House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION—TWELFTH PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, November 21, 1912.

The Parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the 21st day of November, 1912, met this day for the despatch of business.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication from the secretary of His Royal Highness the Governor General as follows:

Ottawa, 21st November, 1912.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that His Royal Highness the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber formally to open the session of the Dominion Parliament on Thursday, the 21st inst., at three o'clock.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

H. C. LOWTHER, Lt.-Col.,

Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

A message was delivered by Major Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Royal Highness the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber:

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the House having attended His Royal Highness in the Senate Chamber, His Royal Highness was pleased to deliver a Speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Honourable Gentleman of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have during the past summer spent several months in visiting the principal cities and towns of Canada from coast to coast, and have endeavoured to make myself as far as possible acquainted with the conditions prevailing.

It has been a source of the deepest satisfaction to me to see the almost universal prosperity which reigns throughout the Dominion, and to witness the energy and enterprise which are shown in the developing the rich resources of the land.

It is most gratifying to observe that the trade of the Dominion is increasing rapidly and steadily, the aggregate trade for the last fiscal year being the largest on record. During the present year the same steady increase has been noted, and it is anticipated that the total volume of our trade for the present fiscal year will greatly surpass that of any previous year in our history.

The revenues of the Dominion continue to expand, and in every branch of business and industry there is a remarkable activity which gives assurance of continued progress and prosperity.

A copious and welcome stream of immigration has poured into our country during the past summer. The volume of immigration during the present year is greater than during any corresponding period of our history, and in larger measure than usual it has been drawn from the British Islands.

The labours of the husbandman have been blessed with an ample return; and, although in some districts the weather has been unpropitious for the harvest, it is expected that the total value of our field crops will be greater than in any previous year.

Papers will be laid before you which embody trade arrangements that have been consummated between the Dominion and certain of His Majesty's possessions in the West Indies. It is hoped that these arrangements will prove of great advantage not only to those possessions, but to Canada as well. A Bill will be introduced for the purpose of carrying this agreement into effect.

During the past summer four members of my government conferred in London with His Majesty's government on the question of Naval Defence. Important discussions took place and conditions have been disclosed which in the opinion of my advisers render it imperative that the effective naval forces of the Empire should be strengthened without delay. My advisers are convinced that it is the duty of Canada at this juncture to afford reasonable and necessary aid for that purpose. A Bill will be introduced accordingly.

A contract for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway from LePas to Port Nelson has been awarded and the work is being pushed forward with all possible speed.

It is abundantly evident that the highways of Canada constitute an important part of an efficient scheme of transportation. The necessity for improving our existing facilities in this regard is manifest and a Bill will be introduced for the purpose of enabling the Dominion to co-operate with the provinces in the accomplishment of this most desirable purpose.

It is satisfactory to know that the proposal of my government to co-operate with the governments of the various provinces in promoting the agricultural industry has met with hearty approval. The appropriations which were made last session in connection therewith have proved to be of marked benefit to the country. After a careful study of the whole question my advisers are convinced that co-operation with the provinces on well defined terms and conditions will achieve the best results along the lines of agricultural instruction. Any such policy to be effective must be continuous. Accordingly, a Bill will be introduced by which a substantial amount of money will be set apart from the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the purpose of assisting the provinces for a term of years in this highly important national work.

My government has succeeded in securing certain reductions in cable rates and will continue its efforts to obtain further reductions.

Under existing legislation the charters of the banks will expire on the 1st day of July next. A Bill revising and extending these charters will be submitted for your consideration and approval.

Several other Bills will be submitted, including measures providing for increased representation of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in the Senate.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the last fiscal year will be laid before you. It will be satisfactory to you to learn that the revenue has been ample to cover both ordinary and capital expenditure.

The estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted at an early date. They have been prepared with due regard on the one hand for economy, and on the other hand for the necessary development of the resources of the Dominion.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I invite your earnest consideration of the subjects to which I have alluded and I invoke the blessings of Divine Providence upon your deliberations.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS: In the absence of the First Minister, I beg to move:

That the Speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament of the Dominion of Canada be taken into consideration on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROGERS: In the absence of the First Minister I beg to move:

That the order for the consideration of a motion for the Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, have precedence over all other business except introduction of Bills until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROGERS: In the absence of the First Minister, I beg to move:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House under Rule 10; said committee to be composed of Messrs. Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Reid (Grenville), Pelletier, Pugsley, Stanfield and Pardee.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

William Foster Garland, Esq., for the electoral district of Carleton, Ontario, introduced by Hon. J. D. Reid.

Alexander Morrison, Esq., for the electoral district of Macdonald, introduced by Hon. Robert Rogers and Hon. W. J. Roche.

Pierre Joseph Arthur Cardin, Esq., for the electoral district of Richelieu, introduced by Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Joint report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Rogers.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at 3.58 p.m. until Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, November 25, 1912.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the table my recommendation in regard to the promotion of Mr. Charles Steedman Blue and the appointment of Messrs. Earl C. Young and Frederick W. S. Galbraith to the positions of offical reporters of the debates of the House, together with the Clerk's report in regard to the same.

COMMISSIONERS OF INTERNAL ECONOMY.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN presented a message from His Royal Highness the Governor General, which was read by Mr. Speaker, as follows:

His Royal Highness transmits to the House of Commons approved Minute of Council appointing the Hon. George Halsey Perley; the Hon. Louis Philippe Pelletier, P.M.G.; the Hon. William James Roche, Minister of the Interior; the Hon. John Dowsley Reid, Minister of Customs, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 11th chapter of Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, intituled: 'An Act respecting the House of Commons.'

POLLUTION OF STREAMS.

Mr. GEORGE H. BRADBURY (Selkirk) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, respecting the Pollution of Navigable Streams.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. BRADBURY: The Bill is similar to that which I introduced a year ago, but which, owing to pressure of business in the House, did not make very much progress. The intention of the Bill is to prohibit the depositing of sewage in navigable streams or streams tributary thereto, and it proposes to inflict a severe penalty for any violation of its provisions by any corporation or municipality or private individual. Every hon. gentlemen in the House must realize the great necessity there is for this Bill, and on the second reading I will explain its provisions more fully.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE USE OF FLAGS.

Mr. GEORGE H. BRADBURY (Selkirk) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, respecting the use of flags.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. BRADBURY: I introduced a Bill similar to this a year ago, but it was not proceeded with owing to pressure of business in the House. The Bill makes it an indictable offence for any person or persons to deface any flag of the British Empire in this country. Every hon. gentleman has no doubt seen a beautiful Union Jack or red ensign with the name of some hotel printed across its face, or perhaps he may have seen it outside an auction room announcing the sale of some commodity. This Bill prohibits the use of the British flag for such a purpose. It also provides a severe penalty for any indignities that may be offered to the flag. Every member of the House can recall some serious case of indignity offered to the British flag and this Bill provides for the punishment of those guilty of such an offence. On the second reading I hope to convince the House that this Bill is necessary.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. J. H. RAINVILLE (Chambly-Verchères: (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), that the following Address to tendered to H.R.H. the Governor General humbly thanking H.R.H. for the gracious Speech he has kindly made to both Houses of Parliament at the opening of this session.

Sir, it is an honour, the worth and the danger of which I both realize, to be called upon to move the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne; and that honour redounds on the constituency which I represent.

However, I feel greatly comforted at the thought that my task is lightened to such an extent by the very progress the country has accomplished, and within so short a time, the bare facts being eloquent enough to dispense me with any lengthy disquisition on the subject.

We are in full prosperity. Older countries admire and proclaim the magnificent results effected through our youthful energy. Our development has been going on for a period of forty years, and we have grown in wealth and power.

The first thing to be done was to open the country to enterprise, in order to allow its immense resources to be developed through the establishment of transportation facilities. So we started building railways, we covered the country with a network of them. Having bound the Eastern seaboard to the centre of the continent, we then boldly set ourselves to the task of reaching the Pacific seaboard through the unexplored region of the interior. The leaders in this venture were men of indomitable energy, and the outcome was such as to amply vindicate the stand they had taken. The rich and fertile West was put under cultivation; large areas were seeded down, and rich harvests obtained in return. To-day Western wheat is a matter of pride to us, and not very long ago the Minister of Commerce victoriously vindicated its superiority in the hearing of the Empire.

Meanwhile we continued carrying on our original policy. Further transcontinental lines were built. Hardly had these new districts been opened up, and even before the building of the railways had been carried through, prosperity, which has always remained faithful to us, hastened to crown our efforts.

As soon as we realized the significance of our progress and the further possibilities which it implied, we made up our minds to organize our forces and protect our territory. Then it was that we outlined a fiscal policy having for its object the safeguarding of our industries.

The treaty concluded in 1854 between Canada and the U.S. had just been repealed. The country had for some time been dreaming of free trade; but very soon the people's will restored to power those who deemed it proper to safeguard the Canadian nation against powerful competitors.

Such was the origin of that policy of moderate protection which ensured the development of our trade. Inspired by these wise provisions, Canada realized that its primary aim should be to develop the resources, the significance of which is fully appreciated.

Sir, to recall the events which occurred in the meantime, is to picture a period of uninterrupted progress. Our trade, which, in 1868, aggregated $131,027,532 amounted in 1888 to $201,097,630. According to the revised figures of the Statistical Year-book, it reached in 1911 the sum of $769,443,905, and yesterday, that of $874,637,794.

One would have to go through every heading under which our national resources are classified in the blue-books. Forests, agriculture, live-stock, fisheries, mines, &c., would have to be taken up in succession and the figures showing the magnificent results obtained throughout would have to be quoted, so as to let the people judge how truthful and encouraging and eloquent they are.

It has often been contended by some that this success is attributable to Providence, while others think the party in power should take the credit to themselves. Both viewpoints can be defended. Of course, governments can take advantage of the blessings which Providence bestows on us. Should they neglect to do so, the national heritage would dwindle to nothing, in spite of its original wealth. I am entirely free to say that the governments which we have had since 1879 have made an excellent use of the National Policy; but more particularly do I believe and state that if our country has reached to such a point of development, it is due, in the first place, to the energy and spirit of enterprise of the people of this country and to the policy of those who realized from the start how important it was that we should be in a position to develop our industries by means of moderate protection. It is owing to them that we have succeeded. As a proof, their policy is still in existence, and even the staunchest Liberals have not dared to do away with it.

Two names are more particularly to be quoted in this connection; two great men are to be remembered by those who are anxious to find in history the true explanation of our success.

Those who understood our youthful community, those who did not hesitate, in spite of the difficulties in the way and the uncertainty of the results to be expected at the time, to start nation-building; those whose insight into the future was far-reaching enough to inspire them with faith in our possibilities; those who applied themselves energetically to carrying out the splendid policy suggested to them by a legitimate and noble ambition; those who persisted until death in spreading their views, in vindicating them and in working for their triumph, these men, I say, have a right to expect from us, to whatever party we belong, the supreme recognition which is due to nation-builders, some evidence of our gratefulness and admiration. And such is the view taken by us, since we all acknowledge to-day the greatness of the work accomplished in our midst, with such a firm and confident heart, by Sir John Macdonald and Sir George E. Cartier.

Sir, what has the future in reserve for us, and what should be the aim of our further efforts?

Since September 21, 1911, the Conservative Government, supported by the immense majority of the country, have taken in hand the destinies of the nation, and the pace of progress is not any the slower.

I do not propose taking up the time of the House by a consideration of figures which we will be called upon to consider in the course of this session. There are, however, a few points on which I would like to dwell.

Canada's finances are in a most prosperous condition. Our revenue is increasing by leaps and bounds. The figures for the last year, which have just appeared in the blue-book, exceed even our most sanguine expectations. Our receipts from the consolidated fund have reached $136,108,217.36, and the expenditure on that same account a total of $96,161,440.77, leaving a surplus of $37,946,776.59. The expenditure on the capital account amounted, cross entries included, to $38,980.641.43. If to our surplus receipts, there be added $1,156,456.16 for the sinking fund, there remains a balance of $122,591.32 which will go to reduce the national indebtedness.

Wholly by means of our ordinary revenue and without borrowing, we have succeeded, Mr. Speaker, in meeting all expenditure on capital account, and besides we have cut down to a certain extent the national debt. Besides, it is expected that henceforth we shall be in a position to reduce the debt by a still larger amount, through the wise and prudent policy followed by the hon. Minister of Finance.

Sir, a moment ago, I pointed to the development of our trade during the last fiscal year. Let us consider the amount of our imports during the twelve months ended September 30, 1912. They aggregated $616,-842,090, while in 1911, on the same day of the year, they reached $496,837, 471, which means an increase for the year of $120,-004,619, that is to say of $10,000,000 per month. Customs duties collected in 1912 during the same period amounted to $102,-695,974.76, while in 1911, they had not exceeded $78,792,125.49. In other words that means a surplus for the public Exchequer of $23,903,849.27, i.e., in round figures, of $2,000,000 per month. Such a brilliant state of affairs should prove encouraging to us, and nobody will blame the Government for bestowing the greatest attention on the trade question.

Sir, in passing allow me to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to the thorough and successful work which is being carried on in our midst by the hon. Minister of Commerce. Last year he carried through a Bill for the inspection of grain, and provided for a special commission appointed to look after that important interest. The Government have built at Fort William an elevator to be run under their supervision. By means of such legislation and of strict government control, an effective system of inspection is ensured.

The organization of our service of commercial agencies in foreign lands is now an accomplished fact, and we are assured of the co-operation of the British authorities. The Department of Commerce is from day to day in receipt of fuller information. A statistical commission has been appointed for the purpose of re-organizing the various branches, and the department is in hopes of establishing shortly a system of statistics of interprovincial trade which will be of a nature to help considerably our business men. As regards our intercourse with outside countries, the department has already initiated and is still pursuing its policy of reciprocity with the British colonies.

Sir, it would be an easy matter to take up the various departments and to show what work they are doing. Once more, it it will be found that equal progress has been accomplished by the Departments of Public Works, Post Office, Interior, Marine, Inland Revenue, etc., concerning which my hon. friend from Kingston will more particularly acquaint the House. Similar activity is apparent everywhere, and everywhere there is a like desire to increase the welfare of the country. As a matter of fact the government have improved the postal service, extended help to the railway companies, induced the House to grant a million dollars towards the improvement of highways, a proposal which for party reasons was rejected last year by the Senate and will be once more submitted to the representatives of the people, providing, as I hope, for a still larger expenditure.

Let me congratulate the Government on the substantial help extended to the farming community through the putting of an amount of a half million dollars at the disposal of the various provinces in aid to agriculture.

That generous deed has not yet given the full results which it is expected to give; but I am confident that such beneficial result will go on increasing for the future welfare of that important class so much in need of encouragement, so as to enable it to overcome the innumerable difficulties in its way, that poverty which is often an inducement to emigration.

If it be true that the Government intend increasing this year the grant to agriculture, allow me, Mr. Speaker, to make a few suggestions. Most of the Quebec constituencies are situated at great distances from agricultural schools, and it is a rather difficult matter for farmers to send their children thither. Would it not be advisable to encourage the providing of special classes of agriculture in connection with the business colleges throughout the province? Would it not also be a good plan to increase the number of model farms, to grant each year special and substantial prizes for the best kept farms, and to appoint men for illustration purposes in the various counties?

But what I am more especially expected to solicit from government for this year, is a grant to agricultural societies towards improving their exhibition grounds and buildings with a view to imparting to farm boys an adequate idea of the importance of this feast of agriculture, at which, once every year, farmers from the various parts of the country congregate, compete and compare notes.

Such action of the Government will, I am confident, instil courage in every heart, will do away with apathy, and create a race of sturdy workers, who realize what agriculture means to a country in the shape of cheer and comfort; and then, instead of deserting their village, they will hearken to the great voice of Mother Earth, and huddle around the parish church, whose steeple, the symbol of hope, seems to watch over every home.

Agriculture no longer ensures stability. Young men leave the farms without heed of the future. They take to the cities, there to live under conditions at best uncertain, very often miserable. To all those deserters of farm life, to all those place seekers who idle in the streets and increase the number of unemployed, I suggest that they meditate the following lines of the poet so touching and yet so true for them as well as for us:

Et comment se fait-il, voilà ce que j'admire,
Qu'aucun père, à son fils, ne s'avise de dire:
Paris est encombré de hardis compagnons,
Retourne aux champs déserts, aux champs dont nous venons.
Portes-y ta jounesse et tes saines idées,
C'est là qu'est le salut de la société.
Remettez en honneur le soc de la charrue;
Repeuplez la campagne au dépens de la rue;
Grevez d'impôts la ville et dégrevez les champs,
Ayez moins de bourgeois et plus de paysans.

Sir, I cannot help pointing out that Canada's forward march has continued steadily and successfully without the help of reciprocity with the United States. I am satisfied that the development of our trade with England and its overseas dominions will be more beneficial to our economic progress and to the expansion of our national resources, than would have been the depressing outlook pointed to in the famous Taft-Roosevelt correspondence.

Sir, among other changes outlined in the Speech from the Throne, I notice the revision of the Banking Act. The upholding and safeguarding of our credit are things of the greatest importance, and the circulating medium, as well as deposits, should be surrounded with every guarantee the legislator is able to provide.

Lastly, Sir, a question of the greatest import for our country at this iuncture, is that relative to its share in the defence of the empire of which Canada forms part.

We are not all agreed as to the form that contribution should take, but from one end of the country to the other, Canadians are unanimously intent on maintaining England's supremacy at sea, in the interest of the whole British Empire.

And should any one doubt my words, I might read the resolution of 1909. I might even quote, if it were deemed necessary from an editorial of 'Le Devoir', of October 12, 1912, wherein the following words appear: 'The Nationalists have never contended that Canada should not do anything for the safety of the Empire.'

However, Sir, let me state very plainly my mind in this connection. Europe is threatened with a general war. It is not yet known whether the great powers will allow the small Balkan states to extend their boundaries. The decisive victory won by the Bulgarian army has unexpectedly set diplomacy on the alert. Inevitably the powers will have to intervene, and it is a difficult matter to foresee what will be the outcome as regards European intercourse. England is not a disinterested onlooker; she will likely have to take a stand, and if war breaks out, an array of all her forces will be in order. Under the circumstances, the stand taken by the government will be readily understood.

If we are rightly informed, the Government propose introducing this year a provional measure of assistance, reserving the right to consult the people, when the time comes to provide for a permanent contribution, and such contribution, if and when it is granted, to be made dependent on the right of representation in the councils of the Empire. That is the purport of the statements made in England and in this House, on behalf of the Government, by the Right Hon, Prime Minister who has the support of the country.

To my mind, that is a reasonable proposal and neither our autonomy nor our constitution will suffer thereby.

As for those who would recklessly refuse to do anything to help Great Britain, the country, I am satisfied, would rebuke them in the words of a great French orator, Mr. Paul Deschanel:

How we do prefer these wise great men who set a limit to their field of activity and keep the upper hand over situations which they have themselves marked out. They first modify their plans to suit the men and things they have to deal with, but later on these will be made to conform to their views. They abide with their times, in order to better influence and direct them; they hold what they have, because they are careful not to take more than they are able to hold. How we do prefer those well-tempered, subtle and keen minds, a Richelieu, a Frederick, a Cavour, to those demi-gods, those fatal and often blind powers, who by their wild leaps and foolish ventures, throw entirely politics out of kelter.

Sir, such are the few considerations suggested to me by our political situation. I firmly believe that we have wisely carried on the work outlined in days bygone by the pioneers of this country. We should remain confident. To-day the attention of the whole world is centered on Canada. Its resources are known, its success applauded. With sufficient boldness and self confidence, Canada goes on its way, showing its prodigious force of expansion. Its merchant navy scours the seas, and last year we were building railways in countries as far distant as Austria. Its happy inhabitants are full of energy and of hope. Given its resources, the wealth it holds from a bountiful nature, the intellectual forces which are at its disposal, it is bound to make rapid progress on the road to success, whose horizon expands infinitely before our eyes. Canada is bound to grow, full of youthful confidence and vigour; and thanks to the carrying out of a healthy and rational policy, we shall witness with pride the fulfilment of its glorious destinies. Canada for ever.

Mr. Speaker, the Government has done me a great honour, an honour to me in person, an honour to my compatriots, an honour to my province, in entrusting to me the moving of this resolution, an honour accorded to but one other of my tongue during the past fifteen years. This circumstance gives evidence of the good harmony and sympathy which unite my province to the present administration.

Canada to-day is in a condition of unexampled prosperity. Our financial position has never been so good, our customs receipts are increasing by leaps and bounds, our commerce is expanding with lightning rapidity, railroads are spreading their network over the whole Dominion. In all other departments of government there is the same story of abounding increase and prosperity. And all this without reciprocity with the United States. Would that those great statesmen Macdonald and Cartier could view to-day the magnificent superstructure being erected on the foundations which they so ably assisted in laying.

It is with pride, Sir, I refer to the coincidence that the mover and seconder of this Address have the honour to represent in Parliament the two constituencies formerly represented by these distinguished statesmen, Kingston and Verchères.

Sir, perhaps the most important subject which will engage the attention of Parliament this session is the relations between Canada and the Mother Country. In this connection, the Prime Minister and three of his colleagues have recently held conferences with the Imperial Authorities. The result of these deliberations will be given soon to Parliament. My confidence in the Prime Minister is such that when his proposals are announced, I have no reason to doubt that they will be found to be of such a character as to meet with the approval of my fellow citizens of the province of Quebec in common with the rest of the Dominion, because, Sir, we have had the advantage of being a great part of a great Empire, and our success in the past should incite us to so continue, and in that union we shall always know and feel that from across the sea Britain with her arm extended bids us to be of good cheer, and hurl defiance at those who would dare to oppress us.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, since the days when Frontenac, that most intrepid French administrator, first pitched his tents on the shores of what was then known as the Cataraqui river, in the hope of diverting the fur trade of the north and west from New York and the Hudson to Quebec and the St. Lawrence, Kingston has played a not ignoble part in the history of Canada, and on her behalf, Sir, I desire to express appreciation to the right hon. the leader of the Government for his recognition of her in allowing her representative to be heard at this time in what promises to be one of Canada's most historic sessions of parliament. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it is not amiss at a time like this that I should extend to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition the sincere sympathy of those of my fellow citizens of Kingston who do not happen to be of my political faith, at the irreparable loss his party has sustained during the present year in the unexpected death of Sir Richard Cartwright. He was known to us Kingstonians as a courteous courtly Canadian, a man of strong views, who had a singular aptitude for saying what he thought; and, Sir, I feel that, without contradiction from this side of the House, or from that, I may say that Canadian public life is the poorer for the loss of Sir Richard Cartwright, who for so many years was a genuine believer in the politics of the gentlemen who face me.

It is difficult and perhaps odious to make comparisons, and yet I feel that I would be unworthy of my trust if I did not set out, in contradistinction to all that has happened during the recess the trip of the right hon. the leader of the Government to England. Since I came into this House I have been time and again struck by the loyalty that the gentlemen opposite show to the leader of the Opposition, and I would like now to tell them that we on this side feel the same loyalty to the man who is the leader of the Conservative party and the leader of the Government. We admire his courage: we admire his foresight: and may I say that it gave us a thrill of satisfaction during the election just past when he faced an adverse audience and told them that sooner than abandon the principle he held, he would renounce all claim and all chance of ever being Premier of Canada. We know his scholarly attainments; his integrity of purpose. We know his zeal for the public service. We have watched him as ably he led this Government during the past session of Parliament. Sir, it is well known that there is no time in a party's history when disunion is so likely to take place as in its first session of power. Men have not then learned to feel that sentimental bond that binds them together in what may fairly be termed a huge political machine. We on this side admire and respect the man for his courage and tact. And when he went to England we realized that fresh problems faced him. He went to England, and we wondered what would happen. If I may be permitted to say so, if it be not presumption, we read his speeches, we watched his movements from day to day, and we realized that the man was making an impression on the public life of England. English newspapers and English statesmen are slow to show enthusiasm. But in the case of the right hon. leader of the Government they did show enthusiasm. We admired his constitutional carefulness. He did not commit Canada to any definite schemes. He enunciated a clear-cut policy —that if Canada was to assume responsibility Canada must be heard in the councils of the nation. It was with a sense of satisfaction that we awaited his return to this country, and now, Sir, we realize that the name of Borden is enrolled upon that scroll upon which fame has written the names of great Canadians.

I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rainville) who has just taken his seat, in a detailed statement of Canada's prosperity and advancement. But perhaps I may be pardoned if I allow fancy to run away with me for a little while. Let me draw attention to a contrast. The other day a gorgeous scene was presented to our view, when I saw on the Throne a Royal Governor and when the Senate Chamber was filled with the representatives of the wealth, the intellect and the ability of Canada. As I looked upon that scene, with those gothic arches splashed with the colours of the setting sun, I was carried in imagination back to the year 1792, when Governor Simcoe came to Kingston and held his first legislative council in a clap-boarded building which still nestles on the hillside, and which is something like fifteen feet square. Canada has made tremendous advances. We are beginning to feel the first pulsation of nationhood, we are beginning to feel our importance, and, though we know not how, we know not when, yet we realize that the day will come when Canada will be a power in the world's affairs, and we look forward with confidence upon the vision of our future.

But, Sir, it is not my duty to take up the time of the House with discussions of Canada's greatness or of Canada's great men. Certain subjects are referred to in the Speech from the Throne. One of the most important of them is the subject of banking. I doubt if the ordinary Canadian knows by what tremendous steps that branch of Canada's life has advanced. During the twelve months ending April 30, 1912, the paid-up capital of the chartered banks increased from $100,000,000 to $112,038,000, and the rest or surplus from $85,000,000 to $100,038,000. The public deposits in Canada increased from $837,000,000 to $960,000,000, and the deposits outside of Canada from $69,000,000 to $85,000,000. In the same period, the total assets of the banks increased from $1,247,000,000 to $1,439,000,000. The total current loans, representing advances to manufacturing, mining, agricultural and ordinary mercantile businesses grew from $710,000,000 to $833,000,000. At the close of 1911 there were 2,435 branches of banks in Canada, and in 1912 there were 2,793. And yet, Mr. Speaker, our vanity has received some rude shocks during the past few years. We prided ourselves on the soundness of our banking system and the perfection of its organization. Perhaps hon. members will be surprised to know that from 1865 until to-day Canadian investors in bank stocks have lost no less than $40,000,000. In 1890, the banks were reorganized and the Bank Act was revised, and from that day the losses have been not anything like in proportion what they were in the early days of Canadian struggle. But we must not forget that the Ontario Bank, through the reckless expenditure and gambling of its manager, came to grief. We must not forget that the Sovereign Bank came down because high finance ruled its board. We must not forget that the Farmers' Bank became involved because wild finance took possession and had control of its organization. I trust that when the Bank Act comes before the House, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White), whom I have known well for a number of years as a close student of economic and fiscal questions, a man practical as well as theoretical, will see to it that some method is devised by which a more careful audit will be obtained, that the thrift of the investor and the savings of the depositor shall not be entirely entrusted to those who, at times, seem to forget that they are trustees for others. I trust that the Finance Minister will keep in view the fact that we must have the greatest freedom of circulation consistent with safety. The country is growing, and no opposition must be permitted that will prevent the expansion of our financial institutions. I would draw his attention to another factor, and that is that, if it be possible, some means should be devised by which the directors and presidents of banks shall be made to feel the responsibility they bear. There seems to be a belief in some parts of the country that the position of president or director of a bank means nothing, that men's names should be used to draw capital for the institution, but that, having been so used, they have fulfilled the object for which they were solicited. I have confidence in the Finance Minister, that these things have had his careful consideration, and that when the Bank Act comes before us it will be found that reasonable and proper methods have been adopted by him to secure the end desired.

Coming from Ontario, an agricultural province, it probably is wise that I should say something in regard to that great industry. As is well known, the power to legislate in regard to agriculture is concurrently held by the Dominion and the provinces, with this restriction that when there is a conflict of legislation that of the Dominion takes precedence over that of the province. The Dominion and the provinces have carried on work in relation to agriculture for some time, and it is not surprising that, in the elaboration of the work there should have been a certain overlapping and duplication. Perhaps, it might be said that in the main the work of the Dominion has been more experimental and research work and has dealt more with interprovincial and international questions, while that of the province has been educational work and work of demonstration. It was a matter of congratulation last session when the estimates disclosed the fact that the Government had decided to appropriate $500,000 for the purposes of agriculture. Of this amount $175,000 went to the province of Ontario. And it seems, Mr. Speaker, that no wiser or saner course could have been adopted than that a part of the growing wealth of the Dominion should have been placed at the disposal of the provinces where the machinery for administration and education is well established. Education has been defined at the adapting of the individual to the environment in which he is to live, a rough definition perhaps, but if I can judge the work that is being done in Ontario that is the underlying principle of her undertakings. Through the agricultural college, Ontario is trying to teach the scientific principles of agriculture. Through her demonstration work recently undertaken—but since undertaken copied in the States to the south of us by some of the railways and other hugh corporations in the hope of increasing the productivity of the soil—work is being done on the farms of the people.

It is not a case of telling how ; it is a case of showing how. The representative of the district serves the ends of the community in the same way as the doctor, except without fee. This work has been so eminently satisfactory that the money available to the province of Ontario last year has been made use of in enlarging the sphere of its agricultural work along this line. Ontario is trying to make life on the farm more comfortable. We have heard a great deal in the last few years about the high cost of living, and we have read many reports dealing with the various causes leading to that condition. If one reads a report issued by a legislature or a committee whose theories are opposed to free trade, he finds the tariff is accused of being the cause of the increase. And yet men seem totally oblivious to the fact that in England, a free trade country, the increase in the cost of living has been almost as great as in Canada, where we have a protective tariff. Coming from a constituency that is not rural, I know that the increased cost of living is bearing hard on our industrial classes. Ontario is trying to solve the problem of more scientific farming, of increasing the productiveness of the soil by the application of scientific principles, not to lessen the earnings of the farmer, but so to increase his products that they may be sold at a better price in the markets of the cities. Great credit is due to the Hon. Adam Beck for the efforts he has put forth to introduce electricity throughout the western and eastern parts of the province of Ontario, in the hope that the labour of the farmer will thereby be somewhat reduced.

It is a matter of regret to us, Sir, that the Highway Bill introduced at the last session met an adverse fate in the Upper House. It is an old maxim that a chain is no stronger than its weakest link,and if I may change the wording somewhat, I may say that a road is no better than its worst mile. For reasons perhaps that are not altogether an advantage to the country, such a Bill may not become law this session ; but I have reason to believe that those who live in the rural parts of the province of Ontario are not unmindful of the fact that the benefits they might derive from such a measure are not being withheld by the Conservative party.

It may perhaps be a considerable jump, Mr. Speaker, from agriculture to penitentiaries, but it is a jump I am going to try to take. As I study the reports in reference to penitentiaries I am struck with the fact that we have a large mass of unproductive labour confined in these institutions. The problem that confronts the Minister of Justice is great. It is a well-recognized maxim of political wisdom that it is unwise to bring prison labour into competition with free labour ; and I may say that I concur in that principle. It is only just and fair that the man who earns his living by the sweat of his brow should not have the fruits of his labour brought into competition with the products of the penitentiaries. But, Sir, there is another side to the question. While we may have the right to take from a man his liberty because he has broken the laws of society, I doubt very much whether we have the right to allow a man to rot, if I may use the term, in idleness. Something must be done to find employment for these men. The penitentiaries as they are administered to-day, are really homes of idleness. Why should not the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Justice get their heads together, and elaborate a scheme by which every penitentiary in this country would be a farm of demonstration? It may be said, that this will cost money, but everything that is worth doing costs money. Surely it is well worth while doing something to uplift and reform our prison population. I have not the statistics before me, but I was amazed a day or two ago to see the large proportion of men incarcerated in the penitentiaries who were under the age of thirty. Indeed there are persons who are practically children in these institutions, and there is no segregation. A boy under twenty, sometimes only fifteen or sixteen, through an ill-advised judgment of a thoughtless magistrate, is sent to penitentiary when he should have gone to a reformatory. He associates with the most defiled and debased criminals, and yet we expect him to leave the penitentiary a better man than he was when he entered it. Sir, we must look forward to a better day—to a day when our penitentiaries shall not be mere punitive institutions, but shall be, in the full sense of the word, reformatory. I would like to take advantage of this opportunity, Sir, to urge on the ministry the necessity of doing something that will make the men in these institutions more fit when they leave them to earn their living. On a Sunday afternoon I have spoken in the Kingston Penitentiary to 600 men whose faces showed nothing but sullen despair and hopeless sorrow. I believe that something can be done to improve the condition of these men, and I want to urge upon the Minister of Justice, whose humanitarian principles I well know, and on the Minister of Agriculture, who will I know recognize the necessity in this matter, that such steps be taken as will make each penitentiary a demonstrative and reformative institution. There is no reason why cheap land should not be bought and be so developed that the farmers who live in the adjacent municipalities and districts may come and see what is being done, and how they may best improve their own condition. In following out these principles a benefit will be conferred upon the prisoner, because when he leaves the penitentiary he will not be obliged to enter again the city slum with all its temptations, and a benefit will be conferred on the agricultural classes, because from one end of this country to the other the cry goes up for farm help. A benefit will likewise be conferred on the state by freeing it from what must always be a burdensome load.

Perhaps in speaking on the subject of agriculture it is only right that I should say something in regard to immigration. The Speech from the Throne touches upon the welcome and copious flow of immigration that is coming to our shores. Perhaps we are paying more attention to the size of the stream than to the purity of the waters that compose it. The statistics in regard to immigration are amazing. We find that from 1902 to 1912 two million immigrants have come to this country, that we have rejected at ocean ports 8,500 men, that there were held for inspection 41,000, and that 5,600 of those who passed the officers of inspection were deported. I know that statistics are not as a rule welcome to the House, but there is no other way in which I can impress on hon. members the necessity for more rigorous inspection than by drawing their attention to the statistics in this regard. During the above mentioned period there were deported for criminality, 749; vagrancy, 253; insanity, 648; public charge, 2,461; senility, 22; mental weakness, 133; general debility, 226; tuberculosis, 271. And yet the great flow of immigration goes on with careless inspection.

Canada has reached the time when she does not need to take anything but the best. The problem that confronts Canada today is one, not of securing immigration, but of assimilating the immigrant. We heard from time to time during the last parliament, from hon. gentlemen opposite that there was an antagonism between Ontario and the West. Why should there be such antagonism. The best that Ontario has had have gone to the West. What the West does the West does well, and in her efforts to assimilate and develop the citizens from foreign lands she has emptied our schoolhouses; she has made it impossible for us to get teachers for our schools. But there is no antagonism on Ontario's part for this. Ontario is proud to be playing her part, through the little red school-houses of the Western plain in continuing our ideals of order, justice and civilization.

I feel, Sir, that I am now getting on delicate ground, because I want to say a word on the navy question. If I can judge the general attitude of men on this question, it is possibly one of doubt and uncertainty. There is a fine old piece of colonial constitutional loyalty in the address which the Legislature of Upper Canada sent to the King on the 23rd of January, 1826, when they said:

> We also, may it please Your Majesty, disclaim the opinion that because we inhabit a colony remote from the United Kingdom we are therefore not equally interested with other subjects of Your Majesty in every event that can tend to the strength and prosperity of the Empire and equally bound to share in the dangers and misfortunes of any war which may be necessary to vindicate the honour of Your Majesty's Crown or to maintain the rights of the British nation.

The reason I refer to that extract is that it differs so radically from the naval policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite as embodied in their Naval Service Act. I do not wish to precipitate a debate on this question; but, if I understood the debates of the last parliament two things were made manifestly clear: that the Canadian navy was not a part of the British navy, and that by some constitutional declaration of neutrality we were, if so desired, in case of any war, to remove ourselves, so to speak, from the sphere of activity. It is utterly impossible for me, as a lawyer, to comprehend by what declaration Canada, in time of need, can remove herself from the sphere of war unless she declares her independence. That is an objection to the Naval Service Act, and the naval policy of the right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It has a tendency towards a declaration of independence rather than a tendency towards a closer union of the Overseas Dominions with the British Crown.

The Speech from the Throne makes reference to the visit of the right hon. the Prime Minister, and his colleagues to London. It states three things, as I understand it: First, that there is necessity for aid; second, that there is an obligation on our part to assist; and, third, that we are willing to do something. The conditions, as I said a moment ago, are not outlined to us, so it is impossible or at least difficult to debate the question with any degree of fullness. Even the cursory reader cannot help being struck with the tremendous growth of the navies of the foreign powers. In looking through a return lately published by the British Government I find that the growth of naval expenditure by the chief European powers within the last decade has been as follows:

Great Britain ..	£31,000,000	£45,000,000	50%
France..	14,000,000	18,000,000	30%
Russia..	9,000,000	18,000,000	100%
Germany..	9,000,000	22,000,000	140%
Austria-Hungary	2,000,000	6,000,000	300%
Italy	5,000,000	9,000,000	90%

Can we be blind, Mr. Speaker, to these conditions? It is all very well to say that diplomacy may smooth the way. Diplomacy may tend to peace, but when the test comes England's right can only be maintained by England's might, and I say it is the duty of England and of the Overseas Dominions to see that that might is available when the time comes. The critics of the right hon. leader of the Government, say that, even assuming that the condition is critical, there is no obligation on the part of Canada to contribute, and they give various reasons for their belief. Some advance the Monroe doctrine. They say that the United States will not permit any foreign country to get a hold in Canada. When Mr. Speaker, did Canadians become so weak that they relied on the support of a foreign nation for their autonomy? If I understand correctly the spirit and intention of the Canadian people, they are determined that their nationalism will never rest on the will and favour of any foreign power. The critics again say that we owe no duty to England because she has not been fair in diplomacy. They quote Maine, Vermont, Oregon, Alaska, and similar cases. I have not the time, nor has the House the patience to permit me to unwind the tangled web of diplomacy in these cases, and it would be useless simply to contradict and say they are not true; weight would not be carried by my words. But I have no less authority than the Professor of Colonial History in Queens University for saying that in the unwinding of the tangle incidental to Maine and Vermont, he is able to prove that the Mother Country got for us rather more than we were entitled to. Then we have the case of Oregon. Each country had historical claim, and fought for it with vigour. It is within your memory, Sir, how a great party in the United States attained power by the cry of 54:40 or fight. They did not get 54·40 and they did not fight. The President of the day would have fought, but he could not carry the Senate with him, the reason being that they had a war on their hands with Mexico that took up their entire energy. The point I wish to make is that Britain took the stand: we will fight if we have to, but we are going to have what is fair—and Canada got what was fair.

Another argument, which was used in the election recently held in Hochelaga is that England was recreant to her trust and to Canada in that she did not, at the time when the North and South were in the clutches of their struggle, strike a crushing blow at the North. Can one conceive a more Machiavelian impropriety than that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: That England owed no duty to the United States, a nation with whom she was on the friendliest terms, but was recreant to Canada because she did not break every rule of international law and strike a friend when she was in trouble. Let us assume that that would have been a correct policy. What would become of Canada if she depended on principles of that sort? What would become of Canada if England were in trouble and other nations assumed that as a straight and honest foreign policy?

Another point is raised. They tell me that if the policy of the right hon. leader of the Government prevails we shall divide Canada into two parts, that we shall have Quebec on the one hand and the English speaking provinces on the other. I cannot believe these foretellers of such dire forebodings.

My mind goes back in history to the time when, in 1775, the revolting American colonies used every wile to win the French Canadians from their allegiance to the British Crown ; my memory goes back through history to the war of 1812, when French Canadian blood watered the lower provinces for the maintenance of British supremacy ; history tells us how, in 1840, the French Canadian people, more numerous then than the people of Upper Canada, threw in their lot with us for a united parliament in order to better the conditions of Canada ; and again, if more recent allusion is necessary, I have not forgotten that, in 1867, Canada, from one end to the other, united, with hardly a dissenting voice, in so far as the provinces were concerned, to bring about Confederation.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat, has drawn attention to the fact that it is his privilege and mine to represent the constituencies which were at one time represented by Cartier and Macdonald, and, Mr. Speaker, in that fact, we, or at least I, feel a tremendous responsibility. It is not the responsibility of a man who ever expects to do much in politics, but it is the responsibility of doing well the little we have to do. And if my hon. friend and myself represent in that way the union of these races, there is no antagonism between Quebec and the other provinces. Canada is a united Canada from one end to the other.

You may say that there is a menace, or that there is not a menace, that the British Colonial policy was a poor policy or was a good policy, that we owe nothing to England for anything which she has done for us ; but, Sir, when the last word is said, when the last argument is advanced, the question we have to answer in this Parliament is this : is the British Empire worth preserving ? If the British Empire is not worth preserving, if it has outlived the sphere of its usefulness, then let it follow the other empires of the world and go into oblivion ; but, if the British Empire is worth preserving, let us see that we do our part. Some one has said that Rome was the lone mother of dead empires. But Britain is the loved mother of living nations. She has realized what the protection of her great empire means as no other world power has ever done. I am not blind to the picturesqueness of nationalism. Being Scotch, my blood thrills at the efforts of the Scottish people to maintain their independence against the aggression of their southern neighbours. I can appreciate the literature, the philosophy and the culture of Greece, and I understand that the union of the German provinces was brought about that the people of that country might have fuller opportunity for national development and advancement. The term 'Empire', in the working out of the problems of diplomacy, has been given a new and fuller meaning by British statesmen. I am an imperialist and I believe that, in the proper acceptance of the term, the great majority of the members of this House are Imperialists; Imperialists in the sense that we realize that the British nation has still a great work to do, not in wars of aggression, not in the acquisition of more territory, but in the maintenance of the world's peace. We must realize that the only way to secure peace is, in quietness of spirit, to make the defence of the Empire so sure that the powers of Europe will see that armaments launched against them, will be courting the fate that awaited the fleets of Phillip and Napoleon, and in giving effect to this policy we would be taking a practical step towards the Parliament of man, the federation of the world. I have much pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in seconding the resolution first moved.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, though there is very little with which I can agree in the observations with which we have been favoured by the hon. member for Champlain and Verchères (Mr. Rainville) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), it is certainly my pleasure to offer to them on this occasion the congratulations which the House is always happy to extend to its young members under similar circumstances. I am particularly grateful to the hon. member for Kingston for the very gracious tribute which he has paid to a citizen of Kingston—I mean the late Sir Richard Cartwright—who, for many years, occupied so conspicuous a place in the public life of Canada. The efforts of the hon. the mover and the seconder of the Address were certainly very creditable, all the more creditable because of the fact that, in the Speech which was placed in the mouth of His Royal Highness by his advisers, there was very little from which they could draw any inspiration. The Speech is remarkable both for what it contains and for what it does not contain. From the point of view of the Government the Speech contains just as much as could not be excluded from it, and, from the point of view of the people, there are many subjects of the greatest importance to which the attention of the House should have been directed.

Of course, everybody expected that the Speech would mention the extended trip of His Royal Highness over the whole continent from Prince Edward Island to Prince Rupert and even to the frontier of Alaska, and the House, I am sure, will only be too glad to extend to His Royal Highness its appreciation of his determination to become acquainted with the range of the vast country over which he is called upon to preside.

Everybody expected also that some reference would be made to the good crops with which we have been blessed—not as large as we might have expected, because, as is suggested in the Speech, the almost constant weeping of the heavens since the 21st of September, 1911, has marred what promised to be a most bountiful crop during the past season. But, still, for its abundance we are certainly most grateful to Providence, and, if Providence could be depended upon to market this crop advantageously the farmers of the West would have additional cause for gratefulness to the Heavens, because, under this Administration, Providence is the only power upon which the farmers of the West can rely for the marketing of his crop. The best the Government could do for him was to ask the railways and the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington to give him a favourable tariff so that he could take his grain over American railways to American shipping ports, with possible injury to his loyalty and the opening of a possible way to annexation, so far at all events, as Tory electors are concerned.

Of course, it was to be expected that we would be asked to ratify the trade agreement which has been made by the Government with a section of the West Indies known as the Bahama Islands, and I can assure my hon. friend that it will be our pleasure on this side to ratify that agreement if the terms are not too outrageous. The principle is right. The effect will not be much, because, after all, the market which is to be opened to the Canadian producer in the Bahamas is not of very great magnitude. The principle is right, I say, because at the present moment there is nothing of which the Canadian people are so much in need as outlets for their productions.

Every year we get from the farm, from the forest, from the mine, from the sea, far more than it is possible for our people in Canada to consume, and hence we have to find markets for the surplus products abroad. How much advantage can we hope to have from the market of the Bahamas? Here is the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1911, and this report shows that the Bahamas imported products to the value of $1,601,201 and exported products to the value of $946,175; the total annual trade of the Bahamas being about two and a half million dollars. And this is the market which is offered to the Canadian people. It is as if a thirsty man were to be offered a thimbleful of water to quench his thirst. But with a government of such contracted ideas as that now in power, we must be grateful for small favours and even a thimbleful of water may be welcomed.

We expected, also, that there would be an announcement that a measure for the improvement of highways would be introduced again this year; the measure which was killed last year by the Government, and not by the Senate, as has been stated in the Conservative press. That measure passed through this House, and it was improved by the Senate; but the Government would rather kill it than accept it as so improved. The Bill came back to the House of Commons with an amendment. Was that amendment at all prejudicial to the provinces which the measure was intended to benefit? Why, the effect of that amendment would have been simply to provide that all the moneys which were to be appropriated for the betterment of highways should be put under the control of the governments and legislatures of the provinces. Under our constitution the highways were under the control of the local legislatures, and, therefore, it was quite in accordance with the spirit of the constitution that the moneys which were to be given for highways should be placed under provincial control. Nay, more, when the measure was introduced by the Minister of Railways, he himself stated that the principle which guided the granting of provincial subsidies would be the guiding principle of the measure; but, although he said that, he refused to incorporate that principle in the Bill; and, when the Senate did so, the Government rejected it. In many of the newspapers supporting the Government, the statement was made that the Bill had been killed by the Senate; but, let it be well understood, the Senate, instead of killing the Bill, improved it, and the Government, rather than accept the improvement, deliberately killed the measure. I express the hope that the Government may have become wiser by reflection, and that it will incorporate in the measure to be reintroduced, the principle contended for by the Senate. But I fear that it is difficult for this Government to learn, and that the Bill will come back just as it was introduced here last year.

Every one expected that there would be something said in the Speech about the naval policy of the Government, but what that policy was likely to be, no man has been so rash as to venture an opinion. What that policy would be the Lord only knew, and the Lord knew because in His omniscience He knew the minds of the ministers when the ministers themselves did not know their own minds. We have had evidence coming from different quarters that the ministers were tossed hopelessly upon the many currents and cross-currents whih raged in the Cabinet, which more than once threatened its very existence, and which at last submerged one of its most important members. Evidences there were, not a few, coming especially from the many semi-official communications to the press, that the ministers were unsteady and variable; as unsteady and variable as an autumnal morning—passing from mist to sunshine, and again from sunshine to mist. At last we are told that the Government have framed a naval policy, that they have completed their meditations and are about to submit it to this House. The policy they are going to propose to us is foreshadowed by information conveyed in this language to be found in the Speech from the Throne:

> During the past summer, four members of my Government conferred in London with His Majesty's Government on the question of naval defence. Important discussions took place and conditions have been disclosed which in the opinion of my advisers render it imperative that the effective naval forces of the Empire should be strengthened without delay.

May I be permitted to observe that this language is absolutely in contradiction of the language which I have heard from the Imperial authorities from time to time. It is in contradiction of the language of Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister; it is in contradiction of the language of Mr. Churchill, the First Lord of the Admiralty; who have not once but many times, on the floor of the Imperial House of Commons, at the Mansion House, on the hustings, on numbers of occasions, told us that England feared no enemy, that she was prepared and ready for all comers, now as ever. But, Sir, I will not prejudge the question; I will not now discuss that statement in the Speech; I will maintain on the present occasion the attitude which I have maintained ever since the prorogation of Parliament last session; I will not discuss the question until the policy of the Government has been disclosed. Whatever may be the information which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has had in England in his conferences with the Imperial authorities, we shall know by and by; and when this information has been placed before us, when the policy of the Government has been announced, we on this side of the House will judge the question upon its merits, guided only by the dual inspiration of what we owe to England as British subjects and of what we owe to Canada as Canadians.

My hon. friend from Kingston is not clear as to the attitude of the province of Quebec upon this question. The province of Quebec, whether it supports the policy of the Government or opposes it, will support it or oppose it, not because it is the province of Quebec, but we will take our stand with our fellow Liberals, and, I hope, with all our fellow Canadians as well. We cannot hope upon this question to be united. Perhaps we may be but that will depend very much on the character of the information which is placed before us. It will depend very much also upon the character of the policy which is presented to us. But whatever may be the policy, whatever may be the information laid before us, if there are in the province of Quebec a few men who say that we owe nothing to England, they are far less numerous to-day than they were previous to the 21st of September, 1911. I see men to-day on the other side of the House—nay, I see men sitting on the Treasury Benches—and we shall have their word in due time, who said, before the 21st of September, that Canada owed nothing at all to England. There has been a material change in their views since that time, and therefore, I have only to repeat that there is no cause for apprehension in that direction. There has been too much in the past of appeals to passion and prejudice, and I hope for my part there will be no more.

There is another subject, one of which there is no mention whatever in the Speech from the Throne, but as to which we should have some information on an occasion like this. That is, the changes which have apparently been made in the character of the Transcontinental railway. Our engineers some ten years ago, when we commenced the construction of the Transcontinental railway, designed a railway which would be in advance of everything that had up to that time been planned, not only in Canada, but in any part of the American Continent; a railway which would be practically level from ocean to ocean, with no grade exceeding 21 feet to the mile. Specifications for such a road were prepared by our engineers. Those specifications were approved by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have constructed their share of the road upon those specifications from Winnipeg westward. The road has been constructed on those specifications from the Rocky mountains to the St. Lawrence. I understand that the Government have now changed the character of the road from Superior Junction to the St. Lawrence. We have never had any satisfactory explanation upon this point; but I agree altogether with the statement of my hon. friend from Kingston, that no road is better than its worst mile, and in degrading that portion of the road the Government are degrading the whole road from ocean to ocean. This is a question which interests not only the province of Quebec, not only the province of Ontario, but the whole of the Dominion from the Maritime Provinces to British Columbia. The matter was mooted in the press more than once, and the only explanation coming from the Government, which was given to us was that nothing had been done; no changes had taken place which would in any way alter the usefulness of the road. That is not a satisfactory answer. That is begging the whole question. We want to know as a matter of fact whether or not the engineers in charge of the work have received instructions from the Government to alter the character of the road, and to degrade it.

I do not at the present time make any charge against the Government. We have not got the information. We will wait for its answer. But we have reason to complain that such a change should have taken place without any information being given of it. My hon. friend had the whole session before him last year, and if he had intended to change the character of that road, he should have given us notice of it, so that we could have debated the matter and could have suggested whether or not it was advisable to take such a course.

Another matter of some importance, which should have been mentioned in the Speech, and of which we should have had some information, is the extraordinary step which was taken last year by the Government in undertaking by Order in Council to amend the tariff and to reduce by one-half the duty on cement. This was a most important step to take under existing circumstances. I address myself in particular to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and I think, upon this occasion he took a course for which no precedent can be found. We derive our revenue from a customs tariff. There are many people who believe that a customs tariff is not the best method of raising a revenue. For my part, I say frankly, I do not believe that it is possible now, or will be for many years, to raise our revenue in any other way. But whether we approve of that system or not, whether we are free traders or protectionists, we are agreed that once a duty has been imposed that duty should not be lightly interfered with. In the first place, a duty should not be levied except after ample consideration as to the amount of revenue that it may produce, and the effect it may have ; because the effect of any customs tariff, even if it be for revenue only, is to create a different atmosphere and therefore likely to produce very serious consequences. For that reason I say that no changes in the tariff should be lightly made. We made in our day a change in the tariff when we abolished the coal duty west of Lake Superior, but we gave the reason. The West was threatened with a coal famine, and it was to avoid that most dire calamity in a country like Canada in the winter time that we resorted to that method. But what is the justification for the course which was taken last June ? We were told all of a sudden that the duty on cement had been reduced by one-half. On this subject there was published in the Canadian Courier in the month of July last, a most illuminating correspondence, in which the charge was made, that the duties were reduced not as a matter of policy, not because of the condition of the country, but simply with the object of influencing an impending election in the province of Saskatchewan. I would not venture to make the suggestion myself, although my confidence in the Government is not very great. But the charge is made by one of their own supporters, and therefore it is more serious for them than if it had come from me. In July last the 'Canadian Courier' published this letter :

To the Right Hon. R. L. Borden.

Hon. Sir,—Some weeks ago the cement interests were advised that certain members of your Cabinet were contemplating the reduction of the duty on cement and sundry other articles, with the sole view of influencing the elections pending in the Northwest provinces. Messrs. Rogers and Cochrane were the prime movers, and according to our information it was intended that the order should be rushed through in the absence of yourself, Mr. White and Mr. Foster. Such an order would be inconsistent with the doctrine of the Conservative party and contrary to the pledges of every leading member of your Cabinet. I may here say that a deputation from companies interested, interviewed Mr. White and Mr. Foster a short time ago and presented our case. The deputation was received with great courtesy and was assured by the ministers that the duty on cement would not be lowered.

However, I see by to-days' 'Daily World,' Toronto, a semi-official statement that this good Conservative doctrine and the personal pledges of nearly every one of your ministers are to be ignored, and the whole cement industry of the Dominion is to be destroyed, all for the sake of assisting Mr. Rogers in his election.

Such a breach of faith on the part of your Cabinet should and would bring about disaster to the party at the next election.

You act on the principle that a little strained money advantage in the West would help your party at present. That might be so, but you should think what would be the effect in Ontario and other parts of the Dominion if you depart from your honoured National Policy and destroy an industry in which so many millions of money are invested. Our company has upwards of four hundred stockholders, and the total number of cement shareholders must be about ten thousand. I ask you, would it pay you to sacrifice these ten thousand, mostly your supporters, for a paltry success gotten by the sacrifice of principles which you and the Conservative party have for years advocated, and which placed you in your present proud position?

No man ever entered upon a career with a better name or brighter prospects. You were admired as a true man by Tory and Grit alike, and it would be a sad blow to the Conservatives to find you breaking a pledge or weakening to the baser elements of your ministry.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier held his party together by the firmness of his management and his adherence to his own personal pledges and the traditions of his party; but in a moment of weakness he listened to the voice of the tempter, to Fielding, Paterson and 'The Globe'—you know the result; his party spurned him and them.

You were elected to fill the place of that great statesman, Sir John A Macdonald, in the Conservative party; you have the ability, honesty and a good name which the whole world recognizes and is waiting to see if you have the generalship and firmness of character necessary to control your Cabinet and not permit them to lead you into shallows and confusion.

I have written this in the interest of the company I represent, and I say sincerely, as your ardent admirer and a life-long supporter of the Conservative party, that I trust, notwithstanding the rumours to the contrary that your decision will be on true nation grounds.

Yours faithfully,

The answer of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) was marked 'confidential' and was therefore not given to the press. But the rejoinder to that answer appears in the same issue, as follows:—

June 10th, 1912.

To the Right Hon. R. L. Borden.

Hon. Sir,—One month ago to-day I had the honour of addressing a letter to you on the subject of the duty on cement, and beg to refer you thereto. On the 13th May I received your prompt and courteous reply. In my letter I called your attention to rumours to the effect that certain of your ministers, in your absence, were pledging your Government to a reduction of the duties on cement, and for the sole purpose (according to rumours) of influencing the elections in Saskatchewan in favour of the Conservative party. In your reply you stated that I gave undue credence to rumours which appear in the press, but it now appears that the rumours as to lowering of cement duty only foreshadowed the event which has taken place; unless the report in the 'Globe' to-day is equally astray. It now appears that what seemed to my credulous mind to be a conspiracy against your honour and the pledge of our leaders has taken place, and all for the sake of influencing a petty local election in a western province.

Your letter to me, which I believed was written in all sincerity, led me to believe that such action was in no way contemplated, and that there was no fear of a departure from the well defined and established policy of the Conservative party.

In view of your letter, as manager of this company, I proceeded in the expenditure of several thousand dollars for the purpose of increasing our output, and have commenced the season on a larger scale than ever before. Had I not believed your letter, or had you suggested the most remote possibility of the lowering of the duty, or even that the matter was under consideration, I would have advised the directors to close the plant and hand it over to the English bondholders.

The action of the Government in this matter is a violation of every pledge given before election, and is distinctly repugnant to the Conservative party. There can be no economic reason for it since there are over one million barrels of cement on hand and sufficient mill capacity to satisfy any possible demand. Had the Government forced the transportation companies to do their duty and carry the necessities of the country at a reasonable rate, there would be no complaint of a shortage in the West or clamour for a reduction of the duty. Whatever may have been your motive in making the order I can assure you that the public will regard the act as an election dodge pure and simple.

It was the hope of the Conservative party that in you they had found a man who was more than a politician, a man who was a statesman, one upon whose firmness they could rely for steadfastness of policy. Lacking such a man at its head, any Cabinet becomes a nest of intriguing politicians.

This action of yours will do more to split Canada at Winnipeg than Sir Wilfrid Laurier did in his whole life, and to advertise and make known the special and divergent interests of East and West. I have travelled all through the West several times, and I firmly believe that eventually the Conservative party has no hope of support from that quarter. Why, therefore, alienate your certain support from the East, and particularly Ontario?

I conclude only by saying that I am much poorer in purse by relying upon your letter upon this subject, as it would be read by any reasonable man, but poorer far in heart and mind when I see the sacrifice to which politicians are driven.

Yours faithfully,

To that letter——

An hon. MEMBER: Name.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The name is not given but we shall have it bye and bye when the papers are brought before the House. To that letter there was an answer as follows:

Ottawa, June 13, 1912.

Dear Sir,—In the absence of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister your letter of the 10th instant with reference to the remission of the duty upon cement has been brought to my attention, and I regret very much that under an entire misconception of facts you should criticise so strongly the action of the Government in this matter. The Prime Minister's statement to you under date of May 13th was absolutely correct because at that date the matter of the cement tariff had not been in any way under consideration by the Government. During the past two weeks, however, an extremely serious situation has developed in Canada, and particularly in the West, due to shortage of cement supply, with an accompanying suspension of buildings, paving and construction work in many localities. From careful inquiries made, it became apparent to the Government that the situation should be remedied at once and a fifty per cent remission of duty was decided upon until October 31st. I am satisfied not only that the action of the Government will meet with the approval of the public generally, but that the fears you express as to its consequence will be found to be not well grounded. The present tariff affords protection of at least sixty per cent to the cement manufacturers, and even with the cut they still have thirty per cent, which is higher than the average rate upon dutiable goods entering Canada. I desire to entirely repudiate your suggestion that the reduction was in any way influenced by political considerations, and feel confident that upon reflection you will agree that the action of the Government was a proper one in the public interest.

Yours very truly,

There is one sentence in this letter to which I will call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White):

The Prime Minister's statement to you under date of May 13th was absolutely correct because at that date the matter of the cement tariff had not been in any way under consideration by the Government.

This implies that long previous to the 13th of May applications had been made to the Government for the reduction of the duty. The fact is that last session it was rumoured in the corridors of this House that the cement duties were abnormal and that the matter had been called to the attention of the Government. But they did not take it into consideration at that time. I wish to suggest to my hon. friend that the time to have taken that matter into consideration was while Parliament was sitting, and that their policy should have been presented to the House for adoption here. It is stated here that the matter was not taken up until after the 13th of May, but the conditions after that date were not changed from what they had been six months before—nor for that matter, were they different from what they are to-day. And, if the duty on cement was 60 per cent, and if reasons were given after the 13th of May why that duty should be cut in two, there must have been just as good reasons why that course should have been taken before that time. The well-wishers of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) of whom I claim to be one, believed that no consideration of political expediency would move him in dealing with a question of the tariff, but that the only reasons which would ever appeal to him for the revision of the tariff, were reasons of political economy. And the views which he had expressed more than once we believed were as firmly rooted in his breast as the Rock of Ages.

There is, in the Speech from the Throne, a most important paragraph, which reads as follows:

Several other Bills will be submittel, including measures providing for increased representation of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in the Senate.

A Bill is to be introduced for increased representation of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in the Senate. With this Bill, as with the naval policy of the Government, I will not deal at the present moment. It would not be fair to the Government, to myself, or to the House, to venture any criticism of that policy, whatever it may be, and we shall wait until it is presented to the House. I presume that the words put into the mouth of His Royal Highness have been duly weighed, and if so, there is only one conclusion to be drawn from them, and that is that the Government have no intention this session of introducing a measure of redistribution. There may be some reasons why the representation of these three provinces should be increased in the Senate—we do not know them. But there is a reason why the representation of those provinces in the House of Commons should be increased, and we do know it. The British North America Act provides that there shall be a census every ten years, and that after every census the representation of the provinces in this House shall be rearranged according to the figures disclosed by the census, upon the basis of population. There is no more important provision in the British North America Act, and I say to my right hon. friend, and to those who sit behind him, that there devolves upon them a consitutional and imperative duty to have this redistribution immediately—not next session, not the session after next, but during this present session. The British North America Act, in section 58, paragraph 5, dealing with the redistribution which must follow the census, provides as follows:

> Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing parliament.

It may perhaps be said, that it is sufficient to have this redistribution made before a general election, but that is not the interpretation which has been given in the past to this provision. The Act provides that the redistribution shall take place as soon as the figures of the census are known. And why? It is true that a parliament may continue for five years, but everybody knows that Parliament can be dissolved at any moment. It may be the will or the pleasure of the Governor General to dissolve Parliament at any time, there may be a crisis which may make this course advisable. Therefore it is necessary that the conditions under which elections must take place should be the same at all times. This has been the policy which has been followed after every census. In 1871, in 1881, in 1891, and in 1901, the redistribution took place as soon as the figures of the census were known. Why, then, this exception? What is the sinister design which exists in the mind of the ministry when they actually contemplate not having the redistribution during this present session? I shall await, what the Government have to say on this important subject. I assume that they have to-day no intention of performing what is an important constitutional duty. If I am wrong I shall be glad to know it, and it will be my duty to apologize, but if I am right the Government may expect to hear of the question again during the present session.

There is one thing in regard to which the Government are silent, that is, as to their achievements—and for a good reason. When nothing has been done, of course nothing can be said. If it can be supposed of governments what is sometimes applied to individuals, that to each one is assigned an angel whose mission is to record his good deeds and his bad deeds, the angel of the present Government as far as good deeds are concerned, has had nothing whatever to do, his pen has been rusty, his page has been blank, and I must say that that angel has indeed had many causes to weep.

When the members of the Government were sitting on this side of the House, they were voluble and indefatigable preachers of virtue. The people took them at their word, believing that their deeds would correspond to their statements, but they have found that these men who were preachers can be little esteemed as performers. My hon. friend who sits opposite, when he was in the place I now occupy, used to deliver homilies on the necessity of having bye-elections on the same day when there were several vacancies at the same time. These homilies have been altogether forgotten. My hon. friend has had the oportunity during the recess of making practical application of his doctrines, but like the old moons, they have gone away—we do not see them any more. There were several vacancies, and several elections took place—I do not speak of the last, which was caused by the resignation of Mr. Monk, but of the others—and there was no reason why these elections should not have been held on the same day. But they were not brought on the same day, they were scientifically spaced with regular or irregular intervals so as to bring the greatest possible measure of success to devoted apostles of the Government.

In other matters I have to charge them with dereliction of duty of the gravest character. I have to say here and now that in the elections in Macdonald and Richelieu there were practices connived at by the Government, which would put to shame the worst record of Tammany Hall. The election in Macdonald was under the charge of my hon. friend the then Minister of the Interior, the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). He stated in one of his speeches, and that speech was endorsed by Sir Rodmond Roblin, that the constituency of Macdonald was full of thieves and thugs from Alberta and Saskatchewan. My hon. friend was shocked by the presence, as he said, of thugs and thieves, and we have, I suppose, to presume that on the other side there were nothing but angels. We shall see the character of those angels. My hon. friend said in his speech that in Macdonald there were thugs and thieves from Saskatchewan and Alberta, but that he had his eye on them, that Sir Rodmond Roblin had his eye on them also, and that the whole machinery of the law would be at their command, and every one of the thieves and thugs would be arrested and properly dealt with under the law. Mark the words, the statement was made not once but several times, that the whole machinery of the law would be used by the hon. minister to put out of business the thugs and thieves of Saskatchewan and Alberta. The machinery of the law was, in fact, at the disposal of the Minister of Public Works, and he used it. A couple of days after this first statement he made the assertion that one of these thugs and thieves had been arrested, was in durance and would be properly dealt with. At that time, it is true, one of the canvassers of Mr. Richardson, the Opposition candidate, had been arrested. His name was Sullivan. Another one was arrested; his name was Walkinshaw. Another man was arrested; his name was Sifton. Another man was arrested ; his name was France. They were all arrested under the machinery of the law; and, Sir, under the machinery of the law these men were put in jail. They were not allowed to see their counsel; bail was refused to them; they were released only when the elections had taken place. And now were they released, these thugs and thieves who were to be looked after by the vigilant eye of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works? What has become of them? The whole severity of the law was to be brought to bear on them. You will naturally suppose that they have been tried and convicted, and are now suffering for their offences. The truth is, Sir, that at this moment these poor men who were arrested by the machinery of the law set in motion by the Minister of Public Works, were, every one of them, absolutely innocent of any charge whatever. One was acquitted honourably, as I shall show presently, and as for the others, my hon. friend, who had set the law in motion against them, did not dare to prosecute them, and to bring them to trial. There was a whole system of terrorism in the election of Macdonald to prevent four honest men performing their duty as British subjects, and to prevent other friends of Mr. Richardson exercising their right as British subjects of canvassing for the candidate of their choice. Sir, I am shocked to see men who can take such a matter as that with such levity as I see on the other side of the House. I followed this matter very closely as the election was going on. In the 'Citizen' of October 12, two days before the election, we read:

Winnipeg, Oct. 11.—The arrest of two more Liberal workers by the provincial police to-day was the feature of the wind-up to the Macdonald campaign, and added fuel to the bitter controversy now raging as to whether these arrests are justified or are merely to intimidate the Opposition candidate's organization.

This is a ministerial paper, a respectable journal of this city. It goes on:

The arrests were made at Cardinal in the French district of Macdonald riding. R. J. A. Prince, one of the men arrested, is a Winnipeg law student whose parents are respectable French-Canadians living across the river at St. Boniface. He is charged with having given a voter ten dollars.

That was published in the 'Citizen' on October 12. On October 18 another despatch came from Winnipeg addressed to the 'Citizen' in these words:

Morden, Man., Oct. 17th.

The case against R. J. A. Prince, of Winnipeg, who was arrested at Cardinal a week ago in connection with the Macdonald election was dismissed here this morning by Magistrate Morden. In dismissing the case the magistrate stated emphatically that the young man should not have been arrested at all and that it was time to put a stop to such proceedings.

This was the only one of the four men who were arrested who was tried. On the same day there appeared in the 'Citizen' a similar despatch with regard to the case of Walkinshaw.

Portage la Prairie, Man., Oct. 17.—D. H. Walkinshaw, who was arrested at Rothwell charged with infractions of the Dominion Election Act in the Macdonald by-election, appeared before Mayor Garland this morning and was dismissed, after F. G. Taylor, who appeared for the Crown had stated that he had no evidence to offer in support of the charge. E. J. McMurray on behalf of the accused asked for a certificate of honourable acquittal which was granted.

Then on October 16 there appeared in the Ottawa 'Citizen' a despatch in these words:

Winnipeg, Oct. 15.—The 'Free Press' this morning publishes what it describes as a swift vindications of Captain William B. Sifton, the Minitonas man who was arrested by the provincial police charged with various offences against the Election Act in connection with some active canvassing he had been engaged in during the by-election here in the St. Laurent district. It was claimed Saturday Sifton had pleaded guilty under section 269 of the Dominion Election Act, but yesterday he pleaded not guilty and the preliminary hearing was set for next Saturday. 'Counsel for Sifton,' says the 'Free Press,' 'then made the remarkable discovery that the inforamtion on which the warrant of arrest was issued was dated October 7, while the alleged offence was not committed until October 10.'

This goes to show that the machinery of the law was set in motion in advance. The despatch concludes:

Later on in the afternoon Provincial Magistrate McMicken stated the case had been withdrawn.

Here is a man, Walkinshaw, arrested, taken to Winnipeg, from Winnipeg taken to Portage la Prairie, kept there in jail, and when the time for his trial came the case was withdrawn because there was no evidence against him.

The same thing applied to the other man, Sullivan. Now, Sir, this is not all. On the following day two personators were arrested by the scrutineers of Mr. Richardson. A day was set for the trial; the plaintiffs, their counsel and their witnesses came to court, and they were told that the men had been discharged from custody, that they had pleaded guilty and had been sentenced to a penalty of $50. The law says that, under such circumstances, there shall be a penalty in money, a fine, or imprisonment. The magistrate undertook to dispose of the case an hour before the time set for the trial. The machinery of the law had been set in motion by somebody, but these men were not allowed to be tried in public. Their case was disposed of in camera. So that at the present time we have no opportunity of knowing what was the extent of their guilt, or whether they should have been punished by a fine or by imprisonment, or who were the parties behind them. That is the way in which the Macdonald election was carried on and won. But, Sir, that is not all. The activity of my hon. friend was not confined to the province of Manitoba. My hon. friend is ambitious in this respect. He had gone to Saskatchewan in the summer; he came to Quebec later on. He came to Richelieu, not himself, personally, but by proxy; he sent a proxy to Richelieu, and the proxy came with his hands full of promises of public works if the electors would vote for the Conservative candidate, Mr. Morgan. I again charge the Minister of Public Works, and I arraign him before Parliament, with having tried to bribe the electors of Richelieu. I call as witness a member of this House, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) and I say, on the word of the hon. member for Charlevoix, that he was sent by the Minister of Public Works to Richelieu to try and bribe the electors. I shall not use my own words; I have the words of Sir Rodolphe Forget published in 'La Patrie,' which is the paper friendly to the Government and especially friendly to the hon. member for Charlevoix. The hon. member for Charlevoix came to the town of Sorel, the shire town of the county of Richelieu and held a meeting, and this is his language as reported in his own paper, 'La Patrie':

He said that he was coming in the name of the government, at the request of the Hon. Mr. Rogers, to beg the electors of Richelieu to send to Parliament a member in sympathy with the present administration.

If my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works had sent the hon. member for Charlevoix simply to ask the electors of Richelieu to send to Parliament a member in sympathy with the administration, I would have nothing to say. He would have been within his rights. I would not have objected had he tried to influence the electors by any honourable means. But the hon. member for Charlevoix did not come empty handed. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman went on and spoke as follows:

I would not come here, said he, until I had the promise of the Government that you would have the marine railway, of which I spoke to you at the banquet offered to Mr. Hazen. It has been promised to you, and I now come to ask you to elect my friend Mr. Morgan, so that Sorel and the county of Richelieu may progress with the assistance of the Government.

I caused promises to be made to me, not electoral promises, but real promises, and I have the pleasure of telling you that if Mr. Morgan is elected your member on Thursday, you will have the marine railway of which you stand in such need, to procure to your city the progress to which it is entitled. I can assure you that you will have this just improvement which has been promised you for the last twenty years, and which you never obtained. You will have it not later than the next session, which opens in one month. The Government on the demand of your member, Mr. Morgan, will have the necessary subsidies voted, one hundred thousand, two hundred thousand dollars, if need be, and you shall have it.

What is your interest, I ask you? I do not want to say anything, gentlemen, of the Liberal party, against Mr. Cardin. Were this a general election, I might probably tell you to vote with your party, but in this election, the interest of the party is not the issue; the interest of Sorel is the sole issue. Well then; it is a Conservative government which is in office. Do you not believe that you must send a member in sympathy with it, so as to obtain all the favours which you may wish for?

That is the way in which it was attempted to bribe the electors of Richelieu.

The bribe failed in Richelieu. Intimidation did its work in Macdonald ; but, in so far as the electors are concerned, we want to feel that such methods cannot be countenanced. It is unnecessary to make any comment upon such practices as these. It is sufficient to bring them to the attention of the House, and I avail myself of the first opportunity, so that they can be stigmatized at once, in the hope that in the future we may be able to prevent their occurrence. Differ as we may upon political questions, we ought after all to carry on our contests in the light of British institutions. I have heard a great deal this afternoon about British institutions, and I agree with everything that has been said, but it is the spirit of the British constitution that we should have fair play. We did not have fair play in these contests, but an attempt was made to debauch the electorate. In view of this, and to bring the attention of the House to the matter, I beg to move that the following words be added to the Address :

We beg to represent to your Royal Highness that in the elections of Macdonald and Richelieu there were practices calculated to terrorize and corrupt the electorate, which were connived at by your Ministers and which deserve the censure of the House.

The amendment having been put :

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will you permit me a correction ? I understand that the commercial agreement made by the Government is not only with the Bahamas, but with the whole of the British West Indies.

Mr. BORDEN: Certainly. I was going to make that correction.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is now on the amendment.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I join with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in the congratulations which he has extended—although in a somewhat grudging manner—to the mover and the seconder of the Address. The right hon. gentleman found very little in the speeches of either of these gentlemen with which he could agree, and I do not wonder at that because their speeches were inspired by a good, strong, healthy spirit of patriotism and optimism. As the right hon. gentleman proceeded I did not hear from him any of the particulars in which he ventured to disagree with what these gentlemen had uttered in speeches which I am sure commanded the attention of the House and which will compare very favourably with the addresses delivered in the past on similar occasions. My hon. friend from the province of Quebec (Mr. Rainville) spoke in commendable terms of the spirit of Canadian unity, which does animate, and which ought to animate, all good Canadians. Does my right hon. friend agree with that? My hon. friend from the province of Quebec (Mr. Rainville) spoke of the marvelous development and progress of this country during the past twenty-five years. Does not my hon. friend agree with that? Why, when he sat on these treasury benches there was little else we heard from him but boasts of the country's progress and prosperity and the additional suggestion, that Providence after all was only a junior partner of the then administration in any benefits conferred upon the country, and that all the progress of this country was due to the measures placed before the House by the Liberal Government and due to nothing else.

I join with my right hon. friend in the tribute he paid to the memory of Sir Richard Cartwright who held a high position in the public life of this country for a very great number of years. Although hon. gentlemen on this side of the House did not see eye to eye with Sir Richard Cartwright on many great public questions, and although he was wont to speak his mind with a peculiar frankness when he was discussing the supposed demerits of his political opponents, I am sure that no one of us had ever anything but the kindliest feelings towards him. Though Sir Richard Cartwright was a man strong and earnest in speech, we knew that after all he was inspired by a kindness of heart which never failed to exhibit itself in the relations of private life.

I would like to pay a tribute here to the memory of my friend, Edward Kidd, a member of this House who has died since last session, and whose friendship, nay more, whose devotion to the party and to myself, was evidenced in a marked degree. When, after the general election of 1904 I found myself, owing to circumstances which I was unable to control, without a seat in this House, Mr. Kidd resigned his seat for the county of Carleton and I had the honour to be elected to represent that county. Afterwards when I was elected for Halifax in 1908 Mr. Kidd succeeded me as member for the county of Carleton. He was a man of few words, but he possessed a great deal of businesslike common sense and was gifted with a very much wider knowledge of public affairs than was attributed to him by those who did not know him intimately. His loss is not only a loss to the county of Carleton but a loss to this House and to the people of Canada.

I join most heartily with what my right hon. friend has said with regard to the visit of His Royal Highness the Governor General to the provinces of Canada since last session. For five or six months His Royal Highness was engaged in traversing this great country from ocean to ocean, making himself acquainted with all its conditions, and becoming seized with the spirit of its people. It was a great task which he undertook, a task which he carried out with that devotion to duty which has characterized him all his life. There is no doubt I am sure in the mind of any hon. gentleman in this House that the visit of His Royal Highness to all these provinces of Canada has resulted not only in a stronger spirit of union between this country and the whole Empire, but in a stronger spirit of Canadian unity and solidarity than even we possessed heretofore.

I now come to some observations of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition with which I am not so inclined to agree. He indulged in some more or less slighting remarks with regard to the arrangements that have been made in Western Canada for the purpose of removing any possible congestion in the transportation of the grain crop. Does my right hon. friend object to these arrangements that have been made? If he does not object, then why does he waste the time of the House in discussing them? We desire to do everything in our power to facilitate the transportation of the West and increasing products of Western Canada, and not only this year but last year we took such action with regard to that as will commend itself to the men of Eastern Canada and to the men of Western Canada as well.

My right hon. friend corrected himself with regard to the West Indies agreement, and he might have followed that example with regard to some other portions of his speech. Ever since the defeat of the Highways Bill, last year, at his dictation—because he took full responsibility for the defeat of that Bill in the Senate—ever since then he has been endeavouring to explain and to apologize for that unfortunate action of his. To-day we have a renewed attempt on his part to explain and to apologize. Well, I can only say to my right hon. friend that the best explanation and apology he can give for that unfortunate action on his part last year, would be a suggestion to his friends in the Senate that when that Bill goes through this House again they shall take good care not to lay unholy hands on it.

My right hon. friend referred also to the naval question and he spoke of certain currents and cross-currents which he said had resulted in the submersion of an important Minister of the Crown. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) is not here to-day to speak for himself, unfortunately he is ill, but I venture to believe that the late Minister of Public Works will be able to discuss his position on that question with my right hon. friend or with any other member of this House. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) acting under a high sense of duty, did see fit to resign his position in the Government, but I venture to think that it will not lie in the mouth of my right hon. friend to utter one word of criticism or reproach against the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) in respect to that. Currents and cross-currents and dissensions—why did not my right hon. friend explain the remarkable change of programme under which he gave up his projected tour in Western Canada? There were tremendous headlines in the Liberal press all over the country, and especially in the province of Ontario, announcing a tour to be made by the right hon. gentleman who was to speak in every province of Western Canada. They were followed by what? By a gathering of certain very influential members of the party in the city of Ottawa, and, if I am not mistaken, within the very precincts of this building. I am not in a position to speak with absolute accuracy as to what took place, but there are rumours that loud tones were heard, that harsh words were interchanged, that fists were even shaken across the table, and that these eccentricities of temperament and temper did not by any means cease when these gentlemen emerged into public gaze. Indeed my right hon. friend was said to have been so very much disturbed by what took place on that particular occasion, that he was not quite himself during the rest of the day, at a public occasion when he had an important duty to perform. As a direct result of these loud and unfortunate dissensions the great western tour was abandoned.

Well, we will go on to one or two more references which my hon. friend has made. He touched on the naval question somewhat lightly. I do not propose to deal with it to-day, because the proposals of the Government will come before Parliament at a very early date, and we shall have full opportunity of debating that question; but he tells us that he had always heard that England feared no enemy. I would rather put it in this way, that the Empire fears no enemy. But, Sir, the fact that the Empire fears no enemy is not a good reason in my estimation why we should delay to a day of possible peril that preparation which ought to be made in advance.

My right hon. friend spoke of change of grades on the Transcontinental railway. I think he will find that my hon. colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals, will have an answer with regard to that particular question, which, whether it is satisfactory to my right hon. friend or not, will be found eminently satisfactory by the people of Canada in every province from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

My right hon. friend has spent a very considerable portion of his speech in reading from a public newspaper a series of letters respecting the reduction on the duty in cement. I observed that my hon. friend the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was not particularly comfortable while he was reading those extracts. Perhaps I may be mistaken in my appreciation of the feelings which animated that gentleman while his leader was discussing that subject. We have heard from a number of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and especially from the hon. member for Edmonton, diatribes without number against the so-called trusts and mergers and the combines, and this very combine, the alleged cement combine, is one that has been held up to contempt and harsh language and obloquy by the hon. member for Edmonton on more than one occasion ; and he even now nods his approval. Now, I would simply like to ask my hon. friend from Edmonton what he thinks of his leader when he poses as a champion of this awful combine. I do not propose to take up time in debating that subject, except to say that it was thoroughly discussed by the Government before the action was taken, that they made themselves acquainted with the facts and the circumstances, and to add further, that before the conclusion of this debate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will state to the satisfaction of the majority of this House and to the satisfaction of the majority of the people of the country, the reasons which led the Government to take that course.

My right hon. friend went on further, and attacked us in anticipation, because he declared that the Speech from the Throne ought to contain a reference to the Redistribution Bill. My right hon. friend is very anxious and very much concerned about an anticipated crisis in the Government. He desires to provide carefully in advance for every possible crisis. I think if he will provide for any crisis which arise in the ranks of his own party, he will have enough to engage his attention, and he need not trouble himself very much about our supposed crisis. I beg to inform my right hon. friend that, as I understand it, and as he understands it, any redistribution measure that may be passed cannot take effect until after the dissolution of the then existing parliament. That is absolutely understood. Now I have under my hand a pretty careful statement of what has been done in that regard since the inception of this Confederation, but I will take only one illustration. As I understand it, in 1901 there was a preliminary report of the census made on the 15th day of August, 1901, and the Redistribution Bill was not assented to until the 24th day of October, 1903, more than 26 months afterwards. The report which we issued to the public was under date of 27th February, 1912. The census of last year having been taken on the basis of June instead of March as in previous years ; and if we put through this Redistribution Bill by April 1914, we shall have made as much progress after the census of 1911 as my right hon. friend did after the census of 1901.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) comments upon the Government's silence as to their achievements. We differ from our hon. friends on that side of the House in that our achievements are such as speak for themselves while these hon. gentlemen were obliged continually to boast of theirs.

My right hon. friend then went on to profess himself shocked in respect of certain misdeeds which he declared to have taken place in the riding of Macdonald and in the riding of Richelieu, and he brought in as incontrovertible evidence of these misdeeds —what do you suppose? Certain newspaper clippings! My right hon. friend, in days gone by, was wont to speak of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, as 'Scrap-book orators.' I venture to think that when a man who has been Prime Minister of Canada and is to-day leader of his party desires to present to the House and to the country a resolution of such a character as that which my right hon. friend has brought forward, for the sake of his own reputation and for the dignity of Parliament, he should desire to be supported by something better than a scrap-book. He will have a test upon his proposed motion. These professions do not come very well from a right hon. gentleman who had to do with the West Huron and Brockville elections, one who obtained the vote of members of this House by his pledge that the investigation into these cases should be carried out to the very end—and yet from the day that pledge was made up to the present time it has not been fulfilled. If he desires to go into these matters and to have recrimination and reminiscence, let me remind him of what took place in London, in Hastings, in Yukon, and in many another election under his regime, the very enumeration of which would occupy too lengthily at the moment the time of this House.

My right hon. friend has referred to a few other matters which we may leave for the moment as they are not of very great importance. The hon. gentleman has been holding a series of meetings throughout the country during recent weeks. He did not, it is true, go to the West, but remained in the East, for reasons into the mysteries of which I do not propose further to pry. But I observe that in his addresses in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec, which were the provinces he visited in this way, he was inclined to condole with the people of this country upon the election of September, 1911. He is not at all concerned, he assures us, about himself, but he is very much concerned for the people of Canada. I would suggest to him that his concern is absolutely unnecessary, for the country is quite contented. I would ask him when next he addresses the people of these provinces to throw aside this depression and gloom and join with the rest of us in endeavouring to do some good work for the country. He bewails the rejection of reciprocity. I do not think that the people, under present prosperous conditions, are at all inclined to sorrow over the verdict they gave on the 21st of September, 1911. Allusion has been made to a certain communication which was made public last spring in April or May, I think —a letter written by Mr. Taft to Colonel Roosevelt, which sets forth:

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not wonder that my hon. friend groans. I will spare his feelings to the extent of refraining from reading that letter; I do not know what the consequences to him might be if I should read it. But I would like to bring to the attention of the House, and of the country, one circumstance in connection with it which is of some significance. There is a very well known and responsible newspaper in the city of New York known as the Evening 'Post'. It was supposed to be thoroughly in the confidence of Mr. Taft and his administration. Any gentleman who is curious in these matters will find in the columns of the New York Evening 'Post' of Friday, May 3, 1912, an editorial article touching this letter, and from that article I will read just one sentence:

> When we recall that the 'adjunct' letter was passed upon by the full Cabinet and by other advisors of the President, the mistake of giving it out appears the more inexplicable.

That is to say, that letter was not merely the personal opinion of Mr. Taft, but was a letter which had been passed upon by the whole Cabinet of the United States, and by other prominent men in that country. This circumstance, it seems to me, gives it a somewhat odd significance. My right hon. friend, notwithstanding, has nailed his colours to the mast—at least we are so informed by his friends, and therefore the statement must be correct; my right hon. friend will not deny it, for this is an extract from a circular used in the West by his friends in a certain recent election:

> The reciprocity flag has been nailed to the mast by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

And if my right hon. friend did not exactly nail it to the mast it was because he seems inclined to pursue his usual course of retiring within the lines of Torres Vedras whenever any difficult or important question is presented for his consideration.

He did, however, tell us at Marieville on the 7th of September: 'My heart and my soul have not changed and my policy has remained the same.' At Cochrane on the 20th of September he said: 'The ideals which we have striven for are stronger than ever.' At North Bay, on the 21st of September, he said: 'On the 21st of September we went down in a noble cause.'

My hon. friend's optimism and courage were very great when he began, but as he proceeded they did not seem to continue, because while at first he was inclined to prophesy the immediate return of his party, yet when he reached Sherbrooke on the 29th of October, after about six weeks of a campaign, in speaking of the next election he said that 'he was not prepared to say that the Liberals would win the first time, but he hoped they would.'

Mr. Speaker, just one moment more. The condition of this country has been described by the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded this debate as satisfactory from a material, industrial and commercial standpoint. There has been expansion of revenue and there has been general development. These are due primarily to the intelligence, foresight, courage and industry of the people, and this Government is prepared to co-operate with the people of Canada in every possible way to increase and advance that development which has been so marked in the past.

My right hon. friend has charged that we have failed to implement pledges. Let me tell him and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, that we have been in power a little more than one year and during that period we have fulfilled at least four times as many of our pledges as these hon. gentlemen opposite in the whole period of their administration. What have we done? We promised aid to agriculture; we brought it in. We promised aid to highways; we brought it in, and my hon. friend's supporters in the Senate defeated it at his dictation. We promised to create a tariff commission; we brought in that measure. We promised terminal elevators, under government ownership and control, and that we would deal with and settle the question of the extension of provincial boundaries; these questions were dealt with last year. We promised that we would proceed at once with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway; the contract has been let for the whole line. We promised to proceed with the equipment of our national ports; they are being attended to to-day. We promised the development of our waterways; and already we have made a substantial beginning. We promised a reorganization of the public service; and we have brought from Great Britain one of the ablest and most experienced men in the public service of that country, whose report I hope will be placed before Parliament at no distant date. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that we are prepared to meet my right hon. friend in any comparison of fulfilment of pledges, and to submit our record in that regard side by side with his when we appeal to the people of this country,—and we do not doubt what the result will be.

At Six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. R. L. Borden) was concluding his remarks, he laid considerable stress upon the fulfilment of promises by the Government of which he is the leader. I am sure the country will be glad to know that we have a government that fulfils it promises, and what it has done we will expect it still to do. But when the right hon. gentleman mentioned to the House a list of the promises made that had been fulfilled, it struck me that possibly there was quite a difference between his point of view and that of other members of the House in regard both to the promises and their fulfilment. If I caught his words correctly, he mentioned amongst the promises that had been fulfilled the promise to grant a Tariff Commission. The country has not got a Tariff Commission. While the right hon. the Prime Minister may juggle with words, the fact remains that if he made that promise it has not been fulfilled. He also promised aid to highways. That promise also, as I understand it, has not been fulfilled. He says the Opposition are to blame; the Opposition say he is to blame. The Opposition may be right; he may be right; but in any case the promise has not been fulfilled.

What is no doubt an important question is the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. He is fulfilling the promise of the Government in that regard. May I suggest rather that the Government of the day are fulfilling the promises of their predecessors in relation to that important work. Supporters of the Government will say that the Government are fulfilling their pledge in regard to the improvement of harbours. Does not the House remember well that it was a part, a very important part, of the policy of the late Government to improve the harbours of the Dominion? And does not the House remember also that it was the part of those who were then in opposition to view with alarm the proposed expenditures of the late Government on these objects just as to-day it is their pleasure to point with pride to the still greater expenditures that they themselves are prepared to make? In regard to these promises there will be no difference of opinion as between the two sides of the House. We are proud to see our successors in office carry out our policy and if it is possible for them to improve on it they will have our hearty co-operation for the welfare of our country.

One promise, the most important made by the Government when in opposition, the promise that achieved office for them, the promise that placed them in power, has not been fulfilled. Surely that promise should be fulfilled if any, and if it is not then our friends of the Government cannot in reason claim merit or credit for the fulfilment of minor promises and especially for carrying out the promises of their predecessors. The promise of which I speak—and I hope I am stating it correctly—was that there should be no more truck or trade with the Yankees. That promise was heralded from every platform. It was that allegation which caused the old flag to wave so tremendously and successfully on behalf of our friends. But the facts are that notwithstanding their accession to power, notwithstanding that they are in a position in which they can carry out their policy, the truck and trade with these miserable Yankees has actually increased under their administration and, more outrageous than that, I believe there has been an increase of percentage as well as an increase in amount. In the face of this absolute failure to implement this most important promise, I ask why should the Prime Minister or his colleagues claim credit or merit for having fulfilled their promises? Why it is a notorious fact that Canada buys from the United States approximately twice as much as she sells to the United States. Under the declaration of policy upon which these gentlemen secured office, first of all, trade between Canada and the United States was objectionable and, in the next place, it was objectionable that we should buy from the United States. But to-day we are buying more from the United States than ever before and we are selling them, I verily believe, proportionately less than in recent years. That is, the balance of trade as between Canada and the United States is more heavily against Canada to-day, under the administration of these hon. gentlemen, than it was under the administration of their predecessors.

But, worse than that, our friends will surely not deny that it was a leading part of their policy to prevent the carrying of trade north and south by railways. They surely will not deny that that was proclaimed on every platform from which they addressed the electors. The Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. White) will not deny that at the last session of this Parliament he declared that to be part of the policy of the Government of the day, and to-day when the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) suggests for a moment to the right hon. the leader of the Government (Mr. R. L. Borden) that there may be something to be asked in regard to the effort made successfully by the Government to have Canadian grain carried to United States ports across the line he replies: Why should it not be so? Certainly why should it not be so. We say by all means it should be when the conditions demand it. It was our friends on the other side who said it should not be so and yet they are helping to make it so and they ask us to give them credit for the fulfilment of their promises. It is true that circumstances required that they should reverse their policy, the policy upon which they were elected, that they should belie the promises made to the electors by which they secured election. It was necessary that they should adopt measurably the policy of their opponents. But having done so it strikes me that the right hon. the leader of the Government (Mr. R. L. Borden) was asking too much of this House when he asked us to give his Government credit for having fulfilled their promises.

Reference was made to the retirement of the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) from the Government and the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) spoke of him as he should speak of a late colleague, in terms of the highest commendation. He said that Mr. Monk in his retirement was actuated by the highest motives. It struck me at the time that it was a fair subject of inquiry what motives actuated those members of his Cabinet who entered that Cabinet on the same terms and under the same conditions and advocating the same principles as the Hon. Mr. Monk and who still remained in the Cabinet. If Mr. Monk in retiring from the Government showed himself to be a high-minded gentleman I forebear to suggest in what position that leaves his colleagues who still remain in the Cabinet. I shall leave that to my right hon. friend the Premier.

I was somewhat astonished to hear the right hon. the Premier dwell at some length on the fact that the right hon. leader of the Opposition had not made a western visit this summer. I could not see the connection between this fact and the subjects under discussion before the House, the subject matter of the Address, or the remarks that have been made on the reply to the Address. This the right hon. the Prime Minister made a matter of importance, and he went beyond that and gave what he asserted was suggested to be an account of a stormy meeting that took place amongst the friends of the leader of the Opposition in connection with this visit. Let me say one word in regard to that. There never was any foundation whatever in any way, shape, manner or circumstance, for any of the suggestions made by the right hon. Prime Minister in that connection. I can only suppose that he arrived at that conclusion by having depended too much upon information derived from the special detective service of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) and that, upon that occasion, I can only presume that the chief of the special detective service had had an attack of the jim-jams and had reported matters which had appeared to his inner consciousness and not matters that had reached him through ordinary sources of information. I would respectfully further suggest that, while this special detective service of the Minister of Public Works may have some usefulness in some regards, its usefulness ceases absolutely when it is required to do detective work.

The Prime Minister was good enough to ask my opinion of what the leader of the Opposition had said with regard to the removal, or partial removal, of the cement duty. I have no difficulty in giving him exactly what I think. I think exactly as the leader of the Opposition expressed himself, namely, that if the duty upon cement should be reduced, and I have no hesitation in saying that I believe it should, it should be reduced by Act of this Parliament at the proper time, in the proper place and in the proper way; and that it would not be a proper action by the Government of the day to make that reduction having a view to the effect that it might be expected to have upon a provincial election rather than upon the welfare of the country. I am against the cement duty. I am for a reduction, and if the duty had been reduced at the last session of Parliament the duty would be reduced to-day and it would have remained reduced. It would not have been juggled with to be off to-day and on to-morrow. We had freedom from half of the cement duty during the summer but we are paying the whole of the cement duty now, and I say again that, while there may be emergent circumstances such as occurred in the case of the removal of the coal duties by the late Government, there are no such emergent circumstances in the case of cement. If the cement duty was too high in May it was too high in February and if it was too high in May it was too high in October. I have no hesitation in saying that it was too high in both February and October and I look to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) to bring in a measure to remedy that condition in the proper way and at the proper time, and if he does he certainly shall have my support.

I was somewhat astonished at the manner in which the Prime Minister saw fit to consider—or to refuse to consider—the position placed before the House by the leader of the Opposition in regard to the Macdonald and Richelieu elections. I was educated, I will admit, in the belief that there was a great deal of iniquity in the Tory party. I have always been glad to believe that my education was, to some extent, misdirected. I have always been glad to think that, especially when persons acquired membership in that party from amongst those who were formerly Liberals—I shall not mention any names—the gentlemen who became members of that party brought with them to some extent the leaven of their Liberal principles and improved the party to that extent. Therefore, I was astonished beyond measure that the Prime Minister, with his traditions, and, may I say, his record in Opposition, should have seen fit to ignore the statement of fact placed before this House and to merely reply: Oh, that was an election occurrence such as took place on former occasions and in other places.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I might trespass upon the time of the House, I wish to place before you and the House facts which I think will establish that there were certain occurrences in connection with the election in Macdonald, Manitoba, that are unique in the history of this country, that no other such occasion has ever yet arisen within the knowledge of this Parliament and that it does claim at hands of the members of this Parliament for the protection of the rights and dignity of this Parliament, the most serious consideration. I do not suggest that, upon any statement of facts I can place before the House to-night, the House will be required to take certain action, but I do say that it is possible to place before the House such a case, such evidence that, unless the House is prepared to go further and make inquiry for the protection of its rights and dignity, this country has entered upon an entirely new political phase the results of which no man can prophesy.

Ordinarily an election contest is dealt with before the courts. The election in Macdonald will be dealt with before the courts. An election petition has been entered and proceedings are now in progress. But there were proceedings in the Macdonald election that do not come within the jurisdiction of the courts, that concern the courts themselves and go so far towards the very fountain of justice and liberty in this country as to demand the attention of the only body that is able to give that attention and that is this Parliament.

I was pleased to hear my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) speak of the might of Britain and the navy of Britain, and also to hear the right hon. the Prime Minister speak in much the same strain. But, let me ask you, Mr. Speaker, why is the might of Britain and the navy of Britain important in the world. Is it because of the number of its ships, and its guns, and the men that are on board its ships, or the money that it costs? Every man knows that the importance of the might of Britain is that Britain stands for the liberty of the subject and the right of free speech. And, it is because it is the belief of the civilized world that the navy of Britain is behind these rights that the navy of Britain is important in the eyes of the world. And it is because of that that the people of Canada and of the islands of the sea are ready to support that navy and to sustain that might and power. But, if a condition of affairs arises when, in the name of the Crown of Britain the liberty of the subject is denied and the right of free speech is prevented, then I ask you to what end the navy of Great Britain or the might of Britain? In this election in Macdonald, I have the affidavits in my hand which prove conclusively that imprisonment was enforced upon free citizens of this country because they dared to exercise the right of free speech; that this was done by the authority of the Premier of Manitoba, that authority in which rests the courts of that province, and, that it was actively connived at by members of the Government who sit in their places in this House. I speak of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of the Interior. Not to weary the House too long but to come to the proof—the House is aware and the country is aware that the Premier of the province of Manitoba is Sir Rodmond Roblin and that the newspaper exponent of his Government in Winnipeg is the 'Winnipeg Telegram.' And in the 'Winnipeg Telegram' of October 5th, just seven days before election day in Macdonald, the following appeared:

> Saskatchewan Crooks at Work in Macdonald. Declares the Premier.
> Sir Rodmond Roblin returned to the city last night from the electoral division of Macdonald, where he has been campaigning for the last week. When seen at his house by a Telegram representative, and asked for his opinion on the result, Sir Rodmond made the following statement:

I will read just the part that bears on the point I have placed before the House :

The fact is that the province of Saskatchewan has undertaken to run the Macdonald election, and I warn the electors of Macdonald of the work these men will do or attempt to do, and ask them, Liberals and Conservatives, to co-operate with the Attorney General's Department and the chief of the Provincial Police in order that honesty and decency may characterize the election.

I have instructed the Provincial Police to arrest these men, and they will be placed in jail at the earliest possible moment when they attempt to do the work they have been sent there to do, and I want to say that because a man is an M.P.P. or ex-M.P.P. in Saskatchewan or of anywhere else, it will not prevent justice being done.

This was followed up by a speech which the Hon. Robert Rogers delivered at St. James on Monday, October 7th, and which appears in the Winnipeg Telegram of October 8th. The Hon. Mr. Rogers said, in part :

I know we have nearly one hundred thugs from Saskatchewan scattered throughout this riding. They are in this very polling division, and we are watching them. One of the ringleaders of that gang, a special and personal friend of Mr. Calder, was arrested to-day in the town of Carman.

In the press of Saturday Mr. MacNutt made the statement that Mr. Richardson was going to succeed. Mr. MacNutt evidently thought he was in Saskatchewan, because he knew he was surrounded by the thugs which Mr. Roblin had described. The thug arrested to-day came into the constituency with Mr. MacNutt. He went to Carman for a week and registered as Sullivan. He spent his time there for a week and then came into Winnipeg with Mr. MacNutt. Mr. Sullivan, of Carman, walked down to another hotel in Winnipeg and registered as Sutherland. He was at this hotel on Sunday and had interviews with Grit election manipulators, and yesterday (Monday) morning went to Carman again and registered as Sullivan, but the moment he started to operate he was nabbed and was now behind the bars. 'There are many others who will follow him,' declared the speaker, amid applause.

This was followed up by a notice in the 'Winnipeg Telegram' on the front page dated October 8th :

First of Arrests in Macdonald is Reported

J. J. Sullivan, said to be of Melville, Sask., and a Liberal organizer in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan, was arrested at Carman, Man., to-day. He was brought into Winnipeg and arraigned before Magistrate McMicken, charged with infractions of the Elections Act. He was remanded to the cells. Warrants have been issued for the arrest of seven other election workers in Macdonald.

Speaking at Roland on October 9 in the presence of the Minister of the Interior,

Mr. OLIVER.

Sir Rodmond Roblin is reported in the 'Winnipeg Telegram' of October 10 as saying :

I have received a telegram this afternoon stating that two notorious crooks from Saskatchewan are now operating in the St. Laurent district. I also have felt it in the public interest to invite the co-operation of the three distinguished Liberals of Winnipeg who were good enough to promise me assistance if I could show them where these political artists were working. To that end I have sent the following message, addressed to Edward Brown, Edward Martin, and Frank O. Fowler, of Winnipeg.

These gentlemen were the executive committee on behalf of Mr. Richardson, the Independent candidate. This is the telegram :

'Two Saskatchewan election manipulators now at St. Laurent. They register as Davidson and Friend. Will you please co-operate with the Attorney's General's Department and assist in punishing two imported election wrongdoers.'

(Signed) 'R. P. Roblin.'

Sir Rodmond Roblin continues :

I sent this message before I have the assurance of these gentlemen that they will not look with favour upon any dishonest or improper conduct on the part of these hordes of political workers that are now in the province. I gladly give whatever weight my assurance carries, and I believe the gentlemen to whom I sent the message I have mentioned, and all other respectable Liberals in this electoral division and the province will protest against the horde of heelers that have been sent in here presumably by the Saskatchewan Government.

I make no vain or foolish statement when I say that they are here for improper purposes.

The Sullivan who travels under an alias has admitted that he is a nephew of the notorious Cap Sullivan, who ruined the Liberal party by his scandalous and outrageous manipulation of elections in Ontario.

When arrested and put in jail there was found in the pocket of Sullivan from Saskatchewan a complete list of all the Metis voters in Carman and district, as well a list of the German and foreign voters at Brunkild. He had marked opposite the names of these men certain hieroglyphics, which doubtless carry certain information to him, but which we as yet have not been able to interpret.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this was what Sir Rodmond Roblin knew after search of Sullivan, and it was on this that he justified Sullivan's arrest. I ask this House if it is not beyond the bounds of absurdity to say that a citizen of Canada is subject to arrest because he had in his pocket a complete list of all the Metis voters in Carman and district, as well as a list of the German and foreign vote at Brunkhill, and that he had marked certain heiroglyphics after these names.

Sir Rodmond Roblin, speaking at Carman, Manitoba, on October 10, with my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, present, as reported in the Winnipeg 'Telegram' of Friday, October 11, said:

Saskatchewan was claiming a victory for reciprocity, but that victory had been won by the votes of Americans and aliens. Now the Saskatchewan government was endeavouring to sway by illegal means the foreign vote in Macdonald. There were hordes of boodlers and bribers from Saskatchewan in Macdonald. Some of them were in the hall that night. They had got several in the jail and they would get more there before the election was over. They did not intend meekly to submit to such insults.

That is to say, Mr. Speaker, and I notice it has the approval of my hon. friends on the other side, that the Premier of the province of Manitoba, the head of the Government in whose hands is the administration of justice in the province, is considered by those gentlemen who are his friends, on the other side, to have the right to stand before the people, and to threaten the citizens of Canada with arrest because they exercise the right of free speech in the carrying forward of an election campaign. I say, Mr. Speaker, that a new era has dawned in this country if that condition of things is to be maintained.

Now, let me just point out to you, Mr. Speaker, for a moment, the method by which elections in the province of Manitoba are conducted. First, the voters' lists are prepared. Naturally, the Government of the day has means at hand to see that its friends are on the voters' lists, or that the friends of its friends are on the voters' lists, some of them having existence, and some of them without existence. In other words, there are opportunities on the part of the Government for satisfactorily and sufficiently stuffing the lists, and I am sure nobody who has followed the career of the present Government of Manitoba will suggest for a moment that these gentlemen have lost their opportunity. As a matter of fact, or so it has been represented to me, on the voters' lists in the town of Carman, where this man Sullivan was arrested, there were between seventeen and twenty-five names on the voters' lists, which were the names of a telephone gang in the employ of the Provincial Government, whose homes were not in the town of Carman, there or thereabouts, who in all human probability did not vote at the town of Carman on election day; but, with Sullivan in jail and other Liberal scrutineers frightened away from the polls, there was no reason in the world why the seventeen telephone men should not be voted in the town of Carman, although their bodily presence might be at the other end of the province.

In the poll of St. Laurent where the same thing was done, the agent of the independent candidate, Mr. Sifton, was arrested immediately before the election. He was not allowed to telegraph to the contral committee to let them know of his arrest. The poll was left unguarded, and of course there was no trouble in establishing a magnificent majority for—Heaven save the mark—for loyalty to the British Empire; and so throughout the province, throughout the constituencies on that day, giving a condition whereby the threat can be handed out from platform after platform, by the man in whose hands rests the authority, who declares in so many words that the right of free speech is not allowed in this constituency and in this province at this time under pain of imprisonment; and I ask you if there is any difficulty in insuring an endorsation of an anti-reciprocity candidate or in maintaining the dignity of the British Empire.

In order to establish what I have said, I will have to ask the House to bear with me while I read affidavits and copies of affidavits made by gentlemen who were arrested under this suspension of the right of the ordinary British subject to free speech and personal liberty. The four men whose cases I propose to bring before the House are J. J. Sullivan, D. H. Walkinshaw, W. B. Sifton, and R. J. A. Prince. The affidavit of Walkinshaw is as follows:

Dominion of Canada,
Province of Manitoba.

In the matter of the arrest of D. H. Walkinshaw at Rathwell, Manitoba, by the Manitoba Provincial Police, in pursuance of a warrant signed by one Chad, on October 9, 1912.

To wit:

I, Donald H. Walkinshaw, of the city of Winnipeg in the province of Manitoba, Agent, do solemnly declare that:

1. That hereto attached and marked Exhibit 'A' to this declaration, and signed by me, is a statement setting forth the circumstances in connection with said arrest.

2. That all allegations contained in said statement are true in substance and in fact.

And I make this solemn Declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me at the City of Winnipeg in the province of Manitoba this 2nd day of November, A.D., 1912. J. A. Wilton.
A Notary Public in and for Manitoba.

DONALD H. WALKINSHAW.

This is Exhibit 'A' referred to in the declaration of D. H. Walkinshaw hereto attached declared before me this 2nd day of November A.D., 1912.

J. A. WILTON, Notary Public.

I was born in Toronto twenty-six years ago, but have spent the last seven years up in Timiskaming, Ontario, where I was engaged in business on my own behalf, and always took an active part in the work of the Liberal party in this district. Just previous to my going West in the middle of last September, I undertook to help in the organization and the correction of the voters' list in the Province of Ontario, under the supervision of Mr. Inwood, the Provincial secretary of the Liberal association. This work being completed, I came out to the West with the idea of getting into business Winnipeg, and naturally in the course of a few days identified myself in the Liberal Executive headquarters, where I was told of the by-election which would be contested in a few weeks in the constituency of Macdonald. Mr. Richardson, who was the independent candidate, and making his platform that of reciprocity and wider markets, invited me to take part, and not being particularly busy at the time, I volunteered my services. I did not ask for any remuneration, and instead of being a 'hired tool' of the party as our opponents claim, I am as a matter of act out of pocket, as a result of my zeal in the cause.

On Monday, September 30th, I went down to Rathwell to look after the organization in that district. In company with Adam Forbes, a merchant of the town, I canvassed electors from day to day with very fair success, in fact so much so that I aroused the resentment of the other party. Although there were two or three outside conservative workers hanging around in Rathwell, I could not find that they were making much effort to canvass the voters, but were evidently spreading stories about my work, and impugning my motives, with the idea of discrediting me. I was however, always treated most courteously by the farmers with whom I came in contact, and given a fair hearing for my story, and I am still firmly of the opinion that the majority of the farmers really believe that freer trade relations with Great Britain and also with the United States would be in the interest of the West, and would gladly lend their support were it not for the sinister influences brought to hear by the Roblin-Rogers combination.

The day I was arrested, October 9th, I spent canvassing in the neighborhood of Indian Ford, north of Rathwell, and on my return to Rathwell about 6 o'clock, I found a provincial policeman in the hotel. He didn't, however, attempt to molest me until after I had had my supper. He called me into another room as I came out of the dining-room and, after asking me if I were Mr. Walkinshaw, said he had a warrant for my arrest. The constable's name was A. C. Ross. I asked him if he intended to serve it, and he said he certainly did. I then demanded to see the warrant and he protested that it was not necessary to show it to me. However, on my insisting, he took me to his room, accompanied by two assistants, and showed me the warrant which was sworn before Paul Kane, justice of the peace in Rathwell, and the information was laid by C. Chad, of St. James.

The information stated that I was charged with violating section 269 of the Dominion Election Act, and on my asking what specific charge was laid against me, he told me I would find out soon enough. On my questioning his right to serve a warrant on such a vague charge, he told me he had nothing to do with the matter, but was told to serve the warrant, and hoped I would go along peaceably. Ross then searched me, took my papers, money, watch, and in fact everything he found on my person. He also took charge of my grip, and on my asking to be allowed to settle my hotel bill, he instructed one of his assistants to find out the amount. This was handed over and a receipt secured from the hotel keeper for me.

Ross then took me by the arm and walked me down to the station, and sat with me in the station waiting room until the train arrived some half an hour later. He was very officious in his manner and spoke offensively to several of my friends who were interested in what was going on, ordering them away, and asking that any remarks be addressed to him. He and one of his assistants then accompanied me on the train to Winnipeg.

On reaching Winnipeg, J. W. Wilton, who is a solicitor, attempted to give me some suggestions and legal advice, but was ordered by the detective to keep away under threat that he would fix him. I was then hurried into a waiting automobile, and rushed to the provincial jail, where arrangements had been made to receive me. On being entered I was again searched and then the detective handed over my effects to the jail authorities, and I gave a receipt for the same on being asked for it. I then asked to be allowed to communicate with my counsel, but was told that I could not do so, as it was after 11 o'clock. They then took me into the ward, and I was ordered to get undressed and leave my clothes on a bench in the aisle. After doing so, I was locked in a cell and left for the night.

At 6 o'clock in the morning a gong rang and I was roughly ordered to 'hurry and get up now.' My door was unlocked and I got my clothes and dressed. All the others had prison suits, and these suits along with my clothes lay together in the aisle outside the cells. The cells were then locked again and a man came through with a tin of porridge without any milk, a portion of dry bread, and a tin cup of tea without sugar or milk. These were poked through a hole in the cage, and constituted the regular prison breakfast. Not being used to this kind of fare however, I found it impossible to force myself to eat it. After a short while another warder or turnkey came to me and took me into another ward and locked me in a cell there. He said it would be quieter.

I was left there till about twenty minutes to ten and was then taken to the office, where my solicitor, Mr. McMurray was waiting to see me. But I had hardly shaken hands with him when I was taken out of the office into another room, where I was weighed and measured and particulars of my personal appearance taken down in the prison records. They quizzed me as to my name, address, age and record, asking me if I had ever been in prison before.

I was then handed over to a provincial detective who took me out of the building, and as I was leaving I asked if I was not to be allowed to see my solicitor. The man only said he had his orders. A taxicab was waiting for us outside. My solicitor attempted to get in and ride down with us to our destination, but was ordered away by the detective. He has since told me that the official in charge of the provincial jail informed him that he might ride in the cab with me, but this was evidently done to put him off, as he was refused permission when he attempted it. I was then rushed to the C.N.R. depot and on to the train for Portage. I was not informed, however, of my destination until I was getting on the train.

On arriving at Portage, the detective took me straight to the provincial jail, where on his telling them who I was, they said they were expecting me. After being entered I was taken into the common ward and locked in a cell until after dinner. Dinner in this jail consisted of a thin, greasy soup, one baked potato, dry bread and a tin cup of rank tea without sugar or milk.

After dinner I was taken to the police court and was brought up before Magistrate Marshall, in what looked to me like a secret session, as the only persons present were the magistrate, the prosecuting attorney, the detective who brought me and a local police officer. The charge was then read by the magistrate, and it was found to be just the same vague charge as was set forth in the warrant under Section 269. The Crown prosecutor, F. G. Taylor, then stated that as the documents relating to the charge were not in his possession, he would ask the court to remand the case until Saturday afternoon, October 12, in order that they might get their case prepared.

The magistrate was about to close the matter in this way, when I took the matter in my own hands, and addressing the court, asked the magistrate if he intended to commit me without any definite charge being laid. As he did not make any comment, I asked that I be admitted to bail. Turning to the Crown prosecutor, Mr. Taylor, he asked him what he thought of that. Mr. Taylor replied that although they were not there that day to try the case, in view of the fact that the prisoner was not represented by counsel, the information which he had was of too serious a nature to permit of bail. Without further comment, Magistrate Marshall committed me to the jail till Saturday, October 12, two o'clock in the afternoon.

I was then taken back to the provincial jail by the detective, and on being turned over to the prison officials was locked up in a cell just like a common criminal and was subjected to exactly the same treatment with regard to meals, sleeping accommodation and confinement as I had been previously. On returning to the jail I demanded to be allowed to get into communication with my solicitor, and I was permitted to call him up on the phone. After being locked up in the cell for some time, I was taken into the office and allowed a few minutes private conversation with my solicitor. He stated that he would see what he could do about bail, although he was afraid there was not much chance of doing anything in view of the attitude of the people pressing the prosecution.

I didn't see my solicitor again until a few minutes before the time to go to the court house on Saturday afternoon, when he informed me that he had so far been unable to do anything with them in the matter of bail, but that he hoped to be allowed to get me out on bail after the hearing that afternoon. I was taken over to the police court by one of the prison officials and the case was again called. After this Mr. Taylor, the Crown prosecutor, read a telegram from the head of the provincial police asking for a further remand till Wednesday or Thursday of the following week in order to enable them to have their witnesses present. This was granted by the court.

My counsel then asked that a special charge be laid or be made, and objected strongly to the vague wording of the information that had been submitted. Mr. Taylor, Crown prosecutor, then stated that the documents in connection with the case had not been forwarded to him, and that he didn't know any more about the case than was contained in the warrant. Now, Mr. Taylor had stated at the hearing on the previous Thursday that the case was too serious a one to allow the prisoner to be admitted to bail. My solicitor then demanded that bail be allowed, and after consultation with the Crown prosecutor the magistrate fixed the bail at two sureties of $1,000 each, and one personal surety of $2,000, or altogether $4,000.

As we were not prepared at the time to produce this bail, I was again taken back to the provincial jail and kept there till 8 o'clock on Saturday evening. In the meantime I had been given my supper and had gone to bed in the ordinary prison routine. At a few minutes to eight one of the jail officials came in and told me to get up and dress, as they were going to take me over to the court house, where my bail would be arranged. After dressing, I proceeded in his company to the court house where bail was arranged by my friends in the town. I then proceeded to the hotel and the following morning came back to Winnipeg.

On the Thursday following, that is to-day, my solicitor, Mr. McMurray, got into communication with Mr. Taylor, the Crown prosecutor, asking him to bring the matter up at once in order to have it disposed of as soon as possible, and Mr. Taylor, after telephoning to the authorities in Winnipeg, and asking them whether they intended to go on with the case, acceded to Mr. McMurray's request. In the absence of Magistrate Marshall, Mayor Garland occupied the bench. The Crown prosecutor asked that the case be dismissed, as he had no evidence to submit. My solicitor immediately asked for and received a certificate of discharge.

I did not then, nor have I since been able to find out, what the nature of the charge against me was. The man Chad, who laid the information, stated that he was an official of the police department, but they have denied any knowledge of him at all, and so far we have been unable to find any trace of him in the country, and the matter has been treated by the police officers and opposition papers as a political joke, and something against which I should have no right to complain.

D. H. WALKINSHAW.

That is to say, a man is held under $4,000 bail against whom there is not a shred or a tittle of evidence to warrant his arrest, much less his detention in jail. All that Mr. Walkinshaw was guilty of was the exercise of the right of free speech; he suffered for that by deprivation of his personal liberty.

I now wish to read the affidavit of Rosario J. A. Prince, dated 6th November, 1912:

Province of Manitoba,
Dominion of Canada,
To wit:

In the matter of the arrest of Rosario J. A. Prince, prior to the election held in the Electoral Division of Macdonald, on October 12, 1912, which arrest took place on the 11th day of October, A.D. 1912.

I, Rosario J. A. Prince, of the city of St. Boniface, in the province of Manitoba, student-at-law, do solemnly declare that:

1. That I am the Rosario J. A. Prince who was arrested on the date above mentioned.

2. That hereto attached and marked Exhibit 'A' to this my declaration is a document containing all the circumstances connected with said arrest.

3. That all the statements contained in said document are true in substance and in fact.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the 'Canada Evidence Act.'

Declared before me at the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, this 6th day of November, A.D. 1912.

J. W. Wilton,
A notary public in and for Manitoba.
R. J. A. PRINCE.

In the matter of the arrest of R. J. A. Prince. This is Exhibit 'A' referred to in the declaration of Rosario J. A. Prince, sworn before me at Wininpeg this 6th day of November, 1912.

J. W. WILTON.
A notary public in and for Manitoba.

I went down to Cardinal on Monday, October 7th, to take part in the elections. On Tuesday the day following, October 8th, I drove up to Notre Dame de Lourdes along with Cyril Rozier to prepare for a meeting which we were to hold there that evening. On our arrival there, we stopped at the boarding house kept by Paul Fries. We had our dinner there, and left without paying for it, and drove further on into the country. We returned later and prepared the hall for the meeting, and then had supper at Paul Fries's house. After supper we went to pay for the meals, and I had no change less than $10. Rozier paid for the meals. Later on in the evening when we were leaving, we had the horses harnessed up outside, and as we were going I paid Fries for the stabling. He had no change with him, and went into the house for it. I said jokingly to him, 'Don't say I gave you that to keep you from voting.' He came back in a few minutes with the change, giving me $9.50 A man by the name of Laboret was with me when Fries gave me back the change.

We returned to Cardinal that night, and I continued my work there. I knew that I was watched all the time. There were detectives in the hotel at Cardinal all the week, and they were watching all that was going on. Many times during the week I was told by different parties that I would be arrested. Finally on Thursday night, after the Conservative meeting held by A. Potvin at Lourdes, at which Mr. Gauthier spoke for us, I was once more admonished by Paul Fries in his stable, that I would be arrested the next day. Fries told me that one Dixon wanted him to appear against me, pretending that I had given him (Fries) money. To this I answered that I did not care, and that they could not arrest me, because I had done nothing wrong.

A most innocent young man—although he lived in the province of Manitoba. I may say that he was young, and that is the reason he did not know better. He knows better now.

Fries insisted, saying 'I want to tell you that Dixon wants to have you arrested, and wants me to appear as witness.' I said 'My dear man I don't know you.' Then he said 'If you are arrested, call me up, and I will come to help you out.'

I got back to Cardinal that night, and acted as if nothing was stirring against me, but I had an idea that I could not clear up, as Fries's words and actions were strange to me. At last on Friday morning, I was called aside by Frank Chittick, and he asked me to go to his room. He then said I was under arrest, and as I protested and would not go into his room, he finally showed a warrant which had been made out against me. I read the warrant which had been signed by two justices of the peace. One appeared to me like the signature of one Defromant, and the other was Louis Fouasse. The name of Defromant was struck off, and Mr. Fouasse appeared to have taken the oath. This indicated to me that the warrant was possibly sworn in blank.

Soon after my arrest, I was joined by A. C. Ross, provincial detective, bringing a man by the name of Frank Turcot. Then I tried to phone to Winnipeg to tell the executive of my arrest, but Ross snatched me away from the phone. A few seconds after the phone rang, and some one called for me. I was allowed to go and answer the message, possibly because they thought that I could not do anything more. It was the executive that was calling me up, and I told them of my arrest. I then asked Ross where he was going to take me to, and he said to Winnipeg, so I told the executive that I was coming to Winnipeg. Here I was maliciously deceived, as I was taken to Morden by Detective A. C. Ross, who failed to keep his word, as he could have taken me down to Winnipeg more easily than to Morden, as the train was coming from the west to Winnipeg in about an hour's time. After I was through phoning I protested against my arrest to both detectives in the presence of about twenty people, and I asked that the case be tried at once, either at Cardinal or at Notre Dame de Lourdes, where the warrant was sworn, and before the justice of the peace who swore it, but this was not of any use, and they searched me, and took all papers and documents they could find. I had on me all the scrutineer's papers for the surrounding district, and I tried to pass them to Mr. Gauthier, but A. C. Ross refused. By this device they had all the organization work crippled up on our side.

From Cardinal we took the train to Somerset, and from Somerset we took the train to Miami, where Detective Ross hired a four-seated buggy and drove us eighteen miles to Morden. Whilst on the way to Morden, Detective Ross used abusive language against the Liberal party and the late Liberal government, and to this I could not reply, only by saying that I would get even for the way I was treated some day.

When we arrived at Morden it was about half-past 6 o'clock that night. I was taken to the jail and locked up in a cell. After a time they offered me something to eat, and when I insisted on having more than bread and water, they brought me some ginger biscuits, which was all I had that night, and I had to pay for them. They then called me up and read the charge, which was for giving $10 to Paul Fries on Tuesday in order to keep him from voting. To this I pleaded not guilty, and the case was remanded till the next day at 4 o'clock p.m., and I was taken back to the cell.

I ask the House to bear this in mind.

Shortly afterwards I was interviewed by Detective Ross with a list of names which he said were in my book when he took it away from me. Upon that list was the name of Paul Fries, and opposite was a sign—$10. I told Mr. Ross that I had never seen the list before, and that it was not my writing. He still affirmed that it was mine, and that I was accused of a very serious charge, and that they had all my books and papers, and that they had very strong evidence against me, but that if I pleaded guilty, I would be let out without any trouble, and nothing would be done against me. Shocked by the impudence of a man that wanted to play with my honour like that, I strongly denied the charge, and I told him that I was not guilty, and that I would wait until I could get justice. That was all that night, but in the morning they started again. The jailer was the first, and on coming to my room he said that I was charged with a most serious offence, and that if I would only consent to plead guilty, they would let me off. I absolutely refused to listen to him. Then came Jack Kennedy, who is a proprietor of one of the hotels there. He also tried to get me to plead guilty, saying that it would be better for me, and that I would get off right away, and that he would see that nothing would be done to me, and that if I would not do that, that they would hold me for a long time, and I might get a heavy sentence. Then I was interviewed by Mr. Kennedy again, and by two jailers or detectives, but still I held out. After that, the whole five came in a body, and pleaded with me to give in and say I was guilty. They said that I would get off if I would only say I was guilty, but still I held out.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon, they again summoned me into the court room, and Magistrate Morden was then present. The charge was read against me, and again I pleaded not guilty. The magistrate said I would have to go back to jail, and the case would be remanded till Thursday at the request of Mr. Bowen, Crown prosecutor. Mr. H. McConnell, the lawyer, then rose, and asked that I should be allowed out on bail. The magistrate refused to allow bail, and Mr. McConnel insisted, but the magistrate was obdurate, and I had to go back to the cell. Some time later I was surprised when the jailer came to the cell, and I was summoned to the court, and asked to sign papers for admission to bail. I was somewhat suspicious at first, as I did not know who were the men who were going to assist me, but I saw that they were anxious to get me at liberty, and so I signed the papers and was released. This was all that happened, and I came home on Monday, and returned to Morden for the trial on Thursday. My case was then heard before Justices Morden and Jicklie. Nobody appeared for the prosecution except Mr. Bowen, the Crown attorney, who asked for a further remand.

Before dismissing this case, I would like to say that it is entirely wrong altogether, either one of two things is true;—this young man should never have been arrested, or the Crown should be in such a position as to go on with the charges which have been laid against him. They are not prepared, and there is only one conclusion to the case, and that is to dismiss it. There has been ample time for the preparation of evidence. The Crown ought, if there were a real case now, to be ready to go and proceed with the trial. There is absolutely no reason for a remand. There is no excuse for this case being carried any further, and I therefore dismiss the case.

Mr. William Manaham, my counsel, asked for a certificate of dismissal, and the magistrate said that he would willingly grant that, and this I received the next day.

The information laid against me, read as follows:—

R. Dixon,

City of Winnipeg,

At Notre Dame de Lourdes.

Tuesday, the 10th day of October, 1912.

I have reason to believe, and doth believe that on Tuesday, the 8th day of October, at Notre Dame de Lourdes, Rosario Prince did give to Paul Fries, of Notre Dame de Lourdes aforesaid, the sum of ten dollars, upon the promise of the said Paul Fries neither to vote nor use his influence in the approaching election in the constituency of Macdonald.

Louis Fouasse,

Justice of the Peace.

(Signed) ROLAND DIXON.

After the case was dismissed, I got back my book and papers and also the scrutineer's certificates which I had before my arrest. In my note book, every page where there were notes or writing, was initialled with the letters 'A.C.R.', which are the initials of A. C. Ross, and the name of Paul Fries was indeed in my book, which I had as a reference, but there was no sign of 10 opposite to the name.

R. J. A. PRINCE.

Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that there was an evident attempt to frighten this young man into pleading guilty to a charge of which he was not guilty by—I do not know whether I should call it forgery or not; but the officers of the law placed papers before him representing them to be papers taken from his person, which were not taken from his person, but were prepared by the so-called officers of the law for the purpose of impressing him. I have no doubt that these so-called officers of the law verily believed that as he was young and had had no experience, they would be able to force from him a confession of something of which he was not guilty, and thereby secure a justification for their action. I ask the House if they have ever heard in the history of this country of a more outrageous proceeding than that in the case of this young man, Prince, and I would ask the right hon. the Prime Minister and the members of the Government if there is not a serious difference between the cases I have mentioned in relation to the election in Macdonald and any other election of which he has ever heard in Canada.

I desire also to read the affidavits of W. B. Sifton:

Province of Manitoba,
To wit :

In the matter of the McDonald By-election, for the Electoral Division of McDonald, held on the 12th day of October, A.D. 1912.

Affidavit of W. B. Sifton.

I, William Blake Sifton, of the Post Office of Mannitonas, in the province of Manitoba, farmer, make oath and say as follows :—

1. Prior to the 12th day of October, I had no particular employment to take up my time, and came to Winnipeg, and went to Mr. Richardson's Central Executive, and volunteered my services in connection with the by-election.

2. As I had been a resident of Manitoba for some thirty-three years, of which time I lived for some twenty years on Lake Manitoba, and in the vicinity of St. Laurent ; consequently being well acquainted with the people at St. Laurent and vicinity, I was requested by the committee to look after the organization for Mr. Richardson, the independent candidate at that point.

3. On the afternoon of Tuesday, the 8th day of October, I left Winnipeg and went to St. Laurent on the Canadian Northern Railway train, arriving at St. Laurent at 6.25 p.m. or thereabouts. I spent the balance of the evening of the 8th and all day Wednesday the 9th, and the evening of Wednesday the 9th, visiting my old friends in St. Laurent, whom I have known for twenty years or thereabouts, endeavouring to show those whom I interviewed why they should support the candidature of Mr. Richardson. On Thursday the 10th, I took a team and drove through that portion of the country lying to the northeast of St. Laurent, where I found that a good many of my friends had left the village and homesteaded in the country, and returned to St. Laurent that night.

4. On Friday the 11th, I spent the forenoon in the village, and was about to go to Oak Point, a distance of seven miles farther, which place I had not visited. While I was in the act of stepping aboard the train, my arm was seized by some person in the rear of me. I turned around and saw a party whose name I have since learned was Jarvis, who told me that he was a provincial constable. Jarvis tried to pull me off by force, without having produced a warrant or notifying me that he had one, but I resisted and he was unable to do so. I finally extricated myself from the grasp of Jarvis. I then jumped off the train to find the reason of my being interfered with, and approached Jarvis and asked for an explanation of his seizing me on the train. He says 'I have a warrant for you' and immediately produced the warrant, and stating at the same time that he was a provincial constable.

4. Another party, whose name I have since learned was Thomas Steadman, of Winnipeg, was standing beside Jarvis at the time the latter grasped me while I was boarding the train, and I heard Steadman tell Jarvis to jerk me off the train. The same party, namely, Steadman, was standing beside Jarvis when I approached the latter demanding an explanation.

5. After the warrant was produced by Jarvis, he Jarvis, proceeded to read it, and I stated that I would prefer to read it myself, and he handed to me and I perused same, and having perused it handed it back to Jarvis.

6. After I had handed the warrant back to Jarvis, I stated to Jarvis and Steadman that I supposed they were paid tools of the government, to which Steadman replied 'we have the authority.'

7. I then stated to Jarvis that I did not know whether I would pay any attention to the warrant or not, or words to that effect, and he referred me to Steadman who at once stepped along side of me.

8. I said to Steadman, 'I do not know what your name is, but I presume I will find that out later, but I am not going to be searched, and I won't go to jail.' Steadman said to me. 'You are wanted in Winnipeg, you will have to go to Wininpeg.' All this conversation took place on the station platform at St. Laurent.

9. After Steadman said this, he and Jarvis walked off together, and held some private conversation, and then they came back to me, and the three of us entered the station. I knew that the headquarters were depending upon me to look after the interests of Mr. Richardson at this poll on election day, and I therefore felt that it was absolutely necessary to wire them informing them of my arrest, so that they might send some person out on the 4 o'clock train that day to take my place. I went up to the wicket in the station and asked for a telegram pad. The agent handed it to me, and I wrote a telegram out informing the executive that I had been arrested, and asked them to provide for the poll. I took twenty-five cents out of my pocket, and shoved the telegram and the money to the station agent. The station agent picked up the telegram and the money, and turned to send the telegram, but Steadman walked into his private office, and put his hand on his shoulder, and said in my hearing to the station agent, 'I demand that you shall not send that telegram under my authority as a police officer, this man is under arrest. The station agent handed the money back to me, and I refused to take it, but the station agent said that I might as well, as he could not send the telegram.

You will notice that they have things pretty well in a corner in Manitoba.

10. Steadman, Jarvis and I then went up to the hotel, to my room. I was kept by the constables in my room all that night. They did not let me leave the room at all, and the following morning about 7 o'clock, we left the hotel, the two constables with me, and took the train to Winnipeg. Jarvis accompanied me to Winnipeg, but Steadman remained in St. Laurent.

11. Upon our arrival at Winnipeg, I was taken to the Provincial Police Court, and I was taken into the room of McKenzie, one of the provincial police. McKenzie called Marsh Jackson, another police officer into his room, and upon Jackson entering the room Jarvis was dismissed and left the room, and then McKenzie left the room, leaving me alone with Jackson.

12. I asked Jackson what the charge was, what the reason of my arrest was, and why I was brought to Winnipeg. 'Well,' he says, 'clause 269 of the Election Act is very broad, even a man for making a public speech could be arrested through a certain interpretation of that clause.' I told Jackson that I had done nothing wrong, and I asked him what was the nature of the charge against me, to which he replied. 'Well the nature of the charge is that you were in the contittuency of Macdonald and influencing voters there.'

That is to say that Mr. Sifton was exercising the right of a British subject which is prohibited in the province of Manitoba during elections as against those who are not voting the way the Roblin government want them to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are these provincial constables appointed by the provincial government?

Mr. OLIVER: So I understand. I am not at all sure that all of these gentlemen who represented themselves as provincial constables were provincial constables, but they may have been.

Thereupon I became somewhat angry, and said—'Now, look here Mr. Jackson, that is no charge to arrest a man on,' and he replied. 'Look here, we have two sworn affidavits that came in on the train today, that you offered two men $25 a piece for their vote.'

The same sort of business that was proposed in the same case of Prince—to which I replied, 'Jackson, that is an absolute falsehood, and I don't believe you have them either,' or words to that effect, to which he replied. 'Well these affidavits will not be produced when you are brought before Magistrate McMicken if you plead guilty to the charge laid in the information.' Jackson further told me that I had better plead guilty, because the charges in the information were of a serious nature, and that I could be released provided I went home, and took no further part in the election. Thereupon I said in a laughing way, 'I will certainly plead guilty, because I have certainly been in the constituency of McDonald, influencing voters, for I went there for that purpose.' This ended the conversation.

13. Jarvis then came into the room and took me before Magistrate McMicken, Jackson and McKenzie accompanying us. When I went in before Magistrate McMicken and appeared before him for a considerable time he said nothing to me, apparently being uncertain as to how to proceed, but finally he spoke and said. 'Is this the man with whom we have to deal, the man that was arrested yesterday' looking at me as he said this. I believing that he was addressing me spoke up and said. 'Well I am the man that was arrested yesterday, but I do not know what dealings you have with me.' Thereupon the magistrate turned to the party acting as clerk of the court, and who from the way he talked I would judge to be a foreigner, and asked him to read the information. I was standing near this party, and as he read it I looked over his shoulder and read the information also, and I noticed that I was charged with being in the constituency of Macdonald influencing voters, and also charged with bribery and corruption. After the clerk got through, the magistrate looked at me and said. 'Are you guilty or not guilty?' I replied, 'I am not guilty of bribery and corruption, but I certainly was in the constituency of Macdonald and attempted to influence voters to vote for Mr. Richardson.' The magistrate then said. 'We can remand this case until a later date if you will take the next train and go home and not do any more work in the election.' McKenzie then spoke up and said that he could remand it to a later date if he wished, and that he, McKenzie would be responsible for my appearance. Thereupon Jackson spoke up and said that it would be remanded provided that I took the next train to Dauphin, and did no more work in the elections. I said I could not take the next train to Dauphin, that I had personal business in the town on Monday, and would need to stay here. The magistrate then when he found I could not take the next train to Dauphin, said that I would have to go to jail until the case was decided, but McKenzie spoke up, and said that I need not go to jail, that he would be responsible for my appearance. The magistrate then said. 'We will release you up to Monday at 10.30, upon the condition that you stay in the city, and do not go into Macdonald constituency, and do not work for Mr. Richardson.' I then walked out of the room.

14. Before I left the court room, Jackson told me that I must appear on Monday, and that the elections being over, upon my appearing on that date, I would be given a complete dismissal, and I could then go home.

15. I then saw my solicitor, and on Monday morning in company with my solicitor, I appeared in court. The case was called and Magistrate McMicken was on the bench. I elected for a trial by jury, and the case was remanded until Saturday.

That is a week after the election.

16. I had lunch that day with a provincial constable from Dauphin, a friend of mine. During our conversation he asked me if I would not like to have that case dismissed. He said 'I think I can arrange to have that dismissed today, I know the people pretty well that run this government.' 'Well' I said 'if you can get an honourable dismissal, with a regular acquittal, it will be all right; sure I would like to have it.' This gentleman, whose name was Rooke and I then went over to the provincial buildings. I stayed in the outside room while he consulted with Graham, the attorney general for the province. After about half an hour he returned and took me into Graham's office, and we shook hands, and Graham said, 'Mr. Rook has stated this to me. and we can arrange that all right. and I will telephone the magistrate, and you fellows go right up there' We left the building, and went to the Provincial Court on Fort Street in the presence of Magistrate McMicken, and on our way I suggested to Rooke that I consult my solicitor. He said it was not necessary, if we could get this case dismissed with an honourable acquittal, that should be satisfactory. I said 'I will be satisfied if I have an honourable acquittal' and before entering the building we stopped and talked on the street, and I again told him that I had better consult my solicitor, and he said. 'It is not necessary, come on upstairs,' and we met Marsh Jackson and went into his room, and talked there for a minute or two, and then we all went into Magistrate McMicken's room, where I was supposed to get an honourable acquittal. I said to them. 'while I will be glad to get an honourable acquittal, this looks illegal, and I will get either myself or you people or my solicitor in trouble. I think I had better consult my solicitor before anything is done.' The magistrate told me that it was not necessary to consult my solicitor, if I would consent to elect to be tried by him instead of by jury, he would try me and give me an honourable acquittal there and then. I did not know what to do, but I finally consented to elect to be tried by him as he the magistrate suggested. The magistrate then said that he dismissed the case, and wrote something on the information. I then asked for a certificate of dismissal. He said. 'It is not necessary, you are honourably discharged. I have written on this information—on the document, and find no charge against you.' I insisted upon a certificate, but he said. 'Can't you trust your friends standing here that this case has been honourably disposed of?' I said 'Your honour, I have a great many more friends in the country, and I would like to have a piece of paper to show them, undoubtedly they have heard of my arrest.' He got excited, and said that it was not necessary, that the newspapers would come out with headlines, especially the Telegram, showing that I was honourably acquitted. I said. 'That is all that can be done. I am a free man.' He said. 'Yes sir, you are absolutely a free man, go where you will.'

17. I then came immediately and informed my solicitor of what had taken place. He said that I was entitled to that certificate, and he suggested that we return at once to the Police Court, and make another demand for the same, which we did, and two other lawyers. The magistrate was undecided. He said. 'I can't sign this until I confer with other people, and if you come here at 12 o'clock tomorrow, I will tell you what I will do.' We went the next day and he refused point blank to give me a certificate of dismissal.

18 I appeared on Saturday with my solicitor, and demanded a trial, and was told by the magistrate that the matter had been disposed of, and he would not hear it.

Sworn before me at the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, this 9th day of November, A.D. 1912.

James Auld,

A Notary Public in and for the province of Manitoba.

W. B. SIFTON.

In this connection I want to draw the attention of the House to the intimate relations which existed between the election activities of the Provincial Government in Manitoba and the administration of justice in the province of Manitoba, a connection that I think will be found unique, a condition that is entirely extraordinary; and, when such a combination is directed against the election of members of this House it is distinctly an infringement upon the rights and dignity of this House, and it calls for action by the Parliament of Canada in protection of its rights and dignity. I am sorry to have to detain the House at this length, but I wish to still further establish this remarkable connection between the election activities of the province of Manitoba and the administration of so-called justice in the province of Manitoba. I read:

Canada.

Province of Manitoba, Wininpeg.

In the matter of an election holden on the 12th day of October, A.D., 1912, in the Electoral District of Macdonald in the province of Manitoba.

I, Hugh Mackenzie of the City of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, Barrister-at-law, do solemnly declare that,—

1. On Saturday the 12th day of October, A.D., 1912, I was present at polling booth in division No. 2 in the Electoral District of McDonald in the province of Manitoba, as the duly appointed agent of Robert Lorne Richardson, candidate in said electoral district at an election held on the said date for the election of a member for said electoral district to serve in the House of Commons.

2. That while polling was in progress a person representing himself as John H. Humphrey made application for a ballot in that name and duly recorded his ballot which was received by the Deputy Returning Officer and deposited in the ballot box. Said person who was unknown to me appeared during the time that Alexander Gunn, Mr. Richardson's local scrutineer, was absent from the polling both for the purpose of recording his vote in polling subdivision No. 3 in said electoral district. Later in the afternoon the real John H. Humphrey appeared and upon taking the prescribed oath was permitted to record his vote. Upon his appearance in the polling booth he was immediately recognized and greeted by Charles Carr, the poll clerk at said polling booth and a prominent worker in St. James in the Conservative interest. Mr. Carr had been present when the personator appeared and gave the name of John H. Humphrey but he made no objection to said personator receiving a ballot and casting his vote in said election. The name Humphrey appears only once on the voters' list for said polling division and said Carr always referred to said list before entering the name in the poll book.

3. That the name of Allen W. Craigie is in the correct list of qualified electors entitled to vote in said election in said polling division.

4. During the polling of votes at said election a person whose name and identity were unknown to me but who subsequently was identified to me as one Robert Stout applied in the name of Allen W. Craigie to the Deputy Returning Officer for a ballot saying at the same time that his name was Allen W. Craigie, that he resided on Roseberry Street, and that he was a carpenter by trade.

5. I imediately asked the said applicant a number of questions as to his identity and at the conclusion of his answers thereto the Deputy Returning Officer upon my request placed the said applicant in the custody of the poll constable as a person who had applied for a ballot in the name of Allen W. Craigie but not being said Allen W. Craigie.

6. That immediately upon the detention of said person I preferred information in writing oath before said Deputy Returning Officer charging said person with the offence of personation.

7. That the Deputy Returning Officer thereupon issued his warrant for the arrest and detention of said person and placed said warrant with the Provincial Constable James Bain, who thereupon took the said accused into custody and placed him in confinement in the jail at St. James in the province of Manitoba.

8. That after the said person had been taken into custody the matter of his arrest was discussed in the polling booth and James W. Hatch of St. James, the duly appointed agent of Alexander Morrison the Conservative candidate at said election, stated to me that he knew that said person was not Allen W. Craigie although when I was interviewing the said person with a view of ascertaining whether or not he was the person, he represented himself to be, the said James W. Hatch took no part in the discussion and did not offer to inform me that said person was not Allen W. Craigie.

9. That on Tuesday, October 15th, I went out to St. James, where I saw Chief Constable Bain who informed me that one S. D. Richardson, a Justice of the Peace in and for the province of Manitoba, had on the evening of said 12th day of October, ordered and had caused the release of said accused and had remanded him for trial before Alexander McMicken, Provincial Magistrate at the Provincial Police Court in the city of Winnipeg on Wednesday the 16th day of October at the hour of eleven o'clock in the forenoon of said day.

10. That on said Tuesday, October 15th, at three o'clock in the afternoon in company with W. H. Trueman, my Counsel in connection with the prosecution of said information, I went to the office of the said Provincial Police Court in the said City of Winnipeg. We there interviewed Felix N. Hryniewiecki, clerk of said Provincial Police Court, and asked him if the matter of my information against said accused was to come before the Provincial Police Court at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the next day. He replied that it was. Mr. Trueman then applied on my behalf for subpoenaes for three witnesses who were required to give evidence in connection with said information, Said subpoenaes were prepared by said clerk and they commanded the attendance of said witnesses at said Provincial Police Court at the hour of eleven o'clock on Wednesday the 16th day of October, 1912.

11. That on Wednesday, October 16th, I attended at the said Provincial Police Court from fifteen minutes to eleven o'clock in the forenoon until about thirty minutes after eleven o'clock in the said forenoon. My counsel, W. H. Trueman came to said police court at eleven o'clock in said forenoon.

12. On my arrival at said police court I was informed by Alexander Gunn, one of the witnesses subpœnaed on my behalf, that the case had been disposed of and I immediately communicated this information to Mr. Trueman upon his arrival at the court house. Said Mr. Trueman and I then spoke to the clerk of said court and told him that we were on hand to proceed with the matter of my said information. The said clerk informed us that according to the records the case had been disposed of. I asked him if he had seen the accused and he replied that he had not. I asked him if the accused had been there that morning and he said he did not know. I asked him if he had any record in the matter and he then produced my written information upon which was written the following memorandum over the signature of said Alexander McMicken—'Pleaded guilty with extenuating circumstances, fine $50 and cost.

(Sgd.) A. McMICKEN.

13. When I arrived at said police court the said Alexander McMicken was presiding in said court for the trial of cases. My counsel informed the said Alexander McMicken that he appeared on my behalf in connection with said information and that we were prepared to proceed with the hearing of said charge. The following conversation then ensued between the said Alexander McMicken, the said W. H. Trueman and myself:—

Magistrate McMicken: 'Both defendants have been here already, have been tried and have been heavily fined.'

Mr. Trueman: 'Were Mr. Mackenzie or Mr. Macdonald present?

Magistrate McMicken: 'I don't know whether they were or not.'

Mr. Trueman: 'Did any one appear for them?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'Yes, Mr. Sullivan was there.'

Mr. Trueman: 'What Mr. Sullivan?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'My God, what questions you ask; Mr. Sullivan, the lawyer.'

Mr. Trueman: 'Are you sure he appeared for the prosecution?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'I don't know anything about that.'

I then made the statement that Mr. Sullivan was not authorized to appear for me and had no instructions to do so; whereupon Magistrate McMicken said 'You shut up, you have no business to speak here.'

I said. 'I have a right to speak here as I am the person who swore out the information against the accused.'

Magistrate McMicken again ordered me to shut up and to stop making a noise.

I then asked Magistrate McMicken why the case had been disposed of in my absence and in the absence of my counsel before the time fixed for trial.

Magistrate McMicken again ordered me to shut up, remarking that he would send me somewhere I wouldn't like, and he called several times for a constable. Mr. Trueman again asked Magistrate McMicken if he would give any information regarding the case, to which Magistrate McMicken replied, 'I won't tell you anything.'

Mr. Trueman: 'What was the amount of fine imposed?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'I won't answer any questions; the men were fined and fined heavily.'

Mr. Trueman asked several times for the amount of the fine imposed, but was constantly met with refusals for the information.

Mr. Trueman asked why the cases had been proceeded with in the absence of the prosecution, to which Magistrate McMicken replied: 'Now go away and don't bother me. I have a lot of business to do here.'

Mr. Trueman: 'You won't say why you did not wait for the people who laid the information.'

Magistrate McMicken: 'I'm not going to stand for nonsense of this kind in court.'

Mr. Trueman: 'It's not nonsense at all; it's a most serious case.'

Magistrate McMicken: 'You shut up and don't bother me.'

Mr. Trueman: 'You refuse to say anything further about the case?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'I don't want to hear you speak any more.'

Mr. Trueman: 'Am I to understand then that you will say nothing further in the matter?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'You can understand what you like, and I can tell you it is not very much. I can tell you that much, that your understanding is not of a very high order.'

Mr. Trueman: 'Well, you are doing nothing to assist me in improving it. What right had you to close the case up without the prosecution being present?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'I want to hear no more of this.'

Mr. Trueman: 'Was Mackenzie or Macdonald present at the trial?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'I don't know, there was a lot of people about.'

Mr. Trueman: 'Well, I understand that the reporters were here from 10 o'clock and that they saw nothing of the case going on, and they say there was no case heard in the court here.'

Magistrate McMicken: 'Perhaps they were drunk, I don't know.'

Mr. Trueman: 'In what court was the case tried?'

Magistrate McMicken: 'I won't tell you.'

Thereupon Mr. Trueman and I left the court room.

14. Subsequently I returned to the court room and asked Magistrate McMicken if Mr. Sullivan had stated that he, Sullivan, had appeared in my behalf. Magistrate McMicken replied, 'No, no, he said he appeared for the prosecution. Now you get out of here and don't bother me any more.'

I further asked Magistrate McMicken what extenuating circumstances had been urged on behalf of accused, to which Magistrate McMicken replied that Constable Bain had stated that the accused was drunk. I said: 'But Constable Bain told me that he was sober and gave no evidence of having been drinking.' Constable Bain was present and in answer to my request that he confirm my statement, stated that he had made no statement whatever with reference to the accused having been drinking. Magistrate McMicken then said: 'Now you get out of here and don't bother me any more—go to blazes—go to the devil. I won't give you any more information.'

15. At the time of accused's arrest he appeared to be perfectly sober, and there was nothing whatever about his appearance or conduct to suggest that he was drunk or had been drinking.

16. I am informed and verily believe that the said Arthur Sullivan, barrister-at-law, did not tell the said A. McMicken that he appeared for the prosecution in connection with said case.

17. That on Thursday, the 17th day of October, I went to the Provincial Police Court, and, after stating who I was, requested the clerk of the court and Magistrate McMicken to permit me to make a copy of any record in court in connection with said information, but said clerk and said magistrate refused to permit me to inspect any record or to make a copy thereof, and also refused to permit me to make a copy of said information.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, Chap. 145, Sec. 36.

HUGH MACKENZIE.

Declared before me at the City of Winnipeg, in the Province of Manitoba, this 14th day of November, A.D., 1912.

M. A. MACQUEEN,
A Commissioner, &c.

Now, there are one or two points in connection with this to which I would like to draw the attention of the House. One is that, on the affidavit of Mr. Mackenzie, the Conservative scrutineers in this particular poll were absolutely parties to these personations, proving beyond question that personation was a part of the scheme of this election. The other point is that whereas two men who were found guilty of personation, a serious offence under the law, and fined for it, were given bail immediately upon their arrest, while free citizens of a supposedly free country, for the exercise of the elementary right of free speech, were committed to jail and refused bail, refused counsel, their friends refused access to them, and treated as though they were convicted criminals. But the two men who were criminals were given every consideration—were released immediately on bail, and were conveniently tried half an hour before the witnesses who were subpoenaed were present to give evidence on their trial.

I think, Mr. Speaker, this case establishes beyond any question the fact that in the province of Manitoba the administration of justice is absolutely in the hands of the provincial government for the party purposes of the Provincial Conservative party, and equally for the party purposes of the Dominion Conservative party. We have the evidence of the Minister of Public Works himself upon the subject, and, while we have not the words of the Minister of the Interior, we have his presence at the meetings at which the announcements were made, and he has made no protest then or since against that condition of affairs.

I need not say, Mr. Speaker, that this remarkable condition of affairs in the province of Manitoba has produced some comment. It is a matter that has effect far beyond the boundaries of the constituency of Macdonald, far beyond the boundaries of Manitoba. For, if the right of free speech, if the liberty of the subject, can be denied in the province of Manitoba, then the right of free speech and the liberty of the subject can be denied in any part of this Dominion. This is a matter that touches every man, certainly every lover of fair play and liberty, throughout the Dominion. I find that this state of affairs has attracted the attention of the Presbyterian Synod of the province of Manitoba. And I wish to say here and now that, of all religious bodies in the world and of all councils of religious bodies in the world, a synod of the Presbyterian body requires the least apology for declaring itself for the right of free speech and liberty of the subject. For, whatever may be said against that body, it cannot be said but that it always has stood for human liberty and the right of free speech. The Synod of Manitoba sitting in Brandon on November 14, agreed to the following resolution:—

> Under a painful sense of duty, this Synod deeply deplores recent evidence of the deliberate prostitution of justice to personal or party ends, and the trampling under foot the sacred rights of citizens to individual liberty and fair trial.

A meeting of residents of the province of Manitoba was held in the city of Winnipeg on Friday night last, and the following resolution was adopted:—

> That the Canadian citizens here assembled regard with abhorrence and alarm the conduct of the Manitoba authorities charged with the administration of justice, in arresting, by executive order, British citizens, holding them in prison by refusal of bail, and finally abandoning the case without the preferment of charges to which they might make answer according to the law.
> That this action, for which the Prime Minister and Government of this province are responsible, was subversive of freedom, was an exercise of absolutism repugnant to the letter and the spirit of British law, and constituted such an offence against the lawful rights of the individual as to impose upon the people as their first duty the obligation of vindicating the law and re-establishing in this province the liberty of the subject.

Now, may I allude in a general way to the conditions which prevail in the province of Manitoba? The Government of that province has seen fit to enter the arena of Dominion politics, has seen fit to use its governmental and judicial machinery for the purpose not only of affecting a Dominion election but of denying to free citizens the rights of free speech and personal liberty. Therefore, it seems to me that the Government of Manitoba fairly brings itself within the range of, at any rate, the notice of this House and its members. And I will take the liberty of saying this, Mr. Speaker—that in the forty years during which Manitoba has existed as a province and has had the benefit of provincial government and of Dominion subsidies, there has not been as much to show for the direct benefit of the people, being the result of the work of the Government of that province, as is to be found in the province of Saskatchewan or the province of Alberta, the result of their seven years of provincial existence. I take the liberty of saying that the school system of Manitoba is a crime against the rising generation of that province. There is not a ten-mile stretch of good, substantial, permanent road within the province of Manitoba, the work of the Government of that province. There is no substantial, permanent bridging in that province for the benefit of the people by the Government of the province, as there is in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. The province of Manitoba took over the telephone system some years ago. They have run it for a number of years, and have run it into bankruptcy according to their own statement. They established an elevator system and operated it for one or two years, and ran that into bankruptcy and were compelled to dispose of it. On the finding of the grand jury, their institution for the insane at Selkirk—

Mr. BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman dealing in the proper place with the provincial administration of every province in Canada, but I do not think the time of this House ought to be wasted in that way. I think it is out of order.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to establish—

Mr. BORDEN: I would like to have it decided whether, in the debate on the Address it is competent for any hon. gentleman to discuss the merits or demerits of provincial administrations over which this House has absolutely no jurisdiction.

Mr. SPEAKER: While usually there has been great latitude allowed in the debate on the Address, I think the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) is wandering a little from the subject, and perhaps it would be well to keep closer to it.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to trespass against the rules of the House. But there was a certain state of facts, bearing entirely upon what I have placed before the House, which I wish to establish beyond question, and had got almost to the point of establishing.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not object to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) establishing whatever he desires to establish, so long as it relates to any matter over which this House and this Government has jurisdiction or control. But if we are going to discuss the provincial administration of Manitoba, we shall have to discuss that of every province in Canada, I suppose, and I do not quite understand why this House should take upon itself that burden.

Mr. OLIVER: My point, Mr. Speaker, is that the Government of Manitoba has interfered directly in the election of members of this House and I want to establish——

Mr. BORDEN: I do not object to the hon. gentleman doing that if he thinks there is a point in it, though I cannot see that it is relevant; for the amendment, I understand, is directed against this Government and not against the Government of Manitoba. I object to the hon. gentleman dealing with the administration of highways, of insane asylums and matters of that kind which are purely subject to provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not dwell on the point at all. I had reached a conclusion on the statement I wished to make, that the condition of affairs which I have placed before the House in regard to the province of Manitoba is arrived at because the revenue of that province to-day are systematically diverted to the maintenance of a standing army of thugs, whose principal employment is in connection with elections, under one name or another, and this is evidenced in the army that they could bring to bear, under the name of detectives, scrutineers, or whatever name you like, in the constituency of Macdonald. I wish to deal with another matter that I think has some bearing upon the question. I have tried to show to the House the absolute injustice that has been meted out to the men who were connected with this election in the constituency of Macdonald. I want to draw a comparison between the action that was taken in this case in the constituency of Macdonald, and the action which was taken in the province of Saskatchewan a few months previous, where many of the same men were concerned, and where many of the same interests operated.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member cannot follow that out, it would be going too far from the debate.

Mr. OLIVER: Then, Mr. Speaker, if I am permitted, I desire to open up the question of the administration of justice in the province of Saskatchewan in connection with the recent provincial election. If I am not permitted, I presume the question does not pertain to this discussion.

Mr. BORDEN: In respect of this Government?

Mr. OLIVER: In respect of this Government.

Mr. BORDEN: The hon. gentleman is quite at liberty, so far as I am concerned, to go ahead and say what he likes in regard to that.

Mr. SPEAKER: With due regard to the rules of the House, I think the hon. member would be ill-advised in opening up this discussion.

Mr BORDEN: I want it to be distinctly understood that I raise no point of order against the hon. gentleman in proferring a complaint in respect to this Government, and I desire to place absolutely no restraint upon him in respect to anything he desires to say in that regard. All that I do object to is the discussion of provincial administration——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has the floor.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend from Edmonton, as I understand it, suggested some question as to his being in order. I want him to distinctly understand that I raise no point of order against him.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have only to say, in regard to any observation that may be made in connectioin with this subject, that it must be within the proviso of this amendment. This amendment refers particularly and only to the election in Macdonald, therefore, I think that dealing with anything in Saskatchewan would not be fairly connected with it.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to press the point. I was prepared to deal with a subject involving the connection of this Government with the provincial elections in Saskatchewan. I have no desire to wander from the subject under discussion, and I am quite willing to accept your ruling. I shall probably have another opportunity of bringing the matter to the attention of the House, but I thought perhaps it was just as well to make the comparison now, so that it would be clearer than it might be later on. While I miss the opportunity of further emphasizing the point I desire to make in respect of the unwarranted and improper interference of this Government in the course of justice in the province of Manitoba, and in the actual conduct of provincial elections in the province of Saskatchewan; while I am unable to carry out my arguments as fully as I would wish, I feel that I have already placed before the House enough facts to establish that there has been a gross trespass upon the rights of the citizen—a most villianous denial of the right of free speech in the election in Macdonald, to which my hon. friend's colleagues were directly a party. In as much as he himself and his government secured the benefit of whatever success those efforts achieved, he himself and his government must either fully accept or effectively repudiate responsibilty.

Hon. W. T. WHITE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

THE CANADIAN WEST INDIAN TREATY.

On motion of Mr. Borden for the adjournment of the House,

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When may we expect to have placed on the Table of the House the publication containing the proceedings of the Canadian West Indian Treaty Conference?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): It is expected that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce will return in a few days, and, while I cannot speak for him, I should think that the report would be presented within a reasonable time after his return.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I ask my hon. friend when the agreement with the West Indies will be brought down?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): That is a matter which shall receive our consideration also, and I will advise my right hon. friend tomorrow in regard to the matter.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Annual Report of the the Department of Agriculture.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

List of Shareholders of the Chartered Banks; Unclaimed Balances; and the Public Accounts for the fiscal year.—Hon. W. T. White.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. J. A. M. AIKINS moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Bank Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. AIKINS: Section 88 of the Bank Act authorizes the bank to lend money to a purchaser or shipper of or dealer in agricultural products on the security of those products, no matter what the quantity may be or where stored; but it does not authorize the bank to lend money to the farmer on his threshed grain, no matter how great the quantity or how well stored. The Act also provides that the bank may lend to a manufacturer of goods, wares and merchandise, on the security of the goods, wares and merchandise; but it does not authorize the bank to advance money to the producer of grain, although it is perhaps the best security that can be given, because so readily convertible into money. The Bill is intended to remedy this by providing that the bank may lend to a person engaged in farming upon the security of his threshed grain, an agricultural product.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: What about live stock?

Mr AIKINS: A great many people desire that the bank should be authorized also to advance money on live stock. I am in entire sympathy with that, but the urgency is not so great, nor are the reasons so apparent. We all know that the farmer needs money, especially the western farmer, immediately after the threshing has taken place, for the purpose of paying liabilities incurred in respect of that threshing, and his other farming operations, and also for the payments of accounts incurred during the summer.

In the West the period between the termination of harvesting operations and the commencement of the winter is short. For that reason the farmer ought to be permitted to devote as much time as he can to fall ploughing and to preparing for his next year's crop. At present the only way in which he can pay his liabilities which ordinarily amount to perhaps fifty per cent of the threshed crop is by selling that crop; and, in order to do that, he must during the time I have mentioned haul his grain to market, and that takes up a large portion of his time. This Bill is intended to obviate that, and give him the opportunity of taking his grain to market when he thinks proper. It gives the further advantage that all these loans are made on the pledge receipt, which is a very simple document, and thus obviate the necessity of chattel mortgages, legal and registration fees, the cost of discharges, and such like. It will also obviate the necessity of the farmers hauling hurriedly their grain to the railway stations to be disposed of there, which, as we know, creates congestion, not only at those railway stations, but all along the line. Moreover, it gives the farmer the opportunity of disposing of his grain when he thinks proper, and he is best able to judge of the time when it should be disposed of. Meanwhile he can store it without cost on his own farm.

Mr. MACLEAN: Does the hon. member include live stock in his amendment? There are a great many farmers in the West who do not grow grain, but who raise stock, and if his amendment is of assistance to the grain grower, I think it ought also to cover the raiser of live stock.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: I do not know the purport of the amendment which the hon. gentleman has proposed; but I may say for his information and for the information of the hon. member who has asked in regard to live stock, that both the matters referred to have had the consideration of the Government, and will be embodied in the revised Bank Act which I propose to bring down. That being the case, I leave it to my hon. friend from Brandon either to allow his Bill to go to the first reading, or to be withdrawn, as he may deem proper under the circumstances.

Mr. AIKINS: It should have the first reading at all events, as it is before the House.

Mr. AIKINS.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. CURRIE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Criminal Code. He said: At present there is no penalty attached to the act of an alien who takes part in our elections either by voting or otherwise. The first clause of this amendment provides as follows:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine of not less than one thousand dollars and, in addition thereto to imprisonment for a term not less than six months, and in default of payment of such fine to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year who, not being a natural born British subject or not having been naturalized as a British subject in Canada: (a) votes or attempts to vote in any election for any public office under the Dominion or provincial law; or, (b) who interferes with or intimidates any person entitled to vote at such election; or (c) takes part in any such election by canvassing, driving voters to the poll or taking part in a public meeting; or, (d) writes, issues or circulates any document pertaining to such election.

Section 2 provides:

> Any fine so recovered shall be payable half to the informer and half to His Majesty for the use of Canada.

This is a matter in relation to which I speak from personal experience. American citizens took part in the last election in the riding I represent. Not only did they interfere with the election, but they had the hardihood to come into my riding and even to stand on the public platform alongside the Prime Minister of that day and call upon the electors in my riding to defeat me. I think a stop should be put to that sort of thing; and, as the Election Law does not make provision for it, we are compelled to reach it in another way. I understand that under the laws of the provinces of the West a man does not have to be a British subject in order to vote. Therefore we must reach these people by the proper means, that is by the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr Rainville, for an Address to His Royal Highness, the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the course of his remarks yesterday, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, said that Providence had been continuously weeping during the past year over the defeat of his Administration in September, 1911. If that be true—and I entirely disagree that it is true—then judging from the tone of my right hon. friend's utterance and that of my hon. friend the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), Providence is not alone in its sorrow. I think that Providence, in this regard if in no other, has plenty of company among hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me admonish them to cheer up, because for them as an opposition the worst is yet to come. If they feel so badly about it now, how will they feel while still in opposition five, ten, fifteen or more years from now ?

My right hon. friend—and I regret that he is not in his seat—honoured me with his attention concerning the cut which was made in the cement duty during the time of the cement famine last summer. My right hon. friend seemed to be vastly concerned about the principle involved in the reduction in the duty upon cement under the authority of a statute by Order in Council. He entirely overlooked the fact that, only a short time ago, when in power, his government had taken a precisely similar course in connection with the duty upon coal. I rather think that the right hon. gentleman, instead of being concerned as he professed, about the principle underlying the action of the administration, was more concerned about his friend and confidant and chief adviser, the head of the cement merger in Canada. Last year, my first session in this House, this Government was subjected to a constant stream of criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite to the effect that we were identified with the trusts, mergers and combines, and a great deal of such misrepresentation—deliberate and wilful misrepresentation in some cases —was made with regard to myself. Yet the fact remains that this Government has been the first government to serve notice in unmistakable terms, in terms that will not be forgotten, upon the cement merger that, if they desire to retain their market they must be prepared to take care of it, and if they do not take care of it then conditions will be changed so that others will take care of it. My hon. friend made a charge of a very personal nature against myself and against this Government. He charged, in effect, that the Government had made the cut in the cement duty for considerations of what he termed political expediency——

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): My hon. friend says, 'Hear, hear.' Well, when I have finished he may not say, 'Hear, hear.' The right hon. gentleman made the charge that the Government reduced the duty upon cement by reason of the fact that there was an election pending in Saskatchewan and for the purpose of influencing that election. I understood my hon. friend from Edmonton to make the same charge. I entirely repudiate that charge, and I propose to prove to the satisfaction of this House that the action of the Government was founded upon the highest considerations of public interest and that if they had failed to take the action they did they would have been derelict in their duty.

Upon what evidence did my right hon. friend found his charge? He took a very extraordinary course, a course, for which, I think, he is severely censurable, he took the course of making these charges against myself and against this Government without having taken the trouble to inquire—and he could have easily ascertained,—all the documents in my possession were at his service—upon what the action of the Government was founded. Instead of that, what did he do? He read a letter from a manufacturer of cement published in an obscure journal, based upon the grossest misrepresentation as to what had transpired in an interview between myself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) and the cement manufacturers during last winter. He could have obtained, as I have said, the information for the mere asking. Instead of that, he took the extraordinary course of identifying himself with the writer of that communication addressed to the Prime Minister, and vouched, I think, for the substantial truth of its statements, and in that, I say, he is open to the gravest censure. It seems to me an extraordinary thing that a statesman of his experience, an orator of his standing, should descend to become a collector of clippings upon which to found an accusation against a minister or a government.

I do not propose at this stage to deal further with the question of the cement duties, but I hope to lay before this House such evidence as will convince hon. gentlemen on both sides that the action of the Government was not only abundantly justified but absolutely necessary under the circumstances. My hon. friend from Edmonton said that although he was in favour of cement duty reduction, he agreed entirely with the right hon. leader of the Opposition —and no one ever knew my hon. friend from Edmonton to take any different position. No matter what the exigency may be, it is with him a case of follow my leader every time.

My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) and my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition have had a good deal to say about their sympathy with the plain people. I propose to make this matter an issue between this Government and the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and the hon. gentleman from Edmonton, before the plain people. Is this loyalty to the West in connection with the cement famine a mere lip loyalty, or is it a real loyalty towards the cement merger? What are the facts? The people of this country will desire to know, and will ask my hon. friend from Edmonton to explain his position in this regard. As I understand, in no part of Canada is the question of cement a more important one than in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and yet we find hon. gentlemen opposite repudiating the action of the Government, and criticising what they did to give relief to the people of the West under circumstances of an extreme cement famine.

Mr. OLIVER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to correct that statement.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I will withdraw it if the hon. gentleman will satisfy me in what respect I have made an error.

Mr. OLIVER: The objection made to the action of the Government was as my hon. friend himself stated at the beginning of his remarks that the reduction was made for the purpose of influencing an election, and not for the benefit of the people.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): What evidence has my hon. friend of that? Before I conclude I will convince even my hon. friend that his suspicions are entirely baseless, and I challenge him to prove that the Government's action was not soundly based upon the information before it.

Mr. OLIVER: I am accepting everything the hon. gentleman said before he undertook to state what the leader of the Opposition had said, and what I had agreed with. The hon. gentleman's statements in this respect do not conform to my understanding of what the leader of the Opposition said and what I agreed with.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Does my hon. friend or does he not object to the action of the Government in cutting one-half off the duties on cement last June?

Mr. OLIVER: I do object to the Government having put the duty on cement in October.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Does my hon. friend not know—and if he does not he should know—that the Government's action was taken under the authority of a statute for which the late Administration was equally responsible with the Government which followed it? Does he not know that this Government is subject to law, and can act only in accordance with the laws of this Parliament? Does he not know that permission to reduce the duty upon any commodity is only granted by the statute in cases where the Government considers it advisable, in the public interest, to make such reduction? A certain situation existed in June, and the Government made a cut in the cement duties for the entire building season. At the end of the season the necessity for this no longer existed, and if this Government had done anything else than to allow the cement duties to go back at the end of October, they would not have been acting properly under the authority conferred by the statute.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct a statement made by my hon. friend, and it is this: that to-day those who require cement in large quantities are making their contracts for delivery next spring, and that those contracts are subject to the duty as it has been fixed by the action of the Governor in Council.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): If the same conditions exist to-day as existed last June, when we were memorialized by boards of trade and building exchanges throughout the West, as well as in certain parts of the East, it is a very extraordinary thing that nobody except my hon. friend has, to my knowledge, raised any protest against the cement duties being resumed as they were at the end of October last.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: What has the hon. Minister of Finance to say in regard to the imputation made against the Government by his old friend in the cement business from Owen Sound?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Sometimes there is a question as to who is one's old friend. I have no doubt whatever that the gentleman who wrote that letter to the right hon. the Prime Minister intended it for publication, and that it should be made use of by the right hon. leader of the Opposition and some of his followers just as it has been. But what is the evidence apart from that letter? Solely the fact that the cement famine in the West and in other parts of Canada chanced to synchronize with the elections in Saskatchewan.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask hon. members to observe the rule of adhering to the question under discussion?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): The basis of the letter which was addressed to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government was a statement to the effect that an assurance had been given to the cement manufacturers by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself, at an interview last winter, that no change would be made in the tariff. It has always been a proper tradition of the Finance Department, and of every finance minister—and I may say one that I have continued, and will continue in the future—that no representations or statements of any kind whatsoever are made, except to Parliament, with regard to any proposed changes in the tariff.

Mr. GRAHAM : What about Currie ?

Mr. WHITE : The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is quite capable of taking care of himself even as against the late Minister of Railways. In order to establish beyond all doubt the wilful character of the misrepresentation made by the writer of that letter as to what occurred at the interview between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself, and the manufacturers of cement, I shall read a letter which came to hand three or four days afterwards, from one of the manufacturers, and which shows conclusively that no such undertaking was given as alleged, and that no representations of any kind were made. The cement manufacturers were heard, and they were informed in the usual way that the Government would give consideration to the matter which was discussed. On the 25th of January, 1912, a few days after the interview, I received this letter:

Toronto, 25th Jan., 1912.

Hon. W. T. White,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Can.

Re Portland Cement.

Dear Sir,—As promised I enclose you a copy of the memorandum used by the delegation that waited on you and the Hon. Mr. Foster on Friday last setting out facts and conditions relating to the manufacture of Portland cement in Canada, which we consider furnish good reasons why there should be no reduction in the existing rate of duty on this commodity and why it is necessary in the interests of the industry in Canada that there should be a rigid enforcement of the Dumping provisions of the Customs Act.

Clause 6 of this Act refers to the importation into Canada at a price less than the fair market value of the article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of its exportation to Canada.

The facts and figures set out in our memorandum show that any cement imported into Canada from the United States at the price at which it is now selling in Canada must be sold at the place of manufacture at a much less price than it costs to make. Surely this cannot be said to be the fair market value for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course of business. It is not most extraordinary? If this is not the kind of thing that the Dumping Clause of our Customs law is intended to prevent, then what are the conditions to which the clause is intended to apply?

Trusting that the memorandum contains such information as may be useful to you in dealing with the matter, and that there will not only be no reduction in the duty, but that the Government will see that the provisions of the Customs Act as to dumping will be rigidly enforced for the fair and reasonable protection of our cement industry.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
JAMES PEARSON.

Does that letter imply that any representations were made ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Who wrote that letter ?

Mr. WHITE : Mr. Pearson, one of the representative men on that delegation. Is not that conclusive evidence ? Does it not prove beyond peradventure, even to the satisfaction of my hon. friend from Edmonton, that not even by implication were representations made that anything would be done or would not be done. Let me first direct the attention of the House to the clause in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, under authority of which the cut was made. Section 92 of that Act provides that the Governor in Council whenever he deems it right and conducive to the public good may remit any duty or toll payable to His Majesty, imposed or authorized to be imposed by any Act of the Parliament of Canada, and such remission may be total or partial, conditional or unconditional, &c. What were the circumstances under which the cut was made ? My hon. friend says that in the letter written by the Acting Prime Minister the statement was made that there was no intention of reducing the duty on cement, and that statement was absolutely true. The statement was made in that letter at that date, because it was true, and my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) need not be surprised to find a true statement in a letter. What happened ? There had been rumours from time to time of a shortage in cement but the matter was not definitely brought to the attention of the Government. On May 31, 1912, we received this :

Winnipeg, May 31, 1912.

We are unable to purchase supplies of cement in Canada for immediate use. We have large paving contracts at Regina and Edmonton. Great loss to ourselves and inconvenience to the public will be entailed unless supplies secured immediately. Can you suspend duty to such extent as will meet Canadian price until situation is relieved.

National Paving and Cement Company.

This was the first time it had been brought to my attention that any particular firm was suffering, and I lost no time in making inquiry about it. I at once communicated with the president of the Cement Company. I met his general manager the next day in Toronto, and I said : 'It looks like a cement famine in the West ; what have you to say ?' He had frankly to admit that they were unable to meet the cement requirements in the West. Now, the Canada Cement Co. manufactures five-sixths of all the cement used in Canada, a fact which the House will require to remember in order to understand the statement I shall make. The manager of the Cement Company admitted, and I made him write me to that effect, that they could not get cars and they could not get boats for the shipment of cement to the West.

Other representations were made, and I commend them to my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) who is criticising the Government, and my hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), for I would like to know where these gentlemen stand on the matter. If their position is that they are not loyal to the West, but loyal to the cement merger, I want to know it. I was the target for a good deal of unjustifiable criticism last session, in connection with mergers and combines, and I should like to know where these gentlemen opposite stand to-day. I commend to my hon. friend (Mr. McCraney) this communication from the Saskatoon Building Exchange :

Saskatoon, June 5, 1912.

This city completely tied up for some fourteen days past through lack of cement and failure of the Cement Merger to meet our requirements and position seems likely to continue. Immense losses being caused to the contractors, etc. Cement can be obtained in any quantity and at short notice from the United States. This exchange urges upon you and your Government the necessity of removing the duty on cement and respectfully urges you to take the necessary action to suspend the duty.

They wanted all the duty off, and my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) criticises the Government for taking only half the duty off.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What is the date of that ?

Mr. WHITE : June 5th. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say : Why could they not bring in the cement and pay the duty ? I will tell you why. I made a very careful investigation into the subject—I gave this matter as careful consideration as I ever gave anything—and in June last, when this correspondence was exchanged, the price of Canadian cement in the West was from 15 to 30 cents lower than the price of American cement, plus freight and duty. The contractors in the West had quoted certain rates for paving and for building purposes, and this meant that they would have been obliged to pay the higher rate because they could not get delivery from the cement companies of Eastern Canada. You will observe that the first telegram I had asked me to equalize the price of cement in order that these men could get the cement at the price for which they contracted and be enabled to go ahead at once with their building and street paving operations.

Another one from Saskatoon, from the Board of Trade—my hon. friend from Saskatoon is not here, but my hon. friend the member from Edmonton is the leader of the western contingent.

The Saskatoon Builders Exchange.

Saskatoon, June 6, 1912.

Cement shortage rendered situation here critical. Construction work all kinds suspended owing to lack of supplies. This delay serious blow to general development. Over five million dollars tied up in buildings and enforced idleness of labourers causing heavy loss to contractors and others. Strongly urge temporary remission of duty to enable obtaining cement from United States thus obviating further commercial distress.

Saskatoon Board of Trade,
M. ISBESTER,
President.

Let me ask my hon. friend this: Does he slander the Saskatoon Builders' Exchange, or the Saskatoon Board of Trade by suggesting that they were influenced in sending those telegrams to me by the fact that an election was pending in Saskatchewan? I told my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) that I would convince him, and I think I have gone far to do it. He cannot stand up and say, and there is no man among hon. gentlemen opposite who can say, there was any collusion in connection with the cement reduction in the West, having reference to the documents I am presenting to the House.

Mr. OLIVER: If that is intended as a challenge, I will be glad to do it.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Sometimes when my hon. friend is assailing this Government. I congratulate myself that the table is between him and me, and that the mace is not within too easy reach of my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend wants my answer, I can give it to him now.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Maybe my hon. friend will remember that last year, when interrupted he declared that it was his turn to speak and that he had not finished.

It is my turn now. It is turn about, and they say that is fair play. Now another one from Saskatoon:

Saskatoon, June 5, 1912.

Situation serious regarding shortage of cement. We have five million dollars tied up in this city for want of supplies. Strongly urge remission of duty for four months to enable us to get supplies from the United States. Work delayed during our short building season is a serious blow to development in construction of work of all kinds. City contractors state they are losing one thousand dollars per day by the enforced idleness of their labourers.

JAMES CLINKSKILL,
Mayor, Saskatoon.
M. ISBESTER,
President, Board of Trade.

Then I have another from Calgary—there is no hon. gentleman opposite from Calgary. I think, probably, that if it was known in Calgary that hon. gentlemen opposite were opposing this cut in cement, it would be a long time before there would be an hon. gentleman from the city of Calgary.

Calgary, June 5, 1912.

Scarcity of cement here. Local manufactured article used up. Calgary contractors buying from United States under hardship of duty of contracts awarded this organization petitions your Government to remove duty on Portland cement until the Canadian manufacturers are able to supply the demand for cement.

W. J. RICHARDS,
Prest. Cal. Builders Ex.

That last sentence answers my hon. friend with regard to the cessation of duties on the 31st of October. Does my hon. friend realize the uses to which cement is put? Does he realize that it is a basic commodity, and that it enters into the construction of buildings, and pavements, and works, and involves the employment of thousands of men? And in the short season in the West it is a most vital necessity that they should get the material early in the year. Will my hon. friends have the temerity, upon the strength of a letter, signed, so far as they are concerned, anonymously, to get up in this House and make a charge against me and against this Government of collusion in connection with such an important matter as the tariff?

Now, I come a little nearer home, and what do we find in Edmonton? Do we find Edmonton sharing in the views expressed here by my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver)? Whether he agrees or not with the views expressed by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), he follows his leader, and he is bound by what his leader says. Yet this is what I received from the Edmonton Board of Trade:

Edmonton, June 5, 1912.

A special general meeting of Edmonton Board of Trade called to discuss cement situation unanimously approved action of our president yesterday in signing telegram asking for removal of duty on cement for period of four months to permit building operations here to proceed. It is pointed out unless immediate relief afforded more men will be idle in West owing cement shortage than are employed in entire cement industry of Dominion.

F. T. FISHER,
Secretary.

Now, here is the representative of Edmonton getting up, contending for an action, or at least an inaction, on the part of the Government which would involve the laying off of more men in the West, according to the statement of his own Board of Trade, than are employed in the whole cement industry in the Dominion of Canada. Now, is there not an apology coming to me? I am sorry my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not present, because he could share some of this with my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). Is there not an apology coming to me for the suggestion that, because it happened to be the month of June, and an election in Saskatchewan was in the month of June, we had taken this action because of the election instead of by reason of those telegrams? Does my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) know where that reasoning leads him to? Does he realize that it leads to the conclusion that the Boards of Trade of Saskatoon and Calgary and Edmonton were in a conspiracy to influence the situation in Saskatchewan? Well, what about Winnipeg? It will be a long time before hon. gentlemen opposite will have any representative from Winnipeg, on account of the course they have taken with regard to this cement reduction, and for other reasons. This is from Winnipeg:

Winnipeg, June 7, 1912.

Please refer this Board's resolution December nineteenth and subsequent correspondence re cement merger contending rate of duty on this necessary article is excessive and petitioning Dominion Government for reduction or abolishment of duty. Since your letter March eighteenth stating matter would be laid before Government for consideration this board without any further advice. Serious shortage cement exists throughout western Canada. Building operations at standstill and erection of many postponed indefinitely This board urge immediate action by Government in reduction or abolishment of duty as necessary to alleviate present serious situation.

C. N. BELL.

And then from North Battleford comes this:

North Battleford, Saskatoon,
June 8, 1912.

Cement shortage renders situation here critical. Construction work of all kinds suspended owing to lack of supplies. This delay is serious blow to general development. Strongly urge temporary remission of duty which will enable us to obtain cement from United States so as obviate further commercial distress.

Board of Trade.

My hon. friend contends for a policy that will retard development in the West. The right hon. leader of the Opposition makes these charges when he might have had the common civility to have walked over to my office and said: 'Will you be good enough to let us see the documents on which you took action in the reduction of the duty on cement?' Is it fair that, on the strength of an anonymous communication, a charge involving my personal integrity should be made against me on the floor of this House? I say there is an apology coming to me in all fairness.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): When the hon. minister speaks about this communication being an anonymous one, is he in a position to say that the Prime Minister did not receive a letter signed by a responsible person in the term published in the Courier?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I am not in a position to say that. All I can say is that he said yesterday, as I understood him, that it was anonymous.

Now, let me say here, because it is not necessary that I should in any way evade these accusations—the case is absolutely conclusive—that there is not a man among hon. gentlemen opposite who will say that this Government could have taken any other course in view of these telegrams and communications. I ask any hon. gentleman to rise in his seat and say that it could, and, not only that, if we had not done it, how the welkin would have rung! The hon. member for Edmonton would have waxed eloquent about the ills of the West and he would have placed the onus upon us of being allied with the trusts, mergers and combines. Talk is all right, but this is the real test. When my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) says we are the representatives of the trusts, the mergers and the combines, the position of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Edmonton will be a sufficient answer on this question.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. OLIVER: I asked the hon. gentleman before to correct the statement which he has seen fit to put in the mouth of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and myself. I understood that he intended to correct it. I must ask him again not to repeat it.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I have no desire to misinterpret what the hon. gentleman said, but I do feel a little strongly about this on account of the reckless way in which this charge was made against me.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): There was no charge made against the hon. gentleman. Do not be too sensitive.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Let me make answer to the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). The leader of the Opposition said distinctly—and I took his words down—that it was by reason of political expediency—

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I hold strong views, and I have some ideals as to the position which I have the honour to occupy in this Government, and if the Minister of Finance, for considerations of political expediency, would do what has been done here, he would be recreant to his trust. If the hon. junior member for Halifax has a different conception then I hope he will change it before hon. gentlemen opposite get into power.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): My only objection is that the Minister of Finance assumes the whole responsibility himself.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): My hon. friend does not, I am sorry to say, keep in tonch with current events. If he had kept in touch with what was happening he would have known that I made the public statement that I had investigated this matter, and that it was in the public interest that this should be done by reason of the cement shortage. Yet, yesterday, it was brought up here as a charge against me that it was for political expediency that it was done, and I am simply meeting the charge as I think I am entitled to do.

Did I rest content with this? I did not. I have a number of press clippings from Western papers, from Liberal as well as Conservative papers, that would have no interest whatever in influencing adversely the Saskatchewan election, impressing upon this Government the absolute necessity of taking some action that would relieve the cement famine which was tying up work in different parts of the West. I have these clippings, but I am not going to put them before the House. What did I do? I decided to look into the matter. I also got into communication with the Canada Cement people, who ship all the cement to the West. The smaller manufacturers in Ontario do not ship any cement to the West. I got into touch with them and with the railways and I endeavoured to get the railways to supply cars in increased numbers to the Canada Cement Company in order to relieve the famine that existed in the West. I am not taking any credit for it, it was simply my duty, but I did it, and while I do not desire to weary the House by reading all the correspondence I desire to put this in such a way that it cannot be contradicted in view of the charge which has been made. Here is the letter of Mr. F. D. Jones, manager of the Canada Cement Company:

3rd June, 1912.

The only reason our shipments to the West have not been greater is because the transportation companies were unable to supply sufficient boats and cars to carry it. Mr. J. W. Norcross, manager of the Merchants Mutual Line, Toronto, who contracted to transport all our water shipments of cement this year states in his defence, first, they ordered two steamers in England and were promised delivery here on the opening of navigation.

This was in June, 1912.

These steamers have not yet arrived but will be delivered this month. Second, the amount of business offering is unprecedented.

The general manager of the Canada Cement Company had to admit that they were not in a position to make shipments to the West. But, he was trying to exonerate his company and he said further:

If there are temporary shortages these shortages are caused by the transportation companies and not by this company. As an example of this the Government work at Brooklyn and Halifax, Nova Scotia, is held up for want of cement——

The hon. junior member for Halifax appears to be critical of the Government in regard to this and here I would ask the hon. gentleman——

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): You have not heard yet; do not make any such assertion.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I know. If my hon. friend will keep perfectly quiet I will not interfere with him, but if he will interrupt I will endeavour to answer him. There was a cement shortage not only in the West but also in the East. I had it on the authority of a member of the government of Prince Edward Island that during the entire month of June he could not get a barrel of cement for which he had contracted the preceding fall in Montreal because of the great congestion which existed with regard to all classes of freight. There was a three-months' congestion of freight in Montreal and there was a shortage of cement in Prince Edward Island. Mr. Jones said that:

The Government work at Brooklyn and Halifax, N.S., is held up for want of cement and the reason is that the Intercolonial railway is unable to supply us with cars, and the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Northern Quebec railway will not allow their own cars to go over other lines. We are to-day 35,000 barrels behind shipment to the Maritime provinces on account of not being able to get Intercolonial cars. I beg to quote the following telegrams regarding this shortage for Government work:

Work Brooklyn, Queen's county, hung up account cement organization demoralized causing great financial loss.

Does my hon. friend mean to say that there was a conspiracy among the people as well as among the boards of trade in the East and the builders' exchanges in the West for the purpose of getting this Government to adversely influence the Saskatchewan election? Now, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is in his seat and I will repeat what I said a few moments ago that I consider an apology due me by him and the hon. member for Edmonton for making such unfounded charges against myself as representing this Government in regard to the reduction of the cement duty, and for saying that the reduction was made on account of political expediency. The right hon. leader of the Opposition did not hear me and I desire to say this to him: I have shown to the satisfaction not only of this side of the House, but necessarily to the satisfaction of his own side that unless there was a conspiracy amongst all the boards of trade and builders' exchanges in Edmonton, Saskatoon and Calgary, the Liberal press of the West and these parties whom I have mentioned in the East, his charge that this reduction was made out of consideration for political expediency must be branded as reckless and unfounded.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have only this to say that I did not make the charge, but it was made upon the strength of a letter of a supporter of the Government.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I have long had and still have a very high opinion of the intellectual qualities of the leader of the Opposition and I ask him, in view of the documents which I have submitted to this House, whether he considers it a sufficient answer to me to say that he bases his charge that the Minister of Finance had cut the tariff upon cement in two for the purpose of influencing the election in Saskatchewan on statements in the letter of a man who claimed that he was a supporter of this Government?

I took the matter up with Mr. Jones, the general manager of the Canada Cement Company, to try and help out the situation in the West, for which action these gentlemen are now criticising me. I received a copy of the following letter from Mr. Jones·

Ottawa, May 31, 1912.

The contractors for the Brooklyn breakwater report that work is held up on account of non-delivery of cement.

E. D. LAFLEUR,
Chief Engineer.

On June 12, advised Jones that Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific railways had stated that they have been meeting the demand for cars.

From Jones' letter 13th June, 1912:

'I beg to state that his (McNicolls') statement is absolutely incorrect.

'In order to show you what the car situation really is I beg to advise you that on June 11, the office of one of the vice-presidents of the Canadian Pacific railway called me up and said they had a telegram from St. Andrews stating that work at the sardine factory was stopped for want of cement and that we were advised that we, the Canada Cement Company, promised we would ship as soon as ever the Canadian Pacific railway gave us cars. The Canadian Pacific railway said they would give us cars if we would agree to ship them to St. Andrews. I told them we would fill our other orders and then ship to St. Andrews. They replied if they gave us cars they wanted them shipped to St. Andrews. I replied we would fill our orders in the proper routine irrespective of their wishes.

'I think this shows you conclusively that the Canadian Pacific railway has not been able to supply cars. In other words they are willing to supply cars for their own work but not for the general public.'

Now, I will read briefly the other letters brought to my attention by Jones.

Letter Jones to Hayes, May 13, 1912:

'At Lakefield the situation is intolerable.'

Is Jones in a conspiracy?—Jones, general manager of a company presided over, I believe, by the chief political adviser of my right hon. friend opposite. Is he in a conspiracy against the Government of Saskatchewan? Did he want the Government to take action that would affect that election favourably to the Conservative party? That requires to be stated but once to show how absurd it is.

'I must draw your attention to the poor dispatch you are giving our business. Cannot something be done to help this out as our customers are complaining bitterly?'

May 8, 1912. Letter Jones to Canadian Pacific railway:

'We are getting away behind in our shipments.'

Letter to Grand Trunk railway, May 3, 1912:

I find that we are short of Grand Trunk cars at all our mills with the possible exception of Port Colborne. Much as I dislike to do so I am compelled not to route over the Grand Trunk when possible to route any other way.'

April 16, 1912.

Jones to Bosworth, Canadian Pacific railway:

'I regret to say that it appears as if our business on Canadian Pacific railway points would be ruined for want of cars.'

That is in April. I received it, of course, in June because I had taken the matter up with the Canada Cement Company, to find out their position. Jones claims that the railway was at fault, and not the Canada Cement Company. I claim that both are at fault—the railway company for not having sufficient cars, and the cement company for not having enough boats. In the meantime, there was a famine in the West; and yet my hon. friend opposite criticises the Government for acting for the public good under the statute which authorizes them so to act, and claims we were doing so for political purposes.

April 11, 1912, Jones to Bosworth, Canadian Pacific Railway:

'I hate to again bother you, but the car supply we are receiving from you at Hull and Montreal is such that our business will be ruined. In fact, we are practically not getting any cars worth speaking of. At the present moment our plant at Hull is over 90 cars short. No. 2 plant at Montreal is over 100 cars short. No. 1 plant at Montreal is about 100 cars short. Since I last spoke to you the conditions instead of getting better have been worse, and as you know from now on the volume of our business will rapidly increase.'

Now, what in substance is all that? I believe in the essential fairness of every member of this House and I would leave it to a jury of hon. members opposite if I have not proven to the entire satisfaction of every man in this House that the Government's action was rightly caused by the state of affairs that existed in the West and in the East by reason of the cement famine, and I submit that this Government is not responsible if it happened that that cement famine synchronized with the Saskatchewan election, the date of which we had nothing whatever to do with fixing. I explained in the absence of my right hon. friend that he could have obtained this information from me. Instead of that, he chose to make an attack upon me, which I think was extremely unfair and highly reprehensible, because he could have obtained the information which would have made it as clear to himself as it is to this House that the Government action had no relation whatever to the Saskatchewan election.

Now, what has been the result? The Government was authorized to take the action, in the words of the statute: 'If it was conducive to the public good.' The result has been satisfactory in the highest degree, and the very action of the Government that is condemned by my hon. friend from Edmonton, following his leader, is going to inure to the untold benefit of the West, because not only will the Canada Cement Company be obliged to increase their fleet on the great lakes, in fact, they have already done so by four vessels, and not only will the railways be more active in moving cement to the West, but the company will be obliged to establish its industry in the West, as I think all large eastern manufacturers should be obliged to do, because one of the greatest benefits to the West would be the establishment of industries. I am happy to say that I have been able to induce some to locate in the West. I never lose an opportunity of impressing upon our eastern manufacturers the necessity of establishing themselves in those great and growing cities in the West, and I believe they will continue to do so for many years to come.

I have given the matter of freight rates a considerable amount of study, and on cement the freight rate from Fort William is one cent per ton per mile. Cement that was selling in Toronto at $1.45 a barrel was selling at Edmonton at about $3 or a little under, and was selling at Saskatoon at $2.50. My hon. friends seem to have no sympathy for the people or the contractors in the West, in the fact that building construction and paving was interrupted, or that thousands of men would be thrown out of work, but simply criticise this Government for having taken a step in strict accordance with the law.

Now, I think I have dealt with the cement question. I started out to prove to the satisfaction of every member on both sides of the House that the action of the Government was justified, and I should like to invite any member from the West to get up and put himself on record, in view of those facts, as opposing what the Government did last June in regard to cement.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF: I think my hon. friend has been putting the question unfairly to the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Edmonton in saying that they opposed the reduction. What they said was that it was done for political purposes, but they did not oppose the reduction.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): After listening to the telegrams which I have read and the communications received from the Builders' Exchanges, the Boards of Trade, and others in the West, and knowing the situation as he does, can my hon. friend seriously ask me whether any Government could have refrained from taking the action we did? My hon. friend from Assiniboia would have lifted his voice to high Heaven if we had not taken action. If my right hon. friend had been Prime Minister at that time, he would have taken the same action, because he is an intelligent man.

And if I had been in his position I would have done what I think he owed to me and the Government to do, but refrained from doing,—I would have made some inquiries as to the information upon which the Government took the action which is now complained of by my hon. friend.

By the way, in connection with that, I said before my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) came in that, while this Government had been accused of being in league with the trusts, mergers and combines, it seems that we are not likely to be any longer open to that reproach, for I have said that we are the first Government that has ever taken a merger of this kind in hand and made it have more regard to the duty it owed to the consuming public.

In connection with this I have an extraordinary report of a speech by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). Let me say with regard to this and other newspaper clippings, that I have been so frequently misreported that I am going to ask my hon. friend, either now or with the permission of the House or later, to state whether this fairly represents a speech he made at Marieville on the 7th September last. Note the date, and remember that Parliament prorogued last April. He was talking very properly about the Government, but not so properly against the Government and its policy. According to this report he said:

> They have formed a tariff commission which is composed of men high up in the Trusts.

The Senate, as hon. members know, threw out the Tariff Commission Bill. And I think hon. members might well consider the names of those who voted against that Bill. I think that would be a conclusive answer to the hon. gentleman's charges last winter that the Tariff Commission was formed in the interests of the trusts, mergers and combines.

> They have formed a Tariff Commission which is composed of men high up in the trusts. The present Government was formed by the trusts and it could not very well refuse to give to those trusts all the protection possible.

You know how much they have got since we came in.

> The Commission was formed but received instruction to ignore the rightful demands of the farmers.

This is real news.

> Why have the workingmen and the small proprietor on the farm no representative on the Commission?

The conclusive answer to that is that the Commission was not formed.

> Have they not the same rights as the trusts? Do not they deserve some consideration at the hands of the Government?

I do not pretend to say that my hon. friend is correctly reported. But he was thus reported in the Montreal Star, and if misreported, I think he owes it to the House to say so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I beg to state that this report is entirely incorrect. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. White, Leeds) will do me the honour to read the other Montreal papers of the same date he will find my speech reported verbatim. I am sure he will credit me with at least knowing that the Tariff Commission Bill was rejected by the Senate last year. But, as regards the farmers being represented on that commission, he will remember that when he introduced the Bill I asked him if the farmers would be represented. No doubt, it is upon some reference I made to that matter that this report is based. But I am sure he will see that I could not have made the speech attributed to me by the Star. The error may be due to the fact that English papers in the province of Quebec sometimes send reporters who are not familiar with the French language. My speech was reported fully in Le Canada and with considerable fullness in the Montreal Gazette. And I would trust the Montreal Gazette for the accuracy of the report of my speech.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): It goes without saying that I accept entirely the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) that he has been misrepresented. Under the circumstances we can understand how it occurred, for he spoke in French and has no doubt been misreported in the translation. Let me do him the justice of saying that it did not seem to me like him intellectually—that is he would have known that the Tariff Commission had been thrown out by the Senate. But as he has spoken about the representation of the farmers about which he asked me in the debate on the Tariff Commission Bill, no doubt he will remember what I said. I said I would not reject a farmer because he was a farmer, or a labouring man, or a business man, or any other because of his occupation or calling; that my conception of the Government's duty was to appoint the best men that could be found.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Except a free trader.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Why, there are not any left in Canada. We would have to get a man from England. And the first to get up in his place and object to bringing in a man from England would be one of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Getting away from the cement duty and the 'trusts, mergers and combines,' and getting into freer air, I desire to give attention to some remarks of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). It seemed to me the hon. gentleman was in what I might call the doleful dumps with regard to the election in Macdonald. He submitted ex-parte affidavits relating to a matter which, I believe, is before the courts, and which I do not intend to deal with, not being acquainted with the facts. It seemed a little curious that the hon. gentleman should bring these forward in connection with the Address. But I think his reason for doing it is obvious. He desired to draw a herring across the trail; he desired to mask his defeat in Macdonald. He and many of his colleagues went into Macdonald and fought under the banner of reciprocity with the United States and free trade within the Empire—absolutely inconsistent things in many ways— and were badly beaten. And I think it was to mask that fact that he brought these charges before us. We cannot sift these charges ex parte. The hon. gentleman files affidavits; some one else files affidavits; how much further on are we in a knowledge of the facts? What progress can we make in criticising the administration of justice in Manitoba which is not within our jurisdiction? I have no objection to inquiring, so far as may be necessary into facts that existed in Macdonald at the time of the election. But it does seem to me that my hon. friend desired to divert attention from the great outstanding fact that the constituency of Macdonald, a year after the general election, by an enormous majority, especially in the rural districts, proclaimed to the world that the great prairie province of Manitoba was forever done with reciprocity. Now, what about reciprocity? (I had almost said, what about Absalom?) My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was strangely silent in his remarks upon the subject of reciprocity. A year ago he said it was passion and prejudice that had triumphed at the polls. And yet on this occasion, he is silent as to reciprocity.

Let me point out to the House that the great issue that still divided the two parties in this country is precisely the same as existed in September last year. The reciprocal legislation of the United States is still upon their statute books, and all that is necessary to make the reciprocity agreement effectual as between the two countries is similar legislation on the part of the Canadian Parliament. I think my right hon. friend owes it to this country and to this House to state precisely what stand he takes to-day upon this question. Would he, if he came over to this side of the House, introduce the necessary legislation to make effectual the reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States? In his speeches throughout the country my right hon. friend has been saying that the problem still remains, but he is silent as to his own views in regard to its solution. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Low), judging from his public utterances in Ontario, holds the same views that he did a year ago, he is still in favour of reciprocity. My hon. friend from Edmonton, from what he said and did in the House last year in this matter, certainly would not now repudiate reciprocity.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is doing me entirely too much honour in addressing so many of his remarks to me, but I really wish to say that I have no intention of repudiating reciprocity.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I did not suggest for one moment that my hon. friend had any such intention. Referring to the views of the hon. gentleman from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), I remember that last year I formed a very high opinion of his sagacity. I thought he was a good political doctor, or at all events a good political coroner, because he knows the signs of death, he said that reciprocity was dead. I am not sure as to the stand taken by the hon. gentleman from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) or the hon. gentleman from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). As to the attitude of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) he is the noblest free trade Roman of them all. I know the stand taken by the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. gentleman from Welland (Mr. German). From the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, it might be supposed that the members of the Cabinet were daily engaged in mortal combat, but is it not quite reasonable to ask, in the light of the views of hon. gentlemen opposite on the reciprocity question, whether or not they make up an exceptionally happy family? How many hon. gentlemen from Ontario will get up in open meeting and declare that they are in favour of reciprocity? How many from Quebec will do likewise? There is an old saying: What will they say in London? But my hon. friend from South Wellington may well ask: What will they say in Guelph? And my hon. friend from West Lambton may have the same trouble.

Let us see what the Globe of Toronto said about the Macdonald election, and endeavour to ascertain whether that periodical considers that question a real live issue:

> Free Trade in Farm Products.
> The electors of the district of Macdonald are face to face with a great issue, on which they will have to pronouce at the bye-election on Saturday next. The issue is not whether there shall or shall not be a change of administration, for whatever the result of the polling the Borden Government will continue to hold office till the next general election, whenever that may take place. The issue is whether the farmers of the West shall have the privilege of sending their grain and live stock into the United States market free of duty, and whether they shall have the additional advantage of the short railway haul and of permanent relief from traffic congestion. If the Macdonald farmers desire to have these benefits they can hasten by their votes at this election the time of procuring them.

What does that mean? That is a straight declaration in favour of reciprocity.

A very distinguished statesman of Ontario, a strong Canadian and Imperialist, has been elected as leader of the Senate in the place of the late Sir Richard Cartwright. I refer to Sir George Ross, and I desire my right hon. friend to read, mark, learn and inwardly digest his views in regard to the question of reciprocity. I think the following words should be deeply engraven upon the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite:

> 'Let us not want to be better unless we are sure of the effects of the medicine. Let Canada continue to sell her merchandise wherever she finds a market, and trusting in a Providence that has always filled her barns with plenty and made her merchants princes in the land; let her not hazard her trade or her independence for expectations that may never be realized, nor place herself under obligations that might interfere with the fullest development of her industries in the years to come.'

It appears to me, speaking without any disrespect, that this is quite a political 'kettle of fish.' Considering the views held by hon. gentlemen opposite, who can conceive the nature of a caucus held by the Liberal party upon this question of reciprocity? It would be like unto a political feast of Pentecost, at which they would speak with divers tongues. I say to my right hon. friend in all seriousness that, in view of the fact that reciprocal legislation is upon the statute book of the United States, it is only fair to the people of this country and to this House that he should declare openly whether he intends to repudiate this pact.

If, on the other hand, he intends to say: I stand as I stood last September on reciprocity, then let him say that, but I think he should say one or the other. My right hon. friend cannot ride two horses. He cannot ride reciprocity in the West and tariff stability in the East. I agree with my right hon. friend to the utmost in saying there is nothing of greater importance to the commercial and general interest of this country than tariff stability.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In respect of cement.

Mr. WHITE: And coal. Tariff stability —he cannot ride the two horses of reciprocity and tariff stability at the same time. My right hon. friend has criticised me, not very often, but on several occasions, with regard to what he has been pleased to call tariff tinkering. There never has been less of tariff tinkering done by any Government since Confederation. In my budget last year I was criticised by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), but so far as tariff stability is concerned I stand with my hon. friend, and I say that there is nothing more important to the industry of this country and to its general prosperity than maintaining general tariff stability until a general revision of the tariff. I agree absolutely with my hon. friend as to that. I said in my budget speech last year explicitly that there were some tariff items in respect of which much could be said in favour of an increase and others in respect of which much could be said in favour of a reduction, but that, having regard to the fact that we were to establish a Tariff Commission and to the general prosperity and conditions prevailing in Canada, I was of the opinion that no tariff modification should be made last year. I am on record as saying that. But now my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) does not seem to have the faculty of criticising himself. Does he not know that no possible change or revision of tariff once a year would produce any such condition of instability as the reciprocity agreement negotiated by his Government? I shall tell you why this is so. In the first place that agreement was terminable on short notice. Let me recall something historically interesting to my right hon. friend and to the members of this House. When the old Lord Elgin Reciprocity Treaty terminated in 1866 the Americans were not willing to renew it. It had lasted for 12 years, but terminated in 1866, after the war. The Americans were not willing to renew it for reasons with which many members will be familiar, among those reasons being a certain hostility on account of the war. The coalition government then in power in Canada, sent two commissioners, Messrs. Hay and Howland, for the purpose of negotiating an extension of that Treaty. They were not able to do that but they suggested that there should be an agreement come to precisely the same as was come to last year, to be brought into effect by reciprocal legislation, and the Hon. Geo. Brown, one of the leading Liberals of Canada, one of the stalwarts of the old days and the founder of the Toronto Globe which now talks of obstruction any day you may mention anything against reciprocity, the Hon. Geo. Brown threatened to resign from the Government and did actually resign for that and another reason.

Mr WHITE (Leeds)

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: Tell us the other reason.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): But he is on record with regard to it. My right hon. friend will find that Hon. George Brown—and no man will have more respect than my right hon. friend for the Hon. George Brown for his judgment in many ways—said it would introduce an element of instability into the affairs of Canada, that we would be kept dangling on legislation at Washington and he could not under any circumstances have put it better than in that expression. We all know that the great trouble in the United States to-day is tariff instability. Tariff changes are threshed out in one House or in the other, they may be amended in one House or in the other, and people dare not make contracts any distance in advance. If there had been such an agreement as this, notice would be given frequently to terminate it, and that would introduce an element of instability. After our plant, our railways, &c., had all been arranged running north and south, after our trade had found new channels, we might have had notice given to terminate the agreement in a few months, to the disturbance of the country generally. That would introduce an instability that we cannot conceive of. Nothing that could be done in the way of altering our own tariff from year to year could produce such instability as would have been introduced into our affairs by such a reciprocity agreement.

What have we lost by the rejection of reciprocity? Let us consider this fairly, what have we lost by its rejection?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You had better ask George Lane, exporter of cattle.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Mr. George Lane is no doubt a worthy citizen, but after all there are many worthy citizens, and it is the business of statesmen to secure the greatest good for the greatest number. I have never denied that reciprocity would have been of great advantage to many individuals, but what we have to consider is the greatest good for the greatest number from an economic standpoint. And I believe that by bringing into this House legislation giving effect to the reciprocal trade agreement negotiated by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with the government of the United States, we would not have been securing the greatest good for the greatest number.

My right hon. friend will remember that in August of last year there was a serious depression hanging over this country. Building permits fell off, customs duties were reduced and in October, immediately after the elections, the revenue again became buoyant, building permits increased and we have gone ahead with the greatest year of prosperity in the history of our country. What have we lost by not having reciprocity? Our trade three years ago was about $750,000,000. Last year it was about $850,000,000. This year I hope it will be about $950,000,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where is the bulk of our trade?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): The bulk of our trade is with the United States.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I have no objection to my hon. friend saying 'hear, hear' to that. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said the other day that the policy of this party was under no circumstances to have truck or trade with the Yankees.

Mr. OLIVER: That was the declared policy of our friends during the election; that was their slogan.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) says that he never said anything of the kind.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not accuse him of saying so, but I say it was the slogan of his party.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Let us clear that up here and now. What was the objection of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden), and I think of every other member on this side of the House, to the Reciprocity Agreement? The objection was the fact of the agreement itself, among other things the fact that we would surrrender control of our fiscal policy to a great nation to the south. Nobody in Canada who has any sense has any objection to buying from the United States or selling to the United States if you buy over the tariff wall that has been erected in accordance with the requirements of each country. If my right hon. friend wants to buy something in the United States I have no objection to his buying it if he brings it in, but I do object to his making an agreement which will deliver our tariff in regard to such an important list of products over to the House of Congress of the United States.

Mr. OLIVER: It would enable us to sell in the United States as well as buy.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): We can sell in the United States to-day.

Mr. OLIVER: We cannot.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds):—but we cannot control their duty.

Mr. OLIVER: But we had control of it by reciprocity.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): And my hon. friend says we had control of it, but how long could we control it They could control our tariff for an indefinite time by the very force of their importance as compared to ours. However, I shall not argue that now. As I said, we retain control of our own affairs. My right hon. friend was in a critical frame of mind, a very critical frame of mind. This country is prospering as it never has been before, but he is not contented with its prosperity. Its revenues are higher than they have ever been before, but my right hon. friend is not satisfied with our revenues apparently. The real fact of the matter is, my right hon. friend is dissatisfied that he is not on this side of the House. I am afraid it is a case of Dr. Fell. I say that with some reluctance, but I cannot understand the position of my right hon. friend otherwise. He has assailed this Government on the ground that we do nothing. He says that this Government does nothing. If this Government has done anything it has not been by reason of the fact that my right hon. friend has not tried to prevent us from doing it, for he obstructed some of the best measures we brought down to the House last year. Let us take some of the things we have done, though we have only been in power a little over a year.

One of the first things we did was to enlarge the boundaries of Manitoba. A general resolution on that subject was passed in this House in 1907, and though my hon. friend was four years longer in office, so far as I can see, he took no step towards enlarging the boundaries of Manitoba. This Government immediately took the question up. It was not the easiest question in the world to handle; my right hon. friend did not want to grapple with it; he delayed; but this Government carried out its promise, and put Manitoba on the same basis as the other provinces in the West. Manitoba was a postage stamp on the map before it turned it into an envelope, and we put into it a couple of million dollars of arrears of pay which she should have had long ago.

Then, take the naval policy. I am not going to discuss the naval question; but what about our naval policy? Last year, when we had been only a few weeks in office, my right hon. friend complained that we had not brought down our naval policy. What are the facts? The first Imperial conference to consider the question of defence of the British Empire by land and sea, was called in 1887, 25 years ago, and during 15 years of that time my right hon. friend was in power. What is our position to-day, so far as naval defence is concerned? We have the Niobe in dry dock at Halifax. She has just been repaired to the extent of $300,000 damage to the hull. Then we have the little Rainbow on the Pacific coast. That is as far as we have got. My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) said in 1910, on a similar occasion to this, that he would proceed to London and consult the Admiralty, and bring down the proposals of the Government later. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says this Government does nothing. What more could my right hon. friend the leader of the Government have done? He carried out his pledges as soon as a man could possibly carry them out in that regard.

Then, we provided a subsidy to the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, a railway that has opened up one of the richest areas in Canada, highly mineralized, and with a great belt of agricultural land.

Mr. MURPHY: Thanks to the Liberal Government.

Mr. WHITE: Let me say thanks to the Liberal Government. We shall say thanks to Sir George Ross, whose views on reciprocity I have just given to the House, and thanks to the very able present Prime Minister of Ontario, and to Mr. Englehart, who is head of the Commission. But when the proposal was brought down to this House to give the province of Ontario a subsidy of a couple of million dollars in connection with the building of that road, exception was taken, although my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) took no exception, so far as I remember, to Bills granting subsidies to the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I divided the House twice in Committee on the Canadian Northern subsidies.

Mr. WHITE: Was it on the ground of rates?

Mr. GRAHAM: It was absolutely on the ground of rates.

Mr. WHITE: I will withdraw that, then. I have a fairly good memory, and my recollection is that so far as the subsidy was concerned, $12,000 per mile, my hon. friend said he did not care about the amount, but that what he did care about was putting the through rates under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under the control.

Mr. WHITE: However, I will withdraw that.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend's memory is partly right and partly wrong. So far as the Canadian Northern in British Columbia is concerned, I forget whether we divided the House; but we divided the Committee twice, because this Government made an exception in granting a subsidy to the Canadian Northern in British Columbia without its being subject to the Board of Railway Commissioners as to rates. I took exception to that on that ground. With regard to the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, I stated distinctly that if I were in the Ontario Government at the present time, I would not think of coming and asking the present Government, or any other, for a subsidy. But as to rates, I went this far—perhaps I did not go so far as some of my friends—that it was a difficult thing, perhaps, to interfere with the provincial governments concerning their own railways; but I urged strongly that as to through rates—this road is linked to a through line, having leased running rights to the Grand Trunk railway—it should come under the Board of Railway Commissioners. Under the statute, that could not be done, even by this House, without the consent of the provincial government, it being a provincial government road; and the Prime Minister, acquiescing, to a certain extent, in my contention, said that before that would become law, he would consult with the Ontario government to see if they would not consent to that jurisdiction.

Mr. WHITE: I accept what my hon. friend has said; but the fact is that the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario subsidy was opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and was thrown out by the Senate composed of a majority of Liberals. I think it was thrown out—I am drawing my own inference—because it was known that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was opposed to it. Let me put it alternatively. If my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had supported it, I do not think it would have been thrown out. I do not know whether my right hon. friend influenced the Senate; I have no evidence to that effect; but I do think that if he had been in favour of it, it would not have been thrown out by the Senate.

Then we brought into effect the Grain Act by which sample markets will be established in the West; and this year, we have, in pursuance of a pledge of the Government, let a contract for a three million bushel elevator at Port Arthur. In addition to that, the Government has made large expenditures upon the improvement of the Montreal harbour, and it is taking up the question of improving Halifax harbour, and Quebec harbour.

This Government has been active to the last degree during the past year, and any criticism as to its not being active, either in bringing down legislation or in carrying out the provisions of legislation, or in carrying on the business of this country, is not well founded.

I have occupied the time of the House very considerably this afternoon. Let me say this, for, after all, I desire to make all allowances, or any allowance that should be made. I spoke rather strongly in regard to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) attacking myself and this Government with regard to the cement duty reduction without having made himself acquainted with the information in my office. I still feel that it was unfair to me; but I believe, in view of the explanation I have given, and the facts I have produced, that he will come to an entirely different conclusion, and will be the first to say so. I am sorry he was not present when I gave most of the evidence I submitted. I think that neither this Government, nor his Government, if it had been in power, could have done otherwise than was done. This Government may submit its record during the past year with confidence to the judgment of the people of this country.

Mr. LOUIS J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I must say, at the beginning of my remarks, that it is not from presumption that I ask the attention of my fellow members, but it is from the desire to exercise my privileges as a member of this House. I wish to state the position I will take in regard to the vote which I shall give on the main motion as well as on the amendment now submitted for our consideration. I am at a disadvantage because of my lack of experience in the House and especially because of the language which I am using in discussing the questions of the day and answering hon. gentlemen opposite who have taken the floor since the beginning of this debate. But, I consider that I have a duty to perform, and that this is a time to set aside all bashfulness and natural timidity, and to do my best to do justice to the cause which I represent. Facing the issue immediately, and expressing my regret that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is not in his seat, I will deal with the remarks which have been made by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, Mr. Borden in his speech on the subject to which I propose to devote some attention. I quote the words of the right hon. gentleman. He said that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier in retiring was actuated by the highest of motives. I understand that this statement is correct and it is of the same fabric as the editorials which have been published in the newspapers favourable to the present administration since the departure of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier from the Cabinet. The apparent object of these statements is, in plain words, to make the hon. member for Jacques Cartier appear as a hero. If the hon. gentleman was a hero for the reason that he went out of the Cabinet and if he was actuated by the highest motives, was he a hero when he came into the Cabinet? What was the motive that actuated him when he came in? If we refer to the debates of last session, when my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was inquiring as to the position held in the Cabinet by the late Minister of Public Works, we will find the defence of the entrance of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier into the Cabinet from the lips of the right hon. the Prime Minister himself. Then that right hon. gentleman said:

> I have no fault to find with the right hon. gentleman for calling attention to the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) when this matter was under debate two sessions ago did not see eye to eye with me on the question of emergent conditions which at that time I thought confronted the Empire. Those conditions appealed to me in that way at that time by reason of very grave declarations that had been made by the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the First Lord of the Admiralty of Great Britain. I am ready to admit, in fact we were afterwards taunted in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite with the fact, that these declarations were, to a very considerable extent, modified by subsequent statements made in the British House of Commons by the advisers of the Crown, by the Prime Minister himself, I think, and also by the First Lord of the Admiralty. It is true that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and I did not see eye to eye, but the point that divided us at that time was not a question of policy, but a question of fact.

If I understand the remarks which I have just cited, when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier went into the Cabinet, he was on the same platform as the right hon. leader of the Government. They had the same policy, the only difference between them was as to a question of fact. The leader of the Government thought that there was an emergency and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier thought that there was none. That was the question as it was stated before the House by the leader of the Government last session.

What do we see now? We see that, during the electoral contest in the constituency of Hochelaga, the Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre) had to submit to an election contest and there was a letter published over the signature of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. The letter is addressed to Dr. Lalonde who was organizer for Mr. Doyon and it is dated November 18, 1912:

My Dear Friend,—You inform me that certain ones are causing a rumour to be circulated to the effect that I am opposed to the contest which is now going on in Hochelaga division. I am surprised to learn this, and I regret the fact such reports have gained currency. I am not taking any part in the contest, believing that in following such course I am acting rightly. I gave up my place as a member of the Cabinet for the reason that the Government has decided not to institute a plebiscite on the question of a naval contribution.

So, taking together the declaration of the leader of the Government at the last session, his declaration here yesterday and the document which I have just cited, if the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was a hero when he went out, it will be very hard for the people of the country to believe that he was a hero when he came in because the people are under the impression that the late Minister of Public Works, when he went into the Cabinet, had had promises which enabled him to live up to the pledges that he had made to the electorate and, if he had no such promises, how is it that, over his signature, we now have the fact ascertained that a plebiscite on the question was only refused when he resigned?

Considering that the condition of affairs at the opening of last session was the same as yesterday, the people of this country will come to the conclusion that during the last twelve months the Cabinet has not arrived at a conclusion on the fundamental question of the naval policy. But there is another side to the question. If the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is a hero because he went out—and he went out because he could not live up to the pledges he had given to the electorate—with what name shall we qualify the act of the others who are remaining ; who were returned because they made the same promises which bound the member for Jacques Cartier, and by which these hon. gentlemen do not seem to be much bound ?

With regard to the paragraph from the Evening Post of New York quoted by the leader of the Government, I do not object to it being cited, but I object to the intent with which it was cited. I think it ill becomes a statesman like the leader of the Government, who has the confidence of the majority of the people of this country, who has been in communication with the Imperial authorities during last summer, and who has a standing before the world, to make such statements as he did.

Is it the preparation for another ultra loyalist campaign, to have the Imperialists of this country swallow another contribution scheme ? I cannot approve of anything of the kind. We on this side of the House do not boast of our loyalty, but let me remind the House that when the annexation manifesto was signed in 1849, it was not signed by Liberals ; that when Canadian aid was refused to the Mother Country by the Government in 1884 it was not a Liberal Government that refused it ; and in 1897, when the Empire was suffering from the South African war, it was a Liberal Government that sent volunteers to the aid of the Empire. When the preferential tariff was established, giving a preference in the market of this country to English goods, it was the act of the Liberal party. When the Transcontinental railway was engineered for linking up the different parts of the Dominion, it was engineered by the Liberal party ; when the naval stations of Halifax and Esquimault were accepted for the Government, they were accepted by the Liberal party ; when the naval question was settled, it was settled by the Liberal party, and, more than that, it was settled with the consent and under the advice of the Imperial authorities.

These are deeds that we have done, and I think it ill becomes a member of this House, even if he be the Prime Minister, to insinuate that loyalty is the sole appanage of the gentlemen who sit on the other side. We claim that we can be Liberals and be loyal, and we have proved it. It is all very well for the hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side to wave the flag and claim that they are the only saviours of the Empire. We do not boast as much as they do, but we claim that our deeds are recorded in the statute books of this country, and we can stand on what we have done.

I now come to the two by-elections of Macdonald and Richelieu. I was one of the fortunate or unfortunate gentlemen who fought for the Opposition candidate in the electoral contest of Macdonald. It may be very well for the hon. gentlemen who are sitting in their offices or at their desks in this House to treat in a humorous vein the attacks that have been made by gentlemen on this side of the House in regard to the Macdonald bye-election. After having sat in the Legisative Assembly of my province; after having practised at the bar of my province for twenty-three years, after having been elected a member of the House of Commons, and, more than that, being a free man in a free country, insulting nobody, trying to do what I thought was right, speaking from the platform and trying to give to those who heard my remarks the confidence that there was in my mind, fighting for the triumph of my ideals and principles, I was shadowed for eleven days in the riding of Macdonald. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House may laugh as much as they please. It may be that the people of this country will not laugh when they know all the details of this election. The key of my room was taken away; my grip was searched; my room was ransacked. I have had proof of employees of the provincial govrnmnt of Manitoba, salaried detectives wearing the badge, trying to put under the influence of liquor a free citizen of the parish of Notre Dame de Lourdes, at the station of Cardinal, on the day there was a joint meeting at Notre Dame de Lourdes.

And when I drove to Notre Dame de Lourdes, the man who had been compelled to drink and had been given money to sign a complaint that I had wanted to bribe him did not have the courage to stand by what he had said. It may be very funny for certain members of this House. But let me say this: I am not in communion with the ideas of the Government of the day, but I think that in the party that now administers our affairs there are honest men. Now, is it necessary for those in that party who are honest and clean to be in the same case with those who have committed such crimes and outrages as have been described? I say, no. I represent not only the Liberals of St. Hyacinthe, but also the Conservatives who voted against me. And speaking for the Conservatives of the county of St. Hyacinthe who voted in favour of my opponent, I say that they have confidence in the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) who now leads the Government. They listened to the attacks he made upon the late Government. They heard him say that that Government were wrong-doers and that if he were entrusted with power he would do better than they had done. But now, when the case of Macdonald is brought to the attention of the House, what does he answer? In his official capacity he says: My predecessors did the same. I say, we never did the same. But, even were the hon. gentleman's charge true, the electors of this country who have expressed confidence in the party now in power will be shocked when they hear all the details of this election in Macdonald. Let me give barely one instance. Last session hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House asked the Government day after day to interfere to reduce the tariff rates for the western farmer. But the Government answered that that question was out of their hands and was in the hands of the Railway Commission. But during the contest in Macdonald, a Minister of the Crown who was stumping the county made a speech in the town of Somerset and declared that the Government would reduce the tariff rates. I suppose he thought this a means of inducing the people to vote for the Government candidate.

In the by-election in Richelieu, the electors were threatened. But those electors voted according to their conscience. And what was the result? Before eight days had elapsed after the result of the election was known, eighty-three workingmen who were supposed to have cast their votes against the Government of the day were thrown out of employment, and they are now in the city of Montreal, at this time of the year, trying to earn bread for their wives and families.

When the Government cannot win by-elections by bribery and corruption, they can at least strangle the electors. For you can be loyal in this country if you are willing to be a Tory. You are entitled to live, you may remain under the shadow of the British flag, but first you must be a Tory, otherwise you are liable to be deprived of the means of earning your bread. It is very well for the Government, with a great majority in this House, to minimize the accusations that have been brought forward and to meet with ridicule the assertions of those who have suffered from the condition of things that is exposed. But the people of Canada, who know what it means to have representative government, the people who have read their own history and know the value of their institutions; the people who are glad to live under the British flag because it affords to everybody freedom and fair play; the people who are patient because they are strong and know their strength, will crush the men who think that they are the people's masters though they have been elected only to be their servants.

Mr. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): I have no intention of unduly claiming the attention of the House. But I feel, as a citizen of this country, that it is necessary to look into the charges that have been made against certain members of the Conservative party with respect to the conduct of an election in Manitoba. I think it can be pretty generally admitted that the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) has wiped off the slate all the objections that have been advanced, so far, to the conduct of the Government of the day. But it is not by any means easy to wipe off the slate—and it is fortunate that it is so—charges of misdoing compromising the liberty of the subject in Canada. And, as it is no joke, it is not for us or anybody else to treat it as a joke. I think, therefore, that we must give it due consideration. For, if the liberty of the subject in Canada is not guaranteed, and guaranteed to the utmost limit, life in Canada is not worth living and citizenship is merely a name. I think hon. members will agree with me that the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is thoroughly capable of presenting any case that he thinks should be presented. I think they will agree that when he has set before the House the facts concerning this election in Manitoba, and in this case has done it presumably to convince us that some great wrong was committed, we are at liberty to judge of the seriousness of the case by the success with which he has presented those facts.

It is impossible for any reasonable Canadian to entertain the idea that elections in this country have always been conducted as they should have been. I come from a constituency where—and I say it with all reverence—I would to God that at the time of the Federal election I had been Attorney General, for I would have arrested large numbers of men in that constituency, who are a disgrace not only to West Peterborough, but to Canada and to humanity. Whisky is their natural beverage, cigars decorate their mouths at all times, they regard every vote as purchasable, and they make a jest of everything that is decent. But, on my own behalf, I will say that there has not been one whisper of wrongdoing in connection with my election. If hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to make a joke of that statement, why should they blame others if they make a joke of the statement of the hon. member for Edmonton? Why can we not treat these things seriously? Those gentlemen who are laughing at the present time have not heard from the riding of West Peterborough one charge against me or my supporters in this respect.

If the hon. member for Edmonton has in any respect proven his case, it is necessary for this House to take notice of it, in order to protect the liberties of the people of this country. During the opening remarks of my hon. friend, I expected that he would strike the key-note of his sincerity, and I was somewhat disappointed to find that he charged the right hon. the Prime Minister with juggling with words, whilst he himself was charging the Government with failure to implement their promises with regard to the Tariff Commission, the Highways Bill, and other measures which depended entirely upon the Liberal majority in the Senate. He cannot possibly be acquitted of insincerity in this respect. I was not disappointed, however, in his later remarks with respect to the balance of trade —something that in the Liberal ranks not many years ago was regarded as another huge joke. When the Conservatives in those days urged that the balance of trade was increasing as against Canada, the Liberal party ignored that important question, and treated it as an absurdity, and a Conservative heresy. Now, however, we find them urging the balance of trade as a justification of their objections to certain policies of the present Government.

The hon. member for Edmonton admits that the success of the Conservative party in the late election was due to the reciprocal policy of the Liberal party, and that the waving of the old flag was a factor in the defeat of the then existing Government. That being so, it must be acknowledged, notwithstanding the fact that all the Liberal leaders were in favour of reciprocity, and that many Conservatives for a time were also in favour of the agreement, that the people of this country were wiser than both. They knew what they wanted, and a triumphant democracy returned to power the opponents of the reciprocity pact.

Referring again to the matter of the alleged misdeeds in Macdonald, I wish to call the attention of the House to a statement made by the hon. member from Edmonton which knocks the foundation from under the supports of the allegations made. The hon. gentleman said:

> I do not suggest that, upon any statement of facts I can place before the House to-night, the House will be required to take certain action, but I do say that it is possible to place before the House such a case, such evidence that, unless the House is prepared to go further and make inquiry for the protection of its rights and dignity, this country has entered upon an entirely new political phase the results of which no man can prophesy.

Here is an allegation made against a respectable party, and yet, notwithstanding all the complaints that may be made in regard to the matter, the hon. member for Edmonton says he does not suggest that upon any statement he can make the House will be called upon to take action. That being the case, why go on? It is extremely satisfactory, after hearing these general allegations, to read the affidavits of the men who are most aggrieved. I am not prepared to say for one moment—and I do not suppose anyone else is—that justice was completely done in every particular; but, as indicated by the speech of the hon. gentleman himself, and especially by the affidavits which he at different times has read, I think that reasonable justice has been done to the persons concerned. The attitude assumed by the provincial government of Manitoba seems to be one of suspicion towards a large number of the alleged workers from other parts of the country who flocked in there at election time. I do not refer to those well-known men, of course, whom we see every day in connection with such elections, but to those persons who flock into a constituency at such a time as to give rise to the conclusion that they are not there for any good purpose. Men who have no record of well-doing in their behalf are usually viewed with suspicion, and I think, if we consult the records of Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, or any district outside the jurisdiction and control of the Conservative party, we shall find that these men are arrested as irresponsible vagrants and handled without ceremony ; yet no outcry is made. And why ? Because by their improper conduct and irresponsibility they have justly drawn upon themselves the suspicion of the community, and may reasonably be said to have been deserving of the treatment they received. This, however, is not the case with all men, and those who are above suspicion could not be treated with impunity in this or any other similar way. Does any one suppose that men who admit they have been bred in the very mire of political dishonesty, as did the late lamented and valorous Cap. Sullivan, and others who infested Ontario many years ago, can pass as angels and claim that injustice has been done them because they have been suspected ?

By no means. That is drawing too much upon the credulity of the people. While sometimes a little injustice may be done, the general tenor of the opinion of the people is that if we did not exercise some rough and ready justice, in a word, knock down without ceremony the ruffians who attempt to terrorize us, we would be under their domination, and would become the laughing stock and butt of the whole lot And that is true. Human affairs are extremely complicated; human institutions at best are weak but we must justify our conduct before the bar of public opinion and if the people of this country think that the general reputation of this Government is such that it cannot be relied upon they will turn this Government out, but if they think that the actions of this Government in Macdonald and other places compare with the actions of certain governments and certain men say in Saskatchewan where the poll indicated that the votes were all one way and the returns only came in at a very late date or something of that description, of course there will be dissatisfaction.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What does the hon. gentleman say as to the resolution of the Presbyterian Synod of Manitoba in regard to this matter?

Mr. BURNHAM: I say that the action of the Presbyterian Synod of Manitoba is a most serious thing and one that calls for prompt action on the part of the people of this country. I should like very much to have had that resolution in more definite terms. I should have liked very much to have had that resolution charge the Conservative Government, charge the government of the province of Manitoba or some other body of people with wrong-doing. But instead of doing that they have left a blissful imputation to go broadcast over the country without denouncing any particular body. There is an old saying: If the cap fits put it on. And when people have been called liars it is not the honest man who stands up and puts the cap on. In this case I question very much whether it would be proper for a Conservative Government, either here or anywhere else, who remained uncharged, to get up and put this black cap on.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Did the hon. gentleman read what Ralph Connor and other clergymen in the Presbyterian Synod said as to the people in this resolution?

Mr. BURNHAM: I am reading the evidence put before this House by the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and I suppose he knows his case well. I have not been able to read all that the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) speaks of but if there has been any serious discrepancy in placing this evidence before the House, if the case is imperfect as indicated by my hon. friend, I shall sit down and allow somebody else to go on with it and put it in proper shape. If it is necessary to supplement the presentation of the case so far made, as suggested by the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald)—and to this I am quite prepared to agree—then by all means let it be done; but so far as the Presbytery for Winnipeg has thrown out imputations of the most serious and searching character, these imputations apply equally to the Liberal and to the Conservative party. Nobody can say that these men, if they intend to impute wrong-doing to the Conservative party had the courage of their convictions, and I must say if we are to look impartially into these things we must agree that where a body of people like the Presbyterian Synod of Manitoba have shown a disposition to consider a question but did not feel able and were not willing to place the responsibility upon anybody in particular, it is because they did not know that they could do so.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I would ask the hon. gentleman whether in his judgment the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) yesterday made a prima facie case at least which would justify the appointment of a parliamentary committee to investigate these charges.

Mr. BURNHAM: I may say I do not think he made out a case at all. I will say this, that if it would tend to clear up a matter of such importance by all means appoint a Parliamentary Committee. If the general opinion of a large proportion of the people of this country is, rightly or wrongly, that a Parliamentary Committee should be appointed, by all means appoint it. I am asked if on this statement of the case by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) I think a prima facie case has been made out. I say frankly that I believe in all sincerity that if this is all that is in the charges that have been made there is nothing in them at all. There are three affidavits. What does one man say?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I am not surprised that the hon. member never observed any irregularities in Peterborough.

Mr. BURNHAM: We observed the irregularities all right. They will not occur again. I promise you that. One of these gentlemen says that after having spent his time more or less I presume in political organizations in Ontario, he went into Manitoba in or about the month of September and found himself in the course of his travels in the constituency of Macdonald, where, being a strong party man, he put himself into communication with the executive and straightway was employed in good, sharp, smart electoral work in Macdonald.

Mr. PARDEE: The affidavit does not say so.

Mr. BURNHAM: Oh, yes.

Mr. PARDEE: He does not say good sharp, smart work; he says employed in organization work.

Mr. BURNHAM: Certainly, I admit that I used those words, that is comment on my part, but I thought possibly they did not understand an awful lot——

Mr. PARDEE: They seem to have understood more than the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BURNHAM : The Liberals have had a bad day to-day. However, as a humble member of the back benches of this House and with some sense of honour, I hope I am entitled, to the best of my ability, to analyse an extremely serious case; because, if the allegations are at all to be justified, something undoubtedly must be done. This man Sullivan came forward and, it is stated on the authority of no less a man than the Premier of the province of Manitoba, that he registered under a false name. I do not want to know anything more about any man than that.

Mr. PARDEE: The Premier of Manitoba did that.

Mr BURNHAM: I am not discussing that part of it. If he did, I certainly may not——

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) did it once.

Mr. BURNHAM: If you have evidence of that fact, why not bring it forward? However, I see that the hon. gentlemen are not disposed to discuss this question; they want to discuss something else.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Will the hon. gentleman tell the House why it was that the prosecutors who laid the informations and arrested these gentlemen did not furnish some evidence at a hearing to show that they were guilty of some offence under the law?

Mr. BURNHAM: I think the prosecutors were extremely silly. I think they certainly indicated that there was no evidence. That is fair.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is only a fair assumption. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) as a lawyer knows that he has gone into court before this and told the court that he had no evidence to offer, not because he had no evidence, but because that is the technical phrase you use when you wish to discontinue a prosecution. That is a fact. I say that if I had been the prosecutor, I would have prosecuted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What would you have done if you had no evidence ?

Mr. BURNHAM : If I had had anything to do with the arresting, I do not think the man would have been arrested.

Some hon. MEMBERS : Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: I do say this, that when the deponent, as disclosed in the affidavit, has treated the matter as a joke, and laughed about it, and in another case said he was quite willing to have a verdict of acquittal if it could be got, and in another case admitted he had brought suspicion upon himself by saying such words as, 'I did not say I gave you that money for your vote,' it is all very well to laugh, but when people are in the midst of trying times, and war's alarms, they had better walk circumspectly. When men are so outraged with regard to their liberty that they can treat the whole matter as a joke, I for one, believe they are guilty. When they were arrested and put through a course of thin porridge and thin soup and all that sort of thing, as outlined in detail in a very humourous way by the men who drew up the affidavit, and when at the end of it they add their appreciation of the institutions of this country, and their appreciation of liberty, and laugh about it and say, 'if you can get an acquittal, get it,' I would have a very poor appreciation of the outrage which these gentlemen are endeavouring to place before the people of this country as having been inflicted upon innocent youth, which is, I think, what the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) called the gentleman. What is the sum total of the outrage inflicted upon these people? The sum total is, that three or four men, who came into the constituency and drew upon themselves, justly, a very large measure of suspicion, were arrested, and a certain amount of punishment was inflicted upon them, but not enough. That is the objection: not enough punishment was inflicted. With regard to the provincial police of Manitoba, the ex-Minister of Public Works asked the hon. member for Edmonton if these men were all provincial police, and he did not know. He said they might have been, but he did not know. These men are duly accredited minions of the law, if you choose so to call them. We have all the witnesses summoned before a justice of the peace, and the trials and preliminaries were conducted before the regulation appointees of the Government. Some of the men who were concerned in these may have been, and likely were, appointees of the late Dominion government, though we have no evidence of that. We must approach this subject, and treat it as a serious subject, and with some regard for propriety. The hon. member for Edmonton cannot be coerced or cajoled into saying he knows a thing he does not know, and he does not know, as he said at the beginning and at the end, that there are any facts to justify action by this House. The Synod of the Presbyterian Church felt that they had to justify the insinuation. They stopped there for the good of this country. I wish they had gone further.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What were they talking about?

Mr. BURNHAM: I would like the hon. member for Pictou to tell me what they were talking about.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You are doing the talking.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am, but I am not prepared to say what the Presbyterian Synod were talking about, because they left it in a very vague way—almost inarticulate, I might say. I think it behooves the people who are making charges to strike out straight from the shoulder, to make these charges in detail, and not merely to say that So and So were treated so and so. The Government of Manitoba actually arrested, at the request of a leading Liberal, two men on a charge of personation. Just fancy that. These minions of the law, who perpetrated such an indignity on such innocent guileless youths, had the temerity to arrest them at the request of the Liberal party.

Mr. CARVELL: And immediately let them go.

Mr. BURNHAM: They were not allowed to go. They were fined $50 and costs. I agree that they should have been stuck in jail for a couple of years. I am not saying that full justice has been done in this case. I am not saying that, but I do say that the present Government in Manitoba, and the Conservative member now sitting for Macdonald, had to fight against a gang that required all their ingenuity, boldness and resources to handle. I think I am voicing the opinion of the people of this country when I say that neither side can boast of their political virtue, and it behooves both sides to improve considerably in that respect. Were it not for the fact that the leaders on both sides have the implicit confidence of this country, it would be impossible to conduct government another hour. It is not for one moment to be supposed that any one is so stupid as to give a complete certificate of character to either party. The circumstances are there, we all know them. We all know the suggestions made by both parties. Some men cannot win fairly, they do not know enough, they have not got the courage, and when they excite suspicion by crawling through the cracks in the fence or under the canvas, and when they get spanked a little bit they cry about the liberty of the subject being infringed, and they call down high Heaven to bear witness to the outrage that has been inflicted upon the political heroes of this country. Well, to do them justice, and it is probably one of the safeguards of the country, to do them justice, they laugh in their sleeve. What is that man who drew up that affidavit talking about when he laughed at it, and what was he talking of when in another affidavit he admits that he was quite willing to take an honourable acquittal. What is the Presbytery talking about? If one man thought it was a joke, why did they not laugh? If the deponent himself laughed at it, what is the matter with the Presbytery?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It was the Synod, it was not the Presbytery.

Mr. BURNHAM: Well, the Synod.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): We had better investigate.

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not think that is necessary. The Opposition is disposed to joke about this matter. It is not a matter for jocularity, and if the people of this country become impressed with the idea that either side can treat it as a joke, they will find, when they have reported to their constituents, that it is not half the joke they supposed. I am sure on further investigation—and there is plenty of room for investigation—that if it can be shown to this House that the allegations are really made, if it can be shown that there is a prima facie case and that it is of such importance as to warrant action, there is not a man in the House who does not say, for the protection of himself, let alone for the protection of the House, that it will be necessary to hold a court of inquiry. There was one thing I was very much surprised at in the language of the hon. gentleman and that was when he said that this Parliament was above the courts.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: As soon as the people of this country understand that a body of men, 221 in number, are arrogating to themselves superiority over the courts I think they will give themselves up for lost. We have to do with the appointment of the members of the courts and with the making of laws, but those who compose the judiciary are put to one side for the purpose of interpreting those laws fairly, and I think for us to hold the sword over their head and say we are above them, that we control them and that, if necessary, we will chop off their heads, is to say that which is unwarranted and improper.

The allegation has been made indirectly that there is in this country a conspiracy for the extinguishing of the French-Canadian race, a race that has borne itself with all the honour and distinction that we should look for in one of the foremost races of the world. There is at the present time a conspiracy on foot to deprive them of their language, and to deprive them of their language is to deprive them of their customs, their history, their traditions and of their institutions. Whether it is proposed that this shall be accomplished by means of the Government, or in some other way, let me say, representing a large number of English-speaking people who, I know, hold the same opinion, that, much as we have been inclined to differ from them in the past, and often as we have had to meet them in keen debate, nevertheless, bearing in mind their loyalty to the Empire in the past and their loyalty in the present, and their recognition of Imperial needs, we will never even at the sacrifice of the English language go back upon or prove recreant to such a people. As far as I am concerned I would prefer never to speak another word of English if it meant that the French-Canadians should be deprived by force of the right to speak their language whenever they feel so inclined.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in rising this evening I wish to give thanks to the Prime Minister, as the senior Acadian member representing the people of the Maritime Provinces. I have at various times during the year, entreated him to replace the one Acadian Senator departed from the province of Nova Scotia with one of the same race from that province. We have been waiting for a long time; but knowing, as we all do, that applications for such positions are made by everybody, I had occasion to doubt the success of our application. I wish to express to him the desire of the people, whom I have had the honour to represent in this House for the last twelve years, and, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will ask one of his colleagues, perhaps the Postmaster General, to kindly take my message to him.

I wish also to express some sympathy and gratitude for the few words spoken by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), in regard to the French teaching in the province of Ontario; more so do I admire his conduct and his expressions, coming as they do from one belonging to the Conservative party, and I trust that the uncomfortableness which may perhaps reign between us will be of short duration. I speak more particularly in behalf of the French people who, as the hon. member for Peterborough has said, like to stand by the spirit of the constitution as well as by the letter.

I wish to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to matters not contained in the Speech from the Throne. In the province of New Brunswick, we are, as hon. gentlemen all know, much interested in the Intercolonial railway. It has been expected for a long time that the Parliament of Canada would acquire the branch lines of that railway which in the Maritime Provinces, and more particularly in the province of New Brunswick, has a large territory to itself. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals in the session of 1910 brought in a Bill providing for the acquisition of those branches, but owing to the erroneous judgment of the election on the 21st of September, 1911, we were not able to accomplish our project. But we expected from day to day that the present Government would lose no time, and would bring in a similar Bill during last session. I called the attention of the Minister of Railways last session to this matter, and he told me that he had not yet had time to consider it, but that he would do so during the recess. The recess has been six long months, and I am still at a loss whether or not the hon. Minister of Railways has given any consideration to the subject. It is a subject of vital importance to the Maritime provinces, and I hope that the session will not be long protracted before we have some expression of policy upon this question. We are perhaps more interested in having the matter settled at once, because we often hear rumours that are disquieting to the people of the Maritime provinces. Some few years ago the Canadian Northern Railway company wished to have running rights over the Intercolonial and even to acquire possession by long lease of that road. We hear the same rumours again and, when coupled with the long silence of the Government, they are disquieting.

This afternoon I heard my hon. friend the Minister of Finance express some opinions in regard to the policy of the Liberal party in the past, more particularly in regard to the great question of reciprocity with the United States. My hon. friend asked the Liberal party if we had not decided to let reciprocity alone. If by reciprocity with the United States my hon. friend meant the arrangement concluded by Mr. Fielding and President Taft, which still stands for the acceptance of the people of Canada, an arrangement which is not a treaty, which is for the exchange of the natural products of Canada for the natural products of the United States, I wish to say that the right hon. leader of the Opposition has no more devoted supporter, no more sincere admirer than the modest member for Gloucester, and, if the leader of the Opposition were to say that we do not want the arrangement any more, even if we can get it; then I would have to take issue with my right hon. friend. The experience of the last year has only served to make that arrangement dearer to the minds and hearts of the Canadian people, because they have been in a position to study it; and, comparing this year's experience with that of previous years, they have come to the conclusion that it is one of the best possible arrangements that could be offered to the people of Canada. It was not a treaty binding the people of Canada for a number of years, as the Minister of Finance and the Conservative party at large are always so anxious to urge claiming that we would not be able to command our tariff, and that we would become an adjunct of the United States. The fact that it was only an arrangement which could be upset by the Parliament of Canada or the Congress of the United States, gives us perfect assurance that nothing of the kind could happen. Therefore my great admiration was for the ex-Minister of Finance when he came back from the United States with such an arrangement, for I had never anticipated that he could have obtained for Canada an open market for our natural products without affecting the tariff on manufactured goods; and what do I find? I find that the manufacturers are always insisting that we would not be able to command our tariff in future, if such an arrangement had been made.

The opening of the markets of the United States to our agricultural products would have greatly benefited our farmers, and this in turn would have benefited those engaged in our manufacturing industries. For everybody knows that agriculture is the foundation of our prosperity and that the more prosperous our farmers are the greater will be their purchases from the manufacturer. Increase the quantity of farm products by opening wider, quicker and more profitable markets and you will necessarily increase, by that very fact, the quantity of farm implements and tools that have to be used. Thus the iron manufacturers first and more particularly would have found their interests advanced by this reciprocity arrangement more than they could be advanced by any tariff that we can make.

But one of the speakers to-day asked: Why should we consider this extension of commercial relations with the United States when it involves danger to our loyalty to the British Empire. Personally, I consider myself as loyal as any British subject that ever lived. I have been represented at times in the Nationalist press as being more British than the King. Well I do not expect to be more British than the King, but I am as British as any King who ever sat upon the Throne. Let us hear no more of these charges about disloyalty to British institutions. British institutions mean before the world civil, religious and political liberty. And they mean also intelligence. I should consider myself less than a true British subject if I had not sufficient intelligence to be able to go to a foreign country to buy or sell without affecting my loyalty. And if there is a nation in the world that, more than any other has proven to the world that economic matters have nothing to do with loyalty it is the British people. These solid business men of the Motherland have shown by their extensive relations with the German, Oriental and American people, that a true British subject does not sell his loyalty with his goods. And I would not be a true British subject if I could not trust my children or my neighbour as well as myself to go to the United States or any other country and trade in goods without trading in loyalty to the Crown. I wish we could hear the last of this talk of loyalty. For I am sure everybody knows that among the French people, of whom my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) has spoken so eloquently, as among the English, Irish or the Scotch, there are none to-day who would sink their allegiance. If there ever were those at any time inclined to forget their own duty and their own best interest in this regard, they were to be found among the supporters of the party now in power.

Now, I wish to say that my people have suffered during the last year for the want of reciprocity. We have in New Brunswick to-day large quantities of lumber piled in the yards adjoining the saw-mills, which lumber could not find its way to the British market because of low prices and because of the difficulty of securing ships which are used by the British importers to carry lumber from other countries. Had we not had some access to the American market last year and this year, half our lumber camps would have been closed. In my own county we have one of the largest saw-mills in the province of New Brunswick. And the whole product of its operation, 25,000,000 feet of lumber cut during last season, has to find sale in the American market. That important company in Gloucester county, the Bathurst Lumber Company, has to-day 600 car loads of lumber awaiting cars on the Intercolonial railway to be shipped to the United States. On that lumber they must pay a duty of $1.25 per 1,000 feet. Their product, as I have stated, is 25,000,000 feet a year, and I leave to you, Mr. Speaker, the calculation of the amount they have to pay to the United States, which under reciprocity would have been kept among the people of New Brunswick.

We talk of loyalty, but I am sure the Liberal party has shown its loyalty by offering at once on coming into power in 1897, a substantial preference on British goods. Nor was it a small favour which was offered to the people of Great Britain through her industries, for ever since then a marked increase has gone on in the importation of British goods into Canada. In 1897, as shown by the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, our total importations from Great Britain amounted to only $29,328,576. This has been increasing by leaps and bounds, and last year, these imports amounted to $110,585,000. When we consider that this increase is due to the preference granted on British goods by the late Government, we cannot but realise that we have expressed our loyalty in trade as well as in words.

I believe that with the reciprocity arrangement with the United States and a still further increase in the British preference, we might have secured the permanency of tariff of which the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), has spoken so highly to-day; we might have secured enormous benefits to the manufacturers of Canada while also benefitting our farmers and consumers and favouring those engaged in the industries of Great Britain.

As to the United States, we have to deal with them anyhow. Our dealings with the United States are greater than our dealings with any other country and double our dealings with the United Kingdom. We have to send to the United States our lumber and our fish. For a large part of the products of the Maritime provinces fisheries especially our smelt, salmon and mackerel, there is no other market than the American market. We have increased our exportation of fish to the United States by over half a million during the last year, and in my own county the export of fish to the United States was nearly doubled. A few years ago large quantities of our dry codfish had to be sold in the West Indies, Spain or Italy. But to-day fully half of this product is marketed in the United States and brings to the people from $1.50 to $1.75 a quintal more than they have ever been paid by dealers in these other countries.

Our total trade with Great Britain during the year 1911 amounted to $247,551,912, and with the United States $413,812,003. That trade consisted of raw cotton to the amount of $12,000,000, and manufactured cotton to the amount of over $6,000,000.

I understand that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce some time ago advised the Canadian Manufacturers' Association that the manufacturers of Canada should look for foreign markets for their products, and should not be content with the markets of Canada. If it is advisable for the manufacturer to look for wider markets, then why should not the farmers of the West also have the benefit of that large and profitable market which the United States offers?

The Speech from the Throne makes reference to the trade agreement which has been entered into with the West Indies, and I wish to congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Government of the day on having consummated that ambition of the Liberal party. But the treaty with the British West Indies can only be appreciated to the extent of the advantages of trade and commerce which it offers, and the benefits to be derived in that respect cannot for a moment be compared to those offered by access to the markets of the United States. The population of the West Indies is but four million, as compared with ninety million in the United States. It must be remembered that a large majority of the people of the West Indies exercise in their daily life the greatest possible economy, and the annual sum expended by one family might not exceed $50 a year. But the ninety million people of the republic to the south are living in comfort and luxury, expending large annual sums on such natural products as are produced in Canada in great abundance.

I will not say anything on the naval question, as my views upon it are well known. In addressing this House during the last session, I had the pleasure of telling my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when I was informed that he intended going to England to consult the Admiralty in regard to a naval policy which would be in the interests of Canada and the Empire, that if he came back with a policy which would provide for a Canadian navy built in the shipyards of Canada, with the iron and steel produced in this country and manned by Canadian seamen, no matter what the size of his vessels might be, I would give him my hearty support. The people of Canada have had time to consider this matter, and their cogitations have, I am sure, resulted in a sympathetic attitude towards the hon. leader of the Opposition in his views regarding the Canadian naval programme. If there are Liberals who may have differed with the right hon. leader of the Liberal party in some respects, they are the first to give him their support upon the question of a Canadian navy, and are ready to assist him in the establishment of a policy which will give aid to Great Britain not only in times of emergency, but at any time such assistance may be deemed advisable by the Canadian Parliament.

In the debate yesterday the hon. member for Edmonton made reference to the Macdonald by-election held in Manitoba in the month of October last. I was speaking a few moments ago of the privileges granted by British institutions, and, as my friend the hon. gentleman from Peterborough said this evening, the liberty of speech is one of those great privileges that are so much appreciated by the people of this country.

In corroboration of what has been presented to the House by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), I shall ask leave to add a testimony which came into my possession as a matter of accident by the expression of the affections of a son toward his father. In corroboration of what has been stated of the position assumed by the provincial government of Manitoba in giving instructions to police and to court officials I would cite the experience of one of my own children who gives me the information simply to express to me his surprise at what he had heard of doings in connection with provincial elections in Manitoba, but could not believe before, was confirmed by his own experience when he was almost subjected to imprisonment or arrest for walking very quietly in the streets of Winnipeg a few days previous to that election. I have a son in the province of Manitoba, a very young man, the youngest of my children, who has scarcely seen five and twenty summers, a student at law in the province of Alberta, who had just left Laval after his course in philosophy a couple of years ago and went there to settle for life. He went into the constituency of Macdonald last October to help in the election and I wish to read to you what he writes me in reference to his experience in the Macdonald election. His letter is in French and I shall read the portion of it which I wish to lay before the House in French and then shall endeavour to translate it for the benefit of those members of this House who do not understand French.

J'ai fait connaissance de M. Bover, député de Vaudreuil. J'ai adressé, avec lui, une assemblée à Fannystelle, dans le comté de Macdonald, où j'ai eu l'occasion de constater la perversité de l'organisation conservatrice manitobaine. Quand je lisais dans les journaux les rapports d'arrestations faites sans cause et sans prétexte, je n'y croyais qu'à moitié, mais je n'étais pas plus tôt rendu dans le comté que j'avais moi-même un policier à mes talons. Naturellement, comme je ne faisais rien de mal ni d'illégal, je ne le craignais pas. Cependant la veille de l'élection j'ai été averti par ce monsieur policier, que si je ne cessais de parler aux gens en faveur de la réciprocité, je serais arrêté et emprisonné. Je lui ai demandé quelle était son accusation? Il me répondit: je n'en ai pas, mais j'ai mes instructions. Naturellement je lui ai dit que je ne pouvais suivre ses conseils que j'étais venu pour travailler et que je travaillerais. A ce moment il est arrivé quelques bons Français, et mon homme eut vite abandonné son idée de m'arrêter.

I shall now give you the exact translation of those few lines.

I made the acquaintance of Mr. Boyer, member for Vaudreuil, and addressed with him a meeting at Farnystelle, in the county of Macdonald, where I had occasion to realize the perversity of the Conservative organization in Manitoba. When I used to read in the papers all the reports of arrests made without cause and without evidence I only believed half of it. But I was scarcely in the county until I had myself a policeman at my heels. Naturally as I was doing nothing wrong and nothing illegal I did not fear him. Nothwithstanding on the eve of the election I was notified by this gentleman of the police that if I did not cease to speak to the people in favour of reciprocity I would be arrested and imprisoned. I asked him what was his charge. He replied to me: I have none, but I have my instructions. Naturally I told him that I could not follow his advice, that I had come to work and intended to work. At this moment a few good Frenchmen came along and my gentleman of the police soon abandoned the idea of arresting me.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is a young man, not one of those whom the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) wants to represent as old mischief makers from Ontario, who have gone to the West, but a very simple young man who has not yet seen his five and twentieth winter, his first experience perhaps in public life. He goes sincerely to speak to the people of Macdonald on behalf of wider markets, and he is followed by a policeman and threatened by that policeman with arrest and no doubt he would have been arrested only that somebody happened to be around and to divert the activity of that policeman. When it comes to this in a province of Canada, which is all united and which must be all united, in which but one citizenship can exist for the French and for the Irish, for the old and for the young, and more particularly for the young who are to be the rulers of this country after we are gone to a better or a worse world, it is time for the people of Canada and the Government of Canada to investigate such action on the part of the government of Manitoba, whether you call it the Roblin Government or by any other name; when any government abuses its authority for its own purposes, it is time that we should call a halt. We must never forget that the strength of our constitution is for the happiness of the people and that the repetition of such courses in elections, by a provincial government, whether in Richelieu or Macdonald, as have been described here to-day, gross infringements on the liberty of the citizens of Canada, cannot be permitted again under the sun of the British Empire.

Mr. GUSTAVE BOYER (Vaudreuil): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it was on the 26th of February, 1910. Rigaud the small town of my county where I reside was all thrown into consternation. A storm was evidently drawing near, the elements which brought it were, in the afternoon, to reach our land, so quiet as a rule. In fact it was about three o'clock when one of the Canadian Pacific Railway trains landed a group of wild Nationalists who came there, some said, to upset the minds and to set their political opinion, henceforth, against the leader of the government of that day. That was the first gunshot of the campaign against the Canadian navy law. The question was to strike hard, to frighten the electors and, above all, to make an impression

I have a sweet remembrance of the member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Rainville) being one of the first among those who were to speak that afternoon.

How great was, on that date, my colleague of to-day! And if the same audience who then listened to him had heard him yesterday what a wretched man they would have found him to be!

He spoke with vehemence on that occasion; yesterday we could hardly hear him. He was wild. Rouget de Lisle did not reach to his heel. How faint his courage has grown since that time! Let us see what the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères said at Rigaud. I have extracts from the Montreal Gazette, from the Star and from Le Devoir. I shall first quote the Montreal Gazette of the 28th of February:

Mr. Rainville added a few observations. He pointed out Sir Wilfrid's volte-face on the Imperialism question, and denounced, as at Longueuil last Sunday, the falsity of the national character of the proposed navy.

The scheme of a naval force to be put at England's service, he said, was a violation of the Militia and Defence Act, drawn up by Sir George Etienne Cartier in 1868, in which it is expressly declared that our militia force should never have to fight outside of Canada or for other cause than the defence of Canadian soil and Canadian interests.

As to the Montreal Star of the same date, it published what follows:

Mr. J. H. Rainville said that the navy would belong to Canada in time of peace. In time of war it would belong to England. The question of a creation of a Canadian navy has arisen, he contended, as a consequence of the preaching of Imperialists of the Chamberlain School. These Imperialists had found that they could not tax the poor people of England any more. That source of revenue was becoming exhausted. So they were now turning their attention to the colonies. What they could not get out of the English poor, they hoped to extract from Canada, Australia and Cape Colony.

Evidence was shown of this in the war which the Northcliffe papers had made on the Lloyd-George budget during the recent election in Great Britain. Lloyd George too had recognized that the poor could not be taxed more heavily, and he had turned his attention to the wealthy.

Now, here is an extract from Le Devoir of the 28th of February, 1910:

I am sure, said Mr. Rainville, that there is here a great number of Liberals who admire Laurier because he knew know to 'stand up' in 1912, when Chamberlain tried to find out what the Canadians thought of Imperialism. 'What is it that may have happened since 1902, 1905 and 1907 to give rise to such a change of attitude in the Liberal party?' He foresees that Mr. Boyer will quote the Militia Act, drawn up by George Etienne Cartier and which prescribes the creation of a Canadian Militia bound to take part in the wars 'in which Canada would be interested.'

Amendments to that text have often been proposed, but George Etienne Cartier, Charles Tupper, John A. Macdonald and Mr. Laurier have always opposed them strongly. But there is an eel—some say a snake—in the grass (laughter). Chamberlain and his disciples, who have the most authority on the press, are making, in favour of Imperialism, a campaign which is well organized. 'As it has become impossible to make the English people sweat more money by means of taxes, they wish to tax Cape Colony, India, Australia and Canada, and if we protest against that, La Presse and La Patrie say that we are uttering the race cry.'

He concluded by a fine burst of eloquence: 'Our only country is Canada, and we must fight but for its progress and prosperity.'

That is what the press has reported of the speech delivered by the honourable member. But he said something else, and our English speaking compatroits who cheered him yesterday would surely have found no attraction in the remarks he made on their account and with respect to Great Britain. Two years have elapsed since that meeting took place, and to-day I am in a position to tell the honourable member for Chambly-Verchères that the vulgar abuse with which he loaded Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that occasion is now falling upon himself and crushing him forever. It is not the leader of the Liberal party who has been unable to keep standing on his feet, but it is his own legs which have given way until he sank to the most degrading abasement.

The honourable member for Chambly-Verchères has been able, within three or four years, to deny his party, to adopt another party, to deny this latter also, to preach a doctrine and to deny it, the whole with an impudence which sickens the honest people, as Le Devoir would say.

Now, let us see what his new profession of faith is. Let us see what he said yesterday in this House:

In fine, Sir, one of the great questions which interest our country to-day is that of a contribution to the Empire which Canada is part of.

The ideas are different as to the way of making this contribution, but from one end of the country to the other, the same feeling exists in favour of the necessity of maintaining England's maritime supremacy, in the interest of the whole Empire.

And note that the existence of this feeling has just come to his knowledge! Is this what he said at Rigaud? Is this what he said to the electors of Drummond and Arthabaska?

And he goes on:

And to those who would doubt it. I could quote the resolution of 1909. I could even quote, should it be necessary to go further, an article written by the editor of the newspaper Le Devoir, on the 12th of October, 1912, in which we read: Never have the Nationalists claimed that Canada should do nothing for the security of the Empire.

I read somewhere that the Nationalists had expressed their views concerning the defence of the country through the voice of one of their leaders, Mr. Lavergne, who stated that he was in favour of the reconstruction of fortifications and of the establishment of defence works on land, &c.

Here is a further extract from the speech of my hon. colleague:

However, Sir, let me state very plainly my mind in this connection. Europe is threatened with a general war. It is not yet known whether the great powers will allow the small Balkan states to extend their boundaries. The decisive victory won by the Bulgarian army has unexpectedly set diplomacy on the alert. Inevitably the powers will have to foresee, and it is a difficult matter to intervene and it is a difficult matter to foresee what will be the outcome as regards European intercourse.

England is not a disinterested onlooker; she will likely have to take a stand, and if war breaks out, an array of all her forces will be in order. Under the circumstances, the stand taken by the Government will be readily understood.

The hon. member was opposed to the building of a navy because, he stated, in time of war it would be under the control of the British authorities. Now here is a question which crops up in which our country has no interest whatever, and the hon. member contends it is urgent for us to give out millions. He winds up with the following statement:

If we are rightly informed the Government propose introducing this year a provisional measure of assistance, reserving the right to consult the people when the time comes to provide for a permanent contribution, and such contribution, if and when it is granted, to be made dependent on the right of representation in the councils of the Empire. That is the purport of the statements made in England and in this House on behalf of the Government by the right hon. Prime Minister who has the support of the country.

They will consult the people when there is no longer any occasion for doing so, that is after the Government will have attained their purpose; and then if the people continue to grumble they will, I presume, grant them a plebiscite, to soothe their feelings Such is the wonderful disclosure or rather justification which the hon. member had in store for us. Is it not laughable to hear him state that the reason which prompted his change of front was accidently suggested to him by the Balkan war? Indeed, had it not been for the gallantry of those small nations who are fighting for the maintenance of their liberty and their rights, the member for Chambly and Verchères would have without compunction let Great Britain fight her own battles alone. But, on a sudden, the roaring of the guns in the Balkans changes his disposition. He takes heart once more and willingly endorses now the proposal for the giving away of millions. If that is what the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères calls standing by one's principles, I must say he is a first rate acrobat.

The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères congratulated the Government on having provided an annual grant to the provincial legislatures as an encouragement to agricultural pursuits. I willingly join my congratulations to his for it is only fair that Cæsar should have his due. However, I think he is mistaken in stating that the Government proposes granting an amount of $500,000 to each of the provinces. Such a division of the grant would be unfair. Some if the provinces, in consequence of the extent of their territory or the numbers of their inhabitants, are surely entitled to a larger grant to enable them to overcome difficulties and spread a knowledge of improved methods in rural husbandry. If my memory serves me right, the increase in the Dominion subsidy to the provinces, as granted by the late government, had also as part of its object, to assist in the agricultural development of the provinces.

As a mater of fact, the special grant to agriculture which the present Government propose to give is a mere revival of the late government's policy; the only difference is in the name, not in the thing itself. Nevertheless, I am glad to see the Conservative government following in our footsteps.

The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères calls for the establishment 'of special agricultural classes in the business college's throughout our province.' I do not concur with him. To my mind, our commercial schools should remain as they are to-day, should continue improving on the same lines and endeavour to make their curriculum more and more up-to-date, but without meddling with agriculture. Let our commercial schools stick to their primary object. If it is desired that agriculture should be taught, let there be established special schools for that purpose, whose curriculum would comprise the teaching of some of the matters taught in commercial schools. Let us not confuse things. Experience has shown that farmers who send their sons to commercial schools are not desirous that they should take up farms, but that they should engage in trade or industry.

Again experience shows that in rare cases only do boys take to agriculture after going through a course at a commercial school or college. To my mind, the teaching of agriculture in such schools would result in a waste of time for the pupils. If it is wished that the theory of agriculture should be taught, let special schools be opened in addition to those already in existence. I may mention the Macdonald college of agriculture at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, where hundreds of young men and girls are continually receiving the instruction which will be helpful to them in after life. The teaching which is given there is wholly in connection with farm husbandry and household science. However, a number of commercial subjects are included in the curriculum. The same might be said of the schools at Oka and St. Anne de Lapocatière, though their organization is on a smaller scale. I have every day occasion to notice the large numbers of young men and girls from various localities in my constituency who attend the courses at Macdonald college. We might be content with schools equipped on a smaller scale. I for one think that agriculture should be taught in agricultural schools, in the same way that commercial and industrial subjects are taught in business or technical schools, the classics in classical colleges, and the liberal arts in the universities.

On the other hand, I am in accord with the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères when he requests the establishment of a larger number of model farms, and I might add the appointment of a larger number of qualified professors, in a position to give field demonstrations of the new methods and improvements, a knowledge of which is a source of profit to the farming community at large.

The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères states that he has been requested to obtain from the Government grants towards enabling agricultural societies to improve their exhibition grounds and buildings, in order to impart to farm boys an adequate idea of the importance of the agricultural fair at which from year to year in every county farmers congregate, compete and compare notes. The views thus expressed by the hon. gentleman if he be sincere, are worthy of praise but at the same time they indicate on his part very little knowledge of the question. Exhibitions are under the control of the provincial governments. The Dominion government subsidizes, by special vote, a small number only of central exhibitions.

Mr. RAINVILLE: (Translation.) Allow me to say one word. I am well aware that agricultural exhibitions are under the control of the provincial governments; my idea was simply this, that the Dominion government might take occasion of the agreement to be entered into with the provincial authorities to give effect to my suggestion.

Mr. BOYER: (Translation.) I hope the hon. member will rid himself of that habit into which he has fallen of continually and recklessly offering suggestions. He should abide by past experience. Once more, agricultural fairs are under the control of the local governments, the Dominion government has nothing at all to do with them.

If district and county exhibitions were under the control of the Dominion Government, I would give him this warning: Before venturing to offer grants, however good your motive in doing so, see to it that the moneys which you are about to distribute are spent so as to give the results which you anticipate. Indeed, the slightest acquaintance with the manner in which things are managed in connection with some of these district exhibitions throughout the country will convince one that they are mere business ventures subsidized by the Dominion or provincial governments. Then again, a large number of those county exhibitions are in no sense whatever doing the practical illustration work to which the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères referred, and young men do not congregate there to obtain inspiration from the achievements of their elders. They are rather an annual meet for amateurs of horse-racing and other various sports which agricultural societies allow on their grounds. I myself visited last year in the province of Quebec agricultural fairs which were agricultural in name only, and were nevertheless attended by thousands.

Mr. RAINVILLE: (Translation.) Not in Chambly-Verchères.

Mr. BOYER: (Translation.) That may be. Chambly-Verchères is already in a pretty bad plight. The hon. member will pardon me but I am not enthusiastic as regards exhibitions. I say again that I would rather favour a measure whereby our parliament would assist in establishing model farms throughout the country, and give field demonstrations. Exhibitions give satisfactory results, provided they are properly managed, and some counties profit immensely through them. But to ensure such results in every case, a campaign would have to be carried on by the provincial governments with the assistance of practical farmers, so as to find out what is the cause of the unrest prevailing and apply the proper remedy.

The hon. gentleman from Chambly and Verchères deplores the exodus of the country people towards the cities. He is certainly right, and in this connection he quoted the following verse:

Remettez en honneur le soc de la charrue;
Repeuplez la campagne au dépens dela rue;
Grevez d'impôts la ville et dégrevez les champs,
Ayez moins de bourgeois et plus de paysans.

The hon. gentleman designates as place seekers the country people who flock to the cities. But if he really wished to detect the reason for this exodus, we would not be long in ascertaining what it is. If the country is deserted, farm houses abandoned, left untilled, it is an easy matter for him to discover why. Let him go through the factories in Montreal, for instance, he will see that ninety per cent of the hands have come from the country places. Industries and the various municipal services have appealed to the country for more labour. It seems that salaries are higher there and the exodus has begun and continues in the absence of any counteracting influences.

The hon. gentleman grew enthusiastic yesterday over the country's wealth, its immense industrial possibilities, and then turning around he wept over the sad fate of the farmer. He might properly have insisted on the immense fortunes accumulated by manufacturers, through the dogged labour of those country people who have given up the plough shares to confine themselves in factories. Excessive protection by enriching manufacturers has impoverished the country folks. In the first place, it made farm labour scarcer; and then, through excessive duties on the necessaries of life, it made life dearer to them.

In 1911, the Liberal government submitted to the people an equitable measure towards correcting the evil, I mean reciprocity. Now, would not that hon. member, who worries over the fate of these humble workers, have been more consistent if at the time he had sided with the farming community? He might then have parodied the verses he quoted in the following manner:

Remettez en honneur la base de la nation;
Repeuplez la campagne au dépens de la protection,
Grevez d'impôts la ville et degrevez les champs.
Ayez moins de millionaires et plus de paysans.

Sir, while I am on my feet, I am anxious to inform the House of the infamous practices I have been the witness of during the Macdonald by-election. Indeed, I am one of the poor victims who almost left their bones in that constituency. I had been invited to take a hand in that election. I proceeded thereto in a very peaceful mood. I was there as a free citizen in a free country, and believing I had the right in that part of Canada to emit untramelled my political views before the electors of Macdonald

I had gone into that constituency to support Mr. Richardson, who was the reciprocity candidate; that was my only reason for being there. I was not opposing Mr. Morrison on racial or religious grounds. I am in favour of reciprocity in the East, and I claim the right to express my views in the West as well. On my arrival there, some unedifying reports were made to me in regard to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). I put no faith in them. However, after all I have witnessed and heard in the meantime, I feel inclined to think that all those misdeeds were committed to his knowledge. An inquiry before the committee on privileges and elections would clear up the matter.

I have taken part in contests in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, some of them, hard-fought batles; but never before had I experienced on the part of the Conservative party such marked contempt for the electoral law. Should such proceedings be resorted to again, a downright system of anarchy would be preferable, the constitution should be torn to pieces and the reign of sheer force substituted for that of right.

Sir, you would have been horrified at the impudence exhibited by the ministers in the Manitoba provincial government. About the same time, an election took place in the county of Richelieu, and not a single provincial cabinet minister interfered. Such is the rule generally followed by the local cabinet ministers in Ontario and Quebec.

When I saw Manitoba's prime minister and his colleagues entering the constituency, addressing very small audiences, endeavouring to influence and intimidate them, I realized that they were animated by some other motive than the desire of showing the superiority of their policy. In this connection the Government relied on the assistance of an army of employees who had recourse to a variety of means quite sufficient to explain why we were defeated. And to this very day I am satisfied that it was not reciprocity that suffered defeat. The people of this country should be made aware of these wicked deeds, and I now propose, Mr. Speaker, to acquaint the House with some of the fraudulent and shameful tricks which were resorted to. Of course, I do not hold the residents of that constituency responsible for such doings; I throw the whole blame on the provincial authorities and their confederates, including the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers).

To begin with, I may refer to an incident personal to me. One afternoon while I was staying in one of the parishes of the county, I was informed that steps were being taken for my arrest a quarter of an hour later. And what reason have they for causing my arrest? I inquired. Because you propose addressing a meeting to-night against a friend of Mr. Morrison. Was not that something outrageous? The person who reported the fact to me held the news from a third party who had overheard a telephone message between a government official and a partisan of Mr. Morrison. The former, whom I do not intend to name, but whose identity I shall willingly disclose before a committee, had instructed the latter to call on a certain local magistrate, whose name I know but do not propose to give, and there to have warrants signed in blank and sent back to him. That outrageous deed was to be perpetrated against me that very night before the meeting took place. You will admit, Sir, that such a proceeding was not evidence of very much bravery on the part of the opponent which I was to meet. And to think that I was spared the prisoner's cell, through the mere kindness of a supporter of Mr. Morrison who absolutely condemned such a proceeding.

I should make plain to you Mr. Speaker, that I was not upset by the news; nay, more, I regret that the deed was not perpetrated. For it would have enabled me to satisfy the electors of other counties, as well as my own, as to the corrupting influence exerted over elections in the province of Manitoba, under the kindly eye of the Government of that province and particularly of the hon. Minister of Public Works. That same plan of arresting Mr. Richardson's friends, those who supported him by word and deed, was carried out in every other part of the county and the whole story has been revealed to us by the affidavits which the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has read to the House. I shall not dwell any longer on that subject. However, let me point out how grievous it is to have recourse to such means or tolerate their use in this twentieth century and in this Canada of ours. Readers of history will remember that in the France of old lettres-de-cachet were granted by the Sovereign just to satisfy the whim of some woman or for some such futile reason, and by this means innocent people were sent to the Bastile, or beheaded, without having had an opportunity of defending themselves. The people at last revolted, and rightly so. Is it not aggravating to find that in this beautiful country of ours, at the very moment the Government propose sending millions to Great Britain, ministers should busy themselves winning elections through terror and the contempt of all liberty recognized and guaranteed by the law.

Sir, there is another infernal machine which has been doing service in the hands of the organizers of that election; I mean the drinking house. Of course, I do not mean to throw blame on all the hotelkeepers in the constituency, for there are some very honest people among them. But every one is aware that licenses in the province of Manitoba are granted direct by the provincial government. The latter, in consequence, has them under its absolute control. Honest hotelkeepers must like the rest take their cue from the provincial government, otherwise they would the very next day be deprived of their license.

To my personal knowledge, a member of the provincial legislature entered a bar room at twenty minutes past midnight, accompanied by a number of voters, and peremptorily ordered the hotelkeeper to open the bar. The latter answered that he could not do so as the law forbade it. I am the law, replied the member, and I then witnessed a drinking bout which lasted till morn. That is a fact among a hundred. I was informed that the hon. Minister of Public Works at the time he was a provincial cabinet minister, had not scrupled to act similarly. No wonder then that such bad example should afterwards be followed.

And, Sir, to satisfy you once more that they had resolved to resort to all the unlawful practices which I have pointed out, I may say that on the morning of polling day, a prominent Conservative, interested in the election, stated to a friend of mine that even should Mr. Richardson be returned, Mr. Morrison would that evening be declared elected. Thus it is, Mr. Speaker, that money and whisky played an important part in that election, and some people, in spite of all, will persist in holding that reciprocity is not popular.

I read in the Manitoba Free Press an interview given by the hon. Minister of Public Works on the day after that election, wherein he stated that the Liberals who had come from the province of Quebec had appealed to racial and religious prejudices. I deny it, the only time we had occasion to deal with the school question, was when replying to Mr. Morrison's supporters, who did not hesitate to revile Mr. Richardson on account of his stand towards Catholics, and on the other hand praised very highly the so-called great spirit of fairness evidenced by the Prime Minister of Manitoba and the hon. Minister of Public Works.

I repeat it, appeals to race prejudices have not come from our side, but from our opponents who distributed during the contest a pamphlet comprising editorials which has appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune, Mr. Richardson's organ, in regard to the school question. As we know, Mr. Richardson had some trouble with Archbishop Langevin with whom he disagreed on the school question.

I taunted my opponents for having raked up these matters which were already several years old, pointing out at the same time that we were not making it a matter of reproach to Mr. Morrison, for his being, as the Telegram has stated, a prominent Orangeman.

Again I say, we of the province of Quebec who took part in that election, we dealt solely with reciprocity, as serious men addressing intelligent people.

Apart from the shameful practices I have put on record, the issuing of blank warrants, the interference of the provincial government, the work performed by hotelkeepers, and others, there were numberless little tricks worked by the telephone and postal services in Mr. Morrison's interest. We are all aware that the Manitoba telephone system is in the hands of the local government. Now, knowing beforehand as we do to what extent the government of that province controls its employees, it is easy to surmise how the friends of Mr. Richardson must have fared in many instances.

As regards the postal service, I may say that I never received, within five days after notification by the sender a letter which had been addressed to me from Winnipeg, forty miles from my location at the time. I might have inferred that the letter had gone astray by accident, but similar accidents happened in the case of friends of mine located at other points.

The other day I witnessed the presentation in this House of the newly elected member for Macdonald (Mr. Morrison), and noticing how frantically he was being applauded by government supporters, I could not help thinking that if some honest Conservatives had been aware of those facts, they would have blushed at the thought of that victory won through fraud, cynicism, coercion and the nefarious influence of unscrupulous men. Several imagined that they were applauding the defeat of reciprocity in the person of the newcomer, while it was simply one of the greatest political crimes committed to this date that they were being made to endorse.

It only remains for me to lay a document before this House. I hope hon. gentlemen will bear with me. It may perhaps not be entirely in order to do so, though it certainly has a connection with the said election, since we were accused of stirring up racial and religious feuds.

To show once more to what lengths the cynicism of some politicians will go, as Mr. Bourassa would put it, I may recall that during the last provincial elections, with a view to putting in a better light the stand taken on the Keewatin school question by the then hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) and the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), our opponents, both Nationalists and Conservatives, distributed right and left throughout the country the circular which I am about to read.

In order that every one may enjoy its full flavour, and also in order to unmask the hypocritical and treacherous practices of those who designate themselves the saviours of racial and religious interests, I give herewith verbatim that henceforth memorable document:

Messrs. Monk, Pelletier and Nantel are right. Mr. Roblin, Prime Minister of Manitoba, does away with the most objectionable grievances, the most intolerable hardship resulting from the outrageous Laurier-Greenway settlement.

The hon. Messrs. Monk, Pelletier and Nantel, and the members who supported them, in connection with the carrying of the Keewatin Bill, showed their absolute faith in the Hon. Mr. Roblin and his government, as well as in his legislature and the people of Manitoba.

They were not mistaken.

The Manitoba School Act has just been amended, and our compatriots are at last relieved of the double tax which weighed so heavily on them since the passing of the iniquitous Laurier-Greenway settlement.

Our three distinguished compatriots who are the only representatives of the Catholics and French-Canadian minority in the Manitoba legislature are loud in their praise, as expressed in the following letter, addressed to the delegation from the province of Quebec which reached Winnipeg on the eleventh instant with a view to thanking the Hon. Mr. Roblin for what he has done in behalf of our compatriots.

Winnipeg, April 12, 1912.

To Messrs. Armand Lavergne, M.L.A., Louis Coderre, M.P., J. Rainville, M.P., Dr. E. Paquette, M.P., P. E. Lamarche, M.P., C. P. Beaubien, C.R., and Alleyn Taschereau:

Gentlemen,—You have come from Quebec especially to honour in the Hon. Mr. Roblin the just and righteous man, the faithful friend and protector of the minority in this province; and it behooves us more especially as being the only French-Canadian members in the Manitoba legislature to thank you for your generous undertaking. You have come from afar to help us in better acquitting ourselves of a debt of gratitude, and you may be sure that all the French-Candians and Catholics of Manitoba are deeply grateful to you on that account.

In return for your generous move, we beg of you to take back to our dear province of Quebec the assurance that our situation in Manitoba has 'since undergone marked improvement.'

We are at last relieved of that double tax which weighed so heavily and so unfairly on us. Thanks to the man whom you have come to honour by your presence, one of the greatest hardships, the most objectionable feature of the iniquitous Laurier-Greenway settlement, is done away with. Those who put their faith in the Hon. Mr. Roblin were not mistaken, and you may be sure that they will not be disappointed.

We remain, gentlemen, &c.

JOSEPH BERNIER,
AIME BENARD,
ALBERT PREFONTAINE.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may state that this document was false, and that the three members of the local House who signed it were perfectly aware that such were not the facts. I may say further that those who took it home from Winnipeg knew that the local government had not done justice to the Catholics in that province. It was nothing more than a political trick set on foot by unscrupulous people who, by such action, imperilled the cause they were supposed to defend. Now, during the electoral contest in Macdonald, a member of the Legislative Assembly, Mr. Aimé Bénard, went so far as to contend at a public meeting that if the action outlined in that letter had not as yet been taken, it certainly would be within a short time; that he, Mr. Bénard, had seen Archbishop Langevin, who had not rebuked him for signing that letter. But I did not take any stock in the statement made by that member who mumbled rather than spoke out that evening. However, before long the trickery of these three members was discovered, and the people are posted now as to the reliability of statements emanating from them.

Let us read together the editorial which appeared in Les Cloches de St.-Boniface, the organ of His Grace Archbishop Langevin, on the date of October 10, 1912, while the contest was going on in Macdonald.

We see by that editorial that the statement signed by Messrs. Joseph Bernier, Aimé Bénard and Albert Préfontaine was false from beginning to end, and deliberately planned to deceive the electors of Quebec as to the state of the school question in Manitoba. But let us see what Les Cloches has to say:

The Winnipeg and Brandon Schools.

Nothing as yet has been done to improve the conditions of Catholic schools in Winnipeg and Brandon. We are content with mentioning the fact and abstain from making any comment, as the public are awaiting explanations which are to be given by the Hon. Mr. Coldwell, Minister of Public Instruction, in connection with the recent amendments to the school boards of those two cities.

The Catholic Federation committee has been very active and very cautious at the same time. They are in no way responsible for the present state of things.

It has been figured out that Winnipeg Catholics will pay this year at least $80,000 of school taxes for public schools to which conscientiously they cannot send their children. Besides these same Catholics are bound to pay for the maintenance in each parish of a Catholic school, and at Ste. Marie and L'Immaculée Conception, that condition of things has lasted twenty-two years. One may judge thereby of the extent of the injustice done by the Protestant majority.

On the other hand, were the public school board to take up our schools, that is 'to rent' our school houses—we have never thought, and will never think of 'transferring' them—and paid the salaries to our certificated teachers of both sexes, that would be of great material help to us, but we would lose greatly as regards religious liberty and the fixing of the curriculum.

We make bold to point out that the new curriculum for candidates to bi-lingual school diplomas shows an intention of putting difficulties in our way. The Government is at times badly served by too much zeal and eagerness on the part of certain people. We are all anxious that English grammar and literature should be taken up, but we need a freer hand in regard to some other matters.

And that is how the delegates from the province of Quebec mentioned in the above circular were fooled and then became the accomplices in that gross misrepresentation! That is how a false document was circulated in the hope of influencing the people of the province of Quebec at the last provincial elections!

Mr. LAMARCHE: I wish to state before this House, Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Ask a question.

Mr. LAMARCHE: I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Boyer) if he is ready to state before this House that I have received, as he had stated, a document such as he has read before the House a few minutes ago?

Mr. BOYER: (Translation.) I do not say that the hon. member for Nicolet took back that letter, but I find his name printed in the document. If he did not take that letter along with him, I am glad of it. But may I ask him whether he had it distributed throughout his constituency?

Mr. LAMARCHE: I will answer my hon. friend's question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Speak in French.

Mr. LAMARCHE: I would prefer to put my answer in English, because it is more important that I should do so as I want my hon. friends from the other provinces who are more interested in this question than perhaps my friends from the province of Quebec who also understand the English language, to hear my statement. I will say that not only have I not authorized the distribution of such a paper in my county, but the moment I saw such a paper was printed I absolutely prohibited its distribution in my riding.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOYER: (Translation.) I am glad to hear that statement from the lips of the hon. member for Nicolet. It shows at least that the hon. member was aware of the falsity of the document, and realized that it should not be distributed in his constituency. But, if that document was of such a nature that he could not make use of it, his colleagues were not entitled to make use of it any more than he was himself. However, they did not have such scruples.

I hope this House will pardon me for claiming its attention so long. I deemed it my duty to fully expose the moral tone of the Conservative politicians in the province of Manitoba, and to show how that election had been won.

If ever I return to that province, I will go accompanied by Conservatives of the province of Quebec. They may be troublesome at times, but at any rate their western colleagues might take lessons from them as regards good manners.

Mr. BARNARD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Hon. L. P. Pelletier, House adjourned at 9.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, November 27, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Department of the Interior for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Roche.

Report of the Department of Justice in relation to Penitentiaries for the same year.—Mr. Doherty.

Return of the Twelfth General Election to the House of Commons of Canada.—Mr. Speaker.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. SAMUEL S. SHARPE (North Ontario) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Companies Act. He said: The object of this Bill is similar to that of a Bill I introduced in this House two years ago. That Bill received its first and second readings, and was referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. That Committee referred it to a sub-committee composed of seven or eight members, which sub-committee considered it for several days and whipped it into shape. But by reason of the pressure of business at that time the Bill was not proceeded with further. I bring it forward now practically in the shape in which it left the hands of the sub-committee. It provides that companies organized by letters patent or by private Act of the Dominion Parliament shall hold annual meetings, make annual statements and have annual audits of their accounts. Under the Dominion Companies Act at present this is not provided for. In most of the provinces companies are required to make annual statements of their affairs. The present Bill provides that companies chartered under Dominion jurisdiction shall make annual statements to the Government regarding shareholders, directors and officials, paid-up stock, assets and liabilities—generally that the information required under the Ontario Companies Act shall be filed with the Secretary of State for the benefit of creditors and others desiring such information. There are minor provisions, but these are the main ones. I trust the Bill will receive the sympathetic consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill rear the first time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CURRIE.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. JOHN A CURRIE (Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House on a matter of privilege. My attention has been called to an article that appeared in the Toronto Globe of the day before yesterday:

A Question for Mr. White.

Now that Parliament is in session The Globe desires once more to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to a letter published by John A. McCrae, secretary-treasurer of the Sarnia Fence Company, respecting certain negotiations between himself and Major Currie, M.P. for North Simcoe. Mr. McCrae charges that Major Currie, as an inducement or a threat to influence his company to look favourably upon a proposal to join a merger of wire fence manufacturers, said 'he had inside information that before the end of the present year the Government was going to take wire for fencing off the free list.' When Major Currie, in reply to this charge, said that he was not a member of the Government, and therefore it would not be possible for him to have any such inside information, Mr. McCrae replied as follows:—

'The official list shows Major J. A. Currie as Conservative member in the Dominion House for North Simcoe. Apparently the Major is endeavouring to draw the line very closely by inferring that no member of Parliament is a member of the Government unless he is a Cabinet minister, and we, not being politicians, did not recognize this fine distinction. The Major, however, endeavoured to strike terror to our hearts by stating that before the end of the present year the Government would take wire for farm fencing off the free list, and place a duty on it, which would result in the steel interests getting control of the wire market, and in that event our life would be very short, and we had better accept his offer to take us into the merger. That he made these statements he makes no attempt to deny. In support of our statement we refer you to the Toronto papers of July 13, which referred to the merger being formed. The Imperial Steel and Wire Company of Collingwood is the company whom Major Currie represented when he made the statements to us. There is no question but that earnest efforts have been made to complete this merger. How successful they will be depends largely on the concerted action of the farmers in opposing, through their members, any change in the free entry of wire for fence purposes.'

The Minister of Finance cannot afford to ignore such specific statements. At the earliest possible moment he ought to assure the House of Commons that neither Major Currie nor any other member of Parliament has received 'inside information' as to coming tariff changes. There is no way in which a tainted fortune can be more quickly or more surely made than by the taking advantage of fore knowledge of tariff changes. The Globe does not believe that Mr. White, by any act or statement of his, gave warrant for Major Currie's alleged possession of 'inside information.' The Minister of Finance is an honourable man. But he owes it to himself and to the House to deny explicitly the ugly inferences that will be read into the fence wire incident if no public statement is forthcoming.

I crave the indulgence of the House in making a lengthy explanation. Last summer, I was in the town of Sarnia on business, and took occasion to call upon the Sarnia Fence Company. I met the manager, Mr. McCrae, and another gentleman who was his partner, or secretary in his private office. Now, the company of which I am president, the Imperial Steel and Wire Company, Limited, of Collingwood, do not manufacture farm fencing, nor wire for the same, and I am not interested in wire for farm fencing in any way. We discussed business generally, and the question of a duty on wire and farm fencing was referred to. Within a few months three large Canadian corporations—the Dominion Steel Company, of Sidney; the Canada Steel Company, of Hamilton; and the Frost Fence Company, of Hamilton—had each commenced the manufacture of galvanized wire for farm fencing, also woven wire fencing. Galvanized wire for fencing is on the free list. A strange thing happened just as soon as this wire was made in Canada. The American manufacturers cut their price from $2.20 and $2.25 per cwt., the price that prevailed for many years, to $1.60 per cwt. They did this to put the Canadian companies out of business, not to benefit the farmers. That is why fencing is so cheap this year. I stated that, unless some of these small firms manufacturing woven wire fencing got together and made their own wire, they would be driven out of business by the fierce competition which I understand they all experienced during the past season. I stated that last year the Canadian steel companies had considered asking the Government to put a duty on galvanized fence wire, but they had only asked for a duty on pig iron, and that, no doubt, from private information which had been given to me, they would make the request at the coming session of Parliament. This information came not from the Government or any member of it, but from a banker who is in close touch with these companies.

The company of which I am president is the largest independent wire company in Canada. We are parts of no merger or combine. We have always stood for free competition. We manufacture over 50 tons of wire daily, and employ over 200 skilled workmen. For instance, the wire for toilet pins, the wire that is used to bind books, and the wire that goes into the spring mattress is no longer imported exclusively from Great Britain or the United States, but a considerable portion is made by our company, by Canadian workmen.

The Sarnia Fence Company buys about three tons per day of finished galvanized wire of the poorest quality and cheapest grade made in the United States, brings it into Canada, puts it through cheap looms run by a few boys. This will give hon. gentlemen some idea of the relative magnitude of the two companies, and their value to the industrial life of this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member is rather exceeding the bounds of relevance. The rule is to state the case and confine himself to a denial or explanation, without going into any argument.

Mr. CURRIE: I am very sorry to trespass upon the time of the House, but the Globe and other Grit newspapers throughout the country have made an attack upon me, and I can see no other way of putting myself right in the eyes of the public than by making a full explanation.

Not very long after I had been to Sarnia, the famous green circular was issued by Mr. McCrae, of the Sarnia Fence Company. It was then that I found out he had been in the habit of issuing circulars about his competitors and using them for advertising purposes, as he used me. It was an old story with him. Of course, being a public man, he made free use of my name, and violently garbled what I said. I was in a helpless position. If I denied what he said, I knew that any one so unscrupulous as to issue circulars such as he had issued on former occasions against his competitors, as well as myself, would not halt at anything. He had his secretary with him when I called, while I was alone. I neither affirmed nor denied his statements, preferring to give him enough rope, and his lies would, ultimately, hang him. They did. He saw his chance to get some free advertising out of the Grain Growers' Guide, which, by the way, is the great organ of the American manufacturers in Canada—a journal that is prepared to go any length in misrepresenting any Canadian who desires to see his country prosper.

In the letter published in the Grain Growers Guide, Mr. McCrae gave his whole case away. In his first letter, which was prepared with some skill, he said, speaking of myself:

> He further stated that in his position as a member of Parliament he had inside information to the effect that before the end of the present year, the Government was going to take wire for farm fencing off the free list, and put a duty on it, which would give the merger an opportunity to increase their profits on the manufacture of fence, and he by completing this merger would be able to take advantage of it.
> Now, we are not in position to say whether Major J. A. Currie has the confidence of the Government or not, but he seems to think he has, and if he or any other parties could induce the Government to put duty on the now free sizes of wire, for fence purposes, the result would be the same, you would have to pay the shot. The same day this change in duty takes place, the price of fence must be advanced. Do you think it is fair that every farmer in Canada should be specially taxed, that Major J. A. Currie and his colleagues may wax and at your expense?

This was what he said in the Grain Growers Guide. Please note the difference:

> According to the statement of Major Currie, member of Parliament in the Dominion Parliament for North Simcoe, made to the Sarnia Fence Company, that he, as a member of the Government, had inside information to the effect that before the end of the present year the Government was going to take wire for farm fences off the free list.

You will observe in the first place he stated that I was a member of Parliament, and in the second place he has the hardihood to say I was a member of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRIE: I am not like some hon. gentlemen opposite, who for many years sat on the Cabinet steps and knocked at the door, but did not get in. I have never knocked nor asked my chief for any favour for myself, personally. In answer to the letter appearing in the Grain Growers' Guide, I stated as follows:

> In the first place everybody knows I am not a member of the Government as stated by your correspondent, consequently I could not have inside information as to what may be the intention of the Government, and even if I had I would not be fool enough to hand it around promiscuously.

Might it not occur to you in all fairness that your correspondent was trying to get some cheap advertising for his fence, at the expense of your paper, other people and the truth?

Now, Sir, I have no desire to continue at any further length upon this matter, except to say a few words in connection with this company of Mr. McCrae's, to show the injustice of his attack upon me. Mr. McCrae, who claims to be the great benefactor of the farmer, started the business first in Port Huron, and did not prosper very well there; so he opened a branch at Sarnia, moving some of his hands and machinery over to Canada. That was a very laudable thing. If a man wants to fabricate wire fencing for Canada the place to do it is in Canada. Now, I do not notice that he asks the Government to take the duty off this woven fencing which he makes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is entirely exceeding his privilege under the rules by which we are governed, and I hope he will confine himself to the question under discussion.

Mr. CURRIE: I quite realize your desire, Mr. Speaker, to see that everybody is justly dealt with in this House. I also notice that hon. members opposite are endeavouring in every possible way to stifle my explanation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CURRIE: I have never yet heard any hon. member speaking on a matter of privilege interrupted in such a manner in this House before. I am endeavouring to show how impossible it was for me to do everything that Mr. McCrae said I was going to do. One would think from his letters, and the article in the Guide, that I was engaged in trying to put a duty on the fence which he sells to the Canadian farmers, and that, if there is a duty put on the wire, the price of fencing will go up. As a matter of fact, Mr. McCrae buys his wire in the States and brings it into Canada free of duty. Just the minute, however, he weaves it, by a very simple process, into fencing, he receives a protection of 15 per cent against American fencing. If a duty of say 10 per cent were put on his wire and the duty on woven fence remained at 15 per cent how would that affect the price of woven wire fences? If the price was raised more than 15 per cent could not wire fence be imported? There is no barbed wire now made in Canada, but the price is higher than it was when there was a duty. The same is true of coal oil and binder twine. In none of his letters does Mr. McCrae mention that he is getting 15 per cent protection, and I do not notice that he accuses me of wanting to have that 15 per cent protection which he now enjoys removed. The only trouble with him is that he is like most other Grit manufacturers: they want all the duty themselves; they do not want to divide it with the Canadian workingmen. Now, Sir, I did not use my position as a member in speaking to Mr. McCrae, nor did I, as a member of Parliament, seek to terrorize him to go into anything or to go into any combine. No combine has been formed, no inducement was offered me by him to go into any combine, and I did not, by word of mouth or inference, lead him to believe that the Minister of Finance or any member of the Government had given me any information as to whether or not a duty was to be placed on wire. I did not ask any member of this Government to place a duty on wire fencing, and I have had no communication with them whatever on the subject—and, what is more, it will be time enough for the Toronto Globe to commence reading a moral lecture to me when it pays up the $25,000 which it has owed this Government for postage since the last election.

PETERBOROUGH LIFT-LOCK—CLAIM FOR EXTRAS.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House I would ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) whether it is true, as I am credibly informed, that the large claim for extras arising out of the contract at the lift-lock at Peterborough is about to be paid to Messrs. Corry & Laverdure, contractors of Ottawa. This claim had been referred under the late Government to Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, who had refused to acknowledge the validity of the claim, and I am now informed that this claim is to be paid. If the claim is to be paid, will it be placed in the estimates in the regular way or will it be paid out of a general fund in the Department of Railways and Canals?

Hon. F. COCHRANE: No decision has been arrived at as to whether it will be paid or not. The matter has had a little attention from me, but I have not come to any conclusion on it. If it was to be paid of course the amount would have to be voted in the House.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—RUNNING RIGHTS.

Hon. H. R EMMERSON: I would ask the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) for information with reference to an item which is being published in the eastern papers in regard to the granting of running rights to the Canadian Pacific railway over the Intercolonial railway, and also with regard to the extension of privileges to certain express companies. The item reads as follows:

It is reported on apparently good authority that after the New Year the Canadian Pacific railway will have running rights over the Intercolonial and the Dominion Express Company will invade eastern Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Prince Edward Island and the north shore of New Brunswick.

Have any arrangements been entered into with the Canadian Pacific railway with respect to running rights to commence on January 1st next, or at any other time, and have any further privileges been granted, or are they proposed to be granted, to the Dominion Express Company on the Intercolonial railway than those which they now have? If so, has there been given in return by the Canadian Pacific railway, which has control of the Dominion Express Company, like privileges over its railway to the other express companies in the Maritime provinces and in Western Canada?

Mr. SPEAKER : This is one of the class of questions of which notice should be given on the Order Paper. It comes thoroughly under the regular rules for that purpose.

Mr. EMMERSON: This is a matter of very great interest to the people of the Maritime Provinces. If I gave notice on the Order Paper, it could not possibly be answered for some days, and I was asking the indulgence of the Minister ; otherwise I would certainly have given notice. Perhaps the Minister could set the question at rest at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SPEAKER : The item says that the arrangement is not to become effective until January 1st ; therefore it did not seem to me to be so very urgent as to necessitate an immediate answer.

Mr. COCHRANE: No arrangement has been entered into as yet about running rights. As to the Express Company, yes. The Dominion Express Company has the same agreement as the Grand Trunk railway had with the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. EMMERSON : Would the Minister answer that part of the question as to whether the Canadian Pacific railway are to grant similar privileges on their railway to other express companies in the Maritime provinces?

Mr. COCHRANE : I answered that fully in saying they had exactly the same agreement that the Grand Trunk railway had.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : That is no answer at all.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—FREE TRANSPORTATION OF HAY.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Would the Minister of Railways and Canals state if any decision has been reached on the application made by certain farmers in the eastern part of Nova Scotia for the free transportation of hay over the Intercolonial railway ?

Mr. SPEAKER : I think this is another of the questions that should be on the Order Paper.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN: It is on the Order Paper.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): It is a matter of urgency.

Mr. SPEAKER : If it is on the Order Paper it cannot be asked now. There is a rule which says a member cannot anticipate before the proper time what is on the Order Paper.

THE STRIKING COMMITTEE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : When is it intended to call the special committee appointed to strike the Standing Committees?

Mr. BORDEN : In the past it has not been the custom to call that committee together until after the Address has been passed. That is the answer which my right hon. friend gave to me on one occasion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : Yes.

Mr. BORDEN . If there is no practice or rule against it, I have no personal objection to calling that committee together at once.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : That is very true. I took that ground in years past. I understood my friend to take a different ground, but I feel very much pleased that my friend on this occasion follows the practice of the late Government.

Mr. BORDEN As long as we confine our tendency to follow their example to such small matters as that, I am sure we shall go on very well.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : Small and great.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Rainville, for an address to His Royal Highness, the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. G. H. BARNARD (Victoria, B. C.): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to intervene in this debate had it not been for some words which fell from the lips of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in the course of his remark on Monday. Before dealing with those particular remarks. I wish to say that I am sure it is a source of gratification to every member of this House, irrespective of party, to hear that the prosperity of the country is so great. So far as the constituency which I have the honour to represent, is concerned, never in its history has it been as prosperous, and all indications are that this prosperity will continue and constantly increase. The post office returns and the customs returns are increasing at an unprecedented rate. The bank clearings are also increasing tremendously; the tonnage of the ocean-going and coasting trade is increasing to such an extent that the docks and harbours of the Pacific coast province are in danger of being seriously overtaxed. In view of the coming completion of the Panama canal, scarcely a week passes that we do not see representatives of the great European shipping companies spying out the land, and making arrangements for carrying on their trade as soon as the canal is opened; and I am glad to say that the present Government has shown its appreciation of the importance of the harbours upon that coast, and a disposition to assist in the necessary development of the ports of the province.

Coming as I do from the province of British Columbia, I need scarcely say that it was with great pleasure that I heard the reference in the Speech from the Throne to the question of naval defence. I do not propose to-day to go into that question, because I hope to have an early opportunity to try and put before the members of this House the views of my constituents upon it. But I can assure the right hon. Leader of the Government that, so far as the people of the province of British Columbia are concerned, he need have no fear of erring on the side of generosity. He cannot do too much to please the people of the Pacific province. With regard to the land defences of that province, I am sorry to say that matters are not in a satisfactory condition. The land defences of the province have not, for some years past, received the attention they should have received at the hands of the different governments in power at Ottawa. Since the Imperial troops were taken away from Esquimalt, and since this Government undertook to control the land defences the forces have been reduced from 500 or 600, under the Imperial authorities, to barely 100. Now, I am perfectly willing to admit that a Canadian soldier is just as good as, and probably a little bit better than an English soldier, but it is stretching my admiration a little too far to suggest that the proportion is one to five. Esquimalt, where the fortifications are, lies within two or three miles of the capital city of British Columbia. In that city are stored public documents of untold value. Esquimalt is fortified. I have always been under the impression that it is a rule of international law that a fortified city may be bombarded by a foreign force, but that it is contrary to the usages of international law to bombard an unfortified city. If that be so, the capital city of British Columbia, which is my constituency, labours under the disadvantage of having just enough fortifications to be called a defended and fortified place, and yet it has not the means whereby to defend itself. For these reasons, I would submit to the Minister of Militia that his fortifications are a menace rather than a protection, and I would ask him to lose no time in strengthening the land defences at that point.

I wish to deal, just for a moment, with the statements made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, with reference to an occurrence during the by-election in the county of Richelieu a few weeks ago. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition, in somewhat melodramatic language, accused the Minister of Public Works of having endeavoured to bribe the constituency by a promise of certain public works. I assume that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was quarrelling more with the words in which the promise was made, than with the substance of the promise, or its effect; and I am inclined to think, judging from some remarks made by that right hon. gentleman at previous elections in this country, that if my friend the Minister of Public Works had couched his promise in scriptural language, the leader of the Opposition might have found less objection to it. For I find, in the Canadian Annual Review for 1911, at page 163, an account by Mr. Castell Hopkins of the recent general election, and the following reference to a speech made by the late Prime Minister at Ste. Julienne in the province of Quebec:

> The speech was notable for one of the Premier's Scriptural references: the Liberal Government is like the Kingdom of Heaven, 'Ask and you will receive.' When St. Donat asked for a railway extension from Rawdon, I say, 'ask and you will receive.' This railway should be constructed to put Montreal in communication with the Transcontinental.

So that it would appear that if my friend the Minister of Public Works had promised his marine railway in the language of Scripture, in all probability the leader of the Opposition would have made little objection. I must say that upon hearing the remarks and the tones—I was almost going to say the anguish, but I shall say the tones of indignation—in which he condemned the Minister of Public Works for promising a marine railway at Richelieu, I could hardly believe my ears. I could hardly think it was the leader of the Liberal party who was so righteously indignant in a matter of this kind. The hon. the leader of the Opposition charged bribery, or an attempt to bribe the constituency, and claimed that his candidate had not received fair play. He arraigned the Minister of Public Works in the following words:

I charge the Minister of Public Works, and arraign him before Parliament, with having tried to bribe the electors of Richelieu.

Well, I am only a humble member of this House, and a follower of the leader of the Government. I do not know just what effect an arraignment of that kind has, but if it is a very terrible thing, I just wish to say, in his own language, I arraign the right hon. the leader of the Opposition before Parliament with having in a general election in 1911 tried to bribe the electors of the city of Victoria. He proceeds:

I call as witness a member of this House, the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Well, I call as a witness a member of this House, the hon. member for St. John, the Minister of Public Works in the late Administration. I also call as a witness the Hon. Mr. Templeman, now, alas! no longer a member of this House. He cites in support of his contention a quotation from La Patrie, which he says is a Government paper. I quote, in support of my arraignment, the Victoria Daily Times, the personal organ of the Hon. Mr. Templeman, and the Liberal organ in the city of Victoria. What were the facts? Just before the general election of 1911, as a matter of fact on nomination day, the 14th of September, 1911, there appeared in the Victoria Daily Times, the newspaper of the Hon. William Templeman, candidate for the Liberal party in Victoria, the following telegram:

Victoria, B.C., Sept. 9, 1911.
Hon. W. Pugsley, St. John, N.B.

I propose issuing an address to the electors in which I will state that the Government will make Victoria a port of first class by building breakwaters and deepening outer and inner harbours to adequate depth to accommodate all shipping. The cost, on Keefer's estimates, will be about $2,000,000 for breakwaters, and about $1,000,000 for deepening harbour, annual expenditure to be about $500,000. These proposed works have been approved of for years, and the harbour work that has been carried out for the last eight years has been with the definite object of securing the results contemplated in above project. At the present rate of progress it will take twenty or thirty years to do what should be done in at the most three or four years. The opening of the Panama Canal three years hence makes this work a national necessity. I will be pleased to have your approval of above.

WM. TEMPLEMAN.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am glad to know the work is going on now.

Mr. BARNARD: It ought to have been done several years before. But it is somewhat peculiar that it was not until nomination day that its urgency occurred to the Hon. Mr. Templeman. In reply the following telegram was received from the Hon. William Pugsley, then Minister of Public Works:

Montreal, Que., Sept. 10, 1911.
Hon. Wm. Templeman, Victoria, B.C.

Your telegram of the 9th inst. re harbour improvements Victoria received. When I was in your city——

By the way that was two years before this telegram was written:

When I was in your city I looked thoroughly into the situation and was impressed with the urgent necessity of the improvements now recommended by you, and will heartily endorse your proposals as contained in said telegram.

WILLIAM PUGSLEY.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARNARD: Certainly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is there anywhere in that telegram the statement made that the carrying on of the public improvements in Victoria was conditional on the electors supporting the Government?

Mr. BARNARD: No, but we have the facts before us, and it is very easy to deduce a meaning from them. We have the fact that this telegram was published on nomination day, we have the fact that the Hon. Mr. Templeman announced to the Hon. Mr. Pugsley one week before the election, that he proposed issuing an address to the electors and asking that these works be carried on. I do not know whether the Hon. Mr. Templeman had some experience which he did not like as regards the promises of the then Minister of Public Works but apparently there was some dissatisfaction in his mind. At any rate Mr. Templeman may not have been quite satisfied with this endorsement of the then Minister of Public Works, possibly the then Minister of Public Works had the idea that his promises would not be quite satisfactory to the electors of the city of Victoria, or possibly the Hon. Mr. Pugsley and the Hon. Mr. Templeman combined thought that the promise of the Minister of Public Works was not calculated to carry great weight with the electors. At any rate, on the 12th of September two days after this, another telegram was sent by Hon. Mr. Pugsley, reading as follows:

St. John, N.B., Sept. 12, 1911.

W. Templeman, Victoria, B.C.

My wire was sent after I had seen Sir Wilfrid.

W. PUGSLEY.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear—a statement of the policy of the Government. That is entirely different from the Richelieu affair.

Mr. BARNARD: So much for the consistency of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and his sincerity in attacking the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) with regard to this Richelieu election. Apparently it is a highly meritorious thing for the Liberal government to promise a public work just before an election, but it is a political crime of the worst kind if a Conservative government should make a like promise. According to the ethics of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, when a Conservative does such a thing it is bribery, but when done by a Liberal it is simply good policy. These gentlemen opposite say when a Conservative makes a promise of that kind, that it is trying to steal the elections, but when exactly the same thing is done by a Liberal government they think it is good ball and the fairest kind of play. Now, Mr. Speaker, if, as is alleged by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, constituencies in Canada have been debauched, then I say that the blame does not lie at the doors of the Conservative party. We have not to go back very far to find instances of glaring impropriety perpetrated by the Liberal party and without going into details there naturally flashes across one's mind the Newmarket canal and the sawdust wharf. Do hon. gentlemen opposite say that these transactions were good public policy? I have not much use for the tu quoque argument, and I am absolutely opposed to anything savouring of debauching the constituencies, but I do say that if in the course of his peregrinations around this vale of tears the devil occasionally finds he is fought by fire, complaint does not lie in the mouth of His Satanic Majesty.

Mr. THOMAS MACNUTT (Saltcoats): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to speak at some length with reference to the charges that have been made and scattered broadcast throughout Canada to the effect that the Saskatchewan provincial elections were won by corruption; but you have ruled that as the question is not before the House, it is out of order for an hon. member to deal with it. I may, however, be allowed to state, having been on the ground and knowing something about it, that the Saskatchewan elections were won by the votes of the British electorate of that province, and won upon two grounds chiefly: first the recognition of the merits of the Scott government, and second, that the electors generally preferred to have a provincial administration which was friendly to a wider market and a lower tariff rather than one that was unfriendly to these policies, which are so strongly supported by the people of my province. Mr. Haultain, who as usual, takes his defeat like a man, has borne testimony to this. He stated after the elections that he thought this time he had a good chance to win, but that he found the feeling for reciprocity so much stronger than he expected that he could not succeed. However, I cannot go very far along these lines, as I understand your ruling.

I wish now to defend the fair name of a friend of mine who has been maligned and sent to jail; that is, Mr. J. J. Sullivan. It is sometimes an honour to go to jail. The suffragettes in the old country think so, claiming that they have a good cause. I think myself that Mr. Sullivan went to jail in a good cause. No charge was found against him, and he was practically deported from Manitoba. Manitoba evidently does not think that all should work together, and if anybody comes there whom the government does not like, they simply take them to the boundary and put them across. I think it would be a good plan, if this line of action is continued, that the Dominion Government should set aside a portion of Northern Manitoba where the present government of Manitoba could have a second Siberia to send their political prisoners to.

I was invited by the executive committee at Winnipeg, consisting of Mr. Edward Brown, not long ago the leader of the Liberal party of Manitoba; Mr. Fowler, a very prominent and highly respected citizen of Winnipeg, and Mr. E. D. Martin, who is in the same category, and perhaps better known here as a brother of a late member of this House from the city of Winnipeg. These three gentlemen formed what was called the Richardson committee. It has been stated that these outsiders from Saskatchewan forced themselves upon the people of Macdonald. I do not think that any of the few who were there, were there other than by the express invitation of this committee. I was asked to spend some time there, but I could not put in more than one week. I was very glad to be able to do so, because Mr. Richardson was standing for what I believe is right, that is, for better markets for the farmers, for the development of the West, and for a lower tariff. The week prior to the election I was not able to be present. I reached Winnipeg on Monday morning, the 30th of September, and I was asked by this committe to go to Carman and assist the committee there, which had nine polls to look after. I accordingly went to Carman, which was the home town of Sir Rodmond Roblin, and the centre of his district. I think I showed some courage in going to Sir Rodmond Roblin's headquarters. A few days afterwards somewhat to my surprise I saw Mr. J. J. Sullivan. He said he had come there at the invitation of the same committee. I did not see very much of him, as I was addressing meetings in one direction, while he was doing the same thing in another. On Saturday evening I took the train home. Mr. Sullivan wished to spend Sunday in Winnipeg, and he was on the same train with me. I did not see him after that. I found out, however, that he had been arrested when he returned to Carman, on a general charge of fraudulently inducing electors to vote for R. L. Richardson. I have known Mr. Sullivan for some years. He has taken a very active interest in Liberal politics; so much so that in my own district he was appointed county president of the Liberal Association. As he was what we call an election oragnizer, I was very glad myself to secure his services a year ago. Very few members of this House will claim that they can do without some organization with somebody in charge. Mr. Sullivan acted for a few weeks as organizer in the district of Saltcoats, and I have never heard that he did anything that was not perfectly correct and proper.

On Friday of that week Sir Rodmond Roblin came to Carman. Mr. Sullivan and I were both there at the time. I was across at the committee room on the other side of the street, and heard a great deal of noise. I found out later on that it was Sir Rodmond Roblin who had discovered our names in the register, and he was holding forth at the top of his voice. He went to Winnipeg that night and gave out an interview. I may be repeating some quotations that have already been made in the House, but do not think that this one was:

> I want to make this further statement, not only to the electors of Macdonald, but also to the people of Manitoba, that in my 31 years of public life I never saw a constituency invaded or infested with such a gang of boodlers and political thieves and thugs as are now wandering around that constituency. . . The gang is from the province of Saskatchewan.

Our late Minister of the Interior fortunately is not from that province, and therefore cannot be included in this.

That province has sent down apparently the whole boodling and bribing brigade of political thugs who appear to have been making Saskatchewan their home.

Members of the Saskatchewan legislature are there. Men who cannot put half a dozen sentences together grammatically, nor have any accomplishments that might give dignity or grace to a threshing gang, are swarming in the constituency and organizing or endeavouring to organize to debauch and bedevil, as far as they can, the honest, intelligent electors of Macdonald. Carman seems to be the centre. The leader apparently is, as far as I can gather, a fellow who is known by the name of Sullen, presumably an alias. . ..

I have instructed the provincial police to arrest these men, and they will be placed in jail at the earliest possible moment when they attempt to do the work they have been sent there to do, and I want to say that because a man is an M.P.P. or an ex-M.P.P. in Saskatchewan or of anywhere else, it will not prevent justice being done.

I was fortunate enough to escape arrest, for, though not an M.P.P., I was present. Mr. Sullivan was arrested on the following Monday. In the interview which I have just quoted, Sir Rodmond Roblin speaks of 'hordes' of election workers. I have always understood that 'hordes' meant a large number. But the only parties from Saskatchewan who were engaged during that week in working on behalf of Mr. Richardson were Mr. Sullivan and myself. So, we are the 'hordes' that Sir Rodmond Roblin speaks of. And three out of four of the men who were arrested were Manitoba people, Mr. Sullivan being the only one from Saskatchewan who was arrested, and he was arrested in a good cause. On Saturday night I was interviewed by a representative of the press and I will take the liberty of reading that interview :

> Thos. MacNutt, M.P. for Saltcoats, who passed through the city on Saturday night, en route home after a week spent in the neighbourhood of Carman in the interests of the Independent candidate, spoke with heat at the Royal Alexandra about an interview given out by Sir Rodmond Roblin in which the premier spoke of 'gangs of thugs and thieves' who had come into the riding from Saskatchewan and were operating among the threshing gangs. Sir Rodmond threatened in the interview to arrest various parties even though they might be M.P.'s and M.P.P.'s.
> As I have spent a few days in the vicinity of Carman,' said Mr. MacNutt, 'and have spoken at several meetings largely attended by 'threshing gangs' and as I have also visited various threshing gangs in the course of my work I am probably regarded by Sir Rodmond as one of the 'horde.'
> 'I am in a position,' he continued, 'to say as the result of actual experience that the feeling is decidedly in favour of the Independent candidate who stands for what the farmers want and require. Many Conservatives who at the general elections favoured their own party's general record but were also favourable to reciprocity now that their party is safe, will seek to send a message to their own party by the election of Mr. Richardson, that they desire larger markets and lower tariff through R. L. Richardson. Those who opposed their former party last fall will do so again, and the Liberals are all in line.'

'Saskatchewan, as a matter of fact,' continued Mr. MacNutt, 'is as much interested in the result of this by-election as the electors of Macdonald themselves, including the 'threshing gangs,' and have at least as much right to assist at this Dominion election as the Hon. Robert Rogers and his notorious political machine on a late occasion in Saskatchewan.

'The services of the police may be required, but not along the lines indicated in the interview. I am of the opinion that less than 25 per cent of the electors who compose the 'threshing gangs' (otherwise the farmers) will support the 'big interests' candidate. If the Conservatives win it will be by means of the vote of the purchasable element.'

And I am of opinion that it was by that means they won. I apologize for drawing attention to my own remarks; I do it only because I have been publicly referred to in this connection. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) made a quotation having reference to myself, but there was a little more of it, and that I will take the liberty of reading. This is part of a speech of the late hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), as reported in the press:

Sir Rodmond Roblin had dealt with the outsiders who had forced the campaign in Macdonald, and in doing so he could not find in the English language words strong enough to characterize the records of these individuals. Foremost in the fight against the Government candidate were representatives of the government of Saskatchewan. It was true, if reports were to be relied upon, that these representatives would be reinforced by the government of Alberta. They were being supported by Mr. Oliver, Dr. Michael Clark, by politicians from the province of Quebec, by Mr. Martin, Mr. Knowles, and Mr. MacNutt, Liberal M.P.'s from Saskatchewan. An individual in the rear of the hall applauded the mention of Mr. MacNutt, and Hon. Mr. Rogers undertook to impart some information as to what that member of the House of Commons was doing in the campaign. Before doing so he referred to a reply of Sir Rodmond Roblin, which appeared yesterday——by Hon. J. A. Calder, of the Scott Government. Mr. Calder was reported as giving out an interview in Regina yesterday. 'But let me tell you,' said Hon. Mr. Rogers, 'that Hon. J. A. Calder has been in the Liberal executive headquarters in Winnipeg all day to-day, assisting Mr. Richardson. Mr. Calder undertakes to make reply to Premier Roblin. He ventures to deny that there are any thugs or political manipulators from Saskatchewan in this constituency at the present time. As far as that is concerned, let me say to you that when Mr. Calder makes that statement he says what is deliberately false.

'I know we have nearly one hundred thugs from Saskatchewan scattered through this riding. They are in this very polling division, and we are watching them. One of the ringleaders of that gang, a special and personal friend of Mr. Calder, was arrested to-day in the town of Carman.

This is the Mr. Sullivan to whom I have already referred:

'In the press of Saturday Mr. MacNutt made the statement that Mr. Richardson was going to succeed. Mr. MacNutt evidently thought he was in Saskatchewan, because he knew he was surrounded by the thugs which Mr. Roblin had described. The thug arrested to-day came into the constituency with Mr. MacNutt. He went to Carman for a week, and registered as Sullivan. He spent his time there for a week, and then came into Winnipeg with Mr. MacNutt. Mr. Sullivan, of Carman, walked down to another hotel in Winnipeg and registered as Sutherland. He was at this hotel on Sunday, and had interviews with Grit election manipulators, and yesterday (Monday) morning, went to Carman again and registered as Sullivan, but the moment he started to operate he was nabbed and was now behind the bars. There are many others who will follow him.'

Mr. Sullivan was arrested and kept in jail for a few days. I have a declaration from him which I am going to read later on, which sets forth the particulars of that affair. But, strangely enough, although there were supposed to be so many political thugs from Saskatchewan, only one man from Saskatchewan was arrested, and they were glad enough to get him to leave without even giving him a trial. There is no disgrace in an arrest of that kind—many a patriot has suffered from such an arrest before now. I would like to read some comments with regard to that arrest. The North-west Review has this to say:

Either J. J. Sullivan is guilty of the charge incorporated in the warrant under which he was arrested or he is not. As our correspondent points out, if he is guilty he is not fit for membership in a religious organization whose proud boast is that its members are chosen from among the best element in the community—men whose honesty, integrity and Catholicity are above suspicion. If he is innocent of public wrong-doing it is not fair to him or to the organization to which he belongs that his character and reputation should be permitted to suffer. A public acknowledgment of his innocence is expected and awaited. The action of the local council, or certain members of the local council, in going to the assistance of a brother in trouble and effecting his release was a very practical illustration of the benefits of organization and should give a great impetus to the work. But the council of which Mr. Sullivan is a member cannot afford to let matters stand as at present.

There were certain accusations made regarding the hordes of political workers from the province of Saskatchewan—thugs and thieves—who were present, but after all, the only one they could discover was Mr. Sullivan, and they were very glad to let him go. The gentlemen to whom I have previously referred—Messrs. Brown, Fowler and Martin—took this matter up, and wrote an open letter to Sir Rodmond Roblin as follows:

Sir—The attention of the executive committee, acting on behalf of Mr. Richardson's candidature in Macdonald, has been called to your recent repeated utterances to the effect that at the present time the constituency of Macdonald is swarming with a gang of election crooks and thugs, from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Upon making the most careful enquiries we have every reason to believe that the only persons from those provinces who are taking part in the campaign, on Mr. Richardson's behalf, are: Hon. Frank Oliver, M.P.; Hon. Thos. MacNutt, M.P.; W. E. Knowles, M.P.; Dr. Clarke, M.P.; Hon. Geo. Langley, M.P.P.; Mr. Devlin, M.P.P.; Mr. S. Latta, M.P.P., and Mr. J. J. Sullivan.

On several occasions recently, and particularly in your telegram interview of the 5th instant, you call upon the Liberals of Manitoba to join you in an effort to safeguard the liberties of our citizens. In view of the facts cited above it appears to us that a very plain and important duty lies at your own door, namely, the production of the names of the imported political crooks which you allege are here from Saskatchewan and Alberta. If there are any such men in our midst we can assure you, as well as the electors of Macdonald, that they are not here with our knowledge, or consent, and you may rely on our committee joining you in an effort to rid the province of their presence.

Signed on behalf of committee.

EDWARD BROWN,
FRANK O. FOWLER,
E. D. MARTIN.

The day afterwards this same committee sent the following letter to the same paper, also addressed to Sir Rodmond Roblin, Premier of Manitoba:

Sir—Twenty-four hours have passed by and so far as we are aware you have only made public the names of two of the men whom you describe as crooks swarming into the constituency of Macdonald from our sister provinces to the West. Further careful inquiries on our part convince us that the list already furnished you by the undersigned comprise all the persons from Saskatchewan and Alberta who are aiding Mr. Richardson in his campaign. You furnish no evidence that one of the men mentioned is from Saskatchewan or Alberta, leaving the number of your hosts of crooks at one. You say you are prepared to give further information.

Under these circumstances our duty to the public demands that we should again call upon you to give evidence of the sweeping charges which you made.

Regarding Mr. J. J. Sullivan, we are reliably informed by a prominent priest of this city that he is a member of the Catholic church and that he is a man of excellent character. That there were no real grounds for his arrest is apparent from the fact that the only charges trumped against him was for unlawfully, by false and fraudulent pretenses, endeavouring to induce a voter to vote for one of the Macdonald candidates. The charge itself is preposterous and, besides, is not founded on fact, as will be proven in due course. In the meantime every legitimate effort to secure Mr. Sullivan's release on bail has been flatly refused by the officers under your control.

If, as premier of this province, you consider the ends of justice and British fair play are to be served by such tactics, we are prepared to leave the matter in the hands of the electors of the constituency of Macdonald.

Signed on behalf of Mr. Richardson's committee.

EDWARD BROWN.
FRANK O. FOWLER.
E. D. MARTIN.

Rev. A. Gerritsma, a priest well known and much respected in the West, made the following statement to which the committee refer regarding Mr. Sullivan:

'I have known Mr. Sullivan well for a number of years. When I was priest at Esterhazy he was the president of our church committee. It was due principally to his efforts that our Catholic church was built there.

'Mr. Sullivan is highly respected by the citizens of the place of all denominations. If my memory serves me correct, he was one of the councillors of the village.

'Mr. Sullivan is a man in whom I personally would trust everything. Needless to say I was much surprised to get a message that he was in the provincial jail. As soon as I heard he was incarcerated I went to see him. In speaking to him I became convinced that he has done nothing wrong. Consequently he is not worrying.

'If that's the only way the Conservatives can win the Macdonald election, by putting an innocent man in jail, then I've nothing more to say. It's disgusting—too ridiculous for expression.

'The facts of the case are clear. The man was arrested, having done nothing illegal. He was rushed off to prison, and until yesterday afternoon his counsel was denied access to him.

'I am certain, absolutely positive, there is nothing wrong in his case.'

That I think is stronger evidence than any that has been produced on the other side.

With reference to my visit to the constituency of Macdonald I have nothing to apologize for. I was invited there by this same committee but if, as a citizen of the West, I desire to go into any other province of my own accord and take some platform, I feel justified in doing so. There was not however, one man who went from Saskatchewan to that constituency without the invitation of the electors of Macdonald.

Indeed every one of us was very pleased to have an opportunity of doing something to strike a blow in favour of better markets for the produce of the people of Manitoba and the West.

I do not desire to take up too much time, but I wish to read a declaration made by Mr. Sullivan, which is as follows:

Canada,
Province of Manitoba,
To wit:

In the matter of the election of a member for the Electoral District of Macdonald to serve in the House of Commons.

I, John J. Sullivan, of Regina, in the province of Saskatchewan, clerk, do solemnly declare:—

1. At the request of the committee in Winnipeg in charge of the candidature of R. L. Richardson, the reciprocity candidate in the recent election held in the constituency of Macdonald, Manitoba, I came to Winnipeg on Tuesday, October 1st, and went to the offices of the committee, in the Chambers of Commerce building. There I met Mr. Fred Woodrow, secretary of the Liberal Association, and Mr. J. W. Wilton who had charge of Mr. Richardson's campaign. Mr. Wilton told me that they understood that I had considerable experience in organization work in election campaigns in Saskatchewan, and that they were desirous of enlisting my services for strengthening their organization work. He asked me if I would take charge of the north poll in Carman, and pointed out to me that although there were several willing workers there, they had so far been unable to systematize their organization, and he thought that I would be able to be of considerable assistance to them. He said that it would be my duty to organize the poll and to see that the work was efficiently carried on and that the full vote was got out. I said that I would be very glad to help. I went to Carman on Thursday, October 3, arriving there in the morning. I introduced myself to Mr. Roland North, to whom I was told to report. We went to the Richardson committee rooms where I met workers and had a general discussion as to what work had been done and the steps that should be taken to get our work in ship-shape. On the following day, October 4, Sir R. P. Roblin came to Carman. He returned to Winnipeg. In the issue of the Winnipeg Telegram published on October 5, appeared an interview with Sir R. P. Roblin, in which he is reported to have said as follows:—

I want to make this further statement, not only to the electors of Macdonald, but also to the people of Manitoba, that in my thirty-one years of public life I never saw a constituency invaded or infested with such a gang of boodlers and political thieves and thugs, as are now wandering around that constituency. . . The gang is from the province of Saskatchewan. That province has sent down apparently the whole boodling and bribing brigade of political thugs, who appear to have been making Saskatchewan their home.

It could not be a very big gang when there was only one arrested, and that one not on a specific charge, but a general charge—and they were very glad to get rid of him, to have him leave before coming to trial. There could not have been less than 100 detectives throughout that district, and this was the only man they could find to arrest.

Members of the Saskatchewan legislature are there. Men who cannot put half a dozen sentences together grammatically, nor have any accomplishments that might give dignity or grace to a threshing gang——

This is not very complimentary to the threshing gang who are the farmers of the community.

—are swarming in the constituency and organizing or endeavouring to organize to debauch and bedevil, as far as they can, the honest, intelligent electors of Macdonald. Carman seems to be the centre. The leader apparently is, as far as I can gather, a fellow who is known by the name of Sullen, presumably an alias. . .

I have instructed the provincial police to arrest these men, and they will be placed in jail at the earliest possible moment when they attempt to do the work they have been sent there to do, and I want to say that because a man is an M.P.P. or an ex-M.P.P. in Saskachewan or of anywhere else, it will not prevent justice being done.

2. I am informed and believe that I was the only worker from Saskatchewan in the said constituency of Macdonald in said election, exclusive of certain gentlemen from Saskatchewan who spoke on public platforms during said election, and among whom were the Hon. George Langley, the Hon. Thomas MacNutt, and R. E. Devlin, M.P.P. I deny that there were any persons from Saskatchewan engaged in organization work in said constituency other than myself.

3. On Friday, October 4, I observed and was informed that I was being shadowed by provincial constables, including provincial constable Laughlin. In the evening I attended a public meeting in company with Mr. Roderick MacKenzie, at which he and I spoke in support of Mr. Richardson.

4. On the following Saturday morning I met Mr. Thomas MacNutt, M.P., at the committee rooms. After stopping there a little while, I went out and met Mr. Roland North. As we were going along the street together, we met a person whose name I do not know, and he came along with us. Mr. North spoke to him as to how he was going to vote. He replied that he was a ballot voter, and that nobody knew how he would vote. I asked him to come to our meeting and hear our speakers before deciding which way he would vote. Outside of this party, I did not mention or discuss politics with anyone in Carman, outside of members of the committee whom I met in the committee rooms. That Saturday afternoon I came down to Winnipeg and went to the general committee rooms, where I procured a considerable quantity of campaign literature, polling lists and cartoons and some newspapers.

5. On the way down to Winnipeg I noticed that one of the provinical constables whom I had seen at Carman was on the train, and apparently following me. He subsequently informed me that he was detailed to look after me and that if I had got off at any of the intermediate stations, he would also have got off in order to keep me in sight.

6. I returned to Carman on Monday, October 7. I was met at the hotel by two provincial constables by the names of Hanson and Bertram. Hanson said that he had a warrant for my arrest. I asked him what the charge was. We went to my room and he took out a warrant for my arrest which he read over to me. I do not recollect the exact words that he read, but it was to the effect that I had illegally induced or had attempted to induce a voter to vote at the then pending election. The said constables then placed me under arrest, and took me down to another room in the hotel. While waiting in this room, Mr. Thomas Usher, one of the committee men came to me, and asked me for a list of the voters at Brunkild poll, which I had copied from the only available list at the committee room. I was in the act of handing it to him when I was intercepted by Constable Hanson who seized the paper and refused to allow Mr. Usher to have it. Hanson said to me that I was under arrest, and that he would take all papers. A little later constable Hanson asked me to show him all papers that I had in my possession. This I did, and he went through them and made a careful examination of them, and finding nothing that he thought was incriminatory, he returned them to me. He also made an examination of my travelling bag. I was then taken to the railway station by Hanson, Bertram and Laughlin, one of them walking on each side of me, and one walking immediately behind.

I may say that Sullivan is rather a small man, he was unarmed and yet three men had to watch him.

At the station I was taken on board the train in company of constables Bertram and Laughlin. We arrived in Winnipeg at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, when I was taken to the office of Police Magistrate McMicken.

7. There were present at said police office said two constables, Marsh Jackson, who is a provincial constable, and the clerk of the court, and another man whose name I do not know. The charge was read over to me by the clerk. A man whose name I do not know asked to have the case remanded until Saturday, October 12, at 3 o'clock p.m. The magistrate made a remand in accordance with this request. I was then taken to the provincial jail.

8. On my arrival at the jail I was taken to a room where I was ordered to hand over all effects in my pockets. I emptied my pockets, including private papers, pass books, travelling card and money. The guard then felt all about my person, and ordered me to take off my boots, which he examined to see if there was anything hidden in them.

This must be copied from their methods in Russia.

I was then taken to a cell where I was locked up. During that evening some one came to the cell and laid down on the floor some bread and a cup of tea, and announced that it was my supper. That night after I undressed the guard made me carry my clothes into the corridor where they were placed on a bench in the corridor. He then told me to stand with my face to the wall in the corridor while he made a search of the cell.

9. On the same night that I was brought to Winnipeg, the Hon. Robt. Rogers addressed a meeting at Saint James, Macdonald. A report of his speech appeared in next day's Winnipeg Telegram. He is there reported to have said:

I know we have nearly one hundred thugs from Saskatchewan scattered through this riding. They are in this very polling division, and we are watching them. One of the ringleaders of that gang, a special and personal friend of Mr. Calder, was arrested to-day in the town of Carman.

In the press of Saturday Mr. MacNutt made the statement Mr. Richardson was going to succeed. Mr. MacNutt evidently thought he was in Saskatchewan, because he knew he was surrounded by the thugs which Mr. Roblin had described.

Well, I am a fairly large man myself, and Mr. Sullivan is a fairly small man, and I do not see how he could surround me.

The thug arrested to-day came into the constituency with Mr. MacNutt.

This is not so, but I do not think that I should have been at all ashamed if it were.

He went to Carman for a week, and registered as Sullivan. He spent his time there for a week, and then came into Winnipeg with Mr. MacNutt. Mr. Sullivan, of Carman, walked down to another hotel in Winnipeg and registered as Sutherland. He was at this hotel on Sunday, and had interviews with Grit election manipulators, and yesterday (Monday) morning, went to Carman again and registered as Sullivan, but the moment he started to operate he was nabbed, and was now behind the bars. There are many others who will follow him.

I may say again that Mr. Sullivan was the only man from Saskatchewan who was there in connection with the election as far as I am aware, except myself, at that time.

10. On Tuesday morning some bread and tea were left on the floor of my cell for my breakfast. I refused to take it and demanded some decent food. After some little talk, the guard agreed to get me some breakfast. Some other food was brought me, and for this I was charged 75 cents, which was kept out of the money which had been taken from me. I then asked that I be allowed to see my lawyer, Mr. Hugh D. Cutler. He saw me, and told me that he was making efforts to get bail for me, but that he had been unable to see the information or warrant under which I had been arrested, though he had made efforts to see them. He also told me that Marsh Jackson had told him that it was no use obtaining my release on bail, for if I were released on this charge, I would be immediately re-arrested on another. All day Wednesday no one came to see me.

11. On Thursday morning, October 10, Charles Forrester and Edward O'Connor, lawyer, came to see me at the jail. They promised that if I would go home that afternoon they would get me off. I said I might as well go home, as I will not be allowed to work, and there is nothing else for me to do. I felt that I had been neglected by my friends and that there was nothing else for me to do but go back to my own province. After I got out, I found that the case had excited a great deal of interest, and that it would be neither fair to myself nor to the party to allow the matter to end in this way.

12. I was taken from the jail to Mr. Forrester's office, which is in the same building as the provincial magistrate's court. There were present Mr. O'Connor, constable Bertram, Marsh Jackson and constable Laughlin. When I left Forrester's office it was upon the understanding that I was to leave for home that evening. I left in company with Constable Bertram, whose name I had then learned was Campbell. We went to a barber's shop. There I picked up a copy of the Free Press, and I saw that a great deal of indignation was being expressed over my treatment. Of this I was ignorant when I was in jail. I also saw a statement in the Winnipeg Telegram, which severely maligned me. I made up my mind that I should remain in the city and have the matter cleared up rather than rest under the imputations caused by my arrest and my treatment in jail. In company with constable Campbell I went back to Charles Forrester's office, I told him that I had changed my mind, and that I was going to stand my trial for the charge that was laid against me, and that I was prepared to go back to jail. He asked me what had caused me to change my mind. I said that I had seen the papers, and that if I went back the Telegram would have scare headlines that I had left the province because I was guilty and afraid of standing trial.

Well, Sir, they must have a poor force of police if a guilty man could do that.

I then told him that he could send me back to the jail as soon as he was ready, and that that would relieve me of any obligation to him. Forrester tried a number of times to persuade me to leave for home. I refused to go. Provincial Constable Parr was then called in and took charge of me. We went to the Empire hotel where we stayed for a night in the same room.

13. On Friday morning in company with constable Parr I went again to Forrester's office, and I told him that if he would get a certificate of dismissal from the magistrate that I would return to my home on the Canadian Northern railway that evening. Constable Parr and I left and returned in the evening. Forrester said that he thought that I was to leave on the Canadian Northern railway train. I replied that he did not make any arrangement for me to leave on that train. He said: 'When are you going home?' I said, 'I am not going home until I get my dismissal from the magistrate on Saturday.' He replied, "You are a fool Sullivan, if you do not go home. As sure as you stay here you will be sent down,' and he instanced the case of a man named Chamberlain, I think, who was sent to jail, and who, he said, was no more guilty than I was. I then said, 'I am perfectly innocent of any wrong-doing and you cannot convict me without perjured evidnce.' He said, 'We can get perjured witnesses against you,' and that I should remember that the government, the police magistrate and the constables were against me down here, and that I had better get home while I had the chance.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Who said that? Was it the magistrate?

Mr. MACNUTT: No, it was Mr. Forrester, the lawyer, as I read it.

I refused to go then without the discharge, and after some time, Mr. Thomas Murray came to Forrester's office to see me. He had a chat with me and told me that O'Connor had seen him, and that O'Connor was very indignant of the way I had acted in the matter. Mr. Murray told me that he was a good Liberal, and that he thought under the circumstances I had better go home. I decided in deference to Mr. Murray's representations that I had better leave. I left that evening for home. I was accompanied as far as Rivers, Manitoba, by provincial constable Ross. On the train he told me that he would like to go to his home at Virden. I said he could get off the train at Portage la Prairie, and that he could take my assurance that I would proceed to my home. He said that his instructions were to accompany me to the boundary of the province. He went with me as far as Rivers.

14. In the following week I got word that I should return to Winnipeg as my case was on the docket, and would come up on Saturday morning, October 19, at 10 o'clock. I returned to Winnipeg on October 18, and was instructed to see Mr. Trueman, who was acting for me as my counsel at the hearing of the case. In company with Mr. Trueman I went to the provincial police court on Saturday morning, October 19, at 10 o'clock. I saw the court docket and saw that my case was on the docket to be heard at 10 o'clock. Mr. Trueman stated to police magistrate McMicken that he appeared on my behalf and that we were prepared to proceed with the hearing of the information. The magistrate said that the case had already been disposed of, and he refused to go on with it. Mr. Trueman obtained from the magistrate a paper purporting to be the information laid against me. While Mr. Trueman was reading it, the magistrate demanded it back. Mr. Trueman refused to surrender it until he had an opportunity to make a copy. The magistrate and a number of provincial constables then sought to obtain it by force, and eventually they procured it from him. In the meantime, the magistrate adjourned his court, and no further proceedings have been taken in the case.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of 'The Canadian Evidence Act.'

Declared before me at the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, this 23rd day of November, A.D. 1912.
WARD HOLLANDS,
JOHN J. SULLIVAN.
A Commissioner in B. R., &c.

That is the statement of those so-called thieves and thugs who took part in the contest in Saskatchewan. I may say that anybody who knows Mr. Sullivan would believe him, even when not on oath, and I myself can certify to the truth of this affidavit up to the time we parted at Winnipeg, a week before the election. I had to go home at that time.

Now, I think these matters speak for themselves, and there is no necessity for me to take up any further time. I have placed these facts before the House, and they are corroborative of what has already been said before the House with regard to the Macdonald election by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I will only say that, as far as I am aware, the election was lost principally because it happened to be a very fine day. That is a peculiar thing to say, but anyone who was in the West last summer knows that we were visited by continuous rain. The settlers and farmers throughout the riding were, as far as I could see, favourable to the return of Mr. Richardson, but, as far as I could learn, going amongst them, they were determined to take advantage of the favourable conditions to complete their threshing.

When I was there they were threshing from early morning until after dark and I was surprised to find the meetings so fairly well attended. I was present at several meetings and I visited a good many of the threshing gangs in operation and I can say from what I know that the people were decidedly in favour of Mr. Richardson and had it not been a fine day and had they not been compelled to stay at their work they would have come in and voted for him. I believe, Sir, that every effort was made on the part of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) to win that election, assisted by Sir Rodmond Roblin. I won't say they were illegitimate efforts, but every legitimate effort was made, I suppose I will not be allowed to say any more than that. At all events, notwithstanding all that was done by Sir Rodmond Roblin and Mr. Rogers their efforts were not quite so successful as they thought they would be because before the election Sir Rodmond Roblin promised that the Conservative candidate would have at least 1,500 majority, and probably 2,000. I shall not take up the time of the House speaking further on this question, but should the matter of the Saskatchewan elections again come before us I shall have something to say.

Mr. J. A. M. ARMSTRONG (North York): Mr. Speaker, the different subjects that have been referred to in the Address from the Throne have been fairly well covered by the gentlemen who preceded me and it is neither my desire nor intention to occupy the time of the House, nor to fill the pages of 'Hansard' to any great extent in my remarks of this afternoon. I wish, however to claim the indulgence of the House for a few moments for the purpose of expressing my opinion as to some of the utterances that have fallen from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite during the course of this debate, and also to place myself on record with regard to certain questions which are of paramount interest to the citizens of Canada and which have a direct bearing upon the peace, happiness, and prosperity of our people. I regret very much that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in observing the time-honoured custom of extending his congratulations to the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address saw fit to dilute the honey of his congratulations with a certain amount of vitriol. I regret very much that the right hon. gentleman saw fit to make the statement that he saw very little in these addresses with which he agreed. I purpose in my humble way to bring to his attention some of the utterances of these gentlemen which I think will commend themselves to every right thinking citizen of this Dominion. So far as the speeches of the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address are concerned I am satisfied to leave it to the calm judgment of the Canadian people to judge between the eloquent address of the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Rainville) the scholarly utterance of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), and the ambiguous airy fairy speech given to the House by the hon. the leader of the Opposition. The House listened to the able and statesmanlike reply made by the leader of the Government in the manner that has always characterized his public utterances, and after he took his seat we were again treated to one of those short, pithy and witty deliverances so often given to this House by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) started out his speech with a classical phrase, and I wish to express my regret that my classical education has been so neglected that I am unable to interpret the meaning of it. In reading 'Hansard' I find that the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) commenced by referring to some friend or supporter of the Minister of Public Works as being afflicted with jimjams. That is undoubtedly a very classical phrase and I shall not attempt to interpret it to this House, but I am gifted with a certain amount of imagination, as other hon. gentlemen are, and I ask hon. gentlemen in this House to pronounce that word and to see if it leaves any taste on their mouths, and then to study the personal record of the members of this House and tell me if there is an hon. member on either side who is more likely to be inoculated with the germs of that serious disease known as the jimjams than the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) himself. I regret that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) is not in his seat this afternoon. He told us that he had always been brought up with the idea that the Conservative party was a party of iniquity and in my humble opinion that is the first really frank statement I have heard emanate from his lips. I believe that that is the way in which he was brought up. He qualified that statement by telling us that as years went by he was forced to change his opinion, and that the reason for his change of opinion was that certain members of the Liberal party had seen fit to transfer their allegiance to the Conservative party, acting as he claimed as a lever to the party. Let me tell the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) the real reason why he changed his opinion. If he goes back in the history of his party, he might just as well be frank with the House and admit that it was simply because the Liberal party has in the past on a few occasions recruited from the ranks of the Conservative party, and coming in contact as he did with these gentlemen, who so transferred their allegiance to the other side of the House, he was bound to come to the conclusion that there was more honesty of purpose and true principles of Canadian citizenship to be found in the Conservative party that he had ever imagined before.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) as well as others referred to the Macdonald election and I shall devote but a few minutes to that subject. The hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) read a very lengthy affidavit with reference to a man named Sullivan. For the information of the House and the country I would like to ask him if this Sullivan, who he says is a personal friend of his, may by any possibility be any relation of that notorious Capt. Sullivan, the one time intrepid commander of the Minnie M. I simply ask for the information of the House and the information of the country. Personally I would be inclined to look with a certain amount of suspicion upon any election worker who went around under that name.

The hon. member for Edmonton also stated that during that election the people were terrorized, that it was a campaign of intimidation. I ask the hon. gentlemen opposite to carry their minds back a few short months to the last general election, and I can give them instances where Government contractors called their employees into their private offices the day before the election and told them they must vote for the Liberal party or they would lose their positions. How does that compare with the intimidation that my hon. friend from Edmonton complains about?

I intend to refer to two of the matters contained in the speeches of the hon. the mover and seconder of the Address. The hon. member for Kingston spoke on the question of immigration, and while I do not intend to refer to it in the same strain as he did, I think it is one of the most important questions that the legislature of this country are called upon to face. The hon. member for Kingston pointed out that more strict inspection should be carried on with regard to the great influx of people from foreign lands. I quite agree with him, but I think a graver duty devolves upon the members of this House, and upon Canadian citizens, than simply to see that these newcomers have the means to supply themselves with their daily bread. Every year, according to the census returns, hundreds and thousands are coming to our shores, who speak every language under the sun, and worship every creed. While we must afford to those newcomers the right to venerate the land from which they sprung, the duty devolves upon Canadian citizens to endeavour to inculcate into their minds a hearty respect for British institutions and a love for Britain's King; and until we do that, this country never can hope to occupy her proper place among the great nations of the world.

Now, I would like to draw the attention of the leader of the Opposition to the proposed alterations to the Bank Act. I know practically nothing about the banking system, but I think it is one of the most important questions that any government could ever be called upon to solve. A day or two ago I received from my constituents a petition asking that a Royal Commission be granted by this Government to investigate all Canadian banks; an evidence on the face of it, that, owing to the many failures in the years gone by, the Canadian people are gradually losing all confidence in our financial institutions. It is not necessary I am sure for me to point out to this House the terrible effects upon many of the citizens of this country occasioned by the failure of a Canadian bank. It is not, I am sure, necessary for me to remind the House what failure of this kind means to many of the old men who, after a lifetime of toil, find themselves, through no fault of their own, without any contributory negligence on their part, forced to depend for their daily bread upon the charity of the community in which they live; and it is not, I am sure, necessary for me to point out to this House what such a failure means to many women and young girls throughout this land who through such failures in the past have been driven in some cases to the grave in sorrow and in shame. It is not, I am sure, necessary to remind this House of the effect of such failures upon the little children, many of whom at the time of such failures were toddling as their mother's knees, and who without a moment's warning have been driven from home and comfort, where they have been served with every need, and practically thrown into the gutter, dependent for a livelihood on the cold charity of the world, growing up in an atmosphere of vice and immorality, and many of them probably winding up within the four walls of those institutions so eloquently described by the hon. the member for Kingston a few days ago. I ask the hon. members of this House, who are responsible for the dying sorrows of these old men? Who are responsible for the shame of these women? Who, I ask, are responsible for the spiritual murder of these little children? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, every hon. member of this House who fails to do his utmost to reorganize or amend the banking laws of this country, so as to render such calamities utterly impossible, is guilty of spiritual murder. It should be impossible for any chartered bank of Canada to go to the wall on account of misappropriation of funds. There should be some system of government inspection of banks that would render these failures absolutely impossible, and I leave it to the financiers of this House to discover the remedy.

In conclusion, I wish to refer to the naval question. A few months ago the Liberal press in my portion of the country was endeavouring to lead the people to believe that the naval question would wreck the Conservative Government, and that the Liberal party were only waiting for an opportunity to attack us. I have not noticed any great desire on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite to clash with us on this question.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I occupy a rather unique position in this House, as far as naval propositions are concerned, in view of the fact that I have the honour to represent a riding that for thirty-seven years never sent a Conservative representative to this House. I further think that I have to a certain extent the right to say that I represent the old time Liberal party, in view of the fact that I have the honour of coming from a riding that has given to the public life of this country men like William Lyon Mackenzie, Sir William Mulock, and Sir Allan B. Aylesworth. I furthermore have the honour of living in that particular portion of the riding that is looked upon in that part of the province as the birth-place and the cradle of reform. I also have the honour of living practically within a stone's throw of the place where the Matthewes, the Lloyds, and the Lounts, and the Mackenzies were, I am informed, accustomed to meet for the purpose of formulating what hon. gentlemen opposite claim to be the principles of responsible government.

Many words have been said on this question already, but very little of a definite nature has been said. If I do not represent Liberal thought in my riding, I practically take my political life in my hands. But I do not care one iota whether I do or not, I am going to tell this House and this country where I stand on the naval question. My position is simply this—that if the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) who leads this Government comes down to this House and tells us that there is immediate necessity for Canada to do something to help Great Britain's navy, I for one will stand behind him and hold up both hands for the giving of every dollar that the Canadian people can give. It was said the other day—I think by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle)—that some critics of this policy had stated that we owed nothing to Great Britain. I do not know whether that is correct or not. I can hardly believe that there is any citizen of the Dominion who would make such a statement, but if there be I can quickly tell what I think of him. I blush with shame in unison with the Canadian mother of the individual who, when he attains years of discretion—or rather indiscretion—can so far forget what he owes to the land of his birth and to the privileges and liberties he and his fathers before him enjoyed under the British flag and who would try to introduce any policy in this country to stir up racial and religious discord. I will not juggle words on this naval question, I will stand behind any proposition that has for its object to make certain of Great Britain's supremacy upon the sea. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the policy they carried out last session—my first opportunity of listening to them—was not, in my opinion, calculated to promote peace and harmony among the different races and creeds that make up the population of this Dominion. It is not by stirring up discord between East and West, by endeavouring to draw a line of cleavage between the two parts of the country or between Catholics and Protestants, that Canada is to be brought to occupy the place she ought to occupy among the nations of the earth. In my opinion the question of race or creed should not enter the minds of public men. To me there is neither East nor West in this Dominion. I do not care whether a man comes from the shores of the Atlantic or from the foothills of the Rockies, for we are all citizens of the British Empire whose flag we love and to whose sovereign we owe allegiance, and are all bound together by community of interest and a common love for the Motherland.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to make a few general observations before the House, for this is one of the occasions when we are afforded an opportunity to deal generally with the needs of the people. My training as a lawyer would lead me to pay some attention to the observations of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Armstrong, York) who immediately preceded me. But he did not say anything that seems to require my attention. When he was about half way through his speech he rather reminded me of a character described in a little story I was reading on the train the other day, a new and novel character to me, 'the garrulous mute,' who was described as an individual who makes a lot of noise but says nothing. He has endeavoured to go beyond the Government and beyond the party to mark out a new furrow for himself. He was going to tell us his policy upon the naval question. I for one listened with interest to learn what that policy should be, as the remarks of an hon. member on that side would naturally be indicative of something more than the opinion of an ordinary individual, for I take it that any sane individual supporting the Government would not take it upon himself to give any expression of policy except such as would be in harmony with that of the Government he supports. But while the hon. gentleman started out with a great flourish of trumpets, it turned out to be another version of the old story of the Earl of Marr who, it will be remembered, marched up the hill and then marched down again. The hon. gentleman made no declaration which would enable us to frame any proper conception of what the Government's policy will be. We understand, and I think the Government understands, that Canada's policy on this naval question must be something permanent, something continuous, something to be established and developed. But the only observation we have from the hon. member is that if there is an emergency he is prepared to vote money to meet the emergency. That policy would end in the paying out of the money ; it would not involve the formulating of any permanent or continuous policy for the country. If we are to understand that this is the policy of the Government, it will be no policy at all, but merely an expedient to meet an emergency. Considering what the hon. gentleman has said, we need not be surprised to find it a policy of emergency, a policy designed to suit everybody but suiting nobody. We on this side are not going to discuss the naval policy at present. We are proud to follow the lead of our chieftain. He laid down, at the opening of the discussion, the course we will follow when he said we would wait patiently until the Government's policy is laid before the House and then would discuss it upon its merits The chief having taken that course, if would not be advisable or proper for any of his humble followers to depart from that course. I think it is the proper course to take, and it is the one we propose to follow. Let me assure the hon. member for North York, speaking as a private member of the House, and possibly as an average member of the Opposition, that, so far as the desire to maintain the strength and integrity of the Empire is concerned, to strengthen the hands of the Home Government and to support whatever is necessary to maintain the power of the Empire, the Opposition will take no second place to any member in this House or out of it. That is what we can promise the leader of the Government so far as this side of the House is concerned.

I said in opening that the present was an opportunity given to members of the House to cover a wide field of discussion and to deal with matters pertaining to the country generally, and more particularly to the constituencies we severally represent. We have listened with a great deal of interest to the words that were put in the mouth of His Royal Highness in the Speech from the Throne, and we are all deeply gratified, as has already been so well expressed, with the information regarding this country which His Royal Highness has acquired in his trip from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I am proud to know that in making a tour of the country, His Royal Highness spent considerable time in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. I may say, by the way, that His Royal Highness was entertained to a very novel sport in one of the harbours of the county which I have the honour to represent. I am told that His Royal Highness, during one of his fishing excursions, had at the end of his line a fish weighing about 865 pounds, and that for three-quarters of an hour his craft was rushing through the waters of the harbour at the rate of about 45 miles an hour.

We are pleased to receive assurance in the Speech from the Throne that the country is in a state of increasing prosperity, to know that the miner, the fisherman, the artisan, and all others engaged in agricultural, industrial and commercial pursuits are steadily growing in prosperity, that the development of the country is going forward very rapidly. We have passed the stage, I hope, when any unforeseen circumstance may impede or endanger the general prosperity and development of this great country. I could not help being impressed with the fact that had His Royal Highness traversed this country some years ago, in the days of Tory administration, he would have been unable to report such conditions as were so happily set out in the Speech from the Throne. He would have found industrial paralysis and commercial stagnation prevailing throughout the land, he would have found province divided against province, and dissensions, racial and religious, existing in many portions of the country. He would have found the finances of the Government in a most disastrous condition, and that while every dollar which could be wrung from individuals was collected, there was not enough money in the treasury of the country to meet the ordinary demands. I am pleased, Sir, to be able to testify to the change in the general condition of the country that was manifested when the period of Tory administration came to an end in 1896. A new era broke upon this country, the sun that set in adversity in June of that year rose in prosperity on the next morning. By progressive, honest and courageous administration, this country is now in such a position that, as I have already intimated, we have passed the danger point. In the few years which the present administration may be in power, there will be no opportunity for them to impede in any way the momentum which the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave to the prosperity of this country.

I am sorry to say that during the last year nothing has been done in my county to bring to a completion the different enterprises which the late government had undertaken. I hope that better things are in store for us, and that the present administration will be able to give fair consideration to the needs of that part of the country from which I come, as well as of the whole province of Nova Scotia. We are told that we must be loyal to Canada, and that we must confine our trade as much as possible within our own bounds. I come from a country, Sir, where we have many magnificent resources. In our coal mines, lumber and fishing, our iron and steel industries, we compare favourably with any other portion of the continent of North America. But if we are to be shut out from the American market, we should be given an opportunity to send our fish to the great centers of Canadian trade and commerce, and one of the first essentials in that connection is increased transportation facilities. We do not object to the spending of millions in the far West to give the farmer an opportunity of getting his grain to market. You never heard a Nova Scotian, or indeed a Maritime man, making any such complaints, for he is particularly anxious for the general development of this country. But if the foreigner who comes into Canada obtains the benefit of transportation facilities to enable him to dispose of his products, what about the Canadian, who has been in this country for the last 150 or 200 years and is to-day, in some provinces at least, in no better position than he was 200 years ago in respect to the transportation of his fish, lumber, or anything else he may have to send to the different markets of the country? A fair start had been made on the improvement of railway facilities in the Island of Cape Breton, but this Government cut them short. I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to the great responsibility which he has assumed in causing a cessation of the railway developments in the Island of Cape Breton. I am glad that the hon. Minister has had an opportunity during last summer of seeing the magnificent development of that part of the country which I have the honour to represent. He has travelled all over this country, and he must know that in the Island of Cape Breton we can never have fair-play for our fishermen until there is established a belt of steel around that island all along the coast. Unless the fishermen of this district have ample transportation facilities, it is impossible for them to compete with the outside world. If they had access to the American markets, this matter would not be such an important one, as they could dispose of their products through the cities of Boston, New York and other American ports. Railway lines should be established from the Strait of Canso through Richmond and down to Louisburg, from thence around to my own county of Victoria, and back to Inverness or some point in the Strait of Canso, with a view to giving to this portion of the country an adequate and efficient transportation service. It is partly under way and I hope that the Government of to-day and the Government that will soon succeed them will take this matter into consideration and give us the facilities we so much need for the carrying of our trade. We are proud to find that we have the money to do it with. We are proud that under the Liberal party there was the disposition to do this work; it was undertaken and commenced by them and I am sure that the Minister of Railways is not doing any credit to himself as a man or any credit to the party of which he is a distinguished member by dashing from the hands of the Island of Cape Breton that sweet cup which was almost at their lips. He ought not to be the man to do that and I hope he will reconsider any policy which he may have formed which would do otherwise than ample justice to the honest people of the island of Cape Breton and the other portions of the province of Nova Scotia which are without railways.

We were told by our hon. friends when they were in opposition that our fiscal policy was not a sound one. In my early experience in the House we were told from day to day that although we were counting surpluses in millions, starting some 16 years ago with one million and ending with something like $39,000,000 a year, this was a mere matter of book-keeping, that we did not have the money, that anybody could bolster up books and cook them and produce a return of that kind. But I am proud to say that last year, the first year in which the present Minister of Finance (Mr. White) had charge of the books of the country and had an opportunity of inquiring into the financial condition of Canada, after the most thorough investigation, backed up by every expert assistance he could get, backed up by a former Minister of Finance, who, I am sure, was keen upon the scent of any wrong-doing on the part of the former Minister of Finance, after all that was done, after all that enquiry and that investigation and searching of hearts and every other means by which they could find any fault against the former administration as to its financial standing, the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) was obliged—I shall not say obliged I dare say he was glad to come down to this House and declare: After fifteen or sixteen years of Liberal rule in this country, after paying every legitimate debt we have a surplus of $39,000,000; there is nothing wrong in the administration so far as the finances are concerned, the books of the country are kept in first class condition and we have a real surplus of $39,000,000. That, Sir, is the condition in which we handed over the affairs of the country to our friends. In the expenditure of the money which we have helped to accumulate we are simply asking a fair show and a fair deal in giving us our proportion of it. We are not finding fault because hundreds of millions of dollars are spent in British Columbia. We are not finding fault because hundreds of millions are spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other large development in this country, but we are expecting that, down by the sea, in the older settlements of this country, where we have good men and true, as good as in any other part of the world, no discriminating policy will be used against us but that the Liberal party will receive the treatment in that part of the country which they deserve from the fruits of the labour of their friends and from the proper distribution of the moneys which we have placed or helped to place in the hands of the present administration.

I must pay some little attention to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. White). He was rather critical in the position which he took yesterday in his criticism of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. He was not satisfied with the kind of evidence that was brought forward here yesterday in support of the claim that the election in Saskatchewan had anything to do with the cut in the rates of duty on cement. Perhaps it had not. For myself I should be sorry indeed to doubt any statement of fact which would be made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. White). I believe that he means well, that he is a man of wide experience and of proper and good natural instincts. But there is such a thing as a man being deceived. There is such a thing as others having ways that are dark and tricks that are vain. There is such a thing as evidence being put before the Minister of Finance which in the simplicity of his heart, he believes but which is no real evidence at all. We are a little too old in the world to believe that the great performer who had charge of the Saskatchewan election would ask the Minister of Finance to make this cut in rates without giving him some material. That great leader, and I am afraid the boss of the Government, was too shrewd, too calculating, to think for one moment there would be any use in going to the Minister of Finance and asking for a cut unless there was evidence, and such evidence as could with some plausibility be submitted to the House when the crucial moment came. I could imagine to myself such a thing as this boss of the administration, this performer, going to Boards of Trade, going to building combines or associations and telling them: Now I am here for a purpose. I am here to help run an election and to win it. I must have something startling in this province. I must have something that will attract the attention of the people and one of the things would be to cut rates of duty on something that enters largely into the economic consumption of the people of this province. Just now I think cement would be a good subject. What is the matter with you sending a resolution to the Minister of Finance telling him that this must be done. Very good. If that is necessary we are good loyal party men and we will do that, but do you suppose Mr. White will believe that such an emergency exists? Believe? Certainly he will believe; he is a good innocent fellow, he knows nothing about these intrigues and he will believe it. This was done all over the country and this deluge of telegrams and resolutions was poured upon the innocent head of the Minister and how well they succeeded was shown yesterday in the vigour and strength of the words with which he backed up this delusion which was heaped upon his head.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does the hon. member suggest that this was actually done or does he only surmise it might have been done?

Mr. GRAHAM: What might have been done is usually done by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. McKENZIE: If my hon. friend the Postmaster General had asked me how it would be possible to have this done in the Department of the Post Office I would say: Certainly, without the slightest possible trouble. But I would make this distinction between the two departments, that whereas the hon. the Minister of Finance would not know that the thing was coming, I think the Postmaster General would be looking for the letter.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does my hon. friend think that that is an answer to my question?

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend the Postmaster General was rather setting snares, he was not looking for a question.

Mr. PELLETIER: No answer is forthcoming.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am rather too old to fall into his rabbit tracks.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I do not like to interupt my hon. friend, but if he will permit me, I would like to ask him a question. What does he think of the correspondence with the manager of the Cement Company? Is he also in league with the Ministers?

Mr. GRAHAM: He is a very strong Tory, and always was.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have not the honour of being closely acquainted with the hon. the Minister of Finance, but I have the honour of a very close friendship with the manager of the Cement Company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: He is a very capable young man whom we trained to efficiency in Cape Breton.

Mr. GRAHAM: And Brockville.

Mr. McKENZIE: I believe the raw material came from Brockville. I have followed his answer very carefully, but I see nothing at all in it that leads me to the understanding of his letters which the hon. the Minister of Finance has reached. I do not think that he admits anywhere, as far as I can follow his letters, that they were unable to furnish the material, or that they did not have it to furnish. I think the speech of the Minister of Finance would lead me to believe that they did not have the goods to deliver, but my reading of what he quoted from the letters of the manager of the Cement Company does not lead me to any such understanding. Perhaps the hon. the Minister of Finance has some information from his other than that he put on 'Hansard.' If he has, we are not able to judge of it as evidence, but in what he has submitted, there is nothing which goes to show that there was any emergency. I do not think, Sir, that a case has been made out at all, so far as the consumers of cement in the West are concerned, because the hon. the Minister of Finance undertook to speak for contractors and builders, and not for the ordinary consumer, who, in a small way, requires cement. I take it that those large consumers are business men, that they watch the market, that they provide in advance for their large operations, and that they have contracts for the supplying of cement. I think it is not presuming too much to say that those paving construction companies have contracts with the cement people at Montreal, or at the other points where they manufacture for the supply of consumers. Let me submit to the Minister of Finance—he is a lawyer—that when the letters speak of the loss of the builder, they mean the loss and danger of those who undertook to deliver those goods; if they did not deliver the goods they would have to suffer the loss and make it good to the party who depended on them to perform their side of the contract. If it was necessary to go to the United States to get those contracts carried out, they had a perfect right to go there. We have samples of that sort of thing in the island of Cape Breton, when the Dominion Coal company, or the Nova Scotia Steel company, owing to pressure on their works, are unable to supply coal or steel rails, as the case may be, and have to go across the line, pay the duty, and fulfil their contracts. There is no such thing as coming to the Government to ask them to remove the duty. That was possibly another delusion practised upon the minister. It is quite possible that those combines and trusts, went to the contractors and got them to raise a howl to frighten the minister, saying: 'we know we have to pay you the difference for any loss you may suffer, but we do not want to pay duty to bring in this cement, and if you cry loudly enough it will come in free.' It is quite possible that that was played upon the minister, and that he was persuaded to let this in free without the necessary evidence being before him. My hon. friend (Mr. White) is not a child in regard to the things that go on in this world, or in regard to the civil or municipal institutions of this country, and he knows that boards of trade are the most delusive bodies that ever existed on the face of the earth. If there is anything to which I would pay little attention it is to the resolution of a board of trade. These boards are the most irresponsible and unrepresentative people that were ever permitted to live in this country. One or two members can pass a resolution; one alone can move and second it, sign it as president or secretary, and send it to the department. That is all the hon. minister has got, and yet he stands up boldly and says: 'Where is the member for Saskatoon, I dare him to oppose the resolution of the members of the board of trade.' The chances are that when he goes up there to look for those members he will be unable to find one that would take the responsibility of saying that he ever saw or heard of a board of trade. That is the kind of evidence that is submitted. We heard it said yesterday, with a great flourish of trumpets, that the leader of the Opposition was making strong bold statements based on nothing but newspaper scraps. I assure the Minister of Finance that he never saw a poorer scrap of any kind than a resolution of a board of trade, and that is the only evidence upon which he based the great case which he tried to make out here yesterday. Now I want to point out to the Minister of Finance some things that the Government did in connection with the accumulation of the evidence that was thrown at his innocent head by the more crafty hand of the boss who was operating from a distance, and the smiles upon whose crafty face could not be seen by the honest and well-meaning juvenile who reigns over the department.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: I take back the word 'juvenile,' I will say 'young.' If I say anything that looks in any way disparaging to the Minister, I can assure my excellent friend that there is certainly no 'mens và' behind them. I could point out to the Minister of Finance sources of information to be found in every part of the country and on which he could rely with confidence. Why did he not consult with his own political supporters in the West? One would naturally expect that when a crucial question concerning the West was to be dealt with the Minister of Finance would consult some member supporting his government from the Western provinces. There are municipal councillors in the West who are responsible to the people; there are local governments in the West; there is the government of Manitoba, who are friends of his; why did he not consult them? Well, Sir, if I were before a jury, I would tell them that the Minister of Finance is not entitled to the apology he pressed for yesterday. I believe that when he exercises his mind as a lawyer over the evidence submitted to the House he will agree with me that the very opposite of an apology is due to him. I had it in my mind to say something about the rather flippant way in which the Minister of Finance dealt with this question and with the members of the Opposition. I submit with due deference to my hon. friend of large proportions and splendid calibre that I am an older parliamentarian than he, and I would tell any minister, let alone the Minister of Finance, that he cannot afford to be flippant or smart in trying to deal with a public question. That may be all right for an irresponsible man like the member of a board of trade, but when it comes to a minister of finance dealing with public questions he must keep within well defined limits, and I can assure him that his flippancy yesterday was not in keeping with the dignity of the position he occupies. There is such a thing as a man of ordinary capacity forcing that capacity beyond its proper bounds, and I submit to the Minister that while he may be well trained as a financier I do not think he ever was intended to be a Mark Twain. When the Minister of Finance proceeded to be smart, his performance reminded me of the somewhat clumsy antics of an elephant on a hen roost.

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask a question?

Mr. McKENZIE: Hast thou found me, oh mine enemy?

Mr. BURNHAM: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that something reminded him of the antics of an elephant on a hen coop; has he ever seen an elephant on a hen coop?

Mr. McKENZIE: I have not, but I have seen things just as much out of place. The flippancy exhibited by the Minister of Finance yesterday reminds me that the Hon. Joseph Howe once said that one had poor taste indeed who would smile at a man with a wooden leg because he limped, but that if a man with a wooden leg undertook to perform the Highland Fling or Sword Dance he was open to ridicule. In attempting to dispose lightly of the leader of the Opposition as the Minister of Finance undertook to do yesterday, he was putting himself in the role of the man with the wooden leg dancing the Highland Fling. Then, the Minister of Finance in his speech proceeds to lay down a new principle with regard to the trade policy of this country. I have always understood it was common ground with the statesmen of Canada that it was well for us to get trade with any foreign country on the best possible terms and that we should do what was proper in every way to get fair trade with the United States or any other foreign country. But, yesterday a new trade policy was laid down by the Minister of Finance; a new prophet has appeared upon the scene and has laid down new laws. The hon. gentleman laid down the law that it is impossible for us to trade with any foreign country in a legitimate way except over an artificial wall. What he means by that I do not know, but to be absolutely fair to the hon. gentleman I will quote his words as reported in 'Hansard,' page 116:

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Let us clear that up here and now. What was the objection of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden), and I think of every other member on this side of the House, to the Reciprocity Agreement? The objection was the fact of the agreement itself, among other things, the fact that we would surrender control of our fiscal policy to a great nation to the south. Nobody in Canada who has any sense has any objection to buying from the United States or selling to the United States if you buy over the tariff wall that has been erected in accordance with the requirements of each country. If my right hon. friend wants to buy something in the United States I have no objection to his buying it if he brings it in, but I do object to his making an agreement which will deliver our tariff in regard to such an important list of products over to the House of Congress of the United States.

What are we to understand by this wall that we must cross? The miner who pays thirty or thirty-five per cent duty on the necessities of life is to be told that if he should get those goods in free from the United States, he is not a proper citizen of this country. Does the Minister of Finance wish us to understand, no matter what offers are made to us by any other country, that for his part he intends to keep a wall between him and that country? Is that the encouragement he is giving to the people who are now overburdened with the cost of living? I hope that my hon. friend from Red Deer will some day come up against this wall, and that it will give him such a smashing that the Minister of Finance will be sorry that he ever attempted to throw up such obstacles.

Mr. WHITE: Would the hon. member be in favour of a further reduction on coal?

Mr. McKENZIE: While I would like to see the miner getting the necessities of life as cheaply as possible, I would be pleased if my hon. friend would put a rail or two in the fence where the coal comes in. At the present time we are importing fifteen or sixteen millions of tons of coal annually from the United States, displacing Canadian coal to that extent. I think the tariff on coal should be raised in order to increase the market for Canadian coal. However, I do not think my hon. friend will take any upward flights with the tariff. My hon. friend's position is this, he says: 'Look at my speech of the 26th of November, and you will see there where I stand. My heart is right, and I hope to carry out my intentions later on; stand by me. You have not got the same chance from the Grits, because they are acting for the poor men, but I am for the combines, I am for the wall. When the proper time comes, I will carry out my promises, when the Grits are more or less off their guard, but at present I am too closely watched.'

In reference to this continuous, permanent Chinese wall with which my hon. friend wishes to surround the country, I want to point out to him the doctrines of his predecessors. Sir John A. Macdonald held that whatever treaties the United States would make with us, we would reciprocate, but if they kept up their high walls, we would compete with them. His predecessor in office, the hon. member for North Toronto, held exactly the same views. I understand that in this country and all over the world the general trend of things is to modify tariffs. If that is correct, where does my hon. friend stand on his high tariff wall?

Mr. WHITE: Will my hon. friend kindly read the words after 'wall?'

Mr. McKENZIE: I have read it all in 'Hansard.' If it bears a different interpretation, I will be very glad indeed if my hon. friend will get this wall out of his way.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend will read it again, I think it will substantially represent his views also.

Mr. McKENZIE (reading):

'Nobody in Canada who has any sense has any objection to buying from the United States or selling to the United States if you buy over the tariff wall that has been erected in accordance with the requirements of each country.'

Mr. WHITE: 'With the requirements.'

Mr. McKENZIE: That is what I say is wrong. The natural condition is that there should be no wall at all.

Mr. WHITE: How do you propose to obtain the revenues necessary for the administration of the business of the Dominion?

Mr. McKENZIE: All I said was that the natural condition of trade should be free trade. I am in favour of raising the revenue as we are now doing it. There should be no higher wall than is necessary to obtain the finances of the country. It has always been the view of the Liberal party that we must deal not with theories but with conditions. There may be conditions where theories will not apply—there are conditions in this country where theories will not apply. But I do object to the hon. gentleman who, of all others, represents the trade policy of the country saying that there must be a stone wall around this country and that we cannot legitimately trade except over that wall. We have heard to-day of large quantities of fence wire coming into this country free. What is the position of these people? What about the theory of my hon. friend? These goods did not come over the wall, and surely according to the hon. gentleman, must be subject to confiscation.

Before resuming my seat I desire to say a few words about the amendment before the House. I think this question of the conduct of the election in Macdonald is such that I can appeal to the Government, and particularly to the Prime Minister, with every confidence that, if the facts put before the House are correct, if these affidavits truly represent the case, the strongest possible steps should be taken to stamp out the practices indicated. It will not do for the Prime Minister to do as he did yesterday when the facts were put before the House—for, though, possibly, the affidavits were not read the substance of them had been placed before the House by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The only notice the Prime Minister condescended to take of the matter was to say, in effect: You did similar things in days gone by. I submit that that is not the position for the Prime Minister to take on a question of that kind. We heard a moment ago from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Armstrong) of the responsibility devolving upon the people of this country to show a proper example to the immigrants who come amongst us. I entirely agree with him on that ground. But the only way we are going to impress the immigrant is by showing respect for law and order. If we who profess the Christian religion and have the advantages of hundreds of years of civilization, are going to tolerate the ignoring of the law and the imprisoning of citizens in this high-handed way, what kind of example shall we set to foreigners who come to this country? My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) said we should do everything possible to assimilate these immigrants who come to Canada. Are we going to assimilate them by teaching them that honest people who dare to express their opinion may be imprisoned? Now, there are many people in this country who do not understand what has been going on and what this trouble is all about. So far as my words can reach I propose to let everybody in my own constituency and throughout the country know what is the nature of this alleged crime. They may think lightly of it; they may think it does not amount to much after all; but at least they ought to know the nature of the case.

One of the first principles of citizenship in this country is that every man is entitled to be unmolested, to have his liberty protected and his property safe, until at least a prima facie case is made out to show that he has violated the law and has made himself liable to prosecution. We have been told several times that in this election contest people were arrested simply on the statement that they were guilty of having violated section 269 of the Election Act. I regard it as my duty to put before my people and others exactly what this section 269 provides. Those of us who are lawyers, and a good many others may regard it as a very simple matter—they know what section 269 of the Election Act provides or they can easily refer to that law and find out. But thousands and millions of people in this country have no access to law books. So far as I can reach them, every man in this country shall have the opportunity of knowing what that section provides, and therefore what is the nature of the charge brought against these people. Section 269 of the Election Act provides:

Every one who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, makes use of, or threatens to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflicts, or threatens the infliction, by himself, or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm or loss, or in any manner practises intimidation upon or against any person, in order to induce or compel such person to vote for any candidate, or to refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted for any candidate or refrained from voting at an election, or who, by abduction, duress, or any false or fraudulent pretense, device or contrivance, impedes, prevents or otherwise interferes with the free exercise of the franchise of any voter, or thereby compels, or induces or prevails upon any voter either to vote for any candidate or to refrain from voting at an election, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence, and is guilty of an indictable offence, and shall, in addition to any penalty thereby incurred, forfeit the sum of two hundred dollars, to any person who sues therefor, with costs.

2. It shall be deemed a false pretense within the meaning of this section to represent to a voter directly or indirectly, that the ballot to be used, or the mode of voting at an election, is not secret.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will see that this crime is put in the category of indictable offences. In degree it is not so reprehensible, and is not punishable in the same way, as the graver crimes, but, being put in the category of indictable offences it is in the highest rank of crimes with murder and the gravest felonies. Now, the criminal law is not different for Manitoba from the rest of Canada,—the criminal law applies the same throughout the country. That being the case, I cannot understand how magistrates undertook to deal summarily with these cases. Let me refer to a provision of the law that is comparatively new. Under the law as it exists, evidence must be given before a magistrate of the nature of the crime alleged before an information can be taken notice of at all. It used to be otherwise, but now witnesses must be examined before any process is issued against an individual. The high-handed manner in which this business has been done will appear when it is considered that since 1909 the law of this country has been such that a magistrate has no right to issue a process for an indictable offence until section 665 of the Act as amended is complied with. This is what that section, passed, as I have said, in 1909, provides:

"Upon receiving any such complaint or information the justice shall hear and consider the allegations of the complainant, and the evidence of his witnesses, if any, and if of opinion that a case for so doing is made out, he shall issue a summons or warrant, as the case may be, in manner hereinafter provided.

3. The justice shall in connection with such hearing have the same power of procuring the attendance of witnesses and of compelling them to testify as under Part XIV.

4. The evidence of witnesses, if any, at such hearing shall be given upon oath, and the evidence of each witness shall be taken down in writing in the form of a deposition, and, subject to the provisions of section 683, which, so far as applicable, shall apply to such hearing shall be read over to and signed by the witness and signed by the justice.

That, Sir, is the course that should have been taken before any person was deprived of his liberty. There is a section in the Act which specifically provides that no legal process, warrant or summons can be signed in blank. It has been rumoured—although not clearly proven—that constables were sent around Manitoba during this election with blank warrants in their pockets. If that is so it is an iniquitous and abominable action, and shocking to the sense of any decent man in this country. If there is an iota of truth in the allegations which have been made, the responsibility of clearing the matter up lies upon the Government. No such action should have been taken against any man unless substantial proof was at hand. It is disgraceful, in a country like this, that any such condition could possibly exist. Our friends on the other side—and some of the ministers, I am sorry to say—laughed at this matter, and rolled it as a sweet morsel under their tongues. But chickens will come home to roost. It may be all right for them to laugh, but the good honest yeomanry of this country will not stand for such conduct. If this Government expects good citizenship, and to receive the respect of the Canadian people for the laws enacted by Parliament, they must respect the law themselves. What is the good of having statute-books if the Government is willing to ignore the laws placed upon them, and to deprive citizens of their rights and liberties in the very face of that law, which they themselves helped to enact? I submit that this matter requires a most careful scrutiny and investigation on the part of the Government and of this Parliament; that the good name and fame of this country is at stake, and I hope nothing will be done to prevent the fullest possible investigation into this matter.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. members of this House for the attention I have received, and I trust that our deliberations in the coming session will be fruitful of much actual benefit to this country.

Mr. R. J. BALL (South Grey): I am glad to have an opportunity of addressing this House in regard to those general matters which are now before us. The Speech from the Throne contained many matters of importance to us all. I am glad to know that the country is in a prosperous and thriving condition. A little over a year ago it was feared that certain circumstances might disturb the steadily increasing prosperity of this country, but the voice of the people averted such a catastrophe, and the old system that was inaugurated in 1878, and which has practically been undisturbed ever since is still extant. As has been stated by the hon. gentleman opposite, we must of course have a tariff for revenue, But I am sure that we must have a tariff for other purposes as well. If all other nations were free traders, possibly it would be wise for this country to adopt the same attitude, but we do not find this to be the case. Our neighbours to the south have a high tariff wall against us and other nations, and it is obvious that we must have a tariff wall for the purpose of generally regulating trade. If we expect to be a great industrial country, we must take definite steps to foster our industries. Had we listened to the appeal which was made to the country last year, and adopted the reciprocity agreement, we would have found that Canada would have been flooded with the products of the United States. In my opinion England is to-day making the same mistake as has been made by that country for many years. Free trade in the past may have been good for England, but what was good yesterday, or ten years ago or fifty years ago, may not be good under the conditions existing to-day. The resources of the republic to the south, although great, are being depleted,, and they have been looking across to Canada, seeking to obtain the benefit of our vast natural resources, in order that they might increase the revenues of their own country. In the event of such a consummation as was stated by Mr. Taft and corroborated by ex-President Roosevelt, Canada would have become an adjunct of the United States. President-elect Wilson has also concurred in this statement. The tariff, therefore, is something which we cannot discard, and the best proof of that is the fact that although the Liberal party before being returned to power in 1896 had stated that the last vestage of protection would be wiped out of this country, the tariffs were but slightly changed during their fifteen years of administration. A proper adjustment may become necessary from time to time, but the existence of a tariff is still found to be essential.

We are glad to know that the farmers of this country have materially prospered, and that, not only in Ontario and the older provinces, but in the West, the evidences of general development and prosperity are profuse and gratifying. I believe that the question of reciprocity is not dead—it is still a live one with many hon. gentlemen opposite—and I think it is just as legitimate to deal with this matter now as it was a year ago. The more information the people of the country obtain upon the matter the better, and the more light there is thrown upon the subject, the more the people are opposed to it. It is true that last year certain hardships existed in the West, but I am sure that the majority of the difficulties which presented themselves in the prairie provinces are attributable to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. For fifteen years hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and during that time they had ample opportunity of developing the transportation facilities of the West, but they failed to keep pace with the new conditions which developed in that portion of the country. The late Government failed to keep pace with the progress that was being made in that country and it devolved upon the present Conservative Government to see that the West was properly served. I do not think we need any better illustration of that than the method in which the Grand Trunk Pacific railroad was handled, because the very portion of that line which should have been built to relieve the West was neglected. Mr. Speaker, we find that our industries are prosperous and progressing. Although the furniture industry with which I am connected, as well as other industries, was not in the schedule for reciprocity, yet there was a feeling of uncertainty and doubt that came upon the manufacturers of this country and which prevented them from enlarging and extending their business as they would have extended it. As soon as the reciprocity pact was defeated confidence was restored and the people have since gone forward in hope, feeling secure in their investments and in their enterprises. I belong to the town of Hanover, which is an important centre of the furniture industry and an enterprising town. For myself when reciprocity was before the people, I felt very doubtful about enlarging my business in any way because we did not know what competition we might have from the other side of the line. At the present time we have over one million dollars worth of furniture coming from the United States to Canada even against a duty of 35 per cent. The furniture manufacturers were deeply concerned at the result of reciprocity. Since its defeat my own town, for which I suppose I may more particularly speak, is moving along with confidence, and even those who voted for reciprocity but who I am sure in their hearts were opposed to it, are pleased at the result of the election of 1911. Sometimes there is an idea that the interests of the labouring men and the interests of the employers are different, but at all events both were united in opposition to the reciprocity proposal. Our labouring men were as anxious as we were in regard to the matter. They had their homes in the town and their homes were becoming more valuable and if depression came from any cause whatever their homes would be reduced in value and possibly they might have to look elsewhere for work. Confidence was restored amongst the labouring men as well as amongst the manufacturers by the result of the defeat of reciprocity and to-day all classes of the community are happy and contented. We are glad to know that this year the West has had a good crop and that the wheat growers have been able to garner the harvest better than last year. Transportation is better. The Government has made provision so that grain is being moved a great deal more rapidly than last year and I am sure that if this Government gets time to carry out its policy the West will be well pleased with it. I look to the West becoming an industrial country after a while. The quarrel between the Western farmer and Eastern manufacturer, if it exists, should not be. We take their grain, and the more industries we can create as the population of the Eastern provinces increases the more of the Western products will be consumed. Personally, I think the interests of the West can be best served by the adoption of a system of mixed farming and with mixed farming and with large industries in the West, the West is bound to become a great country. I understand that Winnipeg is the third largest manufacturing city in Canada, and that is something I did not realize until I had my attention drawn to it a short time ago. Now what can be done in Winnipeg can be done in other places in the West. What you want in Canada to-day is population. Our country is expanding so fast that we cannot get enough people to perform our work. The Western farmer and the Eastern farmer, and the manufacturer are all short of labour and until the population warrants it I suppose industrial progress will be slow. Now, I understand that flax is largely grown in the West and the shed for its seed and the rest of the plant destroyed. We bring our jute, a very inferior product to our flax twine, from the East Indies, and I do not see why that portion of the flax product which is useful for the making of twine should not be preserved and twine industries established throughout the West. As to the cement question about which we have heard a great deal, in my opinion the Government was perfectly right in cutting the duty on cement. The people of the West were suffering under a great hardship. I understand that in Winnipeg the building permits for the present year amount to something like twenty million dollars, and in Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton, and other western cities building operations are progressing in proportion. In order to enable these building enterprises to be carried on something had to be done towards supplying the demand for cement and I believe the Government took the right course in the matter. Because the Conservative Government is reputed to be a government of tariffs it does not necessarily follow that a Conservative government should be unfair to any portion of the community. Any sensible government whether it be a free trade government or a tariff government will adapt its policy to the varying needs of the people and the Minister of Finance and the Government were perfectly justified in the attitude they took. Then if you look at the figures you will find that very little cement was shipped into Ontario and Quebec and the Eastern provinces, so that while great advantage was conferred on the people of the West by cutting the cement duty, very little if any injury was done in the Eastern provinces. We must remember that it was under the administration of the Liberals that mergers, combines and trusts were brought into existence; they could not have come into existence since the present Government came to power, and therefore the late Government is responsible for them. However, we all know that the cement business in this part of the Dominion is a combine and perhaps after all it is not to be wondered at that gentlemen opposite censure the Government for cutting the duty on cement seeing that the cement combine is apparently one of the creatures of their own administration.

The cement industry is a combine, and combines control prices. I believe that if combines would act properly towards the people, and were properly legislated for, properly held in check, they could produce cheaper than individuals. They want to be regulated, and it seems rather strange to me to find that on the other side, when this matter was under discussion, in the United States, cement at the mill could be sold for 65 cents a barrel, while in our Canadian mills it was $1.08. There must be something wrong in the method of making cement in this country. It may be that our factories are not up to date, but there is some reason why they charge so much for cement, and I think this is a matter which ought to be investigated. I may say we have a cement factory in my own town. Though not very familiar with the methods of making cement there seems to be something wrong.

Now I am glad to see that the country is in a prosperous condition, and I hope that our legislation will continue along the lines it has followed in the past. In regard to the navy, I thought for some time that perhaps a Canadian navy would be all right. That was some years ago when things were peaceful. But things are not peaceful now. It is very difficult to tell what may occur on the continent of Europe, or how the old land may become involved. We do not know what the coming Naval Bill is to consist of, but we have no doubt it will be such as will commend itself, at least I hope so, to the whole House. We must stay by the old land, the land that has done so much for us, notwithstanding that there are those who say she has done nothing for us. Canada owes to her a great deal. We have drawn from her the financial strength which enables us to develop this great country. We owe the old land millions of dollars, she has protected us, and any navy we could produce would do very little if difficulties arose with another nation. It would take us a number of years to develop a navy, our ships would become obsolete almost as fast as they could be built for I understand they become obsolete in a few years. Whatever the Navy Bill may be, I am glad to be able to say that if it is at all reasonable it will have my support, and I think my people will give it their support also.

Mr. ROBERT CRUISE (Dauphin): It was not my intention to take part in this debate, but owing to the fact that an elector of my constituency was arrested in the recent Macdonald election, I feel it is my duty to say a few words in regard to his personal character. This gentleman who was arrested is Captain W. B. Sifton of Minitonas. He is a man who is held in very high esteem in the constituency where he lives. I have known Mr. Sifton for the last thirteen or fourteen years, and I do not know a dishonourable act that he has ever done. The worst I could say about Mr. Sifton is that he is a perfect gentleman. Mr. Sifton held a very responsible position under the late government for several years, and during that time I did not hear a word of criticism of him, either by Liberals or Conservatives. I might say that Captain Sifton is an old-timer in the province. He has lived in Manitoba for over thirty years. He lived for a considerable time on the east side of Lake Manitoba, but about twelve or thirteen years ago he removed with his family to Minitonas and I have known (Mr. Sifton ever since. I might also say on behalf of Mr. Sifton that he was one of the possible candidates spoken of in the recent election. Now I understood the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) to say yesterday that if he had been prosecuting those men who were arrested in the Macdonald election they would have been convicted. Well, Sir, the administration of justice is bad enough in Manitoba now, but I do not know what it would be like if my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) was a magistrate.

Mr. BURNHAM: I said prosecuting; not convicting.

Mr. CRUISE: I do not wish to misquote my hon. friend, but that is what I understood him to say, I have his words here:

> I say that if I had been prosecutor, I would have prosecuted.

These are the words of my hon. friend. The hon. member for Peterborough also claimed that the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) had not made out a strong case in regard to corrupt practices in the Macdonald election. I do not know that anything could be stronger than the four affidavits of those men who were arrested. So far as the three other men are known to me, I understand they bear honourable characters, and if these affidavits do not afford sufficient evidence to justify this Government holding an investigation, I do not know what would be sufficient. I must say that it is not a very agreeable thing to be arrested, and marched down the streets of Winnipeg with a constable on either side and one behind, and then placed in a jail, without any evidence whatever being produced against you. I trust that this Government will hold a thorough investigation into this matter, deal with it in the way it should be dealt with, and see that justice is done to the citizens of Manitoba in the future. I do not think it would be out of place for me to say that when the present Administration in Manitoba brings on a general election, the people of that province will show that they will not tolerate what was done in the recent Macdonald election.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): You have been telling us that for a long time.

Mr. CRUISE: The hon. Minister of Finance has seen fit to introduce the question of reciprocity. If I understood him, he challenged the members from Ontario and Quebec to say if they were still in favour of reciprocity. As the representative of an agricultural constituency of Manitoba, and a Western farmer, I would like to state that I am more strongly in favour of reciprocity than I was two years ago. It is all very well for the representatives of the manufacturers to get up and ask for protection. They are the men who want protection. The farming industry is the most important industry that we have in this country. They are the men who should get legislation at first hand. They are the men who should have the markets of the world opened up to them to allow them to get full value for their produce.

I would like to give the reasons why I am in favour of reciprocity. We have a great railroad built from the Atlantic to the Pacific known as the Canadian Pacific railway. This road has been built by cash subidies, by land grants and by the credit of this country and it has practically been handed over to the Canadian Pacific railway to operate and on it they receive a large profit. We have another road, the Canadian Northern railway, which will soon be completed from ocean to ocean and the Grand Trunk Pacific will also soon be completed across the continent. But when we have these three roads will we have any competition? It is easy for the presidents of those roads to put their heads together and arrange their freight rates.

Everybody knows that the freight rates are too high in the West to-day, and there is no possible chance of having them lowered in the future.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. member advocate government ownership of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern railway?

Mr. CRUISE: I am not speaking about government ownership now. As I said, even with these three railroads we will have practically no competition. Four or five years ago it was proven that the large grain companies in Winnipeg received profits to the extent of 16 cents a bushel in exporting our wheat to the Old Country, while according to their own evidence half a cent or a cent and a half was sufficient profit. If we had reciprocity and allowed our neighbours from the South to come in and bid on our wheat what would the results be? I do not for one moment say our wheat would all go South. We have these railroads built by this country and handed over to these railroad companies, so that these companies are in a good financial position to lower their rates and these men in Winnipeg who take the large profits out of handling our grain could take lower profits; the result would be that our grain would go practically in the same channel as it does at the present time and the farmers would get the benefit of the difference in price. Another reason why I favour reciprocity is that on the other side of the line in the last ten years wheat has been six cents a bushel higher than on this side. That is according to grade, and there is a difference between our grade and the American grade. Grain that would grade No. 3 Northern on this side would grade No. 1 or No. 2 Northern on the other side and this makes a difference of three or four cents a bushel. So you can safely say that wheat is ten cents a bushel higher on the American side than on this side, and has been so during the last ten years. Then barley is 30 cents or 35 cents or 40 cents higher on the American side than on this.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is it that way now or has it been for the last six months?

Mr. CRUISE: I am talking of what the average has been. Oats have generally run from five cents to ten cents a bushel higher on the other side. I ask you as a reasonable man and as a farmer is it any wonder that the farmers of our West clamour for reciprocity or for an open market in the United States?

Mr. BURNHAM. Where were they clamouring?

Mr. CRUISE: Four hundred or five hundred farmers came to this House from all over Canada two years ago and asked for reciprocity. The Finance Minister claimed great credit for extending the boundaries of Manitoba. I am pleased to give him all the credit. He said the boundaries of Manitoba were raised from a postage stamp to an envelope, and $2,000,000 put in the envelope for the people of Manitoba. To this I have no objection, it was little enough for the province. But he forgot to remind the House that by that settlement 8,000,000 acres of our swamp lands in the province of Manitoba were handed back to be handled by this Government which was a great injustice to the people of Manitoba. He also forgot to state that they gave to Ontario a five-mile strip across our territory and a ten-mile strip down the Nelson river for the purpose of a townsite? What is the result? The result is that Ontario owns the port at Port Nelson. I ask any reasonable man if that was a fair deal or settlement for the province of Manitoba and I think that when the next local election comes around the people will have a voice in that matter.

Another question that came with the settlement of the boundaries of Manitoba was the practical introduction of separate schools in that province. I would ask the loyal Orangemen in Ontario who took such an active part in the last election, who denounced the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as a Catholic and a Papist and all that sort of thing, how are they going to swallow that pill? The Manitoba school question was settled years ago, we were supposed to have national schools and we must have them. Now the question is re-opened and while we have not straight separate schools we have practically separate schools in Manitoba.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Can the hon. member state what change was made in the School Act last session that makes separate schools any more than we had them before?

Mr. CRUISE: I have not the Act but I will cite one of the Conservative organs known as the Orange Sentinel. I do not think the hon. member will deny anything in that paper. They said: No matter how the politicians of this country smooth over the school settlement in Manitoba there was no getting over the fact that Manitoba had practically separate schools.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to state the Act? The only change—

Mr. CARVELL: Later on you will have a chance.

Mr. PROULX: Does the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) think it satisfies the Catholic minority in Manitoba?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Where are you from?

Mr. CRUISE: The Manitoba school question was settled years ago and it was supposed to be settled for all time. If it is to be opened, then the people should be given a chance to vote on it, but it has been smuggled through by a resolution for a change in the School Act and we have now got practically separate schools.

The suggestion has been made that Western farmers should go into mixed farming. That is all very well, but if Western farmers should go into mixed farming where is their market? Only a short time ago I read in a paper that Mr. Lane, a cattle-buyer from the West, had shipped cattle to Chicago and had paid $60,000 in duty this year.

On motion of Mr. Cruise the debate was adjourned.

House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, November 28, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Department of Naval Service for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Hazen.

Report of the Department of Labour for the same year,—Mr. Crothers.

Regulations under the Destructive Insect and Pest Act.—Mr. Burrell.

Report of the Registrar of Boards of Conciliation and Investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, for the same year.—Mr. Crothers.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Rainville, for an Address to His Royal Highness, the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. ROBERT CRUISE (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of this debate last evening I was dealing with the question of mixed farming in the West. The farmers of Manitoba are going into mixed farming to a greater extent than before, they are realizing its benefits and advantages, and its tendency to increase their wealth and prosperity, although, if they go into mixed farming too extensively, they will certainly flood the present market.

Now, Sir, I would like to say a word with regard to the tariff. We were told by the late Minister of Finance that he had no objection to the people of this country buying from or dealing with the United States over a high tariff wall. I do not know how this fits in with the loyalty cry that was advanced during the last election. If a man can buy his goods in the United States, over a high tariff wall, and be loyal, I do not see why he cannot exchange his farm produce without duty and still be loyal.

I am pleased to know that the present Government is bringing in a Bill to amend the Bank Act. It will greatly benefit the farmer to be able to borrow money on the grain stored in his own granary. It will induce western farmers to build more granaries for the storing of their grain upon their own farms, and enable them to haul their grain to market in the winter when they have very little else to do. It will also enable them to prepare their land in the fall for the next year's crop.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen, of this House for your kind attention to my remarks.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, according to the rules of the House, I am obliged this afternoon to confine the few remarks which I propose to make to the amendment now before us, as proposed by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, and seconded by his first lieutenant, the hon. member for Edmonton. That amendment specifically refers to two recent by-elections, one held in the constituency of Richelieu, in the province of Quebec, and the other in the constituency of Macdonald in the province of Manitoba. As to elections that have taken place in other parts of Canada, may I be permitted to say that, according with the rules of the House, I propose at a very early date to take advantage of an opportunity to show the means employed by friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in certain other parts of Canada where British law and British justice was set at defiance in such a manner as has never before been heard of in any part of the British Empire.

Referring to the election in the constituency of Macdonald, I am pleased, either in this House or outside of it, to talk about, to analyze, and to discuss the result of that particular contest. I was not much surprised at the remarks of the hon. gentleman who moved this amendment, as giving evidence that he was disappointed and even pained at having to discuss the result of the overwhelming defeat which he and his friends received at the hands of the intelligent electors of that constituency. I can quite understand that it was very hard for the right hon. gentleman, and those who sit around him, to realize, as well they must, that the day has passed when they can any longer fool any respectable number of the intelligent electors of this Dominion, in any constituency. The old game, in which they achieved a measure of success during the past fifteen years, has been discovered, and they can no longer work it. They attempted it in the constituency of Macdonald, and it failed. They went there it is true, in the guise of respectability, to discuss the great question of reciprocity, but their hope of success in that contest was not dependent upon their being able to make clear to the farming community of that portion of Canada that reciprocity was an advantage to them. Their hope of success lay in their effort to fall back on their old policy, in the feeling that the circumstances and conditions of the locality were such as to cause their operations to meet with success. They went in there knowing as they did that it was a constituency composed of different races, creeds and nationalities, and they adopted their old policy of appealing to the passions and prejudices of the electors. But Sir, they failed in that effort. In that contest, circular after circular and tons of campaign literature were circulated by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, containing such appeals to the passions of the electorate.

I shall not trouble the House by reading many of those articles because if I were to undertake to read one quarter of them I fancy that I could occupy the time of this House from now until our Christmas holidays. I shall undertake to quote at all events a portion of that campaign literature that was placed in the hands of the Roman Catholic people in that constituency two days before the election. This literature bears the mark and the heading of the French Liberal organ in the city of Winnipeg and it gives reasons why the candidate of the Conservative party, Mr. Morrison, should be defeated in that contest. This is the language in which it is presented to the French people of that constituency:

(Copy.)

Why Rogers and his Orangeman Candidate must be defeated in Macdonald on the 12th of October.

(Le Soleil de l'Ouest, 26th Sept., 1912.)

The election which will take place in the constituency of Macdonald on the 12th of October derives a special importance from the present state of things. As is nearly always the case, our people will have to consider their religious as well as their material interests. Day after day dawns a light which must open our eyes on the first point. The close alliance of the Conservative party and Orangeism makes itself more evident every day. It is not even any longer an alliance, it is the slavery of the Conservatives under the whip of the Orangemen. The watchword was given before the last general election by the Orange Sentinel to look after the choice of the candidates. It is therefore not surprising that Mr. Morrison is an Orangeman.

That is the situation, as it has been made so by the Conservative organization. Those among the Catholics who could aspire to the Conservative nomination have been discarded and humiliated. Once more Messrs. Joseph Bernier and Aimé Bénard will yoke themselves to the Orange cart.

And why this zeal? Why this vileness? It is at the very moment when all the hypocrisy of the Conservatives appears in all its hideousness; it is at the moment when the frivolity of their promises is made so clear, both at Winnipeg and at Ottawa, that even Les Cloches cannot conceal their indignation, that this new sacrifice is asked from the Catholics in a constituency where they could rule. What audacity on the part of our enemies, and what a shame for us!

Because, only years of objection will bring such results.

Is it not time for us to raise our heads? What we have to consider is that the Conservative party, after having lived from the support of the Catholics, after having arrived to power in Manitoba with the help of the Nationalists of Quebec, has impudently been false to all its pledges.

What must be borne in mind is that one day the Orange Sentinel declares that the Catholics of Manitoba have nothing more to hope for and the following day the Roblin-Rogers combination hasten to choose an Orangeman as standard bearer; and we say, without fear of raising any discontent from self-respecting people, that it is necessary to punish the Conservative imposture. A lesson must be taught to Rogers, who has scoffed at the Nationalists and would like to still exploit them. Proof must be made that in order to succeed in politics one must first be honest and frank.

And if this is so as regards the religious question, what lesson does not the Government deserve for its conduct on reciprocity, the railways, the elevators and the navy?

The enormous losses caused to the farmers by the refusal of reciprocity are increasing every day. All the gold that the manufacturers can throw in an election will not compensate for these losses. A few dollars to buy a conscience do not compensate for the loss of a big fraction of the crop.

And the inability of the Government to provide means of transportation, to lighten the burden of taxes, to extend the market! what must be said of that?

What must be said of the evident disposition of the Borden Government to give the millions of Canada for the English navy when we have here so many needs to provide for? For his faithless politics, for his ruinous politics, both fanatical and deprived of dignity, Rogers must be given a lesson by the defeat of Morrison. Once more the arrogance of the vanquished of Saskatchewan must be curbed.

I cite this only as a sample of the campaign that was raised in that constituency of Macdonald, and while this literature was being circulated and placed in the hands of the Roman Catholics of this constituency, a similar work was being carried on in the Protestant portions of that riding, the same policy that they have practiced there for the last ten years in every general election that we have held, in every contest in which we have engaged. They went from house to house in Protestant localities telling the electors there that they would be false to their religion and false to everything if they would go out and vote for a candidate of my choice and of the choice of those associated with me for the reason that they claimed that I had ever been guilty of being too friendly and too generous to the Roman Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba. Let me say here and now that there never was a time and there never was a place in the history of my public life when I did not plead guilty to that charge, and I stand here in the presence of this House and before the people of this country and say I plead guilty to that charge. And I plead guilty, Mr. Speaker, because I do not expect to live to see the day when, as a public representative in this Parliament or elsewhere, I will ever be guilty of anything else than fairness and generosity to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba or to the Roman Catholic minority of any other part of Canada or of any nationality or of any creed or of any race in any part of our Dominion.

Not alone did we have these articles, an example of which I have quoted to the House, but we had representative friends of the right hon. gentleman opposite, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, going up and down that constituency, carrying, as they claimed, messages from the right hon. gentleman himself. Let me quote you some of the statements that were made in this connection:

Extract from speech delivered by G. Boyer, M.P., at St. Eustache in Macdonald election.

(Translated from the French).

Now, ladies and gentlemen, I bring to you a message from the province of Quebec the native place of several of you. You all know that the province of Quebec has remained faithful to the great patriot who was, last fall, deprived of power by a wave of fanaticism. More than ever, the Liberal leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier is loved and honoured by all, Conservatives and Liberals, and to-day a large number of French-Canadian Conservatives regret the unfortunate ballot that they have cast against one of their compatriots to sweep him out of power. The message that I am bringing to you from the greatest French-Canadian who has given lustre to our country is the request for your support in his policy of progress and prosperity. We must be proud of our race and vote for the man who has brought such glorious fame to his French-Canadian countrymen. Do not forget, you halfbreeds who hear me, that in years, past, that great champion of your rights has again and again in the House of Commons, expressed his sympathy for you, while all that time, the Conservatives have done their utmost to take away what you held most sacred; they have dragged your beloved chief into jail, they have betrayed him in order to bring him to the scaffold.

When you are making your ballot on the 12th, remember that Riel was hanged by the government of Alex. Morrison.

These were the words spoken by Mr. G. Boyer, M.P. for Vaudreuil. Now, let me quote you certain statements made by another hon. gentleman in support of the candidate of the Opposition; these words were spoken at Notre Dame de Lourdes on October 10, 1912:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that great statesman, that illustrious leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid of whom all Canadians are proud and whose name is pronounced with pride and justly so, by all those who have French blood in their veins, has spent the energy of a powerful life in order to better the lot of the farmer. . .

Thank God! the cause for which he fought has not perished. No, reciprocity is not dead. The interests of the farmer in this agricultural country cannot be lost sight of. Those interests can be the object of serious attacks, but the time is not far remote when the defender of the prosperity and liberty of the farmer shall again with increased strength be at the head of the Government. To you, farmers of Macdonald, I am speaking in his name. Let your vote be a message of sympathy and a proof of your co-operation with him in his struggle for the maintenance of your rights. Let it not be said that his French compatriots, who love, honour and respect him, who are justly proud of him, and proclaim him the most eminent of them all, let it not be said that they have forsaken him at the very time when he is the most solicitous for their welfare. Let them rally around him, let them stand by him till the day when again they shall hail him as the leader of our National destinies.

In the same speech the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe said:

The political party that has protected the interests of the citizens of French origin is not the Conservative party, (which is the instrument of the fanatical section of Ontario), but it is the Liberal party the leader of which is the greatest, the most patriotic, the most earnest Frenchman of all the Frenchmen in Canada.

These words were spoken by Mr. Gauthier, M.P. for St. Hyacinthe, at Notre Dame de Lourdes, and they form a sample of the campaign as waged in that particular contest. They made every appeal to race, to creed, and to passion. It is true that they discussed the question of reciprocity, as stated by the member for St. Hyacinthe, who made the speech I have quoted on the occasion named, and

I can understand my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) having very great difficulty in realizing that reciprocity was buried on the 21st September, 1911. It is true, Sir, that the right hon. gentleman undertook, a few months ago, to revive his reciprocity child. He made a little tour in the Province of Quebec, and in portions of the Province of Ontario, and he undertook to assure the people of these provinces that he was going to be able to resuscitate this child, and that his greatest hope of success lay in the nourishment that he could bring to it from Western Canada in particular. He so convinced himself, evidently, that this was possible, that he entrusted that reciprocity child to his first lieutenant, the hon. member for Edmonton, and he instructed him, with a large number of other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, to go into the constituency of Macdonald, and see what they could do in that regard. They went there, and presented the arguments, as instructed by the right hon. gentleman. They presented the resurrected corpse of reciprocity, but only to stand by on the 12th of October and witness its reburial at the hands of the intelligent electors in that constituency. I am only sorry that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did not carry out his intention to visit Western Canada, because, in connection with the issue of the writ for the election in Macdonald, I was particularly careful, according to my understanding of his proposed programme, to fix the date of that election at a time that would be convenient for him to be present in order that he might have an opportunity on the 12th day of October to administer the unholy rites of his party to that baby that was being buried five times deeper than ever before by the intelligent electors of that constituency. We may have an opportunity at some future period, however; because, so far as reciprocity is concerned, so far as the record of this Government is concerned, so far as the general welfare and general policy of this Dominion are concerned, from now on we propose to go before the intelligent electors of this Dominion in every constituency that becomes open, and there we shall be willing and ready to test the will of the people upon the questions of the day. We shall be prepared to meet the right hon. gentleman, and those that surround him, on any question of policy that they will undertake to put forward at any time, and we will do so, not after the fashion of hon. gentlemen opposite, but upon the ground of our general administration. We will stand by the grand old National Policy of Macdonald, upon which has been built the great and glorious Dominion of which we are all so proud to day. By that policy we are prepared to stand or fall, in any constituency, in any part of Canada, be it east or west. We are unike hon. gentlemen in this respect, that they have one policy for the West, and another policy for the East; one policy for one race, and another policy for another race. When we went into the contest in Macdonald, we did not go, as hon. gentlemen opposite expected we would, apologizing for reciprocity. I had occasion to say in Montreal a short time before that election that there was no honest sentiment in favour of reciprocity in Western Canada. This statement of mine appeared to be seized upon by hon. gentlemen opposite, and it was used, in season and out of season, in Western Canada; but we stood by that statement, and our friends in Western Canada stood by it. We went before them and used the same words in Macdonald as we used in Montreal. In my first speech in the Macdonald contest I not only made it clear that in my judgment there was no sentiment in favour of reciprocity, but I undertook to deny in the strongest language possible that reciprocity carried any advantage to the farmers or the farming community of Western Canada. On the contrary, I pointed out that no part of this Dominion had profited more by rejecting reciprocity than that same western country. Those were the arguments which were advanced and upon which we won the magnificent victory which we did win upon that particular occasion. In advancing those arguments with regard to the economic position of the Canadian people as it has been built up and established under the National Policy, I was able there, as I am here to-day, to support my statement with a witness who will carry the confidence in that respect of the people of all parts of this Dominion. I was able in that contest to support those arguments and that statement by speech delivered by Mr. Woodrow Wilson, Democratic candidate at that time, in the great Republic to the south of us, and now the newly elected President of the United States. Speaking at New Haven on the 28th of September last, Mr. Wilson used the following language:

> I was very much interested in some of the reasons given by our friends across the Canadian border for being very shy about the reciprocity arrangements. They said: 'We were not sure where these arrangements will lead, and we do not care to associate too closely with the economic conditions of the United States until these conditions are as modern as ours. When I resented this and asked particulars, I had to retire from the debate because I found that they had adjusted their economic development to conditions which we had not yet found a way to meet in the United States.'

If we have these favourable economic conditions within our Dominion, then again I claim that it is due to the grand policy laid down by Macdonald and Cartier upon which we have built up the great nation that excites the admiration of our friends to the south of us and draws from the President the language which I have just quoted. That is the policy that triumphed in Macdonald, and that is the policy that will triumph in almost every constituency throughout Canada.

Now, let me come to another point. Hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to apologize for their defeat by making statements which are not warranted by the facts. They undertake, not alone by their own statements, but through their reptile press from one end of Canada to another, to make assertions with respect to certain arrests that were made in that constituency that are unjust, unfair, and untrue. From my knowledge of the conditions, I make the statement that no arrest was made in that constituency that was not fully and completely justified by the circumstances at that time. It is true that a mistake may have been made through the generosity—

Some hon. MEBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS: I will ask my hon. friends to wait and see whether they will say 'hear, hear' when I have finished my sentence. It is true that a mistake may have been made, or that, through generosity, some of the persons in Manitoba who had in charge the prosecutions did not, out of sympathy, carry them to a conclusion. Hon. gentlemen undertook to cite here the evidence of individuals who were arrested, and they dwelt more upon one case than upon any other. I am not going to weary the House by citing long affidavits in all of the cases, but I am going to give one or two in order that hon. gentlemen may understand the circumstances, that the House will have a knowledge of the conditions and circumstances, and that the people may understand the misrepresentations that have been made throughout the country by the reptile press of hon. gentlemen opposite. Especial mention has been made of the arrest of one W. B. Sifton. In order that this House may fully understand the circumstances and conditions, let me tell you who Mr. W. B. Sifton is. Mr. W. B. Sifton is an individual who was employed by the Government of the right hon. gentlemen opposite and paid a handsome salary out of the public treasury for years and who practically performed no service save and except to go about the country debauching the half-breed vote in different localities. Hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the time of the House in reading certain affidavits; let me read one or two in this connection. The first which I shall read is sworn to by Mr. Thomas Stedman than whom no more respectable, no more honourable, citizen lives in the city of Winnipeg to-day. What does he swear to?

Canada,
Province of Manitoba,
To wit:

In the matter of the Dominion Elections Act and of a by-election in the electoral district of Macdonald, in the province of Manitoba, held on October 12, 1912.

I. Thomas Stedman, of the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, merchant, make oath and say as follows:—

That on Thursday, October 10, 1912, I registered at the Lake View Hotel in the village of St. Laurent, in the said electoral district of Macdonald, and received word that several men were located there working in the then existing election campaign in the interests of the Liberal party. The names of these men I learned were Davis, Jerome and Sifton, and I shortly got in touch with the three men when I noticed they were working most energetically among the French half-breeds, of whom there are a great number in that district. I also saw and was convinced that William Sifton was the leader of these men and saw him spending money very freely in the hotel supplying all and sundry half-breeds with liquor, and I was informed by a number of said half-breeds that the said Sifton had promised them money if they would vote for and use their influence in favour of the candidature of Robert Lorne Richardson, the independent Liberal candidate.

I know that the said Sifton remained at the Lake View Hotel, in the village of St. Laurent, all of that night, and early on Friday morning saw him gather together many of the half-breeds whom he had been with the previous day and take them into the bar of the hotel and purchase liquor for them. He remained in the same bar-room and continued all morning until noon to purchase liquor for these breeds. He was talking to them all the time in the native language of the said half-breeds, which is the Saulteux tongue of the native nations.

I questioned a half-breed by the name of William Ducharme on the morning of Friday, the 11th day of October, 1912, as to what had transpired between himself and the said William Sifton, and he, the said half-breed, in the presence of others stated to me that the said Sifton had offered him the sum of twenty-five dollars ($25) if he, the said Ducharme, would use his vote and influence in favour of the candidature of the said Robert Lorne Richardson, the independent Liberal candidate. Subsequently the said Ducharme also told me that the said Sifton had instructed him to rent a house for the use of the Liberal party and that the said Sifton had sent to said house large quantities of intoxicating liquors, food, tobacco, &c.

I saw the said Sifton take a half-breed named Augustian Chaboyer aside and talk to him and afterwards in the presence of others, questioned this said Chaboyer when he stated that the said Sifton had offered him twenty-five dollars ($25) to vote for the said Richardson, to be paid that evening on arrival of train from Winnipeg, and that the said Sifton had informed him that five thousand dollars ($5,000) was to be spent in that district in the interests of the said Richardson.

I also questioned a half-breed by the name of Baptiste Lagimodière on that occasion and on several occasions since and have been informed by the said Baptiste Lagimodière that the said Sifton gave to him a sum of money and a quantity of intoxicating liquors in order to induce him, the said Lagimodière, to vote for and use his influence in favour of the election of the said Robert Lorne Richardson.

I saw the said William Sifton draw aside the said half-breed Baptiste Lagimodière and hand to him two envelopes. This occurred on the front steps of the said Lake View Hotel and he, the said Sifton, at the same time spoke to the said Lagimodière in the Saulteux tongue.

Sworn before me at the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, this 21st day of November, A.D. 1912.

N. Cox Stewart,
A Commisisoner in B. R., &c.

THOMAS STEDMAN.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me read another affidavit from a gentleman who like Mr. Stedman is a man of honour, highly respected in the city of Winnipeg. This is the affidavit:

Canada,
Province of Manitoba,
To wit:

In the matter of the Dominion Elections Act and of a by-election in the electoral district of Macdonald, in the province of Manitoba, held on October 12, 1912.

I, Herbert Jarvis, of the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, private detective, make oath and say as follows:—

That on Monday, October 7th, 1912, I registered at the Lake View hotel in the village of St. Laurent in the said electoral district of Macdonald and received word that several men were located there working in the then existing election campaign in the interests of the Liberal party. The names of these men I learned were Davis, Jerome and Sifton and I shortly got in touch with the three men when I noticed they were working most energetically among the French half-breeds, of whom there are a great number in that district. I also saw and was convinced that William Sifton was the leader of these men and saw him spending money very freely in the hotel supplying all and sundry half-breeds with liquor, and I was informed by a number of said half-breeds that the said Sifton had promised them money if they would vote for and use their influence in favour of the candidature of Robert Lorne Richardson, the independent Liberal candidate.

I questioned a half-breed by the name of William Ducharme on the morning of Friday the 11th day of October, 1912, as to what had transpired between himself and the said William Sifton, and he, the said half-breed, in the presence of others stated to me that the said Sifton had offered him the sum of twenty-five dollors ($25) if he, the said Ducharme, would use his vote and influence in favour of the candidature of the said Robert Lorne Richardson, the independent Liberal candidate. Subsequently the said Ducharme also told me that the said Sifton had instructed him to rent a house for the use of the Liberal party and that the said Sifton had sent to said house large quantities of intoxicating liquors, food, tobacco, &c.

I saw the said Sifton take a half-breed named Augustian Chaboyer aside and talk to him and afterwards in the presence of others, I questioned this said Chaboyer when he stated that the said Sifton had offered him twenty-five dollars ($25) to vote for the said Richardson to be paid that evening on arrival of train from Winnipeg, and that the said Sifton had informed him that five thousand dollars $5,000) was to be spent in that district in the interests of the said Richardson.

I saw the said William Sifton draw aside the said half-breed Baptiste Lagimodière and hand to him two envelopes. This occurred on the front steps of the said Lake View hotel and he, the said Sifton, at the same time spoke to the said Lagimodière in the Saulteux tongue.

Sworn before me at the city of Winnipeg in the province of Manitoba, this 21st day of November, A.D. 1912.

F. Dobbs,
A Commissioner in B. R., &c.

HERBERT JARVIS.

I may remark that Mr. Sifton was not even a resident of the constituency. He was one of these who are imported by hon. gentlemen opposite for the purpose, as I have said, of debauching the electors and half-breeds of Macdonald. More than that I repeat what I said a moment ago, that for years he was able to live at the expense of the people of Canada, and his principal occupation was carrying out this particular work throughout different parts of the West. He was an experienced individual in that way. I will read an affidavit from a man who was offered money himself at the hands of this Mr. Sifton. The affidavit says:

Canada,
Province of Manitoba.
In the matter of the Dominion Elections Act and of a by-election in the electoral district of Macdonald, held on October the 12th, 1912, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown by the member elected on September the 21st, 1911.

I, Augustian Chaboyer, of the parish of St. Laurent, in the province of Manitoba, labourer, make oath and say:—

1. That on or about the 11th day of October, A.D. 1912, I, being an elector of the electoral district of Macdonald aforesaid, was approached by one William Sifton, who is well known to me and who in my own language, which is the Soto tongue of the natives of Manitoba known as Indians, offered to pay me for my vote and influence in the election then immediately about to be held, and did give to me in order to induce me to assist him in having elected the candidate Robert Lorne Richardson several drinks of whiskey or other intoxicating liquors.

2. That the said William Sifton offered to pay me a sum of money if I would work and use my influence in the interests of the candidature of the said Robert Lorne Richardson, who was a candidate at the election then immediately about to be held.

Sworn before me at the parish of St. Laurent, in the province of Manitoba, this 24th day of October, A.D. 1912.
J. M. J. MULVIHILL,
A Commisisoner in B. R., &c.
AUGUSTIAN CHABOYER.

Mr. CARVELL: Does that affidavit state that the half-breed took the money.

Mr. ROGERS: He took the whiskey.

Mr. NEELY: Why were these gentlemen not prosecuted?

Mr. ROGERS: I have told the hon. gentleman already why they were not prosecuted, and I will tell him again. Sifton has been regarded as a public nuisance in that province for years, and if he was not prosecuted it was not because there was not abundance of evidence against him on which to base a prosecution——

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Will the hon. gentleman permit me——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not want to ask a question if the minister does not want to give way. I was going to ask the minister why he does not initiate prosecutions now against this gentleman

Mr. ROGERS: If the hon. gentleman will wait a minute I will tell him. The hon. gentleman opposite told us here the other day that a protest had been entered against the election of the member for Macdonald, and I now tell these gentlemen opposite that a counter protest has been entered against their candidate, and we expect that the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite will be revealed to the public, and will not further be tolerated in this country. We are going to see that there shall be placed before the courts of the country a full and thorough examination of the records of the Liberals in that constituency.

I will not weary the House by reading more of these affidavits. Mention has been made of the arrest of a Mr. Sullivan who had been imported from the province of Saskatchewan. I wonder if hon. members from the province of Ontario ever heard that name 'Sullivan.' To those who recollect that name I would like to say that the gentleman who was arrested in Macdonald was no less a person than a nephew of old 'Cap.' Sullivan, the hope of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario for a great many years. And, as 'Cap.' Sullivan was the hope of the Liberal party in days past and gone, in the great province of Ontario, so the Sullivan arrested in Manitoba has been and is to-day the hope of the Liberal party in the province of Saskatchewan. And let me tell them that this man Sullivan operated in the recent elections in the province of Saskatchewan in such a manner as to put to shame all the efforts ever made on behalf of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario by the notorious 'Cap.' Sullivan. And I ask you this: When an individual of this kind would come into the province of Manitoba, register under an assumed name, and undertake to go down into the county of Macdonald and start to operate, was it not the first duty of the officers of the law of that province to place such an individual as that into custody? I say it was. And I say the same applies in the case of every arrest that was made in that connection. But now we are going to have them before the courts, and we will make clear the reasons why these men were arrested. In every case there has been complete justification for the action taken by the officers of the law as I understand it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Let us have some proof.

Mr. ROGERS: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to ask about Richelieu? If so, I shall be glad to deal with that matter.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I never mentioned the word 'Richelieu.' What I did say, and I—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member ought to know that he has no right to interrupt a member who has the floor.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): May I ask the hon. Minister (Mr. Rogers) a question?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I merely made the suggestion that it would be quite proper for the hon. Minister (Mr. Rogers) to give us some evidence of irregularities having been practised by this man Sullivan, and not ask hon. gentlemen on this side to accept the minister's word as to irregularities.

Mr. ROGERS: I promised hon. gentlemen in my opening remarks, that at an early day I would discuss everything connected with the Saskatchewan election. I will take advantage of a future opportunity to discuss the record of the hon. gentleman's friend Sullivan to his entire satisfaction.

The other day the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made a rather specific charge against myself in connection with the election held in Richelieu, and I ask the attention of the House for a moment or two while I deal with his remarks in that connection. He said:

> My hon. friend is ambitious in this respect. He had gone to Saskatchewan in the summer; he came to Quebec later on.

In making that statement the right hon. gentleman says what is absolutely incorrect.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What statement?

Mr. ROGERS: That I had gone to Saskatchewan in the summer. I was not in Saskatchewan during the time of the election. Again the right hon. gentleman has been led astray by the reptile press that supports him up and down this country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have some recollection of having read a speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) delivered at a banquet in Regina.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite right. It is true, I was in Regina, but it was long before the writs for the election were issued.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROGERS: Do hon. gentlemen opposite mean to say that I have no right to go to Regina if I please? I did visit Regina, but it was long before the writs were issued. The right hon. gentleman continued:

> He came to Richelieu, not himself, personally, but by proxy; he sent a proxy to Richelieu, and the proxy came with his hands full of promises of public works if the electors would vote for the Conservative candidate, Mr. Morgan. I again charge the Minister of Public Works, and I arraign him before Parliament, with having tried to bribe the electors of Richelieu. I call as witness a member of this House, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) and I say, on the word of the hon. member for Charlevoix, that he was sent by the Minister of Public Works to Richelieu to try and bribe the electors. I shall not use my own words; I have the words of Sir Rodolphe Forget published in La Patrie.

Now, that article, as quoted by the hon. gentleman and printed in 'Hansard,' will not in any particular bear out the argument he advanced in support of the charge he made on that occasion. It may be true, —it is true—that the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) went to the constituency of Richelieu. That hon. gentleman is quite able to take care of himself either in the constituency of Richelieu or in this House. But the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) charged me with making a promise by proxy or in some other form that a marine railway should be built in the town of Sorel in the county of Richelieu. Let me tell my right hon. friend, and tell this House and this country, what truth there is in that statement. It was not until weeks after the election in Richelieu that I had ever heard that a marine railway was proposed or expected to be built in Richelieu. I had never been spoken to about it,—never heard of it, neither the hon. member for Charlevoix nor anybody else had mentioned the matter to me. Yet we have the right hon. gentleman standing in this House and making such statements—misled again by the statements appearing in his reptile press from one end of the country to the other. It is true that there was a time in the history of Canada when the Liberal press of this country had some sense of decency and were guided in their statements by some sort of principle. But that day was before the right hon. gentleman undertook to guide his party in this Dominion. He would be a bold man who would say that, to-day, principle or truth finds much place in the papers that support the right hon. gentleman in every part of this Dominion.

I am prepared to leave this case before the House and the country. We went into the constituency of Macdonald and carried it by an overwhelming majority. That victory was due to the intelligence of the electors of that constituency.

Mr. PROULX: So was our victory in Richelieu.

Mr. ROGERS: Richelieu was carried by the hon. gentlemen opposite a year ago by a majority of over 750, and they had practically no opposition in the fight; but in this contest the majority fell by over 500 We are all human, Sir, and all make mistakes, and the Government made a mistake in not going to Richelieu and advocating the National Policy, which in no part of Canada should be better received than in the constituency of Richelieu. If that policy had been presented by the most humble member of this Government, I am satisfied we would have returned with another scalp from the hon. gentlemen opposite, and when the time comes, if vacancies occur in other constituencies, we will be there, and we will be there at the close of the contest to see the right hon. gentleman and those who assist him play the part of the chief mourners in a further downfall of their unholy policy, by which they have endeavoured to fool the people of Canada for the past fifteen years. I am prepared to leave the amendment to the judgment of this House, and to the intelligent consideration of the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, this House has been treated during the last hour to the most remarkable exhibition that it has witnessed I believe, since 1867—an exhibition of blow and bluster, and threats, that the press shall be throttled; that hordes of detectives and police shall be brought into every constituency in the country when elections are taking place; and my hon. friend wants this House to take these statements as argument.

I will try to answer some of the statements of my hon. friend which, to my mind at least, seem to bear a semblance of argument; but before dealing directly with the subjects mentioned by my hon. friend, I wish to deal very briefly with the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which refers to the naval question. I do this, because of a very significant paragraph appearing in the 'Citizen' of this morning and, I presume, in the other papers, although I have not had an opportunity of examining them. I find that in the Imperial Parliament yesterday the Government was asked by a member of the House of Commons certain questions as to the subject matter of the Speech from the Throne delivered by His Royal Highness the Governor General. The answer of Mr. Asquith is as follows:

> Hon. Mr. Asquith's reply was purely noncommittal. Memorandum had been prepared at the express wish of the Canadian Government, which defined with fulness and precision the position adopted by the Imperial Government. This would be laid before the House without delay, but must first go before the Canadian Government.

I do not know whether in the transmission of this statement the word 'government' was used for 'parliament.' However, I presume it is of no great importance, because the British Premier says, 'I will lay them before the British public,' therefore I assume the Canadian Premier will lay them before the Canadian public. When we receive the statement which he has brought back from England, it will be the duty of every member of this House, and of every voter in the country, to judge for himself as to whether or not an emergency exists, and as to whether the policy which the Government intend bringing down should or should not be adopted. I have, therefore, no further comment to make upon the naval question. I am happy to say that this question will be discussed in the full light of all the information which these gentlemen have been parading throughout the country that they have been receiving from the British Admiralty, and which, as my hon. friend the Postmaster General in his paper the other day said, was absolutely confidential—so confidential that it could not be given to the public, 'but,' they said, 'take our word for it, an absolute case of emergency exists.'

Mr. PELLETIER: I never said that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. CARVELL: 'Take it back'—that is a bad habit on the other side, it is chronic. My hon. friend's paper said it, and what is the difference?

I come now to deal very briefly with the amendment proposed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, an amendment which in, my opinion, contains more real venom to the square inch than any document I ever before heard in the House of Commons—an amendment which says that in the elections of Macdonald and Richelieu there were practices calculated to terrorize and corrupt the electorate, which were connived at by His Majesty's ministers. I am sorry my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) is leaving, because I have a few words to say about this tyranny.

We have listened this afternoon to an hour's defence of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, who without a doubt is charged as being the arch-priest of all this tyranny which has taken place in this constituency of Macdonald. We have listened to his explanation of the matter, and what do we find? We find two affidavits, one by Stedman and one by Jarvis, which would not be admitted for one moment in any court of law—two affidavits which are nothing but hearsay, excepting in so far as one of the affidavits states that the deponent saw Mr. Sifton speaking to certain electors in the county of Macdonald. If that is a crime, that statement would be allowed in a court of law, but everything else in the affidavits is, 'somebody told me something'—somebody told him that they had offered money, and that one man had received $25. In the affidavit of one man, it is stated that he was given a drink of whisky and offered some money which he would not take. Think of all the men in the province of Manitoba who would not take the $25 when it was offered to them. But I will tell you what the affidavit did not state: It did not tell how much the half-breed got for giving the affidavit. We are not trying to defend Mr. Sifton. If Mr. Sifton attempted to corrupt the half-breeds of the province of Manitoba, he should be punished. If Mr. Sullivan, Mr. Prince, Mr. Walkinshaw, or any other man attempted to corrupt the electors of the province of Manitoba, they should be punished. What we are complaining of, and what the people of this country are complaining of—and no man knows it better than the hon. Minister of Public Works—is the arbitrary, unfair, unBritish, unCanadian attempt to throttle and control the people of the constituency by a horde of detectives and hirelings of the government, practices which would not be tolerated in Russia, let alone in Canada, and the Minister comes here and reads an affidavit of one of the criminals who says: I saw this man talking to different voters, and I believe there was something crooked.

Let us follow this for a moment. I shall not reread these affidavits, but I shall briefly describe what took place in each case. Take the case of Walkinshaw. The Minister of Public Works put up the biggest bluff I ever saw this afternoon in the House when he told us he had affidavits regarding the arrest of Walkinshaw, Prince and Sullivan, but will refer to them some other time. Mr. Speaker, he has not got them.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): Yes, he has.

Mr. CARVELL: And he knows he has not got them.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): Yes, he has.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, come off. I am talking to the empty seat of the Minister of Public Works. I do not want any of the back-benchers to interrupt when I am talking to the Minister of Public Works. When they have got their affidavits we will discuss them.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): Do not get excited.

Mr. CARVELL: Now we will discuss the case of Walkinshaw. Walkinshaw was a British subject, a resident of Ontario, a man who entered the constituency of Macdonald. He had as much right there as had the Minister of Public Works or any other citizen of Canada. I am surprised at the doctrine put forward by the Minister of Public Works and cheered to the echo by his followers when he says that this man was not a resident of Macdonald and, therefore, had no right to be in the constituency. We might say that about the Minister of Public Works himself. He is not a resident of the constituency of Macdonald, but we do not deny his right to be there; we do not deny the right of any citizen, let him be British or anything else. I may be running now contrary to my friend from Simcoe, but this is a free country, and any man has a right to go into a constituency and, by legitimate argument, convince people to vote his way if he can. Mr. Walkinshaw went in there, he was shadowed for a number of days and finally was arrested at a place some distance from Winnipeg, I think north of Rothwell. He was arrested by a provincial detective or constable. He was taken to jail, his person was searched, his papers were pilfered from his possession, his money was taken away from him, his watch was taken away from him, he was taken into a cell, and he was stripped to the pelt like a murderer for fear he might have weapons concealed about him. He was compelled to put his clothes on a bench in a corridor and leave them all night. Then he was taken from that town to Winnipeg. He tried to see his solicitor. His solicitor came to the jail and he was told by the jailer he would have an opportunity of seeing his solicitor on his way to the train. He was at once taken into another room, he was taken out of a side door and put in an automobile and switched off to the railway station and the solicitor was left behind. He was brought to the station at Winnipeg and taken to Portage about sixty miles away. There he was put in prison again and there he was measured and photographed and weighed, all particulars were taken of him as they would be of a crook from the city of New York. He was kept there and finally was taken before a magistrate. He demanded bail and they said they could not give it to him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You should tell the House that he had counsel all this time.

Mr. CARVELL: I tell the House that his counsel were not allowed to see him and his counsel never saw him until he came into court on Saturday afternoon, according to the affidavit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had no part in my professional capacity in this matter, but I live in Portage la Prairie, and I am——

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend wants to ask a question——

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am aware he had counsel.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. CARVELL: Take what back? He was never allowed to see his counsel and was brought into court on Saturday afternoon, the afternoon of the election. He wanted bail, but could not get it and was sent back to jail, and was kept there till eight o'clock in the evening and after that hour, when the election was all over, he was allowed bail. He was brought into court the next week. The government had no evidence to offer against him and he was dismissed with an honourable acquittal. This is his narrative of what took place——

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CARVELL: It must hurt my hon. friend or he would not writhe under it the way he does. I do not propose that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) shall make a speech while I am making mine.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CARVELL: I claim the floor and I want to tell my hon. friend I do not wonder that he writhes under the narration of these facts because I will do him the credit to say that I think he is one man from Manitoba who, under ordinary circumstances, would like to be a gentleman and I do not wonder that he writhes under the narration of this unBritish treatment meted out to another British subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am rising to a point of order, if I can make my voice heard above the furore of my hon. friend. I take the point of order because the hon. member made a statement, and of my own knowledge I corrected what he said.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not a point of order, and I object to my hon. friend being allowed to go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: It is not a point of order, and I object.

Mr. SPEAKER: If I understand, the hon. member made a statement which the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), of his own personal knowledge, denies, which denial, as I understand the rule, it was not only the right but the duty of the hon. member (Mr. Carvell) to accept.

Mr. CARVELL: I am willing to bow to the ruling of the Chair. If I had made a statement about the hon. member himself, and he rose to make a personal statement, your ruling would be correct, but, Sir, I was not referring to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie at all, but to Walkinshaw, who was put in jail in Portage la Prairie, according to the affidavit. That is all I am doing.

We come next to the case of the man Prince, another man who was not mentioned by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), another man who he would try to make you believe was a thug and a crook, and against whom he had affidavits which he did not dare to produce. And then he would like you to take his statement and the statement of his comembers and—I will not say reptile press but Manitoba press, which means about the same thing—that these men are crooked and not entitled to the treatment of British subjects in the province of Manitoba. If he could say that because Walkinshaw was a British subject residing in the province of Ontario, he was debarred from taking a part in the election in Macdonald, he could not make that charge against Mr. Prince, because Mr. Prince is a British subject, and a resident of the city of St. Boniface, which is just across the river from the city of Winnipeg, and which, I am informed, is not more than three or four miles beyond the confines of the constituency of Macdonald. Prince was a student-at-law, a man, I should judge, of more than ordinary intelligence, because, when they tried to coerce him into pleading guilty by holding out promises of mercy and pardon, the young man refused to do so, and they did not get a confession from him. This man Prince was arrested at a point near Cardinal—I have forgotten the exact place—and was taken to jail at Cardinal. But before he was arrested, or at the time he was arrested, he attempted to telephone to headquarters at Winnipeg. He went to the telephone and rang up Winnipeg, but the Tory detective, or provincial constable, snatched him away from the telephone, and said, 'You cannot telephone.' It was a Tory Government telephone. Fortunately, or unfortunately for the Tory party, at that very moment, he was called up on the telephone by some other party, and his captors—I cannot use any other word——

An hon. MEMBER: Kidnappers.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, kidnappers is a better word—not knowing who was calling him, and not dreaming that he was called by headquarters at Winnipeg, allowed him to go to the telephone, and he was able to tell his friends at Winnipeg that he had been arrested and was in durance vile at the hands of the political heelers of Manitoba. They told him they were going to take him to Winnipeg, and at Winnipeg friends were waiting for him with solicitors and bail. But he was taken only half way to Winnipeg, to a place called Somerset, and thence to a place called Miami, and from there, by horse and carriage, he was conveyed 18 miles across country and lodged in jail at Morden. He was kept there for two or three days—two days, I think; he was fed on porridge without any cream or milk, dry bread without any butter, and drank tea without milk or sugar. He was treated as a political prisoner would not be treated in Russia. The night he was put in jail he was waited on by Detective Ross, the man who had kidnapped him, and was charged with violating the provisions of Section 269 of the Election Act, which is the section relating to undue influence, that is, he was charged with making promises to an elector in order to induce him to vote, or to refrain from voting at the election. They told him, 'now, you had better plead guilty, because we have searched your papers, and we find in those papers certain names, and opposite one name the sum of $10, and that is proof positive that you were going to pay this elector $10; therefore, it is a very serious crime.' It is a fearful thing in Manitoba, apparently, for a man to have a document in his pocket with a man's name upon it and opposite it the sum of $10. They said, 'you had better plead guilty,' but he said: 'No, and more than that, you are lying when you say you found that document. You did not find that document among my papers.' A few minutes after that, he was waited upon by another Tory official, the jailer and the jailer pleaded with him to make the same confession, but he gave the same answer. A short time after that the Tory official next in importance, the hotelkeeper, came along. I think, Sir, I should apologize to the hotelkeeper; I think he is the man of first importance in the machine of Manitoba. Well, the hotelkeeper came along, and he repeated the same statements. He said: 'We have got you solid, we have got that name with $10 marked opposite it, and you had better plead guilty, and if so we will let you go.' Remember that this was the day before the election. He said, 'No, I will not do it,' and he was kept in jail all night, and the next morning the hotelkeeper appeared and repeated the suggestion. Still the young man refused to plead guilty when he was not guilty. Then he was taken before the Court, and he wanted bail. They would not give him bail, because they said this was a case of such terrible importance that it would never do to allow him bail. I think I am wrong about that; I think that was Walkinshaw. However, he was remanded then until Saturday, and they held him in durance until the election was over. The following week, on Wednesday or Thursday, he was brought up for trial, but no person appeared against him, and the Crown prosecutor said, 'We have no evidence,' and the man was honourably discharged; he received an honourable acquittal. And all this was done in free Manitoba.

Then we come to the evidence in the case of Sifton, in connection with which my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) read an affidavit this afternoon. They did not have the nerve to put Sifton in jail, or to search his pockets for money or papers, but they arrested him on Friday afternoon, the day before the election. He had in his possession, and they knew he had, the scrutineer's papers for the polls in that vicinity, and to prevent him from going out to organize the Liberal party, they held him until Saturday night. They urged him to plead guilty, and they would give him an acquittal, but he would not do so; and they held him till late at night, and finally let him go, on the personal guarantee of one of those sleuth hounds that he would appear at 10 o'clock on Monday morning. Then he met one of the Tory organizers, who said: 'I will fix that; I will telephone up to the police office; they will fix it up, and you will get your discharge,' and they gave him his liberty, not his discharge. They would not give him an honourable acquittal and he would not accept it, and he has not got his honourable acquittal yet. They dare not prosecute him.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: He is a cowardly man who says, 'Hear, hear,' when a man has his liberty taken away and they dare not prosecute.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think it is in order to use the term 'cowardly.'

Mr. CARVELL: If that is not a just reprimand—perhaps I should say it is a modest reprimand—I will withdraw it. Now, what does all this mean? I have as hurriedly as possible narrated the different processes by which those three men were arrested; deprived of their independence and their liberty, carried around from one jail in Manitoba to another, refused the right to see their solicitors, refused bail and a hearing, kept in durance until after the election, and then told to go about their business with the statement, 'We have nothing against you.' What does it all mean? Just what my hon. friend the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) at the opening of this debate declared: It means that in no other British country, probably in no other country in the world, would it be possible for a man's liberty to be so taken away as was done in the province of Manitoba on that accasion, and, I believe, on many previous occasions; because, from information I have received, it seems to be the settled policy and line of conduct of the Tory party in Manitoba during elections. My hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) shakes his head. He is getting wiser than he was half an hour ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have it in writing. I will show it to you soon.

Mr. CARVELL: What does it all mean? I have no fault to find if a man pleads guilty, or if he is prosecuted; but I want this House and the country to consider what it would mean in any province in Canada, outside of Manitoba, if a man arrested for murder, caught red handed in the act, were refused the advice of counsel. Can you conceive a condition of affairs like that, can you conceive a man being refused counsel no matter what charge might be laid against him? Every practising lawyer in this House knows that the first thing any man charged with a crime does is to send for his solicitor, and here is not a jailer, a sheriff, or a public official in Canada, outside of Manitoba, who would for a moment dare to refuse a man the right to see and have the advice of counsel before he is brought up in court and asked to plead to an indictment. What does all this mean? All this means that there was without doubt an organized attempt in this election by the Tory government of Manitoba, aided, abetted and engineered by the Minister of Public Works to deprive these men of their liberty in order to strike terror into the heart of every Liberal worker in the constituency. It was not for the purpose of doing these men any injury; they had no feeling against these men, but it was to drive every Liberal worker out of the country until the election was over.

An hon. MEMBER: Drive the crooks out.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it was to drive honest men out of the constituency and they did drive honest men out. I ask any hon. gentleman to conceive a condition of affairs like that in his constituency. Take the case of my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier)—shadowed for seven or eight days, his room in his hotel broken open, his grip ransacked and turned inside out! I want every hon. gentleman to try and imagine a condition which would exist in his own constituency if the local government should attempt to arrest every man who was suspected of having documents upon him that might constitute some evidence for or against a political party at the time an election was in progress, and keep him in custody like any criminal until the election was over. Would it not drive every respectable man out of the constituency? Would not every respectable man be afraid to work for his candidate? Human beings do not appreciate being arrested and carried from one jail to another in this way. But, they accomplished their purpose and the Minister of Public Works has the nerve to come down here this afternoon and say that this was a decisive defeat for reciprocity.

I do not find fault with the officials of Manitoba who did this. The magistrates, the constables and all the machine from the leaders down do not want to do this; they are human beings, and they are actuated by the same ideas of humanity and mercy as are other people. I call to witness every lawyer in this House that one of the hardest things we have to do is to get officials to carry out the law sometimes as rigorously as we would like to have them do it. These men are not the culprits; these men are only the gun men who carry out the orders of their superiors. They are only the Lefty Louies, the Gyp the Bloods, the Dago Franks of Roblin and his government and of the Minister of Public Works. That is the ground upon which we complain of this transaction; that is the charge we make against the Tory party. It is that they deprived innocent men of their liberty in order to completely block and break up the organization of their opponents in the election, to drive them out of the constituency and thus to win the election by unfair means. The Minister of Public Works now comes down with his defence and what does he do? He brings the affidavits of two of his gun men and wants to justify his conduct by their affidavits and evidence. He might better have relied on the evidence of Lefty Louie and Dago Frank than to rely upon his gun men.

I have talked longer on this point than I intended to; but I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that this is something unique in the history of Canada, outside of Manitoba, and I hope we shall give this matter such an airing and that the newspapers will give it such an airing that it will never happen again in Manitoba. If reciprocity is not popular in Manitoba, then let the electors say so. If our hon. friends opposite think that their policies are better than ours, they have the right to advance them by every lawful means; but they have no right to deprive any British subject of his liberty in order to throttle the free expression of the electorate of any constituency.

Upon the order paper I find a notice of motion, which is something new, foreshadowing the introduction of a Bill which, to my mind, is a deliberate attempt to introduce the dishonest methods and practices of the Macdonald election into every constituency in Western Canada. I noticed in the Citizen of yesterday morning, and in other Conservative papers, the statement that a Bill was to be introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister to extend the Mounted Police Act. If there is an organization in Canada of which every member of this House and every citizen of Canada, who has taken the trouble to follow affairs in this country, is proud, it is the Mounted Police. So long as my hon. friends want to increase the Mounted Police I do not think there is a man in Canada who will raise his voice in protest. To the proposal to double, quadruple, or multiply it by ten, every man will say 'well done,' and we will give our hearty consent, but this clipping makes a statement in which I see a danger. In the concluding paragraph are these words:

A new departure will be a clause providing for the use of plain clothes men in connection with the mounted police. The need for this has been very evident in tracking down persons wanted for murder and other grave offences in the scattered western settlements, especially in view of the presence of so many communities of foreigners.

If there is anything in the literature of Canada that stands out to the eternal credit of this country it is the doings of the Mounted Police in the last twenty-five or thirty years in tracking down criminals in that country. I think it was only a year ago that this House voted quite a large amount to the widow of one of those heroes who died at the post of duty in order to carry out his instructions. Every work of fiction that has been written on Western Canada in the last 25 or 30 years has had a mounted policeman as one of its heroes and the boast of Canada has been that no man could commit murder or a crime of any magnitude but he would be brought to justice by the Mounted Police, every member of which force wears His Majesty's uniform and the brass buttons that go with it. In fact, in so far as the foreigner is concerned, nothing will prove a greater terror to those who seek to break the law than the scarlet tunic and brass buttons of the mounted policemen. But these hon. gentlemen say: We want to extend the army of plain clothes men. More gun men, of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works to carry terror into the hearts of the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta when an election comes on because he cannot succeed under existing circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order to debate a notice on the paper, and I am afraid my hon. friend is very close to it.

Mr. CARVELL: I shall certainly keep myself within the rules of the House. If the Minister of Public Works just had the necessary amount of sand to sit here and listen to me, perhaps I might say a little more.

As to the Richelieu election, I have very little to say. It is a fight pure and simple between the Tories themselves, it is a fight between two, not back-benchers, but two of the leaders, it is a fight between the Minister of Public Works who is the real leader of the party and the belted knight who is the financial leader of the party in the province of Quebec. The belted knight says that Mr. Rogers sent him to Richelieu, and told him to tell the people that if they would elect the Conservative candidate he would give them a marine railway, and the Minister of Public Works says he did not. I do not care which of them is telling a—it might be unparliamentary to say what I have in my mind; but, at all events, I can say that I do not care which of them is in the error. I think perhaps if we all knew what took place in the Chateau Laurier the night before last, we would be able to discuss this a little more intelligently than we can now. But, it will no doubt come out in due time. Under any circumstances, it was a deliberate attempt to bribe a constituency and win an election by unfair means. I want to say again, that to my mind it is not to be compared with the iniquity of the campaign in Macdonald because there they were interfering with the right of the subject and in the Richelieu case they were only attempting to get people to vote by unfair and dishonourable methods.

There is another branch of the Speech from the Throne to which I wish to refer briefly, and I do so because of its introduction into this debate by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I refer to the trade question. There is a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which says the Government have attempted to increase our trade with the British West Indies, and I think British Guiana. I think I voice the sentiments of every Liberal in this House and in the country when I say we heartily concur in any attempt that may be made to increase our trade with the British West Indies or any portion of the British Empire. The only fault I find is that the Minister of Finance is blowing a good deal about what he has accomplished in this respect, and trying to convince the people of Canada that he is conferring on them a great benefit by making a trade agreement with a million or two of people who do not consume much, three-quarters of whom go practically half-naked for nearly nine months out of the twelve, people who do not buy clothing to any extent, because the climate does not require them to use much clothing, people who do not consume our food-stuffs, because they produce their own food-stuffs, a country with which last year our total trade amounted to only about four million dollars. Perhaps I am wrong in that, but that is my recollection.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I think my hon. friend is wrong. Speaking from memory, I think there is a trade of about fifteen million dollars a year between Canada and the West Indies.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no, not the British West Indies. That includes all the West Indies, and Cuba as well.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): My memory is that it includes just these colonies with which we have entered into a trade arrangement. I think the hon. gentleman will find that there is a very substantial trade between these colonies and Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: At all events, the matter is not worth talking about, when you think of the total trade of Canada. Whether it is four millions or fifteen millions, it is only a bagatelle. However, I wish the Government well in so far as they have gone in this direction. These gentlemen tell us also that they will negotiate a treaty with Australia, and I sincerely hope they may succeed in that. We must remember that Australia is producing largely the same products as we produce, and exporting to the same markets. However, that may be, if the Government can increase the trade between Canada and Australia and New Zealand, I trust they will succeed. In that statement, I believe I am again voicing the sentiments of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House. I have here a very significant statement in the last Weekly Report issued by the Trade and Commerce Department, at page 2138, which says:

Exportation of Butter.

The export of butter to Canada continues on a large scale. The Makura, sailing on October 25 takes approximately 10,000 boxes, and notice has been given by the Union Company that space has been reserved for upwards of 125,000 boxes for this season. It is interesting also to note that this office is constantly in receipt of communications from places as far east as Toronto asking for the name of butter shippers.

There is now a preferential trade to some extent with Australia and New Zealand, and I hope my hon. friends opposite may be able to go further, because when butter reaches the enormous price we are paying for it to-day—thirty-five cents a pound, I think, to the retailer in the large cities—

An hon. MEMBER: Forty cents.

Mr. CARVELL: Forty cents a pound, perhaps, when butter reaches that price, then all that the Canadian producer needs in the way of protection is the cost of transportation from Australia and New Zealand to the centre of Canada. When the Australian and New Zealand producer of butter chooses to send his butter to Canada rather than to Great Britain, to which the freight charges are very much less than they are to Canada, depend upon it, the price of butter here is more than it ought to be, and the consuming people of Canada are entitled to some amelioration in their condition in respect to the high cost of living and the burdens under which they are groaning. Therefore, I say success to the Government in endeavouring to increase our trade with Australia and New Zealand. But what becomes of the argument of the Minister of Finance and his friends just one year ago, that if the reciprocity treaty with the United States would go into force, one of the great troubles would be that this country would be flooded with cheap butter from Australia and New Zealand? Is there a member in this House, Liberal or Conservative, representing an agricultural constituency, who did not have that flung in his teeth on every platform? The greatest cry I met was that if we ratified that agreement, we would allow these articles to come in from Australia and New Zealand free of duty, and the Canadian farmer would be ruined. Now with true Tory consistency hon. gentlemen opposite start out to negotiate a trade treaty with Australia, and my statement to them is that they can extend the trade of this country just as freely as they like, and I will support them. The Minister of Finance interjected into this debate the question of reciprocity for what reason I do not know. It may have been that he thinks it is dead, and he wants to resurrect it. Well, if the reciprocity agreement, which means broader markets, less taxation and cheaper food for the toiling masses, and better markets for the producer—if that is what he wants to resurrect——

Mr. McCURDY: Is it dead?

Mr. CARVELL: If it is dead, as the hon. gentleman seems to think, then why does he want to resurrect it?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Did I not ask the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and hon. gentlemen opposite what position they took now? For legislation here is all that is necessary to bring that agreement into effect.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend (Mr. White, Leeds) will have patience for about two minutes, he will have the views of one of the members of the Opposition on that subject. I think he interjected this subject into the debate for another reason. I think that in the halo of glory in which he lives, in holy Toronto, and surrounded as he is by his manufacturing magnates, his banking magnates, his commercial magnates, and his transportation magnates, he rather wants us to resurrect reciprocity, having the idea that it may be to his benefit. Now, let me tell him, that so far as this humble member of the Opposition is concerned, I intend to resurrect reciprocity, and to talk reciprocity every time I get a chance, in this House and out of it, just so long as there is any possibility, in my opinion, of obtaining it. Let me tell him that, from my standpoint and the standpoint of millions of people in Canada reciprocity was good economically in January, 1911, it was good economically in September, 1911, it is good economically to-day, and will be good economically always. I want to tell him that he is living, I believe, in a fool's paradise. He cannot repeat, with all his money——

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Whose money?

Mr. CARVELL: The manufacturers' money, and the transportation magnates' money, and the American money, and the British Unionists' money;—with it all, he cannot resurrect the cry which he raised against reciprocity a year ago. He cannot do what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) charged the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with doing —he cannot again champion one policy in Quebec and another in Ontario. He will find he cannot again join together the Nationalists of Quebec and the Orangemen of Ontario. He and his friends are in power now, and must have some regard to consistency. He will find that he cannot crucify the leader of the Opposition)Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in Ontario because he is a Roman Catholic, and in Quebec because he is 'too British.' The Minister of Public Works talks about Liberals having one policy in one part of the country and another in another part of the country, and brings here garbled reports from his Tory papers in Manitoba to show the appeals made to the French people in that province. And after all what would the evidence show? Something of which every Conservative member of this House was guilty in the last campaign, with this difference, only that what these members said was one hundred per cent worse than could be conceived by any Liberal editor. We want to resurrect reciprocity.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, we do. And we want to resurrect more than that; we want to resurrect the British preference. We want to resurrect any policy which means cheaper food for the labouring classes of Canada; we want to resurrect any policy that will afford us a chance to discuss whatever will make for better economic conditions and a reduction of the cost of living in this country. My hon. friend (Mr. White, Leeds) surrounded by his followers, intoxicated with his own importance, grandiloquently turned to his followers, and, waving his hand as if to say, 'Do not cheer me too lengthly' asked: What have we lost by the rejection of reciprocity? I will tell him a few things that we have lost, but if I were to talk, as the Minister of Public Works said, until Christmas, I could not tell you all that we have lost.

An hon. MEMBER: You lost power.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes but we did not lose honour. We did not have to go down to Quebec and tell our people one story and to Ontario and tell our people there another. We do not have any faction fights in our party. But in the rejection of reciprocity we lost money and we lost it by the million. The people of this country will never know how many millions they lost. But I am going to tell you how a few millions were lost in the last year.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be more in keeping with orderly debate, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) would address the Chair.

Mr. CARVELL: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. I certainly supposed I had the right to address the Minister of Finance through you. But, of course, if you want me to repeat the words 'Mr. Speaker' in every sentence, I can do it. Now, Mr. Speaker, we lost power, and we lost money by the million.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL: No, we did not lose honour, but we lost power. When the question was raised, the day before yesterday, as to what we had lost, somebody remarked, 'you lost what George Lane lost.' Mr. George Lane is a cattle dealer in western Canada who appeared before a committee of the Senate last year and swore that, in one year's transactions, because of the lack of reciprocity, he himself personally lost between $40,000 and $50,000. The people of the great West lost millions of dollars last year by reason of the impossibility of marketing their wheat at any price, let alone the price they could have obtained had they been allowed access to the American market. During the last three months from the western part of the province of Ontario alone—and if my figures are wrong the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds) can correct me—there were exported to the United States between 200 and 300 carloads of cattle. These cattle must have been worth close to half a million dollars. And the farmers have been compelled to pay 27½ per cent on these cattle in order to get them into the American market, and so on these shipments alone these farmers of Ontario have lost over $100,000. From the province of Quebec and the Maritime provinces last year we exported hay of a total value of $6,375,000, and of that amount we sent to the United States $5,187,000 worth, upon which we paid the magnificent sum of $2,672,000 as duties into the American treasury. A gentleman sitting in this House to-day tells me that he himself paid into the American treasury in duties on hay alone $40,000 during the last fiscal year. A constituent of mine tells everywhere that during the last fiscal year he paid $50,000 in duties on hay alone which money might as well have gone into the pockets of my constituents.

An hon. MEMBER: Who pays the duty?

Mr. CARVELL: In the case of hay, the Canadian producer every time. And, on that point I call to witness the members of this House from Quebec and New Brunswick who live along the border. They know that what I say is true. The trade reports to-day show that all up and down the border hay is worth just four dollars a ton more in the United States than it is in Canada. I call to witness a statement made last May by a man from Cleveland, who after buying a quantity of hay in my constituency publicly declared that of all the fools he ever met in his life the farmer of New Brunswick was the worst, for fighting against reciprocity, because he himself had paid $20,000 into the treasury of the United States in duties on hay which might have gone into the pockets of my constituents.

I will tell my hon. friends what we have lost in Eastern Canada. We exported last year fish to the United States to the amount of $5,378,661, upon which—I have not got the exact figures, but I am safe in saying we must have paid a million dollars in duty. If the reciprocity agreement had gone through, the fishermen in the Maritime provinces would have saved that million dollars, and it would now be reposing in their own pockets. The lumbermen of Eastern Canada exported to all countries planks, boards, and scantling to the amount of $20,523,005. Of that amount they sent to the United States market lumber amounting to the enormous sum of $14,275,264, and they paid to the United States treasury in duties the sum of $1,031,181. If any man does not believe that, let him go to the border line and enter the lumber business, and he will very soon be convinced that the Canadian producer pays the duty to the very last farthing. We lost in laths alone the sum of about $127,000, which amount was paid in duty into the United States Treasury. We exported of laths to all countries an amount represented by $1,732,294; of that amount $1,654,822 went to the United States, and duty paid to the amount of $127,600. I myself paid some of that, and I know what is meant. If any man does not credit the statement, let him go into the lath business in the province of New Brunswick, and he will very soon find that it is the Canadian producer who pays every cent of the duty. Last year the value of shingles exported from Canada to the whole world amounted to $1,481,878; of that amount we sent $1,451,878 to the United States, on which we paid in duty the sum of $115,433. Again I say that anyone who does not accept that statement may go into the shingle business for himself in the Maritime provinces, and he will soon realize who pays the duty.

Coming to this year, I find the same set of figures existing in proportion. I have been able to obtain the figures for only the first five months of the present fiscal year, down to last August. I find that of hay we exported during that period an amount equal to $2,422,544; that $2,110,153 went to the United States, and on that duty was paid to the amount of $872,120. The value of potatoes exported to all countries during the five months abovementioned was $238,430; $101,203 went to the United States, on which duty was paid to the amount of $20,000. Of laths and shingles the same proportion holds good; of planks, boards and scantling, the same proportion applies, except that the figures are a little greater.

I have tried to give my hon. friends, as hurriedly as possible, some of the things that we have lost in failing to obtain the benefit of the reciprocity agreement with the United States. Will hon. gentlemen opposite tell we what we have gained? I would like to know if hon. gentlemen can direct the action of the House to one solitary point we have gained. My hon. friend says, that if we had adopted reciprocity, we would have lost our transportation routes, because trade would have been directed to other channels. He says further that this agreement would have been repealed in perhaps a couple of years by the United States, and we would have been back in our old position, but with our channels of trade disrupted, and in a worse position than they are at the present time. But I want to point out to my hon. friend that he must either have confined his energies to his own financial associates, or perchance he has forgotten the stock argument of his friends all over Canada as to the probable effect of the reciprocity agreement. From every platform in Canada, from every platform addressed by the right hon. Minister himself, it was deliberately stated that one of the greatest objections to reciprocity was that if we adopted this pact—which they claimed though only an agreement, was in reality a treaty—Canada would never be able to break herself away from its shackles. I wish to point out to every man within the sound of my voice, Liberals and Conservatives alike, that, in the province of New Brunswick, men holding high positions in the government of that province stated throughout the country, and even in my own county, that if we adopted this agreement, and later attempted to break away from it, the United States would declare war against us and force us to adhere to it. My hon. friend, with true Tory consistency, now says that the great objection to the agreement is that it could have been repealed by the United States in a year or two; that there was no permanency of tariffs connected with it; that, the business of our country being diverted to other channels, the abrogation of the treaty within two or three years would result in disruption of our trade. I ask the hon. Minister of Finance to explain this inconsistency.

Then it is said that we would have lost our transportation routes by going north and south instead of east and west. Does my hon. friend not know that there are over twenty railroads to-day running from Canada into the United States, and vice versa? The transportation routes are there; you cannot find fifty miles of the American boundary line, from the Ste. Croix to Vancouver, which is not crossed by a railway connecting Canada with the United States. The Canadian Pacific railway alone has six lines; all up and down the boarder there are transportation routes connecting Canada with the United States, and all in active operation. And why are they there at the present time? They are there now because, under the economical conditions at present existing, we are compelled to send our produce to the United States even in the face of an almost impassible tariff wall. They are there now because we have to use them. From the figures which I have presented to the House, it will be seen that practically all of our staple products go to the United States—one million dollars worth a day goes there. My hon. friend states that reciprocity would have diverted our traffic, but the very first international act of this Government after coming into power was to go down to these Yankees, and, on bended knees, beg them for God's sake to give them a chance to put their wheat through American territory. Truly they were dilatory about it; it was a bitter draught; but they swallowed the hemlock, and they got the concession. They were allowed to send their wheat into United States channels, but only in bond. It relieved only a part of the difficulty. It did not increase the price to the Canadian producers, but it gave them a chance to get their products out of the country. This year they have been a little wiser—a little bolder, perhaps, and they commenced a little earlier. Even before this Parliament met, they took their hats in their hands, went to Washington, and said: 'Please, Mr. President, give us a chance to send our wheat down here again. You were graciously pleased to do it last year, and it was a panacea for many of our ills; give us a chance to repeat it, and we will try to do better next time.' And yet the Minister of Finance said yesterday: 'Why, we have no objection to trading with the United States; whoever said we did not want to trade with the United States? We are perfectly willing you shall trade so long as you do it over tariff walls.' Their loyalty is oozing out of their finger-tips degree by degree, and I should not be surprised if, before the next election comes around, you will know why the Minister of Finance resurrected reciprocity. You will find him going down to Washington to try and make a reciprocity treaty, because my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is astute enough to know that reciprocity is just as good economically to-day as it was a year ago, and he knows it is the best policy economically which possibly can be proposed for Canada, outside of an increase in the British preference. That is why my friend has resurrected reciprocity.

In order to prevent the people of Canada rising in rebellion against this policy he says we are going to give you a panacea for all your ills, we have negotiated a reciprocity treaty with the British West Indies, and we are going to negotiate another one with Australia and New Zealand. For the edification of the Minister of Finance I shall give a few figures showing the enormous trade which we are doing with these countries, a trade which is going to be our salvation commercially, as compared with this trade with the United States.

Of hay, last year, we sent to the United States, $5,187,727 worth. We sent to the British West Indies and Guiana $16,102 worth, one trainload, and we sent to Australia and New Zealand the magnificent sum of $449. I presume that was a few bales of hay left over in a steamer that had carried prize stock or something of that kind. Fish may give to my hon. friend some comfort. I shall give to him all the comfort he can get in these trade figures. Last year we sold to the United States $5,378,661 worth of fish. We sold to the British West Indies, $1,427,559, or about one-quarter the total amount we sent to the United States, and we sent to Australia $568,232, or one-tenth the amount we sent to the United States. Of laths we sent to the British West Indies $825 worth, to Australia $16,434 worth and to the United States $1,654,822 in the face of the duty of 20 cents a thousand. Of shingles we sent to the British West Indies a little more than $26,000, we sent $30 worth to Australia, and $1,451,878 worth to the United States. Of planks, boards and scantlings, we sent to the United States $14,275,264, and we sent to Australia, New Zealand and the British West Indies combined, $458,443 worth. The same proportion follows down through the figures for the year 1912-13. For the first five months of that year, of hay we sent to the United States $2,110,153; we sent to the British West Indies $11,522 and we did not send a solitary bale to Australia. Of potatoes we sent to the United States $101,203, to the British West Indies $3,376 and none to Australia and New Zealand. For lath, shingles, planks and boards the same proportion follows.

That is the market my hon. friend is going to get for us to off-set the loss we made by being debarred from the great American market. That is the market my friend is relying on to keep his transportation lines running east and west. That is the market my friend is relying on by which his friends will get rich when they are not engaged in merging manufacturing concerns.

I want to tell my hon. friend something we did gain by recipricity. There are a few figures that might be of interest to him. We got just one little taste of reciproctiy in about one-quarter of the proportion of what it really ought to be, just a taste of it and that is with pulp and paper. As my hon. friend knows, American people put through the schedule or the law regarding pulp and paper up to a certain value which only means the cheaper grades of paper. And during the fiscal year of 1911-12, it could not have affected our production to any great extent because the new arrangement was not made until nearly the time of the elections and it was only four or five months from the elections until the close of the fiscal year, and of course it takes some time for men to change their business arrangements and commence shipping in a new channel. But even then the figures show what we made by reciprocity. In the year 1911 we exported to the United States, $2,075,889 of paper of all kinds. Of this great proportion probably 80 per cent or 90 per cent would be paper. In 1912, we sent to the United States $2,052,711. In the first five months of 1912-13 when they could reasonably have commenced to change their trade relations and to manufacture for the United States market, we sent $1,071,197 worth and if you follow that out and take the proportionate amount for the whole year you will find that this year, without allowing for any natural increase which must take place in the last seven months of the year, we will send to the United States $2,570,868 or in five months after they removed some of the duty on paper, about one-quarter of what it should be, we had increased our trade in paper, $500,000 or 25 per cent of the total output.

I have some other figures which may be somewhat illuminative to my friend on the pulp question. We were able to send pulp to the United States to some extent, not very large quantities because the duty was not prohibitive. In the year 1910-11, we sent to the United States $5,094,589. In 1912, after there had been a partial reciprocity in effect, the export of pulp to the United States dwindled down to $4,419,944 or a reduction of more than $600,000 in the amount of pulp sent to the United States. In the first five months of the present fiscal year, that went down to $1,650,941 worth and if you carry that out to the end of twelve months you will find it reaches only $3,962,256, thus showing that in one year there will be a reduction if over $1,000,000 in the amount of pulp which we are sending to the United States. When we send it out in the form of manufactured paper instead of pulp it is the product of an industry which employs hundreds and thousands of labourers all over Eastern Canada. We are sending it in a form which is of some good to Canada, and I have no doubt that if the United States do not restore the old rate of duty on paper it will not be long until the exportation of pulp, will practically cease altogether and we will be sending all this produce from Canada in the form of the manufactured article. And if the United States take the duty off pulp and paper made from lumber cut from the Crown lands of Ontario and Quebec, I assert that 95 per cent of all the paper we produce in Canada will find its way to the United States markets inside of three years.

These are some of the things we have gained from a mere taste of reciprocity. With a statement of facts like that, borne out, not by any politician or member of Parliament, but by the actual trade returns of Canada, I thank my hon. friend for resurrecting the question of reciprocity. I tell him that I will nail it to my mast politically, so long as it is not turned down by the United States. The people of this country are watching this question with a great deal more interest than they are giving to what he is going to do with his $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 for the British navy. The newspapers in my part of the country are giving in parallel columns the prices of potatoes, hay, oats, and everything the farmer exports, in two towns 12 miles apart. The last report I saw, showed that in Woodstock potatoes were selling at $1 per barrel, while 12 miles away in the town of Hopetown, in the state of Maine they were bringing $1.45.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the duty?

Mr. CARVELL: Sixty-two and a half cents a barrel. The same report showed that the proportion in respect of oats was even greater. The people are watching these things, and I do not think they will be stampeded by any flag waving, or by the church which my friend the leader of the Opposition attends, when next they have an opportunity to vote on this question. I want to declare, as emphatically as I can, that what we must have in this country is broader markets, the trammels taken off the sale of our surplus products in foreign markets. My hon. friend knows that, economically, wealth is created in this country in only one of four ways: From the products of the field, the forest, the mines, and the sea. You can juggle with the stock market; you can amalgamate manufacturing concerns; you can merge and combine all you want to; but you do not make wealth; you do not create a dollar. But the men who go into the woods and cut lumber; the men who go to the sea and bring out fish; the men who break up the virgin prairie; the men in the settled portions of Eastern Canada who raise oats or potatoes; these men are creating wealth; these men are the true patriots. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Ball)—I refer to him with the greatest respect—spoke yesterday; and I am told he has grown rich in manufacturing a pretty poor article of furniture out of green wood grown in Canada with a protection of $35 on the $100. He has not created any wealth in this country; he has only, by means of the tariff, been able to extract the money from the farmer, the lumberman and the fisherman; because if they wanted to bring a piece of furniture from the United States, or any other part of the world, they would be fined to the extent of 33⅓ per cent. So he has gathered in their wealth, and he has not created anything.

These are the things for which we tried to find a market in the reciprocity pact. These are the things for which we would have found a market, if that pact had been allowed to go through; and these are the things for which the powers that be must find a market, and for which the people of this country are demanding a market. I await with the fullest confidence an opportunity when the people of this country, the producers as well as the consumers, will show what they think of the great economic question of wider markets and cheaper cost of living.

Mr. A. MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie): I shall not take any general part in this debate. As the House will remember, I had an altercation, as to a matter of fact, with the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), when he was on his feet. The hon. member had been discussing the recent election in Macdonald, and had made the gravamen of his charge the refusal of counsel to certain persons after they were under arrest. He was dealing with the case of one Walkinshaw, who was arrested in the neighbourhood of Rathwell, in the judical district of Portage la Prairie. To be brought to Portage la Prairie, he had to be taken first to the city of Winnipeg, and then by rail to Portage la Prairie, there being no other method of getting him across. It appeared from the affidavit that Walkinshaw was refused counsel by the policeman in charge while he was in transit from Rathwell to Portage la Prairie. The altercation with my hon. friend took place over this point: He stated that all the while Walkinshaw was in Portage la Prairie he was refused counsel; that on Saturday, the 12th of October, the day of the election, Walkinshaw was allowed to see counsel for the first time. Do I mistake the position?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, you do. He saw counsel in Winnipeg, and he was switched away from him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend say that that was the only occasion on which he saw counsel up to the Saturday?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has shown the colour of himself. I rose to correct him, because, after four years experience in this House, I have brought myself to believe that it is at least the desire of an hon. member on his feet to state the facts, and that he would be glad to receive them. I had not read the affidavit of Walkinshaw before. I had not the time to read the whinings of a school girl in such interminable detail; life is too short. I only took occasion to tell the hon. member for Carleton that, living, as I was at the time, in Portage la Prairie, though not connected with the case, I knew right well that Walkinshaw had counsel in Portage la Prairie, and had it before Saturday, the 12th of October. The hon. member for Carleton, with that courtesy which never deserts him, refused to take my word. He preferred, he said, to believe the affidavit of Walkinshaw, whom he had neither seen nor heard of, and on Walkinshaw's affidavit he would stick to his statement that this man never was allowed counsel until the Saturday. Do I mis-state his remarks, I ask again?

Mr. CARVELL: You do. I stated that I was giving a brief review of the affidavits, and I shall leave it to this House to say if I did not state the facts exactly as they are in those affidavits. If my hon. friend wants to give now any personal knowledge he has, which is not included in these affidavits, it will be a contribution to the debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very glad that my hon. friend rose. We see again where he stands. He told us that he was, on his intelligence, as a member of Parliament, stating what was in that affidavit. I had not read it; I said I knew of my own personal knowledge.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not know you had not read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Imagine, then, my astonishment when, on reference to the affidavit, I find that it confirms absolutely what I said. I do not need to read the whole of the affidavit but I will read any part that the hon. gentleman wishes to be added. It goes on to state that this man was arrested on the 9th of October; that would be Wednesday. That night he was brought to Winnipeg. He could not get to Portage la Prairie, I presume; at any rate, the affidavit goes on to say that the next morning he was brought on to Portage la Prairie. I will read the affidavit from this point.

At six o'clock in the morning——

That is, the morning of the 9th of October, when he was arrested.—I am reading from the middle of page 64 of 'Hansard,' the affidavit being given by the hon. member for Edmonton.

At six o'clock in the morning a gong rang, and I was roughly ordered to 'hurry and get up now.' My door was unlocked and I got my clothes and dressed.

We can skip the rest for a little piece. He had been taken down somewhere and then:

I was left there till about twenty minutes to ten and was then taken to the office, where my solicitor, Mr. McMurray was waiting to see me. But I had hardly shaken hands with him when I was taken out of the office into another room, where I was weighed.

And so on.

I was then handed over to a provincial detective who took me out of the building, and as I was leaving I asked if I was not to be allowed to see my solicitor.

Still under the conduct of a policeman in transit.

Mr. PROULX: Did he see his solicitor?

Mr. MEIGHEN (reading):

The man only said he had his orders. A taxicab was waiting for us outside. My solicitor attempted to get in and ride down with us to our destination, but was ordered away by the detective. He has since told me that the official in charge of the provincial jail informed him that he might ride in the cab with me.

Mr. CARVELL: Read it all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He says in his affidavit that he was trying to see his solicitor while in charge of the policeman and that he was refused permission.

Mr. CARVELL: Read it all. If my hon. friend is going to read the affidavit, read it as it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will read the intervening sentence which my hon. friend considers vital.

Mr. CARVELL: Do not garble it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not near the point yet and I ask my hon. friend to rest his soul in patience because when I get to Portage la Prairie my hon. friend will know what it is to squirm in this House.

My solicitor attempted to get in and ride down with us to our destination, but was ordered away by the the detective. He has since told me that the official in charge of the provincial jail informed him that he might ride in the cab with me, but this was evidently done to put him off, as he was refused permission when he attempted it. I was then rushed to the Canadian Northern railway depot and on to the train for Portage. I was not informed, however, of my destination until I was getting on the train.

On arriving at Portage, the detective took me straight to the provincial jail, where on his telling them who I was, they said they were expecting me. After being entered I was taken into the common ward and locked in a cell until after dinner. Dinner in this jail consisted of a thin, greasy soup, one baked potato, dry bread and a tin cup of rank tea without sugar or milk.

After dinner I was taken to the Police Court——

This is Thursday.

—and was brought up before Magistrate Marshall, in what looked to me like a secret session, as the only persons present were the magistrate, the prosecuting attorney, the detective who brought me and a local police officer. The charge was then read by the magistrate, and it was found to be just the same vague charge as was set forth in the warrant under section 269. The Crown prosecutor, F. G. Taylor, then stated that as the documents relating to the charge were not in his possession, he would ask the court to remand the case until Saturday afternoon, October 12, in order that they might get their case prepared.

It is still Thursday.

The magistrate was about to close the matter in this way, when I took the matter in my own hands, and addressing the court, asked the magistrate if he intended to commit me without any definite charge being laid. As he did not make any comment, I asked that I be admitted to bail. Turning to the Crown prosecutor, Mr. Taylor, he asked him what he thought of that. Mr. Taylor replied that although they were not there that day to try the case, in view of the fact that the prisoner was not represented by counsel, the information which he had was of too serious a nature to permit of bail. Without further comment, Magistrate Marshall committed me to the jail till Saturday, October 12, two o'clock in the afternoon.

Now this is the paragraph:

I was then taken back to the provincial jail by the detective, and on being turned over to the prison officials was locked up in a cell just like a common criminal and was subjected to exactly the same treatment with regard to meals, sleeping accommodation and confinement as I had been previously. On returning to the jail I demanded to be allowed to get into communication with my solicitor, and I was permitted to call him up on the phone.

Permitted to call him up on the phone.

After being locked up in the cell for some time, I was taken into the office and allowed a few minutes private conversation with my solicitor.

Thursday, October 10.

He stated that he would see what he could do about bail, although he was afraid there was not much chance of doing anything in view of the attitude of the people pressing the prosecution.

Mr. CARVELL: That was over the telephone, man.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN (reading):

On returning to the jail I demanded to be allowed to get into communication with my solicitor, and I was permitted to call him up on the phone. After being locked up in the cell for some time, I was taken into the office and allowed a few minutes private conversation with my solicitor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN (reading):

I did not see my solicitor again until a few minutes before the time to go to the court house on Saturday afternoon when he informed me that he had so far been unable to do anything with them in the matter of bail, but that he hoped to be allowed to get me out on bail after the hearing that afternoon.

Mr. CARVELL: That is right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly right, and that is exactly what makes my hon. friend wrong, and worse than wrong, if I could name the word. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is some time since the House has been sitting. I know the gentleman who is in charge of the jail at Portage la Prairie. I have been in the practice of the law for some years and I have in the course of my practice, learned which, I have no doubt the hon. member for Carleton, N. B., has also learned, that a prisoner in charge of a constable is not allowed liberty to see counsel until he reaches the point of incarceration.

Mr. CARVELL: I never heard of such a thing in my lifetime, and you could not find a man in the Maritime provinces who had.

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the prisoner reaches the point of incarceration he is allowed to see counsel.

Mr. CARVELL: No lawyer in this House ever heard of such a thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is not very loyal to the standard of etiquette that he tried to enforce on myself. However, the point I make against the hon. gentleman is that he refused to take what I know to be a fact of my own knowledge and referred to an affidavit as contradicting me when that affidavit supported me to the letter. Take another point in the affidavit of Walkinshaw. I do not know Walkinshaw, never saw him, but in no line of his affidavit does he even assert or intimate that after he had reached Portage la Prairie, the point at which he was to be incarcerated, he ever asked to see a solicitor and was refused. Yet, the governor of the jail at Portage la Prairie, whom the Liberal party does not ask to be relieved of his position, is compared with Dago Frank, Lefty Louie and other convicted murderers across the line. As far as I understand this affidavit, and I have read it thoroughly, it at no time states that this man was refused access to counsel after he had reached Portage la Prairie and I know of my own knowledge, and know now from this affidavit, that he did have counsel, Daniel Ormand, by name, from the time he asked for counsel in Portage la Prairie, Thursday, October 10, right up to the time of his liberation.

The hon. gentleman, throughout his address at various times, rose to considerable —I cannot say eloquence—but vehemence, but at no time in the course of his remarks did he reach the exalted stage that he did at this point where what he said has turned out to be thoroughly and completely wrong. Walkinshaw himself, though I do not call him a gun man, compares favourably with my hon. friend from Carleton, N. B., in this respect.

I have only one remark to add. In the language that could not have been plainer —and I think I am within the rules when I say in language that could not have been viler—the hon. member referred to Mr. Stedman and to another man whose name I cannot recall, who made the affidavit read by the Minister of Public Works, as gunmen, and compared them with those thugs recently convicted and sentenced to death in the city of New York. I do not know Mr. Stedman, whose name I never heard until the affidavit was read this afternoon, I do not know the other gentleman, and I venture to say this: that until to-day, the hon. member for Carleton has never heard of either of these men or heard even their names.

Mr. CARVELL: Stedman is one of the men who helped to incarcerate Prince, as I think you will find in the affidavits. Read them over; it will do you good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I repeat my statement: the hon. gentleman does not know the men; he knows nothing of them, and in that state of blissful ignorance he chose to make the charge against them and the comparison he did. During the four years that I have been in Parliament, and for all the other years that I have followed the course of parliamentary proceedings, I say now that I have never seen so flagrant a case of an hon. member shielding himself behind the privileges of this House as the hon. member has exhibited in this instance.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. L. T. PACAUD (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, in addressing this House for the first time, I feel that the Government has added to the embarrassments which invariably accompany such a task by the very slim and unsatisfactory information which it has pleased them to give in the Speech from the Throne on the merits of which we are called upon to pass judgment. We are told, in the first place, that Canada enjoys at the present time almost universal prosperity, that her trade is increasing steadily and rapidly, and that her revenue continues to expand. The hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Rainville), in moving the Address, spoke at some length on this subject. And I may say immediately that I subscribe absolutely and unreservedly to the very vivid description he has given us of the country's expansion and wealth. But let us stop for a moment to consider a question which I regard as of great importance and on which, I am afraid, I must differ with my hon. friend, the question to whom credit should be given for the prosperity which Canada to-day enjoys. The hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres is a very loyal supporter of the present Government. He is anxious to please the members of the present Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A new convert.

Mr. PACAUD: Yes, a new convert. Still, he was compelled to recognize that it would be an impossible task to show that credit was due to the present Government for this prosperity. But he was not to be daunted. He went back many years in our country's history to discover that the authors of the prosperity we are enjoying to-day were the great leaders of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier. I was astonished to hear that view expressed by the hon. member. He was a good supporter of the late Liberal government, and only recently did he change his allegiance on account of the naval question. He supported and approved the fiscal policy of the late government, and he approved of the British preference and of every trade agreement entered into by the late Liberal government with different countries of the world.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario): Except reciprocity.

Mr. PACAUD: No, he was in favour of reciprocity. There was only one question which was discussed on their side in Quebec, and that was the naval issue. But, not satisfied with this not only did he support the late government's trade policy, but he approved of what they did in opening up the Northwest provinces and peopling them with three millions of people in the space of fifteen years by means of a wise and vigorous immigration policy. He approved of the Transcontinental railway which will bind more closely together the East and the West. And, to-day, he has not the courage to rise in his place and give credit to his new friends for bringing about the prosperity of Canada, though he is not willing to give credit to whom credit is due, the late Liberal government.

I now come to that part of the Speech from the Throne which relates to the conference which was held in London last summer, in which four members of this Cabinet took part, concerning the question of naval defence. The information about this matter that is given to us in the Speech from the Throne is very slim indeed. We are told that it is the duty of Canada at this time, considering certain conditions which have been disclosed to the ministers, to give reasonable and necessary aid to the British navy. Well, whatever may be our duty as British subjects or as Canadians, at least, common sense compels us to say that, before forming an opinion, we must know what these conditions are. That has been the more or less invariable rule by members on both sides of the House. There has been one exception, and that exception is the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres. We heard the other night from the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Boyer) what was the political belief of the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres before the 21st of September, 1911. He recalled to us—what we already knew—the very passionate appeals which were made to the electors concerning the naval policy of the late government and the declaration made by these gentlemen on every hustings in the province of Quebec that whatever was done by Liberals or Conservatives touching the naval problem they condemned unreservedly. But since the 21st of September, 1911, we hear no more of these appeals to the electors. The hon. member for Chambly-Verchères seeks to impress us with the idea that he has seen a dark and threatening cloud which is hanging over the British Empire, and immediately he concludes that Canada should give a contribution to the British navy. He is so anxious to-day to explain his position in this House that he waives the consideration of conditions not yet disclosed to us. He draws his own conclusion and declares a wish to contribute to the British navy. This is serious. But he is not content with this; he goes further still and says: I am sure that the province of Quebec and all the other provinces in the Dominion will unite in favour of that policy. I am sure that the friends of the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres, whom he has greatly surprised in the past, will be still more surprised when they learn that he has risen in his place and, without facts to substantiate his judgment, has thus declared his belief, has bound himself hand and foot to the policy of his new friends.

Now, I would like to say a word about some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who seconded this address. That hon. gentleman told us that he knew there were men in Canada who thought that Great Britain had not treated Canada rightly in the past and said that Canada owed nothing to Great Britain. He followed this up immediately by saying that he knew that the province of Quebec would unite with the other provinces in favour of the policy of the Government—which policy has not yet been declared to us. There is only one construction to be put upon these remarks, and that is that the hon. gentleman believed that of the men who profess these views, some belong to the province of Quebec. But I will tell the hon. member for Kingston that if these ideas existed in the province of Quebec they did not apply to the French-Canadian Liberals of that province. The French Liberals of the province of Quebec followed their leader and their party in the first attempt to help England and defend Canada by the adoption of an adequate naval policy. They did this not only because of their sympathy with their leader and allegiance to their party, but out of the sincere conviction that the people of Canada have to face like free men the problem of naval defence. In following this policy, we at the same time admired our leader for having by his statesmanship and sagacity solved the problem of fulfilling our desire to help Great Britain and to conserve our Canadian nation. Any proposals that may be made by this Government will be received with that spirit of fair play which characterizes the loyal people whom we represent in this House.

I now wish to deal with the amendment laid upon the table of the House by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I do not wish to discuss the charges ; they have been explained in this House, and the country now knows how the Conservatives win their elections. But may I be permitted to draw a conclusion from what has been divulged in the House in connection with this matter, and that is, that under this present Government we are going from bad to worse? Before the 21st of September, 1911, a free Canadian and British subject who dared to think differently from hon. members opposite was accused of disloyalty —there was no room for him in the councils of the nation. But to-day when a man acting freely and under the law goes forth to convince the electors of this country that the Government of the day does not merit their confidence, he is locked up and imprisoned, refused bail and denied counsel. Every free-minded and honest man in this country will agree that such a state of affairs is outrageous, and I believe that never since responsible government was introduced into this country has there been a government so deserving of the censure of this House and the people of this country as the present administration. Mr. Speaker, I will vote very heartily for the amendment now before the House.

Mr. ARTHUR CYRIL BOYCE (West Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it must be a matter of congratulation to hon. members of this House that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pacaud) was able to express himself, on the occasion of his first address in the House, with such fluency and apparent force, even if not characterized with the desire to adhere as closely to facts as has been the custom and general tradition of a deliberative assembly such as the Parliament of Canada. But one can forgive my hon. friend from Megantic when one considers the rapid pace that has been set for him by the hon. gentleman from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) who, I regret to see, is not here to-night. I suppose he is tired after the magnificent physical effort which he made to convince this House that he was in earnest. I do not like to speak of the hon. gentleman in his absence, but I am going to take the liberty of referring to some of the statements that hon. gentleman has made, so far as they seemed to me to be coherent and relevant to the question raised in the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

My hon. friend from Carleton was very emphatic about the facts. It did not take him long to accept a statutory declaration as gospel truth when it was read by such a sanctified authority as the former Minister of the Interior, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). Without any knowledge of the man who made the declaration, and without knowing whether he was a man worthy of belief, he gives his statement credence merely because of the views of his political ally, with whom he was in very close company as regards declarations when he sat on this side of the House. My hon. friend from Carleton had no hesitation whatever in pledging himself to the truth of the facts alleged in the declarations read so glibly by my hon. friend from Edmonton, identifying himself with the maker of those statements, and making himself responsible for their truth.

Mr. OLIVER: I would ask the hon. gentleman if he is throwing any doubt upon the correctness of those affidavits?

Mr. BOYCE: My hon. friend will be able to judge of that from my remarks if he chooses to listen to them. It was not always that my hon. friend from Carleton or the hon. gentleman from Edmonton were in the habit of paying such respect to declarations as evidence; and since my hon. friend from Edmonton, in all his integrity as regards public misconduct, has interposed a query, I will just remind him of a time when he was sitting upon the Treasury benches and when he was not at all anxious to accept declarations with regard to political corruption, or evidence involving the actions of thugs and thieves in his own department, elevated and promoted by him because they were political thieves and thugs.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has made an allusion which I do not understand.

Mr. BOYCE: You will understand it in a moment.

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend has any allusion or insinuation to make, let him make it specific, and let us know to whom and what he is alluding.

Mr. BOYCE: I can assure you I have been long enough in this House not to have a herring drawn across the trail of my remarks in that way. I propose to put before my hon. friend, before the House and before the country, one or two glimpses of memory for his edification and in order to show to Canada the spectacle of my hon. friend making an amendment which suggests that this country is suffering; forsooth, from political corruption. My hon. friend was Minister of the Interior in the last administration. Philip Wagner, a trusted officer of his department, preyed upon immigrants coming into this country and stole their money, was prosecuted, once, twice, convicted and jailed, released from jail. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior took poor Philip to his bosom and promoted him. Now, does my hon. friend recollect or deny those facts?

Mr. OLIVER: I can only repeat what I said in the House at the time, that in my judgment Mr. Wagner was the subject of persecution rather than prosecution.

Mr. BOYCE: Well, Mr. Speaker, I remember that my hon. friend did say that, but I was going to say that in connection with these charges there were declarations and statements of fact made to my hon. friend and he scouted them and said it was ridiculous, nay, it was monstrous to found a charge like that upon declarations of that nature, that this was not a court of law, that we were not a jury, that we were not going to try Philip Wagner; and his right hon. leader, puzzled by a resolution couched in the most moderate terms asking only that there should be an investigation into the truth of that charge and if the truth of it should be established that Mr. Philip Wagner would be dismissed, my hon. friend and his right hon. leader, the then leader of the Government, voted down any investigation whatever into the conduct of the thief and the thug whom my hon. friend had taken to his bosom and promoted to a high position.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to protest against the names that my hon. friend from Algoma is calling the late Mr. Wagner. I do not think it is right or fair that this should be allowed.

Mr. BOYCE: I did not know that this poor persecuted gentleman had passed away. I thought he only had passed away politically. My hon. friend received the benefit of his labours as a political hireling a political partisan, rewarded him for these labours and while I have, Sir, I think, enough respect for the departed to speak of him as well as I can, the language of my hon. friend and his colleagues, and the enormity of this amendment, cause me to deal with the facts and conditions and to speak the truth regardless of whom I hit, or whose memory I hit, and my hon. friend ought to be the last one to quarrel with that sort of thing or to endeavour to shield himself behind it.

Mr. OLIVER: In my humble judgment Philip Wagner was very much less of a thug than the member for Algoma who abuses him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think that remark is in conformity with the amenities of debate. The hon. member should withdraw it. It is not the sort of language that should be exchanged between members of this House, if I understand the rule.

Mr. OLIVER: I am bound to bow to your ruling. I certainly expressed my opinion. I am willing to withdraw it out of deference to the rules of the House.

Mr. BOYCE: My hon. friend did not recognize the words I used as being the words of his right hon. leader in his speech in this debate, 'political thugs and thieves' and his own words last session. My hon. friend did not quarrel with that then. Perhaps the political exigencies of a difficult position in which he finds himself to-day touched him on the raw and compelled him to take objection to their use.

I was proceeding to ask if it is any wonder, in the face of a record of this nature, not the only ones by any means which are placed upon 'Hansard' during the fifteen years of the reign of my hon. friend and his colleagues that my hon. friend from Carleton, N. B., should this afternoon regale this House with a mournful dismal howl with regard to so-called political corruption, when he is basing all his proofs, all his remarks, all the basis of all his insinuations upon that amendment, and upon remarks and evidence suggested by my hon. friend from Edmonton in a form which he deprecated and deplored under the very circumstances with which I have charged him and which he cannot deny because they are written on the face of 'Hansard.'

Mr. OLIVER: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend has said he has made a charge against me. I have failed to apprehend what this charge is. I want him to be specific. When he says to this House that he has made a charge against me I ask that he state what this charge is.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid there is really no point of order in that.

Mr. BOYCE: The hon. member for Carleton, N. B., who is a lawyer as many members are, appreciated the fact that when there is very little case there must be very loud and very long and very vehement speech.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOYCE: And that when you have a dishonest client——

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOYCE—you must abuse the judges.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOYCE—and abuse the other counsel.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOYCE: My hon. friend overlooked the fact that he was bringing himself entirely within that very salient doctrine. I am sure it was most humiliating to my hon. friends opposite to see my hon. friend from Carleton, N. B., placed in the position that he was by my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen); a position of great humiliation, a position which demonstrated immediately that while he desired to do all the damage he could, he yet failed to appreciate the value of veracity, and of sticking to facts. Why, Sir, the absolute disregard of that hon. member for facts which appear in documents was so funny, that he pretended to quote the price of potatoes in Woodstock last week, and he could not even do that correctly. The poor potatoes had to be libelled at the instance of the member for Carleton, N. B., for he quoted the value of potatoes at $1 per barrel, whereas the price quoted in the paper in his own town was 20 cents more a barrel—just 20 per cent out in his regard for veracity.

An hon. MEMBER: That is small potatoes.

Mr. BOYCE: I have referred my hon. friend from Edmonton to the records of this House with regard to Philip Wagner. I said I was not going to elaborate instances. He knows the circumstances of that case well, and I merely cited it in order to bring before this House for the refreshment and the delectation of the people of this country, the spectacle that my hon. friend presents now in seconding this resolution, and elaborating upon it, as he did in his speech.

My hon. friend from Carleton referred principally to two features. One was the Macdonald election, about which, save for the declaration of my hon. friend from Edmonton, he knew nothing whatever; and the second was a lament, a grievous lament, with regard to the defeat of reciprocity. He had some courage. He bolstered himself up to this point, and it was a point to which his right hon. leader could not bring himself; he boldly asserted, 'I intend to resurrect reciprocity.' There was, I noted, in the conduct and demeanour of hon gentlemen opposite, a strange difference of cordiality with regard to that statement. I did not notice much applause from my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie).

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was not here just at that time.

Mr. BOYCE: Then I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I do not desire to contradict him, but I distinctly saw him in his place——

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. BOYCE: When the hon. member for Carleton, referring to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance said, 'We want him to resurrect reciprocity, we all of us want him to do so,' a very grave expression came over the face of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. My hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) was complaining of what had been lost to the Liberal party through the defeat of reciprocity, through this country not having seen eye to eye with gentlemen opposite on the 21st of September, 1911. He said, 'We lost power, we lost prestige,' and, in accentuation, he reached the climax when he said, 'And we lost money by the defeat of reciprocity at the last election.' Then he came back, and said, 'But we saved our honour.' Did it not occur to him, or to other members, that if an example of his honour was shown by the palpable misstatements, which he made with regard to the employment of counsel by Walkinshaw, and the slandering of the poor potatoes in his own constituency, the cloak of his honour was in shreds and patches, that it was a poor garment to be left with. 'All lost to the Liberal party save honour,' wails the hon. member for Carleton. All I can say with regard to that which is left is that my hon. friend had better be careful; he would do well to patch up the garment, and not allow further tears such as were made by my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie this afternoon. Well, I have to recollect that the hon. member for Carleton sat on this side of the House not very long ago, and that, with my hon. friend from Edmonton, he had to listen to declarations and amendments, and that, as a champion of contractors like the Marwins, and the rest of those who were plundering the public purse, and who were brought as witnesses—not by declaration, or by affidavit, or by other paper writing, but in person before the Public Accounts Committee—there was no man more adept, no man whose voice was more loudly heard, no man who was more obstructive to the stream of evidence which came through the proper and direct channel, on the oath of the witnesses, than my hon. friend from Carleton during the time his party was in office. He and those who were associated with him earned the title, heralded in the newspapers, of 'official obstructors.' Resolutions were offered to this House with regard to his conduct in obstructing the Public Accounts Committee, and, as my hon. friend well knows, there was no man more desirous of preventing the disclosure of any evidence that might in any way reflect upon the pristine reputation of the late government in matters affecting political purity, than my hon. friend from Carleton. Political thugs and thieves!—my hon. friend from Edmonton takes exception to the expression. Well, we have lots of evidence of their existence in times gone by. Leaving aside the case of Philip Wagner, and without infringing your ruling, Mr. Speaker, if I could go into the history of the frauds disclosed in this House during the recent Administration, what should I say about the ballot switching, the ballot box stuffing, the ballot stealing, the fraudulent ballot boxes, the Byron O. Lott ballot boxes, and the case of Riley—a gentleman perhaps who is known to my hon. friend from South Renfrew—and the fraudulent voters' lists. The time of this House was taken up for no less than two weeks, I think, in showing the fraudulent manner in which the late government made up voters' lists without any regard for law, or even for common decency. Those are matters of history. They were brought to the attention of this House from time to time, and my hon. friend from Edmonton, and other hon. gentlemen opposite voted down the investigation of them by straight party votes, no matter what affidavits, declarations, or facts were brought forward.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition, on one occasion, amazed this House and largely, this country, by refuting charges brought against the Government by the quotation of the words—and my hon. friend is fond of quoting scripture—'to the pure all things are pure.' If the leader of the Opposition were here I would ask him what position he intended to take, or what position he does now take, upon the reciprocity issue. It is true, that the leader of the Opposition did, up to a certain point, say: 'I stand where I stood before the election of September 21, 1911,' but his voice has been getting piano, and piano and pianissimo upon this subject, until you come down to the spectacle of the right hon. gentleman in this Parliament, as leader of the Liberal party, being challenged to state his position upon a great issue which, according to his doctrine and to the line of reasoning of some of his followers, is necessary to the future welfare and development of this country, is afraid to stand up and say that he is now in favour of or desirous of promoting reciprocity with the United States as it was proposed in this House by his late Minister of Finance in January, 1911. Can the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) answer for him ? Can he say that he is heart and soul in favour of that policy ? If he can we would like to hear it, and if he can the country is entitled to hear it. I think it is about time that my hon. friends gave some evidence by a public declaration that they were honest in the political principles that they have been propounding to this country. I have given the hon. member for Renfrew an opportunity of denying the suggestion, or base insinuation, I make against him that he is really in favour of reciprocity. I have given him an opportunity of saying that he is not in favour of reciprocity. I think, to use the vernacular, that it is 'up to him' to say something even though his right hon. leader prefers, under that insinuation, to remain absolutely silent. Then, it being impossible to extract any declaration with a corkscrew from the leaders of a great party expounding and propounding an important trade policy for the future benefit of the country, will my hon. friend from South Renfrew, or his right hon. leader, make a tour now to the West and say : ' We have been conscientiously and steadfastly fighting for reciprocity for you,' when they sit on the front benches of this House and are afraid to make any announcement of their political faith in regard to this question.

I will ask the late hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) the same question. I will pick out several of my hon. friends on the other side of the House, in order to demonstrate that it is quite impossible, quite a satire, to say that there will be currents and cross-currents amongst them upon this question. I ask the hon. member for Rouville whether he will make any declaration upon the subject or whether he can tell us where his party is upon this question of reciprocity.

Mr. LEMIEUX : If it would be useful for my hon. friend in helping him to reach the solicitor-generalship, I would answer him.

Mr. BOYCE : Well, that is a very funny remark.

Some hon. MEMBERS : Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS : Answer the question.

Mr. BOYCE : It will only induce me to be a little more adhesive to my hon. friend, to question him a little bit more, and to ask him again whether he is in favour of this great policy ?

Mr. LEMIEUX : I will answer my hon. friend if he will answer my question. Is he an applicant for the solicitor generalship ?

Some hon. MEMBERS : Hear, hear.

Mr. BOYCE: Well, there is one thing with regard to reciprocity upon which my hon. friend are agreed, and that is that they shall keep quiet about it and not say anything about it in Parliament, where their words will go down upon the pages of ' Hansard '. They are absolutely at one upon that. I might ask the hon. member for St. John county (Mr. Pugsley) the same question. Perhaps he will reply by asking a similar senseless question to that of the hon. member for Rouville. That is about all you can get out of these hon. gentlemen. That is one side to it, but there is another side. These hon. gentlemen have gone through the country and have appealed to the people to send them back to power upon the question of reciprocity. The leader of the Opposition said only a month ago: I stand where I have always stood—although nobody knows where that is—and yet neither he nor any of those who have been given the opportunity will stand up here and state upon his responsibility what his position is, either yea or nay, upon this great issue. What sincerity can be ascribed to the professions of these hon. gentlemen under such circumstances as these? I venture to say that the country has ceased to take these hon. gentlemen in earnest, that it has ceased to believe that these hon. gentlemen had faith themselves in what they professed before the last election on the subject of reciprocity and they will have the greater reason for that disbelief when they see that they are afraid to come forward and state the reasons for the faith that is in them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What about the Address?

Mr. BOYCE: Does my hon. friend desire an opportunity of rising and stating his position on the question? On the question of the amendment, before I leave it, I will just remind my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) of a statement made by a very strong Liberal supporter of the late Ross administration in Ontario during the election which closed the record of that government on the 25th day of January, 1905. His slogan to Sir George W. Ross, then Premier of Ontario was: ' Clean your own doorsteps '. I give that advice to my hon. friend from Edmonton, and I suggest it would be more expedient for a righteously penitent politician, if he would take the penitential bench and pour out contrition for his political sins when he was on this side of the House without attempting to create a mirage by reading affidavits and asking this House solemnly to pronounce against ministers of the Crown upon such affidavits and declarations.

Reference has been made in the Speech of His Royal Highness to the question of assistance to the navy of the Empire. It is welcome news to most of us, irrespective of politics, that this great country is to demonstrate its greatness, its power, its dignity, its prestige, by taking whatever steps may be desirable and necessary at the moment, irrespective of what permanent policy may be framed later on—for the strengthening of the navy of the Empire. I think the situation as announced by this Government, so early after its acceptance of office is in great contrast with that taken by the late Prime Minister and his government. What position did my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) take upon that question and what position does he take to-day? When his so-called naval Bill was brought down to Parliament, the right hon. friend expressed himself as being in accord with a policy which would give assistance to the Empire. Three years have rolled by since he announced his naval programme and may I ask him what progress has been made upon that programme and how has that programme in any one iota contributed to the strengthening of the defences of Canada or of the Empire. My hon. friend from Edmonton possibly may enlighten me on that. I believe that neither he nor any member on the other side of the House can point to one thing done by which that Liberal naval programme was made effective for the strengthening of the defences of the Empire. We were to have ships; plans were drawn, contracts were promised to be let, the ships were never built and so far from strengthening the defences of the Empire the only thing done was to purchase and take away from the British navy the 'Niobe' and the 'Rainbow', pay for them, and bring them to Canada where they are to-day. I do not desire to deal at length with the naval programme of the present Government because we have not the particulars before us, but I do desire to say to the leader of the Opposition that he would have appeared better before the people of this country had he been a little more true to his protestations of being a great and broad Canadian. The right hon. gentleman's feelings upon the question of the defence of the Empire and Canada's contribution thereto, are somewhat difficult to understand, and so devious were they that when the hon. gentleman went to England last time to attend a council of the Empire, he practically announced that he would do nothing on the naval question after having on previous occasions indicated by his words that he would do something, and so he earned for himself the cognomen of 'Mr. Facing-Both-Ways'. We have in power to-day a government which has announced its intention of doing something on this question and I have the utmost confidence that in due course and as quickly as possible the Prime Minister will bring down a measure which will form an effective programme to meet a situation which must have been galling to every true British Canadian, a situation which has long been neglected, which cannot any further be neglected, and which the institutions and the prestige of this country require should not be neglected longer. I have the utmost confidence that henceforth the naval policy of Canada will be worked out without regard to political expediency, and with a sole desire to promote the prestige and credit of Canada as a strong and mighty factor in the welding together of the British Empire. I hope, when these proposals are brought down, that hon. gentlemen opposite will find themselves able, as true Canadians in spirit, to agree to them, to sink their private prejudices in the enthusiasm of their nationalism, and that they will vote for such measure as will promote the dignity and the honour and the power of Canada as a mighty factor in the Empire to which we are proud to belong. I believe that such a measure will receive the confidence of the Canadian people, as, in full and teeming and enthusiastic measure my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his Government have the confidence of the Canadian people behind them to-day. Without suggesting any of the facts that go to make up an emergency, and without debating the question as to emergency, I say it is time that Canada should do her part and not be subject to the reproach which was contained in this morning's paper by an announcement made in the British House of Commons in reply to an enquiry as to what the Dominions beyond the Seas have done. The answer was, that there was an Australian contribution, that New Zealand had contributed, that the little Malay Settlements had sent a dreadnought, and that Canada had done nothing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is in error. Australia has not made a contribution; she is providing her own navy.

Mr. BOYCE: Under the control of the Admiralty; that is what I intend to convey.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, under the control of Australia.

Mr. BOYCE: The Malay Settlements, poor as they are, contributed a ship, which was accepted, and Canada has done nothing. That was the announcement. It is time Canada should remove that blot upon her dignity, placed there by the late Liberal Government. I have the utmost confidence, as we all have, that, my right hon. friend will, with the utmost despatch remove that blot. We have the utmost confidence that he will bring down a measure which will show to the nations of the earth that supporting Great Britain are the strong arms, ever growing stronger, of her Dominions beyond the Seas; a policy which will show that, with the riches with which Providence has blessed her and which she has acquired under England's protection, Canada will give enthusiastically, will give bountifully and sufficiently to assure, or at any rate to promote, the peace of the world.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, before undertaking to reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Boyce) who has just taken his seat, the would-be Solicitor-General, I desire to say a word in reply to one remark made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) this afternoon. I regret that that hon. gentleman is not in his seat. The hon. minister stated that on a future occasion he would take up in this House the question of the elections, not in the riding of Macdonald, but in some other parts of the Dominion. I imagine he was referring to the local elections in the province of Saskatchewan last July. Let me say to the hon. minister that he cannot bring up that question too soon to suit the members from the West, especially those from Saskatchewan. It is no fault of ours that the matter is not being discussed now. Let me say further that if the Minister of Public Works does not bring up that subject, we will take early occasion to afford him the opportunity to make good on the floor of this House the statement he made at the banquet given to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister on his return from the old country, to the effect that the election in Saskatchewan had been won by the disfranchisement of British subjects and allowing aliens to vote. Never was a statement made more devoid of truth. If old Ananias could hear such a statement he would feel like thirty cents. We are ready to discuss that statement at any time.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

Mr. TURRIFF: At any time. We will be only too happy to accommodate the hon. minister.

Now, as to my hon. friend from Algoma West (Mr. Boyce). That hon. gentleman was very anxious to use the corkscrew to get a reply from hon. members on this side. I would suggest to him the use of the corkscrew to extract the solicitor-generalship from the Government. It seems to me he would have a much better chance for the solicitor-generalship if he had left his speech of to-night undelivered. It seemed to me that he rather felt so himself, because when my hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) asked about his getting the solicitor-generalship, he said it was a senseless remark. I agree that it was a rather senseless remark, being based upon the idea that the hon. gentleman might get the solicitor-generalship. However, that is a matter for hon. members on the other side to deal with.

The first subject referred to in the Speech from the Throne is the increased trade of the country. I am sure that everybody on this side is glad to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon Canada's trade expansion. But it was pointed out by one of the speakers this evening that this increase of trade is largely due to the policy in force for the last fifteen years. The Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds) pointed out that our trade was greater than in any previous year. He might have gone a little further and pointed out that our trade with the United States was far larger than ever before. The hon. Minister could have shown that during the first year of the present Government's regime Canada's trade with the United States had increased $70,000,000, more than during any year of the former Government. He might have pointed out also that the trade with Great Britain in the same year had increased only $10,000,000. This, be it noted, was under the administration of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, who, only two years ago went through the Western country declaring that if he were returned to power he would put an end to the traffic running north and south, and would direct it east and west so that the people of the West should find their markets at home and in Great Britain. And here, under the administration of this same hon. gentleman, we have our trade with the United States increasing seven-fold faster than our trade with Great Britain. There was their promise, but now they pay practically no attention to it. One would think that their promises were made simply with the purpose of breaking them, for those promises have not been carried out in any respect. Another point touched upon in the Speech from the Throne is the naval policy that is about to be brought down. We have heard a great deal in the past year about an emergency which is said to exist. But so far as anybody can see the emergency that exists is not in Great Britain and not in the British Empire, but in the council chamber in the Eastern block. There has been a put-up job between the members of this Government and the Unionist party in the old country to send out men by the dozen to go up and down this Dominion talking about emergency and about danger to the Empire, in order to cause the people of Canada to say: Let us forget all about politics and unite to carry out the policy of the Prime Minister. Why does he want that policy carried out? In order to enable him to keep in his Cabinet his Nationalist allies who were elected to this House on the distinct declaration that Canada should do nothing at all for Great Britain and were taken into the Cabinet without any public declaration on their part or modification of their opinion.

And the emergency is that my hon. friend the Prime Minister wants to retain these members in his Cabinet—men who professed that we owed nothing to Great Britain, and did not want to give a dollar or build a ship. There is an emergency, but it is an emergency existing on the Government benches, and if my hon. friend can overcome that difficulty, he may be able to get along without any further break than there has been. During the past summer some of our British friends—dyed-in-the-wool members of the Unionist party—who came out here and addressed Canadian clubs and other gatherings, while making the statement time after time that they did not wish to take part in any discussion of Canadian politics, they invariably ended up with such an expression as 'I hope that Canada will do this or that: ' I hope that Canada will give a contribution; I trust that that the people of Canada will unite, and that there shall be no party divisions upon this question.'

Mr. EDWARDS. Was there anything wrong if they did say that?

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, there is something wrong, and it is this: a put-up job between a party in the old country and a party in this country, and they have brought speakers out here to travel the length and breadth of the land, saying as some of them did, that in September, 1911, the loyal people of Canada preserved the solidarity of the British Empire in opposing reciprocity, and that the people who wanted to trade with the United States without paying duty were disloyal. This was a direct insult to almost half the people of Canada, for it must be remembered that out of every 60 votes cast in the election of September, 1911, there were 31 against reciprocity and 29 in favour of it—a very small margin. These gentlemen travelled throughout the length and breadth of the land, offering an insult to those people who considered that reciprocity with the United States would be an advantage to the people of Canada.

Another matter touched upon in the Speech from the Throne was the question of good roads, and I notice that my hon. friends opposite try to give the impression that the Senate threw out that Bill. That statement is not true, and there is not an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who is not aware of that fact. In spite of that, it has been repeatedly stated that the Senate threw out the Bill. The only action taken by the Senate in regard to the measure was to add an amendment, and it was open to the House to either accept that amendment, or to call a conference between the Senate and the House of Commons to see if some satisfactory arrangement could be made. But my hon. friends opposite did not want to do that. They do not want to pass that Bill unless thep can make a jug-handled measure, by which, in certain provinces where there is a Conservative local government, the money can be given to that government to expend, and in other provinces with a Liberal administration, they will have a string on the money, and can control its expenditure as they see fit. That is why the Senate introduced the amendment, and it is unfair for hon. gentlemen opposite to make the statement that the Bill was thrown out by the Upper House.

I would like to direct the attention of the House to some of the promises that were made by my hon. friend the Prime Minister to the people of the West during the contest prior to the election of September, 1911. The right hon. gentleman promised that if he was returned to power one of the first things he would do would be to hand over the control of the natural resources of the western provinces to the local governments. I believe my hon. friend would have liked to have carried that out, and I believe he would have done so had he been free to act as he would in the matter. But, under the domination of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, the master of the administration, he has not been able to make good that promise, and as far as we can see, has no intention of doing so. He put no strings on that promise, he stated that was his policy, but, when he came to deal with the province of Manitoba, he took away the control of the natural resources that they previously had. Those who heard the utterances of my hon. friend the Prime Minister when he was in Opposition regarding the sacredness of the promises of government, would have thought that when he obtained the reins of power he would have endeavoured to make good some of his promises to the people of Canada. But in almost every case he has deliberately set them aside, and has made no effort whatever to carry them out. That at any rate is the treatment we have received in the West.

Another matter which I consider to be of considerable importance, and a question we have heard but little about, is the degrading of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. This is a most important matter to the people of Western Canada, and so far as I can see, it has been done at the instigation of the other railway companies, particularly of the Canadian Pacific railway, who are not anxious that a first-class road should be operated between the western prairie provinces and the eastern cities. The result of the changing of these grades will be that the road will be changed from a first-class to a second-class line. Efforts have been made to find out exactly what has been done in this matter, but so far we have been unable to get any definite information. I trust that before very long the Government will bring that information down, and enlighten the members of the House on that important subject.

Mr. BRADBURY: Does my hon. friend know that the grade was changed at the instigation of the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. TURRIFF: I believe it is being done at their instigation. Perhaps my hon. friend the hon. member from Selkirk will tell us at whose instigation it is being done.

Mr. BRADBURY: I do not know that it is being done at all; neither does my hon. friend from Assiniboia.

Mr. TURRIFF: I believe it has been done at the instigation of the Canadian Pacific railway, and it is just in a line with everything else that is being done by my hon. friends on the Government benches, standing in with the big interests, standing right in with the monopolies, more mergers, more monopolies, doing everything for their wealthy friends and paying little or no attention to the farmers, the artisans and the labouring people of Canada. The whole tendency of the Government since they have come into power has been along those lines. Almost the first official act that this Government performed was to put a duty on lumber that had been coming in free for seventeen years, simply by changing the interpretation of one of the items of the tariff. Then, when they saw that they had got themselves into trouble with the farming community they had the matter submitted to the Exchequer Court and they got a judgment from the Exchequer Court saying that lumber coming in under Item 504 of the Customs Tariff was dutiable. Why did they not stand by their judgment? They had got what they wanted, why did they refer it to the court if they did not want the judgment? But knowing that there were some elections coming on in the West after collecting for a while they gave instructions that no further duty should be collected until they got a further judgment from the Supreme Court of Canada. The matter was then submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and the lawyer representing the Department of Customs appeared before the judge and stated that he withdrew from the case. The Government withdrew from the case and simply left it without making any further plea and the judgment of the Exchequer Court was reversed by the Supreme Court. Now the matter is being submitted to the Privy Council. Why? The lumbermen of British Columbia and other parts of Canada would never submit that to the Privy Council unless they had an absolute assurance from the Government that if they submitted it to the Privy Council and the Privy Council gave a decision that the lumber under that particular item was dutiable, a duty would be put on that lumber. It would be a simple matter, one of the simplest matters possible for the Government to give a decision and carry out the same interpretation of the law that was in force for seventeen years, two years under the late Conservative administration and fourteen or fifteen years under the Laurier administration. All they had to do was to carry out the same regulation or issue a new regulation to make the question clear instead of having it submitted to the Privy Council? If they wanted to make the lumber free, all they had to do was to amend the Customs Act. But they did not want to do that, they wanted to stand in with their friends, the manufacturers of lumber in British Columbia.

What does this mean to the farmers of Western Canada and the people of Canada generally? Last year over $3,000,000 of lumber came in free and if the duty is put on it means about $700,000 or $800,000 of duty that the farmers and artisans of Canada will pay next year on that lumber. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because this is the class of lumber that is used by the poorer people in building their houses and by the farmers in building their granaries and stables. So I am justified in saying that my hon. friends opposite ever since they have come into power, have been standing in with the manufacturers, with the big concerns, the railways and the mergers, and having very little consideration for the general public.

Let me give you another instance. A little while ago, last August, I understand, one of the Canadian associations of workmen applied for a board of conciliation. They were not able to get that board, and the reason given by my friend the Minister of Labour was that their application was not technical. The reasons given by the minister were almost identical with those given by the Canadian Pacific railway when they refused to appoint one of the arbitrators to that board, and my hon. friend the Minister of Labour also gave as one of his reasons that the Canadian Pacific railway had stated that they would not appoint a member to that board and if the board did give a judgment in the matter that they would not abide by it, and so the Minister of Labour refused to give them the board. What has been the result? A strike has been brought on and that strike to-day is causing a tie-up and a blockade of wheat and other grains in Western Canada for the simple reason that the railway company is not able to handle the cars when they come into Fort William. The other day a statement was made by the Western manager of the Canadian Pacific railway that the reason they were not furnishing more cars to handle wheat, flax and other grains was that there were no ships at Fort William to take the grain away. I see in the Manitoba Free Press a letter from a gentleman in Fort William who states that that reason is absolutely untrue and that the reason there were no ships or not enough ships coming in was that the railway company was not in a position to unload the cars and to load the ships because when a car is unloaded into one of the storage elevators at Fort William or Port Arthur that does not mean that the grain can be immediately loaded into a ship. When that grain is unloaded it has to be weighed and certificates have to be issued. This man, writing with knowledge, writing from the ground, states that the railway company is so far behind with the work that there is $1,000,000 due the Canadian Pacific railway for freight on these cars of wheat coming in and that they have not been able so far to collect the freight because they have not got the clerks to do it and therefore that wheat cannot be handled, cannot be loaded into ships, cannot be sold, because the owners cannot get their certificates and all because the Minister of Labour refused to give a board to these men—and this is the only absolutely Canadian union of labourers in the Dominion of Canada. So I say I am justified in making the statement that this Government stands in with the railroads and the manufacturers and the mergers as against the interests of the farmers and the labouring men of Canada.

We come now to another matter. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday last, asked what we had lost by not having reciprocity. I just want to make one or two remarks upon that at the present time; I hope to take some future occasion to deal with the question of reciprocity, of our wider markets, or lower duties, whatever you choose to call it. I like to believe that the Minister of Finance is a fair man; but I remember that a few weeks ago he was at the Manufacturers' banquet, held in the city of Ottawa, and he quoted from the press the prices of wheat at Minneapolis and at Fort William. He asked, what has the Canadian farmer lost by not having the American market, and he quoted No. 1 Northern Manitoba wheat as against No. 1 Northern Minneapolis wheat. He led the people, who were present at that banquet, to believe, and he tried to make the people of Canada believe, that No. 1 Northern in Canada was the same class of wheat as No. 1 Northern in Minneapolis, and that the Winnipeg wheat was higher in price than the Minneapolis wheat No. 1. Now, as many of you know, though perhaps not all, there is no comparison between No. 1 Northern wheat of Canada and No. 1 Northern wheat in the Minneapolis market. No. 1 Northern wheat in Canada must weight 60 pounds to the bushel, and must have 60 per cent hard wheat at least. No. 2 Northern wheat in Canada has to weigh 58 pounds to the bushel, and has a somewhat lesser proportion of hard wheat. No. 1 Northern wheat in Minneapolis is a different class of wheat altogether; it is a wheat that has to weigh only 57 pounds to the bushel, and it does not require to have 50 per cent of hard wheat in it. And yet my hon. friend the Minister of Finance tried to make the people of Canada believe that it was the same class of wheat as No. 1 Northern in Canada. I do not know whether he was aware of the difference of the grades or not, but if he was not aware of the fact, he should have been, before he undertook to make a comparison that would naturally deceive the people of Canada.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): What was the spread, using the technical term in the West, between the wheat quotations in Minneapolis and in Winnipeg during September and October, because I have the record, I mean for the same grade? Was it not as much as 15 cents in favour of Winnipeg?

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says he has the figures. If he has, let him produce them to the House.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): You should produce them.

Mr. TURRIFF: I say there is no comparison between No. 1 Northern wheat in Manitoba and No. 1 Northern wheat in Minneapolis, no comparison whatever; and in order that there shall be no question about that I will just read what the grades are:

Manitoba grades spring wheat, No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat shall be sound and well cleaned, weighing not less than 60 pounds to the bushel, and shall be composed of at least 60 per cent of hard Red Fife wheat.

No. 2 Manitoba Northern Wheat shall be sound, reasonably clean, of good milling qualities, and fit for warehousing, weighing not less than 58 pounds to the bushel, and shall be composed of at least 45 per cent of hard Red Fife Wheat.

Now let me give you what No. 1 Northern spring wheat in Minneapolis is.

No. 1 Northern spring wheat shall be sound, sweet and clean, and consist of the hard and soft varieties of Spring wheat, and weigh not less than 57 pounds to the measured bushel.

That is a difference of three pounds in weight, and it may be all soft wheat. It does not need to have a pound of hard wheat in it, and yet that is the wheat that our friends of the opposition compare, in the matter of price, with No. 1 Northern Manitoba wheat. Why, our No. 3 Northern wheat is better wheat than the No. 1 Minneapolis wheat. There are dozens and hundreds of constituents in my riding who have sold wheat at home, and got No. 4 Northern wheat for it; who have drawn from the same bin sent it across the line, paid the 25 cents a bushel as duty, and got No. 1 Northern for it on the American side of the line.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Was there any wheat imported to Winnipeg from the United States during September and October, and how much was it spread?

Mr. TURRIFF: There has not been a year during the last 25 years in which Canada has not imported wheat from the United States, and I do not suppose there will ever be a year in which Canada will not import wheat from the United States. There has never been a year in which Canada has not imported flour from the United States, and I do not suppose there will ever be a year in which it will not import flour, because certain grades of wheat have not the qualities necessary for making certain classes of pastry and biscuits, and they have to import either the flour or the wheat. However, I just wanted to point out the unfairness of comparing No. 1 Northern Manitoba wheat with No. 1 Minneapolis wheat. Our No. 3 Manitoba wheat is a better wheat than No. 1 Minneapolis, and if you compare the prices you will find that they are high in Winnipeg and low in Minneapolis. At the time my hon. friend the Minister of Finance made his speech he must have known perfectly well the conditions that existed. In the United States they are farther south than we are, their wheat is ripe earlier, they had the biggest crop last year that they ever had and that wheat was pouring in by the millions of bushels to Minneapolis, while in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, owing to wet weather, the wheat could not be threshed, it was not coming in, wheat merchants had made contracts to supply wheat in order to ship it out, they had their boats, they had their space chartered and they had to produce the wheat or pay the freight. The result was that cash wheat, for a short time, went away up, and my hon. friend must have known perfectly well what the conditions were and that they were not the ordinary conditions. I can show my hon. friend the prices of wheat in Fort William and Minneapolis month by month and year by year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the average difference in the price?

Mr. TURRIFF: The average difference for the last three years would be something like ten cents a bushel, and, if you take the actual quality of the wheat and put No. 3 Northern Canadian against No. 1 Northern Minneapolis, the difference will be over 15 cents a bushel. My hon. friend asks what we have lost. Well, I think he got his reply this afternoon pretty well from my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell). The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) undertook to reply to him.

An hon. MEMBER: He did it.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, and he replied just exactly as we knew the hon. member for Portage la Prairie would reply. He is a clever lawyer and when you get a clever lawyer who has absolutely no case he abuses the opposing counsel. That is what my hon. friend did. He picked on one little thing that did not affect the case at all and he made a great, big parade of that for twenty minutes, got a lot of applause and sat down. The hon. gentleman never came within a mile of the subject and did not want to come near it. The hon. member who is a good lawyer knew better than to touch the subject that was under discussion. But, he made a harangue, got the applause, sat down, and he showed mighty good sense as he very often does. I give the hon. gentleman a great deal of credit for the way in which he managed it. He managed it with more than his usual astuteness and that is saying a good deal. It is a mighty poor case when my hon. friend, who had not intended to speak upon the question, had to get up and draw a herring across the trail because hon. gentlemen knew that there was no person else on that side of the House who could do it with the same fineness of touch that my hon. friend exhibited this afternoon.

I want to touch for a moment or two on the question of cement. The Minister of Finance, who spoke upon this subject on Tuesday, was very insistent that an apology was due to him from my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition, and, in a iesser degree from my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). If there was an apology due from the Leader of the Opposition to the Minister of Finance, what about the apology from the Minister of Finance to this House? I gave the hon. gentleman the most absolute attention of which I was capable, because I like to hear him speak and I have a good opinion of the Minister of Finance, and the whole argument that he put forward was that the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Edmonton were opposed to the reduction of the duty on cement. That was the way that he put it before the House and that is the way it will go before the country. You, Mr. Speaker, sitting in your chair and hearing it all, must have been absolutely aware of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition did not oppose the cutting of the duty and that the hon. member for Edmonton was not opposed to the cutting of the duty, but that the argument that they put forward was that the Minister of Finance had made that cut in the duty just at a time to help the pending elections in Saskatchewan. I will leave it to the House if that is not a fair presentation of the case. The Minister of Finance got a little hot under the collar that anyone should suppose that he would make a cut in the duty in order to help an election. I do not believe the Minister of Finance would do that. I was pleased to hear him say that he had ideas. But, he went on also to say that he had ideals. How long he will be able to keep these ideals if he follows in the train of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) the master of the Administration, is a question that cannot be very hard to answer. But, he has ideals and he tried to make out all through that the question of the cutting of the duty on cement had arisen away back last January or last winter in an interview between the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), with himself, and the manufacturers. The ground upon which we based our conclusion that this was a political dodge, not intentional on the part of my hon. friend, but absolutely intentional on the part of the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane)—and the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) would not be above the same trick—was, not the interview of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance with the manufacturers in January last, but a letter written by his leader the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) to one of his own supporters, a manufacturer of cement, on the 13th day of May last, in which he gave this manufacturer to understand that he was placing too much credence in street rumours, and that there was no intention on the part of the Government to reduce the duties on cement. Less than a month from that date, at the demand of the master of the Administration, and to help him out in Saskatchewan, the Minister of Finance cut that duty in two. The first intimation that we had of that in Saskatchewan was given by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works at the banquet that he gave himself in that province on the 10th of June. Is it any wonder we are suspicious as to why that cut in the cement duty was made? I believe my hon. friend absolutely when he said he had no notion of doing anything of the kind, and he was absolutely justified, as he told us he was, in making that cut in the duty, but if he was absolutely justified in making that cut, was he justified in putting the duty back again? His colleague wrote that the duty on cement was 60 per cent, and I am told it is far more than 60 per cent. I was speaking with the manager of a paving company within the last month, and he told me that last summer he had an offer in writing from one of the largest cement mills in the United States that if he would place his full order for the summer supply of cement with that manufacturer they would sell at 65 cents a barrel. The duty on cement is 15 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): About twelve and a half cents. The duty on a 350-pound barrel of cement is 41¾ cents, but to that must be added the duty upon the bags which makes it about 52 cents a barrel.

Mr. TURRIFF: Then you have 52 cents duty on the cement and 65 cents for the value of the cement in the barrel so that the duty will be from 85 to 90 per cent. But let us take the duty at 60 per cent. When my hon. friend reduced the duty—I suppose he and his colleagues have got to be unanimous about these matters——

Mr. GRAHAM: Except the navy.

Mr. TURRIFF: Oh certainly, they cannot be unanimous about the navy because I expect the Nationalists may have to separate themselves from the Government on that question. Therefore, as this minister said in this letter to which I refer, the duty on cement was 60 per cent, then when it was cut in two there was still a duty of 30 per cent which was more than the average duty the manufacturer in Canada paid. That idea was put forward by the ministers to ease the manufacturer off when the duty was cut, but if that be true why did the Minister of Finance put the duty back again.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): The statute put it back.

Mr. TURRIFF: No, the hon. gentleman could have extended it still further. If he had power to extend the cut in the duty for four months, at the end of that four months he and the treasury board could have extended it for another four months. The Minister of Finance will not deny that. But the fact is that the Minister of Finance was in trouble with his manufacturing friends, and there were no other elections coming on and therefore the duty was put back and we have to-day a duty on cement of from 60 per cent to 85 per cent. Therefore Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree with me that the tendency of this Government has been to stand in with the mergers and the trusts and the manufacturers and the railways to keep up prices, and to still more increase the cost of living and to make life harder for the farmer and for the labourer. That is the state of affairs we have had ever since the Conservative Government came into power.

Mr. PELLETIER: This Government having reduced the duty in that case, perhaps the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) will admit that in four months the Government is at least one better than the Liberal Government was in so many years.

Mr. TURRIFF: If the Postmaster General thinks that his Government did good in reducing the duty on cement then he acknowledges that they are bad now and the signs are that they propose to remain bad. Having put their hands to the plough in reducing the duty why did they turn back?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Hochelaga election.

Mr. TURRIFF: Oh yes, I had forgotten there was an election at Hochelaga and naturally the duty on cement had to be put back to help the new Secretary of State.

Mr. PELLETIER: There was no need of that because the Liberal party had no candidate there.

Mr. TURRIFF: No, the Liberal party had no candidate but the Postmaster General had trouble enough in his own ranks without the Liberal party intervening. His bosom friend Mr. Bourassa and his friend Mr. Lavergne gave him all the trouble he wanted just at that time, and if the Postmaster General takes his character from his old friend Mr. Lavergne he won't be very proud of himself. I think the less the Postmaster General says at the present time the better for his party.

Mr. PELLETIER: There was not much trouble when the other candidate lost his deposit.

Mr. TURRIFF: The Postmaster General and his friends are entitled to take all the comfort they can out of the Hochelaga election and the Macdonald election for that matter. I noticed that to-day the Minister of Public Works took full responsibility for everything that had been done in Macdonald, and therefore, he forces the Minister of Finance and two or three other ministers whom I could mention to share the responsibility with him and I think these gentlemen will be a little restive when they have to uphold before the people of Canada what was done in the Macdonald election. The Minister of Public Works acknowledged this afternoon that he was in charge of that election and that what was done was well done. He went further than that; he went further even than any of his officials, his own tools, went during that election. When the cases arising out of that election came to trial there was not one title of evidence against any one of the four men arrested, and the magistrate said that in some cases they should not have been arrested, and in other cases there was no evidence, and they were honourably discharged, and yet the Minister of Public Works, not satisfied with that, made the statement from his seat in the House this afternoon that every man that was arrested deserved to be arrested; showing that he wanted these tools of his to go even further than they did. And so the Minister of Finance and the other members of the Cabinet have now to assume the responsibility of what was done in Macdonald because their own colleague has shouldered it upon them by defending the nefarious transactions in that election. I wonder how the Minister of Finance would like to get on a platform in his constituency in Ontario and defend the proposition that a man may be arrested on a warrant sworn out two days before the alleged offence could possibly have taken place. Constables were going through the constituency saying : 'We have no warrant, but we have our instructions.' Instructions from whom ? From the Minister of Public Works and from his tools the Prime Minister of Manitoba and the Attorney General of Manitoba—an attorney general who, since he took office, has done nothing but prostitute the Department of Justice of Manitoba for his own purposes in every election that has taken place there. And the boss of the government in Manitoba, while he was there was the present Minister of Public Works, just as he is the boss of the Administration here to which he now belongs. And respectable men like my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds) will have to go through the country defending what was done in Macdonald, because his colleague and master of the Administration acknowledged that it was well done and that all of these men who were arrested, though there was nothing against any of them, deserved to be arrested. We have the proof of it in one of his own speeches. He stated that one man had been arrested and that more were going to be arrested. How did he know that, except from the fact that he had given instructions, that, whether guilty or not, whether there was evidence or not, these men were to be arrested and stopped from working until the election was over?

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): With the hon. gentleman's permission, I would like to ask a question. Did he take part in that election, and if not, will he tell the House why he did not?

Mr. TURRIFF: One reason I might give is that a number of honest men who had committed no crime, were arrested. Another that I might give is that the Prime Minister of Manitoba made the statement that the fact that a man was a member or ex-member of the legislature would not prevent his being arrested. These I might give as reasons. But it happened that I was in British Columbia at the time the election was held, and so was unable to, and did not, take part in it. I will leave to my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) if he wants to get further reasons——

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): I do not want to mix up in it.

Mr. TURRIFF: Of course the hon. gentleman does not want to mix up in it when he finds how it stinks.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): I said I did not want to mix up in the quarrel between you and Richardson.

Mr. TURRIFF: But he was mixed up in the election, as he will find out before he is through. Four men were arrested—four Liberals—who were working for the independent candidate. But some other men were arrested during that campaign, and I wish to place before this House an affidavit in regard to one of these men. And this, be it noted, is an affidavit by a man who swears to facts, not an affidavit such as we had this afternoon from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) made by men who state only what this, that or the other person told them. This is from a man who knows all about it.

Canada:
Province of Saskatchewan,
To wit:

In the matter of an election holden on the 12th day of October, A.D. 1912, in the electoral district of Macdonald in the province of Manitoba.

I, Richard H. Macdonald of the city of Moosejaw in the province of Saskatchewan, Editor, do solemnly declare:—

1. That on Saturday the 12th day of October, A.D. 1912, I was a resident elector in polling division No. 4, Deer Lodge, in the electoral district of Macdonald, in the province of Manitoba, and was the duly appointed agent at that poll of Robert Lorne Richardson, candidate in the said electoral district at an election held on the said date for the election of the member for the said electoral district to serve in the House of Commons.

2. That while the polling was in progress I was cautioned by Mr. Richardson's outside scrutineers that there had been several cases of attempted personation of persons well known to them but that in each case when challenged the said persons had gone away without attempting to enter the polling booth and in consequence of such information I was watching for attempts to personate absentee voters.

3. During the afternoon while polling was in progress a person representing himself as a voter named 'Quinn' entered the polling booth and applied for a ballot. The said person was unknown to me but was not either of the Quinns on the list of voters at that poll, one of whom had already voted and the other, Valentine G. Quinn being a banker who resided in Douglas Park, within a few hundred yards of my residence, and who had, to my knowledge, left for the Coast for some considerable period and I knew that he had not returned to the electoral district or vicinity. I immediately asked that the said person should be sworn and the deputy returning officer, Mr. Cotter, asked him what number his name was on the list, to which he replied 'they told me 196.' The Deputy Returning officer immediately said 'You are not Valentine G. Quinn; what is your name?' On which the said person replied 'I ought to know my own name,' Again asked what his name was he answered 'Quinn' and stated he had a brother outside and attempted to leave the polling booth under the pretence of fetching the said brother in, but was prevented by the constable at the door, under instructions from the deputy returning officer, to whom I stated that I wished the man arrested.

4. Valentine G. Quinn was a name appearing on the corrected list of qualified voters entitled to vote at the said election in the said polling division and I demanded from the person giving his name, who he was, to which he persisted in replying 'my name is Quinn.' I again asked that he be arrested, to which the deputy returning officer replied 'wait a minute, perhaps there is another Quinn on the list.' whereupon I pointed out that there was, and that the said Quinn had already appeared and voted and had been recognized by those present.

5. In reply to further questioning the person representing himself as Valentine G. Quinn admitted to me that his name was 'Tom Morris' and that he did not reside in the polling subdivision of the electoral district, but that he resided at No. 303 Ellen Street in the city of Winnipeg.

6. Thinking that the deputy returning officer was not going to arrest the man I left the polling booth for a few minutes and requested a justice of the peace, who was outside, to hold himself in readiness to receive from me an information which I was then preparing and to arrest and to have arrested a person then within the polling booth.

7. On my return both the deputy returning officer and Mr. Johnstone, the agent of Alexander Morrison, the Conservative candidate, pleaded with me not to have the man arrested. The deputy returning officer stated that I could easily trace him afterwards. I pointed out that I had no guarantee that the address given was a correct one and the alleged Tom Morris then threw over to me a brass check marked on one side 'B. & C.' and 'L.T.D.' and on the other side the number '139,' and stated that he was employed by the firm who were laying asphalt on the road running past the polling booth and that this was his time check. He was pleading that I would let him go as he said he had a wife and three children dependent upon him.

8. On Monday the 14th day of October, A.D. 1912, I proceeded to the address 303 Ellen Street in the city of Winnipeg, given by the said Tom Morris, and there learned from the landlady that such a person had been lodging there at one time but had left, owing her rent, a month previously. She identified the said Tom Morris from my description and stated that he had a wife with him but no children and that both were disreputable characters, the man only working a few days at a time in order to purchase drink.

9. One of the objections raised in the polling booth by Mr. Johnstone, the Conservative scrutineer, to my swearing the information against Tom Morris, was that the magistrate before whom he would be brought, would, he he said, have no alternative but to send the man to prison and as he was only a tool in the hands of other people this would punishing him too severely. On my insisting, however, the deputy returning officer accepted the information and ordered the said Tom Morris to be conveyed to the St. James police station in the custody of a constable named Ferguson.

10. I subsequently verified from the poll clerk's registrar his entry which read as follows 'No. Valentine G. Quinn' and in the remarks column 'Tom Morris attempted personation.'

11. On Monday, October 14th I went to the residence of Chief Constable Bain, who informed me that Morris had been released by Mr. S. D. Richardson, a justice of the peace in and for the province of Manitoba on his own recognizance of $250.00, at about eight o'clock on the evening of October 12th——

I might here remark that this man, who was caught red-handed, was admitted to $250 bail, but other men who were not guilty, and against whom there was nothing proven in any shape or form, had to put up $4,000 bail—because they were Liberals.

—and that the said Richardson, who was known to me personally as the man who was in charge of the Conservative campaign in that portion of the electoral district of Macdonald, had remanded the accused for trial on Wednesday, October 16th, but that he was not sure whether the case would be tried at St. Charles or at the provincial police court. Bain also informed me that it would be his duty to instruct me at what time and place the accused would be tried, in order that I might be present to prefer my charge.

12. On Tuesday, October 15th, 1912, I met the said chief constable Bain on a street car in St. James and he informed me that the case had been set for hearing by Magistrate McMiken at 11 o'clock in the forenoon of Wednesday, October 16th, 1912, and I stated that I would be present.

13. On Wednesday, October 16th, 1912, I waited at the said provincial police court from twenty minutes to 11 o'clock in the forenoon until thirty minutes after 11 o'clock in the said forenoon and that on my arrival there I met a reporter from the Free Press named James Fairlie, who had left me to go to the court a few minutes before 10 o'clock in the forenoon and the said Fairlie then informed me that the case had been disposed of before I arrived.

14. That Mr. Alexander Gunn, a witness subpoenaed in a similar case was then in the magistrate's room arguing with some one about the cases and that he came out and very indignantly informed me that the magistrate's clerk had stated that the election cases were disposed of already but that he did not know at what time.

15. That my counsel, W. H. Trueman, arrived a few minutes to 11 o'clock and I at once informed him of what I had learned, and that I also saw Mr. Hugh MacKenzie, a barrister-at-law, and the prosecutor in a similar case against one Stout, and discussed the matter with him.

16. That I have seen the affidavit made by the said Hugh MacKenzie and have read his account of the subsequent proceedings in court as set forth in paragraph 13 thereof, and that I solemnly declare that the same is substantially an exact statement of what took place.

17. That I verily believe and declare that the corrupt motive which induced Alexander McMicken, the provincial magistrate at the said court to dispose of the cases in the way that he did was to prevent the two defendants, Stout and Morris, from appearing in court and there being recognized as having personated other voters in addition to the charges already made against them, and that from information received I believe that I should have recognized the said defendant prosecuted by MacKenzie as having been a voter in another name in poll No. 4.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me this 25th day of November, A.D. 1912, at the city of Moosejaw, in the province of Saskatchewan.

RICHARD H. McDONALD.

E. A. St. James,
A Commissioner for oaths in and for the province of Saskatchewan.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there you can see the contrast. A man was caught red-handed, trying to impersonate another voter. The evidence was all there; the police magistrate in Winnipeg who was to try the case, Magistrate McMicken, sets an hour and a day to try the case, and before that hour arrives he takes the case up, deals with it, and fines these two men $50 each and lets them go. Who paid the $50? My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works could answer that question if he wanted to. It was paid by tools of his own. That is the sort of justice that is being given us by the master of the Administration, the Minister of Public Works, and that is an action which the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice will have to defend on every platform in Canada. The subject is no longer confined to the Macdonald incident; it is a question of the rights of a free man in the Dominion of Canada, a part of the British Empire. For fifteen long years the right hon. leader of the Government sat on this side of the House, and was a strenuous advocate of clean elections. But now after fourteen months in power, we find an election carried on in this manner, and all my right hon. friend the leader of the Government has to say is 'Oh, it is not the only case where there have been crooked elections.' 'You're another'—that is just the way he puts it. Is that all we can depend on? A year ago, or even six months ago, if anybody had told me that the leader of the Government would take such a position, I would not have believed it, and I would have defended him, but when I see how little he is attempting to carry out his promises I must say I am beginning to lose faith in his integrity. The hon. Minister of Finance, who, as he says, has not only ideas, but ideals, will find it a difficult matter to defend the attitude of the Government on this question. His colleague, the Minister of Public Works, takes the full responsibility for all that was done in Macdonald, and says that it was well done, and not a vestige of evidence of wrong-doing was found against the four Liberals who were arrested. My hon. friend has been talking about Capt. W. Sifton, and showing forth how bad a man he was. Is not my hon. friend the master of the Administration in power? Could he not go after Captain Sifton if he has done anything wrong? Why was he let go, if he deserved to be arrested, and if, as the hon. the Minister of Public Works has said, he was a bad man? He was not an imported article, he was working there in his own province and the hon. the Minister of Public Works says he is a bad man but had no charge against him. The Attorney General's department in Manitoba is simply a tool of his, nothing else. Why does he not arrest Captain Sifton? It is a poor excuse for the Minister of Public Works to give this House to say that Captain Sifton is a bad man and deserved all he got when arrested, when they had not one tittle of evidence against him and treated him and all the others as if they were pick-pockets. That is the position which must be faced by the leader of the Government, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice—it will be no trouble for the others, but that will be the position that these gentlemen will have to defend and I think it will bother the Minister of Justice, who is a pretty decent Minister of Justice. That is the position his colleague the Minister of Public Works has put the Government in by his acceptance of full responsibility for all the villany that took place in Macdonald and he says it is all right and they only got what was coming to them and they deserved it.

Let us see what took place in Richelieu. We have in connection with the election at Richelieu two diametrically opposed statements by members of this House. One man is telling the truth, to put it mildly, or there is one of them not telling the truth. Our worthy knight, Sir Rodolphe Forget, the member for Charlevoix and other places, goes to Richelieu and makes a certain promise to the electors. He promises that if they elect Mr. Morgan, the Conservative candidate, the Marine railway will be built and he says: I do not come to you with any empty promise, I do not come to you with an election promise, I come to you with the real thing, a real promise, and I have it from the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Public Works said to-day that he had never heard of that railway until after the election was over. Well, it is between the Minister of Public Works and the member for Charlevoix, the worthy knight. I do not know the worthy knight very well, so I would be inclined to take his word, but it ought to be settled among themselves. We do not have to settle it on this side of the House, that is a matter for them to settle. One of them may be telling the truth. We will probably find out some day which hon. gentleman is telling the truth. Surely the Prime Minister, after the position he has taken in this House for the last fifteen years is not going to tolerate what would not be tolerated in Russia in connection with these elections. I do not think it would be out of place for the Governor General to call upon the Minister of Public Works to resign.

Mr. GRAHAM: Call on Mr. Morrison to resign.

Mr. TURRIFF: The member for Macdonald certainly ought to resign and if he is an hon. member I expect he will resign, he will not want to occupy a seat won by the methods employed in Macdonald; I would be sorry to think that any member would want to sit in a seat won in that way. However, this is a matter for my hon. friends opposite to settle between themselves.

There are a number of things I hope to discuss in this House before the close of the session. One of the matters I am most anxious to have brought up and discussed at as early a date as possible, is the question to which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works referred, the Saskatchewan election. We are ready, let him go on whenever he likes. The Minister does not strike any terror into the hearts of the people of Saskatchewan. He can boss Manitoba and dominate this Government, but when he comes to Saskatchewan we are prepared to try a fall with him any day of the week. I trust that after all the pretensions that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, when this amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) comes to be voted on in the near future, my hon. friends opposite will see the justice of this amendment and will give it unanimous support.

On motion of Mr. McKay, the Debate was adjourned.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Department of Customs for the year ended March 31, 1912—Mr. Reid.

On motion of Mr. Pelletier, House adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, November 29, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Affairs of the Royal Society of Canada, for the year ended April 30, 1912.—Mr. White (Leeds).

Report of the Department of Indian Affairs for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Roche.

Report of the Geological Survey Branch of the Department of Mines for the Calendar year, 1911.—Mr. Roche.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Hon. Louis Coderre, member for the electoral district of Hochelaga, by the Right Hon. R. L. Borden and Hon. L. P. Pelletier.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 7) respecting the Athabaska Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Turriff.

Bill (No. 8) respecting a patent of George Frederick Bishopric.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill (No. 9) respecting Canadian Explosives Limited.—Mr. Ames.

Bill (No. 10) respecting Dominion Trust Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill (No. 11) respecting New Orleans and Grand Isle Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited, and to change its name to 'New Orleans and Grand Isle Railway, Light and Power Company, Limited.'—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill (No. 12) to incorporate the Great West Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. McKay.

CANADA-WEST INDIA TRADE CONFERENCE.

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): When may we expect a distribution of the publication containing the proceedings of the Canada-West India Trade Conference, which, I understand, has been printed?

Hon. Mr. FOSTER: As soon as the debate on the motion now before the House is concluded, I shall lay the papers on the table.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It is expected that the West India-Canada Trade Treaty will be placed before the House for ratification before the Christmas adjournment and in that case it must be very soon presented. I think it only fair that the House should have the printed proceedings as early as possible, because I notice that they were presented to some of the West India legislatures prior to the discussion of the treaty there.

Mr. FOSTER: There will be no undue delay. I suppose we shall conclude this debate early next week. The papers are all ready, and will be laid on the table of the House immediately on the conclusion of the debate, and in quite sufficient time to enable all members to have access to all that is in it before the trade arrangement is brought before the House.

CAR SHORTAGE.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY: I desire some information on a matter of very great importance and urgency. I have to-day received a letter from the secretary of the Montreal Corn Exchange Association as follows:

Montreal Corn Exchange Association.
Office of the Board of Trade,
Montreal, November 28, 1912.

Hon. Wm. Pugsley, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Sir,—The inclosed copy of letter to the Honourable the Minister of Railways and Canals will explain the nature of a complaint made by the grain exporters in a matter which is of vital interest to the port of St. John and in which we hope to enlist your sympathy, in view of the fact that you represent that constituency in the House.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,
J. STANLEY COOK,
Secretary.

November 27, 1912.

Hon. Frank Cochrane,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have he honour by direction to communicate herewith copy of telegram addressed you on the 15th inst., together with copies of messages exchanged between officers of your department and the undersigned, with reference to the urgent necessity for the supply of cars by the Intercolonial railway to the Grand Trunk railway for the movement of grain from Georgian bay ports to St. John for export.

It has been the desire of the Government to export as large a proportion as possible of the Canadian grain crop through Canadian ports and in addition to secure for transportation by the Canadian route a fair share of the grain products of the middle and western States, and now when large contracts have been made for shipment of grain by the Canadian exporters, they find themselves unable to secure transportation, either owing to the scarcity of cars on the Government owned road, the Intercolonial railway, or owing to the failure of the officials of that road to appreciate the prime importance of taking care of the immense business offering.

As stated in my telegram of 21st inst. to your deputy, contracts for imediate shipment have been made which call for the use of between seven and eight hundred cars, the securing of which Mr. Campbell's wire of 18th inst. would lead us to believe is not to be hoped for.

You can readily understand what hardship may be involved for Canadian shippers when they are subject to storage charges at bay ports for an extended period, when actions may be taken against them for failure to fill contracts, and when they may be mulcted for dead freight, being unable to supply the vessels with the cargoes contracted for.

The situation is acute, and in the opinion of this association calls for immediate action on the part of the authorities of the Intercolonial railway. The members of this association hesitate to believe that the equipment of the Intercolonial railway is as inadequate as Mr. Campbell's message implies, and they still hope that, in view of the urgency of the case, strenuous efforts will be made to alleviate the situation.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. STANLEY COOK,
Secretary

Attached to this letter are copies of correspondence which have taken place between the secretary and the minister, and also between the secretary and certain officials of the Intercolonial railway. I would ask my hon. friend if he has given personal attention to this very important matter, and, if so, if any action has been taken or will be immediately taken in order to enable the Intercolonial railway to take its part in relieving the congestion, so far as the transportation of western grain is concerned.

Mr. COCHRANE: The shortage of cars, not only in Canada but in the United States, is a matter of great anxiety at present. While the matter has not been fully decided, I do not think that the proposition now made is an exceedingly fair one. The Intercolonial railway, like other roads, is short of cars, particularly at this season of the year, and I think it is unreasonable to ask the Intercolonial railway to send 700 cars up to Port Colborne to relieve the Grand Trunk railway. The Grand Trunk railway should furnish these cars and bring them down, and if we did not handle that freight when it was landed in Montreal, we would not be doing our duty, but there is no suggestion in any of our communications that we have not done that. The Canadian Pacific railway does not ask us for cars to take down grain from their road. This freight originates on the Grand Trunk road, not on the Intercolonial railway, and we have enough to do, particularly at this season of the year, in trying to handle what is offered to us originating on our road.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Rainville for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the Opening of the Session, and the proposed Amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. JAMES McKAY (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the indulgence of the House during the short time I shall address myself to the subjects placed before us in the Speech from the Throne. I shall not discuss generally these different matters, but shall address myself to some portion of the remarks that have been made, particularly such portions as I consider affect the West. Unlike a great many of the members who have spoken, and particularly the hon. gentlemen in opposition, I see much in the Speech from the Throne which commends itself to not only that fair portion of the Dominion which I represent, but to the Dominion as a whole.

Surely it should be gratifying to every true Canadian to find in the Speech from the Throne such paragraphs as those referring to the trip that His Royal Highness the Governor General has seen fit to make during the recent summer throughout the whole Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a tour, I submit, that will result in great benefit to the Dominion and particularly to the West where there are a great many more immigrants than in other portions of Canada. To these people, whom we welcome to our prairies, this tour has been a two-fold object lesson. It has shown to them, not only the personal interest that His Royal Highness takes in the inhabitants of the whole Dominion, but also the great respect and loyalty that Canadians feel and show toward the Crown, and toward its Royal representative in this Dominion. This, I submit, is of supreme importance to those people who have come to join us, and to help us in developing our country. It is a cause of great congratulation, not only to the members who support the Government, but also to the inhabitants of this Dominion, to learn from the Speech from the Throne that His Royal Highness has made a personal inspection from the Alantic to the Pacific, and is able to say to this House that the country is full of prosperity and peace; and that not only is the country full of prosperity, but that it has citizens who have the pluck, energy, and enterprise to develop the rich resources with which this land has been endowed. If these paragraphs simply cause carping criticism to emanate from members of this House; if that is the only effect they have on members of this House who sit to the left of the Speaker, I submit that they can hardly be classed as true Canadians. Such paragraphs should thrill the heart of every true Canadian. and cause him to feel pride in the country he is helping to develop. We have a great country, but we must also have citizens who are capable of developing it; and a Government that will legislate to help those citizens in developing it. I am happy to say that we see in the Government of the day such an administration. It is gratifying to a humble supporter of the present administration to see that it has confidence, not only in the country itself, but in the citizens of the country. In its wise administration, it has seen fit to avoid allying itself with, or tying up its fiscal policy with that of a foreign nation. It has shown that it has confidence in its own people, being able to develop this immense country. Notwithstanding the abounding prosperity that is indicated in the Speech from the Throne, and the satisfactory conditions in the country generally, we find that none of these things appeal to the hon. members of the Opposition. All that they can find in those paragraphs are matters for objection. I wish to deal with one or two of those things specifically. I trust the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), who preceded me, will not consider me discourteous if I do not follow him in the lengthy arguments which he advanced, or what I think could rightly be termed the alleged arguments he submitted with regard to different matters.

First, I wish particularly to dwell upon the question of promises made by the administration, which has been somewhat lengthily referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and in regard to which he found fault with the present administration. Another matter to which I intend to address myself briefly is the question of the reduction of the duty on cement. Until the present administration came into power we had a government of promises. I submit that now, we have, not only a government of promises, but a government which is prepared to fulfil and carry out its promises. I agree with one or two things that the hon. member for Edmonton stated; for instance, that the country is pleased or will be pleased to hear that it has now an administration which is fulfilling its promises. I entirely agree with the hon. member for Edmonton when he makes that statement. Unfortunately, I do not see him in his seat, possibly if he had been present he would have called me to task and declared that he did not make any such statement, or that, if he did, he did not intend to make it.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not just catch what my hon. friend was saying about me.

Mr. McKAY: The statement I made was that I entirely agreed with the hon. member for Edmonton when he stated that the country would be pleased to learn that it now had a Government which fulfilled its promises.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is absolutely correct, on the supposition that the Government has fulfilled its promises, which I showed it had not done.

Mr. McKAY: I anticipated in a certain measure what my hon. friend would say, and my anticipation has proved correct. He does not give the meaning that an ordinary person, not familiar with politics, as he is, would give to these words. I give the ordinary English meaning that an ordinary person would give to them. But I will take the hon. gentleman's explanation, because I feel satisfied that, to a certain extent, his explanation is correct. I do not think he intended to make that statement, but the truth will out on occasions, remember, and those words slipped out from him in an unguarded moment. He says now that the Government of the day are not fulfilling their promises. Whose promises are they fulfilling? Certainly they are fulfilling some promises, and I will ask the hon. gentleman to tell me whose promises they are.

Mr. OLIVER: I would certainly say, in regard to the Hudson Bay railway, the improvement of the harbours, and the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba, that they were fulfilling the promise of the late Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKAY: Well, I am prepared to argue this thing fairly and squarely on its merits, and I will take the hon. gentleman's own explanation. I do not consider that he is entirely correct; I say that the Government of the day are fulfilling their own promises, and the facts will bear me out in that statement. But I will take the hon. gentleman's own interpretation of the position, namely, that they are fulfilling promises made by the previous administration, and I will deal with the question on those lines, and see where it will land the hon. gentleman and his friends. As I stated, I intend to deal with what I consider is a matter which more specifically affects the West than other matters that have been brought before the House.

There is no question that affects western interests more than the transportation question. This question of the construction of the Hudson Bay railway has been in politics since 1897, or since the late Liberal administration assumed power. You will remember that in 1896 Sir Charles Tupper promised that, if he were returned to power he would introduce legislation for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. Unfortunately for the country, and more unfortunately for the West, he was defeated. At no time since then was a Liberal-Conservative government in a position to fiulfil that promise, because that party was not in power until the present administration assumed office. In 1897 the construction of the Hudson Bay railway was one of the principal planks in the Liberal platform, at any rate in the West. In the platform of the Liberal candidate in Winnipeg in 1897 it was one of the principal planks. From then on during the whole time that the Liberal administration was in office, that was a principal plank in its platform. In 1908 the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at Niagara stated most emphatically that it was time to construct the Hudson Bay railway. How many years had elapsed since this was first introduced into the Liberal platform? From 1897 until 1908, and yet nothing was done towards the construction of the road, notwithstanding the fact that from election to election its construction had been promised. Therefore, I am justified in characterizing the Liberal administration as an administration of promises. Then, this statement, made by the right hon. gentleman who was then the premier, was made just on the eve of an election. I do not object to that statement having been made. I am prepared to say that I was pleased when I heard the announcement made. It was an authoritative announcement, but no doubt made for the very reason that hon. genltemen in the Opposition now claim that the reduction in the duty on cement was made during this year, because in 1908 there was a Dominion election pending, and the Liberals knew that the question of the construction of the Hudson Bay railway was a burning question in the West. The road had been promised from year to year ; consequently, it was important that an authoritative announcement should be made from the leader of the government of the day. Hence the announcement at Niagara. So important was this announcement to the West that it created a very peculiar and somewhat ridiculous spectacle in the western Liberal press. When the news first came to the West it was stated that the then premier had announced that the road would be constructed ; but as to the time the announcement was somewhat indefinite, and apparently the Liberal workers in the West were not satisfied with the language in which that announcement had been made, and no doubt some telegraphic communication ensued. However, we know that shortly after the first announcement was made as to the construction of this road, it was reported in the Liberal press that the announcement was not exactly correct, that the word 'now' had been omitted from it, and that the announcement that the right hon. gentleman had really made was that now was the time for the construction of this road,—not tomorrow, but now. Seeing that they could not blame any of the wicked Conservatives, that they could not blame anybody who could dominate the Liberal-Conservative party, they actually had to resort to blaming the poor old Niagara Falls in which every true Canadian takes pride. They said that the reporters were unable to catch all the words spoken by the right non. gentleman, owing to the roar of Niagara Falls, near which he had been speaking. All this indicates the importance that was attached to this announcement. That was in 1908, and we found the then Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) making a somewhat similar announcement in the province of Ontario, no doubt, with the idea of helping his followers in the West. Then, we found that, when the Hon. Mr. Sifton was accepting the nomination at Brandon in 1908, he stated that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier was returned to power, the trains would be running on the Hudson Bay railway within three or four years. That was in 1908. Hon. gentlemen opposite went out of office in 1911, and yet there were no trains running, nor had the first sod been turned, nor had the first attempt been made towards the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) shakes his head and says, 'Oh, oh.' I repeat that not a single thing was done towards the active construction of the road. I give them full credit for anything and everything they did. They did begin the construction of a bridge, but that bridge was not finished during their administration. They did send out parties to explore the country, they did make surveys, but these hon. gentlemen have posed as the great friends of the farmer, and it is the farmer in the West who has been crying for the immediate construction of this road since 1896. What do we find? When the capitalists demanded the construction of the Transcontinental railway, it was said that time should not be lost. You remember the memorable words used by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition; 'Heaven grant that it may not be too late.' We found another eminent statesman remarking that it was not necessary to go on with such undue haste, that there was no real necessity for the immediate construction of the road, but that the real reason was because Cox cannot wait. The poor farmers in the West may wait until exploratory parties are sent out from year to year, but Cox cannot wait and, therefore, we must go on with the immediate construction of the Transcontinental railway.

I am not objecting to the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, but I do wish to contrast the claims put up by the Liberals and their friends that they are the true friends of the farmer, and that they do everything to advance his interests, when, as a matter of fact, if we look into the history of their dealings with public questions while they were in power, we find that such claims are absolutely without foundation. For years the Liberal administration, and the Liberal members of Parliament, and the Liberal supporters in the country promised the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, but nothing was actually done towards its construction. Contrast that with what has been accomplished since the present Government came to office. They took office about October, 1911, and it is now November, 1912, and in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session, we find the following language:

The contract for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway from the Pas to Port Nelson has been awarded and the work is being pushed forward with all possible speed.

The announcement is not that survey parties have been sent out to explore for the location of a possible line of railway, but the announcement is the fact that the contract has actually been let, and that the work is being speedily carried on, and we all know that during the past summer the construction of the Hudson Bay railway has been prosecuted with energy.

Mr. TURRIFF: What survey was used?

Mr. McKAY: Presumably the survey made by the late administration, as well as surveys which have been ordered by the present Minister of Railways.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKAY: I am glad to hear gentlemen of the Opposition applaud; I am glad there is something done by the late administration out of which they can take comfort.

Mr. TURRIFF: We let the first contract.

Mr. McKAY: Yes, the Liberal administration let a contract on the eve of the election. Nothing was done until the election writs were issued, and then the news was spread that men were sent up there to do the work, and, I might remark in passing that in that section of the West which used to be operated by Captain William Sifton, of whom we have heard so much, such indignation did his exploits create among the people that the Liberal-Conservatives practically policed that district in order that the ballot boxes should not be stuffed in the last election, as they had been stuffed in previous elections in the north. An hon. gentleman has asked me who let the contract, and my answer to him is that the announcement was made that the Hudson Bay railway would be built on the eve of the election of 1908, and the announcement that the contract had been let only came on the eve of the election of 1911. It is another evidence that anything done by the late Liberal administration that would enure to the benefit of the country was a thing for them to make party capital out of; everything they did was done for party advantage. But that is not the policy of the present Government. The administration now in power is looking after the true interests of the country, regardless of party advantage.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKAY: An hon. gentleman opposite denies my statement, and no doubt he is sincere in his denial, because, belonging to the party he does belong to, he cannot understand how such a thing should be. Let me tell that hon. gentleman that one of the things that induced me to be a candidate in the last election was the manly and noble attitude taken by our beloved leader during his tour in the West. When Mr. Borden visited the West, the question of reciprocity had not been fully discussed in the country. The whole country was seething with excitement, and a great many of the people of the West were prepared to accept reciprocity without properly considering its effects. With that feeling prevailing in the West, Mr. Borden, our leader, came to the West, and deputation after deputation waited upon him and demanded that he should support reciprocity. And, Mr. Speaker, what was his answer? His answer was: 'I am firmly convinced that reciprocity is not for the general benefit of Canada, and even if you were to reward me by making me Prime Minister in order to give you reciprocity, I would not accept that high office.' That is the attitude the Conservative administration has taken since it assumed power; it has proceeded to carry out measures for the general benefit of Canada, irrespective of ulterior motives, and that being so, every man who supports that administration may be proud of it for that reason, if for no other. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) went on to say:

> What is no doubt an important question is the construction of the Hudson Bay railroad. Mr. Borden told us he is fulfilling the promise of the Government in that regard. May I suggest rather that the Government of the day are fulfilling the promises of their predecessors in relation to that important work.

Let us analyze a little that statement of my hon. friend. The Liberal party had been promising, in election after election from 1897 until 1911, the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and during all these years they were unable or unwilling to fulfil that promise. Even though it be true, as the hon. gentleman says, that we are but carrying out the promises of our predecessors, are we not justified in claiming credit that we are fulfilling that promise to the hilt which the Liberals, either because of their inability to implement their promise or because of insincerity in making the promise, have never been able to fulfil. It matters not to the West whether the promise was made by the Liberal Government or by any other government. What the West wants is the railway constructed, and in the degree that it is discreditable to the Liberals that they failed to fulfil their promise, it is creditable to the Conservative Government that within one year after taking office they are able to announce that the contract for the Hudson Bay railway has been let and that the work is being proceeded with diligently.

And, in considering that aspect of the case, let me tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) and his supporters that, so far as I am concerned, and I think I speak the minds of the present administration in this—if they find anything that is beneficial to Canada and that was promised by the late administration, the fact that it was the late administration who made the promise will not deter the Conservative Government from carrying that promise into effect.

As I stated before, they are not seeking party benefits or personal aggrandizement. They are working in the interests of the country, and whatever is good will be fulfilled by them. This alone shows that the great distinction between these two Governments is, that the Liberal administration was a Government of liberal promises, but the present Liberal-Conservative administration is a Government of performance and I am sure it will be a great benefit to the country.

With regard to the question of cement, do the hon. gentlemen on the opposite benches really claim that the reduction of the duty on cement was not an immense benefit to the country, and consequently that the Government of the day should not have made that reduction? They must admit that it was of immense benefit to the country, and must give credit to the Government for what in their eyes may be the little good that the present administration is doing for the country. They fail however, to give the present administration that measure of credit which it deserved with regard to that one item. They object that that reduction has been made. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) claims that the whole thing was engineered by the Minister of Public Works, that the wool was drawn over the eyes of the Minister of Finance, and that all the evidence placed before him as a reason for making the reduction was evidence that need not be considered. From the arguments advanced by these gentlemen we must draw the conclusion that the reduction should not have been made. But we find the hon. member for Edmonton declaring that the Government should not have made that reduction because it was done in an improper manner, that should have been done in this House by Act of Parliament. I do not desire to be unfair to the hon. member for Edmonton, but I submit that is a fair statement of the position he takes. The hon. member for Cape Breton, who is an ardent follower of the hon. member for Edmonton, claims that the Minister of Finance was hoodwinked, that there was no cement famine in the West. The hon. member for Edmonton must either agree or disagree with the hon. member for Cape Breton. I say most emphatically, and the Minister of Finance says also, that there was a cement famine in the West, that he had ample evidence of it, and under the statute he found it necessary to make this reduction in the cement duty. We find that both the Liberal-Conservative press and the Liberal press in the West were full of allegations that a cement famine did exist during the building season, and there is abundant evidence in the press that the whole country demanded a reduction in the duty on cement in order to relieve the cement famine. Although the cement merger took the position that there was a great deal of cement in Canada, and blamed the railway corporations for being unable to send it to the West, the truth was that a cement famine did exist. Now, I would like the hon. member for Edmonton to make himself clear as to whether or not he claims there was really a cement famine in the West.

Mr. OLIVER: I have no hesitation in stating that there is no reason to doubt that there was a most serious cement famine in the West.

Mr. McKAY: I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman make that statement, it knocks the ground from under the feet of the hon. member for Cape Breton in his endeavour to ridicule the hon. Minister of Finance in regard to his position in this matter. I should like, in as mild a way as I can, to remind the hon. member for Cape Breton what he said during the course of his remarks, that it does not always pay a person to be funny. He tried to be funny at the expense of the Minister of Finance, but this admission of the hon. member from Edmonton, puts him in a most ridiculous position. There is ample justification for the action taken in this matter by the hon. Minister of Finance. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the whole question. No doubt hon members on the Opposition benches will still endeavour to justify their conduct with regard to this question, and the position taken by the hon. member from Edmonton. In order that I may not misrepresent the hon. gentleman from Edmonton, let me again quote his exact words as reported in 'Hansard':

> The objection made to the action of the Government was, as my hon. friend himself stated at the beginning of his remarks, that the reduction was made for the purpose of influencing an election, and not for the benefit of the people.

The logical conclusion to be drawn from that statement, Mr. Speaker, is that the reduction should not have been made on that occasion, because it was an inopportune time for any such action. He admits that there was a cement famine in the West, but his position is one in which he practically states. 'Let this cement famine in the West exist; let there be stagnation in building operations, and let the builders suffer; I admit there is a cement famine in the West, but let the people suffer, because by giving this relief you will indirectly injure the Liberal party in the elections that are about to take place.'

Mr. OLIVER: The idea I wished to convey was that the reduction should have been made long before, while Parliament was sitting.

Mr. McKAY: We have all heard of a certain animal which can change its colour in a moment. The hon. gentleman may change his attitude as often as he likes, and I will deal with him in whatever position he places himself.

Mr. OLIVER: The position I take now is the attitude I took when the Minister of Finance was speaking; my hon. friend is misstating my position.

Mr. McKAY: I do not wish to misstate the position taken by the hon. gentleman. Without any desire to bandy words, or to unduly occupy the attention of this House, I again say in all seriousness, that the logical conclusion to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's statement, considering at the same time his admission that a cement famine existed in the West, is that he says, in effect, 'Let these people starve, so far as cement is concerned; do not make this reduction, because you will indirectly injure the Liberal party in the elections about to take place.' But now the hon. gentleman says that it should have been done during the session of Parliament.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKAY: My hon. friend says 'hear, hear.' I am glad to see he grasps my meaning. I again repeat, at the risk of wearying hon. gentlemen of this House, the hon. gentleman says this reduction should have been made during the last session of Parliament, or at the present session. And what about the intervening period? My hon. friend was here during the last session of Parliament; he knew the reduction had not been made. During the last Parliament the Minister of Finance and the Government did not have before them evidence of such an emergency as arose later on, and consequently no reduction was then made. Since then, however, an emergency has arisen, and the hon. gentleman takes the position that, notwithstanding this condition, the people should be allowed to starve until the next session. Is that the attitude which ought to be taken by hon. members with regard to matters vitally affecting the people of this country? I am proud to repeat again that the present administration does not consider the political advantage or benefit of any party in such matters, but, true to its promises, it will deal only with the interests of the country. In the face of such an emergency as I have referred to, it is as clear as the noon day sun that the action taken by the hon. Minister of Finance was the only reasonable course which could have been adopted. What a howl would have arisen throughout the West in the Liberal ranks had the Minister of Finance not taken that position? What would have been the cry of the Liberal members?

Mr. Speaker, there is a certain paper published in the city of Edmonton, known as the Edmonton Daily Bulletin. I understand that a certain hon. gentleman of this House is intimately connected with that paper, and I think it is the mouthpiece of the hon. member from Edmonton. What position did that paper take with regard to this matter? Reading from the edition of the Bulletin of June 6, 1912, I find the following paragraph:

> A chorus of complaints is going up from western cities against the shortage of the cement supply, which is retarding building operations, and threatens to do so to a far greater extent.

Let me commend the serious consideration of this paragraph to the hon. member for North Cape Breton. Coming from such an authority, I am sure he will give at least some value to this statement, made by the mouthpiece of the hon. member from Edmonton. This paper goes on to say:

> At last accounts the minister was in consultation with the head of the cement merger and we can guess from that whether the duty is to be suspended.

Mark you, the tenor of the whole press, including this paper, was that a reduction should be made and this paper said—at last accounts the minister is consulting with the manager of the cement merger—and it practically says: Well, it is hopeless to expect any reduction if that is what he is doing, manifestly showing that they desired a reduction, not to wait until the meeting of Parliament, as the hon. member for Edmonton says, but desired an immediate reduction.

Mr. OLIVER: I might explain that in all probability the editor of the Bulletin had not thought of the possible synchronism of the Saskatchewan election.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I might suggest also that he had not thought that the head of the cement trust is a great deal more nearly connected with the Liberal party than with the Conservative party.

Mr. OLIVER: Trusts have no politics.

Mr. McKAY: I stated a few moments ago that I would meet the hon. gentleman in every position he took, being a humble supporter of an administration that fulfils its promises. I feel that it is incumbent upon me to make this promise good at the first opportunity. The hon. gentleman says now, bearing in mind again that a cement famine did exist, that the whole country was crying for a reduction and this paper was calling for a reduction.

Mr. OLIVER: Had been doing so for some time.

Mr. McKAY: And he says that possibly the reason that the editor of that paper was crying for that reduction was that he did not have in his mind the provincial elections that were about to take place.

Mr. OLIVER: The reason he did not expect it.

Mr. McKAY: There again taking the position that this paper should have disregarded the true interests of the people lest the advocating of a reduction which would benefit them would be to the political disadvantage of the Liberal party. That is the only logical conclusion you can come to from that statement. He says that was the trouble, he says that if the editor of this paper had in his mind the approaching provincial elections he would not have advocated a reduction at that time.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh no, my hon. friend has taken a wrong conclusion altogether. My hon. friend was commenting on the fact that the editor apparently did not expect any reduction of the duty at that time and I said that probably the reason was he did not think the Saskatchewan elections were coming off at that time, otherwise he would have expected that reduction.

Mr. McKAY: I submit that my previous remarks are a sufficient answer to that and I am prepared to leave to the country the decision who has the best position to uphold. Later on, after a reduction had been made, on the 10th June, 1912, we find in this paper the following paragraph:

> The volley of protests that has been sent in to Ottawa from all parts of the Western country in regard to the cement situation has produced some result, though not as much as was hoped. The Minister of Finance announces that the duty on cement has been cut in two, the new rate to stand until the end of October.

We find that after the reduction was made the paper was apparently satisfied with the manner in which the reduction was made by the Minister of Finance. There was no objection at the time by the mouthpiece of the hon. member for Edmonton that it was improper to make it in this way. In fact, as I have said, it had been advocating an immediate reduction. The paragraph continues:

Unless the situation which has existed in regard to cement be relieved both private and public enterprise must be checked and many projects on which work has begun will have to go over to another year. Already contractors have been forced to suspend operations and workmen have been thrown out of employment by the lack of this essential and should the scarcity continue much longer we may expect to learn that buildings planned for this season have been struck from the list and left for future consideration. With people pouring into the country at a remarkable rate and swarming into our cities beyond the lack of proper accommodation it is something more than an economic necessity that building operations be facilitated by every possible means. The threatened retention of half the duty on cement would constitute a bar to these operations not very much less serious than the duty has been. The announcement from Ottawa means that unless there is a vigorous and united protest from the Western people this bar will stand.

All this goes to show that the people from the West were demanding this reduction and were satisfied with the action of the administration in having made it when they did.

Mr. OLIVER: That is not exactly what my hon. friend read from that paper.

Mr. McKAY: There is an old adage that says that half a loaf is better than no bread and I submit that this applies in this case very well indeed. The point, however, that the hon. gentlemen have been making in this House is that this reduction should not have been made because it was for the political benefit of the Liberal-Conservative party during the election in Saskatchewan, and I am addressing myself to show that it was not done for the political advantage of the Liberal-Conservative party but for the benefit of the country at large, and I submit that I have made out my case not only from arguments I have found elsewhere, but from the mouthpiece of the hon. gentleman. We find that gentleman now saying that the cement duty should have been taken off altogether. A great deal has been said about reciprocity, but acording to my recollection the reciprocity agreement did not provide for the reduction of the duty on cement.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, partly.

Mr. McKAY: What was the result of this reduction? Was it of any material benefit to the country at large, and was the Minister of Finance justified in the position he took, or was he not? I submit that the records go to prove that there was every justification for the action he took in the matter. According to the statement showing the importations into Canada of cement for consumption for the years 1911-12, we find the following position of affairs: In 1911, for the months of June, July, August, September and October, 4,491 barrels of cement were imported into Manitoba; into Saskatchewan, nothing; into Alberta, 309 barrels. For the same period during 1912, in Manitoba, 100,287 barrels were imported; in Saskatchewan, 87,856 barrels; in Alberta, 183,646 barrels showing clearly the immense benefit that was conferred on the people of the West by the reduction which the Government made on that item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman state what was the total saving in duties to the people in the West by the reduction?

Mr. McKAY: The hon. gentleman is much more capable of getting at that than I am, and I do not intend to weary the House in regard to that question. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that in order to deal with that question, which opens up a great line of argument, one would have to deal with the whole question of the tariff; consequently I do not intend to deal with it at this hour. These two matters are in themselves sufficient to justify me in taking the position I have always taken with regard to the present administration, namely, that I shall give it my undivided support until I see that it fails to do justice to that section of the West, which I have the honour to represent.

With regard to what has been said concerning the election in Macdonald, I have nothing to say. I do not belong to the province of Manitoba, and, like my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), I did not take part in that election; I was elsewhere. With my knowledge of the gentlemen who have been named as having been placed under arrest, I am satisfied, to use the language of an hon. member who was at one time one of the Liberal leaders in this House, those gentlemen, I can assure you, did not go to Macdonald to make elections with prayers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason I asked my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. McKay) if he could give me the amount that was saved to the people of the West by the reduction of the duty on cement was that, if I heard him correctly, the amount would be comparatively insignificant—less than 400,000 barrels. Now, the duty upon cement, as stated by the Minister of Finance, amounts to about 50 cents per barrel, so that the reduction of one-half would be in the vicinity of 25 cents per barrel, which would make a saving of about $100,000. That is the total saving to the hundreds of thousands of people in the West in connection with the building operations in those great cities—Winnipeg, Portage la Prairie, Brandon, Regina, Saskatoon, Prince Albert, Edmonton and Calgary, where the people are moving forward in building construction at an unparalleled pace, so far as the history of this country is concerned. And for that comparatively small saving, this Government has violated the principles which have ordinarily actuated governments in the past, and has taken to itself the right to reduce for a temporary period the duty upon an important article of consumption without asking the authority of Parliament. They did it at a time when the people would realize that it was done for the purpose of influencing elections, and when the elections were over they restored the duty to what it was before. It seems to me in view of the fact that strong representations were made early last year by the people of the West, and if I remember rightly, when Parliament was sitting, that that was the time for the Government to take into consideration the question of reduction of duties, to take Parliament into its confidence, and to ask for authority to make a reduction; not merely for three or four months, not merely until the political necessity for it should have passed away, but a reduction that would be enduring, and that would enable the people to enter into contracts of a permanent character with foreign manufacturers of cement. You know, Mr. Speaker, as well as I do, that in connection with these important trade arrangements, people who are purchasers of cement would not willingly cease to trade with Canadian manufacturers of cement, and enter into arrangements with foreign manufacturers, knowing that these arrangements would come to an end in the course of a few months. Such a reduction of duty, to be of importance to the people of Canada, should be of a permanent character, so that they might be able to make arrangements with foreign manufacturers, and so get the benefit of reduced prices.

Let me say a word with regard to the cement duties, and I am going to speak of what I know is the case in that part of Canada from which I come. In the city of St. John, the people are obliged to pay in the vicinity of $1.80 per barrel for cement manufactured in Canada, while I am told that in the United States cement of an equally high character can be placed on the cars at the factories at the price of about 60 cents per barrel, consequently, we in St. John are paying for cement about 300 per cent beyond what it costs to manufacture in the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How long have they been paying that in the city of St. John?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not know; I know that during the past year our people have been paying that. If it is true, as was stated by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), and as I have been told by others, that cement of equally high character can be turned out in the factories of the United States at sixty cents per barrel, the matter is worthy of the most earnest consideration of this Government and of Parliament. There has been a saving, under the circumstances, of about $100,000 to the people of the West, but that saving has been largely to the people living in cities. The farmers use comparatively little cement; they may use more in future, and they may be getting in the way of using it to a greater extent, but at the present time they use comparatively little. Thousands of people are pouring into the West, going upon the virgin soil, many of them obliged to live in log houses, or even in mud houses, until they get the money to build comfortable homes for themselves, many of them—not hundreds, but thousands of them—obliged to bring in machinery from the United States; and if our hon. friends desired to do something which would be of real benefit to the farmers, might they not, for a short period, at all events—one, two, or three years—have passed a similar order with reference to agricultural machinery, so that the West would have been able to get the benefit of American machinery without paying the duties that the people are obliged to pay at the present time?

Having made these remarks in regard to the reduction of the duty on cement, I desire to say that I do not understand that any of our friends who have spoken upon this side of the House complained of the reduction of duty. What we do complain of is the mode in which the reduction was made, and the time it was made. We complain that this Government resisted every importunity which was addressed to them to make the reduction, and that they only made it when they knew that an election was imminent in the province of Saskatchewan, and were driven to the conclusion at which they arrived by reason of political exigencies. We complain, too, because, when there is just as much necessity, now, as far as the people of the West are concerned, to get cheap cement, they have restored the duty, and the people will be obliged to pay in the vicinity of, we are told, fifty cents per barrel by way of a tax on the cement they import from the United States or other foreign countries.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) has stated that there is a great deal of material in the Speech from the Throne which is worthy of commendation. My hon. friend referred to the very interesting and beneficial trip His Royal Highness and his party made over this Dominion. With these remarks we all agree. But what we think is well worthy of comment is that the Speech has omitted many important matters which ought to have been brought to the attention of this Parliament and the people of the country. One important omission was referred to by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition which, it seems to me, is entirely unjustifiable It has reference to the readjustment of the representation of the different provinces in the House of Commons. If there is any one subject that ought to be dealt with at the earliest possible moment when the time has arrived at which it can be dealt with by Parliament, it is the question of representation. Under the terms of the British North America Act, as hon. gentlemen all know, there is a unit of representation based on the population of the province of Quebec, and the representation of the different provinces depends upon the increase or decrease in the population of the other provinces relatively to the population of that province. We know, in so far as the Western provinces are concerned, that there has been an enormous increase in population and that it is absolutely essential, under the terms of the British North America Act, that there shall be a readjustment of the representation. It is necessary not only under the terms of the British North America Act, but in order to do justice to the people of the Western provinces. What does the statute say on the subject? Does it give any discretion to hon. gentlemen to bring in a Redistribution Bill whenever they may be pleased to do so? I say it does not. The British North America Act provides that on the completion of a census the representation of the provinces shall be readjusted pursuant to the census returns. The right hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Borden) has not informed the House as to when a Redistribution Bill will be brought in, but he has apparently given the House to understand that there is no obligation on the part of the Government to introduce such a Bill at the present session. That, I deny most emphatically. I say that at the first Parliament which is held after the census is completed, it is the bounden duty, the constitutional duty of the Government, under the British North America Act, to introduce and to ask Parliament to enact a bill for the readjustment of the representation of the different provinces. The leader of the Government says that there is no necessity for it, because it will not come into operation until the dissolution of Parliament. My right hon. friend talks as if he and his Government absolutely control this Parliament. They do not. Circumstances might arise which would make it, in the opinion of the majority of the members of this Parliament, desirable that there should be an appeal to the people. Circumstances might arise, as they have arisen in the past, which might make His Royal Highness, or whoever might be occupying his position, independently of the advice of his Government, feel it in the public interest to make an appeal to the people to get their opinion with regard to any great question which might arise.

Mr. SCHAFFNER : At what date was the Redistribution Bill brought into Parliament after the census of 1901 ?

Mr. PUGSLEY : In the year 1903.

Mr. SCHAFFNER : Yes, two years after.

Mr. PUGSLEY : Two years after. The last census was taken in 1911.

Mr. SCHAFFNER : Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY : Before this Parliament rises we shall be in the year 1913.

Mr. SCHAFFNER : The position will be exactly the same as the position was in 1903.

An hon. MEMBER : No, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY : The Redistribution Bill of 1903 was brought in at the second session after the year in which the census was taken. This is the second session after the census of 1911.

Mr. MEIGHEN : Did the hon. gentleman not state that unless it was brought in at the first session it was illegal and in violation of the British North America Act ?

Mr. PUGSLEY : Not at all. What I stated was that in the year after the census is completed—not after it is taken, but completed—it is the duty of the Government and the duty of Parliament, a duty which they owe to the people of the country under the terms of the British North America Act, to readjust the representation in accordance with the results of the census. That is the argument I make. It would be a most dangerous principle to allow it to rest in the discretion of any government to decide as to when a redistribution should take place. It is a constitutional duty, and that duty ought to be performed. The Speech from the Throne is regrettably and unjustifiably silent upon that point.

Mr. BORDEN : Does the hon. gentleman mean the completion of the census, or the completion of the enumeration ?

Mr. PUGSLEY : What I mean is the completion of the census, so that it will be known exactly what is the population of the different provinces of Canada, of the different constituencies, and not only the population of the different provinces, but also the population in the territories. What I mean is the completion of the census, so that there can be a thorough, complete, and correct readjustment and rearrangement of the representation.

Mr. FOWLER : Will the hon. gentleman kindly inform me when the census of 1911 was completed ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) tells me it was March, 1912.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). It was so stated in the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. As to the carrying out of pledges, I would remind my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, that just before the last election, he gave a pledge to the people of St. John with regard to the development of the port of St. John. True, he made the pledge under heavy pressure, true he gave it when the people were making it pretty hot for our Conservative opponents, and when, in order to give the Conservative party any hope whatever in that constituency it seemed to be necessary for the right hon. gentleman to make some promise. Under these circumstances he made a very strong and a very definite promise with regard to harbour improvements, and the right hon. gentleman sent a telegram to the people of St. John telling them that they might depend upon it that if the Conservative party were returned to power there would be no delay, no putting off, and no diminution in the plans for the development of the harbour of St. John. I am happy to know that that pledge has been partially carried out by the Minister of Public Works signing a contract upon tenders which had been called for by the late Government for the construction of harbour works in Courtenay bay, and also by signing a contract upon tenders which I as Minister of Public Works had called for, for the construction of certain wharfs on the western side of the harbour. I am pleased also to know that he has continued the dredging works which the late Government was carrying on in the western side of the harbour. But, beyond the works for which the late Government had called for tenders and asked Parliament for funds to carry out, not a single step has been taken by this Government towards the development of the harbour. Before the late Government went out of power, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, knowing that their policy was to develop Courtenay bay, and to provide a grain elevator there, and to provide suitable accommodation in the way of immigration buildings, bought a large tract of land at the head of the harbour. And, although the present Government let the contract for the harbour development, not one single step has been taken by them to provide railway facilities, and apparently the railway authorities will have to wait until the wharfs are built and dredging completed before they can proceed with their part of the work. So far as the port of St. John is concerned, the Government does not seem to be alive to the importance of taking action along the line I have indicated.

Mr. FOWLER: At what date did the time expire for receiving tenders for the Courtenay bay improvements?

Mr. PUGSLEY: On the 10th of August, 1912. And let me say here, that I doubt much whether the contract for the development of Courtenay bay would ever have been let had it not been for the energetic efforts of my hon. friend from Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler) who took a very active interest in that work, as he properly should because he represents the county adjoining St. John. I do not wish to detract at all from the efforts of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in that direction, but if all accounts are true it was a very difficult task to get the contract signed by the Government notwithstanding the pledges which the right hon. the Prime Minister had made to the people of St. John. I venture to say, Sir, that if it had not been for the vote that the late Government submitted to Parliament for this great work and had it not been for the fact that I as Minister of Public Works had called for tenders for these harbour improvements, they would not be under way at the present moment. However, as the representative of the city of St. John, I am pleased that even so much has been done. I would call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) to the fact that up to the present time the Department of Railways has taken no action whatever to give the requisite terminal facilities in connection with the wharfs which are being constructed at Courtenay bay. I do not say there will not be time enough to do it in the future, but there is a great deal of work to be done and provision ought to be made for these terminal facilities during this session of Parliament if it is intended that the Grand Trunk Pacific shall be able, as soon as these improvements are completed, to do its share towards bringing the traffic of the West for shipment to Europe through the port of St. John.

Then, the Prime Minister referred to the Hudson Bay railway as if this Government were entitled to credit for proceeding with the construction of the road. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that during the session of Parliament before the election of 1911 the Government asked Parliament for a very liberal grant for the purpose of proceeding with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. The bridge across the Saskatchewan river which was an essential part of the project, had already been placed under construction and the Government asked Parliament for a very liberal vote for the purpose of carrying on the construction of the railway from the Pas to Hudson bay.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What was the amount the late Government put in the estimates?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it was a million dollars; that is a good sum of money.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: It would not half build the bridge.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At all events, when the present Minister of Railways submitted his estimates to Parliament it was sufficient to cause him not to change the amount one iota, and so he submitted to Parliament the same amount that was placed in the estimates by the late Government. The contract was actually entered into as quickly as possible and the money had been voted, but when the present Government came into power as hon. gentlemen who represent the West will remember, the work was held up for several months. It was stated at the time that the contractors were notified not to go ahead. We were told that the Minister of Railways wanted to look into the matter, that he wanted to study the details very carefully; he wanted to find out I suppose, if there was anything upon which he could take the contract away from Mr. McDonald and call for tenders over again as was done in a case in the city of Quebec. But, after wasting months of valuable time, the minister finally came to the conclusion that there was nothing to do but to allow the contractor to go ahead with the work. Yet, notwithstanding that, the Government place in the mouth of His Royal Highness a statement which is calculated to convey an entirely erroneous impression, that they have made a contract for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway; instead of informing the House and the country that they have been carrying out in good faith and with reasonable speed the contract for this great work that was entered into by their predecessors.

My right hon. friend made another promise on the eve of the election, in answer to the hon. gentleman representing Kings and Albert, not for the purpose of influencing the electors, but in order to let the people know that the leaders of the Conservative party were wise leaders, that they had the interests of the country at heart, and that, if they got into power, they would show that by their work. My right hon. friend sent a telegram to the hon. member for Kings and Albert stating that the Conservative party had always been of the opinion, or for several years at all events, that it would be in the interest of the country and of the Intercolonial railway, that the various branch lines connected with the Intercolonial railway should be taken over and become part of that railway system. This Government has now been in power for fourteen months; this is the second session of Parliament; they have had ample opportunity to fulfill the pledge made by my right hon. friend, and yet to-day there is not a single word in the Speech with reference to this most important matter, which is of such vital interest to the people of the Maritime provinces as well as the province of Quebec.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, whom I would like to see in his place, prepared, I presume, and through the Prime Minister placed in the mouth of His Royal Highness, a paragraph expressing his pleasure at the rapidity with which the foreign trade of Canada is increasing. He refers to the fact that during the year which closed on March 31, 1912, it was the largest in the history of the country. Now, in view of the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is one of the leaders of the party, who in the election of September, 1911, went throughout this country from Sydney to Vancouver, telling the people that it was greatly against the interests of this country that we should be so closely allied in trade with the United States, and that it would be enormously to the interests of our country that the trade should flow east and west instead of north and south, one is surprised to find a statement in the Speech expressing great pleasure at the increase of trade in view of what is the fact, that our trade with the United States during the year to which His Royal Highness has referred is greater than our trade with all the other countries in the world, the United Kingdom included. Let me give the trade for the year to which reference is made. For the year ending March 31, 1912, the total imports entered for consumption into Canada amounted to $547,482,190, upon which duty was collected of $87,576,036.52. Our total exports were $315,317,250, or about $230,000,000 less than our imports. In quoting these figures to the House, I cannot but recall to mind the eloquent speeches which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), whom I am glad to see again with us, used to make years ago as to the dangerous condition of a country whose imports largely exceeded its exports. My hon. friend used to dwell strongly and eloquently upon the evils which would result eventually to the country on account of having the balance of trade against it. One would almost expect that my hon. friend would call attention to the rather dangerous condition in which Canada is to-day, by reason of its imports being upwards of $230,000,000 more than its exports. The increase in imports entered for consumption over the previous year was $85,530,872. What was our increase in exports? Only $18,120,885. The total amount of goods imported from the United States for consumption and for exports as well, was $476,889,112, being an increase over the previous year of $72,557,572. The imports from the United Kingdom for consumption, and export as well, amounted to $268,760,435, or an increase over the previous year of only $21,858,862 as against an increase in our trade with the United States of $72,557,572. One would have expected that this Government—this patriotic Government, this Government whose slogan during the election was 'no truck with the Yankees,'—would have asked His Royal Highness to call the attention of Parliament and the attention of the people to the deplorable fact that during the last fiscal year, our trade with the United States—this country with which we were to have no truck if we could help it—increased 350 per cent. more than our trade with the United Kingdom. We will now take simply the value of imports from the United Kingdom entered for consumption in 1912, $116,907,-022, being an increase over the previous year of $6,970,560. During the same year our imports from the United States were $356,354,478, an increase over the previous year of $71,419,739. Our imports from all other countries of the world were only $74,-220,690, an increase over the previous year of $7,140,573. Our exports for the year 1912 to the United Kingdom were $151,853,413, being an increase of $14,888,302, while our exports to the United States for the same year were $120,534,634, an increase over the previous year of only $1,134,833. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, the startling fact that last year the increase in our imports from the United States over the previous year amounted to seventy-one millions and upwards, and the increase in exports to the same country was only $1,134,-833. That, Sir, is the startling state of affairs which we who favoured a reciprocal arrangement with the United States sought to remedy. We recognized that our trade with that country had already assumed vast proportions, and it was increasing to an enormous extent and with great rapidity. We felt that it was not in the interests of this country that we should continue sending our money to the United States by millions and bringing in goods from that country, instead of paying for them by our exports. We sought to obtain this larger market for the growers of grain in the West, for our lumbermen in the East, for our fishermen and those who are developing our mining industries—all of whom would be glad to find in the United States a market for the products of their labour. Our exports to all the rest of the world in 1912 amounted to only $42,929,203, an increase over the previous year of $2,095,750.

I now wish to deal for a few moments with the department presided over by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid). We had the pleasure of having that gentleman in the city of St. John not long ago, in company with the hon. Minister of Finance, and, when looking over the start which has been made in the great work of developing Courtenay bay—a work which I spoke of as my own particular baby in the presence of my hon. friend, and which met with his approval—he boasted that his department had a rapidly increasing revenue, and told the people of St. John that his only fear was that I and my colleagues had not planned largely enough, and that if the Minister of Public Works wanted more money, all he had to do was to come to him and he would furnish him with as many millions as were necessary for these improvements.

The duties collected last year by the department over which my hon. friend presides—and which represents the taxes paid by the people of Canada, just as much as if a tax gatherer came around every month and asked tribute of the people—on goods imported from the United Kingdom in 1912 amounted to $22,367,039.82, an increase over the previous year of $1,610,229.11. On goods imported from the United States—the country with which my hon. friend desired to have no truck, and no dealings—there was collected in duties the enormous sum of $49,177,584.32, an increase over the previous year of $11,322,856.52.

Does my hon. friend not think that he should have asked His Royal Highness to call the attention of this Parliament and the people of this country to the deplorable state of affairs revealed by these statistics; that from this country to the south of us—with which we did not wish to trade—we have actually made our people pay by way of taxes, upon goods brought in from that country the enormous sum of forty-nine millions of dollars and upwards—eleven millions more than was paid out during the previous year? The duties collected on goods imported in 1912, from all other countries amounted to $16,031,421.38, an increase over the previous year of $940,812.41. The total increase in duties on goods imported from the United Kingdom and from all other countries amounted to $2,500,000, and the increase over the previous year on goods brought in from the United States, $11,322,856.52—the increase in duties on goods brought in from the United States amounting to 500 per cent more than imports from all the rest of the world, the United Kingdom included.

My hon. friend ought to look sad; indeed, as I look around, the only hon. gentleman who appears to be smiling and happy is my hon. friend the Minister of Militia. The Minister of Customs does seem to be sad and thoughtful upon hearing the figures which I have presented to the House. And what condition is revealed by these statistics? Do they not show that, talk as we will, our trade relations with the United States are as intimate and as binding as our social relations, and as the years go by, these relations will become stronger, our trade will increase, and in the interests of our people something should be done—call it what you will; by making an agreement of reciprocity, if you like; but the people of these two countries ought to come together in an effort to reduce the duties charged upon the goods passing between them, and reduce the taxation which the people are obliged to pay into the treasuries of the respective countries. Only in this way can we alleviate the burdens now imposed upon the great masses of the people, and reduce the cost of living.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am glad my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) is in his place. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is absent, and while I have some remarks to make to him, I think I will take advanage of the presence of my hon. friend the Postmaster General to call his attention to a very interesting statement which he has recently made. It has nothing to do, so far as I know, with reciprocity; but at the same time it relates to a fear which my hon. friend seems to have had that his former allies were bent upon some course of action which would lead the people of this country into civil war. When an hon. gentleman holding a position of such responsibility as my hon. friend the Postmaster General occupies in the Government of this country, makes the public statement that his allies of yesterday—the men who fought side by side with him in the election of September, 1911, and the men whom he then called his leaders—had asked him to take a course which might lead to civil war, the matter becomes one of more than ordinary interest, and it is a subject upon which the people of this country will be glad to hear from my hon. friend the Postmaster General. In the Montreal Gazette—a good Conservative newspaper—of the 25th of November, I find a report of a speech made by my hon. friend the Postmaster General at a banquet in the city of Quebec. As the subject is one of very great interest, I think I shall be pardoned for reading the whole of my hon. friend's remarks on this occasion as reported in the Gazette:

Hon. Mr. Pelletier began his address by saying that certain relations existed between public men, the privacy of which had to be respected, and if these matters were revealed to the public, and expecially if they were misconstrued even by men acting presumably in good faith, a grievous error would be committed. In the second place, he considered that it was necessary to define in a few words what was meant by a political alliance.

That men of different political beliefs should reach a common understanding in the public interest and that they should carry on together a campaign and separate afterwards if their ideas no longer agreed, was a circumstance that was far from new and was perfectly admissible. Political history of all countries contained examples of this kind and the most distinguished men had taken part in these transactions from time to time. That these alliances and political campaigns waged together should give to some of the allies of yesterday the right to dictate a hard and fast line of conduct of which they alone should be the judges, and that these conclusions should be reached without even discussing the question or endeavouring to find a common meeting ground, appeared to him not only impossible of acceptance, but also altogether too arbitrary for people who reserved to themselves the humble right of thinking for themselves.

'Friendship confers certain rights,' said the minister, and in some cases it is responsible for illusions also. But the most singular illusion is to believe that it may be converted into a dictatorship, especially on the part of those who, possessing eloquence and ability, perhaps forget that they themselves may be deceived and that they do not possess a monopoly of infallibility and a proper appreciation of what is right.

May I ask my hon. friend if that is a pretty good report of his speech?

Mr. PELLETIER: Pretty good, pretty good, but not complete.

Mr. PUGSLEY (reading):

I enter into further details as under the circumstances those who voted for us on the 21st September have the right to know certain facts that may aid them in forming their opinion on recent events. During the first session at Ottawa I had to choose between two alternatives. In my opinion the line of conduct which I should follow was that dictated by honour and duty. At that moment one of our principal allies—

Might I ask my hon. friend to whom that refers?

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not think I will say more here than I said at Quebec.

Mr. PUGSLEY (reading):

At that moment one of our principal allies of the 21st September came to tell me that this was not the course to pursue, but that the programme which he indicated should be carried out. In answer I replied. 'What you suggest might have consequences impossible to foresee.' He replied there was no doubt that these consequences would be grave, and that civil war might be the result.

Mr. PELLETIER: I said that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And he believed it.

Mr. PELLETIER: I could not believe my ears.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My friend need not fear that I will omit a line or word, it is all too good.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am glad that for the first time in my life I have succeeded in pleasing my hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is to be congratulated on escaping from the shackles which bound him to his former allies.

The report continues.

I could not believe my ears and I should not have given the regrettable example of revealing these words pronounced in private had not the author himself repeated them during the elections of May 15th at Jeune Lorette before three thousand people. I ask you this question: If I find a solution which is acceptable to the parties concerned and of which they have indicated their approval as being likely to settle an injustice, and if I am told not to help in any way to settle this injustice but to let it continue, rather than become the author of a civil war, what do you think I should do? I thought it was my duty to follow my judgment, as I am of the opinion that a civil war would be a national disaster, and because of this a meeting is held in Montreal and I am called a traitor, a renegade. I refused to submit to this odious role, unworthy of a man who respects himself, and I shall always refuse in spite of threats.

Continuing, the minister said that another question needing a solution had come up and here again allies of yesterday were dictating what should be done and threatening that if their demands were denied he would be ruined and dishonoured politically.

What were those demands?

Mr. PELLETIER: I said in Quebec all I had to say.

Mr. PUGSLEY (reading):

The men who had threatened him thus had declared——

Let my hon. friend mark well these words.

The man who had threatened him thus had declared that he owed nothing to the Empire or to the Throne to which he had sworn allegiance and he had assured him that he would lose his esteem if he did his part in working for the general interest.

Let me pause to ask my hon. friend if that gentleman, his particular ally of yesterday, did not, during the election of 1911, use these exact words with reference to the British Empire? Did not the allies of my hon. friend go throughout the province of Quebec from platform to platform urging the same disloyal sentiments to which my hon. friend now objects and asking the people what they owed to England, and if it was not true that they had to bore holes through the British flag in order to breathe the air of freedom? Does not my hon. friend know that the Minister of Customs, in November last, dismissed from the office of Collector at Coaticooke a gentleman whose only fault was that he wrote a letter to the newspapers condemning the allies of my hon. friend for using this disloyal language? Has my hon. friend, since he has cast these allies to the winds, asked the Minister of Customs to restore to his place that gentleman who was dismissed, because, forsooth, he had the courage to denounce these disloyal utterances? I refer to Mr. Baldwin, Collector of Customs at Coaticooke, whose only fault was that he wrote against these disloyal utterances upon the part of the former allies of my hon. friend whose disloyal talk he now condemns, but who were as disloyal in their utterances of 1911 and urged then just as disloyal sentiments as upon the recent occasion to which my hon. friend made reference?

This report continues:

It had also been suggested that he should resign and run again, in order to give the friends of yesterday a chance to bring out a candidate against him. They had received their answer in the verdict of Hochelaga. Had the verdict been otherwise his position would have been the more difficult and he would perhaps have been compelled to ask the electors of the Quebec county to express their opinion.

In other words, had the electors of Hochelaga elected the Nationalist candidate, does my hon. friend mean the public to infer that he would have been obliged to yield to the views of his former allies who wished him to take a course that might possibly lead to civil war? Would not my hon. friend have had the courage, no matter what might have been the verdict in Hochelaga, to have stood to his guns and followed the patriotic course he had decided on?

Mr. PELLETIER: Certainly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then what does he mean by saying that if the verdict in Hochelaga had been different he would have been compelled to resign?

Mr. PELLETIER: What I meant was, that even if the Nationalists had succeded in Hochelaga, that would have been no reason for me departing from the path of duty which I think I am following; but if the Nationalist had been elected in Hochelaga, the consequences might have been very serious for the province of Quebec, and then I would have considered very seriously what my duty should be, and I would have gone to the county of Quebec, and asked the electors in that county whether they were of the same opinion as the electors of Hochelaga if they had elected Mr. Doyon. That is what I meant.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Surely, my hon. friend does not mean to lead this House to believe that, if the electors of Hochelaga, thousands of whom, Liberals and Conservatives alike, apparently did not go to the polls at all, had elected the Nationalist candidate on disloyal appeals, he would have had such doubts as to the loyalty of his own constituents, that he would have felt constrained to resign, to see what they would do about it. Is that what he means?

Mr. PELLETIER: I have explained what I meant.

Mr. PUGSLEY (reading):

Happily Providence had ruled otherwise and Hochelaga had given a patriotic decision, the full import of which was realized by all.

Mr. Pelletier concluded by saying that he had been fortified by this expression of confidence on the part of his electors and that the Government now had two mandates from Quebec for the carrying out of the important duties which were awaiting them.

I have called the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) to the fact that one very important office holder had been dismissed because he ventured to criticise the disloyal statements of Mr. Armand Lavergne and other former allies of my hon. friend, one of whom occupies a prominent position in this House. I asked my hon. friend if any steps had been taken to have him restored to office, and to recognize, what ought to be recognized, the true courage of an office holder, who, when he hears those disloyal sentiments uttered by candidates, exposes them to the public, and asks, as Mr. Baldwin did ask, Liberals and Conservatives alike, to condemn those disloyal utterances, and to show their patriotism and loyalty to the old land and to the Empire. Does not my hon. friend think, further that, as he and his colleagues, many of them, gained their seats in this Parliament by reason of those disloyal utterances and those improper appeals to the people of a portion of this Dominion, they owe it to the people of Canada that they should not take advantage of the positions they secured in this improper way, but that they ought to resign their seats, and go back to the people, and give them an opportunity of expressing their views with regard to their conduct? My hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) says of these men, who he now says are disloyal, that they would like him to take a course that would lead to civil war. He denounces them. Let me say that in the election of 1911, in the city of St. John, I stated before the people that there was evidence of a secret compact between the Conservatives and those disloyal Nationalists, and I asked the people to frown down that alliance. Over and over again the Conservative leaders denied that there was any such alliance; but today we have the admission on the part of the Postmaster General that there was this alliance with those disloyal men, and that those disloyal Nationalists helped the Conservatives to win the seats which they hold in this House, thus deceiving the loyal people of this country, from one end of it to the other.

I am afraid I am taking up too much of the time of the House, but I would like to make a reference to the amendment which is before the House. It does seem to me that the course of our friends opposite with regard to the things which took place in Macdonald and Richelieu is very much to be regretted. Perhaps it is not so bad that these things take place, provided they take place without prominent public men being in any way responsible for them. But the sad thing is that these men rise in this House, and deliberately defend the wrongful and deplorable acts which took place in the two constituencies of Macdonald and Richelieu. Take the case of Richelieu. What have we? We have the statement undenied, the statement made in prominent newspapers friendly to the Government, that one of the most important members of this House, whose influence is far-reaching in the province of Quebec, who has even made, or is reported to have made the statement publicly, that he had a great deal to do with the selection of the Postmaster General as a member of the present Cabinet. I refer to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget)—went down to the county of Richelieu, and at Sorel made the statement to the electors that he had seen the Hon. Mr. Rogers, a member of this Government, and had been authorized by him to say to the electors that if they chose Mr. Morgan for their member they would be given a marine railway, at a cost, I think, of something like $200,000; that that amount would be placed in the estimates during the then coming session. He urged the people in their own interest to vote for Mr. Morgan in order to secure this important work, which, it appears, the people of that locality are very desirous of obtaining. Now, there can be no question, I think, that if the statement was made, it was entirely unjustifiable; that it was an attempt to bribe the electors of the constituency, which no member of this House, no man in this country, ought to justify. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Barnard) attempted to compare it with a telegram which he said I had sent to the Hon. Mr. Templeman with reference to the harbour at Victoria. There is no comparison between the two. What I did upon that occasion was simply to inform Mr Templeman of what my department had decided, months and months before, to do. I had been to Victoria; I had met the Board of Trade; I had been over the harbour in a steamer, which, I think belonged to the Canadian Pacific railway, and I had been impressed with the necessity of harbour improvements. I had brought the matter before my colleagues months before the election took place, and, if I remember rightly, there had been a considerable vote placed in the estimates for the improvements at Victoria. I do not know whether it was on such a large scale as that for the improvements which are now being carried on. Mr. Templeman wired to me asking what the intentions of my department were, and I replied that we intended to carry out these harbour improvements. But I placed no condition on the statement I was making—none at all. I stated that it was our intention to carry out these improvements, and it would make no difference, and could make no difference, whether the city of Victoria sent a Liberal or a Conservative member to Parliament. The department of the Government had decided on the policy of carrying out these improvements.

Mr. FOWLER. What condition was in the telegram addressed by the Premier to St. John, other than the condition, which it was necessary should be fulfilled, that if they were to carry out the improvements, they would have to be in power to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: None whatever.

Mr. FOWLER: Then the cases must be parallel?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Absolutely parallel. I have not found the slightest fault with the telegram of the Premier with regard to the taking over of these branch railways. It was unconditional. The Premier bound himself that the Government would take over these branch railways no matter what the constituencies in the province of New Brunswick might do. I found no fault last year, nor do I this year with the Prime Minister for sending that telegram. The same thing with regard to the harbour improvements in St. John. All I complain of is that the Government is not carrying out the pledges that it made to the people. The same in regard to the car ferry between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. A promise was made by telegram by the Prime Minister at a time which, to use the very appropriate language of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) synchronized with the local elections in Prince Edward Island. The Prime Minister wired to a prominent member of the provincial government that this Government had decided to establish a car ferry between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. So far I have not found any fault with that because it was not conditional. But, suppose the Prime Minister had wired to my hon. friend from Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler) that the Conservative party, if returned to power, would take over the branch railways and make them a part of the Intercolonial railway provided Kings and Albert sent to Parliament a supporter of the Conservative party; or, suppose he had wired to St. John, as he did wire, that his party, if returned to power, would proceed with the harbour improvements and had attached the condition provided the city of St. John elected Conservative members to Parliament; or, if he had sent a telegram to his friends in Prince Edward Island stating that a car ferry would be established between the mainland and Prince Edward Island provided the people of Prince Edward Island supported the Conservative party, what would have been the result? Every man in this House would have said that it was a most corrupt course of conduct on the part of the Prime Minister and I am sure that no one would have justified it. The Prime Minister would be the last man to descend so low as to attempt in that way to corrupt the people in any portion if this Dominion. But what do we find the gallant knight who represents Charlevoix doing? He goes down to Richelieu, he finds the people intensely anxious to have this marine railway and he pledges his knightly word that he comes there with the authority of the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Rogers). He has seen him, he has talked the matter over with him and he is authorized by the Hon. Mr. Rogers to say to the people of Richelieu that if they send a Conservative to Parliament this marine railway will be built and that the amount of money necessary for the purpose will be placed in the estimates during this coming session of Parliament. Surely that is not to be compared at all with the telegrams which the Prime Minister sent either since he has been Prime Minister or when he was leader of the Opposition. That is not to be compared at all with the telegram which I sent to the Hon. Mr. Templeman who represented the city of Victoria. In the three cases in which telegrams were sent by the Prime Minister and by myself we were simply stating the fact, the policy, the decision which had been arrived at and which the people could depend upon and, in my own case, the money had been voted months and months before. In the case of Richelieu the grant of public money is made conditional upon the people of Richelieu accepting the bribe and sending a Conservative member to Parliament. As my hon. friend who sits beside me (Mr. Lemieux) says, the hon. member for Charlevoix also undertook that in case the money was not voted at the present session of Parliament, Mr. Morgan would, if elected, resign his seat. Now, what have we? We have the hon. the Minister of Public Works rising in his place and stating that so far from the hon. member for Charlevoix having any authority to make this statement, he had never spoken to him upon the subject. Sir, I believe the Minister of Public Works, and, for this reason, that I care not what others may say in regard to the Minister of Public Works, I do not believe for a single moment that he would rise in this assembly of gentlemen and make the statement that he had had no conversation with the hon. member for Charlevoix upon this subject if there had been a conversation and if he had authorized the hon. member for Charlevoix to go to Richelieu and attempt to bribe the constituency in the way he did. But, what a spectacle we have to-day! It is worse than we supposed it was. A member of this House, enjoying the confidence of the Government, has gone into a constituency and declared that he was authorized by the Minister of Public Works to make this statement when he absolutely had had no conversation with the Minister of Public Works on the subject. It is bad enough, Sir, for one to obtain any article of value by false pretenses, but I ask you if there is anything in this country that is more valuable, more sacred, than the right of the franchise and what do you think of a man who goes into a constituency and who deliberately tells the people that he is authorized by the Government to make promises to them if they sent a supporter of the Government when he had no authority to do so and when he had not even spoken to the minister to whom he referred upon the subject. It is up to our hon. friends opposite to deal with this matter. Are they going to allow it to drop or are they going to investigate it? We have had no statement at any rate upon the part of the hon. member for Charlevoix.

My hon. friend from Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler), is, I am told, going to follow me, and I would be glad to hear from him. I know that he would cut off his right arm before he would go into any constituency in New Brunswick and make false statements in regard to what was proposed to be done there. I am sincere in that. No matter how much we may differ on political questions, no matter how earnestly we may fight, I think we would all recognize that it is absolutely indefensible for a public man to make representations of the character of those that the hon. member for Charlevoix made unless he had authority from the Minister of Public Works to make them. He is reported to have made these representations. There are one or more members in this House who heard him make them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was present.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Here are two hon. gentlemen who sit on my right who heard the hon. member for Charlevoix make these statements which are reported in La Patrie and reported also in the Montreal Star. Did the hon. Postmaster General read in the Montreal Star and in La Patrie the statements which the hon. member for Charlevoix is reported to have made to the electors of Richelieu? Did other members of the Government? Did the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) know of these statements being made? I do not know whether they did or not, but we have to-day the extraordinary spectacle of the Minister of Public Works referring to the member for Charlevoix and saying:

It may be true—it is true—that the hon. member for Charlevoix, went to the constituency of Richelieu. That hon. gentleman is quite able to take care of himself either in the constituency of Richelieu or in this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: An hon. gentleman says, 'hear, hear'. Does he say 'hear, hear' with a full knowledge and understanding of the fact that it is true that he made this promise to the electors of Richelieu and that he had no authority from the Hon. Mr. Rogers to make it, that he was guilty of false pretenses to the electors of that constituency? If this be true does he say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forget) is worthy to be among the gentlemen who occupy seats in this House? I do not say that the hon. member for Charlevoix made the statement; all I say is that he is reported in La Patrie and in the Montreal Star as having made the statement; all I say is that my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) who sits to my right was present and heard him make the statement, and that my hon. friend (Mr. Lafortune) was present and heard the statement made. What I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you will agree with me, and what I say to the members of this House, and I am sure they will agree with me, is, that if that statement was made by the hon. member for Charlevoix, not only without the authority of the Minister of Public Works but without ever having spoken to him upon the subject, I think there is no man here who will rise in his place and say that the hon. member for Charlevoix, is longer worthy to occupy a seat in this House. I do not pass judgment upon him, I merely call attention to the evidence there is of his having made the statement. It is due to the Government, it is due to that gentleman himself, that the Government should have this matter investigated to find out the real facts. So far as the hon. member for Charlevoix is concerned, after the statement which has been made by the Minister of Public Works, his conduct is infinitely worse than it appeared to be when it was supposed that the Minister of Public Works had had a conversation with the member for Charlevoix and had authorized him to make some statement to the people upon the subject. The Minister of Public Works goes on to say:

> But the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) charged me with making a promise by proxy or in some other form that a marine railway should be built in the town of Sorel in the county of Richelieu. Let me tell my right hon. friend, and tell this House and this country, what truth there is in that statement. It was not until weeks after the election in Richelieu that I had ever heard that a marine railway was proposed or expected to be built in Richelieu. I had never been spoken to about it,—never heard of it, neither the hon. member for Charlevoix nor anybody else had mentioned the matter to me.

Notwithstanding that statement of the Minister of Public Works which I cheerfully accept, we have it here in evidence uncontradicted, that the member for Charlevoix went to the people, pretended that he had seen the hon. Mr. Rogers—who I believe was Minister of the Interior at the time but about to become Minister of Public Works—and that he held his promise to build this marine railway provided the electors of Richelieu returned a Conservative to Parliament; that a grant would be put in the estimates this session and that if it were not then Mr. Morgan, if returned, would resign his seat as a member of Parliament. I leave the matter with hon. gentlemen opposite; it is of more concern to them than it is to us. The Government has a majority in this House; it is their duty to move in the matter, and if they do not have an investigation and expose the truth, and take such action as may be demanded by the truth, then the people of Canada who have some regard for the honour of Parliament will hold this Government responsible for their want of action upon this important matter.

A few words with reference to what took place in Macdonald. I am not going into the details of these various affidavits, but would like to call your attention to the affidavits which were read yesterday by the Minister of Public Works. Hon gentlemen will find them at pages 226, 227 and 228 of 'Hansard.' Might I ask my hon. friend from Kings-Albert (Mr. Fowler) to read them. He will find that from the second paragraph in the affidavit made by Stedman and from the second paragraph in the affidavit made by Jarvis, to the end, the two affidavits are word for word in every particular. Although sworn to by different men they are identical in every particular as I say, showing that the language is the language of the lawyer who drew the affidavits and not the language of the men who swore to them. They were evidently struck off together upon a typewriter. My hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) laughs. That is the sad part of it; just a laugh. When these deplorable and disgraceful facts are brought before Parliament, there would be more hope for the country if gentlemen opposite looked upon the matter in the serious aspect in which it deserves to be looked upon. And, Mr. Speaker, what strikes me as important for this House to consider is that while the Minister of Public Works produces two affidavits with regard to Mr. Sifton, there is no affidavit with regard to the other three men, Mr. Walkinshaw, Mr. Prince, or Mr. Sullivan; no denial at all of the extraordinary conduct of the provincial authorities with reference to them; no explanation of their being deprived without justification, of their liberty, of their being taken about from place to place, denied an opportunity of seeing counsel, and at last, after the purpose for which they had been arrested had been accomplished, when the election was over they were discharged without a trial and without anybody being able to produce one tittle of evidence against them. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to think for a moment of what it means to the people of Canada if this Parliament should justify conduct like that. If this Parliament will justify the prostitution of the courts of justice for political ends so that the liberty of the subject can be taken away until certain designs are accomplished, will not the effect be disastrous upon the people of Canada? This is not a matter that affects Manitoba alone; it affects the liberty of the subject: it affects the right of the whole people of this country to have the forms of law obeyed, and there is no more elementary principle governing the administration of justice than that a man's liberty shall not be taken away except in pursuance of the provisions of the law. But what does the Minister of Public Works say? He says in effect: Oh well, although there may not have been a proper information, although the proper charge may not have been made in accordance with the law, yet these people had operated in elections in the province of Saskatchewan and it served them right to be arrested and to be confined until the election was over.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario): What were they doing there?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not care what they were doing there; I have no knowledge of what they were doing there; and I say to my hon. friend, and he should know it as a lawyer, that no matter what may have been a man's previous life, no matter what may have been his object in going into a constituency, until he is guilty of some wrong-doing which comes within the provisions of the law, and a proper information is laid against him so that he can be legally arrested, it is a prostitution of the machinery of justice to take away his liberty.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE (Lisgar): That is what has been done in this case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Can the hon. gentleman say that he has ever seen any person arrested on suspicion—I never have—except on proper information? Let me ask this: is it not one of the most elementary principles of justice that when a man is arrested he shall be taken as speedily as possible before a Justice of the Peace, and if the crime is not clearly made out with the information against him, or is not of a very serious character, such as murder, or some other very serious crime, he shall be admitted to bail? He is to be allowed to see his lawyer and make preparations for his defence, and he is to see the charge that is laid against him. But in these cases the men were taken to jail by constables. One was taken to Winnipeg, another to Portage la Prairie. They were treated as criminals of the vilest character; treated as men who had committed some grave offence; and at last, when the election is over, the magistrate is told, 'We have no evidence whatever to offer against these gentlemen,' and they depart from the court of justice as innocent men. Can the hon. gentlemen opposite justify conduct like that? It would be bad enough if that had been done by officers of the law on their own initiative. Officers sometimes make mistakes. They sometimes arrest people whom they have no right to arrest; but in this particular case, the Premier of Manitoba and the hon. the Minister of Public Works took the matter out of the Department of Justice, and took charge of it themselves; and Sir Rodmond Roblin in a speech, which has been quoted by my hon. friend the member for Edmonton, does not say: 'I have placed this matter in the hands of the Department of Justice with instructions to see that if these people commit any wrong they shall be arrested, and the necessary steps taken to punish them,' but what he says is, 'I know these men; I have given instructions that they shall be arrested.' We find from the statements contained in these affidavits, in the statement which my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) has made from the communication which he received from his son, that these police officers proceeded on the idea that their masters, the Manitoba Government, represented by Sir Rodmond Roblin, would justify whatever they might do in arresting these men, and in preventing them from taking any part in the election. You can see, Mr. Speaker, what an opportunity it would give them to win the election by these means. The Conservative party had their personators abroad during that election.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): Where is the proof of that?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Two of them were arrested, pleaded guilty, previous to the date set for trial, before Mr. McMicken, and were released on payment of a fine of fifty dollars. If our friends, with all the disabilities under which they were suffering, were able to arrest these two men, how many scores, how many hundreds more personators were there to vote in the names of absent voters or dead men in this constituency? If you drive our Liberal workers from the polls by threatening to arrest them, if you destroy their organization, how easy is it for the Conservative personators to get in their work and add many hundreds to the majority which the Conservative candidate might obtain.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before proceeding to deal with the reference made in the Speech from the Throne to the naval question, I would like, in order to avoid doing any injustice to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, to make a further brief reference to the Macdonald by-election scandal. I find that the minister gave a reason why these four men who were arrested under the circumstances set forth in the affidavits produced, had not been prosecuted. It is only just to my hon. friend that I should again give that statement, and it will be for this House and the country to judge whether or not his reason is a good and sufficient one. I quote from page 229 of 'Hansard':

Mr. ROGERS: I have told the hon. gentleman already why they were not prosecuted, and I will again.

I have examined the previous part of this speech, but I cannot observe where he made reference to that reason.

Sifton has been regarded as a public nuisance in that province for years, and if he was not prosecuted it was not because there was not abundance of evidence against him on which to base a prosecution——

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Will the hon. gentleman permit me——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not want to ask a question if the minister does not want to give way. I was going to ask the minister why he does not initiate prosecutions now against this gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS: If the hon. gentleman will wait a minute I will tell him. The hon. gentleman opposite told us here the other day that a protest had been entered against the election of the member for Macdonald, and I now tell these gentlemen opposite that a counter protest has been entered against their candidate, and we expect that the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite will be revealed to the public, and will not further be tolerated in this country. We are going to see that there shall be placed before the courts of the country a full and through examination of the records of the Liberals in that constituency.

That, apparently, is the reason why these four gentlemen were not prosecuted. that there has been an election protest entered, and they intend to enter a counter protest. Under the election law a protest cannot be entered until after declaration day, and, therefore, the Conservatives would not know whether there was to be a protest or not, and could not enter a counter protest until the main protest had been filed. But these four gentlemen were all dismissed before the day of the election, and before my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works could know whether or not there was to be a protest entered against the candidate who was elected. The House may therefore judge as to the weight which should be given to that most extraordinary explanation submitted by the Minister of Public Works as to why these prosecutions were not carried to a conclusion, and why these four gentlemen—or three of them, at all events —were sent out from the court with a declaration from the prosecuting attorney that there was no evidence against them. It has been stated to the House that Mr. Prince, Mr. Walkinshaw and Mr. Sullivan have entered suits for damages for false arrest against Mr. Stedman and Mr. Jarvis, the two gentlemen who made the extraordinary affidavits read yesterday by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works.

I observe, Mr. Speaker, that in the Speech from the Throne His Royal Highness has been asked by his advisers to say that:

> During the past summer four members of my Government conferred in London with His Majesty's government on the question of Naval Defence. Important discussions took place and conditions have been disclosed which in the opinion of my advisers render it imperative that the effective naval forces of the Empire should be strengthened without delay. My advisers are convinced that it is the duty of Canada at this juncture to afford reasonable and necessary aid for that purpose. A Bill will be introduced accordingly.

It appears to me that in a matter of such great importance, and in which the people of Canada are so deeply interested, it would have been but reasonable that some information should already have been submitted to this House from which hon. gentlemen would have been able to judge as to the proper course to pursue when called upon to discuss the question, and to vote upon the Government's proposition. But so far the House and the people of the country have been kept absolutely in the dark as to the result of the communications between the ministers and the British Government. Only a few days before the election in Hochelaga my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, who has been a member of this Government for some fourteen months, in addressing a meeting of the electors, told them that he was ignorant as to what the documents would disclose, but that when he had an opportuuity of reading them he would then make up his mind as to what would be his duty so far as the naval question was concerned. My hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre) who with the aid of the Liberals of that constituency, succeeded—and I am glad he did succeed—in defeating the Nationalist candidate by such an overwhelming majority; even he, in addressing that constituency, told the people that he was not aware of what the documents, as he called them, would disclose, but that after he had had an opportunity of reading them, he would make up his mind as to what course he would pursue. A sorry spectacle, is it not, Mr. Speaker? Two members of the Government go before a constituency in one of the provinces of this Dominion and tell the people that even they are unaware what the documents relating to the naval question would disclose, or what course they would pursue when the naval proposals would come before the House.

The Address moved in reply to the Speech from the Throne is very meagre as to detail. It has not followed, as has been the practice in recent years, the course in former times adopted in this House, as well as in all deliberative assemblies modelled upon the Parliament of the Mother Country, to go into detail in regard to the different paragraphs of the Speech. It does seem to me that it would have been well if, upon this important question, the attention of His Royal Highness had been called to the fact that this question of naval defence is not a new one so far as this Parliament in concerned. It would, I think, have been well to have invited the consideration of His Royal Highness and his advisers to the fact that as long ago as the session of 1909 this House emphatically placed itself on record as being prepared to take whatever course was necessary for the defence of our country and the Empire. I intend to read the resolution which was unanimously passed on the 26th of March, 1909, so that it will again appear in 'Hansard,' and be placed before the people of this country. The resolution was as follows:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House reaffirms the opinion, repeatedly expressed by representatives of Canada, that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions the payment of any stated contribution to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be a satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House has observed with satisfaction the relief afforded in recent years to the taxpayers of the United Kingdom through the assumption by the Canadian people of considerable military expenditure formerly charged upon the Imperial treasury.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and the honour of the Empire.

In view of that resolution, unanimously passed, in the session of 1909, when my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was leading the Government of this country, expressing so strongly the loyal sentiments of the people of this country, irrespective of party, would it not have been well if in the Speech from the Throne reference had been made to that resolution, instead of conveying the impression that now, for the first time, was the Government of this country asking Parliament to do its duty towards the defence of the Empire? I have not a shadow of doubt that that resolution expresses the almost universal sentiments of the people of this country.

I am glad that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) has been able to return before we entered upon a discussion of the naval question. Let me express the hope that in council he will urge upon his colleagues that we should now engage upon a policy, a truly Canadian naval policy, a policy which will be permanent in its character, the strength of which will increase as the years go by, and by which we will be able, in time of stress, to render all necessary aid to the Empire, and to have a navy which will co-operate with the Imperial navy and be of material assistance not only to Canada, but to the Empire as well. Let me express the hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will urge upon his colleagues what he so eloquently urged in 1909, that we should do our duty by Canada and the Empire with our own ships and with our own men, and that we should not hire other people to do our work.

In view of the resolution passed on the 26th of March, 1909, the late Government entered into communication with the British Admiralty, took all the pains possible to get information as to what should be done for the purpose of carrying out the resolution, and as a result of the communications and conferences which took place, tenders were invited for the construction of a number of cruisers and torpedo boat destroyers. Those tenders were received some months before the election of September, 1911. After the tenders came in it was necessary, of course, to consult the British Admiralty in order to find out what confidence the Admiralty reposed in the different builders and also to examine into their financial standing and ability to carry out their contracts. For that purpose one or two of the ministers went to England, conferred with the Admiralty and just before the elections our Government would have been prepared to intelligently award the contract upon the tenders which had been received. There were, I am glad to say, a number of tenders from firms who stand pre-eminent among the shipbuilders of the motherland, firms who had been entrusted by the Admiralty with the building of the greatest battleships of the British navy, a number of these firms were quite willing to come to Canada, to establish shipyards in our country, to employ Canadian labour, to utilize Canadian material and to build ships just as good and as well suited to the purposes of the navy as any which could be built in British shipyards.

It was thought that, as the question with regard to the navy had been raised and made a party question by our opponents, it would be as well not to award an important contract of this character until after the election. As a result of the elections of 1911 the Liberal Government no longer enjoyed the confidence of the people of the country. The people had given a mandate to the Conservative party to carry on the affairs of Canada. That party came into office. They found upon record these tenders to which I have referred. One tenderer was the firm of Campbell, Laird & Company, which has a great shipyard upon the Mersey extending, I think, for about one and a half miles along the shore of that river, one of the greatest shipyards in the United Kingdom. That firm was prepared to enter into a contract for the building of the vessels for which tenders were called, and proposed to establish a shipyard at the port of St. John. I had no personal feeling in the matter. I was not animated by any sectional or provincial feeling. Apart from the fact that I represented the constituency of St. John I would have been quite willing to have them establish their shipyards in any part of Canada, whether on the St. Lawrence or in Nova Scotia or on the coast of British Columbia. As a Canadian I would have been rejoiced to have seen a shipyard established in any part of Canada, so that we would have had these ships to have formed a part of a Canadian navy built in our own country, giving employment to our own people, and utilizing material as far as possible which could be produced in Canada. What happened? When this Government came into power there was a deposit which had been made by the Campbell, Laird Company to the amount of $100,000 as security for the faithful performance of their contract. After some months' delay this Government, acting through the Minister of Marine & Fisheries, returned the deposit to Messrs. Campbell, Laird & Company, and declared the matter at an end. In my humble judgment, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries struck a blow at the constituency which I and he represent, which may never be repaired. At the port of St. John there is a great work of harbour improvement; there is to be built one of the largest dry-docks in the world, a dry-dock which will be capable of accommodating the largest battle-ship. That work is going on pursuant to a vote of money which Parliament granted at the request of the Government of which I have the honour to be a member. That dry-dock is all to be constructed under proposals which were called for when I was also a member of the Government. But, Sir, right alongside of the dry-dock, Messrs. Campbell, Laird & Company, in conjunction with Norton—Griffiths, the contractors for the present dry-dock and harbour works, proposed to erect a great shipbuilding plant, where the ships of the Canadian navy could have been built if the contract had been awarded to them. But the Minister of Marine, for reasons which I submit to this House are without the slightest weight, declined to enter into the contract, and returned the deposit to the proposed contractors. What is the excuse that has been been given by the Minister of Marine for that? The excuse is contained in a note which Admiral Kingsmill presented stating that before the entire programme could be carried out the ships which it was proposed to build would be obsolete because of changes constantly taking place in war-vessels. The reasons given will not appeal to the common sense of any man, for if weight were attached to them no country would ever begin the construction of a navy.

If that reason were true, how foolish it would have been for Japan to have undertaken the construction of a navy, and how foolish for the United States; both of which countries have navies which are almost equal to any of the navies of the world. In the memorandum which Admiral Kingsmill presented, he suggested that it would be well to have two or three ships built in England, and in the meantime the yards could be prepared in this country, and the building of other vessels could be carried on here. We know very well that changes are taking place, but two of these ships were to be built every eighteen months in order to complete the entire contract within the six years. The privilege would be reserved in the contract to make any modifications which the Admiralty or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries might require, and, under the ordinary terms of the contract if there was any reduction in cost, the contractor should get the benefit of it, and, if there was any increase in cost, it would be paid by the country. Therefore, I think the reason which was given by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for striking this blow not only at St. John, but at the whole of Canada, is not a reason that will appeal to the judgment of any sensible man who gives any thought or study to this important subject.

But, let me say further, Mr. Speaker, that by reason of the resolution that was unanimously passed by this Parliament in 1909, it was believed that it would be the policy of this country to proceed with the building and maintenance of a Canadian navy, and great firms were induced to look to this country. Under my department, while I was Minister of Public Works, a contract was entered into with Messrs. Vickers Sons & Maxim, one of the greatest shipbuilding firms in the world, for the building of a dry dock at Montreal. That dry dock has arrived, it has been placed in position under the contract which we entered into, and I do not believe, from what I know of the communications which took place with that firm, that they would have entered into that contract, or that they would have built and brought to the port of Montreal that great dry dock, unless they had had reason to believe that it would be the settled policy of this country to construct the Canadian navy, to have ships built in Canada. I am told that right alongside of the dry dock there is ample room to place a shipbuilding plant, and that they would be prepared almost immediately to enter upon the construction of battleships as large as any which are now in the British navy. They have built many battleships, cruisers and smaller vessels for the Imperial government and they would be quite prepared, so I am told, to engage in this work in Canada. So also, upon the Pacific coast, there is a shipbuilding firm engaged in the construction of smaller vessels, it is true, but steel vessels, vessels of the character that will be required only they will require to be upon a larger scale, and it will not take very long to establish a shipbuilding plant upon the Pacific coast at which the largest vessels can be built. The same thing applies at the Port of Sydney. When the late Government were in power, plans were submitted and proposals were made for the construction of a great dry dock there, and it is recognized universally that the port of Sydney would be an admirable place for the building of ships.

In view of these facts, while we have no information as to what will be the course which the Government will ask Parliament to pursue, let me express to the House, and I do it with all sincerity, the hope that the policy which was laid down and unanimously agreed to in the session of 1909, will not be departed from, and that we shall now begin in Canada, upon as large a scale as the necessities of the Empire may require, the building of a Canadian navy, which shall be strengthened and added to from year to year, so that the navy will be a source of real strength to the Empire in time of danger. No matter what others may think, I am of the opinion that, if the Government does what the newspapers have been repeatedly suggesting it intends to do, that is, give a contribution in money to the Imperial Admiralty, and so hire the people of England to do, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us, what we ought to have the courage to do ourselves, I am satisfied that such a course will not meet with the approval of the people of Canada. I am thoroughly satisfied that what the people of Canada want is that we shall show our strength and our courage, and that we shall move forward along Canadian lines and build up a Canadian navy of the necessary strength for the service of the Empire.

I forgot to mention, Mr. Speaker, that upon the Great Lakes they have also gone into steel shipbuilding. I have had the pleasure of being at Collingwood, and I have seen magnificent steel vessels turned out of the yard there, 500 to 600 feet in length, equipped with the most powerful engines, and equal to any of the vessels of the kind built in any shipyard in Great Britain. The same skill, knowledge and enterprise will enable these builders to construct vessels of smaller size which may be brought down the lakes, such as torpedo boat destroyers, and torpedo boats. So that on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and on the Great Lakes, we have the knowledge, we have the skill, and I am sure we have the courage, to enter upon this work and to do our duty, a duty which devolves upon us as a part of the great Empire to which we belong.

Let me beg my hon. friends opposite to reconsider their relations with the Nationalist party of Quebec. The hon. Postmaster General admits that those gentlemen who were their allies but a short time ago, during the elections of 1911, have demanded of him that he should pursue a course which, in his judgment, might lead to civil war. Let me call his attention to the fact that the only reason—and he knows it, and all hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House know it—why this Government is not prepared to-day to bring down a permanent policy for adding to the naval strength of the Empire is because they have made a pledge to the Nationalists that they will not do so until they submit the question to the people. My hon. friend has parted company with some of those who are most disloyal in their utterances. Let me implore him, let me implore his colleagues, and let me implore the right hon. Prime Minister, in the interest of the people of this country, and in the interest of the Empire, to go still further and break entirely away from the Nationalists and refuse to be bound by the secret pledge which they gave when they came in, that the question should first be submitted to the people. My hon. friend knows that while the ministers were in England making those silly and mischievous speeches, speeches almost as mischievous as that which the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Hughes) made in British Columbia in his reference to Germany, they were not making those speeches in order to influence the loyal people of this country. The people of Canada, from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific, need no urging to give aid to the Empire, but all those speeches were made for the benefit of the Nationalist wing of the Conservative party in Quebec. They were made for my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk); they were made for others. They did not have the desired effect upon him, and so far as we have observed from the statements in the newspapers, they have not yet had an effect upon the Nationalist wing of the party generally. They still demand that the secret pledge shall be carried out, and that this Government shall not engage upon a permanent policy for the defence of the Empire until the question has first been submitted to the people. But in the meantime, they are going, so the newspapers say, to make a contribution of money, because they have discovered an emergency. Well, we do not know what the papers will disclose, but I venture to say that my hon. friends the ministers who went to England, went there hunting for an emergency, and if our information is correct, they have not found it yet. My hon. friend the member for Brandon (Mr. Aikens) also went over, and, always anxious to assist the Government, of which he is so prominent a supporter, he went to Germany to see if he could find something there. When he came back he told the people that Germany and England were actually at war.

Mr. AIKENS : Where did my hon. friend find such a statement ?

Mr. PUGSLEY : I saw it in several Conservative papers.

Mr. AIKENS : Will my hon. friend read the exact words contained in those papers, or the statement in effect ?

Mr. PUGSLEY : Yes. The statement which my hon. friend was reported to have made was that he had been over in Germany and in England, and that the two peoples were to-day actually at war.

Mr. LEMIEUX : What do you say about that ?

Mr. PUGSLEY : I was not surprised at my hon. friend's statement ; knowing the flights that his imagination takes at times, I would not be surprised at anything he might say.

I will not detain the House longer. Let me just say in conclusion that the Government knows what the policy of the Liberal party was. The Government has before it the resolution unanimously passed by this Parliament. In any policy which looks toward the building of a great and strong Canadian navy, which looks towards having that navy controlled by the people of Canada, a navy which shall be strong and great, and always available for the defence of Canada, and in times of stress for the defence of the Empire—if that should be their policy when they bring it down—they will receive the hearty and loyal support of the Liberal members of Parliament and of the Liberal electors in Canada, from one end of the country to the other, irrespective of province, irrespective of race, irrespective of creed.

Mr. G. W. FOWLER (Kings and Albert): At the outset, I must congratulate my hon. friend the member for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) on the form of his speech. I have heard the hon. gentleman on many occasions, but never have I heard him so eloquent as he was this afternoon and this evening. I congratulate him, and I do so most heartily and most honestly upon the form of his speech; but I use the word 'form' advisedly, because I must take serious objection to the matter of his speech, which was misleading, and in which he misinterpreted and distorted facts. When he had no facts to distort, he relied upon that fertile imagination of his to supply them. I am going to follow my hon. friend seriatim, taking up the different items which he discussed, and I shall try to show in what respects my hon. friend has wandered far from the facts.

In the first place, and I do not know why, the hon. member took up the question of cement, and he told us that the price of cement in St. John was $1.80 a barrel, whereas the price at the American mills was, I think, 60c. I do not know what experience he has had in the purchase of cement, but if that has been his experience, I must tell the hon. gentleman that he has been badly imposed upon by the persons from whom he purchased his cement, because within the past four weeks I, myself, have bought in St. John a car of cement, and the actual cost to me was $1.38. If, therefore, the hon. gentleman paid $1.80 for his cement, he had better change the merchant from whom he purchased it. It must be remembered in discussing the retail price, or even the price by the carload, that cement is a very bulky material, that we have no cement mills in St. John or near it—they are hundreds of miles away—and that the freight is a very important consideration. When you come to take into consideration the freight, and the different hands through which cement has to pass in the way of wholesale and retail merchants, you will find that $1.38 is not a very high price to pay in view of the original cost. The duty on cement is 12½ cents per 100 pounds, which would come to a little more than 31c. per barrel.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are 350 pounds to the barrel.

Mr. FOWLER: Yes, that would be about 52c. This great panacea of reciprocity, I understand, would have reduced the cost a cent and a half per 100 pounds, which would make a difference of less than five cents, about 3½ or 4 cents, per barrel on the cost of cement, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, whose course in this matter was severely criticised by the late Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), cut the duty in two by the reduction he made, and reduced it by over 6 cents per 100 pounds. So much for cement.

My hon. friend next took up the question of redistribution, and he was very severe upon this Government for their course in not taking up that question at this session of Parliament. The right hon. the Prime Minister in his reply to the leader of the Opposition showed that the late Government waited nearly two years after the census of 1901 before they introduced their Redistribution Bill. The recent census was completed in March, 1912, and if the present Government take up the question of redistribution at the next session of Parliament, they will have dealt with it sooner after the close of the census than the late Government did in 1903 when they discussed redistribution. If the present Government have violated the statutes, as my hon. friend says, it is a very unfortunate thing that he was not in the House and was not a member of the late Government at that time in order that he might have prevented his friends from violating the statute in a still more flagrant manner. If the present Government have violated the statute, as he says—he did not produce the statute—they are only following in the footsteps of the late Government, and for them my hon. friend has not a word of criticism or blame with regard to that.

My hon. friend next spoke of the improvements at St. John, and he took a very great deal of credit to himself for what was done there. I do not propose to take away from the hon. gentleman's credit in that regard. I believe that the hon. the ex-Minister of Public Works did honestly and seriously try to induce his colleagues in the Government to do justice to the city of St. John, one of the great ports of this Dominion. But he had a hard task before him. He had a difficult task to convince those gentlemen who did not have very much faith or confidence in the Maritime provinces and whose sole desire was to trade, not through our own Canadian ports, but through the ports of a foreign nation. When the Transcontinental scheme was before Parliament, and when they had an opportunity to safeguard the interests of Eastern Canada by providing that all the freight originating along the line of that railway should be carried through Canadian ports, they turned down the proposition of the Conservatives in this House, which would have brought about that result. And why? It is because they were more interested in building up the ports of a foreign country than they were in the prosperity of the ports of their native land. The hon. gentleman is entitled to very great credit for the improvements in St. John harbour, but it ill becomes him to attempt to derogate from the credit that is due the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) for all he has done for the port of St. John since this Government came to power. In season and out of season the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) has been insistent that this great scheme which is going to do so much for the port of St. John should be carried on with all the expedition possible. My constituency is within three miles of the post office of St. John city and the interests of that constituency are absolutely bound up, not indirectly but directly, with the prosperity of the city and port of St. John, and consequently, I thought it was my duty to, in my humble way, do all I could towards seconding the efforts of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. But, what did the Liberals when they were in power do about the improvements in the port of St. John? The tenders were called for and were in on the 10th of August, 1911, and the Liberal administration held office until the middle of October and yet nothing was done. Why was not the contract let before they went to the country? My own opinion is that notwithstanding the efforts that had been made by my hon. friend, his colleagues were not in earnest in forwarding that great work which is now progressing so rapidly under the fostering care of the present administration. My hon. friend told us that Courtenay bay was his baby. It must be a source of keen regret to the hon. gentleman that the founts of life, so far as he was concerned, were dried up on the 21st of September, 1911, and that he had to put this baby out to foster parents.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It has a sort of a step mother now.

Mr. FOWLER: Yes, but a very kindly stepmother; not the kind in the story books, but a real and kind stepmother such a one as in some instances is far better than the real mother.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I may have it back bye and bye.

Mr. FOWLER: Let me assure my hon. friend that his so-called baby will not be neglected by the present ministry, that it will be cherished and nourished and brought up to a much more healthy maturity than were it left to the neglect of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues.

The question of the Hudson Bay railway has been so ably dealt with by my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) that there remains little to say. It is equally true in the case of the Hudson bay railway as in the case of the Georgian bay canal and other great national enterprises, that they were dangled before the people of this country merely for whatever party advantage could be got out of them by the Liberal administration. It was not until the present Government came to power that anything tangible was done in regard to the Hudson Bay railway.

The hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) has spoken with regard to the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway, and he must know that it is not to be expected that all the promises which a party makes can be fulfilled in the first year of office. Let not the hon. gentleman be disturbed with regard to what is to come on this branch line question. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that the pledge given by the Prime Minister with regard to this matter will be carried out to the very letter and that the branch lines will become part of the great Intercolonial railway system as they should be. The Liberal party was in power for a long time and the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) was himself a not uninfluential member of the administration, and, if he is now so anxious with regard to the branch lines will he tell me why during all the time he was Minister of Public Works nothing was done?

Mr. PUGSLEY: We got the Bill.

Mr. FOWLER: Yes, you got the Bill; you were great people for getting things on paper; you were great for giving paper promises and verbal promises as well, but when it came to performance you were most lamentably weak. There is no gentleman in this country who is stronger on political promises than is my hon. friend, and, as I am reminded, particularly on the eve of an election.

As to the trade question, to show the unfairness of the argument of the hon. member, I may mention that he spoke as though the present administration and its supporters were against having trade with the United States. A more ridiculous assertion could not be made, and I was surprised that the hon. member, who is a man of very great intelligence, would venture before such an audience, to make such a statement. The supporters of the present administration are not opposed to trade with the United States, but we do insist that that trade shall be on terms as fair to us as it is to the people of the United States, and the reciprocity treaty upon which the Liberals ran the last election and on which they were so gloriously defeated, was not fair to us.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought you gentlemen wanted no truck at all with the United States.

Mr. FOWLER: The hon. gentlemen is only joking when he makes a statement of that kind. These gentlemen opposite told us that if we rejected reciprocity it was going to end all trade with the United States, and yet the hon. gentleman quoted figures to-night to show that during the term of office of the present administration our trade with the United States has tremendously increased. This shows that the people of the United States are sensible people. It shows that because Canadians had the good sense to turn down a bargain that was two-thirds in favour of the Americans and one-third in our favour, they do not resent it by foolishly proposing to lessen their trade with Canada, which is to-day the most valuable trade of all foreign trades to the people of the United States. I am glad to hear from my hon. friend that our trade with the United States has increased, and I will tell him why it has increased. The reason is that this country is increasing so vastly in population and development that our manufacturers are unable to keep pace with the increasing growth of the country and so more manufactured goods have to be imported from the United States. Coal, that coal which is used in manufacturing, is one of the largest items of the increased trade between us, and more coal is needed to turn out the increased products of the Canadian manufacturer. And so, notwithstanding our greatly increased manufacturing in Canada and the tremendous prosperity of our manufacturers at the present time, they are unable to keep pace with the requirements of the country, and our people are obliged to import from the United States more manufactured articles in the year 1912, the most prosperous year in our history, than during any previous year. I would be glad to see that manufacturing done in Canada. My hon. friend and those who think with him would prefer to have that manufacturing done in some country outside of Canada. The hon. member for Carleton spoke the other day as though the manufacturer was a criminal in this country. 'There were none,' he said 'except those who cut down lumber in the woods, caught fish in the sea, dug coal in the mines, or ploughed the fields, who were producing wealth in this or any other country.' The manufacturer not a producer of wealth? The manufacturer who takes the raw material and by reason of his skill turns it into the finished product, making it ten times, sometimes fifty or a hundred times more valuable than the raw material? That man is not a producer, is a mere parasite, as it were? Such ridiculous nonsense! That is the sort of political economy they talk of on the other side of the House.

Let me point out another instance. Here we have the two leading Liberals from the province of New Brunswick, the hon. member for Carleton and the ex-minister from St. John. One spoke of seventy-two millions of extra duty that he said we had to pay, on imports from the United States. The other says: 'Every time you send your hay to the States'—a man ought to be prosecuted for sending hay from his own country—' and every time you send lumber to the States, you pay the duty;' and he roared it so that he could have been heard down to Queen street. The hon. ex-minister, in those sweet melodious tones of his, says, 'The consumer pays the duty,' while the hon. member for Carleton, in those harsh and strident tones of his, says, 'The producer pays the duty.' Which is right? It is a greater problem than solving the age of Anne. We will let those two great political economists fight it out between themselves, as they cannot very well both be right. That is the sort of political economy we get from gentlemen on the other side of the House—anything to catch a vote.

Mr. NESBITT: Would you mind telling us who you think pays the duty?

Mr. FOWLER: When two such learned statesmen as the member for Carleton county and the member for St. John are as wide apart as the poles, I with my humble ability and my lack of knowledge of political economy, would not dare to venture an opinion. There is an old saying that 'fools rush in where angels fear to tread.' I fear to tread. I want to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) a question. He was asked it the other day. Perhaps by this time he has screwed up his courage so that he will be able to answer. Is the hon. member for St. John in favour of reciprocity?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I may say emphatically yes.

Mr. FOWLER: I am glad we have been able to extract an answer from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is the first time my friend has asked me the question.

Mr. FOWLER: My hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Boyce) asked that question and he would not answer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member from Sault Ste. Marie was simply making a remark that he noticed on the face of the member for the county of St. John a shade of anxiety and sorrow when that was mentioned. I made the remark that the hon. member for St. John is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and not myself.

Mr. FOWLER: The usual lawyer's evasion on the part of my hon. friend. Perhaps the right hon. the leader of the Opposition will be willing to answer now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With great pleasure. We are a united party on this side. We never vary.

Mr. FOWLER: That is a still more clever lawyer's evasion. I ask the right hon. the leader of the Opposition: 'Were you in favour of reciprocity as it was presented to the people of Canada during the elections of 1911?'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I know of some Liberals who have varied their views upon that. I am not one of them. I stick to my ideas.

Mr. FOWLER: I am glad to know that. I congratulate myself upon having produced from the two leaders of the party for the first time during this session a statement on this very important point. I see the smiling face of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). Perhaps he would be willing to answer the question. Is he in favour of reciprocity between Canada and the United States, as it was set forth in the platform of the Liberal party during the elections of 1911?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was, and I am still.

Mr. FOWLER: Then the hon. gentleman has changed his views since last session.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, not a particle.

Mr. FOWLER: The hon. gentleman said the question so far as he was concerned was dead and buried.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I never said that at all. I said the reciprocity issue is dead, and at the time I spoke I think it was dead.

Mr. FOWLER: And you said it was buried too.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I don't think so. My memory may be wrong upon that point, but my language at the time was accurate in describing the situation.

Mr. FOWLER: The hon. member claimed that the issue is dead.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Was.

Mr. FOWLER: Well, it is over fourteen months ago; it ought to be buried by this time.

The hon. member for St. John paid some attention to the Postmaster General, making some quotations from certain newspapers with regard to a speech that the Postmaster General had made in some portion of the province of Quebec, and the hon. ex-minister found it almost impossible to realize that there could possibly be a difference of opinion at the present time between two parties who at one time may have been in some sort of alliance. I cannot think that the hon. gentleman was serious when he made that statement. I think the hon. gentleman must have been laughing in his sleeve when he talked along those lines, for the hon. gentleman has found himself, during his political career, in so many different situations—allied to-day with the very persons he was in opposition to yesterday, the foe of yesterday becoming the loving friend of to-day—that it should not be a matter of surprise to him to hear the hon. Minister say that his old-time associates are those with whom he is at present in enmity. I do not think the hon. gentleman was serious when he spoke that way. However, the hon. Postmaster General has the reputation of being able to take care of himself; of being able to answer any charges that may be brought against him, and replying effectively to any criticism that may be made of his public or private conduct. I therefore leave the Postmaster General to look after my hon. friend with regard to these matters.

I now come to the question of the by-elections in Macdonald and Richelieu. The ex-minister (Mr. Pugsley) waxed righteously indignant when he spoke of the things that were alleged to have taken place in Macdonald and Richelieu. One would have thought that he had never heard of such a thing as corruption, or had never known of improper conduct in elections. One would have thought that he was as innocent as a child of any knowledge of or participation in such matters. What a short memory must the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) have, when he does not remember the famous Rothesay lists; when he does not recollect when that tremendous fraud was perpetrated—a fraud combining forgery and perjury——

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOWLER: He, as Attorney General employed counsel from the city of St. John, when the motion was made by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries before the Supreme Court of New Brunswick to quash that list. The hon. ex-Minister, who has been so shocked at matters in Macdonald and Richelieu, employed counsel and paid him from the public funds of New Brunswick for the purpose of defending that gigantic fraud.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I presume my hon. friend has no desire to mislead the House; am I correct in that?

Mr. FOWLER: Certainly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken. I did not employ counsel for the purpose of defending that fraud; I simply employed counsel to watch the matter, and, that counsel was a consenting party to the quashing of the lists. It was quite proper that this should be done, and every reasonable aid was given to have the lists quashed in court.

Mr. FOWLER: The hon. gentleman was Attorney General at the time, and as such he was charged with the duty of seeing that the laws of New Brunswick were observed. He said 'hear, hear,' when I stated that these lists involved forgery and perjury——

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOWLER—and I wish to ask my hon. friend if, having counsel there as he said to watch the case, he prosecuted any of these men?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the hon. gentleman's memory will serve him rightly, he will recollect that I stated that I had no knowledge or information as to who had committed the fraud. At that time I called the attention of my hon. friend and his associates, who had stated publicly that they knew who had committed the fraud and forgery, to the fact that it was their duty to give that information to me as Attorney General, and I told them that the moment the necessary information was received, prosecution would be commenced.

Mr. FOWLER: Let me tell my hon. friend that the information was given. It was known that these lists were in the hands of friends of his party. One of those gentlemen was a Liberal councillor from the parish of Rothesay. This was well known to my hon. friend, and when he speaks of employing counsel to watch the case, we have cause to remember what that counsel did. It was in my hon. friend's own parish that this fraud was consummated, by which the total number of names constituting the voting strength of that parish was increased from 350 to 750—an addition of not less than 400 fraudulent names. My hon. friend should not be so shocked; I do not charge him with anything more than an error of omission rather than commission. I think my hon. friend is too honourable to do anything of that kind himself; but I say he was derelict in his duty as Attorney General when he did not see that those men, whether Liberal or Conservative, were properly prosecuted. Therefore my hon. friend cannot be serious when he speaks of the matters in connection with the elections in Macdonald and Richelieu.

My hon. friend has criticised very severely the conduct of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget). He made an insinuation — not in words, but by an intimation — when he spoke of that gentleman having pledged his knightly word. Sir, I am a democrat. I do not think a knightly word is any better than the word of a common man. I do not know whether my hon. friend is democratic or not; but that statement was an insinuation against knights, and he had a knight right alongside of him when he made the statement. I am surprised at the lack of courtesy shown by the hon. gentleman—for courtesy is one of the virtues for which he is noted—in not notifying the hon. member for Charlevoix that he proposed to make these intimations concerning that gentleman's conduct, so that the hon. member for Charlevoix might have been present in this House, and in a position to make a satisfactory explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY : In view of the fact that this amendment was moved on the first day of this debate, and that it was distinctly brought to the notice of the members of the House, does not my hon. friend think that the duty devolved upon the hon. member for Charlevoix to be present in this House ? That hon. gentleman has not been here, so far as I have observed, for some few days. I think he ought to be here, and I may add that I consider it the duty of the Minister of Public Works to have given that member due notice to be here.

Mr. FOWLER : The hon. member for Charlevoix has been here, but during all the time he was present none of the gentlemen who sat on the other side said one word in regard to the Richelieu election.

Mr. PUGSLEY : Does not the hon. gentleman realize that it was the duty of the hon. Minister of Public Works to have notified the hon. gentleman from Charlevoix to be present ?

Mr. FOWLER : I have no doubt the hon. member for Charlevoix will be here in due time, and give such an answer to his traducers as will cause them to hang their heads in shame. They based their whole charge against him on the statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works that he gave no authority for anything of this kind to be done. But it is only recently that a change in the personnel of the Department of Public Works has taken place. Might it not be possible, and is it not highly probable, if any conversation took place between the hon. member for Charlevoix and the Minister of Public Works, that it took place between him and the late incumbent of that office, and not the present Minister of Public Works ? The election for Richelieu, as I remember it, was held just before or after the retirement of the late minister, and it is quite possible, and I have no doubt it is the case, that when the conversation took place it was between the late minister and the member for Charlevoix. I have no hesitation in saying that if an hon. member for this House on either side should go into a constituency and represent himself as being charged with a certain message to the people of that constituency from a minister of the Crown, and the statement so made was absolutely false, I say that member would be doing a very dishonourable thing indeed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOWLER: And I think that would be the common verdict of every hon. member. Therefore I say that the hon. member who makes that charge against the member for Charlevoix should be very careful of his ground because he is making a serious charge and he should have learned from both the Minister of Public Works and the ex-Minister, whether, in either case, the member had received the instructions he claims to have received.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My remarks are based entirely on the fact that the report states that he pledged to the electors that he had the assistance of Mr. Rogers. Mr. Rogers is the gentleman specifically named.

Mr. FOWLER: My hon. friend was not really so much shocked perhaps at this very thing as he professed to be. My hon. friend must remember the world-famed Leary telegram which was conceived in fraud and born in iniquity and my hon. friend was present at the conception and also at the birth.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When was that?

Mr. FOWLER: Oh what a memory has my hon. friend! He has actually forgotten the Leary telegram.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was it fifty years ago?

Mr. FOWLER: It was several years ago, but the unfortunate part about a public man's career is that the public remembers away back in the beginning. My hon. friend may have blotted this out from his memory, he may have forgotten what he wishes to forget, but unfortunately the public has a better memory and so they all know about the Leary telegram.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If that event occurred thirty or forty years ago——

Mr. FOWLER: It is scarcely that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I happen to know that long after that my hon. friend was a very loyal and warm supporter of mine, long after thirty years ago.

Mr. FOWLER: Not since the Leary telegram, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY When was that?

Mr. FOWLER: Let me say that I never cast a vote for the hon. gentleman, I never professed to cast a vote for him. The only time I supported the hon. gentleman was in the year 1895 when the hon. gentleman was the Tory candidate for the county of Kings. I am surprised that my hon. friend would refer to that, but I have no desire to wound him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I was referring to was when I was in the Provincial Legislature and the hon. gentleman was my warm supporter.

Mr. FOWLER: Never, never, never, not so. The only time I sat in the local House was the three years when the hon. gentleman was not there at all. He was the very efficient law clerk of the local legislature of the province of New Brunswick when I happened to be a member of that body. Let us hope that the passing of the years has brought with it, as it often does, penitence on the part of the hon. gentleman, that he really now feels shocked at the things that never shocked him before. If that be the case, if he is sorry for the Leary telegram and for the Rothesay list in his county in connection with it, I will be the last person to upbraid him with these things, if it is real penitence he feels. But I think it is only mock-penitence; I fear it was only mock indignation which he expressed at what took place in Macdonald. Telegrams? He sent a telegram to the Hon. Mr. Templeman, of Victoria, on nomination day saying they proposed to spend $3,000,000 in the harbour of Victoria. What did he send that for?

Mr. PELLETIER: To synchronize.

Mr. FOWLER: Why did he send it then? Was it necessary to assure Mr. Templeman that he was going to spend this money? Mr. Templeman was a member of the Government who surely knew that this money was to be spent, that telegram was not necessary to re-assure Mr. Templeman, but he felt it was necessary or Mr. Templeman felt it was necessary to assure the electors of Victoria, and that is why it was sent, to influence the electors, to induce them to vote for Mr. Templeman, and fearing lest the electors would not take the word of my hon. friend he got the endorsement of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. But the result showed that the electorate of Victoria were a very wise people, an intelligent electorate as I know them to be, and no better proof of that can be found than the fact that they sent to this House as their representative the present member for Victoria.

My hon. friend called particular attention to a couple of affidavits in the report regarding Macdonald, and he asked me to read them carefully. The inference he drew from their being alike was not that the two men had seen the same thing the same way. That was the reasonable conclusion that most men would draw, that when two men described an occurrence in the same way they were both present and both telling the truth, but my hon. friend, with the legal ability for which he is so famous, for let me say that in all Canada I doubt if there is my hon. friend's superior as a lawyer, what conclusion does he draw? Why that the whole thing is a fraud and he says it was evidently written by a lawyer. What has been the experience of my hon. friend with regard to the drawing of affidavits? Is it his experience that, when a man comes into his office to swear to an affidavit, the man drafts it himself in his own language, and signs it and presents it to be sworn? Is it not the experience of my hon. friend that the lawyer gets his facts from the party who is to swear to the affidavit, in his own language, and then he, the lawyer, draws the affidavit? I appeal to my legal brethren in this House if that is not the invariable rule and custom. It is only natural that these affidavits should appear to be couched in the same language because they are swearing to the facts, they both saw them, they both knew them, and my hon. friend has certainly gone far afield when he tries to show that these affidavits are false simply because they are couched in the same language.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think my hon. friend will agree with me that he has heard over and over again the supreme court of our province say that it is always suspicious when you find that an affidavit is apparently in the language of the lawyer who drew it up because the affidavit ought to be in the language, as far as possible, of the deponent. In this particular case these two affidavits are identical, word for word. Even to the smallest preposition, everything in the two affidavits is identical.

Mr. FOWLER: I do not recall that the court in New Brunswick or any judge of that court ever made such a statement, and I would say to any court or any judge that made a statement of that kind that they were casting upon the lawyers of this country an odious and false insinuation.

Another criticism which my hon. friend makes with regard to the Macdonald election is that they released these men. Well, it serves the Manitoba Government, or whoever was responsible for the release of these men, right to be criticised for it in this House. They had in this constituency of Macdonald a lot of election crooks, they were sent into the constituency for the purpose not only of debauching the electorate but of trying to switch the election, conduct at which these gentlemen were experts, and with a magnanimity which the hon. gentleman is unable to understand or comprehend, after the election was over and they had won they said:

Let the poor devils go; they were only tools anyhow. Yet, for this magnanimous conduct Sir Rodmond Roblin and others are subject to the criticism which we have heard in this House. My hon. friend says that never in the whole history of this country were men arrested without a charge being made. Why, it is a common thing. If there is a horse race going on at the Woodbine, or near Montreal, or a great circus being held, that is the time the crooks gather around to pick pockets and any man who has attended these gatherings—my hon. friend may not go, but I am sure that my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) will bear me out when I say——

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not hear the remark, so I would like it repeated in order to see whether I can bear the hon. gentleman out.

Mr. FOWLER: I will take it for granted that the hon. gentleman will bear me out, and I will not repeat the remark.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, we must have this settled. I do not want my name brought into the debate in which I have taken no part. If the remark is repeated, I can say whether I can bear the hon. gentleman out or not.

Mr. FOWLER: I made a little, innocent allusion to the hon. gentleman, but I did not mean to offend him. I would not offend him for the world.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not offended.

Mr. FOWLER: I said that it was a very customary thing that at races, where many people were gathered together, crooks will attend as well as honest men, and that the police gather in these crooks. I said that if the hon. ex-Minister does not attend these places, perhaps the hon. member for South Wellington would be able to confirm what I had said. Maybe he does not attend them, and if he does not so much the better.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot confirm what my hon. friend says, so that we will have to take his word for it.

Mr. FOWLER: Very well, then, I take it for granted that my hon. friend does not go, or else I take it for granted that at the places where he has gone the crooks have not been arrested. I have not any personal allusions to my hon. friend and I hope my hon. friend will give me credit for sincerity in making that statement. So, I say, it is not an uncommon thing in point of fact for crooks, or suspicious persons, to be arrested under these circumstances, for men who are looked upon as being crooks and pickpockets to be taken into custody. When men came into the constituency of Macdonald, having no known business, and who were known to have been connected with election frauds before, these people did the wise thing when they arrested them without warrant or without charge. It was necessary for them to be so arrested. My hon. friend would have had them wait until they had stolen the election. The best thing is to lock the stable door before the horse is stolen and drive the thieves off with a shotgun.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And then discharge them on the ground that they are innocent.

Mr. FOWLER: No, I have already told the reason why they discharged them.

My hon. friend lastly referred to the naval question. He spoke very eloquently and very well on this naval question and the duty which we owed to the Empire. I am glad to know that my hon. friend recognizes the duty which we owe to the Empire, not to England, but to the Empire of which we form a part, a duty to maintain in—as great efficiency?—no, Mr. Speaker, considering what foreign nations are doing in the way of building navies, in far greater efficiency than ever before the navy of the Empire upon which the welfare and safety, and the very life itself of this country depends. Who is there, however disloyal he may be to England, that would desire that Canada should come under the yoke of the foreigner? We could not under the present circumstances, even if we so desired, be independent in this country. If we were to break those bonds, light as air though stronger than iron, which bind us to Great Britain, some foreign enemy would gobble us up and we would find that we had exchanged the light government of England for the yoke of slavery. In my opinion nothing is of such great importance to the welfare of the Empire as a strong, united, not a disunited, navy. Why, the afternoon papers have shown us something that should stir the patriotism of every man in this country from Halifax to Vancouver. We are told in the afternoon despatches that the native princes of India have dedictated to the Empire's navy three superdreadnoughts and nine cruisers. The other day we were told that the Malay States, which are under the protection only of Great Britain, had provided for a dreadnought for the Imperial navy.

That is what the dusky-skinned sons of the East are doing for Great Britain. Shall we, the fair-haired sons of Canada, who have boasted that we are the proudest jewel in the Empire's Crown, be behind the Hindu in what we shall do for this Empire of ours? I am sure that the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) will see to it that we take a step or two in advance of the Hindu at least.

Before I sit down, I wish to refer to a remark or two made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). That hon. gentleman tried to show the great advantages we had lost by voting against reciprocity. He said the Liberal party had lost all but its honour; some of us had thought they had not very much of that left. He stated that the price of potatoes in Maine was $1.45 a barrel, while the price in his town of Woodstock, was only $1. Knowing the hon. member for Carleton pretty well, I was afraid that he had misstated the facts, and so a telegram was sent to Woodstock, the town from which the hon. gentleman comes, and I will read the answer to that telegram. My hon. friend the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) pointed out some of the inconsistencies in the speech of the hon. gentleman, and I will just read this telegram to see if it will disclose another.

Understand that Mr. Carvell made statement yesterday in the House that potatoes were forty-five cents per barrel higher in Maine than in New Brunswick. If correctly reported same is gross misrepresentation. Have just communicated with largest shippers at Bridgewater, Maine. Their price to-day on potatoes just ten cents per barrel higher than at Florenceville, New Brunswick, which points form a fair comparison. Prices generally for the past month have ruled about even between Maine and New Brunswick. To-day market reported easier on American side. Our market firm.

That disposes of the argument that the hon. gentleman was trying to make with regard to the benefits of reciprocity in the county which he has the honour to represent, a county very strong in the matter of potatoes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the hon. gentleman give us the name of the party signing that telegram?

Mr. FOWLER: Yes, it is a name well known in New Brunswick, and respected wherever known. The name is B. F. Smith, not John, but B. F.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm): (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I listened with pleasure and interest to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Fowler). That hon. gentleman has argued his case very forcibly and eloquently, and is entitled to our congratulations on that account.

I have the honour to represent the county of Montcalm, a purely agricultural constituency, which formerly was pledged to the Conservative party; and I can assure you, Sir, that I found it a hard task to secure my return, having to fight both Conservatives and Nationalists who had joined hands to wage war on the late Government. We found it a rather difficult matter to have them accept the navy bill which had been passed by the late Parliament.

Conservatives and Nationalists were both very loud in their condemnation of that disastrous, outrageous piece of legislation, as well as of the whole policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government.

More particularly the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier, representing the constituency in which I have the honour to reside, would cry out: 'Down with the navy; we owe nothing to Great Britain, absolutely nothing. It is Great Britain's duty to protect us, not ours to protect Great Britain'. Then he would add in mournful tones: How grieved I am at the thought of having to separate from my leader, for Sir Wilfrid Laurier's policy is objectionable, but Mr. Borden is even worse.

Subsequently I learned of the entry into the Cabinet of the same man who had denounced that measure. How changed from his former stand! Our opponents were prone to say: 'Should the Laurier government be defeated at the polls, should we be carried to power, that outrageous legislation will be repealed forthwith; it will disappear from our statute books.'

I wonder if that is now an accomplished fact. These gentlemen were to ask for a plebiscite on the navy question; the people were to be consulted in that connection. That plebiscite is still to come; expectations have not been fulfilled. Of course, those hon. gentlemen scoured the province of Quebec under the leadership of Henri Bourassa, of Armand Lavergne (the hon. Postmaster General's manager), of Mr. Monk, head minister for the province of Quebec, and all along their journey flags and bunting bordered the roads, bearing the words: 'Down with the navy.' In my constituency there were such flags floating from every tree, along every highway, over cheese factories, butter factories, blacksmith shops, &c. 'Down with the navy,' they said, and some would even add: The navy be d——

Well, Sir, I had a hard time of it in my constituency. Recklessly I agreed to encounter the leader of the gang, Mr. Bourassa, who had challenged me to meet him. I discussed the political issues with him and his friends who surrounded him, especially the "half-leader" Prévost. I rejoiced at seeing them all there. I recalled to Mr. Prévost times of bygone days when I was fighting by his father's side, a great orator, surnamed the lion of the North, and deservedly so. How edifying it was to hear Mr. Bourassa brand Mr. Prévost a perjurer, a boodler, he even added a rake because the latter had come back from Belgium accompanied by young lady secretaries, and everybody saw the point. I said: 'You are mistaken, I have had Mr. Prévost as an opponent, and I knew him to be true and honest; I believe him to be so yet. When you accuse him of being a perjurer, a boodler and a rake, you are a contemptible liar.'

But Conservatives vociferously applauded. I heard the gentleman who entered the Cabinet recently, the Secretary of State, while attending meetings at St. Eustache and St. Henri, joins with the other in crying: 'Down with the navy. A navy is of no use to us, and we do not owe anything to Great Britain.' And to-day these same people exclaim: 'Hurrah, three cheers for the navy.' From that we may judge how sincere they are.

The former Prime Minister must have perceived on May 15 last that the electors of the province of Quebec had discovered the error of their ways. They made amends for past mistakes, and they will make further amends at the next general elections. These gentlemen who to-day are clamouring loudly for a navy will have their turn bye and bye. Beware, the people have a good memory, the people do not readily forget. Did not the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres (Mr. Rainville), who was a Nationalist at the time, go through his county with the cry: 'Cut out the navy, we have no use for the navy; we must not send out our children to be butchered, they should not be made to serve as targets for guns, as Mr. Laurier would have it?' To his mind Sir Wilfrid was a wicked man, a wretched fellow, willing to sacrifice anything for Great Britain's sake. That was the gossip at every street corner.

And to make success still more certain, Mr. Bourassa, the so-called champion of provincial autonomy, the vindicator of our rights in the Dominion, was taken from place to place. The Liberal party made the mistake of letting them have a free hand in the matter, they allowed that campaign of insult, slander and falsehood to be carried on unimpeded. Thus did our opponents succeed in moulding public opinion, and when the general elections were on, we lost some of our best men who suffered defeat. It was contended in every quarter that the Navy Bill was obnoxious, was outrageous, that our children would be constrained to take part in all Great Britain's wars, that they would have to fight even the Japanese or the Chinese. Thus they spoke at the time, but they tell quite another story now.

The hon. member for Chambly-Verchères has given up all his former associates, Liberals as well as Nationalists, and now he is an out and out Conservative. He waves a three-striped ensign, a tricolor; but before the next election comes on, he may change once more. Notwithstanding which, I very much fear he will be defeated.

I see in the Speech from the Throne that the Governor General is made to say how pleased he is at witnessing the prosperity enjoyed by the country at large. As a matter of fact the country is prosperous, but if His Royal Highness had travelled through the country in 1893, in 1894 and in 1896, I wonder if he would have made a similar statement. Going through the cities, he says, I found everywhere evidences of the greatest prosperity. That is a state of things quite different from what existed under the Conservative rule. Then trade was stagnant, business failures were on the increase, agriculture neglected, manufactures just holding their own, or even winding up in many cases. Is it not striking that with the same tariff, the same available labour, and under the same management, prosperity should have set in after 1896. How can such a change be accounted for? To my mind, if with the same tariff, the same territory, the same men, the same help, the same soil and the same brains, an extraordinary wave of prosperity has set in, that is due to the fact that there was a change of leadership in the meantime, and that for a period of fifteen years Sir Wilfrid Laurier has governed the country.

To my mind that conclusion stands out clearly: the management of affairs has passed into different hands. For instance when we reached power the rate of postage on letters was three cents.

Mr. PELLETIER: There were many dead letters.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Yes, on account of so many people going over to the United States. Fully one-third of the people had crossed the border; no wonder if nobody was found at home; they had all departed for the States. But since Sir Wilfrid Laurier's coming into power, letters easily get to their destination, because our people have flocked back to Canada in large numbers. Nevertheless, at the time, the Post Office Department showed deficits from year to year. On taking charge of that department the Liberal Postmaster General cut down the rate on letters to two cents, and instead of former deficits, surpluses were obtained from year to year. That is a rather extraordinary result. Of course that was the result of good management, and the present Postmaster General took up that department in a very flourishing state, yielding heavy surpluses. Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be such a condition of things which induces him to do away with all the officers appointed by the late government; to deprive whole families of their only means of support. In my constituency he dismissed postmen, poor people eking out a living by means of hard work. 'He is a Liberal,' he would say, 'let us put him out.' He dismissed postmasters because they had voted for me, poor people who had been doing the work for twenty or thirty years.

A commissioner was sent over to my constituency to inquire—Mr. Bergeron, a good fellow, a good citizen, but who had suffered defeat at the last election. He was on the wrong side, and people would not have anything more to do with him. He was appointed commissioner at a salary of $15 a day, plus his travelling expenses. He succeeded in carrying on mock inquiries. 'Did you take part in the election?' would he inquire. 'Did you vote?' 'Well, yes,' the poor man would answer. 'I did vote.' 'I am a Liberal.' 'That is all I want to know, the inquiry is over, and be off.'

You may rest assured, Sir, that if the hon. Postmaster General turns up in Montcalm at the next election, he will have a hard time of it. He can make a good speech and find his way out of difficulties all right enough, but he will soon discover that these dismissals have not helped him very much.

His Royal Highness was quite right in stating in his Speech from the Throne that he found the country in a state of great prosperity; and I understand it might have offended his advisers should he have added: 'That is entirely the outcome of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's good management.' The Governor General took the Speech from the Throne as it was handed to him; but the people, knowing who brought about that great prosperity, draw their own conclusions, as they have shown at the last provincial election, and as they will further show at the next general election.

A great deal of canvassing has been done in the county of Richelieu at the last election; and you may be sure, Mr. Speaker, that had it been possible to buy the county, that would have been done; but it was not for sale and they had to go without it.

The Speech from the Throne states that the increase in trade is satisfactory. That is so, but here again it is easy to find out who should get the credit for that increase. Under the former Conservative government we had no treaty with Belgium, or Germany, or Japan, or France. All such treaties were concluded by the Liberal administration, and we are now in a position to judge how far astray were hon. gentlemen on the other side when they predicted that our leader would fail in concluding such treaties and securing for us the benefits deriving therefrom. Without their help, nay in spite of them, Sir Wilfrid Laurier has succeeded in satisfying the Canadian people as to his ability to cope with such a situation and developing our trade with the rest of the world. Such is the real explanation of the increase of our trade. Here, again, no mention is made of the fact that credit for all this is due to the hon. leader of the Opposition, as being the result of his special efforts in that connection.

Why did we endeavour to develop trade with the United States, why did we enter into a reciprocity agreement with them? Had you, Sir, been present at the meetings held in my county, you would have realized to what extent the electors approved of that policy; but at the same time you would have heard our opponents condemning the Liberal administration for not having carried out that plank of their platform as defined at the great convention held in Ottawa. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, our opponents contended, had promised that a treaty of reciprocity would be concluded, and apparently he had not the slightest thought of carrying out his promises in that connection. However, when the former government introduced in this House a reciprocity bill, hon. gentlemen on the other side, Mr. Speaker, would not accept it. It was even expected that the measure would carry unanimously. It was such a beneficial agreement. Hon. gentlemen could hardly believe it; they never expected that Sir Wilfrid Laurier could obtain such terms from the United States. Indeed they realized full well that should such a policy go through, it would enable us to hold power for many years to come. So they hastened to swallow their whole past history in this connection, they set aside the standing offer that they had written in the Tariff and would have nothing more to do with reciprocity proposals, although they had pledged themselves in favour of such a measure when it was introduced by a former Conservative administration and Sir John Macdonald. They turned right around and said 'Let well enough alone.' After criticising the Liberal administration for such a long time, these hon. gentlemen discovered on a sudden that things were in pretty good shape, that the country was prosperous, that there was nothing to complain about and nothing to change.

Then they thought to themselves that they should come out with something more. Of course, these hon. gentlemen are not easily put out. It is not an easy matter to corner them. So they cried out: 'Reciprocity is a step towards annexation.' That settled the matter, and with that catch word they succeeded in bringing over to their views a great many voters. As for me I have stopped sending my shirts to the Chinese laundry, as that might affect my loyal feelings. I realize we should not deal with foreigners, for fear of impairing our national characteristics. A party intent on reaching power will go to any lengths to reach its ends. In upper Canada we were defeated on the Ne Temere decree. Laurier was held responsible for that decree, it being asserted that he could have it repealed if he wished, a thing he refused to do, because he was too much of a Catholic, of a Papist. Let us have Borden, who no doubt will secure the repeal of that decree.

However, the ablest man we have had as Minister of Justice, the most eminent jurist of all those who filled that position, I mean the hon. Mr. Aylesworth, after duly considering the matter, came to the conclusion that the Ne Temere decree was a matter under the exclusive control of the provinces, and that the Dominion Parliament had no jurisdiction in that connection.

Later on, his successor, a former judge of the Superior Court, a prominent man as well, the present Minister of Justice, in turn looked into the question, and both he and his leader have confirmed the opinion given out by Mr. Aylesworth, and which was the only true and reliable one. Albeit, the promise it seems had been made to Ontario that, should the Conservatives be returned to power, the matter would be settled, and the question was how could such pledges be redeemed. As there might still exist some doubt in regard to this question, it was suggested that a way out would be to refer the matter to the Supreme Court. That was done. Then it was resolved that once the matter had been passed upon by the Supreme Court, it might be referred to the Privy Council, and that also was done.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his Minister of Justice who solved the question without any cost to the country, might now enquire from this Government how much did it cost to get the same judgment over again. I shall be glad to see the bills of cost of the numerous counsel who have been retained in this historic case by the various provincial governments and the Dominion Government as well. And all that to find out whether there remains any doubt. To my mind the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and that of the right hon. Prime Minister should have carried weight. But hon. gentlemen were anxious to put something in the way of their friends and do something to please those who had requested such a move. They will be around again; the Government will hear from them before long. An effort will be made, it appears, during this session to insert in the criminal code a section making a misdemeanor of any attempt to prevent marriage between Catholics and Protestants. Is that question also to be referred to the Supreme Court and to the Privy Council? That is very likely, as the Government is bound to redeem in some way or other the pledges made to the electors. It seems to me, however, that if hon. gentlemen continue referring all such political issues to the Supreme Court or the Privy Council, their surpluses will soon dwindle into nothingness. Once they have settled with all the commissioners retained since their advent to power, and paid all such reckless expenditure, very likely our surpluses will not reach yearly into the 25 or 30 millions as was the fashion under the former government.

In connection with the increase in Canada's receipts, which is still going on, hon. gentlemen have forgotten to state how this result was brought about. They did not make the least reference to the efforts of the former government to develop a branch of our trade which has considerably increased. I mean the trade in agricultural products.

At the head of the Department of Agriculture in the late government we had a practical man, a real leader, a farmer who knew his business, I mean the Hon. Mr. Fisher. Thanks to him, the exports of our farm products increased considerably. As a practical farmer, he introduced some marked improvements. He had cold storage compartments provided on board steamships for the safe transportation of cheese, butter, and all perishable products. His first-hand experience in matters agricultural enabled him to give such an impetus to the various branches of farming in Canada, that farmers in all the provinces of the Dominion now are in a position to secure fair remuneration for their labours.

The Speech from the Throne makes reference to the increased flow of immigration. Formerly Conservatives were prone to say: You are bringing to this country undesirable immigrants, you are wasting money; it is an outrage to waste so much money with a view to bringing over here such a class of settlers. However, since they have taken the reins of power, they utter not a sound, they are all perfectly satisfied, immigration is on the increase.

How sincere they are! Of course, I am aware, I know from experience, having for a number of years back held the position of Crown prosecutor at Montreal, probably the busiest criminal court in the Dominion, I am fully aware some people come in who should never have been admitted. But immigrants cannot be picked like raspberries on the bush, by gathering the ripe fruit and leaving out the rest. An inquiry cannot be carried on concerning their previous record, and of course nobody is in a hurry to say: I am a thief, or a murderer, or a forger, or a firebrand. Such people hide, go under assumed names to escape detection. However, as soon as we found out that abuses were being committed and that undesirables were getting in, further legislation was introduced by the Laurier government providing for the deportation to the country of origin, and at the expense of the senders, of any immigrant who turned out to be objectionable within two years after his arrival. Cases occur almost every day. Newcomers are sentenced by the courts, and after serving their time, are peremptorily deported to their country of origin.

Surely hon. gentlemen opposite must have noticed that matters in that respect had been set right by the Liberal government. I remember hearing the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier exclaim at a public meeting: 'Just think of it, gentlemen, Laurier and his colleagues grant admittance on Canadian soil to Doukhobors, people who are still expecting the Messiah, who run about through the Northwest Territories almost naked; and even more, Laurier spends money to get them here. What a pity to see those people governing the country in such miserable fashion.'

Well, he did not govern it very long. I was surprised to see him accept a portfolio, but I was still more surprised to see him renounce it, as he had stated that he was bolted, rivetted, padlocked, chained to his seat. Well, I can see neither chains nor padlock any longer. He has taken everything away with him. I hope to see him back here before long. At that same meeting he added: Just think, Lafortune, an elector of mine, support these people. How painful it is for me to see him in such bad company. Well, I may tell him that it was very painful to see him take a portfolio in the newly-formed government, he who had almost weeped when saying: 'How deeply I regret to have to separate from my leader; but his policy is even worse than Laurier's!'

Nevertheless he accepted a portfolio, and stuck to it with bolt, rivet and padlock. I expected he would remain there for a while; but on a sudden he woke up, got angry, broke the padlock, and skipped off with the chain. Of course, he knew somebody would be found to take his place. There was a shuffling of portfolios. Public Works was taken up by a man who hails from a distance; the finest department of all was given to another, and Mr. Monk's successor was content with taking the meanest portfolio. I wonder if the electors will appreciate the change. Richelieu voters apparently were not very much pleased.

I would have been very happy to meet the hon. Postmaster General in Richelieu. He did not dare to come, although his self-confidence at times is apt to make him overlook danger. I realize that he is not without experience and ability; of course, some brains are required to be taken into any government. But what I object to is the manner in which some people get there. True, he had to follow the lead of a very young man, by many years his junior, Mr. Armand Lavergne. I must admit that I would not accept the leadership of a youth. That accounts for the early breaking out of family quarrels.

The hon. Postmaster General is no longer a favourite with his erstwhile chief, Mr. Lavergne. The latter challenged him to a public discussion of the political issues, but the hon. minister backed out. Of course, I do not mean to say that he was afraid to go. At any rate, a separation is pending, but the Senate will not be called upon to act. The Ne Temere decree will settle the matter.

I say such marriages are ill-assorted. You called yourselves Nationalists for the sole purpose of defeating Laurier. Realizing that in the province of Ontario such a platform would not take, you started to make trouble with the Ne Temere, while the navy question was made the main issue in Quebec.

Thus was the late government defeated. 'Laurier is responsible for the Ne Temere, they cried out in Ontario, 'Down with the Navy,' they cried in Quebec. Our good parish priests feel particularly aggrieved, as they relied to such an extent on the pledges given by Mr. Henri Bourassa.

The late government they contended, had sacrificed the rights of the minority in connection with the Manitoba school question. Laurier they said had sacrificed the rights of the Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba, as a word from him would have sufficed to settle the matter. I still have ringing in my ears the statement made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel): 'If our friends are returned to power, the school question will be settled in quick order. I am ready to spill my blood for the triumph of the cause.' Well, he did not spill much of his blood, not so much as half a pint. Don't fret, once they were in power, the question was shelved.

Did not Mr. Monk state on the floor of the House that this school question was settled, that it had been settled by the Liberal party, through the Greenway-Laurier settlement? That settlement, he would say, I approved of it at the time. But did not the same Mr. Monk wage war on Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that account? Did he not taunt him for having sacrificed the rights of the Manitoba Catholics? The new government has not even been able to grant to the Manitoba Catholics what Sir Wilfrid granted to the Catholic minorities in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

It was necessary that the new Opposition leader should fall from power. Why? So that full justice might be rendered him during his lifetime. His very opponents were constrained to do full justice to him. It is seldom such a thing happens during a political man's lifetime. Had it not been for that change of government, future historians might have written a rather dismal account of his participation in that affair, as the whole clergy were unanimous in saying that he had acted treacherously towards them. By assuming for a while the reins of government his opponents have against their will certified to his superior skill, and such a thing does not happen very often.

As regards the Nationalists, I wonder if there are many left; one would need a lantern to discover them. Once the election is over, you have the whole population on your side. Your most bitter opponents are among the first to cry: 'Hurrah, we have won the battle, let us have a drink together.'

Those old-time Nationalists, it is a difficult matter to keep track of them now, they will no longer acknowledge the name. Formerly, when Mr. Henri Bourassa would request all Nationalists in the audience to lift up their hands, there was quite a number to respond. There were Nationalists galore in those days. Their cry was: 'Long live Nationalism.' But to-day should Bourassa enter this House and call on Nationalists to stand up, very few would respond. Nationalists are few in this House. That was well and good previous to Sept. 21st, but to-day their cry is: 'Long live the Conservatives.'

And when we hear even former Liberals, who supported and fought for Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government, the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères, for instance, a Liberal himself and descended from Liberal stock, but who now that a Conservative government is in power, refuses to go by the name of Liberal, and even, declares, as I heard him do the other day, that he is sorry for ever having been a Liberal, I say can any faith be put in the sincerity of such men? I very well remember that even a short time ago he could be heard crying out in our committee meetings, as a half-leader might do: 'Long live Laurier.' To-day he asserts that Laurier has been bungling all along.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: (Translation.) He is in the manger.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) I will not say that, as he might get mad, and we are still good friends; but I must say that it grieves me to see a young man who got such a good start take such a bad turn. Should the Government be defeated to-day I am confident he would return to the fold, and pretty quick too; a friendly wink would bring him round in short order.

The Speech from the Throne refers also to the rich harvest. We used to hear our opponents say: 'Well yes the country is prosperous, business is in a good way, but Liberals are mistaken when they say that Laurier is the cause of it all, that he is the weather-maker, that he is in touch with Divine Providence.' Well, if Providence had anything to do with it, she certainly was bountiful to him. But Providence is of changing disposition. You will see, gentlemen, that Providence will not extend protection for a long while, for your building lacks the right foundation; you have been building on sand and you are bound to fall before long.

Mr. NANTEL: (Translation.) Such is the blessing I wish you.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman that his constituents will have no blessing in store for him when he tries to explain before them his change of front on the navy question. They will rather order him back to private life.

I still hear the Conservative leaders' cry of the time: 'That great prosperity is not due to Laurier, but rather to the late Conservative administration' (under whose rule bankruptcy was rampant in every direction).

On reaching power, Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to proceed to a general overhauling. He turned down the faucet and stopped the leaks in the casket. Henceforth deficits became a thing of the past. Not he, but Providence should be thanked, the former Conservative leader, Mr. Taillon, would sarcastically say. Well, I am the owner of farms, and if I said to my men: No use ploughing this spring, we will get a crop all the same, do you think Providence would help me very much? When I hear the new Ministers assert that the country is prosperous, the harvest abundant, the treasury overflowing, I am tempted to answer right away: You are merely profiting by that bountiful policy introduced by the Laurier government.

The Speech from the Throne then mentions a treaty of commerce concluded with the West Indies. Now, what do you think of that? The former Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) is the author of this great work. He is a man of worth, though his friends have rather lost faith in him to a certain extent. I was sorry to see him passed over as Minister of Finance and that portfolio handed to a new member, and a former Liberal over the bargain. How pleased he must have felt to see the hon. Mr. White take that portfolio away from him!

Of course the former Minister of Finance might well have expected some such dealing. He has not always travelled on the straight road, and his friends put him aside and called upon a Liberal to be their Minister of Finance. True, the latter was from Toronto, and possibly the large manufacturing concerns were in need of him to help on their business. However, had I been in Mr. Foster's place, I would have been aggrieved. No doubt he must have grumbled some.

The country is in such a prosperous condition, it seems, that the House will be called upon to vote millions. The exact number is not given; the child has not been christened as yet. Out in the country places, two or three days are sometimes permitted to elapse before the child is baptized, when the roads are bad. In this case there is much delay in bringing this Bill before the House. I am anxious to know the figure, whether it be thirty, or forty, or even fifty millions. Once the principle is recognized, there is no reason for being bashful about it. I wonder if the old Nationalist by-word will be heard: 'Down with the navy, no contribution.' The hon. Mr. Monk is at loggerheads with his former colleagues on that question. No wonder, since the Conservative party has three platforms, one for Ontario, one for Quebec, and another for the Nationalists.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) has been consistent at all times. He has never changed his mind. That is why the Prime Minister took him along on his journey through the provinces. He left Mr. Monk behind, as he could not properly show him around in the other provinces. He took along the Minister of Justice, who besides being a worthy minister of the Crown, had always on all matters agreed with his leader. As for the others who have been taken in, I feel rather chary of referring to them. To see people thus accept portfolios in cabinets which they have previously condemned makes me uneasy, and I wonder what kind of a bargain has been entered into. It may possibly never be brought to light. How comes it that Nationalists are now so gentle, so easy to please? What has brought about the change? One of their number has already taken leave, and others may follow suit in the near future.

Mr. Armand Lavergne has not yet succeeded in meeting the hon. Postmaster General. Mr. Lavergne is a young and fiery opponent, a man of resources, with a great future before him. I am pretty sure he has something in store for the hon. Postmaster General. He will want to know why he deserted them. I would be grieved to see the Postmaster General in a bad plight. Many people, on the other hand, consider him a renegade. Really, that is too bad. You are a renegade. Mr. Armand Lavergne says so, and many others go on repeating it.

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) He has slandered others previously.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) But two blacks do not make one white, two backsliders do not make an honest man. That does not seem to trouble the hon. Postmaster General, but nevertheless there is not much fun in being called a renegade. Had it not been for me, says Mr. Lavergne, you would not have been offered a portfolio. He must keenly regret having exerted himself on behalf of a renegade, of a cad, of a political time-server, as he calls the hon. minister.

The latter has not accepted Mr. Lavergne's invitation to meet him in public. But they will come to hands, some day or other, and I will be there to witness the fray; it will be some fun to see them battering each other. I for one would not retain a portfolio if my leader addressed me as a renegade and a cad.

If an hon. gentleman challenged me to meet him, with the words: 'I wish to meet you in the county of Montcalm to discuss your conduct as a minister,' it would not take me long to resign. Let any hon. gentleman state that I secured my election in Montcalm, under false colours, and I shall resign at once; there will be no dilly-dallying about it either. Come before the people and we will soon find out who is the renegade and the cad.

The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères addressed a meeting in a parish where my wife's ancestors were settled; he will see what kind of a welcome he gets the next time he goes there; defeat awaits him at the next election.

Mr. RAINVILLE: (Translation.) Those good people have voted for me and will continue doing so.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) You are in error, as you will find out. Honest people may be deceived once, but not twice in succession. The hon. member deceived his electors, but he will not succeed a second time, you may be sure. A poor man is sent to jail for stealing five farthings from his neighbour, and in a country such as ours, would it be allowable to secure a constituency under false pretenses and then go scot free? No, that cannot be, and the hon. member may rest assured he will not succeed a second time.

He defeated a talented man, and a respectable citizen, the former member, Mr. Victor Geoffrion, a man of honour, and a man of learning. He succeeded in defeating him by joining hands with the Nationalists. He managed to have the electors believe that Mr. Laurier's policy was wrong; that it would mean for the country the expenditure of extravagant amounts, that their children would be enlisted against their will, and that in future they would be mere targets for guns.

By means of such falsehoods, these hon. gentlemen have led the public opinion astray, have misled many people, and on polling day the result showed that the electors had accepted as true those false statements. But the day of retribution is at hand. When the time comes you will have to render a strict account of your doings, with vouchers attached; if not I pity you.

Mr. RAINVILLE: (Translation.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) I have no time to answer. Let me get through, and keep quiet in the meantime. The hon. member visited my native parish along with several other Nationalists, but the people would not listen to him.

Mr. RAINVILLE: (Translation.) You were responsible for not letting me speak.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) The people refused to listen to you, and you had to go back as you came. The Government allowed Monk to depart, and they are on the point of requesting us to vote millions, to borrow millions from England for the purpose of giving them back to her, millions on which we will have to pay interest. Is that good business? Is there any sense in borrowing money from the mother country and then returning it to her in the shape of a contribution? How profitable that will be to Canadians! But it may not be an easy matter to have the people agree to such a policy.

The navy as proposed by the former government was to be Canadian, but our opponents contended that there was no necessity for it. In spite of their denunciations, the electorate have kept faith with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and we succeeded in getting returned. True several of us have fallen on the battlefield, but I was fortunate enough to satisfy the electors of Montcalm that our opponents were only slandering us to secure the reins of power.

People would say: How comes it that men of such worth as Bourassa, Monk, the member for Chambly-Verchères and other Nationalists overrun the province asserting everywhere that there is no use for such a measure and that you do not answer? You are invited to attend Nationalist meetings and you abstain from being present.

That accounts for the people taking stock in the statements of our opponents. I used to reply: If the Nationalists ever set foot in my constituency, Lafortune will be there to meet them. And I did not back out either.

Mr. RAINVILLE: (Translation.) Did you go alone?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) Certainly alone; that was enough. When Mr. Bourassa came to Ste Julienne with his Nationalist allies, I was not alone. The mistake was made to let these gentlemen hold meetings by themselves. They came to Chertsey and addressed a meeting of ten thousand people. People expected that Bourassa would finish me in the first round. Well, it was on that day that I won my election. Another of these gentlemen once came to give me a hand in an electoral contest and caused my defeat. He was my leading speaker at a large meeting held at Ste Julienne. I mean the present Postmaster General. At the time he was neither a Nationalist nor Conservative; he was a Liberal, under the Mercier government. He was very eloquent on that day; I was glad to have him with me; but I was nevertheless defeated.

Times have greatly changed. The hon. Postmaster General periodically shifts his allegiance. I hope he will be back with us some day. Just then he was a Liberal; later on he became a Nationalist, and later still went back to the Conservatives. What will he become next? God knows, but I do hope he will not set foot in my county, for that would ensure my defeat.

We succeeded in satisfying the people that what was needed was a Canadian navy, under the control of the Canadian Government; a navy that would be built by Canadians, with Canadian iron, steel and wood, and by our own people. We got them to understand that the millions voted for the building of ships would come back to our pockets in another shape. The farmer who buys a farm for ten thousand dollars is not any poorer after doing so, provided the farm is really worth that money.

The Nationalists had misled public opinion to such an extent that a great deal of work was required to set it right. I for one fell sick in consequence; I almost died. They spent twenty thousand dollars in the hope of defeating me. Bourassa had made up his mind to get me out of the way. For a period of two years they kept on directing shafts at me in a special column of their paper. I had no paper to defend me; Bourassa had his and he never stopped heaping aspersions on me from morning till night. The happiest day in my life was when I had occasion to meet him on neutral ground. I can assure he had a hard time of it and thanked God when the ordeal was over.

These gentlemen state to-day that there is urgency. They sent some of their number to Germany to obtain first hand information, and they returned with reports of warfare. Of course, they came back in the best of health; but before returning to Canada it occurred to them that they should warn Canadians as to the possibility of war breaking out; hence the necessity for contributing millions towards assisting Great Britain.

Is not that humiliating for Great Britain? Fancy the strongest of the great world powers stating through the mouth of the Prime Minister of the Dominion that she needs a contribution from us, failing which her supremacy will be in jeopardy. The mere thought of it must be painful to such a proud people as the British. If Canada will not make a grant, our national supremacy is imperilled.

Who will believe such a story? Is there a single Canadian who will take stock in such a statement? No, Great Britain does not need our money. Papers state that the whole thing was done at the suggestion of the Prime Minister, who said: Send me a note of what you require, and you will get it; The late Minister of Public Works told us we had canals to build, great natural resources to develop, trade connections to extend, and above all the Georgian Bay canal undertaking to carry through. Two hundred millions, to say the least, Mr. Monk told us, will be required to build that canal. He has departed taking that idea along with him; at any rate no reference is any longer made to it. What was the position of these hon. gentlemen in regard to the Hudson Bay railway? Their contention was that it would be a waste of millions of dollars; and now they rejoice at the thought of it, and forget to say that the proposal originated with the Liberal Government. Objection was taken to the Hudson Bay railway just as much as to the navy. What the late government have done they have deliberately done, after giving due consideration to all the circumstances of the case. The late Prime Minister was not wont to act recklessly, without the requisite information. He has shown that he is the greatest statesman that Canada, and possibly any country can boast of. Wherever he has played a part, we have had every reason to be proud of him and to glory in him; and when he ceased to be Prime Minister, he remained what he had always been, and he still remains to this day, the greatest political figure in this House.

It is urgent, we are told, to uphold the mother country; but about the plebiscite? I do not see those Nationalists who were clamouring so loudly for a plebiscite. When the subject is broached to them, they look annoyed. But formerly the plebiscite was a favourite topic with them. Why do they not refer to it any more? Why do they not insist to get it now, after clamouring so loudly for it? Are they sulking? I do not know what is going on.

I do not intend voting a single cent as a contribution, because I am satisfied that Great Britain is in no need of our money. I shall not vote a single cent, except to carry out the resolution voted on March 29, 1909, giving effect to our policy. Accordingly we purchased two ships and pledged ourselves before the country to build others as circumstances required, but with the understanding that none of these vessels would be commissioned for active service without the Dominion Parliament having been summoned specially for that object and having given its consent, and besides that such ships would be built in Canada by means of Canadian labour. All that was carried out, or was on the point of being carried out.

When I hear people talk of loyalty, it makes me smile. Is there any need for stating that Canadians are loyal? No, there is no necessity for stating such a thing. When I hear somebody say: I am an honest man, I get suspicious. Why should we boast of our loyalty? Is not the fact emblazoned on every page of our country's history? Can any body point out a single fact that impugns the loyalty of the French Canadians?

I fail to see how the contribution which it is proposed to give can be defended. There is no necessity for it. Great Britain would be incensed at the thought of a colony suggesting and proclaiming by a vote that she is in need of our help, of our assistance to maintain her supremacy among the nations of the world. Is it fair to send away Canadian funds when so many things remain to be done in this country, when we have railways and canals to build natural resources to develop, public works to carry out? To borrow money for the purpose of making a present of it would be a rather costly luxury, since our only advantage would be to pay off the interest.

I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite look tired. I would advise them to retire for the night, as I do not intend closing my address for some time yet. If the hon. minister thinks we have been sitting long enough he might allow me to move the adjournment of debate.

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) If the hon. member intends speaking for a while yet, I think he should move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) Yes, I will not be through for a while. It is not very often that I address the House, so allow me to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Lafortune the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Pelletier the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, December 2, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister) presented the report of the special committee appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of the House during the present session. The report is as follows:

On motion of Mr. Borden, the report was concurred in.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That the Select Standing Committees of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, with the exception of the Committee on Debates and that on the Library of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

POSTAL IRREGULARITIES IN MONTREAL.

The orders of the day being called:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to certain irregularities which are taking place in connection with the Montreal post office. I am informed by the newspapers that a certain American gentleman is sending a large number of letters to different parties in Montreal, to induce them to take stock in a cerain railway apparatus, which in the United States has been found to be a fraud. I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to this fact, because I see that proceedings are being taken in Montreal against the gentleman referred to.

Mr. PELLETIER: We are taking proceedings just in order to try to prevent that.

THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. GRAHAM: I notice in one of the newspapers to-day an interview which states that the portion of the line between Cochrane and Superior Junction and Graham, will not be completed until next fall, that there are 46 miles of steel yet to lay, and that it will be impossible to lay that steel during the present fall. Will the Minister of Railways tell me if that is correct, or approximately so?

Mr. COCHRANE: I hope the steel connecting Cochrane with Graham will be laid before Christmas?

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Rainville: For an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm). (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned on Friday night, I stated that I had a few more suggestions to offer, and with your permission, I shall go on.

One item in the Speech from the Throne draws attention to the desirability of improving our highways. Surely there can be only one opinion on the matter. No better use of public funds could be made by this Government than for improving our highways, so as to facilitate traffic, and more particularly those that are the most travelled over, and which are often the most neglected, great national highways, colonization roads, country roads. Surely not a single member will take exception to the new Government pursuing the work begun by the late Government. But on one condition, however: this Government should not be left with a free hand in the use of those public funds, in the way it proposed to do last session, by means of a Bill which let the Government free to do whatever it thought fit in the matter, without any restrictions whatever as to dates and places.

I stated at the time that it would constitute an infringement on the rights of provinces and municipalities. I said that it would be ignoring the constitutional principle in virtue of which the care of highways is placed under the absolute control of the provincial governments.

No one will object to the Government spending large amounts for that object. But all such moneys should be handed over to the proper authorities, that is the various provincial governments and municipalities. Otherwise, I fear the Government might overlook such constituencies as are on the other side of politics. I know from experience how the thing works. In making up last year's estimates no provision was made for a post office in my constituency, and towards the building of which an amount of $20,000 had previously been voted.

Since this Government has come into power, the amount I had secured for that purpose has been struck out, simply because I am not a Gvetrnment supporter. The land had been purchased, the plans had been drafted, everything was in readiness for starting work on that post office. But the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) made up his mind to cancel all that had been done in this connection. That is not fair play. Once this House has decided that a public building is to be erected somewhere, and once the plans have been drafted, it seems to me the successors in office should be bound to carry out what the former House had decided upon to do. It seems to me that such treatment should not have been meted out to the province of Quebec, especially by a Minister of Public Works hailing from that province.

Then again, I see in the Speech from the Throne that the government propose asking the House to vote rather large amounts towards encouraging agriculture. I entirely approve of the idea; there cannot be any difference of opinion on that point. It is of absolute necessity that the farming class, which is the most numerous, be protected. Agriculture is the fountain-head of all prosperity, and it should be protected in the same way that we protect all other classes of society, the industrial class, the manufacturers, the mercantile class, by means of a protective tariff, which now does not apply to farm products. If we wish that the younger generation of farmers should remain on the land, if we wish to see the country progress and our people stay with us, a great deal more should be done towards assisting the agricultural class.

While the late Government was in power, the hon. Sidney Fisher, then Minister of Agriculture, had agreed to divide the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa; and if this Government is so anxious, as it would have us believe, to assist the farming community, they should carry out or return to the policy announced by the late Minister of Agriculture, who had decided to establish a large number of illustration stations in the various provinces of Canada, which farmers might be in a position to reach easily, without any undue expenditure of money and without practically any loss of time. Under present conditions, farmers have barely any time to look over the experimental farm and gather therefrom information which may be serviceable to them. They generally reach Ottawa at eleven o'clock in the morning and are due to return by the three o'clock train in the afternoon. Hence a waste of money, since there remains no time for looking over things, gathering information, getting below the surface in matters agricultural, with a view to bringing about improvements. Matters would take an entirely different turn, if illustration stations were established in several constituencies. Through such stations farmers would largely benefit by the information given out. Besides, such stations might be the means for distributing seed grain, and that would be of real service to the farming community.

I was sorry to find that in the province of Quebec, which is wholly agricultural, better advantage was not taken of the distribution of seed grain from the experimental farm. People do not even go to the pains of applying for a share in those free government distributions. If we had such illustration stations, they might be entrusted with the distribution of seed grain and the result would no doubt be satisfactory, for the government, surely, is anxious to help on the farmers.

Of course, it cannot be denied that people in a great many cases are indifferent, merely plodding along, not going to the pains of applying for samples, or waiting too late to forward their application. But a great change for the better would be noticeable if there were agricultural stations established in the various districts, with men appointed to advertise and effect such seed distribution. So I say, if the government is desirous of assisting farmers, illustration stations should be established in several constituencies.

During the late general election, our opponents, with an eye on the farmers, stated that should they be put in power, they would build the Georgian bay canal. Nevertheless, I see nothing in the Speech from the Throne in this connection.

Have they altered their platform in this respect as well? We are told that the Welland canal is to be rebuilt in order to retain and develop long distance transportation. In my humble opinion that is a mistake, a huge mistake. Why should we spend more millions for the purpose of deepening a canal on which so much money has been expended, and even up to a very recent date? There are two kinds of canals: those of smaller size which are utilized solely for inland trade, and those of greater depth destined to navigation by crafts of larger size, for instance the Georgian bay canal for the transportation of grain from the West. On this latter point we are not yet posted. We have no information as to what the government intend doing, since the Speech from the Throne makes no reference to the matter.

As regards protection for the agricultural class, there is one point which appears to me of the utmost importance, and which we should lose no time in having set right. I mean the embargo affecting Canadian live stock exported to Great Britain. Every farmer, and especially every breeder, is interested in having that quarantine done away with. For the time being no animal may be exported from this country without undergoing that quarantine. I deeply regret that no mention should be made in the Speech from the Throne of any intention to relieve the farming community of this burden.

Farmers of the province of Quebec were anxious to secure the benefit of a reciprocity treaty with the United States as regards farm products; they rejoiced at the thought that their butter, cheese, ham, fruit, &c., would soon have free access to the American markets. But hon. gentlemen on the other side replied at the time and will no doubt continue to reply: You have Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, France, Portugal, Japan; we have trade arrangements with all those countries, why should we require a treaty with the United States? Of course, that is so, but business men, merchants, exporters are aware that it is much more expensive to trade with such foreign countries than with the United States. The risks are greater, insurance and freight rates are enormous, while products sent just across the border have the benefit of direct and safe transportation, intercourse facilities are greater, there is less danger of fraud on the part of go-betweens, accounts are more readily settled. The insurance and freight charges are lighter. Correspondence and other unavoidable expenditure should also be taken into account.

But, it was stated to farmers: If you enter into a trade arrangement with the United States, the exports from that country will flood our markets, our industries will decline and fall. No one thinks of hurting our industries, and no one intended reciprocity to injure those industries. As a matter of fact, the reciprocity proposals with the United States did not at all affect our industries, the late government having included in the treaty farm products only, and such treaty could be abrogated at once if the House so desired. But not content with that, our opponents contended that such a treaty would bring about annexation. That word was turned into a bugbear wherewith to scare the farmers.

I am a French Canadian and I say that my compatriots have fared well under the British crown, and they would be the first to oppose any endeavour to change their allegiance. But is it not preferable to have a market of one hundred million people, at our very door, with whom we are already actively trading in spite of a high tariff, rather than send our agricultural products to Great Britain or to foreign lands.

"'How is it, Mr. Lafortune,' my opponents would urge, 'that representing as you do a county where tobacco is grown on a large scale, you favour reciprocity which will enable the American leaf to compete with the Canadian on our own markets?' —I had no difficulty in showing that tobacco growers were not at all concerned in the passing of that treaty, since it did not interfere at all with the growing of tobacco.

I regret that there is nothing further done towards protecting the farmers. Is there is a single word in the Speech from the Throne giving one to understand that the Government propose increasing the duty on foreign tobacco, so as to protect the national product? Not a word. In the course of the session I shall take occasion to press for an increase of the rate on the foreign leaf which competes on our territory with the home-grown leaf. We shall then be in a position to gauge the sincerity of our opponents who denounced reciprocity on the ground that it would, they contended, ruin the tobacco-growing industry in Canada.

Sir, since the opening of this debate, reference has been made to what occurred during the electoral contests in Macdonald and Richelieu. I did not go to Macdonald, and I am glad of it, for I might have been arrested like the others. I would have stated to those gentlemen that I was a British subject, a lawyer of thirty-three years practice at the Montreal Bar, a King's counsel and Crown prosecutor for the district of Montreal. All that might not have prevented these gentlemen from laying hands on me, as they tried to do in the case of a King's counsel, Mr. Gauthier, a well-known lawyer of Montreal, a former M.L.A and the sitting member for St. Hyacinthe in this House. An honest man, with a good reputation, and a commissioner for the Revision of the municipal code of the provinces of Quebec. All that was not sufficient. An effort was made to force his grip, to pry into his political secrets, and he was subjected to all kinds of humiliations.

In what kind of a country are we living? Is it in a British country that such things are being done? And what has become of the Magna Charta of which all British subjects are so proud, and justly so? Under its provisions, you have not the right to lay hands upon or arrest any one without filing a duly sworn complaint. A preliminary inquiry must be held. Now, will it be said that in a British province the primary principle of Criminal law is deliberately ignored and set aside? That is incredible.

Mr. Boyer, who represents the county of Vaudreuil, is also a man well worthy of consideration. As a citizen and a public man his record is unimpeachable. But he also has been subjected to vexations and humilations in the course of that election.

After such attempts, I feel inclined to say: Let us tear to pieces the Magna Charta; let us no longer glory in British citizenship; let us no longer say that the British crown is the safeguard of all individual liberty.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), who is a well known citizen and respected jurist, who has been for many years a judge of the Superior Court of Montreal; the hon. Minister, I say should be the first to get up and take those fellows to task. Honourable gentlemen should be unanimous in asking for an enquiry, so as to find whether it is true or not that during the election in Macdonald an attempt was made to molest and arrest representatives of the people, men of such high standing as Messrs. Gauthier and Boyer. An investigation should also be carried on in connection with the arrest of five or six other persons who were sent to jail without being afforded any opportunity of vindicating themselves.

I am in full sympathy with the vote of censure moved by the leader of the Opposition, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as an amendment to the address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. We should all demand, whatever our party allegiance, that an inquiry be made as to the truth of the facts alleged before the House.

An assassin, a thief, a cut-throat, a firebrand cannot be convicted until all legal formalities have been gone through, and it would be permissible to lay hands on a British subject without any regard for the law? Now, if such things occurred in the province of Quebec, there would be loud protests on the part of all those who are anxious that the rights of the British subject be upheld; they would insist on an investigation being carried on to probe the matter to the bottom. Sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. Is the criminal law two-fold, or is it one and the same for the whole Dominion? It is, and so I shall give my support to the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition, asking for the appointment of a committee to enquire into the facts; and should the Government refuse to do so, he deserves censure for not moving in a matter of such import.

I had the pleasure of taking a hand in the election which took place recently in Richelieu, in behalf of Mr. Cardin, who is now representative for that constituency, having defeated his opponent Mr. Morgan, a Montreal lawyer. It was highly laughable to hear the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) say to his electors: I have taken a hand in eight elections, and I have been successful in all of them. I have entered the ring in Richelieu, and at any cost I shall come out victorious; I shall not leave the constituency until the Government candidate is elected. And he added: Do you wish all government employees to lose their jobs, the yards to be moved somewhere else, the thought of building the railway which you have been asking for so long a time, dismissed forever? Well then you may vote against Mr. Morgan, and should you do so, dismissals will be proceeded with.

How grand and how inspiring it was to hear such a discourse from the mouth of a member of this House, a millionaire, recently knighted. No, it was not inspiring, it was degrading to hear such words fall from the lips of Sir Rodolphe Forget, and yet all that is the truth. I almost fancied I was dreaming. But I heard it all myself, and the hon. member did say every word of it. Nobody can deny it.

Some may think that in speaking thus I am taking advantage of Mr. Forget's absence from the House. Of course, I should not be blamed if he is so seldom in his seat. That is his business, but I should not suffer on that account. He can take care of himself, but he must be aware of what people say concerning him; he certainly cannot plead ignorance. Those are the things which were stated in public meetings, that is the way they sought to capture votes. The hon. member for Charlevoix was away up. His name was mentioned for the portfolio of Public Works and the current saying was that should he win that election, he would certainly be offered a portfolio. People were already addressing him as the hon. minister. I cannot say if such information was reliable or not. But that was the current saying. However, he was defeated that time, and it may be on that account that another man was chosen, and that there was a shuffling of portfolios. In this connection, I remember the fight we had to make to secure the return of the hon. Mr. Préfontaine in Terrebonne. Honourable gentlemen opposite did not then use exactly the same arguments to-day. The Government was taunted for taking away from the province of Quebec the portfolio of Public Works, Mr. Préfontaine being content with taking the Dept. of Marine and Fisheries. That was outrageous. There was no sense in giving up such an important department. Will they take the same stand to-day? That portfolio has been allowed to go from the province of Quebec; it had been assigned to the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier, not because he deserved it, for he had been fighting against his own leader, saying that Laurier's platform was bad enough, but that Borden's was still worse.

Well, times have greatly changed, and the tone of public life has also greatly changed. I might repeat after many others: Oh justice, what great crimes are committed in thy name. Mr. Speaker, I have previously referred to the arrests which have been made, and I will not repeat what I have already stated; but I am confident that the House and the government will soothe public opinion by investigating the truth of the charges made against certain party heelers during the Macdonald election. I forgot to mention the name of another gentleman who accompanied the hon. members for Vaudreuil and St. Hyacinthe, Mr. Arthur Geoffrion, advocate of Montreal and King's counsel, who was subjected to the same vexations. Like the others he had gone over there as a free citizen to discuss questions of general interest. He also was the victim of lawlessness.

When I read in the speech from the Throne that the intention is to grant millions to England, I cannot endorse such a policy. If Canada is prosperous and thus in a position to give away thirty or forty millions, then why should we not improve the situation of a large number of civil servants who are very poorly paid? For instance, the men employed in the St. Vincent de Paul pententiary have, some of them, been in harness for thirty years on small salaries, and though heads of families, and every day in danger of losing their lives at the hands of convicts, they continue to be underpaid. We have in the civil service, in this very House, for instance, officers of twenty, thirty and even forty years standing, our reporters, among others, who work day and night, I see some whose hair has turned white in the service of this House, and who are not paid as high as they should be, considering the labour involved and the efficiency shown.

When we ask for an increase of salary in behalf of such employees who fill positions of trust and responsibility, and who perform good work in return for a small remuneration, the Government answers that it has not the funds. At the customs house, Montreal, there are heads of large families, who earn only small salaries, and when they apply to their member to get an increase, the latter is told that there are no funds, that the Government cannot do anything. There are here messengers whose health and life have been spent in an every day toil, and who earn only a nominal salary of eight hundred dollars per annum, and when they apply for an increase the answer is invariably that funds are lacking. Even magistrates occupying the highest positions, men of sterling worth, have been obliged to resign, owing to the insufficiency of their remuneration. I may give the name of Sir Alexander Lacoste, one of the most learned judges of the province of Quebec, and even of the whole Dominion, and who was obliged to renounce his position owing to the insufficiency of the salary attached thereto.

I might also name Mr. Doherty, a former judge of the Superior Court, an eminent jurist, who holds to-day the portfolio of Justice, a man of superior ability, who has also been obliged to give up his position for another.

Mr. PROULX: (Translation.) What about the pension?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) I will not make any reference to that. I do not wish to say anything offensive. I am dealing with another aspect of the question. Mr. Ouimet, a judge of the Court of Appeal has resigned to accept a better paid position. When increases are asked for judges who give their whole time to fulfilling their duty, and who have been eminent lawyers constantly working in the public interest, the answer is invariably that there are no funds on hand. For a good many years past it has been claimed that the salaries of judges of the Circuit Court should be increased. Three competent judges make up the court, Messrs Leboeuf, Dorion and Purcell, talented and painstaking men, whose salary, nevertheless, does not exceed three thousand dollars per annum, the salary of a fifth rate commercial traveller. But when an increase in salary is requested for them, the same answer is given: No funds; we are too poor. Additional judges are required for the Superior Court in Montreal, as three country district judges must continually be summoned to Montreal, it being well known that we have not enough judges. And the answer is invariably that there is no money. Nevertheless the intention is to give away millions. But I hope that before donating such an amount, due consideration will be given to the matter. Before giving forty millions to a country which is in no need of it, an effort should be made to increase the salaries of the underpaid.

If there is such a large surplus that the Government do not know what to do with it let them distribute it among those who are deserving, let them do justice to whom justice is due. Great Britain has no need for it. I feel ashamed at the thought of discussing such questions. To think that Great Britain needs our money to maintain her supremacy among the nations of the world. What a set back for British pride! Great Britain does not need our millions, she the leader among the great powers. We would, I understand, borrow millions from her which we would right away hand over to her, and then pay interest on that loan until the capital is refunded. Is there a man with a grain of business sense who will undertake to get the people to believe that?

You may succeed, Sir, I would say addressing the Prime Minister, in getting your followers to agree to such a proposal and to vote these millions; but the people will have their way. They are the best judges, and their decision is final. It will be no use arguing that such a measure was necessary, that Great Britain needed such a contribution. Nobody will believe you. You will find out that the people's vengeance is hard to bear; you will find that when the people kick, the blow is a hard one.

Should not hon. gentlemen in this House, to whatever party they belong, insist before voting these millions, on having the members' indemnity increased? Where is the man who can say that $2,500 is a sufficient allowance for spending here the two, seven, eight or ten months that a session lasts? Election expenses are ruinous, especially when you have to fight unscrupulous opponents who receive millions from the Canadian Pacific and other great corporations.

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) At what figure does the hon. member think that the sessional indemnity should be fixed?

Mr. PELLETIER: (Translation.) Five thousand dollars ($5,000) at the lowest. And I feel the freer to make that suggestion, that personally I have no need for the money. Those who are acquainted with me know that it is not a craving for riches that induces me to speak in that sense. My only motive is that I would like to see justice done to hon. members. They should rise on both sides of the House and all together say: It is time that members of parliament cease working for such a meagre indemnity. The ministers' salaries should also be increased. In passing let me point out to you that the salary of the Montreal city solicitor has been raised to $15,000 and offered to a judge of the superior court, who renounced a judgeship to accept this position.

Members of the Quebec legislative assembly draw an indemnity of $1,500 for a session which lasts six or seven weeks. Can that be compared with what we get here?

When a few years ago the question came up of increasing the sessional indemnity, some would say: the people will be down on us and we replied: Yes, the people will be down on us if we are divided, if one side of the House wants it and the other rejects it. But if we agree and if we all stand by one another, then the people will abide by our decision, as they have done when the sessional indemnity was raised to $2,500. The question was not even discussed before the people, as the vote had been unanimous. Such steps must be taken unanimously.

When the proposal for increasing the judges salaries was submitted, the same objections were made. The judges were drawing $5,000, their salaries were raised to $7,000. Did the people kick? No, and why? Because both sides of the House had joined hands to vote that increase. The salaries of superior court judges are insufficient, and those of the circuit court judges at Montreal, ridiculous.

Let us now consider how a member's money goes. Every day people come to my office for subscriptions of various sorts. It may be a poor farmer who has lost a part of his crops, or some animal in a fire; or it may be the christening of a bell or some charity sale. Or else it may be some agricultural meet or competition, for which the gift of a plough or a whip is in order. Then there are ploughing competitions and annual district fairs. To give less than $20 for any of these purposes would result in being rated as a niggardly individual.

Let us help ourselves before helping others. Personally I am satisfied with the indemnity granted to members, as I can do without it. Providence has been kindly to me. By dint of hard work, energy and moderation, I have succeeded in saving some little money. But is that indemnity sufficient? I think not. I say to the Government: Give us a square deal. When it comes to building railways, or highways, or entertaining, there are millions galore, but when it comes to dealing fairly with the representatives of the people, there is nothing for them. It is proposed to let us have secretaries at $2.50 per day. But who will be found to work at such a salary? We cannot be expected to take on men who can neither read nor write. We are in need of secretaries, for we have a quantity of letters to write, and it is impossible for us to be of service to our electors to the extent we would like to be. If we had a little more leisure, we might give more time to preparing our bills, our speeches; but under present conditions we have not the time; we barely have time for sleep and meals, and we are obliged to travel at night. Those forty or fifty millions would enable you to treat fairly the representatives of the people.

I hope the hon. minister will not forget to build for me that post office, which was so unfairly struck out from the estimates.

If you have millions to distribute, distribute a part in the shape of grants to cheese and butter factories, to district agricultural fairs, to the tobacco industry. There are numbers of ways of expending those millions which it is proposed to give to Mistress England. I love England, but only as a step-mother. Our first concern should be with our wives and children. To begin with, let us work for this country, let us develop its resources, and let us build the Georgian bay canal.

Hon. gentleman opposite refer to scandals; that is really laughable. Are not their forerunners responsible for the most outrageous scandals recorded in the pages of our history: the Pacific, St. Louis, Pont-Caron, McGreevy, Connelly, Langevin, Caron and Chapleau scandals? Was it not to them that Sir Mackenzie Bowell was referring when he said he was surrounded by a nest of traitors? You are the successors of all these men, and you dare lift up your heads? You have spent your life in the midst of the worst political scandals and you have not the right to speak of others. You live in a glass house and should not throw stones at your neighbour.

So, I say to the Conservatives: show some respect for your opponents; do not make any reference to scandals, since scandals have brought about your downfall in former times.

Sir, I have spoken at great length. I regret it for hon. members who have speeches to deliver; but as the session is bound to last for some time yet, they will be given an opportunity to speak in their turn. I thought it proper to make these remarks in the interest of the Liberal party. I shall vote against any measure providing for a grant to Great Britain. The Liberal party have carried out the resolution voted by this House on March 29, 1909. By that resolution we stated that it was expedient to do something. I succeeded in satisfying my electors that the only policy acceptable was that propounded by Laurier. I have not changed my mind, and I am anxious to know what amount the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister will ask the House to vote. I would willingly vote millions if they were to be applied to the objects I have just set before the House.

Let the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister in the first place pay up the country's debt. As we know it now exceeds $350,000,000, and it is proposed to increase it by $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 more in the shape of a gift to Great Britain.

I say with all due respect to the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister: No, you have no right to give away the millions which are the property of the people. That money does not belong to the Government, and you have not been elected to give away the public funds. You were elected as trustee, and your powers do not extend beyond those of a trustee. You are not vested with any extraordinary powers, and consequently you have no right to give away what does not belong to you. Now, I say the millions which the Prime Minister and his colleagues are anxious to dispose of are not his property, and the people will want to know why he has given away millions to a power which is undoubtedly the greatest under the sun, though, through the mouths of a few gentlemen, whom, however, I respect—I am not here to cast aspersions on any one—she makes such an extraordinary request. I am in the habit of speaking out boldly what is in my mind.

I say that to allege in this House that Great Britain is in need of money, is disrespectful to her, and of a nature to throw some discredit on her. It means practically that she is not able to maintain her world-wide supremacy without the help of her colony, which is expected to contribute in consequence thirty or forty millions, though her debt already amounts to 350 millions, we to borrow these millions from Great Britain and thereafter pay interest on the borrowed capital.

In concluding I am fully confident that my constituents will stand by me and say as I say that Canada is in too great a need of its funds to donate them to the Mother Country.

When these gentleman talk of loyalty, I am frightened. I am afraid of a woman crying in the street: I am an honest woman. Is not Canadian history full of facts bearing testimony to the loyalty of the French Canadians? Then why should we talk of loyalty? Therefore, it is not necessary to give presents in order to show our loyalty. When we were told that vessels should be constructed, that we needed them, we did not hesitate, but now this gift is useless.

In concluding, I beg my hon. colleagues to forgive me for having taken so much of their time.

Mr. LAFORTUNE.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to try to follow the speeches of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House regarding the irregularities in Macdonald. However, before passing to what I have risen to say, I want to refer for a moment to that matter. I listened with a great deal of surprise and a good deal of amusement to the efforts of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and other hon. gentlemen opposite, to work up a feeling of indignation at the alleged irregularities in Macdonald. One would think that these hon. gentlemen had imagined that the public had forgotten the record of the Liberal party in Canada. When one looks back over that record for 15 or 16 years and realizes what took place in the different constituencies —in London, for instance, where imported thugs and personators were brought over by the Liberal party and paid out of the Liberal fund to steal the election there; when one realizes what took place when this country was covered with trick ballot boxes, and when they buried six or eight of them in Sharbot lake to hide the shame of the Liberal party; when one looks over the great province of Manitoba and the western country and realizes that for years the Liberal party held office there by padded lists, by personation, and by every conceivable thing that could possibly be done by any party or any set of men to hold sway in this country;—I say when one realizes these things, it is not hard to imagine that hon. gentlemen have been endeavouring to cover up as best they could by their unfair attack on the Government the most signal defeat that they have received at the hands of the electors of this country. They went to Macdonald with the determination to carry it; they imported nearly every man who was importable from Saskatchewan, headed by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), with every member of the House of Commons from that province with the exception, I think, of the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff)—and people are wondering why the hon. member for Assiniboia was not there. I presume he had good reasons, and I presume he could tell the House why he was not. But, in addition to every member of the House of Commons from Saskatchewan, we had one or two cabinet ministers from that province, and we had hon. gentlemen from Quebec. Others came from Saskatchewan who were caught absolutely redhanded in their efforts to corrupt the electors of that province. These men were arrested; and, because the Conservative party were good-hearted and generous enough to allow these men to go without trial, we find hon. gentlemen now rising in their places and trying to work up a lot of sympathy to cover up one of the greatest defeats their party ever received at the hands of the Conservative party. The hon. member for Edmonton was so sure of the defeat of the Conservative candidate that he gave an interview to some of his friends two or three nights before the election, in which he said: 'Boys, it is all over; we will have at least from 200 to 400 of a majority, and it is going to be just the same as the next Dominion election will be—and I agree with him.

Mr. OLIVER: Where did my hon. friend get that remarkable information?

Mr. BRADBURY: I got that statement from men that my hon. friend is supposed to have made it to, and I presume it is right.

Mr. OLIVER: Their names, please.

Mr. BRADBURY: Of course, if the hon. gentleman says he did not make the statement, I will accept his word.

However, I did not rise for the purpose of referring at any length to that election, but I did rise for the purpose of drawing the attention of the House to the unpatriotic action of the hon. member from Edmonton and the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) regarding the condition of the cement duties. I desire to quote what the right hon. gentleman said on this question. I am reading from 'Hansard,' page 34.

I do not believe that it is possible now, or will be for many years, to raise our revenue in any other way. But whether we approve of that system or not, whether we are free traders or protectionists, we are agreed that once a duty has been imposed that duty should not be lightly interfered with. In the first place, a duty should not be levied except after ample consideration as to the amount of revenue that it may produce, and the effect it may have; because the effect of any customs tariff, even if it be for revenue only, is to create a different atmosphere and therefore likely to produce very serious consequences. For that reason I say that no changes in the tariff should be lightly made. We made in our day a change in the tariff when we abolished the coal duty west of Lake Superior, but we gave the reason. The West was threatened with a coal famine, and it was to avoid that most dire calamity in a country like Canada in the winter time that we resorted to that method. But what is the justification for the course which was taken last June? We were told all of a sudden that the duty on cement had been reduced by one-half. On this subject there was published in the Canadian Courier in the month of July last, a most illuminating correspondence, in which the charge was made, that the duties were reduced not as a matter of policy, not because of the condition of the country, but simply with the object of influencing an impending election in the province of Saskatchewan.

But he takes good care that he does not make that charge. He goes on to say:

I would not venture to make the suggestion myself.

He would not veture, but he would build up an attack on the Government of the day on a letter written by a disgruntled manufacturer who was being hit by the reduction of this duty. He built up an attack against this Government on the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) realized the conditions in the Northwest, realized that there was a real cement famine, not a threatened famine, and took advantage of the powers conferred upon the Government by the Customs Act, and did exactly as the leader of the Opposition did at the time a coal famine was threatened in order to give relief to the people there. Instead of the right hon. gentleman being generous or fair enough and broad enough to give credit to this Government for stepping in and relieving a situation that threatened the loss of millions of dollars to the people of the West, and threatened to turn out of employment hundreds and thousands of men, he takes advantage of a letter written by a man who was being hit, one of the disgruntled manufacturers who felt the reduction in the duty and saw his profits fading away and objected to the Government doing what it did to assist the Northwest. The right hon. gentleman stated that he could not see any good reason why the Government should have acted as it did at that time. in face of the fact that the western press, Liberal and Conservative alike, were calling on the Government to give them relief; in face of the fact that he must have known that the cement famine was a serious matter, not only in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and that all over Canada great public works were being tied up. And what is to be said about the attitude on this question of the hon. member for Edmonton, the leader of the Liberal party in the West; a man who must have known the true condition that existed in the West last summer? Above all men we would have expected him to rise in his place and thank the Government for taking advantage of that clause in the Customs Act to extend relief to his friends in Edmonton and Calgary and all through the western country, which was absolutely necessary if the great building undertakings were to proceed in the West. What did the hon. member for Edmonton do? He rose in this House, and, instead of thanking the Government for what it had done, he followed in the footsteps of his leader, and he made this statement:

We had freedom from half the cement duty during the summer, but we are paying the whole of the cement duty now, and I say again that while there may be emergent circumstances such as occurred in the case of the removal of the coal duty by the late government, there are no such emergent circumstances in the case of cement.

Well, Mr. Speaker, one is at a loss to understand such a statement as that coming from the hon. member for Edmonton. He has a paper in Edmonton known as the Edmonton Bulletin and which is regarded all over the West as a newspaper belonging to him, and that paper published article after article, calling upon the Government to either reduce the duties on cement or abolish them in the interests of the people of the West. I will read one or two of these articles, and when you contrast them with the language of the hon. gentleman in this House, you will have demonstrated the inconsistency of the hon. gentleman:

I quote from the Edmonton Daily Bulletin of June 1, 1912.

A shortage of cement is reported from Saskatoon. The cement merger still enjoys protection against the competition of foreign cement-makers. Who, besides the holders of its watered stock, benefits through the restriction thus imposed upon building operations and commercial enterprise?

The Edmonton Bulletin of June 6, 1912, says:

Asking the Boss.

A chorus of complaints is going up from western cities against the shortage of the cement supply which is retarding building operations and threatens to do so to a far greater extent. The Canadian market is ringed about with a protective tariff which 'preserves' the home market to the home cement manufacturer. The home manufacturer being in this case a merger, has done as mergers usually do in like cases—marked up the price without increasing the output, if it did not actually cut down the output while hoisting the price. The result is a two-fold discouragement of building. Where cement can be got at all, it is only at an unduly and unreasonably inflated price; and in a great many places at the present time it simply cannot be got at all. As a relief, the western builders are asking the Minister of Finance to suspend the duty on foreign cement for a time and allow a supply to come in, that it may not be necessary to cancel arrangements already made for the erection of new and badly needed residences and other buildings. At last accounts the minister was in consultation with the head of the cement merger—and we can guess from that whether the duty is to be suspended.

The Edmonton Bulletin of June 6, 1912, says:

Is the Merger willing?

The manager of the cement merger says that to suspend the duty against foreign cement would not relieve the western situation, because cars could not be obtained in which to bring in cement from the United States. If that is the case the merger should have no objection to the duty being suspended. Hasn't it?

The Edmonton Bulletin of June 10, 1912, says:

Barrier reduced but not removed.

The volley of protest that has been sent in to Ottawa from all parts of the western country in regard to the cement situation has produced some result, though not as much as was hoped. . . As the remaining duty amounts to 26 cents per barrel, it is evident that the reduction will neither smash the cement merger nor put very much pressure upon it to cause it to supply the western market.

Under the extraordinary conditions existing throughout the whole western country, the least that can properly be done by the Government to relieve the situation is to cancel the duty on cement altogether for the summer. The building programme of the prairie country is beyond all precedent. The works planned by municipal corporations aggregate a larger expenditure than has been made before in a single season. Unless the situation which has existed in regard to cement be relieved both private and public enterprise must be checked and many projects on which work has begun will have to go over to another year. Already contractors have been forced to suspend operations and workmen have been thrown out of employment by the lack of this essential and should the scarcity continue much longer, we may expect to learn that buildings planned for this season have been struck from the list and left for future consideration.

In face of articles of that kind published in the hon. gentleman's own newspaper, it is hard to understand how he could rise in his place in this House to condemn the Government for doing exactly what his own newspaper and the press generally was calling on the Government to do. The newspapers of the West were pointing out the conditions that existed, showing that unless they got relief large enterprises and public works would be suspended, and that workingmen would be turned out on the streets without work. But, Mr. Speaker, there is more than that. The Edmonton Bulletin was not the only paper that was crying out to the Government. We had the Manitoba Free Press, a paper which I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House will say is very friendly to the Government, crying out for relief. On June 1, 1912, it said:

The Need of Cement.

The builders of Western Canada, unable to go on with their work for lack of cement, want access on reasonable tariff terms to the sources of supply in the United States. They do not want to listen to assertions by Manager Jones, of the Cement Trust, that the railways are to blame. Let Mr. Jones and the railways fight it out along that line to their hearts' content; but in the meantime it is cement, not talk, that is urgently needed in this country.

There is a prediction which it is perfectly safe to make. It is that if the Dominion Government were to do its duty by reducing the duty on cement, so as to give Western builders reasonable access to the cement market of the United States, the cement trust and the railways would be found working together like beavers to hold the valuable market here in the West.

The Minister of Finance, in his letter of January 22 last, in the course of the correspondence resulting from the demand of the Winnipeg Board of Trade that an investigation be made, under the terms of the Customs Act, into the whole question of the excessive cost of cement, promised that such an investigation should be held. Now there is the cement famine. The need of a searching investigation is as plain as daylight.

Meantime there is a still more urgent need of cutting down the duty on cement by an exercise of the emergency power which the Government possesses, and which was exercised last year in removing the coal duties on account of the situation created by the strike in the mines of Southern Alberta.

That is exactly what the Minister of Finance did. He took advantage of the emergency clause in the Customs Act to cut the cement duties in two, and still we have the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and his friends protesting that the Government was wrong in doing so and blaming the Government for coming to the assistance of Manitoba and the other great Western provinces. Then, the Winnipeg Tribune, a newspaper that no one would say is very friendly to this side of the House, had this to say on the subject in its issue of June 4, 1912:

Scarcely Interested.

The Winnipeg Board of Trade represented to the Borden Government the injustice imposed on the West by the duty on cement. No party politics entered into the question here. The members of the board, almost without exception, were unanimous in denouncing the extortion.

Conservative M.P.'s who were indignant over the extortion under Laurier, are, seemingly satisfied to have it practiced under Borden.

The voices of Arthur Meighen and Geo. H. Bradbury are silent.

The eloquence of J. A. M. Aikins is not heard on behalf of the farmers and builders of Brandon.

Meantime building operations may stop, or the builders of homes and factories may import from the United States and pay the extortionate duty.

This is another evidence of the crying demand for relief. Still these hon. gentlemen have the courage, or audacity rather, to claim that that action of the Government was intended to influence the election in the province of Saskatchewan. Were the Winnipeg Tribune and the Winnipeg Free Press anxious to help the Conservative cause in Saskatchewan? Was the Edmonton Bulletin, an organ belonging to the member for Edmonton anxious to help in that election? The proposition is too absurd to be thought of. Here is a telegram from the Board of Trade for Edmonton:

Edmonton, June 5, 1912.

A special general meeting of Edmonton Board of Trade called to discuss cement situation unanimously approved action of our president yesterday in signing telegram asking for removal of duty on cement for period of four months to permit building operations here to proceed. It is pointed out unless immediate relief afforded more men will be idle in West owing cement shortage than are employed in entire cement industry of Dominion.

Does the hon. member for Saskatoon say that there was no emergency or famine at that point that called for the immediate action of the Government? Here is a telegram from Saskatoon:

Saskatoon, June 5, 1912.

Situation serious regarding shortage of cement. We have five million dollars tied up in this city for want of supplies. Strongly urge remission of duty for four months to enable us to get supplies from the United States. Work delayed during our short building season is a serious blow to development in construction work of all kinds. City contractors state they are losing one thousand dollars per day by the enforced idleness of their labourers.

Yet the hon. member for Edmonton, coming right from the heart of the province of Alberta and realizing that the adjoining province of Saskatchewan was suffering from want of cement, instead of approving of the Government's action, rises and enters a protest. Here is another clipping from the Edmonton Journal, June 7, 1912.

The Cement Shortage.

There is no difference of opinion in the West as to the need of relieving the shortage of cement which threatens to interfere so seriously with what would otherwise be the greatest building season in the country's history. The temporary removal of the tariff is the obvious remedy and there should be no delay in bringing this about.

The editor who wrote this article had evidently had not consulted the hon. member for Edmonton, the proprietor of the paper because there was a very great difference of opinion between them. From the action of the hon. member, he apparently did not see that there was any necessity for the Government to use the power given to it under the Custom's Act to give that province and the western country the relief it was calling out for.

Winnipeg, June 7, 1912.

Please refer this Board's resolution December nineteenth and subsequent correspondence re cement merger contending rate of duty on this necessary article is excessive and petitioning Dominion Government for reduction or abolishment of duty. Since your letter March eighteenth stating matter would be laid before Government for consideration this board without any further advice. Serious shortage cement exists throughout Western Canada. Building operations at standstill and erection of many postponed indefinitely. This board urge immediate action by Government in reduction or abolishment of duty as necessary to alleviate present serious situation.

C. N. BELL.

This telegram comes from the Board of Trade of the city of Winnipeg, one of the greatest cities in Canada. That city had over $19,000,000 of work under contract last year, and its progress was threatened. In conjunction with other cities and municipalities throughout the West, it was calling upon the Government to interfere and grant them relief. Still these hon. gentlemen insist that this action was taken to assist in the Saskatchewan elections. No more ridiculous proposition has ever been presented to this House.

North Battleford, Sask., June 8, 1912.

Cement shortage renders situation here critical. Construction work of all kinds suspended owing to lack of supplies. This delay is serious blow to general development. Strongly urge temporary remission of duty which will enable us to obtain cement from United States so as to obviate further commercial distress.

This telegram comes from my hon. friend's constituency. I could go on reading article after article, but I want to quote just one more from the Winnipeg Free Press, a paper that is very friendly to the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House:

Cutting Down the Cement Tax.

The action of the Dominion Government in making use of its emergency power to cut the duty on cement in half, the reduction to continue in force until October 31, is to be commended. It is hardly to be doubted that a survey of the whole situation would disclose ample ground of justification for a complete cutting away of the duty. Still, reducing of the duty from 52 cents to 26 cents per barrel must be accepted as a substantial reduction, for which the country thanks the Government.

This paper is fair enough to acknowledge that the Government has done its duty, yet we find men, who are sent here to represent the people of the West, trying to make political capital out of what the Government has done in this regard. This article continues:

That it is temporary is satisfactory in the sense that the people of this country do not want any assumption of autocratic power at Ottawa. The tariff can only be made by Parliament. It cannot be made by Order in Council; all that the Government can do is to make use of an emergency power conferred on it by the Customs Act with a view to such contingencies as the cement famine which has been retarding building operations throughout the West.

Mr. BRADBURY.

I would commend this to the consideration of the hon. member for Edmonton. One of his arguments was that the cut in the cement duty, which expired on the 31st of October, should not have been put back again. The Free Press, however, points out the constitutional method, which my hon. friend must know, that this emergency clause is only used where there is an emergency, and when that emergency ceases to exist, the clause becomes ineffective. When the duty is to be dealt with, no doubt it will be dealt with by Parliament. The Government took the only course they could have taken. The former Government took the same course in connection with the coal famine a year or two ago, and as soon as the famine was over they restored the duty. That is exactly what this Government has done, and instead of being fair and just, we find the hon. gentleman not rising equal to the occasion, but playing the game of politics. I have grave doubts even, that he has played that well. Realizing the intelligence of the electors of the western country, I feel sure they will resent the position that the hon. gentleman and his friends have taken in this House. I believe that the boards of trade and great municipal bodies throughout that country who appealed to the Government for redress will resent the attitude taken by the hon. member for Edmonton and his right hon. leader and other gentlemen on that side of the House. The Free Press goes on to give despatches from different places, and even from Edmonton :

Edmonton, June 10.—Reduction in duty by one-half will enable contractors to import sement at a price plus freight, of $3.25 to $3.30 a barrel, which is the price they figured on for the Canada Cement Company's product at the opening of the season, according to Secretary Whitmore, of the Builders Exchange.

Brandon, June 10.—Though the market has been somewhat stiff it does not appear that the shortage of cement has been felt so acutely here as elsewhere.

Travellers here this morning stated there would be an abundant supply should the duty be reduced. The news which reached the Free Press office here this afternoon that the duty on cement was reduced by one-half has given general satisfaction.

I do not intend to go on building up evidence ; it is not necessary. It must be apparent to every hon. member of this House, and I am sure it is apparent to the country from one end to the other, that hon. gentlemen opposite have been unjust, and unfair, and that they have refused to give to the Government the meed of praise which might reasonably be expected from opponents who were endeavouring to play the game fairly. Rather they have taken advantage of the circumstance that an election was taking place in the province of Saskatchewan to try to have the western country and the people generally believe that that reduction in duty was not made for the purpose of helping them, but was made to assist a political party in Saskatchewan. A more absurd proposition could not be presented to any body of intelligent men. I have no hesitation in saying that the people of the West will place their stamp of disapproval upon the conduct of the hon. gentlemen who represent the western country, and upon that of the leader of the Opposition, in taking that unfair—I was going to say unmanly—attitude. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would not venture to make the suggestion himself that the Government had reduced the duty for the purpose of assisting a political party in Sasatchewan, but he was not above reading a letter from a man who had claimed to be a supporter of the Conservative party, one of the small manufacturers who was being hit and was suffering under the smart of reduced profits, and on the basis of that letter he tried to make a point against the Government. I can only say that it is not a very dignified position for the right hon. gentleman to occupy before this country.

I do not wish to delay the House at too great length. There have been other speakers on that side who have taken a similar attitude to that of the hon. member for Edmonton. I wish to refer for a moment to an argument offered by my venerable friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). That argument reads as if it might be from the pen of Jules Verne or Rider Haggard. It would be hard to imagine an hon. member on this side of the House being guilty of placing on 'Hansard' such arguments as those I am about to read for the edification of the House. The hon. member for North Cape Breton spoke on the 27th of November. I have to quote somewhat lengthily in order to give the House a sample of the arguments that are brought before us from down by the sea :

> For myself I should be sorry indeed to doubt any statement of fact which would be made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. White). I believe that he means well, that he is a man of wide experience and of proper and good natural instincts. But there is such a thing as a man being deceived. There is such a thing as others having ways that are dark and tricks that are vain. There is such a thing as evidence being put before the Minister of Finance which in the simplicity of his heart, he believes, but which is no real evidence at all. We are a little too old in the world—

That is the trouble, I am afraid.

> —to believe that the great performer who had charge of the Saskatchewan election would ask the Minister of Finance to make this cut in rates without giving him some material. That great leader, and I am afraid the boss of the Government, was too shrewd, too calculating, to think for one moment there would be any use in going to the Minister of Finance and asking for a cut unless there was evidence, and such evidence as could with some plausibility be submitted to the House when the crucial moment came.

Then the hon. gentleman goes on to ruminate:

> I could imagine to myself such a thing as this boss of the administration, this performer, going to boards of trade, going to building combines or associations and telling them: Now I am here for a purpose. I am here to help run an election and to win it. I must have something startling in this province. I must have something that will attract the attention of the people and one of the things would be to cut rates of duty on something that enters largely into the economic consumption of the people of this province. Just now I think cement would be a good subject. What is the matter with you sending a resolution to the Minister of Finance telling him that this must be done? Very good.

This is supposed to be the answer of the boards of trade and municipal bodies.

> Very good. If that is necessary we are good loyal party men and we will do that, but do you suppose Mr. White will believe that such an emergency exists? Believe? Certainly he will believe; he is a good innocent fellow, he knows nothing about these intrigues and he will believe it. This was done all over the country and this deluge of telegrams and resolutions was poured upon the innocent head of the minister and how well they succeeded was shown yesterday in the vigour and strength of the words with which he backed up this delusion which was heaped upon his head.

Mr. Speaker, it is hard to believe that any hon. member would so far forget himself as to commit arguments of that kind to 'Hansard.' I am not an old parliamentarian, as my hon. friend claims to be, but I should feel ashamed if I put arguments of that kind upon 'Hansard' without one tittle of justification. The hon. gentleman builds up out of his own diseased political mind a case of almost inconceivable happenings through the western country. He would have us believe, without evidence, that this 'great boss' that he speaks about, this 'great performer' could go to the different boards of trade throughout the Northwest, and to building associations and municipal bodies and appeal to them successfully to help him win the Saskatchewan election. Does not every hon. member of this House know that there are as many good Liberals in the boards of trade in the West as there are Conservatives, that there are as many Liberals who are contractors and belong to contractors' associations as there are Conservatives ? Why, it is childish to ask the country and to ask this House to believe an argument that would tend to prove that action such as is indicated had been taken by anybody. But the hon. gentleman does not stop there. He deliberately maligns and insults the great boards of trade throughout the Northwest. Speaking of what had taken place in Nova Scotia over some shortage of coal and steel, he says:

We have samples of that sort of thing in the Island of Cape Breton, when the Dominion Coal Company, or the Nova Scotia Steel company, owing to pressure on their works, are unable to supply coal or steel rails, as the case may be, and have to go across the line, pay the duty, and fulfil their contracts. There is no such thing as coming to the Government to ask them to remove the duty. That was possibly another delusion practised upon the minister. It is quite possible that those combines and trusts, went to the contractors and got them to raise a howl to frighten the minister, saying: 'we know we have to pay you the difference for any loss you may suffer, but we do not want to pay duty to bring in this cement, and if you cry loudly enough it will come in free.'

This was a new argument. A few moments before it was the boss, the great performer, who had done this. Now he says he can understand that these combines and trusts had gone to these men and told them to raise a howl and that the duty would be taken off if they raised a loud enough howl. He says:

It is quite possible that that was played upon the minister, and that he was persuaded to let this in free without the necessary evidence being before him. My hon. friend (Mr. White) is not a child in regard to the things that go on in this world, or in regard to the civil or municipal institutions of this country, and he knows that boards of trade are the most delusive bodies that ever existed on the face of the earth. If there is anything to which I would pay little attention it is to the resolution of a board of trade. These boards are the most irresponsible and unrepresentative people that were ever permitted to live in this country.

He says further:

One or two members can pass a resolution; one alone can move and second it, sign it as president or secretary, and send it to the department. That is all the hon. minister has got, and yet he stands up boldly and says: 'Where is the member for Saskatoon, I dare him to oppose the resolution of the members of the board of trade.' The chances are that when he goes up there to look for those members he will be unable to find one that would take the responsibility of saying that he ever saw or heard of a board of trade. That is the kind of evidence that is submitted. We heard it said yesterday with a great flourish of trumpets, that the leader of the Opposition was making strong bold statements based on nothing but newspaper scraps. I assure the Minister of Finance that he never saw a poorer scrap of any kind than a resolution of a board of trade, and that is the only evidence upon which he based the great case which he tried to make out here yesterday.

I appeal to any man who knows the calibre of the boards of trades of Manitoba and the West if this is a fair attack. Take the board of trade of the great city of Winnipeg, composed of the very best business men in that city, big men in every way, men with whom the hon. gentleman who has made this onslaught would hardly be fit to sit in the same room, as far as mental powers are concerned, great business men. These men have been maligned and insulted by this attack. Take the board of trade of Saskatoon, the board of trade of Edmonton, composed of the very best business men of that country. Who would suppose that any hon. member of this House would attack and insult them as the hon. member has done? His action was certainly not very dignified or edifying to this House and the hon. members from the West who sit opposite will be held responsible because while the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) was making these statements these hon. members listened to him and smiled and applauded. No man who knew the true position and personnel of our boards of trade, and our great building associations, would ever expect such an attack to be made on them, and any hon. member who maligns these bodies, as this hon. member has done, must answer to the board of trade and building associations of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Now, where does the responsibility lie? If there has been any suffering in this country, as my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) would lead the House to suppose, from the effects of the high duty on cement and from the effects of this merger, who is responsible? Early in my parliamentary career, on November 16, 1909, I called the attention of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who was then on this side of the House and his Finance Minister to the formation of this combine. I shall read to the House a question I then put to the Finance Minister:

Mr. BRADBURY asked:

1. Has the attention of the Government been called to the cement merger that has taken place, by means of which the Canada Cement Company, Limited, has taken over ten of the largest cement companies of Canada with a capital of $30,000,000 and that on account of this merger the prices of cement to the consumer has been very much increased?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to take action to protect the public against this merger, which threatens to be a huge combine thereby increasing the cost of cement which is almost a necessity to-day in great works?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The government are aware from information in the public press, that a number of cement manufacturies of the Dominion have been consolidated under one large company. Whether this consolidation has unduly enhanced the price of cement is a disputed point.

The law provides two methods of dealing with combinations which unduly enhance prices. One of these, in the case of dutiable articles, is by abolition or reduction of customs duties, after the facts have been established by judicial inquiry. It is proposed to introduce, during the present session measures to make this portion of the law more effective. The other method is under the Criminal Code, the administration of which comes under the direction of the Attorneys General of the several provinces.

This is conclusive evidence that the attention of the late Government was called to the forming of this merger, and to its effects, and the Government was asked to intervene, to make an investigation and apply the remedy. But the Government made no move. Six months later I again called the attention of the Government to this matter when the then Minister of Labour introduced his Bill to investigate combines. I shall again quote from 'Hansard'. I said:

In the early part of the session I drew the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to the effect that the cement merger was likely to have in increasing the cost of cement in the province of Manitoba and throughout the Dominion. I hold in my hand the Winnipeg Tribune of the 23rd inst., a paper that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side used to swear by.

And, I expect, they will swear by it to-day, just as they did of old. It is as follows:

High tariff and combines. The advocates of high protective tariff would do well to consider the effect of high duty in the case of cement.

In the course of last year, about 400,000 barrels of cement passed through Winnipeg, and roughly speaking, about half of this quantity was used in Winnipeg, or for Winnipeg works. In view of the inordinate amount of building in the city and such works as the new bridges and the power plant at Pointe du Bois which will only require at least sixty or seventy thousand barrels, it is more than fair to assume that at least the same quantity will be required by Winnipeg ratepayers this year, namely, 200,000 barrels.

How much more will this amount cost this year than last? At the present time contractors in the city are paying $2.40 a barrel for the same grade of cement as they were purchasing as low as $1.80 last year before the merger was formed, which was brought into existence by the high protective tariff—an advance of 60 cents. This means that if this rate is maintained—and there is no reason for supposing anything else—Winnipeg alone will pay $120,000 more for its cement than last year. At the present time the merger is selling cement at from 10 to 15 cents a barrel less than the price at which it can be brought in from the United States. They have protection of from 51 to 52 cents per barrel, which is prohibitive. A barrel of cement can be sold at the factory anywhere in Ontario in round figures, at $1 a barrel. The duty is, therefore, over 50 per cent.

If the duty were reduced to 30 per cent, which is the average charge on manufactured goods, then it would be possible for the consumer of Manitoba to import their cement from the United States, if the Canadian merger did not make a fair price.

After reading the article from the Tribune, I made a few comments. I stated as follows:

I would like to emphasize what I said in an earlier part of the session when I had the assurance of the Minister of Finance at that time that a Bill was under way which would deal with this matter. It is very important to the western country. I may say that in all our great structures to-day, due perhaps to the increased cost of lumber, we are using cement very largely, and while the Tribune estimates that 400,000 barrels of cement will pass through Winnipeg this year over different lines, I think it would be safe to say that a far larger quantity of cement will have to pass through Wininpeg to supply the needs of that growing country. I would like to ask the minister in charge of this Bill if he intends to make an investigation and take such proceedings as to cause the merger to do what is fair with the people of the West. The suggestion of the Tribune that the protection should be reduced on this article, I think, is a very fair and wise one.

Where was the member for Edmonton then?

I think that when we find that mergers are causing an increase in the cost of commodities, which they are producing, which is unfair to the consumer, the Government should reduce or take off the duty altogether, if it is necessary to force the combines to give the people the product, whatever it may be, at a reasonable price. There is no doubt about this cement merger being a serious drawback to the West. You could get cement at $1.80 last year, now it is $2.40 a barrel. That is brought about, I am satisfied, by the merger, and the Government ought to take immediate action to protect the consumer in this matter.

This shows conclusively that the late Government was warned of what was taking place under this cement merger. Then, the Tribune claimed that there was an excessive cost, and if the hon. member for Edmonton had been as serious and as anxious to protect the West as he appears to be to-day, in believing that this duty should be cut off or abolished, he certainly lost his opportunity when he was a minister of the Crown sitting on this side of the House. Yet, knowing all that, he was one of the men who helped to create and foster this great combine that exists in Canada to-day. That combine was fostered and nurtured under the Liberal party. They did not investigate, and why? Because nearly every leading member of that combine, including the president of the company, was a Liberal. No man would say that the Hon. George Cox of Toronto, was a Conservative, or the Hon. Senator Edwards, or the Hon. Mr. MacKay. When I drew attention to that merger in 1909-10, every one of the prominent men connected with it was an active Liberal, and that is, I suppose, a good reason why the member for Edmonton, and his right hon. leader sat so quiet, and allowed this merger to work its sweet will on the people of the West. But now, things are changed. He is in opposition, and the Conservative party are in power, and he is calling upon the Conservative party to do what he and his friends dared not do. They are playing the game, just as they played it before 1896, when they went up and down the country preaching reduced tariffs, reduced taxation, and free trade as they have it in England. But as soon as they came into power they became the friends and colleagues of the trusts and combines in this country. They are directly responsible for the increased duty on cement. If the duty on cement is too high—I am not prepared to say that it is—I am prepared to ask this Government for a thorough investigation into the whole matter, and if the duty is too high, I expect that this Government will do, just as other great Conservative Governments have done, apply the remedy, and reduce the duty in the interests of the people of this country. I have the records in my hand regarding the duty. When these gentlemen came into office they found that the duty was not so high as it is to-day. In 1894, under the old Conservative regime, the duty was as follows: (I am reading now from the customs returns):

1894, item 184, cement, including Portland or Roman, and hydraulic or water lime, 40 cents per barrel, including the duty on the barrel.

1897, item 187, cement, Portland and hydraulic, or water lime, in bags, barrels or casks, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty, 12½ cents per 100 pounds.

One of the very first things that the late Government did was to increase the duty on cement. In 1897, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition came back fresh from the country with a great majority gained by promising reduced duties and free trade as they have it in England, and the very first thing he and his party did was to increase the duty on cement. In 1906, there was another increase:

Item 290, cement, Portland and hydraulic or water lime, in barrels, bags or casks, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty.

That is, in addition to paying the increased duty on the cement itself, the people were paying duty on the weight of the bag, or barrel, or cask, or whatever the cement came in. And that is not the worst feature, because I find under item 291:

Bags in which cement or lime mentioned in item 290 is imported under general tariff rate of 20 per cent.

Briefly, here is what happened: In 1894, under the old Conservative regime, and until the Liberals came into power, the tariff in existence was 40 cents per barrel, including the barrel; when the Liberals came into office in 1896, it was increased by them to 43¾ cents per barrel, including packages, making an increase in the duty of 3¾ cents in addition to the weight of the bag, or an increase of about 5c. per barrel. But, in 1906, not satisfied with increasing the duty, this free trade party further increased it to 51¾ cents. When the Liberal party came into power they found a lower duty on cement, they built up a higher tariff and they created this merger through that tariff because it is safe to say that without an increased tariff there would have been no great inducement for the formation of this merger in Canada. If the duty on cement is burdensome to the people to-day the whole responsibility rests upon the shoulders of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, the member for Edmonton and their colleagues all over the country. They are the men who put this increased duty on cement. There is no doubt at all that it will remain for the Conservative Government to reduce the tariff and see that a fair and equitable duty is levied. Before taking my seat I want to point out that there was a Bill before this House last session that was killed through the advice and influence of the leader of the Opposition, and this measure would have made it possible for this House and the country to have known exactly where the cement company stood. That was the Tariff Commission Bill. If we had a tariff commission to-day that commission could go into the office of this merger, take control of their books, ascertain immediately where this merger stood and whether they were receiving too much protection or not. The protection was increased by the Liberal Government by nearly 30 per cent and still these hon. gentlemen have the audacity to stand up and try to hold this side of the House responsible for the increased cost of cement.

Now, I am not going to detain the House any longer, but I only wish to say in conclusion that hon. members from the West will have to be more consistent if they want to win the ear of the West, they will have to be more patriotic to the West and more loyal to the West. The men who represent the West cannot ride two horses, one in the West and one down here. It is all right enough for them to go back to a little schoolhouse and discuss the high cost of living and the high cost of cement and then come down here and protest against the Government interfering as they have done to alleviate the conditions that existed in that western country. There is no doubt that the Government intervened when there was a serious famine throughout the country. Millions of dollars of public works were threatened with being closed down, hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of public work had already been closed down, thousands of working men had been turned loose on the streets without employment, and the consequence would have been that, had not the Government intervened, hundreds of thousands of working men would have been turned out of employment. Yet, in face of all this we find hon. gentlemen taking the unpatriotic and unfair position of trying to make a little political capital out of the reduction of the duty on cement which was done entirely in the interests of the people of the country.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, along with other members, I appreciate very much the good advice which is given us by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury). With that deep personal interest that I know the hon. gentleman has in the re-election of the Liberal members from the West, he has advised us not to attempt to ride two horses, one here and one at home. Well, Sir, it does not appear to me as if the hon. gentleman is riding the same horse he was riding two or three years ago. He has told us in his address, part of which is a repetition of some remarks that he favoured the last Parliament with, I think, in the session of 1909-10, that he brought this matter of the formation of the cement merger and the high price of cement to the people throughout Canada as a result of the formation of that merger to the attention of the late Government. It is a fact which does not need any demonstration that the hon. member for Selkirk has been in this House since 1911, and that during the whole of the first session, in fact, during all the time that his friends have held office, this is the first time the hon. gentleman has ever brought to the notice of the House this serious condition of affairs in connection with the operations of the cement merger in Canada. So far as the hon. member for Selkirk is concerned, I do not think that he is just exactly riding the same horse that he was riding when the Liberal party held office.

The Speech from the Throne appeals to me as a very remarkable document, both for some of the things which it contains and many of the things it does not contain, that, in my judgment, ought to be included in the programme for the consideration of this Parliament.

In the first place, our attention is drawn to the general prosperity throughout the length and breadth of this country. Well, our friends on the Government benches have been in office but a short time and they hardly expect us, I suppose, to infer that they are responsible for this general prosperity because they have not yet had sufficient time to disorganize that splendid machine left them by the late Government which is responsible in a very large measure for the general prosperity of the country. Our attention is called particularly to the increased trade of this Dominion with other countries. It does seem a somewhat remarkable thing on which to congratulate the House, coming from a Government who were elected to office in opposition to a trade agreement that would have increased our trade ten times the increase we have had since this Government came into office. It is a remarkable thing that they should congratulate themselves and the country on this increase of trade when the slogan that brought them into office, the platform that brought them to power, if it meant anything, meant the continued restriction of trade between this country and one of the greatest countries of the world, the republic to the south of us.

We are asked to congratulate ourselves and the country on the consummation of a trade treaty with what ? With the British West Indies, and it has been brought to the attention of the House how much of an increase in trade that means. That trade agreement with the West Indies is undoubtedly right in principle. The principle is good but the effect is almost nil as every member of this House knows. And yet we are asked to congratulate ourselves on the negotiation of this reciprocity treaty with the British West Indies, immediately following the defeat of an agreement with a nation of one hundred millions of people.

The prominence given, in the discussion up to the present time, to our old friend the reciprocity agreement, must have impressed itself on every member of this House. Members of the Government are constantly bringing before our notice the question of reciprocity. It formed a very important item in the speech of the Finance Minister, and the one thing that struck me in connection with that speech was the evident deep concern of the minister over the question of reciprocity. He was very much concerned to get the consent of the members of the Opposition to bury the whole subject out of sight. It must be giving the hon. gentleman a great deal of anxiety and worry when he calls on the members of the Opposition to assist in putting that whole question out of sight and out of sound. Well, Sir, the Liberal party do not propose to put the question out of sight and out of sound. The hon. member for Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler) found that out the other evening when he propounded his questions to certain members on this side of the House. The particular agreement that was submitted to the people of Canada on the 21st of September, 1911, is undoubtedly a thing of the past, but Sir, while that particular pact or agreement is dead, the principle that underlies it will never die in the history of this country. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that because they have won a temporary victory by the defeat of this one particular trade agreement with the United States, the people of Canada are forever going to bury the principle of wider markets? If hon. gentlemen opposite have come to that conclusion, I do not think it will be very long before they will awake to find that they have been resting in false security. The Liberal party believe still in the principles of the late reciprocity agreement or pact; they have always believed in those principles; there is no inconsistency in that. It probably is within your knowledge, Sir, that there are hon. gentlemen sitting in this House on the Government seats, who, when that agreement was brought into this House, were just as much in favour of it as were the members of the Liberal party in this House. We are consistently in favour of the principles that underly the reciprocity agreement; but, on the other side of the House there are hon. gentlemen who, by their applause when that agreement was brought into this House, evidenced what their thoughts and views on it were. But the exigencies of party, the political expediency that was brought to bear upon these gentlemen, led them to forsake the principles that they believed in, and to join with the others of their own party who thought it best to mislead the electorate by an appeal to a false sentiment which they themselves had created throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Mr. STANFIELD: What about what happened on your side of the House?

Mr. NEELY: If my hon. friend had been listening to me, he would have heard what I had to say so far as this side of the House is concerned.

We have been asked to believe that even very many of those who in 1911 voted in favour of the principle of reciprocity have changed their minds, and the illustration we are given of that is the result of the election in the constituency of Macdonald in the province of Manitoba. As you are aware, Sir, the Government candidate was elected in that constituency. It certainly was a surprise to many that the Government candidate received the majority he did. The independent candidate in that election had taken the trouble, some months before the election was held, to visit every important part of the constituency and hold public meetings and wherever he went he was met with enthusiastic support and applause. Apparently in the month of August the sentiment of the constituency of Macdonald was overwhelmingly in favour of wider markets and freer trade; but when the election came in October, it was discovered by Mr. Richardson and his friends that this sentiment was not expressed at the polls. Why was it not expressed at the polls in October if it had existed in the month of August when Mr. Richardson made his tour of the constituency? I do not think that at this stage in the debate it is necessary for me to undertake to demonstrate in the House the reason why the sentiment which in August prevailed in the constituency of Macdonald was not represented at the polls in October, the reason being, as has been stated by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and other members on this side of the House, that the electors of Macdonald were not given an opportunity in October of expressing their unbiased opinion on the great trade issue that was presented.

In connection with the amendment before the House, there has been brought to our attention a condition of affairs in Manitoba that it is surely time the people of Canada should become aware of. In view of the large farmers' deputation that came to Ottawa in December, 1910, asking for reciprocity with the United States, it must have been a source of considerable surprise throughout the length and breadth of Canada that the people of the pioneer prairie province of Manitoba saw fit to send only two Liberals, out of ten representatives from that province. The answer to that enigma is given to us to-day in the result of the Macdonald by-election. The methods that were adopted by the connivance and apparently with the approval of the Minister of Public Works; the methods that were adopted by his old colleagues in the Government of the province of Manitoba; those methods that existed to such an extent as they have done in the constituency of Macdonald in the recent by-election, were the methods that in election after election, federal as well as provincial, prevented the people of Manitoba from giving expression to the sentiments which really animated the majority of them. For years back, ever since the Roblin administration has been in office in the province of Manitoba, every Liberal candidate, every Liberal worker, has had to face conditions similar to that portrayed as having existed in the recent Macdonald by-election. In fear and trembling, Liberal workers have sought by fair and legitimate means to influence the electorate of the province of Manitoba, as they knew that the whole machinery of the Department of Justice of the province was in the hands of a great body of officials who were ready at any moment to prevent an honest expression of the sentiment of the electorate at the polls on election day. This House will not soon forget the remarkable speech made the other day by the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Rogers), in which he attempted to vindicate himself, his late colleagues the Manitoba Government, and the Conservative organization generally, in connection with the recent Macdonald by-election. From the speeches delivered by the Minister of Public Works and Sir Rodmond Roblin, Premier of Manitoba, during that election, one would have thought that the constituency of Macdonald was about to be carried away bodily and planted somewhere in the province of Saskatchewan by that 'host of thugs and thieves,' who were being imported from that province. What are the facts? Out of that host of thugs and thieves, one lone individual, Mr. J. J. Sullivan, was arrested. The other three were residents of the province of Manitoba and therefore the term 'imported' could hardly be applied to them. When I asked the Minister of Public Works the other day why these men were not prosecuted, his answer was, 'One of them was a public nuisance, and had been for years.' Surely, that was all the more reason why he should be prosecuted, if he had been a public nuisance for years, and on top of that had been doing crooked work in the election at Macdonald. What was J. J. Sullivan arrested for, according to the Minister of Public Works? We have heard of the sins of the fathers being visited upon the younger generations, but it is the first time I ever heard it announced that the sins of uncles were to be visited upon nephews. The Minister of Public Works claims that the fact that this J. J. Sullivan was the nephew of a gentleman of the name of 'Cap' Sullivan of years gone by, was a good and sufficient reason why he should be arrested when he appeared in the constituency of Macdonald. If that argument is good, where does it drop to when we discover, as we have discovered, that Mr. J. J. Sullivan is no relation at all to the famous 'Cap.' That at least is what Mr. J. J. Sullivan says.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): People in the country know him; people in Ontario know him.

Mr. NEELY: We have a telegram from him to that effect.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): You should get better evidence.

Mr. NEELY: I did not know my honourable friend, the hon. member for Lisgar, belonged to the medical profession; in other words, I was not aware that he was present when Mr. J. J. Sullivan was introduced into this world, but apparently the hon. gentleman was somewhere around on that occasion. Does the hon. member know it himself?

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): I never saw him, but I know it.

Mr. NEELY: That is where the hon. member and his friends have fallen into the trap in this, in going by hearsay.

Mr. BOYCE: Apply that to the hon. member for Edmonton, about the hearsay. He is the greatest one for hearing in this House.

Mr. NEELY: The hon. member for Edmonton can answer that for himself. When it comes to the prosecution of Mr Sullivan, notwithstanding the awful name he bears, and the record of his supposed relative in days gone by, it is discovered that there is actually no evidence at all against him; and my friend from Selkirk—I am sorry he has gone out—would have us believe that the waiving of these prosecutions was due to the magnanimity of the Conservative party in the province of Manitoba. I would prefer if my hon. friend would tell that to the marines, because so far as I am concerned, while I admit there are proper and good elements in the Conservative party, to tell us that the Conservative organization in the province of Manitoba did not prosecute these four individuals through generous feelings, is something I am sure every member of this House will have to take with a very large portion of salt. That is the strength of argument by which the constituency of Macdonald pronounced against reciprocity. I do not say that a trade question is a provincial question, but sometimes, federal issues get into provincial politics, and if the Minister of Public Works claims that the result in Macdonald spells ruin to reciprocity, I wonder what that hon. gentleman thought when he heard the result of the provincial elections in Saskatchewan, because, whether it was right or not, in that election reciprocity, according to the Conservative leader in that province, played a very important part. It is bad enough in the constituency of Macdonald, that Liberal workers have been thrown into jail without cause; that personators in the Conservative interest have been allowed their liberty with too light a penalty, and by unlawful means; but what I consider the worst feature of the case is that since the amendment has been introduced by the hon leader for the Opposition, the only argument brought forward against that amendment is that 'you did the same when you had the opportunity.' That was the argument advanced by my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury). That was the argument advanced by the hon. member for Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler). It is an argument one might expect from hon. gentlemen of their calibre—lesser political lights with lower ideals than we expect their leaders to have, perhaps. But, Sir, when we find the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Borden), and his right hand man the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds), when we find the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) the holder of one of the most important portfolios in the Government, with no argument in defence of their position with relation to these atrocities except: 'You did it, therefore we are justified in doing it,' that of itself is a far more serious aspect of this situation than even the actual occurrences in the Macdonald by-election. I wonder how the people of Canada will view the net result of this discussion on the electoral methods in this country, when the best answer that even the Prime Minister can give to these proven charges of wrong-doing on the part of his supporters in this by-election—for which wrongdoing, the Minister of Public Works must hold himself personally responsible because he was personally cognizant of the occurrences—is that because irregularities occurred in days gone by we must look lightly on these occurrences in the constituency of Macdonald. It is true, irregularities have occurred in days gone by. But I would like to know from hon. members who have made these references if they can give me a single instance in the history of a single province of Canada when, under a Liberal Government, the rights of citizens have been taken away as in these instances when men were thrown into jail and denied the first liberty of British subjects.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): The hon. gentleman has asked for an instance. I will give him one, Saskatchewan last summer.

Mr. NEELY: My hon. friend will have to give us more than that to convince us on that point. And he will have an opportunity in the very near future. My hon. friend speaks of wrong having been done in the Saskatchewan elections last summer. While that is a forbidden subject under the ruling that has been made, yet, if the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss that, let me point out to him one difference between the conduct of this Government and the conduct of the Government of Saskatchewan. It was stated by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) that the Liberal Government of Saskatchewan had obtained power by wrong-doing in the elections last summer. Well, Sir, what was the first thing that the Prime Minister of Saskatchewan did at the opening of the first sitting of the legislature following that election? Why, Sir, he presented the charges made by the Minister of Public Works to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with a mandate from the Government to make the most thorough investigation into those charges. That is something not done by this Government.

Mr. BOYCE: Does not the hon. gentleman think that would be a rather reasonable request to make of this House—a request for a reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections—rather than make a direct charge on evidence that is not before us?

Mr. NEELY: The Government have had every opportunity of saying what they would like to say and proposing what they would like to propose in this matter. They have had evidence presented to them that they have not refuted nor undertaken to refute. The question of my hon. friend is one which he ought to put to the Prime Minister of Canada and not to myself.

This is the contrast between the two governments. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite may say, 'Oh, well, it is only an insincere attempt after all.' I take it for granted that the government of Saskatchewan will welcome the evidence of the man who made the charges in connection with the Saskatchewan election, the Minister of Public Works himself. The condition of affairs is one that cannot be tolerated. It is not the custom of churches in this country—I shall not be sneered at now, because the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is not here—to openly and unnecessarily take part in the discussion of political and public affairs. But every member of the House knows that, so flagrant were the atrocities in the Macdonald by-election that the Presbyterian Synod of the province of Manitoba felt compelled to pass a resolution of censure on those who had permitted those atrocities. I think our friends on the Government benches have extracted too much honey from this victory, or supposed victory, in the by-election in Macdonald. I know nothing of the gentleman who sits for that constituency in this House by virtue of that election. I trust, however, that he is a gentleman of such moral fibre that he would not accept his seat in this House had he known that his first election had been brought about by these methods. And I trust that, having come to this House, and having discovered that his seat was won by these methods of the Conservative party in his province, he will say : 'I will not hold a seat gained by such methods, but will go back to the people from whom I came, and will give them a fair, full, free opportunity to express their sentiments once again at the polls. Now, we are told that this matter is to be gone into further.

Some hon. MEMBERS : Hear, hear.

Mr. NEELY : Hon. gentlemen say 'Hear, hear.' I am glad of it. But the statement made to us by the Minister of Public Works the other day was that a counter petition had been put in against Mr. Richardson, the defeated candidate in that election. There are a number of legal gentlemen in this House on both sides. And any member of the bar knows perfectly well, that while a man may be disqualified as a voter as a result of evidence submitted before the courts in the hearing of an election protest, that does not constitute a criminal action and procedure. The gentlemen who were arrested and thrown into jail, so far as criminal prosecutions are concerned, are free under the law according to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works. There is no criminal prosecution and, no matter what they may do in the matter of a counter protest, by their refusal before the Court to prosecute these four individuals according to the information laid against them, they have practically admitted and avowed that there was no charge which they could prove against them. We have listened to a very severe arraignment of members of the Opposition, especially the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), because of a certain proposed position they have taken on the question of the reduction of the duty on cement. It seems to be the last resort of the members on the Government side, when they have nothing substantial to attack in the position of the leader of the Opposition, to erect men of straw and to attack those men of straw, the attacks being made—shall I say deliberately made—by the different speakers on the Government side who have discussed the question of the reduction of the duty on cement, in order to lead the House and the people of this country to believe that the leader of the Opposition and the member for Edmonton are opposed to a reduction of duty on cement. How any sane intelligent man can draw that conclusion from the speeches of the leader of the Opposition and the member for Edmonton, I absolutely fail to see. There is not, I am satisfied, a single individual on this side of the House who has spoken on this question who is not in favour of a reduction of the cement duty. It was not a very big thing, perhaps, but the trade agreement that was defeated on the 21st of September, 1911, did make provision for a reduction of the duty on cement.

Mr. EDWARDS: How much?

Mr. NEELY: I said a reasonable reduction. I think about 2½ cents a hundred pounds.

Mr. EDWARDS: 1½ cents.

Mr. NEELY: Perhaps my hon. friend is better informed than I am, I am not discussing that point; I am discussing the point that a reduction was proposed and that the hon. gentlemen on the Government side, to a man, opposed it, whatever it was.

The hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) assumed a position of outraged dignity and great indignation because he claimed that the leader of the Opposition had attempted to put his position in a false light before the country; in other words, because the intimation was given that this reduction on cement was made for the purpose of influencing the Saskatchewan election.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEELY: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was calling attention to the complaint of the Minister of Finance that his position, with reference to the reduction of the duty on cement last June, had been misinterpreted by members on this side of the House. In fact, the Minister of Finance became very emphatic and called upon the leader of the Opposition, and the member for Edmonton, to give him an apology for the explanation they had given of that reduction. A reduction of the duty on cement at any time meets with my approval, because I think the duty is altogether too high. I am satisfied that the reduction made by the Government did bring a practical and material benefit to the people of Western Canada, if not to the people of all Canada. But I am reluctant to extend, on my own behalf, or on behalf of any member on this side of the House, anything in the nature of an apology to the Minister of Finance for the position taken by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition with reference to the object and motive behind that reduction. The Minister of Finance makes the statement that he had no other object in view than the benefit of the people. I take the minister's word unreservedly, but I refuse to believe that that was the only motive which actuated other members of the Government who necessarily gave their consent to the reduction of the duty at the particular time it was made.

In the correspondence which the Minister of Finance gave to the House, I notice a letter from the Winnipeg Board of Trade, dated Winnipeg, June 7, 1912, a letter which was quoted, unfortunately, by the member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury). In that letter I notice references to a correspondence between that board of trade and the Minister of Finance and the members of this Government, dating back as far as December, 1911. It was hardly what you would call an intermittent correspondence, because, judging from the references here several communications had passed between the Winnipeg Board of Trade and the Minister of Finance and the members of this Government. That board of trade took a strong position on the question. They said the duty was too high, and the price of cement was too high, and in the previous correspondence they called upon the Government either to cut that duty very materially, or to abolish it altogether. I have not that previous correspondence before me; the Minister of Finance was not good enough to give it to the House, but it is perfectly evident that the Winnipeg Board of Trade anticipated exactly what did happen, namely, a shortage of cement throughout the Western provinces. It anticipated that shortage, not merely on the 7th of June; but for months previously the Winnipeg Board of Trade had sought to impress upon the Government that it was their duty to reduce or to abolish the duty on cement. The Minister of Finance would have this House believe that this urgent demand for the abolition or reduction of the cement duty was the matter of a moment, that it arose in a few days. The Minister of Finance must know, as surely the members from west of the Great Lakes know, that for weeks previous to this final urgent demand, everybody in Western Canada knew that there was a serious shortage in cement, and that the building operations throughout the season were bound to be seriously hampered unless provision was made. I venture to assert that for a considerable period before this House prorogued last session, that knowledge was in the possession of the Minister of Finance, and of other members of the Government, if not every member of the Government. They must have had that information. The Winnipeg Board of Trade was keeping them constantly reminded of the situation, and had been doing so as far back as December 1911, and it is idle to come to us to-day and say we did this because of the urgency of the need, when the urgency of the need had been patent for months previous to the time the reduction was made. That the need was urgent I do not deny. Simply do I affirm that it was urgent for a long time previous to the actual reduction. Now, the position that I, as a western member of this House, take in this. I am glad that the duty on cement was reduced, and very sorry to see it put back again; but our case for a reduction of the duty on cement is not so weak, nor so poor, that we want this matter presented to this House and to the people of the country as an emergency proposition. We want a reduction of the duty on cement, but we want it, not as a temporary provision, but as a permanent provision, and that permanent reduction can only be made by this Parliament. Therefore, having had the information in their possession for months previous to the reduction, this Government should have made the reduction during the last session of this Parliament.

The Minister of Finance introduced almost a new word into the debates of this House, and he used it a number of times. He asked us to believe that the reduction of the duty simply synchronized with the approach of the elections in the province of Saskatchewan. Well, there is no question at all about the synchronizing, because the first public announcement with regard to the reduction was made by the then Minister of the Interior, now the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Rogers), at a banquet in the city of Regina, which one hon. gentleman said he gave to himself, though I cannot vouch for that, on the night of the 10th of June. At that banquet the Minister of Public Works announced that he had just had a telegram from the Prime Minister.

Mr. OLIVER: Not from the Minister of Finance?

Mr. NEELY: No, from the Prime Minister, to the effect that the duty on cement had been cut in two. Of course that announcement by the Minister of Public Works at a political banquet in the city of Regina, on the eve of an election in that province, was just a synchronism. I quite concede the point made by the Minister of Public Works that the writs had not been issued at the time he made that famous speech; but it was on the 11th of July that the Saskatchewan elections were held, and this announcement was made on the 10th of June, so that it was not very long after the announcement before the writs were issued; in fact everybody in the province, and in the West, knew that the Government of Saskatchewan proposed issuing the writs in a very short space of time. The Minister of Finance calls this a synchronism. Having a somewhat suspicious nature in regard to these synchronisms, I must say that, while it may be largely a synchronism, as far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, I regret to say that I cannot accept that explanation for the other members of the Government. We have had an experience of the benefits which have been derived from this reduction and we have a letter here from some member of the Government—I wish they would sign their names when they send these letters out, because we want to quote and quote correctly—to a cement manufacturer in which he points out that although they had cut the cement duty in two it still remained at the high mark of 30 per cent. That reduction to 30 per cent was a great benefit. I would like to know what the Minister of Finance and other members of the Government, having provided for the emergency of the past season, and in view of the benefit of the recent reduction, and of the information which they have derived as to the condition of affairs in the West, propose to do at this session of Parliament to prevent a similar shortage in the supply of material for building operations in the West next season. If the Minister of Finance will make this reduction permanent by means of proper legislation in this House, he certainly will have my support, and I believe the support of every member sitting on this side of the House who comes from west of the Great Lakes. The position was taken by the Minister of Finance that we owed him an apology. Perhaps personally we will have to admit the innocence of the hon. Minister of Finance, but as far as the Government are concerned, we are not yet ready to deliver the apology demanded of us by the Minister of Finance a few days ago.

The Prime Minister the other day, in his reply to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, made a very strong case for himself in his concluding remarks by comparing the record of his Government in the short time it had been in office with the record of the Liberal Government, which had preceded him in office for fifteen years. He enumerated the number of good things that had been done by this Government. One of the things he referred to was the reorganization of the public service. Well, it was noticed that the Prime Minister did not elaborate on the efforts put forth by the Government for the reorganization of the public service. I believe this Government have reorganized the public service. They have reorganized it to a very considerable extent. One of the very first acts of the Government was to appoint a public service commisison for the reorganization of the public service; but, that commission had operated only a few months when it was found necessary to reorganize the commission. I believe that the reorganization has been completed recently by the appointment of another chairman in place of the gentleman who, for some reasons best known to himself, resigned since this House was prorogued some months ago. I have been watching, up in my part of the country, the effect of this reorganization, and, so far as I could discover in my province or in the constituency I represent, this reorganization seemed to be a process of decapitation, taking off the heads of Grit officials and putting Tories in their places. It was a reformation with an axe. The country generally understood that, when the Prime Minister spoke of the reorganization of the public service, having heard his professions for many years in opposition, it would be with the object of putting it on a non-partisan basis. There has been a reorganization of the service, but I fail to see where the service has been improved. The reorganization has put Tory partisans in the place of Liberals whether they were partisans or not, of which I have had some very practical illustrations in my own constituency. I do not propose to discuss provincial elections in this debate, but I think I am justified in calling the attention of the House to the character of the appointments which have been made by this Government in the reorganization of the outside public service, and in calling attention to the way in which these officials have been conducting themselves since their appointment. In the West the department we come in contact with mostly is the Interior Department, which, until recently, has been presided over since this Government came into office, by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers), now Minister of Public Works. The hon. Minister of Public Works reorganized the service in my constituency. How did he do it? By putting out of office all the homestead inspectors who had held their positions under the late Government. Almost every individual in the service of the Interior Department was asked to resign or was dismissed without any investigation, as far as I know, of any sort or description whatever. There were others put in their places, and among the others, just as an illustration, there was one gentleman, by the name of Smyth appointed as a homestead inspector in the place of one who had been dismissed. This Dominion homestead inspector who, in this reorganization of the public service, had been appointed to take the place of an official of the late Government, undertook to take some part in the Saskatchewan elections in the interest and on behalf of the Conservative party. For the small part he took—it must have been very small, judging from the result of the election—an information was laid against this homestead inspector, an official under this Government and appointed by this Government, charging him with the intimidation of voters. I have a copy of the information here which was laid against this gentleman. He was brought before the courts of the province on the charge, and fined $50 and costs. I think the costs ran up probably another $50 on top of the fine. A Dominion Government homestead inspector intimidating voters, complained against, informed against, convicted by the courts of the province and condemned to pay a penalty of $50 and costs.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What is his name?

Mr. NEELY: Arthur Smyth is the full name of the gentleman, I think.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Has he been dismissed for engaging in these practices?

Mr. NEELY: I was coming to that point. This is a matter of public notoriety. The Minister of Public Works cannot say that he did not know what occurred, because, strange to say, when the late Government went out of office it was a remarkable thing that the hon. gentleman who succeeded the hon. member for Edmonton as Minister of the Interior seemed to know the personal record of every Government official throughout the length and breadth of the country. He knew what every one did. Therefore he must know what this particular official did and what he was guilty of in the Saskatchewan elections. If this gentleman had appealed the case and won the appeal, we could have said that there was something wrong, that he had been wrongfully convicted and that he had had to pay the penalty wrongfully; but, while it was proposed by the defendant to enter an appeal in the courts against this conviction, he failed to do so, and the result is that this conviction stands and that this Mr. Smyth, homestead inspector, has paid the fine and the costs of the court.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The Prime Minister will dismiss him.

Mr. NEELY: We would like to have had that done a little sooner.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): He will have to do it now.

Mr. NEELY: So far as this official is concerned, the last information I had from the district was that he was still acting in the capacity of homestead inspector under this Government. But that is not all. I happened to be in that part of the province during those elections, and I discovered that not only the homestead inspector was busying himself in the elections, but that the agent of Dominion Lands at Humboldt, appointed by this Government, was also interesting himself. One of the first gentlemen I ran across in Saskatchewan indirectly, after the election campaign had commenced up there, was another Dominion official,—no less a person that the famous Mr. Jackson, who, I understand, is Chief of the Dominion detective service at the present moment, although previous to his appointment to that office by this Government he held a similar position under the Manitoba Government. I have a copy of a letter here from the Agent of Dominion Lands at Humboldt, in which he introduces this Mr. Jackson, Chief of the Dominion detective service to this Mr. Smyth, the Homestead Inspector, who was convicted of attempting to intimidate the free electors of the province of Saskatchwan. I say I have here a copy of a letter in which Mr. Oliver, that is the name of the gentleman, asked Mr. Smyth, the Homestead Inspector, to kindly give any assistance and information he may require to Mr. Jackson, who is the Chief of the Dominion Detective Service. I understand that this Mr. Jackson was one of the chief actors in the recent Macdonald by-election; this Chief of the Dominion Detective Service who in the constituency of Wadena in the province of Saskatchewan was arrested on a similar charge made against Mr. Smyth, the Homestead Inspector, and was taken to Regina. He was not prosecuted like our Liberal friends in the constituency of Macdonald, for the one and very sufficient reason that he turned King's evidence, and gave information to the court as to the other numerous gentry of his own calibre whom he had brought with him from the province of Manitoba into the province of Saskatchewan. That is the reformation and reorganization of the public service, to which we have been treated up to date by this present administration. I do not think that it is a reorganization that the Government can feel justifiably proud of. Certainly it is not a reorganization which harmonizes very well with the pre-election promises and pledges of the Prime Minister

Mr. GRAHAM: It does not synchronize.

Mr. NEELY: It does not. There is a very serious omission from the Speech from the Throne and that omission is the failure to make any reference to the bringing in at this present session of a redistribution measure so as to give proper representation in this House to the different provinces of Canada. In the old days, when we had a Conservative regime once before, it did not make very much difference to Western Canada whether there was a redistribution or not, because the population was so small that there was very little change from year to year in the representation. But times have changed in that western country. It is now represented west of the Great Lakes by 35 members and we are entitled to 56 or 57 members based on the returns of the recent census. The Prime Minister undertakes to say that we should not be impatient in this matter; he says we need not worry about redistribution; that this Government has three or four years more to live and that so long as we have redistribution before the next election no one will suffer. I can hardly appreciate that position of the Prime Minister. How can he say to-day that some crisis may not develop in the affairs of this country or in the affairs of this House that will necessitate an immediate appeal to the country? As evidence of that possibility, I want to point out to this House, that if some 20 odd members sitting in this House, from the province of Quebec, yes, and a few odd members from the province of Ontario are true to their anti-election pledges and promises as to submitting any naval assistance to the people, by referendum, then we are going to have a crisis in the affairs of this Government in the very near future. The Government tells us there is no trouble in sight. Is it not a fact that over twenty members from the province of Quebec owe their positions in this House to their opposition to the assistance that this Government, or any government, might render to the Empire's defences by contribution or otherwise. And, unless rumour and newspaper statements are altogether false, there are a few members from the province of Ontario in a similar position. If, when this Government brings forward their proposition, no matter what its nature may be, whether it be contribution or whether it be a settled Canadian naval policy, if these gentlemen keep their pledges to their constituents, we will have a crisis in the affairs of this Government in a very short time. That being the case, our demand for a redistribution measure during the present session is a fair demand; it is a right demand, and the Government have given absolutely no justifiable reason why that demand should not be met at once. This question of redistribution is therefore a serious matter. The census returns are complete, according to our information. Why does not the Prime Minister or some member of the Government tell the House the reason for the delay in the introduction of the redistribution measure? We are told that the representation of the Western provinces in the Senate is to be increased. Well, Sir, that is some information; but surely it is a more insistent duty on the part of this Government to give the electorate their fair representation in this House than in a body appointed solely by the Government. I would like to hear from the Government further than we have heard up to date on this question. I want to say to the Prime Minister, who is not present, and to the other members of the Government, that unless this House does get more satisfactory reasons than we have had up to date for their failure to introduce a measure of redistribution at the present session, they will hear of this question not once, but many times, until our demand is complied with; so far, at least, as it concerns proper information regarding their refusal to bring in a redistribution measure.

We have heard a good deal about what occurred in the Macdonald by-election. We have also heard something about what occurred in the by-election at Richelieu. So far as the latter election is concerned, there has been no defence made for what occurred, not even by any member of the Government. The House is therefore unanimous in the opinion that if the member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) made the promise and the pledge he did in that by-election, and made it conditional on the people voting for the Conservative candidate, we have turned a new page in the history of elections in this country. But bad as that may seem, that is only an attempt to bribe a single constituency. I am sorry that the Minister of the Interior is not in his seat, because the next reference I have to make is to him. The Richelieu case was an attempt to bribe a single constituency, but in language as plain as he dared put it, the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) at the famous banquet in Regina on the 10th of June last, attempted to bribe the whole province of Saskatchewan.

Previous to the elections of September, 1911, the Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, made a tour of the West, and made certain definite, well defined pledges to the people of Western Canada. Amongst other things he made the pledge that, if he were returned to power, he would take immediate steps to turn over to the various provinces of the West their natural resources in the shape of timber, minerals, land, &c. He made that pledge absolutely without reservation, so far as my knowledge and information goes, and I think I am perfectly correct in my statement. He made it, not once, but dozens and dozens of times.

When the Prime Minister was making that tour, we thought he was at least fair and honest in the pledges he was giving the people. We did not anticipate that he was going to have an opportunity of making good those pledges, and I don't think he thought so himself. The opportunity, however came to him, whether it was a surprise to him or not, and to-day he and the members of his Government are face to face with those pledges. The Prime Minister did not tell the people of the West, 'We will give you your natural resources if you vote Tory, or if you vote Grit.' No string was attached to his pledge and promise which was, 'We will give you your natural resources.' This is the second session of this House. I have read the Speech from the Throne from beginning to end several times, and I fail to find a single reference in that speech to this ante-election pledge of the Prime Minister. It seems very strange to me that the Prime Minister has not one single word to say about this pledge; but the Minister of the Interior, then Secretary of State, at the banquet in Regina on the 10th of June last, made a plea to the people of the province of Saskatchewan, which was not justified by the course of events in the months preceding the making of his speech, because it ought to be in the information of this House that, although the Liberal party did accept the terms given to those provinces in the Autonomy Bills, for the time being, subsequent to that settlement the Liberal party and the legislature of Saskatchewan placed themselves on record as demanding the turning over of the natural resources of those provinces to the provincial government. That request was not made in view of any change in the Federal Government at all, as the resolutions were passed by the Alberta and Sasatchewan legislatures previous to the Dominion election by which the Liberal party went out of office. They were made presumably to a Liberal Government with every hope and expectation that the demand would be pressed home upon a Liberal Government here at Ottawa. The Liberal party took the position that the Prime Minister was a man of his word. We only knew what he had said in Opposition; we did not know what course he would map out for himself when he became leader of the Government; but in Opposition he had taken a high stand. What does his minister say to the people of the province of Saskatchewan? He addresses himself to the whole province at this banquet in Regina, just four weeks before the election in that province, and, as plain as words could put it, he told the people of the province of Saskatchewan that if they wanted their natural resources it was their inevitable duty to vote for Mr. Haultain, the leader of the Conservatives in that province. We blame the member for Charlevoix (Mr. Forget) for attempting to bribe a constituency. Here is a Minister of the Crown attempting to bribe a whole province. No man can read the words of the present Minister of the Interior at that banquet, giving those words the fairest possible interpretation that can be given them, and take any other meaning out of his words than that the province of Saskatchewan may expect their natural resources restored to them if they vote for the Conservative party in the pending provincial elections, and that they need not look for that turning over of their natural resources if they do not vote in the way indicated; notwithstanding the fact that when we had a Liberal Government holding office here at Ottawa, the whole legislature of the province of Saskatchewan had made an insistent demand upon that Government that those natural resources should be restored to them.

I wish to call the attention of this Government to a condition of affairs now existing in the West. They are probably aware of these conditions, because I believe they have taken certain steps to ameliorate them. Last year there was a serious congestion at the head of the lakes, and that experience is being repeated this year. Of course we would not have reciprocity, but we have had to go to the Inter-State Commerce Commission, so that we might get a through rate to the American inland ports for the purpose of storing our grain. Of course we do not want reciprocity. But just recently, I understand, the coasting laws have been suspended in relation to our inland waters, so that American bottoms can furnish storage at the head of the lakes during the winter months for the grain of our western country. We do not want reciprocity, but we are going to use American bottoms for storing our grain during the coming winter. We heard something a short time ago about keeping navigation open at the head of the lakes for a longer time. But I understand that navigation is closing now and apparently nothing has been done by the Government to carry out the promise given through the press that navigation would be kept open at least a month longer.

Let me further call attention to the fact that the terminal facilities at the head of the lakes are totally inadequate to meet the conditions of the West this year, or any year. Those facilities must be enormously increased in the very near future. Of course the Prime Minister told us that they would take over and operate the terminal elevators at the head of the lakes. The Minister of Public Works announced last summer, at this same notable banquet, that the Government had purchased forty-seven acres at Fort William to build terminal elevators. I suppose the land could be used for storage facilities by dumping the grain on the ground, but no further provision seems to have been made by the Government for storage facilities at the head of the lakes; certainly no facilities are available at the present moment. If this Government is not capable of meeting the congested conditions from year to year, they can at least render one great service to the people of the West, and that is by assisting in every possible way the investigation that is going on before the Board of Railway Commissioners into the freight and express charges that are so burdensome to our people. And the Government can bring their influence to bear in favour of an appreciable reduction in the freight and express charges for the benefit of the consumers throughout Western Canada.

I am not going to discuss the matter that will be before us in a very short time, the question of Canada's part in the defence of the Empire. I have only this to say, that if I have any knowledge of the sentiments of the people whom I represent in this House, they are prepared to stand by the position taken by this Parliament in March, 1909, and will give unfaltering support to their representatives in enacting any proper measure by which Canada will take her part in sustaining and strengthening the Empire's defences as well as her own.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I ask the indulgence of the House for a short time while I refer to some of the questions mentioned in the Address, some questions not mentioned in the Address, and some questions that have been raised in the debate. In justice to the amendment that has been placed before us, I refer to that first. We have tried in the province of Ontario to keep our elections fairly clean, and to use fair methods in them. It was something of a shock to me to hear the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) say what he said about the way he was treated in the Macdonald election. Following the hon. gentleman from Humboldt (Mr. Neely), and taking my cue from the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce), I believe that that question ought to be referred to the committee of this House which has charge of Privileges and Elections, or to a special committee, for thorough investigation. I am willing, in the general interest, to try to elevate our public life, especially the holding of elections, and to take any steps that will end in improving present conditions. We can elevate our public life, and it is the duty of men on both sides of politics, especially those who have the honour of seats in this House, to see that a man can vote in an election and that, no matter what his views may be, he can have an opportunity of recording his vote. I believe that is the sentiment of the people of this country; I know it is the sentiment of the people in my own province. And in my own experience in elections, especially in my own riding, we have never had any trouble in having a fair vote and fair treatment of each side by the other.

Now, I wish to refer to the question of cable rates. We are promised a further reduction in cable rates. We already have something in the way of reduction, and we may get something more. The companies signified a short time ago that they proposed to reduce the cable tolls between the Mother Country and Canada. But there will never be a substantial reduction of the cable tolls in this country until Canada has the courage to say that we intend to build a state-owned cable between Canada and the Mother Country and to implement and strengthen the cable line that is now owned by different members of the Empire between Australia and Canada. The cable monopoly which, until a short time ago, had its headquarters in London, but now has its headquarters in the United States, is one of the great monopolies of the world. It will never move in the direction of reduction of rates until it is compelled to do so. The moment it was known, some time ago that Canada was considering a proposal to establish a state-owned cable, they began to make reductions. That fact is sufficient encouragement to our Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), who has given great attention to the matter, to move now, and out of the great surplus Canada has to-day to build and equip a state-owned cable between the Motherland and Canda.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): We have had enough experience now. The former Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) confirms what I say by his 'Hear, hear;' and I exceedingly regret that when he was dealing with the question he had not the disposition to take the stand I now advocate. But I gather from his approving 'Hear, hear' that he is of opinion that the way to get cheaper tolls is by a state-owned cable. I have stated in this House what I learned from information carefully gathered in London some years ago, that the lobby maintained by the cable interests in London had effectually stopped the reduction of cable rates for years and years, and the same will be effective unless this country and the Mother Country take action. England will have to join us in this matter as soon as we say it must be. The onus will not rest upon Canada of starting a state-owned cable; the Mother Country will have to come in. All that is needed is for Canada to say through this House of Commons and through the Government that we propose to bind the Empire together by a state-owned cable as well as by a system of defence. There is more to be made out of great combinations in matters of trade and closer exchange of public opinion than there is by ships and sailors and regiments of men.

An important question not referred to in the Speech from the Throne is Senate reform. I would like to see some reform of the Senate. Five years more will complete the first half century of our experience with our constitution, the British North America Act, and as it is evident from our experience that some reforms are needed in various directions, a serious attempt to improve our constitution should be made. Reform is brought about in two ways ; we can get it by appeal to the Mother of Parliaments for increased power or we can do it, I believe, by action in this House. I would suggest that as we are approaching the completion of our first half century under our constitution, the government of the day ought to move by inviting the provinces and others to join in a consultation as to how the constitution ought to be improved, and this House ought specially to debate in what way the Senate can be improved. The Senate, of course, is not what it ought to be. Perhaps this House is not what it ought to be, but the people can do something with this House, while they cannot do anything with the Senate. The people of the Motherland, in the Old Country, have found a way of reforming the House of Lords, and it was done in the House of Commons and on the public platform before the people of the country. Something must be done in this country and in this House, so I say that as a House here and as members representing the people, the question of Senate reform is well worth discussion in the House and before the people of the country. A Senate such as we have to-day is an anachronism, and I believe everybody will admit, in fact the Senate will admit it themselves, that some way of improving the character of the Senate, making it more amenable to public opinion, is in order. I trust that a remedy will be forth-coming within a reasonable time.

I come now to the naval policy. I am in favour of an immediate gift, in favour of a Canadian navy and a closer alliance between the Mother Country and the Overseas Dominions, looking to a complete Imperial unity in Imperial defence, and as consequent of that, that we have a proportionate voice in the shaping of the policy of the Empire. I made two speeches in this House on that question. I was in favour of an immediate gift and of a Canadian navy. I am of that opinion still, I have no change to make in my position. As to an immediate contribution, I would have preferred that it had been made two or three sessions ago and that it had been made without conditions, that it had been spontaneous. I congratulate the Government of today that they intend to make a contribution. I hope it will be a substantial one. But inasmuch as it is an immediate contribution and based on emergency, I wish it had been made two years ago, or last year, even now I wish that that contribution was spontaneous and that it came from Canada and the people of Canada without any conference with the Imperial authorities whatsoever. The onus has now been put in some degree on the Imperial authorities of making a request on us for that contribution. I believe that the people of Canada from one end of the country to the other would have voted for a spontaneous contribution and a large one, and if it had gone forward to a listening world that Canada was behind the Empire with a spontaneous and a generous contribution they would have heard it and the Chancelleries of Europe would have recognized that there was a new power in the world that they had to deal with and that the Empire had a great colony if you wish to call it so, a great associated state, behind her in maintaining the defence of that Empire. Later on it must come, if we make a contribution or if we do not make it, if we wish to remain in the Empire we must have a definition of our relation to the Empire in the matter of Imperial defence.

Mr. EMMERSON: A moment ago my hon. friend said that if any contribution were made now, it was at the request of the British Government. Does my hon. friend mean us to understand that he is aware of any request having been made by the British Government for a cash contribution, or for a contribution?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): No, I do not. I am only taking what I read and the statement made in the British House the other day, that the Prime Minister undertook to disclose an invitation which had been given to the Canadian Government and which would be first handed out in the Canadian House. Whether it is a request or not I do not know, but as I said, in the emergency, I would have liked to have seen a contribution, a generous one, made spontaneously and, so made or made as it will be, it will receive the unanimous support of the people of Canada. Our future relations with the Empire must be a matter of consultation, of conference and of very careful consideration and can only be evolved with time. The British system of government is a very peculiar one. The great mistake made by the Nationalists of Quebec in opposing any contribution to a navy policy is due to their lack of appreciation of the spirit of the British constitution. Mr. Bourassa is a very acute man, but his mind is so constituted that he wants a mathematical and exact proposition in regard to government. That is not the British practice, that is not the way in which things are worked out under our system of government. They work out gradually and the insticts and the patriotism of the people are relied on in matters of defence rather than any fixed agreement between different parties or any agreement that might be put in a State document as to what the relation of an associated State with the Empire were to be. I say they made a great mistake when they asked for a mathematical definition as to just where we were to be in the Empire, and just how much we were to give to the Empire and just how much say we would have in the Empire. That will all be worked out, but it cannot be worked out beforehand; and when a condition of emergency exists or when we think an emergent condition exists, it is not a matter of exact statement. It is a matter that will be governed by the instincts and the patriotism of the people and I believe to-day that is the attitude of the people of Canada.

As to a Canadian navy, I said in this House on at least two occasions that I believed in a Canadian navy, because I believe in sea power as the back-bone of national life in the world to-day. Sea power is the thing that upholds England to-day wherever she is on the face of the globe and if we are to be of the Empire we, too, must have sea power. We must have sea power, we must be prepared to build ships, we must be prepared to man them; we must be prepared to fight in them, and, if necessary, I say now that I am in favour of a compulsory naval service in Canada in the interests of the country and of the Empire.

If you believe in sea power, you must train your sons to build your ships, to man them, and to fight in them. The days of peace are not yet come. There must be some way of becoming a sea power, and the only one way is by working it out. We have a people in this country who are able to take charge of a navy, and to fight in a navy. We live on two oceans. We are on the Atlantic, and we are on the Pacific, and not only Canada's present condition but her future requires that we have naval power in this country, and seek to develop it. We look out on the Pacific, which is even greater than the Atlantic, and my contention is that within the lives of the rising generation the centre of the Empire will be on this North American continent, between these two great oceans.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): Not in England.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): No; there is a greater England coming on the North American continent; that is my hope and dream, and we see it coming every day. As to having a navy of our own, and building it ourselves, it seems to me that we ought to be able to build not only a navy but the merchant marine we require here in Canada. We have great fleets of our own on the Atlantic, we are getting them on the Pacific, and we will have more and more of them. We have everything in this country that goes to the building of these ships and a policy of naval defence, based on the idea of a Canadian navy, will stimulate the building of our merchant ships in our own materials. I have been in favour of a great ship building industry stimulated by some act of the Government for a good many years. The day is coming, not now in an emergency, but at any early period, when, in connection with our naval policy, the building of ships shall become a great industry of our own. We have everything necessary. All that is wanted is for the people to take advantage of the opportunity, and to make Canada not only great on land, as she is, but great in commerce, and make her, as I believe she is destined to be, the centre of the Empire, and mistress of all the seas, having her commerce on every ocean of the globe.

Now, I want to pass from the question of the navy,which, while a great question, is, to my mind, a question of an hour as compared with that of transportation, which was referred to by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely); and for a few moments I will discuss that question of transportation as it presents itself to me, in view of all the conditions that exist in this country, and especially in view of the cry of the people of Western Canada for better transportation facilities. Great grievances in regard to transportation do exist in the West. They also exist here in the East, and the problem for us in this House is to find some way of relieving the conditions that exist, of granting substantial and immediate relief to the people of the West, and in other parts of the country. While I have always been friendly to and have supported the idea of the Railway Commission, my contention is that the relief the people want most cannot come from the Railway Commission, but must come from this House of Commons; and I propose to show the House just where relief can be effected. The question of lower rates in the West, and of rates that are discriminative in the West, has gone before the Railway Commission, and there it has become practically a legal battle which will take years to fight to a conclusion. On the lines along which that investigation is proceeding, lawyers arguments and all kinds of impediments are offered to an early settlement, and it does look to me that the only way to get relief is for this House to intervene. How can this House intervene in this great question of transportation? Let me point out one or two defects in the present Railway Act. There is an absence of a provision for the appointment of expert legal assistance in order to enforce the Act. I have pointed out in this House several times that in the United States, whenever they appointed any great public service commission, or passed a law that was for the benefit of the community, they made provision in the law for its enforcement, and especially, they made provision for the employment of permanent counsel to enforce the law. In the United States they have permanent counsel for the enforcement of the Inter State Commerce Act. We have not any permanent counsel appointed to appear before our Railway commission. In some cases we have appointed special counsel, but they have gone into the cases without experience and without any definite instructions; they have had to feel their way. We should adopt the American system. We have adopted largely their railway act, and we should follow them and appoint expert counsel to enforce that law, and fight the battles of the public before that commission. We should have two kinds of expert counsel in the service of the State, a class of counsel that is expert in the matter of rates, and another set of counsel that is expert in the operation of railways, and in the relation of railways to the public, to municipalities or to communities. There are two sides to the Railway Act. There is a side that controls the service and the rates given to the community; and there is also a side that controls the building and operation of railways, and their treatment of the public as individuals and communities. And we ought to have two sides to that Railway Commission, and especially in regard to the counsel appointed to enforce the Act, we ought to have experts in both departments, to fight the battles of the people. It is not fair to tell the public: 'You go to the Railway Commission and fight your own battles,' or to say to a small community: 'You must go to the Railway Commission and fight your own battle.' There ought to be expert counsel in the service of the state to see that the Act is properly enforced.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): Does the hon. member favour the idea of having also counsel for the public before that commission?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): My contention is that the state should appoint counsel to enforce the railway law, just as it appoints a Crown attorney to enforce the criminal law.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): What about the petitioners?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): The petitioners can join and have their counsel. The thing to do is what the provinces in the West have done. They have appointed counsel to enforce the law. My own province of Ontario has been derelict in its duty in so far that it has not appeared before that commission by counsel in order to get justice for the province. But the greatest defect of this Railway Act is that it lacks definitions, and my contention is that we should put in some definitions in order to get speedy action and speedy justice. It is a matter of investigation as to what the Railway Commission ought to do in dealing with grievances before them. We have put very few definitions into the Railway Act for the guidance of the commissioners; in fact, I have a little memorandum here which makes my point clear.

The definitive clauses of the Railway Act, so far as they apply to rates, are found in sections 314 et seq. The railway company is to propose the rates, classification, &c., and submit same to the Railway Commission. The Act requires: (1) equality of treatment for patrons and freedom from discrimination, but the company may charge less for larger quantities, greater numbers and longer distances than the charge proportionately for smaller quantities, lesser number and shorter distances; (2) the company may not charge more for a short haul than for a long haul in which the short haul is included except to meet competition; (3) the company must give equal facilities to other companies and shippers in the matter of receiving, forwarding and delivering freight and must not give undue preference to one shopper or locality over another or to one kind of freight over another.

These definitions are very general and they are open to wide interpretations when applied to particular cases. While the Act says there must be no discrimination against localities, the great grievance of the West to-day is the discrimination against the West because it is the West. Railway rates to-day are higher in the West than they are in the East. Why should it be so? The West contributes as much to the building of these roads as did the East. They are all national roads, they stretch from one ocean to the other, there ought to be equality of treatment by these railways from one ocean to the other and the West should not be discriminated against. There is no specific declaration in the Railway Act that tnere shall not be territorial discrimination; in fact, the claim is made that if the Act is properly interpreted, it is justifiable. The railways have their counsel before the commission —and there is an army of them—trying to justify the position that the great Railway Act, which was passed for the relief of the people of all Canada, justifies territorial discrimination in regard to railway, passenger, freight, and express rates. A remedy has been provided by the Act of the commission with regard to passenger rates but it is only in this respect that such action has been taken. We in this House, if we wish to benefit the West, if we wish to listen to the voice of the West—and the people there clamouring for relief—must realize it to be our duty this session to put it into the Railway Act that there shall be no discrimination against the West or any other portion of the country. All portions contributed to the building of these railways. These railways have been built and are running by virtue of the money contributed by the people of all Canada. Lands were given to them, cash was given to them, their bonds are being endorsed by this Parliament for millions and millions of dollars and members from the West are voting for the endorsement of these bonds by the Dominion of Canada and are not putting in the protest: Not another bond shall be endorsed until we get equality of treatment in regard to transportation, and until it is put into the Railway Act that there shall be no discrimination against the West in the matter of any kind of railway rates. If this Parliament wishes to give substantial relief to the people of the West let it put into the Railway Act a clause prohibiting discrimination against any locality as compared with any other locality, or, to put it still more plainly, that there shall be no territorial discrimination of any kind. I may overstep myself somewhat in putting the case of the people of the West in the words of the Grain Growers' Guide which I received a day or two ago but, I find on the first page of that journal, the following statement:

> Who Deserves Most?
> The railway, manufacturing and banking magnates are always seeking privileges from Parliament and urging compensation for the great sacrifices (?) they have made in 'building up Canada.' Do they ever consider the real sacrifices being made daily without a murmur by thousands and tens of thousands of men and women in log cabins on the edge of western civilization many miles from railways, schools, churches and doctors, rearing their families and developing the country in the face of physical, social and spiritual privations? A grateful nation might well afford some recognition to these hardy pioneers doing the necessary labour that others shrink from, rather than to heartlessly hand them over to be plundered further by those who dwell in luxury, with every convenience ministering to their comfort.

That may be overstatement, but the people and the pioneers of the West are being stigmatized by this Parliament in allowing them to be charged more for transportation than the people of the East, and it is the duty of Parliament therefore to come to their relief and not send them to the Railway Commission, where they must argue their case and have it hung up for years, by a distinct declaration that will remove that injustice and will ensure to these people the same treatment that we have in the East. What have we to offer the people who settle our West if we say that the first gift that we shall bestow upon them is that they must pay higher railway rates than we pay in the East, and that the railway companies that we have created and subsidized shall be allowed to make higher express and freight charges in the West than those which they make in the East? All our Western railways are overburdened with business and they cannot accommodate the traffic. They are not struggling railways; the Canadian Pacific railway is paying 10 per cent dividend and cutting melons for the benefit of its shareholders, while at the same time unfairly charging the people of the West for transportation. There is not a railway in the West that is not doing a thriving business. Railways are built in the West for less than they are built in the East. There is no justification for this unfair treatment, and the people of the West, when they come to us with this main issue, will demand that they be given relief. They are presenting their case for better facilities in the way of transportation, and they are getting them. The grain is being handled more expeditiously. The farmer of the West is to get relief under the new Bank Act in the way of being able to borrow money on his grain and live stock, but still that is not the relief he wants. The relief he wants is lower freight, express, and passenger rates. How do I propose to reach the passenger question? I propose to reach that question by putting a provision in the Railway Act that the maximum passenger rate on every railway running across the continent shall not exceed two cents a mile. They have so many passengers on both the Western and Eastern roads that they cannot handle them. They would make more money under a two-cent rate than they do with a three-cent rate and they should allow the people to travel by the road of their choice. When they give concessions now, it is on the condition that you have to travel both going and coming on the one road. If you want to go to Edmonton, you should be allowed to go by the Grand Trunk Pacific and come back by the Canadian Pacific railway if it suited you. But, the railways say: If we give you a reduction you must travel both ways on our road. They will give a reduction once or twice a year, at fair time and at Christmas, but I want the people to have the lowest possible passenger rate all over the country from one ocean to the other, and the only way to secure that is to put it into the Railway Act. By putting it in the Railway Act it will come immediately into force, and it will take a lot of work out of the hands of the Railway Commission which it is not very competent to do.

There is another thing that wants to be defined by this House. We have never yet told the Railway Commission what our views are in regard to the proportionate charges on express matter, on passengers, on freight, and on the telegraph service. The railways are taking toll from the people of Canada for all these things, and it has never yet been defined how much should be put on the passengers, how much on the user of telegraphs, how much on the user of the express service, how much on freight. There ought to be a readjustment of that. Better still, I would like to see the whole tolls of railways confined practically to passenger and freight service. If we once put into the Act a definition as to what the maximum passenger rate should be and define what the freight rates should be, then it would be an easy thing for the Railway Commission to say what was a fair charge, and their whole energy could be devoted to finding out what were fair passenger and freight charges in this country, based on the idea of absolute equality of treatment. For instance, the two big railways in Canada have told the people of Toronto and of Ontario that they are not to have a suburban service out of the city of Toronto, or commutation tickets, such as are given in the city of Montreal. That is a discrimination against that community and it has existed for years. I brought it up in this House, I brought it up at my own expense before the Railway Commission. The city of Toronto brought it before the Railway Commission; and it is hanging up there yet and will I suppise hang there for years until this House inserts in the Act a clear definition providing that if the railways give the city of Montreal a suburban service with commutation tickets, they must give a similar treatment to the city of Toronto, which is more in need of it than Montreal. We have heard the railways contend in the courts that they are not governed by the Railway Act in that matter, that it is a matter of grace on their part to give it to Montreal and to deny it to Toronto. That must be settled by the Railway Act and relief must be given.

My idea is that to make the Railway Act more effective and more rapid in giving relief, this Parliament must insert certain definitions which should have been in the Act long ago. We should not leave the policy of the country in regard to railway charges, to any commission when the jurisdiction is in Parliament. And, if it takes weeks and months of our time, we should devote ourselves to finding out what are reasonable definitions in regard to the questions I have raised in this House to-night and on many an occasion before.

How do I propose to deal with telegraph and express charges? The day has come in Canada when we must have state-owned telegraph lines and we should now take the lines over from the railways. These telegraph lines are in connection with the postal system in every country in Europe, and they should be in Canada also. If the telegraph companies do not agree to surrender the lines at a fair price, let us go into the telegraph business on our own account in connection with the post office, and let us begin at the productive end of the business. We have state-owned telegraphs in Canada, but we put them in Godforsaken places where there is hardly any telegraph business. Put a state-owned line between Toronto and Montreal and between Toronto and Ottawa, and chain it up with Winnipeg and the West, and telegraph tolls will be cut in two. The telegraph rates to-day are higher in the West than they are in the East and the telegraph companies of Canada, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific railway, are more or less under the control of that great combination and monopoly which controls the cables, and which controls the Bell Telephone Company in the United States. And this monopoly has an effective club even over the Canadian Pacific railway as to telegraph and cable rates. We in Canada are at the mercy of a great monopoly in the United States, which will never be broken until we undertake to start a state-owned telegraph system in connection with the post office. The time is ripe for it. No harm will come from asking the railway companies to surrender their telegraph lines at a fair compensation, and if they do not listen to us the state will be justified in building its own lines. The railways should not be in the express business; they are not in the express business in Europe; their charges in Canada are extortionate; their charges in the United States have been proven to be grossly exorbitant; and the people of the United States have sought relief in a parcel post system which will go into effect in a few days. We are told here that we should wait to see how the American experiment turns out, but it is my belief that we should go ahead for ourselves and start immediate competitions by parcel post with the express companies so as to give immediate relief. Then, if that were done, telegraph charges and express charges would practically disappear from the transportation question, and we would have only two questions to be dealt with by the Railway Commission, namely, what is a fair passenger rate and what is a fair freight rate.

There is another thing that must be cured, and the people are demanding it, and that is the matter of classification, and the matter of commodity charges on freight. I believe there are only ten classes in the tariffs as prepared by the railways, but there are so many variations in regard to commodities and so many divisions, and so many favours granted and so many other requests for favours refused, that the ordinary citizen is mystified. It ought to be stated in the Act that the Railway Commission should be ordered to simplify the classification and the commodity rating. There are so many different freight definitions now made by the railways that the ordinary man cannot possibly know what they mean. One relief to the West would be if that classification were reduced, and especially the list of commodity charges, and the variations in connection therewith. Why should one class of the community, because it is engaged in manufacturing business and produces a certain article, have a favour as against another class. Why should the makers of bricks have their commodity placed in a better position than the producers of cement or lumber. It is only a matter of favour, and there should not be those divisions in the classification, and the railways should not be allowed to make commodity rates under the very wide interpretation permitted to them in connection with railway charges. I hope that this will be one of the things taken up by Parliament at an early date. There is another thing we can do and we are trying to do it, but we are doing it very slowly—one way of regulating the railways, and especially as long as they discriminate and make these unfair charges, is to extend the system of state-owned railways. Probably a crisis has been reached in connection with the National Transcontinental railway, but as to that I am not yet aware of the facts.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I thought this Government was going to do that—it was in their platform.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Do what?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): State-owned railways.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I am waiting to see, but there is a question coming up, as I understand it, in connection with the Transcontinental railway (and on that I am waiting information), which may have an important bearing on the whole matter. An opportunity may arise of settling the question and of securing fair treatment through an extension of the principle of a state-owned railway. It is coming much more rapidly than some of us think. We own a railway to-day, and it is coming to be one of the greatest assets of Canada. We must put it in touch with the province of Ontario, we ought to put it in touch with the other provinces, and we ought to put it in touch with the Transcontinental road. We may have a state-owned railway in the West, and this country has got plenty of money now at Ottawa that will enable it to get the state-owned lines. The province of Ontario has begun a policy, a little weak-kneed at the start, but it will develop, and that it is the proposal of Mr. Beck to apply the hydro-electric system of power to a system of local public owned railways, owned partly by municipalities and partly by the province, that will put these roads in competition with the big roads and their excessive charges. We have just as many railway grievances in Ontario as the people have in the West. There is discrimination, unfair treatment, excessive charges, and the only relief will come from action by the whole of the people of Canada, in their organizations, as cities or as provinces or as a Dominion, seeking relief in regard to transportation by state-owned railways, by fighting the railways through public organizations and by public counsel as they are doing in the West to-day. I commend the provinces of the West for sending their own solicitors to fight the battles of the people before the Railway Commission. A number of other things, however, remain to be done. When the people come to us demanding relief, we must not send them back to the Railway Commission, which is not sufficiently instructed as to how it ought to treat these questions. My contention is that we ought to give the Railway Commission further instructions by the insertion of definitions in this Railway Act that would secure fairer treatment, lower rates, and still give the railways an opportunity to make reasonable returns on their investments, and the railways must be made to see, like every other corporation, that with their franchise goes a duty. The railways in this country have taken the position that they have a franchise to do as they like. They have a franchise, in consideration of doing a duty and giving a service, but the great railway magnates of this country spend most of their time considering questions of finance, such as cutting melons and things of that sort, rather than giving service. We must bring the railways before us in this House, and ask them to justify their conduct in respect of these excessive charges, and make them recognize the fact that they were given a franchise for fair treatment and public service, and if they do not give that fair treatment and public service, that franchise is subject to cancellation and reconsideration.

I want to deal now with another question that has occupied the attention of the people of Canada in a remarkable way during the past summer, and that is the arrogance of the Canadian Pacific railway in regard to stock-watering and cutting enormous melons, which it has distributed amongst its shareholders. This, I think is the worst thing ever done by a public body in this country of ours. I have put a question on the Order Paper, but as it has not been reached yet, I cannot speak exactly. So far as I can gather, however, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made some application to the Government to increase its stock, at least that was the current rumour. Then they chose to act on their own initiative, and distributed sums of money amongst their shareholders which was practically taken out of the pockets of the Canadian people who pay freight rates. They did it arrogantly. Perhaps they did it in defiance of the Government. I do not know, because the facts have not come out, but that action of the Canadian Pacific railway in issuing stock bearing a high dividend of ten per cent, which they claim the right to charge on it, instead of issuing debenture stock or bonds which could be put out at a much lower rate, is in defiance of the people of Canada, and they have set up the principle that they can do what they like in regard to watering their stock. I have brought it up in this House and spoken almost without any support when I did so. I know on one occasion I could hardly get a seconder. I predicted that this would be continued if Parliament was so indifferent, and they have continued it now for years, and they propose to do so hereafter. I sat in this House when the Canadian Pacific railway had a capital of only $65,000,000, and when they came one day to this House for a small increase in their capital, I made a suggestion that the Government of Canada should take up that comparatively small amount of stock, which was then to be had at par, and in that way practically become a large partner, and soon come into control of that railway. I was laughed at on that occasion as I have often been laughed at in this House, but what I said has come true, and the opportunity has passed. From what it had then, it has gradually gone on in its arrogance until it defies the people, it defies Parliament, and while in the last stock-watering it proceeded by asking for the consent of the Governor in Council, this time it ignored the Governor in Council, and put out a great stock-watering proposition, so far as I can gather, without any authority, or with only a questionable clause in its legislation some years ago.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think my hon. friend is wrong in saying that the Canadian Pacific railway have made that distribution. So far as I can understand, they cannot make that distribution and cut that melon without the actual consent of the Government.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I hope the hon. gentleman is right, and I will be very glad to assist the Government in making that point good. They have sent out circulars that they are going to do it, and the responsibility rests on the Government of the day to see that they do not do it.

Mr. TURRIFF: They can stop it.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): It is the most demoralizing thing in Canada. This stock-watering business is an unworthy business; it is against all public policy, and has been stopped wherever it has been attempted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): How does my hon. friend call it stock-watering.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Anything is stock-watering that raises money expensively to the people who have to pay the rates and dividends on the stock. It is raising money in a way that is unfair to the people. It is not quite stock-watering of a character that I am going to speak about in a short time, but it is a wrongful act, and it is against the solemn compact which was entered into between the Canadian Pacific railway and the Government of Canada in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, that their tariff of freight charges was to be governed by the cost of that railway, and this has never been investigated, and to-day by means of issuing stock in this way, instead of taking ten per cent on what the road actually cost, they are taking ten per cent on a capital much more than the railway ever cost. They are treating the people unfairly; they are doing something that no community should allow, and the result is the control of the Canadian Pacific railway to-day is in the hands of foreigners.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean, York) will permit me, he is dealing in general statements regarding this matter. I would like him to distinguish somewhat carefully as between what the Canadian Pacific railway has done in this matter and what is done by any mercantile company under the Companies Act or under an ordinary act of incorporation.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I am coming to that. To-night I am only making general statements. But I intend to go into details, and especially the details with regard to the Canadian Pacific railway. When they sell stock at $175 which is worth from $260 to $280——

Mr. TURRIFF: It is at $266 to-day.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Very well, $266; I say that when they do that they are doing an unfair thing. But they go to the Railway Commission and say freights must be high because they have to pay ten per cent dividends on their stock. They could raise all the money they require on a four per cent debenture, or, on a five per cent debenture. The result would be that we should need to pay only half the rates we pay at the present time. I say that the men who are doing this are foreigners, as the men who are raiding us in cable and telegraph rates are foreigners. And that foreign element that controls the Canadian Pacific railway will charge these enhanced rates at the expense of the Canadian people as long as the House of Commons allows them to do it. I had hopes and anticipations that I should see that great Canadian Pacific railway owned by our own Canadian people; I had hoped that they would eventually buy the stock. But the stock has been so hoisted, it has been so distributed in Europe among these people—do you think we shall ever recover it? There is a new slavery coming in this country; the Canadian people are being put into slavery in the interests of foreign capitalists who take unfair advantage of their position. And we are so pusillanimous in this House that we do not prevent it. What is to be the attitude of the Parliament of Canada—not on the naval question, not even on the question of reciprocity, but on this question of the exploitation of the Canadian Pacific railway? Sir Thomas Shaughnessy — Colonel Shaughnessy of the Hugheseliers—may think that he runs the Canadian Pacific railway, but it is not Sir Thomas Shaughnessy who runs it, nor is it run for the benefit of Canada; it is run by a committee of foreigners who issue instructions in regard to its financial policy——

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What evidence has the hon. gentleman of that?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I see it every day. I see the conduct of the railway. I will give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) a chance to explain the conduct of the railway when I come to the details—and I am coming to them. In the meantime, I commend to the attention of the hon. gentleman the little book I have here, which I found in my post-office box the other day, 'The Canadian Pacific railway and its capitalization.'

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is not the increase of capital authorized by meeting of shareholders?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Of course. Shareholders love to authorize these things. They turn out by proxy. The proxies of the Canadian Pacific railway and the control of them are owned in Holland, and there is a little syndicate in Holland that has the say. I want my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to read this little book in regard to the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific railway. If he has not a copy, I will try to procure him one.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Who is the author?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): the author is the Winnipeg Free Press, a paper that is taking great interest in railway questions in the West and is doing great service to the people of Canada by dealing in a fair and effective way with the railway problems of this country. If my hon. friend wants more information, I ask him to read this book. But I expect to give him fuller information later on.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. gentleman is not giving it to-night.

Mr. NESBITT: Before the hon. gentleman sits down, will he please give us the names of the foreign potentates who govern the Canadian Pacific railway? I thought Sir Thomas Shaughnessy governed it.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Sir Thomas Shaughnessy is elected by foreign shareholders, and large blocks of the shares are syndicated in Holland and Germany. The details of it I cannot give, but the facts are before us and the stock manipulation is before us, and the working of the Canadian people to pay 10 per cent on the stock that was given to these shareholders for $175 which should have been sold for $250 for the benefit of the undertaking is before us. The things that were given to the Canadian Pacific railway, including the lands, the hundreds of miles of completed railway, and the exemptions and other things, were given 'for the benefit of the undertaking' and, as, I think, the last clause in the contract says, 'for the maintenance of that railway for ever.' They were to use the capitalization of the company to the best advantage of the undertaking and not to benefit themselves. And I say they could have raised all they want on four per cent debenture stock. They could have used the enormous surplus which they now have in their coffers to construct the works which they are to construct with the money they are to raise by the proposed stock issue. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company to-day has millions of cash in its coffers. It has securities that it could sell at an enormous increase on the prices paid for it. And they could sell their lands, I am told that they have $75,000,000 of real estate in the city of Vancouver alone that they got from the people of Canada. Why then should the company raise money for the benefit of the undertaking by this most expensive method which leaves millions in the hands of shareholders who laugh at the people of Canada and at anybody who protests against this thing. We should have kept the capitalization at the lowest point—at $100,000,000—or even $50,000,000, and should have forced them to raise money by other means than the sale of stock, or, if the sale of stock was allowed it should have been upon the condition that the stock was sold at the highest price obtainable and the proceeds all put into the treasury of the company and not into the pockets of shareholders. I am going to argue this question in this House as long as I am able as I have argued it outside of this House; and I know that the feeling of the people is that an infamous thing was done in that business, and that it must stop; and that this Parliament——

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are not the rates of the Canadian Pacific railway under the control of the Railway Commission?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): No, I have never consented to that doctrine, though many lawyers have asserted it in this House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Sir Allen Aylesworth said they were.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I do not care. He is not here, and I am here. I have read the Act to the best of my ability, and I believe that the right to investigate what the actual cost of the railway was is still in this House. I have heard the lawyers in this House argue the contrary, and they have put me down at times in that kind of argument.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood the Canadian Pacific railway had accepted the control of rates by the Railway Commission.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): But I have not, as a citizen foregone any right that I had for my protection under that Act. They like to say that, and also that they go under the Railway Commission. They like to hang up the question of rates in a long argument that cannot be settled for seventeen years——

Mr. LEMIEUX: But they have accepted the Railway Commission.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I do not care. I say that here is protection for the people in the original Act. That has never been vindicated, but it ought to be vindicated.

Mr. CURRIE: The original Act places control in the Minister of Public Works, not in Parliament. The Minister of Public Works alone has power to review these matters.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): There is a clause there which says that the freight rates shall be governed by the actual cost of the railway. It is there still, it is still efficacious and still in the interests of the people that any rights we have under it should be vindicated.

I wish to discuss another class of stock-watering, real stock-watering—and we are having a great deal of it these days. Gentlemen from the West, and perhaps the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) were interested in cement charges. The cement industry in Canada is controlled by a gentleman who effected a merger of the cement factories. A new class of men have come forward in connection with financial operations. There was a day when a man was a manufacturer and built up his business and bred his son to his business, looked after it, cultivated it, and built it up and made some money. Now a gentleman has come along, engaged in what is called high finance. He is an exploiter of the public, an exploiter of the manufacturer and a most dangerous customer. A gentleman of this class got hold of the cement industry in Canada; in connection with a great financial institution he effected a merger and the result has been unfortunate for the men who did not go into the merger and for the people who had to buy from the merger as the statements of the members from the West go to show, and the action of the Minister of Finance in connection with the cement duties also proves. These captains of finance come along, they merge the various firms engaged in a trade, they exploit a trade, they merge it and capitalize it at an enormous sum. They have preferred stock and bonds and most of all they have a great big issue of common stock which they take to themselves, they keep some of it for themselves and the rest they sell to the public, putting the proceeds in their own pockets, and the industry is expected to pay a dividend on this watered stock. The cement merger is only a case in point. These high fliers in finance have had one very bad effect, they have demoralized the ordinary investor. The ordinary investor formerly looked for a sure investment at 4 or 5 per cent, but these men have been tempting them with this common stock, saying: 'If you take our preferred stock we will give you a bonus of common stock. The result is that the rate of interest has gone up all the world over, especially in Canada; the investor has been demoralized and will not look at a mortgage proposition or a 4 per cent or 5 per cent bond. The investors in England and in Montreal and Toronto say: Have you not got any free or bonus stock to give us? and as a consequence it is a hard thing to get ordinary capital at ordinary rates of interest. Our banks, I am sorry to say, have encouraged these mergers and they are only beginning. Here is the latest one I have come across. This is a quotation from the Montreal Star—that is a great friend of the mergers, Sir Hugh Graham is a great friend of the mergers. The item reads:

> New Refinery Capitalized at $7,000,000.
> Formation plans of the Atlantic Refineries, Limited, the new sugar company in which Mr. D. Lorne McGibbon and other prominent Montreal financiers are interested, are fast nearing completion, and a definite announcement of the details of the big project will be made in a few days.
> Mr. McGibbon stated to the Star this morning, on his return to the city from the West, that the new company would be capitalized at $7,000,000, divided into $1,000,000 in bonds, $2,500,000 preferred, and $3,500,000 common stock.
> The new refinery, which will be erected in St. John, N.B., will be built at a cost of $2,500,000, and will be one of the finest in existence. The capacity of the plant will be over 2,500 barrels per day, and will be built under the supervision of one of the best known sugar experts of America, who designed the large refineries of the Arbuckle, Warner and Havemeyer Companies.
>
> 'The consumption of sugar in Canada per day,' said Mr. McGibbon, 'is approximately between 7,000 and 8,000 barrels, considerable of which is imported. This is growing rapidly each year, as no sugar refinery has been put up in the Dominion during the past 20 or 25 years, the outlook is most promising for our company.'
> Mr. McGibbon stated that he expected the St John plant would be ready for production in about a year and a half. Owing to the location of the refinery, it would be possible to import the raw product from the West Indies, regardless of the seasons.

I have seen many of these propositions of common stock. There is no statement here that while $7,000,000 is to be raised a lot of that is not to be free common stock used to promote the enterprise. The refinery will only cost $2,000,000 and yet there is all this stock. I do not think I am doing Mr. McGibbon an injustice when I say he proposes to take most of that common stock for himself and the promoters of the enterprise and to ask the public to pay dividends on it. I have spoken of the cement industry which has passed into the hands of a merger, and the sugar industry which it is proposed to exploit in the same way, because if Mr. McGibbon can do this in the St. John refinery he will soon find a way to follow Sir Max Aitkin in the sugar industry in Canada. I am a protectionist and always have been a protectionist, and yet if protection is to be used for the justification of stock-watering of this character in the matter of sugar, or in the matter of cement, then I say the day cannot come too soon when we shall have a tariff commission that will investigate these things and say what the actual investment in these industries may be and that the tariff is to be used only to keep the trade in our own country by a reasonable return on the investment. But no tariff can ever be justified to me in order to pay dividends on such stock-watering as took place in connection with cement and as will likely occur in connection with sugar in this country. That is the danger of this example set by the Canadian Pacific railway of exploiting the public in connection with its capitalization. The capitalization of any concern, and especially of our railways and great manufacturing concerns, must be regulated. They have regulated them in the State of New York by effective legislation. What they can do we can do. Parliament must take control of the regulation of the capitalization of all the companies it creates and no company must be allowed to issue capital for less than it would bring in the open market and no company must be allowed, unless a good case is made out, to do any stock-watering or to put the payment of dividends on watered stock on the public who happen to use the product that this merger is created to control. These men of high finance must be taught a lesson. They must be taught that the people of Canada are not to be be exploited by them, and Parliament must teach them that lesson. You cannot teach them out in the country, and you cannot bring the Canadian Pacific railway or the manufacturers who are exploiting the public to a sense of that duty to the people of this country by anything but strict regulation of their financial arrangements.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): How do you propose to do that?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): In the same way as it is done in the city of New York. When they go to the Railway Commission there and make out that they want money for some particular enterprise, they have to justify their application. They have to tell the commission how they propose to raise the money; they say to the commission, we will isssue stock to our shareholders at its full market price, or we will issue bonds or debenture stock, and the commission sees that, having regard to the condition of the money market, the security issued is one that bears least on the public who have to pay the dividends. They control it absolutely in the public interest, and it has worked out splendidly.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What are you going to do to the mergers?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Parliament must find a cure and I will try to find a cure, and I hope I shall have my hon. friend's support.

Mr. TURRIFF: Take off the duty, that will cure it.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): That may be. As a protectionist I may say that if these industries in this country can only be maintained by this kind of exploitation, by the kind of stock watering, then cut out those industries and protection so far as I am concerned. But it is not true protection, and protection is not to be held responsible for this new kind of financing, and it will not be held responsible if Parliament does its duty.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What is responsible?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Parliament is responsible and can effect a cure right away. And the provinces must not be a party to the exploitation of the public by this new kind of finance. The building up of those enormous fortunes by men who exploit the public is one of the surprising things in the world, and the concentration of enormous wealth in the hands of few individuals must be regulated. It is going on in the United States, it is a problem over there, it is the interests against the public, it may be coming here, and if it is, then Parliament must find a cure for the condition. Parliament was started for the rectification of grievances of the public. That was the origin of Parliament, and in a way, Parliament has been able to cure the grievances of the public from the earliest times up to the present. But we are allowing those new men in finance, those men of enormous fortunes to concentrate wealth and to get control of us. They tell us what they want us to do. We must tell them what we want them to do, and we must insist that they respect public rights. I am through with that matter for the present, but I hope to bring it up later on.

Now, I come to my last topic, and that also has reference to the question of exploitation. The greatest combine in the United States to-day, so far as being severe on the people is concerned, is the coal combine. I read a brief article in the New York World, which is a very good paper and very carefully edited.

Mr. GRAHAM. Worlds are all good papers.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): But the people of this world, some of them, are uncertain. The substance of it is that this coal monopoly controls not only the production of coal and the railways, but the railway yards for the distribution of coal throughout the United States. Coal in the United States has passed into the hands of this monopoly, and we, Canadians, especially of western Ontario, are dependent on the hard coal monopoly in the United States for our heat and fuel, as are many other portions of the Dominion. Now Canada possesses in all her provinces not coal, but the greatest store of electrical energy, capable of development by means of water-power, of any country in the world, and some day the economic conversion of electrical energy into heat will come. I almost believe that the invention exists, and that the coal monopoly and the electrical monopoly in the United States are in possession of it to-day. They fear that the development of electrical energy into a source of heat is coming and that their monopoly is in danger, and, therefore, they are out now to corral all the great water-powers that are left on the American continent. We are told—and we had experience of it in this Parliament a year or two ago—that they wished to get control of the water-powers that are left on the St. Lawrence river, and especially of the enormous power that may be developed in or about the Sault rapids in the neighbourhood of Cornwall. Another attempt is to be made to get Canada and the United States to pass over to an enormous combination in the United States the right to generate electrical energy on the river St. Lawrence. They look for their great market for that power in the city of New York. They have the transmission problem solved at all events, and they propose to generate that power and transmit it to the United States. Now, I say it is the duty of Canada not to allow that franchise to pass to any corporation, and least of all to an international corporation. If that water-power is to be developed, it must be developed by the two countries acting in unison, and dividing the product for the benefit of the people and only for the benefit of the people of both countries. Especially if that electrical energy is to be converted into heat, as I believe it will be in an economic way, we want to reserve all that water-power for our heat and for our industries, and to keep it absolutely in the control of the people, for the people. Yet the proposal is coming up again that we should part with that great franchise and that great store of power, and turn it over probably to be floated in connection with bonused stock and things of that kind. I do not want to see any such thing done with a great water-power like that. I want to see the water-powers we have kept for the people of this country. The people of the United States have parted with their coal and they are compelled to pay $8 a ton for anthracite that could be sold for less than $3 a ton, and we will have a similar experience if we let those corporations get control of our water-powers. We have got to keep them for the people.

These are the questions that I have tried to raise in this House, and I say they are the real questions. I specially ask this House to give attention to the railway question, and to this question of capitalization as I have presented it here to-night. I believe the result will be for the benefit of the people of this country. I am not advocating for one moment any system of confiscation or unfair treatment. I want the people who invest their money to get a reasonable return, a good return, on their investment, but I do not wish to see the people of Canada placed in bondage by unfair capitalization or by people who exploit the various manufacturing interests of the country for themselves and not for the people. Parliament must do something with reference to these things; it must amend the Railway Act, it must regulate the capitalization of all kinds of companies, including railway companies, and it must see that even the tariff is not used as a buttress to unfair exploitation of the public in the way of over capitalization or anything of the kind. During the session, in such way as I can, and with such help as I can get, I propose to bring these questions in a practical way before the House. I hope that some things with regard to railways will be covered by a Government Bill and I shall wait a reasonable time to see what is coming in the way of relief. If something is forthcoming I will be very glad to support it. Otherwise, I will have to go my own way and see if I can get some relief. I will be only too glad to join with anybody else in this House to try and get some relief from these great issues that are bearing on the people to-day. Instead of relief they are only given a stone when they are referred to the Railway Commission which has not sufficient in struction in regard to this matter. I have taken up the time of the House perhaps longer than I should have, but I did feel that I had some kind of a duty to perform in calling attention to these matters. I will be only too glad to let someone else occupy the time of the House and take the lead in regard to these questions. I would like to see the leadership in regard to these questions taken by the Government of the day. They must know what these issues are, they know what the people expect, and it is their duty to deal with these questions, and to deal with them in the way that will give relief to the people of Canada.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, the hour is somewhat late and I would be glad to move the adjournment of the debate, but I am told that it is very important that we should get along with this debate, close it and get down to business. I think then that perhaps I had better crave the indulgence of the House for the few remarks that I intend to make upon the subjects that are now before the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, South York) who just sat down will excuse me if I do not go over all the ground that he has traversed. I noticed, Mr. Speaker, that he did not have very much sympathy for his proposals on his own side of the House. Of course, he might have understood that himself because, attacking the trusts, combines and mergers from the front benches of the Government side, is, to my mind a very hopeless task. My hon. friend, if he wants to get anywhere, had better come across to this side of the House where there is at least a little sympathy with the ideas which he has presented.

In common with other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the House I think that the Government is to be congratulated on the condition of the country. There is no doubt, Sir, that at the present time the country is in a very prosperous condition. Evidence of this is found on every side. We have one of the largest surpluses, we are told, that we ever had in the history of this country. It is a new experience for our hon. friends on the other side of the House to have large surpluses. They did not have them when they managed the affairs of this country a few years ago. Going back to the time when my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) was Minister of Finance to use a homely phrase that they use in my part of the country, they were always scraping the bottom of the pot. But, now, they have an abundance of money and we are all glad to know that they are able to come before the House with such an encouraging statement as to the state of trade and the state of the country. This Government has been very fortunate in that respect. Other men have laboured and this administration has entered into their labours. The tariff revision of 1897, the adoption of the British preference, the subsequence tariff revision, the changes in the western land laws by which the land was kept for the settler and not for the rich corporation, the administration of the western land and immigration regulations, which wakened up the West that had been asleep for about eighteen years, the splendid management of our finances by the late Minister of Finance, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, in short, fifteen years of good, clean, honest and progressive government have made it possible for us to congratulate ourselves to-day on the prosperous condition of this country.

I regret to say, and I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) has left his seat, that my own constituency does not share to the full extent this prosperity. The reason is chiefly the lack of transportation facilities. The products of my constituency are, to a large extent, fish, lumber and farm products. There is a fair local market for the farm products but we have to go abroad to find a market for our fish and lumber. The best market we have for our fish and lumber is in the United States and the people of my constituency were very much encouraged by the proposals prior to the last election looking to reciprocity with the United States. We hoped not only to get relief from the duty, but we also hoped that the trade would be very much increased and that we would be able to have a fast line of steamers plying between the ports of eastern Nova Scotia and Boston which perhaps would do more for us than anything else that could be done. Our other market is in Montreal and other Canadian cities but we experience difficulty in getting there. The difficulty is that we have no proper transportation facilities, that we have no branch of the Intercolonial railway running into my constituency. The late Government undertook to rectify this. They undertook to build a branch railway. They had made some progress, they had made a survey, they had laid off the line, they had taken steps to expropriate the right of way, they had asked Parliament to vote a million dollars to commence the work, they had made a contract with a reliable construction company which had deposited $50,000 as a guarantee that they would carry out the contract and they had bought a branch line, called the Sunnybrae branch, twelve miles long, at a cost of $100,000, which would have made up part of the line running into the county of Guysborough. This was the condition when the present Government took office, but I regret to say that, for political and party purposes, this Government cancelled the contract, struck their pen through the million dollars that had been placed in the estimates and turned the clock back to where it had been before. This has been very discouraging to the people I represent. Hundreds of our young men have had to leave the country and seek employment elsewhere. I do not know what may be the plans of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals for the future, but I take the first opportunity of mentioning this in the House and of asking him to reconsider the decision he came to last year to abandon this important proposal.

Reference has been made to the visit of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) to England. I am sure that every Canadian was pleased to know that the leader of our Government met with such a reception in the old country. The only disappointment I felt in regard to it was that the Unionist press in the old country and the Tory press in this country attempted to use this incident to give the impression to the people that the victory of the Conservative party in the election of last year had some kind of Imperial significance, that, in some way or other, that victory was to strengthen the tie that binds Canada to the old country. Every Canadian knows that the tie does not need any strengthening; it needs strengthening just about as little in Canada as it does in the old country itself. The worst offender in that respect was the Halifax Herald, the organ of the Prime Minister. In one of the headlines, giving an account of the speeches of the Prime Minister in the old country, it was stated that the right hon. gentleman said that Canada was to remain in the Empire as the result of the election. I am inclined to refuse to believe that he ever made such a statement. It is almost incredible that the Prime Minister of Canada should endeavour to convey the impression to the people of the old country that one-half of the people of this Dominion contemplated separation from the Empire on the occasion of the last election. Twice in our history have Canadians demonstrated that they were really ready to do something more than by mere words of mouth to give evidence of their gratitude for the old country. I refer to the South African War and to the adoption of the British Preference. and I am happy to say that both instances took place under a Liberal administration led by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The Soudan War was one other occasion in the history of Canada when opportunity was given us to join the old country in the defence of the Empire; but the Conservatives were then in control and they refused to spend one dollar to assist England in her difficulties. Therefore, the claim put forward by these gentlemen opposite that they are the one and only loyal party in this country is not a valid claim.

The right hon. the leader of the Government made reference the other day to a letter written by President Taft to Mr Roosevelt which he called the 'adjunct' letter, and the right hon. gentleman got a little hysterical over it, and he seemed to attach to it a very great deal of significance. It occurred to me that the right hon gentleman was somewhat too serious about that. I would. ask you, Mr. Speaker, what significance can be given to a letter from one foreigner to another foreigner with regard to the internal relations of this country, I can quite understand a man like President Taft thinking that the people of Canada were a mean lot of hucksterers who had no national sentiment, who would be influenced in their national sentiment and connections by trade and the sale of goods; I can understand that on the part of President Taft because he does not know the Canadian people, but for a man that was born and brought up in Canada, who knows our history, who knows the attachment of the Canadian people to the old land; for him to utter such a thought places him beyond the pale of forgiveness. All sorts of arguments, many of them sham arguments, have been used in regard to reciprocity. There is one class of anti-reciprocity orators who tell us we must have no truck or no trade with the United States. These gentry seem to think that the sale of a bundle of hay or a barrel of fish or a bundle of shingles would have some effect upon the loyalty of the people who engage in that trade. I hope there are not very many who hold such views, but be they many or few they ought to be confined in an institution for the feeble-minded. There are others who tell us that if we get this great boon—they admit it is a good thing—we will lose it after a while and then we will feel far worse than if we never had it at all. This argument I have heard from the Minister of Finance, and if it be sound, it would prevent the Minister of Finance from ever getting a wife because he might lose her; it would prevent a man from accumulating wealth, because the money might take to itself wings and fly, as it often does. Another argument put forward by the Finance Minister is that a reciprocity treaty would destroy our fiscal independence, but the hon. gentleman neglected to tell us how it could possibly have that result. Does the hon. gentleman not know that it has been the custom of every civilized nation to make trade treaties with other countries; hundreds of those treaties have been made by Great Britain and by the United States and even by Canada, and a few years ago we made a treaty with France. France and Germany entered into trade treaties with each other. How does the Minister of Finance know that it will affect our fiscal independence? He gives us his word for it, and he expects us to swallow it, and of course you cannot argue with a prophet.

My own view is that we are dead right on this question of reciprocity and no argument presented up to the present can dissuade me from that belief. Of course, the big interests are against us, but the big interests will always be against the people, and the big interests can put up an argument for almost anything; if they could make a dividend out of it they would argue against the doctrine of gravitation. The cry against reciprocity raised by gentlemen on the other side of the House is not sincere, and that it is insincere is proven by the very Speech from the Throne itself. If you read this speech carefully, you will find that the Government congratulates the country on the enormous increase in our trade. But, wherein is this increase most marked? Why, the greatest increase of trade in the past year has been between Canada and the United States. It has been pointed out that while the increase in our trade with Great Britain during the past year was about $10,000,000, the increase in our trade with the United States during the same period was over $70,000,000. And so we are told in the Speech from the Throne, if not in so many words yet unmistakably, that this truck and trade with the Yankees which is now over $1,000,000 a day, and which during the past year has increased over the previous year by about $70,000,000, is very gratifying to those anti-reciprocity gentlemen on the Treasury benches.

Another matter which has been referred to in this House is the retirement from the Ministry of the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and although little information has been vouchsafed us as to the cause of his retirement, yet, the Prime Minister did tell us that the hon. gentleman retired acting under a high sense of duty. If that be true, and I believe it is, it is a very creditable thing to the hon. gentleman. In the session of 1910, that hon. gentleman moved the following resolution:

> The House regrets that the speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the Government to consult the people on its naval policy and the general question of the contribution of Canada to Imperial armament.

That is the resolution. You will note he refers not only to the naval policy, which I understand to be the policy of the late Government, of a Canadian navy, but to any contribution to Imperial armament. The late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), having voted for that resolution, did not feel that it would be right or honest for him to stay in a government that proposed to give a contribution to Imperial armament without an appeal to the people. If he was the only man in this House who had voted for that resolution, there would be nothing more to say about it, but when we examine the record, we find that not only the late Minister of Public Works voted for that resolution, but the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Justice voted for it. My friend who sits in front of me, the Minister of Customs, voted for it; so did the Minister of the Interior and the Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of Trade and Commerce went out.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If it was necessary for the late Minister of Public Works to retire from the Government, what have we to say about the high sense of duty of these other gentlemen who voted that no contributions should be given to Imperial armaments, unless there was an appeal to the people. I believe in a Canadian navy built by Canada, manned by Canadians and under the control of the Canadian Government for the defence of our own coasts, and in time of trouble or war, to come automatically under the control of the Imperial Government. I think that is the policy the Canadian people will adopt, and notwithstanding all the juggling and all the wriggling they are endeavouring to do on the other side of the House, they will be bound to come to that policy. Great Britain does not need our money; she needs our men far more. If we had given a cash contribution at the time of the South African war, it would have been forgotten in two or three years. The fact that we sent the first contingent to South Africa, the fact that we sent the second and the third contingent, the fact that some of these brave fellows lie to-day under the sod of the veldt; that was a sacrifice worth making, and one that will be remembered for many years. You could not do it by the payment of money, and the payment of money, I venture to say, will not be received with very much satisfaction on the other side of the Atlantic. I noticed in the Manchester Guardian the other day a very significant item, which shows that this contribution was not being received with very much enthusiasm in England:

The Manchester Guardian discussing the probability of Canada offering $30,000,000 for naval purposes, hopes, since it involves a principle which many Canadians will certainly dislike, it will prove to be Mr. Borden's own idea and not the result of any suggestion from the home authorities. He ought to make it clear to Canadians that the idea of benevolence is as repugnant to us as it can be to them.

What proof have we that there is any emergency? So far as we can learn on this side of the House, so far as we can gather information from the press, the proof is all the other way. We have for example the statement of Sir Edward Grey made on July 10th of this year and reported in the London Times, when he says:

Our relations with the German Government of the present moment are excellent. We are perfectly frank with each other about all questions of mutual interest, and I believe that when questions come up, whether they be, for instance, in connection with our respective interests in South Africa, or whether they be in connection eventually with the Bagdad railway, both governments are convinced that their mutual interests can be perfectly reconciled.

I will now quote from Mr. Asquith:

Our relations with the great German Empire are, I am glad to say, at this moment—and I feel sure are likely to remain—relations of amity and good will.

Then a word from Lord Crewe, the leader in the House of Lords:

There is another thing. If you come forward with a great splash of a programme, you help to bring about the particular evil which you wish to avoid, because the people to whom you announce that you are building against them are positively spurred on to the acceleration and possibly to the enlargement of their programme. To that extent you tend to defeat your own object.

Then, again, Lord Crewe says:

Taking March 31st of this year, we find that we have 16 battleships and battle cruisers of the Dreadnought type, as against 15 possessed by all the other powers in European waters. Next year we shall have 24 ships of this type as against 21 possessed by all the other naval powers in Europe. These battleships represent a distinct margin over the two-power standard.

Not only over the two-power standard but over every other nation in Europe. Here is another extract from a speech by Mr. Asquith delivered about the 23rd of July, this year, which must be about the time the Prime Minister and his colleagues were consulting with the Government.

This year Germany has laid down two new ships; we are laying down four. Next year, we are told, Germany is going to lay down one extra ship; we are going to lay down two extra ships. Is that nothing? This year Germany has laid down two small cruisers; we are laying down eight, not quite so large, but much faster. We are accelerating the construction of these eight vessels. It is true that this year Germany is accelerating the construction of 12 destroyers; we have accelerated the construction of 20 destroyers. In the course of the next 18 months it is expected that the German fleet will be reinforced by 21 destroyers. We shall be reinforced by 43 destroyers in the same period.

That does not look very much like an emergency. But I am not going to discuss this question of the navy to-night, as an opportunity will be given later when the papers are brought down, and I can assure my right hon. friend who leads the Government that if he is able to show that there is a real emergency in Great Britain, he will have the support of at least one man on this side of the House in anything he proposes, which is at all reasonable.

I listened to-night to a long discussion in regard to the cut in the cement duty. One phase of it surprises everybody, which is that the Minister of Finance, who came to the Government for the purpose of keeping the Empire together and preventing railway traffic north and south, should have ever though of doing such a thing as that. I wish to refer to it in order to show the attitude not only of the Liberals, but of the Conservatives themselves in regard to that important question. Of course the whole point is that the Government is blamed for having made this cut in the cement duty for political purposes. If that were true, it would be a very serious accusation to make against this or any other government. I want to point out that the accusation did not come from the Liberals any more than from the Conservatives. I wish to read an extract from the weekly letter of J. C. McIntosh & Co., of Halifax. Mr. McIntosh is a man well known in our province, and I have not the slightest doubt that he is a strong supporter of the leader of this Government. The McIntosh firm each week issues a letter reviewing the state of trade and the prices of stocks. And this is an extract from one of these letters :

The Canada Cement Company has maintained that the reason why the western market could not be supplied was that the railways could not furnish enough cars. This company did not seem to be as much affected by the change as were independent companies operating throughout Ontario. The latter maintained that the action of the Government would destroy their business in the western market, and claimed that the action had been taken with a view of helping the Government in Saskatchewan, where elections are now pending.

That is what Mr. McIntosh sent out to his subscribers and patrons all over the country. It shows the attitude of friends of this Government and what they expect of this Government. If that transaction had been attributed to the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I can imagine there would be an uproar throughout the country and a hundred protests would come in demanding what proof there was that Mr. Fielding would do a disreputable thing like that. But here we have leading Conservatives all through the country who seem to take it for granted that this Government—this Government that belongs to the trusts, combines and mergers—would go so far as to do a thing like that for the purpose of winning an election in Saskatchewan. That is the opinion that their own friends have of their political morality, and that is the reason I refer to the matter. Of course they have reasons for what they believe. They remember, perhaps, the telegram that went to Prince Edward Island when the local elections there were on and that won the elections for the Tory party. We have also the incident that happened in Richelieu a short time ago. I do not see my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) in the House, though he was here to-night. Later on, I want to refer to that incident, and perhaps he may then be in his seat.

I wish also to say a word about this proposal to do something in regard to the great industry of agriculture. There are no two opinions about this expenditure. Everybody on this side was in favour of it last year, and I have no doubt they are in favour of it this year. The only criticism I have to make of this proposal to spend money in education and experiment in agriculture is that the proposal of last year was so ridiculously small that one could hardly take it seriously. I have not the census at hand, but I have seen it estimated that more than half the people of this country depend on agriculture for a livelihood. Let us assume that we have four millions of people depending upon this industry. And the Government voted half a million dollars for the purpose of promoting the great industry of agriculture. If you look at the estimates you will see that they propose a larger amount for one wharf in the constituency of the Prime Minister. Half a million dollars for the benefit of an industry which supports four millions of people. This means about 12½ cents a head, or less than the cost of a pound of bacon. Then these hon. gentlemen think it worth while, in the Governor General's speech, to compliment themselves upon having done this. I would like to say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) that if he wants to be taken seriously in this matter he will need to improve on that and propose more effective steps than those proposed last year.

The Prime Minister takes credit for carrying out his promise in regard to highways, 'the grantng of substantial assistance' as he says. But I submit that he has not done so. I submit that the Bill he introduced last year was not a Highway Bill at all, but was a Bill to provide a fund for the Conservative party at the expense of the country. That is a serious statement, but the proof is that the Government refused to accept the reasonable proposal of the Senate to divide the money among the provinces in proportion to population and to have it spent on the roads. Why, the whole amount could have been spent by the Minister of Public Works in the Macdonald election, or in Richelieu in the election there. That was the reason why we on this side were opposed to that method. I trust that if the Bill is introduced again the Senate will treat it in the same way, if the Government do not show the fairness to amend it and make it a Bill for the building of public roads rather than for the helping of the Conservative party at the time of an election. We have positive proof that that was what they intended to do. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid, Grenville) is here, and everybody remembers that the ink was hardly dry on that Road Bill after its introduction when he rushed up to South Renfrew and began to peddle out the road money to the electors. So gross were the statements he made on that occasion that a Conservative paper in the constituency atacked him for doing it. I trust that if that Bill is introduced this year it will be so amended as to secure the proper distribution of the money to the provinces and its expenditure upon the roads.

The Prime Minister said a good deal about having fulfilled his promises made while in opposition. And my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) went so far back as to say that they were going to go back and fulfil the promises that Sir Charles Tupper had made many years ago. I am inclined to think they will have their hands full if they undertake to fulfil the promises made by the Prime Minister in the past. Those promises are so numerous that I do not expect to see half of them carried out before the millennium. I have here the document known as the Halifax platform. I think the House will admit that it is authentic, for it has a full page picture of the leader of the Government on the cover with his signature. It came to a constituent of mine under the frank of the present Minister of the Interior. So I can say to the House that it came from the proper source. I think it is worth while to place on 'Hansard' the Halifax platform, so that future generations may know what the Prime Miniser did promise the people when in opposition, and they will be able to see whether he is carrying out the promises or not:

The Liberal-Conservative platform as laid down by R. L. Borden, M.P., Opposition leader, at Halifax, August 20, 1907:

1. Public Finance. Honest appropriation and expenditure of public moneys in the public interest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

2. Appointment by Merit.—Appointment by public officials upon consideration of capacity and personal character and not party service alone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

I do not know about the 'hear, hear' for that.

3. Honest Elections.—More effective provision to punish bribery and fraud at elections, to ensure thorough publicity as to expenditures by political organizations, to prevent the accumulation of campaign funds for corrupt purposes and to prohibit contributions thereto by corporations, contractors and promoters, to expedite the hearing of election petitions and to prevent conclusive arrangements for the withdrawal or compromise thereto, to provide for a thorough investigation of corrupt practices and if necessary to appoint an independent prosecuting officer charged with that duty, to simplify the procedure therefor and to enforce the laws so amended.

4. A thorough and complete reformation of the laws relating to the Civil Service so that future appointments shall be made by an independent commission acting upon the report of examiners after competitive examination.

We do not hear any shouting on the other side of the House for that clause. Why?

5. Reform of the Senate.—Such reform in the mode of selecting members of the Senate as will make that Chamber a more useful and representative legislative body.

6. Immigration.—A more careful selection of the sources from which immigration shall be sought, a more rigid inspection of immigrants and the abolition of the bonus system except under very special circumstances and for the purpose of obtaining particularly desirable classes of settlers

7. Public Lands and Franchises for the People.—The management and development of the public domain (in which are to be included great national franchises) for the public benefit and under such conditions that a reasonable proportion of the increment of value arising therefrom shall inure to the people.

8. Non-partisan Management of Government Railways.—The operation and management of our government railways by an independent commission free from partisan control or influence.

9. National Ports, Transportation and Cold Storage.—The development and improvement of our national waterways, the equipment of national ports, the improvements of transportation facilities and consequent reduction of freight rates between the place of production and the market, whether at home or abroad and the establishment of a thorough system of cold storage.

10. A Public Utilities Commission.—The reorganization of the present Railway Commission as a public utilities commission with wider powers and more extended jurisdiction so as to establish thorough and effective control over all corporations owning or operating public utilities or invested with franchises of a national character.

11. Public Telegraphs and Telephones.—The establishment after due investigation of a system of national telegraphs and telephones under conditions which shall be just to capital already invested in those enterprises.

12. Improved Postal Facilities.—The improvement of existing postal facilities, especially in newly developed portions of the country, and the inauguration after proper inquiry as to cost, of a system of free rural mail delibery.

13. Tariff Policy.—A fiscal policy which will promote the production within Canada of all useful articles and commodities that can be advantageously produced or manufactured from or by means of our natural resources, having due regard to the interests of the consumer as well as to the just claims of our wage-earning population.

14. Imperial preference.—The promotion by negotiation, legislation and other constitutional means of a system of mutual preferential trade within the Empire.

15. Justice to the New Provinces.—The restoration of the public lands to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan upon fair terms.

16. Provincial rights.—The unimpaired maintenance of all powers of self-government which have been conferred upon the provinces of Canada under the constitution.

There, Sir, we have 16 very important reforms that were proposed in 1907 by the Prime Minister, and I was surprised to find, in reading over the Speech from the Throne, that not one of the 16 has been mentioned during the present session. This is likely to be the working session of this Parliament, and you would expect that some one of these numerous reforms, promised so many years ago, about which the Prime Minister has had so much time to make up his mind, would appear on the programme for the present session; but we look in vain for a single one of them.

One paragraph says that we are to have appointments by merit in the Civil Service. Will any one claim that this Government has endeavoured to live up to that principle? Appointments by merit? Why, Sir, this principle has been violated in every county of Canada. I have no time to go into a full discussion of this Civil Service question, but we have never had such an experience as during the fourteen months that this Government has been in power as regards the Civil Service. Instead of reforming the Civil Service during the fourteen months they have debauched and bedevilled it beyond all reason. I have collected here a few instances that have come under my own observation and I wish to give them to the House. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely), has told us some things that were done in Western Canada. I want to point out a few things that were done in other places. My list is as follows:

1. This Government appointed a gentleman described by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Newfoundland as 'the greatest scoundrel who ever passed the Narrows,' as chairman of a commission to investigate the whole civil service of the country, as in the case of A. B. Morine.

2. They dismissed an officer of the Customs Department because he said privately to a friend that he could not support any man who had been found guilty of bribery in connection with an election contest, as in the case of Lyman C. Smith, of Oshawa, Ont.

3 They dismissed another officer of the Customs Department because he protested against certain anti-British sentiments made use of on the public platform by certain Nationalist orators in the province of Quebec, as in the case of E. O. Baldwin, of Coaticook, Quebec.

4. They dismissed a lighthouse keeper who had served the Department of Marine and Fisheries faithfully for thirty-two years and deprived him of a life pension to which he was justly entitled, because he proposed three cheers for Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as in the case of W. L. Munro, of White Head.

5. They started a prosecution against a postmaster for offensive partizanship who had been dead for four years and, when they discovered that he was beyond their reach, wreaked their vengeance on his poor old widow, as in the case of John H. McPherson, of Tracadie Road.

6. They dismissed an inspector of the Intercolonial railway by telegram and without trial and replaced him by a man who is said by the present Postmaster General to have been guilty of grave irregularities connected with the post office funds, as in the case of John Fraser, of Stellarton.

7. They dismissed a respectable man from the public service in Descousse, N.S., and replaced him with a criminal who was at the time under an accusation of forgery, and has since been tried and convicted of that crime, as in the case of Andrew Landry, of Descousse.

8. They conducted a Star Chamber investigation in a garret. Denied the accused the right to cross-examine witnesses, or to be represented by counsel, examined witnesses in the absence of the accused, as in the case of John W. Davis, Guysborough.

9. They disorganized the life-saving service on the Atlantic coast by recklessly dismissing the trained life boat crews without investigation and replacing them by men who have had no experience in the life-saving service, as in the cases of the life boat crews of Canso and White Head.

Those are a few of the things that have come under my notice in regard to the way they have dealt with the Civil Service. That is what my right hon. friend would call Civil Service reform. I have no doubt there are hundreds of such cases that will be brought before the attention of the House this session.

Another plank in the platform of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) was honest elections. The promise is honest elections and the performance is the scandals we have retailed here for the last week in regard to the constituencies of Macdonald and Richelieu. Is it honest to issue a blank warrant? Is it honest to have innocent men arrested under sham warrants? Is it honest to confine them in jails distant from the places where the supposed crimes were committed? Is it honest to keep them there until after the election and then to discharge them without making or proving any charge against them? These are the only proofs we have yet that the Prime Minister desires to carry out his promise in regard to honest elections. The election in Richelieu has created a good deal of discussion in this House. I regret that my hon. friend the member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) is not present as I would have liked to ask him one or two questions in regard to that election.

Mr. TURRIFF: Why is he not here?

Mr. SINCLAIR: We have a report of a speech made by that hon. gentleman in that constituency a few days before the poll, a report not in what my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works would call the reptile press, the term which he applied to the whole Liberal press of this country, but in his own paper, a reptile called La Patrie. He ought to be able to recognize the spots on that reptile. This is what he is reported to have said:

He said that he was coming in the name of the Government, at the request of the Hon. Mr. Rogers, to beg the electors of Richelieu to send to Parliament a member in sympathy with the present administration.

I would not come here, said he, until I had the promise of the Government that you would have the marine railway, of which I spoke to you at the banquet offered to Mr. Hazen. It has been promised to you, and I now come to ask you to elect my friend Mr. Morgan, so that Sorel and the county of Richelieu may progress with the assistance of the Government.

I caused promises to be made to me, not electoral promises, but real promises, and I have the pleasure of telling you that if Mr. Morgan is elected your member on Thursday, you will have the marine railway of which you stand in such need, to procure to your city the progress to which it is entitled.

The point I wish to make, is that we may have been mistaken when we assumed that it was the Minister of Public Works who made the promise to that hon. gentleman. The latter does not say it was the Minister of Public Works. He says that the hon. Minister of Public Works begged him to go to the electors of Richelieu and to ask them to elect a member in sympathy with the Government. But when he comes to the promise, the real thing, he says he got the promise, not from the Minister of Public Works, but from the Government. It is up to the Prime Minister to say whether or not there was such a promise given, and the Prime Minister has not yet dealt with that question. I want now to call his attention to it, and to point out that his supporter from the county of Charlevoix made the statement that he got that promise from the Government, which, I presume, means not the Minister of Public Works but the Prime Minister. It is possible that some people in the county of Richelieu think that the Postmaster General is the Government, or that Mr. Armand Lavergne is the Government, but we will hold the Prime Minister of this country responsible for the promise until he explains the matter and settles it with his supporter from Charlevoix.

Now the amendment before the House is in the following terms :

We beg to represent to your Royal Highness that in the elections of Macdonald and Richelieu there were practices calculated to terrorize and corrupt the electorate, which were connived at by your ministers and which deserve the censure of the House.

I submit that there is a good deal of proof, substantial proof, before the House at the present time, that such was the case, that these irregularities in Richelieu and Macdonald were connived at by the Government. We have the statement, the word of honour of a responsible member of this House, given at a public meeting to the electors of Richelieu that he had the authority of the Government for making the promise he made, and we have a large amount of proof of irregularities in the constituency of Macdonald. How are these things dealt with by the Prime Minister? What did he say? His only answer was to fling some mouldy futilities across the House about an old contest in North Huron. What did the Minister of Finance say? We expected the Minister of Finance to take some high ground on the question of these irregularities. He is supposed to be the salt of the Cabinet. He was taken in, we were told to give the Cabinet respectability, and we would suppose that a man occupying that high position would have had something to say about this question, that he would have told us that if the Minister of Public Works had really been guilty of having engineered those dreadful things that were done in the constituency of Macdonald, he ought to withdraw from the Government, and that as Minister of Finance he would not sit round the table with a man who had done such things. He ought to compel him either to clear up his character in regard to those difficulties in Macdonald, or to retire altogether.

But what does he do? With a graceful wave of his hand he dismisses the whole question, and says,—'cheer up, the worst is yet to come'. Well, Sir, it is bad enough already, but I have no doubt that if this Government remains in power for a few years longer it will be worse. It is a question that the people will have to take in hand for themselves. The Minister of Public Works is the chief conspirator in this case, and what does he say? Has he made any defence? Why, he accepts responsibility for all those irregularities. He says those men were treated right, that he would do it again, that if he had the doing of it he would punish them much more than they were punished. That is practically what he said. He did not say he was sorry that such disgraceful things happened in his province, he did not say he would try to have them rectified. In fact there was only one man, or two, supporting the Government, if I remember rightly, who had anything to say against these abuses. My hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), said it was a bad thing that happened, and the last speaker (W. F. MacLean) rather condemned it. But outside of these two, I have not heard a word of condemnation either from the front benches or from the back benches about those abominations that were practised in Macdonald. The evidence against the government of Manitoba is overwhelming. There is no doubt at all that the Justice Department of the province of Manitoba entered into a conspiracy to prevent a fair election in the constituency of Macdonald. The evidence against the Government here is, of course to some extent circumstantial, but it is also to my mind conclusive. It is not denied that the Minister of Public Works was in the constituency, that he was on the spot directing that campaign. It is not denied that, before some of those arrests were made, the Minister of Public Works said that an arrest had been made, and that there were more to follow. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) pertinently asked how did he know that arrests were to follow unless he was in the secret, or unless there was some plan of that kind to arrest the Liberal workers in the constituency. I am very unwillingly forced to the conclusion that any fair-minded jury would decide that those disreputable doings in the constituency of Macdonald were connived at by this Government, and I intend to vote for the amendment.

Mr. C. A. MUNSON (Northumberland West): Mr. Speaker, like all the other young members of this House, I crave its indulgence. Elected by the people of West Northumberland, I am here to represent their interests, and in my own feeble way I am going to try and answer a few of the arguments advanced by a number of the gentlemen who have spoken during this debate. A great deal has been said about the election in Macdonald. I take that up first because it was the last thing spoken of. I fail to see that there has been produced any evidence authentic enough for any person to take any notice of. In the first place, there are some affidavits made by both sides setting forth certain particulars regarding actions in contravention of the Elections Act.

We are debating to-night the amendment which, I believe, should be the only thing before the House, but I understand that a considerable amount of latitude is allowed to members on such an occasion as this. At any rate, I find that members have wandered all the way from melon-cutting in the Canadian Pacific railway company to corrupt acts, so-called in the Macdonald and Richelieu elections. A great deal has been said here about the corrupt acts of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). It was alleged by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sinclair) that the hon. Minister of Public Works was in Macdonald, that he took part in the elections, that there were corrupt acts, and that therefore the minister is liable. There were corrupt acts in the West Northumberland, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was there and the right hon. gentleman was doing his best to elect the candidate who advocated his cause. I am not one to say that the right hon. gentleman was guilty of a corrupt act because he came into West Northumberland, but I would have as good a right to say that he had committed gross irregularities as these hon. gentlemen have to say that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was guilty of corrupt acts in Macdonald.

This amendment presents itself to me in a very peculiar way. I may not be experienced enough to read it as it should be read, but I do know that it amounts to a vote of want of confidence in the present Government. The demand by the leader of the Opposition to amend the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne by introducing the words which he proposes is not in keeping, I think, with the reputation that the right hon. gentleman has always borne. I was not in the House at the time the amendment was made but I was with a number of gentlemen, including Liberals, when it was read and we all smiled, one gentleman remarking: Is that all?—a remark which pretty nearly conveys the gist of the amendment.

A great deal has been said by hon. members and especially by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) about the manner in which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works conducted himself. When the Minister of Public Works stated that he would again send detectives if another election took place the look of horror on the face of this hon. gentleman was something awful. He must be afraid of detectives. Why should he be afraid of having detectives go into any constituency? They are the representatives of the law, the guardians of the peace, and why should they not be allowed to go into any constituency? Is it not the duty of the Government to see that everything is run properly? As far as the arresting of these young men is concerned, everyone knows who has read these affidavits that there was cause for making the arrests. Whether there was cause enough to convict I do not know as the men were not tried, but there is this to be said that, during these election contests, men come in from outside under false names and other men come up and swear that these outsiders have committed corrupt acts in asking them to vote for their candidate and offering them money and whiskey. That has been sworn to. What is there in it? There is nothing to make all this howl about. There is not a constituency in the whole Dominion where we have not had irregularities more or less but the very fact that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are making such a howl about these irregularities so called in Macdonald shows that they have not much else to talk about.

It amused me somewhat to hear the discussion regarding the policy of the Laurier Government during the fifteen years in which hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. How they gloated over the grand surpluses which were piled up owing to the fact that the Laurier policy was still in force ! What is that Laurier policy ? Why, it is the old National Policy inaugurated by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878. Practically the same percentage of duty is imposed on goods coming into this country. Sir John Macdonald, when he inaugurated that policy, predicted just exactly what would happen. Manufacturing establishments were brought into being, trade and commerce went on with a rush, railways were built and the Laurier Government came in just at the time when a small depression existed and took advantage of everything that Sir John Macdonald had done. The remarks which we hear in this House about the policy of the Laurier Government are almost enough to make Sir John Macdonald turn over in his grave, and Alexander Mackenzie, too. When the late Government tinkered with the Macdonald tariff, what did it amount to ? They adjusted a few items here and there as necessitated by the times, but they hung on like grim death to the old National Policy and we have it to-day in its original shape almost just as Sir John Macdonald gave it to us.

Now, I am going to say a little more about this amendment. The right hon. leader of the Opposition says in effect that the ministers connived at the irregularities in Macdonald. He does not say whether they all connived, but he says 'the Ministers.' I am sure he cannot mean the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). The Minister of Trade and Commerce, I believe, was in England, and therefore he could not have meant him. He could not have meant the other ministers who were not in Macdonald. They could not have connived very well at long range. The right hon. gentleman kept himself within the lines of Torres Vedras. He did not come out distinctly and say : I am going to lay an information against these ministers, I am going to bring them before the Privileges and Elections Committee, and I am going to forfeit my seat if I do not prove my case, as he would have to do under the rules of Parliament. He was not like the member of this House who, a year or so ago, made distinct charges and proved them to the satisfaction of every person. No, he kept within the lines of Torres Vedras. I used to think the lines of Torres Vedras were lines surrounding Lisbon within which the Duke of Wellington kept his forces, but I find from listening to the right hon. gentleman that within the lines of Torres Vedras, means any place where there is a mud puddle into which you can crawl and pick up a handful of mud and spatter it all over any person who happens to be in the vicinity. During this debate hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have talked for hours, and it occurs to me that there has been altogether too much time wasted and the business of the country too much neglected. I intend only to speak for a few minutes and I wish to be modest about it because I am a new member and I know that the older members do not take very kindly to a man who tries to talk himself to death. I think members of the Opposition in the House might find better use for their time than in trying to bespatter the fair fame of this Government, indecently, as they have been endeavouring to do during the past week. I thank the House for the attention given to me.

Mr. I. DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Munson), I do not propose detaining the House very long. The debate on the Address has lasted already several days and very little remains to be said on either side. However, as the Speech from the Throne states the government's intention of submitting to the House in the course of the session a bill for the revision of the Banking Act, I shall take this opportunity of expressing my views on that important subject to which I have given a good deal of study for some years back, though I may not strictly in doing so confine myself within the limits set down by the section of the Speech from the Throne referred to. I hope that the fact that I am addressing this House in French will not provoke criticism on the part of a certain journalist who apparently thinks that the right to speak French does not necessarily imply taking advantage of that right; as I am quite sure that since making those unkindly references to the hon. member for Vaudreuil, in an Ottawa newspaper, he has had occasion to think the matter over and take a more sensible view of the question.

It is of primary importance that our Banking Act be revised, at least in part. An announcement of the Government's intentions in this regard is awaited with anxiety and I may add that such a revision will not prove satisfactory, unless some pretty radical changes are introduced. In regard to shareholders, for instance, the proposed new legislation should be such as to preclude all possibility of fraud through fictitious shareholders or substitutes. Every shareholder should be bonâ fide, and to ensure that result, it might be provided in the law that no shareholder shall be recognized as such until the board of directors have duly agreed to it, save in the case of an estate. Of course, under such conditions, all could not become shareholders in our banks, but to my mind it is only proper that all should not be allowed to have a free hand with the savings of the people. Were such limitations enforced, we would not so frequently have to deplore the insolvency of shareholders, carrying with it the most baneful results to depositors.

Then, shareholders should be kept in closer touch with the bank's business. I suggested last year that the president or general manager should be under the obligation of submitting to the shareholders at the annual meeting for the election of the board of directors, a statement of all transactions exceeding a certain amount, including overdrafts allowed to clients, considerations which have induced such action, securities held by the bank. And why should not parties concerned be informed of such doings, in the same way that partners in a private concern. Where is the business man who lends money without having any security as to the solvency of the borrower?

It may be objected that the shareholder is in a position to secure information from the bank reports. Well, now, is there a single hon. gentleman in this House who would be in a position to judge of the financial status of a bank, or of the efficiency of its management from reading through these reports? In how many instances has it not been found that bank officials had for years been making false reports, the falsity of which was brought to light only through the failure of such institutions? Why? Because reports of that kind give no clue whatever to the actual condition of the bank's business.

Again it may be stated that millionaires have ready means of obtaining whatever information they may need. But that is no assurance that they will do so, whereas were my suggestion followed, they could not help paying attention to such matters. That is the only means of ensuring a judicious selection of directors, whereas to-day the shareholder votes blindly, and relies wholly on the confidence he happens to repose in Mr. So or So.

But, of course, even that would not suffice. I say to the Government that the revision of the Banking Act is one of the most important and most difficult questions we have to deal with. Banks are chartered by the Government with a view to safeguarding public interest, and in the same way that it controls their organization, it should make sure that they are properly managed, supervise their transactions; and I may add that the people expect measures to be taken that will ensure a closer government supervision. It is quite plain that such supervision is necessary and as a matter of fact the Government has made an effort, though unsuccessfully, to enforce inspection. Such reports as are required are meaningless, utterly insufficient, since failures follow one another without any one suspecting the day before what is going to happen. Which signifies that the means, the only means provided by the law, to keep us posted on the situation of banks, is inoperative.

With, on the one hand, the acknowledged need for an effective government supervision of banking transactions, and, on the other, the failure of the present system of supervision, it is imperative that we should find some other means of attaining that object, and I would pin my faith to the enforcing of a system of inspection by the Department of Finance. I also believe that the public feeling in favour of the establishment of a system of inspection is quite pronounced, and that some move of that kind on the part of the Government is expected. I submit to the House that a departure in that direction would have the effect of inspiring a widespread feeling of security who would make for the stability of our banks as well as for the prosperity of our commerce and our industries.

A fact which I much regret to state, but which should not be withheld, is that the people lack faith in our financial institutions, and the Post Office Department must have had evidence of it in the increased deposits in their savings banks. That condition of affairs will have to be done away with, even should we be forced in consequence to establish a State bank, of which these savings banks are possibly the forerunners. For the future prosperity of the Dominion, it is necessary that the old saw 'As good as the bank' should bear its full meaning.

Such a system of inspection, it may be observed, is not an untried experiment. It has been introduced in several countries and has been giving for many years the most satisfactory results. So I say to the Government that a revision pure and simple of our banking law cannot be satisfactory to the people. Substantial, far reaching changes are needed, and I believe the duty devolves on me, considering the interest I have in the past taken in this question, to offer at this early stage of the session these humble suggestions.

I shall now pass on, Mr. Speaker, to another part of the Speech from the Throne. It is therein stated that Canada is enjoying unexceptional prosperity. We are all agreed as to the existence of such prosperity, though we disagree as to the causes which have brought it about. There is another point concerning which we should all agree, and it is that such prosperity is not due to this Government; for, as a matter of fact, what have they done to favour it? Have they revised the tariff? Have they increased or reduced customs duties? Have they built or started anything? Of course, I do not wish to taunt them too sharply for having done nothing, as they have not been in power very long; but I object to listening to encomiums concerning them, or to their getting credit for happenings which to everybody's knowledge can not be attributed to them.

So then I say that the present prosperity is not due to this Government. The hon. gentleman from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Rainville) goes right back to the fountain head, to Cartier and Macdonald and to the establishment of the great National Policy, to find the actual cause. Alas, facts are against him and there is not a single member in this House, without excepting the Prime Minister himself, but who knows that the failure of the National Policy led the country to ruin. There is not a single member but who remembers that baneful period of our history during which our people left their homes to seek in a foreign country their daily bread which they could no longer find here in the Dominion. In such a condition of affairs there lurked a danger of annexation much more to be feared than influences emanating from a mere trade agreement. Finally, in 1896, the people, disgusted with the carelessness and inefficiency of the Conservative government tired of the National Policy introduced for the satisfaction of a few privileged persons, called on the Liberal party to regenerate and save the country. That task the Liberal party has accomplished. To that party is due in a great measure the extraordinary prosperity which we enjoy at present.

The National Policy could not by itself bring about such a change. Something else was needed, and the main factors of our prosperity were the British preference, the immigration policy, the building of our canals and the improvement of our great waterways, the building of the Transcontinental railway, the establishment of a perfect system of cold storage compartments on board steamships, the reduction of customs duties on about 150 articles of first necessity.

And it is since then, and owing to the good management of the Liberal government in conjunction with a bountiful Providence, that we enjoy that marvellous prosperity which we never tire of lauding. Under Liberal rule, Canada has become a nation known to the world, attracting general attention, and resting on a solid foundation; this Government has as yet done nothing whatsoever to modify our economic status whereas, at the time we reached power, the country was in a state of crisis, of financial depression, verging on poverty. So we on this side of the House have every reason to rejoice at this reference to the prosperity of the country.

As regards that part of the Speech from the Throne which deals with the fair and requisite help to be given for the naval defence of the Empire, like every other hon. gentlemen in this House, I find here nothing sufficiently precise and clear to enable me to discuss the Government's position. But what surprises me is to see a member of this House who abides before hand by any proposal emanating from the Government, especially when for a number of months we are in a semi-official way given to understand by ministerial organs and through the resignation of the former Minister of Public Works, that the Government's policy will consist in donating to Great Britain some thirty million dollars right away ant when we remember that the gentleman referred to was previous to September 21st, 1911, the champion of the statu quo and plebiscite policy, and was one of that group which denounced in the most violent terms not only the proposal for a Canadian navy, but also to use their own words: 'the still more baneful policy' of the present Prime Minister.

So as to make things plainer, I shall quote from a few of the reports of the numerous Nationalist meetings, at which the hon. member from Chambly and Verchères was one of the most forcible, if not one of the most sincere speakers, and I shall use for that purpose Le Devoir, the organized organ of that group.

The following is what we read in Le Devoir, of February 21st, 1910.

Report of a meeting held at Longueuil, on February 20th, 1910.

Summary of a speech delivered by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères, at the time a mere spokesman of the Nationalist party:

Would it not be preferable, queries Mr. Rainville, to spend our money in opening up new colonization roads, in building railways, in building the Georgian Bay canal, in equipping our ports at Montreal, Sorel, Quebec, St. John and other points?

What vexed him was just this:

At a given moment, the King would cable to the Government and twelve hours later, the ships, our ships, would take to the sea.

And to think that Laurier wanted

A navy at the disposal of the British admiralty, which would utilise it whenever it saw fit to do so.

Of course, we owed nothing to Great Britain.

Considering that our rights had always been ignored by the mother country.

Meeting held at Montreal on March 23rd, 1910. This again is from Le Devoir, being a report of the speech delivered by the present representative for Chambly and Vercheres.

He inveighs against the shameful stand taken by journalists who, at the bidding of English noblemen unwilling to maintain British supremacy out of their own pockets, want the colonists to supply the cash and pay the cost of maintenance of the British navy.

Meeting held at Chambly, on August 28th, 1910. Again from Le Devoir being the report of a speech by the present representative of Chambly and Verchères.

Mr. Jos. Rainville follows Mr. Ducharme. He enquires whether his hearers know why the Ottawa Government have imposed on us the Navy Bill, and why Mr. Borden has joined hands with Mr. Laurier on this question. The leader of the Opposition at Ottawa is the mascot of Sir Wilfrid. Whenever there is some mean thing to do, Laurier manages to get Borden to give him a hand.

Imperialism is an English importation, an invention of Chamberlain's, who has instilled it in the minds of the members of the Upper House, all great landlords, by getting them to understand that the result of such a policy would be to relieve the British tax-payer and secure a part of their enormous budget through contributions from the colonies.

What has become to-day of that unflinching Nationalist who now sits in this House as the representative of Chambly and Vercheres? Of his old-time Nationalist ways he has retained only his method of quoting extracts. Indeed, in an effort to clear himself to-day, he cuts out this wee sentence from an editorial of Le Devoir, dated October 12th, 1912, which reads as follows: 'Never have the Nationalists contended that Canada should do nothing for the safety of the Empire.' I will now give the remainder of paragraph, and the House no doubt will infer from it that the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères must realize that he is in a pretty bad plight, since he mutilates the editorial to which he refers.

Herewith I give the wording of the paragraph referred to from Le Devoir, of October 12, 1912:

Never have the Nationalists contended that Canada should do nothing for the safety of the Empire. What we have always stated was that the best and most satisfactory way of fulfilling that duty, while at the same time refraining from any infringement on the principle of self-government, would be by thoroughly providing for the defense of the territory and coasts of Canada, and not by launching out a reckless policy of naval defence for which Canada has no use whatever.

The change of position effected by the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres is equivalent to a complete right about face. One of the strong grounds taken by the Nationalists, prior to September 21st, 1911, was that the great majority of the people were in favour of the statu quo and opposed to any form of contribution. When we would state that in Quebec only was there to be found a small group of abstentionists, our opponents would answer (the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres among others): 'See the Grain growers, the Grangers'; then they would quote the views of Mr. So and So of Toronto, of Mr. So and So of Winnipeg, of such a one from Halifax, or Vancouver, etc. To-day the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères acknowledges that we were right, when he says:

There are differences of opinion as to the manner in which such contribution should be effected, but from one end of the country to the other people are unanimous in their desire to see the supremacy of Great Britain maintained in the interest of the whole British Empire.

Then the Balkan war has worked a wonderful change in the mind of the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres; it has set topsy turvy all his former ideas on that important subject of the Empire's safety, and in it he finds the vindication of the Government's whole attitude, future, uncertain and undefined though it be. He is no doubt forgetful of the fact that our ministers' visit to Great Britain preceded the declaration of war.

I do not doubt that the newly-formed views of the hon. member will be received with great satisfaction and much relief by his constituents in Chambly and Vercheres. So I will let him settle the matter with them and devote some time to a much more interesting figure in this House, I mean the hon. minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel).

For some time I have been worrying over the sad plight in which he would find himself if verily the Government decided to make a grant of thirty millions, considering that he made such a fight, in 1910, to stave off a grant not of 30 millions, but of twenty-five millions, that he showed off as an in and out abstentionist, and that he was noted for his constant appeals to the people of Quebec in favour of the 'statu quo' and the plebiscite. And the reason why I took so great an interest in that hon. minister was my remembrance of a visit which he paid to the county of St. John (whose representative I have the honour to be), on the 1st of December, 1910, and of a speech he made there on that date.

No doubt, he will be grateful to me for recalling in his presence the sweet things he said to my constituents for the purpose of inducing them to vote against me. Hon. gentlemen will also like to have them put on record in 'Hansard.' According to the report in Le Devoir, the hon. minister thus delivered himself at the time:

I will define the three positions taken in the House by Messrs. Laurier, Borden and Monk. Mr. Laurier has made up his mind to have a navy which will be Imperial in time of war and Canadian in time of peace. Mr. Borden, instead of a navy, wished us to make at once a grant of 25 millions to Great Britain. Mr. Monk asked that, previous to any action being taken by the House in this connection, the people be consulted (Applause).

The least that can be expected from a public man is that he should advocate when in power the same principles that he advocated when in opposition. The Government supporters of to-day are not those of fourteen years ago, are not those of ten years ago, are not even those of two years ago. That is why we urge you to oust them from power. If ever our party is put in power, I for one, I promise you to remain faithful to the principles I am advocating to-day. And should the contrary happen, well then, let those who will have carried us to power turn us out.

After reading such a statement and seeing that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue is still a member of the Borden government, I am led to believe, in spite of contrary indications, that the Government's policy does not provide for a money grant; and what confirms me in that view, is the recent acceptance of a portfolio in that Government by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre), who, he also, in 1910, paid a visit to my constituents in the beautiful parish of St. George d'Henryville.

What are the principles, the views of the hon. minister on the important question of a grant towards the maintenance of Great Britain's naval supremacy? We have them summed up in the following excerpt from his speech at the Longue-Pointe meeting, on August 2, 1910:

Speakers overrun the constituencies of the provinces of Quebec blaming not only the Government who have put through the Navy Bill, but also the Conservative Opposition which supported a still more obnoxious proposal.

We rally around the principles propounded by Mr. Monk, by refusing to contribute either men or money to the wars of the Empire, before the people have decided what to do. And we believe that such a stand is patriotic, and not that of the Government or of the Opposition. (Applause).

Mr. MARTIN (Sts. Marie): Translation.) Is it really the member for Hochelaga who speaks thus?

Mr. DEMERS: (Translation.) I will go on with the quotation; it is all the time Mr. Coderre who is speaking:

In 1776 and in 1812, our forefathers repulsed the invaders; we would be ready to do the same, but we refuse to fight for motives which we know nothing about, or rather concerning which we are too well posted, as in the case of the South African war, prompted by the business interests of speculators. And we are satisfied that if the electorate were consulted, the majority of the voters would defeat the Government bill and the Borden proposal as well.

I would have enjoyed recalling to the hon. member for Dorchester the visit which he also made to my constituency and some of the speeches which he then delivered, wherein he referred to rags of the red or blue tinge. But I will leave that for some other time.

May I be permitted while I am on my feet to say one word about the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition. From all that we have heard in connection with the Macdonald and Richelieu elections, it appears that a system of intimidation and terror prevailed there, and that an attempt was made to interfere in very possible way with the free exercise of the most secred right. It was expedient, with a view to vindicating Canada's good name, that a solemn protest should be entered, and I shall be glad to cast my vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. FORGET moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

House adjourned at 12, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

LABOUR TROUBLE AT ALGOMA STEEL WORKS.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. VERVILLE: I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) if he has any information or any representations with regard to the lockout that now exists at the Algoma Steel Works at Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have had no communication on the subject, either from the employers or the workmen.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Rainville for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the Session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, so much has been said by hon. members on the other side of the House upon the amendment of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) regarding the Richelieu election that I think I should be allowed a few words, as I happened to be there. Hon. gentlemen on the other side who have spoken upon the subject do not know very much about it, but have simply taken their cue from what the leader of the Opposition has said. In his speech, referring to the Richelieu election, the right hon. gentleman said:

I again charge the Minister of Public Works, and I arraign him before Parliament, with having tried to bribe the electors of Richelieu. I call as witness a member of this House, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget)——

Well, I have responded to the summons.

—and I say, on the word of the hon. member for Charlevoix, that he was sent by the Minister of Public Works to Richelieu to try and bribe the electors. I shall not use my own words; I have the words of Sir Rodolphe Forget published in La Patrie, which is the paper friendly to the Government and especially friendly to the hon. member for Charlevoix. The hon. member for Charlevoix came to the town of Sorel, the shire town of the county of Richelieu and held a meeting, and this is his language as reported in his own paper, La Patrie.

I beg to deny that I am the owner of La Patrie. I have not and never had a single five cents worth of interest in that publication. If my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition does not want to believe me, he can ask his bosom friend, Senator Dandurand, who has been a director of La Patrie, and, if he does, he will find that what I state now is the truth. The right hon. gentleman has accused me of having been the proxy of the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). I want to declare here that the Minister of Public Works had nothing whatever to do, directly or indirectly, with the election in Richelieu. I was not his proxy, but I went there at the request of my friend, Mr. Morgan, to whom I owe a debt of gratitude for what he had done for me in the election of 1911 in Montmorency county. When I got down to Richelieu I found nearly every hon. member of this House from the province of Quebec, as well as the Liberal staffs from St. Hyacinthe, Nicolet, Quebec, and Three Rivers. I may also say that, so far as I can remember, I found there, on the Tuesday, the present hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) and the hon. members for Beauce (Mr. Béland), St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune), Bagot (Mr. Marcile) and Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau); in fact, the hon. member for Three Rivers, on the eve of the election arrived at the head of a party 210 strong, all wearing red ribbons, with a portrait of the leader of the Opposition, which is against the law. As you know, this was in contravention of section 260 of the Dominion Elections Act. These gentlemen did not hold proxies, but they held a general power of attorney to sell, buy and deliver. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been speaking about intimidation, but let us see what occurred. I arrived there on Monday late at night; and I am sorry I was not there on Sunday, because the result of the election would have been otherwise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: Because, had I been there on Sunday, I would have spoken to the people in the country districts after mass, as the Liberal members did, and I am sure I could have persuaded them by my arguments on political questions. I understand that by intimidation it is meant that you try to prevent a man from voting, but I do not understand that intimidation means that you can force a man to vote for one party or the other, because when he is behind the door in the secrecy of the polling booth, marking his ballot, he can vote just as he pleases. Let me point out here that the vote in the by-election in Richelieu in October last was the largest vote ever cast in that county. In September, 1911, the vote cast was 4,012 and in October, 1912, the vote was 4,060. Let me point out also that, with the exception of Sorel itself and St. Joseph de Sorel, where this Government has kept a number of Liberal workingmen in their employment, we had a majority everywhere. The hon. member for Richelieu was elected by a majority of 241, and Sorel and St. Joseph de Sorel gave him a majority of 302. Talk about intimidation; was it intimidation for me to say to 4,000 people at a public meeting in that county: Gentlemen, I want you to vote; I want you to vote for Mr. Cardin or for Mr. Morgan; your vote is secret; when you have done your day's work, you have earned your money, go and vote as you wish to vote.' But I went further than that. As president of the Richelieu company, which has its headquarters in Sorel, I stated there publicly, in addressing the people: 'If any foreman should interfere with any man with regard to his vote, let me know, and he will be discharged immediately.' Most of the foremen are good Liberals, and they worked very hard against me.

Now, I come to the famous question of the marine railway. That marine railway has been promised since 1906 by every Liberal that visited Sorel under the Laurier regime. It was promised by the late Mr. Tarte, who I believe had a plan prepared; it was promised by the late Mr. Prefontaine, who had the rollers made; it was promised by Mr. Bruneau, now Judge Bruneau; it was promised by Mr. Beauchemin; it was promised by Mr. Lanctot, the ex-member for that county. Let me tell these hon. gentlemen opposite that when it was promised this time, it was not promised by the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) but it was promised by the ex-Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). That promise was made at a non-political banquet given by the workingmen of Sorel, who were present to the number of about 800. Furthermore, the promise was made before the writs were issued, at least three weeks before, and it came about in this way. The president of the Board of Trade of Sorel presided at the dinner, at which were present many of the members of the board of trade of that city, and the president of the board of trade who is a very good Liberal, got up deliberately and said that he took advantage of the presence of the two ministers who had the most to do with Sorel—the hon. the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) and the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk)—to ask them if at least they would promise the marine railway, which was absolutely necessary—and the hon. member for Richelieu cannot deny that it is absolutely necessary. So the Liberal president of the board of trade asked for a promise. I was sitting next to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and he turned to me and said: 'What will it cost, and is it necessary?' I replied: 'It will cost about $200,000 or $225,000, and it is an absolutely necessary work.' At that moment the hon. member (Mr. Monk) rose and promised that he would endeavour to have this marine railway built, which we all know was not only in the interest of the people of Sorel, but was for the good of the country generally. Now, the night that I spoke at Sorel, during the election, I heard that the hon. member had resigned the portfolio of Public Works, and it was rumoured that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) would get it. Some of those present came to me and said: 'Now that Mr. Monk has resigned, I suppose that is the end of our marine railway,' but I told them that I did not believe that was the case. What I said at Sorel was: 'I have just heard that Mr. Monk has resigned his portfolio, but you may be sure that whether his successor is Mr. Rogers or anybody else, he will carry out the promise made by his predecessor. Knowing Mr. Rogers as I do know him, and knowing that he is so friendly to the province of Quebec——'

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: Well, it is very easy to understand that, because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) was born in the province of Quebec. I said 'I believe that Mr. Rogers will certainly carry out the promise made by his predecessor, but it will be more sure if you elect——'

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: Yes, I said: 'If you elect my friend, Mr. Morgan, the request for the marine railway will be backed up by all the Conservative deputation from the province of Quebec, and we will go to the Minister of Public Works, and we will ask him for it, backed up by your own board of trade.' The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who was not there, and who I am sure knows nothing about the matter at all, said in his speech in this House the other night:

I think we would all recognize that it is absolutely indefensible for a public man to make representations of the character of those that the hon. member for Charlevoix made unless he had authority from the Minister of Public Works to make them. He is reported to have made these representations. There are one or more members in this House who heard him make them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was present.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: I ask the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) if he can now make the statement that he was present on that Monday night.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was present at Sorel when the hon. gentleman (Sir Rodolphe Forget) spoke on the eve of the election. We had a meeting at the Town Hall, and the hon. gentleman was speaking, and I heard him there make the promise referred to in the speech of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. There are four or five other members of this House who heard the speech.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) was not there on the Monday, and he was not there on the Tuesday.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was there on the eve of the election.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: On Wednesday evening the hon. member was there, but I only arrived at a quarter past twelve that night by special train, and he was there speaking in the market hall, and I left the place before he finished his speech. On the Wednesday evening I made only a short speech, simply stating that the farmers were in our favour. I ask the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) now, if he can make the statement that he was present on the Monday when I spoke about the marine railway, and that is the only day I ever spoke about it.

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot): I was present on the night in question in Sorel when the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) spoke about the marine railway, and I heard him say what is reported in La Patrie.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: Then it must have been you who made that report in La Patrie. As far as the dismissals in Sorel are concerned, I may say that I had nothing to do with them. I do know that we said to the authorities of the Government shipyard at Sorel to let everybody come and vote, and so much was that done that most of the work in lake St. Peter was stopped that day for want of men. I repeat that if it had not been that 85 per cent of the men in the shipyards in Sorel are Liberals, the result would have been much different. In conclusion, I want to say that I never went down to Sorel with a proxy for the Minister of Public Works, because I have never been used as a proxy, and I am never going to be.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Before discussing the points which have just been raised by my hon. friend the member for Charlevoix and Montmorency (Sir Rodolphe Forget), I should like to review for a few moments what is contained in the Speech from the Throne. It is stated in the biography of the Marquis of Salisbury, written some years ago, that he was an expert in clearness, that no man writing in the English language could be so clear as he, whenever he had to hold a pen. It was said that he could write a Speech from the Throne as easily as he could write an article for the Fortnightly Review. I have read the Speech from the Throne, and if that has been penned by the right hon. the Prime Minister, I am bound to say that he is unlike the late leader of the great Conservative party in England, in that, far from being an expert in clearness, he is a past master in vagueness. It reminds me of the quilt every one of us once saw in our grandmother's house in days gone by. Looking at its broad surface, one could see the intricate weaving; but, while there were very few gold threads in it, there was plenty of fustian. The Speech from the Throne is very heavily freighted with the spoils of the Liberal party for the gold threads it contains. The hon. gentleman seems to have plucked for his scalp many of the feathers belonging to the Liberal party, and to have crowned his forehead with many of the laurels which rightly appertain to that party.

Amongst the petty larcenies—and I am glad to say it is only a petty larceny of which my hon. friend the Postmaster General is guilty—I notice one paragraph referring to cable rates. The speech says:

> My Government has succeeded in securing certain reductions in cable rates, and will continue its efforts to obtain still further reductions.

This is a petty larceny at the expense of the preceding Postmaster General. The work for the reduction of cable rates between Great Britain and Canada is not a work of to-day or yesterday. It started under the direction of my predecessor, Sir William Mulock, it was continued by my humble self, and the first fruits reaped by my hon. friend were reaped just a few weeks after he had taken office last year in the month of October. I do not, however, begrudge my hon. friend the further reduction of this year, far from it, and I hope in the coming years he will obtain more than a cable rate reduction, but a state-owned cable between Great Britain and Canada. It is the desideratum of the Dominions over the seas; is the wish of all those who are sincere believers in cheap telegraphic communication between the various parts of the Empire.

I come now to the real feathers and laurels. The general prosperity of Canada, the settlement of the West, the increase in revenue, the expansion of trade; all of this rightly belongs to the Liberal Government which has administered so successfully the affairs of this country for fifteen years. Lest we forget, I should like to state in a very few words what the Liberal party accomplished during the fifteen years of its regime. First, it adopted a tariff which materially reduced the rate of taxation and promoted domestic and foreign trade. It granted the imports from Great Britain a preferential treatment, which is sane imperialism in deeds, not by words of mouth. It secured the annulment of the Belgian and German treaties which stood in the way of trade between us and Great Britain. It fostered and stimulated the export trade of Canada. It pursued a vigorous policy along the line of development of transportation facilities. It established penny postage within the Empire. It extended the Intercolonial railway to Montreal. The Grand Trunk Pacific was started under the Government which preceded this one, and I only hope that the Grand Trunk Pacific will not be degraded as it is rumoured. It established the Labour Department. It provided against the sweating system in the performance of government contracts. and last but not least, even according to one of the staunchest opponents of Liberalism in the province of Ontario, namely, the Toronto News, the leader of the Liberal party was the pioneer of Canadian naval defence. That policy may be thwarted at the present time, but its ultimate triumph is only delayed. Sir, we look back to our record with pride and satisfaction. It can compare advantageously with that of preceding governments and also with that of the present Government. The turn of the tide in Canada came with the adoption in 1897, of the wise fiscal policy of that great Canadian, the Hon. Mr. Fielding. Even so stout a Conservative as my good friend whom I am pleased to see in his place, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), will admit that the turning of the tide in Canada came on the introduction of the British preference which had been heralded and promised for many years before 1897, but which it remained for the Liberal Government to give Great Britain. That British preference is the test of Liberal imperialism, it is the standard of Liberal loyalty to the Mother Country. The turning of the tide came also—and this was pointed out yesterday in the very able speech delivered by my hon. friend from St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers)—with the adoption of a vigorous immigration policy begun by the former Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) and energetically continued by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

Let us compare the fifteen years of Conservative regime with the fifteen years of Liberal regime and see if we cannot look back on our record with some pride. Our trade increased from 1881 to 1896 by only $41,700,000; our trade from 1896 to 1911 increased by $525,000,000. The population of Canada, in fifteen years of the Censervative regime increase by 562,000; under the Liberal regime, the population increased from 1896 to 1911 by 2,254,000. The homesteads taken up in the West in 1896 numbered 1,300; the homesteads taken up in 1912 numbered 39,000. if I mistake not.

About this immigration, I read in a certain newspaper some very severe strictures upon the class of immigrants that come into Canada from Great Britain. If I did not respect the House of Commons as I do I would read the article which has been published by the chief ally of the coalition government, Mr. Bourassa, in which he represents the British immigrant as the meanest and the poorest kind of immigrant that is being sent to our shores. I will not cite his own words—I respect too much the House of Commons and have too great consideration for the ears of hon. member to repeat what he says in Le Devoir newspaper. I only wish to call this matter to the attention of my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) who, I presume, has a word to say in the direction of Le Devoir. My hon. friend does not deny that, I suppose? Does he deny it? I would like to know if my hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) denies having something to say in the direction of Le Devoir newspaper. The reason I insist for an answer is that my hon. friend, not three weeks ago, stated over his own signature, that he was a shareholder of Le Devoir. And I know, as a matter of fact, that his colleague the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) is also a large shareholder of that paper.

Mr. PELLETIER: A shareholder is not a director.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, Sir, when you put your money into an enterprise, you have that enterprise at heart. I know that my hon. friend will not draw many dividends from Le Devoir. He has drawn all the dividends he is likely to get from that source—the sweets of office are his dividends.

We are told that we have a buoyant revenue. It is true, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds), the saint of the Cabinet, the personification of honesty in the Cabinet, seems happy and proud of that buoyant revenue. He reminds me of young Vincent Astor. I read in the newspapers yesterday that young Astor was in receipt of a vast income, the interest on a capital ranging from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000. Suppose that young Astor were to pass along Broadway or Wall street with a smile on his face telling people that he is the happy recipient of that income, the proud possessor of that fortune, and were to take to himself the merit of the acquisition of that fortune, I suppose he would be laughed at by older folks. For everyone knows that he owes it to the bounty of old John Jacob Astor. Might I suggest to my hon. friend, the Astor junior of the Cabinet, that he owes his buoyant revenue, his magnificent income to the hard-working man whose name is synonymous with prosperity, Hon. William Stevens Fielding. My hon. friend is proud of that fortune; he smiles and is happy. So are we. It is our common heritage. But according to his own judgment, at least, according to what he said before the last general election, is he not now using and spending tainted money? Where does that money come from? If he consults the blue books he will find that out of the $50,000,000 or so surplus of this year, $49,177,584.32 comes from the United States. Sir, it is a shock to my loyalty to think that the son of Toronto—Toronto the good, the Mecca of protectionism, the mother of loyalty, where the slogan 'No truck or trade with the Yankees,' was heard during the last elections—I say it is a shock to my loyalty that my hon. friend receives that tainted money and spends it in public works in Macdonald and Richelieu. But my hon. friend, who is a great student, remembers that there is an old English adage, 'Too much of a good thing is good for nothing.' Has not he noticed of late that this great prosperity of the Dominion coincides with an excessively high cost of living? My hon. friend has disclaimed his affiliations with the mergers, trusts and combines, and if that be true I hope that before long there will be a divorce between him and the hon. member who spoke a moment ago. My hon. friend, who thus disclaimed his affiliations with these interests, comes from Toronto—as I stated a moment ago, the Mecca of protectionism, where a gentleman whose name I now forget stated a few years ago that he would like to see our tariffs as high as Haman's gallows. In Toronto my hon. friend hears only one word—protection, and high protection at that. I have just quoted an old English adage, and might I now remind my hon. friend of an old French saying: 'qui n'entend qu'une cloche n'entend qu'un son'—he who hears but one bell hears but one chime. Let him put his ear to the ground and listen to the tale of woe heard in that stronghold of protectionism—Toronto!

I do not suppose my hon. friend reads the Labour Gazette, although it is now edited by a very experienced statesman, my hon. friend the Minister of Labour; but if he would read this publication he would find there some very definite statistics. In case he does not read it, however, let me quote from a speech delivered yesterday by one of the foremost financiers of the Dominion, Mr. Meredith, vice-president of the Bank of Montreal, as reported in the Montreal Star of yesterday. Speaking of the high cost of living, he says:

The increased cost of living, and the reasons therefore form a subject much discussed the world over, and commissions of inquiry are now engaged in seeking the cause. I mention the subject because to its effect on the bank's net earnings, owing to the necessity of our having to increase our fixed charges from time to time as a result of bringing up the salaries of the staff to a point which may be considered a fair and reasonable one for the services rendered. The cause for the enhanced value of all commodities is difficult to determine. There are no doubt a number of reasons for it; among them, the largely increased output of gold, resulting, to a great extent, from the more scientific treatment of ore bodies.

And he goes on to give other reasons. But, Sir, an investigation, has taken place in the city of Toronto at the request of the Toronto Board of Trade. That report which I have in my hands, and which is made by a very able economist—a man I am told of world-wide repute—states that during the eleven years subsequent to 1900 the increase in the price of meat in Canada was 43 per cent; of fish, 37 per cent; of dairy products, 27 per cent; and of the other foodstuffs, 25 per cent.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): What about the United States?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have not the figures relating to the United States.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I would suggest that you look them up.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will look at them. They may be higher there, for there is more protection in the United States, but in that country there has been elected a David who will shortly give some of his views to the Goliath which has kept the American consumers crushed down for the last twenty years.

My hon. friend spoke the other day of the Canadian Courier—a publication which is read in every respectable home of Ontario. I am an Ontario man myself, and I relish the reading of the Canadian Courier. My hon. friend said, 'Oh, it is an obscure paper'. But it is owned by some of my hon. friend's greatest admirers; I am told that it is published under the guidance of Messrs. McKenzie and Mann. Possibly my hon. friend's reference to that paper as being an obscure one is due to the fact that it is a fair paper for both parties. However, perhaps he knows something about Saturday Night, which is published in Toronto. I do not think this is an obscure paper; on the contrary I find it a very illuminative periodical. Commenting on the report prepared by Professor McKenzie, the Toronto Saturday Night says:

That we here in Canada should be paying more for Canadian produce of one sort and another, than is the Englishman for the self same foods, 'is grotesque on the face of it, but nevertheless this is apparently the fact, according to the figures recently published in the London Economist, a journal of authority in the British capital. The very fact that we send our produce over some three thousand miles of water, not to speak of the expenses incurred in putting it aboard ship and taking it out again, and then sell it through a London shop for less money than we pay for the same things in the province in which they are manufactured or raised seems almost unbelievable.

Almost unbelievable—yet it is the baid truth. As one of the causes of the high cost of living, Mr. Meredith mentions the large output of gold, but Professor McKenzie gives one other cause, which we must bring to light,—for the toiling masses of this country will not stand any such tariff or any such prosperity when they pay more for their foodstuffs on this side of the water than our English friends. Let me quote what Professor McKenzie says:

One cause operating in Canada as a whole which permits the prices of foodstuffs to be higher in Canadian cities than in London is the tax levied on imports of food from abroad and paid, of course, by the Canadian consumer. This tax was intended to protect the Canadian farmer in times of Canadian scarcity and to be inoperative in times of Canadian plenty, but the development of the packing and canning industries, coupled with the growth of cold-storage facilities, has made it possible to-day for a group of men to entirely control the prices at which our farmers must sell certain products—nearly all the possible buyers being in the group—and also to maintain the prices at which the consumer must buy the same products up to the level of the foreign price, plus freight, plus duty. We all know how high are the prices of domestic fruits and vegetables, while imported tropical fruits, upon which there is no duty, are said to be as cheap in Toronto as in any other city outside of the tropics. It was never intended that a tax imposed to protect the farmers should be used by dealers to corner domestic produce. If Argentine beef, New Zealand mutton, and Australian butter, for example, had free access to Canada, no one could doubt that the prices of these commodities would at once drop to about the London level, and it is pretty certain that the Canadian producer would, on the average, get at least as much as he is getting now.

That this tax on the importation of food has resulted in raising the price of food to all who live within the taxed area is now clearly seen by the industrial classes of Germany and of Austria, and is apparently becoming obvious even in the United States. In these countries manufacturers and municipal councils are joining forces with the artisans in demanding the removal of the tax on foodstuffs.

Sir, I claim that the trade agreement negotiated two years ago by the Hon. Mr. Fielding and that other stalwart Canadian, Mr. Paterson, was the best means of abolishing all high prices of foodstuffs consumed in Canada. My hon. friend in his reference to reciprocity was, I would not say sneering, but rather contemptuous. He seemed to forget that 616,948 free men, Canadians, British subjects, supported that pact at the elections of 1911. In his attempt to discredit the Fielding-Knox agreement, my hon. friend even delved into history. He reminded the House of what George Brown had said in 1866 when he refused to join the movement in favour of a new reciprocity treaty with the United States at that time. He said that George Brown protested because he would not care to see any Canadian statesman dangling at Washington. My hon. friend reminds me of the historian who wrote the history of France and forgot to mention the name of Bonaparte. He speaks of the George Brown of 1866; surely my hon. friend ought to know that in 1874 the same George Brown went to Washington, the bearer of a mandate from the Canadian people, to obtain a reciprocity treaty from the United States. When my hon. friend frowns down the idea of negotiating a trade arrangement with the United States, he is very severe on the old chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald. Has he forgotten that Sir John A. Macdonald was himself a supporter of reciprocity with the United States? Has he forgotten that the National Policy itself was only the precursor of a reciprocity agreement with the United States? The other day some one on the other side of the House interrupted my friend from Carleton, N. B. (Mr. Carvell) when he was making the argument I was making a moment ago, that if the reciprocity agreement of 1911 had been adopted, foodstuffs would have been cheaper for the Canadian consumer. Some one asked, 'Who pays the duty?' I wish to tell my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and his disciples behind him, that the answer to that query was given by no less an authority than Sir John A. Macdonald himself. Here is what Sir John A. Macdonald said, as reported in 'Hansard' for 1878, page 861: He puts a very concrete case, and the answer is very simple:

I put a case in the Eastern Townships of a man upon the imaginary line which was between this country and the United States. Suppose a man has 100 acres on the Canadian side of the line and 100 acres of land on the American side of the line. Suppose he grows 1,000 bushels of barley on each of his farms. He takes his 1,000 American bushels to the American market and gets one dollar a bushel for it. He takes his 1,000 bushels of Canadian barley to the American market and gets but 85 cents per bushel, because he has to pay 15 per cent. duty for taking it across that imaginary line. How can it, in this case, be said that consumer pays the duty? It comes out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers.

There is the answer given by the old chieftain. But besides the words quoted above, we have the deeds of Sir John A. Macdonald; we have the permanent offer contained in the National Policy of 1879, and if my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would only take the pains to read section 6, chapter 15, of the Act, 42 Victoria, he will find the enumeration of all the articles practically the same as contained in one of the schedules of the reciprocity agreement negotiated two years ago by the Canadian ministers. A reciprocity agreement should not be in the eyes and in the mind of hon. gentlemen opposite, a disloyal act on the part of the Liberal party when in 1911 we were only continuing the policy adopted by the great chieftain of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1878. But there are two kinds of justice in this country, one for the Tories and one for the Liberals. Tories and Toryism all over the Empire, are the embodiment of loyalty. Whigism or Liberalism, be it in Great Britain, or be it in Canada, is the very embodiment of disloyalty, especially when the hon. gentlemen are not too secure in office. Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley, and Sir Charles Tupper were great imperialists. They could negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States, but Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, and the Hon. Mr. Paterson, being Liberals and sane imperialists, are so disloyal to the Crown when they happen to negotiate a similar trade agreement with the United States.

The right hon. the Prime Minister referred to the leader of the Opposition as a scrap-book orator, and he himself concluded his speech by reading a series of extracts. He taunted the hon. leader of the Opposition about his campaign last fall in the province of Ontario, and he stated that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had nailed the reciprocity flag to his mast. I wish that the hon. gentleman could have quoted correctly the language used by the hon. leader of the Opposition. The leader of the Opposition spoke on that vexed question at a banquet which was tendered to him by the Montreal Reformers on the 27th of May last at the Windsor Hotel. He used the following language, and it states exactly the position of the Liberal party in regard to the fiscal policy:

There was before us last year, and there is before us this year this same problem of larger markets. The agreement which we proposed last year would have largely solved that problem, but it was rejected by the Canadian people. I am a constitutionalist, and therefore I have to accept the verdict. However, that problem is still here, just as it was last year. Not only is it still here, but it is more acute than it was last year.

The problem of larger markets is an important problem in the East, but it is more important in the West. Larger markets for the provinces east of Lake Superior are an advantage apparent to everybody, but in the provinces west of Lake Superior—in the prairie provinces, larger markets are an indispensable necessity. How shall I prove it? Let me appeal to your judgment and your experience. We have been pouring population into the western provinces. Every year thousands, and hundreds of thousands of acres of virgin soil are brought under cultivation. Last year the wheat crop fit for human food was about 130,000,000 bushels. This year, if Providence blesses us at all, our wheat crop will be at least 200,000,000 bushels. Where will the crop go?

We know where the crop is going because hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House went this year, as they went last year, hat in hand, begging from the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States, the privilege of sending our wheat in American cars and American bottoms through American ports. Does the problem still exist? I have not here the words—the weighty words—spoken last year before the Canadian Club in Montreal by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett); but if I remember well, that hon. gentleman prophesied that if relief were not given to the western growers there would be secession by the West from the East. This language was used by one of the supporters of my right hon. friend opposite, a gentleman who aspires, and rightly so, to become a member of the Imperial House of Commons.

I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance must read very assiduously the articles which are published monthly in that gospel of the manufacturers, Industrial Canada. If he wants to know whether the problem still exists in the West, as was stated by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition at the Windsor Hotel banquet and during his campaign last fall in the province of Ontario, he has only to read the report made to the Manufacturers' Association at Toronto by Mr. Frank Beer, in the month of May last. It is published in the August number of Industrial Canada. Mr. Frank Beer was the president of the Toronto branch of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and he stated:

The one event of outstanding importance since our last annual meeting was the federal election which resulted in the downfall of the Government upon the issue of reciprocity. It would be useless to attempt to disguise the fact that Alberta and Saskatchewan are keenly disappointed over the failure to obtain access to the larger markest of the Uuited States, and so long as that feeling of disappointment prevails it cannot be said that reciprocity is dead. Nor can we afford to close our eyes to the fact that the provinces mentioned feel aggrieved with us in the East for the part we played in thwarting their desire. No amout of specious argument or flag waving will allay that feeling or satisfy the West that it has not been robbed.

That is the language, not of a disgruntled or disloyal Grit, but it is the language of the president of the Toronto branch of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. He states that the westerners feel that they have been robbed of their market in the United States.

I now come to the amendment moved by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. There were disclosures after the elections in Macdonald and Richelieu which, I thought, might perhaps affect the apparent tranquility and serenity of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government. When these disclosures were made in this House by the affidavits read by the hon. member for Edmonton, I thought that his eyes would dart reproof. I thought that the right hon. gentleman would remember the Halifax platform, that he would remember the denunciations which he hurled from this side of the House when he was himself leader of the Opposition, about the electoral corruption that the Liberal party, in his judgment, was guilty of in those days. No, Mr. Speaker, he used the old tu quoque argument. But, I must tell the right hon. gentleman that more is expected of him. His own high reputation, his very position as Prime Minister of the premier colony of the Empire, compel him to frown down such electoral methods. Why, Sir, what is the origin of the word 'franchise?' It means freedom—freedom for the elector to elect a representative and if that freedom is denied to the elector and if the Prime Minister of Canada would simply say: 'Well, you did the same thing,' I reply that such an argument is beneath the dignity of the Prime Minister and that it is not in accordance with the policy which he preached on this side of the House.

I see my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) in his seat. He has been on the bench for fifteen years. He has administered justice in the province of Quebec and he is now occupying the highest post in connection with the administration of justice in Canada. He is himself the worthy son of a worthy sire who was a judge for many years in Montreal. How does he regard the methods of Judge McMicken in Winnipeg? What has he to say about the actions of Judge McMicken? Mr. Speaker, if I cannot appeal to my hon. friend as Minister of Justice, or to his better instincts as a judge in the old days, might I suggest to him to read the memorable words of one of his own countrymen, probably the most eloquent of modern orators? Let me refresh his memory. Let him read the words of his eminent fellow-countryman, Sheridan, who, on the celebrated trial of Warren Hastings, in defining what British justice is, used this language:

> It is not the portentous phantom of despair it is not like any fabled monster, formed in the eclipse of reason and found in some unhallowed grave of superstitious darkness and political dismay! No my Lord!
> In the happy reverse of all these, I turn from this disgusting carricature to the real image Justice I have now before me august and pure; the abstract idea of all that would be perfect in the spirit and the aspiring of men!—where the mind rises, where the heart expands; where the countenance is over placid and benign; where his favourite attitude is to stoop to the unfortunate—to hear their cry and to help them,—to rescue and relieve, to succor and to save:—majestic from its mercy; venerable from its utility—uplifted without pride—firm without obduracy—beneficent in each preference—lovely though in her frown.
> On that justice I rely; deliberate and sure —abstracted from all party purpose and political speculations!

That is the image of British justice as defined by that great Irish orator, and my wish is that the Minister of Justice, who is a staunch Irishman, although he belongs to the Tory party, would live up to the spirit of justice as defined by his great compatriot. Sir, we are advertising Canada in the old country, we are asking immigrants to settle our vast domain west of Lake Superior, and when they come here they expect that in this British country they will find the image of British justice set up for veneration. Have they found in the jails of Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie the image of British justice? The Minister of Justice may smile, the Minister of Justice may ignore the amendment which has been placed before the House, and while the people of this country may forget and forgive many things, yet, when it comes to an attack on the liberty of the British subject, the people of Canada, French, English, Irish and Scotch, will never forget and never forgive.

I have listened to the harangue delivered by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rudolphe Forget) and I may say I am not surprised at all at the manner in which he spoke of his dealings, his plannings, and his schemings, in the Richelieu election. The hon. member for Charlevoix said that he was no proxy to the Minister of Public Works or to any other minister. It is a very strange thing that when the Liberal party fights in an election, as the Liberal party fought in the county of Richelieu, none of the ministers who represent the Quebec wing in the Cabinet appeared on the platform. Mr. Monk did not appear in the election, the Postmaster General did not appear in election, the Minister of Inland Revenue did not appear in that election, but they sent the noble knight, the member for Charlevoix and Montmorency, who usually never takes part in politics—he is too busy at other things just now. But, in Richelieu he was there the representative of the Quebec wing in the Government. I will repeat word for word what was reported in La Patrie, a newspaper which is inspired by the hon. member for Charlevoix and Montmorency which takes his special defence just now in many things, which is the organ of the Quebec wing of the Borden Government in the district of Montreal. La Patrie stated that on the eve of the election in Richelieu, and at one other meeting before that, the hon. gentleman had appeared on the platform and had used in substance the following words: 'Gentlemen, you have an election at present in this constituency; the Government candidate is Mr. Morgan, my bosom friend; the Opposition candidate Mr. Cardin. I have spent the evening last night with Mr. Rogers the Minister of Public Works, and I am authorized to inform you gentlemen, that if you will vote for Mr. Morgan, and elect him, you will get that marine railway and I take the pledge, that if this amount is not put in the estimates during the next session Mr. Morgan will resign as your member.' My hon. friend has the audacity to say that this is not a threat, that this is not intimidation. Is conscience a blank with the hon. gentleman? I say it is the worst perversion of the election law. I am not surprised, Sir, at the language of the hon. gentleman; I am not surprised at his taking part in an election contest just now—he needs the Government just now. We have never before seen the hon. member for Charlevoix taking part in an election; we hardly saw him in this House during two Parliaments; he was not in politics, he was in business. But there are people who say that there is a very obvious reason why the hon. gentleman should try to prove his influence in the county of Richelieu, and in the province of Quebec generally, so as to get as much as possible the favour of the Government. The hon. gentleman (Sir Rodolphe Forget) is in straits at the present time.

Mr. CARVELL: What kind?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, it will come out during this session and the members who cheered a moment ago will then understand why the hon. gentleman is ready to eat humble pie and to swallow what he said during the Richelieu election in order to enjoy the good graces of the Minister of Public Works. A very respectable paper, an independent Liberal paper, the Montreal Witness——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend deny that? Is not the Montreal Witness one of the most respectable papers published in Canada? I know of no more respectable paper. I am a Roman Catholic; it is a stern and unbending Protestant organ, but I know of no paper of such honesty of purpose as the Montreal Witness. It stated the other day the following, and thus you will understand how my hon. friend is ready to acquiesce with and to stand as bondsman for the hon. the Minister of Public Works:

> The statement is made on very good authority that the bond interest on the Quebec railway, light, heat and power bonds, due December 1st, will be paid, and that all arrangements in this connection have been completed.
> There has been doubt regarding the company's ability to pay its bond interest, but it is understood that Sir Rodolphe Forget has arranged the necessary financing to pay the interest.
> Such a stand was adopted because it was felt that by the time the next bond interest was due, arrangements would have been completed regarding the assistance the Government is going to lend the Quebec and Saguenay line.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: I deny that absolutely in toto; the Quebec railway will pay its own interest.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I declare from my seat in this House that the Quebec and Saguenay railway is a bankrupt concern at present.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: Do not call it the Quebec and Saguenay; call it the Quebec railway.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is pending in the courts of Quebec an action amounting to $800,000 against the Quebec and Saguenay railway. It is well known; my hon. friend knows it, so do the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General, and no man knows it better than the Minister of Public Works, that the hon. member for Charlevoix is dangling around the minister's offices to get a guarantee of bonds in order to relieve the unfortunate French investors who were caught in that enterprise.

Mr. CARVELL: The engineers have not been paid.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, do not have any fear, the hon. member for Charlevoix will engineer that probably if we have another by-election. I would warn the right hon. the Prime Minister, in whose honesty I believe, to be careful—yes, to be doubly careful. We know what influences are at work at present to obtain from this Government a guarantee of bonds for the Quebec and Saguenay railway. I warn the right hon. gentleman that not only from Canada, but from Paris, from France, investors are watching events just now.

The hon. the Minister of Finance, seems to be aggrieved because forsooth, a reference was made to the cut in the cement duty. As Liberals we do not object to the reduction, in fact, we favour the reduction of the cement duty. I, for one, would be ready to wipe out the duty altogether. The hon. gentleman, however, must know that we are rather suspicious of a cement cut announced by my good friend, the Minister of Public Works, in that smooth language of his, at a banquet held in Regina, a few hours after the Order in Council has been passed, and just on the eve of the Saskatchewan elections. We object to that. It is disgracing Canadian politics to insinuate, to whisper to the electors that if they do the right thing they will get tariff reductions. Nobody accuses the Minister of Finance, in whose sterling honesty we all believe, of being a party to such a crime, but as long as men have the brazen effrontery to parade before the Parliament of Canada their corruption, I tell the hon. Minister of Finance that the people will not stand for such tariff tinkering.

But, Sir, in addition to the cement cut for the West, there was another cut engineered by my hon. friend, the Postmaster General, just on the eve of the Quebec elections, following the same methods. It was not a cut in cement; it was a cut on the Quebec rock. Here is a paper which my hon. friend owns and inspires, and when I want to know something of Cabinet secrets I read L'Evenement. The Quebec elections took place, as my hon. friend will remember, on the 15th of May. Surely he has not forgotten that date. On the 6th of May, L'Evenement reported a speech delivered by my hon. friend at Jeune Lorette. That is where my hon.

friend's leader, Mr. Armand Lavergne, delivered a speech the other day. My hon. friend said, just before the election, in order to get the votes of Quebec :

> We shall make a cut. We shall tunnel Cape Diamond, in order to reach the heart of Quebec.

For a practical man like the Postmaster General, a heart is much needed. He did not find the heart of Quebec, and nobody talks now of a cut in the rock of Quebec, or of a tunnel under Cape Diamond. Will my hon. friends, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, be surprised if we are suspicious as to the honesty of purpose of the Government, when, just on the eve of the Saskatchewan elections it reduced the cement duty, and when the tunnelling of Cape Diamond is announced just nine days before the elections there. This is corruption, and once more I say to my hon. friend the Prime Minister, that he will have to live up to the principles he preached while in opposition, and a searching investigation will have to be made as regards Richelieu and Macdonald, or else he will lose the respect of the independent electors in this country.

Just a word about the naval policy. I have nothing to add to what has been so forcibly said by the speakers on this side of the House, and notably by the leader of the Opposition. I do not know what the policy of the Government will be. We are told, however, that an emergency contribution will be asked from this Parliament. If there is an emergency, I for one will do my duty towards the Mother Country and the Empire. But, what is ' an emergency ?' Webster is my friend, Mr. Speaker, and I look to Webster when I am embarrassed with an English expression. I look to Webster to find out what an emergency is, and here is what my old friend says :

> Emergency; a sudden or unexpected appearance; an unforeseen occurrence; a sudden occasion; a pressing necessity; an exigency.

If my hon. friend is able to establish before this House and the country that there is an unforeseen occurrence, a sudden occasion, a pressing necessity, an exigency, I for one, as a Canadian and as a British subject, am ready to do my duty toward the Mother Country. And not only shall I do my duty, but the Liberal party will do its duty. Let me remind the ' Jingo ' press that there is no monopoly of loyalty in this country or within the Empire, and nobody will be stampeded by any cry of 'Emergency,' if it does not really exist. We are free British subjects; we have free parliamentary institutions; and before voting the millions of this Dominion, we shall want to know why.

My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who spoke so eloquently the other day—in fact so eloquently that surely he should occupy one of the front benches in this House—asked himself—as though he did not know it at all—if it were true that some people had stated in the province of Quebec that Canada owed nothing to England. I can assure my hon. friend that, as a matter of fact, this very disloyal, this very unpatriotic statement was made. And made by whom? Made by his leaders, by the gentlemen who represent the Nationalist wing in the present Government. And I may add, the Liberals in the province of Quebec suffered defeat in twenty or twenty-one counties because they thought it more patriotic to educate the masses to their duties towards the British Crown than to have recourse to demagogic appeals in the province of Quebec. In that campaign of education I am sorry to say the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government was found wanting. He, as leader of the great Conservative party—the party so ably described by my hon. friend the 'nouveau riche of Chambly Verchères,' as the party of Macdonald and Cartier—came to Quebec during the last general election. He knew the vicious campaign carried on by his neighbour the present Postmaster General. He knew the language used by the former Minister of Public Works. He knew the literature sent all over Canada, wherever a French settlement existed in Ontario, in Manitoba or the Western provinces. He probably knew also that my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), a stout imperialist, a jingo of the jingoes, had paid the postage of Le Devoir at the Montreal post office to spread that literature among the French speaking electors of Canada. And the right hon. gentleman did not care to stop that nationalist education given to the French Canadian electorate of this country. The Nationalist wing of the Cabinet, had but one slogan in that campaign amongst the French electors. It was: No navy! no contribution! we owe nothing to England! The present Minister said: ' There is a deep laid plot, gentlemen of the French race, there is a dark conspiracy amongst Laurier, Borden and Lord Grey, to benefit England at Canada's expense.' And the shouters and the shriekers were the men who are now in the coalition Government, the allies of the right hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. LAMARCHE: If my hon. friend will allow me to ask him a question—

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend was one of the worst in the county of Nicolet.

Mr. LAMARCHE: I would ask this: When he says that in the province of Quebec some of the so-called Nationalists said that we owed nothing to England, were they using their own words or were they repeating certain words spoken by the late Sir Richard Cartwright, a member of the Liberal party?

Mr. LEMIEUX: If there are fools who believe that the gallant old knight of Oxford could utter so disloyal a sentiment, I pity them. The hon. gentleman is there using half a phrase—which makes half a lie, which is worse than a lie. He is using half of a sentence which I have just read in the 'Reminiscences' of Sir Richard Cartwright, as they insidiously used half a sentence from the speech made by the hon. Mr. Fielding in the naval debate. The hon. gentleman, I say, was one of the worst, but far less guilty in my judgment than the Postmaster General, who had been a Minister of the Crown in the province of Quebec, and as such had taken the oath of office and sworn loyalty to His Majesty. He argued, and they argued, in the province of Quebec that according to Mr. Fielding: 'Laurier's navy will be Canadian in time of peace, but Imperial in time of war.' And they added: 'Poor mothers, in the dead of night your children will be snatched away from your homes and carried afar to the seas of China and Japan,—indeed, to all the seven seas where Britain dominates; and your children will be killed for a flag which is not their own and for a cause which they ignore.'

Sir, we will have a naval debate, and we will know how many of the gentlemen who jetisonned their principles for office how many will have the courage to repeat what they said during that campaign in the province of Quebec.

I have a few clippings in my possession; I need not use them. The time has come to stamp out the disloyalty cry in this country. The words spoken in Parliament are heard all over Canada. The language used by the Postaster General, the former Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Inland Revenue, the new Secretary of State, and all those other gentlemen who were elected as members of the Nationalist party in Quebec, could not be repeated before such an assembly of free men as is gathered here to-day. Let me tell my eloquent friend from Kingston, that we, the 'disloyal', we the old Rouge party in the province of Quebec, fought the demagogues. Mr. Speaker, you have long been a member of this House, and you know that this was manifested on many occasions—not by blatant jingoism, not by words of mouth, but by deeds. Canadian Liberal imperialism manifested itself in this country when our ancestors of the Reform party fought for responsible government; when George Brown and Alexanderr Mackenzie advocated confederation; when the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, for the first time in the history of Canada, gave Great Britain a trade preference; when Liberalism took over the garrisons of Esquimalt and Halifax; when we gladly gave our co-operation to the fighting forces of Great Britain in South Africa; when the right hon. gentleman, attending the conferences of the Empire in London, obtained, through his wise statesmanship, an equal status for all the colonies, and, finally, when, in spite of the wild appeals made to passions and prejudices, he gave Great Britain a Canadian navy—a navy to be built in Canada, to be manned by Canadian sailors, to fly the Canadian flag, and to be ready to respond to the call whenever the Empire would be in danger. I will not quote from the remarks of the right hon. gentleman, for I find that a speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is still more pointed, and brings out in a more concrete way the principles of the Laurier navy—the tin-pot navy, as my hon. friends are wont to say. When the resolution of March, 1909, was introduced in the House, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce delivered what I consider to be one of the masterpieces of Canadian eloquence. He said ('Hansard,' 1909, vol. 2, page 3406):

> The interest that we take in a contribution spent by another is not the interest that I desire for Canada. I want to see something grafted on the soil of Canada's nationhood which takes root and grows and develops until it incites the spirit of defence in this country, leads to a participation in the defence, leads to that quick interest in it, its glories, its duties, and its accomplished work, which is, after all, the one great thing that compensates a people for great expenditures either on land or on sea in the way of defence, and of the maintenance of the rights of the country. . . The first Canadian-owned vessel, built and equipped in Britain, and sent out to defend our coasts, would become the nucleus and the training ground of Canadian stokers, Canadian sailors, and Canadian officers, and bye and bye perhaps of a Canadian admiral on the Canadian coast. How much time would be spent in completing that circle none of us can say, but if we begin the tracing of it and follow it fairly and faithfully the time must come when we get a complete circle and have an Imperial adjunct to the British navy for the defence of Canada and the defence of the Empire in which Canada has some of her body, her bones, her blood, and her mental power, her national pride.

This is the best argument that was ever offered for the policy of a Canadian navy.

Mr. Speaker, let me say one word to my hon. friend the member for Kingston, and let that word be repeated in the press of this country; let it be heard throughout Canada, and, if it be not too presumptuous of me to say so, throughout the British Empire. The French-Canadians are willing nay, are anxious, that Great Britain should have and maintain her naval supremacy. It is essential to Canada, and perhaps more so to Quebec, for reasons that I will give later on. Great Britain's difficulties are not Quebec's opportunities; on the contrary, Great Britain's difficulties would be Quebec's difficulties; Britain's trials would be Quebec's trials. That is the reason why the members of the French-Canadian Liberal party, knowing what liberties they enjoy under the British flag, are willing to give men and money in order to maintain, unimpaired, Great Britain's naval supremacy on the seven seas.

Mr. NICKLE: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he suggests that I cast even a shadow of suspicion, in respect to their loyalty, upon the French-Canadian people, or if I expressed in any way the belief that there would be the slightest hesitancy on their part to do their duty to Canada and the Empire?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hasten to accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman——

Mr. NICKLE: I am making no explanation; I am asking a question.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I accept, without any discussion, the words of my hon. friend; but he mentioned something in his speech which in my judgment required an explanation from me. He mentioned that he had heard some one suggest that we owed nothing for England. I did not say that my hon. friend had charged this side of the House with that unpatriotic sentiment. I am explaining to the hon. gentleman that he made use of such words in the campaign of 1911.

Mr. NICKLE: I rise to a question of privilege. If the hon. gentleman intends to quote me, he must quote me correctly. I am reported in 'Hansard' as saying:

> Another point is raised. They tell me that if the policy of the right hon. leader of the Government prevails we shall divide Canada into two parts, that we shall have Quebec on the one hand and the English speaking provinces on the other. I cannot believe these foretellers of such dire forebodings.
> My mind goes back in history to the time when, in 1775, the revolting American colonies used every wile to win the French-Canadians from their allegiance to the British Crown; my memory goes back through history to the war of 1812, when French-Canadian blood watered the lower provinces for the maintenance of British supremacy; history tells us how, in 1840, the French-Canadian people, more numerous then than the people of Upper Canada, threw in their lot with us for a united parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. NICKLE: I am on my feet on a question of privilege. I submit that if I am to be quoted it is my right to be quoted as I spoke.

Mr. CARVELL: Read the other part.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might I suggest the sentence he used, 'We owe nothing to England.' That will explain what I have just stated. I have accepted the explanation of my hon. friend.

Mr. NICKLE: I have no recollection of ever using the words, 'We owe nothing to England.' If the hon. gentleman can find it in my speech, I would be very glad if he would point it out. Now that I am on my feet, if my point is well taken, I desire to continue my quotation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order, Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is a question of privilege, I must tell hon. members that I see no question of privilege.

Mr. NICKLE: Then I rise to a point of order. If I am to be quoted, I must be quoted as I spoke.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have accepted the explanation of the hon. gentleman. If I am mistaken—

Mr. NICKLE: Will you please give your ruling, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: I see no point of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. the Minister of Finance, was very gloomy as to the future of the Liberal party. He said that we had many more sorrows to face, that we must stay five, ten, fifteen, or perhaps twenty years, in opposition. Might I suggest to my hon. friend that he might read one of Mirabeau's speeches, in which he said that the Capitol was not far from the Tarpeian Rock. We have seen parties, quite as strong as the Conservative party, remain in office just long enough to show the people how inconsistent they were. But since my hon. friend is making predictions, let me remind him that in our judgment we have a good cause and a great leader. We have a good cause just as the Liberals in England had in the 70's after their defeat, and we have a Canadian Gladstone at our head. Last fall after a meeting at Woodstock, where five overflow meetings had to be held in order to let the hon. leader of the Opposition speak to the masses of the people who had congregated, the Mail and Empire suggested to its readers that if so many thousand people had gathered at Woodstock, it was, forsooth, because the people of Ontario, being very generous, wanted to see the old man for the last time. This was said of Gladstone when he started the famous and classical campaign of Midlothian, and we know what the result was in 1880; he disrupted and disbanded the Tory party in England, as the Tory party in Canada will be disrupted and disbanded at the next general election. Let me recall to my hon. friend the words of Gladstone during that campaign; they are of application to the present circumstances:

We can not reckon on the wealth of the country, nor upon the rank of the country, nor upon the influence which rank and wealth usually bring. In the main, these powers are against us, for wherever there is a close corporation, wherever there is a spirit of organized monopoly, whenever there is a narrow and sectional interest apart from that of the country, and desiring to be set up against the interest of the public, there, gentlemen, we, the Liberal party have no friendship and no tolerance to expect. Above all these, and behind all these, there is something greater than these—there is the nation itself.

Before resuming my seat, I would like to answer my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I read in 'Hansard,' at page 26, the following words which he used in his speech:

If I understand correctly the spirit and intention of the Canadian people, they are determined that their nationalism will never rest on the will and favour of any foreign power. The critics again say that we owe no duty to England because she has not been fair in diplomacy.

He says that of the Nationalists in the province of Quebec.

Mr. NICKLE: Mr. Speaker, I rise——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. NICKLE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has directed a question to me, and I believe it is my privilege to reply. I said, 'the critics say,' I did not say 'the Nationalists say.'

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who are they?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is exactly what was being said in the province of Quebec by my hon. friends the Postmaster General, the Minister of Inland Revenue, the Secretary of State, the member for Dorchester, the member for Chambly-Verchéres, and by all the Nationalists.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. RAINVILLE: I rise to a point of order. If the hon. member will point out to me, even in a newspaper, that I ever said that we owed nothing to England, I am going to resign.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Other hon. MEMBERS: You are afraid.

Mr. MARTIN (Montreal, St. Mary's): Give us what he did say.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Fortunately I have witht me the gospel of nationalism Le Nationaliste reproducing word for word, several speeches delivered by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères.

An hon. MEMBER: Let him resign.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We have not had many resignations, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid that this House will be depleted, and that the majority of this coalition Government will dwindle down to very little if they all resign when we have read their speeches. Le Nationaliste, the organ of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères, the organ of the hon. Postmaster General, the gospel of the rebels in the province of Quebec, reports the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères, as saying:

Would it not be better to use our money to open new railways, to work for colonization, to open the Georgian Bay canal, to equip the harbours of Montreal, Sorel, Quebec, St. John and elsewhere, before deciding this great problem? The Government must submit it to the people.

On the 21st of August, the hon. gentleman said:

Why has Mr. Borden allied himself with Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that question as on many others? The leader of the Opposition at Ottawa—the right hon Mr. Borden, the leader of the Government to-day, is the mascot of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Each time that the Prime Minister (referring to Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—has a 'mauvais coup'—a bad trick—to play, he uses Mr. Borden, and Mr. Borden goes willingly to his assistance.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Who said that?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres, the hon. gentleman who is anxious to resign, the hon. gentleman who said that we owe nothing to England. We remember the song, 'Britons never shall be slaves.' Listen to this, on the 11th of September, 1911, just ten days before polling day. The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères was speaking at Boucherville with that rebel, Armand Lavergne, the gentleman who is trying to raise civil war in Canada, according to the Postmaster General:

I have told myself——

He was speaking to himself, soliloquising.

—that I would not enter the House of Commons like a slave. I have too much heart for that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On the 21st February, 1910, he used the following language:

During the past century the race for armaments has gone on until it has reached the epidemic stage in Europe. The people are being ruined to feed soldiers and to maintain vessels. If the United States wanted Canada thy would only have to take it and I believe—I suspect—that England would allow the United States to take Canada without saying anything. Invariably——

I call the attention of the hon. member for Kingston, to this:

Invariably the United States have obtained what they have asked for, and our rights have always been sacrificed by the Mother Country.

My hon. friend was right in stating that somebody had said that we owed nothing to England. Of course, that somebody was the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres. I said a moment ago that the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche) was the worst, but the first prize is due to the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres. Of course, the grand laurels, the gold medal must be bestowed upon the hon. Postmaster General. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We have many more such statements, but I shall not read them to the House.

Mr. RAINVILLE: I have already said, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman was in Richelieu.

Mr. RAINVILLE——that I never used such language as that which has been attributed to me.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman is quite happy, I am sure.

Mr. RAINVILLE——and I ask the hon. gentleman to take it back.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If I have to take it back I will have to tear the Nationaliste, the hon. gentleman's gospel into shreds.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Never.

Mr. RAINVILLE: I ask that the hon. member take those words back; they are unfair to me.

Mr. PELLETIER: I think, Mr. Speaker, the best course to adopt under the circumstances of such a speech as the one we have just heard——

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was an emergency.

Mr. PELLETIER: After the accusations which the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has made against some of his colleagues in this House——

Mr. LEMIEUX: No; recollections, you mean.

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the hon. gentleman just wait a few minutes? I understand he is labouring under some irritation, and no one can be surprised at that, under the circumstances, but I think he should be——

Mr. LEMIEUX: Smiling.

Mr. PELLETIER: Well, he is smiling apparently; but he is always sore and bitter. If he will try to follow what I am going to say for a few minutes, I think he will have reason to tender apologies to the members of this House against whom he has made accusations. We have heard the hon. member for Rouville say he could prove to my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Rainville) that he had used the words that were attributed to him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let the hon. gentleman wait for a few minutes. He was not interrupted; he was listened to in the most civil and courteous manner, and I tell him that he has got to be courteous and civil to hon. members on this side of the House. He is the only one since this debate began who has chosen to make personal accusations against his fellow members, and if he chooses to adopt such a position in this House, and to indulge in vituperation, he must expect that he is going to get an answer but in a more dignified manner.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, what is the point of order?

Mr. PELLETIER: I will ask the hon. gentleman to keep silent and wait until I have finished what I have to say.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not be long.

Mr. PELLETIER: He is bound by the rules of the House, just as every other member is, but he is so sore and bitter that he cannot bow to the rules, and so, Mr. Speaker, we will have to ask you to remind him of his duty.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The cement duty.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rules forbid any hon. member to interrupt a member addressing the House.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member for Rouville stated that the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères had used the words, 'We owe nothing to England.'

Mr. LEMIEUX: He said worse than that.

Mr. PELLETIER: I trust the hon. member will understand his position, and follow the ruling which the Speaker has just given.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He said worse than that.

Mr. PELLETIER: When the hon. member made the accusation, a denial was made by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères, and the hon. member for Rouville was obliged by the rules of this House and by the rules of honour to accept the statement made by the hon. member. The hon. member for Rouville has chosen to ignore the rules of the House and the rules of honour, and so the people of the country will know what kind of a debate we have in this House when the hon. member is on his feet, and will be able to compare his conduct with that of other hon. members in that respect. The hon. member for Rouville undertook to prove his assertion, and in order to prove it, he read to this House words which did not give a tittle of evidence for his assertion. The hon. member should be manly enough to withdraw the accusation he has made against the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères. However, he has told us that he would not do it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I never said that.

Mr. PELLETIER: Well, perhaps the hon. gentleman did not say it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I said worse than that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER: What is the matter with these hon. gentlemen opposite? I am anxious to pay them as many compliments as they deserve, but we are now witnessing a very remarkable thing. A member sitting on the front benches on the other side of the House accuses another hon. member, and undertakes to prove his accusation, but cannot do so, and then refuses to follow his plain duty and withdraw the accusation, and his friends in this House pound their desks. It is just as well that the House and the country should know that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are guilty of such conduct.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this debate has been a prolonged one, but it has been of use in the sense that after several ineffectual attempts had been made to ascertain what was the political programme of the Liberal party, we at last succeeded in understanding it somewhat. The Minister of Finance tried to learn from hon. gentlemen opposite what was their policy on reciprocity, but these gentlemen, while the Minister of Finance spoke, had not made up their minds whether they were or were not still in favour of reciprocity, and so they could not answer. A few days later the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) tried the same experiment, and again hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House could not give an answer. Finally, they anticipated that the question would be put once more, and they evidently met in the meantime to consider it, and to come to a conclusion. Then when the hon. member for Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler) put the question direct to them, he at last succeeded in having hon. gentlemen opposite declare that they were one and all in favour of reciprocity, although the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) had declared last session that reciprocity was dead and buried.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I rise to a point of order? I did say last session that in my opinion reciprocity was dead, and I think at that time I spoke correctly, but no one has ever questioned where I stood on the principle. I have never changed my opinion; I did not change it then. What I meant at the time, and I think I so stated, was that it was not an immediate issue before the people, and that the immediate issue was then the question of the navy. There never has been any doubt where I stood on reciprocity; I am for it now as much as I ever was.

Mr. PELLETIER: I stated that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) had said——

Mr. LEMIEUX: Take it back.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is nothing to take back. I stated that the hon. member for South Wellington declared during last session that reciprocity was dead, and the hon. member now stands up and admits that he said so, and there is nothing to take back.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not ask my hon. friend to take anything back; I merely made an explanation of what I said, and I think it is a reasonable explanation.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then I am right as to what the hon. member said?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Certainly, I said that.

Mr. PELLETIER: If we agree, then, there is nothing to take back.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Nothing. I do not want you to take back anything. I only wanted to explain.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) wants me to take back my statement, because he wants someone to be in the same bad fix as he is in himself; but, as the hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) himself admits, I have nothing to take pack.

As to the amendment which is now before the House, it seems to me that it is a matter for a judicial inquiry, and that the statements made here can be nothing else than ex parte statements upon which this House cannot pass judgment. There is, however, an amusing feature in connection with this amendment. We are told that the Richelieu election was a corrupt election, and a great fuss is made about it, and the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and the hon. members who sit behind him have used some harsh terms in connection with it; but these hon. gentlemen have forgotten to tell the House that the by election in Richelieu was caused by the very fact that their own supporter, who was returned at the general election, had to admit before the court that his election was brought about by corruption, and he had to resign his seat because his election was secured by corrupt means. They condemn what they claim to have been corrupt practices by our side in the last election. But what took place in the general election, so grave and so bad, that the hon. member had to resign his seat before any evidence was put in, is as white, as pure and as immaculate as it can be. My hon. friends do not suppose for one moment that they are going to get the country to believe all that. We are told that a marine railway was promised in Sorel, but the idea that it is bad for a member of the House of Commons to go to a constituency and promise a great public work, has come to the minds of my hon. friends only quite recently. During the last fifteen years of the Liberal regime in the province of Quebec—I do not know about the other provinces—there has not been one election, general election or by-election, which the party in power has not tried to carry by promising some important public work. That is a matter of public notoriety. I will take just one case in point. There are members on the other side of the House, who feel very much scandalized at this sort of thing, but who have gone to their constituents declaring that unless they voted for the Laurier candidate, they would not get a certain railway, but if they did vote for that candilate, they would get that railway. Now, is that bad or good? Let the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) answer that question for one. At one time a man was disqualified by the courts in the province of Quebec for having made a promise of a great public improvement. This was the first jurisprudence we had in our Quebec courts. That jurisprudence has been since set aside, and it has been declared by the courts that if a man went into a constituency and promised, not to this, that or the other elector, but promised in a general way, the building of a great public enterprise, this was not a corrupt practice which would disqualify any man running in any election in any county in the Dominion of Canada. Now, where is the crime? The hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) has fully explained that long before there was any question of an election; the then Minister of Public Works, Mr. Monk, went about Sorel, and if he told the people of Sorel that he was in favour of building the marine railway, surely there was no crime in repeating what was said by him before the election, as my hon. friends on the other side of the House would like to represent before the country. It is a tempest in a teapot, because my honourable friends on the other side of the House have found nothing more to say against the policy of the present Government.

In this great debate on the Address, the Liberal party should have been in a position to come before the country and before the House of Commons, and put in your hands, Mr. Speaker, an amendment declaring what their policy is on this, that and other great questions, but we have only soreness and bitterness, because they have been badly beaten in Macdonald, and because their majority has been reduced by five hundred votes in Richelieu. That is the sole reason for this amendment. What great principles of policy our friends have, we do not know yet. They have found during the last few days that they are still in favour of reciprocity. We have no desire to take it away from them. If they choose to have a corpse in their political programme, let them have it and enjoy it; but they will see whither it will lead them. I have no doubt it is with the greatest hesitation that some of our friends on the other side of the House have been obliged to accept what probably the majority of the Liberal caucus has decided on, because there are men on that side of the House who would like to get rid of reciprocity.

An hon. MEMBER: Not one.

Mr. PELLETIER: Our friends on the Liberal side have always placed great hopes in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. One of them they claim has unfurled the flag of reciprocity, even in a provincial election, and, owing to that, the majority of the Liberal caucus have decided, probably to the great displeasure of many of them, that reciprocity should be kept. We know where we are, and we know where our friends are. Reciprocity has been a dead issue for a long time. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has tried to resuscitate it in Macdonald. He has had his answer there; and in every county in this Dominion, when the question is known, as it is becoming better known day after day, the members of the Liberal party who have tried to prevent this reciprocity plank from remaining in their platform, will be in a position to tell the member for Edmonton that he was the cause of the great mistake which has put our friends in the position they are in now.

I have been told by the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), who has peculiar ways of his own in interpreting public actions and public speeches, that I am responsible for what a newspaper in Montreal says, because, forsooth, I happen to be, or have been, one of the shareholders of that paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I did not say 'have been;' I said 'to be.'

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. gentleman pointed his hand at me and said: 'You, Sir, are responsible for that.' This is the first time in my life that I have heard any man, who does not want to appeal to prejudice, and who wants to respect what should be respected, tell a shareholder in a company: 'Sir, you are not a director in that company, you are only a humble shareholder; but you are to be held responsible for all that paper publishes, even if its views do not agree with your own.' I shall not make a speech in order to try to destroy that argument; it is self destructive. I think that the member for Rouville has found out since the last election that a great many people do not admire his ways of discussing matters before this House; and the only thing I will say on this point is that sometimes it is beneath the dignity of a member of this House to go as low as he does. I am very sorry indeed that the hon. member for Rouville thinks that I have tried to be as big a man as he has been himself, or as he thinks he is now, by doing something in the way of reduction in cable rates, and he says: 'You are borrowing our feathers.' I can tell the hon. member that I am not going to do that, either to-day, to-morrow or at any other time. But the member for Rouville is a great laudator temporis acti. Whatever good has been accomplished has not been accomplished by this Government, but we will have to thank him for it. For anything good in the past or anything good in the future, every member of this House will have to pass before the member for Rouville, and say: 'I have not done that; it is good, but you, the great man who sits for Rouville are the cause of all the good that is done in this country.'

It is because of the hon. gentleman's influence that, last summer, we succeeded in getting further reductions in the cable rates. He ceased to be a member of the Government in October last, and we got a reduction in August of this year. And the hon. member for Rouville says: I did it; I am the big man; I am the sole inspirer of this policy; my powerful influence remains even after I have left the department, and, though I am absent, it is my influence that brings about all these big things. Surely, a man who is as big as that has the right to accuse anyone and not prove his case and yet not take back his accusation. A man so great is not to be treated as a common man. As this Government goes on and accomplishes more and more for the people of Canada, we shall, no doubt, feel constrained to come to the House and ask for money to erect a statue to the hon. member for Rouville in commemoration of what we have done. Oh, we will treat him fairly. There is not even a Laurier any more, but the great man from Rouville is the only one who is doing all these fine things. And he takes no little trouble to tell the country all about it. I wonder if it is because he thinks the country will find it hard to believe. I am not going into vituperation about this; but it is well that we should try to size up the hon. gentleman, to prevent him, if that be within the bounds of possibility, having quite so much pride. He is not a bad fellow, as everyone would know, if he were not quite so proud of himself. We will give him a chance to grow penitent and try to reduce himself to the size of the ordinary man.

The great, glorious, infallible member for Rouville has told us a number of things quite disagreable for the member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget), and, turning to his friends, he has made the prophesy of what will happen if this Government intends to do certain things in relation to a company that he speaks of as a bankrupt company. He went pretty near to accusing the hon. member for Charlevoix of not being an upright and honest man.

Mr. LEMIEUX : Were you not a director of that company yourself ?

Mr. PELLETIER : Sit down.

Mr. LEMIEUX : The hon. member was a director of the company.

Mr. PELLETIER : I was a director of the company, associated with Senator Casgrain, M. Dubord and other respectable Liberals in the city of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not get excited.

Mr. PELLETIER: Not excited, but just in earnest, to prove to the House the depth to which the hon. gentleman sometimes goes. The hon. gentleman is evidently very sore and bitter, because of the position in which he finds himself, and because of that seeks to wreak his vengeance on others. To-day his attack is directed against the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let the hon. member be silent. If he is not his own master, if he cannot control himself how would it do to send for a glass of cold water or ginger ale in order to cool him down, so that he would be ready to follow the rules of debate in this House?

Mr. LEMIEUX: But you were a director.

Mr. PELLETIER: He is at it again. He is very sore, and shows his feeling against the hon. member for Charlevoix, a man who has done so much to weaken the influence of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. He seeks vengeance upon all those who have helped to prevent him from continuing to be a member of the Government of this country. I have had my turn as the object upon whom the hon. gentleman sought to wreak his vengeance. The former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) has had his turn, so has the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Rainville), and now it is the turn of the hon. member for Charlevoix. So the hon. member speaks of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway Company as a bankrupt company, and mixes it up with the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company. As to the Quebec and Saguenay Railway Company, I never was a director of it, nor have I been connected with it in any shape or form. I want the House to know that. But when the hon. member tries to cast aspersions upon a representative of the people like the hon. member for Charlevoix, I can tell him, and tell this House, that his attack is directed against a Canadian of whom the province of Quebec is proud. Nothing that falls from the lips of the hon. member for Rouville will diminish the reputation which the hon. member for Charlevoix enjoys in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman's words have been spoken in this House for one purpose, and for one purpose only, and that is to raise suspicions and doubts as to the completion of the Quebec and Saguenay railway. He has said that the hon. member for Charlevoix is giving explanations in this House because, that hon. gentleman—to use the word of the hon. member for Rouville—has been 'dangling' outside the doors of the ministers' offices to obtain favours for the Quebec and Saguenay railway. I tell him that is not the fact; the statement he has made is a calumny against a public man of his own province. I am not going to ask him to withdraw it, for the more he says, the less he withdraws, the more unjust he is, the more unjust he persists in being. We have nothing to expect from him. But the country will judge his utterances as they ought to be judged, and the result will not be to the profit or glory of the hon. member for Rouville. He will be deceived if he thinks by threatening in this House and by speaking as he does of the Quebec and Saguenay railway to affect the course of events. If the Government thinks (and inquiries will be made, I suppose, into the matter) that, this railway, having been begun, if it is in the public interest—mark my words, if it is in the public interest—that it should be finished, the fact that the hon. member for Rouville is sore and has sought vengeance against a member of this House, will not prevent this Government from doing its duty. But the hon. member has said that all this has taken place. I tell this House now that there is nothing definite before the Government at the present moment, and no decision has been arrived at in this respect.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member says 'Hear, hear.' But what I have said —and it has been noted, I hope—is that it is not the threats of the hon. member for Rouville that will influence us. If this railway ought to be finished in the public interest, we will judge this question on its merits and not on the threats made by the hon. member for Rouville.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He has given up the case, thrown up the sponge!

Mr. PELLETIER: Because I say that the question will be judged on its merits, and in the public interest my hon. friend says that we have given up the case. That is his way of understanding the public interest and defending the public treasury; it is not mine.

Just before the hon. member for Rouville thought fit to bring these accusations against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, we were told that these hon. gentlemen had lost twenty counties in the province of Quebec on account of certain appeals. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have got into a kind of confusion, a state of mind easily understood by one who knows the circumstances. In the province of Quebec—I do not speak of any other province, but only whereof I know—in the province of Quebec every time the Conservative party has tried to do its duty to this country, even going back to the time of the Militia Bill, the Liberals of that province have gone from hustings to hustings, and have told the people that they ought to oppose any kind of defense, military or naval—that that has been their settled policy for years. What was their attitude in 1896, when in the province of Quebec, as well as in other portions of the Dominion, some big questions were at issue, and should have been discussed? Hon. gentlemen opposite from the province of Quebec went from one meeting to another telling the people that Sir Charles Tupper ought to be defeated because he perpetrated a big crime in buying guns for this country. We have heard that from every platform and every husting in the province of Quebec, and the Liberals of that province were becoming used to such appeals. Fancy their surprise when these same men came back to them and told them: 'We are now going to have a tin pot navy!' They stood aghast, and said: 'These are not the same men who preached to us for years that we should never interfere in the military or naval defence of the country.' It is no wonder that some gentlemen in the province of Quebec were tempted to give them a dose of their own medicine, and recall to their bad memories these appeals of the past. That this took place certainly does not surprise me, and hon. gentlemen opposite got what they deserved.

I shall not deal with this question at any further length. I rose only on account of certain unfounded accusations made by the hon. member for Rouville. When we are told in the province of Quebec that we are not doing our duty in regard to this question, we simply say that when it is brought before the country, the people will judge us then by our attitude in the matter.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rule which governs business on Tuesday evenings, the first hour is usually reserved for private Bills, but as there are no private Bills on the Order Paper ready for consideration, the debate on the proposed motion and amendment regarding the address in reply to the speech from the Throne will continue.

Mr. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, throughout the debate on the Address, the facts in connection with the by-election in Richelieu have been commented upon at sufficient length to warrant my giving some explanation to the House in regard to the practices resorted to by hon. gentlemen who sit on your right. However, before entering into an examination of this question, I may be allowed to say a few words in answer to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), who has paid me the compliment of a few personal references in the course of his speech this afternoon.

In the first place, if I understood him right the hon. minister finds fault with the Opposition for not having more definitely pointed out what policy they propose to follow during this session in reference to the various issues under discussion. Hon. gentlemen, it seems to me, cannot but find rather extraordinary such utterances in the mouth of a Minister of the Crown. It does not rest with the Opposition to define their position and make known the policy they intend to follow. But it is incumbent on the Government to make known their plans for the future; and just glancing over the Speech from the Throne, one would be tempted to think that hon. members on the other side of the House are not very much better posted than we are ourselves in this connection. Nobody is acquainted with the actual policy of the Government.

Is it then to be wondered at if we in the Opposition ranks have not yet set down in black and white the principles which are to guide us in the course of the debate to be taken up next week with reference to the navy? A matter for greater surprise is surely to find the ministers still unable to give out their views on that question, though four of them have gone over to Great Britain to discuss the matter with the British Admiralty. They have as yet left us completely in the dark concerning the details of their plan, and I consider more than strange that they should undertake to criticise us for not having made known our own platform.

Let the Government come out in the open, and they will soon find out that the Opposition are ready for them and will launch out a policy in full agreement with the one they advocated prior to September, 1911. From what we can see, the policy to be submitted by this Government will be the very counterpart of that advocated at that time by the present French-speaking ministers.

Towards the close of his address this afternoon, the Postmaster General referred to my resignation following on the petition filed against my return as representative of the electoral district of Richelieu. As every one knows, the Act now in force is exceedingly severe; even slight irregularities, committed by agents, may warrant the judge in declaring the election void. And I may add that if all elections carried on in this country, and particularly in 1911, in which our present ministers took a hand, had been controverted, in every case the petition would have been sustained.

Moreover, nothing unusual happened in the course of my 1911 election. I find an admission of the truth of that statement in the stand taken by the ministers themselves at the time. It should not be forgotten that the filing of a petition against my return was the deed of a single individual, whom the Government, the leaders of the Conservative party themselves, blamed for doing so. They even made an effort to induce him to let the matter drop. Now, if so many irregularities had been committed, if so many corrupt practices had been resorted to, it seems to me that the hon. Postmaster General, who is such a puritan to-day, should have in person taken the matter in hand.

I now come to what occurred in the county of Richelieu during the recent by-election. In the first place, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the questions which took up the greater part of the time were purely personal and money questions, and that the great principles for which we fought so ardently in 1911 were left in the background. It could not have been otherwise, considering that at the very outset the leaders of the Conservative party in Montreal had stated that the Conservative candidate had a fair chance of getting in, and would get in, as the county of Richelieu was a patronage constituency. And that policy, as laid down by the leaders of the Conservative party at Montreal, was not departed from, that is to say patronage and money matters were the only matters debated, as I will show presently.

It seems to me rather extraordinary and even strange that the ministers should state to-day that they did not take any particular interest in the election. If we were to believe them, the Conservative candidate was left to fight the battle single-handed. We were warranted in finding odd the conduct of the French-speaking ministers of the province of Quebec, who at the first by-election to take place in their province did not have the courage to make known their policy before the electors of the county of Richelieu and state what they had accomplished since their coming into power. But did they really take as little interest as they would have us believe to-day? Now, let us enquire into the matter. I shall show that the exact opposite is the truth. As soon as the election return was voided, the Richelieu Conservatives had a banquet in honour of the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), and in the speeches which were then delivered reference was made mainly to patronage, to the interest the county had in electing a supporter of the Government. Later on, there was a great banquet given in honour of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who was received at Sorel with brass-band and torchlight. The banquet had been organized by the gentleman who was spoken of as the candidate of the Conservative party, and who, as a matter of fact, was chosen as such in that by-election.

I may be allowed to quote the speech delivered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as reported in the columns of a paper to which exception will surely not be taken by hon. gentlemen on the other side, and still less by the Conservative party's candidate at the recent by-election I mean Le Sorelois, owned by the Morgan family. The following is that newspaper's report of the Minister's speech:

I am aware of the importance the Sorel shipyards have in my department. My policy in the Marine department will be to give to your shipyards still greater attention than they have enjoyed heretofore. We have 600 men employed at Sorel. We shall have work for all these men during the winter, and the number of hands will be increased, as I propose applying to Parliament for further grants to carry on the work on a larger scale than heretofore.

We are anxious that your yards should be put to extensive use, and if the Sorel people are willing to work, they will have ample opportunity for so doing. With that in view, we have already increased the rate of salaries, and we shall continue granting increases until the men are paid a fair wage.

In view of all that, you should have a good representative for the County of Richelieu. I hope that you will give to the Canadian Parliament a representative in touch with the policy of my leader, the Right Hon. Mr. Borden.

One can already foretell the promises which were to be made a little later on with greater definiteness.

Now, I will quote from a speech of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Forget), a speech delivered at that same banquet, and which I find reported in the same paper Le Sorelois:

Sir Rodolphe Forget, with Gaelic liveliness, made a racy speech.

The Minister of Public Works made some interesting statements. We are going to get the Montreal dry-dock within a few days, and the Quebec dry-dock cannot be delayed very long. The Minister of Public Works is the best Minister the Province of Quebec has just now.

I hope the hon. Minister (Mr. Pelletier) will pardon me for quoting those words. It is likely that when the hon. member for Charlevoix spoke in that way he had no idea that the hon. Postmaster General would later on bestow on him such generous praise as we heard to-day. Then he goes on to say:

And since the Hon. Mr. Monk and his colleague are so well disposed, the Sorel workingmen should ask him a favour this very night. The Government should provide at Sorel a marine railway, an improvement which would be very beneficial to your city.

As Chairman of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, I believe that would be a pledge of future progress, and I can assure the Government that we will help to carry that measure through, and if needed, we will pay the interest on the cost of the undertaking.

I shall now quote a document which has also its importance, a letter from the Minister of Marine to the Minister of Public Works dated October 16, 1912:

Ottawa, October, 16, 1912.

To the Hon. F. D. Monk, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Monk,—In answer to your letter of this date, I wish to inform you that tenders have been asked for the purchase of the quantity of steel required for the building of five lighters and two tug boats at Sorel. The date for the opening of such tenders is fixed on the 18th of the current month, and as soon as the contract has been awarded, the work will be undertaken right away.

In the notice to tenderers it is specified that the steel should be delivered at the earliest possible date, and every tenderer is required to state at what date he will be able to make delivery at Sorel.

The intention of the department is to proceed with the work as rapidly and within the shortest time possible.

Yours very truly,

J. D. HAZEN.

As may be seen, that letter was written in the heat of the electoral compaign, on the 16th of October, nomination taking place on the day following. That letter was published in the paper Le Sorelois, the organ of the Conservative candidate on October 18th.

Mr. Speaker, other circumstances seem to point to the fact that the Government did take an interest in the election. The Department of Public Works was especially interested in it, and the proof of it is that on the day following nomination day a dredge was located in the river Richelieu, close to the village of St. Roch, with the object of excavating. Telegrams were read by the Conservative candidate showing that he had the support of the Minister of Public Works, that the latter was in sympathy with him and hoped he would succeed, and even offered to take a hand in the election, if necessary.

Another fact which to my mind shows the interest which the Government took in that election is the sending of their representative, the hon. member for Charlevoix, who was received at Sorel by the Conservative party with brass band and torchlight procession.

Still another fact, quite characteristic and which should be noted, in this: Previous to the coming to Sorel of the hon. member for Charlevoix, with the assurance that the Government took an interest in the election, the Conservative party there was torn up by factions. But following immediately on that gentleman's arrival, peace was restored, and Conservatives immediately rallied and worked hand in hand to have their candidate returned. Even members of this House who had stated at the outset that they would not lend a hand in the election in favour of candidate Morgan, changed their minds after the arrival of the member for Charlevoix and followed him in the fray.

The feature of the Conservative campaign in that election was an attempt to buy the electors wholesale, accompanied by threats against government employees.

I do not propose quoting once more the editorial which appeare in La Patrie. Hon. gentlemen in this House are already posted as to its contents. It will suffice to read an extract from L'Eveil, a Conservative paper published at Sorel. In his issue of October 24 last, that is polling day, I find an editorial under the heading 'Sir Rodolphe Forget and the victory in Richelieu'. It reads in part as follows:

For a period of some fifteen years, at every election, we were gold-bricked with promises of a Marine Railway, the carrying out of which invaluable undertaking was, as soon as polling day was over, postponed to some future date.

As on previous occasions that famous question was taken up again; but this time, Sir Rodolphe Forget promised on his own word of honour and on behalf of the Government, that a vote of $200,000 would be placed in the estimates for the next Session of Parliament towards the building of that Marine railway, failing which Mr. Morgan would resign his seat.

He also spoke of the possible re-opening of the railway between St. Guillaume and Sorel, considering that Mr. Morgan must get what he has made up his mind to obtain; like the man who is in danger of drowning and to whom a plank is thrown, he lets go only when he has reached a safe place.

These are not empty words spoken by some irresponsible person, it is the solemn pledge of a responsible man, backed up by the signatures of Dominion Government ministers, and on the carrying out of which the fate of the member for Richelieu will depend.

Allow me, Sir, to quote another extract, as I am anxious to make known the real nature of the contest in Richelieu, and to satisfy the House as to the truth of my contention. I give herewith the wording of a manifesto issued at Sorel on October 17, 1912, and spread throughout the town and county. Under the heading 'Important works in sight' the following is stated among other things:

Mr. Morgan, following on several interviews with the Dominion authorities, has succeeded in obtaining the building of 2 steel tugs and 5 lighters.

Notices of tenders have been sent out for the supply of 10,260 tons of steel, which is twice as much as has ever been ordered at one time since the yards are being operated. The building of such crafts in the Sorel shipyards would give work to a thousand sturdy workmen.

Shall we by our votes intimate to the Government that we would prefer such works to be carried on at Point Levis or somewhere else? Surely not.

Electors of Sorel and St. Joseph, would you be acting wisely in intimating to the government, through your votes: Take away your shipyards, we have no need for them, put them in some other place, equipment and all.

Herewith I give a few more extracts from that manifesto. Under the heading 'Marine railway', the following appears:

Another important question which has been for some time attracting public attention, is the building of a Marine railway. That question of late has entered into a new phase, and the carrying out of that much desired undertaking, which would be for Sorel a source of considerable revenue, seems now assured. As an assurance we have the statement of the Hon. Mr. Monk, Minister of Public Works, and that of Sir Rodolphe Forget, who, as Chairman of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, has promised, if necessary, to pay the interest on the cost of that undertaking.

Electors of Richelieu, are you going to state through your votes that you are opposed to the carrying out of such a profitable undertaking for your city?

However, they were not satisfied with holding up inducements to Richelieu voters, so that they would be sure to vote for the Government candidate, the probability of some misfortune happening them should they vote against the Government was also suggested to them, as we shall see by the following extract, under the title:

The County of Richelieu should be kept whole.

As is generally known, following on every decennial cencus, a redistribution Bill is voted by the House of Commons.

Montreal, the commercial metropolis of that province, and whose population has increased abnormally, claims, and rightly so, an increase in representation. As the number of representatives to which the province of Quebec is entitled cannot vary from 65, the only means of giving satisfaction to Montreal's legitimate claims would be by making one county out of several adjoining constituencies, which thereby would lose their identity.

Would it not be a pity were the beautiful county of Richelieu, which has played such a noble part in the political history of the country, to cease to appear as a separate constituency on the electoral map of the province?

That is not an imaginary danger, it is an actual possibility which we are pointing out to the electors of this county.

And the manifesto wound up with two short sentences which by themselves warrant my speaking as I have done; they are as follows:

A vote against Mr. Morgan is a vote against the Sorel shipyards.

A vote for Mr. Morgan will ensure the permanency and development of the shipyards, and the prosperity of Sorel and the county of Richelieu.

But that is not all. On polling day and the day previous, a short but very interesting circular was distributed among the electors of the city of Sorel. It is worth reading:

Sir Rodolphe Forget, Minister of Public Works.

Several M.P.'s now in Sorel confirm the above piece of news which appeared in La Patrie of last evening. The Prime Minister has offered the portfolio of Public Works to Sir Rodolphe Forget. The latter will make known his decision by Saturday. Sorel and the whole county of Richelieu should join hands with the M.P.'s towards inducing Sir Rodolphe to accept. Should he accept that portfolio, it would mean this, that the Sorel shipyards would return to public works, as Sir Rodolphe Forget stated.

Forget, Minister of Public Works! Sorel and Progress! Long live Forget! Vote for Morgan!

In passing I may be allowed to remark, Mr. Speaker, that if the facts given out in this circular are as stated, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) owes me some consideration for having helped, though unawares, to rid him of a dangerous competitor.

Further, telegrams from ministers or head officers of departments hinting at dismissals were read and re-read at meetings. In due time I shall show that canvassers of the Conservative candidate have warned Government employees not to vote, under penalty of losing their positions. Besides, Liberal workmen were refused the right of attending Liberal meetings, while Conservative workingmen were employed to draw the carriage of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Such is the treatment which was meted out to Sorel workmen. I am right in stating here, as I have done elsewhere, that the small wage-earner was the object of very shabby treatment.

Other facts which have come to my knowledge plainly show the true character of that contest. It seems that the hon. member for Charlevoix was not content with distributing favours in the city of Sorel, but that he travelled through the country parishes. His heart filled with pity at the sight of the parishioners of St. Louis who were busy re-building their church, he promised them a bell if the Conservative candidate, Mr. Morgan, were returned. After thus taking care of the church interests, as Conservatives are wont to do at every election, the member for Charlevoix took into consideration the material interests of the people. He promised to provide a telephone line for St. Louis.

I listened with some interest to the explanation tendered by the hon. member for Charlevoix, this afternoon. He started by saying that La Patrie was not his organ, that he not not a single cent invested in the company publishing that paper. That may be so, but it is not the less true that La Patrie has always well treated the hon. gentleman and even defended him when necessay. Obviously La Patrie had no reason to put in his mouth words which he had not spoken. Therefore I say that the hon. member cannot consistently suspect the truth of the reports appearing in La Patrie. The editors of that paper are his friends, his allies, and it cannot be gainsaid that their reports were in accordance with the facts.

The hon. member for Charlevoix subsequently stated that the hon. Mr. Rogers had nothing to do with the election in Richelieu. Then, why did he use his name? Undoubtedly it was to give more weight to the promises which he made to the electors.

The hon. member for Charlevoix was not the only one to come to the rescue of the party in the Richelieu election. The harmonious dingling of the St. Louis bell instilled a combative ardor into the member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny), generosity into the heart of the member for Montmagny (Mr. Lespérance), unerring logic into the mind of the member for Yamaska, (Mr. Mondu), feverish activity into the member for Berthier (Mr. Barette), and looseness of political principles into the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Rainville).

The hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre) was also seen in the skirmishing line. He was present at the first meeting held at St. Ours at the opening of the campaign. But the most efficient worker was possibly the member for Berthier. According to the expression used by some persons in Richelieu, and I think the expression is proper, he 'heard confessions' in the Government offices at St. Joseph de Sorel on polling day. He caused the workingmen to file past him, and preached to them the doctrine of personal interest, in other words endeavoured to satisfy them that it was in their interest to cast their vote in favour of the Government candidate. He may have succeeded in gaining over a certain number, but not the majority. And if he cared to do so, he might tell of the hot words he got from some of them, who then and there stated that even at the risk of losing their positions, they would vote in accordance with the dicates of their conscience.

So they all came with the exception of the leaders of the Government. Conservative members swarmed in to defend the ministerial policy and advocate the doctrine of personal and local interest.

Mr. LAMARCHE: (Translation.) Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that all the Conservative members of the province of Quebec took a hand in that election?

Mr. CARDIN: (Translation.) I have just given the list of those who were there.

Mr. SEVIGNY: (Translation.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say a word? I, for one, went to Richelieu, and I hope to be there again some day. Would the hon. gentleman state the names of the Liberal members who were there to lend him a hand?

Mr. CARDIN: (Translation.) I do not think that would be of much interest in connection with this debate. Moreover, if the hon. gentleman had been in his seat this afternoon, he would have heard the hon. the Postmaster General give out the full list. I may add that the Liberal members made their appearance at the outset; they did not wait until the big guns had come out, as did the member for Dorchester.

So I say they all flocked in, those who think they loom large in the ranks of their party, and they were accompanied by all the candle bearers around the golden calf of Government promises and favours. They were all there to preach abandonment of principles in exchange for a policy of personal and local interest.

Now, what answer do we receive from the Government and their supporters when we recall what occurred in that Richelieu election? In the first place, we heard the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) give a formal denial to the statement of the hon. member for Charlevoix, as reported in La Patrie. Then we hear them, as they have been constantly doing since the advent to power of the Conservative party, making use of the 'Tu quoque' argument.

Indeed, every time the Opposition took exception to the policy followed by the Government, hon. gentlemen on the other side have invariably answered: Why should you hide your faces at the thought of such deeds, when you did exactly the same thing when you were in power? That is not answering to the charges brought forward by the Opposition. The House and the country have the right to expect other explanations than those heretofore obtained from the ministers and their followers. Moreover, in virtue of the old maxim, two blacks do not make one white, admitting that the Liberal party should have been responsible for some wrong-doing in the past, that is no justification for the Conservatives following in their footsteps. Such an answer on the part of the ministers amounts to an admission of guilt, since they put on a level their own deeds and the so-called wrong-doing of their opponents.

Lastly the Conservative party have not been put in power to continue the so-called wickedness of the Liberal party. When, in 1911, they appealed to the people, they did not state that they wished to be put in power in order to do just what the Liberal party had been doing; they stated, on the contrary, through the mouths of their supporters that they wished to be put in charge of the business of the country with a view to improving on the methods of their predecessors.

The hon. member for Charlevoix told us this afternoon that during the election he had met at Sorel quite a number of Liberal members, even former ministers, and among others the hon. representative of Three-Rivers (Mr. Bureau), at the head of about two hundred Liberal stalwarts, bearing on their breasts a badge with the picture of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. True, a great number of Liberals did pass through the streets of Sorel, with badges bearing the portrait of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But the picture of the member for Charlevoix was also distributed throughout the county, with this difference, that instead of appearing on the breasts of their owners, it was in their pockets. For that picture of the member for Charlevoix was engraven on the numerous bills of the International Bank of Canada, which were in many hands on the market place at Sorel, the following Saturday.

Now, the member for Charlevoix has thought fit to quote that section of the Electoral Act which forbids the wearing of any badge between nomination and polling day. I may draw his attention to the fact that many other clauses of the Electoral Act are of interest under the circumstances and had a more important bearing on the result of the Richelieu election. I hope he will take time to look into those provisions of the law when the counter-petition which I propose filing in answer to the protest just served on me, is investigated by the courts.

The member for Charlevoix and the Minister of Public Works have rejoiced over the reduction of the Liberal majority in my constituency. True, the Liberal majority has been cut down, and that is due to the corrupt practices I have referred to. It is no wonder that such a reduction should have taken place when Government supporters in that election were resorting to such means. No wonder they succeeded in scaring some of the workingmen by showing them poverty at their very doors through the loss of their employment. They were given the alternative of either voting for the Conservative candidate, in spite of their opinions, or of losing their jobs. We have reason to be surprised at hearing hon. ministers chuckle over the cutting down of the Liberal majority under such circumstances, and after having recourse to such dishonest practices, not to say more.

Then, they were not content with making threats, they carried out those threats. A few days after the election, 90 or 95 men in the employ of the Government shipyards were dismissed. And you may be sure, Mr. Speaker, that there were no Conservatives in the lot. They were all picked out with care. They were all suspected by those who look after patronage matters in Richelieu and by those who regularly sit in secret committee to bring about dismissals, of having voted for the Liberal candidate.

The Conservative Government have been in power for a year only, and in order to secure the return of their candidates in by-elections they must take such means as those which have been applied in the Macdonald and Richelieu elections, and which the Liberal party have denounced since the start of this debate. How will it be Mr. Speaker, when these hon. gentlemen have been in power for several years?

Such are the facts which I was anxious to bring to the attention of this House. However, I should add, Mr. Speaker, that I have not given out everything. I have kept some facts in reserve, which I intend using at the proper time, more particularly when that counter-petition in answer to the two protests served on me yesterday is taken up. A good many of the members who have been doing work in my county will be called upon to discuss with me before the court some clauses of the Electoral Act. I invite especially the hon. member for Charlevoix to take up that line of study, considering how well posted he appears to be concerning the election law.

As I have just stated, Mr. Speaker, a further protest has been lodged against my return in Richelieu. The extraordinary feature about it is that two petitions have been filed. It seems as if the Conservative party could not agree as to the choice of a single petitioner. If I am rightly informed, one of those protests was lodged at the request of the Conservative organization itself, an organization which did not take any interest in, and even blamed the filing of, the last election protest in Richelieu filed at the instigation of Mr. Morgan. That election protest apparently does not suit the candidate who suffered defeat in the by-election, since he has thought fit himself to file a second protest.

Is it not strange to see the Conservative party who have been running the campaign we have heard about in Macdonald, and the campaign I have just referred to in Richelieu, hasten to take the lead in filing a petition against my return? It certainly is strange. But when the time comes I shall make known in detail the misdeeds of those worthies who had recourse to every means in their power to capture the constituency in Richelieu. And if any one comes out hurt from the fray, it will not be the member for Richelieu, but those who attempted to carry the county by means of threats and promises.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I believe I am perfectly justified in giving my support to the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. Indeed, I think the right hon. Prime Minister will be the last to blame me, since in his platform speech at Halifax, he promised reforms towards ensuring greater honesty at elections.

I shall vote in support of the amendment.

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the indulgence of the hon. members on this my first attempt to address the House of Commons. I may say that my name appears on 'Hansard,' but it has no right to be there. I have never envied the reputation of having one's name on 'Hansard,' because, coming from the province of Ontario, having sat in the legislature of that province for three years, and having sat here for a year, I believe that 'Hansard' is a detriment to the carrying on of the business of the country. The member who formerly represented Wentworth in this House regrets very much that his name appeared on 'Hansard,' for it was because of the statement that he made in this House on the question of reciprocity, and his right-about-face on that question, that he was left at home, and I was sent to represent the farmers and fruit growers of the county of Wentworth.

I have not been impressed with some of the speeches of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I certainly do not think that they have set a very good example to new members. The statements of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), seem to me to consist of accusations that cannot be proven. They have dealt assassin-like stabs at men of reputation on this side of the House, and for what reason? Simply in order to bolster up their own shattered reputation. I do not think that the action of the hon. member for Rouville this afternoon was a manly one. To me, as a new member of this House, it did not seem consistent, and I hope that when I have been in public life as long as he has been, and occupy as prominent a position as he does, I shall have a greater sense of honor and political consistency than he showed. In my province it would ill become that hon. gentleman to make such statements as he made, for there his name has been associated with the fact that at one time he was ready to espouse the cause of annexation. It is known all over the province of Ontario that at one time he locked arms with Erastus Wiman and some other gentlemen who were anxious to have Canada annexed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was not born then.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): Well, your ideas have been copied from Erastus Wiman and men of his type. The member for Rouville referred to the Prime Minister as a past master in the art of vagueness. The Prime Minister's statements may be vague to my hon. friend, but they are not to members on this side of the House, and I prefer to follow a statesman of the calibre of the leader of the Government rather than the discredited opportunist that the ex-Postmaster General must follow at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): The hon. member for Rouville says that the Conservatives are using feathers plucked from the Liberal party. Did not he hear the leader of the Opposition say, 'Bet your money on the old cock?' I am proud to be able to say that I robbed his hen roost of one of the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde breed that tried to face both ways, otherwise known as Mr. Sealey, and I do not think that the Liberal party lost very much. I know that the country was well rid of a man who tried to face both ways. What did the papers say about him at that time?

> He longs to Bless, but is constrained to Curse.
> The moral of the scornful snigger which his performance has aroused here seems to be: If you intend to bolt, bolt; make a clean job of it, and have done with it. The Liberals may dislike Mr. Sifton, Mr. German, Mr. Lloyd Harris, but they don't despise them. If you resolve to stand by your party, swallow the dose outright, and keep your face straight; do it and don't make a fuss. There are plenty of Liberals who are taking that line. But public exhibitions of anguished indecision, or apologetic deference to both sides, such as Mr. Sealey's merely aroused derision. Mr. Facing-Both-Ways and Mr. By-Ends have never been counted among Bunyan's more popular characters.

I was surprised to hear the member for Rouville make statements about efforts to win ridings.

Mr. GERMAN: By bribery and corruption.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): I will ask the member for Welland (Mr. German) in a few minutes as to his stand on reciprocity. We have seen some gentlemen held up to criticism because of statements they made in their efforts to win ridings. Here is a little card that my opponent sent out at the last election. The dates of his meetings were printed on the one side, and his promises on the other, no doubt to save expense. Here is what he said:

> Vote for Sealey and a new Welland canal via Wentworth.

I went through the whole of that old county, and there was not a hamlet where it was not going to touch, and was referred to as the cork-screw canal. The Newmarket canal was not in it. Then he had on the card:

Vote for Sealey and $5 horse power in Wentworth and vicinity.

The reason for this promise was that Mr. Sealey and his party had opposed the hydro-electric scheme. I may not be known as a 'Hansard' Wilson, but I am dubbed 'Hydro' Wilson in that part of the country. Mr. Sealey wanted to get some of the credit and he tried to call himself 'Hydro' Sealey and get into the hydro band wagon. Then he said, 'Vote for Sealey and three markets instead of two.' I will come to that later on. 'Vote for Sealey and better prices for both the producer and the consumer!' My Liberal friends may take whichever horn of the dilemma they like. They tried both in my county, but they did not succeed. Then: 'Vote for Sealey and a more extended free mail delivery.' I would like to tell the hon. the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) that I wish he had not started rural mail delivery in my county on political lines. The curse of my county to-day is the way in which the rural mail delivery was laid out. The county of Wentworth was the first to have the rural mail delivery, and it was said of Mr. Sealey that he had to send to the United States to get the boxes. Mr. Sealey had to make good the promise that the county should have rural mail delivery. I believe that the hon. member for Rouville came up to Wentworth at the inception of the rural mail delivery. The first route was from Hamilton to Ancaster.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend state that the boxes were made in the United States?

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): I was given to understand that some of the boxes were made in the United States.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The boxes were and are made in Toronto.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): They are made there now, but were they then?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The first ones came from the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): The hon. member for Rouville will find that more than the boxes came from the United States. We were told to vote for Sealey and double the orders for our factories. Well, I will have something to say about the orders for our factories a little later on. Then we were told that Laurier is the pioneer of Canadian naval defence. That is what the hon. member for Rouville says. He may have been but at present he, clearly, in my opinion, is the obstructionist of naval defence and we will soon learn exactly where he stands. The hon. gentlemen are trying to crawl behind the emergency cry. As a Canadian and a British subject emergency or no emergency, I am prepared to do my share towards the defence of the British Empire. Then the hon. member for Rouville says that the trade agreement of Messrs Fielding and Paterson was the best means of abolishing the high prices of food stuffs. That sounds well, but my hon. friend knows that while we were going to make potatoes, cabbages and all such necessities free, he was going to get the Hon. William Paterson to be magnanimous enough to reduce the duty on biscuits from 35 to 32½ per cent. Yet my hon. friend says that this agreement, if it had been put into force, would have reduced the price of food stuffs, and that it would have meant reduced taxation. When my hon. friend speaks of the high cost of living let me ask why he and his friends did not do something with the high cost of living. What stand did they take on that question? Let me read some of the statements made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. When he was speaking at the Liberal convention in 1893, he said:

I call upon you one and all to pronounce at once and give your emphatic support to the proposition that we shall never rest until we have wiped from our system that fraud and robbery (protection) under which Canadians suffer. Our policy should be the policy of free trade such as they have in England. The circumstances of the country cannot admit at the present of that policy in its entirety; but from this day henceforward it should be the goal to which we aspire. From this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power; their idea is protection, our idea is free trade.

Then, speaking at Winnipeg in 1906, the right hon. gentleman said:

We stand for freedom. I denounce the policy of protection as bondage—yea bondage; I refer to bondage in the same manner in which the American slavery was bondage. In the same manner people of Canada, the inhabitants of the city of Winipeg especially, are toiling for a master who takes. . . away a large percentage of your earnings for which you sweat and toil.

The right hon. gentleman was not always in favour of reciprocity. He said on another occasion:

Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians, beginning with myself, would have given many things to obtain the American market, but, thank Heaven, those days are past and over.

Again he said:

There was a time when we were wanting reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside and negatived. We have said good-bye to that trade and we now put all our hopes upon the British trade.

He said further:

But I have found in the short experience during which it has been my privilege and my fortune to be placed at the head of affairs, by the will of the Canadian people, that the best and most effective way to maintain friendship with our American neighbours is to be absolutely independent of them.

No truck or trade with them under any circumstances! Now, I want to come to the right hon. gentleman's friend, Mr. Sealey, because he certainly elected me on the statements he made in this House. I want to tell the right hon. gentleman that I have been sent here as a sort of valentine to him. A deputation from the Vegetable Growers' Association waited upon the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, the then Prime Minister, and some of his colleagues in this Chamber on February 10, 1911. And this is what the right hon. gentleman said in reply to them:

I have only this to say. Of course, we are bound to listen to you, but after listening to you, my last word to you must be that it is impossible, absolutely impossible, that any law which is passed, that any agreement which is adopted, that any tariff which is made, can be equally agreeable to all parts of the community, but that all must be prepared to make some concession to the common good.

Then Mr. Fielding said:

It is much too late. I thank you very much but I cannot speak to you.

Further, the right hon. leader of the Opposition said:

The difference is rather, as has been pointed out to us, the climatic differences of our country. The difficulty is that we are on the northern extremity of the zone,—but there are also advantages in those climatic difficulties. I do not know how it works, but it is acknowledged at the present time that the Canadian apple has no competitor in the world. It is undoubted, I believe also, that the peach which is grown on the northern shore of lake Erie is superior to any product on this continent.

The right hon. gentleman did not want to give us protection on fruit and vegetables, but still I remember that Mr. Sealey had on several occasions made statements and I want to endorse Mr. Sealey on this because I think he took the proper stand when he stated that Canada required protection on fruit and vegetables. Mr. Sealey, in 1908, spoke to the vegetable growers in the county of Wentworth and I was present upon the occasion. He said.

The vegetable and fruit growers are interested in too small an area, and it occurs to me that the general agricultural interests of the Dominion should be combined from east to west and in that way we would copy to some extent the manufacturer in the matter of high protective tariff.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth).

He said further, speaking to the vegetable growers in Burlington:

Now, while our district and foreign markets are very good——

I hope that the House and particularly those Liberals from the West who are howling reciprocity will listen to what Mr. Sealey said:

Now, while our district and foreign markets are very good, everybody agrees that our home and nearby markets are by far the best and most profitable and therefore the most precious to be preserved.

Then why give up this profitable home market to the United States? That is what the people wanted to know on the 21st September, and the answer is that I am here instead of Mr. W. O. Sealey. Then again, he says:

We must play fair with the farmers.

Listen to this, you representatives from the West——

We must play fair with the farmers and give them equal consideration and in fact fair play with the manufacturers as well, but the manufacturers are quite capable of looking after themselves and that it was to protect agricultural products all along the line up to their level that we believed was in the best interests of Canada to-day and in that way try to preserve our home markets for our home producer.

Then we come to an important part of Mr. Sealey's speech. It seems that those who have been giving all the credit to Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson and Sir Wilfrid Laurier for this reciprocity treaty are altogether mistaken, because we have it on the authority of W. O. Sealey that he had a great deal to do with it. I have a pamphlet here which indicates as much, and on which is again printed that smiling face of Mr. Sealey. This is how Mr. Sealey introduces his pamphlet:

President Taft Recognized Mr. Sealey.

In his recent message to the United States Congress, President Taft referred to Mr. Sealey's speech as printed herein, and urged careful consideration of the matter, and the necessity of avoiding a tariff war with Canada which the terms of the Payne-Aldrich Bill might precipitate.

Great Credit due Mr. Sealey.

The solution of the tariff difficulty between the United States and Canada may in a large measure, be attributed to the effect on the American authorities of the illuminating and vigorous address of Mr. Sealey, to which the President referred.

So that you see Mr. Sealey is responsible in a large measure for this reciprocity pact; and let me further add that he is buried among the dead with Mr. Paterson and Mr. Fielding.

Here is another extract from Mr. Sealey's speech delivered at Boston on International Trade and Commerce, which should prove interesting to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) were he present in the House to-night, and which hon. members from the West can ponder over:—

In referring to the United States tariff on wheat of 25 cents per bushel and to Canada's transportation facilities, he says: 'But what does it do for Canada. What does it mean to the British farmers, and the United States farmers who are looking for new homes? It says in substance that the Canadian Northwest soil being just as fertile and productive as the United States West and the labour and cost of producing a bushel of wheat in Canada no more than in the United States, therefore in selecting a new home they will prefer the country that is seemingly giving them the best annual results. And what is all this doing for Canada? It is drifting all the choicest immigration of the European countries to the Canadian Northwest. Pleasanter still it is drifting thousands and thousands of choice United States farmers to our Canadian West. This year's records show an influx of 275,000 of the choicest new farmers, by far the largest proportion coming from any one country being from the United States.

Now we come to the fruit and vegetable growers, a deputation from whom was turned down by the Liberal administration, and I shall refer to a speech delivered in the House of Commons by Mr. Sealey on Friday, April 21, 1911, wherein he stated:—

Now, the Canadian tariff on peaches is one cent per pound, while the United States tariff on them is only one-half cent per pound. The Canadian tariff on strawberries is two cents per quart, while the United States tariff on them is only one cent per quart. Our tariff on much of the fruit is twice as high as theirs; and if, under these conditions, they have been able to invade our markets to the extent of $3,000,000 a year and we have only been able to invade their market to the extent of half a million, or one-sixth that amount, during the same time, with only half as much duty against us as we have against them, the result under free trade in these articles would seem to be apparent to everyone. They would swamp us in our own market while we could be unable to meet them in their own market.

That is just exactly what the people of Canada said to the Liberal party on the 21st of September, namely, that the Americans would swamp us in our own markets. Now, when Mr. Sealey went before the electors of Wentworth on that memorable 21st of September, he had a great many accomplishments that I did not possess; he also had a great many fads; and, he sent out a circular as a Christmas card all over the riding, containing a lithographed copy of his card of invitation to the coronation ceremony at Westminster Abbey church and setting forth that by command of the King, the Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshall of England, invited W. O. Sealey, Esq., M.P., to be present. And on the back of the card was printed: 'With best wishes to you for a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year from Mr. and Mrs. Sealey.' I was certainly not born with a silver spoon in my mouth, and I was up against it, because I had to contest the riding against a man whom the King had invited to come and visit him; and I had never been in the presence of royalty at all. I want to tell you how it all turned out. When Parliament was suddenly dissolved, Mr Sealey was over in England with the King, and he had to hurry back. He tried to recant, and he came down to Ottawa. The result was that he had to swallow the pill and declare himself in favour of reciprocity. But he qualified that to some extent by saying that the reciprocity pact could be changed at any time, and that he had arranged with Sir Wilfrid Laurier that if it was going to injure any vegetable or fruit grower, he would have it changed immediately. That statement was reported in the Hamilton Times of September 11, 1911, a copy of which I have here. We on this side of the House did not think the pact could be changed, but Mr. Sealey said he had a pull with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and he could get it changed at any time. Then, as time progressed and the people really found out what this reciprocity pact meant, Mr. Sealey got a little more anxious, and he came down again to Ottawa; and I am told on the authority of a Liberal friend that he came back, feeling that there was no doubt that he had to play the reciprocity game, but if he bet on the old cock and followed the white plume, he was promised that if he was defeated he would get a place in the Senate. Of course, he never thought we would rob the hen-roost, and that his party would never get back. I want to tell the right hon. the leader of the Opposition that I represent a peculiar riding——

Some hon. MEMBERS : It must be.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): Yes, it certainly is, and when you hear the result, you will not be able to say that a Conservative was returned in Wentworth because we took off the duty on cement, or because we made promises of post offices or anything of that kind; you will simply be forced to admit that the commonsense of the people triumphed at the polls. I will tell my hon. friends opposite why the people of Wentworth voted against reciprocity. Mr. Sealey was thought to be safe in his seat with 354 majority, and the cry I met all over the country was: 'Nobody can beat Sealey.' At the time, I had a seat in the Ontario Legislature, and I was asked to resign and contest the federal seat, not in my personal interest——

Some hon. MEMBERS : Oh, no.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): Not at all. I want to say to my hon. friends opposite, or to at least some of these Liberals sitting on the Opposition benches, that they do not seem to understand that a man can enter public life for other than ulterior motives. I wish to tell them further that I have higher ideas of public life, and, Sir, I hope to see the day when the people of this Dominion will appreciate men who enter public life in the interest of the people and at a loss to themselves. As I have said, I occupied a seat in the Ontario Legislature, and I was fighting there in the interest of the people, fighting the battle of the hydro-electric in the province of Ontario. And, to show you what the answer of the people was to the reciprocity pact, I mention that Mr. Sealey's majority of 354 at the previous election was turned into a minority of 893 on the 21st of September, 1911.

We are told that the farmers and fruit growers are all in favour of reciprocity. How can that be, when from a Liberal township where they used to get a majority of 450, it dropped down to 69, and so on all over the county? A great majority? No, nothing great about it, but the principles advocated are great, Canada for the Canadians. The people had common sense and that common sense was expressed at the polls on September 21. Somebody says, 'Truly reciprocity is dead.' They think we are trying to bury the dead. The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said it was dead, and somebody told him it was buried. We do not want to bury it at all, but all I say is, 'let the dead bury their dead.' I cannot tell you what nationality reciprocity is. I am of Scotch and Irish parents, therefore I can take a little liberty with them; but I would say that this reciprocity 'Bill' must have been an Irishman, because if he had been a Scotchman and died, that would have been the end of him, but if he had been an Irishman and died, they would 'wake' him.

Are the Liberals united? 'We are a united party on this side, we never vary,' are the words of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. We will have another experience meeting. I see the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) sitting in his seat. This is what he had to say in a letter addressed to the electors of Welland:

> The sole issue between parties in this contest is the reciprocity agreement made between the governments of Canada and the United States. As you know, I am opposed to that agreement. I do not believe it will result in any lasting practical benefit to the farmers of Canada, or even to this county, and I feel confident its general effect will be detrimental to the whole business interests of the country.

Are they a united party still! and does the member for Welland agree with his present leader? He has not so far stated how he stands on this question. I think it is in the interest of the House that the hon. member for Welland should give us his views, as he happens to come from a fruit and vegetable section of the country. I will pause for a moment and ask the hon. member if he takes the same stand as he did before. If he does I want to give him credit for it.

Mr. GERMAN: I have not changed my views from what I stated in the remarks the hon. gentleman has quoted.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): Then it is up to the hon. member for Welland to come over to this side of the House, and the leader of the Opposition is wrong when he says it is a united party. It is no such thing. The current and cross currents appear to be all on the other side of the sea. They are not on this side. I will read the views of an Ontario Liberal who formerly sat in this House:

> When reciprocity was first mentioned ninety per cent of the Liberal members at Ottawa were not in favour of it. When the question of the negotiations actually came up, I put the question to the Liberal members, and I honestly believe that if a caucus had been held the vote would have been ninety per cent against it.

That is what Mr. Lloyd Harris of Brantford said. We have heard a great deal about what reciprocity would do, and about who pays the duty. I want my hon. friends on the other side of the House to continue to juggle with that question. They do not seem to know very much about it. The member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) wants the duty kept on coal and although it would be for the benefit of the people of Ontario to have the duty off coal, still we are prepared to pay our share, and let the member for Cape Breton have the duty. We are, however, largely doing away with the use of coal in the province of Ontario; we are using the white coal, and, at some future time in this House, I propose to have the privilege of speaking to a resolution in connection with the hydro-electric proposition.

At one time, I think it was in 1896, the Liberals paraded this country talking about barbed wire, binder twine, and coal oil. On the hustings they declared that they were going to reduce the prices of these articles by removing the duty. They took the duties off. I have followed the hardware business for twenty-five years, and I know a little about these articles. When we had a duty of three-quarters of a cent a pound on barbed wire, we were able to sell it for $2 to $2.50 a hundred pounds and, more than that, it was Canadian barbed wire, made in Canadian factories, giving employment to Canadian workmen who bought their produce from Canadian farmers. The Liberals took off the duty of three-quarters of a cent a pound, and to-day barbed wire is selling for $2.75 to $3 a hundred pounds. Who pays the duty? There is no duty to pay. Furthermore what about mergers, trusts and combines? You are in the hands of the United States steel and wire trust, it is American wire you are using, you are employing American workmen on the American side of the line who buy their produce from American farmers. That is reciprocity for you.

Then, they said they were going to reduce the duty on coal oil, and they did so. Coal oil sells to-day at from say, 15 to 20 cents a gallon. The duty was reduced to 2½ cents a gallon; it used to be 7 1-5 cents. I was able to sell coal oil at twelve cents a gallon, an imperial gallon at that, when we had protection; but the mergers, trusts and combines got in touch with our Liberal friends, and they took the duty off. Of course, it would have been an unpardonable offence to have the Standard Oil Company's tank wagons going up and down through Canada, because the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and the other members on the other side of the House could not stand for that. So what did they do? They got the Queen City Oil Company to use that name in the province of Ontario, and the Imperial Oil Company in the province of Quebec, but they are one and the same, namely, the Standard Oil Company.

As regards binder twine, they were going to do wonders. Binder twine was made in Canadian factories, they were going to take the duty off for the benefit of the farmers. The duty was taken off, but you have to pay more for binder twine to-day, and you are going to pay more next year than you paid last year. The removal of the duty has closed Canadian factories, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite say, 'If we had the reciprocity pact, it would be a benefit to the province of Ontario and to the Dominion of Canada.' You should put this matter before the people as a business proposition. You should send business men to Washington or England, or any other place, if you want to make a treaty. You should not send men who are theoretical free traders, because free trade may be all right in theory, but you cannot put it into practice.

The hon. member for Carleton, N. B., (Mr. Carvell) made a great oration the other night about potatoes. He said that in Woodstock, N. B., potatoes were selling at $1 a barrel, while across the line in Maine, just twelve miles away, I think he said, they were selling at $1.45. If I am wrong, I wish my hon. friend would correct me, as I do not want to make any misstatements.

If the hon. member for Carlton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) will come to my room, No. 316, to-morrow or next day, I will show him some potatoes from Woodstock, N. B., which I bought in Dundas, and for which I paid at the rate of $1.25 a bag. That hon. gentleman is always looking to the United States. Why cannot he look to his home market? Now, how does this potato question figure out? A barrel is 160 lbs. or 2⅔ bushels, or 1⅔ bags. The freight rate from Woodstock, N.B., to Dundas is 23 cts. per 100 in car lots. You can buy these potatoes in Woodstock, N.B., at $1 a barrel, but when they get to Dundas we are paying about $2.24 a barrel. And in Maine they are $1.45 a barrel. So, what is the use of looking to the United States? Why trade North and South?

We have heard throughout the country about 'Laurier and larger markets.' You know, it is funny, but the Liberal party always have a slogan. But the trouble is they cannot get the people to take it up. They had a slogan in Ontario 'abolish the bar,' but when an election came on in the county of Middlesex, they could not even get a standard-bearer. And in the case of the Macdonald election, which they said was a test on the question of reciprocity, they could not get a Liberal standard-bearer and had to take an independent. It certainly must be a splendid policy—when they are all so much afraid of it. But, to return to the question of potatoes, I am not going to quote my own figures; I got these from the Customs Department. We have heard that 'Laurier and larger markets' would be a grand policy. But let us see how it turned out. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1912, we imported from the United States $388,680 worth of potatoes, and we exported to the 'larger markets' of the United States, $19,286 worth.

Mr. CARVELL: With the hon. gentleman's permission, I would ask if he would give us the figures for the first five months of the present fiscal year.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): I will give the figures for the year 1911. I have not the figures for the first five months of this year.

Mr. CARVELL: Will you go back two years?

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth): Yes, let us take the year ending March 31, 1911. In that year we imported from the United States $210,989 worth and exported $13,835 worth. I had not intended to give all these figures, but now that I have started I had better fully enlighten the hon. member for Carleton, N. B. But he is no more of a doubting Thomas than some of those I have in my own county. I went through the riding and sent out like literature showing the facts as taken from the Blue-books. One man said he did not believe it. And I told him these figures were from the Blue-books sent out by the Laurier Government. He would hardly believe it even then. I do not wonder at it not realizing that 'larger markets' simply meant greater competition in like products.

Now, take the case of apples. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1912, we imported from the United States $680,292 worth, if you want to go back further I will go with you, but I advise you not to; we exported into the United States in that year $21,429 worth. Not with the intention of rubbing it in, but for the further enlightenment of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., will that hon. gentleman listen while I state what we sent to Great Britain? In that year we sent $4,678,245 worth of apples to Great Britain. Do you wonder that the farmers of Wentworth did not take stock in 'Laurier and larger markets'?

Of bacon and hams we exported to the United States $82,241 worth and imported from the United States $1,473,296 worth; and we sent to Great Britain $7,821,246 worth. Of cheese we bought from the United States $47,616 worth and exported $31,653 worth—that is a somewhat 'larger market'—but we sent to Great Britain $20,733,064 worth. Take our trade in butter: We sent to the United States $103,819 worth, we imported from the United States $223,841 worth and sent to Great Britain $1,769,510 worth. Then take eggs: we exported to the United States $4,527 worth, and imported from the United States $1,613,108 worth. Of lard, we exported to the United States $34 worth, and imported from the United States $753,392 worth. Then take horses: we exported $312,639 worth to the United States, and imported from the United States $1,778,835 worth. We sent sheep and lambs to the United States of the value of $97,113, and we imported $578,055 worth from the United States. Where is the advantage in Laurier and larger markets?

The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick, made a statement about lath, and would practically lead the people to believe that the Government were robbing his constituents because of the duties they had to pay. I was surprised to find how the lath and shingle proposition works out. The present duty on lath, going into the United States, is 20 cents a thousand, but there is no duty coming into Canada. And, as I recollect it, the hon. gentleman said the duties paid amount to $127,000 taken out of the pockets of his constituents. It does not matter whether I am exactly right in that figure or not.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth).

The business-like Government that he supported was going to allow free entry into Canada, while the reciprocity treaty stated that the duty into the United States should be reduced from 20 cents a thousand to 10 cents a thousand. That shows the kind of business men they were—the fact that they made this jug-handled agreement with the United States. The hon. gentleman referred to shingles and made a statement of what his constituents paid on shingles going into the United States. Shingles are admitted into Canada free, but he was agreeing to have the duty upon shingles going into the United States reduced from 50 cents to 30 cents. Why not have the United States come down to our level before you make a treaty with them? But the trouble with the Liberal party has always been that they gave away everything, and then, when they start to make a treaty with the Yankees, the Yankees are ready to say: You will have to give us something else in order to make up for what we are now going to give to you.

We imported from the United States $123,102 worth of shingles, upon which there was no duty paid coming into Canada, and we exported to the United States $1,451,878 worth, and upon which the hon. member for Carleton states we paid $115,433 duty. Well, who is responsible for this duty being on? Certainly not the Conservative party of Canada. I would like to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to have it go down on 'Hansard' for the benefit of those who do not believe that the fruit and vegetable industry would have been injured by the proposed pact, that the value of fruit imported from the United States in 1912 was $2,150,194, and the total value of fruit exported to the land of 'Laurier and larger markets' was $161,143. Why ask us to take off the present duty and still further displace Canadian products?

I heard some hon. gentleman—I think it was the hon. member for Carleton, N. B., (Mr. Carvell) refer to what reciprocity would have done, and I think he said that he had nailed his colours to the mast, or words to that effect. Now, I would like to explain that there is not very much of the mast left for the member for Carleton. If he has nailed his colours to the mast, they have been pretty well shot to pieces. I do not know what flag he is flying, but I think it must look something like the stars and stripes; at any rate I do not think it has the red ensign with the cross of St. Andrew, St. George or St. Patrick. In 1904 the hon. member for Carleton had a majority of 274 in this House; in 1908 it was reduced to 151, and in 1911, when he had his reciprocity flag flying, the timbers of his free trade craft were so shattered that his majority was reduced to eleven! I think it is a lath that is left, and not a mast.

In regard to the statement made as to whether the pact could be repealed or not, I wish to quote from a statement made by W. O. Sealey, as reported in the Hamilton 'Times:'

It is no treaty, merely an agreement by joint legislation, and one of its clauses provides distinctly that either government can cancel it at any time. I have the assurance of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Minister of Finance, and other members of the House that if it works any injury to the fruit or vegetable growers or any others they would join me in having that section cancelled.

I do not wonder that the leader of the Opposition does not appreciate the remarks of his old-time followers. I quote further from the same article:

I think I can be safely relied upon to have that carried out, and in my own mind tonight I am fully satisfied that I can have made null any item that works to disadvantage.

It might be well for some young members of the House to ask the leader of the Opposition if he ever said that. It was given with such assurance throughout the county of Wentworth that some of the people swallowed it at any rate. However, I do not intend to ask him any questions; we defeated the Liberal candidate and that is the end of it.

A great deal has been said about the prices paid by the Dominion Canneries, but I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the Dominion Canneries are paying more for fruit than is being paid on the American side. For Ontario, tomatoes at the factory, $10 per ton is being paid, while American tomatoes cost $8 per ton; Ontario corn $7 to $8 a ton; American corn $5 to $6 a ton. Regarding potatoes, I would remind the hon. member for Carleton, N. B., that they are sold in Stratford for $1.40 to $1.65 a bag, and in my own town they are selling at $1.40 for delivery in January. The hon. member for Carleton, N. B., should send word to his friends down there to the effect that they should not look to the United States for the disposal of their products, but that the home market is the best. Ontario plums sold at 20 cents to 50 cents for eleven quarts weighing 18 pounds; American plums at 18 cents to 23 cents; Ontario pears, No. 1 Bartletts, at 50 cents per 11 quart basket; American pears at 32 cents to 40 cents. I could enumerate similar statistics at great length, but I have already taken up too much time, but I must again ask why did the Liberals want to make the Canadian fruit and vegetable grower compete with southern labour.

I agree with the hon. member for South York that we want better transportation facilities, and I hope that when the Minister of Agriculture brings down his Bill he will include in it provision for the creation of a fruit commission, to be stationed in the old country, in order to insure proper care of Canadian fruit shipped to British ports.

With regard to the Macdonald election, I want to say that wrong done on either side should be punished, I care not who is guilty. We had our experience, and a bitter experience it was, in the province of Ontario, but we cleaned out the stables, and have never had any trouble since.

Regarding the question of the reduction of the duty on cement, and the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in respect to the action of the Government in that matter, I do not think the hon. member for Edmonton is doing himself or his party any good in the stand he has taken on this question. I would also suggest to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that if they had not used their obstructive tactics last session, we would now have a tariff commission, which would have been enabled to secure the necessary information as to conditions existing in regard to cement. Why cast all the blame upon this side of the House? What have hon. gentlemen opposite been doing for the last fifteen years? The leader of the Opposition avowed himself a strong free trader; he had no use for protection. Why in the name of common sense did he not wipe off the tariff the duty on cement? Simply because hon. gentlemen opposite have never been returned to power on a trade question. Every time the Liberal party have appealed to the country on a trade question, they have met with defeat, and every time they have been elected it has been on a side issue. They tried to obscure the issue by drawing a herring across the trail, but it did not work.

A great deal has been said about pre-election promises. I have with me a promise that was made in my riding. You know how suddenly the election was sprung, and there was such great haste that they started to dig out a post office foundation. I had the fun of having a photographer take pictures of it day by day. The first day we had one man and a horse, the second day two men and a horse, and Mr. Sealey would come up and look at it. He thought he could be elected by putting up that post office. The result you all know. There is a post office just about completed; but the difference between the old post office and the new post office is that the Sealey look about it has been wiped off. I want to tell you what the Sealey look is. It meant this, we were going to have a plain brick building with a sort of fire hall look, and we were to have American hardware fittings and Indiana limestone, and these were to come from the American side. But the electors of the Dominion of Canada put a stop to that. I hope some members of the Liberal party will have the privilege and pleasure of coming to my town when that post office is completed and I will show them a post office built of Canadian brick and Canadian stone, cut by Canadian workmen, and of Canadian lime, Canadian cement, and Canadian lumber, to which my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., referred to as green lumber, and Canadian hardware will be used in that building. I do not refer to the member for Carleton, N.B., as green, I refer to the lumber. I wish to draw your attention to the fact how we changed the American hardware, and it was the result of the defeat of reciprocity. Here is the statement of the Yale & Towne Manufacturing Company :

General Offices, 9 Murray street,
New York City,
October 10, 1911.

To our Canadian customers:

You are already advised of our purpose to establish a branch plant in Canada for the better conduct and development of our Canadian business. We now have the pleasure of informing you that the plant will be located at St. Catharines, Ont., and that its business will be conducted by our subsidiary company, Canadian Yale and Towne, Limited. Buildings for the new plant are already under construction, and we hope to complete and occupy them early next year.

That is the result of the defeat of reciprocity. The Americans had to come over here and get the Canadian market, and that is why I am in favour of protection for the workingmen, for the farmer, for the vegetable grower, and for the manufacturer. Another result of the defeat of reciprocity is that in the city of Hamilton, the city which the county I represent surrounds, since September 21, 1911, we have some 12 new factories employing 2,087 men. That is a direct result of the defeat of reciprocity. We have in the city of Hamilton 44 American manufactories employing 12,087 men. That is the result of the National policy. I might go on adding to these facts, but I have taken up too much time already. Reciprocity, what did reciprocity mean ? I repeat it may not have meant territorial annexation, and if it did not mean territorial annexation it meant commercial annexation. I will go further and say it meant commercial annihilation. That is what it meant, and the people of the Dominion of Canada had enough common sense to turn it down.

The hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), referred to the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Ball) in not very high terms. He spoke of poor furniture which was a blow at a Canadian industry. The member for South Grey happens to be a furniture manufacturer, and the member for Carleton, N. B., is reported in 'Hansard' as saying :

I am told he has grown rich in manufacturing a pretty poor article of furniture out of green wood grown in Canada, with a protection of $35 on the $100.

Well, that is a slur on Canadian manufacturers; but do not let anybody in the House forget that at the present time you, Mr. Speaker, are sitting upon a chair made by a Canadian manufacturer in the town of Dundas, and that the chair that you occupied last year was made by the same firm, and had been ordered through Mr. Sealey. But the present chair has a nicer look about it. It is lighter. We have dispelled the darkness in this House now, and we have a lighter finished chair. Possibly, if I were to follow the example of the leader of the Opposition in his speech when you were made Speaker of this House, I might say we had too much Orange shellac on it, but the green cushion relieves all that. I want the Liberal members to look at that chair and see there the Canadian emblem the maple leaf Canada's coat of arms, with the British lions as sentinels, and everything that points to a true Canadian product. And yet the member for Carleton, N.B., referred to a Canadian manufacturer as a manufacturer of cheap furniture. But there is a sequel to that story of the chair, and I would like the Liberal members to keep it in mind. When the former chair was brought here, an announcement was made by Mr. Sealey that the chair had been made in the town of Dundas, and that he had secured the order for it. Well, an order was given for the new chair this year, and there was no announcement in the papers that I know of. The announcement I want to make to the House is that the Valley City Seating Company, the makers of the former chair, were the makers of the present chair, but the manufacturer's ideas were remoulded. He was a man who voted against reciprocity and the Speaker's chair is a monument to a Canadian manufacturer who put his country before his party. Let me read what this gentleman says:

The United States never treated Canada right in our mutual dealings heretofore. Canada always got the worst end of the deal. The American people want our foodstuffs and we did not need to come to their rescue in their party squabbles. Our tariff is the best tariff in the world, and we were doing well. We should have left well enough alone.

That was the language of that gentleman. What was the opinion expressed at the polls by the people of Canada? It was summed up in lines like this:

'Consider well 'tis not the time
To stunt our growing powers,
And place our country's destiny
In other hands than ours.
So let our final answer be,
We are not to be sold.
We'll shape the future for ourselves
And what we have, we'll hold.'

If some hon. gentlemen are nailing their colours to the mast of reciprocity, I want to nail my colours to adequate protection for the Dominion of Canada. I believe in protection; I am here representing the artisan, the fruit grower, the farmer, the vegetable grower, and the manufacturer, and I can stand on any platform and still say that I stand by the old leader, Sir John A. Macdonald. The following expresses my view:

There is another thing in which I believe. I believe in the protection of Canadian labour. The hand that holds Aladdin's lamp must be the hand of toil. This nation rests upon the shoulders of its workers, and I want the Canadian labouring man to have enough to wear. I want him to have enough to eat. I want him to have something for the ordinary misfortunes of life. I want him to have the pleasures of seeing his wife well dressed. I want him to see a few blue ribbons fluttering about his children. I want him to see the flags of health flying in their beautiful cheeks. I want him to feel that this is his country, and the shield of protection is above his labour.

And I will tell you why I am for protection, too. If we were all farmers we would be stupid. If we were all shoemakers we would be stupid. If we all followed one business, no matter what it was, we would become stupid. Protection to Canadian labour diversifies Canadian industry, and to have it diversified touches and develops every part of the human brain. Protection protects integrity; it protects intelligence; and protection raises sense; and by protection we have greater men and better looking women and healthier children. Free trade means that our labourer is upon an equality with the poorest paid labour of this world.

Mr Speaker, why ask our agriculturists to compete with Southern labor? When the hon. Minister of Agriculture brings down his report I hope that it will contain something of interest to the agriculturists of this country. I hope that something will be done to conserve the water powers of Canada. We have made a grand start in Ontario. All credit to the Hon. Adam Beck for the stand he has taken. If there ever was a Canadian who deserved knighthood it is he. What are we doing in the province of Ontario? We are giving electrical power to the farmer and we are giving it to him so as to make life on the farm not a daily round of drudgery. We expect that in a year or so we will have electric light and power in every home in the county of Wentworth and we are going to give the farmer electrical current at a price which is within his reach.

I hope that I shall have the privilege of addressing this House on the question, but I desire to say now that there is a question with which this House can deal and it is the question of better transportation. It is proposed by the Hydro-Electric Commission to construct radial lines along our transmission lines and when they come here and ask a subsidy for electric railroads along these transmission lines I hope the Dominion of Canada will grant it, and that Parliament will give us every assistance towards the improvement of transportation in Ontario and not only in Ontario alone but throughout the whole of the Dominion of Canada. Other parts of this Dominion have not been as progressive as Ontario has been in the advancement of the hydro-electric-power development. I have been told that I will soon be in the asylum with the ideas that I have on the hydro-electric question. But there is one idea that I hope the hon. Postmaster General will take up and if he does he will relieve the members of this House of a great deal of trouble. I want to see the rural mail delivery carried on by means of electricity. That may seem to some hon. members a wild statement; but I hope that, when I have the privilege of discussing this question in the House, I will be able to put it in such a form that you will see the possibility in the near future of the farmers having their letters and parcels delivered at their doors by electricity. Furthermore, I hope that the day will soon come when we will have control of our streets. I agree with my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) in some of his statements. We have given up too much already. At the present time we control nothing. The corporations have secured too large a control of our streets and public rights. I want to see the name of Canada written in large letters across the sky of progress. I am a Canadian and I believe in and have faith in this country.

Now then, in conclusion, I want to touch on the question that some people are apparently so afraid of touching upon, and that is the navy. I do not want to hide behind any such excuse as that of emergency. We should do what this country should have done years ago and I certainly have no sympathy with hon. members on the other side of the House who try to put words into the mouths of French members on this side of the House. You will see the French members on this side of the House standing side by side in their desire to support the Mother Country. All that we ask for is the protection of the British navy. What does it mean? It means the protection of the British subjects on land or sea, it does not matter whether the British subject is black or white, rich or poor. We are all under the protection of the British navy, the efficiency of which means the peace of the world. You cannot go too far. Make every one of us feel in this country that we are giving something; that is what I am prepared to do and I am as poor as Job's turkey as far as that goes. The hon. member for Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) says that we must show an emergency. Let them take that stand if they will, let them hide behind it if they will, but I stand for doing what we should have done long ago and in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will say:

To our British institutions
And traditions 'Hold we fast,'
'Follow close to old Trafalgar,
Nail the colours to the mast.'
Clinch the ties that bind us to them,
Give the world no cause to think
That the Empire chain will sever
At our firm Canadian link.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilson, Wentworth), who has just taken his seat made the quite unnecessary remark that he represented a peculiar riding, that will not prevent me from bearing witness to the fact that the House derived real entertainment from what he described as his maiden effort. In doing so I recall that in his speech at the opening of this debate, the right hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Borden) found fault with what he termed the grudging manner in which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had extended his congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address to be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General. To us on this side of the House, there did not seem to be any lack of cordiality in the felicitations which my right hon. friend extended to the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Rainville) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle); and it would be strange indeed if, at this stage in his parliamentary career, the right hon. gentleman had even for once omitted to display that courtesy and sympathy which the younger members of Parliament on both sides of the House have always received at his hands. Like so many other remarks made by the right hon. the Prime Minister, there was no real foundation for his remark in this case. The mover and the seconder of the Address acquitted themselves creditably; the leader of the Opposition bore cheerful testimony to that fact, and in extending his congratulations, the right hon. gentleman voiced the feeling of all his followers towards my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres and my hon. friend from Kingston.

Now, Sir, having regard to the amendment that we are discussing and to the circumstances that made the introduction of that amendment necessary, there was an omission on the part of the leader of the Opposition of which the Prime Minister might with much more propriety have complained. He might have complained that the leader of the Opposition had neglected to thank the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) for allowing him to make a speech in this House without being searched or threatened with arrest. The forbearance of the Minister of Public Works in this regard is all the more remarkable when we recall the indignities offered by his co-workers in the constituency of Macdonald to our fellow members from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier and Vaudreuil (Mr. Boyer) for daring to exercise the privilege of free speech in that riding. But fortunately for all of us who believe in plain speaking, this is not the constituency of Macdonald, and it is not Manitoba; it is not even the Ontario of one year ago, and by the time this debate is concluded, the Minister of Public Works will realize that when he started out on his public career he made a fatal mistake in selecting Bill Sykes and the Artful Dodger as his political models, and he will realize further that in this free Parliament of a free people there is no place for the methods of which he is the exemplar and the champion, and no respect for the man who employs these methods.

Before dealing with a few matters that have arisen in this debate, I desire to say a word or two about the Speech from the Throne. In one of its opening paragraphs reference is made to the copious and welcome stream of immigration that poured into this country during the past summer. As that was a direct result of the vigorous immigration policy of the late Government, we congratulate our hon. friends opposite on having continued that policy, and we are at one with them in hoping that a still more copious stream of immigration will pour into the Dominion during the next year. In connection with this subject, let me direct the attention of the Government to a despatch that appeared in our newspapers on November 22 last, the day after this session opened. It is dated London, November 21, and the part to which I direct attention is as follows:

Giving evidence before the Dominions' Royal Commission which concluded its sittings yesterday, Earl Grey urged that the poor law children of England should be sent to Canada or other Dominions. In so far as Canada was concerned, he was satisfied that they would be well cared for and well placed. He opposed the suggestion that the cost of immigration should be borne by the Imperial Government and thought the Dominion Government would be wise in making the investment itself.

Mr. John Burns, questioned as to Earl Grey's proposal regarding the emigration of poor law children, declared himself in full sympathy with the project, and said the Government were prepared to undertake a reasonable or increased expenditure.

If the suggestion contained in this despatch has been considered by the Government, I submit that Parliament should be informed at the earliest possible date as to whether the Government intends to employ the public funds in bringing these poor law children into Canada. It may be a laudable desire on the part of the people of England to rid themselves of such a burden, but before we assume it as part of our immigration policy we should be in possession of the facts and given ample time to consider them. The project is one that more particularly interests the representatives of labour and I have no doubt they will discuss it with the Government at the earliest opportunity, if indeed they have not already done so.

Further on in the Speech from the Throne there is an intimation that the Government will introduce a Bill for the improvement of highways; and presumably this Bill will be similar to the one introduced last session. If it is, and if the Minister of Railways and Canals will keep the promise he made in the House last session, there will be little difference of opinion regarding it. However, as the position of the Liberal party in Parliament with regard to the Bill of last session has been persistently misrepresented for the purpose of making political capital against us, I wish to restate it now so that there may be no further question about it. In moving for leave to introduce this Highway Bill last year the Minister of Railways and Canals stated, in reply to certain questions of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, that the money to be disbursed under that Bill would be payable on the same basis as subsidies are paid to the provinces, namely, on the basis of population. But the Bill, when brought down by the minister, contained no such provision. It was forced through this House despite our efforts to insert such a provision, and later on, the Senate amended it by adding a section containing the promise made to this House by the Minister of Railways and Canals. When the Bill came back from the Senate it was killed by the Government because it simply embodied the promise made to us by the Minister of Railways himself. That is a correct summary of what happened last session, and if the minister has gained wisdom by experience he will not attempt to trifle with Parliament again.

Turning from the Speech itself, let me direct the attention of the House to an observation made by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in seconding the Address. The hon. gentleman, when speaking of the navy, said that in his judgment the general attitude on the question was one of doubt and uncertainty. In saying that, he was describing rather the attitude of his own party friends than the attitude of the general public, and so applied it is a perfectly correct description. How, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, could the attitude of any honest Conservative who scrutinizes the tortuous course of his leader on the navy question, be anything but one of doubt and uncertainty. He will see that in the first place in 1909 his leader declared for a navy built, manned, and owned in Canada; that in February, 1910, that same leader declared for a contribution equalling the price of two dreadnoughts, but leaving it to the Admiralty to say how the money should be spent; that in November, 1910, he declared against a contribution of any kind without first consulting the people; that in 1911 he made common cause with the Nationalists, who are opposed alike to a contribution and to a navy, and that in 1912 he has worked at home and abroad to find an expedient that will at one and the same time satisfy the jingoes and not drive away the Nationalists. And now we are told the right hon. the Prime Minister is about to propose an emergency contribution, the repeal of the Naval Service Bill, and further delay in adopting a permanent naval policy. Little wonder, Sir, that the Conservative who contemplates such a record as that, would be in a state of doubt and uncertainty as to what such a leader would do next. But, that doubt and uncertainty does not extend to the Liberals of Canada. In 1912, as in 1909, they believe in a navy built manned and owned in Canada, ready at all times to respond to the Empire's call if danger threatens and increasing in strength and efficiency as the people of Canada increase in numbers and in wealth.

Speaking in this debate last week, the Minister of Finance took high ground in repelling certain attacks made upon his administrative action with regard to the reduction of the duty on cement; but, the ground he took, I am bound to say, was not any higher than the opinion which he seems to hold of himself. On general principles, I do not blame him for that, particularly when I recall what his colleague the Minister of Labour said, about him at St. Thomas, on October 29, 1911. There was a nomination meeting in St. Thomas on that date, and the Ottawa Citizen of October 30, 1911, reported the Minister of Labour as having said:

> In the selection of Mr. Borden of his Finance Minister, the Hon. Mr. White, he was bringing strength and integrity into his Cabinet, which it might be difficult to get elsewhere.

If that was in the highest degree complimentary to my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, it was pretty rough on all the rest of the Tory party; but evidently my hon. friend endorses every word of it. Last week he demanded an apology because the leader of the Opposition and the member for Edmonton had accused him of reducing the duty on cement for the purpose of influencing the result of the Saskatchewan elections. How does he really stand with regard to that matter? To make out a case in support of his assertion that the cut in the cement duty was not made for the purpose of influencing the Saskatchewan elections, it was necessary for him to convince the House and the country that his attention had first been drawn to the practical effect of the cement shortage in the West on a date so close to the date of those elections, that his action would appear to be continuous from the date of receiving his first intimation up to the day on which the duty was cut in two. He proceeded to do this by reading a communication dated May 31, 1912, and he followed that up by reading other communications from the West on dates subsequent to the 31st of May last. Unfortunately for himself and his contention, he read one communication too many. I refer to the communication from Mr. C. N. Bell, of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, which the minister read in the following terms:

Winnipeg, June 7, 1912.

Please refer this Board's resolution December nineteenth and subsequent correspondence re cement merger contending rate of duty on this necessary article is excessive and petitioning Dominion Government for reduction or abolishment of duty. Since your letter March eighteenth stating matter would be laid before Government for consideration this board without any further advice. Serious shortage cement exists throughout western Canada. Building operations at standstill and erection of many postponed indefinitely. This board urge immediate action by Government in reduction or abolishment of duty as necessary to alleviate present serious situation.

C. N. BELL.

This communication reveals the fact that the Winnipeg Board of Trade had on the 19th of December, 1911, and on other dates thereafter, pointed out to the Government and to the Minister of Finance that there was a cement merger, that the rate of duty on cement was excessive, and had petitioned the Government for the reduction or abolishment of that duty. It further shows that, apart from other letters which the Minister of Finance may have received or sent, the Winnipeg Board of Trade specifically referred him to his own letter of March 18, 1912, in which he stated that the matter would be laid before the Government for consideration, and that from the date up to the date of this communication on June 7, 1912, the Winnipeg Board of Trade had been without any further advice from the Government. In other words, the Minister of Finance slept at his post from March until June and he asks us to believe that his waking up then was due to his discovery that one particular firm was suffering. And you will note that the particular firm happened to be a Winnipeg firm. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is subjecting our credulity to a test that even the best of cement would not stand.

He said that his action had nothing to do with politics, that the reduction in the duty happened to synchronize—'I thank thee, Jew for teaching me that word,'—with the Saskatchewan elections. Why did not the minister frankly say that the cut in the duty was timed to synchronize with a certain banquet in Regina, and that it was all carefully arranged by the Government stage manager, the present Minister of Public Works? He might as well have done so, because the records available to the public disclose the whole story. The Order in Council authorizing the reduction in duty was passed on Saturday, June 8, but no announcement was made on that day or on Sunday, June 9, but on Monday, June 10, the Minister of Public Works, in the course of his speech at his widely advertised banquet in Regina, said:

I have to-day received from my leader a telegram stating that the duty on cement has been cut in two and the farmers of western Canada may now rest assured of an immediate supply of cement.

There is the synchronism; but I suppose the Minister of Finance in his 'strength and integrity,' to quote the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), would also ask us to believe that the sending of that telegram, so that the announcement might be made at the Regina banquet, was another accident, and formed no part of a specially arranged plan. It would be so unlike the Minister of Public Works to arrange anything of the kind! That, however, is not all the evidence proving collusion between the ministers, and how nicely the announcement was timed to produce political effect. The Order in Council was passed on Saturday, June 8th, and, although it is customary to issue an extra edition of the Canada Gazette whenever there is an important change of policy, which is to go into immediate effect, that course was not followed in this case, and the Order in Council was not published in the Canada Gazette until the 15th of June, when it appeared for the first time in these terms.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Five days after the banquet.

Mr. MURPHY (reading):

The Governor General in Council is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered as follows:—Upon the application by importers of Portland cement and hydraulic or water lime, in barrels, bags or casks, described in tariff item 290 of the Customs Tariff, 1907, for remission of customs duty on such Portland cement and hydraulic or water lime, and the bags in which the same is imported as described in tariff item 291, which have been entered on and after the twelfth day of June, 1912, and upon which duty has been paid, one-half of the duty so paid shall be refunded.

The concession for remission of the customs duty on Portland cement, and hydraulic or water lime, and coverings, as hereinbefore set forth, shall only be granted from the 12th day of June, 1912, to the 31st day of October, 1912, both days inclusive.

The publication of this Order in Council in the Canada Gazette shall be deemed to be communication of its provisions to such importers.

RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was three days after it went into force.

Mr. MURPHY: You will observe that this announcement states that the remission of the duty was to date from June 12, 1912. The situation therefore, was this: the importers, received official notice from the Government through the Canada Gazette on June 15th, but the voters of Saskatchewan had received political notice from the Minister of Public Works on June 10, five days previously. The dissolution of the Saskatchewan Legislature took place on June 17, just one week after the Regina announcement, and this remarkable conjunction of dates and events the Minister of Finance describes as merely a 'synchronism.' Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentleman came to this House with a deservedly high reputation; but in his juggling with this cement duty, he evidently fell a victim to the wiles of the Minister of Public Works, and his defence of his action, I regret to say, did not add to his own good name.

Now, Sir, I ask the indulgence of the House while I refer as briefly as possible to the issues raised by the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. That amendment refers to two by-elections and in each the conduct of the Minister of Public Works is directly impugned. So far as the Richelieu by-election is concerned there is no doubt that a most glaring attempt was made to bribe the electors. That was admitted by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) this afternoon, whose defence of the serious charge made against him went no further than to exonerate the Minister of Public Works from having given him a proxy to use at Sorel. The honours lie between them, and they can divide them as they please. But the case of the Macdonald election is vastly different. There the whole machinery of justice has been prostituted to the basest party ends and the moral sense of the country has been shocked to a degree which the Government is only beginning to appreciate. The facts relating to the illegal arrest of Sifton, Sullivan, Prince and Walkinshaw have been fully submitted to the House and it is not necessary to repeat them. But it will not be out of place to add a few expressions of public opinion to those which have been cited by previous speakers. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) read to the House the resolution passed by the Presbyterian Synod of Manitoba. During the week following the adoption of that resolution a public meeting of protest against the outrages perpetrated in Macdonald was held in Winnipeg, and at that meeting Rev. D. S. Hamilton, is reported by the Winnipeg Free Press as having spoken as follows:

Glad of Synod's Action.

Rev. D. S. Hamilton referred to the agitation that had already been made against the actions of the Government. They had the platform and the press. They had had the church and now at last they had the people. Mr. Hamilton said he was glad that the synod had taken the stand that it did last week. He was glad that the organ of the Government had seen fit to abuse a man honoured by the city, by the province, by the Dominion, by the great republic to the south and by the whole world. He would have been glad to have seen Rev. Dr. Gordon on the platform so that he might know that Wininpeg admired the stand that he took. They saw the design of the organ of the Government. It could not attack the synod as a whole and it had to attack one individual. The synod had the old fashioned doctrine of the perseverance of the saints and it would go on in the sure and certain hope of triumph.

In order to make it plain that the indignation which has been aroused is not confined to one part of the country or to one side of politics, let me read the following expressions of public opinion. The first is from the Ottawa Citizen, the Government organ in this city. Speaking of the Macdonald election the Citizen says:

That it was a bitterly fought contest is certain. That influences quite apart from those of logic were used seems also certain. There has been a tremenduous amount of smoke, and the assumption of fire is unavoidable. From both sides come charges of financial manipulation. Apparently, the will of the people has not been in evidence, and money has been talking more loudly than common sense.

The second expression of editorial opinion is from the Halifax Chronicle, a Liberal newspaper. The Chronicle says:

One of the first duties which the Liberal Opposition at Ottawa should undertake when Parliament assembles next month is to demand that there shall be a thorough and searching investigation by a committee of the House of commons into the methods employed on behalf of the Government forces in the recent by-election in Macdonald. This is a matter which concerns not merely the people of Manitoba and the constituency in which the contest was held; it is of vital concern to the people of the whole Dominion. Canada's reputation is at stake, and the right of free speech and the liberty of the subject must be vindicated.

And what answer to all this did we have from the Minister of Public Works? Not only did he flout the Synod, the press and the public, but he justified all the outrages committed in Macdonald. And, as his conduct has not been condemned by any of his colleagues in this House, they must share the responsibility that he has assumed for these outrages. And how did he justify them? He made no attempt whatever to do so in the case of Prince and Walkinshaw. In the case of Sifton, the hon. minister alleged that this man had committed illegal practices in years past, and he read three affidavits designed to support this statement. Even if this charge were true it would furnish no ground for Sifton's arrest in Macdonald, but the minister wholly ignored the fact that Sifton was neither put in jail nor brought to trial. As two of the affidavits read by the minister were furnished by the alleged special constables who arrested him, the disposal made by the magistrate of Sifton's case, apart from any other circumstance, effectually refutes whatever statements these constables may have sworn to. The third affidavit, that of the poor halfbreed, requires no comment. As to Sullivan, the minister achieved his crowning stroke by merely stating that this man was a nephew of 'Cap' Sullivan, of Ontario; and this relationship was, in the minister's opinion, quite sufficient to justify his arrest.

Mr. BLAIN: With the hon. gentleman's permission, I would like to ask where the minister made that statement?

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman will find it through the minister's speech where he referred to Sullivan.

Mr. BLAIN: I would like the hon. gentleman to show where?

Mr. MURPHY: I have read 'Hansard', and I refer my hon. friend to 'Hansard'.

Mr. BLAIN: The hon. gentleman cannot find it. What he says is unfair.

Mr. MURPHY: Now, Sir, I am not here to justify any infractions of the election law, no matter by whom committed. But, in justice to Captain Sullivan, there is this to be said, that whenever he took part in an election, he had the courage to face the consequence of his own acts, and he never tried to shelter himself behind a bogus Dominion detective, a venal police magistrate, or a drunken half-breed.

Mr. LANCASTER: Is not the hon. gentleman aware that this Sullivan of whom he speaks, after the occasion of the elections in which some of his outrageous acts were committed, went under an assumed name and nobody could find out where he was?

Mr. MURPHY: I am aware that on one occasion he explained that he had signed another name than his own, just as the Minister of Public Works and Sir Rodmond Roblin are charged with having done in St. Paul.

Mr. LANCASTER: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, that is not the question I asked him. Is not he aware——

Mr. MURPHY: I answered the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANCASTER. I say is not he aware that it was proven that on several occasions—that of the West Elgin election being one—this gentleman could not be traced for six months afterwards because he dodged in every place, giving his real name?

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend has spoken of Cap. Sullivan; I thought his inquiry related to Mr. Sullivan, of Regina.

Mr. LANCASTER: But you were talking about Cap. Sullivan?

Mr. MURPHY: I did make reference to him, but, ridiculous as was the reason advanced by the Minister of Public Works to justify the arrest of J. J. Sullivan, of Regina, it disappears completely if the alleged relationship does not exist. Hon. gentlemen will remember how melodramatically the minister turned to his followers and, amidst the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite, made the statesmanlike announcement that Sullivan was a nephew of Cap. Sullivan, and therefore a most desperate character. You will also recollect that the minister offered no proof in support of his statement, but that did not lessen the pride of his followers in his matchless logic. He offered no proof, for the very good reason that there was none to offer; yet the minister's extraordinary argument, if such it can be called, was given wide publicity in his party press, and that very publicity, designed to add to the minister's peculiar glory, has resulted in his undoing. When Mr. Sullivan, of Regina, read what the minister had said about him, he sent a telegram to the member for Saltcoats, which that hon. gentleman has handed to me so that it may be communicated to the House. That telegram reads as follows:

Regina, Sask., Nov. 29 1912.

Thos. McNutt, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Rogers' statement absolutely false. Am not related or in any way connected with Cap. Sullivan.

J. J. SULLIVAN.

The only other observation I have to make for the benefit of hon. gentlemen who cheered the Minister of Public Works, is that before his next set piece is presented to this House, they should have a private rehearsal with him, so as to ascertain how much of it is fact and how much fiction, and then they may regulate their applause accordingly.

In order that the House may fully appreciate just what credence may be attached to any statement made by the Minister of Public Works, let me refer for a moment to the 'Hansard' report of his speech of Thursday last, the 29th of November. Replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), the minister said :

Mr. ROGERS: If the hon. gentleman will wait a minute I will tell him. The hon. gentleman opposite told us here the other day that a protest had been entered against the election of the member for Macdonald, and I now tell these gentlemen opposite that a counter protest has been entered against their candidate.

When I heard the minister make that statement, I thought it strange that in view of all the publicity given to the Macdonald election, we had not seen or heard anything about the counter protest which the minister stated had been entered against the Opposition candidate. Accordingly I wired to Winnipeg for information, and on Friday, November 29th, the day after the minister had made this statement, I received a telegram informing me that up to that time no counter protest had been entered. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works will not be allowed further scope to set at defiance all the rules of public life. In view of his last offence, he should either apologize to this House or resign. If he does neither, and the Prime Minister refrains from doing his obvious duty in the matter, then, Sir, I submit the whole conduct of the Minister of Public Works in connection with the Macdonald election and this debate would very properly form the subject of a special representation to His Royal Highness the Governor General, who has the right to demand from all his advisers a much higher conception of public duty than that displayed by this present Minister of Public Works.

The course of the debate has made it clear that the amendment will be defeated by the votes of the Prime Minister and his followers, and the result will be heralded by the Tory press throughout the country as another great victory. But, Sir, that will not by any means be the end of the Macdonald election scandal. During the fourteen months that have elapsed since this Government was returned to power, we have been told over and over again that the intelligent electors throughout the Dominion, irrespective of party, voted in great numbers for the Borden candidates at the last election because these men were pledged to save the country from a danger that was then said to be impending. May I ask, Sir, if these same intelligent electors have not now to be reckoned with? Undoubtedly they have, and when the man who is supposed to represent them in the Cabinet, the hon. Minister of Finance, is called upon, as he will be called upon, to explain in what respect this Macdonald election scandal differs from the scandals that turned the independent vote against the Tory party in 1896 and helped to drive it from power in disgraceful defeat, he will have a task that no man will envy. As the hon. Minister of Finance is fond of dipping into the classics, I will suggest to him as the text for his explanation that old Latin maxim, 'facilis decensus Averni,' and it would be well for some other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to take the same maxim to heart before they vote against this amendment.

Mr. CHARLES A. WILSON (Laval): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has so very properly said, the Speech from the Throne is remarkable for what it contains, as well as for what it does not contain. The first paragraph of the document informs us that during the course of the present year His Royal Highness spent several months visiting the most important places of the Dominion, from ocean to ocean, in order to familiarize himself with prevailing conditions. Certainly no one can take exception to that paragraph, and to the following ones, which refer to the rapid and steady increase of trade in Canada, and the anticipation that this trade will increase more in each and every year; that the total volume of our trade for the present fiscal year will greatly surpass that of any previous year. Nor can we take exception to that portion of the Address which reminds the people of the expansion of our revenues, and the activity, progress and prosperity evidenced in every branch of Canadian industry.

That visit of His Royal Highness conveys a lesson to every citizen of this country, and to every member of this House. The geographical material, commercial, and even social conditions of this great country vary so much from one end of it to the other that no man can be well informed unless he familiarizes himself with them by travel. This remark is addressed, with all due respect, more particularly to the population of the East for the reason that the greater portion of the pioneers in the West have gone from the East and have the advantage of knowing the conditions there as well as in the East. But the Easterner is not so well informed of the conditions of the country because he has not the advantage of travelling so far as the westerner. As one of the remedies that might be applied to the situation, I would suggest an interchange of students between the universities, colleges and schools, following in this respect the example set by the late Cecil Rhodes, and carrying it on along similar lines if possible. After a certain period the students would return to their homes and give the benefit of their study and observation to their fellow-countrymen. That would advance their education and modify their judgment on many points, and it would be to the advantage of the commonwealth at large.

My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who so ably seconded the Address, made a few remarks on this subject with which I will join issue. He said that we hear from time to time in this House from members opposite, referring to the members of the Liberal party, that there is antagonism between Ontario and the West. I would like to tell my hon. friend that there is worse than antagonism, there is ignorance, and ignorance is the cause of many evils, not only between Ontario and the West, but between the East and the West. According to what we hear and read, some people seem to me to know just as much about Quebec as a darkey from the Congo knows about Manchuria. I draw the attention of my hon. friend and his friends to the fact that there is a population of 2,000,000 in Quebec which they have classified as a very inferior race. I believe with my hon. friend, and I will support him in his contention, that one of the problems that exist in Canada to-day is that of assimilating the immigrant. I believe in that, and I am a strong supporter of my hon. friend on that point. That is all very well, but charity begins at home. Let us begin by assimilating ourselves, by developing a true sense of citzenship and of Canadianism, and let us start with unbiased minds and with a recognition of the good little principle that all men are equal. Let us have a little more tolerance, a little more respect for the rights of the minority. A little message to my hon. friend's friend, Sir James Whitney, concerning the teaching and speaking of the French language in Ontario would help greatly to minimize the antagonism between the races in that province at least. At the same time, my hon. friend might take the opportunity of pointing out to Sir James the example set by the province of Quebec on this subject. He might inquire from the minority in that province how it is treated.

In connection with this question, the noble words that fell from the lips of my hon friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) the other night are most commendable if sincere, and we have no reason to doubt his sincerity. His noble sentiments might help to crush the conspiracy alluded to by my hon. friend, that infamous and infernal conspiracy which is on foot to deprive the French-Canadian of his language, and as a equence, to deprive him of his customs, history, traditions, and institutions.

Coming now to the naval defence scheme. We read in the eighth paragraph in the Speech from the Throne :

> Important discussions took place and conditions have been disclosed which in the opinion of my advisers render it imperative that the effective naval forces of the Empire should be strengthened without delay. My advisers are convinced that it is the duty of Canada at this juncture to afford reasonable and necessary aid for that purpose. A Bill will be introduced accordingly.

It is impossible for the moment to discuss that part of the Speech, because the policy of the Government is still hidden among the icebergs in the high seas. But one might say that the words 'without delay' convey a meaning of something pressing, emergent, something that cannot and should not be delayed one minute. That is my view of it, and I do not think I am mistaken. Now the stalwart brigade of four musketeers have banished all peaceful signs from our country. It has trembled with rumours of war, and of German menace since they put their iron heels on the banks of the St. Lawrence. Even the Postmaster General went as far in the Hochelaga election to threaten us with civil war. My hon. friend appears to deny that but we are so used on this side of the House to denials from the other side, that I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) to say it openly so that we may know what he means. Three months have passed since the right hon. the Prime Minister was informed that there was an emergency. Was there an emergency in July or August? When the Prime Minister came back to our shores, we had an announcement that the policy of the Government would be made known. Nothing of the sort happened. We have been sitting in this House nearly a fortnight, and no Bill has appeared so far. Perhaps my right hon.

friend (Mr. Borden) is sleeping or meditating over it. At any rate we do not know yet. We saw that the real first minister, the king of Manitoba, not the make-believe prime minister, not the king of the make-believe castle nor the prince of the make-believe castle, caused an order to be put on the Order Paper to the effect:

That the order for the consideration of a motion for the Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, have precedence over all other business, except introduction of Bills until disposed of.

Now, if there is imminent danger, if there is an emergency, to put it in the form which is more familiar to the people, why is there not a Bill in our hands now? Is the Prime Minister still meditating on it? We see in the papers every day that we are going to have it this week. Well, so much the better, for everybody is expecting it, and the more he delays the more he will give the impression that the emergency is not so great after all. Canada is waiting anxiously to hear the long-expected announcement of the naval policy which is to put Laurier's so-called tin-pot navy to shame, and to cause the German navy to flee from the North sea.

But no Bill has been produced so far, and we are still waiting. The Prime Minister seems to be afraid. I cannot blame him for his hesitation because he has not convinced himself that there is a menace. He does not feel that he is sufficiently afraid himself to play his part in the drama, and he is rehearsing behind the curtain. Let us wait for the raising of the curtain.

Some incidents have happened since the last session of Parliament which this House wants to hear something about, and one of them, not the least, is an explanation of what has become of the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works and member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and, more important, what has become of his portfolio. The man may disappear from public view, but the portfolio is here for all time to come. We find that the portfolio is in the hands of a minister but that the former minister is gone. Has he gone asleep, or has he gone to weep, or both? He is not in his seat. Unfortunately he is ill and that accounts for his absence. He has the sympathy of everybody on account of his bad health. Yes, he is ill and it is no wonder. I presume that the atmosphere of this Cabinet was too strong for this drooping lily of the valley of Nationalism. He has tendered no explanation of his retirement so far beyond the refusal of the Government to implement the promise of a plebiscite made to the electors of Quebec. That is no reason. It is a fact of ancient history, a fact as remote as his Lachine speech delivered befor his entrance into the Cabinet. Has he forgotten the pledges which he had given before he was sworn in as a Minister of the Crown? Did he denounce that pledge to his leader there? Was he promised that this pledge would be respected by the Prime Minister? Was he deceived by his leader? There is no word of explanation on this point. All we know is that he was disgusted with his colleagues and followers of the House who abandoned him as did the brothers of Joseph.

Mr. OLIVER: And sold him into bondage.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): They have sold him for promises of jobs, favours and offices, and, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, as the Premier put it very nicely, being a high-minded man and acting with a high sense of duty saw fit to resign his position in the Government. That explains why my hon. friend the Secretary of State Mr. Coderre is there now. This high-minded man with that high sense of duty saw that there was no room for him in this Cabinet. But is the ex-Minister of Public Works such a high-minded man and possessed of such a high sense of duty? I doubt it very much. He is ill; he is not in his seat now. We hope he will soon recover, and when he resumes his seat we will discuss this phase of his career in his presence. We want to be fair to him. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier is gone, but the portfolio would not follow him. It had to be given to someone else. There were, of course, scores of high-minded men with a high sense of duty in the rank and file of the Conservative party. There was the hon. T. Chase Casgrain, ex-member of this House, ex-minister of the Crown in the province of Quebec, ex-Attorney General, member of the Waterways Commission and a lawyer second to none in this Dominion; there was Mr. Marechal, King's Counsel, Montreal; there was Mr. Bisaillon, ex-batonnier of the bar, Montreal, and Mr. Beaubien, chief organizer of my right hon. friend in Montreal, all men very high-minded and all possessing a high sense of duty. Public rumour put them forward for the portfolio. I do not know whether that rumour is well founded or not, but what is certain is that these gentlemen with a high sense of duty, did not take the portfolio. Of course, with this qualification, I need not refer to the material that the Prime Minister had at his back in this House. The concrete fact is that my personal friend, the Secretary of State, has a portfolio now. He took it up. He jumped at the offer. He is a member of the Government, and feels very happy there replacing a gentleman who was actuated by a high sense of duty and who, being a high-minded man, could not stay there any longer. The newly appointed minister told the electors during the recent election that he had gone to Ottawa, not to be a minister, but to get a position on the bench and now he finds himself in the Windsor gold lace instead of the white ermine. Was the ermine too white for him? The portfolio of Public Works is now in the hands of the hon. ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers). Here is the explanation, it seems to me. Probably the Public Works portfolio, falling from the hands of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, had such a strong smell of Nationalism, that the Prime Minister, like the inquisitive wife of Bluebeard with the blood-stained key, wanted to rid the portfolio of this odor. The portfolio had been in the hands of a minister from Quebec. The right hon. gentleman seemed to be quite embarrassed at first. He thought of giving it to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), but he thought, very wisely, that the smell of Nationalism would grow stronger if it were placed in the hands of that hon. gentleman, the hon. Postmaster General being a Nationalist although, of course, he denies it. The Premier knows better. The hon. Postmaster General changes his allegiance very often. His life is a book in many chapters, and every chapter relates the story of a fresh change. Then there was the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel).

Mr. LANCASTER: Will the hon. gentleman mind informing me what authority he is reading from?

Mr. WILSON (Laval): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman who has just got up should understand, that when we, the French members from the province of Quebec are fair enough to prepare our speeches in his own language in order that he should understand them, he should not be so severe in insisting upon the rule of the House.

Mr. LANCASTER: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): I have the floor.

Mr. LANCASTER: I understand that the hon. gentleman is not reading any authority, but is reading his own speech. If so, he is outside the rules of the House.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): I am consulting my notes, and I am not reading from a book or from a paper. The hon. gentleman gave us so much in 1908 and 1909 in this House——

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understand, the hon. member rises to a point of order.

I may say in reference to it that Dr. Flint says in his third edition:

Written speeches not permissible. It is a rule in both Houses of Parliament that a member must address the House orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech.

That is the rule.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): There are my notes and I will not use them any more. There was the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. My right hon. friend thought of giving him the portfolio, but the Minister of Inland Revenue is known as a heavyweight Nationalist in Quebec. He also denies this, but my hon. friend knows better. At the very moment when the Prime Minister was meditating in his office, as to whom he would turn over the portfolio, the King of Manitoba came in, the man who is reported to have said: To Heavens with Quebec. Mr. Reporter, substituted for that a word commencing with the letter H and ending with a dash, because it would not be polite to use that word in this House. At all events, this gentleman said to the Prime Minister, I will take charge of that portfolio, and the Prime Minister was delighted to give it to him because he was sure that in the hands of the late Minister of the Interior, the rose of Nationalism would disappear entirely and another perfume would come to that portfolio, a perfume a little sweeter to the olefactory nerves of the Prime Minister.

I had the greatest pleasure in listening to-night to my namesake, Mr. Wilson, who represents Wentworth; we have the same name, but we do not belong to the same clan. He had his friends cheer him to the ceiling, because he quoted small figures for our trade with the United States and very large figures with respect to our trade with the mother country My hon. friend is against reciprocity, there is no doubt about that; and he is in favour of the British preference, that is plain enough too. But there was a time when the Conservatives were not so much in favour of British preference, and as we on this side of the House sometimes read, we can refer back to the utterances of these gentlemen at that period of their political existence.

The ex-Minister of Public Works was not at one time in favour of the British preference, and his departure from the Cabinet no doubt lifts a burden from the shoulders of the Prime Minister in that respect. I shall read an extract from 'Hansard' to prove that. I have the right to read this extract, as anyone can find out by consulting Bourinot on that point. On April 8, 1902, my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) was Postmaster General, and on page 2414, vol. 1 of 'Hansard' for 1902, I find:

Mr. MONK: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask if he favours the present one-sided British preference?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Undoubtedly, Sir, I favour that one-sided preference because it tends to alleviate the burden of taxation that lay heavy upon the consumers under the old tariff.

In 1903, Mr. Monk was speaking in this House, with reference to the British preference of which the supporters of the Government are so proud now, and on March 13 of that year ('Hansard' page 59, vol. 1) he said:

At present, under the preferential clause, we are sacrificed to the great manufacturers of Great Britain.

I repeat to-day what I said on a former occasion, when challenged by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to express an opinion on this preferential clause, that if we gave a preference to Great Britain, we should in return have some corresponding advantage in the British market.

That opinion, I believe is held by many others, and that is the policy which my hon. friend the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) and myself advocated in this House long ago.

Ready and willing as we were to give Great Britain a preference, we were not prepared to grant such a preference as would imperil in any way our own great industrial interests.

Speaking in this House on March 26, 1901, Mr. Monk said:

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the amendment which is now under discussion, I wish to be as brief as possible, and I lay before you the proposition: That by the preference which we are granting to Great Britain we lose in this country a sum stated in round figures to be $2,000,000 a year. I say we are losing that sum, because I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to prove to us that upon the articles exported from England and which reach here under the British preference, the consumer really gets the benefit of that preference. It goes as we all know—and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot establish the contrary—it goes to enrich the British manufacturer. It goes practically as a bounty to the manufacturers of Sheffield and Manchester and Bradford, as against our Canadian manufacturers, and we consumers in Canada do not derive the benefit which we ought to derive from that preference. Under these circumstances the question arises: Whether this lavishness, this immense degree of favour extended to a class of people who extend no favour to us is justified in the present state of this young country. Is our financial position such that we can afford to make this distribution of wealth in England where it is not required, to the detriment of our people?

I wonder if the Prime Minister when in England recently went to Sheffield, Manchester and Bradford and repeated what his ex-colleague said about them. Perhaps by the way, those British merchants have got rich enough out of British preference to be able to subscribe money to their navy so that we need not spend much as a contribution to the Empire. Then, on March 22, 1899, Mr. Monk, after referring to the benefit the preference had conferred on England said:

This is money taken out of our pockets to form the vaunted surplus which the Government is supposed to have in its coffers. But where is our profit?

I commend these remarks of the Hon. Mr. Monk to our friends on the Conservative side of the House, who are now so loud in their praise of the British preference.

The Speech from the Throne is interesting for what it contains, as it is interesting for what it does not contain. During the visit of the Canadian ministers to England last summer, I wonder if they consulted the Imperial authorities about the Panama canal. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Barnard) said that not a week passed in his town but that Europeans were coming forward and buying land in view of the trade that it is supposed will develop through the Panama canal. I wonder if the Prime Minister consulted anybody in England as to the status of our ships in passing through that canal and as to what might be expected to become of our Canadian trade in that respect. Whether the Prime Minister did consult anyone in England or not, there is not a word in the Speech about it. Then, the Speech is silent about the Georgian Bay canal and what has my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. White) to say? He was eloquent about the Georgian Bay canal when we were in power, but he has not opened his mouth about it since 1911. Mute also is the Speech on the question of the high cost of living.

It seems to me the Government should be informed of the terribly high cost of living, and some investigation should be made in order to alleviate the burden that crushes the poor consumer.

The Speech from the Throne is equally silent on the question of the Civil Service, the outside service especially. There is no mention of increases in salaries in the Customs, the Post Office, the Inland Revenue, the Penitentiaries, and so forth. I am delighted to see my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, in his seat. He promised last year that a Bill would be introduced this session increasing the salaries of the employees in the penitentiaries. I must give him credit for the bonus given to that class of employees, but it is not a permanent condition of affairs, and a Bill should be introduced at once raising and fixing the salaries of those public servants to assure them of at least three meals a day.

The Speech is also silent about the Copyright Bill. Can the Minister of Agriculture tell us if he has any fresh news from Mr. Buxton? I see that a Copyright Bill has been passed in the House of Commons in Great Britain, and I understand it can be enforced at any time here by proclamation, by His Excellency the Governor General.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues are also silent on the order passed in the House on the 24th of January last, for the production of the list of all the employees guillotined by the new administration since they came into power. The other day the Prime Minister said he had fulfilled all his pledges. That was more than a pledge, but there is no answer yet. At the end of last session, I reminded my hon. friend that the people of the country wanted to know exactly how many heads had been chopped off since the 21st of September, 1911. His answer was that it was a very comprehensive and a very long list, but we have the Auditor General, we have the Minister of Finance, and as those employees must be paid at the end of the month, the pay rolls would tell the story in a minute. I presume they do not want to produce it, that they are afraid, or are too busy chopping heads off, and have no time yet to count the victims. At the end of the session the Prime Minister pledged his word that this list would be furnished to me during the recess, yet nothing has been done so far. I hope my hon. friend, after the baby we all expect has been born, will have time to rest a little, and will give us the information we desire.

My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) must have seen with great pleasure the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne asking for an increase of Senators. When I came to this House, the first paper I read was the Orders of the Day, and I noticed a long motion or resolution of some kind, which was all about the Senate.

Mr. LANCASTER: Did you vote for it?

Mr. WILSON (Laval): That is not the question at all. I am referring——

Mr. LANCASTER: I voted for it. Did you vote for it?

Mr. WILSON: I am referring to the Speech from the Throne, and the right hon. the Prime Minister——

Mr. LANCASTER: You talk one way, and vote the other.

Mr. WILSON—is asking for an increase of seats in the Senate,——

Mr. LANCASTER: In the West.

Mr. WILSON (Laval).

Mr. WILSON:—In order to be kind to his friends. Perhaps, if my hon. friend had a seat in the Senate, he would not be so anxious to interrupt me now.

There is one thing we do not read in the Speech from the Throne, and it is this: the population according to the last census has decreased in some parts, and increased in others. The word 'adequate' was the motto word; the word on the flag nailed to the mast by the right hon. Premier. We do not represent the people in any adequate manner here, and before this naval policy is brought down, the people ought to be properly represented in this House.

A moment ago I read a clipping from the Montreal Gazette of November 10, stating:

> On January 18, 1910, when the Laurier Naval Bill was brought down, Mr. Borden strongly urged the necessity of an immediate emergency contribution, and coupled with this the demand that the people should be consulted on a permanent policy. On February 18, Mr. Borden said. 'To attempt to force a permanent policy of this kind on the people of this country without giving them an opportunity of saying yea or nay with regard to it would be one of the worst mistakes that could be made by any man who favours such a policy.' This course on more than one occasion during this debate was advocated by the present Premier and is the course it is understood he consistently intends to pursue. Moreover, on November 21, 1910, asked what he would do if Premier, he outlined the policy he is now following—consultation first with the Admiralty so as to obtain the facts, then an appeal, if necessary to Parliament for immediate and effective aid, and he emphasized a permanent policy would have to be worked out and submitted to the people.

The first thing to be done was to consult the Admiralty, and then to bring a measure before the House. We expect to see that measure here soon, but it is the third point to which I wish to refer particularly. I do not favour the idea of a plebiscite or a referendum, but I claim that we should go to the people after the Redistribution Bill has been introduced, and then, when the people are adequately represented in this House, the measure can be brought forward.

I have referred to the mission, the visit to England of my hon. friends in a jocular way—I do not wish to offend the member—as the four musketeers. But there was a fifth, whom I cannot forget, a good friend of mine. Before this debate is ended I would like to find out what was the mission in England of Colonel the Hon. Sam Hughes, and why he has been forgotten in the Speech from the Throne. He not only visited England, but, as we read in the reports from the papers, he visited France and shook hands with President Fallieres.

We are told that the hon. gentleman has French blood in his veins. He must have been delighted indeed to pace the soil of la belle France. The hon. gentleman went to Germany, and even the Kaiser had to fall back. That, probably, is the German scare.

House divided on Amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. A. MONDOU (Yamaska): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the following amendment to the Address:

That this House is ready and willing to adopt, at any time, efficient measures for the defence of Canada, an autonomous colony under the British Crown; but that this House is nevertheless of opinion that the Canadian Parliament has no right to impose on the Canadian people responsibilities in regard to the general defence of the Empire, as long as under the present status of constitutional relations between Canada and the United Empire of Great Britain and Ireland, the Government of His Majesty and Ireland, the people of the United Empire alone, will reserve for itself the exclusive management and control of Imperial and international questions.

I do not propose to retain the House very long in connection with this proposed amendment which I brought to the attention of the Canadian people a few days ago, so as to enable the Government and hon. gentlemen in this House to form for themselves an opinion as to its merits. However, so as to make things more clear, I may be allowed to offer some explanations with a view to show what is the true character of our connection with the Mother Country, which some are intent on modifying to-day. Canada has been under British rule for one hundred and fifty years. At the outset we were given a taste of military rule, and later on replaced by the rule of irresponsible office holders. After years of strenuous opposition on the part of English-speaking as well as of French-speaking Canadians, Great Britain had to loosen her hold to a certain extent, and it is greatly to the credit of Canada that she was the first of the British colonies to be granted constitutional government.

It was in 1855, under the McNab-Taché government, during the Crimean war, that the question of our connection with the Mother Country came up for the first time. The British government at the time requested Canada to send over some men; the McNab-Taché government positively refused to do so. A few years later, Sir George Etienne Cartier carried through the Militia Bill, for the object of protecting Canadian territory only; but at the following elections his government was defeated and the Sicotte-Macdonald government took the reins of power.

In 1863, the Duke of Newcastle, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, requested the Canadian Parliament to grant by statute a fixed sum for the maintenance of militia in this country. But the statesmen of that time positively refused once more, and energetically claimed for Canada the right to vote the moneys for the maintenance of the militia as well as all other objects. In his reply to Parliament the Duke of Newcastle recognized the principle that the colonies could not be held to contribute either to the maintenance of the army or to that of the navy, that their only obligation consisted in the protection of our ports and the general defence of the territory.

We now reach the period of Confederation. In 1868 Sir George Etienne Cartier carried through a militia Bill exclusively for the defence of Canadian territory; that principle was embodied in the statute, and it was a second time adhered to in 1904, when the Liberal Government then under the leadership of the now leader of the Opposition (Sir W. Laurier), made a general revision of the Militia Act.

So, in 1868, it was acknowledged without a doubt that the militia would not serve for any other purpose than the defence of Canadian territory. Such was Cartier's policy, which was confirmed in 1882, when the British Government called on Sir John Macdonald, then Prime Minister and leader of the Conservative party, to send men to fight on Egyptian soil. Sir John refused, and those who took part in the Nile expedition did so as volunteers. Such are the basic principles of the policy of the Conservative party clearly laid down, and those who claim Cartier and Macdonald as their political forerunners cannot condemn such a stand. In 1899, a new demand was made to the Canadian government in connection with the South-African war. The now leader of the Opposition was then Prime Minister and what answer did he give? On the 3rd of October, 1899, founding himself on the constitution and on Canada's constant practice, he refused to comply with that request, and those who took part in the South-African war had to do so as volunteers. At the general elections of 1900, the Laurier government was returned to power by a great majority, which shows that the people approved of his not having gone any further than his predecessors. In 1902, at the time of the Imperial conference, the same principle was laid down by the leader of the Liberal Government, to-day leader of the Opposition, and at the general elections which followed, he was maintained in power by an immense majority. The same principle was recognized once more at the Imperial conference of 1907, and a third time, at the general election of 1908, the Government was returned to power by an immense majority, which shows that the people approved of the principle.

Now, rather as a surprise, a short time after that election. On March 29, 1909, on a Monday afternoon, and with three quarters of the members away from the House, the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) moved his famous motion.

Let us examine what occurred in the light of the public documents we have in hand. The Foster motion reiterated the same principle, but the speech that gentleman made in support of his motion appealed strongly to Imperialist feelings, that is to principles quite in opposition to those laid down by Cartier and Macdonald.

The former Prime Minister (Sir W. Laurier) and the present leader of the Government agreed to modify the wording of the Foster resolution so as to put it in closer agreeement with the feelings expressed in the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto. I will refer hon. gentlemen to 'Hansard' of that date, wherein they will find the confirmation of what I have just said. The Imperial scheme was being laid out for the first time. In 1910, founding himself on the new principle embodied in the Foster resolution voted in 1909, the hon. Mr. Brodeur introduced on the floor of the House a resolution providing for the establishment of a Canadian naval service. When that resolution was introduced, the hon. Mr. Monk, member for Jacques-Cartier, moved on its very first reading, on January 12, 1910, the following motion:

What is proposed to-day is to invite us to become responsible for the policy, for the diplomacy, for the treaties, for the alliances of which we know nothing, over which we have no control, made by men, excellent men no doubt, but men who are not responsible to us. And, the proposal is to ask us to assume all these responsibilities without our enjoying the privileges of representation. I do not speak for the province of Quebec; I say you will never find Anglo-Saxons who will willingly accept that responsibility, who will willingly bend their heads to what I consider to be an infraction of the ancient rights of British subjects established centuries ago in England. (1775).

At the time of the second reading of this Bill, Mr. Monk moved a sub-amendment which came up on February 3rd, 1910:

This House, while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of opinion, that the Bill now submitted for its consideration changes the relations of Canada with the Empire and ought in consequence to be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite.

At the following session, on November 22nd, 1910, Mr. Monk moved the following amendment to the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne:

The House regrets that the Speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the Government to consult the people on its naval policy and the general question of the contribution of Canada to imperial armaments.

Here then is clearly stated the stand taken in this House by the hon. Mr. Monk against the proposal of the Liberal Government. A few days previous a bye-election had taken place in the constituency of Drummond and Arthabaska, when the Government submitted for the first time to the people their naval policy. The Government candidate was defeated, and on the day following that defeat, a monster meeting, at which it was estimated 20,000 persons attended, was held in the Ontario street rink, Montreal, and a resolution passed endorsing the stand taken on the naval bill by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, as follows:

The meeting approves and ratifies the verdict rendered by the electoral division of Drummond and Arthabaska, re-affirms the will of the Canadian people to uphold the rights of the British Crown in Canada, declares itself ready to approve all necessary and efficient measures to make sure the defence of Canadian territory, but it considers as contrary to the principle of Canadian autonomy and to the real unity of the Empire, any policy tending to impose upon Canada, that has no voice in the Government of the Empire, any share in its external responsibilities and its military defence outside of the Canadian territory,—the only portion of the Empire upon which the Canadian people may exercise any political or constitutional action.

My object in laying to-night before this House the words of the resolution carried at that meeting at the Ontario street skating rink, is to enable hon. gentlemen to compare it with that of the amendment which I am now introducing, and show at the same time that we are acting consistently and logically, that what we then stated before the public we have no reason to be ashamed of before this House.

The Government that carried through the Naval Bill in this House by a majority of 54, was defeated at the 1911 elections and left with a minority of fifty.

The naval question as contained in the various proposals initiated by the hon. Mr. Monk, was a capital issue at that election in the province of Quebec. It may not have been so in the other provinces, and it is possible that reciprocity and protection may in other parts have been the main subjects of contention, but it remains all the same that the Liberal Government, which had been all powerful until then, suffered irreparable defeat in that election.

It is just possible that in the course of that election young men, inexperienced barristers, went a little too far, even to the point of stating that we owed nothing to Great Britain, but as far as I am concerned, I may repeat here to-night what I stated to my constituents in regard to that question of help to Great Britain. Here is what I said: 'We hear it stated that we are greatly indebted to Great Britain in return for the protection she grants us; but at what time has Great Britain ever spent a cent to carry on wars of which Canada had been the occasion?'

In 1775 and 1812, when the Americans invaded Canada, it was the French Canadians who by their loyalty and bravery preserved it for the British Crown. And I would be tempted, history in hand, to say after Sir Richard Cartwright, that veteran of the Liberal party, on whom such praise has been bestowed within the last days by both sides of the House, that Great Britain owes more to Canada than Canada owes to Great Britain. I hastened to add, however, 'that we had responsibilities as regards the Empire, but that, for the time being, such responsibilities were limited to the protection of our territory.'

Such are the sentiments which I uttered before my constituents and for which I assume the entire responsibility before this House, fully realizing what is implied in such responsibility.

Let us now look into the particular situation which is outlined for us at the opening of this session by the Speech from the Throne. My amendment refers more especially to the following paragraph of that same speech:

During the past summer four members of my Government conferred in London with His Majesty's Government on the question of Naval Defence. Important discussions took place and conditions have been disclosed which in the opinion of my advisers render it imperative that the effective naval forces of the empire should be strengthened without delay. My advisers are convinced that it is the duty of Canada at this juncture to afford reasonable and necessary aid for that purpose. A Bill will be introduced accordingly.

I for one in the light of the information I have in hand, cannot endorse the first part of that paragraph, if I take into account, as I am bound to do, the statements made before the British parliament on the 12th of July last, by the Prime Minister Mr. Asquith, by the Secretary for the Colonies, Lord Crewe, and more particularly by the First Lord of the Admiralty, Mr. Winston Churchill, in answer to the Unionist party, which insisted, though in opposition, that the British government should strengthen the naval forces of the Empire.

The gist of such statements was that Great Britain had already enough ships, that if she built more, she would have too many and would be at a loss to employ them. So I cannot admit that the situation is such that, as stated in the Speech from the Throne, it is absolutely urgent that we should come to the rescue of Great Britain. Neither can I approve of the latter part of that paragraph which states that it is incumbent on Canada to offer a contribution, for then I would be asserting the principle laid down in its former part. I would have been glad to support the Government, had they been content with stating in the Speech from the Throne that a bill would be introduced towards increasing the naval armaments of the Empire. My amendment makes a plain and clear statement of the matter, for it is important that we should take a frank and well defined stand.

The House was entitled to the explanations I have just given; on the other hand, my constituents, in consideration for the trust they reposed in me at the last election, were entitled to my remaining faithful to the policy of the fathers of Confederation who have ever been guided by the great principles which should still inspire our Canadian statesmen; the maintenance of the autonomy of the provinces within the Dominion, and the maintenance of the autonomy of the Dominion within the Empire.

Mr. J. B. O. GUILBAULT (Joliette): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I may state at once that I shall not vote in support of the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Yamaska, but I wish briefly to explain my vote. The hon. leader of the Opposition, who is an old Parliamentarian, and an astute one at that, has deemed it an improper course to criticise the policy of the Government before it is propounded. That stand I think wise. The terrible blows he dealt us at times are evidence of his skill, and if under the circumstances the leader of the Opposition will not condemn a measure previous to being acquainted with its purport, it would be improper on my part, as a supporter of the Government to do any more. I consider myself bound to cast my vote against the amendment introduced by the hon. member, not on its merits, but solely as a matter of timeliness. Is it right to convict a man without his being heard? In the same way, is it right to reject a measure without knowing what is its purport? How do we know whether the proposed legislation does not embody such guarantees as are required by the hon. member for Yamaska? We are in the dark as to the conditions under which we will be called upon to assist Great Britain.

It goes without saying that I preserve my whole freedom of action as regards the Government measure when it is submitted to the House, as well as my right to vote against any proposed contribution, should I think fit to do so. I am unwilling to take a stand either for or against a contribution until I am acquainted with the terms. Then only will I be able to vote intelligently.

I may recall, however, the statement I made in Joliette during the election. What I insisted on particularly was that no such legislation should be passed without consulting the people. It was never contended in the county of Joliette that nothing should be done towards helping Great Britain, neither was it claimed that anything should be done. The cry was: Consult the people, to begin with. If they favour such legislation it will be passed, if not it should be discarded. Such is the position I took in the past, and I propose sticking to it when the Government measure is submitted to the House.

Mr. A. BELLEMARE (Maskinongé): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Guilbault) to be in the right. In a general way I approve the Speech from the Throne as read by His Royal Highness the Governor General. However, I insist on reserving my stand as to the paragraph relative to the increasing of the naval armaments of the Empire. Being satisfied that a bill to that effect will be introduced in the House, I consider it will be time then to judge it on its merits.

As regards the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou), I am not in a position just now either to support it or judge of its merits, as I am not posted as to the details of the Government's naval policy.

Mr. PAUL E. LAMARCHE (Nicolet): Mr. Speaker, I regret that owing to recent illness I am unable to discuss at such length as I would like, the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou). I cannot, however, as a member of this House, and being able to be here to-night, allow this opportunity to pass without declaring that I share the views of my hon. friend from Yamaska. During the election of 1911, I discussed the naval question in my county, and I may say with all frankness, that this has been the main issue of the elections in my constituency, and my arguments have been based on the principle that there shall be no taxation without representation.

What is taxation? Many hon. members of this House may differ with my opinions, but if they study the history of England they will find that taxation has been given different names. It has been called a duty; it has been called a gift, but whether gift, duty or taxation, it is taken from the people, or the treasury as belonging to the people, and it is the funds of the people we are disposing of. I consider that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the member for Yamaska is entirely in order, as it deals with a principle to which I have been opposed in my recent election in the county of Nicolet. Therefore, without giving any further reasons, I may say that I have to follow the duties of my conscience before the duties of my party, and to support this amendment. It is with great sorrow I affirm that I have again to differ with many political friends whom I very much esteem, and whose views I hope I will in the future have reason to support. I wish hon. gentlemen also to understand that by voting for this amendment I do not look for a plank to cross over to the ranks of the Liberal party. My principles are with the principles of Cartier and Macdonald; and I stick to those principles. In my political life there are only two courses open—to go out of it altogether, or to stick to the Liberal Conservative party, but I have to adhere also to my pledges, and to be true to my electors. The right hon. the Prime Minister stated the other day in one of his speeches that Mr. Monk's action in resigning his ministerial portfolio was moved only by his high sense of duty. I hope that my right hon. friend will extend his broadmindedness not only to the ex-Minister of Public Works, but also to the humble member for Nicolet, who, while standing by the Conservative principles, is bound to do his duty and vote once more against the Conservative party.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the member for Yamaska is entitled at least to an answer to the remarks which he has made in the House this evening. The amendment which he has submitted is one of far-reaching effect, and which, if it were proposed at the proper time, ought to be very carefully considered by the House. But it seems to me that my hon. friend would have been better advised if he had waited for another occasion to propose this amendment. The speech from the Throne states that a measure will be introduced by the Government, and of course such a measure will open up the whole measure of naval defence. For my part, I have during the recess taken the position that it would be inadvisable to discuss any policy whatever relating to matters of defense until we had been acquainted of the measure which was to be introduced by the Government. On this side of the House we have formulated a certain policy, and for my part I have not yet any reason to depart from it, but at the same time I think it advisable that we should wait until the policy of the Government is placed before us before expressing any opinion.

My hon. friend stated in the course of his remarks that he is not aware at this moment as to what information that the Government received from the Admiralty. This reason alone is sufficient, in my humble judgment, to make it clear that the amendment cannot be properly considered until this information is before us. I will not express any opinion, either in the affirmative or in the negative, regarding the proposition the hon. gentleman has brought forth in his amendment, but for these reasons I prefer to vote against it.

Mr. BORDEN: I think the observations made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition in regard to the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska are very pertinent. It certainly would be undesirable for the House, on the eve of learning the proposals of the Government, even to enter into a debate on a proposition of this kind, which must be so intimately associated with the measure very shortly to be presented for the consideration of this House and this country.

No one can deny that so far as the permanent participation of this country in any scheme of Imperial defense is concerned, the considerations which the hon. member for Yamaska has placed before the House are entitled to serious attention. It is not, however, a question of taxation without representation; there is no proposal, so far as I am aware, that the people of Canada shall be taxed, except by their own representatives in Parliament. The other considerations which have been alluded to will be held in regard in the future. I would go further than my right hon. friend in one respect. My right hon. friend says that the amendment has been proposed at an inopportune time, and he is not prepared to say what his attitude in regard to this amendment would be if it had been proposed at the proper time. Whether it properly came up in debate or not I would vote against it, for the reason that it would prevent Canada from lifting her finger in the defense of the Empire if war were declared to-morrow; it would have prevented the Government of Canada from sending a man or a gun to fight for the integrity of the Empire in South Africa ten or twelve years ago. So far as I am concerned it is not a question of the propriety of the time, but it is a question whether or not, pending the formulation of a policy of a permanent character, we are going so to bind ourselves that we cannot lift a finger if the whole existence of the Empire is imperilled by sudden war. I would be prepared to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska for that reason, as well as for the one urged by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SOREL MARINE RAILWAY.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has any promise, written or verbal, been made of late by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or the Minister of Public Works, that a marine railway would be subsidized or built by the Government at Sorel, county of Richelieu?
2. If so, at what date, and to whom was such a promise made?

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN: There has been no promise, either written or verbal, with respect to the matter alluded to, made by the members of the Government who are mentioned in this question.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would there be by any other member not mentioned in the question?

Mr. BORDEN: Put the question as to that, and we will try to answer it.

GOVERNMENT STEAMERS.

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. What steamers have been contracted for by any department of the Government during the past year, and what were the tenders received therefor from Canadian, British and foreign builders, respectively?
2. To whom were the respective contracts awarded and at what price?

Mr. ROGERS: None by the Department of Public Works.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Let it stand until it is answered by the different departments of Government.

Question stands.

MR. ARMAND LAVERGNE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is the right hon. the Prime Minister aware of the statement made by Mr. Armand Lavergne, ex-M.P., at a meeting held in the County of Quebec on the 1st of November ult., and reported as follows in the Montreal Star of November 2, 1912:—

'Then Mr. Lavergne proceeded with his version of how the French-Canadian members of the Cabinet had been selected by the new Premier after his victory of last fall.

'The first names proposed,' Mr. Lavergne said, 'were those of Messrs. Monk, Tellier, and myself. I declined this offer of a portfolio in the Cabinet, and at Mr. Pelletier's request, I did my best to make Mr. Monk accept him in my place. He objected at first. Mr. Forget at the same time was working in favour of Mr. T. Chase Casgrain, but I refused to agree to that choice.

'It seemed understood then with the Premier and Mr. Monk that Mr. Pelletier would be the Quebec representative in the Cabinet. Later I learned that Mr. Borden's intentions were to have only two French-Canadian ministers in his Government, and it was at this juncture that I went to Montreal on a special train, paid for by Mr. Cahan, to impress Mr. Borden with the necessity of following the tradition, giving three French-Canadian representatives in the federal Cabinet, which point we finally gained.'

2. Is the above statement true?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. No.
2. The statement which relates to alleged confidential communications is not accurate, so far as the Prime Minister is concerned.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have considered this question carefully, and I have looked at the decisions by different Speakers in the Imperial House of Commons, and my conclusion is that in the Imperial House this question would not be allowed. It does not concern the business of the Government or any business of the executive in connection with the administration of the affairs of the country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do you not think that if the information has come to the Government it ought to be a matter for enquiry?

Mr. SPEAKER: The reference is to the statement of an outsider who is not a member of this House, and it has been held that the Government has nothing to do with such statements.

MARRIAGE LAWS IN FEDERAL TERRITORY.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. What portions of the Dominion of Canada are solely under federal control and jurisdiction?
2. What are the laws with respect to marriage in these districts?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The territory which remains subject to the legislation of the Dominion and not subject to any provincial powers is comprised in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, being all that part of the Dominion not included within the boundaries of any province.

2. The law affecting marriage in the Northwest Territories is the law of England as the same existed on July 15, 1870, in so far as applicable and in so far as not repealed, altered, varied, modified or affected by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom or of the Parliament of Canada applicable to the territories or by any ordinance of the Northwest Territories. See Revised Statutes, 1906, chapter 62, section 12.

The law affecting marriage in the Yukon Territory is that which was in force in the Northwest Territories on June 13, 1898, in so far as applicable, and in so far as not repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada or by any ordinance of the Governor in Council or the Commissioner in Council under the provisions of the Yukon Act. See Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, chapter 63, section 19.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—GUYSBOROUGH BRANCH.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Is it the intention of the Government to provide for the construction of a branch of the Intercolonial railway into Guysborough county during the present session?

Mr. COCHRANE: This matter is under consideration.

PONTBRIAND WHARF.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

When was the Pontbriand wharf purchased by the Department of Public Works, and what was the amount paid for it?

Mr. ROGERS: On May 9, 1912, for $15,000.

QUEBEC CUSTOMS COLLECTOR.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Who has been appointed collector of customs at Quebec?
2. What salary does the new incumbent receive?
3. Is any salary paid to the former collector of customs besides his retiring allowance? If so, what salary?

Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. William Henry Carter.
2. $3,500 a year.
3. The former collector of customs is paid a salary of $2,058 a year as acting officer of customs.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—QUEBEC TERMINUS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Government reached any decision with regard to the site of the terminus of the National Transcontinental railway at Quebec?
2. Does the Government contemplate the tunnelling of Cape Diamond, with a view to locate said terminus at any other point than the one already selected at Champlain market?

Mr. COCHRANE: The following information is supplied by the National Transcontinental Railway Commission:

1. No; it is under consideration.
2. Under consideration.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO MAIL SUBSIDY.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has any mail subsidy been paid to the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company during the fiscal year 1911-12? If so, what amount?
2. What is the duration of the contract entered into?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Chicoutimi and Quebec, $2,831.40; Montreal and Quebec, $3,213; total, $6,044.40.

2. No contract executed; payment made on authority of Postmaster General to continue rate paid in 1910-11.

WIRE FENCING.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has any promise been made by the Government that before the end of the present year wire for fencing would be taken off the free list?
2. If so, to whom has such a promise been made, and by whom?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): No.

PARCEL POST.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Postmaster General read the latest report of the Toronto Board of Trade's committee on the cost of living, which contains the following:—

'We have no parcel-post service, so that the express companies, that is to say the railway companies again, can and do make us pay dividends on stock that has been shown to be largely water. It seems to be the universal opinion of shippers and consignees that in spite of, perhaps it is because of, the monopoly these railways enjoy, they do not give proper facilities for bringing produce into the city. It would be difficult to overestimate the advantages of a parcel-post service such as is maintained throughout Europe, even in Russia, whereby produce could reach the consumer directly from the farmer. The small charge necessary for such service would at once put a limit to the profits of the middlemen, and would compel the express companies to meet the competition of the postal service.'

2. Is it the intention of the Post Office Department to establish the parcel-post system in Canada?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. The question is under consideration.

WRIGHT COUNTY POST OFFICES.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Have any new post offices been opened in the county of Wright since September 21, 1911?
2. If so, where and at whose request?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. (a) Nesbitt Corners, township of Masham; Lambert Corners, township of Northfield. (b) By instructions of the Postmaster General.

HULL WHARF.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Is the Government aware that the Hull wharf is in urgent need of repair?
2. What has been done with the money voted at the last session of Parliament to repair same?
3. What causes the delay in the work?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes; work under way, and will be completed this week, if weather permits.
2. A vote of $800 is available this fiscal year, and will be expended in making repairs required.
3. Pressure of other work in the Ottawa district.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—MONCTON TO LEVIS.

*Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. When is it expected that the Transcontinental railway between Lévis and Moncton will be opened for traffic?
2. What arrangements, if any, have been made for its operation?

Mr. COCHRANE: The following information is supplied by the National Transcontinental Railway Commission:

1. It is expected that this portion will be completed ready for operation in September, 1913. It is not known when it will be opened for traffic.
2. None, but the commissioners are operating a tri-weekly service between Moncton and Edmunston, which was started on the 20th of November, instant.

THE BRITISH PREFERENCE.

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to pass an Order in Council pursuant to the authority already granted by Parliament for that purpose, limiting the British preference to goods brought by vessels direct to a Canadian port?
2. If so, when is it intended to take such action?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): It is the practice to make announcements respecting the tariff only in the Budget speech.

'DUKE OF CONNAUGHT' DRY DOCK.

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. At what amount was the floating dry dock, the Duke of Connaught, valued for the purpose of entry at the customs for payment of duty?
2. What amount of duty was paid on such dry dock?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. The floating dock ship Duke of Connaught has not been valued for duty, having been reported inwards as a British built ship.

2. No duty has been paid in this case—the importers claiming that a British built ship of British registry is exempt from duty.

MIRAMICHI RIVER DREDGING.

*Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Was the contract for dredging in the Miramichi river, New Brunswick, held by A. & R. Loggie, or the Eastern Dredging Company, cancelled by the Government during the past year? If so, when and at whose request?
2. Was there a new contract thereupon entered into for such dredging? If so, with what person or company?
3. What was the price per cubic yard paid to the contractors whose contract was cancelled?
4. What is the price per cubic yard being paid to the present contractor?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. No; but the contractors abandoned the contract on 7th May, 1912, and forfeited their security deposit.
2. New tenders were called and contract was awarded to the Northern Dredging and Construction Company.
3. Eleven cents per cubic yard, scow measurement.
4. Twenty cents per cubic yard, scow measurement.

THE ST. LAWRENCE ROUTE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. How many accidents have occurred on the St. Lawrence route since the opening of navigation this year?
2. What is the name of each vessel wrecked and where did each accident occur?
3. Have investigations been held?
4. What was the cause of each accident?
5. Does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries contemplate any change in the pilotage system?
6. Have the insurance rates been raised as a result of said accidents? If so, to what extent?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Twenty-six casualties have been reported.
2. A list of all vessels stranded or wrecked, with full particulars, is hereto attached.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Answered by No. 2.
5. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is awaiting the results of all investigations now pending, before reaching a conclusion in this respect.
6. No.

MR. MONK'S RESIGNATION.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is the right hon. the Prime Minister aware of a statement by Mr. Armand Lavergne, ex-M.P., at a meeting held in the county of Quebec on the 1st of November ult., and reported as follows in the Montreal Star of November 2, 1912:

Mr. Lavergne made the affirmation that before entering the Conservative Government Mr. Monk had received the assurance from Mr. Borden that a plebiscite would be taken taken before any kind of contribution to the British navy should be decided upon. The Prime Minister also promised his colleague that the Government would do something, Mr. Lavergne did not say what, for the Catholics of Manitoba and Keewatin. It was because

Mr. Borden failed to carry out these pledges that the Hon. Mr. Monk sent him his resignation.

2. Is the above statement true?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. No.

2. No promises of the character alluded to were made by the Prime Minister.

THE MINISTER OF MILITIA AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Did the Minister of Militia and Defence make the following statement attributed to him by the press of the Dominion, in a speech delivered at Vancouver, B.C., on August 6, 1912, and reported as follows by the Associated Press:—

'Gentlemen, we are not more than half civilized today, and war is closer than you dream; the great peril is from Germany. Why? Because Germany must have colonies within a generation or she will begin to go down. She is building ships on borrowed money and must seek new territory. She has large numbers of citizens in the South American countries, and there are only two fields where she can find the needed outlet for her surplus population. One is along the South American seaboard, the other is the British colonies.

'It is well known that Germany is establishing herself at Agadir, a port in Morocco. She meant to establish a naval base there, but Britain told her to get out. For two days war was very near. Germany has to be taught a lesson, and the lesson to be taught her is that Canada, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand are behind the Mother Country. We know that Germany was behind Kruger, and that there was a definite scheme to oust Great Britain from South Africa, but the fact that the colonies sprang to arms and sailed from all quarters of the globe to the assistance of Great Britain caused the scheme to be frustrated.

'Now, gentlemen, the time has come when a definite plan of Empire defence must be adopted. Let it take the form of a full partnership with the Mother Country.'

2. Was the hon. minister authorized to make the above statement ? If so, by whom?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES:

1. The Minister of Militia and Defence did not give any notes of his speech on this occasion to any person, and he is not responsible for the report, which is evidently from hasty and disjointed transcription, and consequently is not in all respects literally accurate.

2. The Minister of Militia and Defence did not need any such authority, and is alone responsible for what he uttered on that occasion.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Did the Postmaster General make the following statement, attributed to him in the Montreal Star of September 12, 1912:—

The Canadian ministers have secured much valuable information from the admiralty, and they would receive still more in the course of a few days. It would then be the duty of Mr. Borden and his colleagues to study the naval problem calmly and dispassionately, and draw their conclusions therefrom. Little time would be lost in making their policy public, and all could rest assured that the people of Canada would have an opportunity to pronounce upon its merits.'

Mr. PELLETIER: On the occasion in question as well as on all others when he referred to that matter, the Postmaster General has always declared that, in his opinion, the people of Canada should have an opportunity to pronounce upon the merits of a system of naval defence which, by its nature and character would bind the future of Canada to a certain line of policy of the Militia Department.

THE MILITIA DEPARTMENT—PRIVATE CAR.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has a private car been purchased by the Militia Department?

2. If so, what was the price paid for said car?

3. Was it purchased in Canada or in the United States?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria): No.

MR. OLIVAR ASSELIN.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. Was Mr. Olivar Asselin, of Montreal, employed by the Department of the Interior? If so, what is the date of his appointment, and what salary does he receive?

2. Is he still employed by the department?

3. Has he made a report to the department on his work? If so, what is the object of said report?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes. He was employed for four months, commencing 5th of January, 1912, at a salary of $150 per month.

2. No.

3. Mr. Asselin's report has not been handed in, but an interim report in the form of a letter has been sent in prior to his final report. His interim report refers to the immigration office at Paris.

PIEDMONT POST OFFICE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Was the location of the post office at Piedmont, Quebec, changed by the present Government?

2. If so, to what building has the said post office been transferred?

3. What is the nature of the business carried on in the building in which the said post office is now located?

4. Has the Government or any member thereof received any protests against the post office being located in the said building? If so, what are the names of the persons sending such protests?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.

2, 3 and 4. To the premises of the new postmaster, in special quarters arranged for that purpose, in order to meet representations made by Mr. Hannaford and Rev. Mr. Desjardins.

COUNTY OF RUSSELL POSTMASTERS.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. How many investigations have ben held since November 1, 1911, into charges of offensive partizanship made against postmasters in the county of Russell?
2. By whom were the charges made in each case?
3. By whom were the investigations conducted?
4. In how many cases were the charges sustained?
5. What amount has been paid in connection with the said investigations?
6. Are there any further amounts to be paid? If so, how much, and to whom?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Three, charges of political partisanship having been preferred against the postmasters of Metcalfe, Longtinville and St. Onge, in this county.
2. Requests made through Mr. J. U. Vincent.
3. By Mr. C. A. Seguin, barrister, of Ottawa.
4. In the cases against the postmasters of Metcalfe and Longtinville.
5. Metcalfe—$55.50; Longtinville—$37.25; St. Onge—$7.50.
6. No.

MR. MONK'S PRIVATE SECRETARY.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Since the resignation of Hon. F. D. Monk as Minister of Public Works, what duties have been assigned to his former private secretary?
2. What is the name and the present rank and salary of the said official?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. George F. Buskard, 1B, $2,400, and $600 for private secretary's allowance.
2. Private secretary to Minister of Interior at same salary as above.

ROCKLIFFE RIFLE RANGE.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. In what year did the Government purchase the site for the Rockliffe rifle range?
2. From whom were the several parcels of land purchased, and what price per acre was paid for each?
3. How many acres of land were purchased, and what was the total amount paid therefor?
4. How many buildings of all descriptions have been erected on the said range?
5. What was the cost of erecting such buildings?
6. Did the Government pay any portion of the cost of extending the line of the Ottawa Electric railway to the said range? If so, what was the amount?
7. How much money has been expended by the Government on the said range for all purposes from the date of the original purchase of the land up to November 1, 1912?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria):

1. 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1905 and 1906.

	Per acre.
2. Keefer, T. C.	$277.70

2. Duty collected on butter imported for consumption, $195,398.06.

3. 1,479,735 pounds, value $412,076.

OATS IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. ROBB :

1. How many bushels, and what grade of oats were imported from the United States to Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912, and the number of bushels in each grade?

2. What was the value of oats imported from the United States to Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912?

3. How much duty was collected on oats imported from the United States during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912?

4. What quantity of such oats were re-exported either as oats, meal, oatmeal, rolled oats or feed?

5. Was any portion of duty refunded on account of grain or meal exported during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912? If so, how much?

6. Has any application been made for a refund of duty on account of grain, flour or meal, exported during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912?

Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. The quantity of oats imported from the United States into Canada during the twelve months ending October 31, 1912, amounted to 1,742,786 bushels. Imports of oats are not classified by grades in customs statistics.

2. $771,671.

3. Duty collected on oats imported for consumption from the United States was $12,633.20.

THE GOVERNMENT'S NAVAL POLICY.

Mr. LEMIEUX :

1. Has the right hon. the Prime Minister read the following letter published on Monday, November 18, in the Montreal press, and addressed to Dr. J. M. Lalonde, of St. Cunégonde by the ex-Minister of Public Works:—

'My dear friend,—You inform me that certain ones are causing a rumour to be circulated to the effect that I am opposed to the contest which is now going on in Hochelaga division. I am surprised to learn this, and I regret the fact such reports have gained currency. I am not taking any part in the contest, believing that in following such course I am acting rightly. I gave up my place as a member of the Cabinet for the reason that the Government has decided not to institute a plebiscite on the question of a naval contribution. I find it just that the electors should profit by the present election to manifest their will in regard to this question.'

F. D. MONK.

2. Is it true, as alleged in the above letter, that the Government has decided not to institute a plebiscite on the naval question?

Mr. BORDEN :

1. The Prime Minister had not read the letter in question until it was brought to his attention on the Order Paper.

2. The Government will announce its policy on the naval question in due course.

CIVIL SERVICE VACANCIES AND APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. WILSON (Laval):

Can the right hon. the Prime Minister tell us why the following Order of the House dated January the 24th 1912, has not yet been complied with:—

By Mr. Wilson (Laval):—Order of the House for a return showing all the employees of the different departments at Ottawa, and also in the nine provinces and territories of Canada, and other places outside of Canada, in the inside and outside service, who have left their employment since the 1st October, 1911, up to the 10th January, 1912, inclusively with their names, christian names, age, nationality, employment and salaries respectively; the date of their appointment; the date of their leaving; their salaries at the time of their appointment and at leaving; the reasons of their leaving; and if replaced or not; the names, christian name, age, nationality, employment and salary of those who have replaced them; and in the case of dismissals, a list of the persons who asked for their dismissals; in the case of these replacing them, a list of the persons who recommended their successors.

Mr. BORDEN: The Prime Minister is informed that the return has not yet been completed. The difficulty is, as I understand from inquiry of the Secretary of State, that a great many particulars are asked with regard to different officials, and there has been some delay in securing the information. The Secretary of State has been requested to use all possible expedition in expediating this inquiry.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): If my right hon. friend will permit me, perhaps he can give me an answer to my question with reference to other departments than that of the Secretary of State, and I could wait for particulars from that department.

Mr. BORDEN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilson, Laval) does not understand me. When questions or returns relate to all the departments of government, they are put into the hands of the Secretary of State who secures the information from the various departments, and until this information comes the question cannot very well be answered. I can assure my hon. friend there is no desire or intention to withhold the information. It will be secured for him as soon as possible.

6. The Government was informed of the intention of the company to make the increase in capital referred to in (5).

7. The President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company verbally informed the Government of the intention of the company to issue the $60,000,000 of stock referred to in (5) in addition to the $75,000,000 referred to in (2).

8. Herewith.

Canadian Pacific Railway.

Extract from the minutes of a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, duly called and held at the principal office of the company at Montreal on Monday the 12th day of August 1912.

The question of the desirability of increasing the ordinary capital stock of the company having been discussed at length, the president submitted the following resolution on the subject, which was adopted, namely:

Whereas the authorized ordinary capital stock of this company at this date is $200,000,000, divided into 2,000,000 shares of the par or face value of $100 each;

And whereas pursuant to the provision of Section 3 of the Act 55, 56 Victoria, chapter 35, Canada, the company being duly authorized in that behalf by its shareholders at a special general meeting duly called for the purpose, may from time to time increase its capital stock for any purpose for which the company requires new capital, to such amount and at such times as the shareholders at any such meeting may determine, such issue being first approved by the Governor in Council;

And whereas the company requires from time to time new capital for the purposes of its undertaking, and it is desirable to increase the amount of the said authorized ordinary capital stock to $275,000,000 being an increase of $75,000,000.

Now therefore it is resolved as follows, that is to say:

That it is in the interests of this company that the ordinary capital stock of the company be increased from $200,000,000 to an amount not exceeding $275,000,000 in shares of $100 each, or its equivalent in sterling money of Great Britain, to be issued and sold for the purposes of its undertaking as may be determined by resolution of the shareholders of the company.

That the president of the company be and he is hereby authorized to make an application in the name of the company to the Governor in Council to have the said proposed increase of stock duly approved of.

Certified a true extract,
(sgd.) W. R. BAKER,
Secretary.

Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Montreal, August 13, 1912.

Dear Sir,—The last issue of the company's common stock, on which the final subscriptions will be paid in the course of the next couple of months, exhausts the amount authorized by Order in Council, August 17, 1908, for the ordinary purposes of the company, and the proceeds will be no more than sufficient to meet the expenditures already made and those to be made in the course of the next few months under existing contracts. Notwithstanding the vastness of the company's expenditures for increased facilities of every description to keep abreast with the transportation requirements of the country, terminal yards, sidings, track facilities and buildings that were completed three or four years ago, and that were then thought to be sufficient for a number of years to come, now prove to be entirely inadequate, and with the outlook for a continued increase in immigration, and the corresponding enlargement of the country's production and trade, it is evident that to avoid very serions congestion indeed, the outlay for increased facilities at almost every important point on the system, for the extension of the double track to the Pacific coast, and for equipment, must be continued without cessation and the works must be completed as rapidly as circumstances will permit. A percentage of the money required for these purposes is derived from surplus earnings and from other sources, but by far the largest portion must be secured by the issue and sale of the company's ordinary share capital.

The directors desire to recommend to the shareholders that the authorized ordinary capital stock of the company be increased $75,000,000, subject as provided in Statute 55, 56, Victoria, chapter 35, to the approval of the Governor in Council; this additional capital, when so authorized, to be issued in such amounts and at such times as may be necessary or desirable for the purposes of the company.

Enclosed herewith please find a certified copy of the resolution of the Board of Directors adopted at the meeting held August 12, 1912, which provides for the proposed increase of capital and sanctions this application, and I beg to request that the proposed increase of capital stock be approved by an Order in Council containing the same conditions and restrictions as those that were incorporated in the Order in Council of August 17, 1908.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Yours very truly,
(sgd.) T. Shaughnessy,
President.

Right Hon. R. L. Borden, P.C.
Premier,
Ottawa, Ont., August 13, 1912.

Dear Sir,—To-day Mr. Wanklyn handed me your letter of the 13th instant and also the one addressed to the Prime Minister enclosing a certified copy of resolution passed by your board of directors at their meeting held on the 12th instant with the request that the proposed increase of capital stock should be approved by an Order in Council. The Minister of Finance is away at present but I expect him back the first of next week and as soon as he returns I will bring this matter before council for consideration as requested.

Believe me,
Yours very truly,
(sgd.) George H. Perley.

Sir Thomas Shaughnessy,
Canadian Pacific Railway,
Montreal, Que.

6. Investigation ordered by the Postmaster General.

Mr. DESLISLE:

1. Has Mr. Georges Chateauvert been dismissed as postmaster of St. Marc des Carrières, county of Portneuf?
2. If so, on what date?
3. For what reasons and who urged his dismissal?
4. If dismissed, who has been appointed to succeed him and who proposed the latter's appointment?
5. Was an inquiry held? If so, by whom?
6. Were accusations brought against him? If so, who was the accuser and what was the nature of the complaint?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1, 2 and 3. It was considered advisable to make a change in the location of the St. Marc des Carrieres post office, removing it to a more convenient site, near the church. It became necessary, therefore, to make a change also in the postmastership. The change was authorized on the 2nd December, 1911.
4. Mr. Rodolphe Caron, on authority of Postmaster General.
5 and 6. See answers to Nos. 1, 2 and 3.

Mr. BELAND:

1. Has Mr. Philibert Plant, Postmaster of St. Frederic, Beauce county, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reason and has an inquiry been held in this case?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. For political partisanship. Before going to the expense of an investigation the postmaster was given an opportunity to sign a declaration that he had not acted as a partisan, but he would not do so. Further inquiry was consequently not considered necessary.

Mr. BELAND:

1. Has Mr. Ernest Jacob, postmaster) of Bleriot, Beauce county, been dismissed from his duties?
2. If so, for what reasons and has an inquiry been held?
3. Who has been appointed to replace him?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. For political partisanship, which was admitted by the postmaster. An inquiry was not therefore necessary.
3. Mr. Gedeon Pomerleau.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Was Thomas Cameron, preventive officer at Andover, N.B., dismissed from office? If so, when and for what reason?
2. Was an investigation held into his conduct? If so, when and by whom?
3. Was the evidence taken at such investigation reported to the Department of Customs with a recommendation thereon?
4. Did the department make the dismissal on such recommendation?

Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. Yes, 12th September, 1912, for political partisanship.
2. Yes, 16th and 17th February, 1912, E. T. C. Knowles, Esq., commissioner.
3. Yes.

4. Dismissal was made under the authority of Order in Council of 12th September, 1912, on the recommendation of the hon. the Minister of Customs, based on the report of the investigating commissioner.

Mr. BELAND:

1. Has Mr. L. V. Bernier postmaster of St. Anselme, Quebec been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reason and by whom has he been replaced?
3. How many years has Mr. Bernier occupied the position of postmaster?
4. Was there an inquiry in this case?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. (a) For political partisanship. (b) By Mr. Edmond Filteau.
3. Twenty-five years.
4. No, not necessary because the member for the county represented that he had personal knowledge of the postmaster's active partisanship.

Mr. DEMERS:

I. Has Mr. A. N. Deland, collector of Inland Revenue at St. Jean, county of Saint Jean, Iberville, been dismissed as such?
2. If so, for what reasons?

Mr. NANTEL:

1. Yes.
2. Political partisanship.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. When was Mr. George Epenard, overseer of works at the new post office in the town of Arthabaska, dismissed?
2. For what reasons and who asked for his dismissal?
3. Who has been proposed as his successor?
4. Is his successor a competent man?
5. Was an inquiry held?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 and 2. On November 18, 1911, by order of the minister.
3. J. E. Baril.
4. Yes.
5. No.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. When was Mr. Anthime Theophile Paré, caretaker of the public building in the town of Drummondville dismissed, or when was he forced to resign as such caretaker?
2. For what reasons was his resignation requested?
3. Who forced him to resign?
4. Who has been proposed as his successor and at whose request?
5. Has an inquiry been held?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Resigned July 1, 1912.
2 and 3. No information in department as to reasons for resignation.
4. O. H. Bernard on a petition from citizens.
5. No.

Mr. REID (Grenville):

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Were complaints made against J. N. Poirier, collector of Excise at Victoriaville?
2. Who made the complaints and what was the nature of them?
3. Was there an inquiry?

Mr. NANTEL:

1. Yes.
2. By a person in whom the department has confidence. Political partisanship.
3. Yes.
4. Yes. A. Gilbert.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has Miss Rosa Triganne, postmistress at Warwick, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reasons?
3. Was her dismissal requested by Mr. Arthur Gilbert or Mr. Francois Laflèche?
4. Who proposed her successor?
5. Was an inquiry held?
6. Who has been appointed postmaster in place of Miss Triganne?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. As a result of investigation.
3 and 4. On Postmaster General's opinion and responsibility.
5. Yes.
6. Dr. F. Lafleche.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has Madam E. Desrosiers, postmistress at Wickham West, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reasons?
3. Was her dismissal requested, and by whom?
4. Who proposed her successor?
5. Was an inquiry held?
6. Who has been appointed postmaster in her place?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2 and 3. For neglect of duty and incivility towards the public, and on report of the Post Office Inspector.
4. Her successor was chosen by Postmaster General.
5. Yes.
6. Mr. Evariste Roberge.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Has William Carrier, postmaster at St. Francois Xavier de Brampton, Que., been dismissed?
2. If so, who requested his dismissal?
3. Was an investigation held?
4. Who called for an investigation?
5. Has any petition been received asking that Mr. Carrier be not dismissed?
6. How many signed the petition?
7. How many applications for the position have been received by the Postmaster General?
8. Who is Mr. Carrier's successor, and who recommended his appointment?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.

2, 3 and 4. An investigation took place in the usual course.

5, 6. None has been received.

7, 8. Mr. F. A. Morrisette was appointed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Has Mr. Lambert, postmaster of St. Fortunat, Quebec, been dismissed?
2. If so, who requested his dismissal?
3. Was an investigation held?
4. Who called for an investigation?
5. Has any petition been received asking that Mr. Lambert be not dismissed?
6. How many signed the petition?
7. How many applications for the position have been received by the Postmaster General?
8. Who is Mr. Lambert's successor and who recommended his appointment?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.

2, 3 and 4. An investigation took place on instructions of Postmaster General.

5 and 6. None has been received.

7 and 8. Mr. Gedeon Bedard; instructions of Postmaster General, was appointed postmaster.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Has M. S. E. Adam, postmaster of Disraeli, Quebec, been dismissed?
2. If so, who requested his dismissal?
3. Was an investigation held?
4. Who called for an investigation?
5. Has any petition been received asking that Mr. Adam be not dismissed?
6. How many signed the petition?
7. How many applications for the position have been received by the Postmaster General?
8. Who is Mr. Adam's successor and who recommended his appointment?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.

2, 3 and 4. An investigation was ordered and held in the usual course and dismissal took place as the result.

5. Yes.

6. 333 signatures.

7. There were three applicants: Messrs. J. E. Rheault, Calixte Bergeron and Zacharie Beaudoin.

8. Mr. Zacharie Beaudoin, on responsibility of Postmaster General.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Has A. E. Dionne, postmaster of Strathford Centre, Quebec, been dismissed?
2. If so, who requested his dismissal?
3. Was an investigation held?
4. Who called for an investigation?
5. Has any petition been received asking that Mr. Dionne be not dismissed?
6. How many signed the petition?
7. How many applications for the position have been received by the Postmaster General?
8. Who is Mr. Dionne's successor and who recommended his appointment?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.

2, 3 and 4. The postmaster was given an opportunity to sign a declaration that he had not acted as a partisan, but he refused to do so, and therefore it was not necessary to go to the useless expense of an investigation.

5, 6. None has been received.

7, 8. Mr. J. I. Campeau, on authority of Postmaster General.

Mr. DEMERS:

1. Has Mr. Joseph Lord, Keeper of lighthouses of lights at Point à la Mule, on the River Richelieu, in the Parish of St. Blaise, County of St. Jean and Iberville, been dismissed?
2. If so, on what date and for what reasons?
3. Were there any complaints made against him? If so, by whom were they made?
4. Was any correspondence exchanged respecting this dismissal?
5. Has Mr. Lord been paid the whole of his salary? If not, why not?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. 22nd June, 1912, for the purpose of reinstating Mr. D. Menard who was dismissed in 1903, and against whom no charge was made.
3. No.
4. Yes.
5. Yes.

Mr. DEMERS:

1. Has Mr. Francois Chagnon, lock-keeper at St. Jean, County of St. Jean and Iberville, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reasons and by whom has he been replaced?
3. Was there one or more complaints against him?
4. If so, by whom were they made, and when?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. Political partizanship; replaced by H. Lancieux.
3. Complaints were made by J. E. Molleur and J. E. Lareau, on the following dates:—on March 20th, 1912, on April 18th, 1912, on June 3rd, 1912, on September 27th, 1912, on September 28th, 1912, on September 30th, 1912.
4. Answered by number three.

Mr. McCREA:

1. Has Duncan McLeod, appraiser of Customs, Sherbrooke, Quebec, been dismissed?
2. If so, on whose complaint?
3. Was there any investigation?
4. If so, who was the investigator?
5. What salary was he receiving at the time?
6. If discharged, who was appointed in his place, and was there more than one person?
7. If new appointee or appointees, what salary or salaries do they receive?

Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. Yes, for neglect of duty.
2, 3 and 4. On information obtained through seizures of goods by special officers of customs, and by investigation into the work of his office by customs inspectors.
5. $1,250 a year.
6. George C. Harkness has been appointed acting appraiser in his place.
7. The salary of Mr. Harkness is $1,500 a year.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has W. A Hattie, Preventive Officer, Mulgrave, Guysboro County, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. On whose complaint was the dismissal made?
4. Was there an investigation?
5. If so, what witnesses appeared?
6. Who has been appointed to the position and at what yearly salary?
7. What yearly salary was paid to Mr. Hattie?

Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. Yes.
2. On account of political partizanship.
3. G. A. R. Rowlings.
4. Yes.
5. W. A. Hattie, William Bouche and Lorenzo Duff.
6. No officer has been employed in the place of W. A. Hattie, the preventive work at Mulgrave and vicinity being attended to by Mr. David Murray, who was employed prior to Mr. Hattie's dismissal.
7. $75 a year.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has David Reid, Fishery Overseer, Port Hilford, Guysboro County, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. On whose complaint?
4. Was there an investigation? If so, before whom?
5. Who has been appointed in his place, and at what salary?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. Offensive political partizanship.
3. That of Mr. G. A. R. Rowlings.
4. No; an investigation was unnecessary, Mr. Reid having acted as agent for Mr. J. H. Sinclair at poll 12, Guysboro county, at the Federal election in 1911. That he did so was verified by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.
5. Robert V. Cooper. $200 per annum.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. Was George C. Mann, Indian Agent of Hobema reserve, dismissed from the service? If so, for what reason?
2. If for partizan reasons, was an investigation held?
3. How long has he been in the service?
4. Does he receive a superannuation allowance? If so, how much? If not, why not?

Mr. McCREA.

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Mr. Mann has been advised that his services are to be dispensed with from the 1st of May, 1913, owing to his enfeebled physical condition.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Since April, 1882.
4. No. He is not eligible under the Superannuation Act.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That the name of Mr. Roche be substituted for that of Mr. Rogers on the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF DAVID FALCONER.

Mr. MACDONALD moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of David Falconer, lightkeeper at Caribou Island, county of Pictou.

Mr. BORDEN: There are a great many motions on the Order Paper that seem to overlap each other. There is no disposition whatever to withhold any documents that are ordinarily brought down with respect to such matters, but I think that if these motions are passed, it will be necessary for some hon. gentlemen who have moved them to meet some member of the Government, or some official of the Secretary of State's office, and arrange that the returns shall not be duplicated and endeavour to get some system out of the very great number of proposed Orders of the House, which I think, will overlap each other in many cases.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I see no objection at all to that, but if it does not involve too much labour, the mere mechanical work of preparing the answers might be done because it might be that two members might ask for the same thing and yet ask a little more in one case than in the other. But, if the motions are identically the same, I see no reason why they should be duplicated.

Mr. PELLETIER: There are several motions on the Order Paper for returns on account of the dismissals of postmasters in a certain county, and then there is a motion asking for the papers relating to all dismissals all over the country. Perhaps the one motion covering all of the cases might suffice.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. PELLETIER: We will have to give the same answers in each case.

Mr. CARVELL: Make duplicates.

Mr. PELLETIER: We will be duplicating all the time.

Mr. CARVELL: That will not hurt you.

Mr. GRAHAM: The difficulty would be that the information in a general return would be so voluminous that it would take a year to get it while, in individual cases, you can find the information required quicker. I see no reason why, if the larger return were brought down and the questions answered, the Government could not, with respect to subsequent questions, refer the member to such and such a page of 'Hansard.'

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria): I would point out that the motion No. 176 proposed by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is very indefinitely worded. It asks for an Order of the House for:

A copy of all letters, telegrams and other papers and documents previous to the resignation of——

So and So. I do not know whether it concerns all the departments of the Government or whether it concerns this gentleman only. I am only pointing this out as an example of the indefiniteness of motions. One is at a loss to know what is meant. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wants all the papers in the possession of the officers of my department, or whether the motion concerns this one party.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend need not worry about this. The wording of this particular resolution is purely a clerical error on the part either of my clerk or of the officials of the House. This is a motion which will form the subject of discussion, it is not an ordinary motion for papers, so that everything connected with it will be made clear before the Order of the House is passed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentlemen are debating motions on the Order Paper which is irregular.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF ANGUS SMITH.

Mr. MACDONALD moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Angus Smith, pilot on the steamer Earl Grey, and also of all the evidence taken at the latest investigation held in regard to the said complaints, and of the report of the investigation with regard to the same.

He said: This was a case in which the dismissal was made as the result of the proceedings of that delectable gentleman Mr. Duchemin. Some of the ministers in response to Orders of the House, undertook to bring down the evidence that was taken by that gentleman, but failed to bring it down. I would like to ask the minister to see that the return is complete, in accordance with the Order of the House and the motion.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MACDONALD moved for:

Copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents relating to the order made by the Railway Department for the transfer of engineers and firemen in conection with railway traffic between Truro and New Glasgow, in the county of Pictou.

He said: Before the development in an industrial way of eastern Nova Scotia—a development which has created more traffic in this portion of the province than is to be found anywhere along the line of the Intercolonial railway—and when the Intercolonial railway was in a crude state, this particular piece of road from Truro to New Glasgow was operated by officials who had control of the road between the cities of Halifax and Moncton. With the construction of what was known as the short line railway, from Oxford Junction to New Glasgow, with the subsequent development of the coal, iron and steel industries in the county of Pictou and the institution of the Dominion Coal and Steel Company in the county of Cape Breton, there arose these abnormal conditions which required to be dealt with by the railway authorities. After due consideration, and at the request of gentlemen interested in these industries, it was decided some fifteen or sixteen years ago that proper railway operation made it necessary this portion of the road should be operated not as an adjunct of the main line from St. John to Moncton, but as a portion of that division of the Intercolonial railway known as the Oxford and New Glasgow division, running from Oxford Junction in the county of Cumberland, to Sydney in the county of Cape Breton. Since that time an attempt was made, solely by some of the employees in the town of Truro and that vicinity who were connected with the main line, to have the operation of this branch detached from its natural adjunct with the Oxford and New Glasgow division, and brought back to the main line of railway. Such a proposition necessarily involved a great deal of inconvenience to the people who were handling the freight carried on the eastern division. If you could imagine a condition of affairs by which the railway division superintendent's office was within a mile or so of large coal and steel industries, and that these people placed on their sidings and forwarded to the central point of the division their products for transportation to other places, if you could conceive a railway policy under which goods to be transported had to remain on the sidings until men came from another division fifty miles away to move them, then you could realize the condition of affairs which practically exists to-day as the result of an order which the present Minister of Railways put in force. I know that the officials of the road have endeavoured to minimize the difficulties created by this anomalous condition, and I would ask the minister to suspend any departure from the system that has existed for so long without first hearing the representations of the men and of the business interests of eastern Nova Scotia, as both the men and the business interests are affected by the change. I was somewhat surprised that the minister, after the assurance he gave me last year, should have made any order in regard to the matter without consulting the people affected. If the order which has been made and which partially interferes with the traffic were extended its affect would be most prejudical to the business interests of Nova Scotia. The object of my notice is to obtain from the Department a full statement of what has been done and the reasons which have been urged on the minister for taking this course. I think the minister should suspend all action in regard to this matter until the people of eastern Nova Scotia should have the fullest opportunity of presenting their case to him and pointing out wherein their case would be prejudicially affected by the continuance of the present order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I desire to express my sympathy with the view taken by the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). As a member representing eastern Nova Scotia, I am interested in this question. I supposed that a few years ago the whole matter had been settled but there was confusion for a number of years and it always seemed to me to be more or less of a labour question, a question whether the employee residing at Truro and in that vicinity should obtain more than their share of the work on the Intercolonial railway. If the railway is to be run on business principles one would suppose that the men who do the work on the eastern branch would be the men who belong to that branch, and one can hardly understand why the department should bring men from another branch in order to carry on the work on the eastern division. I do not think there is any parallel for this way of doing business on any other division of the Intercolonial railway. So far as I am able to ascertain each division is separate and is managed from its own head office and there is no necessity in the world, unless for the purpose of favouring some particular people, why the eastern division should be treated differently from all other divisions. Geographically the branch between Truro and New Glasgow belongs to the Eastern division. It was placed under the eastern division a number of years ago and, in order that no injustice might be done to the men who, at that time, were working on the old Halifax division, all the men, I understand, who were employed on that road were taken over by the eastern division and had a right to promotion on that branch. This question was in a disturbed state for a number of years. Some years ago all the parties were heard and the matter was settled, but it has been opened up again. I feel certain that on the first occasion it was settled properly, and it ought to have remained settled. The business ought to be handled from the main office of the eastern division. The present system that is carried on will be inconvenient to the patrons of the road, as my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has said, and it will be more or less unjust to the employees of the eastern division. I would like to draw that to the attention of the minister. Besides, it appears to me that, to take men all the way from Truro in order to man a train at Stellarton, 40 miles distant, is a waste of time and is unbusinesslike. I trust the minister will give this matter his best consideration and restore the old arrangement which was, I think, fair and satisfactory to the patrons of the road and to the employees on the eastern division.

Mr. STANFIELD : Mr. Speaker, I did not know that this debate was coming up this afternoon. Some papers that I have, are, unfortunately, not in the House. This has been a vexed question for years. There has been not only the question affecting the engineers, but also the question affecting the conductors and brakesmen. I am not going to enter into any discussion of the question at the moment, but the hon. member for Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) made mention of promotion. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said that the men from Truro were those chiefly interested in this question, but I would like to say that the men from Halifax to Truro are just as deeply interested in this question as the men from Truro. With regard to the question of promotion, we have men on the main line from Halifax to Truro, who, previous to this change, were seniors by a good many years, and yet they are still acting as brakesmen on special trains, while younger men are acting as regular conductors. The grievances of the men from Truro to Halifax are just as great as are those of the men on the eastern division, and even greater. My understanding of the settlement made with regard to the engineers and firemen is that neither the engineers, firemen nor their brotherhood agreed to it. When the question was brought up I was never consulted with reference to it. I understand it was handled altogether through the brotherhood and no political reasons were advanced for the settlement. With regard to what the hon. member for Guysboro was remarking about engineers starting from a certain point, it must be remembered that there is this difference between engineers and conductors, that they do not run over the same divisions, and that engineers and firemen are under a different authority from that which controls the conductors. The conductors are under the divisional superintendent, while the engineers and firemen are under the master mechanic. When this question comes up a little later on, I expect to be able to go a little more fully into it, and to explain the reason why it is that men between Truro and Halifax are deeply interested in this question.

Mr. COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I was called out of the House when this matter came up, or I would have asked to have it stand. I have not the papers in the department and have had to send to Moncton for them. I will move the adjournment of the debate till a further date when I can have the papers before me. I want to assure my hon. friend from Pictou that there was no intention of not keeping my word in the matter, and if this change has been made without giving the proper parties notice, we will certainly give them notice.

Mr. MACDONALD: I quite agree with the proposal of the Minister that the matter should stand, and I have felt sure that the hon. gentleman overlooked the assurance that he gave me. All I ask is that he sees that the business interests and the interests of the men on the eastern division are not prejudiced and that the order made should be suspended in the meantime.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—PURCHASE AND SALE OF SHEEP.

Mr. MACDONALD moved for:

Return showing the number of sheep purchased by the Department of Agriculture, for sale in the province of Nova Scotia, the prices paid for the same, the parties who purchased them and the places where they were purchased and from whom; also showing the time and times at which the same were sold and the prices for which the same were sold, and also for any reports in regard to the purchase and sale of said sheep.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the motion which you have just read, I have done so for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to certain statements made in the public press of Nova Scotia with regard to the transactions of the Department of Agriculture in reference to the sale of sheep which was held in our province during the past autumn. The statements are of such a character that the House and the minister should investigate them fully. They do not come from opponents of the Government but from friends of my hon. friends on the other side. The letter which I intend to read is written by Mr. D. M. Cameron of Elgin, in the county of Pictou, dated October 11, 1912, to a paper known as the Free Lance, published in the county of Pictou, and it is to the following effect:

Editor Free Lance,—As I had the privilege of attending one of the recent sales of pure bred sheep, I would like to give the farmers some of my impressions regarding the same. You are aware that the Dominion Government last session, granted a large sum of money for the development of agriculture. Part of this money was handed over to the Dominion Sheep Breeders' Association, for the purpose of stimulating the sheep raising industry in the maritime provinces, British Columbia and parts of the Northwest. The recent sales are the result in my humble opinion, part of this money has been misspent on account of the poor class of stock that has been brought down here.

I claim the privilege of judging the same as I have been a breeder of pure bred sheep with fifteen years of practical experience. A few years ago the local Government inaugurated similar sales. Professor Cummings was commissioned to purchase the stock. First he secured what was offered by the local breeders, friends of the Government of course, the balance in Ontario.

It has been suggested to the present commission (Mr. Corning, M.P.P, of Yarmouth, being the representative for the maritime provinces) that the local breeders were entitled to some consideration on their part, but no attention was paid to it.

Comparing the stock secured by Professor Cummings and the stuff offered at Antigonish, they are not in the same class.

The House will notice that this gentleman declares that the stock which the Federal Government purchased for sale in Nova Scotia did not begin to compare with the stock which was purchased by Prof. Cummings who has charge of agricultural operations for the provincial government.

Outside of a dozen individual rams, the balance were only fit for the shambles. The grade ewes were ordinary looking sheep, numbers of better ones could be bought up around here for one-half the money that was paid for those.

When I looked over the bunch I must say that I would be ashamed to acknowledge that I was a Conservative. I am no expert in sheep raising, but this gentleman who writes this letter claims to be, and he says that this stock that the present Minister of Agriculture sent down to Nova Scotia, for the purpose of improving the sheep industry in our province, was so bad that when he looked at them he was ashamed he was a Conservative.

I would like to ask the farmers of this county if they are satisfied with the way the special grant from the Dominion Government and handed over to the local authorities is being distributed. The cheque from the grant to the Lorne Agricultural Society amounted to the mangificent sum of seventy-eight cents.

I understood that some thousands of dollars is being spent on the Agricultural College and Farm at Truro. Do not you consider that this money could be spent in a way that the average farmer could derive some practical benefit from it?

Now compare prices realized at Antigonish. Average prices for rams, seven dollars each; local sales at Windsor and Port Hawkesbury, more than three times that amount. I do not remember the exact amount but can produce the figures. Seven dollars each for rams that thirty dollars was paid for in Ontario. For instance to show that the farmers know good stock when they see them, one of the best of the lot at Antigonish sold for twenty-seven dollars. I have been informed that those sales down here will not realize one-half the cost.

I presume that some good stock has been purchased but the best has been shipped West. As I understand that those sales are to be continued, I think it about time our representatives and farmers would sit up and take notice, and not allow Ontario men to run our business, giving them liberty to dump all their refuse down here, without a protest.

That letter is signed by D. M. Cameron of Elgin, county of Pictou, a good Conservative, a good farmer and stock-raiser, a man who knows what he is talking about, and if the statement he makes is true, then the Department of Agriculture which was going to do such tremendous things, under the new minister, has badly failed in this respect. We were told when this Government came into power, that the hon. Mr. Fisher, a practical farmer who had to do with that business all his life, and knew something about it, was going to be put in the shade by the new minister. But we now find, according to the statement of his Conservative friend in my county, that while the new minister may know something about raising apples, he knows nothing about sheep, if one is to judge by the character of the animals he sent to our province. At all events, the statements in this letter indicate that the minister has been deceived; he evidently has been relying upon the advice of some persons who went out and purchased second class sheep in Ontario or elsewhere, took them to Nova Scotia, held a public auction, and sold them at ridiculously low prices, because the farmers of Nova Scotia had sense enough to see that they were no good and could not improve their stock. The situation is one which does not indicate that the Minister of Agriculture has been displaying any particular acumen or unusual ability in dealing with the agricultural side of his department. The charge made definitely and positively by the gentleman who takes the responsibility of writing this letter, is one which demands the attention of the minister, and I would be very glad to hear what he has to say by way of explanation. I trust that the papers, when brought down will contain full information, in order to satisfy Mr. Cameron and these other gentlemen as to where the stock was purchased, what was paid for it, the character of the men who bought it and the whole history of the transaction which is so roundly condemned in this letter.

Mr. STANFIELD: While I am not a judge of sheep, I know something about the product of sheep wool. I rise to state that the sale of these sheep was held in Truro, and I know that the gentlemen who had charge of bringing these sheep to Nova Scotia consulted Professor Cumming and Mr. Fred Fuller, both of whom the hon. gentleman knows well, and he also knows what side of politics they are on. In conversation with Professor Cumming, whom we all think well of in Nova Scotia, he stated to me in connection with the sale in Truro, that it was a good sale and that the quality of the sheep was good.

Mr. BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): I may point out to my hon. friend who brought up this question that it is not strictly a Department of Agriculture matter. We have not been doing this work or spending this money as a department, and at all events, I could not take personal responsibility for every detail of that work. I will say, further, that the grant of money under which this work was carried on, was made to the Dominion Sheep Breeders' Association of Canada for the express purpose of doing something to stimulate the sheep industry in Canada which I think my hon. friend will agree with me, is worthy of stimulation. When this money was granted to the Sheep Breeders' Association, it was suggested that as they could not deal with the whole of Canada with the comparatively small amount that was given, they should commence with the far West and the far East, because in Nova Scotia there was great need for stimulating the industry which would mean so much for that province. I do not suppose the hon. member has anything to cavil with as to that. Then, in reference to any political question that may be brought in, I would point out to my hon. friend that the president of the Dominion Sheep Breeders' Association to whom this money is entrusted is Colonel McRae, a very well known and prominent Liberal so that I do not think the hon. member can make any criticism along political lines. The suggestions made in connection with this work were that it should be taken up by the purchase and sale of a certain number of rams and grade ewes, to be distributed and sold in such parts of Nova Scotia as would receive the most profit from the stimulation of this industry. I am not prepared at the present time to follow the details of the speech of my hon. friend. I think that a great deal of matter can be procured through the Dominion Sheep Breeders' Association, and although it is not my particular responsibility, and although I am satisfied that good work has been done, I shall take the opportunity of getting the hon. member such details as will convince him that things are not exactly as he thinks they are. In the meantime, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACDONALD: Before the debate is adjourned, I would like to say to the minister who apparently wants to get some data with regard to this subject, that the issue was raised by the gentleman whose letter I read. I want to remind him that it was well understood that the late Minister of Agriculture and the late Government contemplated instituting experimental sheep farms in eastern Nova Scotia, and that the viewpoint of the men engaged in the sheep industry in our province was that that would be the best method to encourage the sheep raising industry and develop it in Nova Scotia. I think the Minister of Agriculture would have done better in the expenditure of the money he had at his disposal, if he had inaugurated a system of experimental sheep farms in eastern Nova Scotia, so that the leading farmers in my county who are interested in the question will know the facts. I would like to press upon the minister the necessity of taking into consideration the proposition to inaugurate these experimental farms, with any future expenditure he may have at his control for this purpose, instead of spending money in purchasing sheep of the character described here and bringing them to our province to sell.

Mr. BORDEN: I think there ought to be a very great future for the sheep raising industry in the province of Nova Scotia. I do not know any province in Canada that is in some respects better suited to sustain that industry than is the province whence my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) and I come. As to the letter which has been brought to the attention of the House, my hon. friend takes it for granted that the sheep are exactly of the quality and character described in the letter he has read.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have got a good witness.

Mr. BORDEN: I suppose, in respect to sheep as in respect to other animals and things, there may be a legitimate difference of opinion, and for the moment, notwithstanding the authority that has been quoted, and for which I have every respect, I am not prepared in the absence of further information that may be brought before the House to absolutely acquiesce in the opinion which is set forth in that letter. At all events, what my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has done is to place the grant in the hands of a representative association, to entrust to them the expenditure of this money for a very useful and proper purpose, and I do not know to what association or body of men in Canada the expenditure of that money could be more properly left than to the Dominion Sheep Breeders' Association. I do not profess to be acquainted with the personnel of that association, but I understand that it is constituted of men who have paid a great deal of attention to sheep breeding, and it might naturally be supposed to be competent to make a selection of stock for the purposes of the industry, whether in the eastern provinces or in the West. As has been remarked by the Minister of Agriculture, the gentleman who is at the head of that association is not only very prominently associated with this particular industry, but is very closely affiliated with the party represented by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. That being the case, it certainly cannot be laid as a political sin at the door of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, to select an association the most representative in his knowledge, and to entrust to it, without regard to political conditions of any kind, the expenditure of a sum of money for a very useful purpose. Further information, however, may be given later by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. NESBITT: I would suggest to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture that a very much better plan to adopt of buying sheep or cattle would be to have some man in his own department, who is an expert in such matters, do the buying. The members of the Dominion Sheep Breeders' Association are only men, and they want to make money out of it themselves, and the same with the other breeders' associations.

Mr. RHODES: I do not wish to enter into a general discussion on the question of sheep, because I do not know anything about it, but in as much as the arrangement effected for the distribution of sheep in the province of Nova Scotia has been criticised by a gentleman whom the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) claims is a man of authority, I can only say that we have in the county of Cumberland first-class sheep raisers. The firm of Logan Brothers have a reputation as expert sheep breeders, extending throughout the whole Dominion of Canada which is second to none, and their sheep obtain as high prices as those of any breeders in the whole Dominion. When the gentlemen who had to do with the purchasing of first-class sheep for the purpose of that industry, came to the county of Cumberland, they consulted with Mr. Stanley Logan, who is at the head of this co-partnership, and they purchased the very best sheep he had in his flock, and I may say for the benefit of the hon. member for Pictou, that Mr. Logan is one of the strongest Liberals in the county. He is a cousin of the late member. He is the local president of the Sheep Breeders' Association of Cumberland, and the sheep that were purchased from other breeders were purchased after consulting with Mr. Logan. Another man from whom I know sheep were purchased was Mr. Barry Baker of Minudie, a member of one of the most historic Liberal families in the county of Cumberland. By far the larger quantity of sheep in the county of Cumberland, which were secured by the Sheep Breeders' Association, were purchased from Liberals. I make mention of this circumstance merely to assure my hon. friend from Pictou that the matter of these sheep sales in the province of Nova Scotia was not a matter of politics, but the whole purpose was to benefit the sheep breeders of the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have the honour to represent a county which is perhaps one of the best sheep raising counties in the Dominion of Canada; at least it is a county where probably the highest bred sheep in Canada are to be found. I understand the money for the purpose of fostering the sheep industry in Nova Scotia has been expended under the direction of the Sheep Breeders' Association, and the name of Colonel McCrae as president of that association was mentioned by the Minister of Agriculture. Colonel McCrae lives in the city of Guelph where I live, and I do not think I know of any better all-round stock man than himself in the Dominion of Canada. If the sheep in question were purchased on the judgment of Mr. McCrae, I am quite satisfied they were well purchased.

Mr. RHODES: Colonel McCrae was all over the province of Nova Scotia, and these sheep were purchased after having been personally inspected by him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think he is a man who would make a square deal, but it seems to me the sheep in this case were sold for a very small sum.

Mr. RHODES.

Mr. MACDONALD: Different kind of sheep altogether.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that they were purchased for about $30 and sold for about $7.

Mr. RHODES: The farmers of the county of Pictou are particularly shrewd men. I am not trying to insinuate that they got their heads together when these sales took place, but I am inclined to think that the sheep sold were as good as any that were sold elsewhere.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Colonel McCrae's reputation as a stockman stands very high indeed. If there is any real intention on the part of the Government to foster the sheep industry in the province of Nova Scotia or any part of the Dominion of Canada, their opportunity came a year ago last September when the reciprocity pact was before the people of Canada. It is well known that the sheep industry in Canada is not a paying industry at the present time except in the case of a few who engage in raising fancy sheep, sheep of very high grade for export to the American market, and a great many of these men happen to reside in the county of Wellington, which I have the honour to represent. If my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture would devote his time to getting free entry of sheep into the United States, he would be doing something for the benefit of the sheep industry of Canada. The United States market for Canadian sheep is a paying market. The shipping point for my county is the city of Buffalo. There we sell our sheep, and there we pay our duty to get them in. It seems that if we could get anything in the nature of free entry to the United States, we might put the sheep industry upon a paying basis. It is a singular fact that twenty-five years ago, there were six times as many farmers raising sheep in Canada as there are to-day. They have practically gone out of it, there are only a few here and there, and, under present conditions, I think, there will not be much fostering of the sheep industry in Nova Scotia or any other part of the Dominion of Canada unless you gain access to the American market. All our big sales in the county of Wellington are made to the middle and western states of the United States. Large owners come over, and certainly they pay very handsome prices,—far higher than the prices paid in the case of Nova Scotia instanced by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). As I understood the letter that was read, one clause in it stated that, as a Conservative, the writer of the letter was ashamed of the sheep he had seen. I heard a Conservative farmer say, some time after the election in September a year ago, that he had voted against reciprocity and that ever since he had been ashamed to look a sheep in the face. I think that if my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) would devote himself to getting a better market for the sheep we now have, he would do more to foster the sheep industry in Canada than by any specific or direct grant of money he may be able to make.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DEEPENING OF EAST RIVER, N. S.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams relating to the deepening of the East River in the County of Pictou, and also of any reports of engineers in regard to the same, and all plans and other documents relating to the prosecution of the work.

He said: The object of this motion is to enable one to ascertain the present position of the Department of Public Works in regard to the deepening of the East river. This river flows into the harbour in Pictou, and along its banks are the important towns of New Glasgow and Trenton with some of the greatest industries in the province of Nova Scotia. Recognizing the importance of facilities by water for these industries and these towns, the late Government, some three years ago, entered upon the policy of deepening that river, in order to afford navigation from the Straits of Northumberland and the harbour of Pictou for large vessels up to New Glasgow and Trenton. To carry out that project they provided a specially constructed suction dredge which did effective work, so that at the end of the last season under that government a channel had been created, for a distance of six miles, at a depth of 22 feet at low water. There were one or two places along this channel where the material to be taken out was such as to require the action of another dredge. It was hoped that this dredge would be brought in early during the last season, in order that the work might be made effective as soon as possible. But, this special dredge was not brought in until a few weeks ago, so that the completion of the existing work was delayed and the work for the time being thrown away. During the past spring practically every man connected with the dredge, except the captain and the engineer, was dismissed—not because they had committed any particular sin or had been guilty of partisanship, but simply because they belonged to one political party—they were simply told to go. This, taken in conjunction with extraordinary delays in starting the dredge, meant that no work was done in this great project until late May or June. And even when the dredge did start it was manned with a crew of incompetent men, and so there were mistakes and breakdowns which interfered with operations, and very little work was accomplished during the season. The chief engineer, who was not dismissed, left the dredge in midsummer because of the impossibility of getting any practical work done by the incompetent men who had taken the places of the competent men who had been there for a number of years. So, for the last year, the work has been practically at a standstill. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) has been too short a time in the department, I know, to be seized of these facts and of the condition of affairs in relation to this project. But he will recall having met a delegation last winter of a number of his political friends who came here to see the then Minister of Public Works in regard to this improvement. It was expected that, as a result of the view taken by the Government at that time, we should have had some substantial progress with the work. It is not peculiarly difficult dredging work, and this deepening of the river is necessary in order to afford full advantage to the industries of these towns. The sum of $75,000 was placed in the estimates, but nothing has been done. Very elaborate and complete plans laying down the conditions under which all the facilities that would be necessary for these municipalities and industries had been drawn up under the late Government by engineers who had given the most complete attention to the work. Why these plans have not been carried out I am not aware. I have heard rumours that different engineers have been there and that propositions have been suggested by them which involve the construction of dams and other projects of that nature. We shall see as to that when the papers are brought down. I am making this motion early in the session in the hope that the minister will be able to bring the data down early. The things I complain of are these: First, the operation of the dredging during the past year has resulted in practically no work being done. Second, the bringing of a special dredge to do the work there at a season when it was impossible to work, was of course, nonsense; and, third, the fact that nothing has been done under the vote of last year which would indicate substantial progress. In addition to the Nova Scotia Steel Company the McNeil Bridge works and half a dozen other institutions of that character, there has lately been organized a large steel car company, called the Eastern Car Company whose plant is in process of construction and which, it is hoped, will be in operation next year. This work of deepening the East river is expected to result in these great iron and steel industries being brought in touch with the ore supply of Newfoundland. There is no reason why this should not be done. The expenditure proposed is not very large, while the benefits to be derived from the expenditure is very great. I ask for these papers in order that I may see what this Government have been doing in the meantime. I know there were many reasons why the Department of Public Works was not doing very much for some time. The former minister worried about the navy so much that he worried himself out of his position. I do not suppose he took much interest in these things—certainly he did not seem to be taking much interest in the maritime provinces or in these large business propositions. I hope that the new Minister of Public Works will be more solicitous about the carrying through to completion of enterprises of this kind, so advantageous to the great industries of the country. I shall wait, with a great deal of interest for the reports and the plans, which I hope the minister will lay before the House to indicate what the engineers have decided to do in the matter.

Mr. STANFIELD: I would ask the hon. gentleman if Mr. Cantley, the general manager of the Nova Scotia Steel Company, has been dissastisfied with the work done during the last season?

Mr. MACDONALD: I cannot speak for him; I hold no brief for Mr. Cantley; but I know that a number of citizens in New Glascow do say that they are dissatisfied with it. My hon. friend seems to be taking a great interest in my county, but his information is so limited that I would advise him to go and commune with those who know something about the matter before he attempts to take part in this discussion. Speaking for a county with which I am thoroughly familiar, I say that that the delay of the Government to deal with this project is being condemned by business men of both political parties.

Mr. ROGERS: We have no objection whatever to bringing down all the papers, plans and documents to be found in the Department in connection with this matter. I am sorry that my hon. friend has some complaint to make in respect to the manner in which the work has been carried on but, referring to my hon. friend's statement in connection with the Nova Scotia Steel Company, I am informed on the best authority that the president of that company has expressed his entire satisfaction with the work carried on by the Department of Public Works during the past year. I fancy that the president of the Nova Scotia Steel Company, who is so directly interested with the carrying of this project, would have a full and complete knowledge of the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: The president of the Nova Scotia Steel Company does not happen to be a resident of the county.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure he is at least the general manager, and he is entirely satisfied with the work carried on. However, all the papers will be brought down, and I hope my hon. friend will find, as I am sure he will, that he has been very much mistaken in some of his statements in regard to this matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Cantley may be satisfied with the plan finally decided upon by the engineer of the department, and I hope to be satisfied with it myself when I see it. But that is a different matter from being satisfied with the work the department is said to have carried on, and as the work has simply stood still during the last year, I know Mr. Cantley should not be satisfied with an action of that kind.

Motion agreed to.

OTTAWA RIVER DREDGING.

Mr. DEVLIN moved for:

A return showing the amount of money expended in improving the channel of the Ottawa river between the city of Hull and the village of Masson.

He said: I have moved for this return solely for the purpose of calling the attention of the Government to the fact that the channel in the Ottawa river between the city of Ottawa or the city of Hull, and the village of Masson is not fit for navigation. I would suggest that more dredging be done. Certain dredges are now working at a place called Blanch Shoals. The channel is altogether unprotected. In view of the importance of navigation on the Ottawa river and the fact that it is the only waterway between Ottawa, the capital city of Canada, where there are immense industries, and the city of Montreal, the channel should be placed in exactly the same condition as the channel of the St. Lawrence. It should be lighted by a system of buoys such as are placed in the channel of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. BORDEN: The Minister of Public Works left the House a moment ago. I will draw his attention to the observation of my hon. friend. Personally I have no knowledge of this matter.

ALAMEDA, SASK., POSTMASTER.

Mr. TURRIFF moved for:

A copy of all letters, telegrams, evidence taken, reports, &c., and of all correspondence between the Postmaster General and officers of his department, and James Gibson, ex-postmaster at Alameda, Sask., in connection with the instructions sent him to hand the office over to E. Cronk.

He said: This is one of a great number of dismissals of postmasters in my constituency. This is a particularly bad one and my object in discussing the matter for a few moments before the papers are brought down is to ask the Postmaster General if, when he learns some of the facts of the case, he will not issue instructions to his officers cancelling the instructions that have already been sent out, and permit the old postmaster to retain office until something has been proven against him. I shall read a letter which I have received from the old postmaster. As a matter of fact he may be postmaster still; the latest word I had from him, a couple of weeks ago, was that, although he had been instructed to hand over the post office, to his successor and had received word also from an inspector that he would be down at an early day to make the transfer, the inspector had not appeared when this letter was written and therefore the post office had not been transferred. Mr. Gibson, the postmaster, wrote me as follows:

Alameda, Sask., Nov. 11, 1912.

J. G. Turriff, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your kind letter of the 2nd inst. On or about the 1st of January, 1912, at a meeting of the Conservative Committee, of which Mr. J. R. Trumper is chairman, a resolution was passed to the effect that as long as the present postmaster was content (J. B. Gibson) to hold the office, he was not to be dismissed, but when a vacancy occurred E. Cronk should be recommended. On or about the 8th of September I received a letter from the Post Office Department at Ottawa that a complaint had been made that I had taken an active partizanship in the Dominion and provincial elections during my incumbency as postmaster, also stating if that was not true I was to fill out a form of declaration which was in the same letter to that effect, to wit, that I had not acted on any committee, had not canvassed for votes, had not bought any voter with money or liquor, or had not interrupted at any political meeting, and that I had only voted, the above to be declared before a Justice of the Peace. At the time a Justice of the Peace was not available, and the declaration was made before a notary public. On the 20th September I received a notice from W. P. Dorsett, of Redvers, Man., that he would be at Alameda on the 3rd of October to hold an investigation into my political conduct during my term of office as postmaster at Alameda. On the 29th September I got another letter from Mr. Dorsett stating that he would not be at Alameda until the 8th of October. On the 8th of October Mr. Dorsett held his investigation in I. R. Trumper's office. When I entered Mr. Trumper's office the only person there was Mr. Dorsett and Mr. Trumper. I asked Mr. Dorsett if he had the declaration I sent the department at Ottawa. He said he had not. He commenced his investigation by asking if I had taken an active part in the Dominion or Provincial election. I answered that I had not. I expected that Mr. Trumper would have had some one to prove the complaint that had been made. To my surprise, there was no one to do so. Mr. Dorsett asked me if I had any witnesses. I said I had not, and that it was hard to prove a negative. Mr. Dorsett insisted that I should bring in some one. I brought in R. I. Wood and Fred Strong, and both these men on being sworn by Mr. Dorsett said that they did not know that J. B. Gibson had taken any part, as complained, in the Dominion or provincial elections. Mr. Dorsett asked me if I had discussed reciprocity. My answer was no, not in a political sense. Mr. Dorsett then gave a lecture on the evils of postmaster discussing reciprocity, and tried to prove by I. R. Trumper that I had done so, but to any judicial mind it could not be done. At this time I said to my friends I would send in my resignation, but they would not allow me to do so. My friends got out a petition which was largely signed by men of both political opinions and sent to the department at Ottawa. I enclose the letter that came in answer to that petition, also a copy of a letter I sent to the Postmaster General on the 31st of October. Mr. Trumper tried to have a petition, but could not get one name on it. Since the complaint went in to the department and was acted on I submit it should have been taken up in a proper manner. In order to have me dismissed it was not necessary to formulate a complaint, and had I been guilty I would have sent in my resignation at once. If you can get a look at the petition it will speak for itself. I do not look for a reinstatement, but I do ask for an impartial investigation. If my friends Trumper & Co. had only a little patience in the natural course of events, they could have had the post office at Alameda with all that pertains to it without any friction; but the man of 74 quarter sections of land thought otherwise, and his word is law, no matter who goes under in Alameda.

I am yours very truly,
JAMES B. GIBSON.

N.B.—I have always looked on Andrew Broder as one of my friends. Perhaps if you would see, he might say a word for the old man.

I beg your forbearance for troubling you with so long a letter. I am still in the office and may be until the 1st of the month. I do not know when the transfer will take place.

Now, Friend Turriff, I am afraid I weary you, but just a few lines more. Cronk is putting up a building, but Cronk has not one dollar, and every one in Alameda knows that it is Trumper that is financing this thing of a new post office for Alameda. It is he and he only that will reap the benefit or he would not touch it with his little fingers.

J. B. G.

He encloses this affidavit which I shall read.

Canada,
Province of Saskatchewan.

To Wit:

I, James B. Gibson, of the town of Alameda, in the province of Saskatchewan, Dominion of Canada, do solemnly declare that the statements contained in the annexed letter to John G. Turriff, Esq., M.P., of date 11th November, 1912, are true, and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

JAMES B. GIBSON.

Declared before me at Alameda, in the province of Saskatchewan, this 11th day of November, 1912.

J. P. GORDON,
A Commissioner for Oaths.

That letter and that affidavit set out the facts of the case very fairly and very fully. I happen to know the conditions at Alameda very well. I lived at Alameda for many years. It was through my recommendation that Mr. Gibson was appointed postmaster there three or four years ago. I venture to say that the Postmaster General cannot produce one bit of evidence that James B. Gibson has in any way been delinquent to his duties as postmaster. He has conducted the post office in a thoroughly capable manner, satisfactory to everybody in the town and vicinity. That is proven by the resolution which was passed by the Alameda Conservative Association in January last, in which they stated that so long as Mr. Gibson wished to retain the office he should be left free to do so, but that if it should become vacant they were going to recommend that Mr. Cronk be appointed postmaster. When I point out this and the conditions that are thoroughly well known in Alameda, and should be known by anybody who made an investigation, I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Postmaster General, and every hon. member of this House will agree with me that a great injustice, a most inhuman thing, is being done. Mr. Gibson is a man of eighty years of age.

Mr. PELLETIER : Does the hon. gentleman say that he has been dismissed ?

Mr. TURRIFF : He has received instructions from the Postmaster General to hand the office over to his successor, and he has a letter—I have it here—from the inspector of my hon. friend the Postmaster General saying that he will be down at an early date to make the transfer. My object in bringing the question up is to secure from the Postmaster General a promise that this will not be done, or, if it has been done, that it will be cancelled and that Mr. Gibson shall be reinstated until a proper investigation is held. If my hon. friend will hold an investigation, a proper investigation, not an investigation by some tool who is sent there for the purpose of manufacturing evidence, a man who refuses to take down the evidence, and does not take a word of evidence while he is questioning a witness or the postmaster, I am satisfied that the result will show Mr. Gibson to be innocent of any charge that may have been made against him. Why does the investigator not take down any evidence ?—because he does not want to put the evidence before the Postmaster General. He is afraid that the Postmaster General might exercise some common sense in the matter and might refuse to dismiss the postmaster when there is no evidence agains him. But, having refused to take down the evidence, he presents his report without one tittle of evidence to support it, and then my hon. friend the Postmaster General, or his department—I do not suggest that it personally came before the hon. gentleman—sends out word that this man is to be dismissed and a new man put in his place. As I said a moment ago, this man is over eighty years of age, although he is hale and hearty and quite capable of carrying on the work of the post office.

Let me give some of the circumstances under which I came to recommend him as postmaster of Alameda some years ago. Ten years ago, when my friend, Mr. Gibson, had attained the allotted span of life, three score years and ten, he was a well-to-do farmer with 480 acres of good land, a good house, implements and everything in good shape. He sold his farm at a good price and moved into the town of Alameda with his wife who is almost as old as he is. Like many a good man with a big heart in his bosom, he went security for another man doing business in the town. Unfortunately, they had a few years of bad crops and on top of that fire swept the town and this man whom he had gone security for was burned out. He was not able to collect his accounts; the result was that he lost every dollar that he had, and my friend, Mr. Gibson, had to pay out thousands of dollars to make good the bond that he had given. He lost every dollar he had. When, a few years ago, the question came up of appointing a postmaster in Alameda, I recommended that Mr. Gibson should be appointed, not because he had any political claim on the office—there were a dozen men in Alameda who had a better claim on me than had Mr. Gibson—but because I remembered the circumstances. He was a man then 75 years of age, he had lost all his money, he had nothing left and there they were, he and his wife, both old people. I recommended that he should be made postmaster, he was made postmaster, he has continued in the office ever since and has given the utmost satisfaction to Liberals and Conservatives alike. There was never a question raised against Mr. Gibson and when they circulated a petition in his favour it was signed by Liberals and Conservatives alike. When the other party, who wanted to get a tenant for the building he was going to put up wanted to have another man appointed postmaster, he tried to circulate a petition but nobody in the town would sign it. I leave it to the Postmaster General if under the circumstances the old postmaster should not have been left in charge of that office. It is not a big office, but there is enough in it to do Mr. James B. Gibson for the balance of his life. Think of turning a man of that age out in the middle of December, at the beginning of the rigorous winter we have in the West, turning him out practically without an hour's notice, when he committed no fault and had done nothing to deserve dismissal. If the Postmaster General can show that Mr. Gibson has done anything to deserve dismissal if he can show that he was a partisan in the election, if he can show that he did not conduct his office properly, then you will not hear one single word of complaint from me. But there is nothing against Mr. Gibson. The Conservative Association unanimously decided that he should not be disturbed in office, and in the face of that a partisan is appointed to make an investigation, and that partisan refused to take down evidence and makes an absolutely false report on the strength of which the Postmaster General sent instructions that Mr. Gibson should be dismissed and the office handed over to Mr. E. Cronk.

Mr. CARVELL: Is Mr. Cronk in favour of reciprocity?

Mr. TURRIFF: No, Mr. Cronk voted against reciprocity.

Mr. CARVELL: They ought to be glad to get an investigation in your part of the country. In my county they fire them without investigation.

Mr. TURRIFF: But this investigation was worse than no investigation at all; it was simply put up as an excuse. If the Postmaster General wants to get the facts let him send a man of repute and standing, and there are many Conservatives of repute and standing in Alameda, and let him hold an investigation and if he can find any man who says that the post office of Alameda has not been properly conducted ever since Mr. James B. Gibson has been in charge of it, then I will have nothing further to say.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would the hon. member read the letter he has referred to as coming from the Postmaster General so that I may recall these facts to my memory?

Mr. TURRIFF: The letters are very short and they do not throw much light on anything. This is the entire correspondence so far as I know:

Revers, Sask., September 28, 1912

James B. Gibson, Esq.,
Alameda, Sask.

Dear Sir,—Re investigation. Owing to circumstances over which I have no control it will be necessary to adjourn this investigation until Tuesday the 8th day of October, at the same hour.

Yours truly,
W. E. DORSETT.

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Moosejaw, Sask.,
22nd October, 1912.

Dear Sir,—I beg to inform you that I am in receipt of authority from the department to transfer the Alameda post office to Mr. Edward Cronk, and I will go to Alameda at the earliest possible date to effect the transfer.

Yours truly,
F. M. MacNAUGHTON.
P. O. Inspector.

Postmaster,
Alameda, Sask.

Ottawa, 15th October, 1912

Dear Sir,—I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 9th instant, on the subject of the postmastership of Alameda, Sask., and to say, in reply, that due note has been taken of your observations in the matter.

Yours very truly,
HECTOR B. VERRET,
Asst. Deputy Postmaster General.

Post Office Department, Canada
Ottawa, Oct. 18th 1912.

Sir,—I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 15th inst., enclosing a petition, expressing satisfaction with the management of the Alameda post office and recommending that no change may be made in that office, and to say, in reply, that a new appointment has already been made to the postmastership of Alameda.

I am Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Wm. SMITH.
Secretary.

R. J. Wood, Esq.,
Alameda, Sask.

I am not anxious to criticise the Postmaster General personally in respect to this case. He may be deserving of criticism, but if he is I do not know it. He may be cognizant of all these facts and he may know nothing of them, and I think it is very unlikely that he knew all the conditions as they existed in Alameda. So far as I am personally concerned, it would be very much to my political interest if I did not say a word about this in the House or elsewhere, and I will tell you why. At Alameda during the election in July last, there was the biggest Conservative majority for the Conservative candidate in the Souris district that was put up in any part of my constituency, and I doubt if there was such a big Conservative majority in any poll in the province of Saskatchewan. That majority was composed of nine-tenths of the men who passed the resolution in the Conservative Association recommending that no change should be made in the post office. I know Alameda well, having lived there for many years, and you will find as stalwart Conservatives there as in any place in Canada and nine-tenths of them are honourable men and men of high class and men of good standing. I want to tell the Postmaster General that if this dismissal takes place on the lines on which it has gone so far, if this man is dismissed without a fair and proper investigation, then when the next election is held, I do not care whether it is local or Dominion, the majority of 94 that the Conservatives have put up in Alameda will be wiped out and will go right over to the Liberals because the Conservatives of Alameda are not the class of men that will stand for that sort of crooked work that has been going on—pretending to hold an investigation that is no investigation, an investigation that is a farce. Imagine a man holding an investigation refusing to take evidence and on the strength of such an investigation this old official being turned out in the month of December. Mr. Gibson is 80 years old and they were depending on the salary from the post office which would have been plenty for them to the end of their days. But this is not the worst feature of it, although God knows it is bad enough. This man is one of the defenders of his country; this man is one of the men who turned out with the volunteers of the sixties, and he has been writing to me pointing out that out of 30,000 men who turned out over two-thirds of them have now passed away, and he wants to know if the other one-third are to be allowed to die before they get the $100 which was voted them by this Parliament. Here is a man who turned out to fight for his country, and this is the inhuman treatment that his country is handing out to him, not I think with the consent of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, but I hope, now that he knows the circumstances, he will wire this afternoon that if Mr. Gibson has been dismissed he shall be reinstated and then he can hold an investigation. I do not ask my hon. friend to reinstate Mr. Gibson without holding an investigation, but I do not want my friend Mr. Gibson dismissed without one. My friend the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Reid) dismisses cripples. I heard it stated the other day that my friend the Postmaster General invaded the sepulchre and dug up graves of four or five years standing in order to find some one to dismiss. I do not object to him doing that, but I object to him coming into my constituency and dismissing an innocent man under the guise of an investigation, which is no investigation at all. In view of the facts of this case, I simply ask my hon. friend, if the man has been dismissed, that he be reinstated, and then let him hold an investigation as full an investigation as he likes, and if he can find one jot or tittle of evidence against this man to justify his dismissal, then by all means let him be dismissed. The reason I am speaking of this matter now before I have the papers, is because I happen to know the facts of the case, and I want my hon. friend the Postmaster General to take action now and not wait until the papers are brought down. When that is done it will probably be too late. I want to tell my hon. friend also that, where the post offices are worth anything, the postmasters all along the line of railway are dismissed either without an investigation or with simply a farce of an investigation. The time has come when this must be stopped. I do not object to the Government when they come into power dismissing a certain number of men, because, seeing that we were in power for a number of years, there were possibly men who should be dismissed. In this particular case, however, I do not believe my hon. friend knew the facts, because I cannot think that any man in authority who knew the facts, would be so absolutely lost to all sense of honour or decency as to perpetrate such an outrage on any man, and especially to dismiss an old man over eighty years of age, who has done nothing to deserve dismissal, and to turn him out without a dollar in the month of December, to face such a winter as we have in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is very strange to hear some of the remarks which have fallen from the lips of my hon. friend from Assiniboia, and to be told in this House that postmasters in Saskatchewan are dismissed all along the line, when I receive complaints daily from that province that I am not dismissing enough postmasters.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I said they had been dismissed all along the line when the post offices were worth anything. The little fellows are left.

Mr. PELLETIER: Well, that is something, is it not? I was told in the House during the last days of last session that I had dismissed all the postmasters in one county from first to last. I was surprised to hear this, and on looking up the files, I found that the hon. member for that county had, to say the least, made a very great mistake indeed. I am not going to go into that matter any further, but the hon. gentleman who made that statement is within hearing of me now, and I think he will remember making it.

Mr. EMMERSON: You must have got into the habit of doing it in your sleep.

Mr. PELLETIER: I think the man who said it was asleep.

This is a good occasion also to refer to the very drastic action which was taken by the Postmaster General in dismissing a dead man. This matter has been reported several times in the press which has been called in this House the 'reptile press.' I have not considered the matter worth while, but, since the opportunity is given me, I may say that the dismissal of a man who has been dead for four years, cannot be very injurious to his corpse, but I am told that it is an awful crime. The facts, however, are these. The dead man had been replaced by a relative of his, who took care that the department did not know that the postmaster was dead, so that he could enjoy the benefits of office in place of the dead man, and the post office inspector, whose duty it was to attend to these matters, was so delinquent in his duty as not to hear about it, and so the department was deceived for four years, thinking it had to deal with a certain postmaster who had been in his grave for four years. When I heard about this, I thought the name of the man who was dead should be erased from the postal guide, and so I have been told I dismissed a man who has been dead for four years. This will give you, Mr. Speaker, an idea of the fairness of certain criticisms published in certain newspapers in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Was not some complaint made against him for being a partisan?

Mr. PELLETIER: No, but the man who had assumed the office had been a partisan.

An hon. MEMBER: Did the Postmaster General dismiss the real occupant?

Mr. PELLETIER: The real occupant was dead. I do not think this matter is worth while taking up the time of the House. The facts put before the House by my hon. friend from Assiniboia are serious facts, and I can only say, as he himself said, that many of these matters have to be attended to in the department, and, anybody will understand the number of postmasters now in this country is growing very fast. It is over fourteen thousand at present. I suppose my hon. friends on the other side of the House will not expect me to remember the facts concerning every postmastership in the country. The letters which my hon. friend has read being signed by officers of the department, the hon. gentleman, no doubt feels that there is a great deal in what he has stated. He has asked me to send orders this afternoon, by telegraph, that the postmaster be not dismissed. With all due respect to my hon. friend, and while I desire to act in deference to his wishes, I must say that I take it for granted that the officers of the department should have something to say about this matter. The hon. gentleman's remarks are on record in 'Hansard,' and I will give instructions at once that the officers shall look into the matter to-morrow morning. Let me recall something of what I said last session. My hon. friends on the other side must not be offended if I cannot bring to the House the files referred to in all the notices of motion or if I am not ready with the facts relating to any particular notice of motion when I have not been advised as to when the matter will be taken up. While I desire to treat my hon. friend with all courtesy, I cannot at the moment go into the facts of this case, my hon. friend not having given me notice that it would be brought up to-day. But I will give him all the satisfaction I can. Among the facts placed before the House by the hon. member are these—that this man has been a defender of this country, that he is an old man and that he has lost all his money. I feel confident that these facts have not been before me. I asked him to read the copy of the letter the postmaster sent and to keep the letter my hon friend sent to me. He has not read it.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have not got it. I have read everything except two or three letters from Mr. Gibson which were practically covered in the one I read.

Mr. PELLETIER: The letter of the end of September notified Mr. Gibson that the investigation would take place on October 8. Two months have elapsed since then, and the facts which my hon. friend has put to-day before the House might have been sent to me. Let me tell the hon. gentleman, I have refused in cases such as this is represented to be to dismiss postmasters. While I read in the press that I am doing this, that and the other, I may say that I have received from some electors letters of reproach because I do not make certain dismissals. If the facts given to the House had been presented to me—and though I am speaking without the papers in the case, I am confident that the facts never were before me—they would have been considered. And, as I have told the hon. member, the matter will be considered. I am somewhat surprised to hear that the gentleman sent to make the investigation is a disreputable man. I do not know him personally, but I must have had a suggestion for his appointment from somebody who was trustworthy and whom I consequently trusted. That this gentleman has acted in a dishonourable way in the investigation, I do not, for the moment, admit. I would like to go into the facts as requested by my hon. friend from Assiniboia and will do it without delay.

Mr. TURRIFF: With permission, I would say one word. Do I understand from the Postmaster General that, if the facts are as I have shown, and if there has been nothing against this old man he will be retained in his office?

Mr. PELLETIER: Certainly. If there has been, as the hon. gentleman says, a mock investigation, I desire to know it. When I gave instructions that the investigation should take place I intended that the investigation should be a serious one. I must say that I have had complaints before about mock investigations, and when I have gone into the matter have found that the assertions were not true and that the investigations were serious. But I do not wish to contradict my hon. friend without looking into the facts. I may say that I have refused in many instances, particularly in the West, to dismiss postmasters without investigation, and where I order an investigation it is with the idea that that investigation should be serious and fair.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If I may be permitted, I should like to ask a question. I noticed that in the discussion of this case it has been stated that the question was asked this postmaster whether he was in favour of reciprocity. I am also aware that that question has been put by the parties who are making the investigations in the province of Nova Scotia. Mr. Duchemin, who has been making investigations in the constituency I have the honor to represent, I am informed, invariably asks that; and when the postmaster admits that he was in favour of reciprocity, Mr. Duchemin looks much shocked as if the fact were a dreadful one. I would like to ask the Postmaster General, is it regarded as an offense by him or by the department for a postmaster to express views in favour of reciprocity.

Mr. STANFIELD: I would like to ask the hon. member for Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) a question which will throw light upon his own question. He says that the commissioner in Nova Scotia is putting the question to witnesses: Are you in favour of reciprocity? I would like to ask if the question put by Mr. Duchemin is not this: Did not you canvass or argue in favour of reciprocity?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am not so informed. I understand that the question whether a postmaster is in favour of reciprocity or has expressed himself in favour of reciprocity is the one put by Mr. Duchemin. I have not been present at the investigations and speak only of what has been reported to me by those who were present. It seems that some inquiry of that kind was made in the case of Mr. Gibson, and, in order that we might know whether it was regarded as an offense or not, I would like an answer from the Postmaster General.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member has put his question in a way which, I think, is not exactly fair to Mr. Duchemin. Last session accusations were made against Mr. Duchemin of doing a number of things which were unfair. I thought the statements were so serious that I sent Mr. Duchemin a copy of 'Hansard' in which they were reported and told him I considered them serious and wished an answer. He sent an answer which was perfectly satisfactory. The only answer I can give my hon. friend from Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) is that I do not think Mr. Duchemin has ever put any question to what a man believes or as to what his opinions are as to reciprocity. A man's opinion is his own property, but the difficulty is whether he has canvassed for reciprocity. I think there is some prejudice on the other side of the House on this matter, as Mr. Duchemin has been the investigator of some of these cases, but the explanation as given is absolutely satisfactory.

Mr. EMMERSON: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if, in the case of a Conservative being in favour of reciprocity, and voting accordingly he would be condemned to the guillotine?

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not consider the question a pressing one at this time, because I think that a Conservative in favour of reciprocity could not be found in this country.

Mr. EMMERSON: I may tell my hon. friend that I owe my seat in this House to those Conservatives who voted for reciprocity.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am sorry my hon. friend will not be returned in the next election.

Motion agreed to.

Robichaud, lighthouse keeper at Miscou, county of Gloucester, and the appointment of his successor; also of all correspondence respecting the engagement of the engineer of the fog alarm system attached to that station, and the certificates required by the Minister of Marine, showing the competence of that engineer; with the names of the new keeper and of the said engineer and their ages.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams addressed by the Conservative candidate in the county of Gloucester at the election of 21st September, 1911, to the Minister of Public Works from the day that he took his oath of office, on October 10, 1911, up to the 31st December, of the same year, on the subject of public works then under construction in the said county.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a return showing the foremen employed at the various public works in the county of Gloucester on the 21st of September, 1911, who have been dismissed since by the present administration, containing their names, reasons of dismissal, nature of the charges made against them, also a copy of all correspondence connected with the same and reports of inquiries, in cases where such inquiries have been instituted.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a copy of all corespondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents concerning an alleged defalcation in the accounts of Joseph J. Melanson, clerk in the customs office at Bathurst, county of Gloucester, which caused an inquiry to be held on the 23rd of October last by the provincial inspector of customs, with the name of the accuser.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a return showing the quantity by cubic yards of dredging made in the harbour of Bathurst by the dredge 'Restigouche' during the months of May, June, July, August, September, October and November of the year 1911, and during the same months in the year 1912.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a return showing all the postmasters dismissed by the present Government in the county of Gloucester, the names of such persons, the reasons for their dismissal, nature of the charges made against them; also a copy of all correspondence connected with it, and reports of investigations in cases where such investigations were instituted.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents concerning the dismissal of Frederick F. Doucet, keeper of the lighthouse at the entrance of the harbour of Caraquet, county of Gloucester, and the nomination of his successor.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents concerning the dismissal of Donald J. Hachey, Collector of Customs at Bathurst, county of Gloucester, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Turgeon.

For a return showing all appointments to office under the Dominion Government in the constituency of Edmonton from October 10, 1911, to November 21, 1912, with a statement of the salaries in each case together with a copy of all correspondence, recommendations to Council, Orders in Council, and all other papers or documents in any way connected with such appointments—Mr. Oliver.

For a return showing all the employees of the Dominion Government in the constituency of Edmonton dismissed between 10th of October, 1911, and 21st of November, 1912, the salary being paid to each employee at the time of his dismissal, together with a copy of all correspondence, recommendations to Council, Orders in Council, and all other papers or documents in any way connected with such dismissals.—Mr. Oliver.

For a return showing the detail and number of dismissals from public offices by the present Government to this date in the riding of Mackenzie, together with the names of the dismissed occupants, the reasons for their dismissal, the complaints against such officials, and a copy of all correspondence with respect to the same, and of all reports of investigations, where any such were held.—Mr. Cash.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS BY MEMBERS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to make one observation with reference to the Order Paper with which we have been dealing this afternoon. I notice that the very healthy rule which is followed in the British House of Commons of allowing a member to make only a certain number of motions in one day seems to be sadly neglected in our case.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, December 5, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Hazen.

Mr. BORDEN.

THE NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 21) to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire. He said: Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House upon so important a subject as that which I propose to discuss, I shall speak in no controversial spirit. If a portion of my remarks may necessarily controvert opinions which have been expressed by hon. gentlemen on either side of the House, let it be understood that I do so, not by way of criticism, but purely for the purpose of giving frankly to the House the reasons which have led the Government to adopt the course which I shall now out line.

It is not necessary to dwell upon the increasing power and influence of Canada within the Empire, due to its remarkable growth and expansion, and to the wonderful and rapid development of its resources during the past quarter of a century. With this increasing power and influence there has necessarily come by sure and gradual steps a certain development in our relations with the United Kingdom and the other dominions. The evolution of the constitutional relations within the Empire during the past half century has not been less marked than its material progress. In this constitutional development, we are necessarily confronted with the problem of combining co-operation with autonomy. It seems most essential that there should be such co-operation in defence and in trade as will give to the whole Empire an effective organization in these matters of vital concern. On the other hand, each dominion must preserve in all important respects the autonomous government which it now possesses. Responsibility for the Empire's defence upon the high seas, in which is to be found the only effective guarantee of its existence, and which has hitherto been assumed by the United Kingdom, has necessarily carried with it responsibility for and control of foreign policy. With the enormous increase of naval power which has been undertaken by all great nations in recent years, this tremendous responsibility has cast an almost impossible burden upon the British islands, which for nearly a thousand years have exercised so profound an influence upon the world's history. That burden is so great that the day has come when either the existence of this Empire will be imperilled or the young and mighty dominions must join with the motherland to make secure the common safety and the common heritage of all. When Great Britain no longer assumes sole responsibility for defence upon the high seas, she can no longer undertake to assume sole responsibility for and sole control of foreign policy which is closely, vitally, and constantly associated with that defence in which the dominions participate. It has been declared in the past, and even during recent years, that responsibility for foreign policy could not be shared by Great Britain with the dominions. In my humble opinion, adherence to such a position could have but one and that a most disastrous result. During my recent visit to the British islands, I ventured on many public occasions to propound the principle that the great dominions, sharing in the defence of the Empire upon the high seas, must necessarily be entitled to share also in the responsibility for and in the control of foreign policy. No declaration that I made was greeted more heartily and enthusiastically than this. It is satisfactory to know that to-day not only His Majesty's ministers but also the leaders of the opposite political party in Great Britain have explicitly accepted this principle and have affirmed their conviction that the means by which it can be constitutionally accomplished must be sought, discovered and utilized without delay.

Before proceeding to declare and explain the proposals of the Government, I desire to call attention to certain remarks which I addressed to this House just two years ago in replying to inquiries as to the course we would pursue after attaining power. These remarks were as follows:

It may be fairly asked what we would do if we were in power to-day with regard to a great question of this kind. It seems to me that our plain course and duty would be this: The Government of this country are able to ascertain and to know, if they take the proper action for that purpose, whether the conditions which face the Empire at this time in respect of naval defence are grave. If we were in power we would endeavour to find that out, to get a plain, unvarnished answer to that question, and if the answer to that question, based upon the assurance of the Government of the Mother Country and the report of the naval experts of the Admiralty were such—and I think it would be such—as to demand instant and effective action by this country, then I would appeal to Parliament for immediate and effective aid, and if Parliament did not give immediate and effective aid I would appeal from Parliament to the people of the country.

Then, Sir, as to the permanent policy, I think the people have a right to be consulted. I do not know whether I have made my position clear but I have done so according to my humble capacity. I think the question of Canada's co-operation upon a permanent basis in Imperial defence involves very large and wide considerations. If Canada and the other dominions of the Empire are to take their part as nations of this Empire in the defence of the Empire as a whole, shall it be that we, contributing to that defence of the whole Empire, shall have absolutely as citizens of this country, no voice whatever in the councils of the Empire? I do not think that such would be a tolerable condition. I do not believe the people of Canada would for one moment submit to such a condition. Shall members of this House, representative men, representing 221 constituencies of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, shall no one of them have the same voice with regard to those vast Imperial issues that the humblest taxpayer in the British isles has at this moment? It does not seem to me that such a condition would make for the integrity of the Empire, for the closer co-operation of the Empire. Regard must be had to these far reaching considerations, a permanent policy would have to be worked out, and when that permanent policy has been worked out and explained to the people of Canada, to every citizen in this country, then it would be the duty of any government to go to the people of Canada to receive their mandate and accept and act upon their approval or disapproval of that policy.

The present Government assumed office on the 10th of October, 1911, and met Parliament on the 17th day of November following. It is hardly necessary to point out that there was no opportunity until after the close of the session to visit Great Britain or to consult the Admiralty in any effective way. Shortly after the session closed, I went to England accompanied by some of my colleagues, and for several weeks we had the opportunity from time to time of conferring with the British Government and of consulting with the technical and expert advisers of the Admiralty respecting the whole question of naval defence, and especially the conditions which confront the Empire at present and in the early future. I desire to express my warm appreciation of the manner in which we were received by His Majesty's Government, who took us most fully into their confidence on the great questions of foreign policy and of defence, and who accorded to us all relevant information at their disposal. A portion of this necessarily is of a very confidential character which cannot be made public; but an important part will be communicated to the House in a document which I shall lay on the table this afternoon.

In considering the power of the British Empire to maintain that predominance upon the sea which is essential to its safety and to its very existence, it is clear that reference to the other naval forces of the world cannot be excluded. Such references and comparisons are frequently made by all the great powers, and they do not imply anything unfriendly in intention or in spirit to other nations. Indeed, a most distinct reference to the naval power of Great Britain has been set forth in the preamble to the naval law of one great empire which in recent years has sprung to the front with amazing rapidity in the development of its naval forces.

I now proceed to submit to the House the information which we have received from His Majesty's Government. It is in the form of a memorandum, as follows:

From the Secretary of State for the Colonies to His Royal Highness the Governor General.

Downing Street, 25th October, 1912.

SIR,—1. I have the honour to transmit to Your Royal Highness the accompanying copy of a memorandum relating to the requirements of the naval defence of the Empire.

2. This document has been prepared by the Admiralty on the instructions of His Majesty's Government in compliance with the request of Mr. Borden with a view to presentation to the Dominion Parliament if, and when, the Dominion ministers deem it necessary.

I have, &c.,
L. HARCOURT.

MEMORANDUM.

Prepared by the Board of Admiralty on the General Naval Situation and communicated to the Government of Canada by His Majesty's Government.

1. The Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada has invited His Majesty's Government through the Board of Admiralty to prepare a statement of the present and immediately prospective requirements of the naval defence of the Empire for presentation to the Canadian Parliament if the Dominion Cabinet deem it necessary.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty are prepared to comply and to supplement, in a form which can be made public, the confidential communications and conversations which have passed between the Admiralty and ministers of the Dominion Parliament during the recent visit to the United Kingdom.

The Admiralty set the greatest store by the important material, and still more important moral, assistance which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy on the high seas, but they think it necessary to disclaim any intention, however indirect, of putting pressure upon Canadian public opinion, or of seeking to influence the Dominion Parliament in a decision which clearly belongs solely to Canada.

The Admiralty therefore confine themselves in this statement exclusively to facts, and it is for the Dominion Government and Parliament to draw their own conclusions therefrom.

2. The power of the British Empire to maintain the superiority on the sea, which is essential to its security, must obviously be measured from time to time by reference to the other naval forces of the world, and such a comparison does not imply anything unfriendly in intention or in spirit to any other power or group of powers. From this point of view the development of the German fleet during the last fifteen years is the most striking feature of the naval situation today. That development has been authorized by five successive legislative enactments, viz., the Fleet Laws of 1898, 1900, 1906, 1908, and 1912. These laws cover the period up to 1920.

Whereas in 1898 the German fleet consisted of:—

9 battleships (excluding coast defence vessels),
3 large cruisers,
28 small cruisers,
113 torpedo boats, and
25,000 men.

maintained at an annual cost of 6,000,000*l.*, the full fleet of 1920 will consist of:—

41 battleships,
20 large cruisers,
40 small cruisers,
144 torpedo boats,
72 submarines, and

estimated to be maintained at an annual cost of 23,000,000*l.* These figures, however, give no real idea of the advance, for the size and cost of ships has risen continually during the period, and, apart from increasing their total numbers, Germany has systematically replaced old and small ships, which counted as units in her earlier fleet, by the most powerfull and costly modern vessels. Neither does the money provided by the estimates for the completed law represent the increase in cost properly attributable to the German navy, for many charges borne on British naval funds are otherwise defrayed in Germany; and the German navy comprises such a large proportion of new ships that the cost of maintenance and repair is considerably less than in navies which have been longer established.

3. The naval expansion of Germany has not been provoked by British naval increases. The German Government have repeatedly declared that their naval policy has not been influenced by British action, and the following figures speak for themselves:—

In 1905 Great Britain was building 4 capital ships, and Germany 2.

In 1906 Great Britain reduced to 3 capital ships, and Germany increased to 3.

In 1907 Great Britain built 3 capital ships, and Germany built 3.

In 1908 Great Britain further reduced to 2 capital ships, and Germany further increased to 4.

It was not until the efforts of Great Britain to procure the abatement or retardation of naval rivalry had failed for 3 successive years that the Admiralty were forced in 1909, upon a general review of the naval situation, to ask Parliament to take exceptional measures to secure against all possible hazards the safety of the Empire. In that year, 8 capital ships were laid down in Great Britain, and 2 others were provided by the Commonwealth of Australia and the Dominion of New Zealand respectively—a total of 10.

4. In the spring of the present year the fifth Germany navy law was assented to by the Reichstag. The main feature of that law is not the increase in the new construction of capital ships, though that is important, but rather the increase in the striking force of ships of all classes which will be immediately available at all seasons of the year.

A third squadron of 8 battleships will be created and maintained in full commission as part of the active battle fleet. Whereas, according to the unamended law, the active battle fleet consisted of 17 battleships, 4 battle or large armoured cruisers, and 12 small cruisers, it will in the near future consist of 25 battleships, 8 battle or large armoured cruisers, and 18 small cruisers; and whereas at present, owing to the system of recruitment which prevails in Germany, the German fleet is less fully mobile during the winter than during the summer months, it will, through the operation of this law, not only be increased in strength, but rendered much more readily available. Ninety-nine torpedo boat destroyers, instead of 66, will be maintained in full commission out of a total of 144; 72 new submarines will be built within the currency of the new law, and of these it is apparently proposed to maintain 54 with full permanent crews. Taking a general view, the effect of the law will be that nearly four-fifths of the entire German navy will be maintained in full permanent commission; that is to say, instantly and constantly ready for war.

So great a change and development in the German fleet involves, of course, important additions to their personnel. In 1898 the officers and men of the German navy amounted to 25,000. To-day that figure has reached 66,000. The new law adds 15,000 officers and men, and makes a total in 1920 of 101,500.

The new construction under the law prescribes the building of 3 additional battleships—1 to be begun next year, 1 in 1916—and 2 small cruisers, of which the date has not yet been fixed. The date of the third battleship has not been fixed. It has been presumed to be later than the six years which are in view. The cost of these increases in men and in material during the next six years is estimated at 10,500,000*l* spread over that period above the previous estimates.

The facts set forth above were laid before the House of Commons on the 22nd July, 1912 by the First Lord of the Admiralty.

5. The effect of the new German navy law is to produce a remarkable expansion of strength and readiness. The number of battleships and large armoured cruisers which will be kept constantly ready and in full commission will be raised by the law from 21, the present figure, to 33—an addition of 12, or an increase of about 57 per cent.

The new fleet will, in the beginning, include about 20 battleships and large cruisers of the older type, but gradually as new vessels are built the fighting power of the fleet will rise until in the end it will consist completely of modern vessels.

The complete organization of the German fleet, as described by the latest law, will be 5 battle squadrons and a fleet flagship, comprising 41 battleships in all, each attended by a battle or armoured cruiser squadron, complete with small cruisers and auxiliaries of all kinds and accompanied by numerous flotillas of destroyers and submarines.

This full development will only be realised step by step; but already in 1914 2 squadrons will, according to Admiralty information, be entirely composed of what are called dreadnoughts, and the third will be made up of good ships like the 'Deutschlands' and the 'Braunschweigs,' together with 5 dreadnought battle cruisers.

This great fleet is not dispersed all over the world for duties of commerce protection or in discharge of Colonial responsibilities; nor are its composition and character adapted to those purposes. It is concentrated and kept concentrated in close proximity to the German and British coasts.

Attention must be drawn to the explicit declaration of the tactical objects for which the German fleet exists as set forth in the preamble to the naval law of 1900 as follows:—

"In order to protect German trade and commerce under existing conditions, only one thing will suffice, namely, Germany must possess a battle fleet of such strength that even for the most powerful naval adversary a war would involve such risks as to make that power's own supremacy doubtful. For this purpose it is not absolutely necessary that the German fleet should be as strong as that of the greatest naval power, for, as a rule, a great naval power will not be in a position to concentrate all its forces against us."

6. It is now necessary to look forward to the situation in 1915.

In Home Waters.

In the spring of the year 1915—

Great Britain will have 25 dreadnought battleships and 2 'Lord Nelsons.'

Germany will have 17 dreadnought battleships.

Great Britain will have 6 battle cruisers.

Germany will have 6 battle cruisers.

These margins in new ships are sober and moderate. They do not err on the side of excess. The reason they suffice for the present is that Great Britain possesses a good superiority in battleships, and especially armoured cruisers, of the pre-dreadnought era.

The reserve of strength will steadily diminish every year, actually, because the ships of which it is composed grow old, and relatively, because the new ships are more powerful. It will diminish more rapidly if new construction in Germany is increased or accelerated. As this process continues, greater exertions will be required by the British Empire.

Mediterranean Station.

Four battle cruisers and four armoured cruisers will be required to support British interests in the Mediterranean during the years 1913 and 1914. During those years the navies of Austria and Italy will gradually increase in strength, until in 1915 they will each possess a formidable fleet of 4 and 6 dreadnought battleships respectively, together with strong battleships of the pre-dreadnought types and other units, such as cruisers, torpedo-craft, &c. It is evident, therefore, that in the year 1915 our squadron of 4 battle cruisers and 4 armoured cruisers will not suffice to fulfil our requirements, and its whole composition must be re-considered.

Overseas.

It has been necessary within the past decade to concentrate the fleet mainly in home waters.

In 1902 there were 160 British vessels on the overseas stations against 76 to-day.

7. Naval supremacy is of two kinds: general and local. General naval supremacy consists in the power to defeat in battle and drive from the seas the strongest hostile navy or combination of hostile navies wherever they may be found. Local superiority consists in the power to send in good time to, or maintain permanently in some distant theatre forces adequate to defeat the enemy or hold him in check until the main decision has been obtained in the decisive theatre. It is the general naval supremacy of Great Britain which is the primary safeguard of the security and interests of the great dominions of the Crown, and which for all these years has been the deterrent upon any possible designs prejudicial to or inconsiderate of their policy and safety.

The rapid expansion of Canadian sea-borne trade, and the immense value of Canadian cargoes always afloat in British and Canadian bottoms, here require consideration. On the basis of the figures supplied by the Board of Trade to the Imperial Conference of 1911, the annual value of the overseas trade of the Dominion of Canada in 1909-10 was not less than £72,000,000, and the tonnage of Canadian vessels was 718,000 tons, and these proportions have already increased and are still increasing. For the whole of this trade wherever it may be about the distant waters of the world, as well as for the maintenance of her communications, both with Europe and Asia, Canada is dependent, and has always depended upon the Imperial navy, without corresponding contribution or cost.

Further, at the present time and in the immediate future Great Britain still has the power, by making special arrangements and mobilizing a portion of the reserves, to send, without courting disaster at home, an effective fleet of battleships and cruisers to unite with the Royal Australian navy and the British squadrons in China and the Pacific for the defence of British Columbia, Australia and New Zealand. And these communities are also protected and their interests safeguarded by the power and authority of Great Britain so long as her naval strength is unbroken.

8. This power, both specific and general, will be diminished with the growth not only of the German navy, but by the simultaneous building by many powers of great modern ships of war.

Whereas, in the present year, Great Britain possesses 18 battleships and battle-cruisers of the dreadnought class against 19 of that class possessed by the other powers of Europe, and will possess in 1913, 24 to 21, the figures in 1914 will be 31 to 33; and in the year 1915, 35 to 51.

The existence of a number of navies all comprising ships of high quality must be considered in so far as it affects the possibilities of adverse combinations being suddenly formed. Larger margins of superiority at home would, among other things, restore a greater freedom to the movements of the British squadrons in every sea, and directly promote the security of the Dominions.

Anything which increases our margin in the newest ships diminishes the strain and augments our security and our chances of being left unmolested.

9. Whatever may be the decision of Canada at the present juncture, Great Britain will not in any circumstances fail in her duty to the overseas dominions of the Crown.

Mr. BORDEN.

She has before now successfully made head alone and unaided against the most formidable combinations and she has not lost her capacity by a wise policy and strenuous exertions to watch over and preserve the vital interests of the Empire.

The Admiralty are assured that His Majesty's Government will not hesitate to ask the House of Commons for whatever provision the circumstances of each year may require. But the aid which Canada could give at the present time is not to be measured only in ships or money. Any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety, would be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness to the united strength of the Empire, and to the renewed resolve of the overseas dominions to take their part in maintaining its integrity.

10. The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

In this twentieth century of Christianity, in this age which boasts of its civilization, the increasing tendency of the nations to arm themselves against each other is not only regrettable, but depressing and alarming. May the day soon approach when international differences will be settled by appeal to a tribunal established by international authority, and so constituted that its decrees will unfailingly command respect and obedience. But while war is still the supreme arbiter between the nations, we to whose care this vast heritage has been committed must never forget that we are the trustees of its security.

Do Canadians sufficiently realize the disparity between the naval risks of our Empire and those of any other nation? The armies of continental Europe number their men by the million, not by the thousand. They are highly equipped and organized; the whole population have undergone military training, and any one of these countries is absolutely secure against invasion from Great Britain, which could not send an expeditionary force of more than one hundred and fifty thousand men, at the highest estimate. Such a force would be outnumbered twenty to one by any of the great European powers. This Empire is not a great military power, and it has based its security in the past as in the present almost entirely on the strength of the navy. A crushing defeat upon the high seas would render the British islands or any of the dominions subject to invasion by any great military power. The loss of such a decisive battle by Great Britain would practically destroy the United Kingdom, shatter the British Empire to its foundation, and change profoundly the destiny of its component parts. The advantages which Great Britain could gain from defeating the naval forces of any other power would be non-existent except in so far as the result would insure the safety of the Empire. On the other hand, there are practically no limits to the ambitions which might be indulged in by other powers if the British navy were once destroyed or disabled. There is, therefore, grave cause for concern when once the naval supremacy of the Empire seems on the point of being successfully challenged.

The great outstanding fact which arrests our attention in considering the existing conditions of naval power is this: Twelve years ago the British navy and the British flag were predominant in every ocean of the world and along the shores of every continent. To-day they are predominant nowhere except in the North Sea. The paramount duty of ensuring safety in home waters has been fulfilled by withdrawing or reducing squadrons in every part of the world, and by concentrating nearly all the effective naval forces in close proximity to the British islands. In 1902 there were fifty-five British warships on the Mediterranean station; to-day there are nineteen. There were fourteen on the North America and West Indies station; to-day there are three. There were three on the southeast coast of South Africa; to-day there is one. There were sixteen on the Cape of Good Hope station; to-day there are three. There were eight on the Pacific station; to-day there are two. There were forty-two on the China station; to-day there are thirty-one. There were twelve on the Australian station; to-day there are eight. There were ten on the East Indies station; to-day there are nine. Or, to sum up, in 1902 there were one hundred and sixty ships on foreign and colonial stations against seventy-six to-day.

Do not imagine that this result has been brought about by any reduction in expenditure, for the case is precisely the reverse. Great Britain's total naval expenditure in 1902 was less than $152,000,000. For the present fiscal year it will exceed $220,000,000. Why, then, has the naval force of the Empire been so enormously reduced throughout the world, while at the same time the expenditure has increased by nearly fifty per cent? For the simple reason that the increasing strength of other navies, and especially of the German navy, has compelled Great Britain not only to increase her fleet, but to concentrate it in the vicinity of the British islands; and there has been, of course, a substantial increase of strength in home waters. In short, the strain of meeting changed conditions has been so heavy and unceasing that, in spite of largely increased expenditure and every possible exertion, the Admiralty have been compelled by pressure of circumstances to withdraw or diminish forces throughout the world which in time of peril safeguarded the security and integrity of the King's dominions and in time of peace were a living and visible symbol of the tie that unites all the subjects of the Crown.

It is neither necessary nor desirable in this place to debate or discuss the probability or imminence of war. The real test of our action is the existence or non-existence of absolute security. We cannot afford to be satisfied with anything less than that, for the risks are too great. It should never be forgotten that without war, without the firing of a shot or the striking of a blow, our naval supremacy may disappear, and with it the sole guarantee of the Empire's continued existence. I especially desire to emphasize this consideration; for all history, and especially modern history, conveys to us many grave warnings that the issue of great events may be determined, and often is determined, not by actual war resulting in victory or defeat, but by the mere existence of unmistakable and pronounced naval or military superiority on either side.

The fact that trade routes, vital to the Empire's continued existence, are inadequately defended and protected, by reason of necessary concentration in home waters, is exceedingly impressive and even startling. Even during the present year the battleships of the British Mediterranean fleet based on Malta have been withdrawn and based on Gibraltar in order that they might become more easily available if necessary for aid in home waters. The Atlantic fleet based on Gibraltar has been withdrawn to the vicinity of the British Islands for the same reason. Under such conditions the British flag is not predominant in the Mediterranean, and, with every available exertion on the part of the whole Empire, it will be impossible to regain the necessary position of strength in that great highway before 1915 or 1916. Austria-Hungary, with only one hundred and forty miles of sea coast, and with absolutely no colonial possessions, is building in the Mediterranean a formidable fleet of dreadnoughts which will attain its full strength in about three years, and which will be supported by strong battleships of the pre-dreadnought type, and by cruisers, torpedo craft, and other necessary auxiliaries. The fleet of Italy in the same theatre will be even more powerful and more formidable.

The withdrawal of the British flag and the British navy from so many parts of the world for the purpose of concentration in home waters has been necessary but unfortunate. Our navy was once dominant everywhere, and the white ensign was the token of naval supremacy in all the seas. Is it not time that the former conditions should in some measure be restored? Upon our own coasts, both Atlantic and Pacific, powerful squadrons were maintained twelve years ago. To-day the flag is not shown on either seaboard. I am assured that the aid which we propose will enable such special arrangements to be consummated that, without courting disaster at home, an effective fleet of battleships and cruisers can be established in the Pacific, and a powerful squadron can periodically visit our Atlantic seaboard, to assert once more the naval strength of the Empire along these coasts. I do not forget, however, that it is the general naval supremacy of the Empire which primarily safeguards the overseas dominions. New Zealand's battleship is ranged in line with the other British battleships in the North Sea because there New Zealand's interests may be best guarded by protecting the very heart of the Empire.

In presenting our proposals, it will be borne in mind that we are not undertaking or beginning a system of regular and periodical contributions. I agree with the resolution of this House in 1909, that the payment of such contributions would not be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

Upon the information which I have disclosed to the House, the situation is in my opinion sufficiently grave to demand immediate action. We have asked His Majesty's Government in what form temporary and immediate aid can best be given by Canada at this juncture. The answer has been unhesitating and unequivocal. Let me again quote it:

> We have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

Upon inquiry as to the cost of such a battleship, we are informed by the Admiralty that it is approximately £2,350,000 including armament and first outfit of ordnance stores and ammunition. The total cost of three such battleships, which when launched will be the most powerful in the world, would be approximately $35,000,000, and we ask the people of Canada through their Parliament to grant that sum to His Majesty the King of Great Britain and Ireland and of the overseas dominions, in order to increase the effective naval forces of the Empire, to safeguard our shores and our seaborne commerce, and to make secure the common heritage of all who owe allegiance to the King.

These ships will be at the disposal of His Majesty the King for the common defence of the Empire. They will be maintained and controlled as part of the Royal navy; and we have the assurance that if at any time in the future it should be the will of the Canadian people to establish a Canadian unit of the Royal navy, these vessels can be recalled by the Canadian Government to form part of that unit. in which case, of course, they would be maintained by Canada and not by Great Britain. In that event, there would necessarily be reasonable notice of such recall; and, indeed, Canada would not desire or suggest the sudden withdrawal of so powerful a contingent from any important theatre in which the naval forces of the Empire might be exposed to severe and sudden attack. In the meantime, I am assured that special arrangements will be made to give Canadians the opportunity of serving as officers on these ships.

Without intending or desiring to indulge in controversial discussion, I may be permitted to allude to British naval organization. Obviously, one could not make a very complete or thorough study of so great an organization in a few weeks, or even a few months; but during recent years, and especially during the past summer, I have had occasion to learn something of its methods, its character, and its efficiency, and good reason to conclude that it is undoubtedly the most thorough and effective in the world. There have been proposals, to which I shall no more than allude, that we should build up a great naval organization in Canada. In my humble opinion, nothing of an efficient character could be built up in this country within a quarter or perhaps half a century. Even then it would be but a poor and weak substitute for that splendid organization which the Empire already possesses, and which has been evolved and built up through centuries of the most searching experience and of the highest endeavour. Is there really any need that we should undertake the hazardous and costly experiment of building up a naval organization especially restricted to this Dominion, when upon just and self-respecting terms we can take such part as we desire in naval defence through the existing naval organization of the Empire, and in that way fully and effectively avail ourselves of the men and the resources at the command of Canada ?

Where shall these ships be built ? They will be built under Admiralty supervision in the United Kingdom, for the reason that at present there are no adequate facilities for constructing them in Canada. The plant required for the construction of a dreadnought battleship is enormous, and it would be impossible at present to maintain shipbuilding in this country on such a scale. In any case, only the hull could be built in Canada; because the machinery, the armour, and the guns would necessarily be constructed or manufactured in the United Kingdom. The additional cost of construction in Canada would be about $12,000,000 for the three ships, and it would be impossible to estimate the delay. No one is more eager than myself for the development of shipbuilding industries in Canada, but we cannot, upon any business or economic considerations, begin with the construction of dreadnoughts; and especially we could not do so when these ships are urgently required within two or three years at the outside, for rendering aid upon which may depend the Empire's future existence.

According to my conception, the effective development of shipbuilding industries in Canada must commence with small beginnings and in a businesslike way. I have discussed this subject with the Admiralty, and they thoroughly realize that it is not to the Empire's advantage that all shipbuilding facilities should be concentrated in the United Kingdom. I am assured, therefore, that the Admiralty are prepared in the early future to give orders for the construction in Canada of small cruisers, oil-tank vessels, and auxiliary craft of various kinds. The plant required is relatively small as compared with that which is necessary for a dreadnought battleship, and such an undertaking would have a much more secure and permanent basis from a business standpoint. For the purpose of stimulating so important and necessary an industry, we have expressed our willingness to bear a portion of the increased cost for a time at least. I see no reason why all vessels required in the future for our Government service should not be built in Canada, even at some additional cost. In connection with the development of shipbuilding, I should not be surprised to see the establishment of a higher class of engineering works, which would produce articles now imported and not presently manufactured in Canada. Therefore, although the sum which we propose to devote for necessary naval aid at this critical juncture is to be expended in Great Britain, yet we believe that this step will result, under the conditions which I have described, in very marked development of more than one industry in Canada, and that, even from a purely economic and material standpoint, the step has much to commend it.

These ships will constitute an aid brought by the Canadian people to His Majesty the King as a token of their determination to maintain the integrity of the Empire and to assist in repelling any danger which may threaten its security. It is most appropriate that the opportunity should have come when the Crown is represented in Canada by His Royal Highness the Governor General, who has rendered such valuable and eminent service to the State, and who takes so deep and splendid an interest in all that concerns the welfare and safety of every portion of His Majesty's Dominions. Canada is sending these ships to range themselves in the battle line of the Empire with those of the Mother Country, of Australia, and of New Zealand. They will be the three most powerful battleships in the world, and they will bear historic names associated with this country. Thus, every Canadian will realize, in seeing or reading of these ships, that they are a gift in which he has participated, and that, by their presence in the battle line of the Empire, he has freely taken a direct and distinct share in maintaining the Empire's safety.

No modern nation possessing a great seaborne commerce can afford to neglect its interest upon the high seas. Heaven forbid that in this country we should aid or abet any warlike or aggresive tendencies. This Empire will never undertake any war of aggression, and all the influences of Canada will assuredly be arrayed against any such course; but we know that war has come many times within the past fifty years without warning, like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, and thereby the power, the influence, and the destiny of more than one nation have been profoundly affected. A naval war especially may come with startling suddenness, for these tremendous engines of war are always ready and prepared for battle. The security, indeed the very existence, of this Empire depends on sea power. When we are obliged to abdicate the seas, it may even be without war, but in the face of overwhelming force, the Empire's arteries will no longer pulsate, the blood will cease to flow in its veins and dissolution will be at hand.

But if we should neglect a duty which I conceive we owe to ourselves, and if irreparable disaster should ensue, what would be our future destiny? Obviously, as an independent nation or as an important part of the great neighbouring republic. What, then, would be our responsibilities, and what the burden upon us for a protection on the high seas much less powerful and less effective than that which we enjoy to-day? Take the case of one nation whose territory, resources, population and wealth may fairly be compared with those of Canada. The naval estimates of Argentina for four years, from 1909 to 1912 inclusive, amounted to $35,000,000. In addition to this, the Parliament of Argentina voted during the same four years for special naval and military purposes more than $40,000,000. No information is available as to the exact proportion of the last mentioned sum which was appropriated for naval purposes, but it is understood that the greater portion was for naval construction. It is safe, therefore, to estimate that during the past four years Argentina has expended for naval purposes not less than sixty-five to seventy million dollars. The federal and state expenditure of the United States comprises a total annual outlay for armament of between $250,000,000 and $300,000,000, or at the rate of $2.75 per head. A similar expenditure by Canada would mean an annual outlay of some $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, or between eighty and one hundred million dollars during the same period.

It is apparent, therefore, that the aid which we propose to bring at this juncture is of a moderate and reasonable character. For forty-five years as a confederation we have enjoyed the protection of the British navy without the cost of a dollar, and I venture to submit my firm conviction that this assistance freely tendered by the people of Canada through their parliament is due to their own self-respect.

So far as official estimates are available, the expenditure of Great Britain in naval and military defence for the provinces which now constitute Canada, during the nineteenth century, was not less than $400,000,000. Even since the inception of our confederation, and since Canada has attained the status of a great Dominion, the amount so expended by Great Britain for the naval and military defence of Canada vastly exceeds the sum which we are now asking parliament to appropriate. From 1870 to 1890 the proportionate cost of North Atlantic squadrons which guarded our coasts was from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000. From 1853 to 1903 Great Britain's expenditure on military defence in Canada runs closely up to one hundred million dollars.

Has the protection of the flag and the prestige of the Empire meant anything for us during all that period? Hundreds of illustrations are at hand, but let me give just two. During a period of disorder in a distant country, a Canadian citizen was unjustifiably arrested and fifty lashes were laid on his back. Appeal was made to Great Britain, and with what result? A public apology was made to him, and fifty pounds were paid for every lash. In time of dangerous riot and wild terror in a foreign city a Canadian religious community remained unafraid. 'Why did you not fear?' they were asked, and unhesitatingly came the answer, 'The Union Jack floated above us.'

I have alluded to the difficulty of finding an acceptable basis upon which the great dominions, co-operating with the Mother Country in defence, can receive and assert an adequate voice in the control and moulding of foreign policy. We were brought closely in touch with both subjects when we met the British ministers in the Committee of Imperial Defence. That committee is peculiarly constituted, but in my judgment is very effective. It consists of the Prime Minister of Great Britain and of such persons as he may summon to attend it. Practically all the members of the Cabinet from time to time attend its deliberations, and usually the more important members of the Cabinet are present. In addition, the naval and military experts and technical officers of the various departments concerned are in attendance. A very large portion of the committee's work is carried on by sub-committees, which are often composed in part of persons who are not members of the general committee itself, and who are selected for their special knowledge of the subjects to be considered and reported upon. The amount of work which has thus been performed, during the past five or six years in particular, is astonishing, and I have no doubt that it has contributed largely to the future safety of the whole Empire in time of peril. The committee is not technically or constitutionally responsible to the House of Commons, and thus it is not supposed to concern itself with policy. As so many important members of the Cabinet are summoned to attend the committee, its conclusions are usually accepted by the Cabinet, and thus command the support of a majority of the House of Commons. While the committee does not control policy in any way, and could not undertake to do so, as it is not responsible to Parliament, it is necessarily obliged constantly to consider foreign policy and foreign relations, for the obvious reason that defence, and especially naval defence, is inseparably connected with such consideration.

I am assured by His Majesty's Government that, pending a final solution of the question of voice and influence, they would welcome the presence in London of a Canadian minister during the whole or a portion of each year. Such minister would be regularly summoned to all meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence, and would be regarded as one of its permanent members. No important step in foreign policy would be undertaken without consultation with such a representative of Canada. This seems a very marked advance, both from our standpoint and from that of the United Kingdom. It would give to us an opportunity of consultation, and therefore an influence which hitherto we have not possessed. The conclusions and declarations of Great Britain in respect to foreign relations could not fail to be strengthened by the knowledge that such consultation and co-operation with the overseas dominions had become an accomplished fact.

No thoughtful man can fail to realize that very complex and difficult questions confront those who believe that we must find a basis of permanent co-operation in naval defence, and that any such basis must afford to the overseas dominions an adequate voice in the moulding and control of foreign policy. It would have been idle to expect, and indeed we did not expect, to reach in the few weeks at our disposal during the past summer a final solution of that problem, which is not less interesting than difficult, which touches most closely the future destiny of the Empire, and which is fraught with even graver significance for the British islands than for Canada. But I conceive that its solution is not impossible; and, however difficult the task may be, it is not the part of wisdom or of statesmanship to evade it. And so we invite the statesmen of Great Britain to study with us this, the real problem of Imperial existence.

The next ten or twenty years will be pregnant with great results for this Empire, and it is of infinite importance that questions of purely domestic concern, however urgent, shall not prevent any of us from rising " to the height of this great argument." But to-day, while the clouds are heavy and we hear the booming of the distant thunder, and see the lightning flashes above the horizon, we cannot and we will not wait and deliberate until any impending storm shall have burst upon us in fury and with disaster. Almost unaided, the motherland not for herself alone, but for us as well, is sustaining the burden of a vital Imperial duty, and confronting an overmastering necessity of national existence. Bringing the best assistance that we may in the urgency of the moment, we come thus to her aid, in token of our determination to protect and ensure the safety and integrity of this Empire, and of our resolve to defend on sea as well as on land our flag, our honour, and our heritage.

Mr. SPEAKER: I assume, in connection with this Bill, that the right hon. the Prime Minister has considered the question of a resolution which must either follow or precede the introduction of a Bill of this nature. I have not had time to examine the Bill; therefore I am not prepared at the moment, to say whether it should or should not be preceded by a resolution.

Mr. BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which is necessary in connection with the Bill has been submitted to His Royal Highness the Governor General. His Royal Highness has been pleased to approve of the resolution, which is exactly in the same terms as the Bill, and to recommend it to the consideration of this House under the provisions of the British North America Act.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise with any intention of discussing now the very important measure which has been submitted to the House by my right hon. friend. Indeed, under the rules of the House as interpreted by you, Sir, there should be no discussion on the first reading of any Bill. With regard to the point of order which you have just stated, I think that my hon. friend is in order in stating that the details of the Bill should not be discussed until the resolution is brought down. The money consideration, important as it is, is not the chief consideration, and I have no fault to find with my hon. friend in introducing the Bill before bringing down the resolution.

I thoroughly appreciate, as I am sure will other hon. gentlemen, the very temperate manner in which my hon. friend has presented the measure which has just been laid before the House. We may not concur with him in all things; but that will be the subject of further discussion on another occasion. I am glad to tell him that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, though differing with him in other matters, share his devotion and loyalty to the British Empire.

An important feature of the speech delivered by my hon. friend is the memorandum which has been laid before the House; and the people of the country will be glad to know that we have not now to deal with any emergency, or any immediate danger, but with that new condition existing not only in Europe and in the British Empire, but all over the world —the tendency towards excessive armament.

I have no further observations to make at present, Mr. Speaker, but will defer any additional remarks until the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. HAZEN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, respecting the harbour commissioners of Montreal. He said: This Bill is an amendment to the Act constituting the harbour commissioners of Montreal. Some little friction has arisen in the past owing to the fact that that part of the St. Lawrence channel within the harbour of Montreal does not come under the jurisdiction of the harbour commissioners, but is under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. It is thought better to place the entire harbour of Montreal, including the ship channel, under the control of the harbour commissioners, and this Bill has been introduced after consultation with and with the approval of that body. There are a few other amendments embodied in the Bill of a more or less important character. The jurisdiction of the Montreal harbour commissioners originally extended for many miles down the St. Lawrence river. They had control not only over the harbour of Montreal, but over other harbours on the river below what now constitutes the limits of Montreal harbour. In order to avoid the possibility of any misunderstanding in the future, it has been thought advisable to so amend the Act that the jurisdiction of the present harbour commissioners will extend only over the harbour of Montreal. These are the principal features of the Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD: Before the motion is put, would the Minister of Marine and Fisheries tell the House whether any appointments have been made to fill the vacancies in the present Montreal Harbour Commission?

Mr. HAZEN: There are no vacancies in the present board. The members of the board have handed in their resignations, to become effective on the last day of the present month of December, and before that date commissioners will be appointed to fill the vacancies, and they will commence their duties on the first day of January next.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HOURS OF LABOUR ON PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. VERVILLE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, respecting the Hours of Labour on Public Works. He said: This is a Bill somewhat similar to one presented by me in 1910, but withdrawn on account of certain objections having been raised. I hope that when it comes up for a second reading, it will receive the same support from the members of the Government that it did when they were in opposition.

Mr. HAZEN.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. EMMERSON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. There appears in 'Hansard' of yesterday, at page 650, what is intended as an answer to certain questions I put to the ministers with respect to the Intercolonial railway management, and the rumour of a change in connection therewith. The last question put by me was as to whether any member of the Government, the Minister of Railways, or the Department of Railways, had authorized certain statements which had been made with respect to a proposal or intention to change the method of management of the Intercolonial railway. The answer furnished to the House by the minister and placed on 'Hansard' is:

> Not in so far as this department is concerned.

While the answer is in the negative with respect to the department, there is no answer on behalf of the Minister of Railways or of any member of the Government. As this is an important question, particularly in the eastern part of Canada, I think it is due to the House and to the country that we should be informed whether any authority was given for the statement that was alleged to have been made in connection with the proposed change.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member could scarcely, by any stretch of reasoning, convert that into a question of privilege. As an old parliamentarian, I assume it would be in order for him to ask a question.

Mr. EMMERSON: With all due deference, I want to conform myself to the rules. As a member of Parliament I thought I was entitled to have an answer to the question and I wanted to call the attention of the minister to the fact that neither of questions 3 and 4 had been answered.

Mr. COCHRANE: I may say to the hon. gentleman that if he will hold himself in peace for a while, he will probably know all about it.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not think I am entitled to that treatment at the hands of the minister. It is within my rights as a member to courteously ask a question and to receive a courteous reply.

Mr. BORDEN: The hon. gentleman is altogether too sensitive. I did not hear any lack of courtesy in the reply.

Mr. COCHRANE: There was none intended.

Mr. BORDEN: The Minister of Railways informed the hon. member that the information will be furnished him in due course.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BORDEN: I beg pardon; I heard the language myself. The minister said to possess himself in patience, and the information would be forthcoming in due course. That is what my hon. friend said. The difficulty is due to the defective hearing of my hon. friend, and not to any lack of courtesy on the part of the Minister of Railways.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The question in 'Hansard' was not put to the Minister of Railways, but to all members of the Government. The answer is not a full answer to the question; it relates only to the Department of Railways, while the question relates to the whole Government, and when my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) was asked to hold himself in patience, I do not think it was courteous to him.

Mr. COCHRANE: The answer was signed by the deputy minister, as nearly all answers are, and the information was correct: That Mr. Siddal had not been informed by the department or by the minister to that effect.

Mr. EMMERSON: The question is: Was he authorized by any member of the Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: That means by the minister of that department, does it not?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The difficulty is that my hon. friend has answered so far as his department is concerned; but that is all; the other ministers have not answered.

Mr. BORDEN: The Minister of Railways has certainly done his duty. If there is any fault, it is with the other members of the Government who have not done their duty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When the minister told my hon. friend to hold himself in patience, he was not within his rights.

Mr. EMMERSON: The answer applies to the Department of Railways. The department state that they had not authorized such a statement, but I did not hear any answer with respect to the minister, or with respect to any other member of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have this to say with regard to questions and answers submitted in the House, that both the English and, I think, the Canadian practice lays down a distinct rule that it is optional with the member who answers the question how he shall answer it. It is true that when the question is put, the member putting it is entitled as far as possible to a direct and correct answer.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And courteous.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, courteous always, I believe; but what answer shall be given must be left to the judgment of the minister or of the member who gives the answer.

ALLEGED ERRONEOUS ANSWER.

Mr. OLIVER: In the answer given yesterday by the Minister of the Interior to a question by the hon. member from Regina (Mr. Martin), I think the minister will find that in the list of homestead inspectors holding office on September 21, those holding office in Alberta have been included as holding office in Saskatchewan. It may be that there is a corresponding error in the list of appointments. A correction may be necessary.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ST. CHARLES RIVER EMBANKMENT.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Department of Public Works secured any tract of land at a point called La Canardière, along the embankment of St. Charles river, Quebec?
2. If so, when, at what cost, and for what purpose?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

TUG BOATS FOR GOVERNMENT DREDGE.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Were tenders asked for tug boats to attend the Government dredge Cape Breton for the season of 1912?
2. If so, how many persons tendered, what are the names and addresses and the amount of each tender?
3. Was the lowest tender accepted? If not what was the reason for not accepting it?
4. Were any of the tenders accepted? If not, what was the reason?
5. What are the names of the tugs attending the Cape Breton for the season of 1912, and the names of the owners in each case, and the amount paid per day to each tug?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. J. W. Gordon, North Sydney, $29 and $30 per day; F. M. Kelly, North Sydney, $35 per day; D. Rudderham, North Sydney, $40 per day.
3. No. Mr. J. W. Gordon's tugs were not as suitable for the work required as the others, and Mr. Rudderham's tug was worth twice as much as the others.

4. Yes.

5. E. M. Cates, owner F. M. Kelly, $35 per day, employed May 2nd to September 7th. Boonton, owner D. Rudderham, $40 per day.

THE CANADA-WEST INDIA TREATY.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

What are the tariff duties leviable in the British West India Islands which are parties to the Canadian-West India Trade treaty, upon all the articles mentioned in the schedules to the said treaty, and which may be imported from Canada under the preferential tariff rates set forth in said treaty or agreement?

The preparation of the answer to this question may entail a great deal of work, and possibly it might not be of very great use, so that I would be quite willing of the minister would place on the table of the House copies of the statistical memoranda which may have been furnished by either the West Indies Commissioners or his own department or any other department of the Government, and which are referred to in the proceedings of the Canada-West India Trade Conference and are not included in the publication.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto): They will be all laid on the table of the House.

Question dropped.

RAOUL DESCHAMPS.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is Mr. Raoul Deschamps in the employ of the Department of Public Works at Montreal? If so, what is his salary?

2. Has Mr. Raoul Deschamps any other employment in the office of Marine at Montreal?

3. If so, what are his duties and what is his salary?

Mr. HAZEN: The answer to the second question is no.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The first part can be dropped.

BOARDS OF CONCILIATION.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. How many boards of conciliation and investigation, under the Industrial Disputes Investigation act, have been applied for since September 21, 1911?

2. How many applications were refused and by whom were these applications made?

3. What was the reason or reasons for refusal in each instance?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Twenty-six.

2. Six. (a) Industrial Workers of the World, being railway construction workers; (b) Order of Railroad Conductors and Brotherhood of Railroad Telegraphers, Canadian Pacific railway; (c) United Mine Workers of America, North Sydney, Nova Scotia; (d) United Mine Workers of America, Springhill, Nova Scotia; (e) Canadian Brotherhood of Railroad Employees, Canadian Pacific Railway Company; (f) Canadian Brotherhood of Railroad Employees, Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

3. None of these applications were brought within the provisions and intent of the Act.

TEMISCOUATA VETERANS.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. How many applications to obtain the grant of $100 on account of the war of 1866-70 have come from the veterans in the county of Temiscouata?

2. How many have received this amount?

3. How many have been refused?

4. How many are there whose applications are still to be examined or suspended for more ample information?

5. Shall those who receive the grant have a right to the Service medal, if they have not one already, and has the minister given orders in consequence?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria):

1, 2. 3 and 4. Applications are taken up in the order in which they have been received, and not by counties or regiments.

5. A person who has proved his title to a grant under the Fenian Raid Volunteer Bounty Act is entitled to the General Service Medal, and the same will be issued to him if applied for.

ESTEVAN HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. How many homestead inspectors were appointed to work in the Estevan land agency between September 21st, 1911, and July 11th 1912?

2. What are the names of the said homestead inspectors?

3. What salary is paid to each of the said inspectors?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. One.

2. Wm. Morrison.

3. $1,200 per annum.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has Mr. Robert Hendsbee, postmaster at Half Island Cove, Guysboro County, N. S., been dismissed?

2. If so, for what reason?

3. On whose complaint was the dismissal made?

4. Was there an investigation? If so, was Mr. Hendsbee notified, and what was the result?

Mr. PELLETIER: Charges of political partisanship having been made against the postmaster, a judical inquiry was ordered by the Post Office Department; it was held and the commissioner reported that the charges had been proven. The postmaster was notified. As a result of the investigation, the postmaster was dismissed.

Mr. SINCLAIR :

1. Was an investigation held in the case of A. W. Salsman, postmaster at Middle Country Harbour, N.S?
2. If so, when and before whom was it held?
3. What are the names of the witnesses examined?
4. On whose complaint or request was such investigation instituted?
5. Did Mr. G. A. R. Rowlings recommend a man to take the place of Mr. Salsman as postmaster when the latter should be dismissed? If so, who?
6. Was the said recommendation acted upon? If not, why not?

Mr. PELLETIER :

1 and 2. Yes. Mr. H. P. Duchemin on the 22nd of August last.
3. H. Penton, M. Dixon, J. E. Mason, J. Hayne and Mr. Salsman.
4. On instructions of Post Office Department.
5 and 6. Under consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has Mr. McCutcheon, postmaster, Sonora, Guysborough county, N.S., been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. On whose complaint was this dismissal made?
4. If for political partisanship what proof was before the department?
5. Was there an investigation? If so, before what officer and what was the result?
6. Who has been appointed in his place, and on whose recommendation?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. The postmaster was removed on representations which are considered as sufficient evidence that he had been an active political partisan, and consequently an investigation was not required.
6. Mr. C. Russell Burns, by order of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Who has been appointed postmaster at Tracadie Road, Guysborough county, N.S., in the place of John H. McPherson, deceased?
2. On whose recommendation was this appointment made?

Mr. PELLETIER: James Grant, by order of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has Elias Rowding, postmaster at Clementsport, Nova Scotia, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what cause?
3. At whose request?
4. Was there an investigation?
5. Was a petition received by the department asking for a change to be made?
6. If so, what are the names attached to said petition?
7. Who has been appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the dismissal of the said postmaster?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1, 2, 3 and 4. The postmaster was removed on representations which are considered as sufficient proof that the postmaster had been a political partisan, and, therefore, an investigation was not required.
5 and 6. No petition for the change was received.
7. Mrs. Ellen Ritchie.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. What are the reasons for the dismissal of Gervais Carrier, postmaster of St. Gervais, county of Bellechasse?
2. At whose request was this dismissal made?
3. Was an inquiry held?
4. For how many years did he perform the duties of postmaster?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1 and 2. Representations having been made, which were considered perfectly satisfactory, that the postmaster had been a political partisan, the Postmaster General directed his removal.
3. An inquiry was not required.
4. Since 1st June, 1878.

Mr CARROLL:

1. Has Miss Gertie Lewis been dismissed from the post office at Main-à-dieu, Cape Breton?
2. If so, what was the cause of her dismissal?
3. Who is the present incumbent of the post office there?
4. Were there any complaints made against Miss Lewis as such official?
5. If so, what were the complaints and by whom made?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1 and 2. It was found that the postmistress was unable to give the duties of the post office the necessary attention, owing to the fact that she was also employed as telegraph operator. The matter was made the subject of official enquiry, and, as the postmistress would not assure the department that she would keep the office open regularly and give the duties proper attention, a new appointment was made to the postmastership.
3. Miss Mary Scott.
4 and 5. See answer to Nos. 1 and 2.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. What are the reasons for the dismissal of the postmaster of St. Ferdinand de Beaurivage, county of Levis?
2. By whom has he been replaced?

3. What are the additional expenses to the Post Office Department caused by this change?
4. Who requested this change?

Mr. PELLETIER: There is no post office named St. Ferdinand de Beaurivage in the county of Levis, or elsewhere in Canada.

Mr. CARROLL:

1. Has Mrs. Annie Gallivan been dismissed as keeper of the post office at Whitney Pier, Cape Breton?
2. If so, what was the cause of her dismissal?
3. Who is the present incumbent of the office there?
4. Were there any complaints made against Mrs. Gallivan as such official?
5. If so, what were the complaints and by whom made?

Mr. PELLETIER: In November, 1901, the post office inspector reported that the postmaster of Whitney Pier had removed his office to a new location, which was, however, more convenient than the former site, and that the postmaster stated also that the former office did not afford proper accommodation. The postmaster was, however, dismissed for changing the site of his office without official sanction, and another person was appointed in his stead. As it was clearly unjust to dismiss the postmaster for removing his office to a more suitable location, and one that was approved by the inspector, it has been deemed right to restore the office to its former location and reinstate Mr. Peter J. Carlin, the former postmaster.

FREE IMPORTATION OF HAY.

Mr. EMMERSON: Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to bring to the attention of the Government, and particularly of the Minister of Railways—who unfortunately is not in his seat, but I trust the Prime Minister will communicate my remarks to him—the following telegram:

December 4, 1912.

H. R. Emmerson, Ottawa.

Rumor says Minister of Railways granting Eastern counties free transportation for hay on account of shortage there. Hay growers here protest that present rates already give Quebec growers unfair advantage, but that free transportation even to all concerned would result in considerable loss and great injustice to growers and dealers in this and adjoining counties.

WM. FAWCETT,
ASHLEY GEORGE,
WM. CAMPBELL.

This is somewhat urgent, because if any action is taken in the direction indicated, it would no doubt be taken immediately. I present it simply as an expression of views of parties who are interested as growers of hay in the counties of Westmorland and Cumberland. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) would know the gentlemen who have signed that telegram, and he will realize that it is considered by them, at least, as a matter of some importance.

Mr. RHODES: As to information on that point, perhaps the hon. member for Westmorland would get in touch with the hon. member for Antigonish.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I would direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that I have had a couple of questions on the Order Paper since the 26th of November. These questions read:

1. Is it the intention of the Railway Department to allow free transportation of hay over the Intercolonial railway from the province of Quebec to the Eastern counties of Nova Scotia, or any of them?
2. What relief, if any, in the matter of freight rates on hay to be carried over the Intercolonial railway for the farmers of the Eastern counties of Nova Scotia is proposed?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is anticipating a notice on the Order Paper.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I am merely directing the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that this and other questions bearing on the subject have not been answered and I would ask the Prime Minister to have them answered at the earliest possible moment. This is a matter of urgency, and——

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is clearly out of order. Now that he has drawn attention to the matter, it is quite out of place to discuss it.

Mr. BORDEN: I understand the Minister of Railways has the matter under consideration, but I do not know if he has yet arrived at any conclusion. The hon. member will get an answer as soon as it is available.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): We would like to have an answer as soon as possible, because the farmers want to make other arangements if the decision of the Minister of Railways is not favourable.

CANADIAN NEWS FROM ENGLAND.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to refer to an item which concerns me particularly, and which will be interesting to the people of Canada and Great Britain, in the direction of letting them know what kind of news is often sent back and forth between the two countries. I hold in my hand a copy of the Canadian Mail of Saturday, November 23, which has a paragraph referring to the various by-elections held in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member rising to a question of privilege? Otherwise he is out of order.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a question of privilege, because it refers to myself, as I will show before I get through. It states:

It will be noted that the Conservatives have lost no seats and gained one, and the gain is put down as South Renfrew.

The falsity of this is self-evident.

THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT DRY DOCK

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs to what I think is a matter of public importance in regard to his answer to a question which I placed on the Order Paper. It is in reference to the dry dock, the Duke of Connaught, which was recently brought to the port of Montreal. I asked as to the amount at which the dry dock had been valued for purposes of duty, and what amount of duty was paid. The answer was that no duty was paid on the dock, that she had been reported as a British built ship. I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Customs if there is any correspondence upon the subject, and if he will be good enough to submit that correspondence to the House without its being especially moved for?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I have never had any correspondence on the matter, but I understand that a representative of the firm that owned the dry dock called at the department and discussed the matter with the Commissioner of Customs. The Commissioner of Customs informed me that this dry dock was registered in England as a vessel, and that it had arrived in at the port of Montreal and was registered there as a British vessel. The gentlemen who owned the dry dock claimed that it was not dutiable under the law.

Mr. HAZEN: I may say that the question of whether this dock should be registered as a ship or not came before my department. I asked the Department of Justice for an opinion on the matter, and I have the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice to the effect that this was a ship, and properly registered as such. I thought it strange that such was the case, but, on looking into the matter, I found that the English as well as the Canadian authorities hold this view. My hon. friend will remember one case which was within his own knowledge, namely, an action that arose between the Pilot Commissioners of St. John and the Cumberland Coal Company regarding certain barges that were loaded with coal, and then towed by tugs across the Bay of Fundy to St. John. The coal company paid pilotage on these barges. They then ceased to pay pilotage, and brought an action against the Pilot Commissioners of St. John to recover the money they had paid, claiming that these barges were not ships within the meaning of the Act. The Supreme Court of New Brunswick, Chief Justice Tuck, dissenting, decided in favour of the Cumberland Coal Company. The Supreme Court of Canada unanimously sustained the judgment of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. The case then went to the Privy Council, and they reversed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada and of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, and, concurring with the view of Chief Justice Tuck, decided that these barges were ships, and liable to pay pilotage dues. The question as to what was a ship was fully discussed in that judgment. There are other cases in the English courts, and they are all to the effect that anything that is hollowed out so as to be able to float upon the water, to carry cargo, and that requires people on board it is a ship. They decided that in the pilotage case. Now, this dry dock is so constructed that at any time it could be taken up or down the St. Lawrence river. It is so constructed that it can be operated by machinery on board itself, and is built with the design that it can be towed down to the scene of a wreck; and, if the wrecked vessel cannot be propelled under its own steam, it can be put on the dry dock, and the dry dock, with the vessel on board, can be taken to a port where the vessel can be repaired. For instance, in the case of the Royal George, if it were found desirable to place her in the dry dock, and she was not able to proceed to Montreal under her own steam, the dock would be taken to the scene of the wreck, the Royal George would be placed upon it and then it would be taken back again, and so the ship could be repaired in Montreal. I was surprised to find that such was the decision, but I have the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice on file in my office, and I should be pleased to show it to my hon. friend at any time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps my hon. friend will be good enough to lay the opinion on the table.

Mr. HAZEN: I will be very happy to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That matter is greatly—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order, as there is no question before the House. He can speak only with the permission of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no doubt the House will give their permission.

Mr. HAZEN: I think my hon. friend is in error that this dock was registered in England as a ship. I think it was registered when it came here.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was very much surprised to learn the way it was registered. The case to which my hon. friend refers, of the barges used by the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company, is, I think, not at all applicable to this case. There the sole question was as to whether or not these barges could be propelled without outside assistance. It was upon that question that the liability to pay pilotage dues turned. Nobody ever disputed that these barges were vessels, because they were used for carrying coal from one point of the Dominion to another, or in the coasting trade, but this is a very different structure. It is intended to be placed permanently in one locality, and is for the purpose of repairing vessels. It is not intended for transportation of merchandise or passengers from one part of Canada to another, and to me it is a great surprise that the Deputy Minister of Justice has expressed the opinion he has.

I want to speak in reference to another matter. When the question of subsidy of the Vickers-Maxim Company came before my department, in estimating the cost upon which a subsidy should be paid, it was expressly understood that duty on this dock would have to be paid. The Vickers-Maxim Company appealed to the late Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, and also to the late Minister of Customs, Mr. Templeman, for a remission of duty on the dock. They positively declined to make any such agreement, and therefore the duty was entered as a part of the cost when the subsidy was agreed upon. It is a matter of some four or five hundred thousand dollars, and if it is not right that that duty should be thrown off, it simply means that the treasury has been deprived of a vast amount of money, contrary to the understanding that was had with the late Minister of Customs and the late Minister of Finance, when the contract was entered into with respect to this dock.

Mr. HAZEN: I am very much surprised indeed to hear the statement made by the hon. gentleman, because the statement was made to me by a director of Vickers, Limited, was that they had a distinct understanding with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs, to the effect that the dock would be admitted free of duty. I would also remind him of the fact that the point involved in the Cumberland Coal Company case was whether these barges were propelled by steam or not, and it was decided that they were propelled by steam, for the reason that they were propelled by a steam tug, and it was not necessary that the motive power should be on the barge.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a very irregular procedure under the rules of the House. It seems to me that it has gone now to a sufficient length to justify me in asking that it be dropped.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just a word as to the question of fact. Only a fortnight ago I was discussing the matter with the former Minister of Finance, and he informed me that he had distinctly declined to admit that the dock should be admitted free of duty

PRIVILEGE—Mr. RHODES.

Mr. E. N. RHODES (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the report of the proceedings of this House yesterday which appears in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning I find the following:

> Mr. Rhodes, of Nova Scotia, agreed that Colonel McCrae knew a good sheep when he saw one.

I have no objection to that part of the statement. So far as I know, it may be perfectly true. The report goes on:

> —And the whole industry, he thought, would go to ruin, unless access were gained to the United States market.

In view of the circumstance that within a comparatively short space of time 8,000 sheep have been brought into this country on the hoof from Montana, and that thousands of carcasses of New Zealand mutton are brought into British Columbia, I could hardly hold such views as are attributed to me by this paper. It is true the sheep brought into British Columbia are dead. But so is reciprocity. As a matter of fact, I think these remarks are more properly to be attributed to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). In view of the overwhelming decision of the people of this country on the 21st of September, 1911, and of the circumstance that the hon. member for South Wellington, no doubt, realizes that he will be in opposition for many years, perhaps he felt that he might as well stand for reciprocity and be hung for a sheep as a lamb. I give an unqualified denial to this report, and state that my views are unalterably opposed to reciprocity.

DISMISSAL OF MR. JOHN RUTHERFORD.

Mr. TURRIFF: I would draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) to the question I asked yesterday in regard to the dismissal of Mr. John Rutherford. Parts three and four of the question are not answered in 'Hansard' of to-day. It will be sufficient if my hon. friend will give me an answer to these parts of the question.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS PROVIDENT FUND.

On motion of Mr. Borden, it was ordered that the House go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act by providing that the board administering the fund may pay out of such fund the whole or any portion of the contribution thereto of any employee discharged from the service on or after April 1, 1907, on account of having been engaged in partisan work in connection with any Dominion or provincial election.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Mr. Hazen it was ordered that the House go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Canada Shipping Act, Chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, and to provide (a) that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may give directions respecting the registration of wrecked ships and concerning the names of ships; and, (b) that the inspectors appointed under Part VII of the said Act, together with such other persons as the minister may appoint, shall form the board of steamboat inspection.

ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE.

On motion of Mr. Borden, it was ordered that the House go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act, and to provide:

(a) That the Comptroller shall have the salary of a deputy head of a department.

(b) An increase to the salaries of officers and members of the force, the amounts not exceeding the following, namely:

Commissioner of police, per annum	$4,000 00
Each assistant commissioner, per annum	2,800 00
Each superintendent, per annum	2,200 00
Each inspector, per annum	1,600 00
Each surgeon, or veterinary surgeon, per annum	2,200 00
Each assistant surgeon, assistant veterinary surgeon, per annum	1,600 00
Three staff officers employed at headquarters; additional per annum	300 00
Eight staff sergeants, each per diem	2 50
Others, staff sergeants, each per diem	2 00
Other non-commissioned officers, per diem	1 75
Constables, per diem	1 25
Special constables and scouts, per diem	$2 50
Buglers, under eighteen years of age per diem	75
Working party of artisans and others specially employed, per diem	75

(c) That the Governor in Council may authorize extra pay and allowances to be paid to members of the force employed as detectives, and to those serving in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory.

REGULATION OF RADIOTELEGRAPHY.

On motion of Mr. Hazen it was ordered that the House go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide for the compulsory installation and inspection of radiotelegraph apparatus on certain ships, and for the general regulation of radiotelegraphy.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

On the order for the second reading of Bill (No. 4) to amend the Bank Act.—Mr. Aikins.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I remember correctly, the Minister of Finance made a suggestion to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) in reference to this, that it might get its first reading, and then be dropped if the minister has the same thing included in the Government Bill.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I spoke to the hon. member for Brandon, and he is agreeable to let the second reading stand until the Bank Bill is brought in.

DISMISSAL OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

Mr. MARCIL moved for:

Copy of all correspondence, complaints, petitions, memoranda, notes of evidence, letters, reports of investigations and other documents in the possession of the Department of Customs, relating to the dismissal of James S. Harvey, preventive officer, New Richmond, Quebec, W. L. Kempffer, preventive officer at Paspebiac, Quebec, J. Herbert Sweetman, preventive officer at Port Daniel, Quebec, J. B. Le Blanc, preventive officer, at Carleton, Quebec, J. Nadeau, preventive officer, Nouvelle, Quebec, as well as a copy of all recommendations made regarding the appointment of their various successors and the names, salaries, duties and residences, with a copy of their instructions.

Mr. BORDEN: The wording of this motion is somewhat unusual, as recommendations of this kind are often of a confidential character, and as such should not be brought down. Perhaps my hon. friend will make in his motion a slight amendment to that effect.

Mr. MARCIL: I certainly think we are entitled to any information obtainable regarding recommendations made in respect of appointments. If there are private and confidential communications made, possibly we would not be entitled to have them.

Mr. BORDEN: I would suggest that this motion be transferred to those subject to discussion. I have been told over and over again that recommendations of a confidential character should not be brought down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This seems to be brought up now for the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: If this is a motion subject to discussion, it should be transferred to the debatable notices of motion.

Mr. MARCIL: Any documents on the public file would of course be brought down; any private recommendation would, I presume, not be on the public file. It is with that understanding that I make the motion.

Mr. BORDEN: That is satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

UNOPPOSED AND UNDISCUSSED NOTICES OF MOTION.

Return showing the number of appeals made to the Governor in Council during the twelve months preceding November 25, 1912, against orders of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the particulars of each appeal, and the decision rendered by the Governor in Council in each case.—Mr. Graham.

Copy of the original instructions, including maps, specifications, profiles, &c., furnished the engineers on the eastern division of the Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Quebec by the chief engineer of the Transcontinental Commission and approved by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. Also of all instructions, including specifications and profiles, issued by the chief engineer of the Transcontinental Commission or by the chairman, since October 31, 1911, which in any vary, amend, or depart from the original instruction above mentioned. Also, of all correspondence between the Minister of Railways or any official of his department and the chairman of the Transcontinental Commission, or the chief engineer, concerning the departure from the original instructions, either as to the grades, curves and bridges or other permanent structures. Also a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Railways or any member of the Government and any official of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company referring to change of original instructions as regards grades, curves or permanent structures on the said line between Winnipeg and Quebec; and also of all correspondence between the chairman of the Transcontinental Commission or the chief engineer and any official of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, or any member of its engineering staff, concerning the proposed change of grades, curves, or other permanent structures on the line of the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and the city of Quebec.—Mr. Graham.

Copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams, instructions, minutes of evidence taken and had on any inquiry, investigation had, held or taken and of all other papers and documents relating to the dismissal of George H. Cochrane, collector of Customs at the port of Moncton, New Brunswick; together with a copy of all letters and other correspondence between the hon. Minister of Customs, and the member representing the county of Westmorland, New Brunswick, in this House, and of all letters, papers, telegrams, recommendations, appointments, or other papers and documents relating to the appointment of a collector of customs to succeed the said George H. Cochrane.—Mr. Emmerson.

Copy of all papers, including surveys, tenders, and every other record, or document in the possession of the Department of Railways and Canals or any other department of the Government, relating to the building of a line of railways from Estmere, county of Victoria, province of Nova Scotia, to the town of Baddeck in the same county.—Mr. McKenzie.

Copy of the contract entered into between the Department of Railways and Canals and W. H. Weller for St. Peters canal improvements, and for a copy of all correspondence between the contractor or any other person, firm or corporation and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals relating to the dumping of material removed by the contractor. —Mr. Kyte.

Copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents relating to the establishment of rural mail delivery routes in the county of Pictou since the 1st October, 1911, with a statement of all routes applied for, of routes established and of those refused, and the reason for their refusal.—Mr. Macdonald.

On motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, December 6, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. RHODES.

Mr. E. N. RHODES (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I desire, as a matter of privilege, to discuss for a few moments the case of the dismissal of one Lemuel Bent, late collector of customs in the town of Oxford, in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member can take up such a discussion as a matter of privilege. A matter of privilege is something that affects the member himself or his privilege in this House.

Mr. RHODES: If I may be permitted to state the ground on which I believe my case of privilege rests, I shall then be glad to accept your ruling.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I desire to point out that there is a notice of motion on the Order Paper standing in my name, for the production of the papers relating to this case. I would suggest that any remarks the hon. member (Mr. Rhodes) may have to make be postponed until the motion is under discussion.

Mr. RHODES: I think that the rule, Mr. Speaker—if I may discuss the question of privilege as a matter of law——

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may state it.

Mr. RHODES: I think the rule is laid down very clearly in Bourinot that:

—libels or reflections upon members individually have also been considered as breaches of privilege which may be censured or punished by the House; but it is distinctly laid down by all the authorities: 'To constitute a breach of privilege such libels must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity.'

I maintain that certain newspapers have reflected upon my capacity as a member of this House by virtue of the language they have used with respect to me, on the ground that I made the recommendation upon which this man was dismissed from office. If you prefer, Sir, I will read certain extracts from the press, which, I think, will afford ample foundation for my right to discuss this question as a matter of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member can properly discuss the question of privilege. The regular course would be to have the article read, and on that found a resolution for the consideration of the House. That would be the natural course. I think if the hon. gentleman contented himself with referring to the statement without any argument, and applying it, he would be within his rights. But to initiate a discussion of it would be, in my judgment, irregular.

Mr. RHODES: It was not my intention to refer to the matter further than to justify my action. And I must justify my action, otherwise assertions which have been made concerning me by the newspapers would be justified. So that, unless I am in a position to give reasons why I, as a member of this House, exercise a well known right to nominate men for positions and to recommend dismissals, I say, if, in the exercise of that right I am free to be criticised by the press in any language they please to use, there is no protection at all for a member of Parliament in this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it were confined strictly to that right without enlarging by way of discussion and comparison, I think the hon. member would be quite within his rights. But to discuss the matter, I think, would be irregular.

Mr. RHODES: I beg to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it was not my intention to deal with this matter further than to justify my stand as a member and to show that the assertions in the press are unfounded and untrue and are not just criticisms of my actions as a member of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think, with regard to that, the hon. member possesses certain rights in this House; I do not understand that any person has questioned those rights if the language of which he complains directly challenges those rights or questions them; I think the hon. member would be within his rights in bringing it up as a question of privilege. But I do not understand that his right is questioned. There may be something else in connection with it which might be enlarged upon.

Mr. RHODES: As I understand it, you do not question my right to refer to this subject as a matter of privilege, but are only concerned about the manner in which I do it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: That being the case, I submit that you should wait until I have made some remarks upon it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAHAM: That might be too late.

Mr. RHODES: I may say that this is a case which has obtained more or less notoriety, and—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member would be out of order in pursuing the line he seems to indicate. I think, perhaps, he would be well advised, for the present, to avoid violating the rule of the House.

Mr. RHODES: May I be permitted to quote the article in the public press upon which I base a question of privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: I wish to refer to it in a moment, but to say one introductory word. Let me quote, for instance, one paragraph of a letter that has appeared in the public press. It goes on in the first place—I do not wish to deal with it at length—to compare my attitude as a representative of the county of Cumberland with the attitude of those who had previously the honour of representing that county, and who, it says, would not have been guilty of such an act as mine. It proceeds:

No, but it was left for the present member of Parliament to be a party to one of the most brutal acts of political partisanship ever heard of in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RHODES: There is an old adage, that only two classes of persons can judge half-finished work. That old maxim would be too mild to apply to hon. gentlemen opposite if they are prepared to pronounce judgment before they hear the other side of the case. (Reading):

Edward M. Rhodes, M.P., we are ashamed of you.

I may say that some of the headings of editorials in various newspapers throughout the country read as follows:

Ghoulish Spoilsmen; Sordid Story; Pathetic Story; Most Brutal Act of Partisanship;

And so on. Surely, Mr. Speaker, in view of the criticism of the newspapers, I have the right to justify my action in this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Any article which complains of the hon. gentleman's conduct to the extent of interfering with his personal liberty or rights in the House could be read, and the hon. member could move to have the writer of the article appear before the bar of the House and explain his conduct. It would then be for the House to deal with the writer as in its judgment it should determine. I do not think it would be within the right of the hon. member to bring up the matter as a question of privilege, which he could only do by making comparisons or entering into lines of argument which would practically involve a discussion.

Mr. RHODES: I wish to bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but I am not sure that I understand whether I am permitted to justify my action in the matter. The rule of the English Parliament is clear, in such a case a man can be brought before the bar of the House, but that I do not propose, as I do not think it would be desirable.

Mr. SPEAKER: The usual course in this House with regard to such articles, as I understand it, is, if some statement is made about a member which is untrue, for him to read the article or statement, and absolutely deny its correctness. But if the article or statement affects his privileges as a member of the House, the person complained of must be dealt with in such manner as the House may in its judgment see fit after the question of privilege is stated. To outline the rights of members as to what they may deal with or how they may deal with it, could only be done by comparisons and arguments, which would not be permissible under a question of privilege.

Mr. RHODES: My idea is not to make comparisons, but to justify by actual facts and circumstances my contention that I acted properly in the matter. This criticism is unfounded and untrue, but my assertion to that effect is not going to satisfy this House or the country. I would very gladly discuss this question on the motion which appears on the Order Paper, but I waited four hours in this House on the occasion of the motion being brought up, but the hon. gentleman who was to move it was not here and I could not speak. He has himself stated to me that it is not his purpose to speak upon the motion.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend can, of course, speak on the motion when it comes up. The question of privilege along the lines suggested by my hon. friend has hitherto had very wide limits in this House—much wider, perhaps, than those that have been referred to to-day. But as there seems to be some doubt in your mind, Mr. Speaker, as to how far my hon. friend would be permitted to go, I would suggest that he withdraw his proposal; and as it is possible the motion alluded to may be reached to-day or on Monday, he will have an opportunity of speaking upon it. Otherwise my hon. friend can submit to you the authorities on which he bases his claim with regard to the privilege, and you, Mr. Speaker, can take them into consideration. In many instances in my own experience in the past, a member of the House, without any question being raised, has gone quite as far as my hon. friend proposes to go to-day; but I am not disposed to contend that the practice has not gone too far. However, it would perhaps be better to adopt in this matter the course which I have suggested.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was about to say that when the motion on the Order Paper would be reached, whether the hon. member who proposes it intends to discuss it or not, it is quite within the right of any member of the House, as I understand it, to discuss the motion if he so desires.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I am quite content, if it should happen that I am not in my seat when this motion is reached, that the hon. member for Cumberland should make the motion in my name. It was not my intention to discuss this motion, but possibly I may be inclined to change my mind. I would prefer, if the hon. gentleman would allow the papers to be brought down, to discuss the matter at a later date. It is now quite an old subject, and I do not think the hon. gentleman would suffer anything in the estimation of his fellow members or the country by postponing this matter for a few days, until the papers have been produced.

THE ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE.

On motion of Mr. Borden, House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act, and to provide:—

(a) That the comptroller shall have the salary of a deputy head of a department.

(b) An increase to the salaries of officers and members of the force, the amounts not exceeding the following, viz.:—

Commissioner of police, per annum...	$4,000 00
Each assistant commissioner, per annum..	2,800 00
Each superintendent, per annum.. ..	2,200 00
Each inspector, per annum..	1,600 00

(c) That the Governor in Council may authorize extra pay and allowances to be paid to members of the force employed as detectives and to those serving in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory.

Mr. BORDEN: The proposed resolution recommends certain increases in the pay of officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. The present rates are those authorized by the Act of 1905. Last year the pay of the force was increased within the limits of the present statute, and there can be no additional increase without statutory authority.

The cost of living, particularly in Western Canada, has very greatly increased during the past seven years, and that fact has been recognized by the late administration in certain allowances and increases made from time to time in the salaries and remuneration of the Civil Service. It has been found during the present year that recruiting carried on during the spring and early summer in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia has been very difficult indeed, owing to the lack of inducement to men of the proper qualification to join the corps, which at the time is about 50 under strength. Under the present regulations the men engage at 80 or 90 cents a day, and their pay cannot be increased to more than $1 a day. The proposals which are embodied in the resolution, as compared with the existing rates of payment, will be seen from the following table:

	Proposed Maximum.	Present Maximum.
Commissioner of police, per annum	$4,000 00	$3,000 00
Each assistant commissioner, per annum.. ..	2,800 00	2,000 00

It is also proposed by the terms of this resolution that the Governor in Council may authorize extra pay and allowances to be paid to men of the force employed as detectives, and to those stationed in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. It was found necessary, as my right hon. friend will no doubt remember, to employ in the capacity of detectives, members of the corps who seem to possess special qualifications for that purpose. I am informed by the comptroller that the experience of the past has been that men adapted for this purpose are selected and trained, and that, after having been trained for a certain length of time so as to be really valuable in connection with the detection of crime, they are offered very much higher remuneration elsewhere than they can get in the force, and they make application for discharge or refuse to re-enlist, and their services are lost. It is thought that by making a special provision of this kind, their services can be retained and the retention of the services of men of that type is regarded as eminently necessary for the force.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The explanation of my right hon. friend is quite sufficient. The House, I am quite sure, will view with great favour the present increases in the allowances now paid to the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. If there is a corps, if there is any body of men in this country, who are deserving of all the encouragement which the country can give them, is it certainly the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and, so far as I am concerned, I will support with great pleasure the proposition now made by my right hon. friend. I do not know if there are any other features about it that will require discussion, but that will come on the second reading of the Bill. Is it the intention to increase the number of police or to keep it at the present strength?

Mr. BORDEN: The comptroller has recommended to me that the force be brought up to its full strength. I do not remember at the moment if there is any recommendation for an increase, but I shall give that information on the second reading of the Bill, or in committee.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would suggest that if there is a special report from the comptroller, the Prime Minister should bring it down at the second reading of the Bill.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time and agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 24) to amend the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS PROVIDENT FUND.

On motion of Mr. Cochrane, House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees' Provident Fund Act by providing that the board administering the fund may pay out of such fund the whole or any portion of the contribution thereto of any employee discharged from the service on or after April 1, 1907, on account of having been engaged in partisan work in connection with any Dominion or provincial election.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the minister ought to tell us how many of those employees there are, and how much of a draft there will be on the fund?

Mr. BORDEN.

Mr. EMMERSON: At the same time, I think the minister should explain the meaning of the phraseology used, 'on account of having been engaged in partisan work in connection with any Dominion or provincial election,' and explain if any employees who were entitled to the benefits of this Act were dismissed because of participation in provincial elections. My recollection is that the doctrine was laid down, not merely by hon. members on this side of the House, but by the right hon. the Prime Minister as well, that dismissals would not and should not occur because of participation in provincial elections, and that employees of the Government and of the railway service would subject themselves only to the displeasure of the Government in cases where they interfered with, or took part offensively in Dominion elections.

Mr. PELLETIER: If my hon. friend will kindly read the resolution proposed by Mr. Lake, and adopted unanimously by the House, he will see that it covers the cases of both federal and provincial elections. It is stated very clearly.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not recall the resolution referred to. My object in rising is to have the minister state how many employees there are who have been subjected to dismissal because of participation in provincial elections. I am entirely in accord with the principle involved in the resolution, and later I may ask the minister as to whether his attention has been invited to some other amendments which are sought by the employees of the railway, and particularly to applications which have been made by employees who come under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, but who wish to be transferred, or to be placed in a position in which they can elect to come under the provisions of the Provident Fund Act, rather than rely upon any benefits that might accrue to them under the Civil Service Act. I have had communications from those who are now, and have been in the employ of the railway a great many years. They are entitled to come under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Under the Provident Fund Act, all such are excluded from participating in its benefits. I know of one particularly, who seeks to have an amendment of the Act to enable him to come under the provisions of the Provident Fund Act rather than those of the Civil Service Act. I have a long document which has been addressed to the members of the Dominion Parliament, and I presume every hon. member has received a copy of it. It sets forth some amendments that are sought by employees of the railway. I presume that the minister has certainly received such a document, and possibly he may enlighten the House at this moment as to whether these applications and representations have had consideration at his hands, and as to whether he has reached a conclusion with respect to them.

Mr. COCHRANE: The House will remember that last session, on being asked by an hon. member if it was my intention to have the employees who had been dismissed for this cause paid what money they had contributed to this provident fund, I said yes. It was suggested that such a course did not need an amendment to the Act, but, on submitting the matter to the Justice Department, I found that it was impossible to do so without an amendment of the Act. In answer to the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), I have not got the information he seeks to-day, but I will have it on the second reading. It is a very proper thing to have. With reference to what my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) has said, I cannot agree with him. Under the Civil Service Act this is an offence, but not under the agreement which the board of management has with the men; and if it applies in one case it should apply in the other, because a man who takes part in a federal election is very apt to participate in a provincial election as well. No distinction has been made. I think I can say in all these cases we have had an understanding with the representatives of the different departments that we should notify them of an investigation and when it would take place, in order that they might have a representative present, and I think I can produce evidence in most cases that they feel that fair treatment has been extended to them. I shall be very glad to give any further information, either now or on the second reading. With reference to the document to which my hon. friend has referred, I do not remember getting a copy, though it is possible I did receive one. The question has been brought to my notice of employees who are in the Civil Service, and who want to be transferred. I think I can say that this is a matter on which there is a difference of opinion. I have not gone into it fully enough to express an opinion of my own as to what would be fair and right in the matter.

Mr. EMMERSON: On the second reading of the Bill I will invite the attention of the minister to the particular representations which have been made to me with regard to the amendments sought for by employees of the railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: Perhaps the hon. member will draw my attention to what they are, so that I can be prepared.

Mr. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I would like to ask the minister if there is any authority in his department to pay back the contributions of any employee of the road who may have been discharged for some reason apart from the reason given in this resolution. There may be, but I am not familiar with it. I would also like to ask the minister if it would be possible for him, before he presents the Bill for a second reading, to give the House a list of the men who are to come within the operation of this law, with the amounts that may be due to each one.

Mr. COCHRANE: I promised the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) that I would do that. In reference to the first question of my hon. friend, I do not think there is any such provision, but I do not think it would be right to do what he suggests. Any other offence which might be committed would be against the agreement and against the efficiency in the management of the road. This is on a different basis, and harder to control.

Mr. EMMERSON: In this case the man is the victim of circumstances.

Mr. COCHRANE: Perhaps I would put it that way.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The remarks made by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton remind me of a situation which occurred at Halifax some years ago, by reason of the removal of the machine shop to Moncton, and which occurred during the period in which my hon. friend from South Renfrew, was administering the affairs of the Railway Department. When the machine shop was removed to Moncton I think it was not possible to place immediately there, all the men who were thrown out of employment at Halifax. I have in my mind a case the facts of which were related to me only a few weeks ago by a friend of one of the parties who was employed in the machine shop at Halifax. He had been in the employ of the Intercolonial railway for either twenty-two or thirty-two years—I forget which. When the machine shop was removed to Moncton, he was not offered employment there; but about twelve months subsequently to that he was offered employment at Moncton. In the meanwhile he had obtained a position with another railway in Nova Scotia. I think that under the regulations of the Provident Fund Act he would have been entitled to his pension in another year from the time he was discharged. When I heard these facts, it struck me as being a rather hard case, and I was rather impressed with the idea that there should be some way of paying to this particular person a proportion of the pension to which he would have been entitled under the Act had he completed his full term of employment. This is probably the first time that this particular case has come to the minister's attention. I realize that you could not make a general rule or statute upon matters of that kind, but this is a case which particularly deserves consideration. Possibly there may be a great many others in the same situation at Halifax by reason of the removal, of the machine shops to Moncton.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know the particular case the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) is speaking of, but if he would write me and give me particulars, I would be very glad to go into it and see if there cannot be some way provided by which justice may be done.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand that the Department of Justice has given an opinion that political partisanship is not one of the offences disentitling a person under this Act?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is an offence against the Supply Act, but not against the agreement between the board of management and the men.

Mr. MACDONALD: I remember that we had a discussion about that last year. The law in regard to it is laid down in the Provident Act, in section 19, which says:

> Employees who are discharged from the service, for any cause other than those mentioned in paragraph (b) of section 17, after they have been three or more years contributors to the fund, may be paid out of the fund the total amount of their contributions to the fund.

Under the law as it reads to-day men cannot get that money who are discharged on account of wilful default, misconduct, negligence in the performance of their duty, drunkenness, fraud or dishonesty. It would seem that the Act was sufficiently broad to have permitted the minister or the board to have paid out money to the parties who were discharged on account of political partisanship. I may say that certain of these men expected that the minister's assurance to my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) on the subject last winter would be carried out, and I assumed that possibly the Department of Justice had found legal difficulty in the way. The language of section 19 of this Act is so very broad and general, applying to all classes of employees, except those who are discharged for certain specific offences, of which political partisanship is not one, that when these men were not paid, I thought that the Department of Justice had raised some difficulty on the subject. What I would like to know from the minister is whether he has found any difficulty on that account.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax).

Mr. COCHRANE: Other than political partisanship?

Mr. MACDONALD: The statute says that everybody who is dismissed from the service, except those who are discharged because they were guilty of wilful default, misconduct, negligence in the performance of duty, drunkenness, fraud, or dishonesty, should be allowed their money.

Mr. COCHRANE: What other things would there be?

Mr. MACDONALD: Political partisanship apparently would not disentitle a man to the money, and therefore I do not see why there should be any necessity for this Act. I would like to know what the Department of Justice thinks about it.

Mr. COCHRANE: I cannot argue it from a legal standpoint.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister told us last year that these men would be paid, and I assured the unfortunate men who were dismissed in my county that they would be paid when the minister said so.

Mr. COCHRANE: Well, I intend to carry that out.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has not carried it out, but he has come to Parliament to give him authority to carry it out.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: It would appear to me on the face of this statute that the minister does not need any additional law in order to permit it to be done, and I want to know if the Department of Justice have advised him that he requires legislation of this kind.

Mr. COCHRANE: They so advise.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister be good enough, before the second reading, to bring down the opinion of the Department of Justice? because I would like to know what it is. This proposed Act is one which applies to a great number of those employed upon the Intercolonial railway, and any opinion given by the Department of Justice as to its meaning and effect is one which the House and the people in these constituencies affected should be fully advised about.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will do that.

Mr. MACDONALD: I, myself, with all deference, would have thought that the Act was sufficiently wide to have permitted this to be done.

Mr. EMMERSON: Arising out of the case to which attention has been called by my hon. friend from Halifax, there are one or two other cases that I know are before the minister at this present moment that certainly are very much akin to the one cited by my hon. friend from Halifax. Difficulties have arisen with respect to the meaning of the words 'continuous employment.' There are two particular cases within my knowledge—one that of the mechanical superintendent of the Prince Edward Island railway, and another with respect to an engine-man or machinist in the province of Nova Scotia. Mr. Poole, the mechanical superintendent of the Prince Edward Island railway, was originally employed on that railway, and at the request of the manager of the road, went on board one of the Government steamers plying between Pictou and the island. He was there engaged under the direction of the Government and in the interest of the Government, and after they ceased to require his services there, he returned to his former employment. In other words, he was loaned by the Railway Department to another department of the Government, not at his own request, but in the interest of the Government service, and he did as he was instructed. His services were dispensed with recently; I do not know whether it was for political partisanship or for any other cause; that makes no difference. But in the computation of his time, on which was based his annual retiring allowance, this period of his services, at the instance and request of the Railway Department in behalf of another department of the Government, was not allowed. In the other case, that of Robert McDonald, who I understand was in the employ of the Intercolonial railway at Truro, and who was particularly expert in the handling of the steam shovel, he was directed by Mr. Schrieber, the chief engineer of the Department of Railways to go to another part of the Dominion in the public service, and was kept and employed there by the Government and in their interests, and, after he had performed the work for which it was considered he was best adapted, he was recalled to his original employment. It became a question as to the computation of the time which he had served within the meaning of the Provident Fund Act and that period to which I have referred, was not allowed. I would ask the hon. Minister of Railways to make personal and particular inquiry into these two cases. There may be others of the same nature, but manifestly a very grave injustice has been done to these two gentlemen, because they have continuously served the railway, and they were employed under the direction of the railway. In my judgment, it does not matter whether they were kept at their original employment or not. The only question is, were they in the service of the railway? Undoubtedly they were, and I think that a very strong legal argument could be advanced, showing that they were entitled to have that time allowed them in the computation of the annual allowance which they would receive on their retirement.

Mr. COCHRANE: If the hon. gentlemen will let me have a memo. in reference to the matter, I will have it looked up.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I wish to draw the attention of the hon. minister for a moment to a case of dismissal in my district, that of Philip H. Ryan of Mulgrave. The difficulty arose from the fact that the investigator did not seem disposed to give Mr. Ryan a fair trial, refusing to allow him to call his witnesses. Mr. Duchemin, who carried on the investigations in that constituency, did not appear to have been guided by the usual rules of a judge or commissioner in endeavouring to try a case fairly. The consequence was that only one side was heard, and later on it became quite evident that the witness, on whose evidence Mr. Ryan had been dismissed, had not told the truth. This witness, whose name was Byers, was prosecuted for perjury, and was brought up after a preliminary investigation before the grand jury in the town of Guysborough. The grand jury did not find a true bill against him, but the evidence was so clear that Judge Meagher, one of the Supreme Court judges of Nova Scotia, who tried the case, took exception to the action of the grand jury, and instructed the prosecuting attorney to bring the matter before the next court that would meet in that locality. At that trial Mr. Ryan asked leave to produce two witnesses, and I will just quote, for the information of the minister, a paragraph from the evidence given by Mr. Ryan:

> At the investigation held on the 28th of June last, I reminded Byers of what did take place on the 14th day of June, A.D. 1911, but he still persisted in this statement. I offered to go for John P. Meagher and Edward Brennan to have them examined as witnesses. I offered this to Mr. Duchemin. Did not allow me to get these witnesses. He said, never mind your witnesses. It would not have taken me over fifteen minutes to have got the two men.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is that a statement by Mr. Ryan?

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is a statement made by Mr. Ryan on oath before the judge at Guysborough. Now, on that evidence, which is believed by the people who have gone into the case to be false, Mr. Ryan was dismissed, and it is regarded in that locality as a case of very grave injustice. I would ask the minister to produce the evidence taken before his investigator, Mr. Duchemin, before he asks for the second reading of this resolution, so that we may ascertain what report Mr. Duchemin made in regard to the investigation of this case. While I am on the subject, I may say that this is only one of a great many other cases in eastern Nova Scotia, where this man, appointed to investigate these cases, has not given the people who were being tried a fair hearing. The common practice has been to refuse the right of being represented by counsel. I did not myself ask to be permitted to be present at these investigations; but there are honourable gentlemen, barristers on this side of the House, one in particular that I know, of who did ask the right to be present at these investigations and to cross-examine witnesses, and who was refused the right to cross-examine witnesses on behalf of the accused. This right was refused, over and over again, by Mr. Duchemin. Of course, it is impossible to arrive at a fair result in these matters if the accused is not permitted to cross-examine witnesses. The people who testify are necessarily partisans. They go there to tell a story. It is especially necessary in such cases, if we are to be fair at all, that cross-examination be allowed. But it has been constantly refused. And not only that, but courts have been held by Mr. Duchemin in garrets and little bedrooms of hotels. People were excluded and evidence has been taken in the absence of the accused. I am able to prove these statements. I know of cases in which witnesses were examined when the accused were absent, though the accused were within one hundred yards of the place in which the investigations were held.

Mr. RHODES: In what cases was that done?

Mr. SINCLAIR: For one, in the case of John W. Davis, of Guysborough, fishery officer.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not the point the hon. member was discussing.

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, I want to confine myself to the discussion of these railway matters. Not a great many men were dismissed from the Intercolonial railway in my constituency. In fact, there is only one railway station in the constituency, and only half a dozen men, or so, were dismissed. But I do not think any of them got a fair hearing in the examination. It is possible that partisanship may have been proved against some of them—that is a matter for the minister to decide after hearing both sides of the case. But he cannot give a fair decision on hearing only one side. And I submit that the examinations that have been held in the locality by Mr. Duchemin have not been fair. I wish again to press upon the minister the importance of producing evidence, especially in the case of Philip H. Ryan by Mr. Duchemin on which this man was discharged from the service. If, when the resolution is to be read the second time this evidence is before the House, we shall be able to see upon what report the dismissal took place.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is a phase of this question relating to the Department of Railways which is very important as a matter of principle. I do think the Minister of Railways has displayed far more judgment and a greater sense of responsibility as a minister of the Crown in dealing with these charges than either the Postmaster General or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Both of these latter gentlemen have been absolutely ruthless in their disregard of every principle of British fair play. I have no doubt that the Minister of Railways was dominated by some sense of the responsibility attaching to his office in dealing with employees who had vested rights in a fund. For, every employee of the Intercolonial railway, from the inception of his employment becomes interested in the management of his provident fund. He becomes a contributor to it, and by virtue of that fact he has rights of a legal character which would enable him, if this were a company railway and if he were unjustly dealt with, to go into the courts of law and seek a remedy. How far that remedy would be open to him against the Crown, and how far he could invoke the aid of the Exchequer Court in asking to have his dismissal inquired into, is a subject about which a great deal might be said as a matter of law. Whether that legal remedy exists in the case of an employee of the Government's railway or not, the minister ought to realize—and I hope he does realize—that his employees stand in a different position, by reason of their participation in this fund, from that of employees in other departments. I have repeatedly complained to the Minister of Railways by letter and otherwise of the conduct of Mr. Duchemin. Personally, I say that if a man has been guilty of offensive interference in an election, by all means let him be dismissed. There is no objection among hon. members on this side to the invoking of that principle. All we say is that if, in such a case, before you reach a conclusion when you hold an investigation, at least the minister should try to remember that we are not living in South America or in any uncivilized country, and that if there is any principle of British law that we are proud it is that when a man goes into court he gets fair play. Now, that Mr. Duchemin has not dealt with the men before him with any sense of fair play, there can be no doubt whatever—the evidence is indisputable? Mr. Duchemin did not return to the minister last year evidence in the case of investigations which he held in my county. On my motion an Order of the House was passed that the minister should lay before Parliament all the papers connected with the investigation of charges against certain men on the score of partisanship. The minister brought down the preliminary papers and report by Mr. Duchemin upon which he—the minister—acted; but he did not bring down the evidence taken before Mr. Duchemin or anything to show what proceedings were had.

Mr. COCHRANE : Will the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) let me state one point which has a bearing upon that?

Mr. MACDONALD : Well ?

Mr. COCHRANE : Mr. Duchemin was not instructed to send in the evidence in detail, but to send a summing up giving the names of witnesses and the facts; and if this were not sufficient for me to form an opinion upon, I would ask him for a copy of the evidence.

Mr. MACDONALD: There I say, is where the minister went wrong.

Mr. COCHRANE : Perhaps I did.

Mr. MACDONALD : If the minister will follow me upon this point, I think he will agree that he did go wrong. He assented to the proposition that every employee of the Intercolonial railway was a contributor to the fund and that after he was in the employ for a certain time he acquired a vested right of a financial character, such a right that, if he were an employee of a company railway having a similar fund, he could invoke the protection of the courts against unfair treatment by his employers. I do not now discuss the question, whether he could do so in the case of the Crown. Yet the minister was willing in this case, to take away not only the financial rights of his employee but also his position upon a statement sent to the minister by an irresponsible gentleman like Mr. Duchemin.

Mr. LANCASTER : Who had tried the case.

Mr. MACDONALD : Had never tried it. My hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara had better attend to his Ontario dismissals.

Mr. LANCASTER : We will talk about them any time you like.

Mr. MACDONALD : I am speaking of that which is within my own knowledge. These parties had a vested right. In dealing with these matters the minister should have called for the evidence, and not have taken the ipse dixit of Mr. Duchemin. Such action would have been wrong in any case, but particularly so when he could not have known Mr. Duchemin very well himself but had to take a great deal with regard to him for granted. In view of the nature of the office of a minister of the Crown, it is a large undertaking to interfere with the legal and financial rights of an employee, and the minister was simply taking the statement of Mr. Duchemin as to his view of the matters coming before him. I venture to say the minister has gone wrong in every instance. Had the minister acted upon the full stenographic report in every case, I venture to say there would have been fewer men dismissed from the Intercolonial railway. As I have already said, the minister has acted with more fairness than some of his colleagues. But I venture to tell him that he should not have proceeded in any of these cases without having all the evidence before him. Perhaps my hon. friend gave us all the information he had before him; but the Order of the House in regard to the production of these papers was that he should produce the evidence itself, and not Mr. Duchemin's estimate of the purport or effect of the evidence. This Parliament is simply giving a mandamus to the minister, in the same manner as a court of law would direct an inferior court to produce all the documents connected with any particular case. But a court of law with superior jurisdiction would occupy a ridiculous position if the inferior court undertook to impose upon the rights of parties dealt with by sending up only a version or conception of the matter as given by the magistrate presiding over the inferior court.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that all employees of the Government railways have vested rights in this provident fund, and the minister should not deprive them of their rights without having before him the sworn testimony upon which he undertook to take action in the matter, and I think the minister should now, before this Bill goes through this House, obtain from this executioner, Mr. Duchemin, a stenographic copy of every case in which the minister has undertaken to deprive employees of their vested rights in that fund. Many men who, having reached middle age, are going down the hill of life, and who have lost their positions as a result of this ex parte tribunal presided over by Mr. Duchemin, have lessened their income every year in order to participate in that fund. It may be that political partisanship or political prejudice may be advanced as the reason why these men were dismissed from office, but it does seem to me that it is a sad commentary upon the condition of affairs in this country that a man who is romoved from office cannot have placed on the public records the evidence upon which he was dismissed. My hon. friend has the right to exercise arbitrarily the power of dismissing these men, but he did not choose to do that; he sent out an official to make an investigation. Why could he not do it right? If there was evidence taken why should it not be produced, and why should not the minister, when the case comes before Parliament, be in a position to lay before the committee all the evidence taken in every case by this executioner, so it be may be ascertained whether or not the minister acted rightly in the matter?

The question in regard to Mr. Duchemin is one that needs no argument, and I am not going to elaborate on it. Other hon. gentleman on this side of the House can produce evidence on this point that cannot be disputed. I rose for the purpose of pointing out to the minister the position in which these men stood, to ask him to exercise some measure of discretion in the matter, and to bring before the House, in accordance with the orders that have been made from time to time, not Mr. Duchemin's conception of the evidence, but the sworn statements of witnesses taken before him. When dealing with legislation interfering with funds provided for men or women in their old age, the least this Parliament can demand is to have that evidence before them in its entirety.

Mr. EMMERSON: The hon. member for Pictou has touched upon a subject that seems to me so vital that upon it depends the future of the Provident Fund Act. My hon. friend might fairly have gone further in the matter. He has said that every man who was dismissed had a vested right in this fund, and that the action of the minister in dismissing him was in interference with that vested right. I submit that he interferes not only with the vested right of the employee who has been dismissed, but with the vested right of every other employee of the Intercolonial railway who may be a contributor to that fund. The dismissal of employees for political partisanship deeply affects the position of every other employee in the service, for the reason that this fund was based upon actuarial computation, and if the Minister of Railways were to make any large number of dismissals on the ground of partisanship, it might affect the very foundation of the fund itself. It must be borne in mind that the employees contribute to the fund upon a certain percentage, and for every dollar that they contribute the Government gives another dollar. If this fund is to be trifled with, if it is to be made the football of political parties, not only will the fund itself be affected, but every individual employee of the railway will be made to feel it. Every man as he enters the service begins contributing to this fund, and so long as he serves the railway he continues to do so, the amount thus accumulated being for his own protection in the future. If that fund is affected or interfered with by dismissals, the rights of the employees of the railway are undoubtedly placed in a false and unfair position.

Mr. FOWLER: Does my hon. friend contend that employees who participate in this fund, no matter how unworthy they may be, should not be dismissed?

Mr. EMMERSON: The statute does make provision with respect to dismissals, and very great care was taken in the enactment of this measure, that the number of political dismissals should be minimized to such a degree that they would be almost entirely obviated. There may be at times certain reasons why men should be dismissed, but that should be only in such cases as involve flagrant disregard of rules. I think that every dismissal should be enquired into so closely that disposition of the matter should not be left to irresponsible parties who may be appointed for the purpose of taking evidence. The evidence should come under the consideration of council, and, if not, certainly of the minister himself, and be closely scrutinized before any action is taken thereon.

Mr. RHODES: It is not my purpose this afternoon to discuss this Act in detail, or to enter into the general question of dismissals in the province of Nova Scotia, because I purpose to do that at a later stage, and at a more convenient time, but I deem it fair and just to this investigator, Mr. Duchemin, at least to have an impartial statement with reference to him and his conduct in these investigations placed upon the records of this House, especially in view of the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite from Nova Scotia during the last session and again to-day. I must say, in view of the information I have gleaned, having taken the pains to go into this matter myself, that I am surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite have the audacity to make the assertions with respect to Mr. Duchemin which I have heard them make again to-day in this House. In the first place, Mr. Duchemin is a member of the bar of Nova Scotia, and I am astounded to hear another member of the bar impugn his honour as a commissioner, irrespective of any evidence he might have as to the manner in which investigations have been conducted or are being conducted in Nova Scotia.

Dealing first with the case mentioned by the hon. member for Guysborough, that of John W. Davis, I must accept the statement of the hon. gentleman that evidence was taken by the commissioner in the absence of the accused; but I think, in justice to himself and in justice to Mr. Duchemin, it is his duty to bring evidence before the House to show why he makes that statement.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am prepared to furnish the evidence.

Mr. RHODES: The statement of the commissioner goes to show that Mr. Davis himself declined to give evidence in his own defence, and practically admitted that he had nothing to say in defence and that he was an active partisan.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has my hon. friend a copy of the evidence taken in the case of J. W. Davis?

Mr. RHODES: I have not a copy of the evidence in that case, but I am quoting from an answer to a question put the hon. gentleman, which is a matter of record and which cannot be disputed. Furthermore, I have found out upon inquiry that the hon. member for Guysborough, has never been present at any one of these investigations in his county, and has never asked permission to be present or to cross-examine witnesses. Let me add that after the elections of 1896, when the Liberal Government came into power, investigations took place in Nova Scotia only in rare instances, and at that time no cross-examinations were allowed, and not one in twenty-five or fifty cases of dismissals in Nova Scotia was after inquiry, by investigators or otherwise, not a scintilla of evidence of any kind was given; but men were dismissed wholesale on the ipse dixit of members sitting in this House at that time, or merely on a letter from the defeated candidate. The member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), at that time a defeated candidate for that county, dismissed by a mere letter to the then Minister of Railways, the late Hon. A. G. Blair, two men working on a canal in his county, and that was the only record before this House of any cause why these men should be dismissed.

Mr. MACDONALD: What canal were they working on?

Mr. RHODES: It might not have been a canal, it might have been a lock or a bridge. But I will bring before the House the statement in 'Hansard' showing that these two men were dismissed by Mr. Blair on his mere letter, he being then only a defeated candidate. It matters not what work the men were engaged in. The hon. member for Pictou is a lawyer, I am glad to pay him the compliment of saying that he is one of the best advocates in Nova Scotia; and yet my hon. friend never came near any of the investigations being held by Mr. Duchemin in his own county or ever asked permission to cross-examine witnesses, not a single witness, in any one of these cases. Yet he comes here and complains of the manner in which Mr. Duchemin conducts investigations in his county. One of the difficulties in the matter of partisanship in Nova Scotia is that hon. gentlemen opposite have instituted a reign of terror over government officials in that province. They have had to carry the bags of hon. gentlemen opposite; they have had to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. I saw a case of that kind in my own constituency, where, as I went to walk on a platform at a joint meeting on nomination day, I met a gentleman employed by the Intercolonial railway carrying the bag of Mr. Logan, who was opposed to me, and the last words I heard him say were, 'Give it to the brute, Logan, give it to the brute.' That is the kind of partisanship we have in Nova Scotia. I do not blame the partisan, but I blame hon. gentlemen opposite for bringing up civil servants to expect that sort of thing, and to feel that they must be partisans.

In Pictou an investigation was held in the case of Neil Ross (one of the employees of the Intercolonial railway). It was brought out that this man only last year canvassed for his vote, a man of the name of Howard McCulloch, (one of the employees of the Intercolonial railway). He promised and gave the inducement to McCulloch that if he would vote for Mr. Macdonald, he would get his reward in the shape of a government job, and I have here a letter written by the hon. member for Pictou himself to McCulloch. I wish to pay the hon. member for Pictou the compliment of saying that this is written with his usual astuteness, because it does not bear any date, although I would hazard a guess, in the absence of any contradiction from the hon. gentlemen, that it was written very shortly before the last election. It says:

Macdonald & Ives
Barristers, Solicitors, &c.
E M. Macdonald, L.L.B., K.C., M.P.
W. B. Ives, L.L.B.
Pictou, Nova Scotia.

Howard McCulloch, Watervale.

Dear Mr. McCulloch,—Neil Ross has written to me in regard to you, and I desire to say that I should like very much if you would either write or come to see me at any time.

I am
Yours faithfully,
E. M. MACDONALD.

Just such a letter as I would expect the hon. gentleman would write.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RHODES: I assume that hon. gentlemen opposite are applauding the astuteness with which this letter was written. It is just such a letter as I would expect the hon. member to write on the eve of an election, because if he had made it stronger I am afraid the hon. member would not be able to take part in the framing of such legislation as we have in this country with respect to the running of elections.

I want to say, standing in my place as a member of this House, that I believe Mr. Duchemin has conducted his investigations in Nova Scotia with absolute fairness and impartiality in each and every case.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Did you attend any of them?

Mr. RHODES: I did not.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Why did the hon. gentleman read that letter written by the hon. member for Pictou?

Mr. RHODES: I am satisfied to have hon. gentlemen take their view as to why I read it. I do not propose to furnish intelligence to the hon. gentlemen, but I think the reason is obvious.

Mr. MACDONALD: You have got a bad mind.

Mr. RHODES: Has the hon. member for Antigonish any fault to find with the manner in which investigations were conducted in his county by Mr. Duchemin?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Most decidedly I have.

Mr. RHODES: Very good, I ask the hon. gentleman to listen to this letter, which I propose to read:

Truro, N. S., Nov. 21, 1912.

H. P. Duchemin,
Commissioner of Enquiry,
Sidney, N. S.

Your letter of the 5th instant received last night on my arrival home from St. Louis, Mo., where I have been attending a convention of the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Men.

You ask for my impression of the manner in which the inquiries of charges of political partisanship have been conducted and of the treatment accorded to the accused persons.

I was present at the following inquiries held by you:

William Landry, section foreman, Pomquet.

That is in the constituency of my hon. friend from Antigonish.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I was present.

Mr. RHODES (reading):

Charles Landry, sectionman, Pomquet.
William Fongere, sectionman, Pomquet.
John McInnes, foreman-carpenter, Antigonish.
R. McFarlane, section foreman, Antigonish.

All these investigations were in the constituency of the hon. member for Antigonish.

Colin McDonald, sectionman, James River.
William H. Williams, sectionman, James River.
H. H. Sartoris, section foreman, Pugwash.

I would ask hon. gentlemen to listen carefully to these words:

I consider that you were perfectly fair in your manner in conducting these inquiries, and the accused in all cases were given an opportunity by you to call any witness that chose to give evidence in their behalf.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Who said that?

Mr. RHODES: This letter was written by the general chairman of the Railway Maintenance of Way Lodge, and bears on the seal 'Maintenance of Way Lodge.'

An hon. MEMBER: He must be a good Conservative.

Mr. RHODES (reading):

They were also given an opportunity to go on the stand themselves and make a statement in their own defence.

With reference to the two inquiries held at West River in the case of Hugh Fraser and Neil Ross, I was absent in Ottawa at the time and I appointed H. A. McElhinney to represent the brotherhood, and I quote from his report: 'I consider that Hugh Fraser and Neil Ross were given every opportunity at the inquiry held by Mr. Duchemin at West River to clear themselves of the charges preferred against them of political partisanship.

I might state with reference to the inquiries, held at Pomquet, that Mr. William Chisholm, M.P., for Antigonish county was present and in the course of our conversation on the platform after the inquiry Mr. Chisholm said that he had no fault with the commissioner in the way in which he had conducted the inquiries.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I do not believe I ever made such a statement. Besides, I wrote a letter to Mr. Lowe in which I denounced the conduct of that investigation.

Mr. RHODES (reading):

I might also mention the case of Archie Stewart, section foreman at Linwood, whose inquiry was held previous to the inquiry above mentioned. I was not present at this inquiry and you had already sent in your report to the hon. Minister of Railways, but when I went to attend the inquiries at Pomquet Mr. Stewart brought to my notice the fact that some evidence had been taken that referred to a by-election held in Antigonish county in 1905, and when I brought this to your notice you readily agreed to write the hon. Minister of Railways to hold his decision until such time as you could re-open the case and rectify any injustice that might have been done Mr. Stewart in that way. When you had done this he was exonerated from any charge.

Thanking you for past courtesy,

I am, yours respectfully,

GEO. M. MURRAY,
General Chairman,
Maintenance of Way Employees.

This bears the seal of the Maintenance of Way Employees Lodge. My hon. friend from Antigonish has referred to Mr. Lowe. I may say for the benefit of the committee that Mr. Lowe is president of the International Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, one of the largest labour organizations in America. I have here a copy of the letter written to the hon. member for Antigonish by Mr. Lowe, and hon. members will be able to learn just exactly the opinion of this man, who is a resident of St. Louis, and who perhaps does not know the member for Antigonish personally. He knows from the records, however, how men were dismissed in 1897, following the election of 1896, and I ask the careful attention of the committee to this letter.

Mr. Chisholm, M.P.,
Antigonish, N.S., Canada.

Dear Sir,—I see you are a poor loser. I wonder if you recollect in 1896 the events that occurred immediately thereafter. You criticise our brotherhood and say (speaking of Mr. Landry and his local dues):

'I do not know that I can advise him to pay, for it appears that the brotherhood affords no protection whatever to its men in this part of the country.'

Mr. CHISHOLM: Hear, hear.

Mr. RHODES: I must have the right letter. Mr. Lowe goes on to say:

You must either be stating what is wrong, knowingly, or you are living in ignorance of what is transpiring very near you, and what I am certain is common knowledge to every man of the Intercolonial railway, and to every member of our brotherhood. We are giving protection, and we have received protection and reinstatement for several members who had been charged with political partisanship. In every case where an investigation has been called for, it has been given, owing to representations made by Chairman Murray, of Truro, and myself to the present Minister of Railways, and the men reinstated have received from $80 to $100 pay for lost time; others have been reinstated as a matter of clemency on account of domestic matters, large families, &c., even where they had been foolishly active in politics. That much for your criticism, and it will give you a correct means of estimating its value.

Now, let me give you a few plain truths, that only for a lot of miserable politicians, there would be no need for any such investigations or any such dismissals; if you and others like you would keep your hands off the management of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways, instead of trying to work it for your personal and political advantage, there would be no need of any such conditions. What did you do to get investigations for the hundreds of men laid off after 1896? Compared with what the present Government has done in the way of dismissals and suspensions, they are almost white winged. In Quebec you almost made a clean sweep and in every other province several dismissals, but I never could get a single investigation, although I wore my heart and soul and almost my boots out, waiting on your then Minister of Railways, Mr. Blair.

That comes from an impartial man, who is the responsible head of one of the largest labour organizations on the continent of America, and whose sole object is to look after the welfare of those under him. He goes on to say:

You will see that your criticism of the organization comes with very bad grace and I trust the information I have given you may be of use to you. Before any investigation takes place, our general chairman is notified and he, or someone else, has an opportunity to be present. If these men who have gone to you because you are an M. P. had acted as they should and turned the case over to the chairman, whose duty it is to protect them, they would have shown more good judgment, but the curse of the Intercolonial is that so many of the employees, and I do not know whether it includes these men or not, try to work a political pull rather than assisting their organization, in working its machinery to adjust their grievances. I presume in this case, these men, instead of notifying their general chairman, rushed to yourself, who can do nothing to help them.

With best wishes, I am,

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) A. B. LOWE,
President.

There is corroboration of the assertion I made some time ago that the difficulty in the province of Nova Scotia is not with respect to those poor Government employees, but arises from the system under which they have been brought. They were taught to tremble for their bread and butter, and were continually hovering about politicians until the regime which I am glad to say has been inaugurated by the present Minister of Railways.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Have you got the reply to that letter?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Have you got the letter to which that was a reply?

Mr. RHODES: No, I have not. But, I have another letter which I would like to read.

Mr. MACDONALD: I suppose everything is serene and seraphic down there since you came in?

Mr. RHODES: If you are satisfied, I am. Here is a copy of a letter written to Mr.

Duchemin by the Rev. Father D. L. McDonald Arisaig, in the constituency of Antigonish. I assume that the hon. gentleman who represents that constituency knows Father McDonald.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I know him quite well, and would be sorry to drag him into this conflict.

Mr. RHODES (reading):

Dear Mr. Duchemin,—I understand that you are expected in Antigonish again shortly. I should be pleased to see you when you come and glad to have you call at any time.

I wish to express to you my satisfaction at the fairness and impartiality with which you conducted your inquiry here last summer into the cases of Government officials.

I do not think that in the administration of the public service, any portion of the community should be discriminated against, because of the independent exercise of the franchise, or that any man should be dismissed from office without just cause, such as incompetency, neglect of duty, or offensiveness to the public.

I was glad to observe that this spirit of fairness was manifested by you and that every opportunity was given to hear both sides. Whatever conclusions may in each case have been justified by the evidence, I am satisfied that your investigation was fair and impartial.

Believe me, my dear sir, to be,
Yours truly,
(Sgd.) D. L. MACDONALD, P.P.

I do not propose to comment upon these letters at greater length, because they speak more eloquently with respect to the manner in which Mr. Duchemin has conducted his investigations in Nova Scotia than any words of mine could. But my mind goes back to a case in which the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) was interested, much of which goes to prove the statement which I made some time ago, that the trouble with the poor Government officials in Nova Scotia has been that they have been hounded by hon. gentlemen opposite who represent constituencies in that province. Now, here is a case where the hon. member for Guysborough was being driven around the county of Guysborough before the last election by a man who was earning his day's wages from the Government of the country, and, not only that, but the hon. gentleman himself was in the wagon with this official when he canvassed a voter, and said: 'If you vote for Sinclair, I will see that your sons get work with the Government.' These facts were proven in the investigation held before this same Mr. Duchemin. This is a sample, and it is well to have this House know how elections are conducted in Nova Scotia. This case was proved by the evidence of one Patrick Connolly, who, under oath, gave evidence before this same Mr. H. P Duchemin. I am sorry that the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) is out of his seat. He comes from New Brunswick, but I have the facts here in regard to a case in which an old man, over seventy years of age, who had been in the employ of the Government for over thirty-four years, was dismissed from office by him—why? Because his son, in the heat of an election campaign, driving along the road, had got up in his wagon and said 'Hurrah for Powell,' Mr. Powell being the candidate opposed to the hon. gentleman in the election. On that evidence alone that poor old man, who had been a faithful Government employee for thirty-four years, was dismissed. I refer to the case of James Sutherland, who was stationmaster at Aulac. I have no doubt that these instances will afford considerable evidence to this committee of the conditions under which we have had to fight in the province of Nova Scotia, and that they will in a very large measure explain why it was that the Conservative party has had such a comparatively small representation from that province for many years.

Mr. LANCASTER: Who dismissed that man?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Westmorland, who at that time was Minister of Railways and Canals. Another extraordinary argument was presented by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals. He made a laboured effort extending over twenty minutes to show that all the men who paid into this provident fund were participants, and that, whether they were individually proceeded against by way of attempted dismissal or not, they were interested in the common fund, and that therefore any attempt at dismissal would do them an injury. As a matter of fact, the reverse is the case. If you dismissed half the men who have been drawing out of the fund, there would be only half the number remaining to participate in it, therefore, twice as much money for those remaining, I, for one, fail to see the virtue of the hon. gentleman's argument.

Some other matters came to my personal knowledge in my own constituency in which Mr. Duchemin is concerned. I took particular pains to inquire, in order to see how these cases were conducted. The men concerned had present the head of their organization, to see that they were fairly treated, witnesses were called in behalf of the defendant, and in each case the defendant was enabled to give evidence. I saw a transcription of the evidence in these cases, and I do not believe that a fairer or more just trial would be given to any person in a court of law.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you not let everybody else see the evidence beside yourself?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. gentleman can move for the papers.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, we cannot get them.

Mr. RHODES: Well, if the hon. gentleman cannot get the papers at all, does he mean to say, in view of the statement I have made, that Mr. Duchemin has unfairly conducted these inquiries?

Mr. MACDONALD: You will find that out before you get very much farther.

Mr. RHODES: I believe that the evidence I have given is more than ample to show that the investigations in Nova Scotia were being conducted fairly and impartially. I have a good deal more evidence, which only came to hand to-day, and I have been unable to digest it, but we will have an opportunity to refer to this question at a later date.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend (Mr. Rhodes) has indulged in a great deal of fireworks, and his hypercritical charge about the pernicious conditions existing in Nova Scotia is to us somewhat amusing. Who started this business of running the Intercolonial railway on political lines? It was the hon. gentlemen opposite, in the days when public officials on the Intercolonial railway, under a Conservative administration, handed out passes at every general and by-election for the transportation of their voters free of charge. One does not need to go into this, for everybody knows it. My hon. friend would like the House and the country to see that an absolutely ethereal condition of affairs had come into existence once the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches had gone there, that all politics had been eliminated, and that there was a beautiful independence of view and action permeating their conduct of this railway, that nobody was being dismissed on account of politics, nobody accused on account of politics, but that since this high-minded administration had come into office, all of these difficulties had disappeared. All I can say is that I admire the assurance of my hon. friend, when he can stand up before this committee and make such a ridiculous and astounding statement. As to the evidence which he gave us of the great fairness of Mr. Duchemin, and as to the letter which he produced, and which he said I had written, as evidence to support anything about Mr. Duchemin or anything which my hon. friend said in regard to me, there is no lawyer in this House who would attach the slightest possible credence or weight to such evidence. When I tell you that that letter was stolen from the House of Mr. McCullough, for the purpose of creating the impression that Mr. Ross had done something wrong, and was brought before Mr. Duchemin, you have some idea of the just way in which these investigations before Mr. Duchemin have been carried on.

Mr. RHODES: You do not say that Mr. Duchemin stole it?

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Duchemin knew that the charge was made that the letter was stolen, and he also knew that, by any reading of the English language or any possible construction of any kind, there could be nothing distorted from that letter that would warrant any imputation against Mr. Ross.

Now, where has all this discussion arisen, and why all this flamboyant effusion on the part of my hon. friend? I rose to ask the Minister of Railways whether or not he would bring before this committee the evidence taken before this great jurist, Mr. Duchemin, in each and every case. I admitted frankly the right of the minister to dismiss men for partisanship where there was proper cause, and I have never raised that question in the House myself. What I said was that the men on the Intercolonial railway who had paid into the provident fund had vested rights of a financial character over and above the mere question of office holding, and that the minister should not take away those vested rights without having before him sworn testimony of a character that would warrant a judge in a similar case, where the employee belongs to a company, in deciding one way or the other upon that question. I said that the minister had not brought down in previous years under the order of Parliament the evidence taken before Mr. Duchemin. I asked him to bring it.

Mr. COCHRANE: I brought down all the evidence I had.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am not blaming the minister for not bringing what he had, but I claim that the minister should have made this man, Mr. Duchemin, produce the evidence and not his statement of it. The trouble with Mr. Duchemin in my county has been this, that on some evening a constable or some other official would arrive with a notification to some unfortunate sectionman or other individual to appear before Mr. Duchemin in some town the next day.

Mr. RHODES: Do you know of a case in your county or any other county where, when an adjournment was requested on the part of the accused, it was not granted?

Mr. MACDONALD: I may say to my hon. friend in reference to the men who were dismissed in my county, that Mr. Duchemin never had an investigation when I happened to be on hand. If he had given sufficient notice to the party charged, to give him time to communicate with me, I would have gone there; but I know, from the evidence of men upon whom I can safely rely, that he has refused to grant time to enable them to communicate with counsel, and has made the notice of his hearings so short that it was impossible for the party charged to get in communication with anybody who would conduct his defence upon proper lines.

Mr. RHODES: I think the hon. gentleman wishes to be absolutely fair. I am sure he will permit me to say that on the inquiries I made, I feel quite safe in replying that in no instance has an adjournment ever been refused when asked for.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend cannot possibly compass, with the means he has of getting information, all the doings or misdoings of this gentleman, Mr. Duchemin. That would be a task far too great for him to accomplish with the time at his disposal, and I am quite sure his information, while I have a right to accept it as being absolutely correct, as he states it is, could not have been of that extended character that would enable him to speak of what was done in each and every case. I make the statement upon the authority of men whose reputation is beyond question, that these men have received notice to appear in less than twenty-four hours, and it was impossible for them to communicate with counsel, or with gentlemen who would be able to appear for them, and that adjournments, in order that they could get counsel, were refused. I want to call the attention of the minister and of the committee to this fact. I said before to the minister that where he took the vested rights of an employee in a fund, he should not proceed except upon legal evidence, and that that evidence should be made a matter of record in his department, and should be available in Parliament in order to justify his action. That is the principle I contend for personally. It is one that cannot be denied, and I have a right to ask, before this House passes the Bill interfering with the constitution of this Act in any way, and in order to give the House an opportunity to consider what other amendments might be made, that we should have before us the cases, and the evidence upon which the cases were based, in which the minister has taken away the vested rights in a provident fund of the men employed on the Intercolonial

Mr. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.): When the Liberal party came into power in 1896, there was a statute upon the books which provided that a fund should be made for the employees of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways. A certain sum of money was retained from their monthly wages. At that time wholesale dismissals were made without any investigation, and these men were never paid any of the money which was in the Government's hands at the time they were dismissed. I have had since 1911 many applications from these men for the return of the moneys retained by the Government on their behalf. I would ask the Minister of Railways to amend this resolution in order to make it apply to the men who were summarily dismissed without any investigation in 1896 and 1897, and to provide that the money which is now, and was then in the hands of the Government, be returned to these men. It is hardly fair that the men who were summarily dismissed without investigation in 1896 and 1897 should not be in the same position as the employees who were dismissed in 1912. On the Prince Edward Island railway in 1896, a great number of section men were dismissed, who did not receive the benefit of an investigation; but on the contrary, the then acting Minister of Railways simply wrote a letter to the superintendent of the Prince Edward Island railway ordering that these men be dismissed without investigation, but simply on the statement of some irresponsible person in the county made to the Minister of Railways. I will read one of these letters:

> In acknowledging receipt of your letter of the 13th August, I wish to say that the names of the labourers to be placed upon sections 5 and 8 will be given to you by Mr. John F. Whear, who will also give you the names of the third men in each section for extra labour which you may require.
> With respect to the section labourers in Kings county, I have complaints regarding the section men on numbers 2 and 3 of the Georgetown branch of the Prince Edward Island railway, which I have every reason to believe are well founded, and which preclude their continuance in their present positions.

Could that happen to-day? Suppose one of the gentlemen who represents a constituency in Eastern Canada went to-day to Mr. Cochrane, the Minister of Railways, and said that he had reason to believe a man was guilty of partisanship, what would the minister tell him. Simply: 'Lay your complaint; that complaint will be laid before the investigating officer, and if the charges are proven, the man will be dismissed; if they are not proven, he will be retained in office.' That is what the minister would tell him, and what he has always done since he took the oath of office. (Reading):

The names of these men in section 3 at present are: Philip H. Mooney, Frances McAree and John H. Bradley.

I desire them to be replaced by John P. Bradley, St. Teresa, Patrick Mooney, Peake's Station and Philip Maher of the same place.

The men I desire to be displaced are violent partisans and showed themselves to be such on election day, by acting in a way which renders it impossible to retain them.

Where did he get that information? Was it after an investigation on the sworn testimony of witnesses? No, simply founded on some representation as I said before by some irresponsible person. (Reading):

For section 2 I submit the names of Frank McCormick, Cardigan, Peter McLeod, Lorne Valley and Peter Goodwin, Baldwin Station.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) Acting Minister of Railways.

Now, I do not think that we should make fish of one and flesh of another in this matter. These claims should be paid if they are honest. I have no doubt in my own mind—and I think there is abundant evidence to prove—that there are thousands of dollars today in the hands of the Government paid in by these poor men who were summarily dismissed as this letter goes to show. I would ask the minister now, in view of these facts, to amend this resolution so as to make it apply to the Conservative workmen dismissed without cause in 1896. I think it nothing but fair that these men should get their hard-earned money back. They earned it, but it was retained by the Government as a fund similar to the provident fund. And there is no reason why these men should not be treated the same as the men dismissed for partisanship in 1912.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): When my hon. friend from Cumberland (Rhodes) turned to me in a dramatic way and threatened to put me in the witness box to prove that I had given a certificate of character to Mr. Duchemin, I felt a little embarrassed. I did not know what he had up his sleeve, but thought that whatever it was it must be something of importance.

Mr. RHODES: I have some more here.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): My hon. friend at last produced his evidence to prove that I had acknowledged the independence, impartiality and honesty of Commissioner Duchemin. It was in the form of a letter written by Mr. Murray. Now, this Mr. Murray, I believe, is an employee of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I understand he is employed in the yards in Truro.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I am so informed. At all events, I am told, this man, if not an employee of the Government, is a very strong Conservative. He says in his letter simply that I stated that I was satisfied with the way Mr. Duchemin conducted the investigation. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that I do not think I ever made such a statement. I do not say that Mr. Murray deliberately misstated the facts, but if he understood me to say anything like what he attributes to me, I am confident that the statement I made did not justify such understanding. I am convinced of that not only because I should not having been truthful in making such a statement regarding the conduct of Mr. Duchemin, whom I have observed very closely, but because of what I stated in letters written on the subject almost immediately after the occasion referred to by him. I wrote a letter to Mr. Lowe a few days after the investigation as follows:

A. B. Lowe, Esq.,
Pres. Inter. Brotherhood of M. of W. Employees
St. Louis, Mo.

Dear Mr. Lowe,—I beg to call your attention to the unfair treatment accorded to certain of the Intercolonial sectionmen in this county. An investigation was held, which judging by the sequel can only be called a farce. I was present at the hearing before Commissioner Duchemin at Pomquet. William Landry, section foreman, and Charles Landry, underman, were charged with political partisanship. There was no specific accusation. I heard the evidence, and there was not a particle of evidence elicited against either of these men to justify a finding of partisanship. What their politics is, or what part, if any, they took in elections, do not appear from any evidence given that day. The brotherhood have a right to require that when an investigation be held, the men will be judged by the facts there disclosed. It is a downright imposition on your brotherhood to dismiss men on such evidence as was taken at Pomquet. If those seeking the places of the dismissed have to be rewarded for their party service, why not have the railway authorties distribute the spoils without any sham pretence of respecting the contention of the brotherhood. It remains to be seen whether the brotherhood has a reason for its existence so far as protecting its members goes. As the representative for this county in the federal House, I stand for the men in this case, and protest against any farcical inquiries such as held before Commissioner Duchemin, and acted upon by the Minister of Railways.

I do not think there is anything in that letter to show that I had a great appreciation of the conduct or impartiality of Mr. Duchemin. But I have another letter written to Mr. Murary himself, and if I ever expressed myself to Mr. Murray in the way he said I did, this letter would certainly be inconsistent on my part. The letter says:

It is simply shameful how the Intercolonial railway sectionmen in this country, whose places were wanted by inferior men, have been treated.

Then I go on to refer to certain persons; but perhaps I should best consult the feelings of hon. members opposite by not reading these references at this time, but by going on with that part which refers to the conduct of Mr. Duchemin. Speaking of the investigation in the case of Mr. William R. Fougère, I go on to say:

William R. Fougère is the last man in the world who should be called a political partisan. I have known him personally since years, and in no sense whatever has he ever been known to intermeddle in political contests. But he is dismissed; and Mr. Duchemin, in the absence of any evidence, invokes the disconnected, and in its true sense, the harmless story of the half witted girl of Pomquet who gave no evidence whatever in the Fougere investigation, to justify his false report. Why put the country to the expense of investigation and the parties accused to the annoyance these inquiries involved, if these inquiries are not to be honestly conducted and the reports to be based on evidence such as one expects from judicial inquiries? It is an insult to the intelligence of the brotherhood the way the investigations have resulted in this country. It is beside the point to say that there is no miscarriage of justice for these men are all guilty and are well known in the communities in which they live to have forfeited the protection the brotherhood ought properly to afford to them. Grant the conditions are as stated, then the men should be dismissed without investigation, and the proper authorities should accept responsability therefor. But when that investigation is ordered and takes place, the decision of the commissioners should strictly follow the evidence given there and then at the investigation, and should not be influenced by outside representations.

I read these letters to show that Mr. Murray must have been entirely mistaken when he said that I expressed satisfaction with the way Mr. Duchemin conducted these investigations. I repeat that I have no recollection of having said what is attributed to me and do not believe I ever said it, a belief which I hold all the more strongly because of these letters. I have observed the conduct of Mr. Duchemin in these investigations, and am bound to say that it was not characterized by the judicial dignity and impartiality suitable to such occasions. I went down to attend the investigation in Pomquet. I had an idea that I should not be permitted to take part in the investigation, because I had heard of the conduct of Mr. Duchemin and knew of the way he had conducted an investigation at Tracadie a few days before this. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) asked my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) if he knew of cases where sufficient notice was not given. I can name one case which took place in Afton, the accused being Mr. John McDonnell. Mr. McDonnell was investigated in his absence by Mr. Duchemin. Another case is that of Mr. Hubert Myatte, of Tracadie. Mr. Duchemin sent notice by telegraph from Antigonish to the station master who sent it by the sectionman to warn Mr. Myatte to be on hand on the arrival of the train. The train came in about five or ten minutes after Mr. Myatte received the notice, so, of course, he had no opportunity to prepare a defence.

Mr. RHODES: If, in that case, adjournment was asked, was it refused?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I know nothing about that; I was not there. But the Inquiries Act, under amendment made last session, provides:

Reasonable and sufficient notice shall be given so that the party may be able to prepare for his defence either in person or by counsel.

So it provides that persons who are accused shall have the privilege of being represented by counsel. But here was a case where notice was given only five or ten minutes before the arrival of the train on which the investigator was who immediately afterwards opened his court and proceeded with the investigation. How could the accused get counsel?

Mr. LANCASTER: In the case the hon. gentleman has just mentioned, did the accused not ask for an adjournment for the purpose of doing these things he has complained of? Was it not an indication that he knew he was guilty, and did not want to waste time?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): He had no counsel to advise him as to what his rights were, and he was not given a chance to take advice. I am complaining of the manner in which Mr. Duchemin undertook to make his inquiries. I submit that he should have given reasonable notice to the party accused, so that he might have an opportunity of consulting counsel. At the investigation in Pomquet, held about the end of May last, I was refused the right to take any part in the examination. Commissioner Duchemin stated that he did not allow any solicitor to appear for the parties at these investigations, and that in the very teeth of the Act not only permitting counsel, but commanding the commissioner to hear the accused by counsel. I think he qualified his refusal to me of my right to appear by stating that only in the case of charges against officials in the Marine and Fisheries Department had he allowed counsel.

Mr. RHODES: I assume that the hon. member for Antigonish wishes to be fair in this matter, and I would like to ask him if Mr. Duchemin did not state that he had refused in all cases to permit the engagement of counsel, as it tended to prolong the proceedings, but that the hon. gentleman was at liberty to sit beside the man accused and suggest to him any questions that might be asked of witnesses.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I do not remember the exact words Mr. Duchemin used, but I desire to be fair in the matter, and, if he did use words of that kind or express any such sentiment, I am willing that he shall have the benefit of them. But he absolutely refused to allow me to appear on behalf of the accused, and would not permit me to cross-examine any of the witnesses present. He knew I was there for that purpose and he stated distinctly and unequivocally that I could not cross-examine the witnesses or take part in the conduct of the investigations. Perhaps he did say, 'If you like you can whisper to your client,' surely he could not deny me that privilege, and I think I need not thank him very much for his kindness in that respect. I do not think my hon. friend from Cumberland can make a very great hero of him because he allowed me to whisper to my client if I desired to do so.

Let me call the attention of the Minister of Railways to an amendment to the Inquiries Act which was passed last year. Chapter 28 of the Dominion Statutes, 1912, amends the Inquiries Act, Chapter 104 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by adding thereto Sections 11, 12 and 13. Section 12 says that 'the commissioner, whether appointed under Part 1 or Part 2 of said Act, may allow counsel, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made . . . to be represented by counsel.' Section 13 provides that reasonable notice shall be given of the charge . . . alleged against him and he shall have been allowed full opportunity 'to be heard in person or by counsel.'

Commissioner Duchemin, in conducting his investigations, has openly defied the law under which he is supposed to act. The Minister of Railways intimated the other day that instructions had been given to the commissioners as to the manner in which these inquiries should be conducted, and I venture to say that the attention of Commissioner Duchemin, as well as of every other commissioner was called—or should have been called—to the Act under which he must proceed in cases of this kind. Mr. Duchemin, as a lawyer, must have been familiar with the provisions of this Act, although I do not think he can be styled an exceptionally good, impartial, and independent man simply because he is a lawyer. My hon. friend, supporting the contention that Mr. Duchemin was an exceptionally well qualified man, stated that he was a member of the bar; but I know that members of the bar are not all above reproach, and I am sorry that the conduct of Mr. Duchemin is such as I would not expect of any reputable, fair-minded, and conscientious lawyer. Certainly it is not such conduct as I would expect of any judge. Never in my experience have I seen such an instance of cold-blooded partisanship; such a desire to achieve the object which he seemed to have in mind. He seemed to be under the impression that his mission was to get those who came under his jurisdiction out of the way and make a place for others who were looking for the positions. The country owes nothing to Mr. Duchemin, but the Conservative party, perhaps, owe him a great deal, and if the Government are looking for a man who will go to any extremes to carry out their designs in this respect, they can find such a man in Commissioner Duchemin.

I was also present at the investigation at Arisaig, where charges made against the sub-collector of customs and the fishery officers, and others were invesitgated. I went there at the request of these persons, although I knew Commissioner Duchemin would not allow me to take any part in the investigation. I drove 26 or 28 miles to the place at which the investigation was being held, and told Mr. Duchemin I wished to appear for these persons. He very politely and courteously informed me that he did not allow counsel to take any part in the proceedings; that there was no counsel on the other side, and therefore he would not allow counsel to act for the accused. It was on that occasion, and not at Pomquet, that Mr. Duchemin stated: 'If you like you can sit alongside of your clients and suggest any questions you wish them to ask.' At the Pomquet investigation I was merely a spectator, although I took notes of the evidence.

Mr. RHODES: I do not wish to unduly interrupt the hon. gentleman, and I am prepared to do him the justice of believing that he wants to get at the facts. I have a letter here from Mr. Duchemin in reference to this case at Arisaig——

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that a subject for interruption?

Mr. RHODES: Who has the floor?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I have no objection to my hon. friend's asking a question, but I would like him to confine himself to that question, as I do not wish to have my remarks sandwiched with the production of letters at this stage.

Mr. RHODES: I desire to base a question upon the information contained in this letter, but if the hon. gentleman would prefer, as it may be more or less lengthy, I will wait until he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): The hon. member for Cumberland must have felt that the record of Mr. Duchemin was not the best, and that the conduct of his investigations required some defence at his hands. When testimonials from the chairman of the Ways and Maintenance Executive committee in Truro of the kind here in evidence are produced, hon. gentlemen know how much importance to attach to the statements submitted. If his report as to investigations elsewhere are not more correct than his reports respecting the inquiries at Pomquet and Harbour au Bouche, then I do not attach much importance to his statements. I was not personally present at the investigations at Harbour au Bouche, but am convinced from the information I have received that Mr. Duchemin was there not as a judge, but as a prosecutor—or persecutor. My hon. friend, in support of his contention that Mr. Duchemin is a fair minded man, produces a letter purporting to have been written by Father Daniel L. Macdonald of Arisaig. Father Macdonald will hardly thank my hon. friend for dragging his name into a matter of this kind for the purpose of justifying the conduct of Commissioner Duchemin for these investigations at Arisaig. The character of the work the Conservative party tried to accomplish down there, and the meanness of the whole thing is such that Father Daniel Macdonald would not—no, there is not a Tory in Arisaig district who would stand up and justify the things that have taken place and the manner in which the investigations were conducted. I would be very sorry to believe it of him or any clergyman.

Mr. RHODES: You do not deny Father Macdonald's letter?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I am not going to comment on what is in that letter of Father Macdonald's. I leave that as it is; the people down there can judge pretty well how much importance to attach to the defence which my hon. friend tries to make of Commissioner Duchemin by quoting Father Macdonald's letter.

The Bill which we have before us is designed to assist those who have been dismissed. I may say that as far as Antigonish is concerned, there was a veritable slaughter; in the Railway Department the heads were chopped off all over the county.

Mr. RHODES: Nonsense.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I know of no man who was investigated down there except Stewart and one other who was exonerated. I only know of two men who were investigated who did not get the knife. There are seven railway sections in Antigonish county. The first, the eastern section, is Harbour au Bouche. They decapitated two men there. The section foreman and two under men generally constitute the regular staff of a section. They decapitated two out of three of the section staff at Harbour au Bouche. The names are William R. Fougère and Allan Kinney. Then we come to Tracadie, where John Girouard was virtually dismissed. Conditions with regard to work were imposed on him so onerous that he was unable to do his work, and he resigned. He was forced out and to all intents and purposes dismissed.

Mr. COCHRANE: Was it the department that forced any work on him or was it the management?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): It was the management.

Mr. COCHRANE: Are they political?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Yes, it was a part of the scheme. This man happened to get his leg broken the winter before that; he was a little lame, and when he walked a great deal he was badly troubled with rheumatism. As a section foreman he lived in a certain part of the section and was able to attend to the work regularly, but the management required him to walk to the end of the section, a mile and a half to two miles off, before his work in the morning and after his work at night and the additional walking imposed on him, thus after the 21st of September, so effected him that he was obliged to resign. Everybody in that section knows that that was the means adopted to get clear of him, Hubert Myatte an underman on that section was also dismissed. The next section above Tracadie is Afton. There two-thirds of the men were dismissed. They were John Macdonell and J. W. Melanson. The case of Macdonell was investigated in his absence and Melanson's investigation was a farce. At the next section William Landry, Charles Landry and James Armstrong were all dismissed. James Armstrong had been seventeen years or thereabouts in the service. He had now passed the meridian of life; he has a large family with no means of supporting his family except his wages on the section. He served the road faithfully all that time and if he had been allowed to remain on for, I think, eight months longer, a comparatively short time anyway, he would have been enjoying a pension to-day—a pension which ought to be his inasmuch as he contributed the same from his earnings. As it was they cut him off, although he had a large family depending on the pittance he earned, and earned very hard, on the section. William Fougère, at Harbour au Bouche, to whom I referred, is a man with eighteen children, the youngest three years of age, and that man was cut off having no other visible means of support, with absolutely no evidence against him whatever. I have the report of Mr. Duchemin in this case. I have not the evidence. I wrote for it, but did not get it. If the minister will get the evidence in Fougère's case he will find that there was no justification for his dismissal, and in order that Mr. Duchemin might be able to carry out the orders he received from his masters he goes so far as to say that the evidence of the wife of Mr. Fougère should not be believed. He says also that he does not believe the evidence of the sectionman, Fougère, himself. In any place where Mr. Duchemin and Mr. Fougère and his wife are known there will be no difficulty in accepting the word of Mrs. Fougère and her husband before that of Mr. Duchemin. Mr. Fougère has a reputation for truth and honesty in that section that the reflections of Mr. Duchemin cannot sully.

The next section is Antigonish. Mr. Wm. H. Landry was dismissed. Next in order comes Colin Macdonald, of James River, who was dismissed M. Henry Williams an under man there was not investigated. I have not heard what his fate was but I know he is not, nor was he ever, a partisan or a busy-body in politics or anything else. These are sectionmen, and who were put in their places? Is it any wonder that accidents are happening all along the Intercolonial railway, and that the road is considered to be in bad shape and travel dangerous? If that same thing has taken place all along the Intercolonial railway that has occurred in Antigonish, I do not wonder at it at all. They have dismissed two-thirds of the capable and efficient men and put inferior men on sections requiring the very best experienced men obtainable and naturally the result is that the road must suffer and be in a bad state of repair. How do they conform with the rules of the Intercolonial railway in regard to the character of the men they have put on the road? There is a rule that no man who is over 35 years of age may be employed unless he has been previously engaged in some other work on the Intercolonial railway when the age limit is 40. The majority of the men replacing those dismissed in Antigonish are over 40 years of age and inexperienced and they have been put there in violation of the rule and regulation of the Intercolonial railway. How can you expect faithful work, honest efficient work, where all the rules of the road are violated in that way? You can expect nothing but demoralization.

Mr. COCHRANE: How did they get on in 1896?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): That rule did not apply in 1896.

Mr. COCHRANE: They were dismissed.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): These men who replaced the dismissed were not men who were on previous to 1896. There is not one in Antigonish who was on previous to 1896. They are all new men with one or two exceptions.

Mr. COCHRANE: They were dismissed in 1896 wholesale and new men put on. Thus you are condemning the actions of your predecessors.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Not at all. There was no general dismissals after 1896. Let me call attention to the fact that there was no Provident Act in force then.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am speaking now of the efficiency of the road.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Provident Fund Act speaks of the age at which they can come on.

Mr. COCHRANE: He has not given an instance.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Over 75 per cent of those men have been replaced

---

Mr. COCHRANE: I shall afford an opportunity to the hon. gentleman to prove that statement.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I will prove every word to the hilt. I would go over the whole list in this House just now only it would take up too much time. Let me now refer to other dismissals. Two station masters in the county fell by the roadside. Joseph Benoit, one of the most intelligent men in the section, an absolutely respectable man, was selected by the returning officer to act as presiding officer on the occasion of the last two elections. A young man who stayed at his place was seen on election day driving along the road from the polling booth to the station with two other men who took the train to Antigonish. They were presumed to be voters, and no doubt they were. The charge against Joseph Benoit was that this boy who stayed at his house took his team and drove the two men to the poll. That was all the evidence of partisanship. There was no evidence that he attended any meetings or conventions, that he sought to influence a voter directly or indirectly, that he ever asked a man how he was going to vote, or suggested to him how he should vote, or that he should refrain from voting. There was no evidence of partisanship, and yet that man was dismissed. Another station master was dismissed, and the principle cause of his dismissal was that in the community in which he resided, he was supposed to be an active supporter of his brother. That man happened to be guilty of the unpardonable political offence of being a brother of the member for Antigonish county and, therefore, he had to be dismissed, notwithstanding the fact that he had an excellent record as a capable, efficient and obliging public servant.

What is the principle upon which hon. gentlemen are going to act? My hon. friend from Pictou stated that the Minister of Railways had a pretty clean sheet, and he contrasted his conduct with that of the Postmaster General. I am bound to take issue with my hon. friend, because the Postmaster General dismissed employees right and left; he sought not excuses or explanations. He was more manly about it, at any rate. He did not put the country to the expense of a farcical investigation.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Meighen): Order. I think the hon. member must confine himself to dismissals in the Railway Department.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I am directing myself to that, but I wish to make a contrast. I wish to point out to the Minister of Railways how he should in view of the circumstances have acted in these matters. He should have the courage of the Postmaster General and dismiss employees without any cause whatever; anybody that is a Grit must go. That is the principle on which the Postmaster General acts. I believe that the Minister of Railways did not know all the facts in these cases. I am bound to say that I think he was disposed to act honestly in the matter, but he was imposed upon by Commissioner Duchemin. There is no question about that. Mr. Duchemin got and cheerfully took his instructions from the patronage committees in the various counties to which he went. In the county which I have the honour to represent, the patronage has been worked very strangely. The defeated candidate has no control over it at all. He was side-tracked. He was an upright honourable man, of absolute fairness and impartiality, a strong consistent, virile Tory of the Tories, who has been a Tory ever since I can remember, and who has rendered valiant service to the Tory party, for which they do not seem to show much gratitude. Yet he was side-tracked and someone else put in his place, and a committee was formed and this committee suggested to Mr. Duchemin how the investigations should be run. I have moved for the evidence in connection with these cases to which I have referred, and I propose to take up this question of dismissals later on. In the meantime I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that previous to 1896 there was no provident fund. The brotherhoods had practically no standing, in our part of the country at all events, but after 1896, after those dismissals to which my hon. friend (Mr. Rhodes) referred, the men organized and formed a brotherhood, and they got the Railway Department to agree to certain conditions under which the employees of the road should conduct themselves thereafter. Let me point out that previous to 1896, if there were dismissals, there was no rule of the road that required investigation.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is none now.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Under the regulations of the brotherhood no man is supposed to be dismissed unless for some cause. The brotherhood is supposed to protect its members, and how a man votes is not supposed to be a sufficient ground for dismissal. The brotherhood is supposed to protect its members against any high handed or tyrannical dealings.

Mr. LANCASTER: And the brotherhood is making no complaint.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Those men who were dismissed were members of the brotherhood and the brotherhood has been making complaint. The complaint is that they have not been able to reinstate their men. The reason that Mr. Lowe gave in his letter to me for this failure is not a good reason under the existing circumstances. The conditions are entirely different from what they were prior to 1896. These rules and regulations of the brotherhood did not exist until after Mr. Blair's time; it was under him that the regulation was made. The sectionmen who have been dismissed had vested rights; they had been contributing to the fund right along and they should not be deprived of the right to share in that fund without just cause. But what could they do? They were powerless to do anything; there is no court of appeal. How does Mr. Duchemin justify those dismissals? He says the accused men did not go on the stand and prove that they were innocent. Did any one in a British country ever hear of an accused person being required to go on the stand to vindicate his innocence in the first instance? Is it not time enough to require that when a case has been made out against him? If the Minister of Railways will take the trouble to read the evidence taken in the investigations which were conducted by Mr. Duchemin, he will find that in at least fifty per cent. of the cases there is no evidence to justify dismissal. Mr. Duchemin recognizes that himself; the only ground upon which he seeks to justify his recommendations is that the accused had an opportunity to go on the stand and did not take advantage of it. I was surprised to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Rhodes) say that because a man does not go on the witness stand, it must be presumed that he is guilty. That is a doctrine never heard of in a British court of justice, and one which should not be tolerated in any British community.

Mr. G. W. KYTE, (Richmond, N. S.): The manner in which Mr. Duchemin has been conducting investigations in the province of Nova Scotia has come in for criticism this afternoon. I happened to be one of those who attended an investigation in the town of St. Peters, and I will briefly describe what took place. The official, whose conduct was under investigation was not very capable of defending himself or of putting questions to witnesses calculated to bring out the facts. Before the proceedings began I informed Mr. Duchemin that I was there for the purpose of representing the accused.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What case is that?

Mr. KYTE: The case of a man named McLeod.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Where did he live?

Mr. KYTE: At Lewis Cove Road. Mr. Duchemin said: 'I cannot permit you to take any part in this investigation.' I said: 'The Inquiries Act' provides that the accused may appear by counsel.' He replied: 'Hold your tongue.' That was the reply of this eminent jurist who was appointed for the purpose of conducting these judicial enquiries. A little later on I pointed out to him that he was not taking down evidence which was calculated to remove any suspicion of partisanship from the accused. He said: 'If you don't keep quiet, we will have to put you out.' Later on, I ventured to suggest that the accused was not getting fair play, whereupon he turned round to the official who was on trial, and said: 'Look here, if you are responsible for the presence of this man Kyte, it will be all the worse for you,' thus intimating very clearly that whatever chance the accused had of escaping the vengeance of the commissioner it was only by his attorney keeping strictly quiet and not interfering with the proceedings.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I understand that this official was the postmaster and that he had nothing to do with the Department of Railways and Canals whatever.

Mr. KYTE: We are discussing Mr. Duchemin's method of conducting investigations. Now, I will proceed to the case of an official in the Department of Railways and Canals. Mr. Angus McAskill, lock master of St. Peter's canal, was summoned to appear before Mr. Duchemin in April last. I was not present at that enquiry but I know a gentleman who was present and who took down the evidence. Mr. McAskill resides in the house provided by the department for the lockmaster. He has a son who is a medical practitioner in St. Peter's and he has another son, Frank McAskill, who was residing with the father. During the month of May of 1911 Dr. Bissett, with whom Dr. McAskill was practising in partnership, met a person by the name of George Murphy, who told him that his clothes were being held in Sydney on account of his not having money to pay his board. He asked Dr. Bissett if he would be good enough to loan him $4 to release his clothes. Dr. Bissett said that he did not have the money then but that he would get the money for him. Murphy called at Dr. Bissett's office, Dr. Bissett was not there, but Dr. McAskill was present and Murphy repeated to him what Dr. Bissett had told him. Dr. McAskill said: I have not the money in my pocket, but I will give you a note to my brother and he will get it for you. Murphy took the note to McAskill's house, entered the door of the office of the lockmaster, passed the note to Mr. McAskill and the lockmaster called his son and passed the note to him. The son went to his brother's room, brought down an envelope containing $3.50, Mr. McAskill passed it to young Murphy and Murphy went away. These are all the circumstances that were established at the enquiry. Mr. McAskill was asked by Mr. Duchemin as regards his own partisanship in the election and this is the evidence:

Angus McAskill sworn: I was appointed lockmaster October 4, 1910. I was not before in the employ of the Government. I have done no election work since I have been appointed. In the election of 1908 I was presiding officer in the poll at St. Peters, but was not an agent.

Mr. McAskill was not appointed lock master until 1909.

I did not exhibit a copy of the so-called Orange pamphlet in 1908. I never saw a copy of it. I do not know of any of these pamphlets having been used in 1908. I did not try to get George Stone to vote Liberal. He was a bridgeman. I did not ask him to get his son Jonas to vote right. I did not tell him that if he didn't get his son Jonas to vote right he would lose his job as bridgeman.

I didn't canvass George Murphy last local election. My son is a doctor. He had some money in his trunk upstairs in my house, and asked me to give it to George Murphy. I think it would be before last local election. I went to the trunk and got $3 and gave it to Murphy. I gave it to Murphy at the lockhouse. I don't know what it was for. He came to me to the lockhouse with a written order from my son for it. I didn't ask my son why he was giving the $3 to Murphy. I don't know Mrs. Capt. Micheau's son, John McDonald.

Had no transaction with regard to Orange pamphlets with him. I never heard tell of the so-called Orange pamphlets till now. Didn't know they were used in the election of 1908.

(Sgd.) ANGUS McASKILL.

Hearing adjourned till 11.30 a.m. April 10, 1912.

George Murphy was called and he swore as follows:

George Murphy sworn: I know Angus McAskill. I remember getting $3.50 from him last local election.

I may say that Mr. Duchemin elicited the fact that there was a local election in Nova Scotia in June, 1911:

It was his son, Dr. McAskill, gave me a note to go to him and get it. The local election was going on. Dr. Bissett called at our house, and left word there for me to go to Dr. McAskill and get $4. I went to Dr. McAskill and told him that Dr. Bissett had sent me for the money. He then gave me the note to his brother. I went down to the lock and gave the note to Angus McAskill, and he gave me the money. I only went to Dr. McAskill the once. He gave me the order right away.

Then, we have the statement of Fred. McAskill:

Fred. McAskill sworn: I am a doctor practicing at St. Peters. In may last—a few weeks before the local election—George Murphy came to me for treatment, and said that Dr. Bissett had sent him to get $4. I then wrote a note to my brother Frank, authorizing him to give the amount to Murphy. Instead of taking it to Frank, he took it to my father. The money was given to him. Afterwards, Dr. Bissett met me and asked me if I had given the $4 to Murphy. I told him that I had given him $3.50 and Dr. Bissett paid me the money back.

I certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the minutes of evidence taken at the hearing of the case of Angus McAskill, lockmaster at St. Peters, N.S.

(Sgd.) H. P. DUCHEMIN,
Commissioner of Inquiry.

Sydney, N.S., April 23, 1912.

There is the evidence bearing upon this circumstance.

Mr. DAVIDSON: In the case of Mr. McLeod, the postmaster to whom the hon. gentleman referred, was this man dismissed on the recommendation of Mr. Duchemin?

Mr. KYTE: I cannot say if he has been dismissed unless he has been within the last forty-eight hours.

Mr. DAVIDSON: As a matter of fact did not Mr. Duchemin find this man free from partisanship?

Mr. KYTE: I do not know.

Mr. DAVIDSON: It is very important.

Mr. KYTE: It is important for him and it would be as strange indeed as it is important if he has not been dismissed. This is Mr. Duchemin's report upon the McAskill case:

Sydney, N.S., April 23rd, 1912.

Hon. Frank Cochrane, M.P.,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, Canada.

Re Angus McAskill, Lockmaster,
St. Peter's, N.S.

Dear Sir,—On the 9th inst., I conducted an inquiry into the charges against Angus McAskill, lockmaster, at St. Peter's, in the county of Richmond.

George Stone, a bridgeman, in the employ of the Dominion Government, was spoken to by Mr. McAskill last Dominion election, as to the way Stone's son, Jonas, was going to vote. Mr. McAskill said: 'I understood that Jonas is going to vote against us.' That was about the last of August. Witness replied that he supposed Jonas would vote the same side as witness did.

George Murphy, a labourer, received $3.50 in an envelope from Mr. McAskill, just before last local election. He had received a note from Dr. McAskill, a son of the accused, which he took to the father, and the father procured the money, and gave it to him. This was in pursuance of a promise made by Dr. Bissett, one of the Liberal candidates, when he called at Murphy's house to canvass him some days previously.

Mr. McAskill admitted this, but said he did not know why the money was being advanced to Murphy. It was his son's money, and he was simply giving it to him because his son told him.

The son, Dr. McAskill, testified that he gave the money through his father, because Dr. Bissett had requested him to.

I have no doubt this money was paid Murphy to influence his vote in Dr. Bissett's favour, and I do not believe the statement which Mr. McAskill made, that he did not know why this money was being passed over to Murphy in such a mysterious and round-about manner on the very eve of the local election.

I am enclosing you the evidence which was taken in this matter.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) H. P. DUCHEMIN,
Commissioner of Inquiry.

Mr. COCHRANE: Will the hon. gentleman, before he sits down, read the evidence of the two men who were dismissed from the same positions in 1896 and 1897?

Mr. KYTE: There were no two men dismissed in 1896 or 1897. There was one man, the lockmaster, John D. Matheson, who was dismissed upon the evidence given before the commissioner who is now Judge Patterson of New Glasgow. The evidence is in the Railway Department and I shall be glad to discuss it if the hon. gentleman brings it down. There is another significant fact showing Mr. Duchemin's eminent fairness in regard to this investigation. The evidence upon which Mr. McAskill was dismissed was that having relation to the handing of the $3.50 for his son to Murphy. Dr. McAskill and Murphy both swore that a few weeks afterwards Murphy paid back $2.50 of the $3.50 to Dr. McAskill, but Mr. Duchemin suppresses that important piece of evidence in his report to the minister. The only ground upon which Mr. Duchemin attempted to fasten a charge against Mr. McAskill was that the money was paid in this roundabout way for a corrupt purpose, but in the face of the evidence that the money was paid back a few weeks after, his interpretation of the circumstances falls to the ground. I have a statutory declaration from Dr. McAskill on the point. It is as follows:

In the matter of the dismissal of Angus McAskill, lockmaster at the St. Peter's canal, for political partisanship.

I, Fred. G. McAskill, of St. Peters, in the county of Richmond, province of Nova Scotia, do solemnly declare that I was examined as a witness at the investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, commissioner, into the charges of political partisanship alleged against Angus McAskill, lockmaster at the St. Peter's canal, at St. Peters aforesaid, on the (?) day of April, 1912. That I stated under oath as part of my evidence that two dollars and fifty cents of the three dollars and fifty cents given to George Murphy on my order to Frank McAskill about the last of May, 1911, was paid back to me by the said George Murphy in September, 1911. That George Murphy who was also examined as a witness at the same inquiry also testified that he paid me the two dollars and fifty cents on account of the three dollars and fifty cents advanced to him by me and that he made such payment in the month of September, 1911. And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and of the same force and effect as if taken under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Taken and declared before me at St. Peters, in the county and province aforesaid, this 16th day of November, 1912.

ANGUS J. MACCUISH,
Commissioner of the Superior and County Courts in and for the County of Richmond.

F. G. McASKILL.

I saw Mr. Duchemin some time afterwards at St. Peters, and I pointed out to him that his report in the McAskill case was unfair, inasmuch as he had suppressed certain statements which would have thrown a very different light upon the circumstances to which he attached such considerable importance. Mr. Duchemin admitted to me that he did not report that portion of evidence to the minister, but he said: 'Dr. McAskill read over the evidence himself after it was taken down, and, as he did not call my attention to it or desire to have it written down, I thought he did not consider it important.' Now, you see the subterfuge to which Mr. Duchemin resorts. Mr. McAskill was not a lawyer, and knowing nothing about the value of testimony or the importance of having the whole of his testimony reported, signed the evidence, being glad to get away from this investigation, and as he did not ask to have this statement reported in the evidence, probably forgetting that the evidence was given, Mr. Duchemin thinks he is justified in having suppressed it, and having given a report to the minister which is not borne out by all the facts which were produced before him. I could give other instances to show Mr. Duchemin's partisanship, and his absolute unfitness to hold investigations of this nature.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, no.

Mr. KYTE: But inasmuch as they have reference to dismissals of officials in other departments of the Government, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee, because I know I would be called to order. I have upon the Order Paper motions to the number of forty having reference to dismissals of officials in the county of Richmond, and I beg to assure the hon. minister, and other hon. ministers here that they will have ample opportunity for discussing Mr. Duchemin's conduct in regard to those investigations.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

PATENT OF GEORGE FREDERICK BISHOPRIC.

Mr. STANFIELD moved second reading of Bill (No. 8), respecting a patent of George Frederick Bishopric —Mr Macdonell.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not wish to oppose the second reading of this Bill, but, if the hon. gentleman who moved it could give information as to the object of the measure, it would be better. If he is not in a position to explain at this time, I will waive any objection now, of course with the understanding that the information will be given in the committee stage. This matter of patents was discussed a great many times last year. Many Bills have been put through this House renewing patents contrary to the law, which patents ought not to be renewed. In fact, as I recollect it, so strongly was this brought out last year that some of these Bills were refused. It does seem to me that a man has no right to come to Parliament and get a patent renewed which has been allowed to lapse through his own carlessness, and in a great many cases that is why they come here with these Bills. However, in the absence of the hon. member in whose name the Bill stands, I will not oppose it.

Mr. STANFIELD: I cannot give the explanation.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not oppose the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

DOMINION TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. STANFIELD moved second reading of Bill (No. 10), respecting the Dominion Trust Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): There are features of this Bill which will have to receive careful consideration, and, possibly, modification. But I think it proper to give it a second reading, and send it to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

NEW ORLEANS AND GRAND ISLE TRACTION, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY.

Mr. STANFIELD moved second reading of Bill (No. 11) respecting New Orleans and Grand Isle Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited, and to change its name to New Orleans and Grand Isle Railway, Light and Power Company, Limited—Mr. Macdonell.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In connection with this Bill, I would like to say what I said last session regarding another Bill. No company incorporated under the Companies' Act should be allowed to come to this Parliament and ask that its name be changed by Act of Parliament. I submit, they could go to the proper department here and, on petition, obtain the change in the name of the company that they desire. I do not think it is fair to encumber our statute book with legislation of this kind, nor do I think it fair that the time of Parliament should be taken up with such legislation. I intend to vote against this Bill.

Mr. STANFIELD: How would it do to let it stand until the minister is here?

Bill allowed to stand.

CANADIAN EXPLOSIVES LIMITED.

Mr. STANFIELD moved second reading of Bill (No. 9) respecting Canadian Explosives Limited.—Mr. Ames.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think this also is a case which should not receive much consideration from Parliament. If companies desire power to issue share warrants, an amendment should be made to our general statutes, so that Parliament should not be constantly receiving for consideration Bills of this character that take up our time and that should not be found in our statute books.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION CO.

Mr. STANFIELD moved second reading of Bill No. 20, respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—Mr. L'Esperance.

Mr. CARVELL: Before that goes through I would like to have some explanation as to the meaning of section 2 of this Bill. Section 1 provides for an increase in capital stock up to $15,000,000, and I presume there are good reasons why this legislation should be granted. Section 2 provides that the company may invest and deal with moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may seem expedient. This seems to be a very broad provision. They might have the money raised by the sale of bonds or stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company and use it for something entirely aside from the objects for which the company exists. I think the promoter should give some reason for this section of the proposed Bill.

Bill allowed to stand.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 7, respecting the Athabaska Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Turriff.

Bill No. 12, to incorporate the Great West Fire Insurance Company. — Mr. McKay.

Bill No. 16, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company. — Mr. McKay.

Bill No. 17, to incorporate the Northern Empire Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Knowles.

Bill No. 18, respecting the Ontario-Michigan Railway Company.—Mr. Pardee.

Bill No. 19, respecting the Ottawa Terminals Railway Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 13, to incorporate the General Loan Company of Canada.—Mr. Knowles.

Bill No. 14, respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Currie.

Bill No. 15, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Currie.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS PROVIDENT FUND.

House in Committee on proposed resolution respecting the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees' Provident Fund Act.

Mr. STANFIELD: I did not intend to take part in this discussion, but the name of Mr. George R. Murray, of Truro, was referred to this afternoon in a manner not at all complimentary to him. Mr. Murray has been a citizen of Truro for a great many years, and I can assure hon. gentlemen we all think well of him. To my knowledge he has not been a partisan in any manner. I presume he voted for me, because he was an old Conservative—although I have never asked him how he voted—but I think it is unfair for hon. gentleman to make remarks about a man of his calibre. I am sure the citizens of Truro will all deeply resent the remarks made concerning Mr. Murray.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I had not intended to again take part in this debate, but the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) made a personal reference to me which I think demands my attention for a few moments. I think it would not be interesting to the House to compare the record of the hon. member for Cumberland with my own respecting the dismissal of officials, but if at any time he desires to discuss this matter from a personal standpoint, I will be prepared to meet him. The statement he made was that under the late Government the Nova Scotia Liberal members had inaugurated a reign of terror in regard to officials. By that I understand him to mean that the Liberal members were forcing officials to support them, and compelling them to do things in regard to elections which they should not do. As far as I am concerned, I take issue with my hon, friend, and I think I speak not only for myself but for my colleagues when I say that such was not the case. For my part I never encouraged officials to take an active part in elections. We all know that sometimes officials are indiscreet, and we are also aware that in the outside service there are a great many men who occupy comparatively unimportant positions, receiving perhaps fifty or one hundred dollars a year for their services. It could hardly be expected that men in such positions should refrain altogether from politics, or entirely avoid the activities of public life because they happened to hold an office of that kind. There have been occasions on which men have acted as agents for the candidates, and it would have been better had they not done so, but I think we ought to draw a distinction between officers who are getting a living wage from the Government and such officials as postmasters and small fishery officers, who get only a few dollars for their services and are not really in the employ of the Government except on intermittent occasions.

In my hon. friend's reference to myself, he did not mention the name of any official, but I easily recognized the subject of his allusion, because, as far as I remember, it was the only one case in which I did travel in the same carriage with an official during that election. It happened in this way. I was in the town of Guysboro—it is not a very large town—and it became necessary for me to go some four or five miles on a rainy morning to an adjoining district. There were no horses in the livery stables, and it was suggested that this official had a horse and wagon, and might take me to this place. A boy was sent for him, and he very kindly agreed to go. I understood it to be a business transaction, and as he was an official receiving only a small salary I thought it better that it should be a business transaction, so I paid him a couple of dollars for driving me four or five miles on a rainy morning. That is the whole story. The other statement made by him was that in my presence this official canvassed a man and promised him work if he would vote for the Liberal party. I am not aware that anything like that happened. I am quite certain I never heard the official promise him work if he would vote for the Liberal party. It is quite true that the official did drive me a short distance for which he received $2, and on this slight incident, which is the only one mentioned by my hon. friend, he bases the serious charge that we inaugurated a reign of terror in Nova Scotia and compelled officials to do things in elections that they should not do.

Mr. RHODES: Oh, no, that is only one case in a thousand.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think my hon. friend will find it difficult to get many cases. I am not disposed to shield an official who really does go wrong, but the principle was laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1896 that we should not be too severe on officials of that class who are not paid a living wage by the Government and I wish to refer them back to their speeches of that day and to ask them now, if they were honest then to put those principles into practice. My hon. friend from East Simcoe in the debate of 1896 used the following language :

> There is a principle at stake in this matter and it is this, first to be just, even generous to all; and in the next place, if you have the advantage, if you have the power, use that power in a merciful manner.

I submit that the cases that have been referred to to-day do not conform to that rule. The hon. member for Cumberland said that in 1896 men were dismissed without investigation.

Mr. RHODES: Hear, hear.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am not aware of that but I will take my hon. friend's word for it and I will say it would be much more honourable and manly to dismiss officials without investigation than under a sham investigation like those conducted by Mr. Duchemin. If the Administration takes the ground that they will adopt the spoils system and displace the appointees of the former Government and put their friends in their places I can understand that but when they set up a court and employ a a man under an Act of Parliament to do justice to all sides and send him into the country and have him behave like this gentleman who is now conducting all these investigations, I say it is not creditable to the Administration.

The hon. member for Cumberland has undertaken to champion and defend all that has been done by Mr. Duchemin. He will have a busy time of it during the present session if he is going to defend everything that Mr. Duchemin did in Nova Scotia during the last year. I have in my desk a large number of statements and affidavits relating to the conduct of that gentleman, but as they do not refer to the Railway Department I shall not produce them to-night. Take, for example the case of Alexander McInnis, car inspector at Mulgrave, who was dismissed after a sham investigation by Mr. Duchemin. Here is Mr. McInnis' own statement:

Dismissal of a Car Inspector a Disgraceful Job.

Mr. Editor,—About two months ago the Government commissioner, Mr. Duchemin, investigated charges of partisanship which had been preferred against me. The witnesses were two, Tousant Bisbong, a noted political character in Mulgrave, who spent his days and nights during the last twelve months going about making himself a nuisance with his prate about the Government and Mr. Sinclair. The other was Allan McAskill, an elector of the county of Antigonish. Bisbong swore that I canvassed him, but his statement seemed so ridiculous to the commissioner that he was not shamefaced enough to regard it of consequence.

McAskill was examined in my presence and swore positively that I never tried to influence his vote in any way. This would be apparent to any person knowing me, particularly when he votes in another county and in which I was not directly interested. I was then told to retire and McAskill was subjected to further examination. He said again that I had never canvassed him. He was then asked if I had spoken to him in regard to the evidence he was going to give. He truthfully answered in the affirmative. He was then made to say that I had told him what to say and to 'say so over and over again.' On the strength of these words the Minister of Railways has dismissed me from the position of car inspector which I held for twelve years, always on night duty. I worked many a night in winter on my knees in snow and slush until to-day I am crippled with rheumatism. I stuck to my post always and there never was an accident of even the most trifling nature befell a train or car which I had made ready for the road, or which was due to neglect on my part. This was expressed to me by my foreman John Dunbar, Esq., yesterday when he brought the notice of my dismissal. Said he 'there never was an accident through any oversight of yours since you have been in the service.'

I stayed by my work hoping some day that I might be permitted to enjoy in my old age the miserable pittance to which I would be entitled under the Railway Pension Act, but this must be denied me by Mr. Cochrane because a low-minded mean fellow wanted my job.

Poor Allan McAskill was told by me to tell the truth and to stick to it. That was all. He bought a property from me and it was surmised that I must have tried to influence him. When men are placed at the mercy of the characters who engineered the investigation against me and others in Mulgrave and elsewhere and are then placed on trial before a man who assumes the position of judge and counsel for the prosecution, and no counsel for the defence allowed to be present, in a country which is under the British flag, one must be pardoned for saying that there is no other country under any flag which flies in the light of God's bright sun, in which such an outrage against humanity can be perpetrated.

British institutions may be all right when conducted by right minded agents, but what a farce they become when manipulated by the Tory combination at present ruling at Ottawa. Can such things be done in Russia? Assuredly no!

Yours truly,
ALEX. McINNIS,
Late Car Inspector.

Mulgrave, N.S., May 16, 1912.

It appears that the principal charge against him is in connection with his dealings with McAskill. When McInnis informed me what had taken place between himself and McAskill I asked him to put it in the shape of an affidavit and he sent me this affidavit:

Canada,
Province of Nova Scotia,
County of Guysborough, N.S.

I, the undersigned Alexander McInnis, car inspector, solemnly declare that I did not attempt to influence the vote of any person during or previous to the Dominion election in September last, and particularly do I solemnly declare that I did not attempt to influence Allan McAskill, in the interest of any candidate, to vote or not to vote in the county of Antigonish or any other county in the province of Nova Scotia.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and knowing it to be of the same force and effect as if made unded oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me at Mulgrave, in the county of Guysborough, this 29th day of February, A.D. 1912.

(Sgd.) WM. S. WYLDE, J.P.,
In and for the county of Guysborough.
(Sgd.) ALEX. McINNIS.

That affidavit is in the possession of the Minister of Railways and I understand he had it before him when his decision was given in regard to this case. McInnis says further that, after he left the room this witness was further examined, McAskill was recalled and examined by Mr. Duchemin, and that the commissioner tried to extract a statement from the witness against him but failed to do so. These facts were all before the minister at the time he gave his decision in this case, and it strikes me that the decision was a very severe one. Indeed, as far as I can learn, these are all the charges made against this man McInnis.

Another man was dismissed at Mulgrave, Alexander Wilkinson. There was nothing proved at all against Wilkinson in connection with the recent election. It was necessary to go back to a local election some years ago in order to find any charge against him. I would like to have some pronouncement from the Minister of Railways as to how far back he authorizes his investigations to go. Is a man's whole lifetime to be reviewed in one of those examinations, or what is the limit? Is there any time when an accusation like this goes out of date? I am told that in the post office investigations, and also in the Marine and Fisheries investigations, there was practically no limit, that they went back as far as they chose to go, and that in some cases they struck acts committed under a former administration fifteen, sixteen and seventeen years ago. But of course as they were committed in favour of the Conservative party, these acts were not considered to be a violation of the regulation which requires a man not to interfere with politics

As the Prime Minister is here, I may say there was some disappointment felt in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, because he did not take a firmer stand in regard to these matters, and that he did not, at all events, see that these investigations, carried on under his administration, were fair and judicial investigations. The statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Rhodes) that they were not fair after 1896 is not in accordance with my recollection. The investigations in eastern Nova Scotia after 1896 were under the management of Captain Douglas, an official of the Admiralty, a retired captain of the navy, I understand, who was accustomed to conducting investigations, and who carried them out very fairly I am told, hearing both sides, and giving a judicial verdict. That was the way in which the investigations were carried on after 1896 in Nova Scotia. I do not believe any fair minded man would complain of any investigation or of any decision given by the late Captain Douglas. He was a man incapable of doing any of those things that are now charged in connection with recent investigations; it was quite in order for the official who was charged to cross-examine witnesses if he wished to do so. Why should a man be refused the right to be represented by counsel in a trifling matter of this kind where a man is charged with having canvassed for a vote? Why, if a man is charged with murder in our courts, he is allowed to be represented by counsel. The worst crime that a man can commit in this country does not deprive him of the right to counsel, but it appears that under this administration, not only in Manitoba, but in Nova Scotia, a man cannot have the right to be represented by counsel in a trifling charge of this kind. Why should he not be allowed to cross-examine? Will any gentleman on the other side of the House defend the laying down of a rule that an accused official shall not be represented by counsel, or justifying the ruling, refusing the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) the right to ask questions of the witnesses. It is impossible to have a fair trial under circumstances of that kind, and I am surprised that my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) does not interfere, and see that these things are changed, and that a fair trial is granted. When my right hon. friend was in opposition he laid down some very broad and liberal principles in regard to this matter, principles which are perhaps more liberal than would be agreed to by most of the hon. gentlemen present. Let me quote from the speech my right hon. friend made after the elections of 1896 when this same question was under discussion. I am quoting from Vol. 2 of 'Hansard,' for 1896, page 388. This is part of what he said:

> It seems to me that the fact of the payment of public money to public officers for their services ought not to enter very largely into the question as to how far these gentlemen should participate in election contests. It is not the money of the Liberal party or of the Conservative party which is paid these gentlemen for their services. It is the money of the country and the fact that these gentlemen worked for either party so long as they worked openly, honourably and fairly ought not to weigh against them, if at the same time they do not neglect their duty as public officers. It seems to me that those gentleman who are in the civil service of this country ought to have the same right as other electors not only to vote, but to work during elections subject to certain limitations.

These are perhaps more advanced ideas than most of us will agree to, but at the same time I did hope, and I think the people of this country hoped that my right hon. friend would take a step forward in this important matter, and they are disappointed that he did not do so. I know that his own constituents brought a great deal of pressure to bear to have officials of the late government dismissed and his own political friends put in their places. There was so much pressure that his own organ The Halifax Herald came out very strongly in the matter. Here is what the Herald said:

> Mr. Borden should, moreover, lose no time in introducing such reforms into the civil service as will put a prompt and complete end to the scandal of the hungry horde of party heelers, who apparently think the sole business of the Government is to provide them with an opportunity to feed at the public trough—a humiliating example of which is furnished in Halifax to-day. This horde of political dervishes seems under the impression that it is the sole business of the Government to drive away the present occupants of the public trough to make room for themselves, without regard to consequences.

Now, that is pretty strong language, but the case was so serious in the city of Halifax, that the principal organ of the Government in that city found it necessary to use such strong language in denouncing the conduct of the heelers who were persecuting and chasing those poor men who voted at the last election for the Liberal party. I suppose that if these principles which my right hon. friend laid down after 1896 were good then, they are good now. Principles do not change, but governments do, and we expected that these principles would, to some extent be adhered to. Apart from that altogether, however, I think we have a right to claim that a fair trial will be given. That is the natural and ordinary right of a British subject, and il there is going to be a trial at all, it ought to be a decent and fair trial. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) professed to defend Mr. Duchemin, but he has not told us that he is in favour of conducting a trial without counsel, or by forbidding cross-examination, and, I was going to say, by examining witnesses in absence of the accused. I have not proven that.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: But I am going to prove it when we reach the Marine and Fisheries cases. There has been ample proof in the two cases referred to by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte), whose word, I presume my hon. friend (Mr. Rhodes) does not doubt, that he was refused the right to cross-examine a witness, and even to appear for a defendant in the county he has the honour to represent. That, I understand has been the regular course of this gentleman, Mr. Duchemin, throughout the investigations he has conducted in eastern Nova Scotia, and I submit to the committee that Mr. Duchemin's conduct ought to be investigated, because, it appears, he violated the instructions he got. The minister never told him not to have counsel; he undertook of his own accord to lay down that rule, and he had no right to do so. But the minister will not say that he gave him instructions not to have counsel. He has not said so, and I am quite sure the minister has not done it. He did not tell him not to allow cross-examination of witnesses. Why, then, did Mr. Duchemin, acting under a statute which required him to be fair and just, undertake to deny these common rights of a British subject to these men when they were being investigated? Will the hon. member for Cumberland defend that? Why did Mr. Duchemin break the regulations that he got? He certainly had no instructions to do these things, he did them because he was anxious to find a verdict of guilty against the men whom he was investigating and I think he succeeded in most of the cases he conducted in my county.

Mr. RHODES: Just one word, because I do not desire it to be imagined that I am going to allow these statements of the hon. member for Guysborough to go as a matter of course. Undoubtedly this question will arise at a later stage in the session, when the estimates are under discussion, and I will reserve the right at that time to discuss them more fully.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, there seem to be two classes of electors in the country, and these two classes of people have been discussed here to-day. One is the class that does what it actually thinks is best for the country and believes that government is a serious matter carried on in the best interests of the people so far as the party in power, whichever it may be, sees that interest. There is another class, and I regret to see how for it has grown in Canada, that appears to think government is carried on solely for what there is in it for the hangers-on. This latter class is the class that is worrying to men in office and it is worrying because those who compose it consider that the head of a department or the member of parliament who cannot hand over some loaves and fishes to them has lost his vocation. The only interest they appear to have in public life is what reward they are going to get out of the result. It requires some backbone to refuse the overtures of this latter class, but the time has come in Canada when—I say it seriously—both parties ought to do their utmost to discredit the growth of that kind of sentiment. Government is a serious thing and it ought to be carried on in the best interest of the greatest number. After all, this kind of thing can be suppressed if men will stand up against it, although it requires a good deal of courage.

In so far as the affairs of the Intercolonial railway are concerned, particularly this provident fund board, I might point out that the men are represented on this board and that no decision can be come to as to the payment of a claim except through this board. The minister can, in exceptional circumstances, override the board, but generally they sail very close to the statute and the men, being represented on the board, have a voice in every decision rendered for or against any claim in connection with the provident fund. There has been a change in the management of the railways. Years ago there was not this Provident Fund Act, and no definite rule existed, such as would be laid down by statute, at least, to govern the appointment or dismissal of men. The road was not under the brotherhoods in the various departments as it is now. But that change has brought about an altered condition—an altered condition between the department and the employees to a large extent and an altered condition between the men who ask for appointments and those who appoint them. Under the regulations of the Provident Fund Act, no man can be permanently appointed to the Intercolonial railway at present who is over thirty-five years of age, unless he be an expert or has had previous experience in the work to which he is to be appointed. By many it is thought severe, but when you come to consider the relations between the provident fund and the men who are paying into that provident fund you can see that it has to be conducted on some basis approximating an insurance standard. If men, fifty, sixty or seventy years old were employed on the road they would fast become a burden on those who are younger. That condition has changed during the past few years and, while ten or fifteen years ago, men of any age could be permanently employed, and no doubt were, at the present time they cannot be owing to the Provident Fund Act.

Then, take another point in connection with that, if my hon. friend will allow me. It becomes a more serious matter at the present time to dismiss a man and deprive him of the rights which he had in that board than it was previously before he became insured, in the provident fund in which he has a vested right unless he conducts some overt act, which Act is described, I think, very fairly in the statute.

Mr. COCHRANE: Was there not a Civil Service fund?

Mr. GRAHAM: It was not the same thing and not upon the same basis.

Mr. COCHRANE: They paid into it.

Mr. GRAHAM: They did but not under the same conditions. Civil Service rules cannot be satisfactorily applied to a railway. But this law was brought about, the men were given a voice in the management of the fund, in the questions as to how the money shall be collected and how much each shall have to pay and it is a more serious matter than ever before to dismiss any of these men. The brotherhoods, having secured a foothold all over the line, and justly so, they have a large voice in saying who shall and who shall not be dismissed, who shall and shall not be promoted and the time at which promotion comes. I think that my hon. friend will find that under the agreement with these men—not by act of grace, but under that agreement with these brotherhoods—he cannot dismiss a man without investigation, particularly if investigation is asked for. It is different altogether from the situation which existed before the brotherhoods were dealt with instead of individuals. I have been criticised in this House by my own friends as well as by hon. gentlemen opposite for allowing the Intercolonial railway, when I had charge, to be placed under the regulation of various brotherhoods. I have yet to see that the Government, or Parliament, was wrong in allowing that to be done. The railway business has been invaded by the Dominion Government. When the Government, or a municipality, undertakes the operation of a public utility, to my mind, it has to approximate at least the conditions and the regulations which govern a like undertaking under private control. So soon as the Intercolonial railway was placed upon practically a company footing, and even before, I believe, it was perfectly proper for its employees to bind themselves together in various brotherhoods and to work in harmony with the brotherhoods in similar employment on private undertakings. They have the same duties to perform, the same examinations to pass, and practically the same regulations to conform with.

That brings me to another point, and I know a number of my hon. friends will disagree with me on this. I said it, when I was to the right of the Speaker, and some people were uncharitable enough to say that I had an ulterior motive. I am going to repeat it now that I am on the left side of the Speaker. In our treatment of the men on our railways, we indulge in language of a peculiar character if put side by side with genuine sincerity Men employed on the Grand Trunk railway can be candidates for public office in the town in which they live; they can be very useful members of school boards or municipal councils, and nearly always these men are active politicians both in provincial and federal matters. Every man in a railway town knows that. Seeing that we have embarked in the railway business, should we go the length in this House of placing the men who happen to be employed on our railway on a different footing in regard to citizenship from the position they would be placed in were they working for the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway or some other private railway company? I adhere strongly to the view that they should not be allowed to be offensive partisans, and a company would not permit them to be so, if they knew of it; but a man can be an active partisan in his own locality without being offensive to his neighbours, even if they disagree with him, and I think we ought to be broader in our views. An employee of a railway, whether it is a government or a private concern, is far different from an employee of the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department is not a commercial enterprise. It is an enterprise solely for the Dominion Government, and there is no competition with the Post Office Department. So with the Customs Department or the Agricultural Department. Here, however, we find running through the province of Quebec and through the maritime provinces two or three or four systems of railways. A man in the city of St. John, who is on the Canadian Pacific railway, can take an active part in elections and enjoy the full responsibilities and privileges of a citizen, but if he happens to be working on the Intercolonial railway in exactly the same position, if he were to take an active part on either side of politics, somebody would lay a charge against him the next day, invariably some person who wants his job. I think I can say very frankly on this side of the House, as I said when I was on the other side, that we ought to take a broader view in regard to employees of our railway, and they ought to be allowed more latitude than is permitted to employees of departments that are not industrial departments at all. I think some regulations were passed a few years ago preventing men from taking part in municipal elections. In some parts of the province, municipal elections are as bitter as Dominion elections, and they run on party lines, but I have had in my time the most urgent applications and petitions from citizens in some parts of the eastern provinces, asking me to allow a certain gentleman to run as a member of their council, saying that he was the man best fitted in that community, and in some cases they wanted to elect him by acclamation. I admit now, that, notwithstanding any regulation, I shut my eyes and let him go, because I believed it was in the interest of the community, and the fact that he worked on a government railway did not detract from his ability as a citizen. I just want to point out as my view now, as the view I have always taken when on the other side of the House, that the strict rule should not be applied to men working on the Government railway that be applied to other departments of the Government.

The question has arisen as to these investigations and the refusal to allow counsel to appear. The principle is not different, but the legalizing of the investigation would depend under what Act this investigation was ordered, and this commissioner given his authority. If it was under the Inquiries Act he certainly acted illegally in refusing counsel, for the amendment to that Act says that a man accused must be allowed counsel if he so desires. It just depends whether the investigation was merely a departmental inquiry, or whether it was under the Inquiries Act, but I take this view, although perhaps it is broader than is usually taken, that where a man is accused and a commissioner appointed to investigate, he ought to be allowed counsel. If an official of the Intercolonial railway or an official of any other department went solely for the purpose of conducting an investigation to let the department know if there was anything really seriously wrong, I can see a reason why no counsel should be allowed, because an officer of the department went there merely to perform his duty, to find out for himself what the situation was, and nine times out of ten he can get a fairly good idea without a public investigation. Where a commissioner is appointed, however, I think it is fair to all parties, and only justice, that counsel should be allowed where so desired. This Bill I think is in the right direction, although I am sorry it has to be passed on account of the dismissals. It would have been far better if the dismissals had not taken place and the men could remain in their employment and the fund had not been the loser by these men's contributions. My hon. friend, from Cumberland seems to have overlooked in his argument this afternoon that in cutting these men off, they are also cutting off their annual contributions, but so far as the Bill is concerned, now that the men are dismissed, I think that the least that can be done is to have the money that they paid into the provident fund returned to them.

Mr. COCHRANE: I simply want to state that I take the ground absolutely that these men offended against the Civil Service Act, and not against the railway, and it was only from a desire on my part that the men should get an absolutely fair trial that I took the ground that we would investigate in each case, and I am glad to say that I have satisfied the men, or at least those who are looking after the men, if I have not satisfied the members of the Opposition. It has been stated that we are taking men on our permanent staff who are over thirty-five years of age. I am sure that this is not true, because a protest was received from the men themselves against anything of that kind, and that protest was acted upon. Some men have been taken on temporarily who are over thirty-five, some of those who were dismissed in 1896 without an investigation of any kind, and I want to say that there was a fund which the men paid into before 1896, and some of those who were dismissed were paid back, just as this Bill provides for, and some were not. My endeavour has been to use the men in a fair and equitable manner irrespective of politics or anything else, and as regards promotion, I have carried out exactly what the ex-Minister of Railways says that he did, to promote in the service, and the best man too. A railway cannot be run in any other way. It cannot be efficient unless the system of promotion takes place out of the ranks, and the best man too, irrespective of politics or anything else. I did not know that these discussions with regard to the different officials was to come up here to-day, or I might have been better prepared with the information in each case. Of course, it is impossible for a man to carry all these facts in his head. But I am satisfied that fair-play has been extended to each and every one of these officials; and the letters read by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) from Mr. Murray are evidence of that fact. I did not seek this letter and knew nothing about it until it came to my office yesterday or the day before. And Mr. Lowe's letter also. And the conversations I have had bear it out. There have been cases on which we did not agree, but in conversation between Mr. Murray and myself and others we have arranged, and have satisfied one another that justice has been done.

Resolutions reported, read the first and the second time and agreed to.

Mr. COCHRANE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 25), to amend the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees Provident Fund Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REGULATION OF RADIOTELEGRAPHY.

On motion of Mr. Hazen, House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution—(Mr. Meighen in the Chair).

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the compulsory installation and inspection of radiotelegraph apparatus on certain ships, and for the general regulation of radiotelegraphy.
