FISHERIES

EFFECT OF ICE CONDITIONS ON LOBSTER FISHERY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgency. Extreme ice conditions in many lobster fishing districts in the Atlantic region have already meant a delay in executing this fishery. The persistence of this condition will result in shortening the season to the point of loss of livelihood to many hundreds of fishermen who are dependent on this fishery. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Fisheries give immediate consideration to extending the lobster season in those areas affected.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion therefore cannot be put to the House.

BRUCELLOSIS IN NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

That incidence, control, and compensation in so far as brucellosis is concerned under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act be referred for immediate study to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

AIR CANADA BUDGET

Question No. 276—Mr. Rowland:

1. It is the intention of Air Canada to reduce the budget of its finance department by a figure of $180,000 over the next few months?

2. Is this budget reduction to be accomplished by reductions in the department's Winnipeg staff?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Air Canada management advises as follows: 1 and 2. The Budget procedures are a matter of internal management, but it can be said that expense targets are set for all departments to ensure proper control of administrative costs. With reference to the Winnipeg Accounting Department, the company does not contemplate any reductions in permanent staff.

BIOAVAILABILITY STANDARD FOR DRUGS

Question No. 728—Mr. Rynard:

1. Has the Food and Drug Directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare established a bio-availability standard for all drugs prescribed by physicians across Canada and, if so, is this bio-availability standard mandatory to all prescribed drugs?

2. What percentage, if any, does this bio-availability standard require and does this standard percentage apply to all drugs?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Health Protection Branch has established a guideline for the bioavailability of drug products which it assesses in its current programs on drug quality. Bioavailability tests are not at present mandatory, although there is provision in the Food and Drugs Act and Regulations to demand proof of efficacy. The whole field of bioavailability is very much in the development stage, with the clinical significance of bioavailability data still not fully understood. In order to put this problem in proper perspective, we have commissioned an advisory committee of non-governmental medical experts to consider all aspects of it, and report within the next few months.

2. The guideline specifies a minimum bioavailability of 80 per cent for the product, relative to a reference standard. It has been applied to drugs chosen for reason of critical medical use, high sales volume, narrow therapeutic index, possibility of contaminants, and unknown problems with bioavailability.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—DISENTITLEMENT OF BENEFITS

Question No. 763—Mr. Paproski:

1. In the week of January 8 to 15, 1973, how many persons were cut off Unemployment Insurance benefits in (a) Montreal (b) Toronto (c) Edmonton (d) Vancouver (e) all of Canada?

2. In the case of those who were receiving benefits and whose entitlement was cut off prior to the benefit period being exhausted, what was the reason given for this action?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. During the week of January 8 to January 15, 1973 the following number of persons were cut off Unemployment Insurance benefits either because their claims exhausted or they were denied benefits for various limited periods. Number of Claimants: (a) Montreal 3,069;

(b) Toronto 3,766; (c) Edmonton 1,188; (d) Vancouver 1,537; (e) Canada *24,777.

*The national figures are available only on a monthly basis. The figures for the week requested have therefore been estimated.

2. In the case of those who were receiving benefits and whose benefit had not exhausted, the reasons for this are as follows: (a) Refusal of an offer of employment; (b) failure to remain available for employment; (c) failure to attend a CMC course of instruction; (d) failure to attend an employment interview.

CMHC—EMPLOYMENT OF MARRIED COUPLES

Question No. 769—Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway):

1. Does the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation now employ any husband or any wife of another person in the employ of the Corporation and, if so, how many?

2. Does CMHC have a written policy in regard to the employment of persons thus related by marriage and, if so, what is the reason for such a policy?

3. How many wives have been refused employment because of such a policy since June 1968?

4. How many husbands have been refused employment because of such a policy since June 1968?

5. Is this policy now under review?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation currently employs five married couples. Three of these couples were employees of CMHC before their marriage, and one couple was hired as a janitor team in a rental project. In the case of the fifth couple, the wife was hired on a short term contract, in a position previously occupied by her, while the present incumbent of the position is on maternity leave.

2. CMHC does not have a written policy governing the employment of married couples. It has been the long standing practice of the Corporation to discourage the hiring of all relatives of employees, and this applies to the hiring of a spouse of an employee. In administering this policy, cases do arise where personnel on staff marry one another. In these few cases that have arisen the Corporation has generally adopted a policy of continuing to employ both persons on the understanding that they will not be working within the same department in an office.

3 and 4. CMHC does not have a record of the number of husbands/wives who have been refused employment since June, 1968.

5. The personnel policies of CMHC are always under review.

PROJECT SAMSON

Question No. 1,044—Mr. Rowland:

1. What percentage of the $52,000,000 cost of Project SAMSON will be spent in Canada?

2. By province, how will this expenditure be distributed?

3. Do specifications for the tenders include formal regional distribution requirements?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Contracts for Project SAMSON will be awarded as a result of competitions among qualified Canadian companies. Until such time as these competitions are held and contracts are awarded, it is not possible to establish what percentage of the cost of Project SAMSON will be spent in Canada. It is known, however, that the potential exists for a high level of Canadian industrial involvement. This will be brought about either directly for goods and services used in SAMSON, or through offset production arrangements outside the project.

2. Similarly, distribution of expenditure by province cannot be established until the contracts are awarded. The three main switching centers will be located in Nova Scotia, Ontario and Alberta. SAMSON terminal locations are distributed across the country and a significant effort will be expended in each province for construction, installation and test, power and air conditioning.

3. The invitation to tender will request bidders to indicate the regional distribution of their Canadian content.

2. Have other occupation forms been similarly coded and, if not, for what reason have farmers been singled out?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): In so far as the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, is concerned: 1. Yes. This action on behalf of Statistics Canada was taken at the request of that agency under the authority of Section 23 of the Statistics Act.

2. No. The Department of National Revenue, Taxation has met the request of Statistics Canada that codes be assigned to Form T2042 for the reason stated above.

Order Paper Questions

WELFARE ASSISTANCE TO CHILDREN AGED 16 AND 17

Question No. 1,481—Mr. Hueglin:

1. Are children aged 16 and 17 able to obtain welfare or any other form of social assistance that would enable them to live independent of their name and, if so, on what basis?

2. (a) What are the statistics of children (i) 16 (ii) 17 receiving assistance as in Part 1 by month for the years 1970, 1971, 1972 (b) if these figures are not available, for what reason and are any actions planned to secure such information?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Children 16 and 17 years of age may be granted social assistance in every province. However, the legislation governing eligibility and the rates of assistance paid vary from province to province. Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government may share in the cost of such assistance granted on the basis of a needs test which takes into account an applicant's basic requirements and the income and resources available to him. A summary of the provincial situation follows: In Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, persons 16 years of age and over may be granted social assistance. In most cases the provincial legislation requires that the possibility of family support be investigated, and that the young person register for employment or provide documentation attesting to school attendance or to the desirability of continuing at school. In Newfoundland and Saskatchewan persons 16 years of age and over who have established themselves as self-supporting may be granted assistance. In Manitoba, assistance to persons under 18 is provided on a non-ward basis by the child welfare authority. Quebec does not grant social assistance to persons under 18 except on an emergency basis. Exceptions are made for young people who must live away from home to receive medical treatment or educational courses not covered by Manpower training programs. In Alberta young people over 16 who are not attending school are usually considered responsible for their own support; but emergency social assistance may be provided when they are unable to obtain employment. Applicants for social assistance who are 16 and 17 years old may be provided with ward or non-ward care through the child welfare program. Young people are generally not required to return to a home situation which has been investigated and found unsatisfactory.

2. (a) Provincial governments are responsible for the administration of social assistance programs, and statistical data reported by them do not identify recipients of social assistance by single-year age groups. Hence, it is not possible to answer this enquiry at this time. (b) An Information System Team is presently engaged in a project which has as its central focus the design and development of a system for gathering and processing such statistical data.

2. Truck Utility 1¼-ton Chrysler Model XW350, Chrysler Canada Ltd., Windsor, Canada. Truck Utility Rover 101 Series, 1 Metric ton, The Rover Company Ltd., Warwickshire, England. Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): By the Ministry of the Solicitor General: 1 and 2

Year	Average per inmate	Penitentiary Costs	Inmate[1] Maintenance

1961-62.....	3,135	22,432,979	17,351,241

[1]Approximately 73 per cent of the total maintenance cost is attribuable to salaries.

However, expenditures are strictly controlled and efforts are continually being made to keep costs to a minimum while maintaining essential services and adequate rehabilitative programs.

The Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation is responsible for speed surveillance in the area from Blind Bay to Tibbetts Point. (c) Recognizing the high water level situation in the upper St. Lawrence River area, the Seaway entities introduced temporary speed restrictions on March 27, 1973 in the following areas: Ogden Island Buoy 99 to Blind Bay, from 15 miles per hour to 14 miles per hour; Bartlett Point Light 227 to Tibbetts Point, from 15 miles per hour to 13 miles per hour. Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have had a series of six questions dealing with Air Canada, Nos. 1182 to 1187, on the order paper since February 26, a period of some ten weeks. I wonder if something could be done to facilitate obtaining the answers. The questions are not that difficult.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FOOD PRICES

DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF REVIEW BOARD—NATURE OF TERMS OF REFERENCE—METHOD OF REPORTING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he can now give us a definite date when the proposed food prices review board will be established, it now being more than a month since the committee made its interim report and about ten days since the minister announced his intention to establish such a review board? Can the minister give us a firm date, or is he having trouble finding people to serve in this rather useless role?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no trouble in finding people to serve on the board. The work of identifying potential members has not yet been completed. Therefore I am not in a position to give a definite date when the formal appointments will be made.

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps the minister might tell us whether it will be this year or next. Can he tell us whether the terms of reference of the Prices Review Board will include any guidelines with regard to costs, profits and price increases, or will the board have to establish its own guidelines as a result of laborious and long research?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference of the board will be set out in the order in council appointing the commissioners, but I can direct my hon. friend to the statement I made about the plan for the board a few days ago.

[Mr. Masniuk.]

Mr. Stanfield: It is because I read the statement of the hon. gentleman that I have asked the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the intention that a member of the board who considers it appropriate may make a report on his own or will it be necessary that all members of the board act in concert? I ask this question particularly because I understand it is the minister's intention to have the board represent different points of view in the country.

Mr. Gray: I would have to check into this further, but I understand that basically the reports would be reports of the board.

REVIEW BOARD—METHOD OF REPORTING—CONTINUANCE OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the minister whether, in accordance with the recommendations of the parliamentary committee, he intends to have the Prices Review Board report through him to parliament and, if not, why not?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I announced that, in order to confirm the independence of the board, it will be able to release its reports directly for the use of parliament, the public and the government without the necessity of having the report go first to some minister before they can be made available to those concerned. I think this is quite consistent with the main thrust of the recommendation of the committee that this board be independent.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that the minister has circumvented parliament by using the Inquiries Act, and in view of the fact that act will give the board no more and no less power than the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, thereby making the special committee redundant, is it the government's intention to continue the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices and will the committee be given new terms of reference in view of the obvious redundancy?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the government has not circumvented parliament by announcing its decision to take action under the Inquiries Act. The Inquiries Act is an act of parliament, and the government is using authority already given it by parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Specifically, Mr. Speaker, this board will have very wide and deep powers under the Inquiries Act. I invite the hon. member to take the trouble to read the Inquiries Act and then he will know what I mean.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Further, Mr. Speaker, if I could have another 30 seconds—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps it might be easier to allow the hon. member his supplementary and then the minister could have another 30 seconds.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if it is his intention to appoint Professor Young as Chairman of the Prices Review Board so that he can at least salvage something from the Prices and Incomes Commission?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will just have to wait to see who is appointed so that he can try to salvage something from his very negative approach to a very constructive proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WAYS CONTEMPLATED BY GOVERNMENT TO IMPLEMENT REVIEW BOARD RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether he will give consideration to making an early statement in the House of Commons to expand more fully, in a more detailed manner, on the ways which the minister and the government would contemplate for following up or implementing recommendations of the Prices Review Board?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to take that under advisement with my colleagues.

REVIEW BOARD—POSSIBLE DIRECTION BY GOVERNMENT RESPECTING SUBJECTS OF INQUIRY

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Will the minister, on behalf of the government, be directing certain courses of inquiry for this board on the basis of the fact that there has been a tremendous increase in the input costs of farmers and farm suppliers, which can do no other than be reflected in higher food prices? Will the minister give this priority and direct that immediate action be taken on behalf of this industry?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out in my statement a few days ago, the board is intended to be independent, and its terms of reference will enable it to look into any aspects pertaining to changes in food prices. I think this could certainly cover the areas mentioned by the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CONTINUANCE OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN CONTROL AND SUPERVISION COMMISSION IN LIGHT OF FURTHER ATTACKS ON PERSONNEL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the repeated incidents of attacks on personnel of the International Control Commission and the continuation of hostilities throughout Indo-China in breach of the Paris peace agreement, will the minister make a statement in the House at an early date on the continuation of Canada's contribution to the ICCS after the 60 days we are now committed to have expired?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the incidents the hon. member has referred to are part of the accumulating evidence. As I have said publicly, and I have no hesitation in saying it here in the House, there has not been the kind of improvement in conditions of operation of the ICCS which I laid down as one of the reasons for staying on. In fact, the situation has deteriorated rather than improved. However, we have been urged to be patient and we shall continue to observe events, probably until the end of the month.

Mr. Brewin: If the conditions to which the minister refers have not been carried out, and I must agree with him that they have not, why does he not now notify the various parties that Canada cannot continue this useless role?

• (1420)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the peace agreement remains in effect. Although both the United States and the North Vietnamese have sent notes to each of the members of the International Conference on Viet Nam and both of them have expressed their determination to see that the peace agreement is carried out, it has obviously been breached. However, I do not think it is for us to judge whether the peace agreement itself has been broken or not. That is for the signatories of the peace agreement to decide. Our function as members of the ICCS is to report upon infractions that are brought to the attention of the International Control Commission.

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE PENSION—POSSIBILITY OF LOWERING ELIGIBLE AGE TO 60—DISCUSSION AT RECENT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the increasing concern of the whole population of Canada with the payment of old age security pensions at 60, could the minister state whether he raised this question during the recent conference with his provincial opposite numbers?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that question, as well as many others, has been discussed. The whole field of social security was dealt with, including the question mentioned by the hon. member.

[Later:]

DATE OF NEXT CONFERENCE OF WELFARE MINISTERS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr.Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell us roughly when he intends to meet again the provincial ministers of social welfare?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago, in my statement following the conference, I indicated that the next meeting is planned for September. In the meantime, the deputy ministers and government officials will meet.

INCLUSION OF YEARS LIVED IN GREAT BRITAIN BY FORMER RESIDENTS TOWARD QUALIFYING FOR CANADIAN OLD AGE PENSION

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of a recently signed agreement between the minister and the British High Commissioner which will allow former residents of Canada now living in Britain to receive British pensions at age 65, can the minister inform the House whether negotiations are taking place between Canada and Great Britain in order to establish reciprocal arrangements which would allow former residents of the United Kingdom to have their years of residence in that country count toward qualifying for the old age security pension in Canada and, if so, can the minister advise the House when reports on these discussions will be made available?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the matter has been discussed with several countries on many occasions and not only with the United Kingdom. I do not believe I shall be in a position to report to the House in this regard in the near future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MARC CAYER

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Can he tell us whether, since his return to Canada, Mr. Marc Cayer has been offered any help whatsoever by the government to facilitate his reintegration into Canadian society?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be privileged to reply to this question. As the hon. gentleman knows, Mr. Marc Cayer was afforded all courtesy and help possible on his return from Viet Nam. He never suggested that he wanted to have any employment with the Canadian government. If he does, there are no doubt opportunities for which his abilities would well suit him. As for a rehabilitation program, Canada has none which could be suited to Mr. Marc Cayer's very special case.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Has he been in touch with Mr. Marc Cayer with a view to benefitting from the experience the latter gained in Viet Nam?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. My officials had the opportunity of talking to Mr. Cayer about his experiences there and he knows we would always be willing to listen to anything else he would like to tell us.

PENITENTIARIES

TRANSFER OF MAXIMUM SECURITY INMATES TO COWANSVILLE—ADEQUACY OF SECURITY—EFFECT ON PAROLE AND REHABILITATION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, the urgency of my question relates to the massive escapes of maximum security prisoners from the medium security institute at Cowansville, Quebec. Was the Solicitor General informed when maximum security inmates were transferred to the medium security institute at Cowansville, or were the transfers made by his officials without his knowledge?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I was not made aware of this. I might say that the people who are there who could be considered to be maximum security inmates, and I do consider them that in many cases, were classified as medium security inmates. However, after looking at the records of many of these men it is pretty obvious that they are maximum security inmates. There has been a serious overpopulation problem with respect to maximum security inmates and we are trying to find places for them at the present time.

Mr. Grafftey: When maximum security type prisoners were placed in Cowansville, did the Solicitor General order or receive a thorough analysis of the adequacy of the security provisions at Cowansville, and has the minister assessed the effects of these transfers on parole procedures and on modern penal reform and rehabilitation measures which were being carried out successfully at Cowansville with hundreds of medium security type inmates and at similar institutions across the country?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, there are approximately 30 maximum security type prisoners at Cowansville, which has approximately 420 inmates. These inmates were not transferred there all at once but over a period of time. In Quebec there are approximately 600 maximum security inmates, and Archambault, which is the principal maximum security institution, only holds 450 inmates. So they have have had to put some of the maximum security inmates at Cowansville, some at Leclerc and some in the special correctional units.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not aware that the 12 prisoners who escaped were maximum security inmates? What affect has this had on Cowansville which is a medium security institution designed to rehabilitate inmates?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, all those who escaped were not maximum security inmates. However, the moving of maximum security inmates to Cowansville has contributed to the general population problem and has created a lot of tension with the staff and inmates. It has led to a situation in which there are not enough staff to handle all the inmates from the point of view of programs, security and many other aspects. We are now looking for solutions to that problem. On a temporary basis we are applying maximum security measures to Cowansville Penitentiary.

Mr. Grafftey: In view of the good work carried on at Cowansville, will the minister assure the House that in future no more maximum security inmates will be transferred there?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, we, of course, want Cowansville to return to being a medium security institution as soon as possible. However, if maximum security inmates are sent to penitentiary we have to put them some place. We are not going to put them back on the street.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: As I said, Archambault—

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. Allmand: Obviously, I have to explain quite a bit.

Mr. Bell: Where is Rivard now?

Mr. Allmand: As I said, the principal maximum security institute in Quebec is Archambault. However, there is no space left at Archambault and at all our maximum security institutions throughout Canada there is a serious overpopulation problem. We have to find additional space outside of the present regular maximum security institutions.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock has a supplementary.

INCOME TAX

RECONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED CORPORATE TAX REDUCTIONS IN LIGHT OF INCREASED PROFITS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Having in mind the almost daily reports of greatly increased corporation profits in Canada, is consideration being given to reconsidering the government's earlier idea of reducing corporation taxation rates?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the improvement in the return on capital for the business community in no way lessens the need for the corporate measures proposed in 1972 which were meant to enhance Canada's ability to compete in the medium and long term with the new economic blocs in the world.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal who I believe wished to ask a supplementary to the previous question. I thought the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock was rising on the same question and that is why he was recognized.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

SUGGESTED FILLING OF VACANCIES AND INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP TO ENABLE RESUMPTION OF INTERVIEWING OF INMATES AT PENITENTIARIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Will the government soon fill the vacancies on the National Parole Board and add to the membership of the board so that it may resume its very useful practice of interviewing inmates in the various penal institutions across the country, a practice they have had to stop because the government has not filled the vacancies and has not done anything about expanding the board?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the fact that the National Parole Board has discontinued personal interviews in penitentiaries is not due to the vacancies on the board. It is due to a general over-work problem that has carried on for some time. I might say we have made recommendations to fill two positions. We hope they will be filled soon, but that in itself will not bring back the interviews at penitentiaries. I hope to have some measures before the House soon to increase the size of the parole board and I hope we will have the support of members opposite in this regard.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POLICY RESPECTING CONTRACTING OUT OF MAINTENANCE AND CATERING SERVICES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It will also be of interest to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the widespread fear of contracting out policies in the maintenance and catering sections of the Department of National Defence, can the minister indicate the extent to which this policy has been implemented and comment on the charges made during the past week across the country by the president of the Union of National Defence Employees to the effect that many—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member resume his seat. The second part of the hon. member's question is hardly in order. The hon. member cannot ask the minister to comment on statements made outside the House. The question might be asked in other terms or perhaps the hon. member might ask it in some other form as a supplementary.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have heard and seen the allegations made by the union, but I can assure the House and the hon. member that no members of the Department of National Defence staff are being laid off, dismissed or in any way having their jobs jeopardized as a result of contracting out any of the services that the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): None the less, can the minister indicate whether this policy of contracting out is in fact a new policy or whether it relates to the already stated policy of the government, enunciated by the Treasury Board, to reduce the number of civilian employees within the Department of National Defence from 35,000 to 30,000?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, there is no new policy of contracting out in the area of food services and maintenance and cleaning. There is no attempt to reduce the number of Department of National Defence personnel by contracting out. Our contracting out is relatively limited in those areas.

VALCARTIER—MEASURES TO AVOID LAYING OFF OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the hon. minister tell what has been the objective of the administrative measures used until now and assure the House that the department will review its policy in order to spare certain employees of the Valcartier base who have recently been threatened with dismissal at the end of the month?

[English]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already given that assurance.

FUTURE INTENTION RESPECTING CONTRACTING OUT OF CERTAIN SERVICES

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Because this concerns the livelihood of very many people, I wish to ask the minister a question to which I hope he can respond directly. Will the minister assure the House that the Department of National Defence has no intention of contracting out food or maintenance services beyond what has already been done?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, our contracting out of food services and maintenance services is relatively limited. There are occasions when we are not able to meet our requirements internally and we do contract out. When we do, however, the positions of our employees are protected. I repeat, we do not have a policy to greatly increase the contracting out of services.

Mr. Rowland: In view of the fact the average age of the employees likely to be affected by any contracting out, however minimal, is in excess of 50 years, can the minister assure the House that, should contracting out take place, no indeterminate employees will lose their jobs because of it and they will be able to retain their jobs where they are currently employeed or at a base nearby at the same salary?

Mr. Richardson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I can give that guarantee and assurance to the employees. No regular employee can have his position jeopardized by any contracting out of services which we might undertake.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION IF MOTION ON ORDER PAPER ADOPTED—EFFECT OF MOTION ON SUBSEQUENT ADMINISTRATIONS AND PARLIAMENTS

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of the motion on the order paper which deals specifically with the Official Languages Act. Does the Prime Minister envision an act or bill following this motion which will place binding authority either on the Treasury Board or the Public Service Commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the motion stands by itself. No legislation is contemplated at this time to follow up the implementation of it.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question arising out of the Prime Minister's answer. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the nine points outlined by the President of the Treasury Board will have a lasting effect and carry on to another Treasury Board or another President of the Treasury Board in subsequent parliaments or, for that matter, in this parliament?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand the meaning of the question.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): With Your Honour's indulgence, possibly I could explain it a little better. A resolution passed by this or any other body is an expression of that body's opinion, but if the Treasury Board, the government, the cabinet or this group of Members of Parliament should change, that resolution would not necessarily be binding on a subsequent body of men or women, or both. What means of conveyance of that authority does the Prime Minister have in mind for subsequent parliaments?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the authority lies in the act. It was endorsed by all parties in the House some years ago. The present resolution intends explaining how the act will be brought into application in as much detail as possible. If that resolution is adopted by the House, as I hope it will be, it will be binding on the administration as long as it is not changed by parliament.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary. I do not want to get into an argument with the Prime Minister with regard to the application of the Official Languages Act. However, I wonder how the nine points, which I also endorse—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I note there is some applause. If the members had studied the amendment, which I know the Minister of Finance well remembers and which clearly outlines similar proposals—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member ask a supplementary rather than comment on the reaction from other members. Following that, we might try to go on to the next question.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I did not want to become involved, but it seemed obvious that I should make some comment. Will the Prime Minister state how the nine points, which are not now in the Official Languages Act, will become part and parcel of that act if a bill or an act does not follow the motion now on the order paper?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the resolution carries, and if the hon. member intends to support it I am sure it will carry, because if he supports it I am sure everyone else will—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —it will become a directive of this House to the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Only to the present President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we are getting involved in debate on a motion which is not at the moment before the House.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO INCREASE BASIC RATE OF DISABILITY PENSION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact the minister was not able before Easter to introduce his bill to increase the basic rate of the war disability pension, can he say whether that bill will be introduced within the next few days?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is presently before the government. As I already stated in the House, when I have the information I will certainly convey it to the House.

• (1440)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the minister say whether the bill when it is introduced will provide for the increase to be retroactive?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): When the bill is drafted this will be very obvious and easy to determine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REVIEW BOARD—REQUEST FOR SUBMISSION OF TERMS OF REFERENCE TO HOUSE FOR APPROVAL OR EXAMINATION BY STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a question supplementary to those put to him previously. In light of the fact that a great many people in Canada, including important elements of this House, have some reservations as to the efficacy of the Prices Review Board of which the hon. gentleman has told us, is the minister prepared to submit the terms of reference establishing the board to the House for approval in the form of a motion in the same way as the Prime Minister is submitting his motion with regard to the Official Languages Act?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I shall be happy to discuss the hon. member's suggestion with my colleagues, though I might add that parliament has already spoken by passing the Inquiries Act which delegates to the cabinet the authority to set the terms of reference.

Mr. Baldwin: In that light parliament has also legislated the Statutory Instruments Act. Will the minister co-operate with the joint chairmen of that committee and allow that committee to examine the provisions of the terms of reference in the order in council if he is afraid to entrust the matter to the House?

Mr. Gray: I have the utmost confidence in the House, and that is why I am happy to be able to make use of the authority given to the government by the House under the Inquiries Act. However, I would be glad to examine the requirements of the Statutory Instruments Act to determine whether the hon. gentleman's suggestion is one that is in fact required by that statute.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUIREMENT THAT NEW MANPOWER DEPARTMENT STAFF BE FINGERPRINTED—WIDER APPLICATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question in relation to a paragraph which has appeared in an information bulletin issued by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. It is stated that all new staff—this refers to the Department of Manpower—shall be fingerprinted. Does this requirement apply to all the staff of the Department of Manpower? Does it apply to all public servants irrespective of their category in the various departments?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It certainly does not apply to everyone in the public service. However, I will look into this requirement, discuss it with the minister concerned and perhaps provide an answer to the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: Might I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to tell us to which people this fingerprinting requirement applies? It is stated that all new staff are to be security-cleared to a minimum level of "confidential" and complete a form known as M & I 34 or C-216C and be fingerprinted. What people are we talking about?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question, get the information and report back.

Mr. Woolliams: One further question to the Prime Minister. I ask it because I think this is a very important matter, one of concern to many people nowadays who are getting jobs in various departments. Will the Prime Minister take notice of this question and advise the House and the country what new civil servants, public servants, are being fingerprinted in all the departments in Canada today in accordance with the confidential bulletin put out to various people across the country?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Prime Minister wanted to answer. This matter involves security and is of concern to public servants across Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair does not wish to prevent the Prime Minister from replying to the hon. member's question, but I was under the impression he was repeating the question he asked in the first instance. In any event, the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster is about to ask a supplementary which might give the Prime Minister an opportunity to reply to both questions.

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider appearing before an appropriate parliamentary committee, either in camera or otherwise, to deal with this general subject and, in particular, with the charge he made over the weekend that Americans are spying on Canadians?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I never made such a charge.

Mr. Bell: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I have here a Canadian Press report of May 7 in which the Prime Minister is quoted as saying that certain Americans are spying on Canadians—on Canada. I would think an opportunity should be given for the committee to hear, in camera or otherwise, whether these spying charges are justified or not.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Trudeau: Having heard the hon. member explain his question, I think he is really referring to the rest of the answers I gave. I did tell a questioner on television that most people in business, in government, in politics or in industry were trying to obtain intelligence concerning their competitors and that the only important question was whether this intelligence was obtained in legal or illegal ways.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the cabinet has issued a directive that people getting new jobs in the public service in the various departments of government must all be fingerprinted irrespective of the category in which they are classified? Has such a directive been issued and has the Prime Minister knowledge of it? If not, will he look into it?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, you are perfectly right. In my first answer to this question I did indicate I would look into the matter.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF CONTINENTAL SHELF OIL AND GAS RESOURCES—DISCUSSION BETWEEN MINISTER AND GOVERNMENT OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In his recent conversations with the prime minister of the Peoples' Republic of China and in particular in his discussions concerning the continental shelf, did the minister propose to the premier a meeting of Pacific powers to decide on boundary lines between the nations before oil or gas is recovered from the continental shelves?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Sir. The concern which is felt by the leaders of the People's Republic of China relates to the Yellow Sea rather than to the Pacific Ocean as a whole. I did indicate we would be prepared to co-operate with that government by making available to them the studies we have carried out in preparation for the Law of the Sea Conference and in particular with respect to our own negotiations for defining the boundary on the continental shelf off the east coast of Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Would the minister make the same information available to Members of Parliament as he is making available to the premier of China?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be glad at some appropriate point to explain to the hon. gentleman the problems associated with this as they affect the continental shelf.

TRANSPORT

ADEQUACY OF TOFINO LIFEBOAT STATION SERVICE IN LIGHT OF DROWNINGS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport regarding the unfortunate incident at Tofino on the west coast of Vancouver Island in which two persons were drowned when seeking to reach the Indian reserve. In view of the fact there is some concern in the community about the reduction of staff at the lifeboat station— the staff has been reduced to one contingent on duty from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m.; there is no one there at night— may I ask whether the minister is prepared to make an investigation to determine whether or not this curtailment of service was responsible for the loss of life to which I have referred? If he has received a report on the incident, is he prepared to tell the House the nature of the information he has received?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): It is my intention to investigate the matter to determine whether the staff at the station is sufficient. However, in the particular case to which the hon. member has referred, no responsibility can be placed on the staff because four minutes after they received the alarm they were on the spot, saving the people who could be saved. There is only one period during which no one is in the office; it is from 4 a.m. to 8 a.m., four hours, and during that time there is direct telephone contact between the office and the people whom this service affects. Maybe there is a shortage of staff but responsibility cannot, surely, lie in that direction in this case.

Mr. Douglas: Apart from those few extraneous remarks the minister made, may I ask him whether he will undertake to have a full study made of the situation to determine whether or not these deaths might have been prevented, or deaths in similar circumstances prevented in the future, by having a full complement on duty 24 hours a day?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I repeat that in this particular case four minutes elapsed between the alarm and the rescue. But I am making a doublecheck with a view to seeing that no lives are lost as a result of lack of staff.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CLAIMS OF NATIVE PEOPLE— POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will he tell the House the basis of his assumption that the Indians of British Columbia want, as he put it, "half of B.C. back" if he has in fact read the very reasonable, clear and just brief on native claims presented to the Prime Minister and the government by the Union of B.C. chiefs in July of last year, and what does he expect to gain by making such exaggerated and unfounded statements?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In those terms the question is not in order.

DISCONTINUANCE OF CUSTOMS PRECLEARANCE— RELATION OF RESTORATION TO BILATERAL AGREEMENT NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport having regard to the matter of customs preclearance. It arises from the statement issued by the minister on April 26 confirming the intention of Canada to discontinue preclearance and indicating to the United States that restoration of preclearance would have to be negotiated in the context of the present bilateral air agreements. Can the minister advise the House whether any renewed negotiations are taking place with United States officials in this regard, and can we expect reinstitution of preclearance?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think there will be a new round of negotiations on May 28. Like the hon. gentleman, I will just have to wait to see what the results of those negotiations will be.

LOBSTERS—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SEASON BECAUSE OF ICE CONDITIONS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that ice conditions in the Atlantic region are hampering the execution of the lobster fishery in many districts, will the minister indicate whether he has received any reports from his district officers, and what action he is taking to relieve the situation by way of extending the lobster season in those areas affected?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, consideration is being given to the submission of the hon. member.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ALLEGED APPOINTMENT IN 1968 BY FORMER MINISTER, EDGAR BENSON, OF FIRM WITH WHICH HE HAD BEEN ASSOCIATED AS AUDITORS OF CMHC

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there has been any investigation of the allegation that Mr. Edgar Benson, during 1968 when he had responsibility for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, appointed as auditors for CMHC a firm with which he had formerly been associated?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to, perhaps with the help of the hon. member, look into that allegation and find out.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I asked the question particularly because of the fact that when Mr. Benson was asked he said "it is possible; I am not sure". I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether there are any guidelines laid down within this government that govern this kind of appointment?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the normal guidelines referring to conflict of interest in such matters do apply, but I would have to know more about the particular case to know whether there are any guidelines that cover it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

HIRING OF QUALIFIED PERSONNEL TO REDUCE NUMBER OF ACCIDENTS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the disquieting number of railway accidents which occurred recently, and especially in the last few months, is the minister considering requiring the Canadian National Railways to hire enough qualified personnel for an adequate inspection of the lines and an equally adequate maintenance of the equipment?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, for quite some time the Canadian Transport Commission has undertaken, jointly with its American counterpart, an investigation into the causes of railway accidents which are increasing considerably because trains are longer. Trains which were formerly made up of 40 to 50 cars now have 100 to 120, and engines are heavier; this surely results in more frequent accidents. In my opinion the first thing to do is to carry out a complete and thorough investigation into the incidence of modern technology with regard to railway accidents.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED DELAY IN DELIVERY OF FIRST CLASS MAIL

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Can he explain the continuing unreasonable delay in the delivery of first class mail in every part of Canada?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question from the hon. member. I invited him to give me specific cases but he has not done so yet.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley West for a supplementary question and then the hon. member for Brandon-Souris for the last question before calling orders of the day.

STEPS TO INCREASE COMPENSATION OF RURAL MAIL DELIVERY CONTRACTORS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I would also direct my question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that inflation has caused unorganized rural mail contractors to fall so far behind in income they are in fact currently subsidizing the whole postal operation, can the minister advise the House what steps he plans to take to improve the rewards for this group of workers?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): The senior officials of the department are examining this question, Mr. Speaker, and I hope to be able to announce soon to the hon. member and this House decisions which certainly will satisfy them.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris. Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. I did not appreciate that the hon. member for Fraser Valley West had a supplementary question. I will recognize him and then we will hear the hon. member's supplementary to the previous question.

Mr. Rose: I did not rise immediately, Mr. Speaker, as I was waiting for the translation. Since the minister has asked a number of Members of Parliament for suggestions to improve the rural route delivery system, and since the present legislation restricts the minister to amending those contracts under $10,000 a year, is he planning to introduce legislation dealing with this restriction and, if so, when can the House expect to see this legislation?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I hope to introduce such a bill as soon as possible, but I think that it will be possible in the meantime to take administrative measures to correct the situation pointed out by the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF MAIL DELIVERY SIX DAYS A WEEK

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Red Deer. In view of the Prime Minister's recent comment about the slowness of Canadian mail delivery, when will the Postmaster General be announcing the restoration of delivery six days a week as a partial solution to this problem?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thought that the hon. member had appreciated as I did the Prime Minister's sense of humour and that he had not taken it amiss.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the people of Canada do not regard this as funny, will the minister take some action?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, since we have decided to establish the 5-day delivery service, we have noted some difficulties, especially on Mondays. However, recent surveys have shown that conditions have greatly improved and since we have signed an attractive contract with most postal workers, the postal service has really improved in Canada.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of Bill C-176 is of very great importance. It is a subject matter that has been before this House of Commons on two separate occasions. This afternoon I want to address myself very briefly to hon. members here about its content, doing so with the earnest hope that the broad measure of agreement, which I am sure there is in the House about the importance of this matter and the need to make these changes in the law, will result in the expeditious movement of this bill to the committee, back to the House and into effect as the law of Canada.

One of the problems we have experienced in the past with legislation is that too much kindness and too much talk about the merits of legislation has resulted in a delay in the implementation of important measures. This bill is important because it recognizes in a formal way the importance of privacy in our Canadian life. I say "in a formal way" because of course privacy has been recognized in indirect ways through various parts and parcels of the law over the years. But in this bill, for the first time at a federal level, the right of privacy is recognized expressly in a protection of privacy act. We are all familiar with the deepfelt belief that privacy and individuality are of fundamental importance to our own democratic way of life. With the growth of electronic devices which make it possible to hear or intercept conversations and communications without awareness of that interception by the persons participating in the conversation, we have had an increase in the problem of protection of privacy and an increase of the problem of the security of the people in this country, as well as their ability to converse with the knowledge that it is a private matter and not one which is being overseen or overheard by other persons.

The bill attempts to protect the right of privacy, I believe in a number of effective ways. It makes it a criminal offence to engage in this interception and a criminal offence with significant potential penalties attached, one of which is imprisonment of up to five years. It makes it an offence to possess or to sell devices of the electro-magnetic type or other devices which may be used for such interception purposes. Again, it places in the law significant penalties of up to two years imprisonment for this sale or possession of these devices. There is, of course, provision for the proper and authorized possession and sale but in a limited way, a way which is necessary for other portions of the bill. The bill also places a limitation on the communication of information if it is obtained in an illegal way. It proscribes that and also creates the potential of damages, punitive damages, to be assessed against those who improperly obtain or communicate information with electro-magnetic or other similar devices. That is the main thrust of the bill. It sets up the protection of privacy and the importance of our ability to communicate with one another without being surreptiously overheard or having our conversations intercepted.

The bill puts in play, I think, effective measures to ensure that that cannot be done and that that will be hereafter, after the passage of this bill into law, an illegal matter and therefore one which we can attempt to restrain with the full power of law enforcement. The bill on the other hand, recognizes the potential desirability of the use of these devices on occasion in the public interest, in the public cause, when our enforcement officers, either for security reasons or reasons associated with offences where other measures may fail, need these devices and will find them useful in the enforcement of the general law and order on our society. In the case of criminal matters, the bill proposes the authorization of such uses by persons engaged in the enforcement procedures. The bill accepts the conclusion of the House committee in 1970, which was supported by the House again in committee in 1972, that these authorizations should be obtained from a judge, a judge defined, as the committee chose in the 1972 session, to include superior court, county court and district court judges. The Solicitor General, in the case of certain federal matters, and the provincial attorneys-general in the case of provincial matters, are involved in the applications for these authorizations and therefore are seen as having a direct responsibility for this.

There is, in a sense, a double protection through the responsibility of the Solicitor General or the provincial attorneys general and the actual authorization of the use of the warrant by the judge. That is one of the issues which has been the cause of some discussion and controversy. It may again be a matter upon which the committee will wish to focus some attention. I hope when we get to that stage we will look at it seriously once more, but not to the point of preventing the bill becoming, at an early date, a part of the law of the land.

It has been argued in the committee that, on the one hand, it might be better if the full responsibility for these authorizations were placed upon the Solicitor General or the attorneys-general as the case may be. The involvement of the judge, I think, is a useful precaution, even though it is recognized that in an ex parte proceeding he is faced with material being presented to him upon which he must make a judgment without having necessarily the total part of the argument which an opponent might put forward to him. It is none the less a useful precaution I believe in ensuring that the form of the use of electronic device is in fact apparently on a sound basis.

The bill itself sets out that these are not to be first-rank techniques of investigation but rather in the way of additional, fall-back or substitute ways of investigating when more ordinary means of investigation fail. There is further political protection in the requirement of report by the Solicitor General or by the provincial attorneys-general each year with regard to the number and types of uses of devices in the course of enforcement within their areas of jurisdiction. These, I think, are the interesting and useful balances. It will be argued before the House I am sure—and we have a good deal of knowledge about the arguments which may be made in the committee because of the appearance of this matter before the House on two separate occasions and the appearance of witnesses before House committees—that the bill, even as it stands, is perhaps a little too restrictive in respect of the investigative powers, in the shortness of the period for which warrants may be issued and in the exact terminology of the type of cases for which they may be applied.

I will be eager to hear hon. members views once again in the committee as we look at the exact and precise details of the legislation. There also has been some controversy in respect of the proposals in the bill to exclude evidence in criminal or civil matters under federal jurisdiction which had been obtained in an illegal or unauthorized manner following the enactment of this bill into law. There, we would be seeing the introduction into our law I believe for the first time of an exclusionary rule which I think is, in its history, merely intended to add a further sanction against the illegal obtaining of evidence on the theory that it will not so readily be obtained as evidence if it is not admissible in a subsequent case. I think it is worth noting that there are significant other sanctions in the bill before us, including both the penal provisions and the civil or punitive damages provisions, including Crown liability if any Crown servants are involved in an illegal interception. The committee may want to consider further whether this exclusionary rule is reasonable or necessary in this particular case with these additional sanctions.

There is, in addition to the sanction argument, the issue which will be before the committee of whether it is right for a court to be involved with evidence which is illegally obtained or, on the other hand, whether it is fair or decent to the administration of justice to see a cause unresolved because certain clear evidence is not before the court because of the technical rule excluding it.

I think these are important points, and I hope and look forward to having the committee conduct further discussion upon them, but not in a way which will obscure the main and fundamental thrust of the bill upon which there was agreement in the committee of the House of Commons when the main portions of this bill were put forward in almost the same form as they now stand, as well as in the committee of the House in 1972 when a bill very much like Bill C-176 was before it. That main thrust is to make it an offence to engage in electronic, electro-magnetic and similar eavesdropping or interception of conversations to protect privacy in a fundamental way by the creation of that offence, and then only to allow certain very narrow exceptions to that main point. With the passing of the law, therefore, the interception of communications by private citizens, whether for purposes of trade or curiosity, will be a criminal offence. We will have the possibility of restraining such activity and, perhaps even more important, of adding to the assurance of individuals that their privacy is protected and that they do not have to fear that such devices are around them.

In addition to the prohibition of the use of these devices we have also the prohibition of their possession and sale, again except in very narrow categories. That is the main thrust of the bill. It is an important addition to the Criminal Code and to the law of the land and I, therefore, urge hon. members to help in the swift passage of the legislation, even though we must debate in committee the interesting points to which I referred and resolve them there. While they are important, they are not as important as the main thrust of the bill which, I hope, will soon be a part of the law of the land.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, the shortness of the speech of the minister makes it somewhat difficult for the rest of us to comment on a seminal piece of legislation—if I could use that term—but I am afraid that, although the official opposition will want to co-operate in the passage of this bill, there will be three or four speakers from this side at least who will want to have a chance to make their comments before the bill reaches the committee.

I think I am conscious of the fact that we must not be like the pharisees and thank God that we are not like other men when we consider this bill in juxtaposition to the grubby and sordid events which are called the Watergate scandal in the United States. However, it must be admitted that the Watergate scandal makes an interesting backdrop for a public debate in this country. It is my submission that, although the events of Watergate could have taken place here legally until this bill is passed, there is no question that their ethics would leave a great deal to be desired.

One of the major problems connected with this bill for spokesmen for the official opposition such as me is not really in the thrust which has been discussed by the minister regarding the protection of privacy, with certain narrow exceptions, but rather—and I will comment briefly on this and hope that perhaps somebody else from the government will allay my concern about it, and then I will consider some other aspects of the bill—in the rather loose, use of certain words, if I can say so fairly, in clause 6 on page 21 of Bill C-176. There is a description in the clause of espionage and sabotage, and the following are the words which I think are used much too loosely, certainly for this party's acceptance, namely: "... or any other subversive activity directed against Canada . . .". This is not the language of the Criminal Code. This phrase is nowhere defined, either in the Criminal Code, or in this bill, and I hope that the committee will direct itself, first of all, to getting rid of such loose language or, second, to to at least defining it.

We must remember that we are within three years of the imposition of the War Measures Act, and I think that put all of us as parliamentarians—I am not being partisan at all—on our guard when we see rather ill defined language about what is or what is not subversive activity. As I have said in other contexts, one man's draft dodger is another man's hero, and I think that in defining the right to privacy and in defining peculiar ways in which the government can listen in on conversations—and I think this bill is a positive measure—we must be very careful that we are not busy listening in on activities which, although they may not be very pleasant for governments or for administrations, none the less are in no way part of what we might call the scandalous activities of espionage and sabotage.

That is just a comment, but I hope the government will want to tighten up this language, and if not tighten it up, remove it altogether because sabotage and subversion are well defined. There is a law concerning them but nowhere in this statute or the Code is there anything about any other subversive activity directed against Canada. This needs to be defined, and I hope the government will see to it that it occurs.

The problem of the control of electronic means of surveillance has become acute due to rapid technological advances which now offer comprehensive techniques for bugging and snooping. As is obvious, telephones can be tapped, offices bugged, files photographed, movements monitored, and communications recorded without the knowledge of the person involved. I think the minister will agree that science and technology have—until this bill is passed—outstripped the legal means of controlling technology. This is really what we are about. The law is finally catching up with technological change. As I said when I started, it is appropriate for us to be discussing this subject while the evils of Watergate take up so much of the news these days. The assumption that Watergate could not have happened in Canada is naïve, I think, and dangerous, particularly because, until now no federal law has existed concerning wiretapping and other forms of electronic eavesdropping.

As the minister has said, the aim of the bill is to make a crime of the wilful interception of a private communication. To repeat what the minister said—if I may flatter him in this way—the central question is the delicate one of how far you can restrict law enforcement officers without interfering with them, how much you have to restrict them in order to give better assurance that there is, in fact, protection of privacy in the bill. The bill prescribes a particular kind of compromise in this area. If protection is to have meaning, all methods and devices for wire tapping and electronic surveillance must be controlled.

The Task Force on Privacy and Computers—if I may say so gratuitously, one of the more interesting recent government publications—explains the privacy of the person as "aimed essentially at maintaining the dignity of the human person. Our persons are protected not so much against the physical search as against the indignity of the search, its invasion of the person in a moral sense." The right to privacy is not absolute. "In any society, claims to privacy are continually balanced against other values and interests by social, political and legal processes. The security and welfare of the collectivity and its institutions are values which tend to prevail over individual claims to privacy." Of course, what the government is seeking, and I hope it thinks it is seeking it with our help, is to try to strike a just balance between public protection and safety and the protection of privacy. As the minister pointed out, this question has been considered several times in recent years.

The Justice and Legal Affairs Committee studied the matter of electronic eavesdropping and made a report on March 11, 1970. The committee listed 20 major recommendations. Among them were that wire tapping, electronic eavesdropping and industrial espionage should become crimes. Also recommended by the committee were well defined limits on police use of electronic bugs, a list of crimes justifying such investigation, application for use by an attorney-general and authorization by a judge, a stated time period for surveillance, and a yearly report to parliament by the attorney-general. I am glad to say that many of these recommendations have been incorporated in the bill that we are now considering. As I have said, at present there are no privacy laws at the federal level in Canada. British Columbia and Manitoba have privacy laws for civil actions, and I am informed that several provinces have legislation concerning interception of telephonic communication.

This bill is the third bill concerning wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping introduced by the government. When the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) was minister of justice he introduced a bill on privacy on June 28, 1971. That bill died on the order paper after first reading. Then, there was Bill C-6 on the same subject. It was given first reading on February 21, 1972. I think it is worth noting, and anyway I am going to note it because others may read that there is this chronology available. I always have a horror that some day others will read these words, but if so, no doubt thay will be interested to know what happened. Hence the excuse for the history lesson, Mr. Speaker. On May 2, 1972, Bill C-6 was given second reading, and was discussed in committee in early June. The bill, with amendments, was reported back to the House on June 14, and we know what happened then. It did not get any further, and once again died on the order paper.

The present bill has been before us for just a month. It was given first reading on April 13. Essentially, Mr. Speaker, it is the same as Bill C-6, with one or two amendments suggested by the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Outlawed is wilfully listening in or recording of a private conversation by electromagnetic, accoustic or mechanical devices. It will become a criminal offence to possess, sell or purchase any device that is primarily useful for invading privacy.

Information gained from illegal wiretapping would also become an offence punishable by imprisonment. The bill authorizes monitoring aimed at preventing and detecting subversive or criminal activity where other investigative procedures are judged not likely to be successful. Evidence obtained as the result of information acquired though illegal wiretapping can be used in certain circumstances. Bugging must be authorized by a provincial attorney general or by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). Application must be made to a Superior Court judge, and bugging can be approved for a 30 day period, with the right to apply for an extension. In case of emergency, the approval of a judge is not required for authorization but the permit is valid for only 36 hours, and approval of a judge is necessary if the evidence obtained is to be used in court.

Basic to the consideration of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is the recognition of the right to know. In a moment I am going to quote the distinguished hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, the present Minister of Finance, who made a very interesting and now, I am afraid, forgotten by many, speech in September, 1969.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Not forgotten by Jed Baldwin.

Mr. Fairweather: No, and he has a private bill which should be part of this legislation. I am going to invoke the good advice of the Minister of Finance and read to him part of the speech he made, and the suggestions he was going to make to his cabinet colleagues.

The legislative scope of this bill attempts to achieve the two purposes of protection of the right to privacy, and infringement of the right to privacy in the public interest. I suggest it can be criticized as completely forgetting to provide for the complementary right to know. I have here marked a copy of the speech which the Minister of Finance made in 1969. It was probably made to Osgoode Hall. He used to like to speak there. But no, Mr. Speaker, I see it was to the Canadian Bar Association, one of the more open and liberal associations of this country. It was to the Canadian Bar Association annual meeting in Ottawa.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Don't forget that we may be back in practice one day, Gordon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: I had better stop this. Anyway, the speech was delivered to that very open minded group, the Canadian Bar Association. It was entitled, "Twin Freedoms: the Right to Privacy and the Right to Know." I agreed with the thrust of the speech. At page 13 he said:

> Mr. Chairman, there is another side to the right to privacy which has not received the prominence it deserves but whose dimensions cannot be ignored. There is a tendency in governments to refuse information to its citizens under the guise of privacy which is disguised as the public interest.

Those words are eloquent, but they are four years old and I have not seen the government change one whit.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Fairweather: Please do.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Has he read the Statutory Instruments Act which goes a long way towards increasing the public's right to know?

Mr. Fairweather: I have read the Statutory Instruments Act. I have also read the 16 points that the minister's colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) announced, commonly known as the sixteen protection of the government rules. We will be discussing those in the committee. As a very senior civil servant said to me, "I have to get it through my head that it isn't really the protection"—Mr. Speaker, what did he say?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It must have been late at night.

Mr. Fairweather: No, it wasn't late at night. It was an important statement, and I will recall it. He said that it was the protection of the government that was always foremost in the mind of the government, and not indeed the protection of the public. It is no wonder that that man has moved to other places.

Now to continue quoting the speech made by the Minister of Finance, he said:

> There is a tendency in governments to refuse information to its citizens under the guise of privacy which is disguised as the public interest. Government secrecy is sometimes legitimated—

• (1530)

I would not have used that word.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is the right word.

Mr. Fairweather:

> —as the state's right to privacy, but it may well be a denial of the public right to know. If individual privacy is a foundation of democracy, the citizen's right to know is fundamental to any participatory democracy.

That was a sort of elegant phrase then; it is now more famous for its breach than for its acceptance by this government.

> The public cannot be expected to dialogue meaningfully—

Now, Mr. Minister, really. "Dialogue meaningfully" is not a phrase that I think you would have used. I suppose you meant "talk sense". That would have been a better cliché. I know "dialogue meaningfully" is what you said but I hope we reach the stage in this parliament that the clichés "dialogue" and "meaningful" will be exorcised forever. If so, we will have done the country a service.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That speech was made three or four years ago.

Mr. Fairweather: Before it got to the dialogue stage! Now, I am afraid that I was guilty, too. I notice we are beginning to use the word "thrust" and it is close to becoming a cliché as well.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): How about "scenario"?

Mr. Fairweather: We could go on forever—"a meaningful scenario". To continue:

> The public cannot be expected to dialogue meaningfully—still less decide—if it is refused the very information which would make such a dialogue and decision-making possible.

That was an excellent speech. I wish some of the minister's good sense had been embodied in this legislation because I think that most of this legislation is good but there is a serious gap in that part of it which relates to the public's right to know. The minister went on to say:

It is my view that we have now reached the stage when this matter should be dealt with legislatively—

I presume the minister's intervention meant that the Statutory Instruments Act had covered his concern.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Partially.

Mr. Fairweather: Well, the minister is still the minister—regretfully. Maybe he can do something more about this.

—in a comprehensive way and it is my intention to recommend that this course of actions be followed in so far as the federal government is concerned in the very near future.

I think that is a good recommendation. If the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) would accept some amendments that we offer at the committee stage, perhaps we might have dual rights entrenched in legislation—that is the protection of the right to privacy and the fact that the public has, indeed, the right to know.

Others will be considering this legislation, Mr. Speaker, and I hope very much that before this second reading debate is finished someone on behalf of the government will explain what I find to be upsetting language on page 21 in clause 6.16(2)(a) "subversive activity directed against Canada". I serve notice that if the government cannot clear up this matter we will want an amendment at the committee stage.

The bill has been around three times, so there is some disposition to try to get it to committee at an early date. I hope the House will profit from speeches made by members new to this place but not to the consideration of this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-176 takes centre stage at this critical time in political democracy. Canadians have been exposed to and some have experienced the results of wiretapping and electronic surveillance. We have witnessed and read the revelations of the Watergate affair and are shocked by the conduct and cover-up of persons in high places. Mr. Speaker, Watergate is now making the McCarthyism period in the United States look like the age of reason. When we learn that the late J. Edgar Hoover, as head of the FBI, considered Martin Luther King a subversive and a liar and applied electronic surveillance to Dr. King, it makes us realize the restrictions that must be placed on electronic surveillance.

We in the New Democratic Party support the principles of Bill C-176 but are concerned with some of the procedures and provisions in it. I notice that the former minister of justice is here, Mr. Speaker. I read his speech and some of his interviews in which he indicated that there should have been consultation between the Minister of Justice and the attorneys-general of the provinces. I hope that procedure was followed prior to the framing of this bill because he indicated the necessity of uniformity in the law and that the power to license the manufacture of electronic equipment probably lay within the provincial jurisdiction and that such licensing was necessary. I hope this course has been adopted by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and that he will be able to respond to that assertion.

In view of the fact that there is now virtually no legislation limiting electronic surveillance, this bill provides a good starting point to deal with this serious problem. Prior to this legislation all we had was one federal statute which made it an offence to interfere with any of the property of the Bell Telephone Company, to work on its lines or intercept any message transmitted thereon, as well as a few provincial statutes which made it an offence to divulge the contents of a conversation heard by means of wiretapping, except when authorized or directed. These restrictions were completely unsatisfactory and provided an opportunity for wiretapping by many people and groups. Probably the worst offenders, Mr. Speaker, were the police forces of this country.

Wiretapping and electronic surveillance have increased in use and sophistication at a rapid rate in the past few years. They have become the tyrant of technology and have taken on different forms and types, pressing into the privacy of man's conversation and into his home. We have had electronic snoops with regard to criminals; we have had electronic snoops with regard to car salesmen, where a manager has had electronic surveillance of conversations with customers; we have had electronic surveillance with regard to union activities; we have had data bank information revealed, and in some cases that has been unwarranted and unjustified; we have had psychological surveillance by way of truth serums; we have had corporate espionage and now political espionage as exemplified in the affairs of our neighbours to the south.

This bill deals with some of these areas but certainly not all. Probably the most important is the danger of the misuse of data bank information and there is a need to protect individuals and businessmen against the misuse of information about them which is sorted in computers or data banks. There is now a provincial or international flow of information through the telecommunications facilities, linking computers with central data banks. This is certainly not covered by the bill.

This legislation is clear in three aspects however: first, electronic surveillance in the private sector is completely illegal; second, the possession, sale and purchase of electronic equipment by unauthorized persons which render it primarily useful for surreptitious interruption of private communication is illegal and, third, civil liability of persons connected with illegal wiretaps is established. These measures are welcome.

The major concerns of the New Democratic Party are first, the issuing of permits by judges; second, the admissibility of certain evidence from illegal wiretaps and, third, amendments to the Official Secrets Act concerning the issue of warrants by the Solicitor General for alleged espionage and subversive activities. These are the three main areas. I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) will deal with them when he replies, and also at the committee stage.

The general rule that private wiretaps are illegal is subject to this main exception: That the police are permitted to make wiretaps, provided they have complied with certain criteria satisfactory to the judge before a permit is issued. That brings into sharp focus the question of personal privacy in a democratic country and underlines the problems arising from the tyranny of technology. I submit that personal privacy is central to man's dignity and liberty, and to deny him this privacy may be to undermine his very humanity and erode belief in our democratic institutions and the judicial process. In the words of Mr. Justice Field of the United States:

—Of all the rights of the citizen, few are of greater importance or more essential to his peace and happiness than the right of personal security and that involves, not merely protection of his person from assault but exemption of his private affairs—from the inspection and scrutiny of others. Without the enjoyment of this right, all others would lose their value.

This proposition was restated by Professor Edward Ryan at the Couchiching Conference of August 5, 1971 when he said:

The right to privacy, far from being a mere individual claim, is itself a public interest of the highest order, in which may be found the wellsprings of individual creativity and group expression which are at the heart of popular government. They cannot be allowed to be imperilled. No more fundamental laws to our ideals is possible than that posed by the possession and potential abuse of overly wide governmental powers in this area.

From those statements arise such questions as: Should the police be given the power to snoop, and is wiretapping necessary and effective in combatting crime? Many have said that the police should be in the same position and as well equipped as criminals with respect to the use of electronic equipment. This bill deals with the question of private surveillance and private surveillance is made illegal, as is the possession, sale and purchase of unauthorized electronic equipment.

The second assertion that crime is on the increase does not necessarily jibe with the facts. The fact is that more crime is reported today than in the past, and therefore it does not follow that more crime is being committed. The assertion that police wiretapping and electronic surveillance is necessary to combat crime should be reviewed on the basis of facts. The self-conferred right to wiretap by the police has had no appreciable effect on crime detection. Actually, the evidence discloses that wiretapping is used by the police for the purpose of aiding in investigation and seldom if ever for the purpose of collecting evidence. The following was said in the brief of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association which was presented to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs:

In a learned law review article, Brown and Peer made the following observation, generally supported by experts in the field:

'Wiretapping is of very little use in connection with ordinary felonies and crimes of violence. There is lacking in this sporadic sort of crime the pattern of continuity necessary for effective wiretap operation by the police officers.'

No less an authority than Ramsay Clark, U.S. President Johnson's last Attorney-General, voiced the same misgivings when he said:

In several cities where organized crime is most severe, police and prosecution have in the past used wiretap without inhibition. It has not been effective. Organized crime still flourishes in these communities. In other cities where there has never been organized crime, police have never used wiretap. The massive programs required to end organized crime have no place for wiretap. It is too slow, too costly, too ineffective . . . Organized crime cannot exist where criminal justice agencies are not at least neutralized and probably corrupted to some degree . . . The F.B.I. used electronic surveillance in the organized crime area from at least the late 1950's until July 1965 . . . So far as is known not one conviction resulted from any of the these bugs . . . In 1967 and 1968, without the use of any electronic surveillance, F.B.I. convictions of organized crime and racketeering figures were several times higher than during any year before 1965. The bugs weren't necessary.

With regard to organized crime in Canada, we had a royal commission studying crime in Ontario in 1961. In their report they said that organized crime was virtually non-existent in Canada. In 1969 the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police stated that organized crime in Canada was in its infancy. We must, therefore, ask whether it is necessary in the circumstances to give the police such wide powers in these fields. What worries the members of my party, Mr. Speaker, is the procedure that will be adopted with regard to permit applications to a superior court judge. Such applications will be made ex parte by way of affidavit, and the procedure will involve an application to a superior court judge. When there is an ex parte application, there is a one-sided type of justice. The decision is made on the basis of an affidavit prepared by a police officer, in most instances, and there is no right to cross-examination, which is contrary to our adversary system. The judge will need to make a decision on the basis of an application made by one person or group of persons.

In the United States, especially in the state of New York, they have had the experience of police officers who wanted to make application for wiretapping permits going judge shopping. In other words, they have gone to judges who were sympathetic and who have issued permits on evidence that was very scanty. I do not think that this will happen in Canada. Certainly, it is not in keeping with our concepts of Canadian justice. We think that all parties should be represented in court. We think the adversary system is necessary and we think that examination, cross-examination, legal argument and judgment should be part of our system. All these factors are most important, but yet are missing when a police officer applies to a judge on an ex parte basis.

The bill also provides for a private communication, intercepted without authorization, to be not admissible as evidence, but that information or things disclosed as a result of unauthorized interception may be admitted as evidence. In other words, the direct evidence is inadmissible, but the derived evidence may be admissible. We are departing from the usual rule which states that all relevant evidence is admissible, regardless of how it is obtained. It has been suggested that the rule should be that the evidence should be admitted only it does not offend the fundamental concepts inherent in our ideas of ordered liberty under the law. We should consider whether it is reasonable evidence, whether it is just evidence and whether it is in accordance with the Bill of Rights before it is admitted in court. Surely, there could be a voir dire to determine this issue.

It has been indicated that most police wiretapping is not designed to gather evidence, but to gather information from which evidence can be developed. Professor Beck of Osgoode Hall put it into sharp focus when he said:

> The only real control over the police is self-control. To achieve self-control over illegal wiretapping the law should provide that all charges arising from illegal wiretapping must be dismissed in court. This would have a magic effect in assuring that whatever wiretapping legislation is passed by Parliament, it will in fact be obeyed by the police.

I think the members of the New Democratic Party agree with the sentiments contained in that statement by Professor Beck.

Perhaps the most frightening parts of the bill deal with the amendments to the Official Secrets Act. All the safeguards relating to police wiretapping disappear. I quote:

> The Solicitor General of Canada may issue a warrant authorizing the interception or seizure of any communication if he is satisfied by evidence on oath that
> (a) the purpose of such interception or seizure is related to the prevention or detection of espionage, sabotage or any other subversive activity directed against Canada or detrimental to the security of Canada; and
> (b) such interception or seizure is necessary in the public interest.

A provision follows that under which the application for the warrant is made by an officer of the RCMP. The warrant is issued by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). The accounting procedure, the report aspect, is, and I quote:

> The Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police shall from time to time make a report to the Solicitor General of Canada with respect to each warrant issued pursuant to subsection (2) setting forth particulars of the manner in which the warrant was used and the results, if any, obtained from such use.

In other words, all the safeguards which we have applied to the police in general do not apply to the Solicitor General or to the RCMP when the wiretapping is for the purpose of prevention or detection of espionage, sabotage or any other subversive activity. We find that this provision is repugnant to most Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: The last speaker indicated that the views of his party were much the same. He has asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) to consider amendments at the committee stage to this important section. What has happened is that they have lumped together even home-made radicalism. Giving the RCMP the opportunity of maintaining surveillance in universities and other places really strikes at the very roots of political democracy. One should recall that a former Prime Minister issued a direction to the RCMP that no surveillance should take place on university campuses. Past experience indicated that the RCMP were keeping many students under surveillance who did not have the views that were generally accepted throughout the country.

When one reads the words "detrimental to the security of Canada", one wonders if the RCMP and the Solicitor General will apply this section to other segments of society. I wonder if they could ever direct a warrant against International Nickel, Domtar or any of the other polluters in this country when, in fact, their conduct militates directly against Canada and is detrimental to the security of the environment. I wonder if the RCMP and the Solicitor General will be worrying about General Motors, Ford and Chrysler when they enter into subversive activities with regard to price fixing. These are some of the dangers that are attendant upon this type of section. However, one feels that their attention will not be directed to International Nickel and the other great polluters of the environment or the big corporate enterprises, but against ordinary folk, young students in universities and other groups which are trying to make this a better country. Therefore, we find this section repugnant and not worthy of support.

I have outlined in broad detail the position of our party with regard to this bill. Other members will zero in on particular sections and aspects that are of major concern to them. In closing, I think it would be fair to say we support the bill in principle, but we are certainly concerned about some of the provisions and procedures presently contained in it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, this bill is long overdue. Finally, the arduous efforts of many law reformers to provide a meaningful form of protection of privacy in Canada are about to be rewarded. This is not to say that I support all the provisions of this bill before us, but merely to indicate that I support wholeheartedly its general legislative thrust as a valuable and necessary reform to an area of law which until recently was largely ignored in Canada.

In my remarks I will outline, in general terms, some objections to some of the specific provisions of the bill with the hope that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will entertain appropriate amendments following second reading with the same constructive and non-partisan approach that the committee followed in its proceedings during the 28th parliament. However, the minister and hon. members will be only too aware that this is a new parliament, with many new members having new or different ideas. Under no circumstances will the opposition necessarily feel bound by the proceedings taken under Bill C-6 in the 28th parliament when this government had a majority in the House and in the committee. Indeed, it is my hope that the end product of our labours here and in committee might reflect improved protections against invasion of privacy and further limitations on authorized interceptions than are in the present bill.

To put my jurisprudential premise at its simplest, I believe that in a free society the right to privacy should be protected by law and that there should be derogations from this protection only where public need is clearly demonstrated by those who seek to use means to invade privacy in a rational way for the public good. The onus should always be on those invading privacy, not on those seeking the legal protection of the right.

Compared with the United States and the United Kingdom, Canada got off to a relatively late start in this field. However, in the past five years, a great deal of ground has been covered. I refer not only to the hard work of the many able and responsible members from all parties who participated in the work of the standing committee in the last parliament, the initiative of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he was Minister of Justice, or to the continued interest and open-mindedness of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). Of equal importance, I refer to the pioneering work of the Ontario Law Reform Commission in 1968, with its now famous study and report on protection of privacy in Ontario, which laid much of the groundwork for the subsequent activities of the standing committee at the federal level and the resulting initiatives of the government. The Ontario study was prepared largely by my friend and former colleague, Edward Ryan, who was quoted so ably by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), who later became counsel to the federal standing committee and assisted in the preparation of its report which forms the basis of the bill before us. Mr. Ryan and members of the Ontario Law Reform Commission certainly deserve a share of the credit for the bill we have before us today. Canadians will always be in their debt.

However, the concerns which precipitated the interest of law reformers five years ago are much greater today. Canadians should know that technological advances have led to the production of bugging and photographic devices which permit a man's every movement or word to be recorded without his knowing about it. Canadians should also be aware that it is now a relatively simple matter for telephones to be tapped, offices to be bugged, files to be photographed, physical movements to be monitored and communications to be recorded. Yet until this bill is passed, there is virtually no right of recourse or protection in law against this sort of activity. Indeed, had the type of bugging activity which took place during the Watergate affair last year taken place in Canada there would have been absolutely no legal recourse against the perpetrators of this heinous conduct. Unlike the United States law, Canadian law provides no constitutional right to privacy. However, in the context of today's society I would submit that erosions of privacy of the kind I have mentioned, certainly in the political context, constitute the beginning of the end of political freedom as we know it in this country.

• (1600)

The bill before us goes a long way toward providing the protection which Canadians want and need. For the first time, wiretapping is made a crime, punishable by way of indictment and liability to imprisonment for a five-year term. Second, the exceptions are specifically defined, the most important being the carefully-defined authorization of wiretapping carried out by law enforcement officials acting under the instructions of the Attorneys-General of the provinces or the Solicitor General, or their agents specially designated in writing. The bill makes a bold attempt to rationalize, structure and confine the method of requesting an authorization and the person who can give the authorization. However, I have grave reservations as to the specific method proposed in the bill particularly its reliance on the judiciary to provide ultimate authorization, as opposed to the Solicitor General or the Attorneys-General. I shall elaborate on this point later.

Third, the bill provides another valuable protection by making possession, sale or purchase of bugging devices an indictable offence, subject again to certain clearly-defined exceptions in the public interest. Also, the bill makes provision for the forfeiture of such devices in cases in which a person has been convicted of wilful interception or unlawful possession. Another important feature of the bill is that it creates the offence of disclosure of information obtained by unlawful wiretapping or bugging.

Perhaps one of the most innovative aspects of the bill is the introduction of the concept of civil damages, both punitive and actual, in situations of unlawful interception or user disclosure. This means that a person whose privacy has been invaded in this fashion not only has criminal sanctions at his disposal but can proceed against those responsible to recover a monetary amount equivalent to the actual damage to his reputation, and also punitive damages to the extent of $5,000. This may prove to be an important additional deterrent to anyone contemplating illegal invasions of privacy of the kind under consideration.

Unfortunately, though, the bill fails to provide any means by which a person whose wire has been tapped by public officials can find out that his privacy had been invaded in this fashion. There is no provision requiring the Solicitor General, the Attorney-General or their authorized agents to notify the person subject to a wiretap even after an investigation has been completed.

As a practical matter, therefore, it will be very difficult, if not impossible, for a person to seek the prosecution of a public official, or to claim damages against him under the suggested changes to the Crown Liability Act. The present draft seems to be based on the premise that what a man doesn't know won't hurt him.

It is significant that the standing committee in its 1970 report recommended that notification be made within a reasonable time by registered letter, subject to reasonable exceptions where there is a continuing investigation or where the wiretaps are related to espionage or sabotage on behalf of a foreign power. At the very last, the bill should require that in the annual report of the Solicitor General or of the Attorneys General an accounting be made of the number of people who were not informed following the completion of the wiretap investigations surrounding their cases.

I support wholeheartedly the elaborate annual reporting requirement of the Solicitor General and the Attorneys General in this Bill. If invasions of privacy are to be authorized in accordance with the mechanisms proposed, it is absolutely essential that the responsible political officers account to the public for the number of times and the circumstances under which they have initiated wiretapping, and give some indication of the extent to which wiretapping has been successful or unsuccessful as a means of law enforcement. Any Solicitor General or Attorney-General who has been over-zealous in his use of such techniques will obviously be directed toward his rightful place by the force of opposition scrutiny, press vigilance and public opinion. While it is good that these annual reports are required to be tabled or made public "as soon as possible after the end of each year", I would like to see the insertion of a more specific time limit of not more than six months after year end. The unfortunate practices of the present government with respect to the filing of annual reports are surely evidence of the need for further protection. Also, the Solicitor General's report should include information as to the number of persons to whom he issues licences each year to lawfully possess bugging devices which are otherwise illegal.

The public accountability aspects of the bill bring to mind what is perhaps the most reprehensible provision before us, one which allows the Solicitor General to drive a truck right through even the reporting safeguard. I refer to the provision which allows a Solicitor General to issue a secret warrant authorizing the interception of communications if he is satisfied that the purpose is "related to the prevention or detection of espionage, sabotage or any other subversive activity directed against Canada or detrimental to the security of Canada." There is no reporting requirement respecting these secret warrants. All that is required is that the Commissioner of the RCMP report from time to time to the Solicitor General; other than that these secret warrants will never see the light of day.

In any event, what does the term "any other subversive activity" mean? Clearly, it means whatever the Solicitor General wants it to mean. Anything that varies from the status quo could be swept into the net under this elastic formula, whether it be taking a trip to Mainland China or reading the wrong kind of books or knowing the wrong kind of people, as defined by the Solicitor General. We need only contemplate the experience in the United States during the Red scare and deportations of the early twenties, the Red scare of the McCarthy era in the fifties, their disastrous Asian tragedy of the sixties in Viet Nam and the Pentagon papers revelations of the seventies, all of which resulted from the abuse of secret powers directed against subversive activity, to know how dangerous is this provision in the bill before us. The Solicitor General need not even apply to a judge for the issue of these warrants. He does not even report to parliament about his use of these absolute powers of secret surveillance. He need not state how many times he has exercised these powers.

Mr. Brewin: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would the learned member not agree that the words "subversive activity" have been held by the courts in the United States to be so vague and indefinite as to be unconstitutional?

Mr. Atkey: The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) is a constitutional authority for far greater notoriety than myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Brewin: Notoriety?

Mr. Atkey: I believe the statement you have made is correct.

The standing committee of the twenty-eighth parliament recognized the need for a strong power to guard against subversive activities. But the committee also recognized that parliament must be kept informed in order that it might assess the propriety of the use of the power which it grants and the effectiveness of the safeguards, so as to maintain vigilance in preventing the erosion of civil liberties. Yet this government has persisted in maintaining the same sort of secrecy that so characterized its methods of operation during the October crisis of 1970 when civil liberties were reduced to one of the lowest levels in Canadian history. Surely, something is wrong in the state of Canada at the present time if this is allowed to remain in the bill.

At the very minimum, parliament must be informed of the number of times the Solicitor General sees fit to use this dangerous power. Secret surveillance of the sort contemplated by this section has no place in a free and democratic society.

There is another glaring inconsistency in this bill, already referred to by the hon. member for Broadview, relating to the evidentiary provisions as to admissibility. This bill as drafted would preclude direct evidence obtained by illegal wiretapping from being admitted in court proceedings against the originator of the communication intercepted, but it would allow the fruits of such illegally obtained evidence to be admitted, that is the evidence obtained directly or indirectly as a result of information acquired by such illegal interception. In my view, this is totally inconsistent with any rational application of the exclusionary rules of evidence, no matter what the jurisdiction. Either you admit all evidence from illegal wiretapping or you exclude it all.

To exclude it is to admit that such a rule of evidence is necessary in order to control the behaviour of police and public officials in their use of wiretapping. To admit all such evidence, whether direct or indirect, is to leave to the discretion of the court the weighing of such evidence as to its relevance in the context of the case before it. But the legislation as it now stands contains a serious analytical defect. My own preference would be to exclude both direct and indirect evidence which has been obtained by illegal wiretaps, and I was encouraged to note that such an amendment was proposed following second reading by the standing committee of the last parliament and was narrowly defeated by a vote of six to five. Hopefully, this matter will be given serious reconsideration once again.

No further proof of the futility of the present provision is required than to refer to the evidence of the chief of police of Toronto on behalf of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police before the standing committee, there he indicated that in some 155 cases of wiretapping leading to criminal prosecutions in the courts in Toronto, in not one instance was the actual intercepted conversation used in prosecutions, but only the indirect evidence which was obtained as a result of having received that conversation. Clearly, the present evidentiary protection in the bill is totally illusory.

Perhaps the most debated aspect of this bill when it was before the last parliament and in committee was whether the final authorization for wiretapping by the police and public officials should be given by a judge, or by the Solicitor General or the Attorneys-General or persons designated by them. After much debate and division of opinion, the committee opted for the final authority to be given by a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction, but only after the request for authorization was initiated by the Attorney General, the Solicitor General or persons specially designated by them. Later the committee went on to broaden the range of judges who could provide this type of authorization. Included were all county and district court judges in Canada and all provincial court judges or judges of the sessions of the peace in the province of Quebec. I believe the term used in the legislation is "a judge as defined in Section 482 of the Criminal Code".

In my opinion, it was a mistake not to vest the final authority in those political officers who the public hold responsible for the conduct of the government in this country. It should be the Solicitor General or the Attorneys General who have the final say. The exercise of the power to grant authority to invade privacy can affect the critical balance between the government and people. Surely, then, the people must be able to hold a responsible minister to account for his use of the power. Under this bill, the minister can take shelter behind the judge's decision.

The bill provides that the Solicitor General, the Attorney General or agents designated by them will apply to a judge in a secret ex parte hearing for authorization to wiretap. In most cases it will be the agent applying, not the Solicitor General or the Attorney General. One can expect that most agents to be named would be justices of the peace, Crown Attorneys or even chiefs of police. In any event, all of the records of the application are sealed. Surely, this is a blatant abuse of the traditional judicial process. Secret ex parte hearings have no place in our judicial tradition, and they can place a judge in a very difficult and embarrassing position. This may well undermine the traditional function of our judiciary. The judges will have no data to go on other than a written accusation or statement of suspicion by the agent. They will not know both sides of the story and they are not allowed to weigh both sides. In other words, they are not judging; they are being told to make the minister's decision for him. Responsible police officials told the standing committee that they did not want to go to judges. They wanted the Solicitor General or the Attorney-General to take the responsibility, as he should under our parliamentary system. The idea of using a judge, I am told, is borrowed from the United States, and the experience there, as the hon. member for Broadview has pointed out, has been a sorry one.

A New York District Attorney noted recently that the police in his state seemed to know which judges required strict proof and which judges were to be avoided. Throughout Canada, there are 255 Supreme Court and Superior Court judges, 181 county and district court judges, and close to 200 provincial court judges in Quebec, well over 600 in all, who would be qualified to authorize wiretapping under this bill. There is no reason to believe that a similar type of judge shopping would not take place here. As one who prefers greater restrictions on authorized wiretapping, I would strongly urge the committee and this House to give reconsideration to vesting ultimate authority in the political officials, and not the judges.

A final concern with this bill is that the range of the offences for which wiretapping may be authorized by a judge may be unnecessarily broad. The standing committee proposed that the use of this power to lawfully intercept communications be limited to 19 extremely grave crimes, including the control of syndicated crime. Eighteen of the 19 offences listed by the committee carry possible penalties of 10 years or more in prison. This bill before us will allow the police to seek authorization to intercept communications in the case of any indictable offence. In other words, the extraordinary power of invasion of privacy could well become a routine investigative tool and, contrary to the recommendations of the standing committee, wiretapping could be used on such matters as petty theft, income tax evasion, impaired driving, the possession of marijuana and theft over and under $50. While I would not for a moment condone any of these offences or attempt to impair the attempts of law enforcement officials to arrest and convict people committing them, I would seriously question whether authorizing wiretapping for such matters is not really the equivalent of using a shotgun where a rifle would do.

In the same vein, I think that the demand of the Association of Chiefs of Police to extend wiretapping to summary conviction offences is an example of unnecessary and dangerous overreaching of law enforcement goals at the expense of civil liberties of the public generally. I sincerely hope that the committee will avoid this broad shotgun approach.

As one last matter, I want to express some reservation about the provision in the present bill permitting emergency permits to wiretap to be granted for up to 36 hours by an agent designated by the Solicitor General or the Attorney-General without the necessity of having to go before a judge. My fear is that in some provinces the use of such emergency permits may become more the rule than the exception, unless the Attorney General there takes an extremely firm position against such a practice. My own preference, if emergency permits must be part of the legislation, would be to require authorization by the Attorney-General or the Solicitor General personally. Otherwise, the bulk of authorized wiretapping activities may consist of 36-hour taps approved and then revoked by the local agents in each case. These are difficult to detect except ultimately through the Attorney General's annual report to be made public each year, but always after the event.

In closing, may I say that this is one of the most significant pieces of legislation to come before this House this session. It is to the minister's credit that he responded to the pressure applied by the opposition in committee last month and promptly came forward with this bill before Canada is faced with a situation similar to Watergate, with no legislative sanctions to remedy it.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to compliment the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) for what I regard as one of the very best speeches I have heard in this House. I have only been here since 1968, but it is one of the best speeches I have heard on the very important question of human liberty and the related subject of human privacy. I think it was an excellent speech. The question with which we are faced with respect to this bill really is part of the larger question of what limits if any are to be placed on human privacy. That question is a root question, a philosophical question, which must be faced by any society at any time in history. It is a question, however, which democratic societies are inclined to think they need not deal with because democracies, as forms of government, think they are not liable to the problem of the invasion of privacy associated with other types of regimes.

I find it unfortunate, in a sense, that this debate in this House at this time in the history of North America should in fact have aroused such little interest from the point of view of attendance in the House. I realize there are important matters which must be attended to and with which members have to deal. However, I think the attendance here is indicative of the attitude of many people, including Members of Parliament, toward the question of privacy and toward the question of human liberty itself. There is a basic assumption, so prevalent in our land as well as in others, that one need not be concerned about the question of a human right until one is hit personally or until one's group is hit. Then, there is a psychological response.

I suggest that the specific matter with which we are dealing now is one which could open up in a fundamental way the question of the invasion of privacy on the kind of systematic basis that was alluded to by the previous speaker; and in such a way in terms of its long-range consequence for Canadians that all of us in this House, if we cannot be here physically for this debate, should take great care in reading the debate and of course in looking at the bill with which we are dealing before we cast a final vote. Privacy is essential to individuality itself. It is fundamentally important to what is known as the integrity of the personality. This is a notion philosophically as old as the Greek philosophers and medieval theologians and as recent as the intellectual concern of the 20th century psychoanalysts. People as diverse as Plato, J. S. Mill, Bertrand Russell and Sigmund Freud have all recognized that without a sense of privacy, without a distinction between public concern, public involvement, community concern and community involvement on the one hand and the basic right in other instances to have privacy in one's life, that without this distinction being legitimatized and institutionalized in society what you really end up with is the abolition of individuality in people, the abolition of freedom and the abolition of creativity in the human being.

I try to avoid rhetoric as frequently as possible in my speeches and avoid exaggeration, but I think this type of issue is of just this importance. If we take steps in terms of the laws of this parliament which lead to the systematic invasion of privacy, we are really taking steps which can lead to the systematic elimination of the individuality in people. For the purpose of the debate, I define the right of privacy as the recognition of the legitimacy of man's right to think, to speak and to meet with people under circumstances from which all others but those whom he himself has selected are excluded. That, as I say, is privacy. As I have said, I see this as being essential to human individuality.

To state the opposite circumstance I think illustrates the case. That is, if we have a state in which no privacy is permitted, liberty and creativity are also non-existent. The most recent, in terms of the 20th century, standard works of art one cites for this are, of course, the works of Kafka and, in the English language, Huxley's "Brave New World" and George Orwell's "1984". The book "1984" I remind hon. members is a novel written by a man in this century who was responding not, as is frequently thought, simply to capital "C" communism but indeed to the possibility of any totalitarian society which has at its disposal the technological means of the total elimination of privacy. It has at its disposal the possibility, therefore, of the total control of the individual. I think the elimination of privacy, as I said a minute ago, leads clearly in that type of direction. The danger is that, as Canadians, we tend to associate that kind of danger simply with the Nazi regime with which Germany and western Europe had to live in the 1930's and until the mid-1940's. Or we think of Stalinist Russia as another form of totalitarianism.

However, the phenomenon of the threat of privacy is not to be restricted to those countries in those parts of the world. In my view, the United States at the present time is undergoing, in terms of its own internal life, its most significant crisis perhaps of this century as a democratic society. The United States now has the technology to totally invade the privacy of all her citizens virtually any time of the day or night. Not only that, but we are witnessing in what people all over the world have called "that great democracy," the United States, the fact that technology can be used by a democratically elected president, or if he has not authorized it directly himself it is clear that it has been used by officials appointed by him and directly responsible to him.

The point I am making is that in the United States there is the systematic use of modern, technologically sophisticated devices for the total invasion of people's privacy and hence of their freedom, and that is taking place not in a totalitarian society but in a democratic one. It is taking place in part—and this is an important point to make in the context of the central weakness of this bill which is to be found in clause 6 which gives such extraordinary powers to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), totally unimpeded by normal judicial processes—in a democratic country in the form of what is now known as the Watergate affair. It is taking place, I would argue, in part because the men and women who were directing the operation believed in the legitimacy of what they were doing. As de Toqueville said in the last century, and since by a number of other serious commentators, but de Toqueville was the first observer of mass democracy, he saw then the dangers of a democratic society using instruments or devices, because they believed in the overwhelming legitimacy of their case and had majority support, which other kinds of governments in previous times would have been reluctant to use.

The point is that in a democracy, precisely because we mobilize public support for causes, precisely because there is a danger that once you have the majority on your side you might point to those who disagree with that majority as being the enemy, as being in a sense alien, there is a danger of using the full support of a democratic majority to attack the roots of human freedom, namely the right to privacy. I, for one, believe that a lot of people acting under the orders of President Nixon, or—and I hope this turns out to be the case—under the orders of senior officials appointed by him, believe that it was right to spy on Senator McGovern, that it was right to violate the basic legal rights of Mr. Ellsberg, that it was right to engage in undermining the political processes because they believed that a man named McGovern was last year undermining the democratic objectives which the regime of the time was trying to further.

The point I am trying to make is that many of the Nixon officials did not believe that they were doing evil. They believed that Mr. McGovern somehow, instead of bringing peace for which he was working, was going to bring in a kind of society which was the very contradiction of what they thought was in the spirit of the basic American principles of democracy. As I see it, as a democrat in a democratic country, this is the kind of broader issue with which we should be concerning ourselves in this kind of debate. When we give, for example, under the provisions of clause 6 of the bill, the authority to the Solicitor General to use all the modern devices such as wiretapping to invade the privacy of individuals and of groups without going, at least initially, through the judicial route of applying to a superior court judge for a warrant or without having to consult any other person, I would argue that we are leaving ourselves open to the kind of situation which occurred in the United States. I stress the words "in principle", and I do not mean of course that the present Solicitor General or the present government would deliberately embark on such action.

I wish to repeat the point I was making a minute ago about democratic societies. I am convinced that a majority of the members of the U.S. Congress, if this debate were taking place in that chamber a year and a half ago, would have thought it inconceivable in principle that the systematic corruption which is now being revealed by the investigations of the Watergate affair could take place. The point, then, is that if we are going to justify, under certain extreme circumstances, the invasion of privacy, then we have to take extreme precautions in terms of the procedures that will be used by a democratically elected politician in so acting. I suggest that it is a glaring and unacceptable weakness of this bill that the Solicitor General can, relying on his own definition presumably, decide what is going to be defined as a "subversive activity directed against Canada", which is the wording in this bill. This can lead to the kind of thinking by certain eminent politicians in the United States which clearly enabled them psychologically, in a country which is now at the centre of world history, to perceive themselves as being profoundly threatened, not only from without but from within, and to use measures which we find totally unacceptable.

Therefore, to guard against that eventuality in Canada, I think that the minimum we need in terms of implementing the provisions of this part of the act is a safeguard provision that would make it mandatory, at the very least, that the Solicitor General obtain a warrant from a superior court judge and, beyond that, that he must provide to this parliament on a regular basis a full and documented report on all the instances in a given period when action has been taken under the provisions of clause 6 of this bill. If such a change is not made in the bill, judging from what the previous speakers from the Conservative and NDP groups have been saying, I am sure that we will not get this bill passed at all. I hope that the minister is listening with care to what hon. members are saying in this debate if he wants to get it passed.

There are two good provisions in the bill, and we join in praising the minister and his predecessor for prohibiting under this bill private wiretapping and the sale, possession or purchase of equipment to be used for that kind of activity. These are good provisions, but I have entered what I regard as a very important caveat. We expect a change in the provisions of clause 6 which enable the Solicitor General to act in much too sweeping a manner.

I want to conclude with a recent instance, not from American, German or Russian history, but one which occurred in Canada. About three weeks ago a conference was held in this city, Ottawa, organized by the Canadian Society for Industrial Security. It was a three day affair attended by representatives of Northern Electric, Cominco, International Harvester, Bell Telephone, Eaton's and a number of others. The ostensible purpose of it was to discuss security. We do not know what aspects of security because we were excluded from this conference by a group of Canadian businessmen who held it here in the capital city.

I went down to the conference. I was told that the assistant-commissioner of the RCMP, H. C. Draper, was to deliver a paper entitled, "The Threat from Subversive Elements." I was told that he was going to deal with subversive elements in the trade unions. As a Canadian and Member of Parliament, I thought it would be interesting to hear what an assistant-commissioner of the RCMP was going to say about Canadian workers to a group of businessmen. But when I got there I was barred entry. I was told that this was a security matter. I ask what kind of security matter it was. What right did the RCMP have to collect information on Canadians from one coast to the other, information which if revealed or spoken about outside this chamber would probably be subject to the laws of libel? And what right does a state police official, a senior one at that, have to divulge information of that kind about one group of Canadians to another group of Canadians? In this instance, I am told that it was about a group of Canadian workers in the trade union movement, and it was to be divulged to a group who usually are on the other side of the bargaining table, a group of businessmen who will be confronting the workers at different times when negotiating employment contracts. What can justify such action?

After this issue was raised in the House of Commons, I was pleased that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) informed me that there will be no more such conferences. But, Mr. Speaker, this body has met each year for the past number of years. This body of businessmen has been concerned ostensibly with security matters. It is little known in Canada. It is little talked about. The conference was interesting, not only in terms of the papers delivered but in terms of the literature that was made available, advertising courses which representatives of the companies could take. The literature included brochures from a certain institution in the United States inviting representatives of business companies to go there and learn all about bugging, to learn all about listening devices, to learn all about means of, in effect, spying on Canadians who work in offices and factories.

What I am concerned about in this context is that a national police force, the RCMP, should have had a spokesman at that conference, speaking about one group in our country and disclosing what, if used in a different context, could conceivably amount to libellous statements. There is no place in our society for our national police force to perform that kind of act. Little concern has been expressed about that matter by the average person, or by the Canadian newspapers. At times I am at a loss to understand the lack of concern about individual rights that is so widespread in our country. Little concern is expressed about these rights by institutions or people to whom one would look for some kind of leadership. I cite this as merely one instance, simply to show that in the broad course of history Canada is by no means Simon pure. We cannot, therefore, look at Watergate in the United States and say that nothing like that could happen here.

The speaker who preceded me said that the present provisions in the laws of Canada would make a Watergate a clear possibility here. I would like to say that this bill, which in part does deal in a positive way with the invasion of privacy, would still leave the possibility open to the Solicitor General of Canada to initiate the same kind of situation in Canada, and so long as that kind of legal possibility remains I do not think the bill merits support.

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, the re-introduction before this House of legislation governing electronic surveillance has been welcomed by virtually all commentators. I join in this general commendation, but would add the comment that such action is long overdue. The subject has received lengthy scrutiny in previous parliaments. At least three previous Justice and Legal Affairs Committees have heard evidence and considered the matter of wiretap legislation, as it is generally called. It would be redundant to examine fully all of the arguments for and against such legislation at this time, nor is it necessary at this stage to examine in depth all of the particulars of Bill C-176. But I do wish to make a few comments of a general nature on the bill before the House.

The nefarious practice of the invasion of the personal privacy of the individual, without his knowledge or consent and without the authority of law, is surely an area which should be the subject of the most stringent government legislation. Yet as the law now stands such practice is not illegal, is not contrary to the Criminal Code and is not, per se, even the subject of civil action in eight of the provinces of Canada. These facts are sometimes not recognized or not understood by some of those who view the introduction of such legislation only in its permissive aspects, that is, as the allowing of the electronic surveillance of private conversations by police agencies.

This bill should be looked upon, as it definitely is, as a codification of something which most people take for granted as a fundamental human right, that of protection of the personal privacy of the individual and his freedom from interference with his personal conversations, his comings and goings, and his private affairs. Perhaps because of the inherently despicable nature of wiretapping, of bugging and the use of electronic recording equipment to learn of private communications, the general public seems to assume that these practices are illegal. But not so, Mr. Speaker. Thus, legislation in this field is welcomed wholeheartedly. One can only wonder why it took the government so long finally to put together Bill C-6 of the last parliament and now Bill C-176, the latter being substantially the same as the former.

In proposing rules and regulations of this type, however, the government must resolve the age-old and perhaps insoluble conundrum which faces the law when dealing with matters of this nature, the conflict which results when the interests of the individual are pitted in opposition to the interests of society as a whole. The extent and limitations of each, and the degree to which a contemporary society feels the already hazy line between the two should shift one way or the other, is a dilemma which has been faced by lawmakers in free countries over the centuries. A variation of this question is seen presently, especially in the United States, in the debate being waged over the freedom of the press to report, and thus the public to be informed, when such right may conflict with the right of the individual to receive a fair and equitable trial under the law. Thus, this bill must determine clearly for the courts the extent to which, and under what conditions, the public, through its authorized agencies may encroach upon the privacy of the individual.

It cannot be said that one right is paramount over the other, although we must start from the premise that the right of the individual to privacy is a fundamental human freedom which cannot be subrogated arbitrarily. But, to the extent that conflicting interests are diametrically opposed, there must be some compromise. The areas where clearly each is paramount must be spelled out and the hitherto hazy no man's land must be clearly defined. This bill, as did its predecessor, has attempted to achieve this goal in several commendable ways. First, it establishes as a criminal offence punishable by up to five years imprisonment, the use of electronic devices to intercept private communications without the consent of those involved. This operative section obviously refers to the wiretapping of telephone calls, the most common type of interception, but is broad enough to include the use of hidden microphones, long distance microphones and hidden recording devices. To these extents, it establishes as part of our codified law, the right of an individual to privacy.

Second, the bill permits exceptions to the general rule in the case of police and other security agencies, provided authority has been obtained to do so in accordance with the Criminal Code. The significant feature of this provision is the fact that the onus is clearly on those who wish to except themselves from criminal sanction, to establish the necessity to resort to such methods of collecting evidence. The application for the authority is made to a judge and must be signed by the Attorney-General of the province or his personally delegated agent. This requirement of political approval, which was not contained in the former Bill C-6, is an attempt to meet the objections of a number of groups and individuals who have commented on the old bill. Groups with as traditionally disparate points of view as the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, however, managed to agree on this point.

The CACP brief to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs stated:

> The responsibility for the issuance of permits or warrants must rest with the elected representatives and not with the judiciary . . .

The civil liberties brief submitted to the committee on this point concludes:

> We submit that the initiative for wire tapping application should reside with a political authority such as the Attorney General . . .

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the Bill C-176 has been changed apparently to achieve this effect. In fact, under the bill, electronic surveillance authorization would require the consent of the Attorney General or his agent and a judge. In the tried and true tradition of Liberal governments, they have tried to satisfy everyone and be all things to all men. But in the process they have compromised themselves into an error—one of the few in this legislation.

The whole question of the invasion of the sacredness of individual privacy is extremely delicate in nature. Its use or non-use should be determined by someone who is immediately accountable to the people—in other words only the Attorney General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand). A judge and our judicial system together with all of its built-in safeguards for those accused of crime, will eventually become involved in the process when examining the evidence adduced as a result of the wiretap. But the initial infringement of the state into the individual's private communications is a decision of the highest political order. It should, therefore, be made only by a politician, after which it may be the subject of public scrutiny and criticism in the public forum of a legislature or parliament. It follows, further, from this argument that the Attorney General should not be permitted to delegate this authority or if he is to be permitted to do so, such delegation should be to a severely limited number of individuals only and who would be known to the public either by name or position.

The bill in its present forms permits the delegation of this function, which should be properly that of an Attorney General, to as many agents as he so chooses. Presumably these could include every Crown Attorney, justice of the peace, or even chief of police in the province of the Attorney-General if he so wished. Clearly, there must be some statutory restraint in this area, either by the limitation of the function of granting such permission to the Attorney-General only or at least a limitation of the number of agents he may appoint, to a publicly known few. Surely, it is not anticipated that the use of such investigatory methods will be so broad as to unduly take up the time of a provincial Attorney General in examining the signing consents to proceed. And surely there can be few pursuits of greater importance to an Attorney General than the determination of such fundamental questions as the rights of the individual to prevent the indiscriminate delegation of this most important and onerous responsibility as the bill now does is wrong and ought not to be part of the legislation.

Five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Mr. O'Connor.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ADVISABILITY OF DESIGNATING ST. HYACINTHE AS A SPECIAL AREA

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of taking steps under the appropriate programmes to designate Saint-Hyacinthe as a special area in order to provide for the economic expansion of Saint-Hyacinthe by means of incentives to its industries; to bring about substantial industrial growth; and, by means of financial aid, to construct community facilities such as water, sewers, roads, and schools.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my great honour to introduce this motion in the hope that its importance for the population of Saint-Hyacinthe will be apparent to all my colleagues and will obtain the necessary approval, thus breaking with the unfortunate tradition by which such motions are debated to death, or until the debaters are exhausted.

Mr. Prud'homme: That is what will happen!

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I note the words of the member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), who says: "That is what will happen!" It will be a sorry thing for the constituency of Saint-Hyacinthe if that does happen.

Mr. Speaker, I should like right away to say what should be the spirit of this debate. We should take steps to have the Saint-Hyacinthe region designated as a "Special area", so as to provide economic development, and give a considerable boost to the agricultural, manufacturing and industrial sectors; that, briefly, is the spirit behind my presentation of this motion.

Through the words of its Member of Parliament, the whole population, the whole Saint-Hyacinthe area is now asking the federal government, first to help it boost the industries that area already there, second to help it bring new businesses to it, and lastly, to help it bring about improvements in its community services.

The citizens of the Saint-Hyacinthe economic "sub-area" can ask for a special intervention by the federal government with legitimate pride, for they have first helped themselves.

In the opinion of economists, the manpower of my riding is, and rightly so, recognized as stable and reliable. The infrastructures are in place, all ready to receive and support expansion projects or any new development plan.

The mayors of municipalities, particularly Mayor Grégoire Girard of Saint-Hyacinthe, most municipal councils, the secretary treasurers or clerks, the agencies honourably representing our workers, the Chamber of Commerce, the Industrial Development Board and its dedicated officers, and, finally, the local news media well rooted in the riding, such as CKBS, Le Nouveau Clairon and Le Courrier, or because this paper also serves our riding, La Voix de l'Est, they all support us, they all stand behind me as far as the submission of this request is concerned, rather, I should say, they are before me, because they preceded me.

They and others believed in the potential of Saint-Hyacinthe and, as early as 1969-70, they fought with my deserving predecessor, the hon. Théogène Ricard, to secure justice for Saint-Hyacinthe. I am quite aware of the fact that the Saint-Hyacinthe file is already bulky and significant in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The former minister, now Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), will recall having received on April 20, 1970, an impressive delegation from Saint-Hyacinthe, led by the common front of that have-not area. The minister, although he did not grant the request of the delegates, recognized that the situation was unfortunate for the Saint-Hyacinthe area, stating, and I quote:

> The situation is abnormal and dangerous.

Mr. Speaker, three years after this April 1970 action of its common front, Saint-Hyacinthe is still in a bad way. Because of its designation as a "C" area, Saint-Hyacinthe offers little interest for the expansion of industry. Granby and Drummondville, closely related to Saint-Hyacinthe as to industrial stagnation, because of certain qualifications—so much the better for those towns and areas—have been designated as "B" areas. This, these two sub-areas, which are close neighbours are more attractive to industries wishing to locate south of Montreal.

On another plane, the decision taken by the minister in charge of housing on August 14, 1969, to bring an abrupt end to the urban renewal program has been dearly paid by the people of the Saint-Hyacinthe area in particular. Urban renewal studies had then cost the city of Saint-Hyacinthe $11,000, and the other levels of government $33,000. What is more, Mr. Speaker, the federal government's refusal at the time to allow the program to go ahead, would have caused at least a delay in the economic development of Saint-Hyacinthe and its surroundings. Building, business and, quite simply, all industry could have been boosted with investments.

What lies ahead for Saint-Hyacinthe is even more disquieting. The study by the Quebec Planning and Development Bureau suggests that in the south of Montreal, in areas like Valleyfield and Saint-Hyacinthe, unemployment and stagnation have set in for a long time. The study carried out by the National Institute for Scientific Research even says, and I quote:

> There will be very little increase in employment in Bagot, as the economy is predominantly agricultural. Unless there is some exchange with neighbouring counties, or some definitive migration, this part of the federal county of Saint-Hyacinthe will have a high rate of unemployment.
> In the (provincial) counties of Saint-Hyacinthe and Rouville, the available manpower will seek work elsewhere because of the slow growth of employment.

In a word, the outlook seems favourable only in the constituencies located to the south of Montreal, along the river, from Chauteauguay to Sorel, and in the areas around Granby and Drummondville.

However—as the minister knows very well—the urban area of Saint-Hyacinthe, to name but one, has at least as many advantages as Granby. Indeed, from 1966 to 1971, Granby, whose town councillors must here be commended for their dynamism, created at least three times as many new jobs as Saint-Hyacinthe and Valleyfield together.

All this brings us to wonder whether the distance from Montreal is a very valid criterion for a zone to be designated or not by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

At a time when it is about to renew its programs, it is fitting to call the Department of Regional Economic's attention to certain features.

First of all, considering Quebec as a whole, it is obvious that the province needs a master plan, and also close consultation with provincial and municipal authorities and with the main intermediary bodies concerned.

Considering the situation of Saint-Hyacinthe specifically the department should be made aware of the urgent need for more equitable administration of the master plan, particularly regarding neighbouring Granby and Drummondville and for greater autonomy in relation to Montreal itself.

That, Mr. Speaker, is why in my plea—and it is a plea—on behalf of the population of Saint-Hyacinthe, I should just like to point out a few reforms the department could consider implementing.

In the first place, consideration should be given to a contingency for regional stabilisation fund. This would be an instrument for assistance through public investments to industrial towns at times of economic crisis or when industrial economy is functioning normally, to towns dealing mainly in services.

Government interventions should be concentrated in locations which have better opportunities, due to their own facilities, to resist the Montreal attraction, especially Saint-Hyacinthe, to name one among others.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that Montreal should become an economic monstrosity or any such thing. Not at all. It would be advisable, for example, to consider the possible substitution of regional industrial parks for municipal industrial parks. We should for example consider industrial diversification which must also become a more inportant criterion of regional development.

From another point of view, Mr. Speaker, the partly agricultural vocation of Saint-Hyacinthe must hold the attention of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. We must consider the possibility of producing beef in the Montreal area and as again suggested by the National Institute for Scientific Research the other Quebec farming districts would recover most of the manufacturing milk production from the Montreal area. And above all, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, when it does consider the case of Saint-Hyacinthe in particular, will have to think about the definite establishment of a food farming industry, for sure, which will eventually create new jobs at home.

And before concluding this much too succinct analysis, I would like, still in the perspective of the economic development of Saint-Hyacinthe, to remind the government ministers about these urgent requirements: first, an urgent requirement for an expansion of the veterinary medicine school in Saint-Hyacinthe; second, an urgent requirement for a federal legislation concerning the production of sugar beets in order to enable farmers of my riding, in particular, as well as the Saint-Hilaire refinery, to enjoy more stable and considerable incomes; third, as requested by the Chamber of Commerce of Saint-Hyacinthe and the municipality of Beloeil, among others, to proceed with the integral of partial development of a master plan for an express transport system linking Montreal, Beloeil, Saint-Hyacinthe and the other municipalities involved.

Mr. Speaker, I become here only the spokesman for the people of the Saint-Hyacinthe area to ask, in closing, to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that, in the decisions he will soon render in conjunction with the Quebec provincial government, Saint-Hyacinthe be considered very seriously as a "special area".

There are nonetheless some factors that are obvious. The rate of unemployment which last June was 13.2 per cent; the fact that the regional industries are unable to absorb the ever growing number of young people who complete their education and want to join the labour force; the fact that the district of Saint-Hyacinthe is classed as zone "C" by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which places it in a lower position than the neighbouring cities of Granby and Drummondville, which, in fact, are not much farther from Montreal than Saint-Hyacinthe. All these, and many others that I will be glad to give to the minister by hand, plead in favour of Saint-Hyacinthe.

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker, I would be grateful if this plea were not without results. I want to continue increasing the contacts I have already established with the minister himself and with the officials of the department, in order to multiply industries in the Saint-Hyacinthe constituency, to make maximum use of resources available at the federal level and, finally, to reach the point where this worthy cause of the Saint-Hyacinthe population will be heard, accepted and fostered by the officers of the department, not only for the benefit of the people of Saint-Hyacinthe but for the benefit of all our fellow citizens.

[Mr. Wagner.]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) for the brilliant plea he has just made to have his area designated as a special area. It is my humble opinion that the department is now looking for reasons which could warrant the designation of areas in most of low growth areas in Canada.

In my first speech to this House I talked about my area. I note that what was pointed out a while ago by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe strangely ressembles what is happening in my riding of Sherbrooke; the unemployment figures are the same. During the last two and a half years, or even three, studies were made by university researchers as well as the Sherbrooke city council to have the department designate the Sherbrooke area and, on a larger scale, the Eastern Townships as a special area.

We know quite well that our area—here I am thinking mainly of the Sherbrooke area—is in great need of secondary industries. As early as 1954 we developed a tertiary sector which, in my humble opinion, stands second to none in other big Quebec cities. The University of Sherbrooke as well as the University Medical Centre have contributed for a large part to the development of our area.

But if we consider what has been done in the field of processing industries we realize that in the past 10 years, if we figure out the number of industries which settled in the area and the number of those which left, we are minus one. Therefore, our area as well as that of Saint-Hyacinthe have been disfavoured in that respect in comparison to other areas of the country.

In my humble opinion—and I hope the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe will forgive me—the Eastern Townships and more particularly the area of Sherbrooke which is the queen of the Eastern Townships is in the great need of industries and its designation as special area would help enormously in setting up an infrastructure which would allow secondary industries which we lack to settle there.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has indicated a few minutes ago that almost 13 per cent of the population was unemployed in his region. We have the same figure for the Sherbrooke region. However, we have a problem in our region which perhaps is not found in that of Saint-Hyacinthe since it is close to the metropolis of Canada, and it has benefitted for many years from some developments on the outskirts of Montreal; Saint-Hyacinthe has even been described as being or becoming a bedroom town, and I agree with the member for Saint-Hyacinthe when he says that development is much slower when such things happen.

Mr. Speaker, I will support such a motion provided the Eastern Townships be designated at the same time, that is to say that slow growing regions include—and that is the responsibility of the department—all developing regions—and let us put these words between quotation marks—"of Quebec and the east of our country" as well as other regions which have been disadvantaged in many respect because of big poles of growth.

Mr. Speaker, while I agree with the proposal of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, I think that representations now being made by the department to the government of the province of Quebec will have some results, aware as I am that a "special area" cannot be designated without the approval of provinces, and that during the next few weeks, the premier of Quebec as well as the federal Minister of Regional Expansion (Mr. Jamieson)—

Mr. Prud'homme: —as well as the parliamentary secretary!

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): —and the parliamentary secretary will hold discussions to gain an insight into what can be done about slow growing regions in the province of Quebec. I hope that at that time, not only the city of Saint-Hyacinthe but that of Sherbrooke as well will be considered, since we have been making representations for three years already to the minister so that our region be taken into account. I am not the only one to say so; studies made recently by the Quebec Planning and Development Bureau show that the Eastern Townships are economically ill, need a lot of economic assistance as well as an input of capital. This could be done by designating our region as a "special area".

[English]

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I express sympathy with the two hon. members who are seeking to have their particular areas designated under the auspices of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. If this debate were to continue for two or three days, I am sure every Member of Parliament from every corner of the country would like to see his area designated. This does not speak well for the last one hundred years of economic development in Canada, though it does speak well for members who present a case for their areas.

I would point out to the hon. members who have spoken that a year or two ago the government proposed to deal with the question of the designation of areas under the DREE program. There has been, since then, a suspension of that revision process. Certainly, the two cases presented by the preceding speakers ought to be reviewed by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson). I am not well acquainted with those areas, but undoubtedly some day I shall enjoy visiting them. I do say that the question of the revision of designated areas should be dealt with by the minister as soon as possible.

There are certainly questions which need to be asked in terms of designation as they relate to unemployment, to the migration of population from rural areas to urban areas and the continuation of that migration in many parts of the country. If you look at my home province of Saskatchewan you will find that the designated area might well be expanded across most of the north. There are only two areas picked out for designation, in a sense; one in Meadow Lake and one east of Saskatoon. They happen to cover the two seats which were held by two Liberals in that province, but I will not go into that.

The question of regional expansion is one with a far more expansive perspective than merely where lines were drawn in terms of incentive grants. There is a real need for a review and revaluation of those very grants to determine how effective they have been in regional development. If you study the statistics related to poverty in Canada, if you studies the statistics related to development in areas which have been economically deprived in this country, you will find, Mr. Speaker, that in the last four years in the operation of regional development there has been no substantial change in the situation in those regions of Canada which need development, that is to say, regions which lie outside the Ontario golden horseshoe.

We need far more concrete answers about the operation of this program than we have been getting from the minister so far in the committee on regional development. We have had no information about the evaluation of the program which supposedly has been taking place in the last three years. There has been no indication of when those studies are to take place. The minister stated in his forty-page statement to the committee when the committee was dealing with the department that there would be a reevaluation, a redefinition of the type of grants given, a decentralization of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. He stated that the question of equity would be dealt with.

I need only refer to the Ottawa Citizen of April 5 of this year in which the minister is reported as saying that DREE might take back shares in aided firms. There has been no answer whatsoever from the minister to these questions as they relate to economic expansion. I hope that when the committee begins again tomorrow we shall get assurances as to an evaluation of this program up until this point in time. This is needed in order to improve it and develop it for the future. An assessment should be made showing how many of these grants have in fact been give-aways. The minister stated that 70 per cent of the grants made so far were needed in order to create jobs. This simply means that 30 per cent was, in a sense, not needed and that the jobs would have been created anyway. This could represent a loss or a waste in a sense to the Canadian taxpayer of some $100 million. I am sure the new minister is sincere. He comes from a region which itself needs assistance. He has to give the committee some concrete evidence on which to work, a concrete proposal to convince us there is to be some redirection of this department which has come under such severe criticism in the last few years.

We have heard a great deal in answer to questions in the House and in committee to the effect that certain things will be done or will be considered, but we have not received from this department one concrete proposal, other than in respect of decentralization, for real change in the future. I hope the committee will deal with the criteria to be used in the designation of areas, as well as with the question of whether the federal government should take action in respect of equity in the use of Canadian tax dollars in spite of the pleas of multinational corporations. This matter is particularly important in respect of publicly-owned corporations in all parts of the country.

The committee should also deal directly with the freight rate structure as it affects regional development. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) was previously minister of transport and knows the effect of the freight rate structure on my area of the country, on northern Ontario and the Maritimes. Prominent people have told me that when it comes to developing industry in southern Saskatchewan such as distilling and using products from the area, the fundamental obstacle is not lack of incentives or grants for regional development but freight rates on the finished product. If policies of regional development are to work they must take into account questions such as transportation.

I could make a long speech about the effectiveness of DREE grants, but I would sum up by saying that in many instances, although not all, these grants represent nothing more than corporate write-offs. I hope the committee will in the coming weeks inquire into the equity of our transportation policy and will obtain concrete proposals from the minister and his assistants for the development of a truly regional development program.

During our discussions on designation of areas I hope the matter of unemployment will be seriously taken into account. In addition, I hope the question of the emigration of regional population will be taken into account. Hon. members from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, as well as members from the Prairies, know it is not easy to assess the unemployment situation in these areas because of the movement of population to industrial centres resulting from lack of employment in regional areas. This situation must also be considered.

Designation should not be based on only one economic year. A good example of this is found in the western regions where because of grain sales by the Canadian Wheat Board the economy of one year may be relatively high yet within less than a year it can take a severe drop. One year of adverse weather conditions can result in substantial economic change in some areas. When it comes to designation, consideration should be given to the instability of certain economies within Canada.

In conclusion, I wish the hon. member well in his attempt to obtain for his area recognition under DREE. I hope that in the weeks before the summer recess we will receive concrete proposals from the minister. If we believe these proposals represent a move in the right direction, I can promise the House that we will not be as critical as in the past; we will openly welcome any substantial changes in this direction.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I was indeed pleased to hear the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) indicate that he will not be as critical in the future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Provided you do something.

Mr. Blais: I was pleased that the hon. member for Assiniboia, who is one of our more active members on the committee on regional economic expansion, participated effectively in this debate. However, I hope his initial criticism, probably unjustified, will not mislead him in future discussions to frustrate the studies being conducted by that committee. I am sure he recognizes that the program being reviewed by the committee, pursuant to the declaration of the minister, was initiated in 1969 and that some time must be taken in order to ascertain its effects. I agree that there will have to be some amelioration of the program.

I come from an area similar to that of the hon. member for Assiniboia and I hope that in the future we will be able to work together to adopt the best measures for our respective regions. I am pleased, in view of the initial criticism of the hon. member for Assiniboia, to note how readily the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) agreed on the effectiveness of DREE as put into effect by the government. As a result of his ability to argue and plead his case with sincerity, we are convinced that he really believes this program is of great economic benefit.

However, I was somewhat apprehensive about the intentions of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) since his motion was placed on the order paper on January 12, 1973, while he was asked to introduce it on three occasions, namely on February 5, on February 19 and on March 19. And each time since he would not introduce it, I kept thinking that he was reluctant to seek for his constituency the program's advantages since he thought that maybe this program was not so good.

In the light of the comments he made immediately prior to the intervention of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight), it is evident that he has great confidence in the program and in looking at his "rejuvenated" appearance and at his tan, I realize that he simply wanted to go on a vacation and rebuild the strength he needed to bring forth his arguments with his well-known eloquence.

In any case, I thank him for having supported the governmental program and I would like him to try and convince the members of the committee who are from his party of the merits of the governmental policy because in spite of my brief experience in this committee, I have realized that there are some objections to the program.

I should also like to indicate that today, when I realized that the motion was going to be introduced, I hastened to take the floor, because I am against, in principle, urban areas like Saint-Hyacinthe, which is only 25 miles from Montreal, being offered special assistance whereas the far northern areas like mine and those of Northern Quebec, are denied these advantages. I want to oppose the motion of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, because I believe that the available funds to encourage economic expansion are limited and that they should be affected to areas which should be able to ensure in the future a development which is likely to favour all the other areas in Canada.

Moreover, I would simply like to say that the Saint-Hyacinthe area has the same advantages as the Montreal area. In fact, as of December 31, 1972, the Department had offered ten grants which were accepted by applicants in Saint-Hyacinthe. The amounts involved totaled $618,000 and was to create 281 direct jobs. The Saint-Hyacinthe riding as a whole accounted for, as of December 31, 1972, 16 grants offered and accepted, for a total amount of $763,591 and 425 direct jobs having been created.

To designate Saint-Hyacinthe as a "special area" for financial aid purposes, both for infrastructure building and, after June 1973, for maintaining of subsidies to industry, is a question which deserves the greatest attention within the economic structures of the Montreal area and of the province as a whole.

And I want precisely to talk about that subject because the whole of the Montreal area is considered as one economic region. If we start offering special advantages to what in fact are the dormitory areas of that large urban centre, we could be in far trouble. We know—and I would have believed that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe who has once been a member of the provincial government and a member of another party should have known that—that large sections of the province of Quebec do need financial assistance, as does all my own area. And again on the subject of my own area, I will say that it is just like any area in Northern Quebec. Let me quote from the report the minister filed with the committee when he appeared for the first time. This is what it said:

> In a large area of the province, encompassing the bulk of provincial territory and almost 800,000 people, economic performance has been more like that of Manitoba or New Brunswick than that of the rest of Ontario. Northern Ontario has experienced a growth rate in population of less than one per cent per year throughout the decade of the 1960's, slightly below the average for the Atlantic region. It tends to be characterized by a dual economy comprising urban centres such as Thunder Bay, Sault Ste. Marie, Sudbury, North Bay and Timmins, where incomes are at or above national averages, and rural and remote areas and resource towns, where incomes tend to be substantially below the Canadian average and where economic growth depends almost entirely upon primary resource production.

And this area is not designated as a special area, as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe would like for his own area.

Mr. Speaker, I am truly sorry to hear from the honourable member for Saint-Hyacinthe, that there was a 13 per cent unemployment rate in his riding last winter. I deeply sympathize with those people who were so badly tried. However, his is a metropolitan region, and he has access to the provincial government, and he knows very well that the program he wishes to see implemented requires a preliminary agreement between the provincial and the federal governments. True enough, he knows several of the members sitting in the Quebec national assembly and he could certainly approach them and ask for assistance.

Obviously, the motion before us requires to be very seriously considered and I think that all those who took part in the debate have done so.

Mr. Speaker, I only want to say, as every one speaks about his own church belfry, that mine needs to be repainted and that the sound of the bell is not as clear as it should be. In fact, in my area as in most other areas of the country there is a need, not only for temporary stimulants but for one that will favour providing a substructure enabling the manufacturing industry to settle down permanently.

As the Minister of Regional Economic Development has very ably indicated, Northern Ontario has to be developed in order to provide for the development of the far-northern areas of the Western provinces, including Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. And, in fact, it is in my area that the mid-Canada passage, as we now call it, will be developed.

Mr. Speaker, I have been very happy to take this opportunity once again to bring not only my riding and its problems but also all the surrounding regions to the attention of the whole country.

Let's come back to the riding of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. At the outset of discussions held in 1969 and 1970 with the Quebec government concerning the designation of special areas in the province, they deemed advisable not to concentrate efforts on the Montreal region, because the employment situation in Montreal and the neighbouring areas had not yet deteriorated enough to warrant its designation under one of the departmental programs. Since then, chronic unemployment has spread to all Quebec regions and the provincial unemployment rate climbed from 6.9 per cent in 1969 to 8.2 per cent in 1972 and 8.3 per cent in 1972. Consequently, since January 1971, the Montreal region is eligible for financial assistance under the industrial incentive grants program. In March 1971, the region of the new Montreal international airport was added to the four existing "special areas".

Whether the Montreal region will be eligible, after June 1973, for some kind of industrial incentives or whether "special areas" will designated is a question that will be dealt with in the program review undertaken by the department.

Mr. Speaker, needless to say, this will be done with the co-operation of the provincial government and, here again, I encourage the member for Saint-Hyacinthe to address himself to it in order to obtain the advantages he is entitled to.

If the economic situation of the province, and particularly that of the Montreal area of which Saint-Hyacinthe is part, does not improve considerably in the next few months, certain steps will surely have to be taken with regard to Montreal and vicinity.

So, once again, Mr. Speaker, we discuss the fact that we must absolutely find out what will be the results of the general policy of the government as regards its economic expansion program. We are still in its early stages; we must absolutely find out how those amounts of money will be spent and what the results will be. This applies to the Montreal area as well as to other urban and rural communities throughout Canada.

Still, it goes without saying—and I will not budge from my position—this program should be oriented towards the development of the far and middle north. The program must indeed strive towards the economic development and decentralization of our industrial "effort".

Mr. Speaker, I have just been told that other hon. members wish to speak. I merely want to say that Canada is a vast country, that the regional development policy is wise, and that in the next few years we should see to it that even more public funds are assigned to it.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I followed very closely, as did most of my colleagues in this House, the observations of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). I believe he fulfilled his task very spiritedly, making representations that go beyond the usual requests and that are based on what is going on in Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, who is obviously fully informed about the various regional development programs, knows I am sure that it is in a joint action with provinces that special areas can be designated. His representations to the federal Parliament, to the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson), as well as the urgent pleas, the daily representations from the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), who is also asking that the Sherbrooke area be designated as a special area, are obviously well received by the minister.

I must say however that, when it comes to comparing one area with another and given the choice between the Saint-Hyacinthe area, which is very close to Montreal, and the Sherbrooke area—obviously the decision would be difficult to make and non-partisan I believe—I wonder if we might not conclude that it is more urgent to designate that area. But since there has to be priorities everywhere, I believe, as regards the Sherbrooke area, that the representations have come to such a point at the provincial and federal levels, that it would very probably be designated before that of Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, and rightly so—

Mr. Yvon L'Heureux (Chambly): Why not both? The Saint-Hyacinthe area borders on my constituency.

Mr. Prud'homme: The hon. member for Chambly, who would surely have representations to make to have his area designated, says "Why not both"? Theoretically, Mr. Speaker, why not all the slow-growth areas in Canada? However, I hope that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe who, on many occasions, always raises the question of the privileged situation of Montreal, has nothing against the urban constituencies vis-à-vis the semi-rural constituency he wants to represent.

On several occasions, statements by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe have scared me because he consistently alludes to the seemingly privileged situation of Montreal and the Montreal area vis-à-vis the Saint-Hyacinthe area and the semi-rural constituencies. Of course, I will not attribute him any political consideration; maybe after having eliminated the whole Montreal area from the Progressive Conservative election map he would rather concentrate his energy on the rural or semi-rural areas. In any event, his own strategy is up to him.

However, I would like to tell him a few convincing facts and I will refer to a speech delivered by the minister to the Standing Committee on Regional Economic Expansion to the effect that contrary to the rest of Canada, the Montreal region is extraordinarily sensitive to any economic change. When you know that 56 per cent of the Quebec population lives within the Montreal region, that 65 per cent of provincial taxes are paid by the Montreal region, and that 72 per cent of the manufactured products and industrial labour are in Montreal, you must conclude that the Montreal situation is most important to regional development.

I hope that, in the mind of the member for Saint-Hyacinthe, it will be possible to reconcile his justified requests in favour, of course, of the Saint-Hyacinthe constituency which he now represents here with the basic interests of the Montreal region which is, as I always say, the center of eastern Canada. Surely Montreal is the economic center of all eastern Canada and should the Montreal economy collapse all eastern Canada would be in jeopardy, including of course the Saint-Hyacinthe constituency. I hope that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair, until eight p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, prior to private members' hour I was pointing out what in my opinion is the one major flaw in this bill, that is, the provision to refer an application for authorization to wiretap to a combination of both a judge and the attorney general of a province. I feel this requirement as set out in the bill is the result of an attempted compromise by the government to satisfy those proponents of authorization being granted by a judge and at the same time to satisfy those proponents of authorization being granted by an attorney general.

In its attempt to compromise, the government has tried to spread the responsibility for making decision. It is neither that alone of the attorney general, his agent or a judge, but of both or perhaps all of them. This approach, in my opinion, is a worse alternative than leaving the decision solely to a judge. At least then one person alone is responsible for the decision taken. The bill now invites a buck-passing exercise with perhaps no one being accountable for a foolish or harmful use of the authority.

If we recognize that the individual's right to privacy can only be interfered with in the event of public necessity where harm to the public or members of it will possibly follow without its use, then someone must be directly responsible for ensuring that individual rights are protected. The buck must stop somewhere. In my opinion it should be with the Attorney General or Solicitor General alone.

The bill quite properly limits the duration of the use of individual instances of electronic surveillance, requires periodic public accounting of the use of such electronic devices and allows the emergency use of the right to intercept a communication where circumstances do not permit a formal application to be made. There is provision for the awarding of damages to a person aggrieved by one convicted of employing electronics surveillance equipment contrary to the bill, and this again is commendable.

The thrust of the bill, with which I agree, is to make an offence the odious practice of intercepting private conversations except where such practices are necessary in the combating of crime, and only then after close scrutiny and authorization by a properly designated and responsible person. The increasing sophistication of criminal activities and organized, syndicated crime, all equipped with mechanical and electronic equipment, demands that police agencies be allowed the use of equally effective equipment. If the rights of the individual can be safeguarded by judicious and scrutinized use of such equipment, then such use should be a permitted exception to the general prohibition. But for the reasons I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is necessary that the person responsible for the decision to allow the use of such investigatory methods must be the Attorney General or the Solicitor General of Canada.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, much of what has been said by my colleagues in this debate so far has gone to the merits or demerits of the bill and has dealt with some of the particular facts and circumstances of the proposals. I think the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), the hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor) and the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) have dealt exceptionally well with the detail of the bill and I associate myself to a considerable extent with what they have said. I do want to point out that in our examination of this bill we must not forget that it does in fact constitute an extension of the right of the state to secure from people involuntary information or involuntary statements.

I know that the minister said, and I accept his statement, that there is a limitation on the extent to which information derived from electronic surveillance and so-called bugging can be taken. Nevertheless, by this bill there is an extension of the right of government, the right of the state to secure information which in the past it might have had the legal right but certainly it did not have the moral right to obtain.

In my view, in the long run, particularly after the circumstances which we have seen displayed in recent days in other parts of the world, there is a growing body of public opinion opposed to invasion of privacy by means which are unknown to the people whose statements are being obtained in that way. All through the centuries states have attempted to secure facts and information by involuntary means. Any historical examination of this phenomenon will go back to the days of the Inquisition. I do not limit only to the Inquisition but I use the Inquisition as an example, as an historical incident best known to people in the modern day who have read about it. Many methods have been used in an attempt to secure information—by force and by torture both mental and physical. Over the years a repugnance has grown up to this form of acquiring facts and information even in the course of securing information for the prosecution of criminal offences and protecting society.

There has been this conflict. You need to protect society, it is true, but you need to do it by means which are acceptable, not repugnant, to the individual. You may sometimes gain by purporting to guard the state but you may lose infinitely more through the means of securing that information if you brutalize society and the individuals engaged in obtaining it. Before and during the last war we saw evidence of this in the totalitarian states. There are totalitarian states today, of course. I am not going to go into detail about them, but it is common knowledge that they are engaged in securing information not only by electronic surveillance but by other means as well.

This constant struggle has not been won nor, I suppose, will it ever be won because of the very nature of government and the innate character of any kind of government. I confess quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, that if I were a member of a government I would not trust such methods without taking steps to ensure that the strongest possible protection was taken through checks and balances and countervailing forces. What we have here is simply an extension of that principle. When this debate is over, it is true that within the four corners of the bill will be found certain restrictions upon the extent to which the state can go to secure information, without the knowledge of the people involved, by means of electronic and mechanical devices of surveillance. In the result, we will have codified a right of government. By this bill we are saying, in effect, that government has a right to certain types of information without the knowledge, suspicion or consent of the people involved, the right to secure information and statements from them by means of such devices.

I would like this bill to have contained a preamble stating that it is contrary to the rights of the people of this land that there be any electronic surveillance, bugging of any kind except subject to certain exceptions; in other words, an extension of the Bill of Rights. The bill should start on the basis that it is wrong, it is improper, it is not the right of government to secure information by these means unless subject to certain rules. We do not have that; we have a recognition by this bill, not only by implication but by expressed statement that it is right, it is proper and it is legal. I am concerned about this question even though that statement is coupled with other language which restricts the right.

I suggest to the minister that he include a preamble—it might be possible to put it in the Bill of Rights or other legislation—to the effect that the innate principle of securing involuntary statements through electronic surveillance is wrong to start with and can be approved only on certain conditions, some of which would be contained in the bill. As it is now, we have a codification and an admission. By this legislation this House is saying that in fact we approve the right to do it under certain circumstances. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that while we may give very limited blessing to this proposition and may comfort ourselves by saying we have so hedged it with restrictions that it can be done only under certain circumstances, the whole history of parliamentary legislation is that once entry is made, slowly and inexorably the practice grows.

Some of my colleagues may remember when the original income tax bill was passed. I was not here at that time nor, I believe, was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I think it was called the war income tax act and was referred to as temporary, as an act for the purpose of securing certain funds to carry on the war. That was during the First World War, and the people who passed that legislation were probably beguiled by statements of the government of the day, which I believe was a government of a persuasion which should have known better. But at least it was a unionist government. It said that the legislation was temporary and would be withdrawn as soon as the war was over. If Members of Parliament of that day had seen the miscalled tax reform legislation recently introduced in this House, I think they would have given it a terrible time; those people who observe cemeteries might have noticed that the ground was rather disturbed where some of these legislators now are.

When this legislation has been in effect for some time, Mr. Speaker, I wager that people will be coming to governments of the future pleading special cases which will suggest that the principle of the bill should be extended. I make the prediction, confident that it is correct, that in ten or fifteen years from this small beginning of a legislative approval the right to electronic surveillance with be substantially extended. That is why I would feel much more comfortable with the ultimate passage of this legislation if it were preceded by a preamble which said that the principle, to start with, was wrong and only under certain circumstances could it be allowed.

I leave that part of the bill and the debate, Mr. Speaker, because I want now to deal with another aspect which was referred to by my hon. friend from Fundy-Royal. He said that in dealing with this matter the government should deal with a companion question of the right of freedom of information. These are Siamese twins; they are inextricably bound together and cannot be dissociated one from the other. The government secures all kinds of information, not only that given on income tax forms but data on various questionnaires and documents sent out by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and by Statistics Canada. Ask any small businessman. There is an undue, continuing encroachment upon the rights of individual citizens of this country who wish to retain information of a private nature. Indeed, today there is little information that an individual cannot be compelled to give to some appropriate authority of government, particularly the federal government. This applies also to provincial governments and to the governments of some cities.

If one were to make a detailed, itemized list of all legislation passed by parliament for compelling an individual to provide information to governments, one would be astounded at the extent of legislation which compels one to divulge facts. This may be necessary; I do not know. In any event, the government comes into possession of a tremendous amount of information. If this bill passes, it is obvious that the government could come into possession of a great deal more information. What, then, is the responsibility of government in the use of that information?

There is a growing feeling on the part of governments all over the world, which includes this government and the government of the United States, that the executive branch of government stands in some rare, exclusive and esoteric position vis-à-vis the rest of the people of the country. This administration is gathering facts and information and feels it has no responsibility to make known the facts which it has obtained. I consider that to be a dangerous and pernicious doctrine, particularly as it is held by a government which is now seeking this means of compelling further facts and information to be divulged involuntarily.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal referred to a statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) before he assumed his onerous responsibilities. At that time he was much more liberal in his views and spoke as a small "1" liberal about social and legal problems in this country. He was not the only one who held that view and made statements of that kind. While luxuriating in the freedom of not being the prime minister of this country and being free to say what he thought, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), writing in the Montreal periodical Cité Libre, took a strong stand on the need of the public for true and complete information. Although dealing with Quebec politics, he made a statement that basically referred to any democratic government. On that occasion he said:

> Democratic progress requires the ready availability of true and complete information. In this way, the people can objectively evaluate their government's policies.
> To act otherwise is to give way to despotic secrecy.

Those are the words of the leader of the government which we face every Monday and Wednesday in our attempt to obtain answers to written questions and to secure documents. Many questions are asked. I would be the first to admit, and I see the parliamentary secretary pricking up his ears, that without doubt many questions are asked which should not be asked.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I am prepared to admit that. But that shortcoming is only minimal when compared with the extent to which this government hides behind the age old answer, "It is not in the public interest to reveal this information and it should not be provided."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Hon. friends to my left have asked a good many questions. I thought perhaps they might know all the answers by now. I assume they are still genuinely seeking information. We ask questions. I submit that a casual survey of the records of this House for Mondays and Wednesdays will lead one to bring in an appalling indictment of the present administration in that it has failed to live up to what the Prime Minister said before he became prime minister, before he even undertook his responsibilities as a member of this House. Many people hold the same opinion. Former United States president James Madison once said:

A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it, is but a prologue to a farce or a tragedy or perhaps both.

In speaking of the government he was referring to the legislature. Any country in which the legislature, the people and the press are inadequately informed of what the government is doing or what it plans is not a good country, because if information is withheld from parliament there is no forum wherein the affairs of the nation can be debated adequately and properly.

That this is so has been demonstrated by what has happened in the last few weeks in the United States. I do not intend to become involved in what is happening there. The trouble is not so much what some individuals are alleged to have done in their electronic surveillances and in the securing of facts; it is that they are alleged to have taken extravagant and unusual steps to withhold that knowledge from the people. That is the trouble they are in today and that is the reason for their difficulty. The question at issue involves not only what was done, juvenile, stupid and silly though it was; it also involves the failure of certain people to impart frankly and honestly the facts to the people. The attitude of that government is much the same as the attitude held by members of this government. It is alleged that that administration feels that certain facts and information which may be too esoteric, too embarrassing, too difficult or too damaging must not and need not be disclosed.

Before this House complies with the request of the government to give the government or its emanations the right to secure further information, the minister some time before third reading, possibly in committee, should say that the government will take a serious look at the idea of codifying the rights of parliament, of the people and of the press to secure facts and information from the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I have proposed a bill dealing with this area. I do not for one moment suggest it is the final answer. To be honest, I have some doubts myself about parts of my proposal. This is the third time I have mentioned this bill in the House, which in one form or another has been before the House for about three years. I call it the right to information act. The term "public business" is defined in the bill. It contains a simple statement about the rights of Canadians. I suggest there should be a statement in this bill about the rights of Canadians to be free from electronic surveillance except under certain conditions. The rights in my bill are as follows:

Any Canadian, or any person not being a Canadian who resides in Canada, may apply to the government for a record made in the course of public business and the government shall, within a reasonable time thereafter, provide a copy of such record to any person who so applies or make such record available for inspection by him.

There are certain exceptions; I admit that. In addition, I propose that if the government cannot bring itself within the four corners of those exceptions there is the right of the citizen to go to court in order to have the issue settled. If the court makes a declaration, there is then a mandatory duty upon the government, department or Crown corporation involved to furnish that information or face the penalty of a jail sentence. I do not think you would have to use the penalty provision very often, probably only once or twice.

The salutary effect of legislation of that kind becoming part of the law of this land would, in my opinion, have a very useful effect on a government which, because it is the government, is secretive to begin with and, because it is a Liberal government, is even more secretive than most governments. I suggest that this is not very far from the subject matter we are debating. The members of the standing committee to which this bill will be referred will be free to secure a statement from the government and the minister at that time. The former minister of justice, now Minister of Finance, made it quite plain; he said in the simplest and clearest language that it is essential that there be a legislative proposal of this kind. The time has long passed for this country to have on the statute books legislation which gives that right to the ordinary citizen of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I have said all I want to say. There are others who want to participate in this debate. I shall vote for second reading with some mental reservations. I have some reservations about the bill. I have given voice to some of them. I concur with what has been said by some of my colleagues in this party and some of my friends from the New Democratic Party and the doubts they have expressed.

In light of events south of the border, I think this matter is of sufficient importance to take a good, hard look at it. I would like to see this bill regarded as a white paper, or simply refer the subject matter to the committee. Before this debate is concluded, the minister should pledge in the clearest and most unequivocal terms that he will listen to reasonable proposals. I have heard enough from hon. friends to my left to believe that we could get together and come up with some reasonable amendments which the government would be compelled to accept.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: This government loves office so well that it would swallow itself inch by inch and day by day in order to stay in power.

Mr. Reid: Not half as much as you want to get in.

Mr. Baldwin: If hon. friends to my left, and this party get together there will not only be the moral strength but the numerical strength of our conviction which will have a very strong effect on my friends opposite.

While coming back here the other day I was listening to the news. What struck me was not so much the Watergate case in the United States but the case of the Pentagon papers, the prosecution of two men. One does not need to agree with them ideologically, politically or otherwise. It has now been pretty well established that the documents they took had in large part been published beforehand. Expert witnesses called at the trial of these two men testified beyond any question that the documents which they took and caused to be published were not secret documents in the sense they had any value or endangered in any way the prosecution of United States' participation in Indo-China. Most extraordinarily, we find that people high in the government and security agencies in the government were involved in burglary attempts and attempts to obscure information about these two defendants in order to try to favourably impress the judge and jury and forward the prosecution's case. These are the kinds of dangers we face in the matter we are dealing with today. We only see that part of the iceberg above the surface of the water.

This is an admirable opportunity for all members of the House to look at the whole problem in a non-partisan and objective way. The standing committee which will consider this bill is an excellent committee. I hope the committee will have the courage to be objective. It would be well advised to come back with very strong recommendations which the government would have to accept.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, as a new member of this House I am surprised to learn that this is the third time this bill, in substance, has been before parliament. I understand that it has been dealt with extensively on three other occasions by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Having had that much time in committee and in this House, I find it incredible that the extensive rights to wiretap under the Official Secrets Act have not been removed from the bill.

I was impressed with the approach taken by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in dealing with this subject as a matter of a bill of rights or a matter of being positive, rather than negative, in guaranteeing one's right to privacy. This is a most useful approach that could be taken.

It is also interesting to note there have been at least four private members' bills dealing directly with this subject; one from the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather), one from the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), one from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) before he held that post, and one from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). That persuades me there is some merit indeed in private members' bills. I am convinced this subject would probably not be before the House now without the pressure that has been put on the government by private members both now and in the past.

There is no doubt that severe regulation must come into the law with regard to the continuing flagrant abuse of privacy by electronic devices. This bill, which has many weaknesses, is still long overdue. I intend, as I believe the majority of the members of the New Democratic Party intend, to vote for this bill in principle and have it referred to committee. However, I must say we are most unhappy with many provisions in the bill. In fact, this is just a little better than nothing. I would characterize this as still being basically Big Brother legislation.

We have to look upon this bill as only the beginning of a concerted attack upon violations of the right of privacy—violations by big business, by the large technocracy which is developing around us, by government itself. In the last 30 years the pendulum has been swinging away from individual privacy. It cannot swing back unless there is government help, governmental intervention.

I was most impressed by the position taken by the hon. member for Peace River. I was impressed by his argument that we should look at this question from the positive point of view and bring in a bill which would guarantee privacy, rather than the kind of bill we are now considering. The bill before us fails to deal with many areas of privacy violation. For example, we are still faced with flagrant abuses by credit reporting agencies affecting the rights of citizens across the country. What is needed is a bill to require the disclosure by all credit agencies of the files they keep on individuals.

We need a bill which gives to individual citizens the right to take action against such agencies when the information they possess is inaccurate. In addition, we need legislation giving the private citizen the right to clear his record, in the same way as a person convicted of criminal offences has a right to clear his criminal record. There may be items in a man's financial past which hurt his credit indefinitely. There should be some provision here to protect him from the disclosure of information by these agencies which could cause him serious harm.

We need legislation which would allow a citizen to challenge in the courts the release of private data about himself without his consent. I think, too, we need a bill of rights for employees so that employers are prevented from invading the personal lives of employees and interfering with their right to privacy. We do not need big corporations whose employees are expected to go to the company church, the company picnic, and so on. It seems to me that here, too, a right of independence and privacy is involved.

Last, but not least, we should consider protecting the right of privacy where the news media are concerned. I realize the news media should be entitled to get the news fairly when they can, but there are times when they step over the boundary, as it were, as when for example they take pictures of a mother grieving over a dead child. On many occasions in times of personal tragedy the news media impose upon a family that awesome thing, a television camera. In a way this, too, is an infringement of personal liberty and it is an area which those engaged in the media should themselves be considering very carefully.

To deal with the bill before us, there are still many points of weakness in it. First, it seems to me the bill gives authority for wiretapping to be carried out in all cases of indictable offences. I do not see why it should be allowed in all cases. I believe wiretapping should be limited to cases where the most serious offences are suspected. Are we to allow wire tapping for the purpose of catching marijuana smokers? Apparently, under this bill we could.

It seems to me that only the most serious crimes should be covered by the legislation and that these should be listed. Something in the order of those carrying at least a ten-year prison term should be considered.

There is no provision for the attorneys general of the provinces to be required to report to their legislatures in connection with the permits they have issued. This is a fundamental issue. If a political authority is to be allowed to issue permits for wiretapping, the final political authority should be the parliament. When an attorney general is not required to report back to parliament, a dictatorship situation arises.

The most severe weakness in the bill is one most speakers have already touched on. It involves the Official Secrets Act. In spite of the criticism which has so often been levelled at the government, this kind of legislation is foisted upon us. It is not good enough. Earlier I described the bill as Big Brother legislation. The clause I had in mind begins on page 21, and it provides:

> The Solicitor General of Canada may issue a warrant authorizing the interception or seizure of any communication if he is satisfied by evidence on oath that . . . the purpose of such interception or seizure is related to the prevention or detection of espionage, sabotage—

These are the operative words which are so dangerous:

> —or any other subversive activity directed against Canada or detrimental to the security of Canada.

Under the provisions of this clause there is no responsibility to go to a judge. It is entirely an internal matter between the Solicitor General and the police force. This is most dangerous. We have no right to be smug about the Watergate case. Under our present laws, as other speakers have pointed out, there could be a Watergate, and I submit that we could just as easily see a Watergate under the bill before us, because of some solicitor general who was not able to draw the fine line between opposition and subversion. Exactly the same thing could occur here. This clause gives the Solicitor General the right to determine which organizations in the country can be placed under wiretap surveillance. It immediately brings to mind the question of political radicalism on campus, debating societies, and so on. We have already witnessed interference with political freedom on campus. I can see no protection for political freedom on campus in the terms of this bill. The RCMP has over and over again shown itself to be completely unsophisticated when it comes to determining what are political rights and what is sabotage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: They simply do not have the background or in many cases the education to understand it, and this can become a direct threat to academic and political freedom in this country. So I would repeat what the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) said earlier, that unless there are substantial changes, particularly in the clause to which I have referred, I do not think the bill will pass after it has been considered by the justice committee.

I want to deal briefly with one or two other clauses. We say that evidence obtained by wiretapping is inadmissible in court, yet evidence derived from wiretapping is admissible. Surely all we are doing here is encouraging illegal wiretapping. The least that should be given is a voir dire in connection with such evidence, so that the judge can inquire as to the rights of the individuals concerned before that evidence is considered.

I hope these matters will be dealt with positively by the justice committee. We in this party intend to vote for the legislation in order to get it before the committee, but very few of us are satisfied with what we read. I conclude by saying that I would hate to see the bill defeated because it is something, after all, and the present law is hopelessly inadequate in terms of protecting private citizens. Nevertheless, I feel it could be defeated unless there are changes, particularly in the clause dealing with the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, there are certain elements in this legislation the thrust of which most of us agree with. I disagree with the previous speaker in that he is more inclined to put emphasis on serious offences. I agree with the legislation to the extent that it must relate to illegalities per se, whether the offence being investigated is major or minor, because interference with the right of the public to privacy must be protected and upheld. I think it is the function of parliament to maintain that privacy.

There are one or two technical matters to which I should like to refer. The first relates to an application for an ex parte motion. Any lawyer will know that ex parte motions are open to the public, and with a little contemplation this legislation could properly be altered to take care of that situation. It can be left to the committee to make some of these changes to which other speakers have alluded, but this is one which to date has perhaps been overlooked.

This bill calls for notice to be given an accused if this type of evidence, either by transcript, by tape or by whatever method is used, is to be used; but it does not say when. All the power of the state is being pitted against the accused. He must have some time to prepare his defence. Such a notice should not be handed to him at the time the evidence goes in, as that is hardly fair or in keeping with our concept of justice. Under the Ontario Medical Act, for example, in respect of medical evidence at least an accused is given seven days' notice. I think there should be some kind of time limitation, in respect of when notice is given, that such evidence is to be used against an accused. The accused should be given a copy of the transcript or the tape, as the case may be, in order that he will have fair warning and be in a position to prepare his defence.

I am worried about another aspect of this legislation. Although I am not an electronics expert, having watched television at times I am aware of how tapes can be doctored, and this bothers me. Tapes can be cut, spliced and put together, entirely changing the context of a conversation. This legislation in itself or through its regulations must have some safeguards to protect the accused and others if such evidence is to be used. I am not a cynic but, rather, a realist and having been in the courtroom day after day I know how some officials operate. Among the safeguards we have for accused, this legislation must require some scientific proof that there has been no tampering with or doctoring of such tapes or transcripts.

Perhaps another minor point is the aspect of this legislation relating to the doctrine of possession. I have been greatly concerned about the word "knowing" in reference to the primary use. What is "primary"? How close is it to secondary or tertiary? This is a difficult question. The accused must show that possession was not for that primary use. From the accused's point of view, I think that part of the legislation must be further considered.

I am also bothered that peace officers would be authorized to have such equipment in their possession, but the legislation does not spell out that they must only be in possession when so authorized; it merely refers to possession as long as the peace officer is in the course of his employment. Most police officers are employed on a shift basis and may not have the authority to have such equipment in their possession, but if they do so this will not be an offence under the proposed change. Again, I do not want to appear cynical but we must realize that police officers are human and do have temptations. There must be safeguards to protect the general public, making sure that policemen do not abuse the privileges given them. This legislation must relate to the situation I have just outlined as well as to John Q. Public. It must also relate to policemen whether they are on duty or off duty, and those that do not have the authority must be treated in the same way as any other member of the public.

I am surprised by the degree of trust and equanimity we display in respect of those in charge of our communications in this country, telephone and telegraph. We accept them like we accept God and motherhood and believe they can do no wrong. Apparently they can interfere with communications because that is their business and they should know what is going on.

Our memories are very short indeed if we forget what was so well documented recently in respect of the state of IT&T and the way it operated during the last war. It owned 28 per cent of a German aircraft company which produced planes which shot down our aircraft, while at the same time producing communications equipment to protect our ships and planes. Apparently Colonel Ben did not worry about that situation. If we think our communications system is not tied up with IT&T, then we are naïve to the point that we should not be sitting in this honourable chamber. All you need do is talk with employees of Northern Electric or Bell Telephone to find out what the connection is with IT&T.

In any event, that is the way IT&T operated during the last war. Its communications and espionage system was the best in the world. It initiated the first entente with Hitler right after he came to power. A committee of two from the United States made a visit in that regard, and Colonel Ben of IT&T was one of them. They were put in touch with the right people.

We must take a long, hard look at what I consider to be the very naïve way in which we view communications conditions in this country. Parliament and the people have a right to be protected against the actions of such corporations. I frankly admit that I have no love for IT&T or for what it does. It sucks the blood of any person who comes along and tries to play both ends against the middle. It forecast that Germany would win the war in 1941, yet in the middle of 1948 it claimed $27 million compensation for damage caused by our bombers to its aircraft plant. In any event, I believe we must take a more serious look at that aspect of this legislation.

In a philosophic way—others have referred to this—the section dealing with the Official Secrets Act actually codifies and allows the government to carry on what happened in the Watergate affair. I am sure hon. members across the way would suggest to me that this is all right if it is necessary in the public interest to keep them in government.

An hon. Member: That's right.

Mr. Morgan: There is your answer, Mr. Speaker. The wording of the legislation is such that if the Solicitor General thinks it is necessary and in the public interest, the government can do what it wants to do. I do not know who the hon. member was who interjected just now, but I am glad he answered my question, because this is what can happen when a government thinks this legislation is necessary and good in the public interest. It can undertake any surveillance it wished: this legislation makes it possible. If John Stewart Mill were alive today, he would certainly roll in his grave.

• (2100)

I have become rather distrustful of politicians, because politicians too often want power, and power corrupts. Absolute power corrupts absolutely, and this is the temptation which this legislation places in the government's hands. I am afraid my mind wanders a bit, but while I was sitting here tonight I was concerned about the politician, what he actually does and what he stands for. A little limerick came to mind, which I would quote with your permission, Mr. Speaker:

Of politicians we are told to beware,
For they are all so full of hot air;
For instance, the diapers of Justin are as dry as a dustbin,
For, you see, he's the son of Pierre.

This legislation and this particular clause remind me of 1984. It can happen so easily, where you have listening in and where government can do what it wishes to do when it believes it to be in the public interest and necessary for the public good. That clause is so loosy-goosy that any government in power can do whatever it may wish with it. Certainly, the committee must get down to hard facts and really tighten up that clause before we find ourselves in very serious trouble. That particular clause is coated with corruption; it is there. I think that unless that clause in the legislation is changed we will be changing the whole aspect of a free parliamentary system. The system will not last, and could not last, if that power is given.

We see what has happened in respect of our neighbour to the south with regard to both the Pentagon papers and the Watergate situations. I do not know how the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), having seen what has happened there, could codify it and make it possible for government to do it. I wonder whether they have read the legislation and have seen what it says. We object violently and point the finger to our neighbour, but we should first look more deeply at our own backyard and criticize ourselves before we have the temerity to criticize our brother. We should take the mote from our own eyes.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the fact that this type of invasion of the rights of the people of this country must be stopped. This legislation is a step forward. There are many changes which must be made to it in the committee. I hope the necessary corrections will be accomplished.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it is surprising in a country such as Canada that we should be speaking in the same breath about two things: first, the right of the individual liberty of the citizen and, second, the right of Big Brother to supervise this liberty and the extent of it. I am sure most Canadians, no matter what walk of life they come from or what part of Canada they live in, will agree that they have the right to privacy and that that right is probably their most fundamental right as human beings. With the loss of privacy one becomes no better than an animal in a cage in a zoo.

I was pleased to hear the reference of the previous speaker to the year 1984 as being an indication that he also agrees we will soon reach that stage where the ability of Big Brother to direct and influence the lives of every individual will be accepted. I object to the docility of the Canadian public in a number of fields, and this is one. The other one which bothers me very greatly is the invasion of privacy which takes place when a person is searched at an airport. I know why people are searched; I know that we are trying to provide a deterrent. But we are providing a deterrent for a very limited number of incidents where hijacking might take place.

At the same time, however, we allow people to sit in our airports and sell life insurance. Over the years this has been one of the major causes of disasters in the air. It has been violently opposed by all the people who work for the airlines. It is very easy to insure your wife and then send her on a trip with a small parcel containing a bomb. This is allowed, and we know it has been a big factor in air disasters. We allow it because it is a form of business, and we really cannot interfere with the large insurance companies! We search people and we know what we are searching for. However, a metal detector is used. Anyone in his right mind would not carry a hand grenade; he would have to have a mental problem before he would board an aircraft with a bag full of hand grenades. He would carry a plastic bomb which could be contained in a pocket or which could be carried in a number of ways. It certainly would not be detected by a metal detector. I do not believe most people would attempt to carry sophisticated weapons on board an aircraft. If so, we should be using a totally different approach for them.

No one becomes angry about being searched, or objects to it. No one will object when the day arrives when people are searched in a supermarket. They do not object because it happens very occasionally and usually does not happen to them. It is always somebody else who is involved, and that really does not matter. I suggest that if the government wishes to bring in a bill, such a bill should totally outlaw eavesdropping by electronic devices.

We made a great hullabaloo when we stopped hanging criminals in this country except in the case of murder of a policeman. But have we hanged any one who has murdered a policeman since that time? No. We wrote that provision in merely to satisfy the law enforcement people. Two sections are being written into this bill. One will allow the police to carry on surveillance activities against almost anyone. Then we cover that up by allowing the security people, who are a totally different group, to go to the attorney general of a province or to the Solicitor General federally and ask permission to carry on surveillance in the case of national or provincial espionage. That is window-dressing. The people who are responsible for security in this country do not need to ask the government for the right to exercise that kind of surveillance, because we have provided them with the necessary type of equipment and training and with that very elementary device whereby they can go to the Attorney General and ask for permission to use that kind of information.

This right would only be provided once. The Minister of National Defence would go to the Attorney General of Canada and say that the use of certain surveillance equipment was necessary in the interest of national security for the army, navy or air force and he would be allowed to use it. This would be a blanket authorization and it would be carried like warrants and carried by RCMP officers. Once they are given, they are given for an indefinite period. They can do all sorts of things under those warrants.

Most crooks would not be caught by the equipment that is being used today to bug a room, a telephone service or other equipment. If you think your telephone is being bugged or the room in which you are is being bugged, ask somebody to build you a small oscillator. It will cost perhaps $10. Anybody who is using a tape recorder to record a conversation in the room would find that the tape recorder cannot pick up the conversation if on the oscillator you use decibels higher than the human ear can hear. There will be nothing on that tape except a high pitched screech which will destroy everything that is being recorded.

You can get such a device for about $10—any kid can make you one. Children today have a high awareness of electronic devices and can not only dial long distance but place international calls through satellites and perform all sorts of manoeuvres, simply because they know something about the theory of sound, which is really what we are talking about when we refer to eavesdropping. The eavesdropping to which we refer is so elementary and unsophisticated that in my opinion it is not being used by many people.

The privacy that is being invaded and that has been mentioned by other people is not covered by this legislation. This is something for which every member of the House should have some responsibility. I am referring to the new kind of invasion of privacy which is taking place, in particular through the setting up of memory and data banks as well as credit banks and all the other types of data processing information centres which provide information on people from the cradle to the grave and is completely legal and of great value to the person who may be using it.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) mentioned several instances, such as the espionage that is taking place in industry and the ability of smart, young engineers with initiative to use the communications system to tap information banks and obtain any kind of information in almost any part of the world illegally, and use it to make a huge profit. If you have the ability to enter into the memory bank of a large multinational corporation, then you really have the equivalent of the ability to print money. Incidentally, this is being done by many multinational corporations to obtain information on whether or not they should buy a company or play monopoly with other companies, with workers lives and with the very economics of a country.

The provisions of this bill do not cover this type of activity which is an invasion of privacy. If some credit agency states that you are a poor risk because when you were 20 years old you had a nervous breakdown while you were going through college, and if that information in a memory bank somewhere was made available, it might stop you from obtaining a loan or it might do something which happened in another country, namely, stop a young, progressive person from becoming the vice-president of one of the major political parties in that country.

That is the kind of invasion of privacy from which this government should be protecting us. I am referring to protection against the invasion of privacy in the industrial world and in various government agencies where the storing of information is taking place. It is getting to the stage where, if you have access to unemployment insurance data you will know a considerable amount about any person on whom information is stored in that data bank, information about where he works, how long he has worked, what his address is, how many kids he has, what his status is, etc. You would then have unlimited knowledge about him which I am sure he would not want you to have. That information would be available to you if you could invade the privacy of the data bank.

The government has not given any consideration to that matter in the bill before us. I have heard members refer to espionage. We have had only one case of espionage since I became a member, namely, the Spencer case. Would it not be a great thing for the Attorney General, working closely with officers of the Department of Justice who had already decided that here was a poor, harmless, dying man, to state the RCMP should be allowed to attach all the necessary listening devices and to harass him by listening in on his private conversations and following up any contacts that poor Mr. Spencer had. This is a beautiful case of espionage, the only one that has been made public!

In the United States there are two controls that would be available under this kind of legislation and are not available in Canada. In Canada, judges are appointed by the government, although I understand there are exceptions and on rare occasions advice is being given by law societies in the provinces which occasionally make recommendations, although very seldom. Often, defeated political candidates become judges. They are always people who have an obligation to the government and they are not really the kind of people whom you would want to entrust with the responsibility of granting a warrant.

It has always impressed me that when a man goes on strike he has very little chance of getting an injunction against the company involved, but as soon as he goes on strike it is very easy for the boss to see the judge and ask him for an injunction against such and such a union or such and such a plant. He gets that injunction almost invariably without any justification at all. This is true with search warrants. It has been true with regard to every invasion of the rights of workers in this country, Mr. Speaker. It has always been true so far as the workers are concerned but never, never, never applies to the management of the companies.

This reminds me of the will of God clause which is written into many labour and insurance contracts. As an individual, it always seems to me that God is never on my side in those contracts but is always on the side of the companies. This is true whether it be the case of a labour dispute or a dispute over an insurance policy. I think in the present instance God would always be on the side of the Department of Justice, never on my side, and I would be getting the short end of the stick.

In the United States, judges secure office in two ways. In the case of Supreme Court judges a recommendation is made to Congress. Congress has to approve the appointment of a Supreme Court judge. Who appoints such judges in Canada? It is the Minister of Justice. He is always coming before us and asking for the appointment of another three judges somewhere, and he appoints three of his friends. Invariably the appointments are made in that way.

In the United States there is a second way by which judges secure office, and that is by vote. I do not agree that it is a very good system but at least the public has some say in appointing a judge and some choice in getting rid of a judge. With respect to the Watergate case in the United States, why would anyone have any hesitation asking the approval of John Mitchell, the Attorney General responsible for the security of the nation, for permission to engage in wiretapping? Nixon, as President of the United States, represents the top security of the nation, and in such a case anything done to defend him, no matter what it is, would be in the interests of the nation. Therefore, he would go to John Mitchell, as he did or as someone did and ask about this matter. And then he fires them. He says, "I am above all of them. God is on my side. I don't have to resign, but the rest of you had better resign." Mr. Speaker, it could happen here very easily.

I can remember ministers of justice in this House not too long ago who were not the kind of people in whom the average citizen could put much faith. I also remember that a very short time ago we had a solicitor general who was so contemptuous of the representatives of the people that he would not allow us to visit the jails. Not only would he not let the public go in, but he would not let their representatives go in although that right was written into the law of this country for 100 years and was removed only because a former solicitor general said, "You won't need that. That is British law and it will always be there."

I do not think that the individual in this country will be protected by this legislation, but the police will be protected with respect to something they already do. The police will not be any more effective against the Mafia or against anybody who is influential. I am not suggesting that a judge will not give authorization in such a case, but such people are also pretty sophisticated and I am sure they will take precautions against electronic surveillance devices. Such precautions are simple to take.

Progress in this whole field is taking place so rapidly that every time you visit an exhibition of such electronic equipment you find new devices that were not there when you visited it the previous year. The crooks know this and the police know it. There is not a heck of a lot of difference, in many cases, between organized crime and the police force. One is organized on one hand and the other is organized on the other hand, and they both play a real game. But, Mr. Speaker, that game should not affect the individual. The individual should not lose his right to privacy because of the game being played between the police and organized crime in this country.

It is the little guy who gets hurt, the guy who may be cheating 10 bucks or 20 bucks on his income tax. He is the guy who is going to get hurt here. The bootlegger is going to get hurt. The prostitute is going to get hurt. It is very easy to listen to their conversations. The Mounties don't get red ears; they don't mind listening into a conversation in somebody's bedroom. As I say, prostitutes can get hurt. I can see Jarvis Street, with all the mobile listening units. The old judge will be issuing the mobile unit licences, and they will be up and down Jarvis Street in Toronto without number. I can see the accidents taking place between these mobile units in Jarvis Street, and the same will be true of Craig Street in Montreal and of several other streets in that vicinity.

An hon. Member: How about Timiskaming?

Mr. Peters: Well, Mr. Speaker, not even prostitution is organized in Timiskaming; it still remains a relatively unorganized operation, with everybody for themselves. I think the police will probably engage in the free enterprise system of getting a contact here and a contact there and getting some information here and some information there, so nothing in Timiskaming is really going to happen in that field. But I suggest that in other places the police will have a field day.

I have not heard anybody say anything about the other security agency that we have built up in this country, and I am not talking about S and I. Everybody knows about Security and Intelligence. Everybody knows what it does. It is a pretty open book. It handles normal security and intelligence connected with police matters. But now we have another agency. This other agency was set up by the government to look after the security of government against espionage. I do not know the name of one person in that agency. I have not heard that it has even reported to the responsible minister. I do not know if it has ever reported to a committee. I do not know any activity that it has investigated. I do not know if it operates in conjunction with the RCMP or not. But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that agency, operating in the dark, may not be too far away from the CIA in the United States, and I would not be too surprised if there are a number of people in that agency who are also counteragents for the CIA.

Also, I would suggest that, operating under the Attorney General of Canada, they will probably not have much difficulty in getting any type of sophisticated equipment approved by the Solicitor General and that they will not have much difficulty in operating in a pretty free and easy way, without any kind of protection for the public.

I am opposed to this kind of bill. I have no faith in the ability of our police force to police what are truly matters of security. I have seen them chase red herrings for 20 years. I have seen members of the RCMP at every major union meeting that I attended for ten years. I am well aware that they have attended university campuses in about the same haphazard manner. I am quite sure that their purpose there was to write voluminous reports on a number of people and that this was an invasion of privacy that was not justified in the realm of national security. I am sure it was an undue and unreasonable invasion of the privacy of young people, of the privacy of individuals, of the privacy of Canadians in general.

Mr. Speaker, every time there is a demonstration on Parliament Hill we see about one and a half times the number of the members of the press gallery out there taking pictures. Half of that number is press gallery members but the other half is always the same people; they always look the same—they carry their guns the same. They are the same people and they take pictures of the crowd from all angles and by telescopic lens from the tops of buildings across the street and from the top of this building. They have taken pictures of every crowd that has gathered in front of parliament for the last five or six years. If anyone doubts this they should ask themselves how they got those pictures when Mr. Kosygin was here. The same pictures of the same person were being taken at every demonstration in the United States, Toronto, Montreal and elsewhere.

When these pictures were matched it was found that the same guy had been at four or five of the rallies. The RCMP got this information because they are there taking pictures, keeping files and maintaining a record on everybody who attends every meeting. In my opinion, that is an invasion of privacy. Another example is when Mr. Nixon was here and pictures were taken of him. Who takes them? The RCMP takes them, or agents of the RCMP, and they keep a file. This makes things easy for the police. That might be an advantage in a police state. In some countries it is very easy, because when you go to town the first thing you do is not just look for a hotel but for the police station. You give your name, state your business, who you are going to see, how long you will be staying. This makes things very easy for the police, but it is not the kind of country we want to live in. Most of our citizens came to this country to get away from that sort of thing. They do not want Big Brother. Mr. Speaker, what we want is the very maximum right of liberty and of privacy for the individual.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: When you take that away for no reason at all, you are taking the right of the individual to be free. I believed that when we brought in the War Measures Act.

The things that took place under that act were a disgrace and an indication that government never operates on behalf of the people but only operates on behalf of government and the perpetuity of that government. That was a clear case where violent abuses took place because we developed a hysteria. If we again develop a hysteria against organized crime and allow invasion of privacy, again the individual loses.

Mr. Speaker, every time I go the airport I am shocked, concerned and saddened to see people submitting, like sheep, to being searched. I do not care if they take the plane to Cuba. We have a non-scheduled flight every day from Halifax, or perhaps two flights a day. If Air Canada flies me there, I would like them to keep me in a hotel for four or five days so that I could have a holiday, and then bring me back. I am not concerned, either, about the person who hijacks the plane to some place other than Cuba but I am concerned about the nut who gets on the airplane and wants to destroy it. If anyone wants to destroy an airplane flying 50,000 feet above the ocean, all he has to do is kick out a window. Seat belts would make no difference; the pressure on every person would be about four or five tons and the plane would crash. There is no need for a bomb; everybody knows that. The person to be worried about is the one who is going to steal the airplane and hold it to ransom.

I am willing to take the risk of somebody hijacking the plane. Well, nobody is going to hijack the one that goes to northern Quebec, so I am fairly safe; nor is anybody going to hijack the one that my colleague uses to go to Val d'Or, Rouyn, Earlton, North Bay or Toronto. However, Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that people are searched and that their luggage is searched on the strength that something has happened once or twice.

If you get on a bus and the bus has an accident, they do not then give the driver a breathalyzer test every time, nor do they check the tires every time. The Ontario Northland is recapping tires on its buses six times. One caused an accident and killed many people not long ago. No commercial vehicle has tires that are recapped more than three times. Well, we ride that bus and do not search it or do some of the things that we should for our own protection, but we docilely let the police or security people search us. They have the right, as well, to go before a judge and get the authority to wiretap.

Mr. Speaker, nobody has even suggested that we have an ombudsman to represent the public as the Auditor General does in regard to public accounts. The minister will get the file. But the minister was foolish enough to take on such things as the Wheat Board as well as the Department of Justice, so he is not going to have time to read about all the telephone calls that have been made and make a decision on whether the judge should allow it or not. A third party is not even allowed to represent the individual.

I am violently opposed to the invasion of privacy that we, as Members of Parliament, are allowing for no reason. If there were a demonstrated need for this, then maybe we should consider it. I think this government should be introducing a bill to eliminate the right to wiretapping with rare exceptions, those exceptions to be stringently policed. The police force should not be allowed to get a search warrant or injunction, but the individual's privacy should be retained at all costs.

We should stir the people of this country to object to the invasion of privacy, to object to the benefit control officers of the UIC asking the personal questions they do. Once you have been asked all those questions, Mr. Speaker, once somebody listens to your telephone conversations, once you no longer have privacy in your own home, then you are no longer master in your own house and you have really lost a great deal of your individuality; you become close to being an animal. That animal will be 1984 and it will be Big Brother who will make the decision for you. You will be trained to like it, accept it and even to appreciate it.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear my hon. friend from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) speak of the new philosophy of the New Democratic Party. He suggested the government acts only on behalf of the government. I am most impressed if that is that party's position in dealing with regulatory legislation. Presumably, those members will now be voting with my party, the party of freedom, the party that is concerned with individual liberty. It is in that respect that I wish to make some remarks tonight.

The matter of electronic snooping has been raised in the press in the last few weeks in connection with the Watergate affair in the United States. I commend the minister for bringing this matter to the attention of this House at this time. The people of this country are totally unhappy over the use of bugging or electronic snooping devices. They have no reason to wish for this kind of activity and are most emphatically in favour of laws protecting privacy.

If this bill contained only section 178.1 and 178.11 and nothing else, I would commend it entirely to this House and say it is a terrific piece of legislation. Under those two sections, conviction for electronic snooping brings a penalty of up to five years in jail. Electronic snooping is pretty clearly prohibited. Nevertheless, the bill goes on to authorize electronic snooping not only on the part of officers of the Crown but, as pointed out by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Morgan), by private and public telephone and telecommunication companies. The authorization of such invasion of privacy leaves a great deal to be desired and the entire matter must be examined seriously in committee.

It is surprising that the government continues to put forward police state type electronic snooping measures as proposed in this legislation. This is the third time a bill like this has been before the House and, presumably, this bill will go to committee for the third time. Each time provision has been made whereby officers of the Crown and others will be entitled, under certain conditions, to eavesdrop on every bit of private conversation that you and I, Mr. Speaker, may have. It is in that respect also that I wish to address the House tonight.

Not only is the eavesdropping of the government under certain conditions permitted; all of a sudden the results of this eavesdropping will now become legitimate evidence in court. According to section 178.14, if an ex parte application is granted by a judge of the superior court and eavesdropping is undertaken, the evidence in connection with the eavesdropping can be introduced in court and is to be treated as proper and valid evidence. This is an amazing extension of the laws of evidence as relating to courts. All of a sudden the private conversation in someone's living room, the private conversation in someone's office, say in the Confederation Building between members of this House, or the private conversation over a telephone may become evidence. If a constituent says over the telephone that the Prime Minister should drop dead, that statement may be treated in court as evidence if there is a charge of espionage or something like that.

What will happen, Mr. Speaker? Sure, the tape will be given to the accused; the accused will have access to that information. But the tape will be produced in court and entered as evidence and what was said will be loud and clear, almost like a picture. The court and jury, if there is a jury, will have the right to hear that kind of evidence. Such evidence will not have been obtained by someone directly seeing the subject; it will not be direct evidence given by someone who heard somebody else say something. It will be the evidence of a machine. The machine will have heard something said. The machine will be played in court, and what is recorded may lead to a conviction. That is the kind of thing authorized under this bill. That is a serious extension of the law of evidence, and a very serious infringement of liberty. That is the kind of thing we find in this bill. Therefore, this bill is not properly named as clause 1 says—"This act may be cited as the protection of privacy act." Here is a bill that legitimizes wiretapping evidence. That is a serious provision that will have to be expunged from the bill in committee.

May I deal with the next subject. Authority to conduct this kind of invasion of privacy is to be obtained by way of ex parte application to the court. Every lawyer who has practised law knows that you always go to a friendly judge if you want a friendly order. Really, the friendly judge is always there as my hon. friend from Timiskaming pointed out. I have lots of faith in our judiciary, I have practised law and have gone to friendly judges on behalf of my clients to get friendly orders. There is really not too much difficulty in getting such an order if you want one. Now there are to be ex parte applications for permission to bug.

Under this government we have seen the proliferation of all sorts of ex parte applications. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), who I see is here, gets ex parte orders every day to garnishee citizens' wages of this country because they happen to have been overpaid by his department in the matter of unemployment insurance. All of a sudden people find that their bank account is lighter by a couple of hundred dollars or so because the minister has obtained an ex parte order of garnishment. Those are the kinds of ex parte orders I am talking about. You never find out about them until they hit you.

The same holds true for the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury). If he wants to make a seizure because you have not paid your income tax, the minister obtains an ex parte order and makes an ex parte seizure. This is done all of a sudden. There is no due process of law here; there is an ex parte order and seizure. That is the kind of thing that is creeping into our statutes. There is an ex parte order and that is it. And this bill is supposed to protect the rights of the citizen!

I referred to the kinds of orders the Minister of Manpower and Immigration obtains to garnishee people's wages. I dealt with one such order the other day involving a constituent who had already gone bankrupt. The minister's department had been advised of the bankruptcy yet the minister authorized that ex parte garnishee and it went through. Even though I told the minister that the constituent had gone bankrupt, the minister said, "I have a court order, old boy, and I would garnishee him anyway." That is the kind of attitude that prevails under these kinds of ex parte proceedings. Provision is made for them in other statutes, and there is no reason to believe it will not happen under this statute.

Mr. Baldwin: And that is the minister who has unlimited access to our national bank account.

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, he has unlimited access. It would not be so bad if the orders had to be obtained by the minister. However, from looking at this statute we find that the attorneys general of the provinces, the Solicitor General of Canada or their agents—and that could be a corporal in the RCMP or a police constable in Mississauga—could obtain, on an ex parte order from some judge somewhere, the right to bug, wiretap and do all sorts of things. It is not the minister, but the minister's agent. Almost any person could be the minister's agent. This provision is far too loose. It has far too wide an application and puts far too wide a right in the hands of the Crown or its servants. The whole matter of delegation must be looked at. There should be no right of delegation in this serious invasion of the privacy and rights of individuals.

The bill further states that you do not even need a court application. All you need is the minister's agent, his police office, to think that maybe it is a matter of urgency and for a 36-hour period, without limitation, they can go in and wiretap on their own. They do not even need an order. For 36 hours they are foot-loose and fancy free. Eventually they may get an order, but they may not. They may decide to wiretap my friend here, my friend there or any person in my constituency for any reason at all. They do not have to report. They do not have to justify their activities.

I wish to deal further with this ex parte order. Having obtained the ex parte order, does the minister or the police have to make the details of the ex parte order public knowledge? Not on your life. The whole system can be buried. The file remains sealed until it is destroyed. The accused who is charged as a result of an improperly obtained ex parte order has no right to cross-examine the grounds on which the order was obtained in the first place. The evidence obtained against him is not open to cross-examination. The fact that it was obtained without the right to have it in the first place, without the right of being open to examination or cross-examination, is used against him.

Under section 178(2)(i) we find that on proof of conviction or illegal wiretapping the government of Canada, without the right to go into property and civil rights, declares a damage suit for $5,000. Surely a claim for punitive damages, which is a tort, should not be set out in the Criminal Code. After all, the Criminal Code should not set out grounds for civil damage or even limitations on grounds for civil damage. This is clearly a matter within the competence of the provinces. This section should be removed from the statute. If a person is aggrieved by the improper use of wiretapping and sues someone for that, there is no reason why the person so aggrieved should have his damages limited to $5,000 by the Parliament of Canada. The whole question of damage and civil litigation is a matter within the competence of the provinces of this country. It is not a matter of competence of the federal parliament. On that basis, this section must be removed from the statute.

There are a lot of things said by people on the telephone and otherwise. Things are sometimes said when they should not be said. Things are sometimes said in a way they should not be said. As a politician, I know that. Your Honour also knows it. Loose comments are made. Surely, loose comments made by people over the telephone and picked up as a result of the authority given to the police office to bug the telephone or otherwise should not be used as evidence in a court of law. Just because someone says he is going to do something that is possibly of a seditious nature, it should not be used in evidence against that person just because it was said in private.

This whole question must be looked at, and looked at seriously. It is very easy for politicians to talk about fixing a nomination. It is very easy for people to talk over the phone about fixing a horse race. Because it was very easy for my constituent, a middle-aged lady, to talk about getting rid of the Prime Minister, this idle chatter should not be used as evidence against her in a court of law. That is the kind of authority that is being given by this parliament as a result of this bill.

There is one other thing I would like to say before Your Honour calls it ten o'clock. I wish to make this point very clear. Evidence is taken on the quiet without any person understanding that it is being taken from him. It is taken secretively without his having any understanding of what is happening. All of a sudden it is used against him. This is totally against our concept of British justice. On that basis, the clauses in this bill authorizing electronic snooping must be deleted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the House is ready for the question, the Chair will now put it. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) is rising. Obviously, the House is not ready for the question. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Gleave: No, Mr. Speaker; I wish to speak on this subject.

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL CAPITAL—PROPOSED OTTAWA-HULL RAPID TRANSIT—POSITION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT RESPECTING CONTRIBUTION TO COST

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on March 5 last, as recorded at page 1883 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) a question the text of which appears on that page. The question relates to the necessity of a financial contribution, which I and many others have said is the responsibility of the federal government, toward the development of a rapid transit system in the national capital.

On January 30 the province of Ontario made an announcement wherein it stated it was prepared to put up a large sum of money toward the cost of developing a system of rapid transit for the Ontario side of the national capital area. At that time it invited participation by the Government of Canada. Since then, neither the government nor the National Capital Commission has made any commitment whatsoever to sharing in this type of development although I am sure there have been discussions with respect to it.

The important thing, however, was the minister's answer. Apart from the fact that he jumped to the conclusion I was assuming something that I was not, he evaded the direct question and replied that in effect there would be no contribution until a co-operative arrangement had been arrived at within the whole of the national capital region, that is, on both sides of the river, in Quebec as well as Ontario. No one quarrels with the concept that there should be development on both sides of the Ottawa River and that both sides ought to develop space. On the other hand, no one can realistically believe that what is desirable is always possible or that differences in attitudes and needs and states of readiness can be ignored.

A commitment has been made, however, by the province of Ontario which will benefit the Ontario side. A regional transport authority has been established throughout the regional municipality of Ottawa, or Ottawa-Carleton. There has long been a need for rapid transit. An invitation to the federal government to make a contribution has been made. This invitation ought to be answered now. It ought to be answered in the affirmative. It ought to have been answered in the affirmative a long time ago. It is neither fair nor reasonable that those who want such a service now should have that service delayed while they wait for another jurisdiction. I have no hesitation in saying that the reasons for delay on the part of the other jurisdictions may be reasonable. None the less, this delay should not penalize most who reside in the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton.

On this side of the river there are now half a million people who require rapid transit. They live in the capital of Canada. They live in an age when we should be doing our best to improve our city. The national capital ought to be a model for all forms of services which municipalities supply. Yet in the field of transportation we still live in a dark age. The answer is obviously rapid transit. In this age, the traditional bus service will not do.

Having said this, I want to add that no doubt the federal government is experiencing difficulties in co-ordination at this time; there are two municipal jurisdictions, two provincial jurisdictions and the federal government is in the middle. This situation ought to raise, not obstacles but rather challenges for the federal government. Perhaps the time has come for us to constitute the parliamentary committee which has been talked about in the newspapers and in this House from time to time, and ask it to examine the structure and the place of the National Capital Commission. In doing this, perhaps we should consider whether the time has not come for the new types of municipalities, the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton on the one hand and Outaouais municipality on the other, to be represented on the National Capital Commission.

Perhaps we should seek to determine the real place of the federal government in such an arrangement. Perhaps we ought not to turn our backs on the possibility that there may be some good come of local government involvement at the policy level, and that more could be done in the national capital than the commission's traditional role of tending flowerbeds and building highways—that its real role with respect to development and planning might be recognized by local participation. Perhaps we should take advantage of these new municipal structures so that there could be co-ordination at the policy level between the municipal governments and the National Capital Commission. Perhaps we ought to say that the National Capital Commission has a place on a regional transportation body or bodies which affect both sides of the river. Perhaps the question, the answer to which I sought on March 5, might be answered in that way.

I hope that when the parliamentary secretary rises he will announce that the government does, indeed, intend to go ahead now and act with respect to that part of the national capital area which has made a request for a federal contribution to the development of a modern rapid transit system in that part of the national capital area which has shown itself ready and able to absorb it.

The challenges that face the national capital area have been too long characterized as difficulties. My respectful submission is that this government has not been active enough in meeting the challenges. One of the great challenges it must meet in this area is the challenge before it of providing, on this side at least in the beginning, perhaps as an example to the other side, a modern, up to date and thoroughly sound rapid transit system so that we will not forever become the victim of the automobile and the expensive highways which are necessary for its maintenance.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), the parliamentary secretary in this area, to present this reply.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) asked whether, in the event that one or other of the provincial governments is not prepared to participate in the conditions necessary to establish rapid transit to serve the national capital region, the federal government would deal separately with one of these governments in the granting of funds for a system on only one side of the Ottawa River.

The minister is not prepared at this time to accept the premises of the question. Indeed, there is considerable evidence that there is sufficient understanding of the necessity for rapid transit for the national capital region on a truly regional basis to include both sides of the Ottawa River and to be an integral part of a balanced transportation network for the whole region.

In support of this I would point out that the Premier of Ontario has made public statements inviting the co-operation of both the federal government and the province of Quebec in dealing with transit proposals for the national capital region which have been recently announced by his government. Moreover, it is also evident that the province of Quebec is initiating steps dealing with transit and is making a considerable effort to overcome the disparity which now exists between the two provinces in the national capital.

Consequently, the minister is satisfied that in the case of both provinces there is an appreciation of the necessity to plan and implement rapid transit on a regional basis and in a co-operative manner with the federal government. I am sure, therefore, there is agreement on the importance of rapid transit in the national capital region to all three senior governments, as well as to the municipalities to be served on both sides of the Ottawa River, and that these governments are therefore willing to work together on this matter.

This seems to be the appropriate time to seek a meeting to discuss public transit and transportation in the region with the other senior levels of government. To this end the minister is now making arrangements for a meeting with representatives of Ontario and Quebec at which we expect a very co-operative approach to be taken. In due course the minister will undoubtedly be reporting further to the House.

TRANSPORT—ADEQUACY OF TOFINO LIFEBOAT STATION SERVICE IN LIGHT OF DROWNINGS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) a question regarding the very unfortunate incident which happened last Wednesday, May 2, near Tofino on the west coast of Vancouver Island. At 2 a.m. four persons were making their way in a small boat, a dug-out canoe, to the Opitsat Indian reserve and the boat capsized. Fortunately, Mr. Walter Arnett, who was a member of the lifeboat crew, heard the shouting and sent out an alarm. Mr. John Shaw launched a rubber boat within four minutes of hearing the alarm and managed to rescue Mr. Henry Williams. Someone on the wharf rescued Mrs. David Henry Williams. Within 15 minutes of the rubber boat being launched, the lifeboat was launched and scoured the area but was unable to find the other two. As a result, David Henry Williams, age 33, and Mrs. Martha Martin, age 73, were drowned.

I did not raise this matter with a view to criticizing the crew of the lifeboat station; not at all. If they were able to launch a rubber boat within four minutes and launch a lifeboat within 15 minutes of hearing the alarm, I think they deserve every commendation. I raise the matter because there is a growing feeling among people on the Pacific coast that the curtailment of the staff of the various lifeboat stations has contributed to many of the losses of life at sea in recent years.

When one considers that this lifeboat crew is on duty from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., seven days a week, and on call all the rest of the time 24 hours a day, seven days a week, one realizes it is virtually impossible to expect that these men can be found by telephone message from the marine radio station at any hour of the day or night. They go out sometimes to visit friends, to go to church, to visit the beer parlour or somewhere else. It is only between 8 a.m. and 4 p.m. that persons are actually at the lifeboat station. For the remainder of the time the safety of people at sea is dependent upon someone being able to find the persons who are on call but are not really on duty.

I do not believe it was good economy when some time ago the department reduced the staff of these lifeboat stations. The men who go down to the sea in ships and do business in deep water have a right to better protection than that which they are being given. It is not merely a matter of these four persons who were making their way to the Indian reserve: there are fishing fleets 25 or 30 miles out to sea and any one of them could capsize or be involved in a collision.

There is a need for two things. There is need for a modern, up to date ship-to-shore radio service and lifeboat station crews available at all times to launch a boat and go to the rescue of those whose ship has been wrecked or destroyed. I do not raise this matter to either embarrass the minister or find fault with the lifeboat crew, who apparently in this particular instance acted with commendable speed and energy. My purpose in raising the matter is to ask the government, through the Minister of Transport, to look into this situation to see if the paring of the staff of the lifeboat stations has resulted in a situation in which people's lives are in jeopardy.

When I ask for an investigation, I do not mean public servants investigating themselves. I mean someone from the minister's office or persons familiar with lifeboat operations and coastguard services who would look into this matter. They should be people who are not intimately connected with the operation. It should certainly not be done by someone from the Treasury Board to see whether there could be a saving. This is not a case of saving dollars but, rather, of saving lives. This is what I am interested in.

I ask the minister, through the minister's parliamentary secretary, if the department will look into this question of lifeboat stations to see whether men could be on duty on three shifts of eight hours each, which would mean that they would be there and available to meet any mishap. I know some steps are being taken toward this end, but they have been very slow. There needs to be a tremendous improvement in order to achieve some radio service, particularly the ship-to-shore radio service on the Pacific coast. With those two things, adequate lifeboat crews and up to date radio communication, I think we could reduce the loss of life that has been all too common in recent years on the Pacific coast.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member that I have taken careful note of the comments he has made, of his concern and of the various other points that he outlined. At the same time, I would like to say to him, on behalf of the department, that from our review of the whole operation there is no doubt in our minds that a sufficient crew is manning the station.

In order to confirm this opinion it should be noted that it was one of the members of our lifeboat crew who first became aware of the emergency and put the rescue operation in action, which included the launching of the rubber boat and the rescue, and the further launching of the larger lifeboat, both of which took place in extremely short periods of time. Additional staff would not conceivably have improved the speed with which this whole operation was carried out.

It must also be borne in mind that all this took place during the hours of darkness. A special investigation team was sent to the scene of this unfortunate incident to look into all details relating to it. The investigation is still under way.

INFORMATION—POSSIBILITY OF USE OF RETAIL CREDIT CORPORATION BY DEPARTMENTS TO OBTAIN INFORMATION

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, on a day when the right to privacy is being discussed in the House, and indeed throughout Canada and the United States, it is appropriate to consider whether the government's own house is in order. One of the more reprehensible types of invasion of privacy is the surreptitious investigation of persons by governments through the use of commercial credit agencies whose computer-stored data is often lacking in truth if not in substance.

On March 6 of this year I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) if he would advise whether any department of the federal government is a client of the Retail Credit Corporation or Company, or of any other commercial reporting agency and, if so, does it use the information received for purposes other than as an employer? My question was prompted by the following information which has been brought to my attention. The first information is that there is in existence an up to date, eleven-page manual of the Retail Credit Company called "Retail Credit Managers' Manual". It is my understanding that this is a confidential document which is not distributed to the public. Moreover, this manual contains words to the following effect under the heading "General Policies of the Retail Credit Company":

> The company operates with the federal authorities in the United States and Canada. Requests usually come from the RCMP and other federal departments in Canada.
> These departments have the right of subpoena and we try to co-operate with them. Any unjustifiable demands should be submitted to the company's legal department in Atlanta.

The passage to which I refer concludes by saying:

You should realize that the company's information is only hearsay and is not guaranteed.

• (2220)

That is from the "Retail Credit Manager's Manual," which is an up to date manual used by retail credit managers in the United States and Canada. In conclusion, I would refer to some statistics and a comment in the report of the task force on privacy and computers which was tabled in the House earlier this year. That report states at page 63:

Retail Credit of Canada, a subsidiary of the Retail Credit Corporation of Atlanta, Georgia, which is primarily an investigative credit bureau, has been diversifying into in-file operations. Approximately 30 per cent of the in-file business in Canada is now under its control.

In light of the information which I have laid before the House, I would appreciate it if the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) would provide a full and complete answer to the question which I have raised, in the context of the factual information and the resulting concerns arising therefrom.

Adjournment Debate

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot give the hon. gentleman the kind of assurances that perhaps he would like. I gather he would want to have assurance that no one in the government's employ has anything whatsoever to do with the Retail Credit Corporation or the Retail Credit Company of Canada. However, I can say that so far as the Treasury Board is concerned no directive, no instruction and no advice has ever been issued by that body enjoining departments to make use of this kind of service for any governmental purpose, and there have been no departments, to my knowledge, that have made use of the services of this corporation.

I am advised by the Public Service Commission that they have not, and do not intend to make use of the services of this particular corporation, either to obtain character references or, indeed, measurements of so-called credit worthiness when it comes to the matter of the recruiting of people or their appointment to the public service. So both the two control agencies at least do not make use of the facilities offered by this company themselves, nor have they given any advice or instruction to other government departments that they should use them.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FOOD AND HOUSING PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of the utmost urgency and gravity. It is the ever-accelerating rise in prices, particularly in the vital fields of food and housing, and the ever-present failure of the federal government, which has paramount responsibility in this area, to take steps to abate the current inflationary spiral and to deal adequately with the continuing rise in the cost of living. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That this House urges the government to impose a temporary 90-day freeze on incomes, prices, rents and dividends, during which time it is instructed to meet with industrial, labour, provincial and consumer group leaders to formulate measures providing for medium and long term control of inflation.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the motion proposed by the hon. member be put?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimity in respect of the motion proposed by the hon. member. Therefore the motion cannot be put under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FORT ALEXANDER RESERVE—NON-ATTENDANCE OF CHILDREN AT SCHOOL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The matter concerns the fact that 600 students from nursery school to grade 8 inclusive have not attended school since Friday, May 4, on the Fort Alexander Indian reservation in Manitoba. Because of the deplorable conditions of existing educational facilities resulting in health hazards and illness, children at Fort Alexander are not able to receive the educational help which they so desperately need.

In view of the fact that this condition needs immediate attention, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development immediately take steps which will provide adequate educational facilities on the Fort Alexander Indian reservation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and therefore requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. Therefore the motion cannot be put under the terms of Standing Order 43.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 26 to propose a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing an important matter requiring urgent consideration. I refer to the sharp rise in the cost of living, 6.6 per cent in the last year, the highest increase since 1951, which is particularly evident in the vital areas of shelter costs, up 6.9 per cent, and food at home, up 13.3 per cent, causing hardship to hundreds of thousands of Canadians, especially those on low and fixed incomes, and the complete failure of the government to alleviate this national crisis.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East has filed with the Chair the required notice under the provisions of Standing Order 26 in which he seeks to move the adjournment of the House to discuss the question to which he has alluded.

As has been frequently stated in considering proposed motions to adjourn the House, the question to be determined by the Chair does not necessarily concern itself with the importance of the topic but rather with the requirement that the matter should be one that should be given urgent consideration under the Standing Order. Obviously the subject is one of great concern to the House and to all hon. members, but in my view it is not acceptable at this time under the provisions of Standing Order 26. I would draw the attention of hon. members to paragraph 5 of Standing Order 26 which states in part:

> In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration, Mr. Speaker shall have regard ... to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

In passing, it should be stated that the question of the rising cost of living was covered in amendments in both the address and budget debates in this session. Additionally, as hon. members will recognize, the estimates of the departments concerned are still before committees. The question of rising food costs is now being considered by a special committee of the House. I might also refer to Bill C-133 dealing with the National Housing Act which is now before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

I am always reluctant to suggest that hon. members make use of the allotted days available to them under Standing Order 58 as I do not think it is the function of the Chair to direct the utilization of those days. On the other hand, I think I should remind hon. members that there are some 13 days available between now and June 30, and it does seem to me that some consideration might be given by hon. members to that aspect of our proceedings.

For these and other reasons, perhaps the form of the motion proposed by the hon. member which in some respects at least is more of a substantive motion or a censure motion, I would hesitate very much to suggest to the House that there should be a debate under the provisions of Standing Order 26. I regret I cannot put the motion at this time under the terms of Standing Order 26.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING IMPLEMENTATION OF CONTINGENCY PLAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister, in the absence particularly of the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister will have observed the very disturbing increase in the cost of living reported by Statistics Canada this morning. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is now prepared to implement its contingency plan that we have heard about from time to time? We have suggested a 90-day freeze on wages, incomes and prices but, whatever the government's contingency plan is, is the Prime Minister now prepared to implement it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says that they propose a 90-day freeze. It is not clear to the government whether the freeze would include prices on the farm, at the farm gate, all prices, or just—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Just answer the question. You know where those wisecracks got you on October 30, Pierre.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be of any assistance I can to the government in formulating policies—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: —but I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the figures released today, following previously disturbing figures on the cost of living, the government is now prepared to implement the contingency plan it has talked about in the past, although it has never divulged what it is? Is the Prime Minister prepared to move at the present time?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think I have previously explained the government's position on this subject. It is that if the plan is to be implemented it will be announced and implemented at the moment of its announcement. We would not signal it in advance as this would permit everyone across the country to make increases before the plan was actually implemented. I am interested to see that the Leader of the Opposition has not really answered with respect to the explanation I asked of him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): You are not allowed to ask questions now.

Mr. Stanfield: I would be very happy to meet with the Prime Minister and answer any questions that he may have to put to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, this is my final supplementary. In the light of the failure and the intentional refusal of the Prime Minister to be in any way responsive, I simply ask him whether the government will indicate what level of price increase it is prepared to accept in this country for 1973? Can the Prime Minister give the House and the country any information at all, hopefully precise information, as to what the government is prepared to accept before taking some more drastic action?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we would not want to signal in advance any steps we wanted to take in this direction. I think we will be judged by the opposition and by the country on whether we take steps at the right time. But I fail to understand, and perhaps I need guidance from you, Mr. Speaker, why the Leader of the Opposition wants to do this in a private meeting between ourselves. Surely the Leader of the Opposition receives emoluments under the Crown, and this is under his jurisdiction and he should be able to answer questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have expended a good deal of energy trying to get into a position in this House where my right hon. friend could ask me questions like this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for York South rising for the purpose of a supplementary?

Mr. Lewis: I am, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO ENABLE ACTION ON RECOMMENDATIONS OF REVIEW BOARD—SUGGESTED FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister and suggest that the situation with regard to the increase in prices, particularly food prices, is perhaps more serious than some of the hilarity and noise suggests.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that the announcement with regard to the Food Prices Review Board gives that board very wide powers of inquiry and the opportunity for staff necessary to make that inquiry, which we of course support, may I ask whether the government is now considering necessary legislation to enable the board or the Governor in Council or a minister to take action following such an inquiry and the recommendations of the board?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be the intention of the government to take action on any reasonable proposition put forward by the board. I cannot say at this time whether that would entail legislation or not. If legislation is needed in order to act as recommended and as the government desires, then of course we will present it to the House.

Mr. Lewis: I appreciate that there are obviously some constitutional problems with respect to any system of price control or rolling back prices. May I therefore ask the Prime Minister whether he is prepared to call a special federal-provincial conference for the purpose of having all 11 governments or all 11 legislatures take action in order to halt the rising cost of living in all areas?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to that is already written into history. When I was Prime Minister in 1969 or early 1970 this government did call such a conference to obtain the support of the provinces in our fight against inflation. If that were a necessary course I certainly would do it again. I would hope, though, that if we agree this time amongst the provinces and the federal government to do our best to fight inflation, many of the provinces would not head for the hills as soon as the fight got a bit tough.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are many members seeking supplementaries on this subject and they will be recognized. I will allow the hon. member for York South another supplementary for the moment, but then I think we should recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue and pursue supplementaries from there.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if any of the provincial governments run to the hills the people of Canada will deal with them just as the people of Canada dealt with this government last October 30.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: In view of the very substantial increase in all areas of the cost of living and in view of the forecasts of economists that these increases will continue in the future, I am asking the Prime Minister whether he would consider calling a meeting of the federal government and all the provincial governments immediately for the purpose of taking joint action to halt the spiralling rise in the cost of living?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is the same question as the one I just answered, with the possible addition of the word "immediately", and the answer is no, not immediately. We are having a meeting of first ministers on the 24th of this month, and if there is a desire on the part of all participants to put this subject on the agenda the federal government will be very happy to deal with it.

● (1420)

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

Everybody deplores the continual rise in prices, but since the Leader of the Official Opposition is promising price increases to fishermen in the east and in the west, to the western farmers, to the workers of central Canada while he is asking for a price freeze in the House, something which is not easily understandable,—my question is serious, I do not want to set anybody laughing—is the Prime Minister prepared to take efficient measures to have the Leader of the Official Opposition examined first thing tomorrow morning?

[English]

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING INTEREST RATES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if I can get the attention of the Prime Minister, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. Trudeau: You have my attention.

Mr. Hees: In view of the fact that the cost of living is going up—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member. There is quite a bit of noise at the moment and it is difficult for the Chair to hear the question being asked by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for demanding quiet for this very important question. I would ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the cost of living, as the Prime Minister knows, is rising at an annual rate of 3.2 per cent a year, is it the intention of the government to intensify and carry on the policy of rising interest rates and tight money initiated by the Bank of Canada on the instructions of the government about a month ago, which of course will bring about higher unemployment? Is that the intention of the government, as it was three years ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is an element of debate in the question, but if I could comment on the premise of it, that the rise on an annual basis is 3.2 per cent—

Mr. Hees: It was 13.2 per cent.

Mr. Trudeau: —I would be prepared to concede that.

Mr. Hees: I said 3.2 per cent but I meant 13.2.

Mr. Trudeau: I should like to tell the hon. member that in some countries which have applied price and wage controls the consumer price index has been increasing. It has been increasing in the United States at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 9.8 per cent in the past three months. On a year-over-year basis the increase in the consumer price index in Japan was 8.4 per cent, in Germany, 6.9 per cent, in France, 7.0 per cent, in the United Kingdom, 8.2 per cent, and in Italy, 9.7 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings is recognized on a supplementary.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, naturally I meant 13.2 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Does the Prime Minister think, because the cost of living is rising at an abnormally high rate in a few other countries in the world, that this justifies this government, when at the present time our cost of living is going up at an annual rate of 13.2 per cent, in sitting back and refusing to bring in the contingency plan that on other occasions it said it would bring in?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. That is not a question; of course; that is argument. A number of hon. members are seeking the floor for supplementaries. They will be reocgnized. Is the right hon. gentleman rising for a supplementary?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will come to him in a moment after the supplementaries.

FOOD AND SHELTER PRICE INCREASES—STEPS TO CONTROL PENDING ESTABLISHMENT OF PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the urgency of this matter and the fact that it does not seem to be of any great concern to the government, which is regrettable—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact the proposed Prices Review Board, with all its shortcomings, has not yet been set up and will not report for at least another three months, I ask the Prime Minister what specific interim steps the government is prepared to take to hold the line on rising food costs and rising shelter costs which are causing such extreme hardship to people on lower incomes in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, apart from saying that the year-over-year based increase in the all-item consumer price index in April was 6.6 per cent, thereby hoping to correct the figure of the hon. member who was not sure whether it was 3 per cent or 13 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: I was sure it was 13 per cent and not three.

Mr. Trudeau: —I must say I have nothing to add to what I said in answer to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, with great respect, the Prime Minnister has deliberately avoided answering my question. With Your Honour's indulgence, I will repeat my question because it is urgent and very important. In view of the fact that the Prices Review Board proposed by the government, with all its limitations, and there are many, has not yet been set up and will not in fact report for at least another three months, I ask the Prime Minister what specific interim measures the government is prepared to take to hold the line on rising food prices and rising shelter prices to alleviate the suffering of those on low and fixed incomes in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will do me the favour of reading Hansard tomorrow, he will see that I answered this question in reply to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister is deliberately refusing to answer my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: He shows the bankruptcy of this government in meeting this national crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps Your Honour will allow me to redirect my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has a great deal of statutory responsibility in this regard. What specific proposals does the government propose to bring in to help hold the line on rising food costs during the next three months before the minister's lame duck Prices Review Board has a chance to get into operation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to answer the hon. member's lame duck question by reminding him of the proposals in the recent budget to remit sales taxes and remove customs duties as well as to increase the old age pension and family allowances to help the lower income people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might allow the Chair to recognize other members on supplementaries. At this moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway on a supplementary. I will return to the hon. member and others in due course.

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—POSSIBLE PROGRAM TO PROVIDE PROPER FOOD FOR PEOPLE WITH LOW INCOMES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the lengthy battle to get the Prices Review Board started and in view of the fact that people are suffering in the meantime from malnutrition, will the Prime Minister inform the House when the government proposes to implement the recommendation in the report of the Special Committee on Trends In Food Prices, which was accepted by the House, that the government consider the feasibility of co-sponsored programs with the provinces to put proper food on the tables of people with low incomes? I do not want to hear about the Canada Assistance Plan because this recommendation was in addition to any Canada Assistance Plan program.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer on behalf of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: —I feel I must refer to the Canada Assistance Plan because it does provide an opportunity for the federal government to pay half the cost of certain programs if the provinces would request them which would enable more food to be placed on the tables of lower income groups. Also, as I said in the House recently, the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated that he would be going into this matter with his provincial counterparts in tne course of the review of social welfare policy he is undertaking.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Instead of leaving this to some other minister or taking it away from the Prime Minister, will the minister, under his responsibility as Minister of Consumer Affairs, try to get these programs going immediately in order to put proper food on the tables of those who need it?

Mr. Gray: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CIP PLANT IN TEMISCAMING—STUDIES RESPECTING POSSIBLE REOPENING—REQUEST FOR REPORT BY MINISTER

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Can he say if new elements have come out concerning the reopening of the CIP plant at Temiscaming and is there any hope of that reopening taking place in the near future?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I checked on this matter just before coming into the House this afternoon. The position is that we have completed our federal talks with the various parties concerned. The government of Quebec is now meeting, I understand, with the unions and with the promoters, and all three parties agree that once their round of negotiations is completed they will return to us with a proposal. As things stand at the moment, we have gone as far as it is possible for us to go until the remaining three parties reach agreement on the substantive issues involved.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary.

Has the department made an offer to the persons involved regarding resumption of operations in these plants?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: Not a specific offer in terms of dollars and cents, because that is impossible for us to do until the outcome of the discussions to which I have referred is known to us, but we have said that once given a proposal by the other parties we shall respond and make the necessary grants available.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—SUGGESTED ADDITIONAL TAX ADJUSTMENTS TO ASSIST PEOPLE ON LOW OR FIXED INCOMES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary relating to previous questions. Perhaps the cabinet meeting could break up over there for a moment. It is directed to the Prime Minister. Over and above the statements he has made with respect to tax changes and various measures introduced in the spring budget, does the right hon. gentleman have any other plans in mind, not necessarily relating to price controls but in the area of tax adjustments or moneys which could be directed to people with low incomes and people on fixed incomes to help offset immediately the impact of the increases in the cost of living?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): In the area of taxation, what we have in mind is also on the order paper or will be on the order paper soon. In the area of price and wage controls it is in the form of a contingency plan, and here I refer the hon. member to my answer to his leader a few moments ago.

Mr. McGrath: You have no contingency plan.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, we do.

Mr. Hees: They don't know where to find it.

Mr. McGrath: Ask the Minister of Agriculture. He knows.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. I suggest that the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate be given an opportunity to ask his supplementary, and I will then recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Lundrigan: Many of the people I represent are finding inflation rather difficult and I should like the Prime Minister, if he could get serious for a moment, to answer the question. The incomes of many people on the east coast of this country average $2,000 a year and I presume this is the case in central Canada and western Canada as well. Has the Prime Minister anything to tell these people who are doing everything in their power to alert Members of Parliament and the government to the impact that the rising cost of living is having on them? Has he any encouragement at all to give these people? Has he anything to say which would promise an easing of the burden of inflation on people with low or fixed incomes?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the answer given by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was a form of encouragement.

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE UNSETTLED CONDITIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the urbane Solicitor General. I know I shall get an answer, which is something nobody has been able to get today from the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already brought this matter to the minister's attention. In view of the deep unsettlement in the penitentiaries of our country and, indeed, falling morale among the custodial officers, finding, as they do, that it is easier for inmates to get out of penitentiaries these days than it is to get in—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —will he give consideration to setting up a royal commission composed of representatives of his department and of the Department of Justice and also of the various provincial Attorneys General to look into this matter in order to offset falling morale in all of the institutions I have visited or with which I have been in communication, and to report within 60 days because the situation demands not only immediate attention but action?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will give consideration to that proposal. I might say that at the present time there are a number of administrative inquiries under way, one with respect to Cowansville and another with respect to Dorchester penitentiary. I shall await the reports of those two inquiries, which I expect very soon, and then we will make a decision whether or not we need a broader inquiry such as is suggested by the right hon. member. I might point out that in recent years several important inquiries have taken place. There was the Ouimet report of 1969, and the Swackhamer and the Trainor commissions last year. However, I do not want to turn down the possibility of implementing this recommendation. It may be necessary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for that answer. I know how sincere he is about this matter. But am I not right when I suggest that the degradation, as it were, in morale in the penitentiaries has greatly accelerated since the present head of the penitentiaries was appointed some two years ago?

Mr. Allmand: It is true there are morale problems, especially in some of our maximum security institutions, but I do not think I could relate this to the fact that the present director was appointed two years ago. In general, our problem in the maximum security institutions has been the tremendous increase in the inmate population. As we all know, the maximum security inmate is the most difficult type of prisoner to deal with. There are certain morale problems and we are seeking ways now to solve them. An inquiry might be necessary.

COWANSVILLE—MEASURES TO PREVENT ESCAPES

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary of the Solicitor General.

Does he intend to wait for the report's findings before starting to seek a way of locking up the Cowansville penitentiary?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. We have already taken steps to correct the security situation at Cowansville penitentiary. As I pointed out recently, we have increased the number of guards. We are placing special barbed wire on the top of the 18-foot fence. We are clearing the bush farther away from the fence. We are putting special grating on the windows—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might wish to return to motions to make a statement.

Mr. Hees: How many of the inmates are going to tonight's game?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

INDUSTRY

LUMBER—POSSIBILITY OF EMBARGO ON EXPORTS TO REDUCE DOMESTIC COST

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister had time to consider the proposal I advanced some weeks ago to reduce the cost of lumber in Canada by using the federal power to place an embargo on the export of lumber?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): We have reviewed the situation with respect to lumber. We have held discussions with industry representatives. My impression is that the tight situation as far as lumber is concerned should ease in the second half of this year.

SHELTER COST INCREASES—SUGGESTED ELIMINATION OF SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister is unable to announce a contingency plan to meet the very serious problem of rising costs, and since the cost of shelter has increased considerably, would the right hon. gentleman start by eliminating the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This is a representation which is made frequently in the House—

An hon. Member: And ignored.

Mr. Trudeau: —and which the government considers from time to time in preparing a budget.

ENERGY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF CRUDE OIL—SUGGESTED LIMITATION OF EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources relating to the fact that both Gulf Oil and Shell Oil have now followed in the footsteps of Imperial Oil by raising the price of crude. Since these price increases, of which there have been several in recent months, are related not to increased costs but to the fact that demand in the United States is increasing, and since this in turn will result in increased prices for gasoline and domestic fuel oil, would the minister and/or the National Energy Board limit exports of oil to the United States?

● (1440)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may not have been following this but exports were limited by decision of the government in the earlier part of this year. The hon. member says that the increases have not been due to costs, but I would remind him that the cost of offshore oil, which represents between 800,000 and 900,000 barrels a day in eastern Canada, has been increasing steadily because of the pressures applied by the OPEC countries.

With regard to the other question which may be implicit in a comment just made, whether or not the price in the western part of this country should be divorced from the international price, this is something that we are taking under consideration but no decision along those lines has yet been made.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, in view of the concern that is being expressed on both sides of the House in regard to the rising cost of living, and without quibbling as to the precise reasons for the increase but recognizing that price increases as a result of this action are probably inevitable, would the minister and/or the National Energy Board consider decreasing the amount of allowable exports to the United States?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might reflect on this. It is not so much a question of the absolute level of exports but whether or not we should have a two-price system. As I have said, we have not yet reached any conclusion in this regard.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—REQUEST THAT HOUSE BE CONSULTED ON TERMS OF REFERENCE OF PROPOSED PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question relating to matters which have been discussed. Is the government prepared to consult the House in connection with the terms of reference and powers of the proposed Prices Review Board?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect, I believe that this question was asked yesterday of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs simply said that the government was going to invoke the Inquiries Act to establish the board. I know this and so does every member of the House. I am asking the Prime Minister, knowing that to be the fact, whether the government is prepared to consult the House as to the width of the powers and terms of reference this board will have in its dealings with this very difficult subject?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I really have nothing to add to what the minister said yesterday.

FOOD AND SHELTER COST INCREASES—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the NDP now supports our proposal for an immediate federal-provincial conference on rising food and shelter costs, thereby constituting a majority of the House in favour of such a proposal, and in light of the figures released today by Statistics Canada on food and shelter costs, would the Prime Minister now give the government's consent to convening immediately such a federal-provincial conference to deal with this very serious crisis on an emergency basis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is, as you will realize, the same question. As I told the leader of the NDP, a federal-provincial conference will be taking place two weeks from now and the agenda can always be expanded to include the subject the hon. member referred to if such is the desire of the provincial governments across the country.

Mr. McGrath: Can the Prime Minister assure the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized for a further supplementary, but a number of members are seeking to ask supplementaries on the same subject and we will soon be running short of time.

Mr. McGrath: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I merely want to ask the Prime Minister whether he will assure the House that the agenda of that conference will contain an item dealing with the rising cost of living.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. This government operates in co-operation with the provinces and we do not impose agenda items or force them on the provinces.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

CRITICISM BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD OF CERTAIN STATEMENTS BY COMMISSIONER—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Is the criticism made by the President of the Treasury Board against the Official Languages Commissioner, Mr. Spicer, about some of his statements, endorsed by the right hon. Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I apologize to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, but I did not catch the question mark in his question.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I only wanted to ask the Prime Minister if he endorsed the criticism made by the President of the Treasury Board against the Official Languages Commissioner, Mr. Spicer, about some of his statements.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will have to note this question because I do not know what statement of the President of the Treasury Board the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Has the right hon. Prime Minister any criticism to make against the Official Languages Commissioner, Mr. Spicer?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I have no criticism against Mr. Spicer.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN ISOLATED POST ALLOWANCES FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES BECAUSE OF HIGHER COST OF LIVING

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It relates to the fact that the cost of living in areas above the 60th parallel is approximately 25 to 30 per cent higher than in southern Canada. Can the Prime Minister say whether consideration is being given to increasing the isolated post allowances so as to assist government employees to cope with the higher cost of living in the north, and are any other measures being considered to assist other members of the population in the north to cope with higher costs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot.

REQUEST THAT FAMILY ALLOWANCE PAYMENTS BE TIED TO COST OF LIVING INDEX PENDING INCREASES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the proposed increases in family allowances will not be implemented until January, 1974, and in view of the significant rise in the cost of food, clothing and shelter which is affecting many hundreds of thousands of children of families on low income, would the minister cause to be tabled an order in council to tie present family allowance payments to the cost of living index, using January, 1973, as the base month, to ensure that families receive some improvement in benefits starting immediately instead of their having to wait until next year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only remind the Conservative party that family allowances paid to needy persons, to children of needy families, to families with needy children, would have been in effect since January 1 of this year had the members sitting on the Conservative benches not voted against it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is well aware of the fact that the opposition was going to vote for the family allowance bill of the last session. He need only ask the minister of the day, who is now Minister of Labour, about the agreement between the two parties in regard to voting on that bill. Certainly he should clarify the position.

FAMILY ALLOWANCE INCREASES—SUGGESTED ADVANCING OF EFFECTIVE DATE TO JULY 1, 1973

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government would consider advancing the effective date of the new plan for family allowances to July 1, 1973?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the desire of the government to have them implemented as soon as possible. I believe the reason for setting the date of January 1 is the complexity of implementing the plan after parliament has voted upon it.

INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING—EFFECT OF TARIFF AND TAX CHANGES ON CONSUMER PRICES

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the minister's earlier reply to the hon. member for St. John's East to the effect that he was relying on the February 19 budget proposals partially to meet the increase in consumer prices, would the minister be prepared to table the government's analysis of the consequences of the budget changes on consumer prices? If not, is the government satisfied that the tariff and tax changes contained in the budget have been passed on to the consumer and provide adequate relief?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the work that the hon. member refers to has not yet been completed but I shall be happy to discuss his suggestion with my colleagues.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—VALIDITY OF ROYAL PROCLAMATION OF 1763

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister on the subject of aboriginal rights which arises from certain recent statements he has made outside the House. Was the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development stating government policy when he told the Indian Affairs Committee on April 12 last that the Royal Proclamation of 1763 has continuing validity of application in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt as to the correctness of the question asked by the hon. member from a procedural standpoint. The hon. member is making reference at this time, I gather, to evidence in a committee. I doubt whether the question can be asked in those terms. Perhaps the hon. member might like to ask the question directly without reference to a statement made in a committee of the House.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I think I might place myself in order if I were to ask the Prime Minister directly whether the government recognizes the continuing validity of application in Canada of the Royal Proclamation of 1763 in respect of Indian rights, native rights?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must advise the hon. member that this is a very difficult legal question which I am not able to settle in any final way by any answer or, indeed, by a statement of policy. I believe the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development at that time was commenting on a recent judgment of the Supreme Court in relation to a British Columbia case and was probably referring to the fact that a suggestion had been made by some of the judges that the Royal Proclamation still had effect. As the hon. member knows, this is a question of law and not a question of policy.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Central Nova. Order, please. May I be allowed to recognize the hon. member for Comox-Alberni for a supplementary and then go to the hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. Perhaps I might preface it by saying that while the minister did refer to a certain decision by the Supreme Court he was not answering the question in relation to that decision, initially at least. In view of the answer the Prime Minister has given to my question, may I ask him why it would appear that he is refusing to recognize section 91.24 of the British North America Act in respect of Indians and land reserved to Indians and appears in public statements across the country to be trying to slough off this responsibility to the provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That appears to be argument.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

STUDY OF IMPACT OF INCREASES IN COST OF LIVING ON DISADVANTAGED REGIONS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and is on the topic of the rising cost of living. Has the minister initiated any study to determine the particular impact of the rising cost of living on the disadvantaged regions of Canada and how counterproductive these increases have been in terms of DREE's efforts to overcome regional disparities, since it appears that prices seem to be rising faster in the poorer regions of the country?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker. No specific studies of the type outlined by the hon. member have been undertaken. He knows, however, that we have a broader economic analysis under way of these regions of disparity and this would be one of the elements in it. I will be very glad to make what information we have available to him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of members are seeking to ask supplementaries, but we have reached the end of the question period. If the hon. member for Central Nova has a supplementary he will be recognized and then the Chair will recognize the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. MacKay: In view of the alarming statistics dealt with today, does the minister intend to initiate any particular action to see what can be done to take into account this alarming rise in the cost of living and how it affects the poorer regions of the country?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to do that in consultation with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and other members of the government.

[Mr. Barnett.]

HOUSING

TORONTO—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RELIEVE RISING COST

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's recent visit to the Toronto area and in view of the average cost of housing in the Toronto area having risen by 19 per cent in the last year from $32,000 to over $39,000 on average, has the Prime Minister any suggestion as to what his government will do to relieve the soaring cost of housing in the Toronto area?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this subject and the government's position on it is in committee now and the government will have further occasion to state its policy.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I could not raise it until this moment because I did not know what was going to happen. I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to a great and accomplished parliamentarian, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), and call to the attention of the Chair and the House that it is one year today, May 8, since the minister introduced his budget containing certain measures which he has successfully evaded the necessity of having to introduce in the House up to the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course that is not a question of privilege. I doubt that it would be in order to have any kind of debate at this point. I am sure the hon. member for Peace River will be the first to appreciate that that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, roughly two months ago, I believe, I participated in a move, not initiated by myself, to try to get some changes in respect of the question period. I believe that the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker) is the member on the government side responsible for chairing the particular committee considering changes. Today we have had another example of what happens in the House of Commons in respect of the 40-minute question period. I think it is redundant for me to remind Your Honour that this is the only way in which, to my knowledge at least, the Canadian people through their representatives can hold the government responsible for its behaviour.

Mr. Sharp: Nonsense.

Mr. Lundrigan: It is the only way I am aware of. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), although an expert in external matters, may not be aware of it.

Notice was given the government this morning at eight o'clock of the importance of the issue to be raised today. Every member of the Privy Council was alerted by Statistics Canada to the fact that there had been a dramatic increase in the cost of living.

We come here today as members and try to pursue our responsibility not for ourselves but on behalf of the Canadian people, particularly in respect of the areas of very low income and areas that have been very adversely affected by the increase in the cost of living. Members attempted to pursue with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in particular the manner in which the government intends to try to react to the increases in the cost of living. The Prime Minister evaded the questions. He did not answer any of the questions and refused to respond to the representations made. I think I would be unfair if I said that he treated the matter as a joke but some members might be able to accuse him of that.

We have the situation today of a 40-minute question period in which we spent today roughly 30 of the 40 minutes on this most important matter, but I doubt that there has been one single word that we as Members of Parliament and the various communications media can report to the Canadian people by way of encouragement as a result of the representations we made. This is mainly because the government has elected, for one reason or another, having achieved the rule changes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that the House would want the Chair to allow the hon. member to pursue the matter. He rose on a question of privilege. He should state what the question of privilege is and indicate whether he intends to propose a motion. The Chair will make a ruling on whether there is a prima facie case of privilege in that event.

The hon. member is bringing to the attention of the Chair a point which he has raised before. The point is his dissatisfaction with the question period. By agreement between the parties the matter was referred to a committee of the House. I gather that some time or other it will be considered by that committee. However, I am wondering what purpose will be served while the grievance is under consideration by the committee, and what will be gained by pursuing the matter under the guise of a question of privilege. I would hope that if the hon. member indeed has a question of privilege, which I have not perceived until now, he would indicate what it is.

Mr. Lundrigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to say in very quick summary that perhaps the matter should be dealt with by the experts on procedure rather than by a backbencher from the east coast of Canada. The central fact is that by several moves, the restriction on the question period and numerous other restrictions placed on us, our privileges in the House of Commons have been taken away from us by the new rules and by the fact that the government has elected not to respond to the questions raised by hon. members. The result is that effectively our role of holding the government accountable for its behaviour has been eliminated.

I say to Your Honour that it is not good enough for the committee to get around one of these days to dealing with this important matter. This is the most important thing before the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: There must be some way in which we as representatives of the Canadian people, can hold this government responsible for its behaviour. The government has to accept its responsibility to answer to the Canadian people. Today it has been dramatically demonstrated that the government is unwilling to do so. If motions are necessary to bring this matter to a head, then I serve notice that motions will be coming forward of such a magnitude as to hamstring the House until we get some action. I am not blaming the chairman of the organization committee, but certainly that committee has a responsibility and it must tackle the fact that the government has elected not to co-operate with the people of Canada and with members of the House of Commons. We have to hold the government responsible for wilfully rejecting that responsibility. I will be moving motions, and unless Your Honour wants to make a statement to remind the chairman and members of the committee of their responsibilities there will be some delays before we get question periods off the ground in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. I should like to advise the hon. member in a totally noncontroversial way that this very important question, along with many others dealing with the business and organization of the House, has already been referred to the committee.

Mr. Lundrigan: We know that. It has been there for months.

Mr. Walker: I listened very carefully to the hon. member. May I now continue? There are many channels of communication that the hon. member has to members of the committee. If he would care to see members of the committee from his own party they would be his spokesmen. May I say that at the meeting on Thursday the subcommittee will be reporting and asking the full committee to adopt a priority of subjects. The question period is the number one priority subject for the Thursday meeting. Prior to now we have been dealing with the Speaker's estimates.

I must say that I hope no member of the House will fail to give that very important committee an opportunity to go into these matters fully so that not just one member who has a grievance will bring it before the House but will give the committee an opportunity to try to make this whole operation more satisfactory to hon. members such as the one who has just spoken.

Mr. Epp: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Members on this side of the House have been questioned from time to time about the use of Standing Order 43. I moved my first motion under Standing Order 43 today because I felt I had a problem in my riding which is of pressing necessity and needs a solution now. On the same basis, I question whether or not that motion was considered at all by members of the government party who out of hand gave a negative answer. However, I realize that, as a backbencher, trying to get the government to act or at least to listen to the problems that we want to present is very difficult. I suggest that the committee review the whole matter of the question period and at the same time, question very seriously the whole position with regard to Standing Order 43. If there have been misuses, changes should be made, but surely this is a Standing Order which allows a member of the House to rise on a legitimate constituency matter. These attempts to raise such matters are simply being discarded out of hand, so I believe that a change should be made now.

Mr. Cafik: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the point of order was motivated primarily by the feeling of some hon. members that the government has not adequately responded to the increases in the cost of living in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cafik: You can cheer after I have finished, if you like. May I continue, Mr. Speaker? It seems to me that the House should bear in mind that in recent days a working paper on social security was brought forward which proposed an increase in family allowances from $7.21—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we are going beyond the point of order which was raised a moment ago. My understanding of the point raised by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate was that there are difficulties in asking questions during the question period. The hon. member for Provencher referred also to Standing Order 43. I am sure it is the feeling of all hon. members that our rules in relation to that Standing Order could easily be improved, and it is hoped that it will be considered by the committee. If hon. members feel we should continue to have a discussion on the point of order, we should, as much as possible, limit ourselves to considerations of a strictly procedural nature. I invite the hon. member to bear this in mind as he proceeds with his point of order.

Mr. Cafik: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, but it did seem to me appropriate to indicate that what gave rise to the point of order was, in my view, not a valid point and that we have been adequate in this regard. So far as the general point of order is concerned in respect of the question period, it would seem to me that a great deal could be achieved if this matter were discussed. I would certainly encourage a serious discussion of it as soon as possible and particularly of the abuses of the rules whereby points of a political nature are brought forward which I do not think are, in fact, valid points at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: Politics in the House of Commons!

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I listened with keen interest to your remarks as well as those of previous speakers. The Social Credit group continues to deplore the oral question period, partly for reasons which we share with the Progressive Conservatives. We blame them for taking such undue advantage of the supplementary question system that hon. members of other parties are unable to take an active part in the oral question period.

Mr. Speaker, we deplore the extreme slowness of this House in dealing with problems, specifically at the level of the committee involved. We hope Conservative participation in the committee as well as that of our colleagues from other parties will be serious and positive; that the oral question period may be truly meaningful and, at the same time, offering an opportunity for each and every hon. member to truly carry out his duty, which consists in controlling government action, and also to convey an image of efficiency to the public sitting in the galleries.

It is a sad image that we project of the slowness of the House and the clowning of the Progressive Conservatives. If they would only agree to cease abuse of supplementaries which, when you reach the tenth, have absolutely no relation to the initial question, and were willing to co-operate with the Chair and other hon. members, such an understanding of our proper functions as Members of Parliament, which is not to force our opinions through, but to co-operate for the purpose of healthy legislation, would make the task of the Chair much easier and more interesting and we would be giving an intelligent image of parliament to the people of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I thank all hon. members for their interesting comments. I noticed that the chairman of the committee in question was listening closely to the advice and counsel he has received from his colleagues in the House, and I hope, as do hon. members, that the matter can be considered expeditiously by this committee.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed, from Monday, May 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am very much concerned that we should legalize a procedure which I do not think should be tolerated by the ordinary individual citizen. In the society in which we live we should seek to protect and ensure the right of the individual to free communication with other individuals, without the threat or risk of someone listening in on the conversations, and so far as I am concerned this includes law enforcement officers.

I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), when introducing this kind of legislation, should have fully protected the right of the individual to privacy within his or her home, or anywhere else for that matter. I believe that this bill should end at the proposed new section 178.11 which reads:

> Every one who, by means of an electromagnetic, acoustic, mechanical or other device, wilfully intercepts a private communication is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for five years.

But I do not know whether the penalty should be that stiff. Along with my insistence on the right to privacy goes a dislike of putting people in jail for long periods of time. I do not believe that it does a person much good to be put in jail. I doubt that it improves his disposition, his attitude to society. The type of education that people get in jail is not to be recommended.

During the time which I have served in this House I have noticed that there is a great predilection on the part of ministers of justice, and I suppose on the part of those who advise them, to attach rather lengthy jail terms to the provisions of the various pieces of legislation which they introduce from time to time. I do not wonder that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has so much trouble with people escaping from jails, in effect walking out and leaving them. Surely, this should convince the Department of Justice that people do not like jails. If one could get this through the rather thick skulls of the people concerned, perhaps they would not put so many other people in jail.

As I say, I do not think we should introduce this type of legislation granting privileges or rights to police forces to use what are loosely called bugging devices, electromagnetic devices and so on, as super-snoops on the public generally. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), if these devices were really effective in the areas where they have already been used, crime would have decreased, but it did not decrease. If crime did not decrease under those circumstances, then what argument is there for using these devices? Undoubtedly, within the bureaucracy and among the perfectionists throughout our land there are significant numbers of people who would like to bring about a perfectly oriented society in which no one does any wrong. But such a thing hardly every comes into being. And when I look at some of the actions that have currently come to my notice I am not at all convinced of the infallibility of those who say they would protect us from malfeasance through the use of snooping devices.

Let me mention the matter of unemployment insurance benefits. I get many letters from people who have applied for these benefits. Now we have what are called benefit control officers. That description tells us something about our society and about the attitudes of government. They are not called inspectors or investigators, which would be good descriptive terms for the job they do. No, they are called benefit control officers. They are the men who work on benefits. I ask, for whose benefit? I get some letters about them. I could produce those letters but they are private. I have one here from a lady who says she did not really mean what apparently she said. She did not really want to incriminate herself to such an extent. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, she is in no danger of prosecution. The danger she faces is that she will be denied benefits to which she thought she was entitled, for otherwise she would not have applied for them.

Not too long ago I raised a question in this House about a labour dispute at a potash mine in my area, to which a member of the police force was sent in plain clothes. I asked the Solicitor General to investigate the matter. He did, and later he replied, in essence, that this sort of practice would not be continued. He did not give me a firm commitment that nothing like this would ever be done again, because I suppose he had to leave his officers the leeway they need. But there was a clear implication that in this case action had been taken which was not necessary. How do we know that people, officers of the Crown or police officers, who have these bugging devices in their hands and under their control, will not abuse them? It is my clear understanding that one party to a conversation can give permission for his end of it to be tapped. But what about the other party? Is he subject to the same procedure, even though he does not give permission? I would have thought the lawyers in this House would have been more critical of this legislation.

The Minister of Justice should examine his conscience pretty thoroughly when he brings this kind of legislation before us. This is the kind of legislation that can be used to suppress the rights of the individual; it is the kind of legislation that can be used to threaten people and it is the kind of legislation which has been used by dictators and authoritarian governments to enforce their will.

I recall at the time of the FLQ crisis in Quebec that the then minister of justice brought in follow-up legislation which made members of the FLQ subject to certain penalties under certain conditions. At that time I asked him how he defined a member of the FLQ but I did not get an answer then nor since, yet identification was crucial to the total approach. To my mind this was an infringement of the potential rights of the individual just as the legislation before us now will permit an infringement of the rights of the individual.

The pertinent clause of the bill, 178.15(1) reads:

> Where the Attorney General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of this Section by the Attorney General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada is satisfied that circumstances exist that would justify the giving of an authorization for the interception of private communications but the urgency of the situation requires that interceptions commence before an authorization could, with reasonable diligence, be obtained, he may, on such terms and conditions, if any, as he considers advisable, give a permit for the interception of private communications between persons, at a place and in a manner designated by him in the permit.

That is a wide open provision, Mr. Speaker. What is the urgency? At the very least this type of procedure should be hedged with the greatest possible protection for the rights of the individual, not left loose and open.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: I am surprised that the Minister of Justice would bring such legislation into this House. It has been said that the ineffective parts or the worst parts of this legislation can be dealt with in committee. If Bill C-176 of last year, which dealt with the marketing of hogs or cattle was before the house then I would be prepared to go into committee and fight the points in question. However, I am not prepared to sit in a committee to debate provisions such as these and decide whether the committee should change them. These provisions should never go to committee; they are too dangerous. I feel it is necessary to put this point forward this afternoon. I think I have made my point and I thank the House for listening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay a vote on this or the passage of this bill but there are one or two matters to which I intend to make reference. In my view, there is one section that is most dangerous.

Before going on to that, Mr. Speaker, I do not often congratulate the minister of justice but I do think that in this case the minister deserves congratulations for having brought this matter before the House in the form in which it has been presented. After almost three years of gestation, it comes before us now for consideration. Of course, in the interval it has been before the House. I repeat what I have said outside the House regarding the minister. In the administration of his department, following a course taken by his predecessor, he has been making appointments to the bench that have generally been most worthy. I think it is only fair and proper that when a minister does a good job in the administration of justice he deserves a reference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: A minister does not receive too many plaudits or too many words of approbation. However, one subject that in this chamber must always be above reproach is the administration of justice. Without good judges, even though there are good lawyers before them, the citizen is not assured of justice at all times. Sir John A. Macdonald was asked on one occasion what he regarded as qualification for the bench. "Well", he said, "number one, that the individual be courteous and considerate and number two, if he knows some law I would not hold that against him". There is a great deal in that philosophy, because if you have a courteous judge who treats the young members of the bar with consideration it brings about an administration of justice that is respected. Of the appointments that have been made by the minister, it can be said that one of the qualifications has been the maintenance and preservation of that decorum on the part of judges that is characterized by courtesy.

I had no intention of speaking until this afternoon, but I was impressed this morning by an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail, which reads:

> The wiretap bill to which the House of Commons addressed itself yesterday will not prevent a Watergate in Canada; but its swift passage would be an earnest that Canadian politicians set their faces against the moral corruption out of which a Watergate could grow.

I do not entirely agree with that. Under the parliamentary system, if we follow British traditions which, after all, are the essence of parliament, I do not think there can ever be a Watergate in Canada. In the United States, and I am not in any way prejudging or saying anything that might be an unworthy observation, the division between the executive and the legislative makes possible what has taken place to the extent already revealed.

As a former prime minister, knowing something of the problems that arise in connection with security and also of producing, as it were, that political atmosphere that is necessary if one is to remain in office, I say without hesitation that nothing bordering remotely on what has been so far revealed in Watergate could happen under our system.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat dealt with this bill in a thoughtful way, but I do not agree with his thesis. I take exception to one section in this bill which I regard as dangerous to liberty and freedom within our country. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) has endeavoured to bring about a bill that will assure that degree of liberty that is necessary for free men, without permitting licence, too often mistaken for freedom, on the part of the individual. By and large I think it has been well done, with the exception of the section to which I will refer.

Before I come to that, I want to mention in general to the speeches which have been delivered in this House. I was not privileged to hear them yesterday, but I have read them. I have always made it a point to read Hansard thoroughly. I do not want to say that the other members did not make their contribution, but I am speaking particularly of the new members. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) in his speech revealed a tremendous amount of research coupled with political acumen. I thought his speech was a pertinent and material speech. As I say, I did not hear it delivered, but from reading it I regard it as a very fine effort. The same applies to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor) and to the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn). I read those speeches. Each, in turn, expressed a viewpoint. Each, in turn, has revealed, above everything, that there has been the fullest study given to the subject. I shall not deal with senior members who are present and have been members of other parliaments. I am restricting myself entirely to the new members, whose contribution did honour to them and to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having said that, I am concerned about a matter that affects all of us. No one who has not been prime minister has any idea of the responsibility that rests on the Prime Minister in the preservation and assurance of security, both within and without the nation. That is something that is with a prime minister at all times, even on vacation. That is something that he must constantly keep before him as he receives from day to day the secret and top secret ideas of those who are engaged in the administration of security.

Danger to the security of the state has been greatly multiplied in the last few years as a result of technological advances. Indeed, the United Nations' report dealing with this matter a few days ago said that some of the wiretapping devices are so small that they could be inserted into teeth, hidden in flower pots and picture frames and even disguised as dogs' droppings. The report says that this kind of espionage erodes mankind's right to be left alone. An hon. member of senior distinction thought that this subject ought to be included in the Bill of Rights. However, speaking as one who had something to do, after years of advocacy, with the bringing in of that bill, I would not want to see the Bill of Rights have any such term within it.

The security of the state must at all times take priority over the rights of the individual, but at the same time the security of the state shall not be used as an excuse to unnecessarily erode and interfere with human rights. Espionage goes on. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made that clear in one of his rare appearances in the last few days before radio and television, and Canadian Press reported what he said. Yesterday, when he was asked about this by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell), he said that he made no charge. There is no suggestion that there was a charge in what he said. Let me read what Canadian Press reported. The reports reads:

> Prime Minister Trudeau said Saturday he is certain Americans are spying on Canada but gave no hint that he believes illegal tactics are involved or that he is worried by the practice.
> Probably, if we had the wherewithal, we'd be spying on them,' he said . . .

What an amazing statement. I am sure the Americans have a lot of political intelligence on Canada. They cannot help but be disturbed since the Prime Minister's visit to the Soviet Union, when he told Kosygin and Brezhnev that we are afraid of the Americans, that we fear them culturally, economically and even militarily. That statement was understandable in so far as the first two items were concerned. The third part is something that no prime minister should ever have said regarding the one country in the world that today stands to preserve our freedom all over the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister said, "If we had more political intelligence about them perhaps it would be useful in negotiations on the auto pact and energy and so on." I do not understand that statement. I continue:

> Mr. Trudeau said spying is considered a dirty word but it need not imply sinister overtones if it means gathering information through legal means.

Then, he was asked what he thought of the Watergate wiretapping and bugging scandal, and he said:

> I'd be talking as prime minister and I wouldn't want the president to comment on our politics.

I am glad of that restraint, developed since the Moscow visit. Next, I wish to read a report of the Prime Minister's statement in the Toronto Star, as follows:

● (1540)

> Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau refused direct comment during the weekend on the Watergate bugging scandal in the United States but noted that intelligence-gathering is a world-wide phenomenon.
> "I think we'd be very naïve to think that only the United States are engaged in bugging or spying on other countries," . . .
> "I'm sure the Americans have a lot of political intelligence on Canada," he continued. "Probably, if we had the wherewithal, we'd be spying on them."

What kind of statements are those concerning a friendly country? Is it any wonder that a report in the press states that the United States Embassy has asked for a copy of what was said during this interview over CFTO?

I decided to get a copy of this interview. It took me several hours this morning. I will not go into the detail unless somebody wants to know what happened. My representative was told that a copy would be available to my office in approximately half an hour. An hour went by and we did not hear anything. Time went by and we phoned again. We were told "We are looking into it. We have no typed transcript." At that stage I took a hand in the matter. At about 11:15 we were advised by the Prime Minister's office that Mr. Donnelly would be sending us a copy of what was said. How did Mr. Donnelly in the Prime Minister's office know that I had been in touch with CFTO and had asked for the record? How did he have in his possession, in the Prime Minister's office, the actual report of what had been said? I leave it there, but I have known revisions and changes to have taken place on other occasions. Finally, we got the words actually used. It is a sorry picture. Mr. Fraser Kelly said:

> I wonder if what is happening will affect how we look at the United States. Could we assume that the United States is not spying on us?

I know these questions arise during the progress of these appearances over television and radio. You appear so often and try to answer so glibly that you sometimes trip over yourself. In many cases, that is the objective of the questioner. The Prime Minister said:

> I don't think we can assume that and probably if we had the wherewithal we might be spying on the Americans. "Spying" is a dirty word but you can express it otherwise.

The Prime Minister went on to say, as I quoted from the record of the interview:

> I am sure the Americans have a lot of political intelligence about Canada. If we had more about them it might be very useful in negotiations on the Auto Pact and Energy and so on, so accumulating intelligence is really another word for spying, whether you do it deviously or above board I suppose makes the difference.

Fraser Kelly then asked this question:

> I would hope they are not bugging offices of the other countries.

The Prime Minister replied:

> Well, I would hope they are not, but we would be very naïve to think that only the United States is engaged in bugging or in spying on other countries.

There is the record, unrevised, unrepented and undenied because it cannot be denied. That type of statement is dangerous to Canada's relationship with friendly countries and ought not to have been made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said a moment ago you can talk so much that you trip over yourself, but Prime Ministers cannot trip over themselves, have an alibi and deny the undeniable whenever it proves to be embarrassing. A record was kept, even though it took me hours to get it.

What is the situation with regard to espionage? I recall that some years ago Canada received a gift of a magnificent clock from the U.S.S.R.. It was the finest piece of antique artistry that the U.S.S.R. could give us. It was set up in the offices of the Canadian Embassy in Moscow. It was not until two years later that it was found it had a bug in it and that everything that was ever said in that room was available to the U.S.S.R.. That was bugging of an advanced character.

We shall have no right to go around and beat our breasts about what is happening in Washington on this subject of bugging if we practice it at all in our own country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot believe we do. Of course, that is a hope. There is nothing more awful than the fear of having yourself examined carefully and everything that you say revealed. I do not personally mind them getting me because they learn some fancy words, but there are others who naturally do not want anyone to interfere with their privacy. Every Canadian has that right, except where the security of the state makes it necessary that something be done to prevent the probability of an offence being committed or the real possibility of that being done. This bill goes a long way toward removing that danger.

When I was Prime Minister and found out there was a suggestion that bugging was going on, I said, "it ends here," period. It ended there. There are some in the administrative process of government who find it a lot easier to be listening in when carrying out their responsibilities than not to have that opportunity. I do not say I was able to eradicate it completely, but if anyone had dared to do bugging, he would have been out. I will say no more as to whether there was, in fact, the use of that authority which must rest on the Prime Minister.

Some parts of this bill, as I said, are very laudable. I think the minister has tried as far as possible to assure that no bugging shall take place, except where an order has been received from a judge. That, of itself, will not always protect civil rights. I seem to remember a Royal Commission headed by a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (1550)

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I don't want to dispense. Every solitary rule of elementary justice was swept aside.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If a justice of the peace had done it he would have been reversed by the first court which had an opportunity to do so. He made available to the press numerous statements of hearsay knowing that in doing so he was breaking every principle, because he saw dangling before him, as I said in the House, the Chief Justiceship of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All the judges of the Supreme Court had agreed not to sit on a commission, but he accepted, finally. I asked a question in the House at that time within hours after he had accepted, and made the suggestion I made a few moments ago.

Mr. Bell: Senator Martin got in on it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, my hon. friend from Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) has an unusual capacity for not only reading another's mind but also for always having the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not sure whether an individual will be protected, because we have these unusual extra-judicial powers available—writs of assistance are an example of what I have in mind—

Mr. Nielsen: A horrible example.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —by which, on the ipse dixit of a judge a person can be searched and have no recourse. I should like the minister to look into this question in his desire for reform, because this is a field which would enable him to make a monumental change as well. But we have lots of judges. I don't know how many judges there are across this country; there must be 400. If we are to have a judge grant, on an ex parte application, the right to bug, why bug it all up by this section 178.15? In my view, that clause ought not to be there. I shall try to explain why. In order to do so I shall have to read a portion of it.

> Where the Attorney-General of a Province or the Solicitor General of Canada or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section—

Do you just give him carte blanche and say: You are the boy; when there is an emergency, all you have to do is issue a writ for the interception of private communications?

> —is satisfied that circumstances exist which would justify the giving of an authorization for the interception of private communications but the urgency of the situation requires that interceptions commence before an authorization could, with reasonable diligence, be obtained, he may, on such terms and conditions, if any, as he considers advisable, give a permit for the interception of private communications . . .

I ask the minister to tell us specifically why this clause has been included. Have we not enough judges across Canada to whom an application could be made by day, or even by night? Why give to an agent, designated for the purpose, the right to do injustice if he chooses by granting such an order? I go on:

> Where a permit for the interception of private communications is given under subsection (1) the person giving it shall in every case forthwith report thereon with full particulars to the Attorney General by whom he was designated for the purposes of this section or to the Solicitor General of Canada . . .

Well, Mr. Speaker, this agent is above the Attorney General and above the Solicitor General because he can act on his own. He does not need authorization. He does not need any suggestions from them under the wording of this clause. I continue to read from the bill:

> A permit for the interception of private communications given under subsection (1) remains valid, unless sooner revoked either by the person giving it or pursuant to subsection (2),

(a) for thirty-six hours from the time when it is given

Thirty-six hours! What an opportunity for snoopers to snoop. There is no need to go to a judge, though there are multitudes of judges available, but through an agent, and he can do the most terrifying things. I do not fear they would be done under the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) or under the present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). I am not so sure about some predecessors of the Solicitor General. But this provision gives the power to destroy by snooping, the power to interrupt communications. And all that results is this: if he gets what he wants, well and good. If he does not, then nobody knows anything about it. In 36 hours you can raise a lot of hell under a clause like that, and I say to the minister in all seriousness: you have started out along the road to do something to preserve under law the rights of individuals. For goodness' sake do not, while on one hand preserving rights, undo all that is being attempted. In 36 hours you can do much to destroy an individual, and with all the force at my command I say to the minister: take this section out. It places the power in the hands of an individual to be designated, an unknown, an inconnu, giving him the right to do that which only a judge can do.

Why include this section? Have we run out of judges? The words are "when an emergency arises". Well, we have telephones today. It would not be very difficult to get hold of a judge. In this clause you destroy your whole objective and purpose. I am asking the minister to look into this because to my mind it is one of the most dangerous powers ever given by parliament, though at the same time in all the other clauses we are endeavouring to ensure that the kind of Watergating which went on in the United States shall be denied here by parliament.

Now, the bill goes on to say that the information cannot be used. You can snoop, you can listen, because you are an agent. You can listen and contemplate for 36 hours. But you can then forget about it. You cannot use the private communication unless the interception was lawfully made, and so on. But information obtained directly or indirectly as a result of information secured by interception of a private communication is not inadmissible. I do not particularly disagree with that clause. It is much the same as the provision that if a search is made under a search warrant, even if the search warrant is illegal, the evidence secured as a result becomes admissible in court. So, there is really nothing in that.

May I sum up, since I do not want to take more time than is necessary. As I say, that section worries me. It looks to me very much as though the person who drafted it thought to himself: "They will be blinded in parliament by what we are doing to make wiretapping legal, and they will give us power under the section to act as we will for 36 hours". I do not want my rights interfered with for 36 hours by an individual unknown and not responsible to parliament.

Hon. members know what has happened recently in the United States. Even making observations about it causes me very deep pain. The President has been a friend of mine for years. I wonder how many people in Canada who were going to abolish the monarchy are having second thoughts now about asking for a president. The president occupies two positions. He is the head of state. He must have honour, otherwise he loses not only his national but his international prestige. Secondly, he is the head of a political party. He surrounded himself with a Praetorian guard that knew everything but honour. Certainly, I cannot believe he had any knowledge of recent events.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, where I began: what happened in the United States could not happen in Canada under our system where the executive is responsible directly to the legislature. How different it would be were the president not in the dual position under the circumstances that now exist in the United States.

I have nothing further to add. With all the sincerity that I can place before the minister I would ask him to withdraw section 178.15. It will be no retreat, no evacuation under fire, but rather a realization that this parliament must not be asked to place in the hands of an unknown the right to break for 36 hours every rule of the sacredness of the individual. Delete that section and we will have a bill that will, I think, become a model.

On the other hand, I also warn at this point that the United States has laws against wiretapping, which laws have now been proven to be ineffectual. Although not all of the dangers will be cleared up, we will at least show there is determination in this parliament to let Canada, the United States and other nations know that we shall not permit ourselves to take any steps toward a unified state and toward a superior bureaucracy that will determine the rights of individuals.

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, one of the disadvantages in rising to take part in a debate that has reached the end is that much of your thunder has been stolen. Of course, when you have to follow one of the great thunderers of all times, then there is very little left for you to talk about. I listened with interest to the address of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), as I have listened to several addresses in the House on this bill, and I found I agreed with many of the points that have been made in terms of suggestions for amending the bill.

Thee is no doubt at all that as we look through the bill we are bound to find problems with it, but I am not going back over the ground already covered by my colleagues and other members who have asked for certain specific changes. Let me simply make one or two points about matters that I should like to see cleared up in the bill.

For example, section 178.11(2) provides:

Subsection (1) does not apply to

(a) a person who has the consent to intercept, express or implied, of the originator of the private communication or of the person intended by the originator thereof to receive it;—

The right hon. member for Prince Albert pointed out what he thought was a very dangerous section, and may I, in my own way, point out this other very dangerous section. For one thing, what is "consent implied"? I understand what "consent express" is, but I do not know what "consent implied" means. I have some knowledge of the English language and I have some knowledge of logic, but I cannot sort out just what that expression means. I concluded it must be a legal term, so I asked two lawyers today what it meant and they said they did not know what it meant either. There is an enormous difference in meaning between "implied" and "inferred". Is the inference of an acceptance going to be considered to be the same as the implication of an acceptance? Certainly, that is language that ought to be cleared up or perhaps simply removed.

Then a little further down in the sentence there is the little word "or" which is even more worrisome. The section provides that any party to a communication can give acceptance to the interception of that communication. In other words, I could phone up Mr. X and ask a person with bugging or wiretapping equipment to listen in on my conversation with Mr. X since I have, after all, given him permission. It is quite clear in this provision that I, as one of the participants in the communication, can give approval, and therefore what is done is totally and completely legal and not contrary to the act.

Again, it may be a matter of legal language which I fail to understand, but in so far as it is English I think I do understand it and I find it totally unacceptable. As a matter of fact, this confusion and difficulty is expanded in the same provision, where in subsection (3) it is provided:

> Where a private communication is originated by more than one person or is intended by the originator thereof to be received by more than one person, a consent to the interception thereof by any one of such persons is sufficient for the purposes of paragraph (2)(a), subsection 178.16(1) and subsection 178.2(1).

So, Mr. Speaker, you can see the problem compounding itself. Any one person who is party to a multiple communication can give authority to tap the communication and to use the information thus derived for whatever purposes are legal, right and fitting. Surely that cannot be acceptable since at its worst it certainly could lead to framing, perhaps not a legal term but a term that most of us understand, at any rate. I could say to somebody else: "Look, I want to get Mr. Smith. I will call him, up, you listen in and he is bound to trip." After all, even Prime Ministers trip, as the right hon. member for Prince Albert said a while ago, so surely ordinary persons can trip. I could say: "Mr. Smith is bound to give us the kind of information we need to frame him". Surely, this part of the bill is not acceptable.

There are other sections of the bill which worry me. For example, in reference to something mentioned by the previous speaker, there is the question of agents of the attorneys-general of the provinces or the Solicitor General of Canada. Section 178.15(1) reads:

> Where the Attorney-General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section by the Attorney-General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada is satisfied . . .

How many agents will there be in all? Do we have any control? There are several attoneys general in Canada—ten I am sure—and there is at least one solicitor general. That is 11 persons who have the right without condition, without restraint and without control, to appoint agents. How many will there be? We have no idea. There is nothing in this bill to tell us how many there will be. There is nothing in this bill to tell us that there will be some control.

[Mr. Harney.]

I shall not take up the point again at length that was made so effectively by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) yesterday concerning the definition of subversive activities. How in heaven's name do we define, with safety for the rights of the individual and his self-expression, his liberty, his liberty of speech and action, what subversive activity is? We have never been able to do it. However, under this legislation the wording is there—if the attorney-general or the solicitor general feels there is subversive activity. There could, of course, be a cell of the Progressive Conservative party operating in my riding—which to me would be subversive—trying to subvert me as a Member of Parliament. How do we define it? The problem, I think, has been laid before the House and I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) will take this particular aspect into consideration.

My real point is this: The more I look at this bill the more I am concerned because there are so many parts of it which are questionable. The more I look at the whole question of wiretapping and the legalization for certain purposes of wiretapping, the more repugnant I am to give any support at all to this bill for the series of particular reasons to which I referred just now and the many reasons which have been adduced by other members of the House, but more important than that for the reason that I do not think the state should deliberately sanction this kind of activity within its borders. The state should not be involved in wiretapping.

It was a good number of years ago that the British Parliament threw out forever what was then known as "general search". We now have under our system the provision for search warrants, but search warrants are specific. A search warrant is issued to search the property of a certain specific person for a certain specific purpose at a specific time and with a specific end in view, all of which must be stated before the warrant is issued. Back in the bad old days there was a provision for general search. What the provision in respect of wiretapping on the part of the state, either for reasons of investigating criminal activities or investigating subversive activities, allows or, I should say, recreates, is the general search.

I shall quote here from a very worthwhile, extremely well written article by Stanley M. Beck entitled "Electronic Surveillance and the Administration of Criminal Justice".

> These facts raise the vital issue in police use of electronic eavesdropping. It is that such listening is a return to the practice of the general search, a practice condemned and prohibited by the English courts in the eighteenth century.

It is not proper under our law to have general search, and so if we do not believe that a man's property or his belongings or his private household can be submitted to a general search then we cannot accept that his private life should be submitted to a general and continuing search under wiretapping. But, Mr. Speaker, in the case of general search, as bad as it was, it was usually one man's property, one man's household that was searched, not the households of many. When it comes to wiretapping you are searching continuously and generally everyone who communicates with the person that you are interested in searching specifically.

In order to give an idea of the application, I shall quote from a judgment of the United States Supreme Court because this judgment conveys some idea of how many other intrusions are involved, inadvertently usually, when a wire is tapped through electronic eavesdropping:

> While tapping one telephone, police recorded conversations involving, at the other end, the Julliard School of Music, Brooklyn Law School, Consolidated Radio Artists, Western Union, Mercantile Commercial Bank, several restaurants, a real estate company, a drug store, many attorneys, an importer, a dry cleaning establishment, a number of taverns, a garage, and the Prudential Insurance Company.

Of course, that is bound to happen. If you tap a telephone line and listen in on the conversations of people you will hear all kinds of conversations with people on subjects not at all related to the case in question because what you have done is re-institute the practice of the general search, a practice which was followed under the Star Chamber and which was thrown out two centuries ago. You have re-instituted it in a way and in a manner that the extremely authoritarian Star Chamber could not even have envisioned.

A while ago the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) stole some of my thunder by referring to a recent report of the United Nations on electronic eavesdropping. The report is not all that difficult to obtain. It was published in fairly large part in some of Canada's newspapers yesterday. What is described in this report is a mad and absurd world. It refers to listening devices the size of a pin, listening devices which can be inserted by a dentist in your cavity so that you can become a permanent transmitter of everything you say. It refers to listening devices that can pick up conversations miles away. There is a device which uses a laser beam. It can be focussed on your house and from a great number of miles away pick up everything that it is said. There are even madder projects. I shall refer to one which is humourous in a way, absurd in another and horrifying in another way.

> A particularly ingenious device being used by various U.S. intelligence departments is an eavesdropping microphone which quite literally resembles a dog's droppings.
> The device, intended for use in the jungles of Viet Nam, is also being used in the United States to gather domestic intelligence on extremist organizations.
> The listening device is practically identical to the real thing, including the odour.

If I may interject, Mr. Speaker, what mind can conceive of such devices! Matthew Arnold once said that our most besetting danger is faith in machinery. This is faith in a certain kind of machinery gone absolutely wild. The article goes on to read:

> It can be placed on a lawn near the house of whoever is being investigated, and its powerful transistorized transmitter relays conversations to a nearby monitoring station.
> The gadget can transmit to a range of three miles and will remain operable for up to three months. It is weather-proof and flame-proof.
> The bug will often go undetected because of its unique form and the deliberate choice of this particular design is based in the natural reluctance to pick up such an object.

Here is where complete madness and the kind of mentality that would produce and use such devices begins to emerge. We were often told in the past that madness is logic carried to its absurd limit. Here it comes:

It is a mad world that produces these things, and I am not sure that we want to help in any way to create this mad world. It seems to me that the best way to make sure that no bugging is being done by private persons or organizations is to make as sure as possible that none of this equipment is around, and the best way to do that is to prohibit it completely because if you produce it for the police, for the armed services or for the state, it will be contrabanded and will find its way into the hands of individuals, criminals and spies.

So the only safe approach is a total prohibitionist one, and as the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) said so well, he would much prefer this act if it came to an end in its first clause which says very simply that it shall be a criminal offence to wiretap in this country, a criminal offence for everybody. I am sure that not too many people will agree with the absolutist position that I am taking. I know what the counter arguments will be. You need this type of thing if you are to protect yourself against organized crime.

Let us stop and look at that argument to see how much sense it makes. First of all, we are obviously not going to use bugging, are we, even if this bill is passed to trace down teenage marijuana smokers. By the way, there is no restriction in the bill—and I will come to that later— and no definition of the kind of crime for which the issuance of a permit would be justified. Let us stay for a moment with organized crime. There is much talk about it and relatively little definition. I return to Professor Beck. He says:

> Organized crime is simply the application of corporate principles to the business of crime. It is sound economics and politics to aggregate human and physical resources into large organizations that provide central management and control, a division of labour, and prudent allocation of profits. In the United States, the Mafia or Cosa Nostra, is the monopolistic crime corporation. Its illegal activities are primarily supplying gambling, narcotics, women, money and liquor to willing customers.

It is important to realize that the basic business of organized crime is the provision of goods and services to customers who want them. We may not approve of their wanting them, but they want them. Professor Beck continues:

> It is now said to be ploughing its huge profits into legitimate businesses.

It is just a different kind of business, more profitable and safer. Actually, it is a little bit more private because if you are in the Mafia you are being bugged all the time. Professor Beck continues:

> All these crimes are, as noted above, crimes without victims, and for that reason are almost impossible to combat. All these crimes involve imposing someone's idea of morality on somebody who has a different idea. It is "coercion to virtue" through the law. If the criminal sanction is of little utility in these areas is it not time we stopped to ask exactly what functions the criminal sanction can perform, and which ones we really want it to perform?

In other words, if you are going to approach organized crime you have to review your entire thinking about crime and the kind of crime that organized crime is involved in performing. Professor Beck continues:

Is it not particularly urgent that we ask this question if in the attempt to legislate morality we have spawned an infinitely worse evil—organized crime?

Even admitting quite clearly that we are not going to go through this deep philosophical review, we should at least be aware of one thing. If we are out to fight organized crime we have to be aware that organized crime cannot exist except where justice agencies dealing with criminals are not at least neutralized and probably corrupted to some degree. That is obvious. According to Professor Beck, organized crime is a large, well organized, well managed criminal business. You cannot operate this kind of large business without detection, and you are going to have detection if justice agencies are not neutralized, if they are active and not corrupted. Everywhere organized crime exists there is at least a strong suspicion, certainly the allegation and very often the fact, that the justice agencies are corrupted.

It seems to me that if you were out to fight organized crime, what you would do would be to restructure and reform the justice agencies that you have working for you. It has been proven time and time again that for all of its ingeniousness electronic eavesdropping is almost totally ineffective as an instrument of prosecution. There have been very few cases in which the direct evidence received through wiretapping has been used successfully in courts. I am not going to take the time of hon. members to cite the many reports that have been produced on this matter, particularly in the U.S., which has had a lot of experience with this type of activity. It is not a terribly effective way of obtaining information. Very often the evidence that is produced is not admissible in courts, so you cannot prosecute anyhow. All you have done has been to scare the rabbit, but you have not caught it. I do not know how many people here have spent part of their youth trying to catch rabbits, but I did and I know you only try once each time. It does not stick around for the second try.

So, what is the point of using all this marvellous gadgetry if it will not bring the effect you want, if it will not result in the effective prosecution of the criminal? All you have done has been to give him a warning. These devices are devilish and ingenious, but there are counter devices. You can bug a bug. It is hard to tell who is the bugee and who is the bugor. You can have a little instrument, Mr. Speaker, which can spoil the bugging. It is only a $10 job. Any high school kid can build an oscillator which will spoil any bugging gimick. So, it is not a terribly effective way of pursuing justice. But what it does is that it creates in this country, in this society, a state of affairs which is totally repugnant, a state of affairs where privacy for the indivdual no longer exists in any meaningful way.

I am sure that I am going to be told that certainly for the security of the state—as the right hon. member for Prince Albert said a while ago, and his was quite a statement—the security of the state overrides all the rights of all individuals. I might just like to add not all of the time and not in all cases, because there is a very large matter of interpretation involved here. However, for the security of the state, we can justify wiretapping. The situation is somewhat parallel to the attack on organized crime. Who are you going to tap? Of course, ideally you wiretap spies to listen in on them. Well, if you are going to be very good at wiretapping spies no one will know about it, particularly the spies you are wiretapping as an act of counter espionage, and in the world of spies and counter spies legality does not obtain. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested, although he does not seem to be very well aware of the meaning of the word spy in French or in English, this goes on all the time. But one thing he is not aware of is that no spying is legal. Spying, by definition, is illegal. So here you are into an illegal realm anyhow, and if you are going to try to track down spies surely you will try to do it as cleverly and intelligently as you can.

But to allow into the law the kind of provision proposed in this bill, to look into and listen into people's private lives on the grounds that they might be involved in subversive activities, goes a little too far. What we do, if we allow this, is that in this attempt to preserve what is called the security of the state we throw away what is valuable in our society. Let us ask ourselves are we willing, really willing, to bear this cost?

Let me see if I can make one more distinction which I think is very important, Mr. Speaker. People will say that in this matter I am a prohibitionist, and may say, "But look, what if the use of such a device could at one time save a life?" All right; fine. If you use such a device to save a life and prove to me afterwards that you saved a life by using it, I will say it was an extraordinary thing. I am not going to buy it as a general rule, but congratulations. You did the wrong thing, but you did it for a right and good cause.

But of course if you legislate this fact, then it is not simply a matter of saving a life. It almost becomes a matter of using the device to apprehend criminals. There is quite a difference between using a device to stop a killing and using it to apprehend a killer after the fact. Now, I am not going to go back over all the arguments to show that first of all it is not terribly effective, and secondly that it vitiates an extremely important principle of law, and therefore when we allow ourselves to use this kind of device it interferes with people's privacy. If at any time the government of this country was told by its agents that it had to permit a wiretap for the sake of the security of the country, then I would say that by specific act and specific decision, with full political responsibility, make that decision, and come back and explain to the country what it is you did, and why you did it. Mr. Speaker, we do this kind of thing in several other instances.

Many members in this chamber find the idea of telling a union that it members must return to work a repugnant idea. Certainly, my colleagues in this party find it repugnant in the extreme. Therefore, we will see no law which permits this on a continuing basis. If there is a strike going on which is causing so much harm to the people of Canada that it must be stopped, then we say let this parliament assemble and make that specific, extraordinary decision, because we want it to be just that, and have it known as an extraordinary decision. That is why we brought parliament back from summer recess in September, just to deal with that kind of situation. And when that happens we stand up, perhaps some of us with delight, but I know many of us with distaste and repugnance, and say to the workers, "You shall go back to work." But what we have done on such occasions is that we have not only created a better situation by putting people back to work and removing distress from the country, but we have also underlined and sanctified the principle that there shall be no continuing legislation, no continuing law permitting people to be sent back to work against their will. I think the same kind of reasoning ought to be applied to this case.

I will end with one more point. It is a very general one, and it may be considered philosophical by members of the House. But surely it is not beyond some of us to be somewhat philosophical. Over the past few months we have been debating the matter of capital punishment. I have not yet had a chance to state my case in this House for the abolition of capital punishment, but I would simply want to say, when my time comes to state my case, that I respect the people who are opposed to my views, and I do not think for a moment that they support the restoration of capital punishment for vengence. Further, many of them will agree with me that the case for deterrence is not proven one way or another. There are facts on one side indicating that capital punishment deters, and facts on the other side indicating that it does not. The most powerful argument of those who favour capital punishment is that society chooses to indicate its abhorrence of certain crimes by inflicting the final, ultimate and absolute penalty. That is the only argument in favour of capital punishment that is worthwhile considering. And there is a counter argument. It is the one which I choose.

Admitting the value of the other argument I go on to say that society will not, by deliberate action of its own, behave in the same way as the criminal did. Society shall underline the value of human life by never taking it. And I add to this fundamental principle this utilitarian and practical point that if the state, within its society, creates an attitude of respect for life, then indeed this action on its part may reduce the level of violence in society, so there will be fewer crimes, fewer violent crimes, fewer killings and fewer murders, which is of course the objective of all those who participate in the debate on capital punishment, for or against.

Mr. Speaker, there is a parallel. If we in this parliament decide in full deliberation that we will permit wiretapping for certain utilitarian needs, for certain specific purposes, then we condone it. We would condone it but we would be much better to condemn it absolutely and have none of it, not for individuals, not for corporations, not for the police, not for the army—for none of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the legislation before us has been introduced as a result of the state's duty to protect its secrets, information, institutions and policies against spying, carelessness, subversion and secret intervention. On the other hand, we are free to question the efficiency of the organizations and structures that the state has set up to carry out its responsibilities in an area in which the fundamental freedom of the individual may be at stake.

In all countries, security practice involves a whole set of measures. There is an established procedure for classification, safe-keeping, handling and communicating documents and material that must be protected. This involves certain technical devices, and it is in this connection that some anxiousness has been expressed about encroachment by the state, and by individuals and organizations, upon what is commonly called "the right to privacy". This is a vast problem involving, for example, wire-tapping and the use of bugging devices, telephoto lenses, and certain other highly sophisticated devices used by the police and other bodies for detecting crime or for gathering information.

One related practice which seems to give rise to some anxiety is the use of certain technical procedures of investigation to obtain information. Of course, security measures applied, for example, to a staff of employees are an essential part of any efficient system. However, just as ordinary legal procedures can sometimes lead to injustices, so can security practices. Therefore, whatever provisions we draw up for the protection of individual rights, in the last resort, the individual's most important right, which consists in careful and fair treatment, will depend on the existence of a policy. Through that bill we now want to define that policy.

Mr. Speaker, the Official Secrets Act was a rigid piece of legislation written in broad and ambiguous terms. Legal cases which have already come up have indeed shown the haziness of that act and that it was rather lacking in precision and difficult to interpret. As stated in the report of the Royal Commission on Security in 1969 the revised act should protect unclassified information against any attempt at disclosing and gathering data which would be prejudiciable to the interests of the state or would be made with the intent to help a foreign power.

In recent years, people have been questioning the attitude of governments which maintained that administration activities and papers at their disposal should be kept confidential unless and until responsible authorities decide to make them public. However, this situation is much more complex and there are many exceptions, for example, papers dealing with national defense and foreign policy, personal departmental papers dealing with questions relating to social services as well as informal memoranda and drafts. In Canada, since there is no statutory provision other than the Official Secrets Act either forbidding or permitting access to government records, departments have had to treat individual applications on their merits.

Although the Royal Commission on Security recommends legislation in the area, it could not help adding, and I quote:

> We would view suggestions for increased publicity with some alarm.
> We think the knowledge that memoranda might be made public would have seriously inhibiting effect on the transaction of public business.
> We believe that the process of policy-making implies a need for wide-ranging and tentative consideration of options, many of which it would be silly or undesirable to expose to the public gaze.
> To insist that all such communications must be made public would appear to us likely to impede the discussive deliberation that is necessary for wise administration.

In Canada, the bureaucracy is not vast, and the number of serious inquirers quite small.

It seems to us that there is no reason why controlled access to specific administrative files or documents cannot be permitted and arranged on an ad hoc basis when a genuine requirement can be established.

The bill now before us was prepared in the light of these wise recommandations, because the royal commission warned us of some dangers as regards technical security and security of communications; the commission used the following words, and I quote:

One aspect of physical security is generally referred to as technical security, and is concerned with protection against electronic eavesdropping and telephone interception, and with a variety of other technical subjects.

With regard to the security of governmental information transmitted by telegraphic means, we do not believe that there is sufficient awareness, even in senior governmental positions where it is most important, that the telephone is a basically insecure instrument, and that therefore classified matters should not be discussed on the telephone.

Therefore, we have prepared a relatively flexible legislation but also strict enough to meet the requirements of the security of the state while respecting as much as possible the individual rights to privacy.

To those who would be inclined to consider this new legislation still too severe as regards individual freedom against the security of the state, I shall answer the following: the high liberality of American legislation as regards the secrecy of state as often been praised but too much freedom in this area inevitably leads to abuses. And we can see today that the United States have to face the effects of such abuses, so that we do not know at present whether it is the president of the presidency itself that will be eliminated as a result of such a sharp problem.

Therefore, I suggest that we must be careful and forecast such abuses, by introducing an enlightened legislation.

This is why the bill now before us seems essential to me and I support it unreservedly under its present form.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-176 is entitled "Protection of Privacy Act". When I read the first paragraphs of the bill, I agreed fully with their content, but on reading the following paragraphs I agreed less and less to the extent that I for one shall surely be unable to vote for the bill unless it is amended.

The object of the bill, it would seem, is to protect the privacy of the citizens, or so its title claims. But study of the bill reveals—and I shall come back to its study clause by clause in a moment—that it will do exactly the opposite by allowing the state to do the contrary, that is to intrude legally upon the privacy of all citizens.

Before going on to the clause by clause study of the bill, let me refer to the statement the right hon. Prime Minister made in Toronto over the weekend to the effect that spying, through legal means, is allowed. Now it appears that what is illegal will be legalized: spying. To my mind, the state must not be authorized to spy—which is illegal—or to use legal means to do so.

Mr. Speaker, there is a social credit principle which we always put forward to the effect that we are in favour of freedom and the right of every citizen to freedom. Unfortunately, this bill trespasses on the freedom of the individual, even when he is innocent, even if he did not commit any offences against the state or against anyone. I will come back in a while to the clauses which would lead to abuses, because as the bill is indefinite, we do not know where it will all end. We do not know where this bill will end. It is unfortunate that the present sad events which have been headlined for the last few days in the United States are being used, that the publicity psychosis is being used to move a bill which at first glance appears good, but which in practice is extremely bad for the freedom of the individual.

Mr. Speaker, this bill concerns me very much, and I only have to read the recommendation on page 2 which reads:

His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act respecting the protection of privacy; and to provide that the Crown shall, in certain circumstances, be liable for punitive damages in an amount not exceeding $5,000 . . .

Yet, Mr. Speaker, here we have the Department of Justice, which wants to establish justice in Canada, telling us that if this bill infringes on privacy, or that damages have to be paid by an individual because of the use of an electronic device or other under the present bill, then the state will not be liable for more than $5,000 regardless of the damages which could have been caused.

Therefore, in my opinion, this recommendation contains a clear and definite indication that this bill will be discriminatory against the people who will receive damages of $5,000, when in fact they will have suffered real damages of over $5,000.

That is the first reason, Mr. Speaker, why I cannot support this bill. Indeed, if the state causes damages estimated at $100,000 to an individual, and if we are to talk about justice here in this House, I do not see why the state should not pay for its own mistakes and misguided actions. It seems to me that an individual ought to be compensated for losses caused to him.

In committee, we will again consider the bill, clause by clause. Clause 178.12, as I read it, is in direct contradiction with the purpose of the bill. This clause gives complete freedom to the state or any of its agents. We do not yet know who these agents will be, but we may suppose that once again they will be officials who have never been elected by the people, and who will have the power to interfere as they see fit in the private lives of citizens.

Clause 178.12 states:

An application for an authorization shall be made ex parte

This means that when it is desired to search, bug, or wire-tap a private home, the application for leave to do so will be made ex parte, which means that the person concerned will not be present and cannot be represented. Authorization will be granted against him ex parte and in writing, without his permission, without the help of his lawyer, and even without his knowing about it. The application for an authorization must be made, and I again quote:

. . . to a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction, or a judge as defined in section 482 . .t . or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section . . .

But who is the agent? Who is to appoint him? And how long will his term of office last?

And once the authorization has been obtained, and I quote again:

. . . proceedings, if any, may be instituted at the instance of the government of Canada and conducted by . . . the Attorney general . . .

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is five o'clock. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Social Security—Old age recipients in nursing homes—Suggested protection of portion of pensions against rising rates; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Inquiry as to legislation to increase basic rate of disability pension; the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Health—Status of negotiations with provinces on provision of chronic care in nursing homes.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think there would be agreement to consider item No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett).

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the House will now proceed to the consideration of item No. 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

FISHERIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ISSUANCE OF LEASES AND LICENSES IN ACCORDANCE WITH REGULATIONS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni) moved that Bill C-23, to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Fishing Licences

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not often that legislation respecting fisheries comes before the House for consideration. This has been a rather busy day from the standpoint of our interest in fisheries. I have come, from a meeting of the Fisheries Committee on the Pacific Coast Fishery in order to proceed with the discussion of my bill to amend the Fisheries Act.

When the then minister of fisheries and forestry on April 20, 1970, introduced for second reading Bill C-204, an act to amend the Fisheries Act, he had this to say about the Fisheries Act:

It is an act which is as old as confederation itself. Our Fisheries Act was passed during Canada's first session of Parliament. It was passed more than 100 years ago.

He went on to say that the Fisheries Act has, of course, been revised and updated with the passage of time. The announced purpose of Bill C-204, the first major amending bill to the Fisheries Act which had been brought forward by the government for quite a period of time, was to make the Fisheries Act a more flexible and realistic instrument of law in relation to present day fishing methods in Canada and the proper conservation of the fishing resource.

An announced ancillary purpose of that bill was to tidy up some of the more archaic features of the act which had been left sitting over the years since confederation, since the first meeting of the parliament of Canada when the original act was passed. Certain changes along those lines were proposed by the government's amending bill. Incidentally, I may say that after very detailed examination by the committee, that bill was referred back to the House with very considerable changes from the original government draft bill. In my view, and I think in the view of members who were on the committee at that time, the bill was considerably improved.

On the matter of tidying up the bill and bringing it into line with twentieth century thinking, I proposed an amendment in the committee which would have involved deleting the present Section 7 of the act. After some discussion in the committee, my amendment was ruled out of order because it was beyond the scope of the amending bill inasmuch as Section 7 of the act was not opened up. As a consequence of that, and because I thought the matter I had tried to deal with was of some importance, I immediately introduced a private member's public bill which in substance sought to accomplish what I failed to accomplish in the committee. That bill appeared on the order paper in a position where it did not come up for debate. I have reintroduced it at each subsequent session since 1970. This is the first occasion when, through good fortune, it has reached a position on the order paper which gives me an opportunity to actually discuss it on second reading.

What does my bill propose to do? It deals with the matter of the licensing of fishermen in the commercial fishing industry. It seeks to eliminate what I consider to be a very archaic piece of wording in the present Fisheries Act. I am going to quote Section 7 of the act which I seek to delete. It reads:

The Minister may, in his absolute discretion, . . . issue . . . leases and licences for . . . fishing,—

I do not know of any other piece of legislation which has that phrase in respect of conferring powers on a minister. To say that a minister in his absolute discretion may do something, in my view puts him beyond the normal reach of the control of the governor in council. It puts him beyond the normal reach of parliament and sets up a situation which is ideal for a dictatorial type of administration. That was my reasoning in 1970 when I tried to move this amendment in committee and it remains my reasoning to this day. Indeed, I feel that the events which have taken place since 1970 in the field of the administration of fisheries, with particular reference to this matter of fishing licences for commercial fishermen, have borne out the correctness of my argument at that time. The minister and his agents should not have complete discretionary power which is not spelled out by regulation. People should know where they stand. They should know what the rules are and they should at least know those rules cannot be changed without proper action by at least the governor in council. It is a field where regulatory authority is quite necessary and proper.

In the standing committee, I had this to say when I was arguing for my amendment. I quote:

> Mr. Chairman, I think it should be obvious that the purport of my amendment is to create a situation where changes to licensing of fishermen or the issuance of leases can only be made under the authority of regulations passed by the Governor in Council. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that an act which says that the Minister may, in his absolute discretion do something is really out of line with our understanding of our modern concept of the rule of law. Indeed, it strikes me that it is somewhat related to the concept of the divine right of kings and one would say shades of James I. I am sure the Minister is quite aware that this arises out of a situation that has developed in the last year or so on the Pacific Coast of Canada. The Minister has been changing the regulations as they affect salmon fishermen on the Pacific Coast by press releases. Quite apart from the merits or demerits of what the Minister has been doing, it has created a state of confusion. One day we have a proposal that such and such is going to happen under a certain phase of the Minister's program for changing the system of licensing and the next minute we have another press release issued from his office which says, "We are not going to do it quite this way but we are going to do it in this way".

I went on to argue a bit further for consideration of my amendment in the committee. The events that have taken place since that time in relation to the licensing of salmon fishermen on the west coast, the situation which has subsequently developed on the Atlantic coast in relation to the position of the salmon fishermen there and the kind of statements that have been made to me and many others by fishermen, indicate there is a growing disenchantment with the situation. The minister is allowed to exercise this completely dictatorial authority without any guidelines laid down so that a person can see in black and white under what terms and conditions he is or is not entitled to a licence to fish.

I am in agreement with many of the thrusts that the development of policy has taken under the present minister. With regard to some of the emphasis which has been placed on moves toward a new realm of a law of the sea, I give the minister some credit for the fact that Canada appears to be taking a much more vigorous stance than in the early sixties. It may be true that some improvement has taken place in the management of our fisheries and in the husbanding of our marine resources, but it seems to me there is still lack of recognition of the fact that commercial fishermen are human beings and that they have a right to know where they stand in relation to the industry from which they make their livelihood; they ought not to have their livelihood taken away from them at the whim of the minister or of one of his agents in the field who might not be properly knowledgeable of the extent and purpose of certain aspects of fishery management.

The section of the act to which I have referred provides the minister with that kind of authority. It is an authority which, to the best of my knowledge, no other member of the government possesses. If anyone can cite another statute which contains the phrase that a minister may at his absolute discretion do this or that, I should like to know about it, because I have not been able to find it. That is why I welcome this opportunity to raise the matter formally by way of introducing a bill for second reading, and I hope hon. members will give it the kind of consideration I feel it deserves.

I might say in passing that clause two in my bill is somewhat redundant at the moment, though it was relevant when I originally introduced it. There was an oversight on my part inasmuch as the change I proposed has in fact been made in the Fisheries Act. This is a slight modification of the provision in the act which provides for the making of regulations. I believe that all the questions surrounding the issuing of such licenses should be laid out in black and white by way of regulations, changeable only by the formal action of the Governor in Council, and that the authority contained in this bill provides an adequate basis for rational arrangements to be developed in respect to the issuance of licenses or leases. In effect, the archaic section 7 of the act is redundant, unnecessary and unwarranted in the context of our present-day concept of democracy.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this amendment to the Fisheries Act seems, in my opinion, to be a retrograde step in the light of present-day requirements for living resource management and development both of inshore and off-shore fisheries. The issuing of licences still remains one of the most effective instruments available to provide for the development of sound management practices. It is becoming increasingly necessary in the light of the position we are taking at the Law of the Sea Conference and at various international agency meetings. Canada is presently taking the position that we should have control over the whole of the continental shelf surrounding our shores, 200 or 400 miles out, wherever it ends. As a matter of fact we are claiming control over the continental shelf to the end of the continental slope. If we are to retain credibility, not only among the nations of the world but with all sections of the industry within our own nation, we must display an adequate and reasonable measure of control and management of our fish stocks. We are looking ahead toward the management of these living resources on the continental shelves and this will require the introduction of new concepts in licence control.

Our renewable resources are among the most valuable we possess. Non-renewable resources have been disappearing, but our renewable resources constitute a wealth upon which we can rely for many years to come and it thus behooves us to bring in measures for sound management control. We can only do this properly if fish stocks are wisely managed and protected. It is true to say that research into the fishery is more difficult than research into certain other aspects of our natural resources. For example, it is easy to see what is above the ground. It is easier to conduct research involving forestry or mining, as I think most scientists will agree, than it is to determine exactly what is happening beneath the surface of the sea. This is a further reason why more emphasis is placed on licensing.

Legislative jurisdiction over the fisheries of Canada is a federal responsibility under the terms of the British North America Act. This jurisdiction goes back from the Canadian parliament to the British parliament, because the resources of the sea are used not only by the host nation but by other nations of the world. Let me stress that the host nation, or the nation which possesses the resource off its shores must have control over the stocks and must have a preferential right in the fishery. It is for this reason we must ensure that licensing procedures are satisfactory. At the present time, under constitutional law, the federal parliament has exclusive legislative authority over the fisheries. This authority is exercised by the government in co-operation with the provinces, and in many provinces the regulations set out by the federal government are administered locally.

I indicated earlier the benefits which could result from sound management programs and I referred to licensing in this context, but such beneficial results, financial and otherwise, cannot be achieved unless the methodology of sound management is complete. Let me give hon. members an example. Our fishery stocks, because of the possibility of over-exploitation, demand very close monitoring in order to meet national and international commitments. Because of the tremendous strides made in fishing technology, it is quite possible for entire year classes of herring or salmon to be completely annihilated by a few non-conservation-minded fishermen who decide to disregard previously established quotas or fishing times. Most fishermen, I might add, respect the quotas and respect the regulations.

In my own province, most of the fishermen do not need to be told what the law is, or what the regulations are. Like others who live close to the sea, or to the soil, they are naturally conservationists; they do not really need to be regulated. On the other hand, there are some who do, and the threat of a rapid decline of stocks is so great that unless there is a control we can exercise at a moment's notice it may be too late. It might be said we should go through the process of appeal to the courts, or take action through committees. It may be too late to wait for that. We must have control that we can exercise quite speedily in order to ensure that stocks are not rapidly depleted.

If we were obliged to resort to long drawn out procedures we would, in effect, be doing nothing more than practising management on a retroactive basis. As I said before, we must ensure that we have that protection, that policing and licensing capability, the capability of taking away a licence if something goes wrong in order to retain our credibility both with other fishing nations of the world as well as with the industry in this country. We are becoming more and more concerned with scientific management principles for many species, and the authority to issue leases and licences should not be restricted in any way. It is possible for a species to be decimated to the point of no return; therefore, the retention of section 7 is important.

The authority to issue licences provides a readily available and relatively simple control measure to regulate the size of the fishing fleet by regulating unit effort. It gives us the ability to control the entry of vessels and to control quotas and seasons. Licensing has also improved our awareness of the condition of the fishing fleet and the statistical information which forms a basic part for a sound management policy.

In addition to having and exercising control over our stocks, through licensing we can obtain additional information which helps us to employ sound management procedures. I have alluded to the other important aspects of licensing policy—that is, to regulate and control the entry of vessels, quotas and seasons, and to gather statistics so that we may be better informed and may modify our policies in light of the statistics we gather.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, there are now a number of restricted fisheries and, of necessity, there may be more in the future. The control of licensing is basic to the control of a restricted fishery. It is a simple, effective and readily adoptable method of regulating. No one wants to bring in these restrictions, but everyone will agree that you can only fish a resource to a certain point. There is a point of no return. There is a point where you deplete your resource so that it is no longer renewable. This is why we must have quotas.

From talking to people in my riding, people who have thought this thing out—and most of them do—I know they agree that there have to be quotas; they understand the reasons for them. Nobody likes them, particularly the people in my province, since for years they have become used to the freedom of access they have had to a number of renewable resources. For example, men might fish during the summertime a number of different species, as many of them still do, and then go into the woods in the wintertime to do some hunting or even to become loggers. They engage in a number of aspects of the exploitation of renewable resources, but I think all of them realize quotas have to be set and that licensing must be retained for this purpose.

The use of various types of gear is controllable by licensing. We issue licences for mesh size, for types of net, for total length of nets, for seasons, for seines, for trawls, for species, for areas and for many other reasons. The importance of licensing cannot be stressed too much, and it will be used increasingly in coming years as a control measure.

The conditions under which leases and licences are granted are continually changing. In this connection the fishing public demand immediate action. I made the point briefly previously that we should get to the stage where, if the law is broken, action must be taken right away. Or if we come across a similar situation to that which existed in Placentia Bay, Newfoundland, a while ago, where we had high mercury or phosphorous content in the water, action must be taken right away to make sure the resource is protected from pollution of the environment. In this regard, it is very important that we have the proper licensing procedures to put a stop to serious situations such as these.

Let me for a moment visualize a situation where the Minister of Fisheries does not have the absolute authority to grant licences. I think that such a situation would place the minister in a very difficult position whenever occasion arose to cancel licences for flagrant infractions. I have previously discussed many such cases. The minister must be able to face a situation head on.

I am confident of the desirability of these policies in view of over-harvesting and the need to place the fishery in the hands of the real and genuine fishermen who depend on the fishery as a main source of livelihood. These measures have been effective and on the whole have been well received by the people whose main source of income is derived from fishing. Without the exclusive authority provided in section 7 of the Fisheries Act, these restrictive programs would not be sufficiently effective.

This amendment would raise doubt as to who exactly had the authority to grant licences. For example, if the minister is not to have authority, where would the authority lie? The bill proposes it revert to the Governor in Council. Does this mean, in effect, that cabinet would deal with licensing? Or does it mean the House of Commons would? Does it mean that a section of the department would issue licences? I think it is important that we know who does have authority, and that we know that this person can exercise the authority at a moment's notice if a serious situation requiring action were to develop.

With regard to revoking the authority to issue licences as provided in section 7, the proposed new paragraph (g) does not make it clear that anyone can issue licences. It seems to presuppose that someone can issue them, and indicates that the Governor in Council is empowered to deal in a general way with the terms and conditions under which licences and leases may be issued, without enabling the Governor in Council either to issue licences or to prescribe their actual terms and conditions. I do not think that ministerial discretion can be equated with arbitrary or unreasonable action, and the present paragraphs (f) and (g) appear adequate. A function as basic and general as the issuing of licences should not be left to regulation; its proper place is in the statute.

I agree that there should be some appeal procedures. I think people must have the right to appeal, and appeal committees have been set up already for certain species. Possibly they should be set up for other species as well. If a person loses his licence, he should have the right to appeal that loss and to justify his case. But we must be sure where authority lies and ensure that speedy action is taken if that is necessary.

There are a number of examples of where to illustrate the necessity for that authority in the past. I do not want to go into them at this time but I do think that if the authority were taken away from the minister this would be a restrictive step rather than a forward step. We have also seen that licensing has enabled us adequately to set regulations relating to vessels that are used to catch various species of fish. Nowadays, with the development of a multipurpose vessel, with men moving from lobsters to scallops to groundfish, there is still a large percentage following the historical and traditional way of life. It therefore became apparent that a restrictive-type policy would be a step forward towards harmonious development. A licensing program based on the authority invested by section 7 of the Fisheries Act was therefore introduced whereby vessels which had fished in excess of 100 traps became category "A" and could fish up to the maximum of 400. Vessels which had fished 100 traps or fewer became category "B" and could not fish more traps than previously. If a vessel had fished only 75 traps, not more than that number could be fished.

It was necessary to select the trap criterion because catch statistics were not available in the required precision. The catches may be sold over the rail, buyers may move amongst the fleet. We are moving toward a more realistic criterion based on catch value, but for the time being the described classification will prevail. Only category "A" vessels can be replaced or sold. Category "B" vessel licences are non-transferrable. When the present owner ceases fishing, the licence is gone except in the most extenuating circumstances to be determined by a review committee. Based on a licence control program for conservation reasons, a freeze was placed in 1970 on all herring fishing units with the exception of gillnets on the Atlantic coast. The policy stipulated that only those units such as purse seiners, weirs, traps, bar seines and midwater trawlers which fished in 1968 or 1969 would be licensed. Replacements can be made on a ton for ton basis with more extensive restriction in the Bay of Fundy area where overfishing became evident. There is inherent in this licensing policy a provision for entry into the fishery of additional units in all areas except in the Bay of Fundy where it can be clearly proven that herring are being produced for food and not for reduction purposes. The policy also provides for taking into consideration the status of the stocks.

To sum up my key points, I think modern fisheries resource management is based on quotas, restrictions of unit effort, area closures and gear restrictions. Decisions very often have to be made quickly, even on a day to day basis. To restrict the authority to implement management decisions by deleting provisions for licence control that now exist would serve to reduce and seriously impair the effectiveness of our management policies.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to make on this rather interesting bill that is before us. The question of licensing, of course, applies to any resource or privilege which is nationally owned and is not possessed as a matter of ownership by an individual. A farmer, for example, owns the land on which he carries on his operation. He is free, within limitations, to do whatever he likes because it is his property. However, in the realm of publicly owned benefits or assets which belong to the state in general, of course some system of licensing must be designed in order to determine how the resource or benefit shall be exploited. This is the reason it is necessary to have licences allowing people to establish television and radio broadcasting stations. Only a limited number of people may exploit this resource or privilege which is owned by the state in general.

In the same way, the fisheries belong to the nation as a whole. Therefore, it is logical and indeed necessary in the present day that those who exploit this common resource should be licensed so that it may be determined to what extent and under what conditions certain individuals will have that privilege which in theory belongs to every citizen of the state. This, of course, is done through government.

If I understand the intent of the hon. member's bill, it has nothing to do with the abolition or the reduction of the necessity for licensing of the fisheries, because in this way and in this way only can exploitation of the fishery resource be carried on in a reasonable and beneficial way not only for the benefit of the people engaged in it but for the general benefit of the nation. Therefore, if my interpretation of the hon. member's purpose is correct, much of what the parliamentary secretary said is beside the point. I think what the hon. member who introduced the bill is attempting to do is not to reduce, restrict or abolish the issuance of licences or leases but, rather, to determine by regulation the conditions, the classes of people and the circumstances under which licences will be issued or cancelled. In other words, there would be a general framework in which the minister is required to operate when issuing licences. The explanatory note of the bill reads:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide that leases and licences for a fishery or fishing shall be issued by the minister only on terms and conditions previously prescribed by regulations made by the governor in council and not in his absolute discretion as presently provided.

The section of the present act to which the hon. member takes exception is section 7. Section 9 of the act reads as follows:

> The minister may cancel any lease or licence issued under the authority of this act, if he has ascertained that the operations under such licence were not conducted in conformity with its provisions.

This is a subsidiary authority given the minister to cancel licences which is almost as arbitrary as his authority to issue them, although he can cancel them only for cause. This brings me to a point which is of particular interest to lobster fishermen on the east coast where, I think due to the probably unnecessary arbitrary authority vested in the minister, the lobster fishermen have appealed to the minister and have asked him to cancel licences where regulations have been broken. This is a request which came from the fishermen. In those terms it is a very sensible and admirable request, because nobody should have the privilege of holding a licence unless he is prepared to live by the regulations. However, I think the application of the method of applying the subsidiary penalty for breaking a fisheries' regulation was not thought through sufficiently. I have reference to the breaking of a regulation, for which a fishermen is taken to court and fined under the standard system of justice which we all enjoy. This is fine.

However, we also have the additional penalty by which a fishermen forfeits his licence for a given period. I think this has been brought about because, due to economic conditions, it was felt that the fines and penalties imposed by the courts were not adequate to deter the breaking of the law. I am all for clamping down on illegal fishing of any kind, so long as it is done justly and so long as the penalty fits the crime. But we have a situation involving a number of anomalies which I believe affects unjustly some individuals.

I might take the extreme case of a person who owns or acquires a few lobster traps but has no licence. He is an out-and-out poacher. He decides to catch lobsters. This also applies to skindivers who go out and catch lobsters while skindiving. If these people are caught, they are fined. They receive the usual penalty and that is the end of it because they have no licence to be cancelled. However, the situation is different in respect of the fisherman who tries to abide by the law, and most of them do. I might say there is a possibility of error if a person is out on a stormy day attempting to measure a lobster to see whether it is inside or outside the allowable size. Toward the end of the season it must be remembered—at least this is the case in my constituency—the majority of the lobsters are undersized and the fisherman has to throw them overboard. Sometimes he may make an error.

I should like to mention a case in my constituency. Last year a fishermen had a catch of 160 pounds. Fishermen are allowed 10 undersized lobsters for each 100 pounds of catch, but in this case the fishermen had a catch of 160 pounds which under the regulations would allow him to take a maximum of 16 undersized lobsters. It so happened that he had 19. He was taken into court and he pleaded guilty. This year he found that his licence was suspended for two weeks, which amounts to a quarter of the season. In my area this represents perhaps as much as 50 per cent of the catch and it means an economic penalty of around $3,000 on this individual for having three undersized lobsters too many.

It seems to me that the granting and suspension of licences is a very blunt instrument when used in that way. I agree with the parliamentary secretary that there should be some sort of local board which can give advice to the minister as to whether a licence should be suspended. When you have a lobster fisherman who is an unregenerate breaker of the regulations and who gets caught, you find that nobody has any sympathy for him. The feeling is that he had it coming to him. But when minor or borderline infractions of the law take place and it is a first offence, the suspension of a licence for an arbitrary two-week period is unjust.

I might add that in addition to his licence being suspended, the livelihood of his helper is taken away from him, a person who in all likelihood had no direct involvement in the infraction. I cite that case as a borderline case where I think the penalty was much too severe. It is over and above the ordinary penalty under the law, and one from which there is no effective appeal.

In this regard I have a great deal of sympathy for what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) has suggested, namely, the creation of a framework or some sort of terms of reference which should be adhered to in the granting, suspending or cancellation of licences of fishermen. It seems to me that the granting of a licence to a fishermen is a privilege. It should be done in conformity with national interests in the broad sense and the protection of the resource; in fact, all the things to which the parliamentary secretary referred. Certainly the granting of licences must meet all these requirements in the public interest.

However, I think that what the hon. member is suggesting has merit. He is trying to ensure that situations where injustices are unintentionally perpetrated do not occur. I know that these things are done with the best intentions in the world, and I am not being critical of what the Department of Fisheries is trying to do. I am referring to unintended, but unreasonable punitive penalties imposed upon first offenders in borderline cases. Although the bill of the hon. member may be deficient and imperfect in many ways, I think that what he is trying to do has some merit.

Mr. G. A. Percy Smith (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) for bringing Bill C-23 before the House. I believe it has a lot to recommend it. My understanding of the bill is the same as that of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), namely, that its intention is not in any way to decrease the necessity for careful management of this renewable resource or of conservation measures which we all agree must be strictly enforced, but to give more certainty to fishermen who prepare for the fishing season, probably at great expense, and who perhaps a few weeks before the season starts find that their licences are not issued for some reason.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni also objected to the minister having absolute discretion is this matter. He feels it would be better if regulations were made by order in council. The argument in the bill seems to boil down to allowing greater flexibility in the enforcement of regulations. If the decision were to be strictly up to the minister, this would be less cumbersome. However, I would point out that so far as I know, certain authority and discretion rests with the regional director of the Department of Fisheries to alter fishing season—to close the fishing season, in other words—when an emergency occurs such as the pollution of a river as a result of a spill, a flood or some other unexpected condition.

I know that this authority was exercised recently on the Miramichi River, in connection with the salmon fishing season, by the regional director of the Department of Fisheries in Halifax. In fact, it was exercised to the extent that he altered the season by two weeks. It had the effect of pretty well cutting the salmon fishing season in half. In spite of the fact that the regional office has used this authority, I contend that it was wrongly used in that case in 1971, and there is enough flexibility in the regulations under which regional offices operate in cases of sudden emergency.

Perhaps the question of seasons should have been included in this bill because it is closely related to the question of licensing. It is useless for a fisherman to obtain a licence, either from the Minister of Fisheries or through the authority of the governor in council, if somebody else has the authority to cut the season or eliminate it altogether. Therefore the bill might have included some reference to seasons.

I think we all realize that in this very large country where there is an important fishery on the west coast, a very important fishery on the east coast, and the inland fisheries, there are too many details with respect to licensing and seasons for one minister to give them all his personal attention. If these matters were handled by order in council, other ministers of the Crown would be involved, possibly including ministers from the areas in question. In essence, I suppose this is an argument in favour of the bill.

If the minister undertakes licensing, as the present act says, at his "absolute discretion" he must rely on his own department; therefore he would rely on the regional office which has responsibility for the waters in question. I have had some experience with the Atlantic regional office in Halifax and I must say I would hate to leave the matter entirely in their hands. If the minister is unable personally to oversee these matters, then automatically it devolves upon him to look to his regional offices for advice on licensing and seasons.

I have given one example of where the regional office in Halifax cut the salmon season practically in half, apparently without any reference to the minister or to anyone else. I could give many more examples. Going back to the question of licensing, I can cite the present situation on the east coast where there is a commercial salmon fishing ban. About a year prior to the announcement of the ban, a policy statement was issued by the minister restricting licences and transfers of salmon fishing licences. It provided that to be a bona fide salmon fisherman or to obtain a salmon fishing licence you must not be engaged in any other industry, or not have a steady job in any other industry.

Many licences were cancelled as a result of this directive. However, in order to relieve hardship in certain cases the minister did agree that anyone, even though employed steadily, who was receiving a very small annual salary would not be considered to be steadily employed and therefore would be permitted to continue to hold a salmon licence. To deal with people who appealed on this basis he set up a licence review committee in the Atlantic provinces. It consisted of somebody from the Department of Fisheries, somebody representing fishermen and a third, independent citizen.

On the Miramichi, this committee set up by the minister to relieve hardship did in fact give relief in 13 cases. But the departmental officials from Halifax objected to the action of the licence review committee and, presumably, advised the minister. The result was that the minister upset the ruling of his own committee in nine out of the 13 cases. To me this is a matter of great regret. I only raise the matter to point out the insensitivity of regional offices, on the one hand, to the fishermen and apparently, on the other hand, to the wishes of the minister himself. So I would have to agree with and support the bill unless there is some way in which the minister can better control the actions of his regional directors and regional offices. I could give another example, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: Six o'clock.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair, until eight o'clock. I hope you will enjoy your dinner.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock, I was commenting Bill C-176, and particularly clause 178.12 which reads as follows:

> An application for an authorization shall be made ex parte and in writing to a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction,. . . . or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section . . .

What puzzles me, Mr. Speaker, is that we are still on second reading, and I suppose it will be possible to make amendments or clarifications to this bill, which is certainly in a good cause at face value, that being the protection of the individual's privacy. However, when we take the bill clause by clause, we see that its definitions are too comprehensive and not specific enough. Clause 178.12 a) says:

> proceedings, if any, may be instituted at the instance of the Government of Canada and conducted by or on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada, or

And it says below that this can be done by a provincial Attorney General or by an agent.

The bill does not tell us who the agent will be,—and I should not like to draw any false conclusions—but I think it would be unfortunate to see some provinces appointing a political organizer of any sort.

Certain individuals will be authorized to install bugging and wire-tapping devices; if the agents are officials who, in some provinces, may be political organizers, this could lead to serious abuses and have even more dire consequences for individual privacy.

Mr. Speaker, clause 178.15 (1) also deserves our attention. This is another section that could lead to abuses. Clause 178.15 (3) says that it will be permitted to investigate for 36 hours before obtaining an authorization. It would be unfortunate to have people investigating, using electronic eavesdropping devices for 36 hours before obtaining authorization to install these devices. The legislation gives to anyone who has to use wiretapping 36 hours to get his permit or a writ from a judge, an attorney general, a substitute or an agent that we don't know yet; a citizen will be pestered for 36 hours before the person concerned may obtain a proper licence. I think that this is giving the legislation too much leeway and this might still result in most serious abuses.

On page 10, clause 178.18 (2), one may read about the exceptions:

> (a) a police officer or police constable in possession of a device or component described in subsection (1) in the course of his employment;

Mr. Speaker, this bill is extremely serious; an authorization is given to all police officers in Canada. I would like to trust our police officers, but I think that the bill is too comprehensive and that we will unfortunately witness some breaches of confidence. Indeed, some individuals can enjoy pestering other persons in certain areas for all kinds of reasons. We see that police officers are ipso facto exempted under the legislation; they can, as they see fit, connect tapping devices on telephone lines or elsewhere. I think that this will give rise to much abuse.

The government is also empowered to use those devices or tapping apparatus as are police officers, authorized persons and officials.

I trust the members of the committee will amend this bill which, to my mind, is far too dangerous as it stands: limits must be set. If we do not want the bill to lend itself to abuse, we must amend it in several respects. At the present time, the bill could make spying legal, so to speak.

On the other hand, the bill limits to $5,000 only the punitive damages to be paid to the aggrieved person against whom wiretapping has been used abusively. As I said this afternoon, in every other field, when a person inflicts damages upon someone, in a car accident or otherwise, the law requires that individual to be penalized according to the damages he, in fact, inflicted; this is normal. This respects the spirit of justice. But in the case of wire-tapping, if an individual suffers damages worth $50,000 or $100,000, the legislation will prevent his obtaining damages exceeding $5,000.

In its present form, the bill was designed to protect privacy but actually, unless major amendments are made, it will place all Canadians at the mercy of government searches conducted by public servants. Each Canadian, Mr. Speaker, is entitled to privacy and the bill purports to protect privacy. However, it will allow government violation of privacy and pave the way to the creation of a police state in Canada.

It may be that the sponsors of this bill have no intention of creating a police state, but the bill will open doors and within a year there will be penetration of areas other than that of criminality and it is likely that in future the government, or National Revenue officials, taking advantage of new amendments, will use wire-tapping to achieve their ends.

It is against such abuses that we do not want to see, and against the scope of this bill that we are protesting. I wish the government would propose amendments so that, in future, those who want to obtain search warrants or the authority to tap telephone lines would not be led to abuses. If this bill applied only to the field of organized crime and was only intended for the security of the state, we would be satisfied with it. Unfortunately, the people who will be called upon to enforce this act will be facing unlocked doors and we will see abuses such as the ones we deplore at present.

However, I have all confidence in the committee which will be considering this bill again. I hope it will be clarified further in the way suggested by the Police Chiefs Association, and by various other organizations which have at one time considered the previous bill, heard evidence in committee and made quite valuable recommendations. I will not say that the government has tried to bypass the recommendations of the various organizations in Canada, but I believe this is a new opportunity, when the bill comes before the committee, to propose the necessary amendments, in order to ensure maximum freedom to the individual, while allowing the government to use this instrument to control organized crime and to ensure the security of the state, rather than allowing them only to proceed with general searches and allowing officials and other persons exempted from the provisions of this bill, to make ill use of it.

[English]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in a debate that, to judge from the speeches of hon. members who have already participated, is of significant value to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). I believe this type of issue is not partisan and the government is not so committed to its position that it will not show a degree of latitude in listening to, I will not say criticisms but constructive suggestions from members of all parties, including the government party. This debate will allow the minister to take a second look at the legislation. This measure has been before parliament on a number of occasions over a number of years; therefore we can end up with a very good piece of legislation that will be of use and benefit to the government and country in the days ahead.

First let me say that merely because we shall pass this bill in whatever form it may finally take does not mean that the law will provide real protection to the people of this nation. It will not protect us unless the government sees that the law is carried out completely and in every sense in the form in which it is passed. Provisions which allow for latitude in the use of wiretapping equipment in certain circumstances, or in the use of equipment that can reproduce sound, must be at all times implemented in the strictest sense so that those authorized to give permission for the carrying out of any form of surveillance which intrudes upon the privacy of any individual will provide to the public the greatest degree of protection possible.

There are a number of general things I wish to say. At present, in North America and throughout the free world, as a result of the Watergate scandal in the United States we find ourselves in an environment in which we can fully appreciate the terrible consequences of misuse of the type of technology that is available today for invading the privacy of the individual. As Canadians we ought to be aware that it really does not make much difference if there are laws preventing the use of complicated computerized methods of invading privacy. If people and governments are determined to use these devices to invade the privacy of individuals, then the privacy of individuals will be invaded.

It is therefore the great responsibility of the Minister of Justice, whoever he may be, and of the Solicitor General, because he has control over and responsibility for most of the sources of producing information that may be required by the state in certain circumstances, to see that the right to privacy of the individual is guarded just as jealously as is humanly possible. I think that is the first lesson that we as Canadians must learn. Merely because laws are passed does not mean that those laws will be obeyed.

The second thing we must consider, and here we must depend to a great degree on the Minister of Justice, whoever he may be at the pertinent time, is that although the security of the state may be more important than the freedom of the individual, the Minister of Justice will need to be very careful in making sure that the security of the state is really endangered; in other words, he must be certain that it is endangered before contemplating action which will allow invasion of the privacy of the individual to take place. We, as Members of Parliament, must be careful that we do not allow in this legislation any degree of latitude to the Minister of Justice under which he might use his powers against an individual or group of individuals under the guise that he is doing so to protect the security of the state.

Also, in a parliament such as this we must be very concerned about the fact that there can be complication in the mind of the party in office in a minority government where the security of the state is mixed up with the security of the party which happens to form the government of the day. I especially want to emphasize this fact. The government of this day, the government of this country since 1968 has been, and has a record of being, a very secretive government. It has been very concerned about retaining as much information as possible about itself and making available to the public as little as possible of such information.

The government's jealousy about its own actions was one of the main reasons for the proliferation of leaks that occurred during the past two or three years. These leaks gave all Members of Parliament a great deal of concern. If they had happened too often and at too great a rate, there would have been a breakdown in the system of government as we know it and in the system of secrecy that must be expected from public servants, especially those who hold the highest offices in this country and who at all times should be subservient to the elected members of the cabinet or the executive who run this country.

I believe that Members of Parliament have shown real appreciation of what this legislation means. They have indicated real appreciation of what we should do to protect the right to privacy of the individual as well as what the security of the state means. As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) pointed out in his speech, by initiating the constructive suggestions our party has made with regard to this legislation the people of Canada would have a right to know that is every bit as important as the right of the government to protect the security of the state.

There have not been many occasions when the present government and its predecessors have been willing to take the people of this country into their confidence and tell them what is happening. All too often we wrap up anything that appears to be the least bit political, anything that appears to have the least bit of political implication associated with it, no matter whether the public should know about it or not. We wrap it up and stamp it as classified, secret or top secret so that it can be kept away from the public. If a government becomes too jealous about this sort of thing, public servants are put in the position where they become the conscience of the nation. We do not have any right to put public servants in that position. Unfortunately, when we reach that point there is demoralization within the public service that is bad for any government, as well as for the people of this country.

If by this legislation and the approach the government takes to it there is an indication that we wish to protect the security of the state, protect the freedom of individuals and let the people of this country know what they want to know and should know, there will be an elimination or shrinking of the leaks which occur. There will be a degree of confidence, in the minds of Canadians, about parliament that will be truly beneficial to parliament and the parliamentary system of government.

When the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoke today he said that the type of thing that has happened in the United States associated with the Watergate scandal could not happen in Canada. He should know a good deal more than I do because he was prime minister of this country for a long time. He had to deal with many top secret, security matters. He knows parliament better than anyone else in Canada and he knows what parliaments can do. He said that the Watergate scandal or something akin to it could not happen in Canada. I believe he must be right because I do not think there is a better man to make a judgment on that matter.

I say to the government that when we on this side of the House rise to ask questions which at times seem obnoxious to them, those who sit on the treasury benches should thank God that we have an opposition in this country. If it is an effective opposition, there is no way we will get into the kind of mess that today exists in the United States. That is very important. This is one of the reasons I have always been a strong proponent of a constitutional form of monarchy in this country.

We have a cabinet and an executive that is answerable in the House of Commons five days a week to the elected members who are here to ask questions. At times they may not like our questions. Maybe we ask some questions that get them into trouble. We hope so. However, we ask questions which we hope will show that the government of the day is honest in the efforts it is making on behalf of the Canadian people. That is really important. While we may be obnoxious, if we keep the government honest, if we eliminate the possibility of things like Watergate, then in the end we wind up with a much better system of government than any other which exists, even if it is not perfect or near perfect.

In recent days we have asked a great many questions of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) about the organization known as the security and research planning group. We have asked these questions, not because we are implying that some great, new spy network is being set up in Canada but in order to find out precisely what this organization is; and we are making these inquiries with a great deal of justification. When the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), who is sitting in the House now, was Solicitor General he enunciated certain aims and objectives for this organization which was known as the research planning group. The organization has now changed its name and has enlarged its scope. If we do not ask questions there is no way of finding out just what its area of responsibility might be. If we do not ask these questions we shall be failing in our duty as an opposition.

While the government appears to get uptight because we are asking these questions, all we are really saying to them is, "Tell the people of Canada what you are doing." As my hon. friend from Fundy-Royal said, Canadians have a right to know. I say that any police organization set up in this country which enlarges its responsibility over a two-year period, changes its name, adds people to its staff and says it will make judgments on classified information and train people for security positions in the organization or in government, is a legitimate target of inquiry.

I do not say there is anything wrong with this organization, but I do say that people have a right to know what it is all about. Yet every time a question is asked on this subject, government spokesmen give the opposition and the people a lot of double-talk, and the minute people hear double-talk they begin to be worried lest there is something going on that the government does not wish them to know about. It is the responsibility of any party in opposition, especially when it comes to the setting up of a new type of police force, to see that the people know everything about that police force, because such a police force might be invading the privacy of Canadians in one way or another.

If it is doing so, the people have a right to know why it is being done. We in the opposition intend to make sure they have all the information which can possibly be secured, regardless of how it is obtained, whether by placing questions on the order paper, through making speeches in the House or by asking questions orally during the question period. It is the right and the duty of all members of the opposition to see that the facts are placed before the people as clearly as possible. Certainly, as a member of the House I intend to see that those facts are made available.

I should like to return now to an aspect to which I referred earlier. It is one thing to pass a law and it is quite another to see that people respect it. If people are to respect the law, then the government has to set an example. The government has to see that for its part the law is carried out to the letter. From this point of view I should like to refer to the legislation which presently stands on the statute books with regard to the trial period for the abolition of capital punishment except in certain specific circumstances. I sat through the debate in the House when this legislation was passed. I had formerly been a retentionist, but I accepted what the government was saying and agreed to support the legislation for the five-year trial period which was proposed.

I was deceived, just as every other member of this chamber who supported that legislation in similar circumstances was deceived. The government did not live by the law. It lived by its own conscience. It paid no attention to parliament. It made a mockery of the law because it declined to carry out the terms of the legislation. Since that time there has been a rapid deterioration in all aspects of justice in this country. A question was answered in the House recently in relation to the number of escapes from penal institutions. Here are some statistics in that regard. In 1968 there were 108 escapes, in 1969 there were 174, in 1970 there were 293, in 1971 there were 485, and in 1972 there were 684.

Mr. Speaker, if this continues we shall have more prisoners outside the institutions than in them, and we shall be hiring more guards than there are inmates. As a matter of fact, that is almost the situation at the present time. This is just one example of the way in which all aspects of criminal law have deteriorated. This is because the government, for reasons best known to itself, would not live up to the law which was passed by parliament. Yet they have the outstanding nerve to come here and ask us to continue the five-year trial period in connection with a piece of legislation which was never put into effect in the first place. There are many examples of the deterioration to which I have referred. I believe the right hon. member for Prince Albert was right today when he said to the Solicitor General that we must have a royal commission, an over-all inquiry carried out as soon as possible.

I have in my hand information about an inmate in a penal institution who was sentenced to 18 months for trafficking in a controlled drug. This individual was a correctional officer at a penal institution and was trafficking in a controlled drug in the institution. In other words, he was trafficking in a drug in a most despicable way because he was selling the drug to inmates of a penal institution. He broke his trust as a correctional officer and endangered the lives of all his fellow correctional officers in the institution, as well as many of the inmates. He was sentenced to 18 months, and served only 27 days in jail before he was allowed out to work. We cannot have that kind of justice in this country. We must put justice back on the rails or there will be no justice in Canada.

I do not know whether I have used up all my time, Mr. Speaker, but may I just say this. I believe that the legislation proposed is very important. I believe the House of Commons has approached the legislation in a considered, non-partisan manner in the hope that we will arrive at the best possible legislation dealing with one of the most delicate matters that exists in this or any other nation. I believe the Minister of Justice is the kind of minister who will give every possible consideration to all criticisms that have been made or that will be made during the committee stage. In the end I think we will have a good statute.

Nevertheless, it will only be as good as the government makes it by honouring the law that is passed. There are many dictatorships in the world with constitutions as fancy as words can produce and granting all kinds of freedoms, whereas in fact no freedom at all exists in the country. After we have put these words together and arrived at the best possible legislation, the Minister of Justice will have the grave responsibility of seeing that the legislation is honoured in every sense of that word.

If that is the case, then there will be protection for the individual in this country. There will be protection for the state and there will be a degree of justice in Canada of which we can be proud. We shall always be able to hold our heads high with legislation such as this under our system of government and we will not be concerned with the kind of international embarrassment which the United States is facing at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I begin my short closing remarks by expressing my appreciation to hon. members of the House for their participation in this debate. If I may do so without presumption, may I also express my appreciation of their analysis of certain key areas of the bill before us which I know will receive further and serious consideration in the committee.

It is true, as the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) has just said, that much of the approach has been in a non-partisan manner, since certainly members within the same party have not always necessarily agreed upon the exact approach that should be taken. I think this has been typical in the discussion of this matter initially in committee, in the House and in committee last year when the same subject matter, essentially the same bill, was before the House.

The main thrust, the key and central portion of this bill is an attempt to increase the protection of privacy in Canada by making illegal in a general way the use of a whole series of devices, particularly mechanical and electrical devices, that can intercept conversations of people who do not want them to be intercepted. As I see it, this key, central part of the bill has received general support.

I think it is worth noting that the placing in the hands of law enforcement officers, upon whom we depend for the effective operation of this legislation, the power to attempt to control the use of such devices strengthens their position; indeed, we are also making it illegal to have in one's possession or to sell, except in certain limited ways, such devices. This controlling of possession and of sale is one of the effective ways of limiting the availability of these devices in the country, except when those devices are used in an authorized manner.

It has been said by a number of hon. members that making wiretapping or interference with privacy illegal does not by any means completely put us out of the danger that it will continue in an unauthorized and illegal manner. Indeed, it is interesting to note that one or two members commented that it is not the making illegal of such practices that will protect us as parliamentarians, as members of a democratic society, from the use of such devices in the democratic process. I am sure all hon. members would agree that none of us in this House would have tolerated the use of these devices by one of us upon the other, even during the period when there was no illegality. But this would be on the basis of our political ethic rather than on the basis of the law itself. It is that political ethic, that standard of conduct that we have come to expect from members participating in the democratic process which is by far our greatest protection.

A great protection also exists in our democratic process in the quality and the ability of our enforcement officers and in the way in which they go about the business of attempting, on our behalf, to protect us in a general way by maintaining law and order under the direction of the political authority which must take the responsibility for their actions in enforcing the law. I shall say a little more about that later.

My point is that making wiretapping illegal does not necessarily end it entirely. I think it would be a safe prediction to say that those elements engaged in the most serious crimes, the most organized elements of the criminal world, are still apt to make use of such devices even though use of those devices will be illegal. In other words when, in my hypothesis, these people are engaged in criminal activity, they will use these devices notwithstanding this change in the law. Thus, it will be important for our enforcement officers to attempt to come to grips with this problem, and here again we will rely on the quality of our enforcement officers, subject of course, as I say, to the responsibility of the political officers under whom they operate.

For this reason it is extremely important that in the committee we face up to the need to retain for our enforcement officers the ability themselves, in the course of their enforcement duties, to use devices which otherwise are illegal in this country, so that they may have such mechanical devices available to them as will assist them to the highest degree possible in the performance of their duty in the protection of law and order generally and, therefore, the protection of our democratic society. That this bill endeavours to do. It endeavours to do it in a way which retains the political responsibility which requires that applications for any such use by law enforcement officers be on the responsibility of an elected person, either the Solicitor General in the case of federal operations or, in by far the greater number of cases, the provincial attorneys general who have the general obligation of supervising police activity and the enforcement of the criminal law throughout this country.

I emphasize this, because it is not a matter of us as members of the government saying that you can rely in every way, in terms of political responsibility, upon us to do our job as individuals or persons. We are saying that we ought to be able, in this democratic process, in the provinces and in the federal government to rely on the political responsibility of the properly elected officials. I am indebted to the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North for having said that that is the key to the proper operation of our system.

We are here saying we must rely upon the political responsibility of the provincial attorneys general for the greater part of the operation of this bill, that is, on the question of how many times and how frequently such applications or uses of these devices are in fact made. We do, of course, include reporting provisions so that we in advance attempt to put into the political process some ability such as may be reasonable and consistent with the use of the devices themselves with the power to control, supervise and see whether or not the devices are being used in a proper way. I will be eager in the committee to consider with members ways to improve and strengthen this ability to ensure that political control is really there in terms of the supervision by the Solicitor General, or by the provincial attorneys general, of the applications for these devices.

We make clear in the bill that these devices are not to be used as standard devices even by our law enforcement officers, but only when other techniques have been tried and failed or are unlikely to succeed. In other words, they are available as a fall-back position. That we do because we think they have obligations associated with them; they are evidence-gatherers which gather evidence beyond the matter that may be at hand in the law enforcement itself. In the bill we suggest a judge. We had initially said a judge of the superior court. The committee, when deliberating last year, added judges of the country court because of the concern that there should be access to judges by the police and by law enforcement agencies when they need quick action by a judge.

Some hon. members have suggested it would be better if we did not have a judge at all and relied totally on the political responsibility. I think it is better, in fact, to have it as we do, with the political responsibility in terms of the application proceeding and then, admittedly, a pro forma check—which may be all it can be in many cases because it is on an ex parte application—on the procedure by a judge. I think that could be helpful. I do not wish to go to any current or neighbouring cases to indicate when or how it could be helpful, but I think it could be and I shall be glad to pursue that matter further with the committee. Members of the opposition have suggested it would be better if a judge were not involved in that situation. Members opposite have suggested it.

Mr. Woolliams: Not me.

Mr. Lang: I am happy to hear the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) say it was not him. Nor, indeed, I think, was it the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) whom I want to thank for his very kind intervention in the debate this afternoon. He attached great importance to the intervention of a judge in this process. He was very critical of the existence in the bill of the emergency permit which could be applied for by and on the responsibility of the Solicitor General or a provincial attorney general alone. So he is clearly on the side of wanting a judge to be involved. I am quite content to discuss that matter further and reach a conclusion in the committee as we try to come forward with the best possible bill.

However, I would like to say, in answer to the remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, that emergency permits may be necessary. I could say that generally about the need for the police authorities to use these devices in certain circumstances. There may be cases when it will come to the attention of an enforcement agency that there is apt to be soon some major criminal activity. Let us say, for instance, that it comes to their attention that there is a possibility that a significant shipment of heroin is about to be brought into this country. They may know by whom, but they may not know when. They may want to use a device like this, in such circumstances, quickly to determine the "when" in order to stop the import of the drug with all the terrible effects which can flow therefrom.

It may well be that in certain circumstances a judge is not available in time and that the emergency provisions in section 178.15 of the bill should be used. I draw to the attention of hon. members, again, that here too we have put in a political safeguard, not only that the application must be authorized by someone specifically authorized for the purpose by the Solicitor General, or by an attorney general, but there must also be reports upon the uses of such emergency permits so that they will be open to later examination and questioning about the extent to which they have been used.

What we cannot know at this stage is the extent of organized crime, whether it be related to drugs, kidnapping or hijacking, and whether it be national or international in scope, where our enforcement officers may need to have every mechanical device available to them in support of law and order in our society. It is there that I hope members of the committee will seriously consider the obligation to leave it open for our enforcement officers to have such devices as are ordinarily illegal in this country when it is necessary for them to have them in the course of apprehending or detecting serious criminal activity.

The same principle applies, of course, to the major crimes of sabotage and treason. There has been comment about the exact wording of the section referring to subversive activity. I will be very happy to consider that question with hon. members, and the nature of the words which should be in the section in order to provide adequate scope to deal with situations we cannot now foresee and at the same time properly to protect against the abuse of the use of these devices. There is, of course, still the political responsibility, and there too we can look at the question of whether we can strengthen the way in which political control is available if devices are used in that particular area.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members have generally agreed that the subject matter of this bill is important. It goes now to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I look forward to the resolution there, once again, by hon. members who compose this House of Commons of some of these key issues and the prompt return to the House and passage into law of this very important piece of legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[Mr. Lang.]

Some hon. Members: On division.

CANADA WILDLIFE BILL

PROVISION FOR RESEARCH AND CONSERVATION AGREEMENTS, CONTRIBUTIONS TO COSTS AND PURCHASE, ACQUISITION OR LEASE OF LANDS

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-131, respecting wildlife in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-131 deals in relatively simple and straightforward terms with a very important subject, the protection and wise management of the wild living resources in this country. We have not had a wildlife act in Canada. We have had several pieces of legislation which have been used to manage our wild living resources reasonably well, but we need more comprehensive legislation to protect endangered species and to permit the federal government to purchase lands and manage the wildlife on those lands in a truly effective manner.

As most hon. members know, the management of most kinds of wildlife is a responsibility of the provincial government. The management of migratory birds is an exception. There is the Migratory Birds Convention Act, for example, which has been used very extensively by the Canada Wildlife Service in order to protect ducks, geese, seagulls, etc. Otherwise, the protection and wise management of wildlife in Canada has either been provincial in nature or as a result of co-operation between the federal government and the provinces, with the federal government frequently providing the research support, equipment, land and management techniques but with provincial law being used almost exclusively—that is, with the exception of the Migratory Birds Convention Act—for the safeguarding of wildlife in general.

Wild living things in many ways may be referred to as our first line of defence against pollution. There are many species of wild living things which are much more vulnerable to toxic substances, exceptional quantities of waste, and so on, than the human animal is, and when we see wildlife being destroyed we get our first inkling that we, as another living species on this planet, may be in trouble. But the protection of wild living things is important for another reason. It must be a determined objective of all levels of government, of all individuals and of all organizations in this country to preserve as much variety in nature as we possibly can. This is one of the several purposes, I would suggest—perhaps the most important purpose—which can be served by a Canada wildlife act such as is envisaged in Bill C-131.

I have mentioned legislation which has been used in the past, such as the Migratory Birds Convention Act. I could also have mentioned the Financial Administration Act. In fact, lands have been purchased, usually outright, by the federal government, or wildlife habitat sometimes have been gifted to the federal government, sometimes purchased by the provinces or purchased co-operatively by the federal government and the provinces. But in the cases where the federal government has purchased these lands, under existing legislation it has not had the power, for example, to forbid private individuals entrance to those lands and obviously to protect certain species, particularly protect those which are now relatively scarce. It is essential, at least at times, to in effect insulate these lands from human activity or guard it from undue exploitation by curious visitors. This shortcoming, this inability under the federal law at least to properly manage lands will be overcome by the passage of this legislation.

There is another important aspect. It is important, I believe, from both the parliamentary point of view and the budgetary point of view. It is preferable to use legislation passed explicitly by this House, such as the Canada wildlife act, in order to defend the raising and spending of public moneys, rather than to use a more general piece of legislation such as the Financial Administration Act. In other words, parliament, should it pass Bill C-131, will give proper, full and explicit authority to the government of the day to spend moneys on, for example, research or demonstration projects, for the purchase of lands upon which wildlife can live and be protected, in which indeed it can be managed an l the populations expanded. In other words, the passage of this bill will give us a clear mandate from parliament to do a number of things which have been done under other legislation, and certain things which we have been unable to do under legislation passed previously.

I have mentioned the jurisdictional problem in many cases in respect of many species of wildlife, which is that the provincial power is paramount. However, provincial administrations usually rely on the Canadian Wildlife Service for advice and frequently look to the federal treasury for financial assistance. They often look to Ottawa for funds for the purchase of lands, not only for the management of bird life including migratory birds but animals and other kinds of wildlife as well.

The provinces are convinced that explicit support from parliament for legislation of this type, legislation which I hope will make additional funds available for the protection of wildlife, is highly desirable. There has been a history of not only co-operation, but in the last decade advocacy on the part of the provinces of a wildlife act at the federal level. Of course, many kinds of wildlife are interrelated in the normal ecological scheme of things. To manage one species in isolation is usually impossible, and of course for this reason a divided jurisdiction between Ottawa and the provinces has been awkward.

Beginning in 1961 at the Resources for Tomorrow Conference, a resolution was passed by the representatives of all levels of government recommending legislation of this kind. The Canadian Council of Resource Ministers in 1965 passed a resolution to the same effect. The bill now before hon. members has been discussed at length with all the provincial administrations responsible for recreation, conversation and protection of wildlife and is endorsed by all ten provincial administrations.

Essentially, this is a bill which, while it permits us to do certain things unilaterally in respect of migratory birds, generally envisages close co-operation with the provinces and in respect to other kinds of wildlife requires the federal government to consult closely with the provinces, and in many instances, unless there is a clear national involvement or concern, to obtain a positive recommendation from the provinces before, for example, buying land on which the management of wildlife can take place, land which is essential for the protection and preservation of a particular species.

There are four major aspects to the bill. The legislation will enable the federal government, (1) to acquire, control and manage lands for migratory bird conservation, interpretation and research. That is a federal responsibility. It will enable the federal government, (2) to acquire, control and manage lands for conservation and interpretation of and research on wildlife species other than migratory birds in co-operation with provincial and territorial governments.

It will enable the federal government, (3) to enter into co-operative arrangements with any province, territory, organization or person for matters of wildlife conservation, interpretation and research, and for the operation of lands and facilities related to wildlife resources, and (4) it will enable it to take any necessary action, in co-operation with provincial and territorial governments, required to protect endangered species of wildlife.

There are a number of species of wild living things in this great half continent of ours which are in serious difficulties. They have been wiped out over large parts of Canada. They include the cougar, the peregrine falcon and the bald eagle in the eastern half of the country, and the California big horn sheep, the whooping crane and the sea otter in the west. The latter which had been wiped out is now, hopefully, being re-established there. The survival of these species in this country is in many ways a matter of national concern and perhaps even a matter of continental and worldwide concern. That is one further reason for including a clause in this bill which relates to endangered species.

The Canadian Wildlife Service has performed many functions, has carried out a great deal of research and has done a great deal of work rehabilitating endangered species. For example, much of the pioneer work in respect of mercury was done by the Canadian Wildlife Service. It was picked up later by the federal fisheries service. The pioneer work done by the Canadian Wildlife Service had a lot to do with heading off a serious mercury problem, both in Canada and in the United States. Not only has the Canadian Wildlife Service carried out a great deal of research but it has published a great deal of informative material. Its personnel are well known. Many of them have international reputations. They have been responsible for a lot of the basic material which has been presented to the public through the media, television and otherwise. This is one of the reason why Canadians, relatively speaking, are well informed about wildlife in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer more specifically to the responsibilities of the Canadian Wildlife Service. With the passage of this legislation it will have control of all wildlife on public lands which have been purchased by or assigned to the government in general and the Department of the Environment in particular. At the request of other federal departments or agencies, the Canadian Wildlife Service will take charge of wildlife research, provide advice, establish facilities, and so on. The wildlife service will continue to act in an advisory capacity to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on the national parks, and more particularly will continue in its provincial-type responsibilities in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon.

Nothing in this legislation should be taken as restricting the rights of our Indian people except on those lands acquired by or assigned to the department by the governor in council. At the request of the Indian people, the Department of the Environment will continue to provide advice and assistance in developing and implementing measures for the wise use of wildlife resources on Indian lands.

Mr. Speaker, this is a short bill. It is a very important bill. I hope it will soon be referred to the standing committee. I know that hon. members will be very interested in many aspects of the Canadian Wildlife Service, in its plans for expansion and indeed in related plans of provincial departments and provincial administrations, plans which are often based on the findings and recommendations of the Canadian Wildlife Service. Our people in the department must be congratulated for the leadership they have shown in this very important field. I trust that this legislation will be passed promptly, because we at the federal level should be showing more leadership in this very important field.

Mr. Barnett: Before the minister concludes his remarks, would he permit me to ask him one question? Could he say a word on the application of this legislation to lands under the administration of the national parks service in respect of the national wildlife resources within the national parks of Canada? So far as I could follow his remarks, he made no reference to that matter in dealing with the various ramifications of this bill with respect to provincial and other agencies.

Mr. Davis: As long as national parks remain under another department, as is the current arrangement under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the direct line of responsibility for management must rest with the parks branch and that department. The Canadian Wildlife Service of the Department of the Environment acts in a consultative or advisory role. The opinion of its experts is always sought in respect of scientific aspects of wildlife preservation and management.

In a sense, the territories and the Yukon administrations are in the same position as provincial governments, where the direct responsibility over species of wildlife and migratory birds rests with the provincial type of administration which we have in the Yukon and the territories.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members appreciate the thinking that has evolved over the years on the question of wildlife, its preservation and relationship to humanity and the web of life. Generally speaking, I believe the House welcomes Bill C-131 which gives a formal federal presence in this very important field of the preservation of endangered species and the control and management of our wildlife resources. I think it is exactly the same as Bill C-191 which was introduced last year and which died on the order paper, but we welcome its reappearance.

As the minister says, the main purpose of the bill is to enable the federal government to carry on what it has been doing under legislation, in a coherent manner with the co-operation of the provinces where that is essential. As the minister said, the care and preservation of wildlife lies primarily within provincial jurisdiction with the exception of migratory birds. In general, the bill is praiseworthy but it needs to be studied in the committee where suitable witnesses can be heard and where the purposes and the methods envisaged can be more carefully explained.

In the past there has been a lack of realization that humanity itself is part of the web of life. Throughout the world in general, even in Canada, we have been experiencing a population explosion of the human species. The balance of nature, if you like, has been upset and the detrimental effect of this imbalance on other species has been accentuated by the fact that the human species is by far the most destructive of the general environment of every species of life there is on this planet, earth.

The destruction of the environment by humans, of course, not only affects humanity's prospects in the future and the quality of life which will be available to it, but it affects other species as well. If any other species suffer extinction this, of course, is detrimental to the quality of life which is available to man. For example, in many areas of the country where certain species of wildlife formerly existed they are no longer found. I think we should not be satisfied with the objective of preventing the extinction in the whole country of the species, but where practical a habitat should be maintained for as many species as possible in as widespread an area of the country as possible.

In my little province of Prince Edward Island many species that were indigenous to the area have been extinct for perhaps a century, such as black bears, bobcats, etc. Unfortunately, in some cases they have been replaced by species introduced by man which are less desirable, such as skunks and racoons which were not native to Prince Edward Island to begin with.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to take much time on this bill because I think the House generally approves of it. I want to commend the minister on the concept of dealing with the provinces in the case of endangered species. As he said, some species that were unique to Canada have been exterminated—the type of walrus that existed in the Gulf of St. Lawrence at one time, for example, and various types of flightless birds which existed in Newfoundland, and there are endangered species such as the Ipswich sparrow whose only habitat is Sable Island.

It is important to preserve these species unique to Canada, but it is also important to preserve species which are endangered in Canada but which may exist in other places and to try to retain species in danger of becoming extinct in some parts of the country where their continuation might be practical. I must confess that I had a special thrill four or five years ago, if I may use a personal incident, when I went for a walk in the woods in winter and found the track of an otter. This mammal was thought to be extinct in Prince Edward Island for many, many years but apparently there are a few survivors.

I think it is sad for Canada when we find that there are fewer whooping cranes, for example, in the whole country than there are Liberals in the House of Commons! I think that is unfortunate, if I may mix metaphors on both scores.

Mr. Davis: It sounds like an argument for more Liberals.

Mr. MacLean: No; for more whooping cranes. I want to say a few words about migratory birds. It has long been recognized that due to their habit, migratory birds are the special responsibility of the federal government and come under the international treaty on migratory birds. In the first instance, migratory birds were thought of chiefly as game birds. Then, of course, concern for birds which had little economic value, such as the whooping crane, came into the concept.

However, I think that as far as the future quality of life in many parts of the country is concerned, more consideration should be given to other types of migratory birds whose chief value is the pleasure they give to people living in a given environment. I do not mean just bird watchers, but people who live almost anywhere and enjoy migratory songbirds living in the same environment. In this regard I think there is perhaps a tendency for government, in trying to take action, to say, "We must acquire the habitat; we must have complete and full control over it". There is a place for that sort of approach, of course. However, I think there may also be a place for another concept under which the federal or provincial governments, acting singly or jointly, could procure easements on privately-owned property in cases where that property happens to be a remaining remnant of a suitable habitation for some type of migratory bird.

I know of woodlots in Prince Edward Island, which are small and are being decimated in many cases, which are the habitat of thrushes. I am sure that if those habitats were destroyed, the birds would be destroyed. In a few exceptional cases of this sort thought should be given to arrangements being entered into between owners of private property and governments so that the habitat of the wildlife concerned will not be destroyed. Some small rental might be paid, for instance, for preserving the habitat in its present form, or similar arrangements might be entered into.

Generally, I commend the minister for the bill. It is not a controversial one. I hope it lives up to the expectations that we all have for it. When the bill goes to committee it will be further studied and there will be a further determination of what can be expected of it.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-131, an act respecting wildlife in Canada, is legislation which is welcomed by our NDP group and will receive our support on second reading. This legislation is long overdue and will be acceptable to most conservation groups in Canada. Many Canadians are surprised to find that although we have had a Canadian wildlife department for many years, there has never been a Canada wildlife act on our statute books.

Bill C-131 again outlines a major problem facing Canadians in the constitutional field. It clearly shows the trouble we are having in an area where there is mixed jurisdiction. This is probably the main reason for this legislation coming in at such a late date. Wildlife resources are primarily under provincial jurisdiction and, while the federal authorities have been co-operating for years in various undertakings, this legislation will tidy up federal operations and I trust will lead to increasing joint ventures with the provinces in wildlife research and conservation.

The section of the bill dealing with agreements between the federal and the provincial governments also includes possible agreements with municipal authorities, organizations and individuals on wildlife research, conservation and interpretation programs and measures. This is a most important feature of the legislation and could result in real benefit to our wildlife resource if carried out in an imaginative and co-operative manner. It could cover a host of projects both large and small, and be a real vehicle in the conservation fight going on throughout the country.

Another interesting aspect of the legislation is that which deals with public participation in wildlife conservation plans. I feel the success of any measures in the wildlife field will depend largely upon the understanding, co-operation and general knowledge of the Canadian public. The legislation indicates that the minister may undertake, promote or recommend measures for the encouragement of public co-operation in wildlife conservation and interpretation. This dissemination of information to the general public can be brought about by initiating conferences and meetings on the problems facing us in the wildlife field.

The legislation indicates that the minister may undertake programs for wildlife research and investigation and establish and maintain laboratories and other necessary facilities for that purpose. It also indicates that advisory committees may be appointed to advise the department on programs and policy. I feel this is a very important aspect of dealing successfully with wildlife conservation problems and trust that something meaningful will come out of this attempt to actively involve the general public in our over-all conservation plans. There is no doubt about the growing interest of Canadians generally in wildlife conservation, and I am pleased to see that an effort will be made to not only promote the need for wildlife conservation but also to utilize the vast amount of practical knowledge which can be contributed by many Canadians who are experts in this field.

May I again bring to the attention of the minister a suggestion which I have raised many times in the House of Commons. It deals with the setting up of an environmental council which is wholly independent of government. The council would report upon environmental problems throughout the country. It would report, without fear or favour, its findings in the environmental field. It would have adequate research facilities and should be in a position to examine government policies, or lack of them, and to indicate where changes should be made. It would be able to propose courses of action and outline areas where priority measures were required and where immediate action should be taken. It would, naturally, deal with many aspects of wildlife conservation and could give guidance to government and the general public alike as to the measures and the cost involved to meet the ever increasing challenge to our valuable wildlife resource.

There is another serious problem facing wildlife conservationists not only in Canada but in practically every country in the world. That is the need to protect endangered species. For too many years governments at all levels have neglected to adequately protect the environment until we have reached the stage where a very large number of animals and birds are on the verge of extinction as a result of our activities. The protection of endangered species is a very complex problem. It involves not only man's encroachment on wildlife habitat and his unwise cropping of certain species, but it involves primarily man's activity in the economic field. We have used the air, the land and the water as receptacles for effluents which come from our factories and industries. Massive amounts of pesticides have been used without adequate research being done to know if they could be safely used. As a result there is an increasing number of endangered wildlife species to be found everywhere, and Canada is no exception.

Some steps have been taken to rectify this situation, but far more money must be poured into research than ever before and more stringent measures must be used to enforce strict environmental controls if these endangered species are to survive. Time is of the essence and I suggest to the minister that this is one of the priorities in the wildlife field. Through man's economic activities we are endangering the very existence of a number of species. It must be obvious that man himself is in danger, for we depend upon similar food chains in our environment for continued existence.

Other members of our group, Mr. Speaker, will be dealing with specific aspects of the legislation currently being debated. Before closing I would like to speak briefly about the wildlife service which will be administering this legislation. There are a number of highly qualified individuals in the wildlife service. I trust the passage of this bill will indicate that the minister intends to increase the staff of this service so that it can adequately handle the many problems facing it in various parts of Canada.

I would first draw to the attention of the minister the lack of full and proper ecological studies being carried out in our Canadian Arctic. We are all aware that certains studies are being carried out by various government departments, chiefly in connection with the proposed oil and gas pipelines from the north. While some useful information will certainly come from these studies, most of them are crash programs designed to test the feasibility of pipelines down the Mackenzie valley. Competent biologists feel that we still have no adequate program of publicly-sponsored fundamental research. This type of research is essential as it will determine the baselines of an ecological system and would assist us in predicting what stresses can or cannot be placed upon it.

I would point out to the minister that most of the current research is going on in the Mackenzie River valley. There are other areas in the north which have never been touched and where there is great need of environmental research of all types. All Canadians know the increasing economic activity being carried on in the north, and I suggest there should be no further delay by any department of government in getting the basic research started for the whole of our valuable northern territories. It will take many years to complete, but it will assist us to avoid the many mistakes which have already been made in several parts of our Arctic territory.

In the report released just over a year ago by the Environmental Protection Board, a so-called independent body of experts, it was stated that Canada's level of ecological research in the Arctic was abysmally low. Their work was carried on primarily in the Mackenzie River valley where, as I previously stated, a number of environmental surveys have been made or are currently going on. If the environmental and ecological research in that area is classed as abysmally low, then it is obvious that the rest of the north continues to be virtually ignored.

I understand that under the department there is the Canadian Wildlife Service's Arctic ecology unit. It was established primarily to monitor how northern activity affects wildlife and to isolate wildlife areas needing special protection. This Arctic ecology unit was set up in 1970 but up until a year ago at least it was a one-man affair. According to a report made by Pollution Probe, in Toronto, in April of last year the scientist in this unit has been so busy keeping an eye on oil companies and their seismic and drilling operations that he has not had much chance to do any short-term let alone long-range ecological studies.

I remind the minister that the complete unit was originally intended to comprise 12 men, which would be the minimum number required to start a proper research program. These individuals must be highly specialized in order to set up and carry out the type of research which is urgently required by Canada in our Arctic areas. I would ask the minister if any additional staff has been added to the Arctic ecology unit this year, and why he has been so slow in staffing this extremely important research unit. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, this bill will help to provide the necessary funds for this type of research which is especially required. May I again urge that priority attention be given to this matter.

This research in the Arctic is closely tied in with this wildlife bill. I am fully aware of the conflicting jurisdiction in the north in so far as both the territorial councils and other federal departments are concerned. On a number of occasions I have pointed out and protested the real lack of authority which the Department of the Environment has over environmental affairs as far as the north is concerned. The chief federal administrative body in the north is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and there is no doubt that the Department of the Environment plays a very secondary role even where matters of conservation are concerned. I consider this a major weakness in our federal environmental administrative structure. It should be corrected.

The need for additional skilled staff in our Arctic ecology unit might be best illustrated by the greatly increased oil and gas mineral exploration which is going on in our Arctic areas. The program is accelerating and there is increasing urgency for basic ecological research to be carried out and evaluated before immense damage is done to our Arctic ecology.

I believe the following quotation from a paper delivered at the Twentieth Alaska Science Conference in 1969 by R. A. Hemstock, the Arctic co-ordinator for Imperial Oil Ltd., clearly outlines the needs of the oil industry in our Arctic areas as of that date. He said:

> In summary, the 470,000 square miles of potential oil lands in the Canadian Arctic will require for development: (a) Extensive geological reconnaissance; (b) reconnaissance and detailed geophysical surveys for a total of 150,000 miles; (c) drilling of 700-1400 exploratory and 6,000-12,000 development wells for petroleum; (d) construction of 4,000 miles of access roads and 4,000 miles of trunk roads based on northern Canada experience of 1 mile of road per well; (e) construction of 8,000 miles of gathering pipelines and many miles of large trunk lines to market or to marine terminals; (f) construction of camp, town, airfields and sport facilities for an additional population of 10,000 oil workers.

This is only part of the program of northern economic development and I have dealt with it in a very general manner. I trust, however, that the Canada wildlife act will be the instrument by which a federal government can initiate research, not only in Arctic areas but in every part of our country, to ensure that future generations will be able to enjoy the wonderful wildlife resource which nature has given to Canadians in abundance and which it is our duty as legislators to try to protect for future generations. In closing, I intend to support the bill on second reading, as will other members of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my party has been accused on a number of occasions of not being constructive in respect of legislation. I do not accept that charge. On this occasion I take great pleasure in supporting this bill. I take a personal interest in this bill because in many respects I feel it is the culmination of the life of a member of my family. The chief migratory birds officer for western Canada during the twenties and thirties devoted his life to the objective that this bill is outlining. I spent many summers in his home, where I saw gathering together that collection of species and other variances which on his death James Alexander Munro gave, and which now reposes in the National Museum of Canada at the foot of Metcalfe Street here in Ottawa. Tribute was paid to him in the form of a plaque. I am very pleased to be able to pay tribute in this House to his memory.

There are other features of the bill with which I should like to deal. I have two comments to make, and I shall be brief. I feel that at last, through clauses 3(b) and 3(e) taken together, the federal authority will have the power to eliminate what is sometimes described as an inhumane trap. I do not know quite what the correct word would be; "inhumane" is not exactly the right word unless we go into anthropomorphology. Perhaps "inanimal" would be a more appropriate adjective. I refer to the claw trap which was used during part of our development.

Now, happily, a new type of trap has been developed in connection with the economic management of the wildlife of our country. It is known as the conibear trap and it permits the taking of animals for their fur in a manner which does not injure the animal to the same extent. The old claw trap which we sometimes used when we were younger, when we lived on the prairies, and which we used to trap gophers and other small animals caused excruciating pain and lingering death to these helpless creatures. Man is able to fend for himself, and he does so, but wildlife is not so fortunate in an environment inhabited or frequented by humans. Therefore, as a mark of civilization I feel we should take certain responsibilities upon ourselves.

In many respects the legislation now brought forward will enable the authorities of this country to protect and manage our resources upon the basis of which, let us not forget it, this country developed. Canada developed through the fur trade and we still profit by the fur trade. But let us accept modern developments in the management of that trade. I believe clauses 3(b) and 3(e) will enable federal and provincial authorities to insist that these resources are carefully controlled not only for economic reasons, the value in dollars produced, but because of their environmental impact.

We hear so much these days about the quality of life. Those of us who have time at this time of the year and a little later in the year might be happy to go out in some of the parks around here and see a phenomenon on which our country stands and has stood from its very beginning—the beavers building their dams. This is one of the delights which those of us who have become overurbanized often forget. Let us not destroy such pleasures. Let us remember that they can be preserved.

My other comment concerns clause 9. I suppose this particular clause was aimed at preserving those migratory animals which spend part of the year in Canada, and I am delighted to see that with shrewd judgment it can be used to do even more. I asked a question in the House on April 16 which hon. members will find reported at page 3328 of Hansard. It concerned the importation into Canada of the pelts of endangered species from Mexico, Brazil and other exotic lands. It was my understanding that some of these pelts were imported into Canada because of the ease with which they could enter this country due to the nature of our tariff policies and our customs regulations. The minister indicated in his reply that Environment Canada had taken a leading role in international discussions on this subject.

Clause 9 will enable those discussions to be even more fruitful and will help prevent this sort of thing happening. I have seen some of the statistics published in the papers concerning the numbers of pelts brought into this country for reshipment to other countries where they can be made into fancy jackets and fancy long coats. This involves the pelts of species which are endangered in the exotic lands. They are noble creatures whose preservation we must seek, and I am happy to see that facilities to ensure such preservation exist in the legislation before us.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Adjournment Debate

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether there is someone in authority on the government side who can say that in the event of this bill passing reasonably early tomorrow, as I expect it will, we shall still be dealing with the fisheries bill and afterward with the CNR bill as recently announced.

Mr. Lang: That is right, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY—OLD AGE RECIPIENTS IN NURSING HOMES—SUGGESTED PROTECTION OF PORTION OF PENSIONS AGAINST RISING RATES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on January 29 I addressed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) concerning the increase in rent imposed upon senior citizens subsequent to, or indeed in some cases prior to the increase in old age security pension payments. The question as it appears in Hansard makes reference to a recent proposal from a number of very prestigious deliberative bodies. This is actually an error. What I referred to was a member of a very prestigious body, namely, the Senate of Canada, referred to frequently in this chamber as the other place. This is an expression whose procedural antecedents are difficult to trace.

Since the question was raised by myself and other members of the House we have heard a statement from the Minister of State responsible for housing (Mr. Basford) to the effect that he had disseminated his views to the proprietors of institutions under federal responsibility—I presume directly or indirectly.

There are many institutions across the land, operated by provincial governments, which have in fact received considerable assistance, as far as their construction is concerned, from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It would seem to me that the concern for the kind of practices to which this question refers may properly be expressed by the Government of Canada because of its practical and helpful involvement through CMHC.

I hope the parliamentary secretary or whoever will reply to me tonight will be able to indicate what has been the outcome of representations made by the minister directly responsible for reporting for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and what his own minister has been able to do in the field of moral suasion.

● (2200)

The plight of our senior citizens is a most serious one, Mr. Speaker. Today's shocking statistics on the rapidly accelerating cost of living, particularly in the field of food at home and housing, should cause grave anxiety to anyone who has concern for the welfare and well-being of the senior citizens of Canada. Indeed, the past decade has constituted a painful assault upon the security of the aged, on those on fixed income and certainly on those in the low and middle-income range.

As I pointed out when I spoke at the time of the introduction of the amendment to the Old Age Security Act, we have been literally taking it out on the older people because they have borne, without adequate relief, the debilitating burden of runaway inflation. As I pointed out, had the actual cost of living been added to the old age security pensions from 1963 on, the figure would be slightly less than $107. Therefore, the increase to $100, while certainly better than the addition of 42 cents a month which was considered adequate before October 30, is in fact something a good deal less than a burst of generosity or a real solution to the struggle of our senior citizens to cope with the reality of today's inflated living costs.

I have reason to believe, from correspondence which I have received from all across the country, that they are again being subjected to new hikes in their rent so great as to leave them really no better off than they were before the passage of the amendment to the Old Age Security Act. I had a letter not long ago from a lady living in a provincially-operated senior citizens' home, or unit, who told me that her rent was to be increased, effective in June, from $46 per month to $102. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, what this sort of increase will do to the life pattern, the life style of a Canadian who has contributed to this our country for decades and who now seeks to live out her closing years with some degree of security and some relief from the anxiety of financial burdens!

It is a sad commentary on our present-day government that while its spokesman in this field, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, can talk of programs of a long-range nature—three, four and five years—the same minister can have such difficulty in grappling with the immediate needs of our senior citizens. The same, indeed, could be said about those who are not senior citizens. What a help it would be if the new family allowance legislation proposal could be put into legislation immediately and a contribution thereby given to many of our people with families who just cannot provide the basic needs of food and shelter for their children. But the earliest on this from the government seems to be January 1, 1974.

The latest figures of the cost of living index have already eroded the increase which the senior citizens received in their April cheques. Something must be done about this. We cannot continue to allow these people to be victimized. A way must be found to protect the senior citizens of this country from further threats to their economic and financial security.

We now use the expression "old age security". Once it was called an old age pension. The newer expression is more euphoneous and perhaps more pleasing. But there is not much security involved if, when the present government provides even a meagre increase—and the most recent pension increase was a meagre one—somebody else immediately takes away the benefit of that increase which the Parliament of Canada voted. This is a shameful, disturbing, distressing, unpleasant and unnecessary situation. I would suggest that careful thought be given to this matter and that in this day of gnawing, nagging, terrible increases in the cost of living a way be found to translate the concern of this House—I trust the House is concerned—into meaningful action to protect such security as our older citizens have the right to expect.

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and the members of this House share the hon. member's concern for the pensioner in this situation, though the rising cost of living presents problems to persons on limited incomes whether or not they are in nursing homes. The federal government has actively encouraged the provinces and has provided financial support under the Canada Assistance Plan to supplement the incomes of pensioners and others who are unable to maintain themselves in relation to their needs.

Under CAP agreements, all provinces provide financial assistance to residents of nursing homes and other types of homes for special care as required to meet their individual costs of maintenance. Federal contributions for this purpose exceed $150 million annually. Other provisions of the agreement concern the shared-cost comforts allowance which the resident may spend as he wishes, as it need not be applied to the regular cost of care.

We must remember that prior to federal cost-sharing many welfare institutions had no comforts allowances. It is encouraging to find more of them now. An approach used by two provinces to date is to cover specified health care costs in nursing homes under provincial health insurance. The resident then pays only a fixed portion of the cost toward the residential cost. Such costs are within the capability of most OAS pensioners and do not fluctuate automatically each time the pension is increased.

The hon. member should know that Ontario has just raised the basic rate from $3.50 per day to $4.00 per day in spite of the federal government's expressed wish that the rate not be increased at the time the pension was increased to $100. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) instructed the authorities in homes under the jurisdiction of CMHC that no such raises would be approved. Finally, it does not appear to be a situation where federal legislation is appropriate, as the matter is clearly under provincial jurisdiction.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO INCREASE BASIC RATE OF DISABILITY PENSION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in the few months he has been in his portfolio has established a good record and has won the confidence of all of us in this House who are interested in the welfare of our veterans. He has to his credit the piloting through this House of a bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act. He also has to his credit the fact that he has made clear to the members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs that he supports the report of the joint study group on the basic rate of the war disability pension.

However, Sir, I confess I am beginning to feel a bit of concern over the time it is taking for the minister to bring to this House a bill to amend the Pension Act to implement the report of that joint study group. I therefore use this "late show" period tonight to raise the matter, not to heap criticism on the minister's head but to let him know that he has the support of this entire House with regard to this matter and also to let him know that we want him to persuade his cabinet colleagues to let him bring in that bill without further delay.

The fact is that on Tuesday, January 9, as recorded in Hansard at pages 88 and 89, the minister said that the report of the joint study group would soon be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. He kept his word. This was done on Thursday, February 15, as recorded at page 1322 of Hansard.

On Friday, February 23, as reported in Hansard at page 1585, the standing committee reported back to the House indicating its endorsation of the recommendation in the report of the joint study group. In the meantime, on Monday, February 19, as recorded in Hansard at page 1432, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) had indicated that the government was simply waiting, so far as war disability pensions were concerned, for the report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

On Friday, March 16, as recorded in Hansard at page 2298, the minister assured me that the legislation would be forthcoming soon. When Wednesday, April 4, came along and it still had not appeared I asked him again, as recorded in Hansard at page 2968, whether we might expect it soon and in particular whether he would try to get it before us before Easter. The minister said that he would try to do so.

However, yesterday, with the Easter recess now over, I questioned the minister again and to my regret he was not able to make quite such a positive statement as to when this bill might come in. If the delay is because the minister is having trouble getting his cabinet colleagues to agree to a recommendation that calls for the basic rate to be tied to certain categories within the public service, I am prepared for him to take a little longer to win that principle. What we do not want is for him to bring in just a dollar figure that leaves unresolved the matter that veterans have been fighting for for 50 years.

This is an extremely important matter. I know the minister's heart and mind are in the right place, and if the trouble he is having is inside that cabinet I hope he can let his fellow ministers know that this House is on his side. Indeed, I ask him to draw the cabinet's attention to an editorial in the May issue of The Legion, the monthly magazine of the Royal Canadian Legion, entitled "Keeping the Faith". The first part of the editorial commends the minister, the government and the opposition on what was done with respect to improvements in the War Veterans Allowance Act. But then the editorial says this:

> We hope the government will soon give evidence of its awareness of a similar responsibility to Canada's war disability pensioners by the establishment of a basic rate tied to an index of salary schedules for unskilled workers in the public service. The joint study group report recommending such a basic rate of pension has been given unanimous approval by the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs and now awaits action by the government in the form of a bill amending the Pension Act. In the past, increases in disability pension rates were nearly always announced simultaneously with increases in war veterans allowances. Consequently disability pensioners are getting concerned about the lack of any announcement of the government's intentions, particularly since their pensions are based on a very special relationship which exists where the individual has served his country and in return was given assurance that compensation would be paid.

I am sure that the sentiment of that paragraph reflects the thinking of the House. I am sure, also, it reflects the thinking of the minister. It is an excellent report that was produced by the joint study group. The Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs was behind it 100 per cent and so is this House. But I hope the minister will soon be able to say that he has won the battle of his life with the cabinet and that he will be able to bring in a bill that relates the basic rate of the war disability pension to selected salary schedules in the public service so that war disability pensioners in the future will not, as they have over the years, slid behind year after year. The minister has our full support and we hope he will give us the right answer soon.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will, of course, not expect me to make any announcement of new policy at this time. I would, however, remind the House that the report on basic rates of pensions was prepared by a joint working group comprised of government officials and of representatives of veterans' organizations. The government has the whole subject under active consideration, and I have already indicated that I shall be happy to inform the House in further detail when I am in a position to do so. I expect this to be quite soon.

I should emphasize that the government has been keeping the Pensions Act, like other items of the veterans' charter, under regular review. Two years ago the government introduced and parliament enacted amendments which were the result of the most thorough review of the Pension Act in the past 50 years.

Just last year at about this time the government introduced budget measures which provided for the automatic increase of pensions in line with changes in the cost of living. Pursuant to this legislation, pensions were increased by 3.6 per cent effective January 1 of this year. A further automatic increase can be expected next January. It will therefore be clear that the government has continued to recognize and fulfil its responsibility under the veterans' charter and I assure the House that we will continue to do so.

HEALTH—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON PROVISION OF CHRONIC CARE IN NURSING HOMES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak of the need for chronic care nursing homes and on the necessity for people who have to go to those homes to be included under OHIP the same as if they went to acute treatment beds in hospital. A witch hunt is being made for someone to blame for rising health costs. There is negligence at both levels of government in not seeing that beds for the chronically ill are available. My sympathy has always gone out to the ill, many of them decrepit, mentally depressed and unable to help themselves. It is for this reason that I am not impressed with the fencing of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and his provincial counterparts. It is surely the responsibility of the federal government to see that health care is universal across Canada.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

That health care costs are getting out of control needs no comment; it is a fact. Citadels of medical teaching and training continue to accord a low priority to the dire need for education in this field. The increased care in and the mounting costs of general hospitals make it imperative for chronic disease hospitals to cope with many complex problems. There should be established fellowship training programs in geriatric medicine, all in the setting of a chronic disease hospital.

How do we reduce the length of stay in hospital? The first thing is to keep people out of hospital. This means that we must have proper facilities in chronic care nursing homes so that patients can be discharged from hospital. Bottlenecks are occurring in hospitals. In my own hospital, bottlenecks are occurring now where people have applied for chronic nursing home care but are still waiting.

Who is going to build the needed chronic care nursing homes? Surely it is the responsibility of the federal government and provincial governments to see that funds are available for private organizations to build them. This should be part of the medicare program and should be shared equally with the federal government.

We can reduce the length of hospital stay by practising preventive medicine and preventing long, disabling illness by treating it before it becomes firmly established. This means that we must have sufficient doctors to do general practice and enough to practice preventive medicine before the illness becomes either acute, or results in a hospital case.

Many people today who are going to the emergency departments of hospitals could in many cases be treated in doctor's offices. Probably only 25 per cent of those appearing in the emergency wards of hospitals today need that type of treatment. The rest could be equally well treated in doctors' offices. To do this it is necessary to obtain an adequate supply of doctors. Medical schools should be operated so that a doctor is graduated in four years instead of six years, which would reduce the overhead costs of graduating a doctor and have him earning money and paying income taxes approximately two years before he would with the horse and buggy course that most medical schools are following today and which are getting us into trouble.

McMaster University now graduates a doctor in three years and other schools in five years, but most in six years. The cost per doctor across Canada varies in many cases. Surely the grants from the federal government should be made specifically on a per capita basis in relation to the number of doctors graduated at the school. This would lead to far more efficiency. Reducing the time of the course would allow a doctor to be in practice two years earlier. It seems to me that a doctor could be given an interim certificate for a period of three to five years and then sent to areas where a doctor is needed for general practice, which would cover a lot of regions in desperate need of doctors.

An incentive could be given to the doctor who goes into these areas by an income tax reduction or other means. You would then have a doctor with far more experience in general practice and of much more value if he became a specialist. He could make up his mind whether he would be a general practitioner and/or a specialist and, faced with these facts, would make a better choice.

Getting people out of hospital is simply one way in which extended care should be available to all patients capable of being discharged and the long wait by chronically ill patients for the necessary accommodation to become available would be reduced. This should be paid for on the same basis exactly as acute care. Both of these points are essential—to get people out of hospital and give them adequate care, and increase the availability of beds when they are ready to be discharged from active treatment hospital beds.

Mr. Speaker, the cost of chronic care or extended care is approximately one-quarter the cost of acute care in a hospital, of which one-quarter is paid by the old age pensions in a chronic care home. This will indicate the necessity of grappling with this problem and solving it in Canada. Surely it is not an insurmountable problem. It is very unfair for the minister and his provincial counterparts to be hunting all over for somebody to lay the blame on, when it is very simple: first you try to get them into hospital for adequate medical care; second, get them discharged as quickly as possible and have chronic care beds waiting. Hospitalization should cover both. Hospitalization and chronic care would cost roughly 25 per cent of what acute care costs. Surely there is a tremendous saving there and this parliament should see that it is done.

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that a federal-provincial conference is being held today to arrive at such an agreement concerning health care costs and cost-sharing. He must know also that it is generally accepted that we must combat the rise in these costs.

A new financing formula was proposed to the provinces in January, and again today, under which payments are to be made on a per capita basis. The annual increase in costs are to be held down to the same level as the yearly GNP increase, rather than the present 13 per cent rate. This new agreement presents a change in emphasis, more toward a global budgeting concept, leaving the provinces the flexibility to decide how to apportion the funds according to the needs of their population. It is understood that basic standards of comprehensiveness, accessibility, universality and portability would have to be maintained.

I should like to add that preventive medicine is already a stated priority of the federal government. Emphasis, on the fitness side, of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the tripling of the fitness and sport budget in the next three years demonstrate this. Also, fitness, sport and recreation have been transferred to the health side of the department, echoing this change in emphasis.

We all share the hon. member's concern about the escalation in costs. We also realize that expensive hospital beds are not the solution. Finally, we hope for agreement from today's conference because the situation warrants immediate action by the federal government and also by the provincial governments.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

Order Paper Questions

MACHINERY REMISSION PROGRAM

Question No. 171—Mr. Rodriguez:

1. What were the names of corporations which received subsidies under the Machinery Remission Program (MACH) in each of the fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73 to date, and what were the amounts of money remitted in each case?

2. What are the objectives of the above Program?

3. Has the department conducted any evaluative study of the Program and, if so, what was the date of the latest report?

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. There are no subsidies granted under the Machinery Program (MACH) as this is a tariff remission program. The Machinery and Equipment Advisory Board receives approximately 18,000 applications for remission of duty annually and it would not be practical to list individually all the approved applications. However, each year the Public Accounts includes a listing of the numbers of the Orders-in-Council which approved remissions under the program, together with the total amount actually remitted under each remission order.

2. The Machinery Program came into effect on January 1, 1968, along with other changes in Canadian tariffs arising from the Kennedy Round. Under the program the duty otherwise payable on machines, accessories, attachments, control equipment, tools and components imported under Tariff Item 42700-1, may be remitted if such goods are not available from production in Canada. In the budget of June 18, 1971, the provisions of the Machinery Program were extended to importations under Tariff Item 41100-1 covering machinery for use in sawmills and logging. The objective of the program is to increase efficiency throughout Canadian industry by enabling machinery users to acquire advanced equipment at the lowest possible cost, while at the same time affording Canadian machinery producers tariff protection on what they manufacture. In addition, Canadian machinery producers are protected by a single statutory rate of duty which applies immediately when they are in a position to supply.

3. Each year, a report of the results of the Machinery Program is published and distributed to manufacturers and users of machinery. The report covers imports of machinery not available from Canadian production, on which duty has been remitted, and which could represent new manufacturing opportunities. It provides a breakdown of the types of machinery being imported, their value and country of origin. The latest report covers imports of machinery during the year 1971.

BILLS DRAWN UP IN 28th PARLIAMENT

Question No. 1,480—Mr. Matte:

1. How many bills were initially conceived and drawn up in French in the last Parliament (28th)?

2. How many bills were introduced by the government and how many were translated from English to French?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): 1 and 2. The Department of Justice has no information regarding the language in which the 252 bills that were introduced by the government in the twenty-eighth Parliament were initially conceived. However, the practice has been for the original draft of a bill to be prepared in the first instance in English, after which a French version of the draft would be prepared for consideration by the legal officers in the French-speaking unit of the Legislation Section. Both drafts would then be considered from the point of view of their implications in relation to the civil law, and from the point of view of whether each version corresponded with the other version accurately. In numerous cases following the consideration of a draft by members of the French-speaking unit of the Legislation Section and following consultation with the English-speaking members, changes were made in the draft, either in the French or the English version, or in both versions. After these changes were made, a final draft bill in fully bilingual form was prepared for review by the Cabinet.

USE OF FIREARMS IN CRIMES OTHER THAN MURDER

Question No. 1,483—Mr. Hueglin:

1. How many cases came before the courts in 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971, 1972 which involved the use of firearms in crimes other than murder?

2. Of the total number of charges laid, how many of those charged were found guilty of the crimes in question and what was the average sentence for use of firearms in commission of a crime other than murder during the same years?

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: Statistics Canada does not collect data on the use of firearms in the commission of other criminal offences, by type of offence unless the use of the firearm was the most serious offence. When several offences are committed by a person, police departments only report the most serious offence committed in each incident. For example, if a person is arrested for breaking and entering and is carrying an offensive weapon, only the breaking and entering would be reported under the Uniform Crime Reporting Program. Also, in reporting the number of persons indicted and convicted of offences relating to offensive weapons and sentences for such, only the most serious offence committed by the person is recorded.

TERMS OF CBC CONTRACT WITH VISUAL EDUCATION CENTRE

Question No. 1,675—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Has CBC negotiated an extension of its contract with the Visual Education Centre and (a) if so, what are the terms of such contract (b) if not, is it the intention of CBC to negotiate further contracts with the Visual Education Centre?

2. What amounts are paid by the Visual Education Centre to CBC for the exclusive distribution rights of material which it enjoys?

3. Does the CBC contract with Visual Education Centre include rights to material produced by provincially-generated educational broadcasts and, if so, what contra-arrangement, if any, is made with the provincial education department concerned?

4. Does CBC negotiate special contracts with (a) actors (b) authors (c) production units for educational type material and, if so, what is the nature of such contracts?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. An extension to CBC's contract with the Visual Education Centre has not been negotiated. (a) The contract runs until April 30, 1974, but there is provision for extension on the agreement of both parties. (b) The decision to extend the term of the Visual Education Centre contract has not yet been considered as between CBC and VEC.

2. CBC has not been required in the past to reveal the terms of contracts where it is in competition with others.

3. The CBC contract with VEC covers programs exclusively owned by CBC. Where another rights holder, such as a provincial department of eduction, has a shared right on the program it would not be released through the Visual Education Centre contract.

4. (a) and (b): In many cases CBC's collective agreements cover the extension of rights to include educational use. In some cases individual negotiation with actors and authors is necessary. (c) In some cases CBC can obtain from production units or companies the right to release a production for school use. In some other cases the production company prefers to retain the right in order to exploit it in the schools itself, and in some cases education rights are not available.

CHANGES IN CALCULATING CONSUMER PRICE INDEX, INDUSTRY SELLING PRICE INDEX AND GENERAL WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX

Question No. 1,708—Mr. Kempling:

What changes have been made to, or contemplated for, the detailed basis of calculating (a) the Consumer Price Index (b) the Industry Selling Price Index (c) the General Wholesale Price Index specifying precisely detailed changes in all procedures, indexes used as a basis and pricing techniques involved in the calculation of each of the indexes specified for each of the months (i) December, 1972 (ii) January, 1973 (iii) February, 1973 (iv) March, 1973?

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: No changes have been made to, or are contemplated for, the basis of calculating the published (a) Consumer Price Index, (b) Industry Selling Price Index, (c) General Wholesale Price Index in any of the months (i) December, 1972, (ii) January, 1973, (iii) February, 1973, (iv) March, 1973. However, Statistics Canada will introduce the next periodic revision of the Consumer Price Index, probably in June, 1973. The base period will remain 1961 = 100, but the expenditure basket will be changed to 1967, replacing the 1957 weights used up to now. The index calculated on the present basis remains the official index for the period up to the introduction of the index derived with the new methodology. As far as the Industry Selling Price Index is concerned, Statistics Canada plans to publish sometime in 1975 a new series of industry price indexes from 1971 forward, calculated on a 1971 time and weight base, and aggregated within the framework of the 1970 standard industrial classification. Regarding possible changes contemplated for the computation of the General Wholesale Price Index, a start has been made in the development of a new system of commodity indexes that will be designed to measure price change of all commodities traded below the retail level. This set of series will probably be developed from 1961 forward, but the timing, completion and publication will depend on the resources available for this work. Whenever there is a revision in the methodology of computing price indexes, it has been, and it remains, the policy of Statistics Canada to (a) document, in published form, all details explaining such a revision in methodology; (b) and to publish comparisons of the revised and the unrevised series for a period of overlap, in order to show what the changes in a series would have been using either the unrevised or the revised methodology. The period of overlap refers to past months or years, depending on the availability of price data defined in terms of the revised methodology but relating to past periods.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: No changes have been made, nor are anticipated, in the basis of calculating the published (a) Consumer Price Index; (b) Industry Selling Price Index; (c) General Wholesale Price Index; in the twelve-month period prior to and including March, 1973. However, see also reply to question 1,708.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Question No. 1,715—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. Is the Canadian Wheat Board financed through votes in the estimates?

2. Do grain producers make any contribution to its financing?

3. What is the annual budget of the Board for the current fiscal year?

[Translation]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): 1. No. The Canadian Wheat Board Act does provide that the government will pay deficits in the board's pool accounts for wheat, oats and barley when the returns from the market, less marketing costs, are insufficient to cover the initial payments established by the government. Since the board's inception in 1935 there have been three deficits in the barley pool account, two deficits in the oats account and one deficit in the wheat account. The government also pays storage charges under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act on Canadian Wheat Board Stocks of wheat in commercial storage in excess of 178 million bushels.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report of the Board of Inquiry into damages done to HMCS Restigouche during refit.

Hon. ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RATE OF INFLATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that prices rose almost twice as much last month as was the case a year ago, with accelerating increases in such essentials as food, housing and clothing, and given the fact that the government has said it rejects the conventional idea of slowing down inflation by tightening up the money supply, and has rejected the idea of any sort of incomes policy, can the minister tell us whether this rate of inflation is satisfactory to the government and, if not, what the government intends to do about it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, of course it is not satisfactory to any member of the House. The government has already acted to increase the disposable income available to Canadians by our last budget measures through the reduction of income tax, the elimination of the sales tax on food and non-alcoholic beverages, by reducing the tariffs on $1,300 million worth of goods, and by agreeing to set up a food prices review board. The government will continue to watch this situation very closely.

INCREASE IN CLOTHING PRICES—INQUIRY AS TO GUIDELINES AND MEASURES TO COMPENSATE—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH INDUSTRY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs concerning the increase in clothing prices. In light of the 1.4 per cent increase last month and expectations of even sharper increases in clothing prices in the months ahead, has the minister or the government formulated any guidelines for clothing prices this year and any measures to avert or compensate for escalating clothing prices in this very essential area?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, any new policy in this area will be announced in the House in the usual manner.

Mr. Lawrence: Has the minister made any inquiry of the clothing industry about their price intentions, and does the government find their intentions to be acceptable? If not, is the minister now going to at least meet with them on this important subject?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I have not made any specific inquiries. I try to keep informed about the situation, and I will be happy to take the hon. member's suggestion under consideration.

PROPOSED PRICES REVIEW BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO INVITATIONS TO SERVE AS MEMBERS

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In replying to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition on Monday the minister said that no trouble was being experienced in finding people to serve on the Prices Review Board but that the work of identifying potential members had not been completed. May I ask the minister whether any people have yet been specifically asked to serve on this board and have they agreed?

[Mr. Gillies.]

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have made no specific requests or invitations yet. I am still discussing with my colleagues who the appropriate personnel should be.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, in that case I should like to ask the minister how he can assure the House that there is no trouble finding people to serve on the board if in fact he has not yet asked anybody to do so?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that my answer is quite consistent with what I said the other day. One cannot say there is trouble in finding people until one approaches someone and that person indicates an unwillingness to serve.

Mr. Hees: There is a Martinesque statement if ever I heard one.

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF DISCOUNT ON RETAIL PRICE OF GOODS—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the increase in the cost of living and the continuous inflation, would the Prime Minister consider enacting payment of a discount on the retail price of goods, in agreement of course with Canadian retailers, and this in order not to resort to a freeze of prices and salaries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to look into the matter to ascertain whether the government, within the framework of its constitutional authority, would have the power to take such action.

INCREASE IN FOOD AND SHELTER COSTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING IMPLEMENTATION OF CONTINGENCY PLAN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. May I ask the minister if the government now finds the present rate of increase in food costs and shelter costs unacceptable and, if so, can he tell the House whether the government has agreed on a contingency plan and whether that contingency plan will be implemented if prices continue to increase?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. gentleman frames his question in terms of the rise in food prices, which affects all of us in this country, I must respond to him by saying that a system of price and wage controls would not solve that problem. It has not been solved by any prices system in the United States or the United Kingdom. The problem of food is a problem of world shortage of basic commodities—coffee, grains, meat and so on.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East for a supplementary and then try to complete the first round of questions.

Mr. McGrath: If the present trend of increases in the cost of living continues, will the government implement its contingency plan?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, both the preamble to the question and the substance of the question are hypothetical.

Mr. Baldwin: So is the contingency plan.

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS TO PROVINCIAL FINANCE MINISTERS TO REDUCE HEALTH COSTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Finance would have made a statement on motions informing the House as to the conference that took place yesterday. In the absence of that, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the federal government made any proposal to the conference for improvements in the health delivery system for the purpose of reducing health costs, or was the federal government's proposition limited to financial haggling with the provinces?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I missed the last words of the question.

An hon. Member: Was there haggling?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member please repeat the last part of his question?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister whether the federal government made any proposals with regard to a new, changed or improved health delivery system to reduce the costs of health care, or whether the federal proposal was limited to financial haggling or negotiations, if you like, with the provinces?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the government's offer to the provinces was of course related to financing of health services, but its specific purpose was to introduce much greater flexibility, enabling provinces to improve their services and also to control the increase in health costs.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary may I ask the minister exactly what proposals the federal government made that would assist the provinces in reducing their health care costs, or was it simply the federal government's intention to pull out from under the escalating health costs despite the fact that the provinces were introduced into the scheme by a federal law?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the fact that we were making an offer that, even according to the projections of costs made by the provinces, would result in about $1.1 billion more for the provinces over the next five years, should show that the federal government was not trying to get out of this, but was trying to ensure better service to the Canadian population in this field.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact it is obvious to anyone that that kind of settlement with the provinces cannot in any way control costs within the provinces and that costs may go up away beyond the offer made by the federal government at any given time, no matter which government is involved or at what time, and in view of the fact the escalation in health costs is the result of increased and excessive doctors' incomes and other incomes and the unavailability—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is running short of time. Perhaps he should ask the question. We have to make some progress.

Mr. Lewis: As I say, it is also due to the unavailability of alternative health homes for people who now occupy hospitals. I want to ask the minister whether the federal government has made a study of health costs with a view to installing in Canada some new form of health delivery?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, there have been several such studies made, in particular the study on community health centres that was made public last year. Once more, the whole gist of the federal offer was to answer the problem raised by the provinces to the effect that the present system favoured the development of acute care hospital beds and medical treatment. The whole gist of our offer is to make sure that the provinces will have all the flexibility they need better to control costs, but the control of costs is their responsibility.

HEALTH CARE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT UNIVERSALITY, PORTABILITY AND QUALITY WILL BE MAINTAINED

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the haggling over health costs, which are 4 per cent lower than the government's cost of operation, between the federal minister and his counterparts, can the minister give an assurance that there will not be any sacrificing of the principles of universality and portability or the quality of health care across Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the assurance that has been very clearly given all during these negotiations with the provinces is to the effect that the basic standards of comprehensiveness, accessibility, universality and portability would have to be maintained under any new scheme of health financing. As far as the rest is concerned, our proposals are aimed at giving the provinces all the flexibility they need in this area to do whatever they feel is appropriate to control costs and provide better services.

EDUCATION

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING SUPPORT FOR UNIVERSITIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Sepaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State on another aspect of yesterday's conference. Will the minister state for the university community that the federal government has no intention of withdrawing from its undoubted national and constitutional responsibility for funding post-secondary education, despite any frustrations felt from yesterday's meeting?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the proposal I put forward yesterday on behalf of the federal government, which was received with such widespread support from the provinces, does in fact reflect the commitment of the federal government to continue the support characteristic of the past for post-secondary education. If the particular formula I offered yesterday is not acceptable, we are quite willing to revert to the continuation of the present scheme which seems to meet with more favour from some provinces.

HEALTH

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL CARE—INQUIRY AS TO GUARANTEE IN PROPOSALS TO PROVINCES THAT FEDERAL GOVERNMENT WILL PAY HALF THE COST

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is there anything in the proposals he placed before the provinces which will guarantee to the provinces that half the cost of providing hospital and medical care will be borne by the federal government?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I will have to refer the hon. member to the documents that have been tabled today by the Minister of Finance and which were put before the conference. I think they will show that there is no such guarantee with regard to two specific programs. However, as I said, we have used the provincial projections of cost over the next five years and the offer we made arrives at a result that is $1.1 billion more favourable to the provinces than the continuation of the present scheme. Therefore I do not think we should have too many fears in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A considerable number of members are seeking supplementaries on this subject. I bring to the attention of hon. members that we have not yet concluded the first round of questioning. In fairness, I think the Chair should be allowed to recognize—the hon. member for Témiscamingue, after which, if hon. members so desire, we shall return to consideration of this matter.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

[English]

For the moment, I think the Chair should recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REPRINT OF GOVERNMENT'S WORKING PAPER

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare a question which is not necessarily related to the debate that has just taken place.

Since certain members rushed to pick up the working paper on social security in Canada after it was tabled in the House, can the minister tell us if additional copies will be made available to the public, which has asked for them?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to note that there is still interest in that paper and I have ordered a new printing so that hon. members may have as many copies as they wish.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPORT THAT SOVIET EMBASSY STAFF MEMBERS OBTAINED ACCESS TO SECRET REPORTS IN EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the Prime Minister's homily on espionage the other day, I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not two staff members of the Soviet Union's Ottawa embassy entered the east block of the parliament buildings very recently, waited until the security guards were looking the other way, raced upstairs, asked for top secret reports in the room in which they are kept, had turned over to them reports from Moscow which they asked for, and at the end of two hours, having read them, thanked those in charge and left?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the paraphrase of the article in the Toronto Star that I also read. There is no substance to the report whatever.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the report was by Mr. Reguly of whom a former government had the same view when he made a statement. Has he been communicated with to find out whether or not the statement he made, as reported in the Toronto Star in detail, is correct? What has been said to him? Has the minister been in touch with any of the officials who advise they are most embarrassed by what did not take place?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member will understand that after this report appeared in the Toronto Star there was very great concern that there might be some foundation to the story.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: Therefore, most careful inquiries were made, and as far as we can ascertain there is no foundation whatsoever to the story.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question follows the question put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert but it is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Considering the debate that took place in the House yesterday on security matters, can the minister explain why confidential matters from his department are brought to my attention?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, I cannot, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—POSSIBILITY OF WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN PERSONNEL FROM CONTROL COMMISSION IN LIGHT OF FURTHER ATTACK

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs also. In light of a report in today's newspaper of a further attack on Canadian ICCS troops, may I ask the minister whether this incident is enough to convince the Canadian government that the time has now come to get out of Viet Nam?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I only heard the report on the radio this morning and we have not had a direct report from Saigon. This is another deplorable incident, if it is true, as I expect it is. As I said in reply to a similar question the other day, this is accummulating evidence that we will have to balance when we make our decision.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): May I ask the minister how many more Canadian lives it is going to take before he abandons this disastrous role?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I answer this question by repeating what I said in commenting on the tragedy when Captain Laviolette was killed, that the problem is not how many Canadians might be killed. There are always risks involved in any operation of this kind. The test is whether there is anything useful being done as a result of our activities there.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON CERTAIN FORECLOSURES BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I put a similar question recently to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who is responsible for housing. In light of the fact that a number of foreclosures are now being proceeded with by CMHC where the equity of the owner is substantial, in some cases as high as $10,000 and the arrears are less than $400—I have examples—and since instructions that take place have not only been issued but foreclosures are taking place in such cases, would the Prime Minister consider imposing a moratorium on this kind of foreclosure, particularly when the cost of housing this last month went up 6 per cent over the same period last year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire into the allegation and see whether the hon. member's question can be answered.

Mr. Woolliams: When the Prime Minister is investigating this matter, would he look into the case of certain legal firms in Canada that were appointed on a straight patronage basis and where the amount of arrears on the mortgage was $358 and the legal bill to collect that amount of money was $597? I can understand my socialist friends being worried because they are the highest paid counsel for the labour unions.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SENDING HOME OF DEAD INDIAN CHILD IN CARDBOARD BOX—UNAUTHORIZED AUTOPSY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the shocking revelation yesterday that the body of an Indian baby, Belinda Manybears, who died in an Edmonton hospital, was sent home to the mother in a cardboard box and also that an unauthorized autopsy was performed on the body, and bearing in mind the clearcut responsibility of the federal government for the Indian people, has the government investigated this incident and, if so, can the Prime Minister tell us what action is being taken?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me to answer, this question has already been the subject of an investigation and everything seems to indicate that it comes under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. The Alberta Minister of Health has himself stated that he was making a thorough investigation on the matter.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the fact that three other incidents were also revealed yesterday in one small Alberta community, and in view of the fact that an Indian spokesman said this morning that there may be others as well, is the federal government taking action to ensure that nothing like this will occur in the future?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, we will certainly communicate and, in particular, with my colleague from the province of Alberta on this matter.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR EARLY INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO INCREASE FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the aftermath of yesterday's collapsed dominion-provincial conference and in an effort to take some steps to counter the seriously accelerating rise in the cost of living, will the minister give consideration to bringing in immediately his measure to increase family allowances, the legislative expedition of which my party has pledged itself to already?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated many times, we are trying to introduce this bill in the House as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask the minister whether in light of the serious increase in the cost of living he and his very important department are taking any steps to ameliorate the effects of this shocking increase?

Mr. Lalonde: The question not only affects my very important department; it also affects my very important provincial colleagues with whom I have to consult and work in this respect.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT QUALITY OF MEDICAL CARE WILL BE MAINTAINED

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, following the remarks by the hon. member for York South, which I cannot accept—

Some hon. Members: Split!

Mr. Railton: —and knowing that the majority of illness cannot be prevented and must be skillfully treated, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to reassure me that his department is spending enough on maintaining quality medical care and not spending its money entirely on preventive medicine?

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): If my hon. friend would look at the estimates of my department, the total cost of medical care and hospital insurance will clearly indicate that these two programs still eat up a very substantial part of the funds allocated to health care in this country.

MEDICAL CARE—REQUEST FOR FULL PARTICIPATION BY REPRESENTATIVES OF TERRITORIAL COUNCILS IN FUTURE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the people of the north, not forming part of the provinces, are very concerned about medical and health care, as are other Canadians, can the minister assure those living in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories that at future federal-provincial conferences they will be invited, through their elected territorial councils, to take part as full participants rather than attending merely as observers?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I do not think that, with regard to conferences dealing with health matters, I could differ from the procedure prevailing at all other federal-provincial conferences; on this question, the matter does not come under my jurisdiction.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last spring, the right hon. gentleman promised residents of the Toronto region that he would cancel the Pickering airport development if more than 50 per cent of the people in Metro Toronto were opposed to it. Since the NDP last night in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications voted to give the government support for money to push ahead with this project—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might ask his question directly without reference to proceedings in a committee. It might be easier, at least from a procedural standpoint and from the point of view of the Chair, if the hon. member could ask his question directly.

Mr. Atkey: Very well, Mr. Speaker. In these circumstances is the Prime Minister prepared to treat this NDP support as indisputable evidence of public opinion in Toronto being in favour of the airport or would he consider taking into account the recent public opinion poll published—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PAY OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL ON VIET NAM SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. As the Treasury Board has not yet taken any action on the very logical and fair request by Canadian Armed Forces personnel serving in Viet Nam for increases in their special allowances to bring those allowances up to a level comparable with those paid to External Affairs personnel serving in the same area, will the minister advise the House when the government intends to take action on this request and, in so doing, preserve the principle of equal pay for equal work in which it professes to believe?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The present scale of pay and allowances for the military in relation to the civil side of the public service was arrived at after a study lasting a year and a half designed to produce this kind of over-all equivalence. On an over-all basis it was found that the military service suffered a balance of disadvantage as compared with the civilian employees of the order of about 3½ per cent. Consequently, military pay and allowances were set at about 3½ per cent higher in general than those of civilians. The military pay and allowance system is structured on the basis of peace-keeping operations which carry a higher operations risk component than civil foreign service, and this is rather unusual for people in the foreign service class who have not entered into military service. Consequently there are special allowances for civilians in respect of Viet Nam.

An hon. Member: Would you mind repeating that?

Mr. Hees: Since one man's life is just as important as any other man's life when serving his country, would the minister consider taking another look at this matter and giving our armed services personnel a fair break as they have very logically requested?

PROPOSED NEW TANKER ROUTES ON ATLANTIC COAST—CONVENING OF MEETING BETWEEN OIL INTERESTS AND FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister taken any steps to convene a meeting between the oil interests and the fishing industry, especially the lobster fishing industry, before the establishment of new tanker routes along the Atlantic coast? If so, when can we expect a report on the areas to be covered by these new routes?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, I am supposed to have summoned all parties interested in lobster fishing. I am not aware that the department has issued such a summons.

PROPOSED NEW TANKER ROUTES ON ATLANTIC COAST—CONSULTATION BETWEEN DEPARTMENTS OF TRANSPORT AND FISHERIES ON EFFECT ON FISHING

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question bears on that raised by the hon. member for South Shore and is also directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that a meeting is going on today in Halifax at the call of officials of his department, can the minister assure the House that consultations have already taken place between officials of his department and those of the Department of Fisheries with respect to the effect these proposed tanker routes will have on fishing activities and on the lives and safety of fishermen in the area concerned?

[Later:]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, senior officials from my department are participating in these meetings. It is certainly not my department which decides what routes the oil tankers must follow, especially as regards pollution. INCREASE IN STRUCTURAL STEEL PRICES—REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the serious consequences to the construction and manufacturing industries which will result from the increase in structural steel prices announced yesterday by the major producers, and in view of the fact that profits of the steel companies showed an increase this year compared with last year of more than 60 per cent, would the minister consider discussing with the steel companies the maintenance of the current price level and the forgoing of this unconscionable new price increase?

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE LOCATION OF HEAD OFFICE IN VANCOUVER

Mr. Douglas Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the government of Canada prepared to use its authority as the sole shareholder of the Canada Development Corporation to ensure that the corporation's head office is located in Vancouver as promised?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure the Minister of Finance heard my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: He heard it all right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: And you are going to hear about it too.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I heard the question, Mr. Speaker, but I was just waiting to see whether you would allow me to respond.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: And hoping he would not.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): By statute the decision as to where the head office of the Canada Development Corporation should be located is a decision for the board of directors. I have, however, made it clear to the president and chairman of the board of the Canada Development Corporation that the government favours locating the head office of the corporation in western Canada.

An hon. Member: How far west?

Mr. Hees: That's not going to be enough.

Mr. Nielsen: I live in the most western city in Canada.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FORT ALEXANDER RESERVE—NON-ATTENDANCE OF CHILDREN AT SCHOOL—PROVISION OF ADEQUATE FACILITIES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I should like to direct this question to his parliamentary secretary. As school children on the Fort Alexander Indian reservation in Manitoba have not been attending school since last Friday and have only been attending half time since March 6 because of the lack of facilities and school space, and as we have contacted the department on a constant basis over the last week, will the minister now direct officials of his department to provide adequate school facilities for the children on that reservation?

[Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay).]

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there really are some policy decisions involved in this question which will require me to take it as notice. I do like to give complete answers but I will take it as notice and bring it to the hon. minister's attention when he returns tomorrow. We are very much aware of the situation at Fort Alexander and we have taken measures to correct certain things that we could correct. There is still a shortage of proper building facilities in certain areas, particularly at the north end. There are some very good and adequate facilities at the south end. We did take measures to correct the water situation in the north end. There were some problems with the water there, but recent tests have shown that the water system has been totally rectified. The coliform counts are now low and satisfactory. We have taken some measures—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was going to say that I was pleased the hon. member did not have an answer, but that might have been unfair to him.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary. Will the department relay that information to the leaders of the Indian band at Fort Alexander and convince them that it is so?

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

SEIZURE OF MANITOBA EGGS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—ACTION BY NATIONAL FARM MARKETING COUNCIL

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since at this time we appear to be seeing the unfolding of another chapter of the so-called chicken and egg war, I shoulk like to ask the minister whether or not the National Farm Marketing Council has taken any positive action in respect of the seizure of Manitoba eggs in the province of British Columbia? If so, what does the national council intend to do about this, and will we see a move toward the free interprovincial movement of products in Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have talked with the chairman of the National Farm Marketing Council who has been in touch with the president of the egg marketing group. I have asked him to make sure that harmonious relations are rebuilt if they are showing signs of breaking down, because I feel it is most important that they work together for the betterment of all egg producers in Canada.

Mr. Murta: In view of the minister's reply and as it seems that at the present time the council is not acting with any kind of force or determination in the matter, I should like to ask whether this very serious problem will go to the courts if it cannot be solved by the council, and, if so, will this not partially destroy the credibility of the National Farm Marketing Council in respect of future negotiations?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that many of these people on the different provincial boards and the national board seem reasonable and responsible, and I am sure they will come to some happy conclusion.

[Later:]

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to that posed by the hon. member for Lisgar to the Minister of Agriculture regarding the chicken and egg war between Manitoba and British Columbia. Has the minister ascertained whether or not Manitoba producers had in fact overproduced their quotas and, if not, has the marketing council some authority to demand compensation for the eggs that were sold as broken eggs in British Columbia?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a detailed report from the chairman of the National Farm Marketing Council. I think this falls within his duties and authority under the legislation. I have not received that report yet, but I will inform the hon. member and the House as soon as the report is submitted to me.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): The minister has expressed a desire to lower food prices and tariffs between Canada and the United States. Is he making every effort to lower tariffs between the provinces in order that we may have lower food prices in Canada?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, my main concern is to see that the producers of eggs and the consumers get a fair deal.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): You should make sure that the producers in Manitoba get a fair deal.

Mr. Whelan: That has been the aim and drive of the marketing board in respect of eggs or any other product that may come within its jurisdiction.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member a definite date, but I expect that the bill will be introduced well before the end of the current session.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. NATIONAL SECURITY

REPORT THAT SOVIET EMBASSY STAFF MEMBERS OBTAINED ACCESS TO SECRET REPORTS IN EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, since the question that I intended to ask has already been asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, I should like to ask a supplementary. In view of the fact the Secretary of State for External Affairs told the House a moment ago that there is no foundation to reports that members of the Soviet embassy staff entered the east block and examined confidential documents, I would ask the Solicitor General if the reason the government does not know anything about such an incident is that the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group, which we have been told is responsible for the security of government buildings, was too occupied otherwise investigating and compiling information on certain Canadians including members of this parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton East. The minister rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Allmand: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have stated to the House on several occasions that the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group in my department does not investigate Members of Parliament or anybody else.

An hon. Member: What do they do?

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member resume his seat. Is the hon. member rising on the question of privilege?

Mr. Cossitt: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In reply to the minister on the same question of privilege, he stated that his group does not do these things. I think it is about time the minister gave the House a complete and full explanation of what his group does do.

USE OF VEGETABLE PROTEIN IN PROCESSED MEAT PRODUCTS—CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER OF HEALTH ON ISSUANCE OF TRADE INFORMATION CIRCULAR

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has he consulted his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, regarding the issuance of a trade information letter on the use of vegetable protein used in particular in processed meat products?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, officials of our two departments have been in contact about this.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that we have reached the end of the question period. Perhaps the hon. member might ask a supplementary question, following which I will recognize the hon. member for Nickel Belt and perhaps another questioner.

Mr. Hales: Has agreement been reached between the two departments concerning the wording on the lable to be used on such products as superburgers, etc.?

Mr. Gray: This is being discussed between the two departments, and obviously when the trade information circular is released it will indicate the agreement in question.

LUMBER SHORTAGE AND INCREASED COST—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the demand for Canadian lumber in Japan and the United States and the shortage in Canada, with escalating costs to Canadian consumers over the past year, is the minister aware of the situation and what does the government intend to do about it?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the matter of export controls comes under the jursidiction of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I believe he answered a question about this yesterday.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lethbridge will be recognized, and then I will have to call orders of the day. Perhaps we can pursue the matter raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt tomorrow in priority to other matters.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—NOTICE REQUIRED FOR CANADIAN WITHDRAWAL FROM CONTROL COMMISSION

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that in a statement in the House on May 7 regarding ICCS the minister stated that Canadian participation would continue until the end of this month, can the minister state whether Canada is not in fact bound by agreement to give 90 days notice regarding withdrawal and in reality we must participate at least until the end of August regardless of the decision taken on May 30?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is no. As I explained in the House on several occasions, we made a specific reservation on that point.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Is the hon. member for Scarborough West rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Harney: My point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, has to do with the remarks contained in the question of the hon. member for St. Paul's which you quite appropriately ruled out of order on the grounds that it reflected on a vote in a committee. Nevertheless, it is a matter of record in the House and in the minds of the public that he has alleged that my party voted in favour of the Pickering airport last night when the matter came up in the estimates. That is not at all the case. We voted against his motion. I myself am still opposed to the Pickering airport, and I think this matter should be made clear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member for St. Paul's kindly resume his seat. I will recognize him in a moment. The point raised by the hon. member shows the difficulty by importing into our debates the proceedings in committees. We might go on for some time, I suppose, trying to ascertain what happened exactly in a committee of the House and why certain members of the committee voted in one way rather than another, which shows the difficulty and the danger of bringing into the debates in the House the debates and proceedings in committees. That is why I thought I had to rule the original question out of order. I would hope there would be no further debate on the point.

Mr. Atkey: I rise on the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate fully the comments you have made. There was not in any way any attempt to rehash the matter before the committee last night.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Atkey: The result in the committee last night did change substantially the position of the government in view of public statements made by the Prime Minister. Also, I think I should clarify, for purposes of the allegation made by the hon. member for Scarborough West, the fact that my motion said that they have given the government support for the money to push ahead with the project.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Atkey: Those were my words, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

• (1500)

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order, as House leader for our party.

We have had numerous meetings with other parties to discuss setting up offices and secretariats in ridings. Agreements had been concluded, serious discussions had taken place and we had arrived at conclusions. Now that the House has resumed its business, it seems that everything has been upset and nothing is operating anymore.

My point of order is to ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) if the deals that are taking place now are serious and what they are specifically, since I have no other means to find out what has been said during the parliamentary leaders' meetings.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises this matter as a point of order. It is a question that could have been asked during the oral question period; I have no objection, providing the House gives its consent, against it being asked to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), providing we eventually come to the business of the House.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to discuss the matter privately with my hon. friend because most of the discussions have been conducted in that manner and I hesitate to break that practice at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to ask a second question?

Mr. Fortin: I rise again on a point of order.

It is precisely there that lies the problem. Those discussions were held in camera but when we reach the House matters are different. Once and for all things should be done in public and we should not be afraid to provide the Canadian people with an adequate service. Anyhow, we are in 1973.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Boniface is rising on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I think my point of order is very important because it relates to the discussion on the various points of order and questions of privilege that came before Your Honour a few moments ago. I would like to say that the hon. member, when speaking to his motion which was defeated last night in the committee, made it very well known in the committee that his motion did not preclude that he was against the Pickering Airport—

Mr. Speaker: Order please, I call on the co-operation of hon. members. I think that nothing at all can be gained by raising alleged questions of privilege and alleged points of order during the question period. I call orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA WILDLIFE BILL

PROVISION FOR RESEARCH AND CONSERVATION AGREEMENTS, CONTRIBUTIONS TO COSTS AND PURCHASE, ACQUISITION OR LEASE OF LANDS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Davis that Bill C-131, respecting wildlife in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-131 which recognizes the responsibility of the Government of Canada to protect our heritage in this nation in terms of wild animals and other resources that were here prior to our coming, some of which have almost disappeared. This bill recognizes, also, that it is important that, if we are to justify our occupation of this half of the North American continent we must look after those things that are naturally here, so that they will be available for our children, our grandchildren and those who come after us who will develop and make Canada the great land that it has the capacity to become.

I commend the minister for the suggestion in this bill that the Canadian Wildlife Service will extend its work in research and pathology in connection with toxic substances and other matters affecting wild animals and wildlife generally. I hope the minister will deal with the serious question of trapping. I have received many letters from young children in my riding decrying the use of the leg-hold trap in the taking of wild animals by trappers and others, decrying the injuries caused to animals whose legs are torn off or they are trapped in these devices and suffer for days before their frozen bodies are picked up and taken to be skinned. We have now developed the Conibear trap, but even with it I understand there are problems in that it is heavy to move around and sometimes the effect of this trap, which is supposed to kill wild animals instantaneously, results in the whole of their face being mutilated. We need an investigation or inquiry into new forms of trapping that will not be as injurious to animals as the existing devices.

The work done by the minister in connection with migratory birds has been excellent. I hope that in developing the thesis behind this bill he will extend this conservation work to other forms of migratory animals, indeed to animals of the high seas in the northern part of Canada where sometimes it is difficult to know whether we own land or sea.

I commend the minister for bringing this whole matter to the attention of the House of Commons, but having inspected the bill I find that it is one the most loosey-goosey pieces of legislation to come before the House for some time. It gives the minister powers. It provides that he "may" do all sorts of things. He may undertake, promote and recommend measures; he may initiate conferences; he may undertake programs of research; he may establish advisory committees; he may co-ordinate and implement; he may take charge of this or carry out measures with respect to that. There is only one place in the bill where it says the minister "shall" do anything. That is in clause 11, which provides that the minister shall spend wisely money given to him, in accordance with the provisions laid down when it is given to him.

What we are really doing in this legislation is giving the minister authority to conduct almost any kind of program that he wishes. The minister can go charging off in one direction one day; the next day he can determine that that is not his priority and go charging off in another direction. At no time is he under any obligation to come back to the House of Commons and say what the priorities should be and where the limited amount of social capital available should be used in promoting and doing something for the preservation of wildlife.

I think it is high time we established some mandatory priorities. The minister should bring legislation before the House in which he says, "Members of Parliament, I want to do certain things and these are my priorities. These are the wildlife species I want to preserve. This, Members of Parliament, is the problem and this is specifically what I am asking you to authorize me to do." But legislation in this loosey-goosey fashion is not fair to the House and is not fair to the people of Canada.

There are provisions in the bill under which agreements can be made with the provinces for joint undertakings and agreements can be made with private organizations, with the permission of the provinces. I think it is proper that the minister should have permission to make certain agreements but we must ask, what kind of agreements? Agreements to do what; to preserve what? To say "just to preserve wild animals," in the total picture, is not definitive enough. It does not specifically set out to the House what the minister is really going to do. What we have is motherhood legislation. Wild animals are popular, it is nice to have a bill on wildlife, so we have a nice bill on wildlife that does not say a darn thing.

There is one problem that really disturbs me about this bill. It comes with clause 13, which provides that the governor in council may make regulations prohibiting certain things, specifying measures, and so on. The clause 14 reads:

Every person who violates any provision of this act or the regulations—

Mr. Speaker, there are no compulsory or mandatory provisions in the bill, so clause 14 must mean regulations.

—is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

What we have is criminal law introduced with criminal sanctions upon summary conviction, without even the regulations, rules or even the aims and objects of the regulations and rules brought before the House of Commons. The minister may make a regulation, he may even make a regulation to cover something that happened in the past, and the person who broke that regulation would be guilty of an offence and subject to punishment upon summary conviction. This kind of thing should not appear in legislation; it is the type of activity that should be stricken from this bill. If the minister has rules and regulations and if they are to carry with them penal results, they should be set out in detail so that the people of Canada know what laws they are likely to break.

I want to make some suggestions with respect to this bill, Mr. Speaker. I think it should set out in detail the extent of federal government involvement in the preservation of wildlife. It should set out in detail to what extent it is a matter of federal authority and to what extent the federal government is looking to the provinces, the counties and the territories of Canada to do their part under the legislation.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, federal responsibility clearly encompasses those animals and birds subject to large migration, and in particular migration across provincial boundaries. That may well apply to the caribou herd and presumably it applies to whales in our inland seas. It may well apply to other animals and birds with which I am not too familiar, although I am sure the minister has in his department people who are familiar with them.

The whole question of wildlife in the territories should be brought under this legislation. In answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) last night, I presume the minister was really saying that wildlife in the territories is a matter for the territorial council. Mr. Speaker, the territories are not yet provinces. I suggest that the assets and resources of the territories belong to all of Canada; thus they are the direct responsibility of the minister and should be specifically set out as being within the federal competence. The minister should also make it quite clear that it is a federal responsibility to co-ordinate research carried out by provincial and other authorities in connection with wildlife. To some extent that is contained in this bill, but it is not clear and specific.

The whole question of wildlife within federal parks is a loose one. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is responsible for federal parks and apparently has staff looking after wildlife in those parks. But we should have one minister to look after wildlife problems in Canada. Surely, if we are going to have a wildlife act it should set out that the Minister of the Environment is responsible for wildlife in all federal parks and all federal public lands.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I think the legislation should set out what the endangered species are, and it should set out clearly what the minister should do and is directed to do with respect to the preservation of those endangered species. When legislation provides for a grants system to provinces and private organizations, surely this House should have an opportunity to know what kind of grants the minister has in mind. Perhaps the legislation should be specific and set out the type of projects that the federal treasury will sponsor or in which it will share the costs of the provinces and private organizations. In my opinion and in the opinion of some others it is not good enough to give the minister the right to make grants or agreements, because it leaves the whole matter open to the question of who knows whom; who has a project; is money available, if so, make an application and if it is politically sound, money will be made available. This is just not good enough, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: That is Liberal patronage.

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, it is political patronage. One of the problems in Canada is that of overlapping jurisdiction. This occurs in many areas, and in the management of wildlife it is a real plague. For example, the township where I have my cottage licences hunting and the county provides bounties for bush wolves, so both the county and the township are specifically involved in the management of wildlife. The province has myriad rules with respect to hunting and conservation, and now the federal government comes into the act with two ministers looking after wildlife.

Mr. Jamieson: Three.

Mr. Blenkarn: Perhaps it is three: we have the territorial government, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and now the Minister of the Environment. This results in a waste of the taxpayers' money on overlapping and conflicting authority. It is time the Government of Canada showed leadership and set out what it is going to look after and what it expects the provinces and the territories to look after with respect to wildlife. Perhaps we could get out of this conflict and overlapping of authority that occurs not only in this field but in many other areas such as health care and fire prevention. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, my constituents and, I suggest, yours are tired of paying taxes to governments which all do the same thing and all take credit for it. Here we have a motherhood bill. I am sure the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) sincerely wants to do something to protect our wildlife, but he should get down to it and set out just what that is. He should not present us with a bill that is all-encompassing and gives him power to go off in one direction or another without regard to the cost or the jurisdiction he takes unto himself. This is the problem we face here and in other fields of legislative competence.

The problem with this bill is that it allows the minister to enter into new programs without a budget, without any limit and without any real legislative control. It is not a responsible bill and does not reflect concern for the citizens' tax dollars. It permits the minister to enter into one program today and another one tomorrow, to go whichever way the Globe and Mail tells him to go, to get involved in something that is popular now and, if it is not popular in a year or two, to get involved in another program. We have had too many of these new programs and it is time we got down to the question of priorities.

The people of Canada are among the most heavily taxed in the world and are rapidly becoming the most regulated in the world. It is time the government looked at the concept of wildlife preservation in all its aspects and considered it as a total package. It is time the minister and the government gave this country leadership for dealing with our resources and preserving them so that our children and grandchildren will benefit from them. This kind of loosey-goosey legislation, this kind of motherhood bill really will do nothing to build a better Canada.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, we in the NDP—and my remarks do not pertain exclusively to my group—have for a long time been concerned about wildlife and wildlife management. We are concerned about preserving the natural habitat of wildlife in this land and the respect that should be paid to nature itself. We appreciate the bill and realize that it tends to deal with an area that is largely under provincial legislation not only with respect to wildlife but to many matters which affect wildlife. For instance, provincial governments have jurisdiction over general questions involving land and land use or the misuse of land. That area of concern has an effect upon wildlife. The question of waters under provincial jurisdiction also may involve matters which have serious effects upon wildlife. Activities involving forestry, logging, mining, recreation in provincial parks and camping grounds, hunting, fishing and logging which come under the jurisdiction of the provinces impinge in one way or another upon species of wildlife.

In his opening statement the minister indicated that this bill has been the subject of discussion with provincial governments and that each of the ten provinces has endorsed it. I did not grasp clearly, from what the minister said last night in response to a question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), the relationships involving the federal government, this bill and the territorial governments of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. The minister intimated that the approach taken with respect to those territories was the same as that taken with respect to the provinces, but his statement was not clear and I think requires clarification. To my mind, at least, there ought to be a clearer understanding of how this bill involves the territories, particularly in light of oil and natural gas discoveries in the northern areas and the dangers that those discoveries can bring not only to wildlife but to the terrain itself.

I am of the opinion that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should not be given jurisdiction, under this bill, with respect to national parks; I do not think there ought to be duplication of responsibility in these areas at the federal level. I think we should make that clear now. This legislation ought to apply to wildlife in the national parks, otherwise two approaches to protection may be taken and the matter may involve different jurisdictions.

The pressures upon wildlife in this land are very large, very impressive, very dangerous and largely unknown. The bulk of our population are city folk. They live in an urban setting. I do not say this in an unkind way. However, people who live in rural areas come in contact daily with nature and know more of nature than do people who live in cities. As I said, the bulk of our population lives in cities and works in cities and only rarely, at vacation time or the odd weekend, are city people able to go to the country. So, often they do not really understand what wildlife is and do not have adequate knowledge of it. In the sense that we do not understand the effects of all aspects of human activity, the pressures on wildlife are largely unknown.

Sometimes we build dams, as happened in my province, as the minister knows, and we create artificial lakes, thereby flooding thousands of acres. Sometimes we flood moose pasture and elk pasture and destroy food sources for antlered animals. This tends to kill them off or drive them away to other areas. This, in turn, creates additional pressures on foods available in other areas. Also, the operations of logging companies drive fur-bearing animals from the area. The consequences of indiscriminate logging, coupled with dry summers and forest fires, create additional dangers to animals and birds in the forests.

Although hunting from helicopters is not permitted or authorized under provincial law, as I understand it, one hears of hunters using helicopters to hunt. They may come either from within or without Canada. These people are able to charter helicopters, and they fly around the mountain tops and ridges and pick off mountain sheep and goats as if catching the proverbial fish in the proverbial barrel. This sort of indiscriminate hunting indulged in for the acquisition of heads and horns, and not for meat, indulged in because the hunter simply wishes to kill something, continues and endangers the wildlife of this land.

We are familiar from reading, if by no other way, of the effects of pesticides, herbicides, chemicals and effluents which are discharged by industrial plants. We know that fertilizers which used to contain phosphates and detergents have been flushed down into the ocean where they have contaminated fish and birds who feed upon those fish. Those chemicals are destructive and injurious. Therefore, because we must concern ourselves about these matters we endorse the principles contained within the bill.

We know that because in this country there are different provincial jurisdictions, one set of rules and concepts will apply in one province and may not apply in another. These concepts at the provincial level may alter from time to time. The provinces may adopt more rigid views at any given moment in preserving wildlife, or their thinking may become not so rigid. There is a good thought within the bill to the effect that we may be able to develop—and I hope we will—uniformity of concept with respect to preserving wildlife throughout all the provinces and territories.

I am a bit unhappy that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is to be free to go its own way, because that way may or may not coincide with the way the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) wants to go. Apart from that, I am a bit unhappy about the provisions of clause 9, which provides that the minister may, in co-operation with one or more provincial governments, do certain things. I assume from what the minister said last night that he conceives that to also mean in co-operation with the territories, but the bill does not say that and I think it excludes it. I would like to know just what that clause means. In any event, it provides that the minister may, in co-operation with the provinces, take whatever measures he deems necessary for the protection of any species of non-domestic animal in danger of extinction.

The phrase "in danger of extinction" is not clear. It makes one think that only when a species of wildlife reaches the stage of being in danger of extinction will a move be made to correct the situation. In many ways, when that state of affairs is conceived and understood, it is too late; the damage has been done. We all know of species which make an almost superhuman effort just to keep alive the process of propagation.

I would like to see the clause altered so that it does not carry the implication that we only move at the last possible moment. That is what the phrase "in danger of extinction" means to me. It does not give any clear indication of the basis for deciding whether a species of wildlife is in danger of extinction. Also, the bill does not take into account what species of wildlife may be in danger of extinction in one area or another. I refer, for example, to islands. Some species are peculiar to certain islands. Any undue hunting, industry, use of pesticides, helicopters, or any of the other things I mentioned earlier, such as mining and logging operations, could not only place wildlife in the area in danger of extinction but could extinguish it completely.

There are areas of northern British Columbia where the grizzly bear is now extinct. Because of new roads and people, he is moving farther and farther away. Even though we have different ideas about the grizzly bear, it is a rather shy animal, as are most animals in the forest. They want to keep out of our way as much as we want to keep out of theirs. When an animal hears a person in the bush, it gets out of his way; it is not interested in meeting him. Because of road building, logging and aircraft, more people are moving into these remote areas.

Grizzly bears are feared and hunted. This is the concept we have of someone who is hunting a grizzly bear. It is ridiculous, because usually the hunter is in a blind in a tree some distance from the grizzly bear. He has a high-powered rifle with a powerful telescope. The poor grizzly bear, hundreds of yards away, does not have a clue what is going on until he has been shot. The "fearless" hunter then climbs down from his safe position and collects his trophy of a grizzly bear head or skin. This lack of respect for wildlife is indicative of what is happening to species such as the grizzly bear.

This is also true of black bears. In many respects they are very gentle souls. They wander all over the streets of Jasper and Banff. They are a bit of a nuisance at times because they scrounge from garbage pails. However, they have some protection. When they wander along the road they are likely to be shot by someone travelling in a car. The purpose is merely to cater to that individual's desire to kill something.

The words contained in clause 9, which imply that action will be taken only when animals are in danger of extinction, should be changed. Action should be taken before that time in order to preserve our wildlife. Also, there should be research with regard to preserving wildlife species so they may grow and develop. There is a need for herds to enlarge. Such research should take into account not only biological questions which impinge upon propagation of the species, but harvesting for food and hunting for trophy purposes. I am not the least bit interested in supporting the idea of trophy hunting. In fact, I would like to see the federal and provincial governments promote the idea of people hunting with a camera instead of a gun. This would attract a different group of people from those with the killer instinct. I would like to see people preserve on film what they see, rather than having a moose head on the wall, collecting dust, to which a hunter can point with pride. In most cases these poor, defenceless animals are shot from a distance of great safety.

In addition to the biological question, research should involve the economic question. With regard to hunting, there are a number of guides who earn their living guiding people into hunting areas. They earn their living by showing others what wildlife is all about. This research should involve recreational forest areas in a way similar to what I was saying about cameras a moment ago. I do not think the concept of research being carried out entirely within the minister's department or in conjunction with the provinces will be satisfactory. It would be much more fruitful if grants were made to people outside the government service to do research in this field. I cannot think of a group of people who know more about wildlife and are more intimately involved than our native Indian people. They know what wildlife is all about.

In this area, I believe extremely useful research work could be done if we were to draw on the experience of our native Indians. Grants for research work might also be given to guides and trappers who live a large part of their lives in the bush in the same habitat as the animals we now seek to protect, as well as to wildlife foundations, rod and gun clubs and other groups which by their activities have shown concern for the wildlife of this land.

When the bill gets before the committee I hope it will not be rushed through. I hope an opportunity will be given for people whose lives are closely associated with nature and wildlife to make suggestions and representations for improving the measure, for making it function in a better way than is conceived from the point of view of the lawyers who drafted it or from the point of view of the minister who determined policy questions with regard to it. Legislation of this nature concerns itself with something beyond the normal comprehension of most of us in this House or, indeed, in our society today. We must draw on the knowledge, experience, feelings and understanding of those who of their own volition live a life which respects the wild creatures around them. If we do this, I am sure we can produce a measure which will be a credit to this land for a long time to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some brief remarks on Bill C-131, an act respecting wildlife in Canada. I realize that it is just enabling legislation, but there are several points affecting the prairie provinces which I think should be stressed at this time. Many of the points contained in the bill came out of the Resources for Tomorrow Conference which was held over ten years ago. I am glad the government has brought forward this legislation because it is long overdue. All Canadians wish to do everything possible to preserve our wildlife. Nobody appreciates wildlife more than people who live in the rural areas of Canada, because they live so close to nature.

One concern I have about this legislation is that no mention is made of the dollars for wetlands program. This program was introduced by the Progressive Conservative government in the early sixties and was established to encourage farmers in the prairie provinces not to drain sloughs and potholes on their farms. I felt it was a very effective program. As we are all aware, in the early 1960s grain sales were good and farmers wishing to increase production were trying to put as much of their land under cultivation as possible. This meant that many potholes and sloughs were being drained. The situation became so serious that water tables in many areas were affected. Not only did this occur, but as these sloughs and potholes were vast breeding grounds for the duck population in North America there was a distinct possibility that if the trend continued it could result in the extinction of the ducks.

The government of the day was aware of this possibility and introduced the dollars for wetlands program. Under the program the government paid an annual incentive to farmers who agreed not to drain their land. The farmer was compensated for loss of income incurred through not putting land into forage or grain production. The program was very effective when it was introduced. However, in 1969 and 1970 the government at that time decided, for some unknown reason, that there should be a cutback in the program. The cutback was in fact so severe that very few farmers participated. Another problem was that no change had been made in the amount of incentive paid to farmers since the program was introduced. We are all aware of the increases in costs to our farmers, and at that time we urged the government to double the incentive paid because their rates were out of date. But the government would not listen. The irony of the situation is that in the year that we saw the biggest cutback by the government in the dollars for wetlands program, we also saw the introduction of the program known as Lift.

Here was a situation in which one department of government was paying the farmer not to grow wheat and encouraging him to take the land out of production, while at the same time another department of government was discontinuing a very effective program which was achieving the same result in addition to protecting the environment. This paradox was brought to the attention of the government, but in their arrogant way members opposite would not listen. I hope the dollars for wetlands program is completely reinstated and that farmers will be paid enough compensation to encourage them to leave their sloughs undrained. The area of Manitoba which I represent is one of Canada's largest duck breeding grounds. If these breeding grounds are to continue to exist, farmers will have to receive proper compensation. I know they are prepared to co-operate.

Ducks feeding on farmers' crops in the field present a very real and costly problem on the Prairies. This has been mentioned in the House many times. As a result, because of their heavy losses a number of farmers view the duck population with concern. The government has, it is true, taken some steps to ease this situation. Farmers are sometimes criticized for the position they take in this regard, but I can imagine how loudly any retail merchant would holler if birds were allowed to eat produce off his shelves. If wildlife is to be protected, farmers will have to receive sufficient compensation for damage to their crops. This is a "must" if the bill is to be effective.

One other point I should like to make concerns damage by wildlife to crops which have been left in swath during the winter due to poor harvest weather. Riding Mountain National Park is in my constituency. It is more than 1,200 square miles in area. Many farms border the park or are in its vicinity. If these farmers are obliged to leave crops out in swath for long, the damage done by wildlife from the park is almost unbelievable. When they complain about their losses either to the province or to the federal government, each level of government claims it has no responsibility. I hope the bill before us will see that proper compensation is paid to farmers for damage done to crops by wildlife.

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in commenting on the bill before us I should like to address my remarks in particular to clause 9 to which my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Howard) was referring a while ago. If I might make a suggestion in all humility to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis), it would be that he consider looking at Bill C-165. My humility is, of course, increased as I note that this particular bill relates closely to a private member's bill submitted by myself for the consideration of the House. It is entitled "an act respecting the protection of endangered species." The material in that bill certainly relates closely to clause 9 of the bill we are presently studying. For the interest of the House I shall read the brief clause 9 of the bill before us. It is entitled "Endangered wildlife" and provides:

The minister may, in co-operation with one or more provincial governments having an interest therein, take such measures as he deems necessary for the protection of any species of non-domestic animal in danger of extinction.

I humbly submit, Mr. Speaker, that although the intention and the spirit of the clause are good, the clause is still a relatively weak one. As the expression often goes in this House, it is a provision without teeth. The only teeth that this provision would have are to be found in the mouths of the poor animals who are supposed to be protected. There are no specific provisions as to how action is to be taken. There is nothing in the clause about sanctions and there is, indeed, very little definition.

As a suggestion to the minister and to the committee I should like to put forward some distinctions and definitions which are contained in Bill C-165 which I think are more specific and useful. There is an attempt to define "endangered species" in this way:

—"endangered species" means any wild mammal, wild bird, amphibian or reptile which by regulation is declared by the minister to be threatened with extinction—

Further on there is a definition of that last phrase, "threatened with extinction":

—"threatened with extinction" means a species or subspecies which is either unlikely to continue to survive without special protective measures—

I think this underlines the point that the hon. member for Skeena was making so effectively.

—or occurs in such small numbers and/or in such a restricted or specialized habitat that it could easily disappear.

In other words, this kind of definition is, I think, more useful than the very general statement that is contained in the present bill and I think meets the kind of concern expressed by the hon. member for Skeena. However, it is not enough for us in Canada to think only of the wildlife of this country as isolated from the rest of the world. In this case as in so many others we must have an international approach to the concern we feel. It may be that practices followed in this country can have a nefarious effect on wildlife in other countries. In order to make my point I should like to read from an article that appeared in one of our daily newspapers this winter, from a United Press source. It is brief and reads as follows:

U.S. Attorney Robert Morse and Assistant Secretary of the Interior Nathaniel Reed said yesterday in Brooklyn federal court the largest ring of traffickers in illegal animal pelts ever uncovered had been smashed.

You might ask, quite rightly, Mr. Speaker, what are illegal animal pelts? How would we define them as being illegal in this country? I suggest it would be difficult since we do not have a law in this country that defines trafficking in certain animal pelts as illegal. The article continues:

A major company which admitted $5 million worth of purchases and sales of threatened species, including ocelot, otter, leopard, cheetah, jaguar and puma, faces a $500,000 fine.

That is a fairly stiff fine. But the next paragraph is the one that should really startle us:

Reed—

That is to say, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Nathaniel Reed.

—said these illegal pelts are shipped to storehouses in Canada and Switzerland because these countries do not now prevent the purchase and sale of these skins.

It is rather nice to have some international attention, but there are some times when we get attention that we could do without. This is certainly one of those times. Canada and Switzerland are about the only two countries left in the North Atlantic world, as it were, which do not prevent by law trafficking in skins and pelts of endangered species. I wish this bill did have some more teeth in it particularly with this point in mind.

Referring again to Bill C-165, which I submit is a better defined document, it contains a provision regarding international concern in the objects of the bill. The bill states:

It is hereby declared that it is necessary to assist on an international and domestic level in the preservation of species threatened with extinction and that there is illegal traffic on an international and national scale of skins of wild mammals, wild birds, amphibians and reptiles which threatens the survival of many rare species.

Again we have the balancing effect of supply and demand here: if we can cut off the supply, we will stop the demand—effectively. But as long as Canada remains a warehouse for this kind of trafficking it will always be possible for traffickers, whose trade is illegal in other countries such as the United States, to come to this country and set up operation. For this I do not think we should hold up our heads with too much pride.

I know I keep quoting from Bill C-165, Mr. Speaker, but there is this provision in the bill which is quite specific:

The minister

(a) shall determine to the extent possible through consultation with foreign countries, interested persons and organizations what species and/or subspecies are threatened with extinction either on a worldwide basis or a habitat basis; and

(b) may seek the advice and assistance of scientific organizations and specialists in the fields of zoology, ornithology, and herpetology, without restricting the range of advice and assistance to the said scientific fields.

Then in the operative part of the bill there is the provision that no person shall sell, purchase, store or import into Canada the skin of any endangered species. I think many members of this chamber would have more confidence in Bill C-131 if clause 9 contained provisions of the kind I have just cited from Bill C-165, where there is clear instruction as to how the minister is to proceed, what advice he is to seek, on what basis he may declare a species an endangered species, and there is a clear prohibition against the sale, trading, warehousing, exporting or dealing in the skins and pelts of endangered species. Then beyond the prohibition there is the calling for a sanction as follows:

Any person violating any provision of this act or any regulation is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and liable for each offence to a fine of five thousand dollars and imprisonment to a term not exceeding five years or to both.

Put this kind of provision in the bill, Mr. Speaker, and obviously you will have teeth in it. Left as it is, I think clause 9 will do very little other than express finer sentiments. It does very little more than give vent to our feelings, offering no real likelihood of any effective action being taken.

It is very rarely in this House that we debate the interpretation part of a bill, but I should like to suggest that some of the interpretative material in Bill C-131 is rather vague. In the interpretation clause, clause 2, it says that "wildlife" means any non-domestic animal. I suppose the obverse is true and that any domestic animal is one which is non-wildlife. You have a definition here which with its counterpart is, of course, completely tautological. It is comprehensive but it is not very deprecative. There are certain species that clearly fall either within one of these categories or within another of these categories.

Mr. Rose: The horse.

Mr. Harney: I hear my colleague from Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) exclaim from his bench, "The horse". In Canada we have domestic and wild horses, and there have been recent cases in the handling of horses both wild and domestic for export which should cause us to bow our heads in justifiable shame. Some time ago—I forget exactly when, but well over a year—the Department of Transport did inaugurate a fairly good code for shipboard transportation of horses. Members of this House may not be aware that horses are shipped live out of this country, ostensibly, in many cases, for the purpose of breeding and rearing in Europe, and in other cases for the purpose of slaughter. I understand that the code does stipulate in part that horses over 11 years of age may not be shipped out of the country for the purpose of slaughter.

Several societies concerned with the humane treatment of animals looked into these shipments and came away rather alarmed at the way these animals are treated on shipboard. It is obvious to anyone who looks into the situation that horses are shipped to Europe, there to be slaughtered and their flesh to be served on the tables of Europeans. If those people want to eat horse meat, I suppose that is their business. What we should be concerned with in this country is the situation when these animals are shipped out of Canada for this purpose.

I would take a much more simple approach to the matter, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that no horses should be shipped live out of this country for the purpose of slaughter overseas. Then we would know absolutely that these animals would be killed humanely here and that our handling of them would be sound and humane. No matter how well we supervise this—and I doubt that we do or can supervise it well—I do not suppose we will ever be able to assure ourselves that these animals are humanely treated once they have left the port of Montreal or Halifax and are on a ship somewhere in the middle of the Atlantic.

Horses can fall ill and die, and horses that are too old obviously cannot suffer the sea passage safely. Some horses may have foals that are too young to be treated in this fashion. Others simply have not been trained and are not sufficiently docile. Many horses have been reported to have been treated most inhumanely during shipment. Perhaps when we review this bill in committee we can consider the rather vague definition of "wildlife" and expand the bill to the consideration of this kind of situation.

Someone might tell me that my intervention is a little out of order, but I know there have been allegations made to the effect that wild horses from Alberta have been shipped to Europe under these conditions. If we want to take that very sound view and make that distinction between wild and domestic animals, we should at least take steps to prevent this kind of inhumane treatment.

Let me end by saying there is something very biblical about this event. The expressed concern on the part of the government and hon. members of this House for the well-being of animals is something which dates back to the very beginning of biblical times. According to the first book of Genesis we were put on this earth to tend the garden, and we were expected to tend this garden with respect. In a very significant way, the manner in which we deal with the creatures with which we share this earth is a reflection upon ourselves. If I may interpret, as indeed has been done many times before, the first verse of Genesis, the first thing that Adam did was to name the animals. I suppose this is what the minister proposes we now do in a modern way. We are not going to name them, we are going to research them. Let us hope that our research goes beyond the mere expression of idle curiosity and becomes an expression of our concern for our fellow creatures on this earth.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this bill, and I congratulate the minister for bringing it in. In dealing with wildlife in Canada the bill covers many things. It provides for agreements with the governments of the provinces, so it covers provincial, municipal and township matters. It deals with organizations or persons associated with wildlife research. I think this is a very important matter as we are always faced with problems of research, particularly in the area of our wildlife kingdom. It deals with payments and contributions in respect of the cost of measures resulting therefrom, and provides for the purchase, acquisition or lease of lands. It also provides for the costs incurred in administration of the legislation to be paid out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament, and relates to other matters in connection with the administration of this legislation. I think this is a very good measure in that it deals with these aspects and covers a tremendous area of the country.

We all know what happens if we do not maintain the balance of wildlife in this country. We are also aware of the disappearance of many species of wildlife. We know there is a great deal of importance in maintaining this balance of life. I have in mind the fact that the wolf population in the northland kills the crippled, the lame, the halt and the blind of our caribou and deer populations. These animals would encounter untold suffering if it were not for wolves killing them humanely and mercifully. I think the ecology of the north would be very much upset, particularly in the Northwest Territories, if we did not have wolves to kill off the mice. Mice destroy all kinds of vegetation in that country. The same applies to foxes and rabbits, and one might include in that chain hawks who live on mice and other small animals, and other carnivorous species.

I should like to refer to an article which goes back to the 1950s when the Dutch elm disease threatened some of the trees which line the streets of many mid-western towns. In 1954, Michigan State University, which has a large number of elms on its East Lansing campus, began to spray with DDT to kill the beetles that spread the disease. The beetles began to die, but so did a large number of robins. Soon zoologists discovered that earthworms ate the DDT-covered leaves that fell to the ground, the worms in turn were eaten by the robins, causing them to die of nerve poisoning. This example covers three species and stages in the ecological chain.

Michigan State's experience is a demonstration of the phenomenon known as biological magnification. While the DDT concentration in one area may be microscopically low, it can multiply through the food chain. Several birds along the Great Lakes, including the American eagle, were threatened with extinction because of the use of DDT, because DDT causes the liver to produce enzymes that attack the hormones governing the production of calcium. I should like to quote the following from the Globe and Mail of July 7, 1969:

When the eagle's system produces less calcium, the eggshells become thinner, causing more frequent breakage and fewer baby eagles.

The osprey, peregrine falcon and mallard duck have problems similar to those of the eagle. And the Minks Ranchers Association believes that DDT may be affecting mink reproduction.

I think this covers quite a field, and it goes to show how we can destroy wildlife by using controls such as pesticides. The article goes on to read:

Humans seem to eliminate DDT once it reaches a level of 10 or 12 parts per million. (Most North Americans apparently have that level in their bodies).

Experiments in feeding prisoners massive DDT doses have uncovered no measurable dangers—

But in treating mice they did run into problems which showed that it might be harmful. The experiments also indicated that DDT might interfere with the productivity of wildlife.

I want to congratulate wildlife groups, people in fish and game clubs and rod and gun clubs for the part they have played. In my area there are such clubs, particularly fish and game clubs and conservation clubs, that have done very useful work. They have bought up land here and there and have stocked it with wild animals and birds. These animals and birds are multiplying under these normal conditions, just as if they were free. It is a beautiful sight to see these animals and birds, some of which are being released into the woods because of overpopulation. I cannot stress sufficiently the important part these organizations have played in building such sanctuaries. They have aroused public opinion, which is very important. Public opinion has been aroused on the very subject that the minister has been smart enough to put into legislation and bring before the House.

I want to refer for a minute or two to the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart) who commented very ably on the wetlands and how they could be used. The same thing applies to Ontario, where we could protect our bush and similar areas that are unfit for agriculture but would make excellent havens for wildlife. The other day I was in the bush, a woodlot of about 200 acres. There were deer there, bears, raccoons and beavers; a stream goes through the lot. This was very interesting to me. Here was preservation of animals by people, without any compulsion at all. They did it because they like to protect the wildlife of the country.

I would also like to refer to the comments of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) who dealt with the problem of wild and tame horses. This is certainly a problem that affects us all, and it probably distresses a good many people when horses are caught and shipped abroad. Many times they are injured on the way, and a few times they have had colts during shipment. One such case was reported to me, and when one case is reported there are usually many others. This matter could be taken care of by the federal branch dealing with the health of animals. As is the case when any type of thoroughbred or other animal is shipped out of the country, a health certificate should be required for the animal. Regulations could be brought in barring any animals from being shipped overseas that were not going there for breeding purposes. It is as simple as that. If there happened to be too many wild horses, they could be slaughtered, frozen and then shipped. Let us not do this by the back door in an underhand way. Let us be fair and honest in our approach to the problems connected with wild horses and wildlife.

In conclusion, I want to congratulate the minister. I know that he will have the support of all members of the House on his progressive legislation.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on second reading of this bill. It is perhaps one of the few bills that will receive unanimous agreement from all sides of the House and from all the public. If there are any misgivings, they would only be that the bill does not go far enough and is not sufficiently extensive to satisfy many people.

In his speech the minister gave a good resumé of what the bill hopes to accomplish. I think the public is becoming increasingly aware of what only a few generations ago only the conservationist was aware of, namely, that man as a species of animal himself must be increasingly aware of the fact that he is limited by many of the boundaries of nature within which other animal species are restricted, and that he is finding the same peripheries to his activities that nature applies to other animals.

The multiplication of a new species creates a new balance. This seems to have been true since the world began. Rather belatedly, the human species is realizing that the preservation of many animals is desirable and even necessary for our survival. Of course, we have our domesticated animals which have come from the wilds, but as well there are many other animals that are not domesticated, and we desire to have them protected. In North America, for instance, the deer population was at an all-time low around the 1900s, but through wise management it is now in substantially greater numbers than previously and there are no signs of their dying out. It is now obvious that most animal life and bird life on this continent can be preserved, and may even thrive, if man would only apply some relatively minor and modest measures of control. However, these are rather meagre.

A few years ago, when I first came to the House in 1968, I asked what research was available on upland game birds in the prairie provinces, Unfortunately, I found that very little research material was available and I was referred to research material accumulated by the Americans in the Dakotas and Montana. But even in that area the American research was quite meagre. For my own interest I was able to procure some native varieties of seedling plantings for birds from the government station at Indian Head, and I believe that the government officials in the dominion nursery there have made a creditable start in this area. They are to be congratulated for having made a start in finding suitable plantings which will sustain game bird populations in the prairie area.

The problem with wildlife programs at both the federal and provincial levels has been the apparent lack of continuity of the programs once a project was under way. For instance, the government had a program of poghole preservation in western Manitoba which fell afoul of the government's austerity measures in 1969. The farmers at that time, since they had an excess of grain on hand, were glad to preserve some of the potholes for waterfowl preservation because of the income involved from the leasing; but at this time when grain is not so abundant—it is in short supply and it can all be sold—it will be more difficult to convince farmers to set them aside and leave them as a sluice for waterfowl preservation.

I would like to say that although the setting aside of selected areas as refuges has a good deal of advantage, I think that for the preservation of wildlife this should be done throughout the whole of the country, interspersed with farms, agricultural units, and so on. To do this we need the co-operation of the provincial and federal governments but, most importantly, we need the co-operation of rural councils. Speaking of my own area, there will not be much progress there unless the co-operation of rural councils is enlisted. Their help will have to be planned in the matter of restrictions, easements, perhaps direct tax relief measures, etc., which will have to be agreed upon in order that a suitable habitat for wildlife may be made available. It is quite true that a relatively small effort to maintain these habitats will be necessary to support a substantial wildlife population.

I am always amazed at the statement that the English countryside sustains a higher population of wild animals per square mile than any other country in the world. In Canada, and in the prairie provinces especially, with the severe winters wildlife population may not be extremely high but there is no doubt that with proper management surprisingly good results could be anticipated.

There is a problem in my area, which I think would be prevalent in many other areas, regarding hunting rights of the native people. Tensions are heightening between the Indian people and the rural communities surrounding reserves over the question of all-year hunting and what is considered a particularly unsportsmanlike method of hunting, night-lighting, by Indians on private property. Although Indians have a right to hunt during the year on reservations or on Crown land, there is actually little Crown land available, so that most hunting is done on private property. The original purpose of allowing Indians to hunt for food has long since lost its validity in the southern parts of the country, as all the game available could provide only a slight amount of food for the Indian population.

The double standard of having some people able to hunt all year round while others cannot hunt at all, particularly when hunting is carried out on private land, has caused intense animosity in my area between the Indian people and the surrounding farm population and sportsmen. It is wisely pointed out that all the violations of night-lighting, and so on, are not caused by the Indians. Of course, the problem is complicated by the fact that the preservation of wildlife is under provincial jurisdiction. While the treaties which guarantee the Indians their right to hunt were made by the federal authority, up to the present time there has been no obvious attempt made by either the federal or provincial authorities to sort out this delicate problem.

It is a problem that will have to be solved. I urge the minister to have his department study this problem as well as having the Department of Indian Affairs study it so that meaningful discussions with the provinces and with the Indian bands themselves will lead to some kind of solution. Otherwise, I am afraid that the animosity may lead to violent solutions that we will all regret, and that will endanger the working out of satisfactory relationships between the Indians and their rural neighbours. This may not be a very widespread problem but it is a severe one. It goes to the root of the original treaties and also to the root of the enforcement of provincial game laws. I congratulate the minister on this bill and I wish its purpose success.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to take part in the discussion on Bill C-131. Perhaps my initial observation will be similar to that of others who suggested that this is umbrella legislation. One of the problems with umbrella legislation is that it tends to be full of holes, in that it allows a minister to do a great deal or to do virtually nothing.

I realize that the problem of wildlife protection, management and enhancement in Canada is fraught with certain difficulties which are largely jurisdictional, and even with the best will in the world the federal government would have to seek the co-operation of provinces and municipalities before it could achieve its objectives. I also think that the matter of the regulations to flow from this bill is of major concern. Because of the very general nature of the bill, it seems to me that the regulations will determine whether or not Bill C-131 is to be effective or just window-dressing.

Without those regulations, or knowledge of them, we really cannot draw too many conclusions about this legislation, except that it is a statement of fine intentions. This is a continuing problem with a great deal of legislation presented to this House. I recall that a couple of years ago, when we were discussing the problem of protection of the boreal ecology with respect to the Yukon mineral bill, until we were sure which set of regulations would be accepted we in parliament were in a very poor position to make any intelligent comment on the nature, scope and possible effectiveness of that bill, and so with many other pieces of legislation. But in saying that, I think we can be pleased that we have this legislation before us, of course recognizing the limitations and also recognizing the fact that it is really up to the minister or the government to determine how much effect this will have in preserving and enhancing the kind of natural wildlife which abounds in Canada.

It is interesting, I think, that wildlife legislation took so long to arrive at the federal level. I believe it is here now because of a growing concern over and a recognition of the fact that we as men, as humans, are really "part of" rather than "apart from" the whole ecology of this planet. We have too long stood above the planet as its masters, but now we find that our mastery has not really been very masterful. We, like the animals, are part of the whole ecosystem, and man's transgressions are the most threatening to it.

About 20 years ago the standard text for general science in British Columbia was called "Mastering our Environment." I doubt whether a text with that title would ever find its way into the school system today because our whole attitude with respect to man's relationship to the environment has changed, perhaps due to the pioneering efforts of people such as Jack Miner dealing with birds, Grey Owl dealing with beavers and of writers who published interesting outdoor stories. Today more and more people are recognizing the validity of preserving the often limited and definitive parameters or boundaries of what survives in terms of wildlife, not only animal life but plant and marine life.

I do not intend to go into great detail in a clause by clause review of this bill. As I said earlier, I feel the bill is very general and that it is really up to the minister to determine what flows from it. Whether or not it is used to the benefit and preservation of wildlife really rests with the minister and his government. I would like to note—I will list some things in a moment and perhaps discuss them in detail later—some of the threats to wildlife which I think have brought us to the point where we must now consider this preservation legislation. The first thing we have to consider—and this is largely, by the way, centred around modern man—is the destruction that development of all kinds causes to wildlife. There is also the destruction of predators, which in turn destroys the food chain. There is the suffering and destruction due to the various kinds of savage traps that we use to catch animals. There is the destruction of animal life caused by chemical pollutants, herbicides, pesticides and various waste products. There is the destruction caused by government department ignoring another government department. I will amplify this later. Finally, the destruction of animals, both lethal and sublethal, having to do with the reproductive capacities of those animals, birds and fishes which is due to radioactive fall-out.

Mr. Speaker, it is rather pointless for us to be considering this legislation at all if we do not take a long strong stand on matters such as technological development, chemical and nuclear pollution and the ignorance of one government department compared to another. Unless we take all these things into consideration, we are only uttering a lot of fine sentiments and the result will be gradual extinction of more and more species. I have heard it said that we are losing one species of animal per year in the world. This figure is nothing for human beings to be proud of.

In British Columbia we have examples of destruction due to developments such as the Roberts Bank coal port. The bulk loading facility happened to be set in the only Mediterranean marine climate that exists in British Columbia. Many people opposed that port because of its situation within to marinetide flats and wetlands which is where the life of the sea starts. Any further depradation of this limited and unique Mediterranean marine area in Canada would be a definite loss not only for recreation but for those forms of marine and fish life that depend upon such areas to reproduce. This includes shellfish and other types of commercial fish.

I am pleased that now when we consider the construction of coal ports and such things as airports, we first embark upon environmental studies. I do not know how sophisticated these studies are, but at least greater consideration is being given to the environmental impact. No explicit references to environmental studies for annual protection before embarking on major developments are to be found in this bill. Another thing that concerns many B.C. people is the possibility that the mudflats east of the Second Narrows bridge on Burrard Inlet may be destroyed for the development of port facilities. I would oppose any such move because I believe we should try to preserve mudflats for the reasons I have mentioned in connection with Roberts Bank.

There have also been doubts about the development of the Mackenzie valley. I have in my file some material from the Canadian Wildlife Federation which came to me a couple of years ago when I was speaking about the Yukon Minerals Act. At that time we were as concerned about exploration and development by mining companies as we are today about the development of oil pipelines. In the winter, 1971, issue of Wildlife News appears the following comment:

> Statements made recently in the House of Commons imply that the Canadian Wildlife Service is actively involved in research on the effects of pipelines on ecology in general and on wildlife in particular. Except for an inventory of sensitive wildlife areas, and a general reconnaissance of the types of damage being done by oil exploration—

And coming to the operative part of the statement, Mr. Speaker.

> —the Canadian Wildlife Service has neither undertaken research of the type implied nor does it have funds for such research during the forthcoming year.

I hope the minister can tell us that is no longer true, or else everything contained in Bill C-131 is nonsense. Lack of funding reminds me of the Canada Water Act which was to provide the establishment of river basin boards. To my knowledge none has been set up, mainly because there was no provision for funds to cover them. It is all very well to have research into sensitive ecological matters, but if funds are denied we might as well forget the subject. There are some other interesting comments in the Wildlife Federation leaflet which bear not only on the attitudes of Canadians but also on North American or western European values. On page 2 appears the following:

> But, as the Canadian Wildlife Federation points out in its current National Wildlife Week program, the earth is not without its limits—limits which we have known for several centuries. We have long since "conquered" the wilderness and "subdued" the last inhabitable frontiers. Our technology exploits forms of energy which gives to each of us power equivalent to hundreds of times the impact on our environment. The wastes and even the products of our rapidly growing, diversifying technology are too often released into the biosphere to upset the eons-old balance of natural systems.

In other words, the Canadian Wildlife Service, a branch of government, is complaining that we are using the air as a sewer. We are. If we continue to do this it is bound to have a much more pernicious effect on our animal life than we can overcome by setting up any reserve for the resting of wild ducks. There exists the larger question which is important and one which goes beyond this legislation. I should like to read one more paragraph from this excellent bulletin because it relates to the larger question:

> Clearly, our devotion to the growth ethos, the outmoded conventional wisdom that proclaims "bigger" to be "better", has been too complete for too long. Now that bigger populations, more products and by-products of technology, greater use of resources and proliferation of wastes are lowering the quality of our lives—perhaps even threatening our survival—it is surely time to make intelligent choices which, at best, may preserve a reasonable quality of life and, at worst, will avoid disaster for our species.

I think it is implied here that our species are inextricably linked with all other species on this planet. Perhaps I have said enough about that, but it reflects the attitude of many people and I am sure that in the main, though perhaps not completely, it reflects the attitude of the minister.

The next point is the destruction of predators which in turn destroy our food chain. For too long we have been chasing "the big bad wolf"—we allow the rodent to multiply, and so the whole ecosystem gets out of balance. A lady from my riding has written to me on this general topic and I should like to quote from her letter. She writes:

> Our wildlife plays a vital part in our ecosystem—all wildlife—even the predators, that hunters and stockmen would have us believe are an "extra entity!" But then "self-interest" tends to make one's views a bit biased, wouldn't you say? Or to carry the thought further "man is the extra in the ecosystem!" He contributes little and feels justified in taking all he can get at the expense, in many instances, of the environment. The destruction of predators (so-called) is the irreversible first step toward destruction of land and the ecosystem. As the predators disappear, the rodents increase; as the rodents devour the roots of the grasses, the grass cover dies—causing erosion. With the destruction of the natural growth of grass cover, the so-called noxious plants take over—productive land becomes a desert!

From recent information we know that because of overgrazing, poor management practices and perhaps even a change in climate, the Sahara desert is growing by one mile per year and it could conceivably cover a huge portion of Africa in our lifetime. From our biblical studies we know, too, that the Holy Land was once a very lush and productive place but because of malpractice and lack of concern for environment we see what some areas have degenerated into.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I have said enough about the destruction of predators and how we have been blind to the necessity of maintaining a balanced ecosystem in our world. We can see what happens if you shoot the coyote, as the shooting of the coyote and his relatives meant that there were far more gophers who ate our grain and, consequently, caused a great deal of erosion, creating a potential wasteland where no life survives.

I should like to speak now for a moment about the destruction and suffering due to the savage and cruel trapping methods employed in Canada. I am not scorning those people, such as native peoples and others, who trap for a living. What many do not know is that perhaps half the leg-hold traps are sold in urban areas are for catching pigeons, cats and other kinds of bothersome creatures around the city. It may be interesting to note that in the last few months there has been established an all-party, House of Commons animal welfare committee, the establishment of which was prompted by the efforts of Mr. Tom Hughes of the Animal Welfare Foundation. The committee has met once informally and will probably meet again. It is attempting to deal in a rational and reasonable way with the welfare of animals. At the moment the committee is chaired by my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) and, if it is successful in its endeavours, we hope that our work will lead to the development of a more healthy approach toward animals generally, and specifically help to stamp out the cruelty which is involved in the use of the leg-hold trap.

Especially since a number of grisly television documentaries on this subject were aired, interest in more human trapping methods has been growing. A class of school children from Port Coquitlam in my province wrote to me about this matter some weeks ago. They say:

> We, the grade seven students of Irvine Elementary protest the use of leg-trapping of animals. Our class had a discussion on this subject and found there is another way such as the Conibear trap which kills instantly. Why couldn't the trappers use it?

The letter is signed by the students of that class. It seems to me that if students like those are beginning to realize what is happening, recognize the cruelty involved and display that sort of sensitivity and concern toward animals so that there may be safer and a more humane approach to their slaughter, if their slaughter is necessary, it bodes well for us, as does this legislation. After all, these children will be our future decision-makers.

This legislation is a reflection not only on the minister but on the times in which we live. I do not think the children are quite accurate in their assessment of traps. The Conibear trap, the supposed substitute for the leg-hold trap, does not meet all the necessary conditions entirely. It does not quite meet the ideal of being a perfect trap. I do not suggest that people who depend for their livelihood on the leg-hold trap should be denied its use until another one is developed, but the leg-hold trap should be sold to bona fide trappers only and kept out of the city.

Certainly, if there are to be grants and awards under this legislation the minister should consider, as a first priority, awarding grants for the development of a more humane kind of trap to be used on wild animals. A good place to start would be with the Conibear trap. In any event, whether it is important or not, I wanted to say it because many people whom I represent would want me to say it, as they are concerned about this subject.

I should like now to deal for a moment with the destruction caused by chemical pollutants such as the various herbicides, insecticides and various waste products that flow from our technological society. I reiterate, there is not much point in dealing with the lack of resting spots for the wild goose if we do not at the same time deal with pollutants. So long as we continue to pollute ourselves and our world, what is the point of a bill that encourages research into this and that, and will establish some sort of resting place, in co-operation with the provinces, for geese? There is no point to it.

Take the matter of herbicides. We use phenoxy herbicides. Chemicals such as 24D, 245T, 245TP, Mecoprop, and so on, contain some of the chemical female hormones in addition to chlorinated hydrocarbons. Some of these chemicals have been around for years; others have been used most recently as defoliants in the Viet Nam war. Canada joined 58 other nations to secure the ban of these defoliants because they are dangerous, not just because they take leaves off trees in Viet Nam but because they are dangerous to humans and animals. Canada, along with 58 other nations of the United Nations asked for these chemicals to be banned. At the same time, although Canada has asked for these phenoxy herbicides to be banned in Viet Nam, our Canadian Department of Agriculture has authorized their use in Canada.

What do these chemicals do, Mr. Speaker? I am told that they are capable of causing bronchitis, myocardial damage, kidney and liver damage, neuritis, fatigue, depression, nervousness, headaches, disturbed sleep, attacks of giddiness, muscular aches and pains, edema, disturbances in memory, loss of weight, disturbances in concentration, uncontrollable bleeding involving the eyes, nose and other body openings and internal organs, cancer and deformed babies. The fumes can be as deadly when ingested. But, unbelievably, our Department of Agriculture authorizes the use of these chemicals in Canada.

If those chemicals used in Viet Nam are so thoroughly damaging to humans in the manner I have just outlined, what on earth will they do to animals? The damage caused by chemicals like these will far more than offset any benefit that may accrue to animals as a result of this legislation unless we are concurrently prepared to deal with that pollution. I hope the minister and his department will deal with them. Certainly, he ought to interest the Minister of Agriculture in reviewing his authorization of these chemicals. That is part of his job. If he does not do that, then this legislation is just so much tokenistic nonsense.

Consider for a moment what has happened in Texas. May I read an excerpt from a letter written by a lawyer in New Mexico who has this to say about the effects of certain chemicals:

> Shortly after the spraying, the cattle of both of my clients began dying. The remaining cattle are emaciated and do not gain any weight although they are being fed in excess of the normal food ration. Calves have been aborted by mother cows; and, those calves that have been born alive since the spraying are only the size of large dogs.

If sprays can do that to domestic animals, what can they do to wild animals? The use of these chemicals has escalated because of continued tax-free pressure by the chemical lobby and various other lobbies. When we use these chemicals we remove one source of trouble and cause others. We are attempting to control one kind of horror with the use of another horror, and this will have to stop.

What about the case of the plastic waste in England which caused the shells of gulls' egg to become much thinner and severely limit reproductive capacity of these gulls? If these things continue to happen and we take no steps to control them, we shall be in great difficulty. What about the mercury in fish? What about pulp mill pollution in British Columbia? For years I have been trying to obtain from the minister his records of monitoring pulp mill effluent of the Fraser River, a very important part of our salmon resource, but with no success. And here the minister comes in with a bill that, as he says, will save the animals. It is difficult to reconcile those words with his past actions.

Also, let us consider the destruction caused by one department of government to wildlife as a result of ignoring the aims of another department of government. This week I received a request for an extension of a LIP project. That project is six weeks late. I suppose the LIP project could be made fun of and satirized. However, a number of people are devoted to building artificial nests around Pitt Lake for wood ducks an endangered species. Funds for the project came late and an extension was requested. If no extension is approved, the project will be eliminated or those involved will have to pay for it out of their own funds.

This is a case where the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis), in consultation with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), who is in charge of LIP funds, can make certain this project goes ahead. I am pleased to see the Minister of Manpower in his place because I have not yet made a personal representation to him on this subject. However, I have made representations to his department for an extension because this project deals with an endangered species. At the moment the project is in jeopardy, as is the species. One department of government must co-operate and communicate with the others. It is essential. Let me give another example which I mentioned earlier. Through the United Nations, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) asked for a ban on herbicides in Viet Nam. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) allows this same product to be used in Canada. That is a contradiction I find hard to reconcile.

There is another matter of interest. The Department of Transport authorized that a part of Pitt Meadows in my constituency be used as a helicopter practice range. This is precisely over the nesting area of an endangered species known as the sandhill crane. There are now only three or four pairs left in the area. When the sandhill crane is nesting, the helicopters disturb them and they fly away from their nests.

The concluding item on my list of destruction of wild animals and wildlife in general is the destruction caused by radioactive fall-out. There are both lethal and sublethal effects. I do not think anyone realizes the extent of genetic damage caused by this. This is one reason why since coming to this House I have been doing everything I can to discourage the obscenities of further nuclear testing whether underground or on the water. I do not think people realize the amount of radiation pollution we have been ingesting since World War II. I have a paper which was prepared by Professor Gordon Edwards, department of mathematics, University of British Columbia. I will read from it briefly. I would like to make it as interesting as possible, which is a difficult thing when quoting. It reads:

During the atmospheric testing of the 1950s, the AEC predicted (correctly) that much less fallout would reach the ground in arctic regions than in temporate regions of the United States. They concluded (incorrectly) that Eskimos would not be in danger of accumulating dangerous amounts of fallout. They didn't know that food chains can behave in peculiar ways. Lichens . . . have no functional roots, and often grow on rocks rather than soil. They absorb their mineral nutrition in the form of dust taken directly from the air. As a result they absorb radioactive fallout directly, without the dilution and discrimination processes which operate when fallout is absorbed through roots. Caribou eat great quantities of lichen (many times their own body weight) and therefore take up excessive amounts of radiation from fallout. At the end of the food chain, caribou meat makes up a substantive portion of the Eskimo's diet, producing the unexpectedly large amounts of fallout radiation in their bodies.

This is not only true in the Arctic. It applies to milk and other products. There are dozens of other examples. If radiation is a threat to humans, it naturally follows that there exists a threat to animals. The government has to move in the direction to grapple effectively with radiation. Unless they do, the sentiments expressed in this piece of legislation will fall far short of reality.

Someone called this a motherhood bill. I think that is a bit cruel. Bill C-131 at least recognizes the problem of endangered species and does so for the first time. In British Columbia some wags may take the term "endangered species" to mean the Liberal party. Nevertheless, my party intends to support this bill. The bill, however, makes little mention of the points I have raised and seems to be deficient in explicit power to prevent abuses. Before setting down I also would like to congratulate the rod and gun clubs as well as groups such as SPEC and the Coquitlam River Committee for bringing the nature of the problems directly to the attention of legislators. Without the private interest groups and environmental groups there would certainly have been less motivation to have wildlife legislation considered during this session.

I will try not to be cynical, but I wonder what impact this bill will have on the massive environmental rape known as the James Bay project. How will this bill protect the animals in that area? If the minister will excuse me for accusing him for being a bit lethargic on the matter of the Skagit, I wonder how it would have helped the animals in the Skagit valley. How would this bill have helped predict the difficulties associated with the Bennett Dam in the Athabasca basin?

These are extremely important matters since wildlife protection does not deal with single issues. They are broad and comprehensive. They are not just limited to wildlife. Our reactions are determined by the attitudes and traditions we have. It is about time we changed some of them. I do not want to appear unduly sanctimonous, but we are all products of the habits of how we have been raised. Talking and reading about new attitudes and new realities is how they gain general acceptance.

In conclusion, possibly the House might consider the private member's bill of my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney), Bill C-165 which, as he stated, broadens the definition of "endangered species." With the minister's co-operation, possibly Bill C-165 might be sent to the committee at the same time as Bill C-131.

I am pleased to have had the opportunity to speak on this bill. I congratulate the minister for bringing it forward. I hope some real action will flow from it.

[Mr. Rose.]

Hon. Walter G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the debate that has resulted from the presentation of Bill C-131 has been largely a ritualistic exercise. I do not think anyone is going to oppose this bill because the principles it espouses, the wise management and possible use of renewable resources, has long been accepted by the federal government, provincial governments, municipal governments and the people of Canada. Indeed, I feel that the people of Canada are ahead of governments in this regard. It is only by continuing pressure that we now have harmonized in the bill before the House these principles vital to the preservation and conservation of our renewable resources.

● (1700)

My contribution this afternoon will be brief. I do not intend to outline a grandiose policy of wildlife management. I do wish, however, to pay tribute to some of the pioneers whose efforts have made this bill possible. We have just come through National Wildlife Week which occurs annually during the early part of April. I am sure all members will be aware that it is a tribute to the pioneering work of Jack Miner who founded one of the first migratory wildfowl sanctuaries in the southern part of Ontario. This parliament eventually recognized the pioneering work of the Miner sanctuary and passed legislation which made the annual observance possible.

In addition, I should like to refer to the Resources for Tomorrow Conference of 1961 which I think was a high-water mark in the emergence of the legislation now before the House. As the minister told us in his opening remarks, one of the resolutions which came out of that conference urged upon governments, particularly at the provincial and federal levels, the passing of wildlife legislation which would attempt to deal with problems which had already been defined. One of the pioneers in this effort was the Canadian Wildlife Service itself. Canada has been well served by this branch of government and some of the men who have served as directors of the department over the years must be mentioned as largely responsible for the legislation before us today. I shall not mention any names. I shall simply indicate that during the past two or three decades the directors of that department have called attention in season and out of season to the necessity for legislative action to ensure that wildlife, as part of our renewable resources, is wisely managed.

The Resources for Tomorrow Conference also led to the establishment of a resource ministers' council. It is my opinion that there is lack of appreciation of the role this council has played and can play in its important responsibility of co-ordinating wise management measures in all areas affecting renewable resources. For example, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), speaking in the debate last night, as reported at page 3543 of Hansard, referred to the effort which he says he has made many times in the House to bring about the establishment of an environmental council wholly independent of government and entrusted with reporting on environmental problems throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, we already have such a council—the resource ministers' council which brings together annually, and more frequently if necessary, all the provincial ministers across the country in council with the federal minister so that they may achieve some measure of co-ordination in an area where it is most difficult to achieve co-operation because of the constitutional jurisdictional problem. The headquarters of the council were deliberately established outside the city of Ottawa so there would be no suspicion of any direct connection with government at any level. The council operates out of Montreal. It has a highly qualified secretariat and its function is to do exactly what the hon. member for Kootenay West is apparently advocating.

So the council already exists, and the fact that a Member of Parliament is not aware of it indicates that it has hardly been given the prominence that its important responsibilities deserve. It was in 1965 that this council passed a resolution reinforcing the resolution which came out of the Resources for Tomorrow Conference of 1961 urging legislative action to carry out the responsibilities of wise management of Canadian wildlife resources. We should pay tribute here this afternoon to those who have pioneered in the resources ministers' council and who perhaps have not received the measure of support which the importance of their work merits and who, in particular, have not received the financial support necessary if we are to achieve positive results under this program.

Another emanation of the Resources for Tomorrow Conference was the Canadian Wildlife Federation. That body was born from the conference. It was hailed at the time as one of the important achievements of the conference. The federation brought together the fish and game associations across the country and it has, I believe, been one of the major influences in urging governments at all levels to act in making possible the production of the legislation now before the House.

We all realize that legislation of itself will not achieve positive results unless there is initiative and action on the part of all governments. This follows from the jurisdictional problem to which I have already referred, one which makes it extremely difficult if not impossible to get action in the area of policies affecting conservation. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), who spoke just before me, outlined programs and policies which he said might be activated by the federal government. The federal government can activate nothing unless it gets the co-operation of the provinces, hence the importance of the resource ministers' council. I feel the provinces are ahead of the federal government in this regard.

I am reminded, for example, that the resource minister for Quebec who served on a committee of the Resources for Tomorrow Conference in 1961 was a politician by the name of Rene Levesque. Perhaps he might have become more closely associated with matters of national unity had there not been so much delay in implementing the resolution of the Resources for Tomorrow Conference in this respect.

Mr. Davis: Judging from one of his speeches, he was a separatist then.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, I was there. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) has suggested that Mr. Levesque was operating as a separatist even at the Resources for Tomorrow Conference. I would remind him that the chairing of the resource ministers' council operated on the rotating principle. After the federal minister, which was myself at the time, the first chairman of the general council was Mr. Spooner, who was then minister of resources for Ontario. His successor was the Hon. René Lévesque, who was minister of resources for the province of Quebec. He was willing to preside over the intergovernmental body that had been created to get around jurisdictional problems.

Perhaps I can relate here my first contact with Mr. Levesque as resource minister for the province of Quebec. He arrived in the middle of steering committee preparation because he replaced the Hon. Paul Earl as minister of resources for that province. Mr. Earl was not of the same inclination as his successor. Mr. Levesque objected to the presence of a federal minister—perhaps there were some separatist sentiments evident in that regard—presiding over the steering committee since Ottawa did not have jurisdiction over renewable resources. When I was chairman I indicated that I was also functioning as minister of northern affairs. He shrugged in his inimitable fashion and said I could continue as minister of northern affairs since Ottawa had jurisdiction, but not as minister of resources. This was a diversionary tactic which must always be exercised when it comes to dealing with the provinces in these matters if positive results are going to be achieved.

We now have legislation that all hon. members who have spoken this afternoon have concurred is long overdue. It is merely enabling. Nothing will happen unless funds are available. And here is where the crunch comes. I think that if Ottawa is going to make the legislation effective, in positive terms it must indicate what its funding priorities are. I have already intimated that the vitally important resource ministers' council has been inhibited and hampered in its work because adequate funds have not been available. As already mentioned here this afternoon, it is significant that one of the programs that fell under the measure of austerity of 1969 was the excellent pothole leasing project. It was very difficult in the first instance to get farmers to co-operate in leasing land to preserve the potholes of the Prairies where most of the duck population is generated, and I think it was a retrograde step of some proportion for Ottawa arbitrarily to cancel a program of this kind just when it was receiving ready acceptance from the prairie farmers.

I hope that programs such as this will be restored and enlarged upon, because it is this kind of leadership in the field of federal funding that is going to ensure the effectiveness of the act and the continuing co-operation of the provincial governments. One of the hopeful aspects of the wholly new attitude toward wise management and multiple use of renewable resources is the leadership being provided by young people. I think the generation that is now coming upon the scene will be much more positive than that which is gradually leaving the scene of action.

When we get this bill into committee I hope, since some members have suggested that the bill needs strengthening, we might give some attention to replacing some of the "mays" with "shalls", always of course being aware, as the bill is aware, that provincial agreement must be reached in all cases, and also aware that the public of Canada is way out in front of governments in supporting legislation of this kind. It is the public who pay for programs in terms of taxation, and I am sure that any funding initiative on the part of Ottawa would be cordially received by the public of Canada.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to join other members in welcoming Bill C-131. The bill will provide for a program of rehabilitation, habitat preservation and research for rare and endangered species within Canada. I am disappointed, though, that the bill does not include some provision for prohibiting entry into Canada of species of animals that are endangered throughout the world. I realize the rationale behind not doing so. There is a convention presently being drafted by the International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources, and I understand we are waiting for the completion of this convention before preparing legislation which, in a sense, will be complementary to Bill C-131 and will deal with the importation of endangered species into Canada.

In the meantime, however, things are going on which are contributing to the continuing decline in population of a wide range of species of animals and reptiles. If allowed to continue for another year or two at its present rate, these species will be pushed past the point of no return, and certainly into extinction within five or six years. It seems to me that we could by order in council now take certain measures that could contribute, at least as far as Canada is concerned, to stopping the drain on these irreplaceable species of wildlife.

I have had a bill before the House of Commons for three sessions now relating to the protection of endangered species of animals. The object of the bill that I have introduced—its present label is Bill C-88—is to protect species of animals and also birds, amphibians, reptiles, mollusks and crustaceans which are in danger of extinction. The bill would do this whether they are endangered on a worldwide basis or on a local habitat basis, and this is an improvement over a couple of earlier bills. It is very important that we make this distinction because some species, although they may not be endangered on a local basis are in danger of elimination from even one hemisphere or another, and any legislation or order in council we have here in Canada must take this into consideration.

To achieve the objective of protecting these species in danger of extinction, the bill which I propose would prohibit the importation into Canada of not only the furs, skins, etc., of these species but any part thereof or any product manufactured from a part thereof. This would include a cosmetic product that was manufactured from the oil of an endangered species of whale and it would include perhaps costume jewellery manufactured from endangered species of molluscs, etc.

This would go much further, in my view, than we are likely to see in any convention which is presently being drafted by the International Union for Conservation of Nature and National Resources. I have been in touch with our customs people who have been studying the matter, and I gather from talking with our own customs officials that it would be possible for the Canadian government to now or very quickly enforce restrictions under schedule C of the Customs Tariff. I understand this has been discussed with the national body drawing up the convention, but I gather that the body drawing up the convention is concentrating on sources of exports rather than on imports. Because of the world trend today toward simplifying procedures of customs varification through spot checks, it just does not make practical, common sense to try to do very much about imports. I take issue with this and I think they are seriously underestimating the strength of public opinion in this regard.

I would urge strongly that Canada take steps on its own through an order in council to prohibit the importation of all endangered species or parts thereof. I would suggest that even though we may have customs spot checks, as we now have, that arouse public opinion, hon. members of this House could find very many groups in their ridings who would go out policing to make sure that any endangered species of animals which appears on any store counter, or any cosmetic sold in any drugstore which contains a part of an endangered species, a whale for example, would be brought to the attention of the competent authorities. I feel that public opinion would provide much more effective policing than any customs check we could develop. We need not kid ourselves that customs could handle this completely, effectively or in an airtight way, but we do not have to depend on customs. Let us get the law on the books and we will leave it up to the public and the various environmental groups which exist in this country to enforce it; and I am convinced they can.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister—he may already be aware of it—a very serious abuse that has occurred within the last month and a half because we do not have any import regulations of this kind in Canada. The state of New York in particular, as well as the United States in general, have a very tough endangered species act which prohibits the importation into the United States of skins, furs, etc. Approximately six weeks ago a very important shipment of illicit skins from South America came into Canada and was exported to the United States, circumventing the U.S. customs officials. Through some very effective detective work this circumvention was discovered. These illicit traders are using Canada right now as a means to circumvent the severe import restrictions which exist in the United States.

I feel strongly that we should be taking steps now—and we could through an order in council—to prohibit absolutely the importation into Canada of these endangered species. We could bring this regulation in now, and when the international convention is in final form and we approve it by legislation, that could take the place of whatever order in council or regulation we may have enacted.

I hope the minister will be receptive to the suggestion of having at least the substance contained in both the private member's bill submitted by the hon. member for Scarborough West, Bill C-165, and my Bill C-88 referred to the committee which will be considering Bill C-131. I do not ask, necessarily, that the bills themselves be referred to the committee, but if we could have the subject matter referred by unanimous consent it would be useful. We could perhaps bring in a number of witnesses to give their opinion as to precisely the most effective type of measure we could adopt here in Canada to contribute to the cessation of this illicit trade in endangered species or parts thereof.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in the debate on Bill C-131 relating to wildlife services in Canada because of the very direct application it has to the area I represent, namely, the county of Norfolk. The Wildlife Service has only recently purchased a marsh in the area of Long Point from the Big Creek Company, and is presently making a survey of the area for the purpose of administering it to the best advantage of the people of the area and the wildlife which inhabit the marsh.

Let me refer specifically to clauses 3(a) and 3(e) wherein the word "co-operation" appears twice. It refers to the co-operation in wildlife and interpretation thereof and co-operation with the government of the province having an interest. In this particular instance, side by side with that area of the marsh acquired by the Wildlife Service is another area formerly owned by a local resident, Mr. Lee M. Brown, a very ardent conservationalist, comprising about 60 acres. This was recently given to the Long Point conservation authority which administers conservation activities throughout Norfolk and Haldimand counties. This provides an excellent opportunity for the co-operation which is mentioned twice in the bill.

I bring this to the attention of the minister and members of the House because I feel a very grave injustice has been done to Mr. Brown, the conservationalist to whom I referred, in that he was found guilty and fined in a local magistrate's court for contravention of the Migratory Birds Convention Act. Mr. Brown, as I said, has been a lifelong conservationist and is recognized throughout the area as such. He built up a sanctuary for Canada geese there, rivalling in a small way Jack Miner's sanctuary already referred to by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). Crowds are flocking there to see wild geese during the migratory bird season.

I referred to the injustice done to this man, and I think it is best illustrated in a letter written to the editor of the Simcoe Reformer of Tuesday, April 17, part of which I would like to read into the record. It is written by a former editor of that paper, a lifelong resident of Norfolk and a friend of Mr. Brown. This is what he said in part:

> In any case it seems a strange reward to Lee M. Brown for his generous act in deeding the sanctuary and about 60 acres of surrounding property free of charge to the conservation authority. His conviction and the levying of a fine against him is surely a peculiar way to express gratitude to one of Norfolk's leading conservationists and a man who has given many years of his life to building up a sanctuary for Canada geese and other bird life and who has expended many thousands of dollars of his own resources in feeding the thousands of birds and otherwise caring for them—

I will conclude with the following paragraph:

> Now the outcome of this court case must give Mr. Brown occasion to wonder at such an expression of public gratitude for his unremitting work over the years in providing a haven of a unique character for birdlife in the Long Point area. Certainly he had good reason for discouragement in carrying out any further plans of this kind or to turn over more property to an ungrateful officialdom.
> His many friends will resent the injustice done to one of Norfolk's most devoted conservationists.

I knew that this case was coming up so I wrote to the Wildlife Service here. Some of the men in the service are personal friends of Mr. Brown. I thought that in light of what I have already stated it would be only fair and just that this action against him be withdrawn. After all, there is the spirit of the law as well as the letter of the law to observe. I refer again to the co-operation which I trust the legislation proposed in Bill C-131 will bring about among men like Mr. Brown, the Long Point conservation authority under the provincial government, and the Wildlife Service of Canada, and prevent such an incident from ever happening again.

All Mr. Brown was doing was thinning out the male population of blue billed ducks in that area at the time of the mating season, because often they would destroy the nests, kill the females and prevent the proper incubation of eggs. For this act he was technically and legally found guilty and was fined. But, after all, the spirit of the act should be applied as well as the letter of the law. We admit that justice must be done but, most important of all, justice must be seen to be done—and this certainly was not the case with respect to Mr. Brown.

So in supporting this legislation, as we all do, I appeal to the minister to ensure that when the regulations under the act are drawn up and the act is administered, there be some spirit of understanding and of humanity toward those people who are already doing great work in the field of conservation which this bill proposes to assist and increase.

There is more I could say, Mr. Speaker, but I know other hon. members wish to make a contribution to this debate and therefore I will close my remarks.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I also want to join my colleagues in supporting Bill C-131 and the principles and objectives contained therein. It is encouraging to note that the bill authorizes the minister to promote wildlife conservation, engage in various research activities and establish the entering into of agreements with advisory committees, the provinces, municipalities and individual persons.

However, my purpose in entering the debate is specifically to point out what I consider to be a grave injustice done to many farmers in western Canada, particularly those who are located adjacent to bird sanctuaries in areas where waterfowl make their habitat. It is rather disturbing to note that there is nothing in the bill to provide for what I consider to be the basic ingredient in the maintenance of our wildlife, namely, food. For many years ducks and geese have been sponging off the farmer, to his financial and economic detriment and I believe that a great injustice is being done to the farmers directly affected.

It is no great secret that the wildlife of which we are all proud is a natural asset enjoyed by all people. However, I do not believe that the burden of maintaining ducks, geese and waterfowl which migrate should fall totally on the farmers. Millions of dollars worth of damage has been done throughout the years and very little constructive effort has been made to compensate farmers for their losses.

In my own constituency of Vegreville there are two bird sanctuaries, the Beaver Hill sanctuary and the Whitford Lake sanctuary. I believe it is reasonable to assume that the wildlife there is the property of the Canadian people and therefore it should be up to the Canadian people to contribute to its maintenance. I think that the damage done by waterfowl is described very specifically in a booklet that has been put out by the Western Canadian Wildlife Advisory Committee, entitled "Uninvited Guests". To many producers in western Canada, ducks and geese, particularly in the wet fall season, are truly uninvited guests.

In the province of Alberta a fund has been established by the sportsmen of the province for the purpose of defraying some of the losses that the farmers have suffered. This fund was reimbursing $15 per acre over the years, but because of the heavy drain on it this amount has been adjusted to 86.15 per cent of $15, which works out to $12 or $12.50 per acre. I have a claims settlement sheet which was issued to a farmer in my constituency, a gentleman by the name of George Kucher who had 55 acres of barley totally damaged. It was inspected by the inspector of the Alberta hail and crop insurance board. To compensate him for his 100 per cent loss he received $710.74. That is a far cry from what he could have received had he been able to harvest this crop, which was barley. Fifty-five acres of barley would produce roughly $40 to $45 an acre. A reasonable estimate would be $40 an acre, and it would result in this producer obtaining some $2,200 out of his 55 acres of barley. However, because of the damage done by ducks he had to settle for some $710.74.

He lost another 85 acres in the same manner and received $1,098 to cover his loss—a far cry from what he could have received had he been able to harvest the crop. It seems to me that this particular gentleman, as well as many others who are trying to make a living from their efforts at farming, should be entitled to more adequate compensation than they have received, and I believe the federal government and the provincial governments should share the burden.

There are many ways in which this could be done. Perhaps a more effective lure program could be provided. But in addition to the loss which is sustained, each time a producer has to have an inspection it costs him $25 to have an inspector come from the Alberta hail insurance board to inspect his crop. In a particularly wet year he may end up having two or three inspections, depending on the length of time the harvest takes. In this particular case, in the crop year of 1971 Mr. Kucher had to pay out something like $75 for three different inspections made by an inspector of the Alberta hail insurance board.

I do not want to prolong this debate. I simply say to the minister that I hope some mechanism will be provided whereby adequate compensation will be made available to people who are afflicted by loss of crops due to damage by migratory waterfowl. I believe that the payment of $15 per acre is totally insufficient. It should be something in the order of $35 to $40. I believe that the fee of $25 per inspection should be abolished. I also believe more sufficient lure crops and more adequate arrangements for areas situated close to bird sanctuaries should be provided so that losses would not be sustained year after year. Wet years are not uncommon in Canada and losses can occur year after year.

I hope that the minister, in co-operation with the provincial governments and municipalities, will be able to arrive at a suitable arrangement so that these people may be better compensated, thus creating a much greater understanding between those who support our wildlife by providing food and those who enjoy the advantages of our wildlife.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying, on behalf of all my colleagues, that we welcome this piece of legislation and I congratulate the minister for bringing it before the House. It has been said that it is a decade or so late, but better late than never. I think it is, or can be a useful piece of legislation.

The second thing I would like to say is in connection with the remarks of the two hon. members who have introduced bills which deal with the abolition of the trade in the pelts and skins of endangered species. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I wish to convey to both of these colleagues, who are on different sides of the House, the fact that they will have my absolute support in bringing their bills forward and I will do everything within my power to expedite the passage of those bills. Having said that, perhaps some discussion might take place afterward so that this can be achieved.

Having said some nice things, I now want to ask all members of the government side of the House to pay attention for just a few minutes while I say something that I believe they should hear. Let there be no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker; this bill does not do very much more than has been done in practice in the past. Secondly, I am concerned, and I think all hon. members ought to be concerned, that apparently the minister is treating the federal jurisdiction north of 60 degrees, so far as the problem of initiating action under this bill is concerned, as though he were dealing with provinces. I remind all hon. members of the government side that that area comprises 44 per cent of the land mass of Canada and over that 44 per cent we do have federal jurisdiction.

Please let us not back away from the authority we have when we are dealing with a matter which is becoming as vital as the preservation of our wildlife, something which we are now starting to recognize is not an inexhaustible resource, something which is a priceless resource. From the speeches made today it can be seen that we all agree about this. I beg hon. members on the government side to take this message back to their colleagues. Do not back out of an area of jurisdiction and the authority you already have, since this bill can be so useful in that area even if it has its difficulties elsewhere.

I also want to comment that this bill will only be as successful, so far as dealing with the provinces is concerned, as its funding is in order to entice the provinces into the programs envisaged. As a consequence, I hope

hon. members will keep pressure upon the government to make sure that there is sufficient funding from time to time.

There is one other comment I would like to make before I close. Reference has been made today to just about everything one can imagine in the environmental field, but I single out one which I ask all members of the House to consider. That is the question of the leg-hold trap. Hon. members have said that they have received letters from children, adults, organizations and societies pointing out the cruelty of the leg-hold trap. Again I want to say that I will support any legislation to ameliorate this situation. I recognize that there are problems involved, but I ask the government to give it serious consideration and as soon as possible bring something before the House so that we can at least to some degree remove the cruelty that exists under the present trapping system.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the privilege of speaking in this debate. I thank hon. members for their attention. Again I congratulate the minister for bringing this bill before the House, and again I ask that the caveats which I have mentioned be considered by all hon. members in the spirit in which they are given.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss at length the principles of the legislation before us. They have been pretty well covered by other hon. members. I would just like to underline what I think has been put before the House in the form of a suggestion. I hope the minister will indicate some willingness to have the subject of two other bills considered conjointly with this particular bill when it reaches committee stage, namely, Bill C-88 standing in the name of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), and Bill C-165 in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney).

I have been looking at these two bills as they interrelate with Bill C-131. While I realize this is not the place to go into any detailed discussion of the clauses, I would like to draw attention to clause 9 in the bill before us which is headed "Endangered life" and which provides authority for the minister to take measures in co-operation with one or more provincial governments. I think that the thrust of the other two bills I have mentioned might relate to that matter in such a way that the authority proposed in clause 9 could be extended, at least for the time being, to provide authority directly from parliament for the minister to co-operate with other governmental authorities outside Canada.

It is in that context that I think the implications of the two private members' public bills might be considered by the committee. Perhaps something could then be sorted out, with the agreement of the minister, whereby some of the ideas in them could be incorporated into this bill, at least pending any further developments such as were referred to by the hon. member for Laprairie when he made his remarks.

• (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I must notify the House that if the hon. minister speaks now, he will conclude the debate.

Wildlife Protection

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude my remarks before six o'clock because I hope this bill can be sent to committee and there dealt with promptly. Everyone who spoke on this legislation has endorsed the basic principles underlying the bill. Essentially they said that it is good but that perhaps it does not go far enough, and they have asked for clarification.

The hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) charged my ministry and the Canadian Wildlife Service in particular with dashing off in all directions. I might remind him that the amount of money available to the Canadian Wildlife Service in recent years in my view has been too small. It has been increased in the last half-dozen years, but still roughly $10 million a year is not enough to do the job which I believe it should be doing in the next few years.

The hon. members for Skeena (Mr. Howard) referred to species in danger of extinction as if these were the only animals and birds with which the Canadian Wildlife Service is concerned. I am sure he knows of many instances such as the North American duck population which is now several times its original size. The Canadian Wildlife Service has had a major hand in the protection of that species and also in the wise management of much larger populations.

The hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) raised the question of trade in skins, trophies, etc., and of endangered species originating in other parts of the world, with a view to their protection. I might tell him and other members that Environment Canada, and in particular the officials of the Canadian Wildlife Service, have been very active in the drafting of an international convention on endangered species. That convention is in draft form, has been initialled by Canada and will shortly be signed by Canada and a number of other countries. Once it has been endorsed by a large number of countries, which I hope will happen in a matter of months, then in fact under our existing trade and commerce regulations we have the law necessary to put its major stipulation into legal effect in this country, and import and export controls as required will be implemented by this government.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) referred to various projects in this country and suggested that because of financial restrictions the Canadian Wildlife Service was not able to participate adequately in environmental appraisals in the Mackenzie River corridor. The budget over a three-year period is half a million dollars a year, so it has been funded handsomely to carry out that particular job. The three-year program will be completed this fall. Other appraisals have also been undertaken. For example, he referred to the James Bay investigations which are in their third year and in which the Canadian Wildlife Service has participated. He used some of the current phraseology in describing James Bay. I hope he attends the meetings of the committee and cross-examines our experts on wildlife. I will be surprised if he finds them giving evidence that there will be extensive damage to migratory birds, for example, as a result of the James Bay development.

The Peace-Athabasca delta problem has been investigated very carefully and we expect that, at a cost of $2½ million, we will be able to return it to a state of nature. Whether we will be able to collect the $2½ million from British Columbia Hydro remains to be seen but we will try.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) spoke about pothole leasing. That program was researched carefully for several years but is not regarded as very productive by our experts. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) talked about crop depradation. I do not know how well the government in Alberta communicates with hon. members of the federal Conservative party, but a new crop depradation program has been in effect for a year. It was worked out in close consultation with the province. The federal contribution is $1 million per year. This program for the feeding of ducks, geese, and so on, flying backwards and forwards across Canada has worked to the satisfaction of the provincial government and the farmers.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) made an important point. We said that the administrations in the Territories and the Yukon should not be treated as if they were provincial governments. Were he to make the same speech in Yellowknife or Whitehorse he might find a different reception than that from members who live in the Ottawa area. The old-fashioned imperialism which used to see decisions made in the national capital, and very few made in the Territories, has long passed. I believe that the Territorial administration and the administration in the Yukon should be given as much latitude as possible to determine the use of local resources. The Canadian Wildlife Service will provide as much advice as it can, and the hon. member has my assurance that I will step in wherever I believe it necessary in order to avert catastrophe in respect of a particular species.

That is the sum and total of my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I hope this legislation can now be referred to the appropriate standing committee.

[Translation]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

[English]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might rise on a point of order to propose to the House something that has been the subject of discussion with a number of hon. members. It relates to Bill C-88 standing in the name of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), and Bill C-165 in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney), both of which refer to the question of endangered species. As I understand it, there is general agreement that the subject matter of those two bills be referred to the committee as companions to the government bill. Accordingly, I would seek the unanimous consent of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move:

That the subject matter of Bills C-88 and C-165 respecting the protection of endangered species be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The Chair must ask for the unanimous consent of the House to this presentation. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, order for second reading discharged and Bills C-88 and C-165 referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

At 6.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

Minister, Health and Welfare Canada

Ottawa, Ontario, K1A 0K9.

April 18th, 1973.

My dear Minister,

Re: New Financing Arrangements In The Health Care Field

As you will recall, a revised federal proposal for new financing arrangements in the health care field was presented to the Joint Meeting of Ministers of Health and the Federal/Provincial Committee of Ministers of Finance and Provincial Treasurers on January 19, 1973. Provincial ministers at the time were asked to study the revised proposal with a view to reconvening with us in about two months' time for the purpose of trying to reach agreement on the amount of the federal contribution for health services. Telegrams were recently sent to all provincial ministers concerned advising that this further meeting will take place on May 8 and 9.

In the discussion immediately following presentation of the revised federal offer, provincial ministers commented on the financial features of the proposal. They stated their concern about the adequacy of the escalator and questioned whether the newly introduced risk-sharing feature would provide sufficient protection should there be unexpected escalation in costs at a rate in excess of the escalation in the federal contribution. Subsequently, in the course of the technical discussions which took place after January 19 officials of several provinces likewise raised these two issues and elaborated on the reasons for their being a cause of concern. A criticism of the proposed risk-sharing formula related to its non-cumulative characteristics, i.e., it made no provision for repeating in subsequent years any federal contribution in respect of excess escalation in costs that a province might experience in a particular year. There was, of course, a reason for this. In relation to long term cost projections for hospital and medical services and the improved effectiveness which provinces should be able to achieve in providing health services as a result of being able to use the federal contribution throughout the entire range of services, the federal government considered that its contributions under its previous proposal would be adequate. The availability of a large block of thrust funds to assist provinces to develop and introduce more economical methods of delivering services provided further support for this view.

Notwithstanding the above considerations the federal government now has further reviewed these two aspects of the proposal and taking into account the possibility of provinces encountering unexpected situations, has approved further modifications as follows:

(a) The declining 1 per cent adjustment incorporated in the escalator to be advanced from 1974-75 to 1973-74. The following illustrates how the escalator now proposed compares with the one contained in the January 19 proposal:

Fiscal Year	Escalator Now Proposed	Escalator in January 19 Proposal
1972/73	Base Year	Base Year
1973/74	G.N.P. + 1 per cent	G.N.P.
1974/75	G.N.P. + .80 per cent	G.N.P. + 1 per cent
1975/76	G.N.P. + .60 per cent	G.N.P. + .75 per cent
1976/77	G.N.P. + .40 per cent	G.N.P. + .50 per cent
1977/78	G.N.P. + .20 per cent	G.N.P. + .25 per cent
1978/79	G.N.P.	G.N.P.

The base year would continue to be 1972/73 with present arrangements maintained in 1973/74 and thrust funds made available in that year. However, it is necessary to escalate the 1972/73 federal per capita contributions to provinces pursuant to the formula through 1973/74 in order to determine the 1974/75 per capita contributions. You will appreciate that improving the escalator in 1973/74 by advancing the declining 1 per cent has a significant effect on the level of the per capitas, and consequently on the gross contributions in the years thereafter. In particular, it creates a rate of escalation in the federal contribution that matches more closely the rate of escalation in the estimated provincial costs during the early years of the new arrangements.

(b) The risk-sharing formula to be cumulative but on a diminishing basis. In this way, the federal government would be able to take account of certain important provincial concerns, but without abandoning the fundamental objectives of the new financing formula.

Under this approach risk-sharing payments made in a particular year under the "75-50-25" formula contained in the January proposal would be phased out in subsequent years in the following manner:

—a risk-sharing contribution made in the first year, i.e. 1974/75, would be followed by payments equal to 3/4, 1/2 and 1/4 of that contribution in the second, third and fourth years respectively;

—a further risk-sharing contribution or one made for the first time in the second year, i.e., 1975/76, would be followed by payments equal to 2/3 and 1/3 of that contribution in the third and fourth years respectively;

—a similar type of contribution made in the third year would be followed with a payment equal to one-half of that contribution in the fourth year;

—contributions towards excess expenditures in the fourth (1977/78) and fifth (1978/79) years of a new health financing agreement would not be followed by additional payments in subsequent years.

(Note: An illustration of this revised approach is contained in the attached folder).

This modified risk-sharing feature recognizes that excess expenditures i.e., the value of the difference between the rate of escalation in the federal contribution and provincial costs, incurred in a year might recur in whole or in part in succeeding years. This revised approach would relieve the provinces of a portion of the additional financial burden accruing to the provinces in succeeding years as a result of unexpected additional expense in one year. The principle of phasing out risk-sharing payments recognizes that, if a province spends at a rate that exceeds federal contributions in a year, such a province should be able, through economies in other parts of its health program, gradually to de-escalate costs to its original target rate of expenditure. Furthermore, the revised risk-sharing provisions assume that provincial administrations, with the use of thrust funds, will be in a better position to prevent excess expenditures by the last few years of the proposed new arrangements.

Finally, in assessing this revised proposal, provincial ministers no doubt will recall that federal contributions under the risk-sharing formula will be in relation to total health expenditures as defined.

Another issue briefly raised at the January 19 conference and further discussed in the subsequent technical meetings related to the loss of federal contributions under the Canada Assistance Plan that occur when a province changes the basis for its support to health or health related services (such as nursing home care) from a needstest basis to an insured or universal basis. A policy that results in the loss of CAP contributions when a province introduces changes of this nature in the health services field might be inconsistent with the basic objectives of the federal proposal for new financing arrangements. Accordingly, the federal government is prepared to agree that where a province participating under the new arrangements chooses, or has chosen, to make available health or health-related benefits on a universal basis in an area in which there has been federal cost-sharing under the Canada Assistance Plan, that province will be entitled to receive similar levels of federal financial contributions as it would have received had it not introduced the universal program. You will appreciate that this is a rather complex subject and, consequently, the mechanism for implementing this principle has to be worked out jointly. I will be prepared to explore with my provincial counterparts alternative methods for its implementation.

With these additional modifications, I believe the federal proposal now provides a full and reasoned response to the principal concerns which certain provincial governments have enunciated respecting the proposed new health financing agreement.

As for the form of the federal contribution, a number of provinces have suggested that this should be by way of a transfer of tax room. If the newly revised proposal on the quantum contained in this letter is accepted by provincial governments, the federal Minister of Finance remains ready to discuss in detail, at our meeting of May 8-9, the possibility of some transfer of tax room. In this regard I am attaching a copy of a separate letter that Mr. Turner has written to his provincial counterparts.

I am also attaching folders which contain new calculations reflecting the latest cost projections that we have received from the province, recent revisions to our assumptions concerning the future performance of the gross national product and the modification in the escalator described on page 2 of this letter. You will note that on the basis of the assumptions made with respect to future health cost trends of your province and the GNP rate of growth, it is calculated that the basic federal contribution to your province (i.e., excluding the risk-sharing provision) under the proposed new arrangements compares favourably with the estimated contribution that would be made if present arrangements were retained. These figures exclude the additional contributions that would be available should it become necessary to invoke the risk-sharing formula.

You may recall that some months ago I forwarded to you in mimeograph form copies of Dr. A.P. Ruderman's report which formed an appendix to the Report on Community Health Centres prepared by the committee under the chairmanship of Dr. John Hastings. Dr. Ruderman's report now has been printed in final form and I am pleased to forward two copies of it to you.

I look forward to renewing our discussion on the very important subject of new financing arrangements in the health care field, and I hope that this new proposal will meet with your approval and enable us to finalize the matter very soon.

Yours truly,

Marc Lalonde.

The Secretary of State, Canada

Ottawa, May 1, 1973.

You will recall that the Prime Minister wrote to provincial First Ministers on November 9, 1970, suggesting that the post-secondary education fiscal transfer program be extended for two years, in order to provide time for a review of the present arrangements. Following further discussions between my predecessor, the Honourable Gérard Pelletier, and the Council of Ministers of Education, as well as with individual Ministers of Education, it was decided that the 1967 program should continue until March 31, 1974, with a national rate of growth in the federal contribution not exceeding 15 per cent per annum.

The present program of fiscal transfers in support of post-secondary education will therefore have been in operation for seven years when it expires on March 31, 1974. It may be useful, in light of the examination which we have carried out since that time, and of comments of other interested governments, if I were to review briefly a few of the major considerations relating to the development of the program to date.

First, it is significant to note that annual operating expenditures have risen at a rapid rate during the life of the program, especially in the early years when for example the percentage increases were of the order of 25 per cent between 1967-68 and 1968-69, although they declined thereafter to an estimated 7.9 per cent between 1972-73 and 1973-74. It is also noteworthy that, in line with this growth pattern, federal contributions increased substantially in each succeeding year of the program and that the value of transfers to the provinces in respect of post-secondary education will have reached an estimated cumulative total of some $5.3 billion by March 1974, as indicated on an annual basis in table 1.

With the assistance of these transfers the provinces and the institutions were able to set in motion an unprecedented expansion of post-secondary instruction. As shown in table 2, the number of full-time students in universities and colleges and other post-secondary institutions across Canada increased during the first five years of the program by 60 per cent to a total of 497,000. In addition to full-time students, an estimated 250,000 persons were attending post-secondary institutions in Canada on a part-time basis in the fifth year of the program and costs relating to a further 200,000 at the senior matriculation level were also eligible for federal contributions under the program.

A number of demographic factors have also been and will continue to be of major importance. Of particular relevance is the size of the 18-24 age group which up to now has been the source of more than 80 per cent of all full-time post-secondary enrolments. When the present fiscal transfer program went into effect the ranks of Canadians in the 18-24 age group were growing at a record-breaking pace, and by 1971 their number had reached 2.7 million, an increase of 552,000 over a five-year period. As shown in table 3, however, the rate of growth of this age group will be progressively slower in the present decade until approximately 1983 when the number of 18-24 year olds will begin to decline in absolute terms.

The above-mentioned factors indicate, I believe, that the present program was established in 1967 to respond to a very special set of circumstances in the post-secondary education sector, Furthermore, in our view, the program has on the whole been successful in meeting the objectives which were foremost in the governments' minds in 1966. At the same time, we are of course aware that there may have been certain shortcomings in the existing arrangements and that from time to time the program has been the subject of criticism by provincial governments. For example, some provinces are of the opinion that the arrangements have represented a pressure on their priorities and that unavoidable rigidities inherent in the formula may to some degree have inhibited innovation and adaptation of educational structures to changing needs. We are also aware that the program may have permitted certain inequities, in that it allows those provinces in which the greatest amounts are spent to claim the largest federal transfers.

In the circumstances, the federal government has given careful attention, in the course of its review, to ways and means of removing these shortcomings and of introducing improvements which would result in a more satisfactory arrangement from both the provincial and federal points of view. In particular, we have examined a number of alternative financing formulae which might assist in meeting more adequately the generally accepted objectives of interregional and interpersonal equity.

At the same time, we are aware of and accept the continued importance of adequate financing of post-secondary education in Canada and believe that funding should continue at a level which will enable governments to meet their obligations in this sector. As a result, the federal government considers it of prime importance to provide a level of contributions which will ensure that the needs of the provinces can be adequately met on both a medium- and long-term basis.

In light of all the above considerations I should like to propose to provincial governments a conversion of the present program of fiscal transfers into a system of provincial per capita entitlements based on the size of the 18-24 age group in each province and escalated at 7 per cent per annum, subject to a levelling provision designed to bring all provincial per capita entitlements to parity over a ten-year period. Such entitlements would continue to be met through a combination of the present tax points relating to post-secondary education and adjustment payments, and the conversion formula would be in effect for five years commencing April 1, 1974.

The formula would be based on eligible actual operating expenditures for the fiscal year 1973-74 calculated according to part VI of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972. Table 3 indicates that, on the basis of current estimates it is likely that the fiscal transfer will amount in that year to approximately $1,066 million. Table 4 illustrates the estimated entitlement for each province for the year 1974-75 and for each of the four subsequent years. According to our present calculations, an escalator of 7 per cent per annum multiplied by the population 18-24 will produce an average national annual increase in the federal contributions during the next five years of some 9.4 per cent as compared with the latest estimate of a 7.9 increase in eligible operating expenditures on post-secondary education between 1972-73 and 1973-74.

I hope the above proposals will be satisfactory to all provincial governments and I look forward to hearing your reaction at the Federal-Provincial Conference of Ministers of Finance, Health and Education on May 8 and 9. I understand that the question of the post-secondary education fiscal transfer will be dealt with on May 8 in the afternoon.

Yours sincerely,

J. Hugh Faulkner

FINANCING THE FEDERAL SHARE OF HEALTH SERVICES

Notes for Remarks
by Finance Minister John N. Turner
to a Joint Federal-Provincial Meeting of Finance and Health Ministers
Ottawa, May 8, 1973

Introduction:

Mr. Lalonde has just explained the modification in the basic federal formula for determining the amount of the federal financial contribution for provincial health care services and substantial improvements in the so-called "risk-sharing" provisions. He has also given assurances that provinces will retain federal sharing now paid under the Canada Assistance Plan when they switch a health or health-related program from a needs test basis to a universal basis.

The federal proposal thus provides for a reasonable rate of growth in basic federal payments. And it includes a risk-sharing provision which takes account of a number of suggestions we have received from provincial governments. Perhaps most importantly, provinces will be free to spend federal payments throughout the entire range of health services, so that they will be able to plan their programs according to their own priorities. This additional flexibility, together with thrust funds, will assist provincial governments in the development of more effective and economical systems of health delivery. The fact that federal payments will no longer be related to costs will also, of course, mean an end to the detailed federal audit.

As I indicated to provincial ministers of finance in a letter of April 18, if provincial governments are now prepared to agree to the formula which Mr. Lalonde has proposed on behalf of the federal government, I would be ready to consider with you in some detail the form of the federal contribution. In this regard, a number of provincial governments have expressed the view that the federal payment for health services should be via a reduction in federal government taxes. This would enable provinces to increase their rates, with no increase in the tax burden borne by Canadians.

Principles Underpinning Tax Transfer

Accordingly, I should like to make a specific proposal to you today. It is predicated on the condition that provinces are able to agree with the new formula approach for determining the annual federal contribution to provincial health care programs. Before outlining the specific details, however, I want to set out the principles which underlie the tax transfer proposal.

First, the size of the reduction in federal taxes must take into account the expected rate of growth in revenues from the tax room being transferred; it must also take account of increase in the federal contribution for health services. Perhaps this is a point which is not well understood and I should make clear what is involved. Suppose the federal government were to cut its taxes today by the exact number of personal income tax points required to cover the federal contribution for health services in this year and provinces were to raise theirs by a commensurate amount. That number of tax points would, in less than a year, over-compensate provincial governments by a very large amount. The reason, of course, is that the value of tax points is growing more rapidly than the expected rate of growth in provincial spending on health services and the anticipated federal payments for these services.

As a concrete example to illustrate this point, let me take the recent proposal put forward by the Government of Quebec for a 28-point income tax point transfer to cover the federal payment for hospital insurance, medical care and post-secondary education. Our calculations show that such a transfer would, by the end of the decade, yield provincial governments a cumulative sum of more than $10 billion over and above the amount of federal payments otherwise available. Moreover, at that time, the excess payments would be growing at a rate of about $3 billion annually. It was never intended that a transfer of tax room to cover federal obligations under existing shared-cost programs should be used as a mechanism for a large-scale transfer of fiscal revenues from the federal to the provincial level. That is an issue which we have always maintained should be resolved on its own merits, and not determined as a more or less accidental result of new financing arrangements covering shared-cost programs.

Second, we remain convinced that it is in the overriding national interest for the federal government to continue to occupy a large position in the personal income tax field. This is fundamental, if the federal government is to continue to bear the main burden of responsibility for economic stabilization, to maintain harmony in the over-all national tax system, and to fulfill its responsibilities for the distribution of income among Canadians and among the regions of Canada.

Third, as Mr. Lalonde has already mentioned, if the federal government is to cut taxes to pay for its share of health services, this would have to be based upon firm undertakings that the basic principles of the existing hospital and medical legislation remain unaltered. I refer here to the principles relating to the universality and comprehensiveness of services; the accessibility of these services to the Canadian people; their public, non-profit nature; and the portability of coverage for individual Canadians moving from one province to another. The importance of maintaining these conditions has been emphasized in the past and, from earlier discussions, I believe there is a consensus in support of this position.

Let me add one further important point. The transfer of tax room can only be made operative if all provinces accept the new financing arrangements. We cannot see our way clear to implement the necessary tax cut unless it can be applied across the country. Otherwise, there would be different basic levels of federal taxation from province to province. This is a situation which we would regard as injurious to national unity and the growth and efficiency of the national economy.

Details of Proposal

Bearing these principles in mind, we would like to suggest a transfer of tax room in two parts, together wiith a continuation of cash adjustment payments for as long as they may be required.

First, we would be prepared to reduce the rate of federal personal income tax by 6 percentage points. These tax points would be equalized to the national average under the existing provisions of the Fiscal Arrangements Act. The federal government would give a firm undertaking to effect this transfer. But, for reasons I shall explain in a moment, we do not think it would be practical, or desirable to make it operative until January 1, 1977. An appropriate cash payment would therefore be continued during this transitional period.

Second, we would be prepared to eliminate the existing federal excise taxes and duties on domestic and imported tobacco products, spirits, brandy, wine and beer. Provincial governments would then be able to move into this tax room without any increase in costs to consumers. It would be possible to implement the federal tax cut effective on January 1, 1975. The additional revenues that provinces could obtain from these revenue sources would also be equalized to the national average. Provincial governments, of course, already obtain large amounts of revenues from these two tax sources. Federal withdrawal would thus enable provinces to consolidate their revenue position in these areas.

Third, to the extent that the value of the tax cut is not sufficient to pay for the federal contribution for health services, as determined under the GNP-escalated formula, the federal government would make this up by a cash adjustment. In due course, and at varying dates, the growth in the yield of the taxes transferred would provide revenues to each province equal to and higher than the federal payment otherwise due.

Mechanics of the Tax Proposal

Let me elaborate a little on the important question of the mechanics of the tax transfers proposed.

With respect to the personal income tax, I must make clear, at the outset, that for reasons which are well known to all of you the federal government will not effect its tax cut through the abatement system. Rather, the tax cut would be implemented through the introduction of new federal and provincial rate schedules. When the federal government reduces its rate, provincial administrations will be able to obtain the federal revenues foregone by increasing their tax rates. There would be no additional burden on taxpayers.

However, as I have already indicated, we do not think it desirable to try to implement this major change in the federal rate structure until January 1, 1977. There are two reasons for this. The first is that Canadian taxpayers have only recently been subject to some fairly extensive changes in the structure of the personal income tax system. This is the first year in which they will have an opportunity to become accustomed to new forms and new schedules. In addition, a number of provincial governments have recently introduced changes in their own personal income tax systems in the form of property tax credits, school tax credits and so forth. We think it is very desirable to give the tax system a chance to settle down before any further major changes are made. Second, by 1977, we will have had some years of experience with the new tax system. We need that experience to obtain more adequate information respecting the system. That date appears to me as the most appropriate time at which the transfer could be formally effected. Naturally, provinces would be paid in the form of cash until the federal income taxes are cut.

As for the proposal respecting excise levies, the federal government would amend the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Customs Tariff in order to remove the special excise taxes and duties on tobacco products and alcoholic beverages. This includes the excise element of the customs duties on imports of such goods.

In the case of tobacco products, the repeal of federal excise levies would allow the provinces to increase provincial sales taxes on these goods by an equivalent amount without increasing tobacco prices. The provinces would thus acquire additional revenue equal to the amount of federal revenue foregone.

In the case of spirits and wines, the provinces, by holding constant their retail prices on these beverages, would acquire the federal revenues foregone because of the elimination of the federal excise taxes and duties on these products. The transfer of revenues from spirits and wines would thus be effected through an implicit increase in provincial mark-ups. In provinces where certain Canadian wines are retailed through manufacturers' outlets, the recovery by the province of federal levies on such wines might require the introduction of a special provincial tax.

The transfer of federal revenues on beer could be effected by provinces increasing their levies on breweries simultaneously with the repeal of the federal excise taxes and duties.

I understand that the value of the tax room provided to each province through a repeal of excise taxes and duties would be relatively simple to measure. Excise rates on alcoholic beverages and most tobacco products are expressed as fixed amounts per unit or gallon. Accordingly, the value of the tax room in each province would be determined by multiplying those rates by the quantities sold in each province. I should add that the elimination of excise levies on alcoholic beverages would not mean that federal supervision over quality control in the production of these products would end. The federal government would continue to maintain supervisory personnel in distilleries and breweries to ensure quality control.

We would also propose that any additonal revenues which flow to the provinces as a result of higher provincial tax rates on personal income, alcohol and tobacco, would be equalized automatically under the general equalization formula in the Fiscal Arrangements Act. The amount of equalization would of course be treated as an integral part of the federal payment for health services to the seven provinces receiving equalization.

In the case of Quebec, there is already in place a special 16-point personal income tax abatement which constitutes a part of the federal contribution for hospital insurance in that province. If the provinces agree with our proposal and the federal government goes ahead with a reduction of 6 points of personal income tax, I shall want to consult with the minister of finance for Quebec concerning the future status of the special abatement.

Financial Aspects of the Proposed Tax Transfer

I want to say a word now about the financial implications of the proposed transfer of tax room. The year 1975 is the first year in which the federal duties and taxes would be eliminated. In that year, I estimate the value of the proposed transfer of excise tax room would be worth about $1.4 billion, including associated equalization. I estimate this $1.4 billion will be a little more than half the proposed federal contribution for health services in that year. Fiscal year 1977-78 would be the first complete year in the new health financing agreement in which both the excise taxes and personal income tax transfers would be effective. In 1977-78 I estimate that, for the country as a whole, about 85 to 90 per cent of the federal payment will be covered by the tax transfer. This percentage will vary somewhat from province to province, but it would appear that, in 1977-78, all provinces will receive at least 75 per cent of the federal payment through the proposed transfer of tax room.

You are all aware that the value of personal income tax points grows rapidly, whereas revenues from alcohol and tobacco taxes grow relatively less quickly. By combining the two, I believe we have a package which will provide an appropriate rate of growth of revenue to pay for health programs. Over a period of years, as the value of the personal income tax component grows relative to the excise room, the value of the tax cuts by the federal government will gradually reduce the required cash adjustment. In due course, provincial governments can reasonably anticipate that the tax transfer will more than cover the federal commitment.

Of course, I do not want to suggest that provincial governments would have to increase their tax rates by the precise amount of the federal cut. Provinces can raise their levies more or less than the federal reduction, as they see fit, and they obviously could alter the mix between personal income tax or their taxes on alcohol and tobacco.

Our estimates are no more than estimates. It is still not possible to be precise about the yield of the personal income tax under the new tax system. Furthermore, any projections about the future value of tax points are based heavily on estimates respecting the future growth of the economy. If the value of the tax room transferred should grow very rapidly, then the date when the value of tax room exceeds the amount of the federal contribution would arrive sooner. If the growth rate in the tax room being transferred turns out to be less than we estimate, provincial governments will receive larger cash adjustment payments.

Conclusions

Let me summarize the essential points in the federal proposal respecting the formula and the tax transfer. The proposal would enable provincial governments to spend the funds they receive as they see fit. The additional flexibility provided will enable them to introduce and operate more economic and effective ways of delivering health services. The amount of the reduction in federal taxes will, in due course, enable them to administer their programs without direct federal financial support. In fact, provinces may experience a "surplus" relative to the federal government's financial commitment respecting provincial health costs.

I understand that this subject will be on the agenda of the first ministers' meeting later this month. I recognize that not all of you will be able to comment in detail today on the proposal which I have put before you. However, it would be helpful to get preliminary reactions from you.

I believe that if we can reach an agreement on the federal payment, thus making it possible to implement the tax transfer, we shall have taken a large and important step forward. The winner, as a result, will be the Canadian people—both as taxpayers and recipients of health services.

FINANCING FEDERAL AID TO POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

[The attached statement by Finance Minister John N. Turner to the joint federal-provincial meeting of finance and education ministers responds to a letter from the Honourable Saul Miller, Manitoba Minister of Colleges and University Affairs. Mr. Miller's letter, written on the behalf of the provinces' Council of Education Ministers, proposed a transfer of additional tax points to the provinces to finance post-secondary education.]

I would like to address myself to three points made in the letter: (1) the suggestion that the federal government should transfer additional personal income tax points to the provinces in the form of a tax abatement to finance post-secondary education; (2) that these tax points should be equalized to the value of the tax in the province with the highest yield; (3) the implication that this program should be used as a means to transfer a greater share of revenues from the Government of Canada to provincial governments for general purposes.

The letter outlines the reasons why the transfer of additional tax points is being requested. Essentially, it is argued that a transfer in the form of tax points would avoid interfering with the ability of individual provinces to determine their own priorities. It would also allow provinces greater flexibility to achieve greater efficiency and improvement in services. Finally, it would eliminate the administrative complexities of the present arrangements, related to such things as the definition of shareable costs, settlement of final payments and apparent inconsistencies in practice from province to province.

I might say at the outset that the formula Mr. Faulkner has presented to you this afternoon will overcome the problems just described. Under the new formula, which relates the federal contribution to factors other than actual program operating costs, provinces would be freed from the administrative intrusion that inevitably results when contributions are related to actual program practices and costs. Provinces would have all of the freedom and flexibility they needed to develop their own programs as they see fit.

The suggestion that additional personal income tax points be transferred from the Government of Canada to provincial governments does not appear to me to be justified. At the present time, the 4.357 points of personal income tax and the one point of corporate taxable income, both equalized to the national average, which form part of the federal payment to the provinces, cover about 55 per cent of the federal contribution. The remainder is, of course, paid out in the form of cash to the provinces. We all foresee that the value of these tax points will increase at a more rapid rate than the rates at which post-secondary education costs will rise. As a result, the value of the tax points already abated to provinces will exceed the federal financial commitment in the foreseeable future. From the day this happens, provinces will in effect be receiving an "overpayment", if I may put it that way, for this program. Moreover, the amount of this "overpayment" will increase each year as the value of the tax points increases relative to the increase in program costs.

A major objective on our part, which I believe provincial governments would share, is to establish conditions that allow provinces the freedom and flexibility they are asking for to manage their own programs of post-secondary education, while maintaining a reasonable growth of federal contributions. By a reasonable growth rate, we mean a rate that is roughly commensurate with the growth in the national economy.

The formula proposed, consisting of the 1973-74 actual federal contribution escalated by the rate of growth of the population group 18-24 years of age, together with the 7 per cent escalation factor, will add up to an annual growth of between 9 and 10 per cent in federal contributions. This formula represents a generous contribution towards provincial post-secondary education costs and is somewhat higher than the growth in costs anticipated for the current fiscal year. It provides an adequate margin for improving provincial post-secondary education programs, over and above what might be needed to meet rising prices. A transfer of additional tax points, as I pointed out, would involve a much higher rate of federal contribution and would jeopardize the goal of reasonable growth. Alternatively, the transfer of additional tax points would merely mean that this program was used as a device for transferring resources to the provinces, for purposes other than post-secondary education. I do not see how we could justify such a step on either grounds.

The second point in Mr. Miller's letter I would like to comment on is the suggestion for a new system of equalization based on the province where the yield is highest. The basic principle underlying the general equalization program contained in the Fiscal Arrangements Act, and generally accepted by both recipient and non-recipient provinces alike, is that the lower-income provinces should receive a federal grant to enable them to finance a national average level of services. This is still a valid national policy objective. The suggestion in Mr. Miller's letter is in conflict with this principle. Moreover, I would note that equalization of some tax points to the value in the province with the highest yield, rather than to the national average, value would imply that post-secondary education programs have a higher priority than we may, in fact, be prepared to accord them. I would put these programs in a privileged position vis-à-vis other programs competing for national resources. I fail to see the justification for such special treatment.

The last point I want to comment on is the implication that post-secondary education programs should be used as a means to transfer more tax revenue from the federal to provincial governments in order to meet growing cost pressures. I take it that these "growing cost pressures" relate to programs other than post-secondary education. Recent experience has shown considerable easing in the rate of growth of expenditures on post-secondary education.

If the problem is pressure on government programs generally, it seems to me that the post-secondary education program should not be used as a vehicle for meeting it. Rather the case for more revenues should be argued on its own merits. As I said this morning, it was never intended that a transfer of tax room to cover federal obligations under existing shared-cost programs should be used as a mechanism for a large scale transfer of fiscal resources from the federal to the provincial governments. This morning I proposed transfering all of the excise taxes and duties on tobacco and alcohol plus 6 personal income tax points to the provinces to help in the financing of health programs. I fully appreciate the views and concerns of provinces who have requested tax room to finance well-established programs, and this has been reflected in our proposal this morning. At the same time, we have to move carefully in this direction so as not to erode seriously the ability of the federal government to use the tax system as a major instrument of economic policy.

In this connection, I can only repeat what we have so often maintained in the past: that the federal government has a responsibility to maintain sufficient control over the income tax system to permit it to effectively manage the economy and to achieve a greater degree of equality in the distribution of income between provinces and between individuals.

I might also draw to the attention of our provincial colleagues that the recent federal budget contained three major measures making for larger provincial revenues or tax room. First, the personal income tax was cut substantially, in the order of $1.3 billion, and these amounts have no termination date. Second, the rapid economic upswing that is developing from the budgetary measures will increase provincial revenues in the order of $400 million accumulated over a period of two years. Third, the inclusion in the general equalization system of municipal taxes imposed for local school purposes will add about $190 million beginning this fiscal year to the seven lower-income provinces. In all, I think it fair to say that these moves have assisted provinces during this current year in financing their growing budgets without generalized tax increases.

These conclude my comments on the suggestions in Mr. Miller's letter.

THE GUARANTEE OF PROVINCIAL REVENUES

Notes for Remarks
by Finance Minister John N. Turner
to a Joint Federal-Provincial Meeting of Finance Ministers and Treasurers

You will recall that the revenue guarantee was originally proposed as a device to ensure that provinces, which adopted income tax legislation conforming to that of the federal government, would receive no less in tax revenue under the new system of tax reform than under the previous tax system, had it remained in place. We could not know the precise effects of tax reform, or be certain whether a province would suffer a loss of revenue by adopting the new system.

The best estimates at the time indicated that the tax base upon which new provincial personal income tax rates would be levied would be about 8 per cent lower than the so-called federal "basic tax" employed under the old tax system. Accordingly, our calculations suggested that provinces levying rates in the proportion of 30.5 over 28 of their 1971 rates would be receiving about the same amount of revenue under the new system as under the old. If it turned out that the calculations of the federal government were wrong, and the provinces received more revenue under the new system, they would retain this benefit. On the other hand, if the provincial revenues received from applying the new, higher converted rate to the lower base were less than the amount estimated to be received under the old system, this difference would be made up as part of the guarantee. The guarantee, you recall, covers the combined yields of the personal and corporate income taxes, including associated equalization. Thus, as long as provinces continued to conform to the federal income tax legislation and expressed their provincial income taxes on the federal base, the guarantee would be operative.

I have been reviewing the revenue guarantee in the light of its original intent, and taking account of developments since its inception in January, 1972. I must admit that the guarantee has become an exceedingly complicated issue, both in technical terms but, more importantly, in its broader context. The original intent of the guarantee was to encourage provinces to conform to the new federal income tax legislation. If provinces conformed and expressed their tax rates on the basis of federal tax payable, the federal government was prepared to guarantee the yield of the new system to be at least equivalent to that of the old. To this end, the federal government calculated new converted tax rates, designed to yield revenues equal to the old system and guaranteed that the application of these rates would yield revenues equal to the old system.

It can be argued that the guarantee should not compensate for any changes in the tax system subsequent to January, 1972. If changes did occur to the federal tax base so as to affect provincial revenues, the provincial tax rates ought to be adjusted to yield the same revenues as before the changes, in the manner followed at the beginning of 1972. While these arguments have some merit, I am of the view that the position we have adopted respecting the changes announced for 1972 and 1973 is appropriate.

In the budget of February 19, I proposed a number of changes which would reduce the personal income tax burden on Canadian taxpayers. These included increases in personal expemptions from $1,500 to $1,600 for single persons and from $2,850 to $3,000 for married persons effective January 1, 1973. I also proposed that the exemptions and tax brackets would be automatically increased each year by reference to changes in the consumer price index. This indexation of the personal income tax system, which is to begin in 1974, is designed to relieve taxpayers of increased income taxes which arise not from gains in productivity, but from the interaction of inflation and the progressive nature of the tax system.

I announced at the time of the budget that the reduction in provincial revenues arising out of the increased exemptions for individual taxpayers would be covered under the provisions of the revenue guarantee contained in part IV of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972. This action parallels a similar decision taken in May, 1972 when I announced that the measures reducing both personal and corporation income taxes would also be covered by the guarantee.

Still, the indexation of the personal income tax, to begin in 1974, appears to me to differ in substance from other changes that have been proposed or enacted. In essence, the indexation proposal reduces the tax burden on individuals which arise out of inflationary, not real, gains and adds a greater degree of fairness to the tax system. As a corollary, governments will no longer be able to spend tax money arising from inflationary gains, but will be required to increase tax rates explicitly, in order to carry out more ambitious spending programs.

The indexation proposal was well received by Parliament and by Canadian taxpayers generally. I am not surprised by this reaction, since the proposal constitutes a major advance in the fairness and equity of the tax system. We all recognize that this advance is not without cost. The proposal means that governments will receive somewhat less revenue than they would otherwise have obtained from a continuation of the present system. This is necessary to give meaning to the indexing feature. I would emphasize, however, that the only revenues thereby foregone by governments are those which the tax structure would have imposed on inflationary, and not real, gains in income. Under these circumstances, it seems to me entirely inappropriate for provinces to expect compensation for those foregone revenues. I would not expect provincial governments to ask the federal government to increase its taxes on Canadian taxpayers, who have had their burden relieved by indexation, in order to make payments to provinces, equal to inflationary revenue gains they would have received in the absence of indexing.

Admittedly, the entire subject of the revenue guarantee is complicated, and I will want to consult with each of you over the coming several months, to arrive at some commonly acceptable solution. There is a particularly difficult problem of adjustment for all provinces when the guarantee comes to an end in 1976. I have been giving some further thought to the situation both immediate and forthcoming. In due course, I would want to consult with you with some concrete proposals. Perhaps we will find it advantageous at an appropriate early date to have some technical aspects of the matter explored by our officials.

I would welcome comments from you on this matter.

ENERGY

CRUDE OIL PRICE INCREASE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I desire to present a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Imperial Oil Company Limited has increased the price of crude oil by 25 cents a barrel effective May 1. This and other recent increases have no relation to increased costs of production and are related entirely to the oil shortage in the United States of which the oil companies are taking an unfair advantage.

In view of the fact that the area west of the Ottawa Valley has been made a captive market for western oil by act of parliament and that consumers are entitled to protection from unjustified increases in the price of crude oil and gasoline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding):

That the government take immediate steps to introduce legislation empowering the National Energy Board to set fair and equitable prices for all crude oil produced and sold in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member under Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON RECIPROCAL PRIVILEGES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to propose a motion to the House based upon an urgent and pressing case. In April, 1970, Canada and the United States signed an agreement relating to reciprocal fishing privileges in certain waters adjacent to each other's coasts which carried with it certain benefits and rationalizations in terms of fishing. There have been some discussions about this matter between the two countries and the negotiations have come to an end. As a consequence there is a possibility in the very near future that the agreement will terminate, which will be a disaster for the fishing industry. Therefore I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to inquire into, and give priority to, the question of the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United States of America on reciprocal fishing privileges in certain areas off their coasts signed in Ottawa on the twenty-fourth day of April, 1970, the expiration of which is imminent.

If there is agreement to that motion, Mr. Speaker, I propose—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

RAILWAY ACT

PROVISION FOR MANDATORY PUBLIC HEARINGS ON APPLICATIONS TO REMOVE STATION AGENTS, CARETAKER-AGENTS OR CARETAKERS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-179, to amend the Railway Act (deviations, changes and removal).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knight: At the present time, Mr. Speaker, section 120 of the Railway Act does not provide for a mandatory public hearing to be held when railway companies make application to remove any regular station agent, caretaker-agent or caretaker. This amendment would provide for the requirement of a public hearing. At the same time there is no requirement for the type of service that must be provided by the railway's personal contact. This amendment would spell out the services to be included by such company representative if permission has been granted for the removal of regular station agents, caretaker-agent or caretaker. Therefore this bill would help protect the consumer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN FOOD COSTS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. I refer to the latest lecture the people of Canada have received from the Minister of Agriculture and specifically to the statement by the minister accusing price-conscious consumers of being spoiled by low costs. Was the minister expressing the policy of the government in this statement and, if not, would the Prime Minister tell the House exactly what the policy of the government is or who is enunciating government policy? I think we have arrived at a time when the people of Canada should know what the policy of the government is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The first part of the hon. member's question is, of course, in order, and the Prime Minister will be given the floor for the purpose of answering.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the particular part of the speech that the hon. member refers to is obviously not a matter of policy; it is a matter of opinion whether the people are spoiled. It is a matter of judgment. The policy of the government on all these matters is shared by the Minister of Agriculture and the rest of his cabinet colleagues.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister clear up this matter and tell the House precisely what the policy of the government is with regard to the continuing increases in the cost of living?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will stay around today he will hear the Minister of Finance and other spokesmen for the government give answers to this question.

GUIDELINES TO BE GIVEN PROPOSED PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister tell us exactly what guidelines the government proposes to give to the Prices Review Board which is in the process, we believe, of being set up? Will the policy enunciated by the Minister of Agriculture prevail, or exactly what guidelines will be given to the Prices Review Board?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the guidelines are reflected by the statement I made on April 27 announcing the decision of the government to create such a board.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEASURES TO STABILIZE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister. In light of what the right hon. gentleman has said and the statement by the Minister of Finance to the joint meeting on Monday that the federal government is to continue to bear the main burden of responsibility for economic stabilization, and as the Prime Minister cannot tell us today what he is going to do, would he take the first opportunity on motions to make a statement indicating by what means the government intends to exercise this responsibility and give absolute priority to the question of economic stabilization rather than merely to the survival of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, I believe that this is the very subject which is going to be discussed later today as a result of the motion to be put by the opposition. Members of the House and, indeed, the people of the country will see that the government is very much concerned about this problem. The answers and explanations of our position will be contained in the statements by the Minister of Finance and other spokesmen for the government later this day. I hope the hon. member will see his way clear to staying around and listening to some of the excellent speeches which will be made on this side of the House.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF CRUDE OIL—SUGGESTION THAT ENERGY BOARD FIX PRICE FOR PRODUCT PRODUCED AND SOLD IN CANADA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the right hon. gentleman. In view of the fact that the price of crude oil in western Canada has gone up by 55 cents a barrel in the last six months, and in view of the fact that the area west of the Ottawa Valley is a captive market since it does not enjoy the benefit of competition from offshore oil, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to a two-price system by which the National Energy Board would be able to fix a fair and equitable price for crude oil produced and sold in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the question of whether the government is giving consideration, the answer is that the government has indeed considered a great number of measures and counter-measures. On whether there will be any policy on this or on other aspects of the energy question announced, I want to say that the minister responsible is presently in Europe attending a very important conference on the problem of energy in the western world, and he will be able to answer the hon. member as to any plans he has in future.

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—REQUEST THAT FAMILY ALLOWANCES BE INCREASED IMMEDIATELY TO HELP THOSE ON LOW INCOMES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. As the Minister of Agriculture has stated that one-third of the Canadian people, those on low incomes, are hurt by rising food prices but will be helped by increases in old age pensions and family allowances, is it the intention of the government to increase immediately family allowances and old age pensions, specifically to compensate for the fast rise in food prices, or must these people wait for another six months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we certainly want to make sure that these measures are implemented as soon as possible. I repeat my regret that the measure is not in existence now, in the case of family allowances of $20, because we had hoped that it would be applicable since January 1 of this year. Unfortunately, members sitting on the opposition front benches did not see fit to go along with that legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously, we are going to have debate on this point. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Egmont on supplementaries, and return to this subject after we have completed the first round of questioning. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be given an opportunity to ask his supplementary later.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister a perfectly sensible, non-controversial question. The Prime Minister made a wisecracking reply and a misleading statement, but that is no reason why at this stage of the game I should not be allowed to ask a normal supplementary question to a good first question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the Prime Minister. Hon. members appreciate the difficulty of the Chair in attempting to complete the first round of questioning. The hon. member says he has a perfectly legitimate supplementary. I do not quarrel with that. I am sure it will be quite in order when he is recognized for that purpose. Other members wish to ask supplementaries. The hon. member for Champlain is waiting for his turn to ask a question. I do not see why hon. members should object to the Chair trying to complete the first round of questioning and then return to this very important matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This is why I recognized the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the Prime Minister did not give me a factual answer. On a question of privilege, I request the right to straighten out this matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: My question of privilege is this. The Prime Minister knows there was nothing to stop the government bringing in that bill if it had wished to do so. It could have brought in bills to increase old age pensions and family allowances at any time during the past four months. The Prime Minister knows he is misleading the House and the Canadian people by making a statement that is absolutely untrue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I heard the member for Edmonton West say I deliberately misled the House. I do not believe he should have said this. I would ask him to withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps at this point hon. members will appreciate what I thought was basic wisdom a moment ago when I tried to continue with the questioning in an orderly way. I think the hon. member could have waited a moment to ask a supplementary. There was not much point in rising on what he called a question of privilege. On his question of privilege, the Prime Minister says he heard a member say he deliberately misled the House. Of course, no member can say that. With all the noise that prevailed in the House. I certainly did not hear the hon. member for Edmonton West or any other member make that statement. I am not sure whether it will appear in Hansard. The hon. member for Edmonton West appeared to want to rise a moment ago. If the words were spoken, I am sure he will want to agree with me that they are not parliamentary.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to reply to the question of privilege. I appreciate the difficulty in which Your Honour finds himself, having experienced the same difficulties in the past, in not hearing words exchanged. I will avow, Mr. Speaker, that I did say the Prime Minister deliberately misled the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On this score, either the Prime Minister is ignorant of the facts and has ignorantly misled the House or in making the statement he has induced the House, but with intention.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will say this in reply—

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Let him continue.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If I have transgressed the usage of language in saying that the Prime Minister has deliberately misled the House I will apologize to Your Honour and to the House for using those words. But I will not withdraw the words that he was ignorant of the facts.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can charge another member with ignorance, of course.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is unparliamentary. I would even go further and say that the hon. member does not have to apologize. I very often hear hon. members who are charged with uttering unparliamentary language rise and make an apology. What is required is not an apology, because that is perhaps going too far. The hon. member has not been asked to do that. He has been asked to withdraw the words, and I gather he does so. I would hope that we could again try to continue with the question period. I understand the point of view of the hon. member. He makes a distinction between what he said and what he wanted to say. He withdraws what he said and asserts what he wanted to say, and I guess we would all agree to that.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like the withdrawal to be unequivocal. I must say that if the hon. member has some doubt—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —I am prepared to see the matter brought before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and I will gladly appear before the committee. I do not consider that he has withdrawn the statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I appeal to hon. members. I really thought that the hon. member's withdrawal was unequivocal. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. Hees: Certainly, it was.

Mr. Speaker: I consider it that way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Edmonton West said he withdrew those words. He said he withdrew the words that the Prime Minister deliberately misled the House. That is my understanding. I will read Hansard tomorrow to see whether it is confirmed. I indicated to the hon. member a few moments ago that that was my interpretation of his words, and he confirms that impression; he asserts this in looking at the Chair. I accept this. I am entirely satisfied with what the hon. member has said. What more can we do? We could go on debating for a long time whether there has been a withdrawal. The Chair has to make the interpretation of the words of explanation given by a member who utters unparliamentary language. My ruling was that the language was unparliamentary. The hon. member, who knows the rules better than I do, recognizes it and has withdrawn. I would hope we could now go on to hear the hon. member for York South who has been waiting patiently in the wings.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Just listen, for a change. I think the importance of the point of order should not be lost on all members of the House.

Mr. Reid: It is certainly lost on you!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Twice during the last three days the Prime Minister, in answer to a direct question about immediate action on the proposal to increase family allowances put forward by the Minister of National Health and Welfare recently, replied with an answer that had nothing whatever to do with that question. He attempted to indicate that members on this side of the House were opposed to that proposition and, in addition, he attempted, in a manner which is well known not only to members of this House but to people generally, to indicate that the program which was being discussed here in this place this week was the same program as had been advanced by the government last year, which it definitely was not. I think that if the Prime Minister wishes to resort to this kind of childishness he could be spending his time in better places, perhaps with my five-year old in kindergarten.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière always speaks with lots of wisdom, and I will hear him with pleasure.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker,—

[English]

An hon. Member: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We might allow another member to rise on a point of order, and that is the hon. member for Lotbinière. He has asked for the floor on a point of order and he is recognized for that purpose.

[Translation]

I apologize to the hon. member for Lotbinière. He has the floor.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would once again like to urge my colleagues to ensure that the first speakers during the oral question period do not ask supplementary questions, in order to do justice to all parties in the House, and to stop wasting time.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say on behalf of our party that you can count on our support in your efforts to maintain order in the House, and I once again draw the attention of the Progressive Conservatives to the sad show they give, asking them to cease wasting time in the House during the question period.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is this not the same as your points of order?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Why not give a chance to others, you bunch of egoists!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): When it is one of your points of order, it is all right.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): We are the parliament, not you.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. I hope we have gone beyond points of order and questions of privilege and will return to trying to complete the first round of questioning. I want to assure hon. members to my left who want to ask supplementaries that they will be given this opportunity in a moment, including the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. The hon. member for York South has the floor.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

GRASSY NARROWS AND WHITE DOG RESERVES—MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF FISH—GOVERNMENT ACTION—PROVISION OF ALTERNATIVE FOOD

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I was tempted to rise on a point of order but may I pose some questions to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister knows that there has for some considerable time been a problem with the mercury pollution of a river system which has affected the residents of White Dog and Grassy Narrows reserves in northwestern Ontario. I have met with some of the leaders of these reserves—

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The rules apply equally to all hon. members of this House. The hon. member for York South is not permitted during the question period to make a statement, and that is precisely what he is doing now.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is right. I agree with the hon. member for St. John's East that no member should make statements, allegations or declarations while asking a question. That is why I objected earlier, I thought very gently, when the hon. member for St. John's East asked a question, and I will with equal kindness ask the hon. member for York South to ask a question and not make a statement.

Mr. Lewis: With great respect, I object to Your Honour agreeing with that perfectly unjust statement. I was not making a statement. Instead of saying "in view of the fact that there has been" I said "there has been". That is all I did, and I really do not appreciate this kind of nonsense on the part of the hon. member.

As the minister knows, there has been a problem for some years with mercury pollution of a river system affecting the residents of two reserves in northwestern Ontario. I wish to ask the minister whether his department has been in touch with the situation, has made tests of the inhabitants of those two reserves, or has taken any other action to assist the residents of those reserves?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have been aware of this problem for many years and I know that on several occasions it was necessary to see to it that Indians of this region change their fishing habits.

I think that my department's officials have communicated with the provincial authorities about the causes of such pollution. I have not yet received any report on its effect on the Indians of that region, but I shall inquire from the Minister of National Health and Welfare who looks after the health problems of the Indians and find out if he might give a reply to the hon. member.

● (1430)

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has his department been in touch with the residents of those two reserves, White Dog and Grassy Narrows, and have any steps been taken to supply the residents of those two reserves with alternative food to the fish they cannot now use in health?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario government played a very prominent role in that field, especially because it seems that the pollution was caused by a company which dumped a considerable amount of mercury in the river and lakes concerned. The Ontario government was responsible for the situation and my Ontario colleague followed the matter closely.

In addition, a special team of doctors from my department was sent to the area to study the situation and make additional tests with a view to establishing whether or not the health of the persons affected is in fact threatened. These tests have not been completed. My department and the Ontario Health Department have been working very closely in conjunction with this matter for several weeks if not several months.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question, and I go back to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Even though Ontario has jurisdiction over the waters concerned and also the health question, working together with the federal department, in view of the fact the federal ministry still has a responsibility under the BNA Act and the Indian Act for the welfare of these people, I should like to ask the minister whether discussions have taken place to make available to the residents of those two reserves other nearby lakes or waters where they can continue their fishing habits and occupations?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am taking the hon. member's recommendation under advisement and shall see whether it would not be possible to implement it in order to improve the lot of the Indians of that area.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR EXTENSION OF PROJECTS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of protests raised as a result of application of certain criteria for granting extensions of local initiatives projects, can the minister indicate whether he is considering changing such criteria?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Not at this stage, Mr. Speaker. We are reviewing these matters at all times and if there is any change in the program we will be announcing it.

[Translation]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—MONTREAL—SUGGESTION THAT SEASONAL UNEMPLOYMENT RATE BE ADOPTED AS CRITERION FOR APPROVAL OF PROJECTS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Given the fact that the Montreal area is disqualified for local initiatives projects because the unemployment rate for that region in March was 6.7 per cent instead of 6.8 per cent, according to the project acceptance criterion, could the hon. minister responsible for this program consider the seasonal rather than the monthly unemployment rate for March as the project acceptance criterion, thus allowing the Montreal area to benefit from the Local Initiatives Programs in 1973?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are using the same yardsticks consistently throughout all regions of the country. Incidentally, by that same calculation the rate for the Montreal Canada Manpower Centre area is not 6.7 per cent but rather 5.9 per cent.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another supplementary question.

Could the hon. minister—he did not answer my question a moment ago—consider the seasonal rather than the monthly unemployment rate for March as the project acceptance criterion for local initiatives projects?

[English]

Mr. Andras: The problem is that we would have to change the basic criteria all the way through. Every one of these is a relative matter and I doubt very much if it would make any difference in the end.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—NATURE OF EXTENSION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement by the minister that LIP projects will be extended by an amount of $30 million to $40 million and as letters from the minister's officials indicate that the time will be extended but not the funds, could the minister clarify this?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think that the release which was sent to all hon. members did indicate several categories of eligibility for extension of local initiative programs that had been under way as of now and as of May 31. One of the categories was the kind of project that had not been completed due to any reasonable delay—the weather, that kind of thing. We say they can be completed where no further funds are allowed, but there are several other categories that will also be eligible.

[Translation]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—MONTREAL—SUGGESTION THAT RATE OF UNEMPLOYMENT BE CONSIDERED IN APPROVAL OF PROJECTS

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister.

Could he tell the House if he foresees the possibility, in an area as large as Montreal, of taking into consideration the high unemployment rate in some Montreal districts as opposed to those with a lower rate, instead of putting all districts on an equal footing without considering the unemployment rate?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as usual, we will take all these representations into consideration.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED PREMATURE DEPORTATION OF MALLAPPA REDDY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can he tell the House whether an investigation is now under way as to why Mr. Mallappa Reddy of Montreal was prematurely deported before all his appeal procedures were exhausted, as this action could seriously affect many others in similar circumstances?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are several circumstances I think should be brought out about this case, and with your indulgence I will try to be brief.

First of all, as was publicized in the paper this morning, Mrs. Reddy arrived in Canada as a visitor fully ten months after her husband had been ordered deported. Mrs. Reddy arrived, it has been established from inquiry, with $5,000 in her possession. His deportation order was upheld by dismissal of his appeal in November, 1972. He was given 25 days to effect his deportation voluntarily which he did not do. Before executing the order, deportation authorities checked with the Supreme Court authorities to see if any appeal has been made, since the Federal Court appeal had already been dismissed, and the execution order was in fact implemented on that basis. In spite of all this, if all else fails and there is real hardship we are quite prepared to assist Mrs. Reddy through financial measures, but we must consider the fact that she had a fair amount of money in her possession when she came. We will assist her to get back with her husband.

SPORTS

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—INQUIRY RESPECTING DECISION ON GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether it is true that the Cabinet has taken a decision about financing the Olympic Games? If so, could he tell the House what is that decision?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a decision was taken by the Cabinet at the end of January to the effect that bills would be introduced in the House to authorize a certain financing plan essentially based on the issuance or sale of coins and stamps. This legislation, I hope, will be introduced in the House before the end of May.

[English]

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—LEGISLATION TO AUTHORIZE MINT TO PRODUCE SPECIAL COINS—DIVISION OF SEIGNIORAGE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Is he aware that the mint is presently organizing and ready for the production of Olympic coins, and is there any legislation contemplated to allow the mint to be in a position to produce these coins?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the premise to the question, but I repeat my previous answer that legislation will be introduced by the government enabling the mint to proceed with the scheme along those lines.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, is the Montreal Olympic Committee going to be allowed to retain all of the seigniorage in connection with Olympic coins to be produced by the mint?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is a complex subject and the government will put its position before the House at the time it introduces the legislation and it is debated. I hope that the complexity will be understood by the opposition and that they will be in favour of it.

An hon. Member: If you can understand it, we can.

● (1440)

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister referred to the complexity of the question and in doing so he was pointing in my direction as if it were something he expected we could not understand. Does it not amount in fact to the people of Canada having to put up, because they will not receive the benefit of the coinage, some $200 million by indirect instead of direct contribution?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is no, but I think the fact that it was asked proves, indeed, that the complexity of the question is not understood by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I approach the altar of the Prime Minister's arrogance with great diffidence. The Prime Minister should treat the House with a little more consideration and not be egregiously contemptuous. I ask him whether or not the plan is, as originally stated, that the mint will receive some $70 million for the actual cost of the production of the coinage and the difference between the cost and the value thereof will go to the Olympic committee? Is that not a simple question even for an uncomplex person such as the Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the preamble to the question I must point out that the hon. member chose to intervene because he said I had pointed at him. I must say that I did not. I was gesticulating in the direction of the hon. gentleman who asked the question. But if he wants to see himself involved I will gladly repeat my answer to him, that the facts he stated in the first question have no for an answer and indeed it proves that the question is very complex. If the hon. member wants a longer statement, we would have to revert to motions.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Trudeau: I would only be prepared to speak on motions at the time the legislation is given first reading. If we get permission at the time of first reading to make a statement on motions I shall indeed be glad to make it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am not thin-skinned like the Prime Minister but invariably when he wants to be contemptuous he refers to me as the "honourable" member. I always refer to him as "right honourable" despite the fact that he is not a member of the Imperial Privy Council and only Mr. St. Laurent and I are.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member for Peel South resume his seat. We are running short of time. Hon. members will appreciate that we are on only the third or fourth question. I would ask the indulgence of hon. members not to have too many supplementaries on each subject. The hon. member for Peel South has a supplementary to his question. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West wants to ask a question. I will recognize the hon. member for Peel South for one supplementary and the the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. That will take us quite far along in the question period.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Blenkarn: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I object principally to the Prime Minister's suggestion I cannot understand and that members of this House cannot understand the question of seigniorage. The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert explained it in detail to the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should resume his seat when the Speaker takes the floor. This is elementary. I recognize the hon. member for the purpose of asking a supplementary. I think he should try to ask a supplementary rather than debate the matter. We have had a mini debate on a subject that is very mysterious to the Chair, but the hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister advise the House when this matter will be brought before the House in terms of legislation authorizing the issuance of these coins and other things?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In a previous answer a few moments ago I indicated that it would be our intention to bring it before the House before the end of the month.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—GOVERNMENT POLICY REGARDING SUPPORT—ADVANCEMENT OF FUNDS TO CITY

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I shall not try your patience with a series of supplementaries, but I should like to direct a very uncomplicated supplementary to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Treasury Board's study of the Montreal Olympics of about six weeks ago revealed that an estimated deficit would perhaps accrue of somewhere in excess of $200 million, I should like to ask whether or not the government has changed any policy decisions regarding federal support for the Montreal games and whether or not any funds have already been advanced to the city of Montreal for the purpose of the Olympics through any department of government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the question the answer is no. The policy of the government remains as I stated in my statement to the House at the end of January or the beginning of February. On the second part, whether any funds have been paid out under the provisions of that statement, I do not have the answer; I have every cause to think the answer is no, but I will look into the matter. Finally, I want to assure the House that when I talked about complexity I did not mean to insult anyone's intelligence. I was referring very much to a very complex question indeed, and I hope the House will understand that.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SUGGESTION THAT PROJECTS REFUSED TO BE REVIEWED

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Secretary of State.

Has he considered and accepted a formula for review of Opportunities for Youth projects which were rejected although they are obviously meaningful to the young people sponsoring them?

[English]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker. I regret as much as the hon. member the difficulty faced by those whose projects were rejected, but frankly I am not considering further funds for those at the moment. I think that is the short answer to the question.

TRADE

SUGGESTED VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER TO EUROPE TO PRESENT CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister when he is listening. In view of the success achieved by the President of Mexico in appearing last month at the European Economic Community in Brussels and the announcement that President Nixon will be visiting Europe this fall when he will no doubt press the position of the United States on trade with the European community, will the Prime Minister consider a trip to Europe to put forward Canada's position forcefully to the European community?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the hon. member's suggestion that I do a bit of travelling. I have the intention of preparing travel plans for the coming year.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said he would be preparing his travel plans for Europe for next year. Would he not consider it more appropriate to be putting Canada's position before the community this year?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the House should know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was in Europe just a matter of a couple of weeks ago putting this case, and it has been put on previous occasions by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by various other ministers including the Minister of Finance who was over in Europe. I myself put the case very strongly in the United Kingdom when I visited the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in December. I can assure the hon. member that the representations are constant and continuous, but that does not preclude, I repeat, my consideration of further travel plans for the year to come.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are just a few minutes left before the end of the question period, and I would ask hon. members to give other hon. members an opportunity to ask questions. Perhaps the hon. member for Calgary South might ask a last supplementary, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Kent-Essex and then the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the visit of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to Europe, but does the Prime Minister not think that an appearance by himself would be more appropriate and have more impact than appearances by his lesser ministers, particularly when so many countries are being represented in Europe by their chief executives?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is an argument.

FARM LABOUR SHORTAGE—PROVISION OF SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS—ACTION TO MEET NEEDS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who, I am sure, is well aware of the problem. Because of the fact it is becoming quite apparent that shortages of farm labour for planting and harvesting could seriously jeopardize food production in Canada, and at the same time thousands of students desperately need summer employment to obtain money for their further education, would the minister at this time, or in a statement on motions, indicate if any new initiatives, over and above those used last year, to survey adequately both needs and to resolve this most serious problem are in process?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will examine the hon. member's representation and give him a more satisfactory and detailed answer later.

SMALL FARM DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the recent announcement by the minister of a one week deadline for the government of Saskatchewan to agree to the implementation of the small farm development program, can the minister tell the House whether an agreement has been reached by the two governments or whether negotiations are still in progress between himself and the provincial government?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met with the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan in Ottawa on Tuesday. He submitted some ideas or suggestions to me to consider. I am resubmitting them to him in Regina this afternoon, and we have agreed to have these negotiations finalized by next Wednesday.

Mr. Gleave: May I ask the minister whether, in view of the fact several other provinces, including Quebec, have not yet signed an agreement, he also issued an ultimatum of one week to the province of Quebec?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are taking them one at a time but they will all be treated the same way.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. As usual, the matter is very serious.

Two days ago, following statements by the Leader of the Official Opposition to the effect that prices to fishermen in the east and the west and also to western farmers should be increased, I asked the Prime Minister whether he intended to have the Leader of the Official Opposition examined. Now I notice that for the past two days the Leader of the Official Opposition has not been in the House? Has the Prime Minister had him sent to the hospital for examination?

BROADCASTING

CABLEVISION—REQUEST THAT APPLICATIONS TO CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION BE EXPEDITED

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, before asking my question I would just like to say, in view of the remarks made by the last questioner, that I believe the Leader of the Opposition is in Vancouver.

I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Communications in charge of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. In view of the fact many communities are anxious to have cable television available to them and that the CRTC seems to be dragging its feet in setting hearing dates for applications, will the minister take it upon himself to see what can be done to have the CRTC exhibit some urgency in this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that any delay in the holding of CRTC hearings is strictly due to the tremendous workload the commission has to deal with. I do not believe there is negligence on their part; I maintain continual contacts with the members of the CRTC and I transmit to them representations submitted to me by hon. members.

[English]

Mr. McKinley: As many applications for cable television service have already been submitted to the commission to which there is no opposition and the applicants have been proven to be responsible and financially stable, could these applications be approved without the necessity of going through a formal hearing?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that I would dare express an opinion on whether or not the CRTC is bound by law to hold a hearing, but I am convinced it is proceeding as fast as possible. Now, if the hon. member wishes to inform me of special cases or abnormal delays, I shall be happy to bring them to the attention of the chairman of the CRTC.

TRADE

REPORTED INSISTENCE BY UNITED STATES THAT CANADA ACCEPT ENERGY DEAL IN RETURN FOR ACCESS FOR CANADIAN MANUFACTURED GOODS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the report from Washington which appeared in today's Globe and Mail that Secretary of the Treasury George Shultz had intimated that in trade talks between Canada and the United States the United States was taking a package approach and insisting that in return for the U.S. accepting manufactured goods from Canada we would have to accept the U.S. proposal for an energy deal. Is this being discussed in the trade talks right now and, if so, what is Canada's position?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, of course I have not seen the transcript of the secretary's remarks and until I have I cannot comment in any detail. It is true that we have resumed talks. I think that the atmosphere for our discussions has improved very considerably. I think there is an understanding and a willingness on both sides to deal with separate issues on their merits.

Mr. Broadbent: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for his supplementary, but we have reached the end of the question period. In fact, with the implied consent of hon. members I have allowed a little extra time because of the points of order and questions of privilege we had earlier in the question period. As I say, the hon. member may ask his supplementary, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi on a last question.

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF DUTY PAID BY CANADIANS ON IMPORTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is on one of those separate trade items referred to by the minister. Could he inform the House whether the governments of Canada and the United States are discussing, as a change in the auto pact, the proposal I made in the House on March 13 to remove the 15 per cent duty that Canadians must now pay if they purchase a car in the United States?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when I have something more to state with respect to our discussions I will do so in the appropriate way. I think it would be premature at this time to make any statement in respect of these talks.

PENITENTIARIES

COWANSVILLE—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY IN LIGHT OF FURTHER ESCAPE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It concerns the escape of yet another inmate from the Cowansville medium security institution while visiting his wife in Montreal. Since one of the officials of the minister's department has said that this inmate can be considered dangerous, will the Solicitor General now order an independent inquiry into the escapes of maximum security inmates from medium security institutions, and into the transfer of these inmates to such institutions? Can he now assure the House that he will establish an independent inquiry in order to find out just what is going on?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have said that I have an inquiry under way at the present time and that when I receive that report I will consider the suggestion put forward by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I want to say that in this case the inmate in question had a child on the day he was arrested, and this was the first opportunity he had to see the child. He was allowed out of the penitentiary on that basis. Unfortunately he breached the trust put in him and escaped from the guard. This incident is also under investigation by the inquiry and I hope to have a report soon.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking supplementaries, but I think I should really call orders of the day. I apologize to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi who wishes to ask a supplementary, but with his forbearance and consent perhaps the matter could be pursued tomorrow. The hon. member for Peace River is rising on a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader about the business of the House for the next week, but before he comes to his place I think I am entitled to remark on the gratuitous statement made by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who is the leader of the only effective opposition in this House,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —is in Vancouver at the request of a great many people there to outline the alternative policies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to ask the government House leader—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the statement that has just been made is not entirely correct. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is not in the city which I represent at the request of that city; he is there because the Conservatives have been flogging $100 tickets all over the place.

Mr. Bell: He didn't say that.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have to wait for his point of order.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Lotbinière on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, we were deeply hurt by the disparaging connotation of the remark made by the hon. member for Peace River about the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). That party should know that the hon. member for Témiscamingue is the leader of the opposition party for Quebec in Ottawa.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a point of order. I would hope that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) would not attempt another reminder of that kind.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Témiscamingue wants to raise a point of order.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is to inform the hon. member for Peace River that there are only two Progressive Conservative members in the province of Quebec, and they do not even see eye to eye.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Having settled that important issue, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader about the business for this week and next week.

When replying I would be grateful if the hon. gentleman would indicate if the government has now composed its differences so that he can tell the House just when the ways and means resolutions with regard to corporate taxes will be introduced. I first asked that question two months ago.

Mr. MacEachen: As the House knows, Mr. Speaker, we will be considering an opposition day today and another tomorrow. On Monday, I would hope to call the amendments to the Criminal Code related to capital punishment, followed by the Fisheries Development Act and the CNR financing bill. On Thursday and Friday of next week, it will be necessary to call opposition days. The timing of the introduction of the corporate tax changes is very much in my mind at the moment.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader—and I do so in view of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture which is the only statement of government policy we have had on the increase in the cost of living—if the government will give consideration to setting aside the low priority that he has outlined before the House and bring in amendments to the Family Allowance Act so that we can get money into the hands of the poor who have to eat every day, not just once every six months.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, if I may put a question to the government House Leader. In view of the fact that we cannot get any enlightenment on the subject of disability pensions from the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), since that was promised six months ago as a priority, would the minister state when he is going to introduce legislation on disability pensions?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe most hon. members would agree that capital punishment and fisheries are priority items, as is action on family allowances and the subject of pensions brought up by my hon. friend. They will be brought in at an early date, and hopefully will be dealt with before the end of June.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO TAKE EFFECTIVE ACTION TO DEAL WITH INCREASED COST OF LIVING

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley) (for Mr. Baldwin) moved:

That this House deplores the failure of the government to take concrete and effective action against the rising cost of living, so evident in the price of shelter, food and clothing; and therefore urges the government to impose an immediate temporary freeze so as to enable it to develop a satisfactory plan in conjunction with the provinces, industry and labour for the purpose of keeping the cost of living within acceptable limits.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this motion with the feeling that we are talking about one of the most important problems that is before the Canadian public today, the problem of the high cost of living and what we are going to do about it. It would seem to me that we do not have to debate the subject at length to ascertain that we have a serious inflationary problem in Canada. The consumer price index has increased by 6.6 per cent and the food component of that index has increased 12.9 per cent. All the forecasts we have indicate that inflation is going to be with us in the future. I know that these forecasts can be very difficult. Certainly, the forecast made a year ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in his budget, when he hoped that there would be reasonable price stability during this year, has not come true. I mention that not in a pejorative sense at all, but merely recognizing how difficult it is to make good forecasts in this particular area. I accept the explanation given by the Minister of Finance and the government many times that there have been great difficulties throughout the world in terms of food supplies, rising incomes and the rising expectations of people who are using more food. I accept those statements and would not debate them here today.

What I should like to debate is how we are going to evolve ways to deal with these particular problems in this country, and what we should do about inflation and our monetary and fiscal policy in a general sense. There are those who would argue that we should live with inflation as it is. A conventional part of economic wisdom says that inflation and full employment must go together, that we should go for full employment and be willing to live with the inflation it generates. I think that is a defeatist attitude, a program that is basically unacceptable in any contemporary economy, in any contemporary country. The inflation that could be experienced in a country such as Canada could be so high that we could not expect the Canadian people to bear such an unjust burden. People on fixed incomes are desperately burdened as it is. Those planning a pension or insurance program are already badly hit by inflation. Certainly, the great regional disparities in this country mean that the burdens of inflation fall heaviest on those who live in areas of low income.

We have unleashed in Canada today a series of expectations which bode ill for us in the future. Historically, many countries have found themselves in serious economic difficulties in terms of employment and economic growth because of unbridled inflation. So, we must do something about those inflationary forces in the Canadian economy at this time.

But beside that, and apart from that, the fact that we are experiencing a cycle of inflation in Canada today indicates, I think, that we have not come to grips with the problems of economic management in the Canadian economy. In the last two or three years we have had an inordinate level of unemployment. Our level of unemployment has been among the highest of any industrialized country in the world and we all applaud the reduction of this high level, even by a slight amount. There has been an enormous underutilization of our productive resources, and we have probably lost between $5 billion and $6 billion of possible production per year because the economy has been operating below capacity.

The same can be said of taxes. We have lost a great amount of tax income which would have been generated by people who would have been working. We have had an economic policy that, very simply, has led to an increasing proportion of foreign control of our own economy. We have operated under an economic policy which simply has not worked for Canada and the amount of inflation from which we now suffer simply underlines this fundamental fact.

What worries the people of Canada and must worry all in the Parliament of Canada is this: As we enter this pattern of upswing and inflation, are we entering into the classical cycle when price expansion will eventually cause economic contraction? Will there be once again lost production, and are we, going to experience a classical business cycle? Analysts are saying that the high costs of today will be reflected in higher costs tomorrow which means there will be more inflation. The situation certainly calls for action right away.

Why are we experiencing the present level of inflation in Canada? There are two major causes of inflation. The first well known cause is cost-push, the cause or the inflation which we experienced last year, a matter which appeared to be a matter of great concern to those responsible for economic policy at that time. They asked, how is it possible that we have both inflation and high unemployment? The answer is, of course, that the inflation was not related to demand factors at all. There was cost-push inflation operating in Canada during the last two or three years, and that cost-push inflation should have been dealt with then. So, we were in the ignominious position of having a high level of unemployment and high levels of inflation.

What has happened now, and the reason that we have such great problems in Canada today, is that the cost-push inflation generated two or three years ago has now been supplemented by demand-pull inflation. Actually, we have both, and because we suffer from both forms, we must simply do something about it. Why has demand-pull inflation come about? One could argue that it has come about because incomes are rising. However, basically and primarily, demand-pull inflation, as we are today experiencing it, has come about as a result of the futile attempt of dealing with the inflationary problems of three years ago, as if it were caused by demand-pull and therefore by introducing high interest rate policies, a slowdown of the economy, and fiscal policies which stopped normal growth. So, we have shortages of supply now. The occurrence of cost-push inflation and demand-pull inflation together are creating inflationary expectations in the economy which the economy simply cannot sustain.

The real question is not necessarily why do we have this inflation, but what can we do about it? What kind of policy can we evolve that will make it possible for Canadians to have reasonably full employment and price stability at the same time? How can we cope with the situation in which the Canadian economy now finds itself? No one would argue, I least of all, that this question can be solved in any simple fashion. At the same time, it appears to me that there are basically three approaches that can be taken to solve this particular problem.

The first is the great, classical approach, the traditional approach, which says that if there is inflation in the economy, you must slow down or dampen the economy, raise interest rates, impose high taxes and cut off excess purchasing power. This supposedly stops the forward movement of the economy and slows down the inflationary spiral. That was the policy followed by the government in 1970 and that is the policy that some of us are frightened the government will follow again. That policy, of course, will not work. It will not stop inflation unless you generate unacceptably high levels of unemployment. We are still suffering from the use of such a policy three years ago. One can give the government great credit for bringing the rate of inflation in Canada down to quite low levels through such a policy. However, in doing so, it paid a cost that was enormously high, a cost Canadians today are not prepared to pay again and inflation was only temporarily checked.

The question one must ask is, why does that classical approach not work now? Why did we end up having high unemployment and inflation at the same time, even though there was a slow down in the economy? The reason the policy does not work is that such a policy is designed to work in an economy which is totally competitive, where competitive forces are operating all the time. The trial of that policy two or three years ago, made it self-evident that the Canadian economy had within it a series of blocks, of power groups which do not respond the way competitive markets do. We do not have perfectly competitive economy. So, we find that the traditional policy for fighting inflation does not work. The Phillips curve that people talk about is not applicable. We do not have acceptable trade-offs between employment and inflation. Consequently, it does not make good sense to follow the traditional policy.

The second thing I wish to say about that policy is that it depends upon enormously good economic forecasting and analysis. I have argued many times in this House that we are not properly organized in Canada for economic policy making. We need a system of competent economic forecasting, but do not have it. I do not want to press that point except to say that if we are to use monetary and fiscal policies alone to create full employment and combat inflation, we must be very sure that we are accurately measuring the leads and lags that take place in the economy. Our estimation and analysis in this country of these leads and lags has been very poor indeed. We just have not been able to predict them. Whether anybody else could do so I am not prepared to say, but the government has not been able to do so. Relying on a policy when we do not have the tools to undertake it is folly indeed. We know that if you follow the classical way to fight inflation in this country, the policy is not going to work. It has not worked in the past and will not work in future, and we must reject the idea that it will.

I do not think anybody in this parliament is prepared to see the Bank of Canada tighten the money supply and raise interest rates to slow down production in order to get inflation under control. That is a perfectly unacceptable way to approach this problem at the present time.

On the other hand, if we do not follow the traditional method, we must do something else. We are not prepared, it seems to me, to accept the rate of inflation prevalent in the economy. It affects expectations involving, among other things, international trade. If we cannot accept it, one must ask, what are the alternatives?

One alternative is calling for voluntary restraints, asking everyone not to raise prices, asking labour not to raise wages and industrialists not to sell labour not to raise wages and industrialists not to sell their goods at higher prices. This was attempted but did not work. The thrust was made, but did not work. What is left?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that, given the structure of the economy and the problems we are facing, we simply have to come to some sort of enforced incomes policy if we are to get rid of the inflation which is doing so much harm to so many Canadians at the present time. Nobody really approaches such a solution to the inflationary problem with any pleasure. I agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) that you have to approach the idea of making the policy work with care. However, I and the members on my side of the House, at least, feel strongly that we must do something to contain inflation. The people of Canada, I think, feel the same way. I think the people of Canada are looking for somebody to give leadership in this area and say, "Let us try this, let us make the economy work effectively."

What are the arguments against an incomes policy? What are the arguments why we should not attempt to adopt incomes policy? The first argument is that it will not work. I reject that out of hand. There is no reason to believe we cannot design an incomes policy in this country that will work. One looks at the experience of other countries, particularly the United States and England and it is clear that the record is mixed.

Indications from the British experience are not in, although we know the inflationary rate in that country has been reduced. One has to be careful of international comparisons, but I believe the rate has dropped roughly from 10 per cent to 6 per cent. We know that until they went to phase three in the United States, the American experience worked well. When they went to phase three, it worked badly. I reject out of hand the idea that we are incapable of designing in this country an incomes policy that will work. All we need to have is the will, the courage and the leadership to put it into effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: The second reason it is said we should not have a policy is that it would create a vast bureaucracy to administer the program. No one is talking about an incomes policy today that is comparable to the incomes policy operated in the forties during the war. It is a different situation altogether. Nobody is talking about rationing. We are talking about an incomes policy with no rationing. We could administer and operate an incomes policy in this country with something in the neighbourhood of 800 to 1,000 people. What the figure would actually be, I would not suggest specifically, but we know that when the United States with 225 million people ran its income policy, they ran it with 1,200 people. The argument put forward that we would have a vast bureaucracy does not wash in the present situation.

The third reason that is given for not having an incomes policy in Canada is that we have an open economy. It is said that any country where 25 per cent of the gross national product is generated through international trade cannot make an incomes policy work. Again, it creates some difficulties. My own view is that they are far from insurmountable. Indeed, it would not be a bad idea to look more carefully at our export and import policies at this time, as well as our capital flow problems, and relate them to a growth program in Canada.

Finally, it is argued it would not work because the people are not ready for it and do not want it. What evidence is there? Every Gallup poll you look at, and I do not like to mention Gallup polls, indicates the Canadian people want some sort of incomes policy in this country at the present time. Certainly, most members of parliament found during the Easter recess that the major problem facing Canada today is the cost of living. There is no question about it. How long do Canadians have to wait before some action is taken to deal with this problem? The Canadian people are willing, able and eager to have positive approach taken to lower the cost of living. These are the arguments made against it.

What are the arguments for it? Certainly, the argument of getting the cost of living under control is important. The field of housing, which will be dealt with later, is terribly important. With the rate of inflation today only 6 per cent of the families in Toronto can afford to buy a single family home if they are not to spend more than two and one half times their income on housing. The present rate of inflation in the cost of housing today, if compounded, and I know these figures have been quoted before, means that in the year 2,000 the average selling price of a single family house in Toronto would be $250,000, a quarter of a million dollars. We have to break such inflationary expectations.

An incomes policy would give us time to work out economic policies that would lead to the proper use of our resources, a stable employment program, a stable import-export program, a program that would allow the Canadian economy to move forward the way in which it should. I cannot state how sincerely our party is committed to the fact that now in Canada we should have a 90 day freeze on incomes, prices, rents and dividends as a start in attacking the inflation problem in the Canadian economy.

I want to make it very clear that we think that the 90 day period of time should be used, and in this I agree completely with the leader of the New Democratic Party, to consult with the provinces, leaders of labour, the leaders of industry, leaders of agriculture and leaders of consumer groups to work out a stabilization program. It has never been part of the Conservative party policy to have a 90 day freeze and that's it. We believe an incomes policy has to be an integral part of our monetary and fiscal policy if this country is going to operate with full employment and reasonably stable prices.

We would use the 90 days to develop the program in detail. We think guidelines should be developed for measuring acceptable changes in prices and incomes. We suggest guidelines that are not voluntary, but that are enforceable. When there are productivity changes, these can be taken into account and remedies can be provided for those suffering inequitably because of the program. There is no reason why it cannot be done. We believe it can and should be done. In this economy, we have had enough experience in the old fashioned idea of monetary theory alone and fiscal policy alone, fighting inflation and bringing about full employment. It is not working. How much evidence do we need? We think it is essential to supplement monetary and fiscal policies with an incomes policy right now.

Before 1936, before Lord Keyne's great work, anyone who suggested there were times a government had a responsibility of operating without a balanced budget in order to get full employment was totally rejected. Surely, in the seventies we are not so blind that we are going to allow the Canadian people to be damaged by inflation and accept high levels of unemployment because we are unwilling to concede the proposition that it may be necessary now to supplement traditional policies with an incomes policy.

In this parliament, there has been debate after debate of all kinds of what are responsibilities of government. But surely, no one can argue against the proposition that it is a central responsibility of the federal government to follow policies to provide full employment and price stability. Surely this cannot be argued. It must be the central thrust, the central responsibility of the federal government. This is a responsibility which the government is not accepting, and I hope hon. members on the treasury benches opposite will accept our suggestion, will adopt an incomes policy, relate it to monetary and fiscal policy and get this country moving again.

• (1530)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member resumes his seat, I gather the hon. member for Davenport is seeking permission to ask him a question. He can only do this with the hon. member's permission and on the understanding that the hon. member has not yet completed his speech.

Mr. Gillies: I shall be glad to answer a question. I wish I knew what it was before it was asked, though.

Mr. Caccia: Would the hon. member tell the House what are the components of his prices and incomes policy at the point when the 90-day freeze which he is proposing comes to a conclusion?

Mr. Muir: He has just told you.

Mr. Gillies: I would be glad to answer that question if I were given another 20 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed!

Mr. Gillies: Basically, we believe we should work out a series of guidelines for appropriate increases in incomes and prices. These guidelines would be enforceable and adjustments would be permitted corresponding to changes in productivity. This would be accompanied by policies designed to increase supplies in the market of agriculture products, housing and so forth, so that the forces of supply and demand would operate in an effective fashion again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: A further question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The day is getting short, and I believe there are a number of hon. members who wish to take part in the debate. If too many questions are asked at the end of speeches, the number of speeches possible might be cut down. If members of the House wish, we can, of course, allow further questions, though I believe there is some objection taken to this—perhaps we should allow the Minister of Finance to make his speech.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we address ourselves to this motion with a recognition that rising prices in this country involve us all in a matter of growing concern—a concern felt by the country as a whole and shared by this House. No one is going to deny that inflation is hurting every Canadian. I must say the government is watching the situation with a commitment to do everything it can to ensure that low income families, in particular, are left with sufficient disposable income to cope with the rise in prices. The economic responses are not easy.

I listened with great care to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and I still do not know what economic responses he would make in sufficient detail to allow a considered judgment to be made upon them. I want to suggest to him that there are no magic, clear-cut solutions and it is no use deluding ourselves or the country into believing that a solution is easy. I do not believe posturing is going to provide a solution, nor will rhetoric, nor political cosmetics.

An hon. Member: Talk to the Prime Minister about political cosmetics. He has his hand in the jar.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this motion glaringly underlines the lack of credibility of the Conservative party in its mounting desperation for power. I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman, when he blurted out the word "poll", should have retreated from it immediately. What the motion does is to propose a vague and ill-defined type of freeze. Its terms certainly do not give the House any clarification of its intent, neither did the hon. member for Don Valley. As I say, it proposes an ill-defined type of freeze on the incomes of Canadians to be followed by further controls of an even more vague and ill-defined nature.

Despite the pertinent question put by my hon. friend from Davenport (Mr. Caccia), we were not able to ascertain the precise nature of what the hon. member had in mind. We are quite willing to recognize the gravity of this problem for Canadians. Our difficulty is in understanding just what policy the hon. member wishes to pursue.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Look at your budget speech of last year. You haven't done a damn thing about it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I submit that the proposal put to the House this afternoon could very well, over the longer term, hurt Canadians far more than it would help them. It is a proposal which could aggravate inflation rather than relieve it and it could, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) warned in earlier days, substantially increase tensions between various groups in Canadian society. I am sorry the Leader of the Opposition is not here today.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You have been absent, too.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am not complaining about it. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that it will not cost him any money to listen to me this afternoon.

An hon. Member: It is costing the country a fortune!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Leader of the Opposition said on January 31, 1971, that "there had been a lot of loose talk about wage and price controls".

An hon. Member: That was two and a half years ago.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, about one and a half years ago. I continue the quotation. He said:

—even cabinet ministers are mentioning it these days as the answer to price stability in Canada.

Incidentally, I may say I was a faithful reader of the hon. gentleman's contributions to the Toronto Telegram before he entered politics. Even if he is a recent convert, one wonders what his motives are.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: The Prime Minister is a convert, too.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I continue. This is the Leader of the Opposition speaking:

It is important for us to recognize the far-reaching implications of such controls which, by their very nature, could be nothing better than a short-term solution taken as a final resort after all other means had failed.

They would cause untold resentment among groups and individuals who felt unfairly done by and they would result in a climate of constant confrontation. In additon, of course, they would inevitably lead to a highly centralized and therefore inefficient form of economic planning.

I say as strongly as I can that we must make a further, serious effort at a time when inflation is partially, if temporarily under control. This is the time to act again to set up a pattern for co-operation. And this must be combined with monetary and fiscal policies which will appear credible and workable to the people involved.

I agree with the last few words of that citation. I am sure the knowledgeable members of this House—and by definition every member of this House is knowledgeable on these matters—will recognize the problem of inflation is worldwide in origin. There is no way in which a major international trading nation like Canada can insulate itself from these forces. To suggest that it can do so represents a flagrant attempt to mislead the Canadian people. I say to the hon. member for Don Valley that if this recently-acquired obsession with controls, for whatever motives he might care to have attributed to him—maybe the word "obsession" is a little too strong—

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —is based only on the fact that we ought to have wage and price controls in this country in order to give it a try, run it up the flagpole and see if anyone salutes it, to use the old Walter J. Thompson aphorism, then surely he is deluding himself, the House and the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. gentleman was talking about inflationary expectations. I venture to say him that every time he brings up this matter in the House in these terms he is prompting expectations that if he were in power—fortunately this is an academic question—it would result in a self-fulfilling prophecy and prices would be escalated even more than they have been escalating. I suggest to him that this is a self-defeating type of policy.

● (1540)

Let us analyse the underlying situation. While Canada's price performance has been significantly better than that of most other industrial nations, it has felt the impact of the global increase in food prices and the price of commodities. When I talk of commodities I am talking of international commodities such as wool and cotton which affect our clothing prices. Recent figures published by Statistics Canada indicate that as a result of my budgetary measures the cost of children's clothing did not rise following the relief granted from sales tax. If you look at the figures relating to international commodity prices of lumber, which of course affects the cost of housing, you will see there are world-wide shortages. These increased prices result from adverse weather conditions, failure of world crops or a general increase in world-wide demand—for example, in an affluent country such as Japan, which is becoming more consumer oriented—flowing from a sharp upturn in economic growth as well as an increase in personal incomes. This is a situation that we must recognize. Our economy is vulnerable because we handle large amounts of imports and exports and we are not immune from the contagion of this world-wide problem.

Aside from food, let us look at wages and salaries and other commodities. These have been rising, but they have been rising relatively stably. When I take a close look at what the Conservative party is proposing here, I come to certain conclusions, and they are these. The Conservative party is advocating an immediate temporary freeze. But they do not tell us what is to be frozen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: Where have you been?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If hon. members read carefully what the hon. gentleman opposite said today, they will find it impossible to distinguish whether he is talking about a temporary freeze or continuing permanent controls. I invite hon. members to read the exact words that the hon. member used this afternoon. The motion then goes on to refer to developing——a satisfactory plan in conjunction with the provinces, industry and labour for the purpose of keeping the cost of living within acceptable limits.

Again I ask, what do they propose to freeze? In an earlier motion which was put forward by the hon. gentleman's deskmate, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), they proposed a freeze on food prices, except those at the farm gate. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whom do they think they are fooling? It should be obvious to any aduit Canadian, and certainly to every farmer, that if food prices are frozen at every level in our marketing system except at the farm gate, prices paid to the farmer for his output will be effectively frozen as well.

Mr. Gillies: No one says anything different.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Let me go on further. The farm gate is the point where most of the upward pressure has originated on food prices because of a shortage of supply to meet demand. Last year increases in the price of meat, fish, poultry, fruits and vegetables at the farm gate accounted for more than 60 per cent of the increase in food prices.

The effective freeze on food prices at the farm gate proposed by the official opposition, the Conservative party, would cause farmers to cut back on domestic production rather than encourage the essential increase in supplies which is sought by the government, and will eventually lead to a renewed price explosion. What hon. gentlemen opposite fail to realize is that the problem of food prices is one of shortage of supply. You do not curb the problem by imposing price controls; you only curb it by encouraging supply, and, as I say, the hon. member has failed to realize this.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Who wrote this speech?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Again I suggest to the House that it is impossible to apply a freeze or controls to imported goods. Imported goods in 1972 amounted to $1.2 billion and accounted for some 10 per cent of all food consumed in Canada. I submit it is also impossible to apply a freeze or controls to other imported goods. Last year total imports amounted to $18.5 billion, a substantial proportion of all goods purchased by Canadians.

If there is any doubt intellectually about the fact that the Conservative party proposal could hurt rather than help Canadians at this stage, it should be dispelled by a recent letter dated April 24, 1973 to the Wall Street Journal by John Kenneth Galbraith, a distinguished Canadian-born economist, a man who, as hon. gentlemen know, is one of the leading advocates in the United States of selective income controls of a permanent nature. As an exponent of controls, Galbraith wrote to take strong exception to action by the United States administration in imposing a freeze on meat prices. This is what he said, and I want to quote him:

> The purpose of control is to arrest the interaction of wages on prices and prices on wages in that part of the economy characterized by strong unions. As such, it is an essential supplement to fiscal and, in its more limited role, monetary policy. It is nowise a substitute for such action. Controls should not be used where price increases are caused by an excess in aggregate demand or a shortage in the specific supply. If so used, some momentary effects apart, the result will be either random shortages in the retail stores, violations or, more likely, both.
> The present behaviour of meat prices, as of numerous other prices, shows every indication of being caused not by wage and cost increases but by the pull of demand. For this the right remedy is to stop playing games with the Congress over who will be responsible for the next tax increase. The need, whatever the prospective level of spending, is now for a prompt increase in taxes.

Not only do the Conservatives propose to compound problems in Canada by imposing a freeze on prices of food and other goods; they also propose to intensify these problems by vastly increasing fiscal and monetary stimulus. If there is one thing that even a student in first year economics should know, it is that if one is to attempt to apply any wage or income or prices policy, one has to have an accommodating fiscal and monetary policy.

Mr. Gillies: Certainly; I agree with that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. gentleman agrees. When I presented my budget on February 19 and said that, evaluating the system as best I could, the maximum cash requirements of the government of Canada against the markets of Canada, weighing the problem of unemployment and the rising cost of living, was $2 billion, the hon. gentleman and his friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West, as well as their leader, said that that stimulus was only half as much as it should be, that we should double the deficit from $2 billion to $4 billion. Now, Mr. Speaker, these hon. gentlemen cannot have it both ways. They cannot ask for a policy that will restrain the rise in prices in this country by putting a lid on the economy of this country, and at the same time propose to juice up the fiscal element in the country by twice as much. I think on the basis of better judgment, the hon. gentlemen opposite might well want to reconsider the position they took about two months ago.

I do not think it is difficult for Canadians to understand the consequences of the proposal made by the Conservative party to put fire under the kettle and then increase the pressure of the burners, increasing economic stimulus and hoping that, by holding the lid on, they will prevent the lid from blowing off and a lot of water spilling over. The hon. gentleman is suggesting the imposition of a lid on our price structure in this country, and is in no way suggesting there should be an accommodating fiscal and monetary policy to go with it. I say that such a proposal is absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You are antediluvian.

Mr. Gillies: It is a cost-push situation.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The government does not contemplate the adoption of controls under current circumstances. We are only prepared to adopt them if, on balance, controls are supported by conclusive evidence that there would be net benefit to Canadians. We do not believe under the present circumstances that that will be the case.

We can recall the situation in the United Kingdom which faced a critical emergency situation with a rampant increase in prices and wages far exceeding that of most other industrial nations. We pointed out, and I repeat now, that the United Kingdom exempted food at the farm gate. They also exempted imports from the freeze the subsequent controls.

Mr. Gillies: And look at what has happened in the U.K.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We have had an even more vulnerable economy. The United States imposed a freeze followed by a control program in August of 1971 to deal with serious domestic and international economic problems of a kind that did not confront Canada. Why was the United States position different from ours? I suggest it was different because their dollar was in deep trouble and their trade figures showed a deficit position with a $10 million deficit on visible and invisible accounts.

● (1550)

While the United States program had some temporary success in curbing inflation, more recently U.S. prices have been increasing more rapidly than in Canada. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to say that phase one and phase two worked, but a system of prices and incomes control has to be looked at over the entire phase of putting them on and how you are going to be able to take them off. I suggest to the House that these are the effects that have to be looked at.

In March the United States consumer price index was up 8.8 per cent over December, at seasonally adjusted annual rates, compared with 7.7 per cent at seasonally adjusted rates in Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): When ours was 13 per cent.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Rising food costs were the major, and remain the major, cause of price pressures in the United States in recent months. What is of prime importance in the context of the present debate is the fact that U.S. food prices have soared despite the fact they continued under the more rigorous phase two control program and moved to phase three for most other prices in February. The increase at an adjusted annual rate in the U.S. for food prices, March over December, 16 per cent in Canada, compared to 29.8 per cent in the United States. In other words, despite the fact that there were price and wage controls in the United States for the first three months of this year, at annually adjusted rates the rise in food prices in the United States was double that of Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is selective; over the last year ours is in excess of theirs, and you know that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as the Montreal Star said in an editorial on May 4, 1973:

—if 18 months of controls have been ineffective in breaking the back of inflation in the United States, what hope would there be for the 90-day freeze proposed by Canada's Conservatives?

An hon. Member: Let's have a serious debate.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): When we look at other comparisons, we see there has been a sharp variation in the rate of price inflation in various countries, with a recent acceleration in most during the period from 1970 to the end of the first two months of 1973 inclusive. The over-all increase in consumer prices in Canada of 15.6 per cent was lower than that for all the other 11 leading industrial nations.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): How does that help Canadians?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have said that for any price and wage control system to work in this country we need an overwhelming national consensus. I have referred on several occasions in this House to the need for a strong consensus in support of any system of controls if it is to work effectively. I note that the motion speaks of consultation with provinces, industry and labour to devise some kind of undefined plan for control following a freeze, but there is no indication of a consensus among any of these groups in favour of adopting controls under present circumstances. Certainly, the Leader of the Opposition has had no success in persuading the heads of Conservative governments in Ontario, Alberta, New Brunswick and Newfoundland that a freeze-control program should be adopted. As a matter of fact, if the recent budget of his colleagues from Queen's Park can be taken into consideration, the 40 per cent rise in sales tax does nothing to relieve the inflationary pressures in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What about your tax increases?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): In fact, together with the restoration of the 3 per cent surtax it is equivalent to a 16 per cent rise in personal income taxes in Ontario.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What about your increases in general corporate tax for 1973?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Nor is there much evidence of any enthusiasm among other provincial leaders. In its brief to the government in March, the Canadian Labour Congress again made abundantly clear its continuing strong objection to controls. The great bulk of business and farm leaders also made it clear that they do not support the adoption of controls under present circumstances.

An hon. Member: How about the Canadian people?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Don Valley when he tried to flog the strawman of restrictive monetary policy. There is no restrictive monetary policy. The governor of the bank before the committee, and I in the House on two occasions, have repeated that there is no restrictive monetary policy. This is an expansionary monetary policy paying careful attention to the control on liquidity.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What is the liquidity ratio of the chartered banks today?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The government's policy, shown particularly by the February budget, is to restrain inflation by easing the pressure of rising prices on budgets of Canadian families through tax and tariff reductions which will increase take-home pay and moderate the cost of a wide range of consumer products, and will at the same time provide special relief for the elderly, the veterans and their families. In other words, the fundamental aim when there is that type of squeeze is to increase the disposable income of Canadians by tax reductions at the personal and sales tax level and to encourage an increase in supply by the agriculture industry, as well as by international competitive policy. That is the policy the government is currently following.

The real proof of the pudding can be found in a comparison of our costs with the disposable incomes of Canadians. I am concerned that the disposable incomes of Canadians, particularly for lower income Canadians, remains in a position to meet whatever increase there is in the cost of living. The aim of the budget and other government policies is to encourage an increase in supply of goods through an increase in production to meet rising demand; in other words, to deal with the basic source of the problem rather than to try to cover it up with a bandaid of the kind offered to Canadians by the Conservative party.

I want to recite again to the House the specifics of the last budget. They are reduced personal income taxes by the equivalent of 12 per cent to 13 per cent; raising the basic exemption from $1500 to $1600; raising the exemption for married couples from $2,850 to $3,000; cutting the basic federal tax by 5 per cent, providing a minimum reduction of at least $100 and a maximum of $500; indexing personal income taxes beginning in 1974; abolishing the federal sales tax on all children's clothing, footwear and wear-goods and non-alcoholic beverages and the special tax on toilet articles, cosmetics and clocks and watches with a manufacturer's price of less than $50; reducing tariffs temporarily by an average of five percentage points on a wide range of imported foods and other consumer goods totalling $1.4 million in 1972; permitting family farms to pass from one generation to another free of capital gains tax; removing restrictions for tax purposes on the reinvested earnings of small businesses; increasing the old age pensions to $100 a month effective April 1, 1973; raising the combined OAS/GIS to a maximum of $170 a month for single persons and $325 a month for couples; injecting a further $190 million into the economies of the slow-growth regions of Canada by including local school taxes on property in the calculation of equalization grants to the provinces. This represents 26 per cent of school taxes paid by the local ratepayers of the seven receiving provinces which, if it is passed along by the provinces to the local ratepayers, will increase their disposable incomes by that much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We must also consider the measure of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to raise family allowances $20 a child in respect of all families, and the announcement by my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) of the establishment of a food prices review board to monitor food prices.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Increased Cost of Living

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The combined effect of these provisions in respect of fixed incomes, lower incomes and those with large families is to increase the disposable income so as to combat the rising cost of living. I want to say that the policy of the government at this stage in our economic cycle is to increase the disposable income of Canadians, particularly those with fixed and lower incomes, and to increase the supply of agricultural and manufactured products by combined agricultural policies, tariff policies and fiscal and monetary policies. Our aim is to meet the problems with a sound economic policy and not by 90-day stop-gap measures; a sound economic policy that reflects the international forces applying in this phenomenon of domestic inflation that is apparent to most Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1600)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) wishes to be recognized for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Baldwin: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I just wonder whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would now like to apologize to me for pressing me to stay and listen to what he described as new and exciting ways to deal with the problem of inflation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This seems to be another one of the interjections which have become sort of the order of this afternoon. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as I begin my remarks, I want to say to my friends in the Conservative party that all of us listened very carefully and very courteously to the interesting speech of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). I noticed that while the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was speaking, they did not return the same courtesy. I hope they will from now on. If the question of rising prices is as important as the hon. member for Don Valley said, and all of us agree, it seems to me this debate should be carried on with seriousness instead of in the way in which some members of this House have behaved during the past few minutes.

It occurred to me, as I watched the question period and the last few minutes in this House, that the members of the Conservative party think they can overcome the results of the Gallup poll by being negative, destructive and noisy. I want to tell them they cannot do that, Mr. Speaker.

I shall deal with the proposal of the hon. member for Don Valley in a moment, but I want to say to the Minister of Finance that it does not help to resolve the problem now before this House as well as before the people of Canada for him merely to recite again what he told us on February 19 and to make a speech which suggests that all that can be done has already been done, that nothing more should be done. I know of nothing less helpful to the situation in Canada than that kind of entirely unjustified complacent attitude which the Minister of Finance has shown. I could not help but notice when the hon. member for Don Valley spoke, that one of the reasons he gave that it is no longer possible to affect the price situation by creating unemployment is that our economy is no longer competitive. That is what he said. I agree with him entirely. I merely find it very difficult to understand why he supports an economy that grows more and more monopolistic and therefore unable to deal with the real needs of the Canadian people. That is the basic difference between his very thoughtful approach to the problem and the approach which we of the New Democratic Party take.

He says blithely in his speech that countries have been hurt by inflation of this level. I do not know what decade he is talking about. If he is talking about the decade of the 1920's, there is no doubt he is right. But if he is talking about the decade of the 1960's and 1970's, I challenge him to give us an example of that kind of nonsense. Is he talking about Japan? Has its economy gone to pot? Is he talking about Germany? Has its economy gone to pot? Is he talking about any of the western European countries? The fact is, of course, that when you have rising prices throughout the world internationally—I am speaking now not from the point of view of Canadians who are hurt, and I will come back to that point in a moment, but from the point of view of the economy as an economy and from the view of our position internationally—and if the prices in your country are not rising at a level higher than the general situation your economy, in fact, is not hurt. Indeed, the fact is that Canada has not been hurt internationally. If that is the case, then what on earth is he talking about?

The Minister of Finance has already cited from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) a quotation which had been drawn to my attention earlier today, but let me say in general terms that the Leader of the Opposition and members of the Conservative party twitted the government for having a kind of paranoia about inflation, for being preoccupied with inflation and for being obsessed with inflation. The Conservative party spokesmen then were right because one can easily become obsessed with this question in the terms in which the hon. member for Don Valley spoke. The hon. member for Don Valley and the members of the Conservative party today are making precisely the same mistake. They are attempting to impose, if they had the opportunity, a freeze that is meaningless and undefined which would cause immense harm to a large part of the people of Canada, never mind the economy as a whole, and which would, in the first instance, be of particular harm to the farmers of this country.

I have said many times when addressing farm meetings, which I have had the pleasure of doing for many years, that I do not claim to be a farmer but I do claim to know a little about the situation in respect of our farm population in this country. For some three or four years, from about 1969 to 1972 inclusive, the farmers of this country, perhaps like the farmers in many other parts of the world but particularly in this country, were getting the raw end of the stick. Their prices were too low, their costs of production were rising all the time and they were being squeezed by international prices on the one hand which, they could not control, and on the other hand by the cost of production, which they could not control. Their income fell continually year by year. I say as one urban person in this country that if the consumers of Canada were paying higher prices for food only because the farmer was at least getting a decent price for his products, the consumers of Canada would have no right to complain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: This is were I part company with the Minister of Finance because my observation of the situation in Canada with regard to food prices and other prices, which I will come to in a moment, is that the purchaser in the supermarket and in other food stores does not pay a higher price now merely because the farmer is at last getting a decent price for his products. The consumer is also paying a higher price because of the monopolistic control of the food packaging, because of the waste in food advertising and packaging and because of the monopolistic control over the processing of food and the monopolistic control by the supermarkets in this country which gouge consumers beyond the point where it would be justified to raise prices because of the farmers' income.

I often go shopping with my wife. Time and time again she has drawn my attention to the fact that she picks a tin of something off the shelf which has a price and a label on it, that she then takes that label off and finds under it another price five cents lower and then takes that label off and finds a third price ten cents lower again. What that means is that the supermarket has had that tin on its shelf for months. It was brought in at a low price and the merchant is now taking advantage of the situation to get what the traffic will bear by gouging the housewife unnecessarily when she goes shopping. It is this kind of consideration that has made us demand a food prices review board and indeed a prices review board generally, if we could have one, because what you would have then would be an agency that would look into the reason for the increased prices; you would be able to expose the unfairness that exists. That is what we should be after. We should be able to expose the unjustifiable increase.

As I will suggest in a moment, Mr. Speaker, if the government took the necessary step, then somebody would have the authority to do something about the situation when prices have been unfairly raised. Everyone in this chamber, when he talks about inflation, is concerned, genuinely I believe— I do not for one moment question the integrity of the hon. member for Don Valley any more than I hope he questions mine—about the low income people in this country. There is one simple, decent, humane, moral way of dealing with that problem, and that is to raise the income of the low income people of this country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: To enter into a massive system of price, wage and incomes control—and I will come back to that in a moment—to enter into a massive system that will freeze injustices where they are and that will create divisions, and to suggest a 90 day freeze during which you can do nothing at all except wait for the whole thing to blow up when the 90 days are over, all in order to assist the low income people, is nonsense. The fact is that the old age pensioners, the families on welfare, and the people on low wages are now poor because our society has not been justly run, because the redistribution of wealth and income stops at the gate of the Liberals and Conservatives, who are much more concerned with serving their corporate friends than with serving these people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I was glad to see the increase in the old age pension to $100 a month, but I say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and to the Minister of Finance that if they are concerned, as I know they are, about the condition of the old age pensioner, particularly in an era of rising prices and particularly when those rises are centered in food and shelter, then the way to deal with that is not to boast about an increase of only $13 and some odd cents above what the old age pension would have been, but to increase it much more, as could have been done, because the economy of Canada can well support it.

We supported the budget because it did have some income tax cuts on a very progressive basis for individual taxpayers, and we were glad to see that, but again I say that if we are concerned about the low income people one way to help is to increase their disposable income. There, I agree with the Minister of Finance. I merely disagree with him because the steps which are taken by governments, steps to increase this disposable income, are always puny steps, mincing steps, instead of adequate and humane steps to solve the problem.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): They help to solve the problem.

Mr. Lewis: Sure, they do. If you increase the income of the low income groups, then of course you increase the demand for goods and services and so, at the same time, you have to increase supply.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You have to have both.

Mr. Lewis: Right. The point I am making is that instead of attempting an impossible and unfair system of price and wage controls, and it really is wages, not incomes, let us deal with the low income people in a way in which they can be dealt with justly and fairly and without harm to the economy.

I reject the idea of a freeze, not only because it is undefined but because it is a meaningless thing. I am not going to accuse the hon. member for Don Valley, as the minister did, that all he was suggesting was a freeze. I listened to the hon. member. I appreciate that what he said was, "Let us have a temporary freeze during which we will work out some policy of controls." I was interested when he said there was no reason why we could not have a system of controls that will work. He said we only need the will, the initiative and the leadership—all the things his party has not got, Mr. Speaker!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: He said we only need these things to have a control system that will work. I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I listened anxiously to him as I sipped a cup of coffee behind the curtain, to hear exactly what that price control system, what that income control system would be; where it would go, how long it would last, what the constitutional problems are with the provinces, how those constitutional problems may be overcome, how long it will take to implement, what kind of bureaucracy will be required to enforce it. Will it apply to farmers, will it apply to wage earners, will it apply to wage increases that are already provided for in collective agreements, because there are such? What are the details of it, and indeed what are the broad outlines of it? And, Mr. Speaker, nary a single word on that from this ex-professor of economics who spoke so eloquently in other ways.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The reason there was not a single word is not because the hon. gentleman is not intelligent and doesn't know economics. He is both; he is intelligent and knows economics, and because he knows economics he knows darn well there is no system of controls that has worked in the United States or Britain, or in any other part of the western world, or indeed even in the communist countries where, with all the totalitarian controls they have, they have not been able to do the kind of thing that the hon. member for Don Valley suggests is possible in Canada.

It is significant to note that when the Conservative party first started talking about this they talked about price and wage controls. They never talked about anything else but price and wage controls. Then, the hon. member for Don Valley joined their ranks. He is a much more tactful person, a little more sophisticated and thoughtful person. He saw it was unjust to control only wages, so he said, "Let us stop talking about price and wage control, and let us start talking about price and incomes control." Well, let me tell him, Mr. Speaker, that this is the kind of talk that the President of the United States engaged in, this great President of the United States whom the hon. member for Don Valley wants us to follow, not so far as Watergate, but up to the fence, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): They have reached their watershed.

Mr. Lewis: Let me inform the hon. member for Don Valley that if you compare the second quarter of 1971, the last full quarter before the Nixon economics were imposed, before the controls were imposed, with the fourth quarter of 1972, the latest full quarter on which I have information, we find that in the United States corporate profits before taxes increased 20.6 per cent, and corporate profits after taxes increased 25.1 per cent. It is true that dividends only increased 5.1 per cent, but undistributed profit increased 50.5 per cent. The profits were undistributed. The large corporations held in their coffers half as much again as the undistributed profits they had before the controls were imposed. Of what value is that to the people of the United States?

Remember there was an increase of 20.6 per cent for profits before taxes and 25.1 per cent for profits after taxes, but average straight time hourly earnings in manufacturing increased only 8.7 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis. I would point out that the other figures I have given are also on a seasonally adjusted basis.

The reason I feel this talk about incomes control does not apply really to incomes can be put in the question:

how in heaven's name are you going to control the income of the doctor, the lawyer, the architect, the engineer and the accountant? How does the hon. member for Don Valley propose to control the use of the increased profits of the corporations? When these people talk about incomes control, what they really mean is wage control because that is easy to impose. Organized workers negotiate in a glass bowl,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: —in public, and if anybody wants to know what the increase is for the auto workers or the steel workers—

Mr. Alkenbrack: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I should like to ask the Leader of the New Democractic Party if he does not recall that federal price controls worked during the second great war and during the postwar period. Would he answer that question for me?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The question may be answered, but it really is not a point of order. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There can be no point of order arising from the Speaker's ruling on a point of order. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I say that the wages of organized workers are public knowledge, and if you want to know about an increase all you have to do is get hold of the union or the employers concerned. The wages of the unorganized worker can also be controlled because the government would have the greatest ally in that area, namely an employer who would rather pay less than more.

Those who talk about incomes control are not being entirely honest because they are talking about something that cannot be imposed. What can and would be imposed is control of working people in this country. There are too many working people in Canada making the minimum, and some below the minimum necessary for a decent living, for us to accept the idea of controlling their wages.

I have only two or three minutes left, Mr. Speaker, but I want to make one final point. It is this kind of consideration, the impossibility, the unworkability, the injustice—in fact, the senselessness—of temporary freezes, and the injustices and inequities of a system of control as well as the impossibility of doing it in peacetime that has made us support the idea of a food prices review board and a prices review board generally. If the prices which people have to pay are fair in relation to increased costs, then people just accept that and live with it, but I suggest there is a measure of unfairness in the increased prices and a prices review board could find that out.

Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the fact that Imperial Oil, followed by Shell and Gulf, increased the price of crude oil. Imperial Oil increased it on May 1 by 25 cents a barrel; that is a total of 55 cents a barrel since November, just six months, or a 20 per cent increase in the price of crude. Already that increase in the price of crude is being reflected in the increased price of gasoline to car owners. Again, this affects the farmers of Canada because the agricultural industry—although some members of this House may not know it—is the largest user of oil and energy in this country, as an industry. Pretty soon this increase imposed by Imperial and Shell and Gulf will be reflected in increased food prices because farmers' costs will increase as a result of it. Why were these prices increased, Mr. Speaker? Do we not have enough oil in Canada? Was there an increase in the cost of producing the oil? Not at all. They were increased in Canada because Imperial, Shell and Gulf can get a higher price outside this country. That is unfair to the people of this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him, plus some extra, has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I do not and I did not object to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) finishing his statement. I am not the one who is stopping him.

An hon. Member: The Progressive Conservatives are.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The Progressive Conservatives.

An hon. Member: That is correct.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I am not surprised.

Mr. Lewis: I am not surprised either.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today is of great importance to the whole country, and hon. members. In fact, it says:

That this House deplores the failure of the government to take concrete and effective action against the rising cost of living, so evident in the price of shelter, food and clothing; and therefore urges the government to impose an immediate temporary freeze so as to enable it to develop a satisfactory plan in conjunction with the provinces, industry and labour for the purpose of keeping the cost of living within acceptable limits.

• (1630)

Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday I believe, I asked the Prime Minister whether he would recommend the hospitalization of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for the purposes of a psychiatric examination. The leader of the opposition was in the Maritimes at the same time as I, some 10 days ago, and he promised that a Progressive Conservative government would improve the conditions over there by getting better prices for fish. He had also made the same promise to the western wheat growers and the dairy producers in Quebec. And upon his return to the House, he proposes freezing prices. This is completely incompatible!

Mr. Speaker, this matter, as I said earlier, is most important because it concerns Canadians. I would bet my shirt that tonight, on the CBC news, instead of reporting on this important item, they will talk about Viet Nam, as usual. They talk about the problems of foreign countries rather than Canadian problems; they forget to talk about our own problems—

Mr. Grafftey: Do you not think there was a problem in Viet Nam?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): It is certainly not a Canadian problem.

Mr. Grafftey: Not a Canadian problem?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): It is not a Canadian problem. Our problem is the rising prices in Canada. By all means let us take an interest in what is going on the world, but let us begin by putting our own houses in order, including that of the member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Speaker, in Canada we have provincial governments. In Quebec, we have a Liberal government, as in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. In Ontario, Alberta, New Brunswick and Newfoundland there are Progressive Conservative governments. In the three remaining provinces, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, there are New Democratic governments. Let us go and see if people are better off in those provinces, if prices are lower and if the cost of living is less than we know it to be in Ottawa, if we are to believe Canadian statistics.

Mr. Speaker, it is all very well to say: If I were in power, I would do this or I would do that. But the Progressive Conservatives were in power when inflation was growing in Canada. Why did they not fight it? Why did they not wipe it out? Why did they not take some action? Why did they not introduce legislation?

Mr. Speaker, it is all very well to say to the government: You have not done it right. But what would we do in their place? Even the spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party who spoke just now did not offer any solution. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said after that: There is no magic solution. So we have to put up with the present state of affairs, because there is no magic solution.

Mr. Speaker, the problem in Canada is not so much prices as the loss of our products. That is the real problem. Prime Minister Trudeau boasted recently that Canadian production would reach $102 billion for the first time in history, while the gross national income, including parliamentary allowances, everything included, would be about $70 billion. Now, I should just like hon. members to ask themselves: how and when can you buy $102 billion with $70 billion? That is a simple enough rule. How and when? Mr. Speaker, it is the system that tends to inflation, that leads us straight to inflation.

Increased Cost of Living

Not long ago Premier Bourassa of the province of Quebec went to the United States to borrow $100 million to finance part of the James Bay development, in the constituency of my colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Laprise); he managed to borrow this sum at 10 per cent interest for a period of 25 years. Here again, those who have done elementary mathematics can easily see that in 25 years we will be paying $250 million in interest alone, and that we will still owe the $100 million capital we borrowed.

Mr. Speaker, did the premier of the province come back from the United States with a cartload of American dollars? No: he came back with what is called a promissary note, a little piece of paper marked $100 million, 10 per cent interest, 25 years, signed Robert Bourassa, the whole thing endorsed by the entire population of Quebec province. So it all works by figures. What did the Americans base their $100 million on? On what they have? The Mississipi, Watergate, Mr. Nixon's election? No! They based the $100 million on the feasibility of the James Bay project. If the project had not been good, Mr. Bourassa would not have got 25 cents from the United States. They studied the project and said: "All right, we will finance it".

Mr. Speaker, that is why we suggest using the Bank of Canada. The governor of that institution can write figures too. Based on what? Inflation? No; based on the James Bay project. He can do the same thing as the Americans. And then, we could lend to the provinces, and not just to Mr. Bourassa, without interest, as we so kindly do for India, Thailand, South America, countries of Europe, Africa, etc. They are interest-free loans for a period of 60 years. Recently a $48 million loan was granted.

Mr. La Salle: For the purchase of Canadian products.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes. Would the James Bay development project not also permit buying Canadian products? It is the same thing. An agreement to purchase Canadian products can be entered into in Winnipeg, in Quebec, in British Columbia. Obviously, we would not be purchasing all our material in Japan with those $100 million. Let us buy here, in Canada. There can be agreements between the provinces and the federal government. And the Bank of Canada is there for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, they think that is funny. By the time India reimburses those interest-free $48 million loaned for 60 years, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will be 115 years old and he will no longer be around. As for little Justin, he will be barely 61. That is about the only change there will be.

Mr. Speaker, there is a solution to fight the current inflation: lower interest rates, make use of our financial institutions, become masters of our credit instead of going begging abroad. Do you think it is pleasant to see representatives of our municipalities going to Europe, to Switzerland, to Germany to borrow money for the development of our natural ressources? It is inconceivable that a government tolerates such a situation. As long as we continue in that direction and keep talking about price controls or control of whatever you want, this will lead to absolutely nothing.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance talked about a miraculous solution, but there is none. We have been suggesting for quite a length of time that a compensated discount be granted at the retail level, following an agreement between a national commission and Canadian retailers whereby prices would not change. This would be an agreement not an imposition. Everyone is free to join or not. But if you join, then the government would order the payment of a 25 per cent compensated discount on retail prices, which means that for a $100 purchase the consumer would pay $75 and the government $25 as compensated discount to the retailer. The retailer would have $100 and inflation and price increases would thus be efficiently controlled. But no. Yesterday, the Prime Minister asked me whether that was constitutional or not; to my mind, he did not know whether the matter was constitutional or not. It seems to me we should look into it.

Indeed, I wonder what is keeping the Canadian parliament, which is sovereign, from passing a law to adopt a compensated discount, as was done anyway during the war in the case of milk.

Mr. Speaker, that is no miracle solution but a very normal one. Why does the government hesitate to try it out? What is it waiting for? Why speak of freezing prices which would lead right away to a black market? Why not try the solution advocated by the Social Credit party?

Mr. Speaker, I repeat: this is no miracle solution. The member for York South spoke of increasing the income of low wage earners. He is against price control. He has not always been against it, but now he is. I think that he has heard us often enough to reach this conclusion.

A price freeze is no good, really no good. They suggest increasing the income of workers, those who are drawing a small income. But how are we to increase this income? The hon. member has failed to explain. He has not referred to it.

I am going to tell you how. You must take from the haves and give to the have nots. That is the way to increase the income of the poor, that is the socialist solution.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian who earns $25,000, $50,000, $75,000 or $100,000 a year does not hide his money in a corner of his bedroom. He spends it, he buys things, he opens a business or something similar. His money is used for something, this is not saving. So, they are going to take it from him and give it to somebody who has less money. The total revenue remains exactly the same; the total national revenue will still amount to $70 billion and they will not be able to purchase the $32 billion worth of goods which are on the shelves, in stores, in wharehouses, in sheds, in back stores as we call them. To take from the rich to give to the poor will not solve anything.

The hon. member for York South stated that his solution would be wage control. This is exactly what I have just said. If you have the chance to make money, the government will watch you and take it away. Thus, private enterprise is killed, the stimulus which drives someone to do something. He is discouraged and then he says: If I have to work for the government, I will give up. This is what happens in private industry. So the solution of the New Democratic Party is not effective.

As far as we are concerned, we say that we should make up the difference between production and national income at current prices, paying at first a compensated discount and then distributing a national dividend to every citizen. This is a solution.

Mr. Speaker, whatever may be said, whether it seems ridiculous or funny, as long as those solutions are rejected, we will continue to beat around the bush. We will always be considering absurd motions as the one introduced today and far-fetched solutions which do not solve anything but create worse problems.

Mr. Speaker, the Creditists are continuing to instil these principles into Canadians so that the products will be available to the Canadian people and allow them to be their own masters.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles)—Unemployment Insurance—Commission policy respecting unemployed agricultural workers seeking benefits; the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—Post Office—Steps to increase compensation of rural mail delivery contractors; the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn)—Canada Development Corporation—Request for tabling of details of appraisal of Polymer for sale to Corporation.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO TAKE EFFECTIVE ACTION TO DEAL WITH INCREASED COST OF LIVING

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillies (for Mr. Baldwin):

That this House deplores the failure of the government to take concrete and effective action against the rising cost of living, so evident in the price of shelter, food and clothing; and therefore urges the government to impose an immediate temporary freeze so as to enable it to develop a satisfactory plan in conjunction with the provinces, industry and labour for the purpose of keeping the cost of living within acceptable limits.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday and today we directed questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) to try to establish exactly what the government policy is in this critical area of inflation and rising prices. On a number of occasions, we asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to outline the government's guidelines for areas within federal jurisdiction or the government guidelines to be imposed upon the proposed prices review board.

Today, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said that he announced government policy in this regard and the guidelines when he made his statement on April 27. I read that statement. Nowhere can I find in it any reference to government policy with regard to food prices or the cost of living. Nowhere can I find in it any reference to government guidelines for the new prices review board. In the news stories covering the press conference of April 27, when the minister made this announcement, we are again left in the dark. There is no reference whatsoever to exactly what the government policy is in this regard.

It is interesting to reflect on the circumstances surrounding the announcement by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He chose to make his announcement in the midst of the Easter Recess when parliament was not in session. What is even more difficult to understand, he made his statement coincidentally with the closing of a major federal-provincial conference in Ottawa on welfare. I am sure this announcement was made in the hope that the half-hearted attempt to meet the consensus of the food prices committee, and the growing fears in the country, would be obscured by the statement closing the federal-provincial conference on welfare. That is the only conclusion we can reach.

Mr. Gray: Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. McGrath: I am sure the minister will be participating in this debate. My time is limited. I am sure the minister will be able to ask all the questions he wants when I finish my speech. I am sure the minister hoped his announcement on his half-hearted attempt to meet the demands of the food prices committee and half-hearted attempt to meet the New Democratic Party half way would be obscured by the news flowing from this federal-provincial conference on welfare. That must surely be the explanation as to why the minister elected to make his statement at the time when the House was not sitting. Subsequent events have shown there was certainly no urgency.

The minister was trying to say he was treating this matter as one of great urgency. He could have at least waited one more week until parliament was in session and made his statement in the House, thereby allowing the members of this House to respond to the action the government was taking. But no, Mr. Speaker, the minister elected not to take that course. There is a good reason for that. The minister knew that the statement he made on April 27 setting up the prices review board would not be acceptable in this House and would not stand up to the scrutiny of this House. That is why he elected to make this statement when the House was not sitting. The committee recommended and I quote:

> The Committee recommends:
> 1. That the Government give consideration to the advisability of introducing the necessary legislation to establish an independent Food Prices Review Board equipped with such powers as are necessary to review prices, and that it report to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In its reports to the Minister, the Board could make recommendations concerning appropriate action to be taken.

The government does not intend to introduce legislation in this House. It does not intend to bring this review board into the House in any way, shape or form. Instead, they circumvent the House by using the provisions of the Inquiries Act to establish this commission. If the government had shown enough courage to meet the recommendations of the committee and to bring legislation before the House something might have been said for it, but the government knows full well it would have been faced with amendments and that these amendments would, at the very least, have had the effect of putting some teeth into the useless board whose establishment is proposed.

Given the situation in which parliament finds itself, the minister knows that the proposed review board, as announced by the minister on April 27, will not be acceptable and that hon. members would, by way of amendment, have considerably strengthened the board in fulfilment of their commitments and responsibilities. As a consequence, no legislation has been introduced. The board is to be set up under the Inquiries Act. What will it do? The provisions of the Inquiries Act will give the board no more power than could be exercised by the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices. The commissioners will be able to call for papers and persons and examine witnesses. That was precisely the role of the special committee. Obviously there is no future for the special committee, because the special committee is now redundant by virtue of the minister's action.

But even allowing for all the limitations and shortcomings of the review board, surely there must be people in Canada who could be approached to serve on the board. Until yesterday not one Canadian had been approached. Nobody had been invited to participate in this work. No invitation had been extended to any Canadian asking him to chair this board. One wonders what has become of all the expertise which I am sure must be lying around in the bureaucracy of Ottawa left over from the Prices and Incomes Commission. One wonders, in particular, why Dr. Young was not called upon. After all, he must have amassed considerable experience during his tenure as chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission. I submit he was not consulted because, as a result of his experience, he has reached the conclusion that only some form of income control would effectively halt inflation in Canada. And this, as we all know, would prove embarrassing to the government.

There has been an adverse reaction across the country to the minister's statement. We know it is not acceptable to most of the consumer groups. I refer, for example, to a release by the Women Against Soaring Prices. In a brief dated May 2, this body expressed its views as follows:

> Government guidelines for this Board are incomplete and unsatisfactory. Dependence upon "investigation and publicity" just is not powerful enough to deal with rising prices. Moral persuasion has not worked in the past and will not work in the future. At most, all that can be accomplished is a levelling-off effect on food prices.

That is the reaction of one group and it is re-echoed many times. I am sure the minister is aware of editorial opinion as expressed in the newspapers. The reaction of the editorial writers is consistent with the general reaction across the country. The minister's statement of April 27 was an affront to parliament. It showed contempt for this House and, more particularly, it was an affront to the special Committee on Trends in Food Prices which worked diligently to come up with the recommendations it placed before the House.

In the midst of all this, in the midst of the latest figures released by Statistics Canada a couple of days ago, showing a 2.6 per cent increase in the cost of food for the month of April, what are we doing? What is parliament doing? What are the priorities of the government? At a time when food, shelter and clothing prices are soaring, parliament occupies itself with amendments to the wildlife legislation. What are the legislative priorities for the balance of this week and next week? These open-ended opposition days, where the issue will not be resolved because there is no vote, by virtue of what I consider to be anomalies in the new rules, were designated by the government. They were not designated by the Official Opposition or by either of the other parties. It is the government which manages the business of the House. It was the government which said we should deal yesterday with amendments to the wildlife legislation. And this at a time when the whole country was talking about the scandalous increase in the price of food.

Mr. Gray: You could have had a vote today if you had wanted it.

Mr. McGrath: Certainly, the government is not getting its priorities straight. There is concern about this issue across the country. What shall we be doing next week? We shall be dealing with the question of capital punishment. Mr. Speaker, that bill has been around since this session began. Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said the poor were suffering because of high food prices but that the rest of us were spoiled. And, in that statement he recommended that the government should increase family allowances. Surely, in view of this, the government should re-arrange its legislative program in line with the consensus which exists in the House and immediately bring in amendments to increase family allowances thus placing money directly into the hands of the poor.

The Prime Minister, in his continuing efforts to deceive and mislead the House, talks about the fact that increases in family allowances could have been made last year, but for the Official Opposition. I reject that statement as being a gross deception. The Prime Minister, as the leader of this country, should show responsibility as such, and not mislead the House. The opposition did not prevent that bill getting through.

An hon. Member: Yes, you did.

Mr. McGrath: That bill was withdrawn by the government because they were getting flak from the government of Quebec. That is true, and the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) knows of what I speak because he was the Prime Minister's emissary to Quebec. That was why the bill was withdrawn. They talk about one man holding up third reading of that bill. The fact of the matter is that the House could have sat next day and given third reading to the measure. Or the government could have brought the bill on when the House met in emergency session in September to deal with the Vancouver dock strike. There was a disposition among all members to bring it on at that time.

The situation now is that after five years of study there is no FISP arrangement. It took approximately five years to come up with a Family Income Security Plan and now it is defunct. What do we have instead? We have a policy announced by the minister as a result of a federal-provincial conference under which the family allowance will be increased to $20. He talks about some new mechanism in connection with which he needs the consent of the provinces. I say to the minister: Bring in the increase in the present family allowances right away, as an interim measure. Let us not wait another six months for the new program mentioned by the minister following the federal-provincial conference. Let him bring in legislation now as a means of getting money directly into the hands of the low income group, those with large families and those living on fixed incomes, the people who are feeling the squeeze. The poor cannot wait six months for the minister's bill, they need money now. They have to buy food every day.

Where are the poor of this country? They are in the large cities where inflation is highest. They are in areas of regional disparity where incomes are low and unemployment is high. They constitue a very substantial majority in this country who are suffering from the consequences of the complete failure of the government to relieve the burden imposed on them by inflation. When the Prime Minister rises in this House to respond to questions, I challenge him to place the facts before the House instead of continuing to try to deceive the people of Canada. The fact is that we could have had the family income security plan, and we could have had it before the close of the last session of the last parliament; it could have been in effect now.

I point out that as an interim measure the government can change its legislative program and immediately bring in amendments to the present Family Allowances Act. There is a disposition on the part of members in the House to deal with this matter expeditiously because it would put money into the pockets of the poor, those with large families and on fixed incomes.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) spoke today, and I listened very carefully to what he said. I am sure that other members on the government side will confirm, and I am sure a reading of Hansard will also confirm, that the minister categorically rejected any suggestion of a freeze or any kind of controls as a means of fighting inflation. But I heard no reference whatsoever to what the government does propose to do. There was no mention in the minister's speech of the government's contingency plan. The fact is that there is no contingency plan.

Mr. Cullen: Then, why ask about it?

Mr. McGrath: Because the Prime Minister has said that there is one. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs appeared before the special committee on food prices and said that there was a contingency plan. However, I think the record will bear out that the minister was contradicted in this regard, because when the Minister of Agriculture appeared before that same committee he did not seem to be too knowledgeable about a contingency plan. As far as he was concerned, it was something that was just being talked about and was still evolving.

One gets the very distinct and clear impression that the difficulty about it is that the cabinet is split, that the government is divided on this issue, that there is no consensus within the government. This is why the Minister of Agriculture was allowed to spout off idiotic remarks about consumers never having had it so good, about how the people of Canada are spoiled, and food still remaining the best buy, contradicting the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has a difficult enough role to play as it is.

This is just about the first anniversary of the first budget of the Minister of Finance and it is interesting to look back to see what the minister said in May one year ago in his budget speech. He said that the government is committed to reasonable price stability, and that they do not expect food prices will rise as fast in 1972 as in 1971, that the current tendency encouraged them in this expectation. Well, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the minister's expectations and all his subsequent remarks, the food index jumped 2.6 per cent to 156.2 per cent in April from 152.2 in March. This compares with average increases of 0.8 per cent between these two months for the five preceding years. There was also a 12.9 per cent rise in food prices since April 1972, with food consumed at home rising 13.3 per cent and restaurant meals up 10.7 per cent from the preceding month of April 1972. Obviously, the Minister of Finance does not have the policies to cope with this problem.

That the government does not know how to deal with the problem becomes increasingly and painfully evident with each passing day. The government is playing for time. It is playing politics with this most crucial and serious issue in Canada, an issue that is bringing hardship to hundreds of thousands of Canadians. The government is playing for time, for some short-lived political gain. I say that this is disgraceful and the sooner the country is rid of this government, the better.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has not disappointed us. His speech has run true to form. It was the typical hatchet job that he does so well and which we in this House have come to expect.

I know for a fact that the use of the Inquiries Act, which after all is legislation passed by this parliament, in connection with the major recommendation of the special committee on trends in food prices was a quick and immediate response on the part of the minister. The only attack that the hon. member for St. John's East can seem to summon up is the negative one of saying that it is taking a little more time than he thinks is necessary to find the appropriate membership of the board. He fails to recognize that not only do we have to find personnel for the board, but first it must be determined whether we want on the board consumers, chartered accountants or lawyers. Having made that determination, the cabinet can then select personnel who in their view will best fit that particular role.

Imagine if you will, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) had decided to take the other tack—in other words, not do anything while the House was in recess. The first member who would have risen under Standing Order 43 would have been the hon. member for St. John's East, suggesting that nothing had been done about the food prices committee report. If on the first day the minister had introduced legislation setting up the kind of board he proposes to set up under the Inquiries Act, we would have had the opposition members asking why we did not take action under the Inquiries Act because we could move much quicker. This is the kind of situation where the government side cannot win. If it moves too fast, it is accused of not using legislation that would slow up the process. If it does introduce legislation that would slow up the process, given the heavy amount of work on the order paper, the government would be criticized for moving in this way in order to get out from under the report of the food prices committee.

I was also interested to hear the hon. member say so much about the prices review board when it was his party which rejected out of hand the major recommendation of the committee, despite the fact that it had the support of the Conservative government of Alberta. Their terminology was a "monitoring board", but this review board had the support and backing of the government of Alberta and was a suggestion that government made.

The hon. member who preceded me quoted from a statement prepared by Women Against Soaring Prices, the WASP group, but I did not see him jump to his feet when the same group proposed that the consumers of this country enter into a boycott. He was not so quick then to jump on their bandwagon. In point of fact, he thought that they were wrong at that time. I suggest that the WASP group was wrong on that occasion and that they are wrong now. If you want to set up a board with authority to roll back prices, then I suggest you read some constitutional law.

The hon. member referred to editorial writers in this country, and I am just wondering how many of these editorials he has read. He said the consensus among the editorial writers of this country was that there is no point to a food prices review board being set up under the Inquiries Act. I suggest he and I must read different papers. No doubt he reads Tory ones, whereas I read ones that are objective.

To be fair, editorial opinion on this subject is probably divided. But even those who oppose the setting up of this board under the act at least say we should give it a chance to see if it works. If it is successful with food prices, then it might be a pilot project for dealing with other commodities. Although it is easy in an off-hand way to ridicule, it is difficult to come up with any positive suggestions. I challenge the members of this House to read the speech made by the hon. member for St. John's East and find one positive suggestion that he made during the 20 to 25 minutes he spoke. He did not tell us how they would cope with rising prices.

I read with some interest, but I must say with little hope, the motion proposed by the Conservative party, with a view to determining if it answered the question I had in mind. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) presented his address, and we are still wondering what, in fact, the opposition parties would do and where they would go after the 90-day freeze. We still do not know what they intend to freeze. We heard a lot of criticism about the NDP and the problems it had with its waffle group, but I suggest the Tory waffling that is being done here makes that NDP group look like a bunch of pikers.

Let us look at the record. In April, 1972, when the Conservatives thought they had absolutely no chance of winning the election but expected to have at least a respectable showing and this was when leadership candidates were rattling their sabres, being more interested in the leadership than politics—what was their view? I suggest the leader of the NDP hit the nail on the head when he said there was no comment about dividends or incomes, but strictly comment about wage and price controls. In any event, in the view of the Conservatives they were not going to form a government and it was quite safe for them to talk in this way. They did not talk about dividends or professional fee control; they talked strictly about wage and price control. After the election in October, 1972, they were as surprised probably as we were when they realized they might be asked to form a government. What was their position then? They still talked about controls if necessary, but not necessarily controls. That has a familiar 1940 ring to it, and I suggest that is where the Conservatives are, about 30 years behind the times.

Then, they saw that this party was going to form the government and they began to hedge their bets a little bit. At that time they said they did not think this was the time for control. We then heard the two financial critics of the Conservative party, Tweedledum and Tweedledee, one saying he would be dumb today because the other was dumb yesterday; one saying this is not the time for controls and the other going on the CTV national network saying the time has come to bring in a temporary freeze all the way down the line, not stopping even at the farm gate.

This was supposed to be a temporary freeze. Then, the people of Canada spoke up and said that you cannot control everything; there are some areas beyond the capacity of Canadians to control. The Conservatives said then they would not control those things they could not control. They did not want to hurt the farmer and the fishermen, so they intended to stop at the farm gate. I suggest that, in fact, is meaningless. You are either going to have controls or you do not have controls. You cannot have half-way measures, and I suggest that proposal does not even go half way but only works to the detriment of the Canadian worker and consumer. I suggest there is no support in the country for that position. I suggest it is very easy, and a good political pitch, for the Progressive Conservatives to say that because prices are going up they intend to impose controls, but when you pin them down you find they do not know where controls are to be put on, how they are to be put on, or what results these might have.

It is interesting to note that this motion provides for discussion with the provinces, industry and labour. The food prices committee carried out such consultations and actually had these people appear before it. That committee had before it representatives from the CLC and we know what their position is. They are against control. That committee and representatives from the governments of Alberta and Manitoba, one Progressive Conservative and one NDP government, and they are also against controls. The committee had a representative from the Canadian Cattlemen's Association before it who also indicated opposition to controls. The committee had representatives of consumer associations appear, and they said this was not the time for controls. Why is there a need for consultation when we already know the position these people take?

Members of the Progressive Conservative party have been saying that we should show some leadership. I suggest we have shown leadership but that they are bankrupt in this regard. They know that no one is in favour of controls but they really have nothing to suggest except a 90-day freeze. They suggest we should put the lid on for 90 days and then watch it blow off after that. They know that we will be in power and that they can hedge their position. This is only a political promise.

What kind of controls are we getting from Progressive Conservative parties? We have seen an example of this in Ontario. Thank God for an effective opposition in Ontario. That government proposed a 7 per cent energy tax, but fortunately the opposition parties were successful in having that tax rescinded. What did that government propose to do about the rising cost of living? It simply increased the sales tax by 40 per cent, and that is not the way I would like to see the federal government act. Fortunately for the people in the rest of Canada, this increase only applies in Ontario. Imagine what might have resulted if the federal government had increased sales tax by 40 per cent instead of dropping it by 47 per cent for those in the $5,000 income bracket.

I do not intend to reiterate what was said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), but he did highlight the government's aims, for those who were listening to him, although I think there were very few. I wish I had the ability of the leader of the NDP to put the Tories in their place regarding their behaviour and courtesy shown in this House. It was very difficult to hear what the Minister of Finance had to say because of the interjections by the Tweedledums and Tweedledees across the way who realized that the minister was punching holes in the one argument put forward by the Conservatives that might have had at least some merit.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that speech, Jack?

Mr. Cullen: I wrote this one and I think it's pretty good. In any event, the Minister of Finance did outline the highlights, for those in this part of the Chamber, and admitted that there were areas where no control is possible. The hon. member for Don Valley waved his hands and admitted there were areas that cannot be controlled, but apparently he did not want to hear about them. He tried to brush aside those remarks, but he was kind enough to state these were not excuses. He actually conceded there were reasons for price increases and areas over which Canada had no control.

We in this party do not operate in a vacuum, and Canada cannot operate in a vacuum. We must operate in world markets. Surely, the hon. member for Don Valley recognizes that fact. It might be interesting to go back to the time when the hon. member for Don Valley was addressing his economic students to find out what kind of pitch he was making at that time. I venture to guess that some of the hon. member's lectures on why controls would not work in Canada would be very interesting. I can imagine him putting a question such as this to his students: Give us your views why controls would not work? It is only a guess on my part, but I feel that we might find one or two questions of that kind in his examination papers, or certainly in his lectures. I hope that most of his students were good thinkers and pointed out to him, notwithstanding the fact they might get a failing mark, that what he proposed would not work in theory and would certainly not work as far as Canada is concerned.

I want to state that, as Chairman of the food prices committee, I agree with the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), the committee did work hard. I think we disagreed on only one point. I understand their party is prepared to accept five or six of the recommendations of that committee and only oppose the establishment of a food prices review board. In any event, the committee did work hard, no thanks at least in the beginning to those opposition members who first of all were successful in removing any expertise we might have received from the Senate. I am not particularly given to defending the Senate in this Chamber, but I think members of that place, particularly members such as Senator David Croll, might have played an important role in the work of that committee. Such members might have provided much expertise but, for whatever reason they had, the Conservatives rejected that expertise, and I suggest this has worked to the detriment of Canadians generally.

The leader of the NDP said the Minister of Finance was being complacent when he said that certain things had been done, and nothing more remained to be done. I suggest he was misinterpreting what was said by the minister. The minister not only outlined what had been done, he went on to say what was being done and what would be done in the future. There is no complacency on the part of this government. With a two-seat majority in this House we cannot afford to be complacent but must act in a responsible way in order to win the respect and support of other hon. members.

The minister indicated that we were combatting rising prices by increasing exemptions, lowering taxes, removing tariffs and allowing the transfer of family farms from one generation to another without imposing a capital gains tax. He also pointed out the increase in old age pensions and guaranteed income supplements, veterans' pensions, higher family allowances and higher income supplements for senior citizens, having them tied to the cost of living. All these things have been done and will be done by this party and government, and that is why I am pleased to support it, as I have done for some considerable length of time.

Increased Cost of Living

Much has been said to discredit the food prices committee. It has been suggested that it was a toothless committee and could only come out with recommendations that were toothless. I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was breathless when he suggested the committee and its recommendations were toothless. He obviously did not consider the board's powers under the Inquiries Act. If the hon. member were in the underwear business now and decided to raise prices to an exorbitant level I wonder whether he would be somewhat apprehensive about the review board having a look at the situation. Our committee worked well. We never lacked a quorum. I give credit to all hon. members for this. Members of the Conservative party, such as the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott) and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) made a sincere effort to see that the committee worked.

The Committee had credibility to the point that two provincial governments asked that their representatives be permitted to appear before us. One of them had this to say about our committee and about the fact that such a committee was set up:

● (1720)

> We commend the members of the Committee for their undertaking and for their dedication to objectively review and analyse all this complex situation and set of problems. While we do not assume to have all the answers at hand, we would like to explore with you the philosophy of our government in this area and some suggestions for your consideration.

If that committee was a waste of time, certainly the Progressive Conservative government of Alberta did not think so.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks this afternoon, I cannot forgo an observation that has become so apparent this afternoon. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he spoke, the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) when he spoke and the chairman of the food prices committee, each in turn castigated this party because they learned nothing about the income regulations that this party proposed. They learned nothing about their scope or their aim or composition. They were speaking from, by their own admission, absolute ignorance when they indicated as their reasoned opinion that such regulation could not work. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is absolute hypocrisy because if they make statements like that on a subject that is so serious, they should at least know some of the fundamentals of what is proposed. Had they listened to the various speakers from this party who have endeavoured from time to time in a reasoned and reasonable way to indicate what we believe would provide a solution to one of the most terrible problems facing this country today, they would then have had some indication of what we are trying to accomplish.

What I would like to do this afternoon in the time allotted to me, which is very short, is to show why the people of Canada are not only confused but alarmed at what is happening. I listened with rapt attention to the Minister of Finance. I listened with very careful attention to the leader of the New Democratic Party and to the Chairman of the food prices committee. What struck me as a Canadian was the fact that each of them seemed prepared to accept this tremendous increase in the cost of living. They seemed prepared to accept inflation as a Canadian way of life and as something that was unavoidable. The only solution they put forward, each in his own way, was to give more Canadian tax dollars to an ever-increasing number of Canadians who find that they cannot survive under this government's economic program. This is what will cripple this country. This is what will cripple the New Democratic Party, because their basic support is from the labourers of this country who are the middle income earners. This is the very group which this government is carefully placing as the main target for taxation in its tax reform bill. This is what we are up against. This is what is happening in this country today.

Now, I should like to say what else, in my considered opinion, is confusing the Canadian people. I refer to the statements by the ministers of this government as they travel across this country. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) tells the farmers what they like to hear. He is saying that food in Canada today is a bargain. He is saying that food prices are not too high and no doubt will go even higher. The farmers of this country have to work in close co-operation with the consumers of this country, and I say that in making such statements the minister causes divisiveness between two groups which may be irreparable. He gives the consumers of this nation the impression that the prices they pay in the food stores are the prices the primary producers receive, but there is a great difference between the two. The farmers are not having it that great. The farmers also are consumers.

One of the greatest problems facing farmers is that their input costs today are rising at a greater rate than their selling prices despite the increasing price of food. As soon as the present inventories that the agricultural producers of this country have, which were produced at lower cost levels, are exhausted, the farmers will not be receiving the high income it is alleged they are receiving at the present time.

Then, we have the minister who represents a riding adjacent to mine. He is a neighbour of mine and is a man for whom I have the greatest respect. What did he say? He said that food prices are too high. One minister says they are too high and another minister says that they are not too high. This minister not only says that they are too high but that, because of its great concern, the government set up a special parliamentary committee for the prime purpose of studying the trend in food prices and ascertaining why they are so high. The purpose of this committee was to bring in a recommendation, and it recommended the establishment of a committee to control food prices and, if necessary, roll them back. One minister says the prices are not high enough and another minister has a policy to roll them back.

So, we go to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of this party. What does the Prime Minister say? He says there is no cause yet for alarm, that he does not consider there is any crisis yet. As a matter of fact, he believes there is no need for a contingency measure at this time, although we have had the greatest increase in food prices the consumers of this country have experienced. How can the people of this nation know what the government proposes? They are utterly confused. Perhaps they could accept the suggestion of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal party that we must accept the high cost of living. Maybe the people of Canada could accept this proposition if they knew how high prices would rise. But, Mr. Speaker, from the gravest experiences over the past months, even after the Prime Minister said inflation was licked, people know that it has continued at an ever-increasing rate. What makes me discouraged and alarmed is that the Minister of Agriculture, on behalf of the government, says that food is a bargain in this country. He does not tell the people of Canada that under Liberal administration the dollar has dropped in purchasing power from 100 cents to 69 cents. Not only is the government responsible for the increase in the cost of food, but for a 30 per cent devaluation of the Canadian dollar.

These are the problems we are concerned with when we say there should be some form of income control. It may be all right for various political parties to say, for various reasons, that there should be no control on wages. But talk to the men who are working and earning wages and you will find they are perfectly prepared to accept control if there is also control on the goods and services they purchase. Their constant demand for wage increases is because the dollar is going down in value and the cost of the things they buy is increasing.

I would like to deal with the Minister of Agriculture who speaks on behalf of Canadian farmers. I have the greatest respect for him as an individual, as a farmer and as a gentleman, but I cannot say that of him as a member of the government. Why can't I? It is because he says that food prices are still too low, that they should go up, and that farmers need more for their produce. But at the same time he supported wholeheartedly the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance which removed the tariff on imported food, the purpose of which was to reduce the price of food in Canada, and thereby reduced the price received by the very farmers he is championing.

The Minister of Agriculture goes around the country and says, "Grow more. Produce more. Get with it." At the same time he wholeheartedly supports marketing schemes proposed by the government the sole purpose of which is to control supply, to put quotas on production, to introduce supply management and government-regulated prices. You cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker, but that is what this minister is doing. What else is he doing? He is one of those who say that if you want to get ahead as a farmer in Canada, you have to produce, you have to increase efficiency, you have to get with it. But he supported a government which paid people not to grow grain. He supported a government which butchered hundreds of thousands of chickens to prevent them laying eggs.

He is the same minister who supported the national dairy marketing scheme and set it up as a model, the very purpose of which was to allocate dairy quotas to such a degree that for the first time in Canadian history we became importers of dairy products rather than exporters. This is the minister who gets up on a public platform and says, "Grow more. Produce more," but then comes into this House and supports every single measure to reduce the production of farmers and to reduce their incomes.

It is no wonder that the people of the nation are confused. It is no wonder that the primary producers in agriculture are becoming sceptical about the nice, pleasing speeches being made by the Minister of Agriculture. They are businessmen. They would greatly prefer progressive action from the minister on measures to solve their problems rather than pleasant speeches designed to win friends and influence farmers.

When we in this party talk about controls we are not talking about freezing Canadians into a position in which they cannot move. We are not talking about introducing hardship for any group of Canadians. We are trying to bring in some sort of program designed to help this country out of the dilemma in which it finds itself. It is not good enough for any government, let alone a Canadian federal government, to say that because things are going on in other countries, it naturally follows that they must go on in Canada. Somebody has to be a leader. Somebody has to find a solution to these inflation trends. Why can't it be the Parliament of Canada?

The only thing holding the Parliament of Canada back from making progress in fighting inflation and the increasing cost of living is the stubbornness of the government in refusing to accept, even in part, a proposition which the opposition sincerely feels will work. Government members castigate us about a 90-day freeze. They talk about it as if that is the total program. They castigate us for not laying the program out in full.

On a subject as complex as this no man in the world has the capability to discuss the question completely and to illustrate the remedy within a 20-minute speech. I congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), because in a series of speeches he has done more to illustrate a policy that will work than all the ministers of finance I have had the pleasure of hearing during the last two parliaments. The hon. member for Don Valley made a simple statement that will find acceptance—

Mr. Caccia: Very simple.

Mr. Danforth: —even from the hon. member who interjected. The hon. member for Don Valley said the present economic policies are just not working. If you think they are, just go and ask your constituents. If you do not know what is going on, you had better find out or you will not be here very long. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) insists on injecting himself into the debate. It is to him I allude. If he does not know right now that the increased cost of living is a massive problem in his riding, a riding with which I am familiar, then he is not accepting his responsibilities as a member of this House.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, no one in this House can be accused of not being concerned about the problems facing Canadians. No one in this House can be accused of being unsympathetic to the fact that the cost of living is going up at an alarming rate. The only difference between members of the House is on the way the problem should be attacked. If I have any plea to make to this parliament it is to ask members of the other political parties to lay down their partisan, political shields and, as responsible Members of Parliament, show some interest in the principle that we are proposing at this time.

Mr. Caccia: May I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): This can only be done with the consent of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Danforth: I will be glad to receive a question.

Mr. Caccia: In light of the non-partisan plea which the hon. member just made, would he enlighten the House on the remedies he would like to propose?

● (1740)

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been in the House during the course of debates on the economic policies of his government which have taken place in this session alone, he would not have to ask such a stupid question.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the terms of the resolution before us are very broad, covering the entire spectrum of the cost of living. I am as aware and as concerned as anyone about the elements that go to make up the cost of living, food, rent, clothing, utilities, transportation and the rest. But on the principle that the longest journey begins with a single step, I will confine my remarks today to cover what can be done about the spiralling price of food which some analysts tell us may increase by as much as 45 per cent. I am well aware that this will not frighten the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) nor some other ministers perhaps, but it frightens the people of this country and it frightens me. I am afraid to think about the situation that can occur if nothing is done about food prices in an effective way.

At the outset of my remarks I want to warn the government that it cannot get away with the type of food prices review board which has been proposed. Certainly the skirts of the New Democratic Party may be broad and protective in some regards, but I warn the government that it is not going to be able to hide behind them. We have said that the board as announced by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) is not adequate and will not pass as far as we are concerned.

I come from a west coast province, and to us the situation in which we are placed today appears as though there has been a big shipwreck and people are tossing about in the water. The government has proposed a search and rescue operation but has confined its terms strictly to the business of search. While people are in the water, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is telling them that the situation is inevitable and nothing can be done about it because of world conditions of one sort or another, and the Minister of Agriculture is reiterating tiresomely from the shore that food is a very great bargain—if you can get it! In the meantime, the Conservatives are watching the heads bobbing about in the water and are advising the stranded people to freeze for 90 days, but saying nothing about what they propose to do during the 90-day period.

Watching the Progressive Conservative party, I rather wonder if their reticence about bringing forward their 90-day program is because they have no ideas for it. I am afraid all they would do is put on a 90-day freeze and then, like Mr. Nixon, take it off and watch prices skyrocket. I am afraid they have not taken the warning of the late Jan Masaryk, the Czech patriot, who declared: "Excitement is no program". I think the Conservatives believe that excitement will convince the voters of this country that they have something. But the voters know that at the end of 90 days, prices would go still higher.

An hon. Member: That is nonsense.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): It may be nonsense, but you will have a chance to contribute in your own way. We in the New Democratic Party are firm in our determination to press for more than an investigation. The board as set out by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs does not have anything like the powers that we asked for and that the people want. Mr. Speaker, neither this party nor the people of this country are going to be fooled by what the board is at the present time. It is just an investigatory board, a toothless wonder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): I am not going to be silenced on the matter, Mr. Speaker. Up to this point the proposed prices review board has been nothing more than the resurrection of John Young's prices and incomes commission, which did absolutely nothing for three years except to spend $3 million of the taxpayers' money and produce reams and reams of paper. It was a waste of time, paper, money and expertise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): That is exactly what is proposed now. Mr. Speaker, I want to put forward our proposals. We believe that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should, without delay, bring in legislation to clothe either the board or himself—I do not think it matters very much which one it is—with the power to act on the findings of the board. Anything short of power to act is a waste of time and a deception.

Let me tell you, Mr. Minister, that you are lighting a slow fuse if you think you can get away with a board that is just another investigatory body. You cannot. The people of this country have been led to believe that this committee was a forerunner of action on the part of the government; they have been led to believe that the government is concerned about them. It is not only the people on low incomes who are suffering—although they are suffering most severely—but as costs creep higher and higher, people in the middle and higher income levels are suffering as well. Some of the analysts promise us a 45 per cent price increase in the future.

Mr. Minister, I say that by bringing in a board of this type in your name you would be, in my opinion, betraying the consumers of this country. The consumers trust you with their well-being, and they do not believe that you are going to fob them off with just another investigatory, time-wasting body. I would suggest that you keep your record clean and do not get—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust the hon. member will not mind my interrupting, but I must remind her that an effort should be made to address the Chair rather than the minister.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): I certainly shall, Mr. Speaker. I am referring to the minister, but it certainly causes me no hardship to put my remarks through the Chair. I shall remember that.

We want the minister or the board to be clothed with powers to prevent unjustifiable prices, to roll back prices which are unjustifiable and to protect the farmers where necessary by price supports or subsidies, or in whatever way is essential. I was rather amused this afternoon to hear one of the hon. gentlemen to my right, who like myself is from the city, suggest that all we need to do is plan for very quick production. I was thinking how the farmers would react to that idea. Presumably, within this 90-day freeze beef could be raised from conception to table. I know it is going to be more complicated than that.

We do not propose that the price of all kinds of meat be controlled, but that there be selective controls on certain foods which, taken together, would add up to a nutritionally sound diet. Don't tell me it cannot be done. I have here a copy of the Daily Telegraph of London, England, dated February 22 which points out that in Britain they are exercising very definite control on the price of a particular commodity. That is the Kellogg's firm, which has 60 per cent of the market. The government is telling Kellogg's that it will hold the line on those prices as long as it believes it should do so and prevent their going higher, because higher prices would be unjustifiable.

I want to pay tribute to the chairman of our food prices committee, but in my view he was stretching the point a bit when he referred to the quick response by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in dealing with the prices review board. I do not think his response was quick. I agree with the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). Surely, even during these last two or three weeks when he was looking for suitable members for the board, the minister could have found at least one suitable candidate. As well, he might have done something else—met with his opposite numbers in the provinces and discussed with them provisions that would be necessary to overcome any constitutional obstacles in this field, with a view to overcoming them. Even if they did not remove them, we might have discovered what they were.

Mr. Speaker, in this country there have been many areas over which jurisdiction has been divided between provincial governments and the federal government. Governments could not encroach upon each other's jurisdictions. However, when the public wanted action taken in a joint way, it was taken. When the people wanted income taxes to be collected exclusively by the federal government, the provinces were able to surrender the power of taxation to the federal government. These things can be done if the government wants to do them.

My great fear is that this government does not genuinely wish to set up a prices review board that can act. I have not seen evidence of such a desire and that is why I am afraid. I am telling this to the consumers of this country because they must make sure the government realizes how essential it is that the board be in a position to act. Also, I am telling the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that it will be highly dangerous for him if he does anything short of giving this board the powers that it needs. That can be done and must be done. Merely because we cannot see all the way through the thicket does not mean that we should not make a start in this area. We must make a start.

Undoubtedly there are some who want to leave things to the workings of the marketplace. I am talking of people like the Minister of Agriculture. That view, I suspect, is also held by some other members of the cabinet, including the affable, knowledgeable and able Minister of Finance. Mr. Speaker, I will tell you what such action would mean today. If you leave these things to the workings of the marketplace it will mean leaving the consumer at the mercy of some large and powerful corporations who will first destroy their weaker competitors and then be in a position to demand from the consumer every cent that the traffic will bear. Those who were on the food prices committee know that and they will be even more aware of this fact when we resume our sittings in a short while.

People must have food in order to live. Consequently, the food industry is highly profitable if you consider it in its entirety. Anyone who doubts that should look at the profits of the great corporate structures underlying the supermarkets and some of the other sectors of the food industry. No wonder prices are going up: profits are going up and profits are there to be reaped.

As long as the food gamblers can sell their wares at a profit, it matters not a whit to them who gets hurt in the process, whether it is the farmer whose existence is threatened by the rising cost of machinery and farm supplies, the low-income families whose children cannot get proper nutritional food, or the middle-income families who are brainwashed, along with the rest, into buying all sorts of things they neither want nor need because of the wasteful ingenuity of those servants of the supermarket, the advertisers. I have noticed that according to press reports advertisers are beginning to worry. They are becoming sensitive because people no longer believe many of their claims about the wares the supermarkets display. They are now saying that they must improve their image.

The purpose of the food prices review board is that of taking a first, real step to transform the food industry from its present status of a gambling venture into what it should be, an industry to supply the needs of people for food at the lowest cost consistent with quality and with the protection of those who are involved in food production, the most vulnerable of whom at the moment are farmers.

Water has always been a public utility. It has been regarded as too important a substance to be cornered by one or two big monopolies for their own private profit. I am glad to say that there is one provincial government that is beginning to look at food a little in that light. The government of British Columbia is beginning to supply the co-operative movement, regarded as an enemy by the great monopolistic private food chains, with funds to build up a co-operative, non-profit alternative to the gambling food chain business which is so deeply rooted in the country in which we live. I am glad to see that this beginning has been made.

May I have two or three more minutes, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has three minutes. If it is after six, I would assume hon. members would want the hon. member who has the floor to complete her remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the minister look at this board in a way completely different from that in which he has so far viewed it. Consumers have become aware, as the minister no doubt knows, that committees which sit too long merely involve procrastination. Their establishment often means that decisions are put off and that a whitewashing job is done. People will not put up with that any more. I hope the minister realizes that if he does not act there will be retribution. If retribution does not come about in this House, he and those associated with him will suffer that retribution at the hands of the people across this country who trusted this government to do something in solving the problem of food costs. Those costs are part of the cost of living which people must bear. People must have food in order to live. If the government betrays the trust of the people, it is doomed no matter whether it receives the coup de grâce in this House or at the hands of the voters.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The House will resume this debate at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, some 2,500 years ago a Greek philosopher was attributed a statement he once made to the effect that he knew that he didn't know. Presumably it was Socrates who pronounced it. I would like to borrow that statement from him tonight in approaching this subject, because it is of such complexity that it makes one realize very quickly the limits of one's knowledge in attempting to come to grips with it.

I would rather have listened for the duration of the debate. However, the speech made at the opening this afternoon by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) touched upon certain aspects and this has prompted me to respond to what he said.

In his speech, the hon. member for Don Valley emphasized the importance of introducing a freeze. He called it an "immediate temporary freeze." He mentioned 90 days. It is this kind of conflict to which I take strong exception. What does it mean? Expressed in those terms, it is truly a Conservative philosophy. It says to society, those who are trying to catch up in their income and standard of living with those who have made it, "Stay where you are and accept the fact that for a certain period of time you will not be able to catch up with the rest of society."

Who will be hit? Who is going to suffer? Who is going to be affected by a freeze of the kind proposed through this motion of the Conservative party? It is the working poor, the unorganized worker and the organized worker earning less than $80 a week, such as a hospital worker. It affects all those in society who are trying to improve their lot and catch up with the others.

This kind of measure would not affect the professionals who earn a reasonable income. This is where the whole question of wage and price controls becomes so intriguing. It is easy to impose controls on the wage earner because the system is set up in a way whereby wages are determined by the employer. With a measure of this kind, whether of short or long duration, experience in other countries has shown that once you introduce a temporary freeze, when the period is over the government finds it necessary to extend it because of the complexity of the situation, and politically it is not easy to remove.

Usually, a measure of this kind affects the wage earner in all sectors of the business world. How would it be possible to introduce a freeze or control without affecting the income of non-wage earners, those who by virtue of their activity are not dependent on a salary? Are you going to say to the professionals that by virtue of this freeze, the lawyer, doctor or accountant should stop seeing clients at a certain point because he has reached his income ceiling? Conversely, will you say to these professionals that once they have reached the ceiling permitted under the measure they should serve their clients free of charge? These are questions that come to mind.

It would be very helpful if the members of the Conservative party would explain to us how they would do this without harming those sectors of society that are trying to catch up with the others, namely, the wage earners, the working poor, the unorganized workers and the organized workers at minimum salaries. How could a measure of this kind work effectively for those who are not wage earners, such as the professionals? This philosophy of the Conservative party says, "Let's freeze everybody in their place. You who are lagging behind, stay there. Those who are doing well can take it. In the meantime we might find a solution." We have not heard from the hon. member for Don Valley, except for a brief answer which lasted a couple of minutes, as to the measures he would introduce at the end of the temporary freeze.

I have no particular knowledge of economics, as you can see perhaps from my exposé so far. I represent the average guy who is looking to parliament for the answers. Today the onus is on the Conservative party to provide the answers, and so far they have not outlined a policy which can convince me they have an alternative to what the government has done so far.

An hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Caccia: They have offered only a short-term, temporary proposal without looking to see what would happen at the end of the rainbow.

An hon. Member: Listen to the speech. Read it.

Mr. Caccia: I listened to the speech this afternoon; I do not need to read it. How do you implement controls in a federal system of government unless you have full co-operation at the provincial level? How do you implement controls in a democratic society, in which I suppose one of the motives in life is making a profit, when you have set up your own business and wish to catch up with those who are doing better, or when you are not a member of an organized union and want to catch up with people who are earning a better wage? How do you go about introducing compulsion in a society which fundamentally abhors compulsion?

The other question is, what happens when controls are taken off? Will the level of prices remain unaffected at that point, or is it likely, as has happened in other countries, that when you take the lid off, all that has been gained is lost in a matter of weeks? Have members of the opposition thought this through and, if so, what are their answers? What happens after the 90 days to the weaker segments of society who are trying to catch up with the others? Certainly a doctor earning $50,000 a year will not be affected by the freeze, but a worker in a hospital earning $80 a week is in a different position. How would the Conservatives allow him to catch up with the others, according to their theory?

In searching for an adequate answer we must also realize that Canada is not an island; we cannot isolate ourselves from the inflationary spiral which is sweeping the entire western world. As we all know, we are dependent on trade with other countries. How do we isolate Canada from the inflation we import? This country has to import in order to export. I heard nothing this afternoon about that aspect of the problem. The hon. member for Don Valley mentioned it briefly, but he moved on at once to another subject.

Before we embark on a temporary freeze the people of Canada are entitled to know what will happen at the end of the freeze. It is for us, as politicians, not just to provide answers which will relieve the anxieties of the moment because that course might be politically expedient, but to provide answers which will demonstrate that we have thought things through and that we have a chance to implement a policy all the way through. To me it seems the Liberal approach so far has been as sound and as effective as it reasonably could be.

Mr. Caccia: Wait a moment. When your turn comes you will have an opportunity to contribute. The government has done one thing; it has redistributed income by taxation. You take away purchasing power from those with higher and middle incomes and give it to those with low purchasing power, and you do it by means of programs of income support such as old age assistance, the guaranteed income supplement, allowances for children, programs for veterans, the Canada Pension Plan, and so on. This is a form of redistribution of income. You can do this to the extent society is willing to accept it.

When we were considering the capital gains tax in this House, who were opposing it as a measure which was thought to be the end of the world? It was the members of the Conservative party. They were opposing one of the most logical and sensible measures for the redistribution of income to permit those who have no way of defending themselves to be helped through the government's system of redistribution of income by taxation. So you take purchasing power away from certain groups and give it to others by way of social security programs.

A second measure which has been introduced is provision for a cost of living increase in the programs I have mentioned so that those who live on fixed incomes have a chance to keep up with increases in the cost of living through regular adjustments. Another measure is one which was announced recently, the setting up of a prices review board. I am looking forward to seeing how this will work. I really do not know whether it will be able to achieve the objectives the public expects it to achieve. Perhaps it will only serve the purpose of emphasizing the complexity of this issue.

Another measure which is still to come is the introduction of really effective legislation in the field of monopolies, keeping monopolistic trends to a minimum and, if possible, eliminating the fixing of prices. Then, I suppose—and this can be done in several ways through our agricultural policies—we might introduce incentives designed to increase the supply of certain products. I recall a lengthy debate which took place in this chamber until seven in the morning. It was on the introduction of agricultural marketing boards. Members of the Conservative party were strongly opposed to these boards. Do they still think it was such a bad idea? Would they still be opposed to that measure, now that two years have gone? If so, why?

Sometimes memories in this chamber are very short, but it does no harm to raise these matters. I do not know what the answers are to the issues. I am Socratic; I do not know. But I do know the Canadian people are very disturbed by this trend. They want to have correct political answers, sound answers which will stand the test of time—not temporary measures which will serve merely as window-dressing.

In conclusion, since it is they who have introduced this motion I believe it is the responsibility of the Conservative party to tell us what will be done when the temporary freeze comes to an end. Will they renew the freeze for another few months? Having done so, what will they do next? How are they going to enable those sectors of society that are trying to catch up with other sectors to improve their lot, their wages and conditions? How will they deal with inflation which is imported into Canada from other parts of the world? Unless they can, the exercise here today will only have raised false hopes. It seems to me that we can do better than that.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those days when, under the rules, the opposition is assigned the right to raise certain grievances. To put the debate on the tracks, as it were, may I refer in my introductory remarks to the motion. We have asked the House to deplore the failure of the government to take concrete and effective action against the rising cost of living so evident in the price of shelter—which I shall deal with in a moment—food and clothing. We urge the government to come forward and impose an immediate temporary freeze on the price of shelter, food and clothing and to hold discussions within 90 days—a factor my hon. friend from Davenport (Mr. Caccia) seemed to miss—with the provinces, industry and labour and come up with some plan to stop the ever-increasing, galloping inflation.

Having listened to the speech of the previous speaker, if I may refer to it for a moment, I took the position that the hon. member had thrown up his hands. He is speaking for the Liberal party, but really he is a Liberal back, not in the nineteenth or the eighteenth century but in the seventeenth century—laissez-faire, let it go. On the one hand he cried about people on small salaries, and on the other hand talked about people with larger incomes. What he was really saying was that there was no revenue.

This parliament has already approved an increase in the old age pension, we have approved an increase in the exemptions of small wage earners, we have improved the pensions of veterans—but by the time the cheques got into the envelopes the inflationary spiral had eaten up the increases granted. The government knows that and the Canadian people know it.

When we came to this House four months ago I do not know whether the government had great hopes, but their only remedy to cure high prices was to set up a special committee to investigate food prices. That special committee recommended that we set up a food and prices review board. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), who in turn agreed with our member who led off this debate, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), and also the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) that this board will be useless. It is only an excuse for inaction. It really means more procrastination while Canadians suffer.

I could not help but agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway who spoke before supper. After all, this lady is a great parliamentarian of great capacity. She has a feeling for humanity and an understanding, following the tradition of her great father and parliamentarian in this institution. She has been influenced by socialists. This influence must come from her leader and other members of her party. She said that this review board will mean nothing but further procrastination, and there she let the cat out of the bag as far as her party is concerned. She knew this review board would be useless.

We said that a committee that would study the cause of price increases would be useless. This is merely hoping that something will turn up, like Micawber. The Canadian people knew that the cost of living was high. They knew the cost of food was high, and so are rents. Housing is expensive, as is clothing. They know their pay cheques will not meet the demands of their families. They know that now. They also know that prices will go higher because the government has no remedy. This government is bankrupt of ideas.

I was one who criticized the setting up of this committee, not only because I knew its recommendations would not solve the ball of wax of inflation but also because it was too narrow in purpose. The committee was set up to study food prices only. One wonders why it was restricted to that aspect alone, since the cost of living is rising, as is the cost of housing and shelter, which I will deal with in a moment, and clothing. Only last night I read that the cost of clothing during the next few months will go up 50 per cent. So why were just food prices picked out? I think the reason is that there were political implications. The Liberal party and another party in this House were frightened of those political implications, so they zeroed in psychologically on food prices in order to move people's minds away from the real issue. But people's minds are on the subject because their pocketbooks are on it. We said this to parliament as early as last January and now, four months later, it has been proven that what we said was correct. What was needed was not parliamentary investigation but responsible government action.

We have put forward a concrete program and we refer to it in our motion. We have recommended a temporary freeze. My hon. friend from Davenport keeps asking what will happen after 90 days. During the 90 days there will be discussions with the provinces, with industry, with labour and with farm organizations.

Mr. Caccia: What happened in the United States?

Mr. Woolliams: My hon. friend asks what happened in the United States. I should like to quote what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said. I must say the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) rather shocked me today, because I used to shadow his portfolio when he was minister of justice and I got to know him very well. He said that the price index increase in Canada was lower than that of any country in the western world. He had better get together with his Prime Minister; even he seems to be more honest. In answer to a question put by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 3510 of Hansard:

> I should like to tell the hon. member that in some countries which have applied price and wage controls the consumer price index has been increasing. It has been increasing in the United States at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 9.8 per cent in the past three months. On a year-over-year basis the increase in the consumer price index in Japan was 8.4 per cent, in Germany, 6.9 per cent, in France 7.0 per cent, in the United Kingdom, 8.2 per cent—

However, the Prime Minister admitted that the rise in the index in Canada over the same period was 13.2 per cent. Britain imposed temporary controls, and the United States has temporary controls. I say there is some record, at least, that they worked; they worked well while in operation. We put that forward as a concrete suggestion.

Before dealing with housing, one of the questions always raised by the Prime Minister—it must have been his favourite subject at university—is the constitution. For too long he has been hiding behind the constitution. I say that under the constitution the government has the power to act in order to implement a temporary freeze on all prices. Pausing there, as the hon. member for Don Valley said, we are living in the year 1973. During the first war, under the terms of peace, order and good government the federal government realized it had the power to stop galloping inflation and declared, not by act of Parliament or by changing the constitution but by judicial decision, that there was a national crisis. If we had a similar judicial interpretation today that there was a national crisis, any government in Canada under that formula would be able to implement some form of price control, particularly in the field of housing.

I am tired of this government.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

An hon. Member: The country is tired of it.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, the country is tired of its always hiding behind the constitution.

Let me deal particularly with that subject the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) suggested would be raised in this debate, that is, housing. We have in Canada the most serious national housing crisis that has existed during my lifetime or the lifetime of any Member of Parliament sitting in this House. The index refers to a 6 per cent increase in housing. I made 10 or 15 phone calls across the nation today about this situation, and I found in talking with real estate people and those in the house construction business that costs have increased in the major cities in Canada from a low of 50 per cent to a whopping high of 100 per cent since the Trudeau gang took office. Believe me, the people of Canada have not forgotten that this is the same old gang running the country. It may try to create a new image and a new psychology, but its policies are the same. We have the same kind of unemployment, the same kind of inflation and the same bankruptcy of ideas. There has been no change.

An hon. Member: What about the Tory promises?

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member talks like a seventeenth century economist. In the 1960s, those in the low-income group were able to buy houses in the major urban centres for much less than today. In 1968, a house with three bedrooms and a bathroom and a half cost approximately $15,000. Today that same type of house, whether it is in Edmonton, Calgary, Toronto or Ottawa—there might be a slight difference—would cost $30,000 to $35,000. The cost has increased a whopping 100 per cent. I have checked the price of housing from Vancouver to Halifax and, speaking relatively, these increases have taken place on a pro rata basis. I repeat that the increase has ranged from 50 per cent to 100 per cent in the two cities that have the doubtful honour of suffering the highest increases as a result of this government's policies. In the city of Toronto the increase has been 100 per cent, and in the city of Ottawa it has been 80 per cent. These two cities lead the pack in the increase in housing costs.

This government has merely set up a review board to look at the price of food and investigate the causes of the increase, yet these terrific increases in the cost of housing have taken place. My friends on the other side are always asking for solutions. Let me remind them that the CMHC is guilty of instructing solicitors to commence more foreclosure actions than any other housing corporation in Canada. The leader of the NDP—I see him in the House—has made reference to corporate bums. This state-owned and controlled body, and I have the figures, today has instructed solicitors to foreclose on the little people across the land.

When reading the Toronto Star tonight I noted that spokesmen for that socialistic government agency said there were 260,000 homes in respect of which only 2 per cent of the owners were behind in their payments, and with respect to only 1 per cent foreclosure action has been taken. Even I, not being a mathematician, can figure out that 1 per cent of 260,000 is 2,600 homes across the country that are subject to foreclosure action.

Let me deal for a moment with the history of this type of thing. I want to make three points. Only 6 per cent of the wage earners in Toronto can today own a home. The heading of this article suggests that housing in Toronto is a major social tragedy. I suggest it is a social tragedy everywhere. Rents are going up for the old and for the students. I refer to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 29. It reads in part:

Munish Gajadhar moved into a one-bedroom apartment at 230 Oak Street on January 1.

His rent in the morning was $137, and by suppertime it was $152. If that is not galloping inflation, then I have never seen a galloping horse outside the city of Calgary. Let me say a few more words about this great, national agency. I know of a case where a man signed a mortgage on a house in April, 1966, for $12,350. He was a Calgary resident. An action was started in January of this year by a member of a firm appointed as a result of all the compassion this Liberal government can muster. I am sure of that because one of the members of that firm ran against me as a Grit during one election.

This man was three mortgage payments behind; $118 for October, $118 for November and $122 for January—a total of $358. He was out of work, but even so an action for foreclosure was started. He obtained an order from the court, and after consulting certain people he was able to sell the house, as a result of inflation, for $21,000. When he went to pay CMHC his arrears, although they were only $358, the partisan solicitor charged him $579.50. That is the type of thing done by this government which has great feeling for the people! That is quite a collection fee on such a small foreclosure. Of course, the CMHC representative suggests there are only 2,600 foreclosures today in Canada.

I remember when the former leader of the NDP was Premier of Saskatchewan. He has talked about foreclosures in the 1930s. Never was there a corporation in Canada so heartless as the CMHC—and it is under the control of the minister responsible for housing. Let me say to the hon. member on the other side who wants remedies but will not take the medicine when you give it to him, it is time the CMHC ceased to be an independent body and was made directly responsible to the minister, in order that he might control the fate of Canadians living in urban centres.

An hon. Member: You can't blame them for patronage appointments in that regard.

Mr. Woolliams: That is another thing I do not want to get into at this time; it would take too long. This government has appointed so many Grits to so many boards lately that it has run short of jobs for them.

Only the rich can buy a house in Canada. Those in the middle and low-income groups are forced to live in public housing which will be our future ghettoes. Those who oppose this party when its members move motions are now bleating like sheep because they know this government is bankrupt of ideas. They know this government has driven the middle-class and the poor people from their homes into public housing, at high rents. I think Pitt was right when he said that when votes cease to be important, they will cease to be bought. That is what is happening to the Liberal party right now. Members of that party are becoming nervous and jittery.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Wollliams: Then go to the people and see what happens. Our problem is one of over-all inflation rather than simply rising food costs. We must consider the whole ball of wax, the entire field of inflation. We must make decisions in these terms, rather than continue to bleat like sheep about food prices only. The increase in food prices will continue as long as we have inflation and Liberalism in this country.

Last night in the U.S. news and world report several top economists of the United States, Britain, and I believe one from France—I do not try to hide the fact that other countries are experiencing inflation, but at least they are doing something about it—said that if inflation continues we will have a greater recession in this country than we had in the 1930s. This kind of economic condition spells distress, unrest and war—and, God knows, even in my lifetime we have had enough of that. Surely the time is past due for the Liberals to start moving. If they want to hold power, let them hold it with responsibility and start governing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: What should this government be doing in addition to what I suggested about CMHC? It should act within the authority and power of the constitution and not hide behind it. As the hon. member for Don Valley and the hon. member for St. John's East have said, we should immediately impose a temporary freeze on prices in order that we can initiate discussions at all levels with the groups I mentioned in my opening remarks. While the freeze is on, quick action should be taken to consult the provinces, industry and labour. This is not a selfish race against time but is a step one that must be understood for the economic good of the whole country rather than for any special group with special privileges.

• (2040)

We should repeal immediately the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials so that at least those people I have spoken about will be able to afford new homes. We should produce a new national housing program, making grants to the municipalities to clear away the bureaucratic deadwood and deadlock which exist at all levels of government, and guarantee the little people that the interest rates which they pay on their CMHC mortgages will be no greater than 1 per cent over the prime rate. I am not talking about private lending institutions; I am talking about where the lending is through a government entity. In that case it should never be greater than 1 per cent over the prime rate. I understand that at the present time—if it has not risen today—the prime rate is 6½ per cent. So the rate on CMHC mortgages should not be more than 7½ per cent.

We are not competing for public money with industry, because this government has the ability to gather in millions, indeed billions of dollars through taxation by hitting the middle-class and lower income people of this country. I spoke to the parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible for housing and said, "Bring in your housing bill." I told him we have two or three amendments to it. I said that the bill is only a band-aid bill, but let us at least get the band-aid on the move. I gave him the undertaking that our party wants to see the Liberals on the move. We want to get the bill to the committee, where we will move our amendments, hope to get some support from government members, move the bill back into the House and get some action. It will not solve much, but it is better than nothing. The Prime Minister tries to say that there have been delays. I cannot say he deliberately misrepresents the facts, but I can say he wanders from the truth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, generally it is with a great deal of relish that I speak in the House of Commons. However, tonight I do not have that sense of enjoyment because, quite frankly, this is one of the few occasions in my parliamentary career, when to some extent at least, I have to agree with what has been said by the members of the opposition. The most serious problems we have in Canada today is that of inflation. It is a problem which has been with us for a number of years. One would be less than truthful if he did not admit that.

This is not merely a Canadian problem; it is worldwide. I agree with the hon. member who this afternoon said that just because it is also a problem in the United States, in England, in France and in Germany does not mean that if the people in those countries happen to close their eyes, we in Canada, whether members of the Liberal party, the Conservative party or the New Democratic Party, should close our eyes to the problem. We cannot do that because the citizens of Canada are suffering grievously from this great sickness of inflation and it is up to us to do something about it.

Many arguments have been put forward as to why we do not have a system of controls in Canada.

An hon. Member: We have inept leadership, that is why.

Mr. Whicher: We have somebody with a loud voice on the other side. Please do not interrupt me when I am on your side at the moment. We have been told that there are many arguments against it. The first argument is that it will not work. Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to accept the lame excuse that controls will not work, because they simply have not been tried in Canada in peacetime.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: It is true that they have been tried in other parts of the world; no one would deny that. However, it is not true that they have been tried in our chosen country, for which we are responsible. For that reason I say that until they have been tried and proven unsuccessful, I will not accept the excuse that they will not work. I have also been told that controls are unconstitutional and we must obtain the permission of the provinces and get agriculture, labour, industry and everybody else on our side.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

It is high time we had a little chat with the provinces, with agriculture, industry, labour and all the other segments of the economy. If we do not—and this is the question I want to ask members of the House of Commons tonight—what is the alternative? People on my side of the House say that the members of the opposition have not told us exactly what they would do. But I have not heard from my side of the House either, since this Parliament started or during the past number of years, the alternative to controls in Canada. The alternative must be in our lifetime. I say, with sadness, that the alternative is absolute financial chaos in our lifetime if something is not done to stop the runaway inflation we have in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for one to have been to school or to university to understand this fact. A person earning $10,000 a year now in Canada, ten years from now—with the rate of inflation we have on May 10, 1973—will have an income of $20,000 a year; twenty years from now he will have an income of $40,000. One of my friends on this side of the House, whom I respect, said, "How can you bring in controls when the doctors, certainly, will not care about it?" He said that doctors today are earning $50,000 a year, while hospital workers are earning only $4,000 a year. To that hon. member I say that everyone knows that ten years from today a doctor who now has an income of $50,000 will have an income of $100,000 a year, and the hospital worker will be earning $8,000 a year—if we do not do something about inflation. I think it is high time we did something about this problem.

• (2050)

I think the only people who will agree with me are hon. friends to my immediate right. They say we cannot control things in this country. Only a month ago we put controls on a great Canadian corporation, Bell Telephone. Complaints came from my party, of course, from the NDP in particular and there were at least groans and sighs of dismay from my Conservative friends when the Canadian Transport Commission brought in a recommendation that Bell Telephone be granted a 2.3 per cent increase. The government said that this was too much and that it would have to review the situation. We heard the moans and the groans of the leader of the New Democratic Party about Bell Telephone gouging the public with a 2.3 per cent increase, but only a week or ten days later Ontario Hydro workers were granted a 30 per cent increase over a three-year period, or 10 per cent a year—and the leader of the New Democratic Party did not even give one good grunt.

You cannot have it both ways. Somewhere along the line we will have to face this situation. I am not going to say that Bell Telephone is making too much money, but just compare its increase of 13.5 per cent over the last five years with the 63 per cent increase by the Post Office, which is a nationalized concern, the 50 per cent increase by Ontario Hydro, which is a public concern, and the 39 per cent increase by Quebec Hydro and you will see that public enterprise has not really done too badly.

I only raise this matter to show that we have controls in Canada when we want to bring them into effect, but when we do not want to bring them into effect we just choose to ignore them. It does not matter whether we are politicians, doctors, teachers, plasterers or painters, whether we are in the agricultural field or wherever else we work—except, of course, if we are on the old age pension or some other pension—the fact is that our salaries, through natural increases, are doubling every ten years. Somewhere along the line somebody will have to tie this whole thing into a bundle and bring us back to the world of reality.

It has been suggested that the introduction of controls would create a great bureaucracy. I am not prepared to accept that philosophy one little bit. I agree that past history seems to show that each time a minister is placed in charge of a completely new portfolio in the federal government or in the provincial government of Ontario or Quebec, he is no good if within one year he does not have 1,000 people working for him. History proves that to be the truth. My hon. friend from Quebec who sits on the front bench opposite would agree with that. He had 1,000 people working for him; he knows what it is all about. But this does not mean that in the serious situation in which we find ourselves—and surely every member would agree that it is a very serious situation—we cannot streamline the bureaucracy and instead of acting as Conservatives, Liberals, members of the NDP or Creditistes, for once, in a state of national emergency, we should start acting as Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: When controls were brought in during World War II they were not brought in by the Conservative party or by the Liberal party: they were not brought in just by politicians but by all Canadians working together to win a war. Mr. Speaker, we are at war today. We are in a financial war, an economic war. If we do not do something about it, we are going to be swept under the table, not by countries where there is great inflation, not by countries like the United States but by great countries which in the next 25 or 50 years will really show the way, countries which have controlled economies such as China, Russia and countries of the Far East.

The old ways of controlling inflation simply will not work. Hindsight is a great thing. It is not with any feeling of bitter criticism that I look back on what has happened in Canada during the last three or four years, because I respectfully say that if my hon. friends opposite had been in power, perhaps they would have done the same thing. Perhaps they would have cut back and caused unemployment in order to control inflation. But with hindsight we know that this simply does not work.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the government: If such cutting back does not work, then what will work? Are we just going to go along with the tide and end up, as one hon. member on the other side has suggested, in the year 2000 with the average house in Toronto costing a quarter of a million dollars? Are we just going to go along with this tide, or are we prepared to do something about it? Again I emphasize that when I say "we", I mean the members of the House of Commons who represent the Canadian people—and they, in my opinion, desire controls; they are crying out for controls because they just do not know what to do at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, in case I am criticized by some, and I expect I will be, but I do not mind constructive criticism at all—

An hon. Member: We will look after you, Ross.

Mr. Whicher: You fellows had better look after yourselves. I can look after myself. But in case I am criticized by someone immediately following me who asks what kind of controls the hon. member for Bruce is talking about, I want to say that I mean 100 per cent controls. I mean controls on wages, on salaries, on profits, on rents, on dividends and on prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: There is no easy way. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) this afternoon. He is a member for whom I have the highest regard, but I think there is a bit of politics in the attitude of the Conservative party when they urge temporary controls for 90 days because—

Mr. McGrath: A temporary freeze.

Mr. Whicher: Or a temporary freeze.

Mr. McGrath: There is a lot of difference.

Mr. Whicher: In my opinion, a temporary freeze of 90 days would simply not be long enough. We may as well let the Canadian people know the truth right off the bat. There should be controls for two years anyway, because 90 days will not even let us get going. It will give us time to conduct a study, but it will not be long enough.

It has been said that we live in a democracy, that the average Canadian citizen is not ready for controls and that the average Member of Parliament, wherever he may sit in this House, is not ready for controls. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that sometimes in a democracy you have to give up a little bit of freedom in order to keep democracy in the long run. In my opinion, the citizens of Canada have to give up a little bit of freedom and accept controls, and I am sure they will, in order that we may remain a democracy for many long years to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, if I believed that democracy could be saved by controls I would think more favourably of controls. But I should like to know of a single instance in world history where democracy has been saved by that route. That is the route not of democracy but of disaster and hysteria. There are times in a democratic society when controls are required, but let us not have any illusions about what those controls do over extensive periods of time. If I thought for one moment that controls of one kind or another would further the cause of democracy or assist our society, then as reluctant as I might be I would go along with it. But in my view, Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence to support such an argument.

All of us would like to think that there is an easy way to end inflation. This afternoon I listened to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) express the rather wistful hope, with an evangelical appeal, that all we need is good will amongst men and then this thing would work. I only wish it were so. I have the greatest respect for the hon. member but in this particular case I really must question his judgment. The things he suggested are not going to correct the serious problem that inflation has become, not only in Canada but internationally.

To suggest a 90-day freeze is to assume that inflation is a psychological problem—it is in our heads and therefore the Conservative party is going to knock it out of our heads in 90 days. It is sort of a couch for the whole nation on which we get security after 90 days. Surely those of us who have worked on committees dealing with economics know that inflation is a worldwide problem with deep roots, and is not going to be solved in 90 days or cured by psychological attacks on it.

We all read the polls, and it is true that the people of Canada are very much disturbed about the problems of inflation and their security. If you were to ask the people in a straightforward way, without any qualifications, if they want an incomes policy, if they want controls, I think because of this insecurity there would be a tendency to say that they want it. But it is important to follow that question with a series of questions asking to what extent they are personally willing to accept controls on their incomes. We would find then that the percentage of support would drop substantially. I did a poll of my constituents and asked this question. Many of them replied that they personally were not the problem. Mr. Speaker, it is always the other fellow who is the problem. For the worker, the boss is the problem; for the boss, the worker is the problem; for the consumer, it is the farmer; and the farmer remembers the lean years and thinks everybody else is the problem.

Knowing how the people feel, I think we do a terrible disservice to the nation to prey on their insecurity. At the very best, the suggestion of control is a futile gesture and at the worst a cruel joke that will end in frustration and anger. I am not suggesting for one moment that those who are advocating it see it in that light, but I hope hon. friends to my right will excuse me if I express myself forthrightly and say that I see it in that light.

How will it work? After all, some of the people who are advocating this policy are very intelligent. I do not for one moment discount the background and knowledge of the hon. member for Don Valley. I may have reservations about some of his colleagues, but none about him. So how will it work? Would somebody explain that to me because I, too, would like tranquility. I do not like to see prices rising and Canadians disturbed every time they go to the supermarket or buy a gallon of gasoline. I would like to have some kind of wand to wave over the situation—whether 90 days or 120 days—so that the whole thing would go away like a bad dream. I do not know how it would work, Mr. Speaker; all I know is that it would benefit relatively few people.

The first thing that comes to mind is that the old age pensioners must surely benefit from a price freeze. The old age pension is now geared to the cost of living, so perhaps there is less urgency in that direction. But suppose the price freeze had been suggested two or three weeks ago when parliament was proposing to increase the old age pension—would the old age pensioners have benefited, or would they have been frozen into a situation that could not be corrected for a long time? What would have been the answer of government, Liberal or Conservative, in a case like that? We know the Liberal answer. Would the Conservatives have answered in a better way, or would they have said that the 90-day freeze would stick because if an exception was made for one group then another would want to be excepted, so there would be no increase in the old age pension?

I recall when the government of Canada, in one of its most confused states when it had a majority—that always tends to confuse the government of Canada—decided that the most serious problem facing this country was inflation and that they were going to fight it to the death. They did not care how many people they threw out of work, Mr. Speaker—and they threw a lot of people out of work. We kept asking, as did the Conservative party, for an increase in the old age pension, but it was refused because we were in a fight against inflation.

We saw the old age pensioners of Canada held as hostages in that silly and futile fight that could not be won. We might have had an increase in the old age pension two or three years ago had it not been for the attitude of the government that they could not give an inch in the fight against inflation. We think the last election cured the Liberal party, or at least some of them. Is it going to take another election to cure the Conservatives as well?

Take the problem of the poor. Are they to be frozen into a situation they do not deserve? Are they living in affluence now? Are they contributing to inflation? Are they to be penalized because of a freeze? How do you help them when you freeze them? Suppose the government exercised worse judgment than it has in the past and listened to the Conservative party and brought in a freeze. What would it mean to the family allowance? We are trying to get it introduced in July because we do not want to wait until the end of the year. It should be done now. If there were a 90-day freeze, there would be no increase in the family allowance or any kind of transfer payment no matter what the merits of the program. Is this what is being suggested to parliament as an intelligent proposition?

Then what about the farmer? We warned everybody about the problem two or three years ago when the farmer could not even cover the costs of production. Some other members spoke in this House on behalf of the farmer, but we raised the uproar here and in the country when the farmer could not get a decent return for his work. Now that he is starting to get it, are we to decide that he is to be frozen and has to pay the price? Perhaps it could be said that the industrial workers have strong unions and should be stopped because they are making more than other people. Every attempt in this direction has failed. We sometimes point to Sweden as a model of industrial peace and intelligent labour-management relations. Once a year everybody sits down to a discussion. That is all very well, except that in Sweden they have a disease called "creep". This means that if there is a tight labour market and a particular worker wants a little more money, management will somehow find a way of paying it to him. So where is your freeze?

The only time the marginal worker in our society gets a break is when there is a labour shortage, when there is a tight labour market, at which time inflation rates may be somewhat higher. At such times management may look at the marginal worker and say, "Well, he does not see so well or hear so well and he is not quite as fast as he should be. But, damn it all, we need him and there is a job for him." Then the worker can bargain for better conditions even though he may not be in an organized group. Will you ask this man to pay the price of your intellectual freeze? I would not ask him to do it.

On the other hand, perhaps you will say that the economy benefits. Perhaps stepping on all kinds of people is worth it as long as the economy benefits. What is the evidence in support of that proposition? The evidence is that when Canada has done better than other countries in the fight against inflation, we have had a national disaster. Two years ago Canada had the lowest rate of inflation among industrialized nations, but what did we get for it? We got a rising dollar and the highest level of unemployment in the western world. That is what we got for our successful fight against inflation.

The important question to ask—as my leader pointed out this afternoon and as the hon. member for Don Valley must know—is, how well are you doing in relation to your chief trading partners? I take a serious view of inflation but I would take an even more serious view if our record in trying to control inflation was much worse than that of our chief trading partners, because then we would be in serious difficulty. If we operated under a fixed exchange rate, our position would be serious. However, that is not the case. We are operating under a floating exchange rate and we have been doing as well as, if not better than, our trading partners in this area.

In which way will our economy be helped if we try to control inflation beyond reasonable bounds and thereby impose intolerable burdens on the people as we fight this battle? That is the question I ask. I keep asking myself, what are you to do and how are you to do it? Let us talk about equity and business, and again I shall refer to something my leader said this afternoon. It is easy to control wages because they are open and above board and there is not much elbow-room for the worker. But what do you do about business profits? Who benefits from the freeze? Presumably you attempt to control everything. Are you going to control the businessman and his profits? How? There is no way to control a businessman's profit in that kind of situation.

An hon. Member: What about taxes?

Mr. Saltsman: You cannot even do it by imposing taxes. We tried to impose additional taxes during the war.

An hon. Member: There was the excess profits tax.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, we had the excess profits tax. But many businessmen did not allow their profits to reach the high point at which they would be taxed. If you are a businessman you make a rational judgment. You see what is happening in your company, and if you find that the government will penalize you heavily if you make profits in excess of, say, 10 per cent you will make darn sure that you never hit the 10 per cent level. There are many ways of disseminating the benefits of profits. You can build nice new buildings with air-conditioned offices. People can have improved amenities; the company cars become bigger and the expense allowances more liberal. Holidays become more frequent. Before you know it, you have destroyed what is a valuable feature of the free enterprise system, perhaps its only valuable feature, the urge to become efficient in order to make profits.

The excess money is disseminated in this way because businessmen will want to make sure the government does not collect it in taxes. How will you force them not to do this? How do you force a doctor to work if he is not satisfied with what he is getting? How can you say to him, "All right, you can make $30,000 a year but no more." If the doctor knows he will not make more than $30,000 a year, he is not going to break his back in order to earn another $20,000 which the government will take. So do you think he is going to keep on working after he has made a certain amount? I hear somebody laughing in the gallery. There must be a doctor there. I wish human nature were otherwise. We in my party hope that some day human nature will be otherwise, but do not be a dreamer and do not tell tales which lack credibility and arouse false hopes in people.

In giving figures this afternoon the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) showed what happens to profits. If they are not paid out in dividends, they go into retained earnings. There are all kinds of ways to get around this problem. For instance, how do you control the rate of return on money; in other words, interest rates? You cannot control them through the Bank of Canada because those rates are an international phenomenon. What would happen if you decided, for instance, to set interest rates in Canada at 3 per cent? What would the people with savings in Canada do? They would immediately take their money out of Canada to where they could get 8 or 9 per cent. In that case you would not be embarked on an incomes policy; you would be watching the border, introducing capital controls and monitoring society in a way that is intolerable. I should like to stop many of these things. Certainly there are many things wrong in our society. But every time I think of stopping them I ask what would be the price. That is the question hon. friends to my right are not asking.

There may be some who would benefit from the conception of a 90-day freeze. At the risk of being misunderstood, let me say there are some politicians who are so committed to power that they are willing to say anything that will benefit them. Some politicians are prepared to play on the legitimate fears of our society. They know people want stability. They know some people want wage and price controls, or think they want wage and price controls. I am not prepared to argue about that. What are you to say to the people? Should you not say, "I know how you feel and I know what you would like, but there are many, many problems associated with trying to do as you would like.

Let me explain this matter to you so that you may know what price you will have to pay if we do as you want."

I suggest that that is the attitude responsible politicians should take to the question of wage and price controls. If you adopt an irresponsible attitude when you know the price that must be paid, but keep quiet and simply feed on the fears of our people, you are not serving society. Even if an election were to be won on that basis, it would be a Phyrrhic victory for the people involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Recently the government of a country not far from our own embarked upon that kind of program in order to win an election, and the people of that country are now paying for it. I hope the people of this country will not have to pay the same kind of price.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I ought to bring to the attention of hon. members that there are just about 40 minutes left before the end of this debate. I notice that three hon. members seek the floor, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), and the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard). I hope that, perhaps not necessarily as a result of any formal agreement, there might be an understanding among hon. members on limiting the length of their speeches so that we may bring these three distinguished participants into the debate before ten o'clock.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to adhere to the guidelines you have laid down. I should like to speak mainly about farm prices. Food prices have been news in the House of Commons ever since we came back here some months ago. There has been criticism on all sides regarding the rising price of food. As a result of the clamour, a food prices committee was set up. Up to the present that committee has not done much other than recommend the setting up another board. I feel that the kind of proposal the Conservative party has put forward today is workable. This may be very different from what many members of this House think but I believe that, properly explained, this kind of proposal will be accepted by the Canadian people. It is certainly something that is needed. Voluntary controls or restraints up to the present time just have not worked.

Agricultural policy is implicated in the government's failure to deal with inflation. A good many members from all sides of the House spoke this afternoon and this evening. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) should be expected to do the same. Inconsistent and irresponsible statements by various members do not take the place of policy. Our policy is clear. It has been enunciated by a good many members. It is that a 90-day freeze on wages and prices would cover wholesale and retail food prices but would exempt food at the farm gate.

The freeze was never proposed as the stabilization program. It is simply to be the first step. Apart from the effect that such a dramatic step will have in suppressing inflationary expectations, its main purpose is to provide the necessary time to consult the provincial governments, business and labour to devise an equitable, efficient and effective stabilization plan and to develop the organization required to carry out such a plan. During the time the stabilization machinery is being set up, a prices and incomes standstill will prevent any groups taking advantage of increasing their income.

The nature of the freeze has been spelled out quite clearly. It will apply to all incomes, wages, salaries, rents, dividends, fringe benefits and all prices, including interest rates. Only food at the farm gate—I will deal with that in greater detail later—because of the difficulty of counter-productiveness of control would be exempt from such a freeze. Price or income increases scheduled to take effect during the freeze in that case would have to be postponed. The phase to follow the standstill cannot be clearly spelled out, as many members have asked. For one to do so before the stabilization program is put into effect would be to invite pre-emption. For another, since success of the plan will depend on the support of other levels of government and on business and labour, these groups will have to take part in developing the program. Whatever the exact form phase 2 might take, however, there are certain principles which the Conservative party feels should be adhered to.

For the stabilization program to succeed in controlling prices it must be comprehensive. At the same time, this goal should be achieved without creating a massive bureaucracy. It will, therefore, rely heavily on voluntary compliance and co-operation. Such co-operation will not be forthcoming unless the guidelines are reasonable, consistent and equitable. This means that because of changes of weather or the market some prices are particularly vulnerable and this fact should be taken into account. The guidelines must not place any group of the economy at a disadvantage in relation to others, and some flexibility in the income guidelines should be entertained so that low-paid workers will not suffer unduly.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the following increases in the past 12 months are not acceptable; they cause a real, not a psychological hardship. Vegetables have increased by 22 per cent, poultry by 21 per cent, eggs by 43 per cent and milk over 10 per cent. It must be realized that these increases are not the fault of the primary producers and will not provide a sustained base for establishing a decent income for the average producer. In the past ten years retail food prices have increased by 33 per cent, while farm prices have increased by less than 16 per cent. The producer only receives approximately 40 per cent of every dollar spent by the consumer on farm products.

Comments made by the Minister of Agriculture on this matter are divisive. They are not in the true interest of the producers of this country whom he says he is trying hard to help. First, in the comments he has made he has invited consumers to blame the farmers for high food costs. Second, he suggests that the farmer wants to put his burden onto the backs of the poor. This is not true. Third, in his speeches in this House and in what he has said outside the House he has implied that accelerating retail prices will provide the answer for the producer while the bulk of that increase will go to everyone else.

Our policy is in the best interests of the farmer at the present time. First, it is a national policy. It is a policy that can and will be supported by the whole community, including the housewife. Second, it addresses itself to the inflation the farmer is experiencing. Third, it is consistent with a new and comprehensive agricultural strategy that will assure improvements, and sustained improvements, in income for producers. In their briefs to the special committee on food prices the Alberta government and others urged this government to establish a food chain intelligence system. Their responsibility would be to maintain a continuing vigilance on the factors that contribute to food costs in all sectors of the food chain. That certainly is not being done at the present time.

In the first three months of this year farm input costs increased by 6.1 per cent, an increase of 10.2 per cent in the past year. How can a government suggest that rising food prices will mean income gains for the farmer, with costs rising at such a rate? How can the government suggest a food prices review board will be able to do anything while farm operating costs are increasing at such an accelerating rate? We propose that these input costs should be frozen for 90 days and a policy introduced to provide permanent relief against such cost pressure.

One very important feature of our proposed stabilization plan is that farm prices will eventually have a ceiling. This must happen if all other segments of agriculture are in the same position and are also frozen. As an example, the input of meat packers would be limited. After the live beef cattle move from the farmer to the packer, the price would be frozen at that point. The ceiling that would be imposed on farm commodities for the proposed three-month period would only be imposed under what this party considers to be emergency conditions such as we are experiencing at the present time. At the present time farm prices are at an all-time high. It should be stressed that there would be absolutely no move to impose temporary controls such as we are talking about tonight if prices of commodities were not at their present high. If prices were not high there would not be the need to take the kind of measures we are talking about this evening.

Food prices are not rising primarily because of accelerating demand and will not be abated by telling people to eat less nutritious food. In this affluent age it is not a luxury, it is not a privilege; it is a right to expect to be able to eat decently, to drink milk, to eat eggs and meat. The greatest single cause of escalating food prices is supply and industrial policies which have failed to assure food production at levels consistent with steadily increasing and predicted demand.

The main source of this failure is the government. In the area of marketing practices the government has displayed an incredible amount of shortsightedness. Instead of marketing boards promoting shortages, as has been the recent vogue, the government should be actively promoting an expansion of production. To ensure that farm incomes remain reasonable, marketing both at home and abroad should be more aggressive. This has been stated many times by hon. members on this side of the House. This is of particular importance in light of the recent emphasis placed by the United States on the expansion of agricultural production.

Canada will find it increasingly difficult to compete with United States' commodities unless our marketing system becomes much more active and much more responsive rather than allowing farmers and consumers to be at odds with each other, as epitomized in the statement by the Minister of Agriculture. Governments should take direct action to head off the major source of the farmers' problems by heading off rising costs. Perhaps the greatest failure has been the government's total ineptness to allay the inflation psychology in this country which is running rampant at the present time. Wage earners, expecting another year of high inflation, have during the first quarter of this year settled for a 7.5 per cent increase in wage rates.

The approach we have taken to the marketing of agricultural products in Canada is anything but market-oriented. Our static view of the market is out of step with a fast and dynamically changing world. Great rewards appear likely to farmers and to the agricultural industry as a whole if Canadians change their perspective in this regard. We on this side of the House have long advocated various methods of expanding the food supply by offering incentives to producers and ensuring, to the best of our ability, that their products will be sold not only inside Canada but in our expanding export market.

Looking at our total trade picture, I see there has been a steady narrowing of the trade balance in agricultural products over the past seven years. Canada exported about $1.4 billion worth in 1968 and imported about $1.1 billion worth. If one excludes wheat, Canada is a net importer of farm products. This situation has changed over the last year, but not as a result of a more aggressive approach to marketing. It is basically because we are running into a situation of short supply throughout the world. No one is talking at the present time about an abundance of farm products; there is a scarcity, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), continually reminds us. Has the government been working in the last three years to expand agriculture and make it more self-sufficient? No. The government has been working like mad to increase impediments to production.

The Minister of Agriculture delivered a speech on March 4 which, if it was read by many agriculture producers, would have quite a startling effect. He was talking about an area of Saskatchewan and said that pork and beef producers in that area appeared to be gun-shy of marketing boards. He went on to say:

> Frankly, I think producers would be much further ahead to take an objective look at what the system could offer to their industry, and see how marketing boards and agencies could be put to work for them, and not against them.

There has been a lot of controversy about marketing boards. The beef industry has rejected them. However, the Minister of Agriculture appears bent on moving toward a system under which all agricultural products would be covered by such boards. It was also mentioned this afternoon that the Minister of Agriculture, who has been talking so much and who has been the champion of the farmers to such a great extent—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murta: —has been in agreement with some of the following measures which have been enacted over the past few years, measures which have restricted the marketing ability of the industry. One of these was, of course, the Lift program. Another was the amendment to the Farm Products Marketing Act. At the present time this whole question is before the provincial courts. Last year the government spent $2.25 million to reduce egg production, and of course the situation at present is that supply is short. Is this an efficient way to improve the income of egg producers?

Mr. Basford: Yes. They are getting the highest prices in history.

Mr. Murta: To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I think it must be stated again that farm prices would eventually be frozen at the present level. Prices at the farm gate, which would cover live cattle, hogs and so on, and possibly fresh vegetables—any product which had not reached the processor or was still in the hands of the producer—would not be affected. This would allow for any movement of products in North America, that is, the intercontinental movement of products, and in this way agricultural trade would not be impeded. This would last for a three-month period and would only apply if farm prices were at their present levels. As I mentioned earlier, there would be no need to use this formula if agricultural prices were low.

I have two more points. The agriculture committee will be fully involved in all stages throughout the duration of the total plan. Prices of all agricultural input such as seed, fertilizer and agricultural machinery would also be frozen. The selling price of products may be frozen, but on the other hand rising costs will also be curtailed. If our program is to work, all segments of society must be involved. Accordingly, I believe agriculture must play its part and must work along with society. In the present circumstances, having regard to the inflationary spiral which persists today I believe this program would be acceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, since three thirty this afternoon we have heard hon. members of the opposition and the government speak about inflation. The Canadian people are aware of its existence; it is nothing new, neither to us nor to the Canadian people. But not one of those members was able to suggest a solution to the present problem or tell us how to remedy the situation otherwise than by freezing prices. We Creditistes believe that there is a better way.

The committee on food price trends presented its first report on April 2. It suggested no solution to the problem of increasing food prices. It was unable to do so because it did not tackle the fundamental cause of high food prices. Alerted by the general demands and protests of consumers who have a hard time making ends meet, the government has chosen to create a special committee of the House to fight against increasing prices. And as was to be expected, the committee has brought forth a first interim report advocating, as a solution, the creation of a "super committee" to inquire into price increases. We are not told how this committee will be created, who its members or what its powers will be, but anyway they wanted to give the Canadian people the impression that they had considered the problem of rising consumer prices.

So what happens now? To remain in business, any producer must sell his products at a price at least equal or superior to the total amount he must spend to market them: raw materials, manpower, transport, maintenance and depreciation. All costs and expenditures of the producer must be included in the price of the finished product.

In the course of production, the community has received in the form of payments for raw materials, wages, transport, telephone and heating costs a total amount equal to total costs. Theoretically, consumers can buy the whole production, because the sums expended in the course of production and which are now in the hands of consumers are equal to the total costs and therefore to the total prices. Indeed, this is why the opponent of Social Credit can say that production permits the purchase of consumption, for the moneys paid out during production are equal to the overheads, and are thus equal to the total prices.

Let us take the producer and state the problem as if the producer sold directly to the consumer, without going through any middlemen. The latter do not change the elements of the problem; at worse, they just complicate it a bit. In order to remain in business, the producer must sell his product at a price equal to at least the total production costs. The cost of the raw materials, the cost of financing, the depreciation of plants and tools, the cost of transportation and communications, the cost of insurance and manpower, all the costs involved go to make up the final price of the product.

Taken overall, the community has received during production, in the form of payment for goods, services or salaries, a total amount which is equal to the overall cost of production. This is what we mean when we say that production permits the purchase of consumption, because the moneys paid out during production are equal to the overheads, and thus equal to the sum of the prices.

What about the producer's profit? Let us suppose that the producer wished to receive, not just a sum equalling his production expenses, or overheads, but, by means of the prices he asks, a sum greater than the actual production costs, so as to make a legitimate profit. The total of the prices will then be greater than the total costs or the total production expenses. This means that the purchasers will not have enough money in hand to buy the total production, at the set prices.

The reason for this is that the producer, who is in business to make a profit, does not pay out this profit during production, but obtains it from the consumer, by means of the prices that he sets on his products.

In other words, the retail price of a product is always higher than its actual cost. As only an amount equal to the actual cost is distributed during production, there results a gap in the community's purchasing power equal to the difference between the retail price and the actual cost.

As the community needs the production offered and its purchasing power falls short of the overall cost price, it borrows money, it runs into debts. This is the true reason for the entire community running into debt with finance companies, loan companies and banks.

Thus, the economy manages to work somehow or other, rather badly than well. With the years, debts go on increasing and reimbursements become harder to make. The costs of those debts are in turn added to the new price aggregates which go on increasing and inflating to such an extent that authorities become upset and finally yield to the hues and cries of disapprobation and appoint an enquiry commission.

Is profit to be eliminated? We cannot control prices. Price is made up of costs. There is no use cooking up figures to lower a price from $10 to $9 if the final cost of a finished product is $10.

Some people suggest to restrain profits, even to eliminate them. It is the drastic solution of Marxists and mini-Marxists; let us abolish profits! But if a manufacturing industry does not allow its owner to make a living or does not allow its directors to issue reasonable dividends to stockholders who finance the industry, it is going to end production and direct its operations toward more profitable areas.

Profits kept within reasonable bounds are an incentive, and encouragement to produce. The effect of good competition is to keep profits within reasonable bounds.

Faced with prices which steadily increase, consumers need more purchasing power. Presently, they are trying to get it by higher wages or higher social benefits. Those higher wages and welfare payments are in turn reflected by prices which will increase proportionately. Therefore that is not the solution we seek, even if specific conditions have to be improved.

What we need is a purchasing power supplement that will go to the consumer without going into prices, namely a new purchasing power directly distributed to the consumer after having been directly created by the state's financial organization.

The other solution proposed by the Social Credit consists in having consumers pay only the actual cost of the product.

If the actual cost of a suit is $80 and it retails for $100, the consumer will pay only $80 for the suit which retails for $100, while the difference between the retail price and the actual cost, namely, $20, will be paid as compensation to the retailer by the central bank whose duty is to establish and maintain a balance between total expenditures related to production and the total cost or the purchasing power distributed in the course of that production.

The only compulsion element to be taken into account in that solution is the profit factor.

But nothing would be simpler than setting a rate of profit for any given type of products, or for any given class of producers.

So that would be a just and worthy solution to the problem, not only food prices but all consumer prices as well.

● (2150)

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that I am allowed, I wish to thank the member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) who, I believe, cut short his speech in order to give me a chance to say a few words.

I should like to take part in this debate on the official opposition motion, which deserves the attention of the House. Judging by the speeches I have heard, we are clearly still trying to find out who is responsible for the inflation.

We have heard hon. members making certain criticisms, some fair some not so fair, some rather harsh. I think that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) ran through all the legislation introduced by the government in the last four or five years, he was quite right in saying that the government had made great attempts to combat inflation, and I think also that we are quite right in saying that, in spite of all its efforts, it was completely inadequate, not to say a total failure to achieve their aim of stopping inflation, which is costing every individual a tremendous amount today.

The Progressive Conservative Party's motion certainly deserves our very close attention. I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) say: We should not freeze prices for nine months, but for two years. It seems to me that the Progressive Conservative Party has put forward a limited proposal which, as I have said, nevertheless deserves consideration. However, one member claims that for a measure to take effect, it has to be implemented for at least two years.

As for the New Democrats, they naturally disagreed with the Progressive Conservatives. Just now they blamed the government for not having succeeded in fighting inflation, but I did not hear them suggest any real solutions.

The Social Credit Party also gave their opinion. Personally, I do not necessarily believe in the solution recommended by this party. I shall therefore not go too lengthily into the opinions expressed.

With limited time, it is of course difficult to make an in-depth study of the problem. However, I should like to express in this House the concern of Canadians about this problem and the feelings of all hon. members by saying that it would be urgent to refrain from criticism or partisanship regarding such an important issue. Canadians badly need a solution.

Who is in a better position than hon. members to find one? I feel the government has a major responsibility to assume, being in charge of governing the country. Of course, opposition parties, any of them, and hon. members should co-operate and submit the best ideas, the best opinions, the best suggestions to the government. But of course the government would have to be willing to accept suggestions voiced by different members or different parties.

It would be to the government's advantage.

I know it has been meeting businessmen; it should multiply those meetings with businessmen and make them understand that they are heading for disaster if they keep on anticipating such enormous profits.

I also think that the unions should be made aware of the danger involved in certain collective agreements and requirements which necessarily entail salary increases and so on.

We are perfectly aware of the fact that we cannot leave it to agriculture or a few small industries to solve the problem called inflation. We are quite aware that surely a small group is not responsible for it. Businessmen, industrialists and the government are also to blame. The latter should apply the necessary controls. As mentioned earlier, we are always afraid of imposing controls and I think that because of the importance of this problem, the government, as the administrator of this country, should nevertheless discharge its responsibilities and will have to adopt unpopular solutions if we really want to serve the interests of society without partisanship.

It often happens that as members of Parliament, we know that a measure is unpopular but it is our duty as responsible people to adopt this measure. Even though a price freeze may be unpopular for certain groups, I must admit that some members are in favour of it and have the courage of proposing it.

Of course, one might reject this suggestion as inadequate, while acknowledging the major efforts made by the government. Once again we know that huge amounts of money have been invested to improve the unemployment situation, etc., but we also know that in spite of those millions spent over the last five years, unemployment is now three times as high as in 1968.

Is the government the only one to blame? Of course not. Due to circumstances, some problems arise; the economy is unsound but we would often be tempted to justify ourselves by saying that it is worse in the United States, that other European countries are in a worse position, that others have more problems than we do. We would be easily satisfied if we entertained such thoughts.

The government must assume its responsibilities. The whole country hopes that our Parliament, political parties, members of Parliament will succeed in finding again an objectivity which is not often seen in this House. In the face of such an important problem, difficulties and dangers involved, when we speak about inflation and economic uncertainty, which many people are understandably concerned about, I suggest that as members of Parliament, we must go beyond partisanship and try to convince the government and urge it to approve specific measures likely not only to reassure the Canadian electorates, but to introduce changes which might seem to be concessions on the part of the government to the extent that they would be likely to reassure people and strenghten our economy. I believe that we must act in this direction.

Therefore, any proposal, at present, must be seriously considered, because we must admit that the government, in spite of its efforts, has not succeeded in finding the right solution.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I shall not boast that I have the right solution, but I suggest that important meetings with businessmen, industrialists and union members as well as a price freeze would not be enough, considering the very high level of prices. But I feel that a 90-day period of reflection could be extended, should it prove too short, as we know full well that a long period of price freeze should be accompanied by a wage freeze. I therefore believe that we should weigh carefully the suggestions that have been made. Above all, we tried to be objective, that our Canadian parliament might find a solution to this serious problem.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—COMMISSION POLICY RESPECTING UNEMPLOYED AGRICULTURAL WORKERS SEEKING BENEFITS

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, on February 26 I raised a question with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) concerning the activities of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, more particularly the benefit control officers in the area I represent. While three months have passed since then, the whole question of unemployment and the way it is being administered is still quite relevant. As a matter of fact, we received just last month the interim report of the advisory committee on unemployment insurance, and I shall refer to that in my remarks tonight.

The matter about which I am most concerned is the treatment of seasonal agricultural workers in my riding. The county of Norfolk is a cash crop area, perhaps one of the most concentrated cash crop areas in Canada. We are heavy employers of seasonal labour to harvest our crops. A great many of these people are of origins other than Anglo-Saxon, many having come to our country from Belgium, Hungary, Germany, Poland and many other mid-European countries. The people of the first generation of these immigrants are still active in the agricultural industry in this area and many are unable to speak English except in a very rudimentary way. Some can scarcely understand it when it is spoken to them, and they cannot read it let alone write it.

It is against this background that I wish to discuss with the government and the minister, or his representative, the problem that has arisen as a result of this situation. Seasonal agricultural workers have been forced into the unemployment insurance program. Some have been disentitled and disqualified almost on a wholesale basis, chiefly because they are seasonal workers. This is their type of work. They did not want to come under unemployment insurance in the first place, and previously they were excluded. The present situation is that if they work 25 days or less, they do not have to come under the plan, or if they earn $250 or less they are not included; beyond that they are included and have no choice.

I do not want to be critical all the way through, but I would suggest to the government that these people now be given the privilege they once had of opting out of the program. This would apply only to seasonal agricultural workers. They would have the choice either of coming under the plan or not. They did not want to come under it. They object to having deductions made from wages during the harvest season, which they consider to be found money. Many of them do not need the work too badly in the first place. The employers, largely farmers, detest the bookkeeping involved and if my request were adopted it would remove one of the great headaches that now plague the officers of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I think this is a reasonable suggestion to make and I hope the parliamentary secretary—I am happy he is here and is paying attention—will take it to the minister, because I believe this could be done through regulation and without a major amendment to the act.

I now wish to refer to the other portion of the problem in my area, which relates to language among the ethnic groups. I refer to pages 8 and 9 of the interim report of the advisory committee on unemployment insurance. On those pages we have the findings of the benefit control officers. By and large they are given a clean bill of health. It is said that they are not harassing individuals interviewed and they try to be as helpful as possible. However, many of these people do not understand English. They do not understand the import of what is being asked. They do not understand the report or statement when it is read back to them.

I would suggest to the parliamentary secretary, and through him to the minister, that a claimant when being interviewed have the privilege of an agent to represent him, either to translate for him or to interpret the meaning of what is being asked and the statement he is making. Benefit control officers by and large try to be straightforward. I do not think they intimidate the people. However, their interrogation procedures are a little questionable. Sometimes the people are asked whether they have a babysitter in a home where the wife is a worker. The wife says that she has not. Obviously, she has not when she is not working. The report goes into the insurance officer stating that there is no child care arrangement, and she is therefore disqualified on the ground that she is not available for work.

A similar situation occurs when they ask whether or not a person has a car for transportation. The person concerned may not have a car now, but if work is available can obtain transportation. However, the person is not asked that type of question. The insurance officer who makes the decision is not the person who carries on the interview. All he sees is a sentence in the statement saying, "No child care arrangement". I do not think this is quite fair or above board. I think this problem could be cleared up if there were an agent with the claimant to advise and to translate for him.

Then on top of that, these people have the fear of many immigrants from iron curtain countries when a government agent comes into their home. They are petrified. They will say anything. They will answer anything and will sign anything in order to get the man out of the house. Then after talking to their neighbours they have a very grave doubts about what was said and done, but it is too late. Along comes the yellow slip from the Unemployment Insurance Commission stating that they are disqualified.

I wish to make one final point. In our area there are a great many people who are financially independent. They have no need of unemployment insurance or seasonal employment. They see their neighbours drawing unemployment insurance benefits because they are unemployed. This is not right. The public sees this and it creates a bad image for the Unemployment Insurance Commission and what it stands for. In order to weed out these people I think there would almost have to be a means test. I do not know whether that is practical; I will leave that to the parliamentary secretary, the minister and his officials to decide. It seems to me it could be done by regulation and that it would be very easy for a benefit control officer to decide whether a person was entitled to benefit. There is more I could say but I have used up my time. I appreciate having had the opportunity to state my case, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Unemployment Insurance Commission does not have any program designed to deliberately and specifically disentitle any claimants. However, the commission does make investigations where there are indications that job vacancies do exist in the same or allied areas.

The situation with regard to the hon. member's constituency is that a number of seasonal agricultural workers have been interviewed since January 2 of this year. These persons were mainly employed in the tobacco industry where work is of a seasonal and unskilled nature. Labour force information indicated that job vacancies were available in the area and resulted in the commission's investigations. In other words, from our viewpoint we are not doing anything different with respect to unemployment insurance in the hon. member's constituency than we are in any other. If I understood his submissions, they were in effect that we should do some things differently in his constituency.

With respect to the language problem that the hon. member posed, I am fully in agreement with him. In all parts of the country, where it knows in advance that there are sizeable numbers of people who speak languages other than English or French the commission makes a serious attempt to have there officials who speak those languages, to enable the interviews to be conducted properly. I think this matter should be investigated with respect to the constituency of Norfolk-Haldimand to see if such language fluency is available to UIC officials there.

The other point the hon. member raises, to change the legislation so that these agricultural workers would not be included within the purview of the act, is a more difficult one. I will bring it to the attention of the minister, but I am sure the hon. member realizes that the intention of parliament was to include all people who were employed, and to make any exception might lead to difficulties because it could lead to claims for exemption by other groups. However, this matter will also be reported to the minister and to the commission.

Adjournment Debate

POST OFFICE—STEPS TO INCREASE COMPENSATION OF RURAL MAIL DELIVERY CONTRACTORS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, over the years in my responsibility as Member of Parliament for Fraser Valley West various problems associated with rural route mail contractors have come to my attention. In certain instances practices relating to tendering and to contract terms have caused frustration, and in other instances real hardship. To be more explicit, Mr. Speaker, because of the nature of tendering, in order to secure a contract often unrealistically low bids are submitted to and accepted by the Post Office Department. Only after the successful bidder has experienced the realities of daily hours demanded, costs required, and the inflation factor, to perform the mail deliveries in a satisfactory manner does he become fully aware of whether or not his bid accurately reflected a fair return for his financial investment and effort.

Should the contractor discover that he has underbid, the contract he has signed makes impossible any upward revision for two years following the signing date, save under exceptional circumstances as laid out in the contract. In a riding of extreme growth, such as Fraser Valley West, the limitations of the contract can so restrict the contractor that long before the termination date his number of stops might have doubled compared with those at the date of signature, with little or no corresponding increase paid for the extra work. In contrast, all construction contracts with the government contain escape clauses to deal with unforeseen circumstances.

The implication involved in the points I am attempting to make is that in some cases at least the local, rural mail contractor is subsidizing the Canadian Post Office Department. Certainly my information leads me to believe that rural contractors, and perhaps subpost office managers, are the only group in the postal delivery system that have no collective organization to bargain on their behalf with the government. The lack of such an organization has perhaps contributed to the fact that rural contractors generally have fallen behind the letter carriers and postal workers in coping with the rising cost of living.

Because I felt this to be of vital interest to many people in my riding, I went into it in some detail. About a month or six weeks ago the minister suggested that all members representing rural or semi-rural ridings should write to him and suggest methods to make the situation of the rural mail contractors more equitable. There are some 23 rural contractors both centrally and peripherally in my riding. I met with them, and I have a number of recommendations that I would like to deal with now. Because they are not organized, contractors suffer from the tender system and from inflation. They do not enjoy the fringe benefits afforded the organized section of the postal system such as UIC, transportation to points of delivery or uniforms.

One recommendation is that they be paid an hourly rate which might be equivalent to that of postal clerks, which at the moment is roughly $4 an hour. That should be part of any future formula considered by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) and his officials. Another recommendation relates to car allowance. These allowances are decided locally and vary from 12 cents to 20 cents a mile. I recommend a more generous car allowance, perhaps 25 cents per mile plus the additional 30 per cent insurance cost which must be met because the vehicle is used for business. It might be noted here that these people must be bondable; it is a responsible job and an important one.

There should be a fixed formula for the growth factor within a route. It is also seriously suggested that when a route has reached a certain size, it should be split. Perhaps the size should bring in about $10,000, or an average living wage. We should stop thinking of this as a part-time job, because in many cases it is not. It amounts to a full-time job because people have a substantial investment in the vehicles necessary to do the work. They also have duties additional to those of letter carriers because they have to sell stamps and money orders and take out parcels.

The matter of Saturday delivery was also mentioned. However, I am not certain that their customers would accept the deletion of Saturday delivery. Nevertheless, they are not recompensed for the extra time compared to other postal clerks or mail carriers. I think we should have an established tender floor in which no one could underbid. Because of the nature of the tender, too many people underbid and then find that they cannot fulfil the contract on those terms. If morale is low, even on the "mail must go through" theory they feel they are being exploited.

On May 7 I asked the Postmaster General a couple of questions about this matter. I know he has been considering the question very seriously and I am certain that the rural contractors, in my riding at least, look forward to his response.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely sympathetic to the problems currently encountered with respect to some rural mail. And I am in perfect agreement with what the hon. member said and the suggestions he made seem to me to be very appropriate.

However, I would like to remind him that those businessmen are bound by contract with the department and that contract was indeed awarded following the calling of public tenders. So they themselves originally set the amount of the contract. However, it is true that during the period of the contract the contractor can file an application to have his rates adjusted.

Unfortunately, we found that too often the contractor who has to file that application himself does not do so or does so too late and several contractors do not benefit as they could from an increase in their rates. So there is clearly room for improvement and I am prepared to ensure that we will soon come up with a new formula for adjusting rates which will be much more understanding and much more realistic.

Secondly, we will be prepared very soon to base the rates on amounts in line with those paid to members of the Postmasters Association.

Thirdly, it is also our intention to assess all routes as soon as possible in accordance with the new formula I referred to, and we will then make the necessary adjustments so that contractors receive the rates they deserve.

Finally, we think that the ceiling of $10,000 is no longer realistic and we are prepared to recommend an amendment to the act so the amount will be increased to $25,000.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DETAILS OF APPRAISAL OF POLYMER FOR SALE TO CORPORATION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, on March 21 last, as recorded at page 2455 of Hansard I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to file with this House details indicating that Polymer Corporation was sold to Canada Development Corporation at fair market value. The Prime Minister said he would look into the matter and reply in detail, and that he was informed that an independent assessment had been made which was the basis for the price. I assumed the Prime Minister would have filed that material with this House and I did not expect that I would need to appear on the adjournment debate at this time. I expected the Prime Minister to have some respect for this House and its members, to have the material here, or at least to come personally and explain to the House the matter raised by my question. I am disappointed that he is not here.

Finally, after considerable pressure being exerted, Polymer Corporation, through the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), filed its annual report for the period ending December 31, 1972. To give some indication of the profitability of this company and its hopes for the future, let me read an excerpt into the record from that report. In their report the directors of Polymer Corporation said, among other things:

> Polysar has set strategic plans for growth and backed these with operational plans. They are designed to achieve world-wide sales in excess of $500 million, with accompanying gains in profits, in five years' time. The keys to both corporate and personal achievement—the environment, the organization and the systems—have been strengthened. We look forward now with confidence to fulfilling our expectations in the fourth decade in the Polysar story.

This was the corporation that, at a supposedly fair market value, was sold at half the book value. It was illegally sold by this government, Mr. Speaker, because I submit the Canada Development Corporation Act requires that if Polymer was to be transferred, it had to be transferred at fair market value. I repeat, this corporation was transferred at half the book value.

When I asked the question of the Prime Minister I had been led to believe that the deficiency in price below the book value was $42 million. However, after examining the statement of Polymer Corporation for the year ending December 31, 1972, I find that the book value of that corporation was $124,109,000. For $62 million it was transferred. I defy the Prime Minister, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), the Minister of Supply and Services and, indeed, any member of the government to show the House one major corporation in the past 50 years of the history of this country that has been sold at half its book value.

● (2220)

Mr. Bell: How about the Bonaventure? That went for nothing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blenkarn: They do a lot of things. The Wood Gundy report is suppose to be around. That report supposedly indicates that Polymer was a sad shock and was not worth very much—only half its book value of $62 million, or maybe $72 million if the company was lucky enough to show a bit of profit over a four-year period.

The people of this country have been hoodwinked; they have been defrauded. This transaction is illegal. The Prime Minister does not even have the courage to come here and answer. This is what is called a rip-off. The leader of the New Democratic Party made great gains in the last election by talking about corporate rip-offs. I can understand why he can get into bed with the Prime Minister, because they are both pretty good rip-off artists.

We in this House have been given glowing reports of Polymer Corporation since it was incorporated in the late forties. We have been told of the tremendous investment in growth, patents, development and expertise. If this transaction was at fair market value, Parliament has been misled for many years. The statement given to the minister on December 31 setting out a glowing report of Polymer must be a phony. Presumably the buried report done by Messrs. Wood Gundy was correct and Polymer is a poor goose. I suggest that this House is being goosed and their goose is not being properly prepared. There is something goosey about the whole thing. It is time this House demanded a full accounting of this sorry mess so that we will know what happened to the assets of the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the objectives of the Canada Development Corporation, as defined in the act, is to help develop and maintain companies which would be managed and controlled by Canadians in the private sector of our economy. Furthermore, the act requires that the CDC achieve its objectives to realize a profit and in the best interests of all shareholders. Given this undertaking to operate in the private sector to realize a profit and since the CDC must also offer Canadians the opportunity of investing in the Corporation and thus participating in this development, the CDC must operate so that all its operations constitute an attractive investment for all Canadians. It is therefore with this in mind that last year the CDC purchased Polymer Corporation from the government.

While there has been much talk about Polymer's profits, several of its operations were found to have made very little profit and some have led to deficits which have affected the efficiency of this company, to the point that they would be made less spectacular for the period preceding the sale to the CDC.

However, Polymer was to be sold to the CDC at a fair and reasonable price, under Section 39(1) of the Canadian Development Corporation Act which reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may sell or cause to be sold to the company, at such fair and reasonable price as may be agreed upon by the Governor in Council and the company, the whole or any part of the capital stock of any or all of the following:

(a) Polymer Corporation Limited;

(b) Eldorado Nuclear Limited;

(c) Panarctic Oils Ltd.; and

(d) Northern Transportation Company Limited

but subject, in the case of the capital stock of Panarctic Oils Ltd., to any agreements relating to the sale of capital stock held by the Crown.

A fair and reasonable price being stipulated, the government requested that an independent appraisal be made of Polymer. This was done by Wood Gundy which made its appraisal on the basis of strictly financial and economical factors. The Wood Gundy report did suggest an order as to size for the value of Polymer which was not different from other internal appraisals made by the Department of Finance and of Supplies and Services. On the basis of these reports, the government negotiated with the CDC management and a fair and reasonable price was arrived at.

The Wood Gundy study once completed was to provide a lot of confidential information. As a result, making this information known to the public would be detrimental to Polymer which could incur considerable damage due to the fact that its competitors would have such information.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this House will appreciate that the confidential nature of these appraisals reflects among other things the sincerity of the government and their wish to arrive at a fair and reasonable price.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

FISHERIES

AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON RECIPROCAL PRIVILEGES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity which arises from termination of the Pacific salmon talks between Canada and the United States of America relating to a new agreement on reciprocal fishing privileges to replace the one that expires very shortly, and from the desirability of parliament declaring a Canadian position on this matter without delay. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That this House affirms the desirability of future co-operation between Canada and the United States in all matters relating to fisheries conservation and harvesting, which in its view must be based on recognition by both countries of each other's prior right to all fish stocks of its currently declared fishing zones and territorial seas, and of salmon originating in its rivers.

And that this House further affirms that, because of the intermingling of stocks in the fishing waters of the two countries, it is desirable that there be a continuing agreement between the two countries which will provide for an equitable division of the intercepted catch between nationals of the two countries.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE HEIGHT AND STANDARD OF RIGHT OF WAY FENCING IN RESIDENTIAL AREAS

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-180, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, at the present time the only requirement for fencing of railway right of way is a four and a half foot fence. While this may have been satisfactory for the nineteenth century conditions under which that section of the act was passed, it is not satisfactory now, particularly for the protection of the life and limb of children who reside near railway rights of way in built-up areas. The purpose of this bill is to provide a higher standard of fencing in such areas.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

PROVISION OF COUNSEL TO PERSONS SEEKING DISABILITY PENSIONS

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

February 20, 1973—Mr. Coates—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan".

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to this bill which for some time now has been allowed to stand. I feel that possibly it should not be stood any longer.

There have been discussions relating to this bill. The objective of the bill was to try to ensure that those people who were applying for a disability pension under the Canada Pension Plan and had gone through the procedures and were without counsel when they reached a certain position would have counsel afforded them. As a result of some difficulties regarding the possibility that this involved the expenditure of money and would upset the balance of ways and means, concern was expressed on the part of the Chair whether or not this was a proper private member's bill.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I have had correspondence with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), and in that correspondence he has given me certain assurances he will make a technical amendment to the Canada Pension Plan legislation that, in effect, will do what I was trying to accomplish with this private member's bill. As a result of that assurance and as a result of the awareness of the minister of the concerns and problems of people in this position, I would like to withdraw the bill and thank the minister for his kindness in taking this step.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

PRIME INTEREST RATE INCREASE BY BANK OF MONTREAL—PRIOR CONSULTATION BETWEEN BANKS AND MINISTER—POSSIBLE RETURN OF TIGHT MONEY POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question relating to the announcement by the Bank of Montreal this morning that its prime rate is being increased from 6½ per cent to 6¾ per cent, following an increase from 6 per cent to 6½ per cent on April 9. In view of the position the minister took yesterday with regard to the government's policy toward tight money, does this announcement follow any consultation between the banks and the Minister of Finance?

● (1110)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the president of the Bank of Montreal was trying to reach me this morning but I was tied up at a cabinet committee meeting. I notice that, although the prime rate has been raised from 6½ per cent to 6¾ per cent, the bank in its release said that the rate on loans of $100,000 or less to small businesses will continue to be based upon 6½ per cent. Rates on consumer loans are unchanged. What the bank is in effect adopting is a dual rate system to preserve accessibility for small business and consumer loans at the present rate in the market.

I gather that the pressure on the rate follows from the raising of the discount rate in the United States to 6 per cent and the fact that the prime rate in the United States is now 7 per cent which, if you take into account the manner of compensating balances used in the American banking system, puts the effective prime rate in the United States now between 7½ per cent and 8 per cent. What is happening is that this response of the prime rate announced this morning by the Bank of Montreal is a reflection of the pressure of international interest rates.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question. I ask it in view of the fact the bank also announced that the mortgage rate under the National Housing Act would be increased in the future. Does this not in fact indicate to the minister and the House that a tightening of money is developing and the banking system is already feeling it necessary to ration loans between large borrowers, for example, and small borrowers? Does this not in fact indicate a reoccurrence of tight money conditions?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker. The fact remains that pressures on the Canadian banking system are such that as the interest rate differential between the American and Canadian capital markets widens, if it widens too much, the pressure on international borrowing against our own markets deprives Canadian borrowers of what credit allocations they might otherwise have had. What the banks are trying to do is to suggest to their larger accounts, particularly multinational accounts, to go into the regular capital markets and that it is appropriate, particularly on an immediate and medium-term basis, to leave the loan allocations untouched and free for Canadian small businesses, businesses in those areas of the country not favoured by the rapid growth of some of the metropolitan areas, and to ensure that consumer loans remain untouched. Certainly the press release I received from the Bank of Montreal reflects that initiative. The president of the Bank of Montreal said that the objective—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will appreciate that the reply should not be too long; otherwise we will have to revert to motions.

Mr. Stanfield: I wish to ask the minister whether in fact the rate of inflation that is occurring today does not in itself lead to a tightening of money and pressure on the money supply system because of increases in costs and therefore an increase in loan requirements? Does this inflationary situation, plus tight money, not create a vicious circle that feeds on itself? In view of this, does the minister intend to take any action to cut the cycle and deal effectively with the escalation in inflation that is taking place in order to avoid the continuing development of this tight money situation, or whatever the minister may choose to call it?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the analysis in the preamble to the question by the Leader of the Opposition. The interest rates reflect two circumstances: First, the international rate structure, particularly in the North American capital markets and, second, a very strong demand for credit, reflecting a tremendously strong expansion in the economy at the moment. What the banking system is reflecting is not a restrictive monetary policy but a monetary policy that reflects the expansion in the economy while maintaining proper liquidity in the banking system.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and the hon. member for Témiscamingue and then the hon. member for Edmonton West and others.

BANK PRIME INTEREST RATE INCREASE—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN NATIONAL HOUSING ACT MORTGAGE RATE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a supplementary to the Minister of Finance. In view of what the hon. gentleman has just said, may I ask him whether or not we can expect an increase in the NHA basic mortgage rate to follow?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I think it would be very unwise for anybody in the House, particularly a Minister of Finance, to speculate on interest rates.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of that highly enlightening answer from the Minister of Finance, can the hon. gentleman assure the House that he will take steps to prevent an increase in the NHA mortgage rate?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): My primary purpose is to ensure that a sufficient amount of money reaches the mortgage market, for reasons of which the hon. member is aware, in order that we can continue with the housing program which is supplying more houses to Canadians than they have ever had before.

BANK PRIME INTEREST RATE INCREASE—EFFECT ON STABILIZATION OF ECONOMY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Témiscamingue for a supplementary.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, as he often does, the minister told us this morning that interest rates had been increased to 7, 7.5 and even 8 per cent in the United States. Can he say whether it is absolutely necessary for Canada to follow suit, and how the higher interest rate announced this morning will stabilize the Canadian economy and help fight efficiently against inflation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to start a debate on the relation between current interest rates in the States or in Europe and Canada, but I shall be willing to do so in due course.

[English]

BANK PRIME INTEREST RATE INCREASE—SUGGESTED RETENTION OF PRESENT LEVEL AND ADJUSTMENT OF RATES TO PARTICULAR CLIENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In lieu of accepting willy-nilly the increase in the prime rates of the chartered banks, would the minister not use his good offices in consultation with them, or through the governor of the Bank of Canada, to see that Canadian banks leave their prime rates at the present level and use discretionary adjustment of their rates to particular clients so as to carry out the policies requested by the government with regard to multi-national companies and larger accounts? In this way, small business would not have to overcome the higher and increasing prime rate.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): It is on the basis of such consultation that the Bank of Montreal has, in effect, introduced the beginnings of a dual rate system. Both the governor and myself, in consultation with the presidents of all the chartered banks, have made it clear that there is not a restrictive money policy, that we want priority given to small business in this country, Canadian-owned small business, particularly in those areas of the country where growth prospects are less favoured.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of members are seeking to ask supplementaries. Perhaps it might be wise to call upon the hon. member for Calgary North to ask the last supplementary on this subject, to which we might return later, and then I will continue the first round of questioning by recognizing the hon. member for York South.

BANK PRIME INTEREST RATE INCREASE—EFFECT ON COST OF HOUSING

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for housing. It arises from what the Minister of Finance has said, that there is an undertaking by the banks to lend at the prime rate to borrowers of less than $100,000. There is no one in the country—I am thinking particularly of the people in small business—who can borrow at that rate. Would the minister tell us, since he is the minister responsible for housing and we have reached a social crisis in housing, what effect the increased rate will have on the cost of housing, which has already reached a crisis stage?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I would urge the hon. member, to the extent that there are any adverse effects, to join with me in passing Bill C-133 as quickly as possible—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: —so that the benefits of the legislation providing for subsidized interest rates can be made available to the people of Canada as quickly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, we have a name for that kind of answer in the City of Calgary, but I shall not use it. Can the minister undertake now that all loans made directly by CMHC will be at a rate not more than one per cent higher than the prime rate so that the little people, the people the Minister of Finance talked about who cannot borrow money under 12 per cent, will be able to purchase houses?

● (1120)

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, all I can do is to give an assurance that it will be at the rate prescribed by the National Housing Act as passed by parliament.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

AGENDA FOR MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS LATER THIS MONTH

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Would the right hon. gentleman inform the House whether the agenda for the meeting of first ministers to take place later this month has been settled?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as of yesterday morning I had answers from eight of the ten provinces, so the agenda has been tentatively settled to that extent. I do not know whether the other two provinces have replied since yesterday morning.

Mr. Lewis: Would the right hon. gentleman inform the House whether the agenda contains an item dealing with the possibility of legislation to follow up the Food Prices Review Board which has been promised, and also whether any province has asked that the matter of the cost of living be placed on the agenda?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, until the agenda is agreed to it would be uncustomary for me to say what it contains. I will gladly make the agenda public as soon as it has been agreed to. Therefore I cannot answer in detail the first part of the question. On the latter part, I would say I have requested that exchanges be made between the provinces and our government to ensure that we can discuss economic questions, and each participant will, of course, be able to interpret that in the light he wishes.

FOOD PRICES

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF PERSONNEL OF REVIEW BOARD

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact the minister has already asked, I am informed, for nominations for the Food Prices Review Board and has received nominations from at least one source, will there be any further delay in announcing the personnel of that board or may we expect an announcement soon?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I hope there can be an announcement very soon, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a supplementary to the question asked a moment ago.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether, in picking the personnel for the Food Prices Review Board, he can give us the assurance that consumers, particularly those of low income, will be represented on the board?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, among the types of people we are considering are people in that category.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASES—GOVERNMENT DECISION ON TRANSPORT COMMISSION ORDER

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Communications.

Could he tell the House whether it is possible that a decision on the Bell Canada rate increases be reached before the end of the 90 day period provided for on April 6?

[Mr. Lewis.]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I was absent-minded and did not hear the question.

Mr. Matte: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I had to wake up the hon. minister. There seems to be bad communications and, therefore, I repeat my question.

Is it possible that the hon. minister will reach a decision on the Bell Canada rate increases before the end of the 90 days provided for last April 6?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): It is not impossible, Mr. Speaker.

PROPOSED LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—DATE AND PLACE OF PRELIMINARY DISCUSSIONS AND CONFERENCE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the importance to Atlantic Canada of the Law of the Sea Conference, would the minister indicate whether a place and a date have been finalized for preliminary discussions this fall among the nations concerned, and whether the final conference will still be held next year in Santiago, Chile?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there will be a meeting to discuss the organization of the conference before the end of the year. Present plans are to proceed to have the full conference in Santiago on the dates that have already been indicated.

AGRICULTURE

DANGER OF GRASSHOPPER INFESTATION IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES—AVAILABILITY OF CHEMICALS TO DESTROY PESTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and has to do with the report of Statistics Canada regarding the danger of a grasshopper infestation this year in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba being greater than over a period of ten years. In view of the fact that about 80 per cent of the increase in the areas infested is expected in Saskatchewan, will the minister do what he can to assure the availability of the necessary chemicals to destroy this pest in advance this year when we expect large production and markets? This is a very serious matter.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the report. I was in Saskatchewan last Thursday and Friday and visited the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan and talked with our officials there. We receive weekly reports on this condition. We are attempting to make sure we do everything humanly and physically possible to control this infestation, particularly if it amounts to what some people are suggesting could happen in the prairie provinces. We are concerned about making sure that production is not impeded in any way by such things as grasshoppers, politicians or anything else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister included politicians because when he was in Saskatchewan recently he fully qualified as one politician interfering with my possibilities.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact certain chemicals formerly used for grasshopper control have been banned, can he now assure the House there will be sufficient supplies of effective chemicals that can be used in this war against grasshoppers?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the different sprays that have been banned and the dangers of using some of them because of the effect on crops, the animal population and byproducts of the animal population. I am told that we do have effective sprays, and that is what I had in mind in answering the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I can only go on what my officials tell me, but if hon. members from western Canada have suggestions on what we should be doing I would be glad to hear them.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question.

TOURISM

ALLEGED BAD IMAGE OF CANADA IN EUROPE—POSSIBILITY OF CONVENING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Is he aware of the discussions held at the last congress of the Canadian Association of Travel Agents during which many people dealing with tourism in Canada complained about the unfavourable image of our country in Europe and the rest of the world? If so, can he tell the House if he intends calling a federal-provincial conference on tourism problems in Canada and, especially, in the beautiful province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have already met with the provincial ministers of industry and tourism to discuss joint provincial-federal plans for the development of the tourist industry. I think all members would be most encouraged by the optimism of the provinces and all those associated with the tourist industry. We should be facing a big year.

• (1130)

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

In view of the answer given by the minister, can he tell us if he will launch in his department a study of the problems which were pointed out at the congress by the representatives of the Canadian tourist industry and could he inform the House of the results of this study before the end of this session?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: We are, of course, examining all proposals and suggestions from those in the tourist industry for the improvement of the industry. If there are any particular proposals the hon. member would like to make to me or to my department in that respect, I would be very glad to have them. In that connection, the estimates of my department were before the standing committee this morning, particularly those in respect of tourism, and I think that record might be of interest to hon. members.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TORONTO—WITHHOLDING OF BENEFITS FROM CERTAIN ITALIANS—REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. It concerns a situation in the city of Toronto. It is reported from a high official of the commission that some 70 Italians have been deprived of benefits to which they are entitled and that even after two or three representations no action has been taken. Will the minister intervene in this matter in order to see that these benefits are paid and that any orders of disentitlement or that would relieve them of this money are rescinded so they can be brought back in good standing?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there has been some investigation of the complaints, but I intend to examine the record myself and make a decision on it.

Oral Questions

BENEFIT CONTROL—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER REPORT BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it has been some time since we have heard of the advisory committee to the commission that is examining reported overzealousness. Can the minister give any indication of how far the committee has proceeded with the investigation of claimants' complaints and just how long it will be before its report will be tabled?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have been advised that the activities of the advisory committee are proceeding well. I understand they have some very specific meetings scheduled for the middle of May and that they are hopeful of giving me their final report before the end of this month.

DAVIE SHIPBUILDING LOCKOUT—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES NOT BE FORCED TO CROSS PICKET LINE

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works about the present lock-out at the shipyards of Davie Shipbuilding Limited in Lauzon, Quebec.

The staff on his department employed at the dry dock of this yard being in complete sympathy with their coworkers who are barred from work, can the minister assure the House that his department is not pressuring its employees to force them to cross the picket lines?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we called on our employees to return to work twice. They refused to do so, saying that they might be subjected to pressures, even physically. So we stopped requesting them to return. We do not intend to bring pressure upon them to force them back to work.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware that the lock-out at Davie Shipbuilding Limited is now illegal since no lock-out or strike can be staged legally before May 12?

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, it is not up to us to determine whether it is a lock-out or a strike, or whether it is illegal or not. We merely requested that our employees return to work. They have refused and we have no intention to exert any pressure on them to do so.

POST OFFICE

STEPS TO DETERMINE CAUSE OF DELAYS IN MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that delays in mail delivery are becoming worse week by week, and in view of the fact I received a letter on Wednesday, May 9, marked "rush" that was mailed at Gainsborough, Saskatchewan on April 28, some 12 days earlier, would the minister advise what steps, if any, are being taken by the Post Office Department to determine the cause of delays in mail delivery, and when can the citizens of Canada expect to begin to receive their mail within a reasonable time after mailing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, a businessman who can guarantee 99 per cent efficiency of his operation is doing very well indeed. I would remind the hon. member that the Post Office Department deals with some 5 billion items a year, which would justify an average of 16,000 complaints a day. I do not believe we receive such a number. I therefore want to assure the hon. member that postal service on the whole is very good and if this particular incident occurred I regret it and we shall endeavour to find a solution to the problem.

WINNIPEG INTERNATIONAL—SUGGESTED UPGRADING AS ALTERNATIVE TO PICKERING SITE—SECURING OF NEW ROUTES FROM WINNIPEG TO UNITED STATES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the government's expressed search for policies to remove discrimination against western Canada, and in view of the opposition of the majority of Pickering residents to the establishment of an international airport there, can the minister inform the House as to what efforts he is making to upgrade the international airport at Winnipeg as an alternative to the Pickering site?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have never considered that Winnipeg would be a substitute or alternative for Toronto.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister this question at least. Is he encouraging access to mid-western and western United States cities by Canadian air carriers operating from the strategically located mid-continent international airport at Winnipeg and, if so, when can we expect success from these representations?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think the hon. member knows this is part of the negotiations which are being carried on now with the United States and we hope to obtain new routes and partly from Winnipeg to a certain number of points in the United States.

The hon. minister said yesterday that he was giving his attention to all the representations made by hon. members from Montreal concerning the renewal of local initiatives projects in the Montreal area, and especially in Montreal itself. REPRESENTATIONS OF PRESIDENT OF BANGLADESH RESPECTING INCARCERATION OF BENGALESE—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Does the hon. minister intend to take any action about the distressing incidents that have happened in the last few days in Pakistan, in which thousands of Bengalis wishing to be sent back to Bangladesh were arrested in the middle of the night and imprisoned in Islamabad, since when the President of Bangladesh has called upon other nations to register their disapproval?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are trying to encourage the settlement of a number of outstanding difficulties among the countries of Pakistan, India and Bangladesh. We are doing everything in our power, which of course is not very great, in these matters, but I assure you that our concern is there. This is only one aspect, of course, of a very difficult problem. There is a special emissary coming to Canada—indeed, the Prime Minister saw him yesterday—for the purpose of discussing these questions and others.

VIET NAM—FINANCIAL SITUATION OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION OF CONTROL AND SUPERVISION—GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): I should like to put a supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker.

Is it true that the International Commission of Control and Supervision on the Viet Nam cease-fire lacks financial means to carry on with its mission? If so, does this government intend to increase its financial contribution to this end?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is true, as is reported in the newspapers today, that the International Commission of Control and Supervision is insolvent. This is a very difficult and serious problem for the commission. It arises out of the failure to agree upon a budget for the forthcoming period. We have requested the parties to the peace agreement to make another advance that will enable the commission to continue its operations. In the meantime, I fully expect that we may have to provide funds that should have come out of the commission itself in order to feed our own contingent. But we are not taking on any other responsibilities.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF CEILING ON ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED PUBLIC SERVANTS, ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE AND ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Now that the government has committed itself to the removal of the 2 per cent ceiling from the annual escalation of pensions paid under the Canada Pension Plan, will the President of the Treasury Board take the necessary action so that the 2 per cent ceiling can be removed from the annual escalation of pensions paid to retired public servants and to retired RCMP and armed forces personnel?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member and the House know, the government is very sympathetic to this proposal but has stated on previous occasions the notion or idea that the change in the escalation rates, both in the Canada Pension Plan and the Superannuation Act should be conterminous.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST THAT PENSIONS BE EQUATED WITH THOSE OF RETIRED AIR CANADA EMPLOYEES

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister and it is in reference to Canadian National Railways' pensions. Would the minister give consideration to making representations to the CNR that the pensions of its retired employees be put on a parity with those of retired Air Canada employees?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister wanted to answer the question. I should like to repeat it, if the minister did not understand it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was looking at the minister and he did not seem to be too anxious to respond. If he wishes to reply now, of course he will be recognized.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I believe the minister did not understand my question. Therefore I would like to repeat it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Would the minister give consideration to making representations to the CNR on behalf of CNR employees so as to give them an opportunity to have parity in their pensions with those of Air Canada employees?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, while this does not come under my jurisdiction, I would be glad to see that the representations are passed on.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—PROROGATION OF COUNCIL BY COMMISSIONER—REQUEST FOR REPORT—STEPS TO PREVENT RECURRENCE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport has said in his question indicates how little he knows about the responsibilities of his minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister which I put to him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will have to call on the hon. member for St. Boniface qui invoque le Règlement.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in my view two ministers working together could perhaps make better representations than only one, although I think that my minister is still the best.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the minister rises on a question of privilege, I will recognize the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: Cabinet solidarity seems to be split asunder in more ways than one. On February 13 I directed a question to the Prime Minister concerning the unilateral and arbitrary prorogation of the Northwest Territories Council and at that time, as recorded on page 1231 of Hansard, he undertook to look into the facts as they were quite important. I wonder if the Prime Minister—and I direct the question to him and not to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—has looked into the facts as he stated he would and, if so, will he now say what steps the government is going to take to see that there is no possibility of a recurrence of an incident of this nature?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I undertook to look into the matter, which I did by suggesting to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that he ascertain the facts and give an answer in the House, which he can do much better than I could.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of discussing this incident. Of course, there are problems in any democracy and I think that the Commissioner for the Northwest Territories has met with the members of the territorial council and everything seems to be settled. We shall have the opportunity of finding out next month at a new sitting of the territorial council. I intend to be present there in order to discuss these problems at the beginning of the sitting with the members of this council.

INQUIRY CONCERNING AMENDMENTS TO YUKON ACT RESPECTING STRUCTURE OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Can the minister inform the House whether it is the intention of the government to introduce in this session amendments to the Yukon Act to incorporate therein the reforms he has promised to the people of the Yukon in the structure of their government?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I did not make quite as many promises to the people in Yukon as the hon. member for Yukon did. I want to say that we will introduce legislation at the proper time but at the speed measures are being passed these days, I am not very optimistic about the possibility of having it adopted very quickly.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: I have one last supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member but there are only two minutes left before the end of the question period and I see many hon. members who wish to ask questions. I seek the co-operation of hon. members so that we can have as many questions as possible. I will not charge hon. members for the 15 seconds I have just taken.

Mr. Nielsen: Since redistribution would have to take place before the next territorial election a year from this November and any increase in the size of the council would have to be dealt with in this session, can the minister say whether or not he expects to introduce amendments to the Yukon Act with respect to those increases in this session.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Since the minister has just met with his provincial counterparts, can he inform the House whether any agreement was made on the proposed new minimum wage and, if so, when will the legislation be enacted?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. What took place at the conference of Ministers of Labour was a comparison of minimum wage rates throughout the country, both federal and provincial. There was no effort on the part of the provinces to ascertain the future policy of the federal government relative to the minimum wage other than to indicate that they would like some conformity between our own and their rates. I gave a general indication that we were considering further increases, but no specific time for the implementation of those increases has been determined.

Mr. Harry Olaussen (Coast-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I understand there is a large backlog of veterans cases to be processed. Can the minister inform us whether he has any intention of increasing the size of his staff?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry but I did not get the first part of the question. Would the hon. member repeat it?

● (1150)

Mr. Olaussen: I understand there is a large backlog of veterans cases to be processed by the department. Is there any intention to increase the size of the staff in order to deal with them?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we have increased our staff in the past and this is still in process. We are looking at this at all times and it is quite possible that we will further increase our staff.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT ALL TENDERS WILL BE OPENED IN PUBLIC

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the recent revelation by the Minister of Supply and Services that millions of dollars of goods and services are being purchased by his department through a procedure whereby, while there is tendering, tenders are opened in private, would the Prime Minister assure the House that this unusual practice will cease and that in future all tenders in the minister's department will be opened in public and that those tendering will be given the opportunity to attend such openings?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is true that it is the practice in my department. I personally wondered why. That was done during the days of the former Tory minister. On December 28 I asked that a study be prepared on the advantages and disadvantages of such a practice and that alternatives be submitted to me if necessary. My officials handed me the report today and I intend to discuss it with them next week.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the hon. member a supplementary and will recognize the hon. member for York West and the Leader of the Opposition for the last questions and then call orders of the day.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister know of other departments that are following this practice of opening tenders in secret?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any such departments in the federal government. I am told that provincial governments follow that practice.

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Trudeau: I am very satisfied with the answer given by the Minister of Supply and Services who certainly did the right thing in looking into this matter as soon as he became minister. If I understand correctly, it is a practice that began or at least existed in the days of the Conservative government in this country.

FILMS

AGREEMENT BY FAMOUS PLAYERS AND ODEON THEATRES ON SHOWING OF CANADIAN FEATURE FILMS

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State. Can the minister confirm the various reports in recent days that an agreement has been made involving the famous Players and Odeon theatre chains to guarantee the showing of Canadian feature films for at least several weeks a year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will assume that the question has been asked directly. The hon. member cannot ask the minister to confirm a report. The minister might reply briefly as if the question had been asked directly.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In line with the government's concern about getting wider distribution of Canadian films, an agreement has been arrived at. I am not in a position to outline the details because I still have to finalize some of them with the two chains.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ALLEGED APPOINTMENT IN 1968 BY FORMER MINISTER, EDGAR BENSON, OF FIRM WITH WHICH HE HAD BEEN ASSOCIATED AS AUDITORS OF CMHC

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for interrupting the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport but I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman will recall that a number of days ago I directed a question to him in regard to a report that Mr. Edgar Benson, when he was the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, had appointed an auditing firm with which he had formerly been associated, but of course is no longer associated, as the auditor for that corporation. I asked the Prime Minister whether the report was being investigated and whether this kind of appointment was consistent with the guidelines of his government in such instances?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I looked into the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition and found that, indeed, Mr. Benson, when he was the minister responsible for housing, had appointed a firm of auditors with which Mr. Benson had broken all associations many years before when he entered federal politics. I therefore see no conflict of interest involved in this question.

SPORTS

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—GOVERNMENT POLICY REGARDING SUPPORT—ADVANCEMENT OF FUNDS TO CITY

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Unless there is a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to answer a question put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West regarding the Olympics. He asked me if any federal moneys or advances had been paid to COJO or to Montreal. I inquired from the Treasury Board and the President of the Treasury Board assures me that no such moneys have been paid.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Earlier this week discussions were concluded in Seattle between Canada and the United States relating to an agreement with respect to fisheries, without arrangements being made for further negotiations. If there are no further negotiations the agreement will expire on June 15. If it does, there will be chaos in the fishing industry on the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts.

My question of privilege is that I would have thought, inasmuch as those discussions ended this week and considering the great difficulties and apprehension involved, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would take the opportunity to make a statement to the House on motions about this question so that the public and Canadian fishermen in particular could understand what their position is with respect to those negotiations and that agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—DISAPPROVAL OF GOVERNMENT'S PROPOSED HEALTH CARE COST-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands) moved:

That this House disapproves the government's proposal to retreat by stages from the present cost-sharing arrangements with respect to hospital and medical care programs and calls upon the government to fund all health services on a 50-50 basis and to expand the health resources fund to enable the provincial governments to improve their health services.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday, May 8, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) presented certain tax proposals to the conference of provincial ministers of finance with respect to the contributions of the federal government to the health services provided in this country. These proposals are of such a complex nature that I am sure most people in Canada are totally unaware of their implications and what effect they will have upon future health services in this country.

It is significant that the provincial ministers of health gave a somewhat hostile reception to the proposals. I intend to examine them and propose the motion now before the House. In my opinion, the tax proposals advanced by the federal government represent an insidious and cynical attempt by the federal government to limit its financial contributions to hospital and medicare programs. I think it would be advisable to take a few minutes to review the fact that there are those in the Liberal party and in the present government who, throughout the years, have been somewhat hostile to the idea of a comprehensive national health program.

The first deliberate commitment by a government for a national health insurance scheme came in the 1945 Green Book proposals. At that time the federal government, having promised during the war that it would make Canada a better place for people to live in, and stimulated by the fact that just a few months before it had had a serious setback in the election when its majority in the House had been reduced to seven members, brought down the Green Book proposals. It is significant that the Liberal party's interest in health insurance has always had a direct relationship to the unsatisfactory state of its majority in the House of Commons.

One of those Green Book proposals was that a national health insurance program be shared jointly by the federal and provincial governments. However, nothing was done about it, and in 1946 the government of the province of Saskatchewan introduced the first comprehensive hospital insurance plan on the North American continent. In 1948, the province of British Columbia did the same, and these two provinces financed hospital insurance entirely on their own from then until 1958.

It is true that in 1956 the Liberal government of Mr. St. Laurent, when the Hon. Paul Martin was minister of national health and welfare, introduced the Hospital

Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, but it had a joker in it. The federal government would only contribute to hospital insurance if the majority of the provinces, representing a majority of the people of Canada, entered the plan, of course knowing that at that time the two central provinces were not interested in setting up hospital or medical care insurance. The result was that not one dollar was ever contributed to the hospital insurance plans of the provincial governments until 1958 when the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) took the joker out of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, and made a contribution to hospital insurance.

That government also set up the Hall commission on medical care. It brought in its report during the Pearson regime, and it is to the credit of the present President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who was then minister of national health and welfare, that the medicare act was drafted and placed on the statute books. May I say that that act sets forth a comprehensive national health insurance program. It recognized that hospital insurance and medicare were only one phase. That legislation provides that, by order in council, the federal government may extend health insurance to cover additional services such as dental care, optometric care, prescription drugs and other health services. May I also say that most of the opposition to that legislation came from inside the Liberal party, particularly from the financial mandarins. As a matter of fact, after the legislation was passed the then minister of finance, now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), imposed a five year limit on the agreement which was entered into with the provinces, and that five years will expire in a few weeks.

Instead of expanding the national health insurance proposals as contained in the legislation, the present government has been seeking ways to abdicate some of its responsibilities in this field. Last year the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), who was then minister of national health and welfare, put a proposal before the provinces which they rejected. Last January 19 the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) put forth a modified version of those proposals. I must say that I was disappointed with that, Mr. Speaker, because personally I have been impressed with the innovations and the energy which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has displayed with respect to the whole question of social security. I thought he would bring the same imagination and aggressiveness to tackle this problem of health insurance. But he did not. He brought down the same proposal which last Tuesday the Minister of Finance put into more concrete terms.

What the Minister of Finance proposed was that, first, the provinces must accept the formula presented to them last January by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. That proposal is that over the next five years the federal government will restrict its contribution to hospital and medical care to its present contribution, plus an escalation based on the Gross National Product, with some slight cushioning in the first few years of the five year period. Last Tuesday the Minister of Finance also offered the provincial governments six percentage points of the personal income tax, and the revenues from the excise tax on the sale of alcohol and tobacco, and if the revenues from these sources do not provide sufficient to match what the federal government has been paying, then the federal government will give them a cash payment, bringing them up to what the federal government is now paying, plus the GNP escalation.

It seems to me ironic, Mr. Speaker, that for the future financing of hospital and medical care, the provinces are going to have to rely in part on taxes on commodities which ought to be curtailed in the interests of health. The federal government is now embarked upon a program of discouraging people from using more tobacco and more alcohol, and in the years ahead we could very well witness a situation in which the federal government will be advertising and telling people not to smoke so much and not to drink so much, in which case the provincial governments would have less revenues with which to discharge their responsibilities in providing health services to the people of Canada. The Mad Hatter in Alice in Wonderland could not have made a more absurd proposal.

Implementation of the recommendation made by the Minister of Finance will have two effects. First, it will leave the provincial governments with all the risks inherent in rising health costs. At present health costs are rising at anywhere from 13 per cent to 15 per cent per annum. To try to tie the federal government's contribution to the GNP has no relationship whatsoever to what the provincial government's responsibilities will be. Having got the provincial governments into a health insurance program, the federal government is now, by stages, proposing to pull out and leave the provinces with the primary responsibility for providing health care. This will either mean that the provincial governments will have to curtail the health services which they will provide to their citizens or they will have to impose additional taxes. The provinces which will not be able to impose those additional taxes will have a much lower standard of health services.

● (1210)

The Minister of Finance summed it all up in the speech which he made to the provincial ministers of finance last Tuesday when he said:

> The amount of the reduction in federal taxes will, in due course, enable them to administer their programs without direct federal financial support.

If ever there was a start at moving down the road to a complete abdication of its responsibilities with regard to a national health insurance program, that statement represents such a step.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The other day the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that the provinces will be $1.1 billion better off over the next five years. The provinces dispute that. They dispute it both on the basis of what these new fields will bring in by way of revenue, and on the basis of what the Minister of National Health and Welfare estimates the increased costs will be.

If the Minister of National Health and Welfare takes part in this debate, I ask him to tell the members of this House whether the $1.1 billion, assuming the provinces get it, constitutes a guarantee that that sum of money will represent 50 per cent of the cost of providing hospital and medical care to the people of this country. Secondly, I ask him if that money, which the minister says the provinces will get, will be adequate to enable the provincial governments to move into phase two and phase three of the national health insurance program and provide the other medical services which were envisaged in the Medical Care Act.

The second effect of the proposal which the Minister of Finance has made is that the federal government is washing its hands of any responsibility for providing health services such as dental care, prescription drugs, optometric care, eye glasses and other health services. The federal government is now seeking to pull out of the game. It is tossing in its cards. it is saying to the provinces, we will give you certain fields of revenue and this should be sufficient to meet your needs. It will be up to each province to decide whether these new sources of revenue will enable them to do two things; first, maintain hospital and medical care at its present level and, second, whether they will have the necessary finances to expand the health insurance program so as to make it comprehensive.

When the medical care legislation came into effect in 1968, nobody in this House felt that we had completed the task of setting up health insurance in this country. Canada is far behind most of the industrial countries of the western world. Small nations much less affluent than Canada, the Scandinavian countries, West Germany, Britain, Israel, the Lowlands, Holland and Belgium, and many other countries have a completely comprehensive health insurance program that covers every aspect of health services for their people. The federal government is now getting ready to wash its hands, abdicate its responsibilities and leave it to the provinces in the future to attempt to provide those services out of revenues which will not be adequate for that purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: What is going to be the result? The result is going to be that we will end up with a mishmash of health services across Canada. Some provinces may not be able to continue to meet the escalating costs of health insurance and medicare. They may have to start imposing deterrent fees or a means test. Other provinces will not only be able to carry on the other services, but will have the necessary financial resources to expand their health program. However, those provinces will want to impose very severe residence qualifications for those who are going to enjoy the benefits of those services.

We are not going to have a national standard. We are not going to have a comprehensive program that covers people from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This is a complete negation of the whole concept of federal-provincial relations as laid down in the Rowell-Sirois report brought down prior to World War II. That set forth the proposition that every citizen of Canada, no matter where that individual might live, would be entitled to certain basic national standards of health services, education and welfare. That is the only way in which you can have national unity. You can balkanize a country in more ways than by promoting separatism. You can promote national disunity by having some parts of this country more favoured in terms of health services, welfare and education than other parts of this country. Nothing will tear this country apart faster than to destroy the concept of having a comprehensive national insurance program by which all citizens of Canada, no matter where they may live, will be entitled to all the health services they need, irrespective of their ability to pay.

The federal government's rationale for introducing this tax proposal is that they want to do two things. They want to provide the provinces with flexibility and they want to do something to curb escalating costs of hospital and medical care. I think there is much to be said for flexibility. I support the minister in attempting to do that, but I suggest that flexibility should not be used as a smokescreen for opting out of the federal government's legitimate responsibilities. The federal government can give to the provinces adequate flexibility with regard to which particular health services they will add to those that are now in existence with federal support without the kind of tax proposal which the Minister of Finance has presented.

The other reason they say they have introduced this is in order to curb rising costs. Of course, we need to curb rising costs, but you cannot curb rising costs by throwing the responsibility back on the provincial governments. Does anyone think the provincial governments are spending money like drunken sailors just because the federal governnmment puts up 50 per cent? As a matter of fact, for every dollar which they get from the federal government for medicare and health insurance, the provinces have to put up a dollar. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the dollars they have put up are much harder to come by than the dollars the federal government puts up. The greatest restraint is that the provincial governments have to match federal expenditures in the matter of health services. If we want to curb the escalating cost of health services, we shall not achieve this result by passing the ball back to the provinces. We can only do it if we are prepared to modernize our health delivery system.

There is no doubt money is wasted under our present health program. We are caring for many people in acute treatment hospitals where the cost is $50 or $60 a day who could be cared for in nursing homes for half that amount. There are many people in nursing homes who could be cared for under a home nursing program. The method of paying doctors may need to be completely revised. Then again, we could reduce much of the cost of medical care by setting up community health clinics where major emphasis would be placed on preventive health care, thereby reducing much of the cost of acute medical treatment.

Thus, I have suggested in this motion that in addition to the federal government funding health programs on a 50-50 basis, it should be prepared to expand the health resources fund and make money available on a continuing basis, not just the six years for which the proposed trust fund is envisaged, but on a continuing basis on the very logical deduction that any money which is paid to provincial governments to put up nursing homes, to establish community health centres, to set up home nursing care programs, will more than repay us in the long run by reducing the annual cost of providing health services.

I do not think, therefore, that either flexibility or a desire to curb the rising cost of the health program requires the kind of proposition which the government has placed before the provinces. The federal government could secure flexibility, it could help curb rising costs, by providing some of the necessary capital needed to modernize the health delivery system while at the same time continuing to do two things which are fundamental. First, the government could assure the provinces that, in one form or another they will be guaranteed that 50 per cent of the cost of any of the health services which are needed will be paid by the federal government and, second, that as they move into other health fields the federal government will be prepared to pay 50 per cent of the cost of those additional programs as well. After all, it is now almost five years since the medical care program came into effect. That program has brought great benefits to the people of Canada and I think the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who was minister of health at the time, has won for himself a place in the history books of Canada for the contribution which he made and which the government of that day made to the better health of the Canadian people.

But we cannot mark time. There is a growing need for dental health programs, particularly for school children and for the aged. Eventually, they should be extended to the whole population. This means spending money, for example, on building dental colleges and training dental assistants and dental hygienists. There is a growing need to move into the field of prescription drugs, particularly to help those who are suffering from long-term illnesses which require drugs to be administered over a long period. We all know, of course, that there are people who require treatment with certain drugs, such as insulin, for as long as they live. There is, too, a growing need for an optometric service, again starting with children and then spreading out over the population as a whole. Such programs as these will not be introduced unless the provinces know that the federal government is prepared to share the costs on a guaranteed basis.

I hope that before this debate is over the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Finance will assure the House and the people of Canada that the federal government will continue to guarantee a 50 per cent share of the cost of providing health services to this country, not only in respect of those services which are presently being provided but also with respect to additional services which ought to be provided and which, indeed, must be provided in the years ahead. Unless we take this course, we are virtually telling the people of Canada, through parliament, that the idea of a comprehensive health insurance plan, the concept that every Canadian, irrespective of race, colour or creed, will be entitled to all the health service he needs, has gone out of the window and that we intend to toss back into the hands of the provinces responsibilities they do not have adequate financial resources to meet.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure today to deal for the first time in the House with this very important aspect of my department having to do with the field of health. And I could say in that respect that I do appreciate the fact that the New Democratic Party decided to use this day to move a motion which will allow us to discuss that question so important to all Canadians.

Of course, that does not mean that I agree with the motion, far from it, but I think that it will certainly give us the chance to discuss both the situation that exists with respect to health services in Canada today and the proposals put forward by the federal government in that field in recent years.

[English]

I might be tempted to paraphrase, for the benefit of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), a statement which was made at the recent meetings by a colleague of his from British Columbia, the provincial minister of health. There was, he said, a great danger when discussing these matters of using concepts and proposals of the thirties to meet problems of the seventies.

Mr. Grafftey: That is another cliché.

Mr. Lalonde: While we agree on the necessity of maintaining our health services in Canada, there is also a very strong feeling among all governments and the Canadian people, that we should get better value for our money and that we could make better use of the available resources in this sector at the present time. I think we can agree that these two major shared-cost programs have been highly successful in achieving their basic objectives of developing and making accessible essential health services of comparable standards on a nation wide basis. They were a necessary prelude to the next phase of rationalizing the comprehensive health care program so as to make it consistent with the particular health needs and the economic realities of today. However, the arrangements of the past, particularly in relation to hospital insurance, have tended to perpetuate our orientation toward high cost services. I was pleased to note that the hon. member conceded this fact.

● (1230)

A new approach is thus required—a rational and flexible approach which rewards efficient and effective provision of services and discourages inefficiency, ineffectiveness and the waste of costly resources; an approach that will encourage the evolution of the present system into one capable of meeting the needs of the future; in other words, a total approach that will result in the improved management of health care resources and their effective utilization through the entire range of facilities and services.

But while criticizing the present cost-sharing arrangements for contributing to an unnecessarily high rate of continuing cost increase, we must recognize that the present programs have served Canadians very well indeed in other respects. For example, the basic standards of comprehensiveness, universality, accessibility and portability have given all residents an outstanding degree of protection which undoubtedly has contributed to the improvements in health status which have occurred since the introduction of the two programs.

For example, on the eve of hospital insurance the Canadian infant mortality rate was roughly 20 per cent higher than that of the United States, 30 per cent higher than that of England and Wales and 40 per cent higher than that of Australia. By the end of 1971, the first full year of medicare for all provinces, our infant mortality rate had fallen to 10 per cent below that of the United States and to virtually the identical rate for England and Australia, although the rate had been dropping for them as well. Similar marked improvements have occurred in our maternal mortality rate as well.

With the introduction of the medical care program, medical practice has become economically viable in any community with a sufficient population to warrant a doctor. Decreased emigration and continuing high immigration of physicians from abroad, and an increasing output from Canadian medical schools, have pushed Canada's doctor-population ratio down virtually to the target which the Royal Commission on Health Services in 1964 despaired of reaching before 1991. The ratio for all active physicians, including interns and residents, was 1 to 661 at the end of 1971. All provinces have experienced a substantial improvement in their doctor-population ratios since the medicare program was first announced and the companion health resources program was implemented to assist in the capital and renovation costs of education and research facilities for health professions.

Thus, we have been getting some value for our money, and I would say good value. However, the combined rate of increase for hospital and medical services still amounts to some 12 per cent per annum and seems likely to continue at this level unless a different approach is taken to the delivery of health care. For example, it is generally agreed that many patients at any given time in general hospital facilities could be equally well cared for in less expensive facilities and that many routine tasks currently undertaken by physicians could be delegated to other professionals.

Many developed countries, including some with better mortality rates than ours, have succeeded in providing high quality health care to their citizens at a relatively lower expenditure than Canada. We believe, therefore, that we must and can improve the cost effectiveness of our present health care system and in this way help make available funds for the many major programs in a variety of fields which the people of Canada desire and need. The federal financial proposals are designed to enable and encourage provinces to take the most effective approach in the management of their health care systems.

The federal government is not proposing or considering abandoning the two great health insurance programs, nor in any way watering down their standards which mean so much to Canadians. What we intend to do is to help make it possible to improve their performance—both cost-wise and benefit-wise—and I am confident that, with the support of the Canadian people, and in co-operation with the provinces, we will succeed in doing just that.

I should like to concentrate for a few moments on the first part of the resolution that has been placed before this House. The first part of the resolution reads as follows:

That this House disapproves the government's proposal to retreat by stages from the present cost-sharing arrangements with respect to hospital and medical care programs—

It is obvious that the first component of the resolution is based on a misunderstanding, or possibly a complete misinterpretation of the objectives, concepts and principles of the federal proposal to the provinces for new financing arrangements in the health care field.

Let me emphasize at this point that the view the federal government is retreating by stages or otherwise from its financial responsibilities towards health care is inaccurate, misguided and misleading to Canadians who have come to rely on the existing insured-benefit program and who, in the final analysis, pay the costs thereof. As I will elaborate, the objective of the proposal for new financing arrangements is to provide greater flexibility to the provinces as well as the incentive to re-organize and create greater rationalization in their health care systems. In proposing a new form of contribution—that is, the per capita payment approach with provinces being able to apply the federal payments throughout the entire range of health services—the federal government is merely using the major instrument at its disposal to exert its force for fundamental change and to play the necessary role of the catalyst in expediting such change.

To understand properly the nature and purpose of the latest federal proposal for health care financing, which my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and I placed before provincial ministers a few days ago, it would be appropriate to review briefly the circumstances which led to a re-examination of existing cost-sharing arrangements and the history of discussions that have taken place with the provinces on this matter for the past two and a half years. As all hon. members of the House are aware, the rate of escalation in costs of insured hospital and medical services has been a major concern to both the federal and provincial governments for a number of years. Several initiatives for reducing the escalation have been undertaken at both levels and on a joint basis. I am pleased to report that the steps that have been taken jointly with the provinces, and also taken by the provinces alone, have led to a situation in which the provinces have achieved a reasonable degree of success in their efforts to control costs. I feel certain that all hon. members will join me in an expression of appreciation to the provinces for such efforts.

However, these measures will have a short-term impact since they are not directed towards removing some of the glaring inefficiencies in the health care system. A more fundamental and comprehensive approach is required, an approach that will concentrate on the identification and development of less costly but equally effective methods of delivering health care services. The report of the committee on the cost of health services, as hon. members know, contains some 80 recommendations for reducing health costs. The majority of these lie in the sphere of the provincial authorities, and in our subsequent assessment of these recommendations in consultation with the provinces it became evident that the present arrangements did not offer sufficient flexibility to provinces to encourage implementation of many of the more economical methods of providing services.

It was in the light of the foregoing circumstances that the provinces, in relation to the recommendations of the committee on the cost of health services, began to press the federal government for more flexibility in the use of the federal contribution. It was in response to this pressure that my predecessor, the Hon. John Munro, made known to his provincial counterparts at the federal-provincial conference of Ministers of Health on December 10 and 11, 1970, that he was prepared to re-examine the existing hospital and medical insurance legislation in consultation with them, for the purpose of developing a new approach to health care financing.

In stating his views at that time, Mr. Munro emphasized the need for a new approach, a rational and flexible approach which would reward efficient and effective provision of services and discourage inefficiency, ineffectiveness and the waste of costly resources. It was suggested that we should be seeking a form of financing arrangement that would enable the provinces to achieve greater flexibility in determining their priorities in the health care field within the context of national goals and in pursuing the most effective approach in line with these priorities; in other words, to encourage the introduction of more economical methods of providing services and other measures conducive to the development of a total health care system.

This is the objective which we established when we started to review the existing legislation and from which we have never deviated in the cause of formulating the latest proposals that we submitted to the provinces. Indeed, during the course of the many discussions which have taken place during the last two years with the provinces, although they disagreed in varying extent with some of the features of our proposals, never questioned the basic objective.

At this point it might be useful to members of the House if I were to set out more precisely these objectives. I will list six of them. They are: One, to reduce the rate of escalation in the cost of health services without impairing the quality of care, but introduce a form of contribution that would provide a greater incentive for control of costs; two, to give the provinces greater flexibility to determine their priorities in the health care field and to pursue the most effective approach in line with these priorities, consistent with the existing national standards; three, to optimize the use of all health resources; four, to permit the development of special programs like the thrust fund to bring about reorganization of the health care delivery system and thereby improve the efficiency of the system. The fifth objective was to simplify the financial arrangements between the federal and provincial governments, and the final objective was to meet the existing system of comprehensiveness, accessibility, universality and portability in respect of the basic hospital and medical care services and to obtain agreement for the co-operative development of additional standards in the over-all area of health services.

Surely, the establishment of these specific objectives as a basis for developing a new financial arrangement with the provinces and the nature of the discussions that have taken place with the provinces during the past two and a half years cannot in any way be construed as a move on the part of the federal government to retreat by stages from its responsibility in health care financing. We are attempting to introduce a substitute to the rigid forms of agreements that now exist. There is no question of the federal government retreating in any way from the well-established principles of the existing program, or of reducing its over-all role in the health care field.

Mr. Stanfield: Except financing.

Mr. Lalonde: I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) refer to financing and I am coming to this. I should like to say a word about the proposals we put forward. It seems that some people, including the Leader of the Opposition, have found these a little bit complex. I will try to make them a little more simple.

What are the features of this formula? The first is a federal per capita contribution to provinces which would replace existing financial arrangements and which would escalate in relation to the growth in the economy with some adjustments that will be shown. The second is that the per capita contributions would begin in 1974-75 and essentially would be based on shareable cost for the fiscal year 1972-73. These base year costs would be adjusted upwards to reflect the introduction of an optometric benefit, unemployment insurance and, where appropriate, special adjustments for particular provinces.

The third is that the base year per capita payment would be escalated through 1973-74 with reference to the GNP plus one per cent. Contributions to provinces, of course, would also take into account population changes. The fourth would be a levelling of provincial per capita payments to a uniform national average over a 10 year period, a thrust fund totalling $640 million to be allocated to the provinces on a per capita basis and to be available to provinces during 1973-74, to be used at the time they want, after discussion and agreement with us, obviously. There would be provision for additional federal contributions to provinces in instances where provincial health spending would grow more rapidly than the rate of growth in federal payments, and a guarantee to provinces against the loss of federal contributions under the Canada Assistance Plan in instances where a province changes the basis for its support to health related services.

These are the basic features of the financial proposal that has been offered to the provinces. In addition, the federal government has assured the provinces that it will maintain its role in the co-operative development of standards, in the development and promulgation of health educational and promotional materials and in the provision of consultative services as required. Obviously, I do not need to spend time here in saying that the intention is to continue the broad range of services that the Department of National Health has been providing to Canadians in various forms for many years. So, the formula is not really complex, but it is not really simple, either.

An hon. Member: It is confusing.

Mr. Lalonde: Some people may be looking for simplistic solutions to these problems.

Mr. Grafftey: It is a bureaucratic nightmare.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

Mr. Lalonde: The present system would be even more complex than this system. What we are offering here is a solution which will certainly not only streamline the system but make it much more effective.

What about the estimated financial implications of this proposal on the basis of current projections of present shareable costs? The federal contribution under the present proposed formula would be greater by $1.1 billion over the next six years than under existing arrangements, and this is on the basis of the present projection of costs over the next six years. Out of this $1.1 billion I have mentioned the provinces would have available the thrust fund I have mentioned of $640 million. That fund would be provided to assist the provinces in reorganizing their health care systems and, in particular, to assist them in developing and introducing more economical methods of delivery care.

We firmly believe that the provinces will benefit considerably through a new financing arrangement such as we have proposed because the increased flexibility in the use of the federal contribution, combined with the innovation that will be possible through the use of the thrust fund, should enable provinces to reduce the rate of escalation in costs without impairing the quality of service. As will be noted, the proposed new formula includes no provision for the financing of new major programs. In this regard, I think you will agree that most provinces would object to the federal government taking an initiative in the development of new services or programs prior to the rationalization of the health care system and thereby releasing some funds from the existing programs that could be used for new programs. But this not excluded in the future.

The start of new programs like denticare or pharmacare is not excluded even on the basis of shared-cost programs. I would refer the hon. member to the statement made by the Minister of Finance on September 14, 1966 to the meeting of the ministers of finance in Ottawa in which it was said that most Canadians expect the federal government to retain some vehicle to bring about new country-wide social and economic advances in the future. He was referring to the cost-shared program. A constitutional paper was prepared for the constitutional conference entitled "Federal-Provincial Grants and the Spending Power of Parliament". There again it was clearly indicated that the federal government would remain in the area of shared-cost programs, but that this would have to be done on the basis of a clear consensus among the provinces. So, what we have here is a formula which, according to our calculations, —and there is always an element of risk; there is no absolute guarantee—would provide over the next six years an amount of over $1 billion more than the present formula would provide for improving the health services in this country.

I must say I was rather surprised and disappointed to read a report in the press of a statement by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) while he was in Vancouver. I am glad he could make it back for the end of this week. On Wednesday, the day after our proposal was made at the conference in Ottawa, he rejected totally the proposal and called it all kinds of names. I would have thought he might have taken the trouble to have at least read it rather than depend on some garbled message which may have come through from Queen's Park.

Mr. Stanfield: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering whether the literature which the minister was kind enough to send me of the statements by himself and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) are garbled reports or am I entitled to regard those as authorized versions of the latest gospel?

Mr. Lalonde: Well, I can only conclude that the Leader of the Opposition could certainly have improved his service greatly had he obtained a copy of those statements the next morning in his office rather than in Vancouver. I would rather conclude that his master's voice from Queen's Park took no time to reach Vancouver, no more time than it takes to reach Ottawa these days.

I have only a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to talk about the health resources fund. The health resources fund has been created to provide health training facilities in Canada. It provides for an amount of $500 million over the next 15 years. Out of that at the present time, as of March 31, 1973, $217 million have been paid to the provinces in contributions toward the costs actually incurred in creating the new facilities and another $81 million is committed to projects under construction. So, there is a total of $298 million committed to assisting in the creation of more than 150 projects forming the major part of our 16 health science centers across the country. But there is still a significant amount of money available in that category. There is an amount of about $200 million. These funds will be sued for major developments in the health research and training field over the next few years.

I must say that the proposed financial arrangements which are presently before the provinces contain provisions for $640 million for thrust funds which are available for both capital and operating requirements. Capital projects which provide less costly alternatives to acute bed facilities could be provided from these funds. This amount of $640 million would be available over a six-year period and, as I say, even if the provinces were not to use it in the six-year period they could still hold it in reserve. This amount should be compared with the $500 million under the health resources fund which was intended originally for a 15-year period. So, that is not such a bad deal.

The provinces have had placed before them, therefore, a proposal which includes a form of tax-sharing approach to which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) referred. I might say I am afraid that, in spite of our efforts to reduce the consumption of alcohol and tobacco, I am pretty sure there would still be fairly substantial sources of revenue there for many years to come. If our campaigns should improve that situation, I could almost turn the argument around and say that we could assume a reduction in health costs because of the reduced consumption of tobacco and alcohol. This would mean, therefore, that the provinces would require less money for expenditure in that field.

Under our proposals the provinces would have referred to them six per cent of the income tax revenue plus the revenue from the taxes on alcohol and tobacco which have been mentioned. During the period when the value to the provinces of these additional taxes is less than the total value of the federal contribution toward health, the difference would be made up by a cash payment to the provinces. At the point in time when the value of these taxes begins to exceed the federal contribution, the provinces would keep the surplus. That surplus could be used for health and any other purposes they might wish.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the minister at this point for two reasons. First, his time has expired. Second, it is one o'clock. If the minister requires only a few minutes more to complete his comments, and if members would grant him unanimous consent, he might be allowed to continue now or at two o'clock. In this respect, the House is in the hands of members. Perhaps we could have an indication from the minister whether he could conclude in the next few minutes or whether he would prefer to resume at two o'clock.

Mr. Lalonde: We could adjourn now, Mr. Speaker. I would require just a few minutes at two o'clock, if that is agreeable.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair to resume the same at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank all my colleagues who agreed to give me those few minutes to complete my remarks. I will deal very briefly with our proposal in the field of fiscal transfer.

[English]

I have heard several comments in the House about the transfer of the excise tax on alcohol and tobacco. Some hon. members seemed to feel that this was some kind of "bad tax". I am surprised at this introduction of the new concept of bad and good taxes according to the items which are being taxed and according to some moral criterion which should still be defined. The only thing I can say is that be they good or bad—and I suppose all taxes are bad—nevertheless no one has as yet invented a better solution to finance public expenditures. The fact is that the federal government has been spending large sums of money, I think over one billion dollars, over the last year. I am sure that the province of which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was premier would not hesitate to impose a tax on alcohol and tobacco to finance its operations, and the same would be true of the province for which the Leader of the Opposition was speaking a few years before he moved to leaner pastures. The federal offer, therefore—and I want to spend more time on this question—is a response to the provinces, both in terms of program control and flexibility and in terms of the willingness of the federal government to shift tax resources to the provinces as a means of financing federal contributions to health, on the condition that the existing national standards be maintained.

As a result of the proposal that we have put forward, over the next several years the provinces, through the amount provided under the health formula made up of shifted tax resources and cash, will have the flexibility to make adjustments which should make funds available for other health programs. When the point is reached at which the value of these taxes begins to exceed the contribution under the health formula, the surplus, of course, will be available also at provincial discretion for assisting in total health financing, as I previously mentioned.

Mr. Stanfield: In 1995.

Mr. Lalonde: I think that once more the Leader of the Opposition is quite wrong. I suggest that he sharpen his pencil and he will find out that the cross over for many provinces will be some time in the early 1980s. I am not surprised that the finances of Nova Scotia were in such a bad shape when he left if he used such methods of calculation.

In conclusion, the federal proposal stresses the maintenance of the existing national standards and provides flexibility and thrust funds which will allow the federal funds to be used by the provinces for their total health financing. I think I can also say that several provinces would object in particular to new major shared-cost programs at this time, such as implied by the resolution before the House.

The mover of the motion asked a few questions in his speech, and I would like to spend a minute on them. First of all, he asked whether the $1.1 billion surplus which would be appearing according to our proposal over the next six years will cover 50 per cent of the cost of hospital and medical care. I can only tell him that this excess of $1.1 billion has been arrived at on the basis of figures provided by the provinces after many consultations and meetings with the provinces, and that on the basis of present projections as provided by the provinces over the next six years $1.1 billion more will be coming to the provinces for health expenditures than they would be getting under the continued present system of fifty-fifty sharing under the medicare and hospital insurance acts. I can assure him of that. I for one would say that if I were on the other side and if I were given a bet with odds of 1.1 billion, I think I would be crazy to refuse it. I would certainly not hesitate to take such a bet.

So far as the second question is concerned, as to whether it would be adequate to move into phase two and three of health care, I am not quite sure to what the hon. member was referring. I presume he was talking in terms of denticare and pharmacare, but I am not sure that that is what he had in mind. If that is the case, obviously this financing formula does not provide for those programs, but it has been quite clear from the beginning in our discussions with the provinces that the financing formula was not aimed at covering these plans. If the provinces were to agree with the federal government to embark upon new, substantial programs such as denticare and pharmacare on a universal basis, then there would obviously have to be new agreements, new discussions, and probably new legislation to put such programs into effect. As I have stated before, there is nothing in our proposal that would preclude such an eventuality.

Let me say in conclusion that we believe what we have proposed is a fair and responsible answer to the problem. The moneys available are much more substantial than those available under the existing programs. Obviously, the provinces are free to reject the proposal; that is their right. But the federal offer has been made after over two and a half years of discussion, and if the provinces decide to reject it or refuse to consider it any further, at any rate let us not hear any more about federal rigidity and refusal to co-operate. I think the Canadian public and this House should know at whose door any blame should lie.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to participate in the discussion of what I think is a most excellent motion presented with a most excellent speech by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). It seems to me that members of his party are generally at their best when opposing the government, an exercise in which they are not getting much practice but they can still do it. I listened most attentively to the hon. gentleman and found myself in agreement with the vast majority of his speech and I commend him.

It is an important subject. I notice that the minister said that the motion gave him the first opportunity to discuss this subject. I would say to him that it should not have been the first opportunity; he should have made a statement on motions before this conference or at least he certainly should have made a statement on motions after its dismal collapse. There should not be any reluctance to discuss in this House, before representatives of the people of Canada, the plans which he has made for the very important portfolio which he now holds.

There are so many areas of concern of which we must take note that I wondered which particular segment the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands would choose. There is great concern across the country for the casual, foot-dragging and underplaying with regard to the grave drug situation in this country. There is great anxiety, too, about the need to move quickly toward more efficiency in health care. The proposal of the Canadian Nurses Association is something which I think should commend immediate attention. There is great anxiety with the cynical disregard which there now seems to be for the whole question of medical research. One is appalled at the minute increase in the vote in this tremendously important field in this year's estimates which is just a little over $2,000. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, having decided to move into this field, must have had quite an exercise in intellectuality in choosing the area of immediate concern.

In his speech the minister indicated that, in his view, the plan which was so brusquely turned aside by the provinces a few days ago was not in fact a complicated plan. When I read the document I thought it was a bit complicated.

Mr. Stanfield: Deliberately so.

Mr. Macquarrie: After hearing the minister "elucidate" this morning I now know it was complicated.

Mr. Stanfield: Deliberately so.

Mr. Macquarrie: In this I agree with that great organ in the city of Toronto, the Globe and Mail which in an editorial this morning said:

> Whether it was another failure or a bargaining ploy by the provinces, one thing is certain: the federal proposals were so complex that most Canadians would not have read them, let alone understood them, which is a bad state of affairs in a democracy.

When I read that I thought perhaps that gray shadowy person behind the legislative process in this country, that "genius" who dreamed up the FISP bill of the last parliament, must have employed himself in the convolutions that went into this plan.

Mr. Stanfield: The same fellow.

Mr. Macquarrie: It may indeed, as some of my colleagues suggest, be more than one. Perhaps it was a group effort or a committee effort and we know what committees can do sometimes. The formula is certainly cumbersome. But one thing about it was crystal clear; it was a bum deal for the provinces which they very smartly rejected on behalf of the people for whom they are trying to provide the best of medical service. I cannot but agree with the course they took.

I noticed with pleasure the reference of the mover of this motion to a document which I have often mentioned in this House, the Rowell-Sirois Commission Report on Dominion-Provincial Relations. It seemed to me that the minister somewhat denigrated this by suggesting that it happened to be a document of some decades ago. I am not one who necessarily believes that those things which are well established are automatically of no value. I think I have read most, if not all, documents on the Canadian constitution since the Rowell-Sirois Commission Report and I have yet to see one which in my judgment has a firmer grasp of the needs and values and priorities of our federal structure than that very fine document.

The only place where I may differ from the hon. member from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, is that being an ardent Canadian nationalist, I use the word "dominion" when I discuss these matters whereas he uses the more American expression "federal" but we all know what document we are talking about. I was impressed by what the hon. mover said about the irony of zeroing in on liquor and tobacco. Long ago in the legislature of the province of Prince Edward Island where the tax base is not so broad, Mr. Speaker, and where it is important to find every area you can for revenue, there was a discussion on the estimates and it seemed that the only place where revenues were expanding was from the taxes on liquor. The leader of my party at that time, a very distinguished physician, Dr. MacMillan, said "I still think, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot really drink our way into prosperity". I say to the people of Canada that they cannot smoke and drink their way into improved health.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I think we have to base our confidence on something a little better than that. I believe, as one who is something of an authority at least in a part of this realm because I gave up smoking long before I even heard of Miss Judy LaMarsh—

An hon. Member: How about drinking?

Mr. Macquarrie: I am here to orate, not to confess. I should like to say that, while we can find our moments of levity as demonstrated by the mover of the motion who has the light touch which I lack, being a dour, serious man on Highland Scottish extraction, the question is in fact a very serious one.

This week we had the very disturbing collapse of an essential dialogue between the two jurisdictions in this country. We had assembled the ministers representing the provinces and dominion in an area of immense importance to all Canadians, the field of health. A two-day conference was arranged which broke up after a one-day meeting, and I think the abruptness of the termination disturbed all of us and disturbed the people we represent. I have been looking over the various news items because I was not allowed into the conference. These things are now held behind closed doors. As I read the items I find room for deeper anxiety. The headlines read: "Federalism endangered by plan, Manitoba says"; 'There's no gain in it for us,' Crosbie says in rejecting proposal"; "No agreement on health costs", and all across the board there is a lack of confidence and a feeling of dismay that on this important question the two jurisdictions were not able to proceed.

The minister closed his peroration with the suggestion that it would not be difficult to place the blame and he implied that it lay with the provinces. I say that the major responsibility for the collapse of this very important conference lies in the inflexibility of the federal government of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: Attitudes like that are revealed in an article by Peter Calamai, one of the most highly informed journalists in this field, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on May 7. The column is headlined, "No more sweetening of kitty: Lalonde". With an attitude like that at the beginning of a dominion-provincial conference, how in the world can we expect there to be a reasonable and harmonious discussion of this important matter. This government, which I consider as having been in office for one decade, and God knows that is too long, laid upon the provinces rigid restrictions in this field. Into that rigid framework the provinces have had to enter and administer the important and costly program of health care. It ill becomes the representative of the federal government at this stage of the game, after having laid down the rigid rules, to suggest that now he will leave to the provinces these rapidly accelerating costs and try to escape as far as he can from bearing the burden of these costs, many of them geared to the rigid formula inspired here, in Ottawa.

● (1420)

I am sure we all want the people of Canada to have a health care plan that is not only adequate but ample. I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. Other countries in the world are ahead of us in this field and there is no reason why they should be. We are now at the stage in our social development where the proper health care of all Canadians is a social necessity. It is a priority under our way of life. We cannot turn the clock back to the so-called glorious days of laissez-faire, because we know that even under our system substantial numbers of Canadians, this day, this hour, are left with inadequate care. One thinks of the permanently handicapped and of those, as the mover of the motion mentioned, who day after day must take costly drugs in order to maintain a viable standard of health.

We are all concerned about the tremendous increases in costs which have occurred in the last few years in this field, and we know that the provinces are bearing a tremendous burden in this field. Again, I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. It is outrageous to suggest that the provinces are playing fast and loose with these funds and that they cannot be trusted. That is an outrageous suggestion. If the federal government cannot come up with something more realistic and generous than the complicated program thrown at the provinces the other day, it had better stick to the 50-50 formula. It is far better to stick with that than bring forward the kind of suggestion under which the government might do something in the 1980's to alleviate the situation.

I suppose the only element that could be more ironic than underpinning alcohol and tobacco would be designating the year 1984 as the year when action will be taken.

Mr. Stanfield: Tax sharing might be significant by that year.

Mr. Macquarrie: In the short time at my disposal, and I never like to speak beyond my time, may I say that in my view it is incumbent on the minister and the government, instead of sitting back now in a sulk, to negotiate seriously with the provinces; to start all over again, if necessary, to confess that they have been too rigid, too arrogant, too haughty, and to find a way whereby the federal government may maintain its traditional and proper role in ensuring minimal standards of health care across this country. At the same time, it must provide to the provinces sufficient resources to enable them to develop their own health systems which are geared to their own particular needs. It must give the provinces the administrative elbow room to develop within their own jurisdictions their own health systems so that they can obtain the maximum value for every dollar spent by either or both jurisdictions. We have had too much bureaucratic rigidity, too much of the take it or leave it attitude, too much of, "adopt our view, or go back to your provincial capitals".

I believe that if our government were to display sufficient sensitivity in this area, it would adopt certain priorities. I will name them in my limited time. First, the government should ensure that all Canadians get value for those tax dollars which go to meeting health care costs. We must take these things seriously. Second, it should ensure that each province has a fair and equitable share of tax revenues, either under the tax points system or under some other system, so that the provinces can meet their responsibilities for current health care programs and for those programs which are needed to meet particular conditions within each province. Third, it should ensure what the present plan certainly does not ensure, that provision is made for the relative growth in revenues. These would have to be viewed realistically. Fourth, a sensitive, thoughtful and preceptive federal government would, of course, preserve its own power to use the fiscal system in order to maintain economic stabilization. It will also, and here I echo the Rowell-Sirois Commission whose chief prophet today is the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, ensure the preservation of the principles of universality, comprehensiveness, accessibility and portability. These principles must be maintained.

Where we are most deficient, it seems to me, is in the lack of reasonable flexibility. When the late Prime Minister Pearson was in the House, he often talked about co-operative federalism. You do not hear that expression so much now and I do not think one sees it practised so much now, either. The federal system, as any historian or political scientist will tell you, is an extremely difficult one to operate. You cannot operate it by ultimata or by dicta. You can only operate it by continuous concession, constant compromise and eternal good will; declarations such as, "This is the last sweetener we are going to put into the kitty, take it or leave it", are recipes for the destruction of federalism. Federalism can crack on matters of social and economic concern as well as on deep political and emotional issues. Here, again, I find myself in accord with the mover of this motion. This is a matter of great importance. This is probably the biggest challenge the minister has faced and, so far, he has failed.

An hon. Member: Ha!

Mr. Macquarrie: If the sudden departure of the representatives of the provinces to their capitals is not a sign of failure, I do not know what more dynamic or dramatic indication one would want. I trust that the Liberal backbencher who laughed at my assertion a moment ago will take this seriously. I think the apparent lack of concern shown by the government has created a major crack in the whole structure of Canadian federalism. I hope, when this matter is taken up again by the first ministers, that we will see a bit more concern, a bit less callousness, more consideration and less inflexibility; otherwise not only our national health plan but our federal structure may be greatly endangered.

● (1430)

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should not like to miss this chance of saying a few words on the New Democratic Party's motion that reads as follows:

That this House disapproves the Government's proposal to retreat by stages from the present cost-sharing arrangements with respect to hospital and medical care programs and calls upon the Government to fund all health services on a 50-50 basis and to expand the Health Resources Fund to enable the Provincial Governments to improve their health services.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot give my wholehearted approval to this motion for the good reason that I see from reading it that it is the product of a socialist mind. I am not one bit socialist myself, but a democrat and where the provinces are concerned, I am for independence, which is why I cannot accept the whole motion although I am in favour of parts of it.

This motion takes us back to the history of federalism, joint tax programs, and federal government spending power.

I had the privilege today of listening to the speech of the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). I was pleased to hear a former technocrat expressing his view on the profitability of federalism which he has been preaching for some years, as he did especially when he was the great mind behind the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). And the statements he made today did not surprise me, as I knew nothing had changed, for every proposal made in the House was inspired by those technocrats. Indeed, I have always said that the present Parliament is being led by the technocrats, and that it is they who think up the legislation before asking us to pass it.

The proposals made at the meeting on May 8 were simply a repetition of those made at the meeting on January 19, although some have been slightly amended.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare said earlier that he needed more money. When health is concerned he needs more money and we get less for our money from those services.

I think we should consider carefully the current government proposals modified for the provinces. As recorded in Hansard for May 9 on page 3599, the Minister of Finance who was giving details of those proposals stated, and I quote:

> First, we would be prepared to reduce the rate of federal personal income tax by 6 percentage points. These tax points would be equalized to the national average under the existing provisions of the Fiscal Arrangements Act. The federal government would give a firm undertaking to effect this transfer. But, for reasons I shall explain in a moment, . . .

And he gave a few reasons for proceeding immediately with certain transfers. Again I quote:

> Second, we would be prepared to eliminate the existing federal excise taxes and duties on domestic and imported tobacco products, spirits, brandy, wine and beer. Provincial governments would then be able to move into this tax room without any increase in costs to consumers . . . Third, to the extent that the value of the tax cut is not sufficient to pay for the federal contribution for health services, as determined under the GNP-escalated formula, the federal government would make this up by a cash adjustment.

However, when you consider that these proposals have been submitted by the provincial governments we say on their behalf that of course the current proposals are unacceptable to the provinces for the good reason that they will get even less, whatever the minister says, in return for the rights they have given up in favour of the federal government more than 40 years ago. What astounds me is the behaviour of the government which is always making submissions to the provinces whereas under a true federalism, the provinces should express their wishes to the central government. We are doing here what we blame the large unions for, that is, we are entirely forgetting the wishes of the grass roots to consider only those of the leaders. I think that the federal government is asserting itself in the same way as the big union leaders. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said elsewhere in his statement: "If the provinces do not approve of it, all they have to do is reject it." But he failed to add that if they refuse they will have nothing, which is simple. Reference is made to agreements with the provinces. But what is the nature of those agreements? The federal government stands before the provincial governements and says: This is what we want. You are free to accept it or reject it, but if you reject it, you will get nothing. The Minister of National Health and Welfare himself has just repeated those words.

Mr. Speaker, we call this coercion by leaders antidemocracy or dictatorial federalism, and the provinces cannot submit to this any more than union members can accept the conduct of certain union leaders who unilaterally impose their decisions on the provinces without even consulting them. And that is exactly what the federal government has been doing for many years as we witness ever more inquiries and federal-provincial conferences such as that of May 8, with decreasing success. And we witness the clash of brains between officials who are well installed in all departments and who are seeking a new gimmick in order to pester everybody and give more authority to the central government, while provinces are being turned into mere vassal institutions. What is regretable in Quebec is that we do not have a government strong enough to stop this invasion by the federal government. What did all these meetings with provinces bring as concrete results?

Mr. Speaker, one has only to read the newspapers of the day following this famous meeting to see once again the deplorable state of the situation. In the Montréal-Matin of May 9, for instance, we read and I quote:

> Ottawa and the provinces on the warpath.

There is nothing new about them being on the warpath and I think they will continue to be because responsibilities are not outlined. I for one have always been opposed to these joint programs. I was glad, in the years of the former prime minister, the late Right Hon. Mr. Pearson, when he informed us that should he stay in office for another two years, there would not remain a single joint program. He had promised to remove them all. But six months later, the Liberal party compelled him to resign and elected another prime minister. Since then, joint plans have been increased threefold, and I say that so long as we have that system without a sharing of responsibilities, we shall have this quibbling. What I am hoping for is that if a province turns any specific field over to the federal government it does so on a 100 per cent basis, and not 25, 40, 75 or 80 per cent, a little game that leads to all this continuous bickering. It is still true that "Ottawa and the provinces are on the warpath". Here is what one can read in the May 9, 1973, issue of Montréal-Matin:

> TOTAL FAILURE OF CONFERENCE
> SQUABBLING OF FINANCE, HEALTH AND EDUCATION MINISTERS
> The double conference of ministers of Finance and Health and Finance and Education respectively ended in total failure. Having been unable to agree on the financing formula proposed, at both levels, by the Trudeau government, the participants decided to go home and refer the whole problem to the premiers who are to meet in two weeks in Ottawa.

As the first lot was unable to agree, the matter will be referred to the provincial premiers, who will agree no better. Like the premier of Quebec, when they return from some conference where they achieved absolutely nothing, they claim to be satisfied and even say so on television programs. This, of course, is to disguise the party's failure, as citizens are inevitably the victims. I continue quoting:

> This dramatic development came about at a time when there were indications, at least according to federal spokesmen, of provincial interest in the federal proposals. But it is now clear that that optimism was forced and that, on the contrary, the provinces demanded a higher degree of flexibility in the fields under their constitutional jurisdiction.
> This failure is even more serious for the federal government especially as the minister of Health and Welfare, Mr. Marc Lalonde, had succeeded, a fortnight ago, in obtaining the unanimous approval of the provinces concerning the objectives of his program to review the social security system.

Some approval! How happy Mr. Castonguay said he was, in Quebec, upon his return from Ottawa when he said that at last there had been an agreement. And how! He has left the entire administration to the federal government. Incidentally, with regard to family allowances, that is what we want. That is what the country wants. If the family allowances system is turned over to the jurisdiction of the federal government, then let it take it over 100 per cent and then one will be able to say whether they administer it well or bad, but, let no one say that 40 per cent of the administration will be left to the federal government and 60 per cent to the provincial government or vice versa. Once again, those particulars should be determined clearly, to avoid quarrels.

To go back to my quotation:

> The fact that the dual question of health care and postsecondary education has been referred to the government leaders themselves is a clear indication that relations between Ottawa and the provinces are not at their best.
> Generally, the provinces want the federal government to move out of a vast field of taxation to allow the provincial governments to finance their own particular programs without having to beg endlessly and remain in a state of dependence upon the central government.

For that, the provinces and ourselves blame the federal government.

> Before leaving, the provincial minister of Finance, Mr. Raymond Garneau, stated that if Quebec had accepted the federal proposals on financing postsecondary education, it would have lost several million dollars.
> As for the financing of health care, Mr. Garneau finds the Turner formula too complex and not generous enough. Instead of the 28 tax points Quebec demanded, Ottawa offers only six—

And the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) spoke a while ago of $1,100 million.

It is nice to talk about an increase of one billion one hundred million dollars over a period of six years, but if, for example, Quebec's expenditures for hospital services were to double, what would this billion be worth? This is very relative. If I am offered a billion tomorrow I would be crazy to refuse it, but we must think in the long term. With regard to the future expenditures of a province, what is this billion worth? It may be worth a trifle and this is why we are not ready to accept such amounts without first knowing, Mr. Speaker, if expenditures will rise or fall.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

It is obvious that in the present situation—and I could mention six other items, but I will be satisfied with one—we suggest that the government accept the status quo, i.e. what was paid formerly to the provinces, because we must live in this upside down federalism; let us accept the formula of paying in equal parts the expenses of the provinces. This first proposal was much more equitable; by accepting to pay half of the expenses of the provinces, if the expenses increase, it is understood that the payments of the federal government will increase because, after all, it is the role of the federal government. It merely collects taxes to transfer them to the provinces. This is not funny, but it should play that role. Today, it benefits from its situation as collector to impose its will, to become a dictator, and this is why we would prefer the equal share formula for some time while waiting for a true revival of Confederation. We are now living with dictatorial federalism. If we come to a true revival of Confederation, the provinces will have something to say. They will then determine together the activities of the federal government in our country, as was done 40 or 50 years ago. At least, under the equal share formula, the provinces had or still have something to say. They can choose the quality of medical care and improve them and they are always assured that the central government will have to supply its share. In a word, they can still prepare their budget in accordance with the needs of the population instead of gearing health services to the amount that Ottawa will be kind enough to give them. The federal government could withdraw completely from such provincial fields as health and education. Let it withdraw completely and leave it entirely to the provinces—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him is now expired.

• (1450)

[English]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that there are quite a number of members who wish to participate in this debate. If there is agreement from all sides of the House, perhaps the suggestion could be accepted that henceforth there be a 15 minute limit on speeches, which would enable all members to have an opportunity of speaking before we adjourn for the weekend.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the suggestion. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, as an elected representative from one of the slow growth, developing regions of this country I should like to make a brief contribution to this debate and to express some of the concerns of those I represent. The tone of my arguments will be in direct contradistinction to the hon. member who has just spoken, particularly with reference to the role of the federal government in the health care field.

Any consideration of health care in Canada must, of course, include reference to the quality and and extent of service and the cost of all aspects of any comprehensive health care program. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has proposed to the provinces that existing shared-cost programs under the Hospital Insurance Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act be replaced by a single program under which the provinces would be free to use federal payments in whatever way would best assist them in the development of their health care programs.

The argument in favour of this proposal is that the provincial governments would have greater flexibility in introducing more effective and more economic methods of dispensing health care. In short, it is suggested that acceptance by the provinces of this scheme would mean better health care at less cost. That is what we want in Canada and it is what we should strive for. But is that what the result would be from this different approach to the financing of health services in Canada?

Speaking personally, Mr. Speaker, I am reluctantly just a little sceptical about the free-hand approach to the provinces, and I should like to try to explain why. I know the contention that this would be a step toward clarifying which government is taxing us to do what; but I am also aware of the tendency of some provinces, especially the one in which I happen to live, Ontario, blatantly to neglect their underdeveloped and remote regions. It is the federal government which has expressed primary concern for regional disparities, and in my view this must apply to health care as well as to economic development.

Rather than seeing less involvement of the federal government in health care services, I would favour a more active presence, particularly in the delivery of health care services in the more remote and underdeveloped regions of Canada. At the present time, as all hon. members know, the federal government is responsible for the health care of native people living on reserves. If you asked any chief or band council whether they would like this responsibility transferred to the provinces, you would get a very quick and strongly worded negative response.

Why is this, Mr. Speaker? Because Indian people know that they are much better served, in most cases, than are their brothers and fellow citizens living off the reserve in a remote area and who come under provincial jurisdiction. Non-native people who witness the establishment of nursing stations on reserves and who know that there are regular visits of medical specialists and dentists to isolated Indian communities quite rightly ask the question: Why can't we have these same services, the same quality of services? It is an empty, hollow answer to tell them that they come under provincial jurisdiction, we are sorry. The indignant rebuttal to that by my constituents is: If that is the way it is, then we, too, want to be under the federal umbrella for health care services; we want Ottawa to provide us with access to health care services which the province refuses to do. To persons residing in more isolated areas where there is a serious lack of hospital facilities and health workers, accessibility simply means the availability of services. It is of very little benefit to a citizen to have publicly financed health insurance coverage if he has only very limited opportunity for reasonable access to necessary and appropriate health care when it is required.

Access to health care is now being identified in a number of charters on human rights. It is my understanding that the primary objective of the existing federal health insurance legislation was to ensure that all Canadians would have access to services, irrespective of their ability to pay and regardless of where they live.

One of the difficulties which I see in the motion that is now before the House is that it calls only for the federal government to issue a blank cheque to the provinces for health care services. It says nothing about insisting that the provinces do a better job of distributing these services fairly and equitably in order to get the money from the federal treasury which is being offered to them. This government has endeavoured to adopt a fairly high profile in doing something about regional economic disparity. I ask them now to adopt an equally high profile in seeing to it that regions like northern Ontario receive much more in the way of health care services and facilities. Leaving the field open to the provinces, giving the provinces a free hand, will likely mean that those who now have will get more, and the have-nots will still be no better off.

From time to time we hear much said about constitutional propriety as related to such responsibilities as health care. That is a fascinating academic diversion, but it does nothing to help the men, women and children who live on the expanding frontiers of Canada and who deserve at least as much as their urban cousins namely the right to medical attention and health care as and when it is needed. It is the federal presence in this field which can guarantee help to those who need it most. If the federal government is seeking to retreat from the health care field—and I hope that is not the case; I have read again the minister's speech and I am assured that it is not the case—if there is any tendency or temptation in this direction, then I urge every possible reconsideration. Instead, I make the plea for a more active, direct involvement by the federal government in this field. To leave the provinces free to use federal payments in any way they like for the development of health care programs will only mean hardship, particularly for those who live in the vast region of northern Ontario.

The Department of National Health and Welfare Act charges the minister of that department with the responsibility for all matters relating to the promotion and preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over whom the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction. In addition, there is to be co-operation with provincial authorities with a view to co-ordinating efforts made or proposed for preserving and improving the public health. I am not certain that there is a desire on the behalf of the federal government to retreat from this responsibility, but if that were so, then I would certainly oppose such a move. There is a need in Canada for the federal authority to become more closely involved with the provinces in the health care field; to co-operate more in efforts to improve public health; to take more initiatives, not less; to show more leadership and not draw back and give a free hand to a province like Ontario which is hardly aware of its own geography north of Sudbury, Sault Ste. Marie or west of Thunder Bay.

Since the Second World War, one of the most striking developments in the health care field in Canada has been the progressive involvement of the government. It is no longer accepted wisdom that medicine and government should never mix. The federal government's primary objective in the health field has been to promote and assist the development of essential services on a nationwide basis, the development of comparable standards of service across Canada, and to help make available the human, physical and financial resources required to provide these services. Much has been accomplished, and we do not need to review it all now.

This is not the time, however, to weaken the federal presence in the responsibility for health care; this is a time to strengthen it. To withdraw the federal presence and replace it only with tax points and other financial resources would be wrong. It would be much better, it seems to me, to remain an active participant and see that our 50 per cent share, or whatever it is, is being spent for the maximum benefit of Canadians and is fairly distributed.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has clearly stated that the basic standards of comprehensiveness, accessibility, universality and portability would be maintained under any new scheme of health financing. I only wish I could share his faith that in giving the provinces more freedom and flexibility the result will be better health services at less cost. Maybe that will be so for British Columbia or Manitoba—I do not know—but as one who comes from northern Ontario I can tell the House that we have absolutely no faith or confidence in the government which presently occupies the seat of power at Queen's Park. Our medical care premiums are among the highest in Canada, yet in vast stretches of the province of Ontario there is little or nothing in the way of health care services.

Whatever the financial arrangements may be that the minister will work out with the provinces, I urge this government to have a strong voice in seeing that the funds allocated are appropriately and equitably used by the provincial authorities.

Hon. Robert Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to enter into a debate with the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, except to say that it seems to me a good deal of his speech would have been more appropriately made to the legislature at Queen's Park rather than here.

I should like to address myself to some of the things the minister said. I am sorry he is not here. I am sure he has a valid reason for being out of the House. The minister took a pot-shot at me for being out of the House in the middle of the week. I am sure a pressing engagement has taken him from the House, but I am sorry he is not here. I would feel a little easier saying some of the things I intend to say if he was here to hear them.

An hon. Member: It couldn't be that important.

Mr. Stanfield: We will see how important it is. First let me say that the minister took exception to a comment I made on Wednesday in respect of his proposal, and made the charge that I had made comments without knowing what he had said. The minister has a tendency toward this kind of offhand, snide comment. Apparently he had forgotten that his office, which is much more courteous than he is, had sent me full documentation of the proposals. I had that documentation before me and was able to read and study it.

I may tell the minister through you, Sir, that I have had quite long experience in analysing proposals put forward by the Department of National Health, both here and in connection with my former responsibilities. Although the proposal here is complex, as has usually been the case, it does not take anybody with ten years' experience or more in analysing such proposals to see through them rather quickly. I am sure the distinguished member of the NDP who sponsored this motion was able to analyse the proposals in the same way. I do not take offence easily, but I resent the kind of stupid remark the minister made, when he does not even know what his own officials are doing as far as dispensing information is concerned.

It is very clear that the main purpose of the minister is to restrict federal financial responsibility in this area. That is the main purpose of this whole exercise, although it has been dressed up with a lot of talk about flexibility, and so on. I do not question the earnestness or the desire of the minister or his department to exercise the machinery which exists for controlling the growth of and the expenditure for these programs. I do not question their sincerity, but the whole purpose of this exercise is to limit the increase in the financial responsibility of this government. That is the main thing I want to say this afternoon, and that is why I suggest that any provincial government which accepts this proposal is out of its mind. I put it as simply and as bluntly as that.

The schemes which are in effect today were put forward by the federal government in the areas of hospitalization and medical care. There was no negotiation or discussion about essential matters. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) will recall very well, I am sure, that there was no give and take on any matter of consequence. The principles and the main features of these programs were laid down by the federal government, and that was that—the provinces either took them or left them.

Now the federal government has apparently made up its mind that it is not getting full value for the programs it laid out, and wants to restrict its financial liability. It talks about injecting flexibility into the programs but gives no indication at all as to how a province such as Nova Scotia, for example, can finance these measures and achieve flexibility. It is all very well to talk about building nursing homes and a whole scheme of institutions to take care of people, but you first must have the money to do that. For years this government would not even participate in cash grants for the construction of hospital beds. My hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands recalls all this well, as I recall it.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) talks about the federal contribution equalling 50 per cent of the total cost of these programs in future years—and he says it will—I have not the slightest confidence in his projections or his figures, because the whole point of the exercise is to restrict the growth of future responsibility. If that was not the point, the government would not be moving away from the 50-50 cost-sharing arrangement.

There is room for legitimate argument and discussion as to what the federal presence should be in respect of the administration and delivery of health programs, how much the federal government should be involved and how much the provincial governments should be involved. But there can be no room for argument about the responsibility of the federal government to participate fully in these financial responsibilities. The government is welshing on that aspect of the matter, Sir, and that is what angers me. It brought the provinces into these programs and it is now trying to welsh on its financial responsibility and its general responsibility to the Canadian people.

Now the government has introduced, for perhaps some kind of smokescreen, a proposed tax-sharing arrangement which even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) calculates—and I have no more confidence in what he says in 1973 than I had in what he said in 1972—would mean that even in 1977 the amount the provinces would receive under this arrangement would constitute only 75 per cent of the federal financial responsibility. Presumably that means that we would be well into the 1980s before these tax-sharing arrangements would have any real significance to the provinces. Are we to take up time in the House and in discussion between the federal government and the provinces, with all the problems which lie ahead in the 1970s talking about some kind of phony proposal which might possibly have some significance in the 1980s?

In the end we come right down to the fact that an adequate health delivery program is vitally important to every Canadian. There is no doubt about that. I refuse to be a party to any effort by the federal government to welsh on its responsibility and limit its risk, leaving the provinces to accept the full risk in a situation into which the federal government led the provinces, sometimes willingly and sometimes not so willingly.

Be that as it may, we are now operating under programs which the federal government says are not producing results commensurate with the amount of money being spent on them. I say, let the federal government work with the provinces to make the health delivery system more efficient and more valuable to the Canadian people, but let us not have the federal government, under some talk about flexibility and tax-sharing arrangements and guff like that, try to restrict its responsibility and let the provinces wrestle with an increasing financial load which will be felt by the wealthier provinces and which we know is very unfair to the poorer provinces. I wish the minister had not been in such a hurry to leave the House. I would have liked him to be here so that I could have told him personally of these things. If he does not read these comments I hope I will have another opportunity of putting them to him.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, most Canadians and most Members of Parliament have lived with the universal hospital and medical insurance plans which are in effect in every province in Canada for so long that they tend to forget what the situation was before we had them. They have eliminated the worry tremendous debt which could be, and was, incurred by Canadian citizens, and not just those in the lower income brackets, before we had this kind of system. I have read an article by the Washington correspondent of the New Republic which appeared in that magazine on February 10, 1973. He compares what happens in countries such as Canada, Great Britain and Finland, where there are insurance plans to take care of hospital and medical costs, with what happens in the United States. I wish to place some of his comments on the record in case some hon. members do not remember what happened a couple of years ago. He quotes from an NBC documentary and says:

> There was this lower-middle-income worker with a heart attack. The hospital took him in, thinking he was covered by California's state health insurance; he wasn't. He cashed his life insurance for $4000 and gave it to the hospital, but he was left with $8000 still to pay. The doctor told him to go home, take it easy, relax, don't worry about anything.

How could he help but worry? The article continues:

> A woman we know went to the hospital recently for an emergency check-up and chose a low-price room; she was discharged two days later—hospital bill $237.10. The American Hospital Association says a day in a hospital now averages $105.30. Health costs have shot up 40 per cent in four years.

That is the situation in the United States where there are no hospital or medical insurance plans. We have such plans in Canada because the CCF government of Saskatchewan, headed at the time by my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), did not wait for the other provinces or the federal government but implemented on its own a full hospital insurance plan and, later, a medical insurance plan. Then the federal government came forth with an offer to the provinces to pay half the cost of a hospital insurance plan provided it was universal.

I remember the opposition there was to that proposal from the provinces. I remember a former Conservative Premier of Manitoba, Mr. Roblin who at that time was the leader of the official opposition objecting violently to that proposal. According to him, all that was necessary was that the province of Manitoba pick up the tab for those people who could not afford to pay premiums into Blue Cross, the voluntary hospital plan. However, the people of Manitoba insisted on having a universal plan to cover hospital costs. Now we have it in every province.

I remember that when the Liberal government under Mr. Pearson made its proposal about universal medical insurance coverage and told the provinces it would share half the cost of the program, Premier Robarts, the Conservative Premier of Ontario, objected bitterly. He did not want the plan. However, he finally came into it not because he wanted the province to be part of a universal plan but because the people of Ontario said it was a good idea, particularly if 50 per cent of the cost was to be paid by the federal government. So Ontario and the other provinces came in.

We made a good beginning to this kind of program, but it was only a beginning. We still ought to be thinking about coverage for optical expenses, for dental expenses and for the cost of prescription drugs which are tremendously expensive. We certainly will not get the provinces to think about these things, even if Ottawa were to make such a proposal, because Ottawa is now saying to the provinces that it gave them a cost-sharing program for hospital and medical insurance and now it intends to get out and leave the provinces to carry the ball. Any provincial government which would think about co-operating with Ottawa to implement a denticare plan, an optical plan or a prescription drug plan, when Ottawa takes this approach to shared-cost programs, would have to be crazy.

The federal government is worried about the escalating cost of the present hospital and medical insurance plans. So it should be. Ottawa is no more worried than is every provincial government in this country because these costs are escalating. There is no questions about it, they are going up at a very rapid rate. So all governments are worried about what can be done. Just as Ottawa has been looking at the problem, the provincial governments have been looking at their plans to see what can be done. A number of suggestions have been made. Many of the suggestions which seem most likely to help reduce costs could be put into action very quickly by the provinces, except that Ottawa is not now committed to pay for alternative care.

Let me illustrate what I mean. The cost of hospitalization in one of our general hospitals is now running at between $65 and $90 a day per bed. If a person in any city in this country is hospitalized, no questions are asked; Ottawa pays half the costs for standard care. But many of these people, particularly after an emergency and following the acute stage of their illness, could be moved into a nursing home until they were ready to go home. Many of them could have some form of home care. Both of these types of care are substantially cheaper than the cost of having a person in a bed in a general hospital.

Why do the provinces not adopt such a plan? It is because even though it is cheaper, it is more expensive than 50 per cent of the costs of operating a general hospital, and Ottawa refuses to amend the legislation to pay 50 per cent of nursing home care or home care. The costs of medical insurance, that is, the amount going to doctors, have risen substantially year by year. They have risen whether or not the provinces agree to a formal increase in the rate.

Almost without exception there is an increase in the amount paid to doctors in every province, every year. I am not blaming the doctors. I am not saying the doctors, working the way they do, are charging too much, but we must consider whether there are not other forms of medical care which can be just as effective, or more effective than the present methods and will cost the community less. We should be looking at the possibility of using paramedical people who can do a great deal of the fairly routine work which doctors undertake.

The federal government commissioned Dr. Hastings of the University of Toronto to look at the whole question of medical care. Dr. Hastings made a report and recommended in it very strongly that we move on a voluntary basis toward a system of community health clinics. Some of the provinces—I know that my province of Manitoba is one of them—are very interested in encouraging the growth of community health clinics on a voluntary basis. There is no suggestion by anybody, that I know, that doctors would have to practice in a community health clinic or that patients would have to go to it, but on a voluntary basis the province of Manitoba, among others, is very interested in such clinics.

Is there any suggestion that Ottawa will really support community health clinics? If there is, I have not seen it. We are concerned, the provinces are concerned and the public is concerned about increasing costs. The public and the provinces want to slow down the rapidly increasing costs, but not a single province, regardless of what party forms the government, has agreed or will agree to the unilateral proposal made by Ottawa that it will limit the amount of the increase which it is prepared to give toward the payment of hospital and medical insurance plans to the amount of the increase in the gross national product.

It may be that the proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) would cover 50 per cent of the cost of hospital and medical insurance for the next five years. But what happens after five years? As costs continue to rise, the provinces will no longer be paying 50 per cent; they will be paying 60 per cent, 65 per cent or more. Every province will be hurt. The wealthy provinces, such as British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, can probably manage in one way or another. The people and the provinces who will be hurt are precisely those who can least afford to carry the costs of hospital and medical insurance.

Therefore I am amazed that a federal government which encouraged the provinces to go into hospital insurance, which forced the provinces to go into medical insurance, is now saying to the provinces: We are no longer prepared to honour the commitment we made to you when we urged this plan on you, that we would pay 50 per cent of the cost of these plans.

The proposal of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) cannot be accepted by the provinces. It is a proposal of which those ministers should be ashamed. While they have a right to be concerned about the costs of health services in this country, they have no right to renege on the promises and pledges they made to the provinces that the federal government would pay 50 per cent of the costs of hospital and medical insurance.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must say how puzzled I was after reading the motion moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), which reads as follows:

That this House disapproves the Government's proposal to retreat by stages from the present cost-sharing arrangements with respect to hospital and medical care programs.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if we should not read it as saying that his party denies to the provinces the responsibility of ensuring the management of health services. It is exactly as if we were denying the provinces the ability to manage their program themselves. And further on, this motion seeks, it seems, to restrict also the federal government's participation while urging that all health services be financed on a 50-50 basis. When one reads the statement made last Wednesday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and that of other provincial Ministers of Finance, one can readily see that the 50 per cent will be exceeded, as stated in the motion.

This motion, Mr. Speaker, is not justifiable because provincial governments are denied the opportunity of self-management and of ensuring themselves the management of health programs. What this government proposes in fact, Mr. Speaker, is very clearly stated in the release issued by the minister. It said that the purpose of the federal-provincial meeting was to draw up a new formula in order to determine the annual federal contribution to health services administered by the provinces, that this formula was designed to replace the present cost-sharing arrangement established under the Medical Care Act and the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and would give provincial administrations more flexibility in order to provide more efficient and cheaper health services, while making for reduced health care costs.

That, Mr. Speaker, the spirit of the program as introduced and prepared by the Minister of National Health and Welfare; this has nothing to do whatsoever with the motion introduced by the member of the New Democratic Party who wants that the provinces be denied the responsibility of managing this program.

As was seen, Mr. Speaker, and as was noted in the last few years the costs of medical care increased constantly year after year. One could read recently that those costs actually registered an increase of at least 14 per cent a year.

For the year 1973 or for the rest of the decade we should be mainly concerned with setting up a much more modern system which would provide Canadians in all provinces with much more adequate and cheaper health services.

It is in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, that the plan was introduced; it implements certain recommendations and especially those in the Harding report which, for example, deal with the establishment of community health centre networks to reduce the stay of patients in hospitals. A shorter hospitalization period would mean lower costs for the Canadian taxpayers and would make rehabilitation and nursing medical services much more accessible and at a much lower cost especially for those living in the rural areas of this country.

I am thinking particularly about the people in my riding who for a large part must drive several miles, over 50 in certain cases, to get medical care or hospitalization.

If they could go to community health centres located near their homes in their municipalities the cost of health care in Canada would be considerably reduced.

The Harding report recognized that such centres and services if well designed and administered would contribute greatly to reducing the cost of medical care as well as facilitate its access within a well integrated system. This is what I meant, Mr. Speaker, when I said that medical care would be much more accessible and could be provided cheaper than that administered in hospitals which several citizens cannot easily reach because they live far away from rural centres.

The proposals were described as very complex. Of course, the problem is also quite complex; there is no easy formula which would meet the needs and would be acceptable to all the provinces. We can already see some wavering or reluctance on the part of several provinces to accept the proposal. I think that they want to study the matter in greater detail, before passing judgment on the proposals which was not the case on the part of some hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, although the philosophy of the program has been accepted by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), he refuses to understand all the complexities or the mechanics of the whole program which has been put forward to the provinces.

Last Wednesday, the non. Minister of Finance listed the mechanics for the financing of the program and I should like to correct certain comments that were made earlier by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), the spokesman for the Social Credit Party of Canada, when he said, for example, that once again, it would be some kind of "big brother's" federalism where provincial governments would be subjected to some authority or dictatorship.

He quoted the formula—or part of it—which had been submitted, but without any further explanation. In fact, he omitted to go on and explain the mechanics of the tax proposal.

With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind hon. members of some mechanics as announced by the hon. Minister of Finance. He stated that as far as personal income tax was concerned, he would like it to be quite clear that the federal government, for reasons known to the House, will not reduce taxes through tax abatements. He suggests rather the establishment of new federal and provincial tax schedules; when the federal government will reduce its rates, the provincial authorities may collect the relinquished federal revenue by increasing their tax rates. The taxpayer's onus will not be increased, a detail which the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) has failed to point out.

The member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) referred to excise taxes levied on alcoholic beverages and cigarettes. I think that it is essential, Mr. Speaker, to read carefully page 3599 in Hansard of May 9 last. I quote:

> In the case of tobacco products, the repeal of federal excise levies would allow the provinces to increase provincial sales taxes on these goods by an equivalent amount without increasing tobacco prices. The provinces would thus acquire additional revenue equal to the amount of federal revenue foregone.

Of course we are not giving up that taxation field in order to avoid our responsibilities or a reduction in such tax revenu, believing or foreseeing a reduction of those taxes on account of a general decrease in cigarette and tobacco consumption.

The hon. member for Hillsborough said that he had given up smoking, just like me. Like him I will say that I have not decided yet to give up drinking. I would like to reassure him on the government's intentions as concerns excise taxes on tobacco products and alcoholic beverages which are not likely to decrease in the coming years. If one looks at the development programs of the industries engaged in the production of alcoholic beverages or cigarettes, one can see, Mr. Speaker, that those industries do not expect either a decrease in their sales.

According to the proposal of the hon. Minister of Finance, the province of Quebec through tax abatement or opting out, already enjoys 16 points. It administers and finances a good part of that program and, as far as I know, it is not the worse for it. I believe the proposal that was made to other provinces, Mr. Speaker, the proposed program closely resembles that which the province of Quebec has known since 1970 and, as far as I know, the citizens of my province are not the worse for it.

I will quote again what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said on May, as reported at page 3600 of Hansard:

> Of course, I do not want to suggest that provincial governments would have to increase their tax rates—

—as the hon. member for Roberval suggested, this new program would lead in the provinces to a tax increase in order to finance this program. But this is out of question, Mr. Speaker. I keep on quoting:

> . . . by the precise amount of the federal cut. Provinces can raise their levies more or less than the federal reduction, as they see fit, and they obviously could alter the mix between personal income tax or their taxes on alcohol and tobacco.

In the proposal, the government commitments go a bit further and I quote:

> Provincial governments would receive basic per capita grants from the federal government. And if required, the provinces would get further federal risk sharing payments should they spend at a rate above that of the growth of the basic federal grant.

These last lines contain the important part of the proposal. We can see there, Mr. Speaker, all the flexibility of the proposal which has been put to the provincial ministers, a flexibility which will allow the implementation of much more economical and efficient procedures for the provision of health services.

The hon. member for Roberval said that the provinces will not get anything; well, I cannot see the basis for such an argument. If this is really what comes out of the proposals, that the provinces will not get anything out of them, all they have to do is to turn down the proposal, Mr. Speaker, and keep on getting the existing 50 per cent.

I am coming back to the proposal brought forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). He starts out by congratulating the minister, saying that since taking over the department he has put forth tremendous energy and talent to seek a solution whereby health care will become less costly for Canadians and more readily available. And a little later on he accuses the minister of trying to evade his responsibilities and the federal government of trying to shirk its responsibilities by withdrawing from the program. Such is not at all the spirit or the philosophy of the program when one sees the commitment by the federal government. The minister said it would amount to $1.1 billion over the next six years, not based on the experience of the past two or three years, Mr. Speaker, but on a projection over the next six years. And in addition to that amount another $600 million is to be provided as a trust fund to assist provinces if, for instance, as indicated by the Minister of Finance in his statement, all these amounts should prove adequate.

I do believe there is no occasion to mobilize the finance ministers of the provinces and to stir up the concern of Canadians as to the fate of the health services programs offered to Canadians. In my opinion, health services or health care available to Canadians since 1970 are the best of any offered in industrialized contries. I shall of course make an exception regarding socialist countries, Mr. Speaker, as I should not like to start off a comparison between our services and those offered in socialist countries. However, comparing with western European countries and industrialized countries which respect private enterprise, it will readily be seen, Mr. Speaker, that we have an unparalleled system.

[English]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in my view the delivery of humane, adequate and efficient medical health care services will be one of the most important, if not the most important issue facing the Canadian people in the next few years.

[Translation]

Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that tomorrow morning the aldermen of a town council were to declare it a law that the town hall is to give free bread to each family, and the next morning at 9 o'clock they went and drew up this law; the law would exist, but nobody in the city administration would telephone to the bakery to bake more bread. That, Mr. Speaker, is quite simply what we have done throughout Canada with medical services; the federal and provincial Parliaments have voted billions of dollars for medical services for most Canadians, and especially for poor and aged Canadians, but these services do not exist at all.

[English]

It is my contention that medicare in Canada today is purely a financial mechanism, as many members in the House today have already pointed out. It involves the worst kind of federal-provincial joint program. The Liberal governments' consistent approach to medicare has been one involving half socialism and half free enterprise. That is, I believe, why the NDP in Ontario would not, in their brave way, support some of the Liberal plans for that province. The program is half socialism and half free enterprise, and embodies the worst of both worlds. It simply does not work.

The same government that pours millions of dollars annually into this non-system refuses, through the health resources fund we have mentioned today, to make that system effective so that it may benefit people at the local community level. When medicare legislation was introduced into the House of Commons we knew that the only possible way the federal government could implement efficient medical health services at the local community level was by supporting in this House the concept of a health resources fund. What happened? No sooner was the health resources fund established than Treasury Board reduced it. Therefore we wonder why we are faced with the kind of problems which we face today.

What has the federal government done? It has poured billions of dollars, in the form of income supplements, into the non-system while at the same time maintaining a static supply of medical personnel and services. No wonder these services for many Canadians from coast to coast, for the disadvantaged living in rural areas and those living in the cores of cities, have literally collapsed. As hon. members have already mentioned, in many rural and innercity areas, low-income and aged people are not getting any service whatsoever. As they line up for diagnostic services and treatment I am reminded of the bread lines during the depression.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, quite often in the country it is easier to get a vet to see to animals than it is to get a doctor to see to human beings.

[English]

In many rural areas there are no paramedical personnel, no community clinics and no primary care doctors. We warned the government 15 years ago that we would need these facilities. Often it is easier to obtain services of a veterinarian to treat your cat, dog, cow or horse than it is to obtain the services of a doctor to treat your family. That is the situation we are in. This government was warned about the problem when it introduced medicare, and now it is trying to draw away from its responsibilities.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we have in the—

An hon. Member: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Grafftey: Excuse me, but the hon. member has already spoken; I have only 15 minutes to speak about something important.

In the province of Quebec we have Mr. Castonguay's recommendations, which recommend the setting up of community centres and paramedical groups, with more general practitioners and more researchers in our medical schools. But what are the federal government's responsibilities in this field?

Let us take for example the rural area that I represent, Brome-Missisquoi. Before there was medicare in the constituency of Brome-Missisquoi, there were seven permanent doctors; in the town of Farnham, a town without a hospital or a community centre, there were four permanent doctors ten years ago, before medicare. What do we have now, Mr. Speaker? There is not one doctor in the whole constituency of Brome-Missisquoi, and there is just one in the town of Farnham.

[English]

This is going on all across Canada.

An hon. Member: Come, now.

Mr. Grafftey: Please do not interrupt. I know how frustrating it is for the hon. member to support the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), but I ask that he please stop prattling.

Doctors have tended to practice in the hospital environment, and I am not blaming them entirely. I am blaming the federal government for the attitude it has taken with regards to co-operating with the provinces in order to effect the efficient delivery of medical and health care services. We have recommended time and again that the health resources fund must be backed up, voted on and supported by this House if the federal authority is to play its proper role in supporting medical and health care services.

I refer to what my leader has already said. Any federal withdrawal must be accompanied by a guarantee of transfer of tax powers to the provinces to allow them to maintain their level of spending, as well as a guarantee that the poorer provinces will not be short-changed by federal government withdrawal. This must not happen. The system has already collapsed for the poor and the aged who have no mobility to get into hospital centres. It must not collapse for all Canadians and it is bad enough now because of lack of federal responsibility in this regard.

The federal health resources fund must be expanded immediately to humanize health services. In particular, there must be more funds for medical research, training, primary care visits and paramedical assistance to develop community clinics, especially in disadvantaged areas. What does a town in my area do with medicare payments when there are no services? Ten years ago in Brome county we had seven full-time doctors, and four in Farnham. Now we do not have any in Brome county, and only one in Farnham. The paramedical people, the primary care physicians and the community clinics that we were told we must have 15 years ago, still are not there.

One cannot imagine what this means to low-income, disadvantaged Canadians and aged people whom medicare was supposed to help in the first place. A cruel hoax has been perpetrated upon them. Now the minister says we are going to withdraw from the program. The Minister of National Health and Welfare came before the Canadian people with a smokescreen, an unintelligible proposition which in effect means: We have pushed you into this program. Now sink or swim. This is irresponsibility of the first order which we cannot tolerate for one minute.

Medical and health care services constitute just one of the many challenges which are not being met by federalism as now practised in Canada.

Mr. Béchard: Is that from your book?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes, but what does that really add to this debate?

[Translation]

Yes, this is in my book, but your remarks are not all that intelligent. I am aware of your frustration, but keep quiet. In the province of Quebec, it is a very important matter, believe me.

[English]

As I already mentioned, this is the worst kind of joint program. Every time the Minister of National Health and Welfare stands in the House we are told this matter is one of provincial responsiblility. But who initiated it? If any performance underlines the fact that we need basic modernization in this area, the performance today by the Minister of National Health and Welfare underlines it.

Like the challenge of the environment, transportation and living space in our cities, education and all the rest, medical and health care services test the very viability of North American federalism. If Canadian medicare schemes continue merely to be a financial mechanism the complete breakdown of services will come about sooner than we care to think. If doctors' incomes continue to soar, government authorities will have to put them on salaries. If doctors and medical manpower will not go into underserviced areas, surely a decent and humane state has an obligation to make sure medical personnel is equitably deployed.

Public costs mean that public resources should be used to influence the operation of systems that are essential for the health needs of all the people—not just the rich and the advantaged but all the people. Costs will continue to skyrocket if governments, working with the public and medical profession, do not assume their responsibilities in determining that the plant, personnel and services are made ready. If they are not, what was the money voted for in the first place? Was it to make doctors more and more rich, and to make the system collapse?

In my view we have confused our priorities. We have devoted a great deal of effort to the production of material goods, and little effort to the care of the people who produce them. We have rushed ahead with cars, roads, factories and new food technology without really knowing where we are going and why. As a critic of health care services in North America, I say that our health care services are in appalling disarray. It is not good enough for the federal government to say they are spending billions of dollars, putting it into the system and taking no responsibility whatsoever for the effective working and implementation of that system.

We have been faced with real problems, a multitude of them, and we have thrown up our hands in despair. Our society, in terms of decent medical and health care services, suffers from deep social wounds—yet our approach is to put band-aids on them. what the minister suggested today is just another series of band-aids. We are only tinkering with parts of the non-system. That is worse than nothing. We need major surgery. I hope the government recognizes this fact before it is too late.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By agreement, the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) concedes his place to the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie).

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) for making it possible for me to say a few words before catching my plane.

Mr. Isabelle: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is not the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont), but the hon. member for Hull.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The point is extraordinarily well taken and the Chair apologizes from the bottom of its mistaken heart.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I too thought you were mistaken. I welcome the opportunity to speak on this matter of health costs and the negotiations going on between the federal government and the provinces regarding paying for health costs. This debate is long overdue.

As one who has spent my life in the health care field, I have observed much of the discussion and the results of the negotiations of governments in this area. It is perhaps understandable that, with the rise of social consciousness, all citizens are entitled to the very best health services and, with rising affluence, to afford more elaborate and more expensive health care.

There has been peculiarly little dialogue on the fact that health care has definite limits of expansion. Politicians and the public have never accepted the realization that there are no bounds to health care. The whole of the national economy could be devoted to health care and there would still be many worthwhile projects undone. I once knew a doctor who had been the personal physician of Pancho Villa and rode with him on his campaigns of civil insurrection in Mexico. To have one's private physician is as close to complete medical care as one can arrive at. But Pancho Villa obviously lacked many other things in the health care field that he might have had, such as hospitals, drugs, and so on.

I believe that the intrusion of the federal government into health care, welfare and, to a lesser extent, the educational field has been one of the very divisive factors in Canadian life. The Fathers of Confederation, very wisely, I think, and displaying much more forward looking ideas than Canadian governments of the past decade, reserved for the provinces health, welfare and education. Perhaps it was not foresight but merely an accident. In a practical way, this was a very farsighted, almost clairvoyant look into the future. They recognized, much more than recent politicians, that essential personal services to the individual are involved. Perhaps in the area of education and welfare, at least in a dollar way, there can be reasonable standards applied so that the costs remain within bounds and that individuals, regardless of where they live in the country, may enjoy reasonable equality of service.

I make no apology for advocating strongly that the provinces must be charged with the responsibility of administration in these three areas, particularly in the health care field. Health care is a personal service and there is an enormously wide variation in what is considered good health care. Basically, to those who are workers in the health care field all citizens must be treated as individuals. This means reasonable and early access to health care personnel. It means, generally, the interplay of one person with one individual doctor who must take an adequate history and conduct an examination which requires time, skill and, above all, an intense preoccupation with the patient. At the hospital level it means reasonable access when needed, and care by competent people. Unfortunately, under the so-called free—for the patient—medical services, all of these things become almost impossible to achieve because of the vast pressures at the entry to the health care system, the physician's office and the hospital admitting room.

I would like to expand much further on this important aspect, but in the limited time available perhaps I should say a word about the financing of health care costs. I think the 50-50 health sharing formula is the worst type of furmula to finance health care that could have been devised. It encourages a vast proliferation of bureaucracy and a tendency for administrators outside the health care field to move in and tell the health care workers how services should be run, and even which services will be provided. This situation came about largely because the federal government under the Pearson administration assumed the "holier than thou" attitude that they alone were capable of ensuring that citizens received adequate health care.

The federal government of the day assumed that all provincial governments were suspect and would not provide proper health care or use the money wisely. It was a sanctimonious, self-righteous and entirely uncalled for attitude because it assumed that provincial governments were much less capable and much less responsive to their citizens' needs than the federal government. The 50-50 cost sharing basis fulfilled a bureaucratic dream, because executive people in the health care field are great empire builders. Each and every person in the provincial departments of health had his own idea of what would be good, and there certainly is no end to the many good programs; indeed, all programs have some value. There was almost an irresistible urge to spend money and institute programs so it could be shown that their provinces had instituted programs; and of course no province could be left behind in instituting its own particular program.

Health care costs have been escalating much more rapidly than the country can afford. Fortunately, it is now being recognized that there are limits to what can be done. Perhaps the organ transplant era has shown that if this practice becomes widespread, nearly everyone could benefit during a lifetime but it would require an enormous number of staff, buildings and equipment for this relatively small field of medicine—and at what cost! I think the public is now willing to accept that there is a limit to health care services, that health care is a purely personal thing and that what the state is able to provide for the individual may not be nearly all that the individual would desire. I am sure that having arrived at this conclusion we can better deal with the financial aspect of health care. Until there is general acceptance that we cannot do everything, there will not be public acceptance of putting limits on health care spending.

There is great discussion taking place at this time in connection with health care delivery systems. All health care systems carry certain advantages and disadvantages. I cannot mention that the president of the American Medical Society, reporting on an inspection of health delivery systems in European countries and the Soviet Union said he was struck, not so much by their differences from the American system as by the number of complaints about the shortcomings of their systems. In other words, every health care system attracts an enormous amount of criticism.

We are now involved in community health care and community clinic projects, but these still depend on a physician taking time and skill and having his options open to give health care advice. It is doubtful there will be any material improvement in the over-all delivery of health care, although these developments could have a certain limited application. It takes time to see patients, and it seems doubtful that there would be any more time in a community clinic than under any other system.

The attempt by the federal government to give provincial governments more flexibility and responsibility and to work out satisfactory financial arrangements with them is long overdue. The federal government must get out of these 50-50 cost-sharing programs which are an invitation to overspending and poor programming. Federal politicians must leave it to provincial governments to set up standards on the basis of what they feel their citizens desire.

There remains the general fear among certain disadvantaged provinces that their citizens would be short-changed because of a low regional economic base. I should think satisfactory formulae can be devised to allow such provinces to give their people care comparable to that available in other provinces. In any case, I feel it is difficult to set standards in the health care field with any degree of accuracy, and I have found that most so-called standards do not mean a great deal.

The latest federal-provincial conference ended prematurely this week and the provincial finance ministers have spurned the federal government's proposals to get out of these shared-cost fields. Whether they did this so as to have a bargaining tool, or whether the conference was, indeed, a failure, it is generally considered that the federal proposals are very complex and open to a great deal of uncertainty as to what might actually happen before payments finally settle down around 1980. As described in the Globe and Mail, it was "a fearfully complicated transitional means of payment" with uncertainty lasting for a decade, leaving the provinces six additional points of income tax, the revenue from excise tax and duties on tobacco and alcohol.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has said the package would amount to the equivalent of 20.8 income tax points as these points produce revenue at present, and I think this is important. But Ottawa did not turn over 20.8 tax points, because these tax points will earn more and more money each year. Ottawa really would like to have control over spending.

These three programs were initiated by Ottawa over the objections of several of the provinces, and they were negotiated in areas which the constitution gives to the provinces. The health minister has finally recognized, on behalf of the government, that the provinces have to establish their own priorities and that there should only be minimal national standards. Canada is a very large and regional country. In the health care field Ottawa has been barging around deciding what is best for all. It may well be that the method of rebating federally-collected income tax to the provinces is not the best way of proceeding, and that changes in the provincial income tax system will give a truer view of our problems.

Before lunch today the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) indicated that Canada had a good supply of doctors. However, I would point out that half the doctors in this country came from overseas during the last two decades. Many of the countries from which they came could ill afford to spare them or educate them. Accordingly, we have been looked upon as something of a pariah among western countries for having taken these highly educated people away from their own lands.

My view is that the supply of doctors will not be good in the future, because as time goes on there will be a reduction in the number of young people entering universities to prepare for the profession. Medical training is long and arduous, and those who have been through it sometimes wonder whether it is worth it. If the minister believes the supply of doctors is being maintained, I suggest he should examine this question further.

Health Care

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): At last, we are going to hear something sensible.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, I find it very interesting that such important subjects as the motion put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) can be dealt with in the House of Commons. It gives us the opportunity to discuss in particular hospital costs, health care costs in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy for anybody to make much of a relatively recent problem, but its causes have not been analyzed and no attention has been paid to the problem of increased health care costs in Canada. I know that we are the second country in the world where costs rose quite sharply—right after the United States—since we spend 6.8 per cent of our gross national product on health care.

But when one wonders why health costs increased so much, one should make a much more detailed analysis than those I have seen up to now. For many years, in fact, little planning has been done in the field of medicine. It was everyone for himself.

I think this is where we were wrong. I remember that, at least in the province of Quebec—and I believe the same problem existed in other provinces—hospital workers were very poorly paid. I remember that almost anybody hired to do any kind of work with the sick. Maybe it was all right at that time and the matter of salary was not very important. Indeed, it was in the thirties, in the difficult years of the depression.

Anyway, we still have this old concept and when suddenly came prosperity, hospital workers automatically asked for higher wages. I cannot blame them but that really increased considerably the cost of health care in Canada. It is true that physician fees have slightly increased also, but we must think that the medical profession spends a lot of time looking after Canadians in need of their services. Of course, if a physician works 10 or 15 hours a day, he is doing a tremendous amount of work. We know that many physicians are hard workers. Certainly they make more money than those who work only 2 or 3 hours a day.

It is a very difficult profession and because I have been a physician for 25 years, I know what a great physical effort is required to carry out this unending work.

Today, it seems that if health costs are increasing it is because politicians failed to take their responsibilities or maybe they failed to listen to those responsible for health services in Canada. I remember that a physician was always considered as a poor administrator. It may be true but he is the one who predicted that we will have in Canada an escalation of medical needs which would seem unbelievable, because if those needs keep on increasing at the present rate, I think that by year 2000 all the money in Canada will be used for that purpose.

I will not give a historical account of what happened in the field of health care since Confederation. It is a most interesting question and I ask all those unfamiliar with the health care and social security programs implemented in Canada to look into the matter. It is quite interesting and points to the shortcomings and the reasons for the current situation.

The medical associations of Canada have often suggested what should be done to avoid this escalation, namely to build hospitals for convalescents and the chronically ill. I think that if we did this, we would reduce by 25 per cent hospital costs in Canada. Unfortunately, nobody ever thought of that. Politicians have other concerns. For instance, let us consider what happened in Quebec where it was decided to remove the iron bars from the windows of a psychiatric hospital because they were unsightly and because politicians said that it looked like a prison. Should we lock up poor sick people in hospitals that look like prisons? So, the bars were removed and consequently last week three patients jumped through a window. They were not killed but are in serious condition.

This is what happens when politics meddles in a field such as this one—and this happened recently in Quebec, at the Saint-Michel-Archange hospital. Perhaps the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) might check this over the weekend.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, if we are to reduce the cost of health care, we must do something practical, concrete, that is build hospitals for the chronically ill and convalescents.

When a patient is cured or recovering in a hospital, he must of necessity spend some time convalescing. For various reasons—I do not want to go into that now—he cannot leave the hospital on the seventh, sixth or fifth day. Why could he not spend that time, perhaps even a week, elsewhere to convalesce, until he is back on his feet and can resume his normal occupation? But today there are complications which impose a heavy financial burden on the government in view of the large number of people admitted to hospital these days.

Let us take the case of pensionners who are hospitalized at age 78 or 80. If science continues to make progress, I think we will live to be older and older for better or for worse. I think that the average life expectancy in Canada is now 72 and it will certainly go up within the next decade.

So why do we have to hospitalize older people who are prone to catching pneumonia, for instance, or any other similar illnesses which normally do not require them to be confined to a hospital? But because of their ill health, because of their physical state which is deteriorating, they have to be hospitalized. But the fact is that at a certain point, for one reason or another, they cannot be returned to their families. They cannot be returned home because they cannot more around or are suffering from deficiencies due to their illness. So we have to find a place for them to stay.

I know perfectly well that in my riding, for instance, in Sacred Heart Hospital there are many patients who should not be confined to hospital beds which cost $60 or $75 a day when normally they should be in institutions where the costs are $12 and $13 a day. I think we should give much more consideration to that problem.

The questions of cost-sharing is not new. The federal government has always paid its share. That we may want to withdraw might make sense because provinces each have their own priorities. But I would not want our withdrawal from those plans to result in the balkanization of Canada. It is absolutely essential that the federal government show leadership and say, O.K., we are going to withdraw gradually over a certain number of years when you will become entirely self-sufficient, provided that criteria and standards have been set up to prevent the citizen of the province of Quebec from getting treatment in New Brunswick or Ontario, or the citizen of Ontario in Saskatchewan.

Remember the hospitalization problems that arose between the cities of Ottawa and Hull when people from Ottawa would go to Hull for treatment and vice versa. It would be a pity if that became the rule throughout Canada, and we ended up with ten different plans, which would result in moral suffering for many people.

People say that doctors make a lot of money—and it is an easy thing to say—if they work hard, of course they will make money. But if not, they do not make money. It is easy to say. In fact, it is just a smoke-screen. People say that doctors are getting too rich, saying for example that a doctor in Quebec earned $43,000 doing urine tests. Now, I do not know what this doctor actually did, but it seems to me that he cannot have done anything else but urine tests, Mr. Speaker.

In any case, there are always exceptions. There are fools in every profession, maybe more perhaps among politicians. Let us say that there are fools everywhere. We must not get excited over the fact that a doctor is earning $200,000, $100,000 or $30,000 a year. If he earnes $200,000, he is going to pay income tax and the money will come back to the government, which can then redistribute it to the provinces for them to run their hospitals.

To my mind, the problem does not lie there.

I was listening to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) who quoted his book. I cannot quote from mine: I have yet to write it. But, in any event, he complained about the shortage of doctors. There will always be a shortage of doctors, Mr. Speaker, because . . .

● (1620)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. If it is the wish of the House, he may continue. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Isabelle: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, as well as my colleagues. This is almost Christian charity, because I would like to insist on one specific point. Some complain about the lack of doctors. In Canada, there is one doctor for 826 citizens. In the USSR, there is one doctor for 413 citizens. But if we really dig deep in the statistics, we realize the situation is not nearly as serious as it would seem. In the province of Quebec, everyone lives either in Montreal or in Quebec City. It is not possible to remove the doctors from Montreal. To my mind, there are too many doctors in that city, as well as in Quebec City. There are quite a few there. They should go elsewhere. Doctors should be conscripted, so to speak; they should be told: You are coming out of the university; you will practice for two years where there is a shortage of doctors, then you can come back to the city.

This applies with regard to specialization; no one specializes on coming out of the university. One does not become a blacksmith after a few courses at a technical school. One must practice medicine to become aware of all its advantages and disadvantages to know how to practice and how to take care of the human being. It is important. One does not treat people like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi said. There are too many animals or too many veterinarians in his riding, I don't know. It is easier to obtain veterinarians than doctors.

Mr. Speaker, concerning specialization, the provinces are responsible to see about it. If they do nothing, then we must act. That is why every doctor should practice for three or four years before "embalming" himself in a specialty. If there was such a program, maybe we would maintain equal distribution between those who normally specialize and those who do not and would go as doctors in needy regions. I think this is what we should do.

The third step that should be taken to obtain more doctors, would be to prod universities and medical colleges which have done almost nothing since Canada exists. They are beginning to react a little because they have been prompted a little by medicare and other legislation. They are more careful than before. We should urge universities to lower the standards of admission which are set at about 80 per cent. If you have not obtained 80 per cent in science—not philosophy or catechesis but pure sciences—you cannot be accepted in medicine. What does that mean? It simply means that if you are admitted at medical school with 80 per cent, you are almost a genius. In medicine, so much is not necessary. We badly need people who want to work, tend patients and do something about health care in Canada.

Indeed, anyone cannot be accepted in medical school, but it is also true that current criteria are much too strict and those supermen who complete their studies with 80 per cent all want to become specialists, even psychiatrists. This is another matter which should perhaps be more closely considered, Mr. Speaker.

If we continue to increase the number of psychiatrists, as it has been happening for the past few years, we will be asking questions. We will be wondering whether we are in the right country, Mr. Speaker.

If the provinces are not astute enough to recognize the real problems which have given rise to today's high costs, I think that we should provide leardership and tell them: This is what we are going to do; we will give you some money, the methods may be altered according to your priorities, but the program, the basic system will remain the same.

● (1630)

If we act otherwise, it is the balkanization, the end of Canada as regards this program and others. We speak of the general practitioner, Mr. Speaker, when he made deliveries for $5, nobody spoke about him. Deliveries went from $10 to $25. This was expensive, this was frightening, only a specialist should have asked so much; at the time, we did not have any. Some were trained; they ask for $225 or $250 and it is not better.

At any rate, nobody spoke about them when they rendered service and now, if things continue the same way, we will find—the English word is probably more accurate—a sort of disincentive, a kind of non-stimulant to work as doctors. I do not know of any doctors who are now very enthusiastic about our laws on social security; maybe it is because we went too far. At any rate, if we want to reduce the costs of health care in Canada, we must opt for or against the programs. As far as I am concerned, we should opt out but we should keep essential bases so that everyone is treated the same way in Canada. To this end we should not put the cart before the horse; doctors must be trained. The approach is overhasty. Our medical personnel must be trained, after which the program can be considered. It is all very well to say that we want to train paramedical staff. I have no objection to a nurse, or anyone else, taking my blood pressure, but when it comes to having midwives officiating at confinements, which is still acceptable at a pinch, and is done in other countries, if any complications develop the doctor must be called, or else they can call the blacksmith, the farmer experienced in calving.

In my opinion the approach to the problem has been inadequate. Time should be laken to think over the problem, instead of practicing demagogy and bandying words one does not quite know the meaning of. It would be much more simple to give the problem intelligent consideration and to define it. The problem of excessive increase of medical care does not rest with the provinces, nor with the federal government. Increasing salaries will not bring about a great change. No hearing has been given as yet to those who are responsible for health care in Canada, it is as simple as that. I may be said to be mistaken, that would not be a novelty, but it might be well to really take into consideration the thoughts of Jules Verne, and see how right he was.

[English]

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to support the motion put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) which reads as follows:

> That this House disapproves the government's proposal to retreat by stages from the present cost-sharing arrangements with respect to hospital and medical care programs and calls upon the government to fund all health services on a 50-50 basis and to expand the health resources fund to enable the provincial governments to improve their health services.

I support this motion in light of the federal government's proposal to limit for the next five years its contribution to the provinces in the field of health care. This plan would limit the federal government's contribution and contain an escalation clause tied in with the GNP. It would guarantee 6 per cent of personal income taxes, revenue from the excise taxes and, ironically, the taxes on alcohol and tobacco, to promote health care in the provinces.

The provincial governments have already stated their objection to this plan. Our party, and many speakers from the Conservative party have expressed their opposition. We believe that this program would limit financial spending for medical care, with the result that there would be an end to hope of any co-ordinated national health policy and the end to any progressive changes which are essential in this field. Secondly, it would mean that the poorer provinces would fall far behind those provinces which can afford to expand their health care services.

What has prompted this proposal of the federal government? It seems to me one can reason that the government either believes Canadians are so well off in the health care system which now exists that there is no need for expansion of services, or that the Liberal government, despite its high-sounding phrases, is not fundamentally committed to the concept of government responsibility for health care in the nation as a whole. In other words, perhaps the federal government is attempting to pass the buck to the provinces. I suspect the motive of the government is the latter.

Are we so well off in regard to health care that the federal government can wash its hands and say that now the provinces must look after it. Canadians spend, on average, $260 per capita for hospital and medical care, dentistry and prescription drugs. We are spending more and more on health care, but there is not a corresponding increase in the quality of our health services. One has only to think of the fate of the family doctor and the queues of people in hospital emergency waiting-rooms who are waiting for services which they so desperately need. Are the poor so well off that they do not need extended health care services? Families on low income and the poor of this land may still have to pay a health premium, because some provincial governments are not enlightened enough to include this in the over-all income tax policy. Thank goodness there are three New Democratic provincial governments which have already abolished the premium for health care.

What about the children in this country who have dental problems? Are we to ignore them and say that we do not need to expand health care services in this field? We should consider the cost to families which try to provide proper dental care for their children. When children have poor teeth, their health is affected and sometimes their school work as well. Not only is there the cost of dental care, but also the problem of service. In my area of northern Ontario, this service is sadly lacking. Ours is one of the richest provinces, but communities near mine such as Thessalon and Blind River are without dental care and proper medical services. These are moderately sized towns. What is the situation in respect of the smaller, isolated communities further north which cannot even obtain temporary dental coaches to visit the community to help the people solve their dental problems?

Are pensioners so well off under the provincial health schemes that no improvement is needed in this area? Can they afford eyeglasses, dentures or cardiac pacemakers? The other day I spoke to a pensioner who pointed to his ears and said he was wearing $300 in each year. He had to bear that financial expense from his old age security pension. Is the problem in respect of drug costs so small that the federal government does not see the need for adequate reform and financial help? Canadians spend $300 million annually on prescription drugs, yet how many people can afford them, especially those with low income and those on pension? Canada, unfortunately, has the highest drug prices in the world, due to the drug manufacturing industry which is very monopolistic and lacks competition, and to the lack of adequate federal legislation.

How, in light of these problems, can the federal government say that things are all right and that it now intends to withdraw from the financial commitment it assumed in the past? How can it say there is no need for a national plan to effectively increase the health care standards in the country, and that it intends to leave this field to the provinces? There is much to be done, and I am afraid that if we leave it, to the provinces we may have no guarantee that each province will make health care its number one priority.

We know that today provinces are beset with all kinds of costs related to things such as roads, job programs, and so on. Perhaps the richer provinces will be able to get by and expand their medical care programs. I have in mind provinces such as Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. However, when we look at the record of the Conservative government in Ontario, I have my doubts about that province. But what of the poorer provinces, especially those in the Maritimes, and Quebec? The result is that if they are lucky they will be able to maintain the services they have, but may not be able to expand into areas where Canadians need some aid.

What happens to the concept of federalism which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) so fondly speaks about? How can we end the inequities which exist between the east and west coasts if we have a national health care plan which relies on the provinces to do the best they can with the finances available? I consider it a national disgrace that a country as wealthy as Canada cannot even match the health schemes of some of the poorer western European countries such as the Scandinavian countries, Britain and even Israel. There is need for effective action. There is need for federal government financing for medical care in this country.

The first thing that is needed is a comprehensive, fully publicly-financed medical care program covering not only hospital and doctor's services but also dental costs, private duty nurses, therapists and paramedical people, as well as a program that will deal comprehensively with optical care and ambulance service. Second, there is need for financial assistance to the provinces for the building of more community health clinics. I represent a constituency that was a pioneer in this field. It took the labour movement to get it under way. A health clinic was established to promote preventive care for people before they had need of a doctor or a hospital.

More funds are needed for hospital construction in the provinces. A rich province such as Ontario now is cutting back on its hospital construction program. It is here that there is need for more federal financial aid. Third, we need a program to reduce the cost of prescription drugs in this country. We should establish a Crown corporation to manufacture and distribute generic drugs in competition with private manufacturers, in order to help bring down the high cost of drugs.

Fourth, we need a system of cash benefits for sickness, to compensate for loss of income through illness or accident not covered by workmen's compensation. Fifth, there is need for more financial assistance to the provinces for the education of doctors, dentists and paramedical personnel. I think that is an area which is neglected. If we had more paramedical personnel, they could be handling some cases of sickness rather than tying up the time of high-priced doctors. All these areas need to be expanded, and I cannot see how we can do it under the proposal of the federal government that has been so wisely rejected by the provinces and most members of the House.

In conclusion may I say that too much needs to be done to cut back now. We need a comprehensive national health program, and we need federal aid to the provinces on a continuing basis. We need the guarantee of the federal government to pay 50 per cent of provincial health costs. We hear much about the rights of Canadians these days, but there is no more basic right than the right to good health. I say to the Liberal government that it cannot shun its responsibility in this field and hope to retain the confidence of the Canadian people.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by referring to this motion and the comments of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) because he was the most recent speaker. I would say that there are really three elements involved in this motion. The first is that there is regret expressed by the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), that we are going to change the present cost-sharing arrangements in respect of the medicare and the hospital care program.

I can understand his concern in respect of that matter, because they have been very successful programs, but at the same time I hope all hon. members will bear in mind that the motivation is only to bring forward suggestions for change in the cost-sharing arrangements and in the formulae in regard to these two programs. The motivation for change is brought about primarily because of a series of federal-provincial conferences on this subject which have taken place over the last 30 months. Constant attention has been brought to bear on this subject by the provinces and by the federal government, and there is a wide degree of unanimity in respect of the need to adjust the formulae to allow the provinces to have an input in terms of their own priority in respect of health care services.

It is very important to underline the fact that in the present arrangements the provincial governments are forced almost by necessity—because we share on a 50-50 basis—to spend more money in the area which is most expensive, such as hospital acute care beds, and so on. In other areas where they want to enter into extended services for ambulatory care and other types of preventive medicine, we do not have arrangements to allow them to do this. It is in response to their request that we are trying to make the program more flexible.

There are a number of ways in which we can approach this question, and clearly people will make different value judgments in respect of it. One is to widen the base of the kind of services that would be eligible under these two programs, or to change the programs themselves so that they become flexible and not tied to a specific type of medical service. Federal-provincial conferences have emphasized the need to do this, and this new formula is an attempt to allow the provinces the kind of flexibility that will give them an opportunity to put more emphasis on various important areas of health care service within their borders. That is really the reason we are bringing forward the formula. It is certainly not being brought forward because we want to vacate the field. There is no intention to do that at all but, rather, to recognize that in our federal system the provincial governments have legitimate concerns in respect of their own priorities. We should respect that principle as much as we can.

However, the federal government is determined, at the same time, that we maintain certain national standards and those national standards would have to prevail whether or not there was a change in the formula. I am referring to standards such as the comprehensiveness of the programs, universality, portability in Canada and accessibility to people regardless of whether they can afford to pay for these services. Those elements must be maintained. I feel that although there is a proposal to change the formula, it is a step forward, not backward. It is a step in the direction, not of balkanizing the country—which was suggested by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands—but to keep the country together because of the insistence on these national standards which would make sure that Canadians from coast to coast were treated in an equal way.

I believe that if one were to accept the principle of the motion, which would be to give a blank cheque to the provinces and to simply say that we would pay 50 per cent of all health care costs in Canada, that would give rise to the balkanization of this country because we would have stepped out of the picture and allowed the provinces to do whatever they wanted within their own jurisdictions regardless of the effect it might have from coast to coast. It seems to me that we are doing precisely the opposite to what has been suggested by some members of this House. We must maintain controls, we must stay in the field and we must give leadership.

I think that we are recognizing, through this new formula, that in the past the original program was much needed and served Canadians well, but in past years there has been a tendency for the provinces to pay more emphasis to the programs expensive forms of health care such as hospitalization. Now that this question has been taken care of quite well in this country, they need flexibility to move into other areas which would be less costly.

Mention has been made of community health clinics in this country. We should give some emphasis to that question. However, in this respect members always seem to talk about the health resources fund. My understanding of the health resources fund is that it is not established to involve itself in that kind of operation but is primarily for the purpose of educating doctors, nurses and providing institutions for that purpose. If we want to do the kind of thing that hon. members are talking about, then I think we need the thrust fund which we have proposed in our negotiations with the provinces, whereby $640 million would be put forward over a short period of time, namely, five years. This money could be used by the provinces to develop innovative ways of providing services to communities without having to give undue emphasis to the more expensive forms of health care on which we have been concentrating in the past.

The motion implies that the health resources fund is inadequate and that we should provide more funds. I do not know what the hon. member has in mind in terms of additional funds, but let us say it was $500 million more. Would that provide any more available funds today? The fact of the matter is that there is roughly $200 million in that fund which has never even been requested by the provinces. So if more money is required for the kind of things the hon. member wants, it is not required in the health resources fund in my view but, rather, in a new kind of fund which we have called a thrust fund in our negotiations with the provinces.

It has been suggested, too, that in these negotiations the provinces have flatly rejected our proposals. That simply is not true. The fact is that a number of provinces have indicated their willingness to consider this program and to negotiate it. Certainly, some provinces feel that the proposal is not for them at the present time, but what is the alternative? In some cases it is for us to opt right out of the field altogether. As far as I know, that is not what the hon. member who proposed this motion, or anybody else in his party, wants. The difficulties we are having in respect of the federal-provincial conference are not because we are not following this motion, but because we are insisting that we remain in the health care field. I think the hon. member would agree with us on that.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, we have not really put the proposal to the provinces and said, "Take it or leave it". That has never been the case, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) never said it was the case either in the conference or since. A statement was made to the effect that it would be difficult to put more sweeteners in the pot. I think it is understandable that in any negotiations there has to be a point where you feel you have gone as far as you can in providing funds. These funds are not a step backward. The formula is designed in such a way that no province will lose any amount of money that it presently has by accepting the formula, and under our formula within the next ten years they will receive $1.1 billion more than they would if they had stayed under the existing program.

I referred earlier to the thrust funds. They are designed to help the provinces reduce the cost of health care in this country by innovative programs so that we can get out of the acute care hospital situation. I do not think it is fair or reasonable for any Member of Parliament on this or any other side to say that we are proposing to opt out of cost-sharing. We have simply put forward a different formula for arriving at it, which would provide the kind of flexibility that the provinces desire. I personally cannot see anything objectionable about that approach.

I recognize that some members are reading into this particular motion and into the present situation in the federal-provincial negotiations the idea that the federal government is saying that it does not intend to get involved in pharmacare, denticare, care for eyeglasses, or whatever. This question has not been taken into consideration at the present time. I think it is felt that before we become involved in these areas, we need some agreement with the provinces. As a matter of fact, in previous negotiations the provinces asked us to give a commitment that we would not enter into any new, broad program such as denticare or pharmacare without consultation with them and without a consensus that it was also a priority of theirs. They do not want the federal government to push them into this area. I think they have a point, because they have priorities too and we should respect them.

So, Mr. Speaker, this formula is not designed to take care of any financial expenditures that the provinces may incur in the area of denticare or pharmacare, because if they wish to go in that direction we would want to discuss it and negotiate what kind of arrangements should be made without any reference to the formula we have proposed. This formula does not in any way prohibit our becoming involved in cost-sharing in those areas if agreement is reached with the provinces in the future that this should be done.

Health Care

In my view, if anyone in this country is really trying to opt out of health care in the federal sphere, it is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). In a statement made in the province of Quebec he said—I think I have it correctly—that the federal government must withdraw from shared-cost health programs and give the provinces a greater share of fiscal resources with an appropriate system of equalization. If that is not a suggestion that we drop out of this area and fail to provide the kind of leadership we have provided in the past, I do not know what is. He is proposing a new kind of tax-sharing arrangement with the provinces. It may be different in amount, in terms of the 6 per cent or in a couple of other details. However, the Leader of the Opposition may be proposing something different but for a different reason, because he is saying. "If I were the federal leader of this country I would get out of this field."

We are not saying that. We are saying that we will negotiate with the provinces to arrive at a suitable arrangement which would allow the kind of flexibility that would maintain national standards across the country for the benefit of all Canadians, and that we are going to stay in the health field. We are determined to stay because we feel that although it is largely a provincial responsibility, the federal government has a great deal of input and leadership in the field. I think we have proven that in the past, Mr. Speaker.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PENITENTIARIES

ESCAPES BY PRISONERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of the utmost urgency stemming from the incredible rash of breakouts from federal penitentiaries, the latest being the escape of five dangerous prisoners from St. Vincent de Paul. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That this House Orders a special committee be immediately set up to investigate all aspects of the penitentiary system, including the operation of weekend leaves, of the Bail Reform Act and, if the committee decides it is necessary, of the National Parole Board, and report its findings and recommendations to this House as quickly as is consistent with a thorough investigation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Yukon. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

FISHERIES

RECIPROCAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of very urgent and pressing necessity. Tomorrow, May 15, is one of the deadlines established by an agreement signed between Canada and the United States on April 19 of this year, the effect of which, if fully consummated, will be to deny Canadian salmon fishermen on the west coast access to certain stocks of United States salmon while opening up the access that United States fishermen will have to Canadian salmon, particularly Fraser River stocks. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That this House disapproves of the agreement between Canada and the United States of America dated April 19, 1973, which seeks to give salmon fishermen of the United States undue access to Canadian stocks of salmon.

Mr. Speaker: This motion also requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

Nuclear Tests

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORTHCOMING NUCLEAR TESTS BY FRANCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the impending French nuclear tests in the Pacific some time this month and in view of the mounting world protests, including those from our Commonwealth partners, Australia and New Zealand, I seek, under Standing Order 43, unanimous consent of the House to move a resolution in similar terms to those adopted by this chamber in regard to the Amchitka test by the United States and the nuclear tests by France last year. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather):

That the Canadian House of Commons again calls on all nuclear powers to cease all testing of nuclear devices and specifically on the government of France to cancel all its proposed nuclear tests in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43 the motion proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent? It is difficult to determine. Perhaps we should call for the "nays" this time.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is unanimous consent provided the motion is not debated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed? Is there unanimous consent to the proposal of the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is unanimous consent, the motion will be put.

Motion agreed to.

On the order: Motions.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do so at this time because it appears we are at the conclusion of the item, motions, on our agenda and no one on the government side has risen to make an announcement to the House about a matter of very great importance that I raised a while ago. I refer to the agreement between Canada and the United States signed on April 19 of this year which, effective tomorrow, seeks to bring about a severe restriction of the opportunities for Canadian fishermen on the west coast to fish stocks of United States-bound salmon while enhancing and increasing the opportunity of United States fishermen on the same coast to fish close to shore up to our three mile limit and seriously impinge on the stocks of Canadian-bound and Canadian-owned Fraser River Salmon.

I think it is an affront to the House for the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. I realize that hon. members sometimes would like to hear statements on motions from hon. members on the government side, but I doubt very much that the failure on the part of a minister or of the government to make a statement on motions can be brought to the attention of the House by way of a question of privilege. I am not sure whether this is the kind of matter that the hon. member thinks should be referred to the Committee on Privileges, and this in itself may be the best indication that there is not a real question of privilege. The hon. member has made his point, but I doubt that the matter should be pursued by way of a question of privilege.

Order Paper Questions

MARITIME POLLUTION CLAIMS FUND—MAXIMUM ALLOWABLE CHARGE ON OIL

Question No. 957—Mr. Harding:

1. What is the maximum allowable charge for the Maritime Pollution Claims Fund on each ton of oil imported into Canada or shipped from any place in Canada?

2. What rate was charged per ton of oil at the inception of the plan and what is the rate being charged at present?

3. Does the same rate apply uniformly in all parts of Canada over the same period of time?

4. If there are any exceptions to a uniform rate, where are they and what rates apply in these cases?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. Fifteen cents.

2. Fifteen cents.

3. Yes.

4. N/A.

MARITIME POLLUTION CLAIMS FUND—REVENUE FROM POLLUTANTS OTHER THAN OIL

Question No. 958—Mr. Harding:

1. Has any revenue accrued to the Maritime Pollution Claims Fund from any pollutants other than oil?

2. What other cargoes of pollutants are liable for payments to the Fund and what is the rate charged on each different pollutant?

3. Have any of these shipments of pollutants had claims against the Maritime Pollution Claims Fund?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. None.

3. No.

BRYDEN REPORT CONCERNING PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Question No. 969—Mr. Howie:

How much money was paid for the production of the so-called Bryden Report concerning the Public Service Staff Relations Act and to whom was it paid?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): The total amount paid out under contract for the production of the Bryden Report was $39,894.61. This amount was paid out to the following persons: 1. Mr. John Bryden received $29,364.41 of which $6,131.79 was reimbursement for expenses incurred by him.

2. Dr. W. R. Dymond received $3,500.

3. Father Gérard Hébert received $7,030.20 of which $905.20 was reimbursement for expenses incurred by him.

MARITIME POLLUTION CLAIMS FUND

Question No. 978—Mr. Harding:

1. How much money is currently in the Maritime Pollution Claims Fund?

2. How many claims, to date, have been charged against the Fund and what was the amount paid on each claim?

3. How many claims against the Fund are pending?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. $7,947,142 as of March 31, 1973.

2. Nil.

3. No claims against the Fund are pending. Since the Fund is in the nature of an unsatisfied judgment fund, claims are made on the Fund only after other remedies are exhausted; and some claims that are now being disputed with polluters may eventually become claims on the fund.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—MATERNITY BENEFITS

Question No. 1,018—Mr. Hueglin:

With regard to maternity benefits from January 1, 1972 to the latest month for which statistics are available (a) how many women received benefits for the maximum time period under the provision for maternity leave (b) what was the average number of weeks for which maternity benefits were received (c) how many of the women who have taken advantage of maternity benefits under UIC have returned to the labour force?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): (a) and (b). In order to provide the information requested, the Commission would have to prepare special computer programs. This would entail inordinate costs and time in (a) the preparation and testing of the programs (b) the use of computer facilities to extract the information; (c). This question cannot be answered as the Commission has no way of knowing if a claimant returns to the work force or merely stops drawing benefits and ceases to report to the Commission.

FISHER REPORT ON SEA ISLAND

Question No. 1,067—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Were the objections in the Fisher Report on the access system expropriation on Sea Island disregarded by the Department of Transport and, if so, for what reason?

2. What review of these reports is made before a decision is reached?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Ministry of Transport and the Department of Public Works as follows: 1. The objections questioning the need for the proposed roadway and its associated expropriations were examined by the Ministry of Transport, but raised no new evidence to invalidate that requirement.

2. The Minister of Public Works reviews each report before making the decision to expropriate. Before doing so, it is customary for the minister to obtain the views of his cabinet colleagues, especially the minister responsible for the program involved and whose senior officials review the report concerned in detail.

FINANCIAL STATEMENTS BY HARBOUR COMMISSIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 1,075—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Does the Department of Transport lay down ground rules for the publication of financial statements by harbour commissions in B.C. and, if so, what are the requirements for financial detail?

[Mr. Harding.]

2. Does the Department make payments to support the operations of such harbour commissions and, if so, upon what terms or conditions?

3. Does the Department have any role to play in the determination of how harbour commissions may use this income for such purposes as the solicitation abroad of business?

4. Are the detailed expenses of all employees of the Fraser River Harbour Commission available for the years 1967, 1968, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The Department of Transport does not prescribe rules for the publication of financial statements by harbour commissions. The department does, however, prescribe a form of accounts and requires each commission to report to it annually in the form prescribed.

2. No.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned; 1. (a) 159; (b) 715.

CONDITIONAL AND ABSOLUTE DISCHARGES

Question No. 1,485—Mr. Hueglin:

1. By what method does the government determine the number of (a) conditional (b) absolute discharges dispensed by the courts in Canada since the inception of the law relating to them?

2. How and when can various organizations in Canada involved in monitoring such matters secure the information relating to the number of absolute and conditional discharges granted and what supervision of these discharges is carried out by the federal authorities involved?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Statistics Canada and the Department of Justice as follows: 1. (a) and (b) As a result of the new law passed on July 15, 1972, the forms used by the clerks of the adult courts and juvenile courts to report information to Statistics Canada, were redesigned for 1973 to include the items absolute and conditional discharges. Data are collected on an individual basis according to the statutes in each province under which an individual is charged. For the remainder of the 1972 calendar year (after the law was passed) the clerks of the adult courts were requested by circular letter to report the additional information on the forms already in use for 1972.

2. Data from adult courts for 1972 should be available for all provinces except Quebec and Alberta, by December 1973. Data for Quebec and Alberta should be available by mid 1975. Information was not collected from juvenile courts for 1972. Data from adult and juvenile courts for the first quarter of 1973 should be available by December 1973. Data pertaining to the second, third and fourth quarters of 1973 should be available 60 days after the end of each quarter. Revised court forms were introduced on April 1, 1973 and will be processed by computer which explains why data from the first quarter will take longer to process than for the following quarters. There is no supervision of these discharges carried out by the federal authorities involved.

FOREST INDUSTRY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—BOXCAR SHORTAGE

Question No. 1,523—Mr. Reynolds:

Will there be shut-downs and curtailment of production in the Forest Industry in British Columbia because of a boxcar shortage and, if so, what is the government doing to solve this serious problem?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Both major railways are taking steps aimed at providing an adequate supply of cars during this period of exceptionally high demand for the products of the forest industries of British Columbia. New equipment is being purchased while efforts are being made to secure the prompt return of lumber cars from the United States. At the same time, the railways have held discussions with the producers to investigate ways and means of optimizing equipment utilization. In short, the railway companies are taking all possible steps to avoid dislocation of the British Columbia forest industry. The effectiveness of these efforts depends upon a number of factors, one of which is the B.C. forest industry itself. It is difficult to foresee whether the future will be free of delays or other problems but it must be stressed that the railways are making every effort to eliminate or minimize any disruption.

The first formal request to Canadian borrowers to explore fully the Canadian capital market before floating issues abroad was included in a statement on economic policy by Mr. Benson on October 13, 1970 during debate on the Speech from the Throne. A letter was sent by the Hon. E. J. Benson to provincial treasurers and finance ministers and to investment dealers most active in international underwriting transactions on April 22, 1971, reiterating his request that foreign borrowing be kept to a minimum. A copy of the text of this letter was released April 23, 1971. The minister alluded to this request on several other occasions in the latter half of 1971. The subject was again discussed by federal and provincial senior officials at a Federal-Provincial Continuing Committee meeting in June 1972 and shortly thereafter the Minister of Finance visited his provincial counterparts to express concern over the level of foreign borrowing. From time to time through this period, the minister and his officials have been in touch with individual borrowers and investment dealers to discuss individual borrowings in relation to the minister's request. The Governor of the Bank of Canada made reference to the minister's request and concurred with this request in speeches made by the Governor in October 1970 and April 1971. The Bank of Canada also made note of this request in its Annual Reports for 1970, 1971 and 1972.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION BOARD

Question No. 1,836—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

What fees and salaries have been paid to each member of the Board of Directors of the Canada Development Corporation since the Board was established?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Pursuant to Section 31 of the Canada Development Corporation Act the CDC is not an agent of Her Majesty or a Crown Corporation. The directors' remuneration is determined by the board of the CDC which has not made the information public. Consequently the information sought concerning fees and salaries of directors is not available.

*BOOKLET ENTITLED "PROPOSALS FOR A COMMUNICATION POLICY FOR CANADA"

Question No, 1,851—Mr. Douglas:

1. How many copies were printed of the booklet "Proposals for a Communications Policy for Canada" issued by the Department of Communications?

2. What was the cost of printing this booklet?

3. What was the method of distribution and to what categories of persons was the booklet distributed?

4. What firm did the lay-out and copy for this booklet and at what cost?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in view of the length of this answer perhaps it might be printed in Hansard today as having been read.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer referred to above is as follows:]

1. Eight thousand copies.

2. The cost of printing was $11,510.13.

3. Some 900 copies of this booklet were distributed to Senators and Members of Parliament, provincial ministers responsible for communications, as well as to the parliamentary press gallery on the day it was tabled in the House. Other copies were mailed the same day by the Department of Communications and the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to departments, organizations, associations, companies, industries, broadcasters, cable undertakings, media and individuals, the names of which appear on the distribution lists of the Department of Communications and the CRTC. Two thousand other copies were offered for sale in all provinces by Information Canada.

4. The lay-out, type specifications and calculations, design and printing of screens, type composition for the covers and title pages and "camera ready" lay-outs were done by Gilles Robert et Associés, in Montreal. The cost was $1,154.72 (including federal taxes). Information Canada printed the booklet at the cost shown above.

Order Paper Questions

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—FILMS FOR GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

Question No. 1,853—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Since the announcement of the Secretary of State on July 4, 1972 "that the National Film Board will no longer be the exclusive recipient of government commissions" (a) how many film contracts have been awarded by federal departments and agencies to private film producers (b) how many films were produced in the same period by the Film Board for federal departments and agencies?

2. As provided for under the National Film Act, is the National Film Board still responsible for allocating all film contracts for federal government departments and agencies and, if not, what agency has been set up to handle this responsibility?

3. As it is impossible both to compete and control, is it the intention of the government to amend the National Film Act so that the National Film Board "will now have to compete with private producers for all film contracts awarded by a federal department or agency" as outlined in the Secretary of State's announcement of July 4, 1972?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. The announcement by the Secretary of State on July 4 was a statement of intention on the part of the government and so far no legislation has been changed. The National Film Board is still responsible, under the National Film Act, for allocating all contracts for government departments and agencies. I am informed by the National Film Board that (a) 36 contracts were issued by NFB on behalf of government departments to private film producers for the period July 4, 1972 to March 31, 1973; (b) 52 government department film projects were assigned to NFB Production for the period July 4, 1972 to March 31, 1973.

2. Yes.

3. As a follow-up to the policy statement concerning the film contracts awarded by the federal government, a committee presided over by Treasury Board and including representatives of the National Film Board and the Secretary of State Department has been set up to consider various matters respecting the implementation of this new policy. The committee is also examining private producers' views on this matter. This may result in amendment to the National Film Act.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION RECRUITMENT

Question No. 1,914—Mr. Dick:

1. Did an advertisement appear on March 17, 1973 in the Economist under International Appointments, stating that the Public Service Commission of Canada was seeking Management and Financial Auditors for the Audit Service Bureau, under reference number 73-ASP-F1-2?

2. Will these persons work in Canada and, if so, will they be moved to Canada at the taxpayers' expense?

3. For what reasons is the Public Service Commission recruiting outside of Canada, especially taking into consideration the low levels being recruited?

4. How many positions are to be filled from this competition?

5. What efforts have been made by the Public Service Commission or the department involved to staff from within its own ranks, or from Manpower Resources of Canada?

6. Did the advertisement appear in Canada and, if so, where and on what date?

7. Who waived the requirement that the applicant should be first a Canadian citizen, and second, a landed immigrant?

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

8. What would be the cost of transferring the successful candidate, his or her family, and household effects?

9. Is there a probationary period for the successful candidate, and if he is not successful, will he or she be returned to England at government expense?

10. Who has authorized the funding for this recruitment commitment?

11. Will this competition require a recruitment officer to travel to London, England to interview the candidates?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. An advertisement appeared on March 17, 1973 in the Economist under International Appointments, stating that the Public Service Commission of Canada was seeking Management and Financial Auditors for the Audit Services Bureau under reference number 73-ASP-FI-2.

2. Qualified candidates who are offered employment and who accept the offer of employment will work in Canada. They will be moved to Canada at the taxpayers' expense.

3. The Public Service Commission, after exhausting internal manpower resources and conducting 11 separate "open" recruitment programs within Canada during the period of March 1972 to March 1973, did not meet the manpower requirements of departments at the entry level of the auditing group.

4. There are 30 positions to be staffed by means of this overseas recruitment campaign.

5. Extensive training programs have been under way in the four main user departments and have been the prime source for appointment at the entry level. However, the resource is insufficient to meet the current demands. As noted in item (3) above, 11 separate "open" recruitment programs for auditing positions at the entry level were conducted by the Public Service Commission within Canada during the period of March 1972 to March 1973.

6. The advertisement referenced was directed specifically towards auditor recruitment in the United Kingdom and therefore did not appear in Canada. However, 11 advertisements were placed in major Canadian newspapers and journals periodically over the last year (see item 3).

7. Section 17, subsection (4) (iv) of the Public Service Employment Act authorizes the Commission to recruit other than Canadian citizens when qualified Canadian citizens are not available.

8. It is not possible at this time to state a cost. This will only be possible when the successful candidates are known; the granting of removal expenses is a departmental responsibility.

9. Yes, there is a probationary period. In the event that a candidate did not complete successfully his/her probationary period, the decision to grant the candidate any removal expense to return to England would be a departmental responsibility.

10. The Public Service Commission has authorized the funding for this recruitment campaign.

11. One officer of the Public Service Commission and two officers of the Department of Supply and Services will interview candidates in London, and possibly other centres in the United Kingdom.

1. What was the total cost, to the government, of the Study of Grain Transportation and Handling?

2. Who were the consulting firms that carried out the study and what were the amounts paid to each firm for its services?

3. How were the firms selected?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): 1. Total cost was $587,950.

2. Personal Service Contracts & Computing Services, $40,000; Grain Industry Personnel on Personal Service Contracts, $94,950; Country Grain Elevator Study, University of Manitoba, $12,000; Country Grain Elevator Study, P. S. Ross, $27,000; Cost Ascertainment Study, Thunder Bay & Pacific Terminals, P. S. Ross, $15,000; Eastern Terminal Grain Elevators, P. S. Ross, $19,000; Farm Trucking Costs, University of Manitoba, $5,000; Commercial Trucking, Trimac Transportation System, $5,000; Inland Terminal Design, P. Foody & Co., $45,000; Cleaning and Storage Study, P. Foody & Co., $50,000; Saskatoon Terminal Study, P. Foody & Co., $5,000; Economic Effects of Rationalization of Prairie Communities, Underwood McLellan & Assoc., $44,000; Grain Handling and Transportation Costs in Canada, P. S. Ross, $25,000; Grain Transportation in Eastern Canada, Kates, Peat, Marwick, $46,000; Costing of Terminal Elevator Design, Barnett McQueen, $5,000; Solids Pipeline for Grain Study, Hedlin Menzies, $3,000; Testing of High Speed Cleaning Machine, P. Foody & Co., & Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, $147,000; Total $587,950.

3. In most instances special knowledge of grain handling systems was required in carrying out the research. Work was contracted out to individuals and organizations having the requires experience or demonstrated competence. Where more than one group met these requirements, contracts were awarded by competitive bidding.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION POLICY RESPECTING POLITICAL MOVEMENTS

Question No. 1,946—Mr. Mazankowski:

What is the policy of the Farm Credit Corporation in respect of Corporation officials participating actively in federal election campaigns and openly supporting specific political movements?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The Farm Credit Corporation advises as follows: It shall be a condition of every appointment that except with the approval of the chairman and subject to such conditions as the board may prescribe the appointee shall not be a candidate or actively participate in work for or against a candidate for election to the House of Commons, the legislature of any province or the Council of the Yukon Territory or the North West Territories or for or against any political party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have four or five questions on the order paper, all of which may have embarrassing results for the government, but that does not excuse the delay in answering them. One is starred question 1,800 which has been on the order paper since March 29. It reads as follows:

1. On what dates since January 1, 1973, did the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce communicate with the Secretary of Commerce of the United States regarding possible or potential trade action by the United States against Canada?

2. Have letters of protest to the United States government been sent by either the Prime Minister or the minister and, if so, on what dates and to whom?

No matter how free one is from suspicion, the fact remains that this answer could have been given long ago. The answer would be very simple. I think it is that no communication has taken place, and that is the reason there has not been any answer.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very pleased to look into this question. Quite frankly, I thought it had been answered and I regret it has not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I would suggest a little better communication among members of the Cabinet.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, last March I placed a number of questions on the order paper on the subject of the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group. All these questions were answered within what I consider a very reasonable length of time with the exception of one question, namely, No. 1,769. If the other questions could be answered as quickly as they were, I fail to see any valid reason for the delay in answering this particular question, which simply asks who were the employers during the previous five years of the 17 persons whose names the government has admitted in an answer to one of my previous questions and who comprise the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group. If there is no reason for the government to desire to hide what these people were doing before they went to their new positions, would the parliamentary secretary give the House some indication when this question will be answered?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I will get in touch with the minister and report back to the hon. member.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

FISHERIES

RECIPROCAL PRIVILEGES WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 26 to move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That this House do now adjourn for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely: the impasse which exists between Canada and the United States of America for a continuing agreement on reciprocal fishing privileges in each other's fishing zones, and what further steps are necessary to secure a new agreement or, alternatively, what steps are necessary to protect Canada's fishing interests if the United States will not renew the agreement on equitable terms.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has given the Chair due notice of his intention to request leave to move a motion to adjourn the House in order to discuss the subject matter of reciprocal fishing rights and privileges in the Pacific between Canada and the United States. It should also be said that the background material appended to the hon. member's notice was found to be most useful. I will add also that the Chair appreciated the hon. member's co-operation in placing for the consideration of the Chair a motion in a proper form without argument and supporting material in the motion itself.

There can be little doubt, of course, of the importance of the matter raised now by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and by other hon. members during motions. The desirability of carrying on further negotiations with the United States is probably indisputable. However, as has been said often in the past, it is not the importance and urgency of the matter itself which the Chair ought to consider primarily, but the urgency of the debate.

In making a determination whether or not the matter should have urgent consideration under the provisions of Standing Order 26, the Chair must have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within a reasonable time by other means. It does seem to the Chair that there are a number of steps available to the hon. member to bring on a discussion and consideration of the substance of the matter which he has requested be set down for debate. In my view, the proposed motion does not meet one of the basic requirements of the Standing Order and of our practice, and consequently it cannot be put to the House at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PENITENTIARIES

ESCAPES FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CIRCUMSTANCES—SECURITY PROVISIONS TO PREVENT FURTHER INCIDENTS—TYPE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Solicitor General but he seems to have escaped from the House today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps I might direct my question to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Justice. I would ask whether either gentlemen can report any progress in respect of the capture of the five dangerous prisoners who escaped yesterday from St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, and what security provisions are being undertaken at this time to avoid any further escapes from this penitentiary?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General would have very much liked to be here to meet hon. members but longstanding commitments in Victoria, including a meeting with the John Howard society, have kept him away. The matter of escapes and additional procedures is, of course, receiving very careful attention. At the same time, a decision has been taken and the commissioner will be authorizing an inquiry under Section 12 of the Penitentiary Act into the circumstances surrounding these escapes. The whole matter will be pursued with the vigour which I know the hon. Leader of the Opposition has come to expect of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Baldwin: That is what worries us.

An hon. Member: Give us an explanation.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Solicitor General does the best he can in view of the people he has to work with.

An hon. Member: That is a reflection on public servants.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the Minister of Justice say whether the government has received any detailed explanation as to the latest escapes? Has it received any explanation of why a guard tower 30 feet away from the point where the men are said to have gone over the wall was empty at the time?

An hon. Member: He was at a luncheon.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the minister say whether this guard tower and others at this penitentiary are now being manned continuously? What assurance can the minister give the House?

Mr. McGrath: They shouldn't be allowed to escape during the lunch hour.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is true it appears that two of the towers in question were unmanned at this particular point in time. It is also a fact that this was directly contrary to instructions which were given again in writing as recently as May 1 that these towers were to be manned at all times.

This discrepancy in conduct compared with the directions which existed is part of the elements which have led to the need for an inquiry.

Mr. Stanfield: As I understand it, the inquiry referred to by the minister relates to prisons, security and breakouts in the province of Quebec. I should like to ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice whether the inquiry will be broadened so as to include the penitentiary system in the whole of the country, either in the form of a royal commission as proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert last week or in the form of an inquiry by a special select committee of the House as proposed today by the hon. member for Yukon? Will the government broaden the inquiry to include the whole penitentiary system in Canada and all its aspects?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the inquiry to which I referred a moment ago was specifically in relation to the incidents that took place over the weekend. The Solicitor General reacted in quite a positive way to the suggestion of a broader inquiry in terms of the consideration he wanted to give to that suggestion when put to him in the House the other day. I am sure he will include in his consideration of the appropriate inquiry the suggestion contained in the motion of the hon. member for Yukon.

ESCAPES FROM INSTITUTIONS—REQUEST FOR BROAD JUDICIAL OR OTHER INQUIRY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the escapes reported in the last day or two are the most recent of a number that have taken place in the last number of weeks or months, and in view of the fact one may reasonably suspect there is some kind of loss of discipline or morale in the system at the moment—I address this question to the Prime Minister—can we have from him an assurance today that there will be a broad independent judicial or other inquiry into the whole system of the guards and supervision of penitentiaries in Canada?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice just gave the answer I would repeat to that question, that the Solicitor General did indicate his sympathy with the suggestion. He referred to other inquiries that had been made in recent years into the penitentiary system. He indicated he would want to consider all these and then give his opinion to cabinet and make a statement to the House, if necessary.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question really follows that of the hon. member who preceded me. This is a matter directly for the Prime Minister. I ask the Prime Minister whether consideration is being given to the suggestion I made two or three weeks ago, concerning the open-door proclivities that are becoming part and parcel of the penitentiary service today so far as inmates are concerned, I asked for the setting up of a royal commission. This is a very serious matter and one in respect of which the administration of justice is being widely criticized?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the question is an elaboration of the question just asked by the Leader of the New Democratic Party and my answer, I must say, is along the same lines.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It seems hard to get an answer from the Prime Minister. I do not want him to draw on his imagination for his facts, but I am wondering whether he could answer the question. Has the subject been before the cabinet and I would like an answer instead of these smart-aleck answers the Prime Minister regularly gives the House?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon on a supplementary.

SECURITY IN PROVINCE OF QUEBEC—REQUEST THAT TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY COMMISSION BE BROADENED

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Justice. In light of the announcement by a spokesman for the Solicitor General that a three-man inquiry commission will be set up this week to investigate penitentiary security in the province of Quebec and in view of the obvious reluctance of the government to broaden that inquiry to include the whole of the country, will the minister at least assure the House that the inquiry will be prepared to examine recent disturbances at Millhaven, Cowansville, St. Vincent de Paul, Dorchester and Prince Albert penitentiaries as well as its existing terms of reference?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly discuss that representation with the Solicitor General. I should think that the objective in maintaining a somewhat narrower ambit for this particular inquiry is to deal with the very specific issues that are involved here. The broader questions are important and the Solicitor General attaches great importance to the questions involved as he indicated to the House earlier, including the over-all question of morale, and is considering the nature of the broader inquiry which may be required with regard to these matters.

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure I can spot ten members rising on supplementary questions. All these hon. members cannot be recognized on the very first question, but perhaps we might have two or three further supplementaries. The hon. member for Yukon has a supplementary. He will be recognized, and so will the hon. member for Skeena. We will then try to complete the first round of questioning and return later to others who want to ask supplementaries on this subject.

Mr. Nielsen: I have one last supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the delays in previous inquiries into prisons by this government, would the Prime Minister assure the House that the report of this particular inquiry or commission will be submitted directly to the House rather than to the minister or to the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I cannot give that assurance.

ESCAPES OF PRISONERS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO COMPETENCE OF COMMISSIONER FAGUY

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as there is obviously a need for two types of inquiries, one into the escapes a few days ago and the other into the general competency of the penitentiary service, will the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General cause an inquiry to be undertaken into the competency of Commissioner Faguy, because that is where the problem seems to stem from?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to accept the premise of the hon. member's question, at least to the extent of prejudging the very issue of the inquiry and the many factors which may be at work in creating the difficult problems that exist. I think it would be a mistake to start with a prejudgment about the nature of the problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe on a last supplementary question, after which we will continue the first round of questioning. I will recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, the hon. member for Calgary North and others later on this subject.

ALLEGED ISSUANCE OF SPECIAL PASSPORTS TO ESCAPED PRISONERS—REQUEST THAT NO NEW PASSPORTS BE GRANTED

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Considering that one or several escapees now being sought were issued special passports on the occasion of their most recent evasion, did the minister give specific instructions that new passports not be issued?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not given any such instructions. The hon. gentleman will recall that when this was done in the past it was in order to help to apprehend the criminals, and they have been apprehended.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Is it the minister's intention to issue a passport if the police force asks for it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will agree that the question asked in these terms is hypothetical.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. He has informed us that he intends to present a bill dealing with conflict of interest of members of the House of Commons. I should like to ask him whether he is also in the process of preparing legislation to deal with the conflict of interest of public servants, particularly in the higher ranks?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the present plan is to produce, some time in this session, a general statement on the question of conflict of interest relating to Members of Parliament, ministers and public servants. The reason that legislation may be desirable for Members of Parliament and Senators is that this particular field has already been dealt with in various acts of parliament. The objective would be to reconcile and probably update some of these acts of parliament. At the moment, according to the present situation it would be intended to reflect the procedures with regard to conflict of interest in the case of public servants in the form of guidelines rather than legislation, but that is a tentative judgment at the moment.

ALLEGED HOLDING OF BELL CANADA SHARES BY MEMBER OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question arising out of a statement by the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission on a television program yesterday in which he indicated that there is a section in the National Transportation Act prohibiting members of the Canadian Transport Commission from having an interest in transportation or communication enterprises with which the CTC has to deal. May I ask the President of the Privy Council whether he is aware of the fact that one member at least, and perhaps more than one, of the Canadian Transport Commission has or has had and continues to have shares in Bell

Canada? If he is not aware of it, will he undertake to make an inquiry and inform the House as to that fact?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): I am not aware of any such situation. I will discuss the matter with the Prime Minister, and if there is any further report to be made to the House it will be done.

POSSIBILITY OF GUIDELINES FOR CABINET MEMBERS DISTINCT FROM THOSE FOR OTHER MEMBERS OF HOUSE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him whether it is intended to produce any guidelines in respect of members of the cabinet as such as distinct from ordinary members of the House of Commons, and whether it is intended to do this by the publication of guidelines or by statute?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, following the answer just given by the President of the Privy Council, my answer would be yes, we do intend to make public guidelines applying to ministers as well as to members of the House, senators, public servants and, indeed, appointees in general by order in council. As to the second part of the question, legislation is not contemplated at this time for any of the other categories but Members of Parliament and Senators who, as the President of the Privy Council said, are presently dealt with by legislation.

APPOINTMENT IN 1968 BY FORMER MINISTER, EDGAR BENSON, OF FIRM WITH WHICH HE HAD BEEN ASSOCIATED AS CMHC AUDITORS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if there is a follow-up question, but I would like now to correct an error I made in answer to a similar question on Friday or Thursday when I said that Mr. Benson had resigned or severed any connection with a chartered accountants firm upon his entry into politics. The answer should have been that he resigned or severed such connection when he became a member of the cabinet. There is a two-year period between the two dates. I might have said also that the appointment was made by cabinet rather than by the minister, as indeed it is an order in council appointment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Benson would still have a benevolent interest.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ROLE OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT IN SELECTING PROJECTS—FURTHER APPROVALS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Some ten days ago the minister sent to the members a list of Opportunities for Youth projects definitely approved by his department. Could he tell us what effect could the members' recommendations have on projects from their own constituency?

[English]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of opinion. As I have said before, the responsibility for rejections is in all cases one that I assume as Secretary of State and is not a responsibility of Members of Parliament. We consulted Members of Parliament who were free to offer advice if they wanted to. Some took advantage of the opportunity and some did not. But I want to emphasize that the refusal was my own and that of my department.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Could the minister tell us whether another list of approved projects will be drawn up?

[English]

Mr. Faulkner: No, Mr. Speaker.

ALLEGED PROMISE OF REINSTATEMENT OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROJECT AT LAC MEGANTIC IF CROWD PROVIDED FOR PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Has the minister ordered an investigation into the report in Saturday's Globe and Mail that sponsors of an OFY project at Lac Megantic were promised by a Liberal organizer that their program would be reinstated if the project sponsors provided a crowd for the Prime Minister's visit, and will the minister undertake to advise the House of the full results of that investigation?

• (1440)

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that is the first I have heard of it. It sounds like patent nonsense to me, but I will look into it.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for his supplementary, but I think we should try to proceed in an orderly fashion if we can. There are still supplementaries on the first and second questions and further supplementaries on the third question. Perhaps we should set a full 40 minutes aside just for supplementaries. However, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Rocky Mountain for his supplementary and then we will have supplementaries on the first question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister tell the House, categorically and for the record, that no Liberal organizer is in a position to cause any OFY application to be accepted, rejected or reinstated, and will he introduce a statute for the opportunities for youth program to help avoid this kind of abuse?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I answered the first part of that question in my response to the hon. member for Champlain. The decision was taken by myself and the people in my department. With respect to the second part of the question, we have gone into that proposition at length before the standing committee and my position remains unchanged.

PENITENTIARIES

ESCAPE OF JEAN-PAUL MERCIER FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CIRCUMSTANCES AND POSTPONEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT DEBATE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister. It concerns one of the escapees, Jean-Paul Mercier, who pleaded guilty last week to the murder of two game wardens, Mederic Coté and Ernest Saint-Pierre. He committed those crimes, to which he pleaded guilty, after escaping from the penitentiary where he had been serving 24 years for armed robbery and attempted murder. In light of that fact I ask, and I say this with a kind of respect to the ministers, will they now make a categorically clearcut statement to the House with reference to this person and the circumstances surrounding the escape of this man who has been found guilty of two murders, one attempted murder, and one armed robbery?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the escapes include this individual and others about whom one could make very serious statements in regard to their being at large. This is one of the reasons for the inquiry. The Solicitor General, I think, indicated to the House in the case of this particular institution, with the inclusion in it of persons requiring great security, that greater security provisions were made. Part of the problem, of course, is that some of them were not in fact in place at the time.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the circumstances I have set out, would the minister now advise the House, with respect to the plea of guilty by this particular individual, whether he pleaded guilty to non-capital murder or capital murder and whether he pleaded guilty to capital murder while the temporary abolition of capital punishment was still in operation?

Also, In light of these circumstances and until all this is clarified, would the minister undertake to see that the debate on capital punishment is further adjourned in view of these horrible, terrible, tragic facts until they are all straightened out and a statement made to the House so that debate can proceed in an orderly fashion?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I must say I am glad that we will have an opportunity this afternoon to examine the rather serious lack of logic in some of the remarks by the hon. member. With regard to his inquiry respecting the circumstances of a particular plea and so on, I will be glad to seek this information from the provincial Attorney General under whom the prosecution would have taken place.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Can he inform the House how long the guards' coffee breaks are?

Mr. Lang: I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that the Solicitor General, who is still appearing before the committee with his estimates, would be glad to discuss this matter.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST THAT INSTITUTION BE BROUGHT UP TO DATE TO FACILITATE REHABILITATION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the deplorable conditions at the British Columbia penitentiary which I visited last week, and in view of the fact that a stabbing took place in that prison last Wednesday which has yet to be reported, can the minister advise when this prison will be brought up to date so that it and other prisons will be more acceptable for rehabilitation purposes instead of being training grounds for escapes and further criminal activities?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Solicitor General will welcome the interest of the hon. member in support of his hopes for improving the conditions of prisons in this country and for the way in which, as a result, we will be able to deal with the rehabilitation problem.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I could not agree with the minister more. We all hope for rehabilitation, but this prison is 100 years old. I am asking when we can expect some action in that area so that prisoners can be rehabilitated instead of what is going on right now. We still have not had the stabbing explained that took place in that prison last week.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will now recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley who has a supplementary to the second question, and after that the hon. member for Kootenay West.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

APPOINTMENT BY FORMER MINISTER, EDGAR BENSON, OF FIRM WITH WHICH HE HAD BEEN ASSOCIATED AS AUDITORS— GUIDELINES FOR CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It deals with cabinet ministers and conflict of interest. Did he look at any papers in regard to the severance of Mr. Benson from his former firm to ascertain whether there was any residual or beneficial interest retained by him in the firm or, just like another political leader not too far away from us, did he take the word of someone else when ascertaining the facts? Further, while I am dealing with cabinet ministers, in view of the question by the hon. member for York South about the Canadian Transport Commission, does the Prime Minister intend to develop guidelines or present legislation to define the present situation of cabinet ministers and any holdings they have that are related to applications to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission so that there can be no doubts, in view of the recent allegation in St. John's about one particular cabinet minister and the potential conflict of interest there?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member put so many questions in one that I am afraid I will not be able to do them justice. I can just say that the guidelines applying to ministers will be one thing. The guidelines applying to public servants and order in council appointees will be something else. The general approach will be the same. The principles will be the same for everyone, but they will have different applications as they apply to Members of Parliament, members of the cabinet, members of the public service, and order in council appointments.

With regard to the other part of the question, I looked at the papers and the evidence which were put before me and I have no cause to believe they contain anything erroneous, but if the hon. member has any grounds for suspicion I feel he should see it his duty to inform me of it and not let this kind of innuendo circulate.

Mr. Nowlan: In order to avoid the possibility of any innuendo, would the Prime Minister consider tabling the papers he looked at so that all members of the House could look at them? Also, in order to avoid any innuendo in the second part of my question which dealt with the CRTC, would he or someone in his cabinet in the near future please define the position of cabinet ministers who have holdings as a result of CRTC decisions or licences given by the CRTC so that there is no misunderstanding?

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED NEW TANKER ROUTES ON ATLANTIC COAST—DISCUSSIONS WITH DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the environmental threat posed by any oil tanker route along our Canadian coastline, and in view of the fact that oil refineries are being established on the Atlantic coast of Canada and must be supplied by oil tanker fleets, are discussions going or or have discussions been held with his or any other government department as to the routes which these oil tankers must use in supplying these refineries?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There are discussions with environment and even with external affairs, and in the case of the west coast I think we are discussing it with a committee of the UN to make sure that the coasts are protected and the fisheries too.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I indicated that my question referred primarily to the Atlantic coast. Has the fishing industry been involved in any of the discussions relating to the oil tanker routes?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There was a meeting last week at a very low level in Halifax, a meeting which I was not aware of and which was referred to by two members on the other side of the House. I think they are to receive a letter to this effect. It was to that meeting that the provincial government was invited. The industry was invited, and they were discussing the impact of the tanker route on the fishing industry.

● (1450)

Mr. Harding: What is the basis of the discussions taking place? Do they include safety measures, including the limiting of the size of tankers in certain areas?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have not received a full report on the meeting that took place in Halifax. As soon as I have it I will be happy to indicate what it is. It was a public meeting, Mr. Speaker. I am waiting for a report from my officials who were there. It was not a secret meeting, as was indicated in the newspapers, because even the provincial minister who was referred to was at that meeting. Nothing secret was going on there. As soon as I have the report I will be happy to communicate the conclusions of the officials attending the meeting.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, related to one I asked last week. In view of the concern expressed by the fishermen of Atlantic Canada, especially the lobster fishermen of Nova Scotia, about the proposed new tanker routes, will the minister or his officials be holding still further discussions with the oil industry and representatives of the fishing industry before any of these proposed routes become finalized?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think I have to answer that I do not intend to have special routes for tankers; routes must be determined for all ships, including tankers. What we are interested in is the impact on the fisheries, and that is what has been discussed in Halifax. If it is necessary to have different routes for tankers, probably we will have a recommendation to that effect. I do not have the report yet, but these are the questions we are looking into.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DESIGNATION OF MONTMAGNY AREA AS SPECIAL ZONE—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Can he tell the House whether he has initiated negotiations with the Quebec government to designate Montmagny and suburbs as a special area?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker, not yet. However, I will be meeting with the government of the province of Quebec on Wednesday or Thursday of this week and I have no doubt that will be one of the matters that will be up for discussion.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENTS ON INTEREST RATES AND GOVERNMENT'S FISCAL POLICY AND ON EFFECT OF INTERNATIONAL MONETARY SITUATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the announcement by the Bank of Canada of an increase of half a per cent in the bank rate and of the announced or expected increase in the prime rate, would the minister make a statement tomorrow on the whole of the Canadian financial scene in so far as it affects interest rates and the government's fiscal policy in travelling again, shall we say, this old route in its fight against inflation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the implications in the preamble but I will take the general intention of the question into consideration.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I should also like to ask the minister to make a statement either tomorrow or later this week with regard to the effect on Canadian interest rates of the international monetary situation, the high price of gold and the same dreary symptoms we are now seeing of the crises we have had twice in the last year, and on just what this is going to do for the whole Canadian financial picture, so that the minister and the government can come clean with the Canadian public.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we have already got a very open government.

Mr. Baldwin: What about the tax cuts?

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT HOLD DOWN INTEREST RATES ON MORTGAGE LOANS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance based on the announcement today by the Royal Bank of Canada that its prime rate for loans of over $200,000 is being raised to 7 per cent. In view of the fact the Bank of Canada is encouraging this two-rate system, and in view of the fact that many borrowers at the prime rate are mortgage and trust companies, will the government commit itself to a policy of holding down the interest rates on mortgage loans?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take the general tenor of the hon. gentleman's remarks into consideration. Obviously, the day to day responsibility for the monetary policy of the country rests with the Bank of Canada. It is only when the general thrust of that policy comes into conflict with that of the government that the Minister of Finance has to intervene.

Oral Questions

OIL

PROPOSED WEST COAST TANKER ROUTE—GOVERNMENT POLICY IN LIGHT OF RECENT STATEMENTS BY U.S. OFFICIALS AND PREMIER BARRETT'S PROPOSAL

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. In view of some recent statements by United States officials about Canadian energy and oil policy being in a quagmire and nothing but fantasy, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether it is government policy to give the Alaskan oil tanker route the green light, as published on Thursday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the publication on Thursday that the hon. member refers to. I can say that government policy has not changed in this regard. It is that we do not favour the route from Alaska which would take oil tankers over the ocean into waters that are very narrowly confined between the United States and Canada. That is still our policy, and our policy is still to indicate that the Mackenzie route is one which we would be prepared to consider if there is application made in the proper form, and that we would be very happy to follow up on that.

Mr. Fraser: In view of the Prime Minister's reply, can the Prime Minister tell the House why the government is presently studying Premier Barrett's alternative oil and gas route through Alaska, the Yukon and British Columbia? Does that indicate some change in government policy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not even sure of the premise of the question. As of a week ago we had not received the studies behind Premier Barrett's proposal, although we had asked for them repeatedly. So we cannot say that we are studying them. We have not received them. This may have changed in the past week. The minister is to return from Europe today and he no doubt will be in the position to supplement this answer when he is in the House tomorrow.

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED DELAY IN ISSUING REFUNDS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. It arises from a number of inquiries I have received, and I am sure many other hon. members have received similar inquiries concerning the delay in income tax refunds. Can the minister advise those people when they may expect their refunds?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that would depend on when the returns were filed and whether there were errors in the returns. However, there have been close to four million refunds processed and these should be now in the hands of some four million Canadians. The others are being processed very quickly. I hope that all refunds on returns which were properly completed and submitted on time will be in the taxpayers' hands within the next two weeks.

Oral Questions

AIR CANADA

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW COMPUTER CENTRE AT DORVAL—EFFECT ON WINNIPEG CENTRE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the construction by Air Canada of a new computer centre at Dorval Airport. Can the minister assure the House that the building of this new facility will not render the Air Canada computer centre in Winnipeg obsolete?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to ask for a report from Air Canada on this.

Mr. McKenzie: During that inquiry, will the minister find out whether all Air Canada reservation and computer services are eventually to operate from Dorval?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED SHELLING OF CONTROL COMMISSION OUTPOST—EFFECT ON CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister any definite information he can present to the House respecting the reported shelling of an ICCS outpost in Viet Nam, and can he say whether this incident has in any way affected his judgment about how long Canada should remain there?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that we have no direct information yet from Saigon. We are expecting it at any time.

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON CONTINUING ROLE OF CANADA IN CONTROL COMMISSION AND PLIGHT OF CIVILIAN PRISONERS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister take this opportunity to say whether or not an opportunity will be given to the House soon to debate the whole question of the continuing role of Canada in the ICCS and another question that is disturbing many Canadians, the plight of civilian prisoners in that country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, before the end of the month the government must, of course, make a decision whether we will continue to participate in the International Control Commission. I will make that announcement in the House. On the question of whether it would be desirable or necessary to have a debate at that time, I certainly have a sympathetic attitude and will give the suggestion very careful consideration, as I said some weeks ago. With regard to the question of civilian prisoners, very slow progress is being made. There have been some exchanges of a few hundred prisoners on each side recently. Both sides charge, of course, that there are hundreds of thousands of civilians still incarcerated. Unfortunately, very little progress is being made. This is one of the aspects of the peace agreement that is so disturbing.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROVISION OF AID TO WEST AFRICAN NATIONS STRICKEN BY FAMINE

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the urgent appeal from the Food and Agriculture Organization for help to relieve the famine in the five western African nations where some 10 million people are either dead or in a state of malnutrition, is there anything the minister can do to take the lead among Canadian ministers and among other countries by bringing some help to this hard-pressed area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have already anticipated this question. As I announced in Moncton on Friday, we have already given $2.5 million in food aid to the area surrounding the Sahara. We are looking very sympathetically at requests for help because this is a very serious situation.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF TASK FORCE TO STUDY FEASIBILITY OF NATIONAL CAPITAL DISTRICT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Has the government made a decision with regard to the appointment of a special task force to study the feasibility of the development of a national capital district, that task force to be headed by Mr. Douglas Fullerton, the present chairman of the National Capital Commission?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there will be a more precise announcement made later, but there has been a feeling within the government of the need at this time for a study of the future administration of matters relating to the national capital region. The person who has asked to head that is the chairman of the National Capital Commission. However, a more formal announcement will be made in due course. The report of such a task force will be useful for something I have felt the need of for a long time, as have as other members, namely, a parliamentary inquiry into the operations and the role of the National Capital Commission and what changes in the law should be made.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INCREASED QUOTAS FOR CREAM SHIPPERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the fact Canada has imported some millions of pounds of butter, and in light of the fact we have a surplus of skim milk in this country, can the minister inform the House at an early date as to how he intends to help cream shippers to continue or perhaps increase quotas in this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister might be allowed to give a brief reply to the question asked by the hon. member. I would not want him to make a lengthy statement which normally should be made on motions. After the minister has replied, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and then the hon. member for Davenport.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my answer will be as short as possible. Most of this policy is set by the Canadian Dairy Commission. It will be in a better position to do this soon because I am recommending an appointment from western Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATUS OF DISCUSSIONS ON RECIPROCAL FISHING ARRANGEMENTS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to our reciprocal fishing arrangements with the United States. This will give the minister an opportunity to do something more than move his head back and forth in a north-south direction. Precisely what arrangements has the government made with regard to having further discussions with the United States on the matter of the reciprocal fishing arrangements which are in such an uncertain state at the present time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can agree with the hon. member. We have had some very difficult negotiations with the hon. member. We have had some very difficult negotiations with the United States. They are not yet concluded. We expect to meet again with the Americans before the end of the month, well in advance of the June 15 deadline that is provided in the agreement. In a related matter, we have also had discussions about salmon in particular which, if anything, are even more difficult. It is the intention of the government to resume these negotiations in due course.

UNITED STATES RIGHT TO CATCH FRASER RIVER SALMON—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MAY 8 COMMUNIQUÉS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs inform the House whether Canada intends to take an unequivocal position with regard to the claim by the United States that it has rights in perpetuity to catch Fraser River salmon?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of States for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I always hesitate to make public announcements about a negotiating position. I do not intend to do so on this occasion. I can tell the hon. member we will defend the rights of Canada just as strongly as he.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for one last supplementary on this subject, then the hon. member for Davenport, and perhaps we will have one last question before calling orders of the day.

Mr. Howard: Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs table the two communiqués dated May 8, one from Canada and one from the United States, that resulted from the last talks in Seattle where the question of the claim by the United States about rights in perpetuity to Fraser River salmon was discussed? Will he table those communiqués?

Mr. Sharp: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. If there were communiqués I will see that they are tabled so that all members will know what was agreed upon.

DRUGS

MEASURES TO INFORM PUBLIC OF DRUGS NOT THERAPEUTICALLY EQUIVALENT ACCORDING TO QUAD STANDARDS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact many patients are continuing to use drugs that are not therapeutically equivalent as determined by QUAD analytical standards, will the minister indicate to the House the measures being taken by the government to inform the public of these potentially ineffective drugs so that appropriate substitution can be made?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the QUAD program is in operation and the department will issue another publication next year, with an additional list of drugs.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice a number of members are seeking supplementaries to previous questions. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to note the supplementaries of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for St. Paul's and give them some kind of priority tomorrow, although in fairness I think I should recognize the hon. member for Lambton-Kent now for one supplementary.

Mr. Holmes: Will the minister indicate if the government has plans to reimburse those patients who have found it necessary to discard a drug that has failed to pass one or more of the QUAD analytical standards? I refer in particular to those on fixed incomes such as our old age pensioners?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the implication of the question, and the answer is no.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed, from Tuesday, February 20, 1973, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Mr. Caccia.]

Mr. Speaker: When this debate was adjourned some weeks ago, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) had the floor.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the fact that a large number of members wish to participate in this debate, I wonder whether the House would agree to limiting the speeches to 20 minutes. If we impose this restraint, it will provide an additional amount of time for other members who wish to speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed and so ordered?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, our party will not agree with this suggestion as long as we shall not come to an understanding regarding the use of Thursday as an opposition day.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I began this speech on February 20 by indicating I would vote for second reading of Bill C-2 in the belief that detailed discussion of the subject in committee would probably result in the passing of amendments. I also indicated that I believed the vote should reflect the will of the majority of Canadians, just as my vote will reflect the majority opinion of my constituents.

I had been presenting different opinions, and today I should like to read two more. The first is an extract from an article which appeared in Le Devoir on February 6 by Fr. Guy Bourgeault. He said:

[Translation]

> . . . I could quote various studies for the benefit of our bilingual members of Parliament . . . they all go to show that the abolition of the death penalty has no noticeable effect on crime.
>
> Despite the progress made by the abolitionist movement, and despite all the studies that have been made into the subject, there are still many who wish to retain capital punishment. They see it as primarily a means of intimidation and dissuasion, and consequently, a means of protecting society against criminals. But the experience of many countries demonstrates that the death penalty does not have the intimidating effect that we tend to suppose it has, and that abolition does not bring about an increase in crime.
> For society to protect itself, it will have to prevent crime by applying the necessary socio-economic adjustments.
> . . . sub-human socio-economic conditions are an important factor in crime. In other words the criminal is often—perhaps always—both a victim of existing social disorder and the cause of a new social disorder. Or again, to quote the title of a once-famous film, we are all murderers. For collective responsibilities are not only sub- or super-personal ones; they are also personal responsibilities. All of us together are . . . responsible for the continuation of unjust social structures which prevent some individuals from fulfilling their possibilities. If these people end up committing murder, dare we judge them and punish them just like that?
> However, those who seek to justify the death penalty invoke much more than societys need for protection by intimidating the potential killer. It becomes a requirement of justice; the murderer shall be put to death, the Bible said . . .; and St. Paul considered the prince raising the blade to the murderer as "a minister of God carrying out vengeance on him who has done evil"... "Killing sinners is not only allowed, but necessary, if they are harmful or dangerous to the community", Thomas Aquinas was to say later...: the part must be sacrificed that the whole may remain healthy...

... for the Christian these are evangelical landmarks that he cannot easily ignore; they tell him what, in God's eyes, is the value of any human life. The value that God puts on man's life was revealed to man in Jesus Christ: his life and his death. And his ressurection.

[English]

I should like also to read extracts from the brief on capital punishment submitted by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. First, on deterrence:

The threat by society to punish must not be an empty one.

And on the possibility of error:

The safeguards which presently exist and the principles governing the judicial system virtually guarantee freedom from error.

And on the question of justification:

Is society justified in taking away a life? This question can be answered by another question— "Is society justified in making war?" There is a fundamental answer which even from the philosophical point of view cannot be refuted. Society does have the right to protect itself by whatever means are necessary.

From a booklet on capital punishment produced by Mr. Guy Favreau when he was Minister of Justice in 1965, I should like to read the following:

Some persons approach the issue of a death penalty from a straightforward moral viewpoint, the abolitionists among them believing that it is wicked and unwarranted for the state to take a human life in any circumstances and the retentionists believing that the crime of murder is so heinous that death is the only punishment which is consonant with a sound moral sense in the community. Neither of these groups is likely to change camp upon considerations of deterrent effect; the conclusions are deeply and subjectively rooted in background, training, philosophy and religion.

Further on in the booklet we read, and I underline this statement:

The rights of the individual must not be considered as sacred to the point where the rights of society are subjugated thereto.

And another extract which is relevant:

If a threat is an empty one which cannot or will not ever be actualized, it will not influence conscious or unconscious deliberations of the individual. It is, therefore, not a question as to whether society imposes capital punishment or life imprisonment for murder, it is whether those sentences are actually carried out.

Five thousand of my constituents replied to a questionaire on this subject. Only 22 per cent of them favoured abolition. Thirteen per cent supported the limited retention, provision for which is made in the bill before us. An overwhelming 65 per cent supported the death penalty for all first degree murders. I have presented a selection of the opinions which have been material to me in reaching my own decision. As one medical doctor in my county stated, an abolitionist cannot vote for retention of capital punishment even if that is the majority opinion of his constituents. Possibly, one day, I shall vote for abolition, but while I am willing to send a man to die before enemy guns, and while I believe the rights of society cannot be subjugated to the rights of an individual, I shall continue to support effective measures to protect society, including the death penalty for all first degree murders.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, this is a most important subject and a most difficult one. I think it is the third debate on capital punishment in which I have engaged, and I find that, generally, members are more inclined to bare their souls in a debate of this sort, which I think is all to the good. I am always pleased when we in this chamber have what we call a free vote. I think the less frequently we have the laying on of the party whip, the more mature becomes our deliberative assembly.

I find this a question of extreme difficulty, a sentiment a number of my colleagues have already expressed. Last October, a reporter from one of Canada's great newspapers called me up in Charlottetown and asked me for my views on this question. I told him it was not easy to give my views but I tried to give him a balanced statement. A few weeks ago a reporter from another distinguished Canadian journal asked me the same question, and I gave what I thought was the same balanced answer. I may say that neither of these answers ever saw the light of day, because to be moderate in one's view is not the way to get in the press.

I am not able to be dogmatic or precise on the matter, not because I have not thought about it, but because I have thought much about it. When I spoke in this chamber seven years ago I confessed then that I entered the debate with a feeling far removed from supreme over-confidence in the rightness of my view. I may say that I have not moved toward any greater dogmatism in the years since; nor have developments in our society made the question any easier of adjudication. Indeed, it seems to me that this present time is an unfortunate time to be discussing an issue with such ramifications.

This very day we find great anxiety about what is going on in our penal institutions. We have an aura of violence which is disturbing. We have very serious assaults upon our police forces. Indeed, I thought earlier in this session that probably it would have been the course of wisdom for some agreement to be found to extend the provisions of the present act for a year or two and then to bring it up again, perhaps more hopefully, at a stage in our society which was a little more stable and which would be conducive to a little easier in-depth study of this very fundamental question.

In addition to the basic challenge in dealing with a question which has broad sociological, philosophic and indeed moral aspects, we have in the Canadian situation and in the bill before us some other factors which add grave difficulty for those trying to make up their minds. One which comes to mind is this, that for years in this country, no matter what the law said, no matter what the Code decreed, we had ipso facto abolition of the death penalty. Every Canadian knew this, every legislator knew it, and that historic fact makes this kind of debate totally academic. Even in cases involving the death of policemen, wardens and the like, and in the absence of any appeal for clemency, the sentence of death has been commuted without exception year after year. So, in a sense, we know in our hearts that we are talking in vacuum.

Another matter that disturbs people is that in today's reality life imprisonment means something quite different from life imprisonment. We find that a short passage of years is sufficient before one who is committed to life imprisonment is again moving about in society, and this of course adds to the gravity and the seriousness, of the matter, as well as to the perplexity and concern of the Canadian people.

The present bill also has an obvious, easily recognized and patent inconsistency which makes it extremely difficult to be enthusiastic about it, or certainly to use a logical approach to it. If capital punishment is abolished because it is not a deterrent and that generally is the reason given for its abolition—then why is capital punishment retained for the murder of certain citizens? If the death penalty is viewed as a deterrent to the murder of police and penitentiary officers, why is it not considered a deterrent to the murder of other members of society? This seems to me to be a logical question that should present itself immediately to the members of the House. Because we cannot have it both ways. If the death penalty deters, why limit its deterring effect? If it does not deter, why pretend that as against certain members of society it in fact does?

I take second place to no one in my regard for the police forces of the nation, nor in my appreciation of the tremendous responsibilities and risks that they are taking in the protection of the generality of society in an age where violence if far too rife and tranquility far too rare. I have paid especial attention to the representations from the various police organizations that have come to me, as they have come to all other hon. members. If I were convinced that the death penalty helped diminish the risk faced by our police forces, I would support its return. But if I were that convinced, then I would not limit this protection to our police forces only; I would draw the mantle of that protection over all members of society, over all my fellow citizens.

I listened with interest to the speech made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on January 30 when he addressed himself to this particular aspect of the bill. As reported at page 787 of Hansard, the right hon. member said:

> If a man goes to Government House and assassinates the Governor General, he is liable to be sentenced to life imprisonment. If in running away he fired a shot, not towards the police officer who is following him but ahead and the bullet ricochets off a plate on a tree and kills the policeman, he is guilty of capital murder.

He then went on to say he was opposed to the system of selective condemnation for murder as an expedient that would not work and which has not worked. I find that a compelling observation. As the hon. member who preceded me mentioned, all of us have received numerous representations. One which moved me greatly was a very, very perceptive and sensitive letter from a group of pupils in a junior school in my constituency. I was impressed by their interest and in the clarity of their thought. Many have written to us and brought forward moral reasons for their point of view, and they have prevailed upon us to take a similar point of view.

Some people in Canada are convinced that the execution of a citizen by the state is immoral and that should end the matter. They contend that the basic ethical underpinning of our social structure is vitiated by the taking of a life by those placed in authority over society. I have the greatest respect for the sincerity of those people who feel so convinced, and I wish today, as I wished in 1967 when I last spoke on this subject, that I could base my judgment so firmly on moral and religious grounds and be so sure of the rightness of my presentation.

Others have written to us quoting Holy Writ as leading ineluctably to the imposition of capital punishment. Happily my church, the Presbyterian Church of Canada, does not lay upon its members any directives in the matter, but a recent issue of the Church's publication, the "Presbyterian Record," produced something which I found extremely interesting. I quote:

● (1530)

> A recent news item included the following quotation from the minutes of the Presbytery ... of ... "Whereas the word of God teaches that capital punishment is the will of God for those guilty of murder, the Presbytery of ... of the Presbyterian Church in Canada urges the government of Canada to reinstate the death penalty for those found guilty of murder."

The writer of the article to which I referred of April, 1973, in the Presbyterian Record went on to state:

> The presbytery is quite correct. The word of God teaches that "the murderer must be put to death." As a matter of fact the word of God tells us that whoever strikes or reviles his mother or father, whoever commits witchcraft, beastiality, adultery, incest or homosexuality should also be put to death. Furthermore, the story of Ananias and Sapphira strongly indicates that those who lie or withhold any possessions from the church should also fall under set sentence of death. If the Canadian government asked the Presbytery of ... to state the word of God regarding these offences it would appear that the presbytery would have no choice but to state it is the will of God that the entire population of Canada be executed!

This writer did not think of it and I do not know why I did not, but I remember Christ defining adultery in a very broad way. He said that he who lusted after a woman committed adultery with her in his heart, so that would take quite a wide sweep, I am afraid. He then went on to say that St. John said anyone who hated was in fact a murderer. There are very few people in our society who have not at one time or other said they hated this, hated that, hated him or hated her.

This was all serious, but in a much more profound delineation of this argument, this writer went on to state:

> If any murderers should be executed it should be those who murdered the Son of God.

For those, even Christ himself proclaimed not death, but forgiveness. I do not want to use my whole time as this is a very important debate and there are many people who wish to talk about this matter, but I have read a great deal of material on the subject. One of the best articles was the second research report of the Solicitor General's department brought out by Mr. Fattah. He opened with a foreword which is a quotation from a great literary man of our time, Boris Pasternak, and I quote:

> If the beast who sleeps in man could be held down by threats—any kind of threat, whether of jail or of retribution after death—then the highest emblem of humanity would be the lion tamer in the circus with his whip, not the Prophet who sacrificed himself.

That is a powerful quote, one which should cause some reflection. He then quotes George Devreux as follows:

> The theory of capital punishment is the most conspicuous instance of hedonistic rationalizations and the most convincing example of its fallacious nature. The failure of capital punishment as a deterrent is rooted in a peculiar aspect of human psychology. I refer to man's inability to conceive of his own death.

That too is a pungent comment, Mr. Speaker.

John Bright was one of the great figures in British history, he said:

A deep reverence for human life is worth more than a thousand executions in the prevention of murder; and is, in fact, the great security of human life. The law of capital punishment whilst pretending to support this reverence, does infact, tned to destroy it.

This, too, I find impelling.

As I see it, Sir, we all must in the long run leave our representations, our notes and our Gallup polls aside and make up our own minds. As I see it, the basic question is whether the death penalty is a deterrent to the crime of murder. I do not belong to those who argue that the right to impose death is beyond the ultimate right of the state. I think the state, in the interest of the safety and security of its members, acting in the interests of its members, may impose the ultimate sanction. If I were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that a state hangman would make for a more safe and more secure society, I would support his return as a move toward the over-all good of the members of society. If the evidence which I have studied led me to that ineluctable conclusion I would support that return, but I have to come back to the essential question: Is capital punishment a deterrent to the crime of murder?

The statistics here are no more persuasive, although almost as pervasive, as the scriptures. The data I have checked would lead me to believe there is not a clear-cut case that the imposition of the death penalty is a deterrent to murder. With all the inadequacies I have mentioned, and I hope that some improvements may be made in the committee, where we can put ourselves on a level with something closer to our view, I am prepared to support the measure for another five years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: One of the pieces of evidence which impressed me most was that again found in the first conclusion of Mr. Fattah's report as follows:

If the increase in homicide were solely due to the suspension of capital punishment then it should be limited to this offence. Other offences of violence for which there has not been a change in punishment should show no increase or at least a lower increase than that in criminal homicide. Our data amply show that this is not true. Actually the increase in criminal homicide is the lowest among all crimes of violence studied, a fact which indicates that such increase can neither be attributed nor related to the suspension of capital punishment.

I think that is a very important observation because we are all much disturbed by the rise in violence in our society, and it compels us to look with greater clarity than ever before for the real reasons. I believe that if we came to the easy conclusion that society generally would be better with the return to capital punishment we would be misreading our society's needs and intentions, and perhaps seeking a form of relief which in effect would not be efficacious.

So, Mr. Speaker, without any degree of self-righteousness or any abundance of surety on the matter, I have come to the conclusion, after the most careful and earnest thought, and after as much reading and consultation as one can do, that in the circumstances the best course of action I can carve out for myself, thinking of the people of my riding and the people of Canada, is to move on to the committee stage with this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the subject of capital punishment has been an agonizing one for me. Before I was elected to the Parliament of Canada and before the FLQ crisis, I had a very distinct and positive position. I was opposed to capital punishment. During the capture of Pierre Laporte and his subsequent murder, I must admit that I thought the whole question over again. It did not seem proper to me that, under the law, one who would kidnap someone like Pierre Laporte should be subject to the maximum penalty of life imprisonment and yet, if that person were to murder Laporte, as happened in that particular case, he would be subject to the same penalty. This gave rise to a whole rethinking of this question.

Having rethought the matter, I have come now to the conclusion that capital punishment, in spite of these considerations, is something I cannot support. I say that after very careful consideration of the question. I believe that the problem I alluded to a moment ago, that is the disparity of penalty between kidnapping and murder, can be corrected without the use of the ultimate penalty of death itself.

I should like to address myself specifically to the bill before us. The intention of Bill C-2 is to extend the five year moratorium on capital punishment for murder, with the exception of prison guards and police officers, which was introduced in the year 1967, to expire on December 31, 1972. Following second reading which we are considering at the moment, the matter will be referred to the standing committee for further consideration and possible amendment. In my remarks here today, I should like to suggest certain specific amendments that I believe should be undertaken by the committee or which might be suggested by the committee which affect not only the Criminal Code and offences under it, but also penal reform generally and the whole question of parole. I think it is quite clear that every man in society really believes in certain basic, fundamental principles which relate to this question.

First of all, it is paramount today that we, as legislators, give consideration first to the protection of society itself. I think every person we represent really believes this is our first priority. Second, we must make sure that whatever laws exist in the Criminal Code must exist not only to protect society but also to provide a deterrent to others so that they will not commit crime. That is really what the Criminal Code, in my view, is all about.

In addition, I think most people believe in the rehabilitation of the criminal. That is what penal reform, parole and so on are all about. But the rehabilitation of the criminal, important as that is, should not take precedence over the protection of society. I believe it also goes without saying that revenge has no place in our Criminal Code. The prevention of crime is really the name of the game.

This embraces a respect for mankind, a respect for the individual's rights, a respect for an individual's freedom and respect for his property. Indeed, if we have any respect at all for man we must have a basic respect for life itself, not only my life or your life but all life, including that of the criminal. We must respect life, in so far as it is humanly possible without destroying the basic principle of protecting society itself.

Bill C-2 deals specifically with murder, culpable homicide, and not murders by reason of passion or manslaughter. So, arguments in respect of crimes of passion and a person in that particularly agitated state being deterred from committing a crime because of the existence of capital punishment are not relevant to the bill in front of us. I think it is clear, however, that persons committing crimes of passion are not affected by any penalty that might be imposed because such persons are to some degree insane, are not in control of themselves and certainly not thinking rationally of all the consequences which may befall them if caught. In any event, we are talking about culpable homicide, murder, within very strict terms.

Basically, I am opposed to capital punishment unless there is no other way to protect society. Man clearly has the right to protect himself by using any means that is essential to do so. It is quite obvious that one could easily think of a case where an individual, in order to protect his wife and family, would have the right, if it were absolutely essential, to commit an act of murder. If this is true in respect of an individual, I would think that, at least in theory, it would also be true of the state. I do not really subscribe to the argument that the state does not have the right to impose capital punishment. I believe it has that right if that is the only course available to it. I would argue, however, that it is not the only course it could follow in order to achieve its essential objective of protecting society.

Clearly, the policeman or the prison guard is an instrument of the state. In cases of robbery or attempted murder, surely a policeman has the right to protect society by shooting the criminal if that should be the only way to prevent him pursuing his illegal end. That point alone surely is sufficient proof that the state, under certain circumstances, not only has the right but possibly the obligation to exercise that right. However, we are not talking about that temporary resort to violence in order to protect society. We are speaking here of a person who has been convicted of a crime. At that point, hopefully, he is safely in jail and has been taken out of society. We must judge whether we have the right to impose capital punishment on him. Admittedly, in such circumstances the man has already been taken away from society, and society for at least that moment is adequately protected.

Unfortunately, the question of capital punishment is being discussed today against the vivid background of what I would call the permissive society. Many people are moving toward the re-instatement of capital punishment because they are really fed up with the permissive society. Many people feel that capital punishment is advisable because they suspect it is the only way to protect themselves. They feel that a person who is found guilty of culpable murder, is sentenced to life imprisonment but in fact, in a few years he is back in society, able to impose his particular views on society and possibly to murder again. It is against that background that we must look at the question. I think it is in that area we must take some kind of corrective action. There is a feeling that we are far too lenient in rehabilitating the criminal, and that too little cognizance is being given by the Parole Board and by others to the real principle of protecting society. There is a lack of trust in those particular institutions. In my view the question of capital punishment can be properly considered only as a part of the over-all question of the law and penal reform. I hope that the committee which reviews this question will bear in mind this important point.

Earlier I referred to the Laporte case and I should like to talk about it in some detail. I mention that case because it has caused me great concern. In looking at the Criminal Code, we find that the maximum penalty for kidnapping is life imprisonment. The court does not have to impose life imprisonment, but that is the maximum penalty. In respect or murder, the maximum penalty and the minimum penalty are the same, life imprisonment. Let us look at these two things in the concept of someone who would kidnap a person, as happened in the case of Laporte. The penalty would be different if the men kidnapped him or kidnapped him and murdered him. The fact is that in murdering him they did not expose themselves to any further penalty. Given that example, I think we must take some kind of reasonable action. We must look at the maximum penalties and see them in relation to parole.

Under the present law relating to kidnapping, if one is sentenced to life imprisonment one is eligible for parole in a period of seven years. In the case of non-capital murder, which means the murder of anyone other than a policeman or prison guard, one is eligible for parole in a ten-year period. This means that in terms of eligibility for parole, there is only a three year difference between the time when a person sentenced for murder is eligible for parole and the time when the person sentenced for kidnapping is eligible for parole. I think that situation has to be corrected somehow or other. If the person guilty of kidnapping were given less than life imprisonment, then that person would be eligible for parole after the expiration of one third of his sentence or four years, whichever comes earlier, with a minimum amount to be served of nine months. Therefore, a person who is found guilty of kidnapping and is given, say, six years, would be eligible for parole after two.

Another distinction which I have to point out here is that anyone who is given a life sentence is never really free. He may be out of jail on parole, but the fact of the matter is that he is on parole for the rest of his life. This means that any violation of that parole will put him back in jail, which is a very important point to recognize.

Let us have a look at some of the offences for which imprisonment for life becomes the maximum penalty. They are: hijacking according to section 76(1) of the Criminal Code, endangering the safety of aircraft in flight, causing injury with intent, rape, causing death by criminal negligence, capital murder, non-capital murder, manslaughter, attempting to commit murder, kidnapping, abortion, robbery, breaking and entering with intent of committing offences in the dwelling. All of these, and some others, carry with them the maximum penalty of imprisonment for life. It seems to me to be inappropriate that in the case of culpable murder, whether it be of a policeman or whoever, the maximum penalty is exactly the same as for some of these other offences. I have illustrated that point before, and I will make some proposals to try to correct that problem.

I will not propose capital punishment. I think what the situation calls for is the imposition of some minimums, some mandatory regulations in respect of parole in respect of murder. I will suggest that all those who are guilty of culpable murder, whether the person murdered is a prison guard or a policeman or any other member of society, shall not be eligible for parole under any circumstances within a 15 year period. That is a change from 10 years to 15 years. Some people to whom I have spoken feel that perhaps it should be 20 years. It is difficult to make a value judgment on what it ought to be. I am simply saying that my personal view is that it should be 15, but I am willing to recognize that others who perhaps know more about the problem might want to change it, and if the change were from 15 to 20 years I would certainly go along with it.

Second, I should like to propose that all who commit murder while in the process of committing another criminal offence which carries with it a maximum sentence of life imprisonment shall not be eligible for parole in less than 20 years. This means, first, that a person who murders a policeman while committing armed robbery would not be eligible for parole in less than 20 years. Second, it means the same thing in most cases of the murder of prison guards, although there is a flaw in the formula which I think the committee should consider. My definition, while committing another crime which carries with it life imprisonment, would not include the person who, in attempting to escape from prison, commits murder. A specific reference would have to be made to that case, and I would be willing to go along with that. In my view this would provide a deterrent, and would provide a significant difference between a sentence of life imprisonment for offences other than murder and a sentence of life imprisonment for the offence of murder.

I would like to deal for a moment with the question of whether the death penalty is, in fact, a deterrent. I indicated earlier that I believe the state has the right to protect society. I believe that it has the right to impose the death penalty. But I do not believe that it should impose the death penalty if there is any other alternative available which is equally effective, and I believe that there are other alternatives available which are equally effective. In my view the death penalty for the offence of murder is certainly not a deterrent. People can argue this in both directions, but let me quote some of the statistics which have been quoted in the House before but which have led me to believe that the death penalty does not provide a deterrent. The study which I have before me reads:

New Zealand abolished capital punishment in 1941, restored it in 1950 and again abolished it in 1961. During the 1961 debate on the Crimes Bill, the Minister of Justice, the Hon. J. R. Hanan, noted that although the penalty for murder changed three times, in 1935, in 1950 and in 1957, the figures for murder were not affected. During seven years of capital punishment (1951-1957) 22 murderers were convicted. Eight of the murderers were hanged. In the nine years following the suspension of capital punishment the figure was 24.

In New Zealand, from 1936 until 1941 the death penalty was never carried out in practice. If as a starting datum the year 1936 were taken, then it would be found that in the 15 year period during which the death penalty was not imposed in New Zealand (1936-1950) there were 148 murders; in the 15 year period before 1936 there were 154. In other words, there was a reduction of six in the number of murders after executions had stopped. This figure is very significant if examined in relation to what was happening to the population of New Zealand. At the beginning of the 30 year period in 1920, the population was approximately 1,250,000, and in 1950, the end of the 30 year period, the population was about 2,000,000. Such an increase demonstrates that the decline in the murder rate was substantial although the difference in the number was only six.

That certainly indicates to me that at least in that country, the abolition of capital punishment did not give rise to an increase in the murder rate. The same conclusion can be reached from a study of almost all the statistics you want to find. I believe the murder rates in the death penalty states and in the abolitionist states of the United States have been cited. The rate in the abolitionist states per one million of population was .510. In the death penalty states it was .570. So, it would seem to me that those figures as well would tend to lead one to believe that there is no direct relationship between abolition and the incidence of murder.

I should like to quote further in respect of this:

With regard to the United Kingdom figures, an article commenting on criminal statistics for 1966 said:

"In the statistics covering the first year since the suspension of the death penalty, the murder figures naturally attract particular attention. The murders recorded during the year numbered 143 which was 10 less than in 1965 and 12 fewer than 1964. Such a variation is within the normal range of variations in the crime over the years, and appears only to confirm the experience of this and other countries that the presence or absence of capital punishment makes little difference to the number of murders committed."

● (1600)

I think that ought to be enough to indicate that capital punishment does not have any significant effect on the number of murders committed. If it is not a deterrent then why use it, unless you want to use it as some form of revenge, adopting the argument of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth? It seems to me governments should not exercise themselves in that kind of moral judgment.

Our responsibility is to protect society and we have to use every means available to us to do that, but we must never use the absolute punishment of death unless it is the only means available. I do not believe it is. I think the death penalty is a very effective deterrent with respect to some crimes, and to use a reductio ad absurdum argument, if you applied it for exceeding the speed limit, you would certainly cut down on the number of offences. But it would be an inappropriate penalty. You could impose the death penalty for all kinds of minor crimes. As a matter of fact, many countries do that, and it can have a great effect. However, in respect of murder, the worst of crimes, I do not believe that it has any effect at all. In cases where it does have a deterrent effect, I think it is totally inappropriate.

Over the passage of the last few thousand years, we have moved away from the idea of corporal punishment which was carried out with great abandon in many countries. People guilty of certain crimes had their right arms cut off, and people guilty of other crimes had their left arms cut off. People had their eyes plucked out, or the foreheads were branded to indicate to everybody in society to beware of them because they had previously committed a crime. That kind of corporal punishment is frowned on today. I do not think that anybody in our society would say we ought to cut off both the legs of a murderer, but surely that kind of punishment is something less than putting him to death. If we do not subscribe to putting out his eyes or cutting off his limbs, how can we subscribe to breaking his neck? I really don't understand that.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to capital punishment because, (1) it is not a deterrent to murder; (2) it is unnecessarily severe and we do not have to go to that length to protect society; (3) society can be properly protected without the use of capital punishment and I have outlined some changes in the parole system and Criminal Code which would assure that, and (4) there is too much room for error. If one looks at the statistics in respect of the hanging of innocent people, one will find they are much more significant than one might have thought possible. I find it reprehensible that any society would take such a final step, in many cases on the basis of hearsay evidence or in conclusive evidence. Those who advocate capital punishment consider wrongful conviction as only a limited possibility. But although most mistakes are prevented by the judicial system and executive clemency, some occur due to mistaken identification, inadequate circumstantial evidence, perjured testimony, overlooking and suppressing of evidence and unreliable expert evidence, not to mention excessive zeal on the part of investigators or prosecutors.

In a 40 year period, 12.3 per cent of the 406 persons sent to Sing Sing prison for execution were found, upon reconsideration, to have been sentenced in error. Hartung found that in Michigan, which does not have the death penalty, judges and juries erred in 10.9 per cent of 759 life imprisonment convictions for murder in the first degree from 1942 to 1951. I suggest that it is inconceivable that we in this parliament could advocate such a final solution to a problem, considering the enormous possibility of error and the fact that the error can never be repaired. Under these circumstances I, personally, refuse to be the hangman for society. I have too much respect for human life, and I have too much concern for society itself to think that it is necessary to impose that kind of solution on a problem that can be solved in a less dramatic way.

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, lest there be any doubt, first of all I would like to stipulate that I am an absolute and total abolitionist. I make no apologies for it, and I have no qualms about it. Perhaps it is because I am an impressionable person, or was very impressionable when I was young. I remember that in the 1930's a young man was convicted of murder and sentenced to hang. All the people in the area signed petitions and requested clemency. I remember people going around looking for dollar bills, even for nickels and dimes to help this man. There was very little money in those days. That man was hung, and I heard many of the neighbours say that they wished capital punishment would be abolished once and for all. Not too long ago I talked to some of the signers of the petitions. Many of them are still ardent abolitionists. However, a few of them now say that they want the death penalty. It seems that the further people are removed in space and time from the act of putting a man to death deliberately, the more likelihood there is that they will be in favour of capital punishment.

Several months ago, when this debate began, one of the members of the Conservative party indicated that his party would be the only party that would have a truly free vote on this issue. I want to assure that hon. member that the members of this party will also be free to vote as they wish. Each member of the NDP will vote according to the dictates of his conscience. I am an abolitionist and I will vote for Bill C-2, although it still has provisions for capital punishment for the murderers of prison guards and policemen. I think that this provision should also be removed.

Statistically, the likelihood of a policeman or prison guard, who is doing his job, losing his life is about three in 10,000. The likelihood of a miner doing his job and losing his life is about 11 in 10,000. and the likelihood of a farmer losing his life when in the fields working with farm equipment is about six in 10,000. That is one of the occupational hazards. I want to point out that abolition has been party policy with us for years. One reason I am a New Democrat is that my party has policies. I would not doubt that most NDP members will vote for this bill, although I understand that several of them are seriously thinking of not voting for it. Most of the members of my party will vote for this bill because they know this is one of the things the NDP stands for, and that is perhaps one of the reasons that brought them to our party in the first place.

Our party has adopted policies which originated at our conventions. I remember that policies on abolition were adopted as long as 25 or 30 years ago. Of course, these policies have formed the basis of our action in the political arena, whether it be the House of Commons, a provincial legislature or our own constituencies. Other parties have policy conventions, but I have heard it said, or read somewhere, that they have made it a habit to burn their policy statements after a new leader is chosen.

Let me now turn to the question of abolition. Why am I an abolitionist? I am an abolitionist because in periods of crisis, and whenever reactionary elements become more powerful, it becomes too easy for society to make hasty judgments as to the innocence or guilt of a man. Let me preface my remarks by saying that from 1881 to 1960, on the average, approximately 52 persons out of 100 convicted for murder were in fact hanged; the other 48 had their sentences commuted. In other words, 52 per cent of those convicted were executed.

Now, let us look for a minute at the years 1931-35. Here, we find that there were 83 executions out of 106 death sentences. The percentage of executions in death sentences was approximately 83. This was the highest percentage of executions in Canadian history. The period between 1931 and 1935 was also an age of reaction, counter-reaction and discontent. These were the days of the depression, drought, unemployment, riots, the Ku Klux Klan and the communist scare. Many authorities have pointed out that there were several executions during this period which were probably not justified, since some of the accused were immigrants not cognizant of their rights. The translators used were not always the best, either, and because of the lack of proper defence counsel in some cases it was believed that not all evidence was brought to court. In passing I should mention that this was the age in which the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation was born.

I am an abolitionist because, once in a while, I like to take a leaf out of the thoughts of certain minority groups in this country; in this particular instance I am referring to the original Canadians, the Indians. Many Indian tribes in Canada never did believe in capital punishment and they never practised it. The Indian people feel that one murder does not justify another murder by the state. They feel that a murderer should have an opportunity to regain his honour. This presupposes that an execution does not take place. I also know that Indian people accept a paroled murderer in their midst far more readily than white society does; indeed there are many instances of the acceptance of a murderer after parole even by close relatives of the victim. I know of such cases in my native north-western Saskatchewan.

I am an abolitionist because there are many deaths in our society which in many instances are tantamount to murder but which are not considered in this light, and the perpetrators get off scot-free. We, in this House, do not prohibit cigarette advertising; yet how many people in this country die each year of lung cancer? How many deaths are there because of the sloppy work of some doctors? Yet, what sentence is meted out to these doctors, if any? There have been instances when bridges under construction have collapsed and many men have been killed. Subsequent investigation has revealed that inferior materials had been deliberately used; yet the presidents of these companies got off scot-free. There have been instances where improper shoring or no shoring at all was used when sewer trenches were dug and men have died; yet no one was charged with murder. There are mines in this country where conditions are conducive to silicosis and lung cancer. Miners die, yet many people who could do something to solve hazards in mines do nothing about them. This includes Members of Parliament.

I am an abolitionist because society collectively breeds murder and when a murderer is guilty, we are all guilty to a degree. Many here consider me as a bleeding heart. I do not think I am one. In 1967, there were 29 murders in Saskatchewan; nine of these occurred on August 15, 1967, when a family of nine were ruthlessly shot down in the early morning hours. Within several days the murderer was apprehended because of the astute work of the RCMP. The murderer was 21 years old and evidence produced at court later showed that he had symptoms of schizophrenia when he was six years old. In the murderer's own words "he had to kill, and kill, and kill", because he felt he was acting as the agent of the devil. He was a patient in a mental hospital from May 29 to July 26 of that year. He was discharged, partly because the psychiatrists thought there was some regression of schizophrenia and partly because there was a great deal of pressure being put on the hospital by the government of the day to cut down on medicare and hospitalization costs. He was found not guilty by reason of insanity. However, if he had been kept in hospital awhile longer this tragic event may not have happened. Immediately after this crime, the mental hospital authorities took steps to screen their discharges a lot more carefully than they had in the past.

On January 30, 1969, seven people were slain with an axe in a community in northwestern Saskatchewan. The suspect was apprehended almost immediately and in the wake of the slaying the Saskatchewan government liquor board store was closed and a scheduled showing of the murder-mystery "Beserk" in a local movie house was cancelled. It turned out that the suspect was found not guilty by reason of insanity. Long before the murder, he confided that he had thought about killing mounties. No one really suspected he was mentally ill and he was never treated. During the trial his mother was described as a woman who drank all the time and was never married. He had three brothers and five sisters, most of whom were from different fathers. In his youth he was inadequately clothed and did not have enough food. He was taken away from his mother at age 11 by the Department of Welfare and lived in a series of foster homes from which he usually ran away. The only happy foster home he had was at Swift Current. But he felt lonely and missed the north country.

I have mentioned these two cases, Mr. Speaker, because to me they illustrate that if somehow the environmental circumstances of these two murderers could have been changed, then perhaps these tragedies could have been avoided. I am an abolitionist because, despite the basic integrity of our judicial system, I sometimes question its infallibility. Judges and juries have been known to make mistakes and the utter finality of capital punishment leaves no room for correction of them. In England, in 1953, Timothy Evans was hanged for a murder he did not commit.

I am an abolitionist because it is in keeping with my personal Christian beliefs. Many retentionists quote from Genesis to justify capital punishment, as do various church groups. They say, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." However, I think of Jesus Christ and the prostitute who was to be stoned by the crowd, and Christ said, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone . . .". Somewhere in the Bible the statement, "Vengeance is mine . . . saith the Lord" also appears. Consequently, as a Christian, I feel that a murderer should be segregated from society and God, in His ultimate wisdom, will pass final judgment on him.

Retentionists argue for the death penalty. They say that ultimately it will save more lives because of the deterrent effect. However, I remind hon. members that many more lives could be saved by more intensive research into the causes and cure for cancer and heart research, alcoholism rehabilitation centres, providing conditions in mines which will make it less likely that miners will die an early death as a result of silicosis or lung cancer, enforcing safety regulations in our construction industry and so on. We can save many more lives by other methods than by capital punishment.

All violent crimes have been on the increase. Most of these are increasing at a faster rate than murder. Of course, we are not suggesting capital punishment for assault and battery. I believe in law and order and in maintaining the integrity of our police forces. There is one area in my constituency where women and children are afraid to go out after nightfall. One individual has been charged with assault on three different occasions. Each time he obtained a suspended sentence. He has so little respect for the police now that he deliberately flaunts them and makes the whole business of law enforcement very difficult.

Surely our courts should give a little more support to the police, especially if the evidence is foolproof. Letting a man off once on a suspended sentence is fine. In many instances, that is all that is required. However, when the same man repeats the same offence a couple more times, surely the man should be removed from the community for a time. It also behooves me to say that a little more regard should be given to the appointment of judges. This should be done on the basis of merit rather than on the basis of political affiliation. Under these circumstances, perhaps it might be possible to have a little more uniformity in the application of our laws.

Someone in this House stated today that we have a permissive society. This is so because of permissive parents and permissive institutions. We live in an age of violence. I wish to give an example of what happened several months ago in a hockey game between Portage la Prairie and Humboldt. It was a junior hockey league series for the Centennial Cup. Humboldt withdrew because of excessive violence. One Humboldt player was severely maimed at Portage la Prairie. He may never be able to play again. While on the ice, the players were slashed and speared. It seems that the players on the opposing team were trying to perform deliberate mayhem. The Canadian Amateur Hockey Association reprimanded the coach and players of the Humboldt team for withdrawing from that series.

Here we have a form of legalized violence in a national sport. I feel that for this sport and many others, laws should be made to protect people whether they are on or off the skating rink. Any hockey player causing violence deliberately should be criminally prosecuted. This is a difficult decision for many Members of Parliament. Many have conducted polls in their constituencies. I have never conducted a poll, but I have received many letters on the subject. Fortunately, my choice will be much easier than that of many members. Approximately 60 per cent of the correspondence I received is from people basically in favour of Bill C-2. The only point they have made, and this is in keeping with what was said by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), is that life imprisonment should be just that. After deliberately committing murder, a person should not be eligible for parole after six or seven years. The people who wrote to me feel that life imprisonment should be at least 20, 25 or 30 years. They also feel that more care should be taken by the parole board before letting a murderer out on parole. These people have expressed some reservations about granting leave to a supposed murderer a few months after being convicted and put in prison.

Many Canadians are frightened because justice is not always administered as it should be. I agree with having a humane prison system as well as granting leaves to certain types of murderers. I also believe in training for those who have committed offences against society. However, we have an important duty to preserve the safety of the communities of this country.

[Mr. Nesdoly.]

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, many previous participants in this debate have remarked that at this stage most members have already made up their minds and it is hardly likely that their attitudes will be changed in the course of the debate, even by the most eloquent speeches. I am sure this is probably true, but I hope many hon. members will be listening to the speeches because perhaps some of them can be swayed.

I, personally, during my election campaign told the people in my constitutency that I would support the abolition of capital punishment. During the period after the election and before this House opened, I took it upon myself to do a lot of research into this subject because I knew it would be coming up. I read many books, I interviewed inmates from our federal penitentiaries and, after this procedure, I have changed my mind.

I will speak on some of the reasons why I have changed my mind in a moment, Mr. Speaker, but I would not be doing my duty as a member of this House if I did not mention my concern over the government presenting this bill to this House as a priority item when we still have over 500,000 people unemployed and many old age pensioners and other people on fixed incomes having a hard time with the cost of living rising from month to month. I cannot understand this government bringing in this bill. Why do I say this? Since the Trudeau government was first elected in 1968, capital punishment has been abolished. As a matter of fact, there has not been one single person hanged since this government came into power, so what is the big rush to get in this bill? I say the government is wasting time, stalling. They should be dealing with positive programs to stop high unemployment and high inflation. Where is their contingency plan for price and income controls?

I should like now to get back to some of my reasons for changing from an abolitionist to a retentionist. We must realize that when we are talking about the criminal element in our federal penitentiaries in this country, we are only talking about 1/30 of 1 per cent of all the people in Canada. It seems strange to me that this House has to spend so much time on the death penalty and bail reform debates when we are only dealing with 1/30 of 1 per cent of all the people in Canada. I think it is time we got a little tougher with these people who cannot conform in society and did a better job of looking after the 99 29/30 per cent of the people who are not in our penitentiaries.

When we talk about capital punishment, we are not talking about hanging everyone who commits murder. We are talking about the hard-core criminal who premeditates and decides he is going to kill somebody. This is the man we are talking about. We are not talking about the man who commits murder in a fit of passion, the man who is insane. We are talking about the hard-core criminal who cheats the public, breaks the laws to make his living, who doesn't want to change and who looks upon murder as part of his business. I say that these murderers who murder for a living should be eliminated from society. Like most Canadians, I am heartsick at listening to the quotes of so-called research experts who will go to any length to rehabilitate, at the expense of the taxpayers, killers who in many cases have proven themselves, by repeated crimes, unworthy of such consideration.

I ask the government to prepare a plebiscite for the next national election on the abolition of capital punishment. Let the people of Canada decide what they want to do with their murderers. To this end, I have introduced a private member's bill, No. C-117, an act to provide for a national plebiscite on the abolition of capital punishment. I hope the government will see fit, before my bill comes up for debate, to adopt this proposal for the next election so that the people of Canada can decide on this very serious moral issue.

I certainly believe in rehabilitation of the criminal, but some of the acts of this government in the past four years have just gone too far for the average Canadian to take. I should like, just for a couple of minutes, to discuss our new bail reform laws.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in a press release issued a few weeks ago stated, and I quote:

Although the new bail laws have not been in operation long enough to judge accurately the impact and results, there was general agreement across Canada that the new regulations were working well and offered a significant improvement in personal liberty over the previous existing laws and practices.

Where has the minister been? Certainly not out in British Columbia. Has he talked to any judges or policemen? The new Bail Reform Act is a farce, and I suggest to the minister that he must be having too many meetings with the so-called research experts. The government should stop listening to these bleeding hearts. Mr. Speaker, can you believe that four convicts in British Columbia were given a $10,000 LIP grant to do a study on heroin? The result of the study, other than many free hours outside their cells, was a recommendation by the four convicts to legalize heroin and abolish prisons! I guess this could seem humorous to some people, Mr. Speaker, but I feel it is totally irresponsible. Donald Anderson, who is 48 years old and head of the project, disappeared with a 17-year-old girl and $3,000 at the end of the program.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member in the midst of his speech, but it does seem to me he is straying away from the question of capital punishment. I ask him to address himself to the subject under consideration.

Mr. Reynolds: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am just trying to show, with the aid of these examples, why the present bill is not working.

Now, I would like to get down to some facts. Many members in favour of abolition stood up and said the whole world is abolishing the death penalty. Well, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that Canada is one of 58 countries which retains the death penalty. At last count, authorities in 27 countries had given up the death penalty either by law or by virtue of simply not executing anyone. That is a fact. Another fact: two countries are experiencing strong support for the return of the death penalty. In Britain, where capital punishment was abolished except for treason after a five-year period in 1969, and also in West Germany, there is strong feeling for the return of the death penalty. I think the reason for these reinstatement movements in Britain and West Germany is that the people of these countries feel like the people of Canada—that the hard-core criminal who does not want to live by the standards society sets should go to jail, and that a hard-core murderer who wants to murder an innocent victim should pay with his own life.

Mr. Speaker, I would like now to review a couple of murder cases in British Columbia. The first is that of a Mr. Rene Castellani who was sentenced in 1966 for the murder of his wife. His method of murder was putting arsenic in milk shakes during a period of 13 months. Our laws state that 10 years must be served before parole, but Mr. Castellani is living in Abbotsford, B.C., and working in a bookstore. I understand he checks into the prison once or twice a week, and punches the time-clock like a regular working man. What kind of punishment is this for a man who committed such a brutal crime?

The second case, Mr. Speaker, concerns Mr. Lorenzo Hiscock who was sent to Kingston in December, 1962, for the murder of his first wife. This charge was later reduced to one of manslaughter and he was sentenced to 14 years. Mr. Hiscock was paroled from Joyceville on January 19, 1968. He was readmitted to penitentiary in British Columbia on July 5, 1972 and has been charged with the murder of his common-law wife. This case shows that the death penalty can be a deterrent.

In one of my previous comments I mentioned the words "research experts" once or twice. I think I would refer to them rather as bleeding hearts. I would like to read into the record of this House of Commons a letter I have in my possession. It is written on Canadian penitentiary stationery. The heading is: British Columbia Penitentiary, Box 150, New Westminster, B.C. The letter is addressed to the District Representative, The National Parole Service, 2nd floor, 32988 South Fraser Way, Abbotsford, B.C. The reference number is 3808—Head CDG. Mr. Speaker, the comments in this letter are about Charles Head, the same Charles Head who has been mentioned in this House of Commons by some hon. members many times; the Charles Head who on four different occasions was convicted of brutal, sexual assaults on girls between the ages of six and nine years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member poses an interesting question. It is usually the practice here that when a document is read into the record, a letter, for example, the author is identified. Perhaps the hon. member could assist me in reaching a decision as to whether the letter should be read into the record. Is he prepared to identify the author?

Mr. Reynolds: I do not have the name of the author but I do have a copy of the letter in my files. If you wish, I could paraphrase the letter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems to me that it names somebody who has been before the courts and who has been convicted of the crime of murder. I really should like to hear some argument from hon. members before I would be prepared to permit the hon. member to read a statement which has apparently been written about somebody else by a fellow inmate in a penitentiary, for example. Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. Reynolds: It was not written by a fellow inmate, Mr. Speaker, but by somebody who works for the parole service. I think it important that I should read the letter and get my message across that the rehabilitation facilities in prisons are not doing their job.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member be prepared to name the person who wrote the letter?

Mr. Reynolds: No, Mr. Speaker. I think I could get it later, but at the moment I do not have the name of the person who wrote the letter.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Really, I think I should hear further argument on this point. My feeling is that under the rules which govern us, and which have governed us in the past, I should ask the hon. member not to read the letter. However, I am prepared to hear argument. I gather the hon. member for Yukon wishes to assist the Chair to reach what I regard as an important decision.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is the practice of the House for members to be permitted to read such correspondence into the record when the hon. member himself, and no one else, takes responsibility for what he is reading. Quite apart from that, the letter deals with an individual whose background and activities are notorious. They are public knowledge. Individuals have been named over and over again in this Chamber, and correspondence related to them cited without the names of the authors having to be read into the record. I submit it is not in accordance with our practice to insist that this be done. Even if that were not so, the subject matter with which the hon. member is dealing in this debate is a person by the name of Head, whose character, reputation and activities, both past and current, are notorious throughout the length and breadth of this country.

● (1640)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a brief word, Mr. Speaker. May I begin by agreeing with the statement made by the hon. member for Yukon that it has been the practice of this House for a member to be permitted to read a letter without giving the name of the author if he is prepared to make the ideas in the letter his own.

Mr. Nielsen: That is what I said.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But at that point I am afraid I must part company with the hon. member for Yukon. It is not simply a case of taking responsibility; he must give the ideas as his own. It seems to me that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta is trying to give the House the contents of a letter that has come from outside the House without giving the name of the author. In fact, he admitted that he does not have the name before him at the present time. Therefore, I think the hon. member is perfectly free in argument to say that certain ideas have been presented to him with which he concurs; but to read the letter so it goes into Hansard in fine print as though it were a piece of evidence from the outside would not, I think, be appropriate in this case.

Mr. Nielsen: If I might add to that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon has already spoken on the point of order. Are there any other contributions to the point of order?

Mr. Nielsen: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: I just want to point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, through you, Sir, that what I said was that an hon. member who reads such correspondence into the record must take responsibility for doing so. I meant precisely the interpretation that was put upon it by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely that the hon. member adopt the ideas as his own.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a question of privilege and the hon. member really should not have raised it as a question of privilege. Are there any other hon. members who would like to make a contribution to the point of order?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, in order to get around a little bit of difficulty here, I understand that the hon. member has quoted from a letter which, as a matter of fact, has some very great significance. It is apparent that, for various reasons, the latter part of the letter is not available. I suggest the best way out of the difficulty is this. It is too late for the hon. member to paraphrase it, as he could have in the first instance, so I suggest he simply adopt the thoughts as his own in some way that might be akin to paraphrasing, which would get us out of the hole. The letter as such does not have to go into the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank hon. members for their contributions. Whether the person referred to in the letter has a reputation of the utmost notoriety or has no reputation whatsoever which would interest anybody, the fact is that the Chair cannot, of course, make a ruling on that ground. I think it is the duty of the Chair and the responsibility of all hon. members to see that people are treated within the proper limits.

I would ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta if he is prepared, as suggested by the hon. member for Yukon, the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to paraphrase what is in the document and make the comments his own responsibility in regard to what somebody felt about this particular person. This would be permitted by the Chair, but this is the responsibility that now rests on the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Reynolds: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that I have not quoted anything from the letter as yet. If I may repeat my previous comments, I was talking about the same Charles Head who, on four different occasions, was convicted of brutal sexual assaults on girls between the ages of six and nine years; the same Charles Head who, during the time he was under a life imprisonment sentence, was once declared criminally insane and had the sentence reduced to 15 years; the same Charles Head who, on a weekend pass, raped, mutilated and murdered Tanya Bush, a girl of seven years, who was the daughter of a prison guard.

I believe, as many others do, that Tanya Bush was killed because there is no death penalty at present for the murder of the wives or children of our prison guards and policemen. There would have been a death penalty if the same Charles Head in his vendetta had killed the prison guard, the father of the little girl. I suggest that by separating prison guards and policemen, we put their families in jeopardy against vicious attacks by these hard-core killers.

I suggest that some of the comments made by people in the parole system about inmates are of interest, and I should like to refer to some comments made about Charles Head:

> This inmate from Mountain Prison was seen today at his request. He had also been reported as becoming emotionally upset again. On the whole, Head has adjusted well to his institutional life at Mountain Prison, and he states he had a short pass to visit his mother at New Year's, 1972. Physically, he looks well, much better than he was when he was confined to the protective custody unit here for several months.
> Attention is drawn to my memo to the Vancouver office of the National Parole Service dated—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask for the co-operation of the hon. member. He is obviously reading from some kind of statement that has been sent to him, a statement of which he himself says he does not know the authorship. It would, therefore, seem to me impossible for the hon. member to vouch for the facts contained therein, since he would have no way of checking their authenticity. I think perhaps he has made his point about the person to whom he has referred and I do not think it would help debate in this parliament if reports such as this, of which there is no authorship, are put on the public record; I do not think that would help our institution at all. We do want to have fair play on matters that are of public interest, so I would ask for the hon. member's co-operation in not reading the document he has before him.

Mr. Reynolds: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I shall abide by your ruling. I should just like to say from my own knowledge that this same man, Charles Head, of whom I am speaking, four months to the day before he killed Tanya Bush was recommended for parole. This recommendation was made by one of the so-called research experts. This is the point I am trying to make. I should like the minister to ascertain who is the author of this letter, and I can supply him with the first page of it. I think people of this sort are the ones who are causing this problem, these so-called "bleeding hearts".

I might also mention at this point that I support the motion moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to set up a parliamentary committee to review our prison system. We should not foist this off on a royal commission or leave it to our judges. The members of this House who have been elected by the people of this country should solve this sort of problem.

The case to which I have referred proves there is an argument in favour of having a deterrent; I think it is a fine example. Who knows how many people capital punishment has deterred from committing murder?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the next speaker I should like to thank the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. It is an extraordinary situation, one in which passions run much higher perhaps than is the case in the ordinary type of debate that we have. I do thank him for complying with the wishes of the Chair.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, it is quite interesting to hear the speeches on a bill being examined in our spare time. Since there is nothing else for us to do, I would like to make a few remarks on Bill C-2, to extend the abolition of the death penalty for another term.

Mr. Speaker, when similar debates took place in 1966 and 1967, I was not at all convinced that the abolition of the death penalty could solve anything concerning the problem we want to solve in Canada. After a five-year experiment, I am not more convinced. The government itself, the supreme authority, has decided to abolish the death penalty for criminals, but we unfortunately have had to realize that these individuals have continued to apply the death penalty. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the law is society's safety valve and without the law, there would be only anarchy.

The events which have taken place, especially in the past two weeks, concerning a host of prisoners condemned to life imprisonment, or very long imprisonment, have shown us that, whether we like it or not, we were unable to have them serve the sentence which had been imposed upon them.

This very morning, we heard that a bunch of prisoners—for when a group of about half of dozen escape, I suppose you can call that "a bunch"—have escaped from prison while outside the prison with a large number of others, which could only make it easier for them.

We see a steady rise in crime in Canada, and the death penalty as we have known it since 1961 applies to premeditated murder.

Listening to the liberal member speak just now, I got the impression that he was speaking as if we were still living at the time of la Corriveau. But since then, there have been many amendments to our penal code, among them that, since 1961, the death penalty applies only to premeditated murder. And I am in favour of capital punishment in such cases. There are a number of points I should like to take up in a few minutes that are allotted to me. I should like to draw the attention of the House to the way in which justice is carried out in Canada. Not so long ago, during the 1970 October crisis, a man—and not just anyone, but a minister of the Crown—was kidnapped and strangled. I do not know if it is because the police are unable to find the perpetrators of this crime, or because the courts are unable to apply strict laws to those who are believed to be the perpetrators, but in any case, nothing has been done so far to punish this abominable crime.

Some time ago, another "crime" took place near where I live, in La Sarre, Abitibi. A father who was out of work snared, not a minister, but a hare in the woods, and he had to pay a $25 fine, plus $16 in court expenses. Now, in all fairness, I think that the man who killed a hare in his snare was more harshly punished than the man who strangled a minister. This leads one to wonder about the enactment of justice in Canada.

In the last few years the laws have been made much more lenient.

Mr. Speaker, I think I should point out that it is five o'clock, so that I may continue my remarks at eight o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark)—National Parks—Banff and Jasper—Lack of accommodation for summer employees—request for statement on housing; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—Supply and Services—CF-5 Aircraft—Reason for additional purchases; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Post Office—Request for tabling of Samson-Belair report.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think there might be agreement to take item No. 16.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there such agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PERMIT DEDUCTION OF TAXES AND MORTGAGE INTEREST ON PRINCIPAL RESIDENCE

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider amending the Income Tax Act to provide that an individual, in computing his taxable income for a taxation year, may deduct from his income for the year (a) the amount paid by him in that year in respect of municipal taxes or $500.00, whichever is the lesser (b) the amount paid by him in that year by way of mortgage interest on his principal residence or $2,000.00, whichever is the lesser.

He said: This motion is aimed at what I consider to be one of the fundamental needs of the people of Canada today, and that is shelter. I submit that in the way it has been framed it favours no one. This is ensured by the limitations.

If one considers present government policy in respect of housing, or perhaps I should say the lack of it, in conjunction with interest rates and the oppressive tax structure under which people suffer at the present time, he will see that there is no doubt that it is impossible for low and average income families to purchase homes. Home ownership has been a dream of many people in this country, but this government makes this just a dream.

Task forces have travelled around this country studying housing problem and have found that 80 per cent of the people contacted would like to own their own homes. This is not possible. This government has an unemployment problem which could be solved easily if something were done to encourage home construction, but this government refuses to remove the 11 per cent tax on construction materials. Surely the government could do something about encouraging people to own their own homes. This could be done by adopting this motion. There is a requirement for homes by 200,000 families.

Any student of first-year economics could tell the government that encouragement of the construction industry would stimulate the whole economy. If the government would adopt this motion it would increase the demand for housing, stimulate the economy and put thousands of people back to work. What is the cost of the interest paid by people who own homes? The interest rate has been raised from 6 per cent to 9 ¾ per cent. That is the rate this government is allowing now. In the last month the bank rate was increased from 5 per cent to 5 ¾ per cent and the CMHC rate increased to 9 ¾ per cent, thus raising the monthly cost to the person owning a home. This, in itself, is inflationary and adds a great deal in the way of interest payments.

To attack the inflation the government could adopt a motion such as this. The major costs of any home to the average man are the interest payments and the amount of money he must pay in the form of real estate taxation. These people should be given a break in respect of reduced cost of shelter which, in turn would reduce inflation. I think this is something this government does not seem to understand. By reducing the interest rate and giving these people a break the government could reduce the cost even of the rental payments on homes. This would reduce the pressure for increased wages, and would stop the cost-push inflation which we have in this country today but which this government cannot seem to recognize. Let us stop the cost-push and keep the inflationary costs down.

The single family dwelling is the best security any Canadian can have against the inflation which this government seems unable to cope with. Some people may ask how we can pay for this. I say simply by the encouragement of new home construction more people would be paying taxes and this would stop the drain of hundreds of millions of dollars from the federal treasury to the provincial treasuries by way of transfer payments such as the $1,800 million that was required last year because of the high unemployment in this country. What is the experience in respect of this type of approach? This is not a new idea. It has been followed in the United States. It has also been practiced in the United Kingdom. Both countries use this method quite effectively.

I take no credit for originality. I am merely trying to have this government see the direction in which it should move. It appears to me that what we must attempt to do is give the average Canadian some historical heritage. We must give him some roots in Canada and thus enrich his life. I wish all members could read a book by I. H. Asper called "The Benson Iceberg" published by Copp-Clark in 1970. I would refer them to pages 16 and 17 in which he refers to the deductions allowed in the United States. All federal and local taxes are deductible. So also are sales taxes, gasoline taxes and any other taxes. These may be deducted from income when one computes one's federal income tax. This is the type of program we must have in this country.

When the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour) presented a somewhat similar motion before this House in April certain options were presented. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc), who replied on behalf of the government, obviously read a prepared statement because he did not reply to what the hon. member for Regina East had to say. He started off by making some rather irrelevant and inaccurate remarks about the Progressive Conservative party and the hon. member for Regina East. The hon. member for Laurier said that there had been more housing built in Canada from 1968 to the present time than in the last 20 years. The logic of this argument must have been mixed up in the translation because I do not understand it. It does not deal with the position of the thousands of people who live above the level at which they would be entitled to subsidized housing. These are the people whom we must help, but that was not apparent obviously to the hon. member for Laurier. However, he took great pride in pointing out to the House that businessmen may deduct their expenses, that if a corporation wishes to buy share-capital it can borrow the money and charge that interest.

Surely the average Canadian has an entitlement to what one might call social capital by way of owning his own home. Surely, that is just as important as allowing corporations to deduct their interest payments when buying share-capital. The average Canadian should be worth as much as any businessman or corporation. He went on to explain that fundamental concept of income tax that expenses are allowed only when they are used to create income. I would invite the hon. member for Laurier, and the government on whose behalf he was speaking, to look at the numerous and varied examples in the Income Tax Act. That will put the lie to that statement. He also said that the basic deductions allowed to Canadians are even better than those allowed in the United States of America. I would invite him to read Asper. All I have to say to that comment is balderdash.

The hon. member for Laurier, speaking on behalf of the government, went on to indicate that Canadians are not charged a capital gains tax on their own residence. It was suggested that the government was being a big brother for not imputing income in respect of a person living in his own home. My, how magnanimous this government is! But we are not dealing with capital gains. We are dealing with the right of a Canadian to own his home and to be encouraged so to do. We are not dealing with the adding of an additional burden to the already oppressed income tax payer. We are trying to lighten his load. The government says there is a difference between the tenant and the owner. I would ask the government to re-read the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Regina East in which the position is adopted that there must be a benefit to the tenant as well as to the owner.

Again the hon. member for Laurier, speaking on behalf of the government, said this provision would be much better for the rich than for the poor because if a man did not own his own home he would not have enough money to receive these benefits. Let me point out to the government, and to the hon. member for Laurier if he has failed to realize it, that if a man is that poor he would be living in subsidized housing. The hon. member dealt with two extremes. First, he dealt with the man who owns his own home whose income is so low that he would not benefit from the deductions. Such a person is already faced with economic doom. There is the other extreme of the person who happens to own an oil well in Calgary. No one would really care if he did not receive the benefit of the full deductions allowed. The fact that this is an item for the rich is merely taken from the textbooks which now have no relevancy due to the fact that we do have subsidized housing.

Are we not trying to take people out of what we may call the beer parlour society and encourage them to build up an equity of which they may be proud so that they will not be living just for today. If a man is renting, the rental people will also receive a deduction from this. I hope that these deductions would permit people to save enough for the necessary down payment. This is what this motion aims to do. The limit on the amount deductible for real estate taxes and for mortgage interest purposes ensures that it will not be detrimental to any other Canadian taxpayer. I am surprised at the hon. member for Laurier who says that this legislation is for the rich and not for the poor. He knows, all too well, the many special favours given to the rich under the Income Tax Act to which the poor or even the average income man is not entitled.

● (1710)

The hon. member for Laurier says that such an item in the Income Tax Act would tend to raise interest rates. People would not care what they paid if they could deduct it. That is nonsense, and he does not back up his statement with any facts whatsoever. It is certainly not the case in the United States where such deductions are permitted. Then, he made the point that people would put a mortgage on their house to buy a new car or a new boat. The hon. member knows very well that this is being done with investment loans, but it can only happen to the rich who cash in their stocks, get some money, buy their boat, or borrow money from the bank, buy the stock and deduct the interest. But only the rich can do that. That puts the lie to that one, Mr. Speaker. I believe the government, through their spokesman, have made the worst of a very bad argument, but apparently this is the official line. A study must be undertaken immediately. The Carter Commission, having been abolished or abandoned, we now have a patchwork quilt of special subsidies to the rich but not to the average man.

The tax cuts arguments do not make sense because no consideration is given to the fact that people who rent would also get a deduction and would reach the limit put on the amount of those deductions. This relief is needed by the people in Canada who live on fixed incomes, such as pensioners. The provinces have a variety of schemes for deductions from income tax of real estate taxes. Surely, this government must realize that these provisions must be co-ordinated and made fair for all the people of Canada. The government should ensure that the scheme is the same from east to west. I would like to draw attention to the Income Tax Journal of 1967. There is an article there on home owners, in which the whole subject is dealt with in great detail.

The core of this motion is to help the home owners, especially those on fixed and low incomes. They are the ones who need help most. There will be, by way of the property tax, a differential between the commercial and industrial properties, one which is long overdue. People on low and fixed incomes pay a high percentage of their income in real estate taxation and mortgage interest, and I suggest this is not fair. They are burdened with all kinds of education taxes for which they do not get any benefit. I think this is something which can be corrected by this government, if they saw fit to help those people who really need help.

Some people argue that we should give direct aid to municipalities instead, but anyone who has served on municipal councils knows well that if you get an extra dollar from the provincial government you tend to increase the work done on roads and sidewalks within the municipality. The benefit of this dollar will not be passed on to the pensioners, to the fixed and low income group who need the help so desperately. Within the world in which we find ourselves, where high unemployment and inflation exist and where we almost see a technological revolution taking place and oppressive taxation is imposed, this motion would at least make economic survival possible. The young would take a creative step and the old would find some security, but most important of all we would give some social capital to the people in need of a home.

Lastly, the argument put forward by this government has been that the Progressive Conservatives are always complaining about the complexity of the Income Tax Act and that if this motion were adopted it would only make it more complex. In view of the present income tax law, how can this government blithely bleat on and say that this provision would make things that much worse, for that becomes the cruellest joke of it all.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to reply to this motion. In principle, I have always favoured a reduction of the income tax by the amount paid in interest on mortgages on housing as well as of taxes paid on house property. At the same time, however, I have always argued that one must consider priorities, one must make decisions on what one should do first. So, I want to repeat these arguments as I presented them in the past on what would be the effect if we were to introduce a measure of the type proposed.

The Income Tax Act currently follows the principle that deductions cannot be made for personal or living expenses. This extends as well to interest paid on money borrowed to purchase goods and services which are for personal as opposed to business use. It also applies to taxes paid on living accommodation, to provincial sales taxes on purchases, to provincial fees such as car licences, and to municipal taxes and charges of all kinds. In keeping with this principle, a taxpayer may not deduct expenses of repairing and maintaining his residence. If one could deduct all expenses of a personal nature, very few people in this country would have any taxable income at all.

Rather than allow such deductions, the act provides for basic personal exemptions, $1,500 in the case of a single individual and $2,850 in the case of a married couple. The February 19 budget proposes to increase these to $1,600 and $3,000 respectively, as well as to index these exemptions to cost of living increases. Additions to these basic exemptions are granted where there are dependent children, where a taxpayer is over 65 years of age, and where a taxpayer is blind or confined to bed or wheelchair. The deductions granted in Canada are among the most generous in the world. For instance, in the United States the basic deduction for an individual is $750 and for a married couple is $1,500.

The hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Morgan) would allow the deduction of municipal taxes to a maximum of $500, and mortgage interest to a maximum of $2,000 if these amounts were paid in respect of a principal residence. In concept, the purchase of a home is no different from the purchase of any other item for personal use, even though such a purchase is usually the largest single expenditure which a taxpayer will make in his lifetime.

When the Royal Commission on Taxation thoroughly reviewed the income tax system several years ago, it recommended that the principle of not allowing a deduction for personal or living expenses be retained. It did not recommend a deduction for municipal taxes or mortgage interest. I also note that there is no mention in the motion of school taxes which in my county in many cases are probably running at least double the municipal taxes. Incidentally, I would like to see these school taxes as a deductible item, if this were possible, but rather than that my own opinion is that school taxes should be removed entirely from residences.

When tax reform was introduced, it was recognized that the encouragement of home ownership was desirable. On the other hand, it was thought best not to deviate from the basic rule regarding deductibility of personal expenses to which I have already referred. The Income Tax Act, therefore, provided two major incentives to home ownership.

The first incentive was to allow a taxpayer to make a capital gain on the sale of his home without incurring tax liability. This is particularly useful to people like myself. I imagine there are many of us at the present time. We are the "do-it-yourselfers" who spend money and time adding to and improving our residences. The second was to continue the practice of not including in the taxpayer's income the economic benefit which he receives from home ownership. This benefit, which is the value of his accommodation, may be looked upon as the return he has received on the capital he has invested. It should be noted in passing that other countries, including Great Britain, have added this "imputed income" to the taxpayer's income for tax purposes in years gone by.

A comparison between a home owner and a home renter should illustrate this point. Mr. Jones and Mr. Smith each have $20,000 to invest. Mr. Jones buys a house and Mr. Smith buys securities which yield him a return of about $1,000 a year. Each year Mr. Smith has to bring into his income $1,000 while Mr. Jones brings in nothing. But Mr. Smith also has to pay rent for his living accommodation, and of course the rent is not a deductible expense. It is unlikely that the $1,000 per year, after paying income tax, will provide him with equivalent accommodation to that which Mr. Jones has received for his $20,000 capital expenditure. Thus, we can see that Jones is ahead of Smith from a tax point of view.

Suppose that after 15 years Jones' home is worth $40,000 and Smith's securities are worth $40,000. If they each sell, Jones receives all his money free of tax, but Smith would have to bring half his capital gain, $10,000, into income. Thus Jones is again ahead of Smith. Thus, the Income Tax Act at present favours home ownership to a very considerable degree.

If the government adopted Mr. Morgan's proposal—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Herbert: I am sorry. If the government adopted the proposal of the hon. member for St. Catharines concerning a deduction for mortgage interest, Jones would pull even further ahead of Smith because he could buy a more expensive house, getting a mortgage and writing off the interest. His untaxed imputed income would be greater and his potential capital gain would also be greater. So, we can see that accepting such a proposal discriminates against the person who rents.

Mr. Morgan: It is also deductible for him.

Mr. Herbert: This is not made clear in the hon. member's motion.

Adoption of this type of proposal would favour high income tax payers in three ways. First, if a man were too poor to raise a down payment on a house, he could not take advantage of this provision. Second, if a man owns his home but has taxable income of less than his mortgage interest or municipal taxes, he could not take advantage of the full deduction. Third, because of the progressive nature of the personal income tax, the deduction is worth more to a taxpayer with a higher marginal rate than to one with a low marginal rate. The maximum deduction proposed of $500 for taxes plus $2,000 for mortgage interest would be a very generous tax deduction that would result in a very large tax saving to a high income tax payer.

It is a little clearer to me now because of the interjection from the hon. member for St. Catharines, but it was not clear whether the proposal he made contemplated that those who rent would be permitted to deduct a portion of their rental payment, up to $500 per year, but even if this were done the proposed deduction for mortgage interest would benefit only those who own their own home. It should also be noted that Manitoba and Ontario have adopted, with the co-operation of the federal government, a plan to give tax credits to help offset the cost of municipal taxes. But these credits have two important distinguishing features. First, they are constructed in such a way as to give most benefit at the lower income levels. Second, they are a deduction from provincial taxes payable, rather than from federal taxes payable, thus in effect being an indirect grant by these two provinces to the municipalities within their boundaries.

There are two other points which could be made. First, it is possible that a deduction for mortgage interest would force up interest rates on mortgages because there would be increased demand by potential home buyers, and the potential home buyers might be ready to pay higher interest rates since they could deduct the interest. Second, such a plan would encourage people to mortgage their homes in order to raise money for other types of personal expenses, because they could not deduct the interest on money borrowed to buy other personal items.

Mr. Morgan: You did not listen to my argument.

Mr. Herbert: I listened to your argument. Thus, we might be encouraging people to mortgage their homes to buy cars and boats, and to take vacations. We might end up with a situation where the ownership of a house "free and clear" would be indicative of bad tax planning. I say this with all sincerity. In my own case I am in the fortunate position of having a home without a mortgage, a home built over 25 years ago, which I have been able to improve and enlarge substantially over the years. It does not have a mortgage at the present time simply and honestly because the interest on that mortgage would not be deductible.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if this motion were to be carried, and interest on mortgages became deductible I would be one of many, many people who would be seeking a mortgage on my house, and I would have a use for the money. It is a straight matter of economics, that on the use of those moneys in other places I would be likely to get more than the net interest I would be paying for them. An interest rate of somewhere between 9 per cent and 10 per cent for a person in a higher bracket would be an effective rate of something like 5 per cent.

• (1730)

I also suggest that persons whose mortgages are nearly paid off will be thinking about increasing their mortgages for the same purpose. Most of us are perennially short of cash. How do we go about getting cash? We borrow. What better way is there of borrowing than by mortgaging our homes? If this proposal were adopted we would gain the advantage of being able to deduct the interest payments from our income and thus, in effect, we would get cheap money.

The hon. member suggested that his proposal would encourage home construction. As I see it, it would do quite the reverse; it would discourage home construction. Home building is now going on at a much higher rate than ever before, much higher than that considered essential by the Economic Council, and there is such a great demand for mortgage moneys that the rate of interest has been pushed to a high level. Our efforts, surely, should be directed to bringing that interest rate down. If we increase the demand on available moneys, as this proposal would do, the interest rate would go up and the people who really need this money will be outbid by those who, like myself, are quite willing to pay 10 per cent or more for it provided the interest is deductible from income tax. After all, it is top dollars we are talking about and this money would be deducted from our top rate of tax. As I see it, this is a discouragement to homebuilding rather than an encouragement.

It is very difficult to estimate the effect on revenue of the proposed deductions because it is not known whether those who rent are included. As I understand it, those people are to be included. How many taxpayers would be able to take full advantage of the reductions? To what extent would they rearrange their affairs to take advantage of the deductions, as would happen in a case like mine or in the case of people who want to mortgage their homes or increase an existing mortgage? It is reasonable to estimate that the revenue loss would be well in excess of $1 billion.

If those who rent were not permitted to deduct something on account of municipal taxes, the entire benefit of this tax reduction would go to one class of Canadians, namely, those who own their own homes. It should be remembered that our living styles vary from province to province. Traditionally, there has been a two-to-one ratio in favour of home ownership in the province of Ontario, as opposed to a two-to-one ratio in favour of renting in the province of Quebec. I think it is important to make sure that all sectors of the nation benefit equally. The proposed deductions would have the effect of decreasing not only the revenue of the federal government but that of the provincial governments whose tax revenues are calculated as a percentage of the federal tax.

The hon. member for St. Catharines also spoke of the effect on inflation and suggested that this measure would have a beneficial effect. In my opinion, quite the contrary is true. Force would be exerted on available funds, thus increasing interest rates. This, to me, would be inflationary. We would also run into difficulty in determining the practical application of this proposed legislation to those who rent, particularly to those who live in large properties, multiple dwellings, and so on. It would be difficult to determine precisely how much an individual could deduct.

Of course, there are many ways in which we can help the homeowner. One way, proposed continually by the opposition and supported by myself, involves the reduction or elimination of the 11 per cent tax on building materials for house construction. For years I have spoken in favour of that proposal, although I recognize that any government must decide where the proposal stands on its list of priorities.

At present, house building is at an all-time high. Although I have heard the argument about the cost of homes in certain parts of the country, I read just this past weekend advertisements for beautiful homes being built less than half an hour's drive from the downtown areas of major cities such as Montreal at prices that, if you allow for inflation over the years, can be favourably compared with those charged 20 or 25 years ago. That one can in 1973 buy beautiful homes on beautiful, wooded lots of 10,000 square feet for $14,000, $16,000, $18,000 or $20,000 is an indication that we have nothing to be ashamed of; indeed, it is something we should be very proud of.

The hon. member for St. Catharines contended that when municipal governments receive additional provincial and federal moneys, they increase their spending and thus are not able to reduce municipal taxes. I do not think that is entirely correct. Many of these programs are for essential municipal works which would have to proceed in any event. To that extent there is an offsetting effect in this area and it may not be necessary to increase municipal taxes. Even if additional moneys were to be paid, it must be recognized that at some time the local councils would make their own decision whether to proceed with an additional park or some other program which is being undertaken with federal and provincial aid and, naturally, they would have to raise the necessary funds through an increase in taxes.

I began by saying that on principle I have always favoured the deduction of municipal taxes and interest on house mortgages from income tax. I have also tried to illustrate that everything must be put in some order of priority. With federal expenses running at their present level, I consider that any suggestion which would reduce our revenues by more than $1 billion is improper. That is what would happen if this measure were adopted.

I also suggest that its adoption would be beneficial to the higher income groups. Certainly it would benefit me, and from a personal, selfish standpoint I would be happy to see this proposal go through. As I said earlier, one of the first things I would do would be to get myself a good, hefty mortgage, one large enough to provide me with the $2,000 income tax deduction suggested in the motion. For these reasons I must oppose the proposal brought forward by the hon. member for St. Catharines. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything else I wish to add at this time; I think I have covered all the points raised by the hon. member for St. Catharines.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, having been the owner of farmland and a house for some time, I have a fair amount of sympathy for the objectives espoused by the mover of this motion. He wants more people to own homes. However, I do not think he is going about achieving this objective in a workable way.

● (1740)

If we really wanted more Canadians to own their own homes we would reduce the interest rate on mortgages to 4 per cent or 5 per cent and keep it there. We would do something about the developers who carry out so-called development around our cities. Not too long ago an hon. member described the situation around Toronto. I read at least two magazine articles on this matter. Several development companies pretty well control the land around Toronto that is going to be developed. These corporations will be in the position of charging as much as the traffic will bear—and this is plenty—for housing to be built in that area.

With the kind of legislation proposed in this motion we would be using the taxpayers' money to help people move into such an area and sign an agreement to purchase a house. Those who would really be benefiting would be the developer and the person lending the money. That is what we would be doing with this kind of program. There would be great inequality, and advantage only to certain taxpayers. I am not only thinking of the very rich and the very poor. I use the example of a young man in his twenties who wishes to purchase a house. Under this proposal he would receive maximum tax relief of $500 plus $2,000, that is, $2,500. If he is single he is entitled to an exemption of $1,600. If he is married he is entitled to an exemption of $3,000. A single man would be entitled to a generous tax exemption—$1,600 plus $500 and $2,000. This amounts to $4,100. If he were married he would receive an even greater exemption.

A person working for a construction company may be very well paid. If he works in a northern area his accommodation may be provided at so much per month. However, he would not benefit from this kind of deduction. He would be taxed much more heavily than his counterparts in Winnipeg, Saskatoon or Edmonton. Surely, it is not our objective to keep our young people in the cities. This motion overlooks that factor. It also overlooks the situation of old age pensioners. In this avaricious and brutal society a person who is able to survive to the age of 70 may still own a house. If not, he will have to pay rent for his accommodation. I suggest we would do a great deal more good if we increased the old age pension from a maximum $170 to $200 or $250.

Mr. Alexander: You had your chance.

Mr. Gleave: That is all right. I have had many chances. That just proves that I am a human being. If we followed the policy that was recommended by the Carter commission, that a buck is a buck, we would get much closer to equality. At the same time, our taxation policy would be equalized. We would be able to make life more pleasant for people in this country no matter whether they are at the top, the middle or the bottom of the income scale.

Under this proposal we would have to contend with another type of problem. Some provinces are moving toward relieving municipalities of the education tax load which they have been carrying. In order to do this the provinces have to move into other fields, such as direct sales tax or income tax. I think the provinces are doing the right thing; this is a logical approach. Education has become expensive and sophisticated enough that it should no longer be charged only to the property owners in the community in which the school is located. Some communities are able to afford a more expensive kind of education than others. The cost of education being carried only by property owners is an obvious inequality. If we want to achieve equalization of income and the opportunity to have good accommodation we should be considering other areas of taxation.

There are inequalities in our present tax system which should be corrected. Allowances should be given to artisans who use rather expensive tools in their trade. We should also give consideration to the evaluation of marketing quotas so that there would be a larger measure of equality on the production side. We should value quotas for taxation purposes in the same way as we do land. Quotas have now become a cost of farming in the same way as the tools of a plumber or an electrician. We could justify changes in our tax structure in areas such as these. Possibly we could justify public parking facilities for trailers. I know workmen in the construction business who live in trailers. In addition to the cost of purchasing a trailer, and the interest, there is the cost of keeping it in a trailer park. That can be very expensive. These people live in trailers so they can live in the community in which they are working.

With all due respect to the mover of this motion, I feel it has too many loopholes. There are too many areas which it does not cover. I think we would be further ahead if we were to raise the exemptions to which workers are entitled, provide additional allowances in respect of children under the family allowance plan, pay more generous allowances to old age pensioners, and so on. If we followed such a course I believe we would be further ahead than if we tried to treat homeowners as special individuals entitled to special allowances. Indeed, in today's society a person who is able to raise the money with which to purchase a home, to put down the initial payment and keep up the mortgage payments, is already a fortunate individual. As time goes on there may be far fewer of them. I am sorry I cannot give this motion the support which the hon. member obviously hoped it would receive in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleagues for giving me at least five minutes to say a few words on this motion which I find very interesting since it invites the government to amend the Income Tax Act to allow the taxpayer, the owner of a single family house, to deduct from his taxes, half or two thirds of his municipal and school taxes up to $500. The limit may be a bit high.

I am in favour of the motion since I have always considered that the fact of not allowing for the deduction from income taxes of at least part of municipal and school taxes on a family house was in fact a way of taxing taxes. The owner of a single family house, for example, does not have the advantage of the builder or the owner of apartment buildings and that is why I always said that our laws favour big capitalists to the detriment of small investors.

If I had houses to rent I could deduct from my income taxes two thirds of my repair costs when people making mortgage payments on a single family house cannot benefit from such a reduction.

So, as far as municipal and school taxes are concerned, big companies settling down in a community as often happens in my riding, can benefit from a municipal tax exemption during 20, 25 or 30 years.

On the other hand, to encourage small industry, to provide employment, the small owner who merely wishes to provide shelter for his family cannot deduct anything in the form of municipal taxes. As soon as he spends $10 or $100 to become an owner he is immediately taxed and overtaxed while big capitalists are still protected.

In fact, I made a study on the protection given to big capitalists today. Half a century ago, for example, big capitalists paid roughly 70 per cent of taxes in Canada while small taxpayers paid 30 per cent. Today, it is quite the opposite. Small taxpayers pay 72 per cent of Canada's taxes and capitalists whose income has increased ten-fold in the past forty years pay only 28 per cent. That gives you an idea of the protection they have been getting over the years.

Well, I feel there could be a debate about amounts involved in the motion but, contrary to the opinion expressed by the previous speaker that it would not help housing, I believe it would indeed help housing tremendously. Personally, I am interested in building low cost housing because of my savings on interest. In fact, I gain two-thirds of maintenance and interest on mortgages, otherwise on the money I invested to pay for those rents.

It can clearly be seen how interesting that is for those who lend money on a large scale, and how well protected they are. Major money-lenders are allowed to benefit by deductions of two-thirds, which is not at all the case for small home owners since the second part of the motion calls for exemption on mortgage interest. I have always wondered why so few members were interested in the mortgage interest paid by the small owner.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that the time allowed for my speech has expired. In closing, I would like to say that the government should introduce legislation so that we could discuss it in more detail, for it is a problem of interest for the majority in this country, and I think that all small owners would be glad if the government were to present such a bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair until eight p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was just saying that in the last few years especially, our laws have been greatly relaxed. Looking back, we find that in 1967 capital punishment was abolished for five years. Now it is intended to extend this measure, but we are well aware that the government wants to abolish capital punishment completely.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

It is also wished to liberalize the use of drugs, to make abortion completely free. Contraceptives have been legalized. Homosexuality has been legalized, and according to a study of the cost of prostitution in Montreal, a study that was requested by the former Solicitor General, it will probably be proposed before long to liberalize prostitution so that prostitutes may contribute to the tax revenue.

Mr. Speaker, when one considers this whole range of abolitions, one wonders where all this will lead us. One wonders whether the Liberal party does not take too seriously the name which makes it different from other political parties.

In an article published by a student of Sir George Williams University, Mr. Robert Rochon, two or three years ago in La Presse, one could read the following remarks, and I quote:

● (2010)

What does society exactly mean both for the layman and the intellectual, in concrete terms? Therefore, it is by this last question that I answer, I believe, to the first one, namely: "That value, what is it?"

A society is a group of people gathered in one community by nature, by laws or by a contract. It is a moral union of intelligent beings, grouped in a stable and efficient manner to achieve a purpose that is known to and desired by everyone. This moral union of intelligent beings consists of three things essential to the achievement of that purpose:

1) Unity with regard to a purpose that is known to and desired by everyone

2) Unity of will to achieve that purpose

3) Co-ordination of appropriate means to achieve that purpose, WHENCE the need for an authority obeyed by everyone.

Relations of the members of the social "body" as such are relations that are determined by the purpose of society and governed by the latter. Therefore, this group of men or intelligent beings is a social fact which consists mainly of the behaviour of the subjects. Whence the necessity of conforming to principles, customs and moral or legal rules.

Mr. Speaker, this definition of society seems clear enough to me; let me repeat the three main elements that Mr. Rochon lists:

1) Unity with regard to a purpose that is known to and desired by everyone.

2) Unity of will to achieve that purpose.

3) Co-ordination of appropriate means to achieve that purpose, WHENCE the need for an authority obeyed by everyone.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that we come together and make laws to protect ourselves, and we must accept those laws. But we become aware that one element of the population, certain members of our society refuse the laws which have been set up by and for it. These people disregard the essential principles for achieving the society we desire.

In the book "Law and Order in Canadian Democracy", published by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, we read on page 9:

The existence and enforcement of "law" in a free country like Canada presupposes "order" as a necessary corollary. Where there is no law, or existing law is not enforced, the "law of the jungle" obtains—there is no order, and the liberty of a majority of the citizens is assailed without restraint. And so law and order have come to be almost synonymous terms, and the expression conveys a single idea.

Mr. Speaker, those who now apply capital punishment—crooks and criminals—endanger the liberty of other citizens; when you read the newspapers, you see that scarcely a day goes by in just the city or region of Montreal without the most sordid murders' endangering the lives of citizens, to such an extent that you dare not venture into certain districts and certain streets in the evening or at night. It is the same in the larger towns, and very often even in the country. Why is that? It is precisely because a certain number of the individuals who make up society refuse to obey its laws.

Later on in the same book, there is a reflection by Charles Reith, quoted from The Police Idea.

The fundamental problem which confronts the world today is the finding of means of providing authority with force which will compel respect for its laws and without which, as all history knows, it must inevitably and repeatedly fail to function.

Now that strength no longer exists nowadays in the police force because it no longer has the authority needed to indict those people and bring them before the court. Even if capital punishment still applies whenever a police officer is murdered, some police officers risk their life every day in attempting to arrest those criminals and when they commit them for trial, those criminals are often released on bail and the following day, those same individuals thumb their nose at the police officers who arrested them the day before and who risked their life doing so. And when those individuals come back before the court, they are sentenced to a few years' imprisonment.

That is what we call a life sentence, which is absolutely false because the maximum is 20 years. And people who committed as horrible a crime as murder seldom serve their sentence. Therefore people are puzzled and rightly so.

Again in the Montreal newspaper La Presse, Guy Cormier wrote a very interesting article and I quote:

Most of the arguments for the abolition of capital punishment are acceptable . . .

That does not mean that people in favour of the abolition of the death penalty are always wrong. Our society is ill, that is a fact.

I come back to the quotation:

They have been so often analyzed under so many aspects in books, articles, letters and manifestoes that in trying to summarize them, one could not make head or tail of them. Considering the irrevocable character of a punishment determined by a naturally fallible human reason, that alone would tell in favour of reducing as much as possible the number of cases where it should apply.

In those last words, Guy Cormier recommends prudence and I believe everybody agrees with him. The article says further on:

Because, if any error can be rectified on earth, no one will ever manage to compensate for the loss of life unjustly inflicted. Now, the black book of punishments contains cases where it had been impossible to establish beyond the shadow of a doubt the guilt of the defendant.

Nevertheless, there is an aspect of this matter which should embarrass convinced abolitionists.

Indeed, since the state has relieved the executioner from his duties, one notes that criminals make up the only category of citizens who persist in preserving the former tradition.

I said so a while ago.

Again I quote:

They have not abolished the death penalty; they go on applying it with gruesome briskness. Since 1967, when Canada temporarily ceased to send convicted murderers to the gallows, the criminals have, on their own account, applied the death penalty to the rate of 376 annually. Naturally, we are refering to murders. Those abominations happen in the dark, unwitnessed and even without a semblance of justice.

And I will add without any kind of trial. Mr. Guy Cormier goes on to write:

The victims, you know them, their bodies are on the front pages of tabloids specialized in daily horror. Last week, it was a young girl of 22. She crawled 200 feet before dying. That comes under the heading "miscellaneous".

I would like the tender hearted who are quickly softened by the murderers' fate and the leagues dedicated to the defense of human rights to subdue their campaign addressed to the public, to turn at last towards the real party, that is the murderers themselves. Let them try to convince those people to abandon their barbarous and cruel methods of taking their "law" into their own hands. Because the assassins are the ones who persist in applying themselves capital punishment to the detriment of innocent people most of the time.

Does that mean that we must come back to old, rigid methods and multiply gallows? Certainly not. But we must act with discrimination.

The suspension of capital punishment decided in 1967 for a five year trial period did not apply in principle to bandits killing policemen. That exception is logical: it still is. Because if you do not punish by death the murderer of a policeman there is no reason for having a police force at all in a country. Killers of children should also be sent to the gallows. Cases of kidnapping and piracy should be dealth with the same severity.

Since the beginning of time, humanity had to drag along incurable outcasts. Such people are to be eliminated from society. It is not even worth taking the risk of confining them to a prison that they will leave one day by escaping from it or because of a stupid or complacent official.

We have seen a lot of stupid or complacent officials not too long ago.

Pardoning a man who should be put to death is condemning the widow, the orphans, the parents of the victim to pay taxes to house, feed, clothe, entertain the assassin for the rest of his life. That injustice is added to the first one.

Mr. Speaker, as I said in my opening remarks before the House took recess, I will be voting against Bill C-2 precisely because I have not been convinced that the abolition of capital punishment would meet a need in our society.

The death penalty was maintained for the murder of a policeman or a prison guard.

I personally think, Mr. Speaker, that a bank manager or a drugstore manager or any businessman who are also family heads are as much in danger as any policeman or prison guard because in many cases what criminals are interested in is mainly the money in the cash boxes behind the counters and they will shrink from nothing to try to get it.

One might say that an offender who is going to commit an armed robbery did not premeditate murder, he does not know who he is going to kill. But when an offender arms himself with a fully loaded machine gun, he may not know who he is going to kill, but he has made up his mind to kill anyone who will be in his way and try to stop him from getting what he wants.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, this offender must be considered as the one who has deliberately committed a murder.

One might also say that—as I have already mentioned when I spoke of the flexibility of our laws—if we cannot prevent abortion and homosexuality in some cases, we have legalized them up to a point and if we cannot prevent murder, we should abolish capital punishment. Then, why not say: If we cannot prevent theft, arson and rape, let us legalize them. And if we cannot enforce the law, let us simply abolish it.

Mr. Speaker, I think the trouble is not with those responsible for law enforcement. This uneasiness does not exist in our police forces which have many times shown their efficiency. The trouble is elsewhere. The suggestion is to abolish for 5 additional years capital punishment for murderers. And yet, in our society, we forget that we have still not abolished the life penalty for thousands of people who have to make do with crumbs from the social welfare. Those people are living in the most abject poverty and almost like animals. When they complain to civil servants, they are often treated like dogs.

Quite often those people protest because our society is sick and does nothing to enable them to lead an honourable life, as they have done until then. When they find how much we pay to maintain a prisoner, I wonder whether they are not justified in protesting.

The building only of the Sainte-Anne-des-Plaines prison cost on the average more than $32,000 per inmate, for lodging only. Some reports indicate that an inmate's maintenance costs on the average are $7,000 or $8,000 per year.

Many families must content themselves with a scanty pittance because some of its members are crippled or sick, while people who have chosen to live on the other side of the fence are often treated like kings.

Mr. Speaker, no wonder that our society is sick, something is missing somewhere. As long as it has not been proven to me that abolition of the death penalty can improve society, I will feel compelled to promote its retention in the case of premeditated murder and in that case only.

Mr. Speaker, in due time I will vote against Bill C-2.

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the course of this debate you have heard a great deal about individual incidents and specific cases which raise a great deal of concern about law and order in our society. From time to time some hon. members suggest, I suppose, that they are more concerned than other members of this House about law and order in our society.

The hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) has just completed his remarks which seem to me to clearly suggest he has serious doubt about the views of the government on this issue and whether members on all sides of the House who favour the abolition of capital punishment really are on the side of law and order, on the side of the good and decent. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, of a statement during the course of this debate on corporal punishment when a Conservative, whom I will not name because he is not here—but you can check Hansard—suggested, in effect, that we were probably on the side of the rapist because we were abolishing the whipping of rapists. I tried to make the point that it was the circumstances in which that kind of punishment took place that was particularly relevant to our view that it should be abolished, and I personally stated that I see a place for corporal punishment, particularly in family or similar circumstances, but not in prison circumstances.

[Mr. Laprise.]

The hon. member for Abitibi says he will not be convinced that capital punishment should be abolished until he is convinced about a lot of things, about how it will improve law and order in our society and how it will result in less murders. That is a case no one will easily try to make. I do not know that I follow the hon. member's logic, where he drew his lines, and why he does not want to go back to the fourteenth century when capital punishment extended to minor theft and where perhaps it had a deterrent effect because of the minor nature of the offences which which it was linked. That, I think, is significant and is something we should bear in mind.

I was distressed in listening to the hon. member for Abitibi—I regret referring to him so often, but I am following him in this debate—if I understood him correctly, when he said there were times when the garbage of society should be disposed of. That is a term I do not think we should apply to any human being because it suggests there is never forgiveness, never a change of opinion or never a change of attitude. I presume that if the hon. member had been with Christ on the day when the adultress was present and Christ said, "He that is without sin, let him throw the first stone," the hon. member would have in fact thrown it because he is more righteous than Christ was in that context. I do not think he would agree to any version of that situation which says that was not an offence of a serious nature. That was not the issue. It is a question of one's attitude toward the whole approach of a human being in our society.

As I approach this question I want to say that there are some, as the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) said this afternoon, who find it straightforward and easy; they say there must, or must not be capital punishment on a doctrinaire basis. To the extent that one can be basically philosophical or doctrinaire on the question, let me state at once that I would, in a theoretical way, defend the right of the state to take the life of a person when that is necessary, reasonable and useful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I would not translate that into a duty, and I would particularly demand of the state an examination into the premise that it is in fact reasonable or useful to take a life. Some may wonder why that is a burden which should be put upon those who would argue for the taking of a life. I personally see a great deal in the whole attitude we have toward life, the dignity of the person and the nature of the individual person charged with an offence, whatever it may be, that leads me to be and to want to be a little careful when it comes to the question of whether or not the state will take that life.

I will not argue that there have been occasions, and that there could be occasions again, when the taking of life as a punishment is necessary for the maintenance of law and order in a particular society. I will hold that as a possibility. The question which we have before us—which those who believe as I do, that this is theoretically possible, have before us—is whether it is indeed a useful, desirable or good thing to do now.

Individual members will refer to cases and they will say: In these circumstances, should capital punishment not follow if it could thereby stop the crime or avoid a future crime of similar import? They will never succeed in making the case that it would in fact have stopped the crime, and indeed in their examples—and I listened to the member for Abitibi who referred to them, and to most hon. members who spoke in favour of capital punishment in Canada—from those offences for which they argue capital punishment they move to others which they argue would not exist if capital punishment was in force. It is there that their logic falls down. They cannot make a statistical case in favour of the deterrent value of capital punishment.

I must say that I will not try to make a case in terms of statistics. I will not do so for two reasons: first, I am less than convinced that this is the basic way of determining the issue and, second, other hon. members who have spoken—notably, today, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik)—have done an admirable job of analysing the statistical situation and showing what happens in certain circumstances with or without capital punishment.

The hon. member for Hillsborough referred to the Fattah study and the fact that crime other than murder rose faster than murder in a period of time when capital punishment may have been an issue in this country. These things at least raise the question of whether or not there is, in fact, a significant deterrent element involved. But I prefer to turn instead to the conjectural argument that in many murder situations the emotions that are involved in the committing of the offence are such that the punishment is not present in the minds of the committer of the offence; that often, in those circumstances, whether or not he will get away with it may not be important. I am referring to the husband or wife murder, the family murder, the close friend murder. In these situations emotions often rise to such a pitch that the exact punishment, and even the question of detection, are not likely to be present.

There is a whole range of cases where as a result of mental imbalance the mind is not likely to be focusing very clearly on the murder. There is another range of cases where one could say that the question of the exact punishment may make a difference. There, in any analysis of the thinking of the people involved, one finds that the question of whether they will be detected is far more influential than the question of whether punishment will be 10 or 15 years in jail, or death. The magnitude of 15 years in jail, in terms of the way those people are viewing life, is indeed a pretty significant factor, but the question of whether they will be detected is apt to be a much more important factor.

So we have on this side of it the question of whether there is indeed practical merit and a practical deterrent value in capital punishment. On the other side there are those who ask: Should we pay money to keep alive people who have committed these offences? That becomes a very interesting argument in terms of economics against human life, if you have put the deterrent argument aside. It then becomes a fairly crass argument in terms of economics against human life. But against that, what do we have? We have the fact that in order to maintain capital punishment you must maintain the whole apparatus of execution. You must have someone who is executioner.

Would you, as an honourable man who is prepared to vote for capital punishment, volunteer for the job of executioner? That is an interesting question and I shall come back to certain aspects of it later. You must maintain the apparatus of execution which allows, in a cold-blooded fashion, the termination of a human life. I say "in a cold-blooded fashion" because one of the problems with capital punishment is that it does not happen in the heat of the immediate aftermath of the crime itself. I do not hear hon. members arguing for removal of the trial process and the determination of guilt or innocence, and therefore for the removal of a significant period of time between the time of the offence and the time of execution.

With that time interval in mind, hon. members should appreciate what is involved, that after a fairly long interval a human being who has done something grievously wrong to all of us is then to be dealt with. Is he the same man he was? Is there any place in the process for considering whether he is exactly the same, in terms of the punishment that will befall him, as he was when he committed the offence? That is the kind of thing which leads to a particularly interesting vote on the issue of capital punishment.

Hon. members have been in the habit of putting to their constituents the questions: Are you in favour of capital punishment? That is the wrong kind of question if you want a really careful answer to the issue, because to answer "yes" to it, all you have to do is to be able to imagine a single case where you would be glad to have capital punishment applied—and that single case involves many elements which are not always conveniently present. It involves the absolute certainty that the man to whom you wish the punishment to be applied was in fact the man who committed the offence. It involves the kind of terrible offence where we could not imagine any change at all on the part of the offender. It involves many such things.

The real question is quite different, namely: Do you favour capital punishment in circumstances where the man who is before you probably committed the offence, however horrible it may be, regardless of his present position? I ask hon. members to take a look at a certain piece of evidence when the question is put in that way. Lawyers know that when capital punishment was the usual sentence for murder in Canada, it frequently was not applied because as long as murder led to capital punishment as the logical legal conclusion, juries, no matter how clear it was when lawyers would say that it was either murder or nothing, would reach to find a manslaughter verdict, a verdict which avoided capital punishment in the specific case before them when they were looking at the individual to whom it was applied, and perhaps when they also had in mind from time to time the issue of whether or not there was serious doubt about the guilt of the man, however probable it was that he was in fact guilty. I think this is the kind of issue which must be before hon. members as they look at this over-all issue.

Recently the supreme court in the United States was discussing the issue of capital punishment. I was surprised to hear the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggest that we, too, in this country should shift this important and fundamental question from the forum of Parliament to the courts for a decision. I, for one, have always been of the view that it is Parliament, the elected representatives, who should decide fundamental questions, and not a court of nine men, however appointed and wherever sitting. It may be that in some other systems the inflexibility of their constitutions allows for some tolerance of decisions by a small group of men rather than by the parliament of the land. That is not true here. We, as the elected representatives, have the power and the ability on behalf of the people all across the country to decide this issue, and that certainly ought not to be shifted from here to a court.

But I do think it is interesting to notice the reasoning of the Supreme Court in the United States in deciding that in fact capital punishment was no longer to be tolerated within their constitution. They noted the fact that it was not a punishment which was following automatically in cases for which it was defined; that just as here, juries would find ways around it, or appellate courts would find reasons here and there to set aside the punishment, and that in fact, as one of the nine U.S. justices said, it got to the point that whether or not capital punishment applied was like lightning striking. He noted that in fact in some cases it was applied because of the combination of a particular judge, jury and circumstance, while in much worse cases it was not applied because of the particular combination of judge and jury. That was our experience in this country as well; any lawyer knows that that was the experience, that it depended more on the particular judge, jury and circumstance, not related especially to the case which let to the application of capital punishment in a particular situation.

With that kind of random way of applying capital punishment, whether or not we have to maintain the executioner and put into the hands of some individual the termination of a life, without completely to all satisfaction at all times resolving the horrific question of whether or not that person was guilty beyond peradventure, and whether indeed the man himself deserved some further consideration, is the question that has to be decided. The issues of whether or not we should have different, moderately or greatly different systems according to our view of imprisonment, and of whether or not parole should be less easily granted, are conflicting issues; but they are issues which are separate from the main issue of capital punishment itself.

Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that we ought not to want to have capital punishment in our country because there is no evidence of any substantial weight that it has a real deterrent value, and that on the other hand the very dignity of our human existence inevitably is involved in the fact of execution itself, and therefore on simple pragmatic grounds in terms of the dignity of man we ought not to have capital punishment here. And I say to the hon. member for Abitibi, who will in other contexts speak in terms of the dignity of the human person, that he should remember that it exists, too, for any person who has been accused.

I will not speak of the problems of rehabilitation and the problems of parole that relate to how our penal systems will be governed. These are the kinds of questions which can be dealt with in the committee. What I do suggest to hon. members is that in this debate we are now on second reading of the bill, and the question which surely hon. members have to consider is whether or not this matter goes to the committee at all. If they think that the law as it stood before 1967, and as it stands again for a time after the five-year temporary law has lapsed, is perfect, beyond improvement, it is only then that they ought to vote against this bill on second reading.

There are, indeed, in the bill some rather minor elements which deserve the serious deliberation of the committee and deserve to be made a part of the law. I think, for instance, of the change from the expression "non-capital murder" to the phrase "murder punishable by life imprisonment." I believe that the expression "non-capital murder" has tended to grate upon people because murder, they say, is always capital, looking at the victim as they do in those circumstances. To treat it somehow as non-capital sounds as if one is treating it lightly; yet life imprisonment is not a particularly light penalty. So the change of words is suggested to improve the way in which we view these particular offences, even if they remain the way they were. I suggest to hon. members that the serious issue of whether or not we need the execution apparatus, of whether or not adequate deterrents are not available without it, is one that deserves their serious discussion in the committee and that this bill should now go to committee and have the considered judgment of members upon it.

As I have personally made clear, Mr. Speaker, I believe that without any fundamental argument about the right of society, of the state, to take a life, in practical and pragmatic terms it is not necessary from a deterrent point of view and that, therefore, the balance shifts in favour of no longer taking those lives and in favour of the argument that avoids execution, in favour of the argument that strikes all of us and that is so fundamental to our whole democratic process, that the dignity of the human being be upheld wherever possible and that that should apply in this area as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) rise for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Fraser: I do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the minister agree?

Mr. Lang: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the minister because I did not hear all of his speech, but I wonder if he would be good enough to answer a question which I think troubles a number of us who are very sympathetic to much of what he has said. If one is advocating the abolition of capital punishment on the grounds that the minister has stated—and other hon. members have spoken along the same line—where is the logical distinction between hanging a frightened man who runs out of a bank and shoots a policeman, and not hanging a man who shoots the prime minister, or who may engage in the diabolical business of killing people for the underground? I would be interested to hear the minister's views on this particular problem.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate that question. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) will appreciate from my remarks that I did not attempt to distinguish in any logical way why one particular type of murder rather than another should have capital punishment attached to it. Indeed, in my remarks I said that essentially I do not believe in the deterrent usefulness of capital punishment, and I may say that applies, in my view, to the situation covering peace officers and prison guards as well.

There have been some peace officers and prison guards who have expressed extra concern about their particular situation in the capital punishment provision, and in the course of the debate in 1967, five years ago, they were heard in the form of the compromise which was adopted by parliament at that time. The argument I make is that if, indeed, it is thought to be so important to them, that they attach so much importance to this particular provision, then I so value their service in their particular role that even while I disagree with them about the real value of the deterrent, I could go along with them in having a special exception for them.

I would say to the hon. member that the logic of my remarks, and my further opinion is that total abolition would be the far better course and that indeed if, as I now believe, prison guards and policemen are more and more moving from the position of wanting special protection, it may well be that in committee hon. members can find a solution. It may be that an assured period of imprisonment prior to any possibility of parole will be a better solution than anything contained in the bill itself. I have spoken in the current context as a total abolitionist but I am willing to look at additional safeguards, to be perhaps under the discretion of the trial judge himself, which would predetermine the period of imprisonment before parole is permissible.

I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South that I have spoken in this debate as an abolitionist. I am prepared to support the present bill even to the extent that exceptions for police and prison guards be put into it, although that appears to be no longer necessary. I would be happier with another solution which I have mentioned, which would deter the most serious of offences. Perhaps that discretion could be vested in the trial judge himself.

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, this bill is worth debating in parliament because Bill C-2 is no longer just legislation; it has become a symbol to many Canadians; it symbolizes the permissiveness that they believe is a threat to their safety. To them it symbolizes a "soft on crime" attitude that they believe is encouraging violence. To them it shows the need for a change of direction.

Last spring the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang)—I wish he were here and not out of the chamber—indicated he saw the need for this change. When speaking to 500 lawyers at the O'Keefe Centre, Toronto, in March of 1972 he said that rising crime figures showed we must have more vigorous enforcement of the law. He said there was need to restore the balance between freedom and authority by effective law enforcement. He said the increase in crimes of violence was particularly significant and cited the testimony of the commissioner of the RCMP to the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs revealing how the crime rate in Canada has doubled in the past ten years.

He did not draw the conclusion that this warranted the restoration of capital punishment in Canada, but many people have concluded that the trend to which he referred merits the need for strong law enforcement, of which the restoration of capital punishment would be one part. I think this is evident in the trend that one sees in the United States, where 36 state legislatures are now considering in their jurisdictions the restoration of capital punishment, and where two states have already enacted that restoration. Certainly, an increasing number of people in Canada are of this mind. According to an article in Weekend magazine of October 21, 1972, there were 215 murders in 1963, and 426 in 1971. That kind of development shows the average Canadian that we need strong enforcement of the law. We need to express that conviction by restoring capital punishment.

The conviction is growing among a great number of Canadians that we need the death penalty as one way of reversing the permissive trend of the past decade. Advocates of abolition often speak as if the desire to retain the death penalty shows some kind of blood lust or perverse sadism, but that misjudges the Canadian people. Few citizens of this country find much pleasure in the sight or thought of a fellow human being hanged. But there are many who want some assurance that the law is going to be enforced and the public is going to be protected. They do not want cruelty shown to anybody, but they want the ordinary man, woman and child of this country protected and they want to say to the criminal element of this country that that element is on notice that society is prepared to defend itself. They do not find that kind of assurance in Bill C-2.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the average Canadian knows this bill is a "nothing bill" which will do nothing to meet the crisis of crime and violence in this country today. It may purport to give protection to police officers and prison guards, but in the hands of a government committed to commute even these death sentences it will not do even that. This bill is a charade. It gives appearance without reality. It professes to provide for what is called the death penalty to be invoked for murder punishable by death. But the fact is that capital punishment will be suspended entirely for the next five years if this bill passes. The majority of Canadians today oppose that suspension. They oppose it, not because there is some atavistic barbarism in their hearts but because they see it as one more step down the road of permissiveness.

It is evident that most Canadians want capital punishment restored, because they are recoiling from what they regard as the loose administration of justice they have had under this government. They have had enough of releasing kidnappers after a few years' confinement. They have had enough of giving a wife murderer leave that he used to go on an international honeymoon. They have had enough of police officers being shot down and their murderers escaping the penalty they deserve. They have had enough of giving priority to the criminal and neglecting the victim. They have had enough of easy parole and leaves when they find that many parolees become criminals again and leaves of absence become doors of escape. They have had enough of easy bail when they find freedom given to thugs and hoods and addicts who use it to pillage, assault, molest and murder. They have had enough of all this and are saying to parliament, "Change this and give us some protection under the law, the kind of protection that Canadian citizens want and used to be confident of receiving."

In the Speech from the Throne the people were promised changes, but they have not seen any, and Bill C-2 does not offer any. Instead, it shows the same permissive mentality the Canadian people are rejecting. The people want a policy that will put the criminal element on notice that society in this country cannot be attacked with impunity. That is why public opinion polls report that a large marjority of citizens favour the restoration of capital punishment. In the constituency of Scarborough East, for example, of 3,510 who answered a questionnaire on this subject at least 70 per cent indicated support for capital punishment. That is why in the same constituency a petition signed by 225 people, most of them high school students, asks for the retention of the death penalty.

Abolitionists, instead of vilifying these citizens, as some do, should ask themselves why so many people are clamouring for the restoration of the death penalty. Abolitionists should ask themselves why so many good, decent, law-abiding people want the death penalty renewed. These people are not cruel, but they are concerned and they are demanding that their government and Parliament be concerned too.

That raises this question: Would the death penalty do what the public thinks it would? That is a question to which many abolitionist speakers in this House have addressed themselves. Some of us are under the impression that the abolitionists assume that they have all the good cards in their hands. They can point to statistical studies that show the abolition of capital punishment does not result in mayhem, nor does its retention or restoration result in social peace. They conclude, therefore, that capital punishment has no deterrent value whatsoever. With a kind of elitist superiority, which somehow has been evident in this debate, they deride the anxieties of the people, which they do not think need to be taken seriously, and assure the populace that they should calm their fears. It seems that the elite few know more than the commonplace majority.

Let us take another look at this argument. Has anyone ever suggested that capital punishment would prevent all murders? Surely not. Surely we would not expect that, any more than we would expect that not having capital punishment would prevent all murders. There has never been a penalty yet devised that would restrain everyone. To dismiss the death penalty because it does not eliminate murder should logically mean we should abolish prison sentences because they do not eliminate bank robberies. The point is that the threat of capital punishment does deter some people from murder, just as the threat of imprisonment deters some from robbery.

To say that when you have capital punishment you also have some murders is really offering no more evidence than to say that when you have long jail sentences you also have some robberies. We know that. However, just as the imposition of prison sentences does deter some people from robbing, pillaging, assaulting, and so on, we have every reason to believe that the imposition of this supreme sentence, the death penalty, does deter some from the act of murder. I think that is one reason why the average man is supporting the restoration of the death penalty.

You can quote all the statistics you like and draw all the graphs you like; you will still find the common sense of the ordinary Canadian saying that the threat of the death penalty is a deterrent. He knows it is a deterrent to him, and it is a deterrent to others. Let me cite some examples of this reasoning, in a survey conducted in 1970 and 1971 by the Los Angeles police department:

Margaret Elizabeth Daly, of San Pedro, was arrested August 28th, 1961, for assaulting Pete Gibbons with a knife. She stated to investigating officers: "Yeh, I cut him and I should have done a better job. I should have killed him but I didn't want to go to the gas chamber".

Orelius Matthew Stewart, an ex-convict with a long felony record, was arrested March 3, 1960, for attempted bank robbery. He was subsequently convicted and sentenced to the state prison. While discussing the matter with his probation officer he stated: "The officer who arrested me was by himself, and if I had wanted, I could have blasted him. I thought about it at the time, but I changed me mind when I thought of the gas chamber."

Salvador A. Estrada, a 19-year old youth with a four-year criminal record, was arrested February 8, 1960, just after he had stolen an automobile from a parking lot by wiring around the ignition switch. As he was being booked at the station, he stated to the arresting officers: "I want to ask you one question. Do you think they will repeal the capital punishment law? If they do, we can kill all you cops and judges without worrying about it."

George Hewlett Dixon, an ex-convict with a long felony record in the east, was arrested for robbery and kidnapping committed on November 26, 1959. Using a screwdriver in his jacket pocket, he held up and kidnapped the attendant of the service station, later releasing him unharmed. When questioned about using a screwdriver to simulate a gun, this man, a hardened criminal with many felony arrests and at least two known escapes from custody, indicated his fear and respect for the California death penalty and stated: "I did not want to get the gas."

In our country, Edwin Boyd was reported never to have carried a loaded gun because he feared he might use it during a bank robbery and then be subject to the death penalty. The same article in Weekend magazine quotes Paul Gascon, executive secretary of the Solicitor General's component of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the association which represents penitentiary guards. He is reported to have claimed that the six guards taken as hostages in the Kingston penitentiary riot in April, 1971, may owe their lives to the fact that the death penalty was at least on the statute books. He says:

> The inmates were told that if a guard were killed, the responsible people would be hanged.

I suggest to Parliament it is superficial to think the threat of capital punishment has no deterrent value whatsoever. It is true it may not deter some people, but neither will a prison sentence or any other penalty enacted by law deter them. However, it can deter some people. It should be in the law to say to people it is there to be used if they transgress in this way. It is in the interests of public safety that this penalty be on our statutes, and equally that our government be ready to carry it out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stackhouse: Some say it is asking too much of a judge, jury or cabinet to enact this kind of penalty. One could cite the oft quoted statement of the late President of the United States, Harry S. Truman, "If you cannot take the heat, get out of the kitchen." If you cannot assume the responsibilities of the office to which you have been called and which you have freely undertaken, get out. This is part of the responsibility of carrying forward the administration of justice in this country.

But effective as capital punishment may be as a deterrent, it would not be right for society to exact it if it were immoral in itself. Parliament must be satisfied that it is a just penalty before it has a right to impose it. We have no right to put this penalty into our statutes and to enact it if we are in any way doing it for purely pragmatic reasons. We must be satisfied that it is upheld by moral conviction as well. For that reason I have been impressed by the arguments of abolitionists that capital punishment is an offence against the sanctity of life. On the basis of that argument, they try to argue that they must oppose having it in the law. I found those arguments deeply moving, and fully respected the sincerity and values that motivated those contributions to our debate. However, there is another side to the argument. I hope that abolitionists will listen to all speakers who express it.

Capital punishment has been upheld through the centuries because of the very commitment of our society and civilization to the sanctity of life. It is a principle of law that the penalty must fit the crime and in some way make up the deprivation that the crime has caused. Surely that is the basis for having a penal code. It is the conviction that a crime has in some way deprived an individual and society of something that must be made up. The penalty in some way must equalize that which has been taken away from the individual or society.

The death penalty is, surely, based on the belief that taking a life is so great an offence that it may require the forfeit of the murderer's life to meet the demand of justice. It is because life is sacred that murder is the worst of all crimes and requires the highest of all penalties. It is not because those who favour retention of capital punishment have a loose attitude toward the value of life. It is just the opposite. It is because they are convinced that the life of the ordinary person walking home at night in the darkness of a city street has something that is ultimately precious to him, his life. That must be protected by a law that says life is of such value that where it is taken, the penalty must equalize the offence.

In the course of this debate—and it has taken the government a surprising amount of time to get back to it—some hon. members have questioned the state's right to impose the death penalty. They have suggested it is a form of murder itself. However, that reasoning is consistent only if it leads to a radically pacifist conclusion. Such a conclusion would say any taking of life is unjustified. A soldier defending his country and using the arms put in his hands by society would therefore be a murderer if he took an enemy's life. A policeman defending his community and using the gun put in his hand by society would be a murderer if he took a criminal's life.

But Parliament is not ready to reach that conclusion. It is not ready to say we should disarm our armed forces and that we should disarm our police. By the same reasoning, we should not reach the conclusion that the hangman himself, or the executioner is necessarily a murderer. We cannot reach that conclusion, because we know that in this kind of world this country must have those who will bear arms in its defence, that it must have policemen armed to defend its communities and, I put it to you, must equally be prepared to have the executioner ready to carry out the death penalty.

This does not, I submit, contradict the biblical ethic on which must of our civilization is based. That ethic rightly recognizes that there must be authority to maintain order in this kind of world and that this authority must have power to impose its will. The same justice that justifies the soldier or the police officer justifies the executioner. Some hon. members have argued that this ethic requires us to forgive and forbear. Indeed, a reference to that point of view was made by the Minister of Justice, and we have to take very seriously the kind of opinion he expressed.

I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, two points. One is that one must always distinguish between an ethic which is applied to individual and personal relationships and the ethic that orders the affairs of state and the conduct of society. It is for this reason that throughout history societies have distinguished between the right of the individual to bear arms and the right of the society to call upon soldiers, policemen or others to bear arms in its defence. Certainly, from the time of Augustine onward this has been part of the Christian tradition and it is part of the tradition of this country itself. Laws are enacted restricting the right of the individual to carry arms or use arms in his own interest. Laws also affirm the right, and often the duty, of the individual to serve the state in defending it by the use of arms.

As well we ought to recognize, when considering this point, that if we were to say society has no right to impose the death penalty because society must be prepared to forgive the murderer, surely society would not have the right to impose any kind of penalty on any offender against the law. Does not every sentence which society imposes involve a certain judgment, a judgment by which society says to the offender: You have disobeyed the law; you have offended against society; you have taken from society that which you had no right to take, and you must now make up for it? By that same reasoning, society has the right to impose the death penalty where it is deemed merited. What gives the state the moral right to incarcerate an offender in prison for years is the same right by which society can say to a murderer that his life may be taken as forfeit for the one that he has taken.

Finally, I would say it is absolutely imperative that parliament recognize the way in which the laws of the country must stress personal responsibility. Indeed, I would say it is part of the biblical ethic upon which so much of our civilization can be, has been and should be based. For that ethic requires us to emphasize the responsibility of each person for his behaviour and to conclude that each offender must be ready to pay the price of his deeds. I have often been very impressed, but more often depressed, by the way in which some hon. members throughout this debate have implied that the murderer represents a failure of society and that society must acknowledge its guilt. They have almost concluded that if a murder takes place, society should be punished and the murderer should somehow receive a large measure of sympathy.

Mr. Nielsen: A Liberal suggestion.

Mr. Stackhouse: I appreciate the importance of social influence and environmental influence for good or for ill. But surely we are not ready to be sucked into accepting the kind of extremist extortion by which we forgo any individual and personal responsibility whatsoever. Altogether, I would hope we would stress the opposite and see that the individual is fundamentally responsible for what he does. I would like to see a restoration of that principle in our ordering of the economy as well as in our ordering of social programs. But equally, indeed more, we must see it in the way we draft the law and in the way we administer it. Otherwise we can have no law and we can have no moral order.

I think one of the most important legal events of our time has been the Nuremburg trials. One of the values of the Nuremburg trials was the way in which they showed to the world that no individual can shrug off on society the responsibility for his behaviour. He may be able to say he was ordered to do something, that he was commanded to do it, that everyone was doing the same thing; but the Nuremburg trials said to him, in effect: You did it; you must accept the responsibility, and you must pay the penalty.

Now we are pleading for an emphasis of that kind in the ordering of Canadian law. We are pleading that Canada will be a country in which each person has freedom but each person has, equally, responsibility under the law.

Recently I read a very interesting and at times revealing story called "The Valacchi Papers." Describing the experiences of a Mafia killer, Joe Valacchi, the story tells how Joe felt everyone was to blame for everything in his life, except Joe himself. That kind of reasoning may be understandable when it takes place in the twisted mind of a hired gun, but it has no place in the reasoning of Members of Parliament and ministers of the crown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stackhouse: What we must see is the truth to which the contemporary French philosopher, Jean-Paul Sartre, has borne such articulate and profound testimony. This is that when you have explained all the environmental influences you wish to explain, that when you have accounted for all the effects of society, the individual himself is still left with the final decision as to the kind of life he will lead, and that human behaviour is ultimately and profoundly the result of individual choices. That is why I would wish we might have, always, a system of law which would say to the individual: Yes, we will take account of all the factors which have contributed to what you are, but above all you must recognize that you have made yourself what you are.

We would say to one person who kills another: You judge yourself; you condemn yourself. Someone else may perform the mechanics of the execution, but you yourself have put yourself on the path that has led you to this. If a man dies by execution, he dies a death he has fundamentally chosen and which, fundamentally, he could have avoided.

For these three reasons, Mr. Speaker, I hope that parliament will reject this bill and will reject it soundly: first, because the people of this country want parliament to say that this is a country where the law is enforced; second, because the provision of this law in our statute books is a deterrent to many who might take life; third, because it is an expression of personal, individual responsibility. Let us defeat this bill and return Canada to the legislation of the former Criminal Code. If we do, we shall express the will of the people, who want not permissiveness but order. They are tired of indulgence and they want responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I was first elected to Parliament in 1968 and was therefore unable to take part in previous debates on the important matter now before us. And so it is with some anxiety, but also with some satisfaction, that I rise for a few minutes to express my personal opinions on this highly controversial subject, which is nevertheless one of the most important that we have had to debate for a very long time.

Perhaps the first question that arises for me is that of the role of the member of Parliament in a debate as far-reaching as this. Does a member's mandate necessarily require him to act as his constituents seem to wish, or should he be a man who can inform them and lead them to the course he thinks best, should he, in a word, be a leader who is not content to sway with the opinions of his constituents, but assumes the responsibility of trying to help them and applying for them the laws which he believes to be the most appropriate.

I have had the opportunity of myself carrying out an opinion poll among my constituents, since when I have to admit that, to conform to their strong majority opinion, I would have to vote on unequivocally for the retention of the death penalty. But the poll included also, in addition to the question of whether or not they were in favour of the death penalty, other related questions such as whether they were in favour of the parole system which is at present in effect in this country. Their reply was just as conclusive as to the previous question on the death penalty. My constituents' dissatisfaction about this is perhaps even greater than the dissatisfaction of those who have expressed their desire to keep the death penalty.

I therefore come to the conclusion that the first responsibility of he who represents an electoral riding is to inform his constituents and state clearly that the legislation the government tries to implement meets the needs of a society that we all want to improve, a society in which, on the one hand, individuals will have the right to live, in which they will feel protected and, on the other hand, in which they will feel that all the mistakes they might make, however serious they may be, will not be considered by the state as unforgivable, and deserving to be treated with violence and in a spirit of revenge, but which deserve to be judged fairly, with understanding and with a view to rehabilitating the individual, enabling him to play again his part for the establishment of a better society in which he may have played a part for which he was not necessarily the first responsible.

It is therefore in this frame of mind, Mr. Speaker, that I take part in this debate, after explaining on several occasions to my constituents, in my riding, that in my opinion, it was sad and unfortunate that we have to live in a society where we have to consider reinstating the death penalty taking away the most valuable asset: life—in an attempt to protect society from a minority which tries to destroy it and to deprive it from its most valuable aspect, that unique asset which is life.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite difficult to say to our constituents who may read in newspapers every week and sometimes even more often, the report of horrible things which publicity takes pleasure in making known to the public often without giving explanations, attenuations which would make those acts, at first sight horrible, not justifiable but sometimes explainable.

If I could be convinced, Mr. Speaker, that it is the real criminals we are punishing by death, if I could be given that concrete proof that it is really those responsible for the corruption who are given the penalty they deserve, I might have a different view from the one I express today. But since I have had personally the chance to practise law for about 14 years before entering politics I am in a position to say with profound conviction that I have proof—and that proof is not isolated—of cases where people were condemned because of the incompetence of their counsel, perjury of witnesses and that guilty people were able to avoid punishment because of the ability of their counsel, the money they handed out and which allowed them to avoid punishment under the law.

In a society seeking harmony, people want to be able to walk down the street or stay at home without fear at being bothered, molested or attacked, and we must recognize that injustices allow the real authors of reprehensible acts to avoid punishment.

Mr. Speaker, it is truly a difficult situation for a legislator, for a private member like myself, to try and strike a balance between a society where laws must be enforced and where we must also respect the individual's basic right, namely his right to live, his right to make mistakes, even very serious mystakes. Those two rights, society's right and the individual's right, are putting us in a dilemma which makes it hard for us to take a firm stand.

If I took the position of someone who thinks that society, the protection of structures and law enforcement come first, I would then be in favour of death penalty. I would advocate strict laws which would protect the individual against himself and against those who try to break, deliberately or not, the existing laws.

But if I remember that I am also a human being who has made mistakes, who will make mistakes in the future, then I become again someone who looks at his fellow man: An individual who was placed in circumstances different from mine, who has made mistakes for which he was not always responsible. Then I want to rehabilitate this individual, to understand him, to help him and to find ways for him to become again an individual who will contribute to improve our society. I will try to enable him to become again this essential tool which will help us to prove that we were able to understand the often reprehensible actions of individuals, to accept them and to take steps according to our responsibilities.

It is true that it is a society's duty to have laws strict enough to protect the individual. But I think that we should never forget that when a society has come to the point of considering capital punishment as a solution to its problems, this society, in my opinion—and I say that with a deep conviction and without passing judgment on opinions contrary to mine—does not accept its true responsibilities which are to tackle the root of the problems, to find human solutions where the individual must be punished for his faults but not at the cost of his life.

Everyone will agree, I think, that to take someone's life is the law of the underworld. It is this absolutely irrational and absurd law which says that when a criminal, to use this word, has committed a fault, he must lose his life for the problem to be solved.

● (2140)

Mr. Speaker, I think that this debate is not and should not be political. It was a pleasure to meet some hon. members from other parties and to see the interest they have for the question and that they do not intend to have a political debate. When we talk about a man's life, when we say that our society must be better, this meets the general willingness and this is the majority if not all members.

Tonight, as during the recent days when we had the opportunity to discuss that question, all of us know that what we are going to do is very important and that it will steer the course of our society.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that we must all agree that if capital punishment is an extreme, our parole system is inadequate; several of my colleagues have agreed on that and I would like to say just a few words to support hon. members who deplored the way the parole Board allowed the release of those who had seriously broken the law.

If we want to be generous, human, understanding, I think that we must accept as a basic law that a person who has deliberately and seriously broken the law must have a penalty equal to his crime.

Maybe this is the conclusion I draw from the pole I made in my riding where I ask many times the following question: if we had a better parole system, if the people who seriously break the law had to suffer longer imprisonment, would you change your view on capital punishment? I obtained a very positive answer.

However, Mr. Speaker, I would not be in favour of a 25-year imprisonment penalty for instance. I think that we must draw the line somewhere. The offender must have the impression that in time he would be in a position to change that society where maybe he wishes to come back because he has understood that the way he followed was not the one he should have followed.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that imprisonment for as long as 25 years could perhaps satisfy some individuals and bring political support to others. It could perhaps hide behind a smoke-screen the real issue which is primarily to put an end to murders and violence.

Some, Mr. Speaker, refer to statistics in order to attempt to justify retention or abolition of capital punishment. It is true and I think that statistics prove it—that murders have increased since 1967 and this, at first sight, seems to support those in favour of the maintenance of capital punishment.

However, before taking a decision based on statistics, we should ask ourselves how many murders, since the passage of the legislation in 1967, were committed to settle a score. How many of those crimes were committed by people who lived in a social environment where they were contaminated, where they experienced an unhappy childhood, where their parents neglected their education and found themselves in such circumstances that they are not entirely responsible for the murder they did commit.

It follows that statistics can be used to justify either the maintenance or the abolishment of the death penalty. I think that it would be unfortunate to quote a whole series of statistics which can be used in one way or another without setting the basic problem, that is to determine if fear prevails. Indeed I think that all our friends in favour of retaining the death penalty are under the impression that fear of being one day put to death prevents people from committing some reprehensible action.

Mr. Béchard: Fear is the beginning of wisdom!

Mr. Marceau: My hon. friend from Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine says that fear is the beginning of wisdom. I hope that this fear will be the beginning of his own wisdom and that he will understand that as a member, a capable notary public and an extremely humane fellow, it would be absolutely absurd for him to preach at home that the law of vengeance and of the underworld would be the one that we ought to comply with. I say that in all friendship for this hon. friend who has never given me the impression that he would go that far in his reasoning.

[Mr. Marceau.]

Mr. Speaker, I would not like to stretch this debate, because I think that others have some extremely valuable opinions to express. In concluding I would like to express a view on the cabinet prerogative to commute death penalties to life imprisonment.

I find it rather stange that, on the one hand, the death penalty is advocated in cases where prison guards or policemen are murdered, that the right to protection is recognized where they are concerned and that their murderers deserve to be put to death, while on the other hand the course of the law can be altered by a political commutation.

Personally, I feel that if we favour some exceptions, as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) mentioned in his question a while ago, we should be logical enough to pursue the reasoning to its ultimate limit. In fact, I believe that if this bill, as it stands, is accepted, we should seriously consider qualifying the political intervention for commutation in such a way as to allow the judiciary to really play its role; when society, acting through a jury and judge, has decided to take extreme measures in some cases, the law should take its course or those exceptions should be removed which, to my mind, are no longer exceptions if they are finally cancelled through political interventions.

Mr. Speaker, I should therefore like to close my remarks by saying simply this, as honestly and seriously as possible: The bill under study and on which we shall have to vote seems to me to be a compromise—and this is unfortunate—that we regretfully have to accept in the circumstances because in my very limited personal experience—although I still represent a significant number of voters—I have to come to the conclusion that outright abolition of the death penalty would be an inappropriate step that should not be taken.

However, full retention of the death penalty would, in my opinion, be a solution that would not meet the needs of our present society because first and foremost—and I say it again—I hope that the Canadian society in which we have confidence will understand how urgent it is that we consider total abolition of the death penalty within a few years. Regretfully, the present situation does not allow it; I think that, rightfully because violence still exists to various degrees—a violence we want to prevent and whose progress we want to curb—people criticize us for passing compromise legislation. However, I hope and I am convinced that soon the Canadian society, which is the best and which we all cherish, will be mature enough to abolish definitively the death penalty that places Canadians under the rule of violence and fear. We would like to eliminate forever the haunting idea of the death penalty and get back to a Canadian society in which it will be pleasant to live. I am convinced that this will be done very soon.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express great thankfulness for being able to take part in this debate tonight because I think it is one of the most important debates we have had during the session. This matter has been under discussion since the beginning of this session and, indeed, during almost the whole length of time I have been in parliament. I cannot forget that prior to the 1967 legislation there were private members' bills introduced. There was a private member's bill introduced on one occasion at least when we went over the whole matter of capital punishment and decided in our own way where we stood and expressed our position. I feel that it is very important that we should do so once again at this time, because this is a debate which is not confined to this House but which is profoundly shaking Canadians and the Canadian conscience from one coast to the other.

I want to say at the outset that I believe the people on both sides of this debate are very sincere and earnest as to where they believe the truth to lie. But I want to say, also, that I was exceedingly grateful for the speech which was made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) this evening, because I felt that in that speech he did what should be done in a debate of this kind. He gave a very dispassionate, quiet outline of the situation as he saw it and he endeavoured to keep the temperature down. That is what we should try to do in this debate.

I feel that one of the things that has made it very difficult, both outside and inside the House, is the way in which emotions have been whipped up to the point where it has been practically impossible for many people to regard this matter in a logical way. It has been practically impossible for them even to consider facts, because we were unfortunate in that a few very horrible crimes occurred in this country at the time when this legislation was brought forward for consideration. With our usual Canadian way of doing things, although we got off to a slow start in considering the matter it did not take long before the hot-liners, the press and the media in general whipped up excitement about the matter until people were no longer able to look at it in the right context and perspective.

Certainly, I feel that as a result, in many parts of this country people got the idea that any time their little girl went up to the mailbox to post a letter, a rapist might be lurking behind any one of the trees between their home and the corner. Women got the idea that there was not a street in Canadian cities where it was safe for them to venture forth once darkness fell, and strong men got the idea that everyone was running round with weapons and lying in ambush for them.

I know that we have had an excess of crime in recent years. Canada is not the only place where crime has increased, crimes of all kinds and particularly crimes of violence; but I know also that it has not been proven anywhere by figures that the rate of murder has increased in this country or in any other country. I know that what the Minister of Justice said tonight was accurate according to the best research that has been done, that there is no proof that capital punishment acts as a deterrent.

I know that these things are true from the facts and figures that have been worked out painfully and slowly by the researchers. Consequently, I was grateful tonight when the Minister of Justice brought this debate to a quiet consideration of facts, figures and alternatives before us as we think about how best to protect society from people who have committed murder. After all, that is the question at which we are looking.

I do not think it helps one little bit to quote the words of Jesus Christ who was, above all, a man of peace, good will and forgiveness, in such a way as to shut out any hope of mercy on this earth for a person who has committed murder or any hope of just or civilized treatment on the part of his fellow humans. I do not think that is helpful in this debate, nor does it help to pick out some of the particularly spectacular crimes and act as though these were the general rule and imply that there were many more of them than we hear about. As I say, a climate of quiet reasonableness is the one in which we should be discussing this matter.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL PARKS—BANFF AND JASPER—LACK OF ACCOMMODATION FOR SUMMER EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON HOUSING POLICY

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am going to discuss tonight an accommodation crisis in two townsites which are virtually completely controlled by the federal government, a contempt for democratic rights which is a continuing affront to this Parliament, and a warning of the way in which power can be abused.

On March 26 I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) for an outline of the government's housing policy in the townsites of Banff and Jasper. You must understand that because they are located within national parks, Banff and Jasper have virtually no power to govern themselves. If the people who live there want a pothole repaired, they have to go to Ottawa for authority. One of the critical matters which Ottawa controls is the disposition of building lots and building permits.

While the state may have no business in the bedrooms of the nation, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development personally controls and decides on the number of bedrooms there will be in Banff and Jasper. For several years there have been too few beds and too little accommodation to meet the needs of the people who have to live there because they work there. In summer, that shortage becomes more acute because of the summer help needed to meet the growing flow of tourists, drawn in part by the deliberate tourist advertising of the federal government.

When I asked what the minister was doing, he replied that he was reviewing the matter. Some days later he tabled in committee a statement with two major proposals: first, the response to the summer crisis would be to let local businessmen provide temporary accommodation with trailer dormitories; second, the minister expressed his view that one answer to the housing demand in Jasper would be to move the people, instead of building houses. Twelve hundred people, one third of Jasper's population, are associated with the CNR division point in Jasper, and the minister has stated his clear preference that the answer to that crisis should be to find the division point, in his words, a new home.

Later still, a press release was issued proposing to make sites available for permanent mobile homes in Jasper, although not in Banff. The preference was repeated, to move the people of the CNR. Those announcements leave at least three gaping problems: first, there is no assurance that this announcement—under duress and late in the day—of permission to build temporary mobile homes can be taken advantage of by enough local employers; second, there is no announced intention to meet the permanent accommodation crisis in Banff, except the veiled suggestion that the solution there might be to move people, too, to the neighbouring town of Canmore; third, there is the clear fact that many Jasper residents would not choose a mobile home if they lived in a community where choice was a reality.

Despite the minister's concessions, there is still an acute accommodation shortage in the townsites of Banff and Jasper national parks. But, Sir, I suggest to you and to this House that the issue goes well beyond housing. The basic problem is that the relationship between the parks department and the people of the townsites is a colonial relationship, marked by people who are powerless and a government that is arbitrary, secretive and arrogant.

Virtually everyone accepts that townsites in the national parks cannot be exactly like communities elsewhere. They are in a region dedicated to preservation and so there must be some controls. The people who live there accept that. They are perhaps more concerned about conservation than any other community of Canadians. Indeed, they prove their commitment by going to live with nature and not just talking about it. The people in the townsites are not opponents of control. They are opponents of abuse; and abuse is what has happened—an abuse of power so consistent that it should alarm every Canadian concerned about arbitrary government.

Let me cite a few examples. In the past ten years Ottawa has commissioned a number of reports about the townsites. Few have been published. All have been expensive. More are still secret. If the people concerned were consulted, it occurred only after the decisions were taken. They were not asked, they were told, about the community where they live and raise children. Again, there is no local government. Virtually every local decision, except for schools and related matters, goes to some distant deputy in Ottawa for final decision.

Now the minister announces his conclusion, without the slightest consultation, that the best thing to do with the 1,200 railroaders who live in Jasper is to move them out. When he said that, I asked if he would hold a public hearing to find out what problems or opinions the people might have. He declined to hold a public hearing. So I called such a meeting and invited the minister to come, or the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) or his parliamentary secretary from whom we hear so much. The minister declined to come. He declined to send his officials. He refused to send people there who might answer the questions of the residents. The minister says that he believes the meeting was premature. He thinks that consultation of that kind is premature. The reason he thinks so is that he prefers to consult only after decision is taken.

What is alarming to Canada about this situation is that this attitude is not restricted to the townsites in the mountain national parks. It is the attitude which led the minister at Ship Harbour, the new national park, to propose to move the people there, some of whom had been living in those sites for eight to ten generations. It is the attitude we find in Kouchibouguac park in New Brunswick. It is the attitude we find in Waterton and Riding Mountain. The parks' problems are serious problems. They are going to grow more acute. If we are to solve them in a reasonable way we must dispense with this arrogant, arbitrary and secretive attitude of the parks department and begin to recognize the rights of people who live in areas that are, or will become, national parks.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it will be rather difficult to answer all the questions raised by the hon. member in three minutes, but I would point out that the minister tabled a document in the committee which indicated a number of things that have been done. I recognize the sincerity of the hon. member, and all hon. members know the efforts made by the previous member for Rocky Mountain who was continually bringing problems to the attention of parliament and the government with respect to the national parks.

I believe we have done a lot in the past four or five years in trying to increase communication between people who are concerned about conservation, about parks and about many of the matters connected with them. In particular, in connection with the national parks several public hearings have been held related to the establishment of new national parks. This was the first time in our history that such public hearings were held, and they were very fruitful. The government received some good advice from these meetings and by and large it has been reflected in a number of changed decisions. The hon. member mentioned Kouchibouguac. I think we have arrived at a very positive solution with respect to it. We had some difficult times there with the fishermen who were displaced, but we found some positive solutions to compensate fishermen for the rights they lost.

In the time remaining to me I wish to turn to the specific problem raised by the hon. member and to mention some of the short-term and long-term solutions. In Jasper, discussions are going on with the CNR with a view to relocating the railway division's activities outside the park. During the transitional period, fluctuations in permanent and seasonal housing demands will be met by making serviced lots available for mobile homes or dormitory-type trailers. Sites for seasonal staff requirements will be ready for use in time for this summer season. In addition, a number of mobile home sites will be available almost immediately, and the remainder necessary to meet all current demand will be ready by the end of November, 1973. Temporary sites will be available in the meantime. The minister issued a press release a few days ago which I think was well received by many people out there. I notice that an editorial in one of the local papers spoke favourably of the positive statements that the minister had made in this regard.

In Banff, the opportunity to provide visitor support industries and their employees with accommodation in the Canmore area is being pursued. Our regional planning officers have entered into discussions with Alberta provincial planners with respect to land use adjacent to national parks, including the possible development of the Canmore area to accommodate persons servicing park visitors. Development of Canmore will provide an economic stimulus to the area, as well as local employment. I know that some aspects of this matter in the Canmore area, have been looked at very critically. One of the criticisms of some of the people—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired. I had given him some extra time because of the difficulty of saying "Kouchibouguac."

POST OFFICE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF SAMSON-BELAIR REPORT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I asked the government to produce the Samson-Belair, Riddell and Stead Post Office transportation study which was compiled in 1969 with the co-operation of five postal employees. It was important that this document be produced and that the government inform the House and the people of Canada whether any of the apparently worth-while recommendations were implemented. The document highlighted areas where millions of dollars could be saved.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) informed me that the document is confidential. There is nothing confidential in the document. It contains worth-while public information and should have been publicized. The House and the Canadian people are now entitled to know if any of the recommendations were implemented and, if not, why not. It is impossible for the minister or his representative to give a complete answer in three minutes and I would suggest that the minister or his departmental officials compile a complete and detailed explanation on all aspects of this study. After all, it cost Canadian taxpayers $240,000 and they are entitled to some answers.

There is, however, one clearcut recommendation in the study. It is that the Post Office should continue to use private contractors in the delivering of mail, because they are able to carry out the service at less cost than the government. The study backed this up with explicit and detailed information.

In answer to my question as to the increased number of trucks and employees now needed since the government dropped the private contractor, the Postmaster General has informed me that 50 more trucks and 447 more employees are required. This increase, plus all the additional maintenance costs of the vehicles, will run into millions of dollars. Further to this, mail delivery service has deteriorated since the changeover which took place on April 19, 1972.

There is some dispute as to the figures for Winnipeg. The Postmaster General states that the number of trucks has increased by only one. The Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce, which has undertaken considerable study on this matter, has publicly stated that the number of trucks in Winnipeg has increased by 36. If these figures were incorrect, the Post Office should have made a public statement to put the record straight. I will be investigating this matter further. Also, Mr. Speaker, it would be of value to know why in some cities it takes fewer vehicles now, and in other centres more. On November 23, 1971, the then postmaster general stated:

> The intent of the Post Office is to integrate urban mail transportation services in major areas of Canada in order to help stabilize mail transportation in these centres whose continued operation is essential to the maintenance of a national postal network.
> The proposed integration means that the Post Office will undertake the intra-urban mail transportation previously carried out by private contractors . . .
>
> The decision to implement an integration of urban mail transportation services comes after a series of studies by the Post Office Department.

It is unfortunate this study was not presented at that time.

> As a result of these studies, integration was successfully undertaken in sections of Montreal and Vancouver as early as 1967.

The then postmaster general further stated:

> Application of the national and regional criteria result in the inclusion of the following metropolitan cities in the program—

He listed 19 cities. I have only asked for information on eight; I will have to ask for information on the remaining 11. The then postmaster general completed his speech by saying:

> I believe that this move will help to bring a greater degree of stability to a most important element of Canada's mail system and as such constitutes a major step forward in the development of an increasingly reliable mail service.

That is all contrary to information in the study to which I have referred. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), speaking on this subject at that time, stated:

> I have followed the changes made by the Post Office Department in recent years, and the difficulty has been that with every change costs have gone up and services have gone down.

How true that is. At no time did the then postmaster general make any mention of the Samson-Belair study. He had documented evidence that it would be a major mistake for the Post Office to take over the mail delivery, but he completely misled this House and the people of Canada by saying it was a major step forward. He had in his possession a $240,000 study which clearly stated that the four existing government-operated urban services were more costly than an equivalent contracted operation. Detailed reasons were given for reaching this decision. The government and the former postmaster general owe this House and the people of Canada an immediate explanation for their actions. This report reads:

> The principal criteria for evaluating the desirability of department operating or contracting its combined urban services requirements is cost; and more specifically the cost per item to provide the service . . .

The major factor in the cost gap between government and contracted services is labour productivity, and to a lesser extent administrative and supervisory costs . . .

The performance of the service by the department withholds from the private sector a volume of business which could stimulate growth and development. Furthermore, government stands to lose the tax revenues which would normally be derived from contractor's profits and their purchase of gasoline and other materials . . .

In future the department should contract for city services unless there is conclusive evidence as to the unavailability of this service on reasonable terms from outside the department.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him by the Standing Order has expired.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I regret infinitely that the hon. member is trying to do indirectly what he was prevented from doing directly. He already tried—and he is at it again this evening—to table in this House the confidential report prepared by Samson, Bélair, Riddell, Stead, Inc., or to have it tabled and he was told at that time that he had not the privilege to do so.

I would rather refer him to Appendix "B" of Hansard of March 15, 1973, at page 2288, which describes the general principle applying for notices of motion for the production of papers.

I think that this consultant study on transport clearly falls under paragraph (1) of the clause on consultant studies in Appendix "B". The nature of the consultant study is identifiable and comparable to work that would be done within the Public Service and it should be treated as such.

I would also like to mention to the hon. member that his remarks are of course very incomplete and probably biased too, because he knows very well that the Department already implemented 36 of the 44 recommendations of this report.

Secondly, he knows very well that following this report, there was another, introduced by Mr. Goldenberg and that following the recommendations included in the Goldenberg report, issued one year after the Samson, Bélair, Riddell, Stead Inc., report the main urban transport services were integrated in order to reinforce the postal transport system and to ensure about 1,100 Canadians a permanent job.

Finally, the hon. member also knows very well that I cannot discuss this matter fully because of the proceedings initiated by companies which are affected by the integration.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—CF-5 AIRCRAFT—REASON FOR ADDITIONAL PURCHASES

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on April 18 the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) replied jointly to my written question No. 1277 in which I had asked how many CF-5 aircraft had been purchased by the government, how many were currently in service, how many were in storage and how many had been sold to other nations. The answers, respectively, were: 135, 46, 45 and 20. The initial purchase order was 115 CF-5 aircraft. We have now purchased 135. Those 115 cost Canada $225 million, about $2 million per plane.

I should add that I followed-up my original written question with an oral question in which I asked the Minister of Supply and Services, as reported on page 3433 of Hansard, why, if more than half the aircraft initially purchased where not in use by the armed forces, we were arranging to buy another 20. The answer I received was as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I shall first study the question and then give an answer to the hon. member.

The point I wish to make is this. Before a written question is replied to, an answer is prepared by public servants and submitted to the minister concerned for examination. If we add the figures given in answer to my question, the number of aircraft in service, in storage and sold to other countries is 111. The number purchased is 135. If I were the minister I would want to know what had happened to the other 24 aircraft before I authorized that answer. The minister obviously failed to ask such a question, to judge from the nature of his answer in which he said he would have to find out.

I am appalled that the minister should have given a reply like that. I knew what had happened to the other 24 aircraft before I asked him the question. Six had crashed, and 18 were awaiting delivery from Canadair. The reason for our purchase of an additional 20 aircraft is that we are converting from CF-5s in single configuration to CF-5s in dual configuration because the aircraft is now to be used as a trainer for pilots designated for service in high performance jet aircraft.

On the surface, this decision by the Department of Supply and the Department of National Defence appears to be reasonable. However, the CF-5, which the people of Canada purchased at approximately $2 million a copy, is a development of a training aircraft, the Northrup T-38 Talon which can be purchased off the shelf at about two-thirds the price of a CF-5. What we are doing is converting these expensive CF-5s to trainers when the CF-5 was itself developed from a trainer. If we want trainers, why not buy T-38s or have them built under licence? If we want a general purpose fighter aircraft—the original justification for the CF-5 when ordered in 1965—why not buy one that will serve that role adequately?

The CF-5 has beautiful flying characteristics, I am told, but little else can be said about it which is in its favour. As an interceptor it is too slow. Little good can be said about it in terms of air-to-air combat, in terms of photo reconnaissance or as a tactical ground support fighter. It is too slow for some roles, too delicate for others, too poorly armed for still others.

Its purchase, which I believe was decided upon when the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) was minister of national defence, has to be classed among the monumental blunders in an area where blunders have outnumbered wise decisions in recent years. I am speaking of equipment purchased for the Canadian Armed Forces. What we needed at the time the CF-5 was purchased were about 70 high-performance aircraft. We ordered 115 CF-5s because that was the minimum number that Canadair could produce in any sort of economic manner. Thus, we purchased upward of one-third more aircraft than we needed; one-third more of an aircraft that was chosen principally because it was cheap, not because it fitted the role for which it was purchased.

In effect, we are thus paying one-third more for each aircraft than the purchase price of $2 million, and indeed since less than one-half of the initial purchase order is now in service we have in fact paid double for each aircraft. For double the price per copy of a CF-5 in 1965, when the order was placed, we could have purchased, for example, the F-4 Phantom and would have had the number of multipurpose, high-performance aircraft we required, and no more; aircraft that are capable of fulfilling the role assigned to them, which the CF-5 is not.

Beyond that, we now have in service 66 CF-101 Voodoo aircraft and are replacing them with newer models. An aircraft like the F-4, with slight modifications, could have fulfilled an air defence role as well as a tactical support role and other roles assigned to the CF-5. Thus, had we purchased such an aircraft to fulfil all fighter aircraft roles, we probably would have been able to place an order sufficiently large to warrant production of that kind of aircraft in Canada. Such a decision would have had the additional advantage of lowering supply and maintenance costs because we would have only one aircraft instead of two aircraft types in service.

It is about time we stopped making major equipment purchases for the Canadian armed services on an ad hoc basis. We will shortly need to decide upon a replacement aircraft for the CF-104s and CF-101s which are in service. The answer that I received to question No. 1210 on the order paper informed me that these aircraft will need to be replaced "about 1980." Unhappily, the same answer informed me that "no specific evaluation study of possible replacement aircraft for the CF-101 and CF-104 is currently under way". Well, let us get one under way and avoid the purchase of another disaster like the CF-5 or the Bonaventure refit. When we talk about equipment for the Canadian Armed Forces, we are talking about millions of dollars. For heaven's sake, let us quit fooling around.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the original question we are debating tonight, dealing with an additional 20 CF-5s being purchased, appears in Hansard at page 3433 of April 18, 1973. As the hon. members knows, the Canadian forces' inventory of CF-5 aircraft, now standing at 68 single-seaters and 23 duals and due to be increased by 18 more duals, is calculated to be just right for the programmed 15-year life of the aircraft. With an advanced training role soon to be added to the CF-5s close support tactical air assignment in mobile command, it is expected that aircraft held in unit establishments and in reserve will be adequate for the total program.

Beginning in December, 19 dual and 12 single CF-5s will begin to replace the T-33 aircraft currently used by 1 Canadian forces flying training school at CFB Cold Lake, Alberta. The change will give the forces the capability of training student jet pilots on a modern aircraft at the advanced level. It is estimated that the CF-5 phasing-in will be completed at 1 CFFTS by November, 1974.

Twenty aircraft were sold to Venezuela in 1972. Of these, 18 are being replaced as dual-seaters for the expanded training role. Six aircraft have been written off due to accidents since the CF-5 came into service in 1968. While some CF-5s are currently on inactive reserve, all the aircraft are programmed for various roles during the aircraft's service life. These aircraft will be brought back into service as required to fill commitments. Mr. Speaker, this situation has no relationship whatsoever to the refitting of the Bonaventure, as this is a constructive program.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the light of representations made to Members of Parliament of all parties from, I suppose, all the major cities in this country I should like to move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration be requested to review the criteria adopted for the continuation of LIP grants so that projects which have been discontinued solely because the cities in which they operate have a lower rate of unemployment than the national average can be considered favourably: (a) because the area in which they operate has a high rate of unemployment, (b) because the project itself is of great social value.

PUBLIC WORKS

CONSTRUCTION OF RETAINING WALLS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion concerning a most urgent matter resulting from serious erosion on the St. Lawrence banks which is damaging properties and causing concern to riparian residents. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House request the establishment of a special committee to consider the legislation and regulations authorizing the construction of retaining walls and to suggest amendments enabling the Minister of Public Works to build the required walls where necessary and as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent, therefore the motion cannot be put.

HOUSING

ROCHDALE COLLEGE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, when you called "Motions" I did rise to move a motion but I was not recognized. Perhaps you did not notice me, but I would appreciate the opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure hon. members will agree to return to motions for the purpose of allowing the hon. member to rise for the purpose of proposing a motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stackhouse: In view of reports that Rochdale College, Toronto, was the scene this weekend of the eleventh fatality through falling from this high-rise, social monstrosity, and in view of reports that of 800 arrests in connection with Rochdale since January, 100 have been for drug trafficking, I ask leave of the House pursuant to Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That CMHC be directed by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to request the receivers of Rochdale College to replace the present management and to evict the present tenants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: There are many vocal "yeas" but there are also many vocal "nays". Since there is not unanimity the motion cannot be put.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

PENITENTIARIES

ESCAPES AND DISTURBANCES

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26 I ask leave to move a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing specific and important matters requiring urgent consideration. These matters I have given notice of concern the penitentiary system in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta has given the Chair notice of his intention to request leave to move a motion to adjourn the House under the provisions of Standing Order 26 so that consideration can be given to the matter of the penitentiary system of Canada.

There is little doubt in my mind that the question raised by the hon. member is one of widespread and great concern among all members of the House. It relates, indeed, to the kind of situation that would normally be contemplated, I suggest, by the provisions of Standing Order 26. I would think there is a consensus among hon. members that an opportunity should be provided as soon as possible for the consideration by the House of this issue. The many questions asked yesterday during the question period are an indication of this general feeling.

At the same time, it is difficult for the Chair to overlook the fact that one of its committees this very day was seized with consideration of the matter, and this is evidenced by the fact that a report, which I have in my hand, was tabled by the chairman of the committee. I appreciate that there is difficulty in that a motion to concur in the report has not been proposed to the House at this time. It may well be that, in the minds of hon. members, by consent it would be better to have a debate under such a motion rather than have an emergency debate. I would think this could be arranged following consultation.

I repeat that in my view this is the kind of situation contemplated by Standing Order 26, and I would be inclined to put the hon. member's motion and suggest a debate at eight o'clock this evening. It may be, however, that following consultation there will be agreement among hon. members to have this debate in another way at another time.

Accordingly, as authorized under the Standing Order I will hold the matter in abeyance until these consultations have taken place within the next couple of hours and make a ruling later this afternoon on the basis of whatever consultations may have taken place in the meantime.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER—OVERCROWDING—ALLEGED BEATING OF PRISONER BY GUARD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see the Solicitor General back in the House safe and sound.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: He went over the wall.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to direct a question to him regarding the penitentiary at Dorchester, New Brunswick, which I believe the minister visited last week. Is it correct that Dorchester penitentiary is overcrowded as a result of a big increase in the prison population during the past year? Is it also correct there are not enough beds to go around and some prisoners are being kept in what is called the hole, partially for punishment and but also partially because there is not enough room?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, Dorchester penitentiary is at capacity. When I was there last week I think they had one more space available in the entire penitentiary, and some of the inmates were in the disassociation area.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That must be the guardhouse.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the disassociation area is the hole. This extreme population problem is the result of two things. Approximately a year ago there was an excess of space in the penitentiary but there was a transfer of inmates from western Canada where at that time we had a serious population problem.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Oh, we are good boys.

Mr. Allmand: They still had space available there, but since the beginning of this year they have had 100 inmates from the Maritimes enter Dorchester, which is far beyond any intake into the penitentiary in recent years.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Just like central Canada, they blame all their troubles on the west.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question arising from the fact that the penitentiary is overcrowded and that some inmates are being kept in the hole for reasons of overcrowding. Can the minister tell us whether he in fact examined the facilities while he was there? I know he interviewed some of the prisoners, but did he in fact examine the facilities of the institution or did he refrain from examining certain areas of the penitentiary because it was too dangerous for him to do so?

● (1420)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to examine the facilities but the director of the penitentiary recommended that I not do so at that particular time because there was a sit-down strike going on at that time in the institution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: I took the decision that it was more important to spend the time speaking to the men. I met with the union representatives, the inmates committee, and the officials. I might say that since I was there we have moved 24 inmates out of Dorchester to central Canada. We put 12 of those 24 in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Were they hockey fans?

Mr. Allmand: To be precise, the 12 who were sent to St. Vincent de Paul were put in an area that was formerly used as a regional reception centre. It was vacated recently for a new regional reception centre. That space was available for these men. We were going to close that wing. The other 12 were sent to Kingston penitentiary to an area that had been closed previously but is being opened up on a temporary basis to deal with these men in the overcrowded situation.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether it is true that a beating took place at Dorchester by a guard, not a beating of a guard but a beating by a guard of a prisoner, and that subsequently the guard was transferred to another institution? Has there been an investigation of this if in fact a beating did take place, and when will the results of that investigation be made public?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not have information with regard to a beating by a guard. There was a fight earlier in the winter between some inmates which led to some further trouble, but I will check into this. When I was there I was not made aware of a beating by a guard, but I will check into that.

PRINCE ALBERT—COMPLAINTS BY WIVES OF PRISON OFFICERS CONCERNING DANGERS FACED BY GUARDS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I will go from Dorchester to Prince Albert and ask the minister whether or not he has had any complaints in writing from the wives of officers in the Prince Albert penitentiary concerning the serious dangers that the guards face today because of the failure of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries to give them support when they are challenged by recalcitrant prisoners?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there were some letters, but last week the Commissioner of Pentitentiaries visited Prince Albert and met with the wives. He had a long discussion with them and promised to take up the complaints they put to him. He reported to me yesterday about that visit. We intend to follow up on that, but he had quite a long discussion with wives of the guards.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have one follow-up question, Mr. Speaker. Was there a general suggestion that the penitentiary services of Canada, including Prince Albert, would be a lot better off if it were not for the fact that a political appointee is commissioner today who has no knowledge whatever and had none when he was appointed two years ago?

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker. No one has made that suggestion to me except the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in reply to the minister because the hon. member for Skeena has already raised the matter and certainly it was dealt with in Prince Albert. If the information has not got to the minister, somebody is guarding the information from him.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Lewis: I do not have a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is why I am recognizing at this time the hon. member for Skeena on a supplementary question and a few other hon. members who have supplementaries. I will come to the hon. member for York South in a short while.

POSSIBILITY OF EXERCISE OF AMNESTY TO RELIEVE OVERCROWDING

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to ask the minister whether he is going to rename the special correctional unit at Laval as a halfway house, but I will not. I should like to ask the minister whether he is going to resort to that age-old technique of dealing with overcrowding in prisons by invoking amnesty upon the occasion of the visit of Her Majesty?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that is not our intention. Since the establishment of the National Parole Board several years ago it has been our policy to release inmates under the Parole Act rather than by amnesty.

PRISONERS TRANSFERRED FROM DORCHESTER TO ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—REQUEST FOR SELECT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE PENAL SYSTEM

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. I wish to ask him whether, of the prisoners transferred from Dorchester following disturbances there, five of those transferred or one or more were the same individuals who escaped from the Laval institution last Sunday?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, none of them were the same. The people who were transferred from Dorchester to St. Vincent de Paul were transferred to the old St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary and in particular to the former regional reception centre. The people who escaped were from the correctional development centre, which is a different institution, a super-maximum institution—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I have a further supplementary question for the minister. Since he was with us in the committee this morning and since the committee has reported the unanimous request of the committee to the House that a select committee be set up to inquire into the whole penal system throughout the country, will he recommend to his cabinet colleagues that that motion be acceded to by the House so that it can be brought in and passed without debate?

Mr. Allmand: This morning I stated that it was up to the committee to make a decision on that matter. I had decided we would have an independent judicial inquiry, which I think is the better way of dealing with it. I said that if the committee decided to set up a parliamentary inquiry I would co-operate with the inquiry, but I personally do not think it is the best way of dealing with this subject.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously a number of supplementaries are being sought on this subject. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi and then complete the first round of questioning. The Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta on a supplementary question.

REPORTED ADVICE TO ST. VINCENT DE PAUL OFFICIALS BY POLICE THAT INMATES WHO ESCAPED WERE SPECIAL SECURITY RISKS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, were officials of the minister's department informed by officials of the Quebec Provincial Police that the five inmates who escaped from the correctional institution in Montreal last weekend were special security risks requiring extra and special surveillance?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the first that I heard about that allegation was when I saw Mr. St. Pierre on television last night. We immediately got in touch with the Commissioner of Penitentiaries to see if the Director of the Quebec Provincial Police had passed on any such information. The commissioner was not aware of it, but he checked and this morning he told me that certain information was passed on with respect to one of the inmates to one or some of the officials of the Quebec region, but it was with respect to a time frame other than the present time. I am pursuing that still further and I hope to have more information for the House as soon as possible. We dealt with that in the committee this morning as much as we could.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROGRAMS TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNGER CANADIANS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we can leave the super institution the Solicitor General was talking about and ask the Minister of Finance a question. I am sure everyone in the House is happy with the fact that the unemployment figures continue slightly on a down curve—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: —but in view of the fact it is still the case that younger Canadians from 14 to 24 years represent the largest single group of unemployed Canadians at this time and it is a very large number of unemployed, about 200,000 or more, may I ask the Minister of Finance or any other minister dealing with the matter whether there is any particular program to deal with the unemployment of young Canadians in the months ahead?

● (1430)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a good many of the direct employment measures of the government are oriented toward younger people, as the hon. gentleman knows, particularly LIP and OFY. I am watching these figures with great care.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNGER CANADIANS—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF TERMINATION OF LOCAL INITIATIVES PROJECTS IN MAJOR CITIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, that leads to a rather obvious but important supplementary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact Local Initiatives Programs in major cities are being terminated at the end of this month on the basis that those cities have less than the average national unemployment rate, which ignores the fact that in those large cities there may be pockets of unemployment above the national average rate, and as many thousands of young Canadians will be thrown on the employment market and many worthwhile schemes will be abandoned, I would like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether he is ready to reconsider his program and to continue worthwhile projects—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: —not those given to companies but those given to local communities organizations?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give every consideration to the hon. member's representations. I have nothing further to announce at this time.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I think every member of the House is disappointed with that answer. The minister told us yesterday that he would give it consideration. In view of the very large number of young unemployed in Canada, and in view of the fact that more young Canadians are likely to be unemployed when they leave school this month and next month, will the minister now undertake to reconsider his program and put the LIP projects on the basis of their worthwhileness in terms of service instead of the irrelevant criterion he has now adopted?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, all those factors are being given consideration not only because of the representations of my hon. friend across the way but because of very considerable representations by members of my own party.

POLICIES TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REVIEW OF PRESENT REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS TO SEEK IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. While we welcome the news of a general decline in unemployment across the nation, in view of the fact that unemployment in the Atlantic region was 11.1 per cent last month, almost twice the national average and actually higher than it was at this time three years ago, is the Minister of Finance, along with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, preparing a co-ordinated set of policies involving capital, transportation, manpower and taxes to reduce decisively the disparity of employment opportunities suffered in this region and, if so, when will a statement be made?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, although there is some improvement in the unemployment picture I am not satisfied with them in most areas of the country. But I should note that the hon. gentleman ought to take some comfort from the fact that in the Atlantic region the employment picture increased by 20 thousand in April over March. We will continue, with the co-operation of my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to increase opportunities in the Atlantic region.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Central Nova on a supplementary, and then will attempt to finish the first round of questions. I think I should recognize the hon. member for Champlain and after that return to all these supplementaries on the first and second questions which will take a few minutes.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer, and I should like to address a supplementary to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the goal of equitable employment opportunities for the Atlantic region and Quebec has obviously not been advanced successfully by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the national economic policies of the past four years, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is going to undertake a thorough and independent review of existing regional development programs, and in particular is the government going to set up a special task force to co-ordinate over-all regional development and transportation policies to seek further improvements in these depressed areas?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the premise of the question, but so far as an over-all review is concerned the minister responsible for Regional Economic Expansion has done such a review and is now in the process of discussing it with the various provinces. He is engaged in a series of trips to the various parts of Canada to discuss with them the various aspects of that review, and of course the Minister of Transport is doing the same thing in his area.

PUBLIC WORKS

EROSION ALONG ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—CONSTRUCTION OF RETAINING WALLS—POSSIBILITY OF AMENDING STANDARDS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Could he say whether he has ordered his officials to consider particularly the problem of retaining walls along the shores of the St. Lawrence River in order to change the present standards which keep riparian owners from being adequately protected?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the problem of damages caused by erosion along the shores of the St. Lawrence is still under consideration. Of course, I cannot commit either the department or the Canadian government to take the responsibility for any erosion due to natural causes. Again, when erosion is caused either by shipping or federal works, we then assume responsibility. I would say that in certain parts of the St. Lawrence it is quite difficult to determine whether or not erosion is caused by shipping, and we try to establish our limits as precisely as possible.

CONSTRUCTION OF RETAINING WALLS—DELIMITATION OF RESPONSIBILITIES—ADVISABILITY OF CONVENING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the problems raised as to jurisdiction of the various levels of government, does the hon. minister intend to convene a federal-provincial conference for the purpose of discussing this matter so that jurisdictions of federal, provincial and municipal governments may be clearly established and that the public be better informed and know to whom applications should be made?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that our responsibilities are quite clearly established and we have no intention, at least for the present, to convene a federal-provincial conference in order to define them.

POINTE-AU-PIC—INQUIRY RESPECTING COMPLETION OF RETAINING WALL

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Further to my colleague's question, does the department, which undertook the construction of retaining walls in Pointe-au-Pic some six to ten years ago, expect to bring this work to completion this year?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, since the project mentioned is a specific one, I should have to review the file in order to know what to decide.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON STABBING

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It relates to a question I asked yesterday of the Minister of Justice regarding a stabbing that took place at the British Columbia penitentiary a week ago this Wednesday. Can he tell us who got stabbed, who did the stabbing, and whether any charges are pending?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I am awaiting a report on that, Mr. Speaker. When I get it I will give it to the hon. member as soon as possible.

EFFECT OF CLOSING MINIMUM SECURITY INSTITUTIONS AT SPRINGHILL AND BLUE MOUNTAIN ON REHABILITATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Solicitor General if he has made an assessment of why decisions were taken by his department to close the minimum security institutions at Springhill and at Blue Mountain in New Brunswick, which has resulted in a great deal of the overcrowding that has occurred at both the Dorchester and Springhill maximum and medium security institutions and has in effect just about destroyed the rehabilitation program carried out in those two institutions?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the institutions referred to that were closed were minimum security institutions. Our problem is not really with minimum security inmates; it is with maximum and to a certain extent medium security inmates. I must also say that at the same time those two institutions were closed a new centre was opened in Halifax, a community correctional centre, and another is shortly to be opened in Moncton as a minimum security centre. These will allow inmates to work in the community at the same time as they are carrying on their rehabilitation program.

● (1440)

Mr. Coates: Would the Solicitor General not agree that the closure of these two institutions and the transfer of a great many inmates to the maritime provinces from other parts of Canada have resulted in the tremendous overcrowding at both Dorchester and Springhill with the result, for instance, that at Springhill the young offenders aspect that was carried out there has had to be set aside in order to make it into a general institution and the minimum security inmates now have nowhere to go and must stay in the institutions with—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might reply briefly to the question which was perhaps approaching argument rather than questioning.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when I was in the Maritimes during the Easter recess I visited the Springhill institution. I did not find that there were any major problems there. I met with all groups and they did not indicate any major problems. There has been no change in the programs at Springhill. It is still a medium security institution and medium programs are in process. The living unit program is being introduced there as well. I think everything is all right at Springhill. The problem is basically at Dorchester, and I agree with the member that the problem there is due to the large transfer from the west in addition to the 100 new maximum security inmates from the maritime area.

PROVISION OF NEW MAXIMUM SECURITY INSTITUTION FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary following the same line of questioning, Mr. Speaker. About a year and a half or two years ago a maximum security institution was planned for British Columbia and money was allocated by parliament at that time for the building of that institution, but the government across the way vetoed it. There was some criticism of the architecture. In light of that fact and in light of the overcrowding, particularly that caused by moving prisoners from the west to the east, would the Solicitor General look into the matter and see if the architecture could be changed and the money allocated used to build the maximum security institution planned by the former commissioner?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that a maximum security institution was planned for British Columbia but because of the criticism that was levelled against that type of institution—it was a Millhaven type of institution—the plan was suspended. As a result, the former solicitor general set up the Mohr Commission to develop a new plan. That work has been completed and we are now trying to find a site in British Columbia for this new maximum security institution. We were going to place it near the present British Columbia penitentiary but the people of New Westminster did not want to accept the institution there so we are looking for another site.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby for a supplementary on the second question and also the hon. member for Hamilton West and others for a series of supplementaries on the second subject, which will take us close to the end of the question period.

Mr. Woolliams: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. In light of the difficulty the minister is now having with the various institutions at all levels, medium, minimum and maximum, would he give an undertaking to expedite this project, use the money that was allocated by parliament and show leadership in this field, thus avoiding the difficulty we are having in Canada today in the administration of law?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, we are expediting this matter but in the last year it has been very difficult to get a community to accept a maximum security institution. We want to co-operate as much as possible with the municipalities where these institutions are placed. I might say that in the first place New Westminster was ready to accept the institution but the council, after further consideration, asked us not to place it on the same site as the present institution. We are now working with them to find a new site.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN FREIGHT RATES POLICY TO REMOVE DISCRIMINATION AGAINST ATLANTIC PROVINCES AND LOWER UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and concerns the persistent high levels of unemployment in the Atlantic region. In view of the high level of discrimination in freight rates in Canada which weighs against the industrial development of the Atlantic provinces, can the minister assure the House that he is giving consideration to changing the transportation freight rate policy to remove this discrimination against the Atlantic provinces and, incidentally, against western Canada as well?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am presently in discussion with the premiers of the Atlantic provinces on this very subject.

An hon. Member: When are you going to do something?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West on a supplementary.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED PREMATURE DEPORTATION OF MALLAPPA REDDY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is not a supplementary but I know you said yesterday you would recognize me today. Pursuant to that I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether he has had an opportunity to investigate what I would call the callous deportation of Mr. Reddy? Has he any information on whether this deportation order was premature, keeping in mind that Mr. Reddy apparently had 60 days within which to appeal? Has the minister caused an investigation to be made and what is the result?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had some information but I am not satisfied as to its completeness. I will be re-examining the answers I asked for within the next day or so, but I doubt very much if all this will result in a reversal of the decision.

Mr. Alexander: Can the minister advise the House why it was necessary for his department to move with such haste in this matter, particularly when the wife was seven months pregnant and two or three months would not have made any difference? Has he looked into this in order to ascertain why his department moved with such haste?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of that on which I wish to satisfy myself, but in the meantime I would point out that when the Immigration Appeal Board rejected his appeal in November it stayed the order of execution of deportation for 25 days to permit Mr. Reddy's departure to coincide with his wife's since her visitor's visa had the same length of time before expiry. This was based on the assumption and the indication that Mr. Reddy would voluntarily leave the country but he did not do so.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATE INCREASES—EFFECT ON SLOW GROWTH REGIONS—POSSIBLE TIGHT MONEY POLICY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the Bank of Canada has increased its lending rate twice since the minister introduced his expansionary budget, has he had discussions with the governor of the Bank of Canada, especially since the chartered banks have already increased their lending rates, with regard to the effect this is having on the slow growth regions of the country which are still suffering from chronically high unemployment? Can the minister also assure the House that the Bank of Canada and the government are not in fact embarking on a tight money policy?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have given the assurance before that the monetary policy continues to be expansionary. As a matter of fact, for the first four months of this year the amount of loans granted by the Canadian chartered banks rose at an annual rate of 30 per cent. I have made it clear, and so did the governor, to the chartered banks that special consideration was to be given in the allocation of loans to those slower growth areas, to use the hon. gentleman's phrase, and particularly to smaller businesses. I note with some satisfaction that the chartered banks that did raise their prime rates in response to the bank rate made special provision for a type of dual rate in favour of small business, and a good many of those will be found in the Atlantic region.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary on the subject and then the hon. member for Lisgar, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister whether he sought and in fact received an assurance from the governor of the Bank of Canada that there would be no further increases in the interest rates of the Bank of Canada during the period of the minister's expansionary budget?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the governor made it quite clear in the speech he made in Toronto that the monetary policy of the bank would continue to reflect the expansion of the economy. I cannot give the hon. gentleman any such assurance that the bank rate will remain the same. The governor has a duty, under his statute, to respond to domestic and international credit situations and interest rates as he finds them.

AGRICULTURE

SEIZURE OF MANITOBA EGGS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—EFFECT ON INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture in connection with interference in the interprovincial movement of farm commodities in Canada, which could have very serious effects on agricultural trade within our country. Has the minister's department ascertained as of the present time whether the Manitoba government was within its quota in sending eggs into the province of British Columbia for sale, which seems to have caused the dispute?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, upon checking I find no interference with interprovincial movement so far. We are concerned about the orderly movement of products across provincial boundaries. I met with the chairman of the National Egg Marketing Board this morning, and I am very optimistic that all this confusion and the suggestion of irregular marketing will come to a happy conclusion.

● (1450)

Mr. Murta: Does the minister not feel that the seizure of approximately 50,000 dozen eggs in British Columbia is a violation of free interprovincial movement within our country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is argumentative.

HEALTH

ALLEGED NUTRITIONAL DEFICIENCY AMONG PEOPLE OF FOUR PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR DATA AND ESTABLISHMENT OF FOOD PROGRAM

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the statement by the co-ordinator of the Nutrition Canada survey that there is an urgent need to inform four provinces of serious nutritional deficiencies among their citizens, can the minister identify the four provinces to which Dr. Sabry refers and can he assure the House that relevant nutritional data will be made available, without waiting for the final report, first to these four provinces and then to areas in others where serious nutritional problems have been identified?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to identify the four provinces concerned, but I am told that they have been advised of the results of the inquiry inasmuch as they are concerned.

With regard to the third part of the question, the information will be given each one of the provinces as it becomes available and, as I indicated to the House, the government intends to publish all the documents and findings of the study when it has been completed across Canada, that is towards mid-October, we hope.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): In view of Dr. Sabry's statement and in view of the fact that medical research has linked poor nutrition to mental retardation and low resistence to disease, is the government willing to take the initiative in establishing a food for people program which will guarantee an adequate level of nutrition as a basic right of every Canadian?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the problem mentioned by the hon. member, I feel it would be advisable to wait till the survey has been completed across Canada before reaching very exact conclusions. Concerning the implementation of a program similar to that the hon. member spoke of, I feel the topic should be the subject of much more elaborate discussions. A similar program, applied in the United States for years, has been the object of many attacks and criticisms to the effect that it is far from efficient.

PENITENTIARIES

ERECTION OF SIGNS IN COWANSVILLE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Solicitor General.

In view of the many escapes that have taken place in the last few days, particularly from the Cowansville penitentiary, and in view of the fact that in the surroundings of this town there are signs along the roads that read: "Watch for prisoners crossing", can the hon. minister say if it was he who asked the Quebec Minister of Roads to put up the signs?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED ROUTE FOR TANKERS OFF NOVA SCOTIA COAST

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the importance of providing protection to the environment and fisheries of Atlantic Canada, will the minister make a statement on motions concerning his "proposed off-Nova Scotia vessel routing scheme", which was item 8 on the agenda of the meeting held by his officials in Halifax on May 9, 1973?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, I am expecting a formal report from my officials. When I receive this report I will see whether it will be worth while to make a statement on motions. I must underline the fact that the main purpose of the Halifax meeting was safety of navigation, not fisheries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of hon. members that there are four minutes before the end of the question period. We have had so many supplementaries again today that we have spent almost all of the question period on the first three or four questions with these countless supplementaries.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary will be brief. In view of the opposition by fishermen and others to the 10 mile wide shipping corridor which cuts right through the inshore fishery banks off Nova Scotia, will the minister consider a new tanker route which will follow the 100 fathom line parallel to the coast of Nova Scotia and which will put supertankers and other tankers off our coast where 99 per cent of our fishermen would not be affected?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we will do our utmost to protect the interests of our fishermen. I think the Department of the Environment is also interested in this matter. I think the hon. member's representation was fitting and I think we can succeed in this regard. I again state to the hon. member that the Halifax meeting was more concerned with navigational safety than anything else.

WINNING OF ALLEN CUP BY ORILLIA HOCKEY TEAM—REQUEST FOR LARGER GRANTS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as head of amateur sport and fitness programs. Is the minister aware that last Saturday night the Orillia Terriers of the city of Orillia won the senior championship of Canada and the Allen Cup with a score of eight to one on the game and four to one on the series? In view of this, is the minister prepared to look at his grant system to see if he can make a larger grant?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NORTHERN ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR LOWER CANADIAN NATIONAL AND CANADIAN PACIFIC FREIGHT RATES IN LIGHT OF REDUCTION BY ONTARIO NORTHLAND RAILWAY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It concerns freight rates. In view of the recently announced reduction in freight rates to areas of northern Ontario served by the Ontario Northland Railway and Star Transfer of approximately 18 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Foster: It is nice to see so much interest in northern Ontario. In view of this, will the minister take action to have freight rates reduced by a similar amount in areas served by the CNR and CPR?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know, and I think the hon. member and the House know, how freight rates are determined in Canada under the act.

An hon. Member: Do you know?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, I know. I hope the hon. member knows. I hope the two main railway companies in Canada will review their scheduled rates following this decrease in freight rates by the Ontario Northland Railway.

[Later:]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement by Premier Davis, as reported in the Globe and Mail of May 11, that the National Transportation Act is being illegally administered by the CNR and CPR, will the minister undertake a review of these charges through the Canadian Transport Commission to ensure that the 18 per cent recommended by Premier Davis for the Ontario Northland Railway will also be applied to the CNR and CPR?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, if the premier of Ontario thinks that the law has been illegally applied—we all know what recourse is available in Canada in such cases—he should go through the usual channels.

[Mr. Rynard.]

[English]

[Later:]

Mr. Peters: I should like to address a supplementary question to the minister arising out of his earlier reply. We are all aware that the Ontario Northland Railway operates solely within the jurisdiction of the government of Ontario and in a relatively small area of Northern Ontario. Would the minister give consideration to meeting with Premier Davis and his officials in an effort to see that the CNR is encouraged to provide a similar incentive to development in other parts of Northern Ontario as that which the provincial government is trying to provide in a limited area of that part of the province?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I said a few minutes ago that I hoped the railway companies—and this is in accordance with the Transportation Act—will review their rate schedules applying to this part of the country, and maybe in the west as well as in the Maritimes. I think that is a good indication of my position. As far as a meeting with Mr. Davis is concerned, I have been trying to arrange such a meeting for the past 15 days. I hope that when he returns from London he can meet with me and discuss this subject and, indeed, all other matters connected with transportation in Ontario.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PERSONS INDICTED FOR CAPITAL MURDER OTHER THAN MURDER OF POLICE OFFICERS OR PRISON GUARDS—COMPLETION OF LEGAL PROCESS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Solicitor General. It is in two parts. First, to the minister's knowledge, are there presently any persons in Canada who have been indicted for capital murder other than for the murder of police officers or prison guards? Second, if there is such a person or persons, has the entire legal process been completed—the preliminary hearing, trial, appeal to the Supreme Court of the province and appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I think that a question asking for such details should be placed on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Dick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I draw to your attention and the attention of the House that on January 26, as recorded at page 881 of Hansard, the hon. member for Calgary North was entitled to ask a question in almost the very same words and of the same length. I point out that the debate on capital punishment is now in process. I think it would be appropriate to have the answer now rather than in three or four months. I ask that my question be considered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate the position of the Chair. The hon. member himself refers to the fact that there is a debate going on in the House, which in itself shows that the question ought not to be asked. In any event, the hon. member knows that his recourse under the Standing Orders is simply to give notice of the question. I would be pleased to ensure that it is given priority. If the hon. member wishes to redraft the question and ask it in shorter terms, I would have no objection to allowing it to be asked. This is much easier than having a point of order to deal with. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to redraft his question and get a quick reply.

● (1500)

Mr. Dick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the knowledge of the Solicitor General, are there presently any persons who have been indicted for capital murder, other than the murder of prison guards or police officers, and, if so, have they completed the entire legal process?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Since we are presently operating under the 1961 capital and non-capital murder law, the number of those indicted for capital murder is much larger than it was in recent years. I know there are some in the category about which the hon. member inquired. I do not have the exact details, but I will get them and make them available to the House for the debate later in the day.

[Later:]

Mr. Dick: On a point of order, perhaps I should indicate to the Solicitor General, through you, Mr. Speaker, my intention of discussing the question I raised earlier at ten o'clock.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MERCHANT MARINE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the next question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

In view of the brief that was released by the CNTU on April 1, is the hon. minister prepared to make a statement on the creation of a Canadian merchant navy, or does he plan to do so in the fairly near future?

Capital Punishment

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have already stated, in the House or outside, that we are steadily beginning to restructure our merchant navy, and also to help our shipyards.

First, we should like to accept the Darling report; we should like to reserve all Arctic navigation for Canadian ships, and we hope eventually to achieve the next stage, that of starting to make our merchant navy truly Canadian, and giving it all the privileges that merchant navies enjoy throughout the world.

BUS PASSENGER FARE INCREASE, NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR MAINTENANCE OF OLD RATES UNTIL COURT CASE DECIDED

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On February 27 I asked the minister a question with respect to the action of Canadian National Railways in increasing its fares in Newfoundland. The minister promised to investigate the matter and, hopefully, do something about it. Can he tell the House whether he has had a chance to investigate this situation and, if so, what has been done about it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I recall that I did investigate this matter at the time. No increase took place pending the decision of the court.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972.

The House resumed, from Monday, May 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks last night, I pointed out that the practical purpose of this debate is to decide the best and most effective way to protect society from a person who has committed murder.

Some people want to follow the age old practice of hanging the murderer. As a matter of fact, I wonder why they stop at that when they could go still further back and reintroduce the procedures of drawing, quartering, disembowelling, and otherwise going to the limit in inflicting suffering and misery in the process. Others realize that the subject today is much more complicated. I believe that most people in our country today are not particularly concerned about wreaking vengeance on a murderer. What they want is security for themselves, their families and their communities. Large numbers of Canadians today are, I believe, very fearful for the safety of themselves and their loved ones. They want to make sure that never again shall a murderer commit the crime of murder. They want measures to be taken which will ensure that murderers are not turned loose on the community. To my mind, this is the big problem with which the Justice Committee will have to grapple when the bill before us reaches it. It seems to me that the committee might very well be examining a number of aspects which can not be adequately considered by this House in the time we are able to spend on the matter.

Speaking for myself, I should like to see the complete and final abolition of capital punishment. Reasons in favour of this point of view have been advanced by many speakers. I wish to summarize those which have influenced me most. First, figures fail to prove that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder. During the past five years, in Canada and elsewhere, crimes of violence have increased but the rate of murder has not increased. Second, practically every country in the industrialized world has abolished capital punishment. Third, there has been no hanging in Canada since 1962. The people have proven thereby that they have no desire to watch this cold-blooded taking of life; increasing numbers of people do not want it to be done, even though they are not called upon to watch it being done. Nobody can tell me that if the Canadian people overwhelmingly wanted to bring back hanging, the federal government would have been able to get away without executing a single individual since 1962.

The fact is that we, as a country, have outgrown hanging and capital punishment generally, as a means of dealing with murderers. Fourth, hanging will not bring a murdered person back to life. Instead of killing the murderer it seems to me it would be better to keep him securely imprisoned, put him to useful work and use his wages to help the family of the victim. In this way, he would be enabled to make a small measure of restitution to those whom he has deprived of a loved one. Fifth, in a world of large-scale violence such as ours is today, it merely escalates that violence when the state retains this survival of violence directed at an individual. Surely, the best way to inculcate respect for human life is to refrain from taking it in the name of the law.

For these reasons, I have long been in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. Speaking in this House in 1966 on a joint private member's bill before the final legislation was brought in, I made my position very clear. When the government, in 1967, brought in its legislation providing for a five-year trial period during which capital punishment would be abolished, I supported it. I shall do the same thing now.

It may be that we will require yet another trial period before we are ready to abolish the death penalty altogether. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) said yesterday, because some members are not in favour of doing away with capital punishment, there may have to be some exceptions made in order to establish the principle of abolishing capital punishment. If we cannot have a clear abolition bill passed, then I am prepared to accept abolition on the instalment plan. The main thing I want to make sure of is that when capital punishment is finally abolished, it is abolished forever because we have proved that we have outgrown it. I was greatly heartened by the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Marceau) who yesterday made his position on this matter very clear.

What I think is required now is a quiet, dispassionate study of the best way of dealing with murderers in view of the over-riding need to protect society. Certainly, the House has given every demonstration of its concern to keep not only murderers but those who commit crimes of violence away from society. This chamber has, for days and weeks, heard the words of people who have been attacking the inadequacy of the present parole system and the detention of people in our prisons. I am very glad that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has announced he is prepared to hold an inquiry so as to improve the situation. The Canadian people do want more and better protection against people who have committed crimes of violence, and particularly against murderers.

In this regard I think the British experience has been very interesting. In 1949, the British government set up a royal commission to look into capital punishment in all its aspects, a commission which reported in 1953. Before that commission began its work, its chairman, Sir Ernest Arthur Gowers, was a supporter of capital punishment. During the life of the commission he became an abolitionist. Having travelled to other countries, had witnesses before him and studied documents and papers over a period of four years, he became convinced that he should become an abolitionist rather than a retentionist. I commend such a period of study to people like the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse) and others who have studied the subject for a much briefer period and are retentionists. I think that if they extended their studies and examined documents, facts and figures, travelled to other countries and heard witnesses whom they could question, perhaps in the end, like Sir Ernest Arthur Gowers, they too would decide that retention was no longer good enough in this modern world in which we are living.

Capital punishment was abolished in Britain in 1965 for a trial period of five years. It was abolished permanently in 1969 at a time of some peculiarly horrible murders. In fact, one of the long-time supporters and advocates of abolition was opposed in a general election by a close relative of one of the victims of a very horrible murder, and to the ever-lasting credit of the British people and their maturity, this man was returned to his seat in parliament. Capital punishment was abolished permanently, as I say, in 1969. This year, 1973, an attempt was made by a private member to restore the death penalty in Britain and he brought in a bill to that effect. This bill was decisively defeated. There has not been a hanging in Britain since 1964.

Many community organizations and most of the major churches in Canada are opposed to capital punishment. They call for research into crime and its deterrence. There was a very eloquent article in the Globe and Mail this morning which quoted what Mr. Pearson, when he was Prime Minister, said on this subject a few years ago. He felt that the handling of the problem of murder ought not to be by such measures as the gallows and the gas chamber, but that we must go into places like the slums and the ghettoes of our cities, into clinics and so on, to try to prevent the crime of murder in its early stages. If there are any school teachers within the sound of my voice, they will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the crime of murder has its seeds planted very much earlier than the actual commission of such a crime. The seeds of murder are planted in injustice and misery, in the broken homes and in the wrong teachings of parents in their homes.

As for my own stand on this matter, I have said that I am an abolitionist. I have found that very wise things have been said by people from a number of areas. I mentioned the churches a moment ago. One of the most interesting, and to me most significant and altogether moving, expressions on the subject of capital punishment was given by the Canadian Catholic Conference. I should like to quote from this statement by the Reverend W. E. Power, president of the Canadian Catholic Conference. It is dated January 26, 1973. I quote this statement for its thoughtfulness and impressiveness. He says in part:

> The question of the death penalty, in our opinion, ought not to focus on whether a convicted murderer, no matter how wanton "deserves" to die. The focus should be on us: should Canadians as a community try to break the escalating spiral of violence by refraining from violence even as a deterrent?

Then, leaving out a paragraph, I continue:

> There is also a pragmatic, statistical question whether the death penalty is an effective deterrent. We will not enter this debate. Our question is not whether the death penalty is an effective deterrent; our question is whether it is an absolutely necessary deterrent, required by good order in Canada today. Unless you are convinced that it is, then we feel that the presumption should be for suspension. Furthermore, in our opinion, the case for retention of the death penalty has not been proven.

● (1520)

> We would hope that, during a possible second period of suspension, research committees would study exhaustively all the ramifications of this complex problem and publish their reports within a specified period. We might note the need for study of the effects of violent crime on the families of both the criminal and the victim.

I would also add that I should like studies made in respect of the effects of violent crime on communities and those children and adults who watch the media and listen to the hotliners, because in my opinion the spreading abroad of the details of these horrible, heinous and gory crimes, which we have witnessed in this country during the last few months, has done nothing to contribute to keeping down the climate of violence which is escalating in so frightening a manner these days.

My own stand is that it is up to a Member of Parliament to give leadership and to vote in accordance with what he or she believes to be right. In this connection, I should like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly), who stated quite definitively in an article in Saturday Night this year that he believed, regardless of what the constituents thought or a majority of them might think, it would not be the duty of an hon. member to vote for or support something he or she believed to be evil. I also have written in this vein to a number of constituents.

What good would it do a constituent to have a member who would get up on this issue and vote against what he, or in this case, she, believed? How could you ever again trust that hon. Member of Parliament to do anything honest if he or she was crooked enough to vote counter to what he or she believed merely because there was a sizeable group in the constituency that wanted this? Surely, we are not going to have members in this House who are prepared to vote for things, tongue in cheek, because they think it would be popular in their ridings. What a strange doctrine that is. Surely the members of the riding association and the constituency have chosen men and women they believe to be honest, intelligent and capable, people who will get the facts and vote accordingly. Some of these facts are more available to us than to the people in the riding. Surely, they trust us to get the facts and use our own judgment and then, in the light of that judgment stand up fearlessly and say what we believe to be right, without worrying about whether the constituent will hear what we have said and how we have voted in parliament. The greatest indignity and insult to the electorate in my opinion is for a member to duck the vote. I do not think we should do that.

In this country we have heard pleas from both sides of the House for leadership on a number of important issues, and this is an issue in respect of which I believe the people of this country are entitled to leadership from Members of Parliament. They are entitled to the best thinking of which we are capable, whether or not that thinking is different from what it was several years ago. Hon. members may well have changed their minds in the interim. I believe it is a wonderful thing to change your mind as a result of learning further facts and achieving greater maturity. I would be pleased if, in the light of further evidence or maturity, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) could flip-flop back to where he was before. That would prove to me that he is capable of learning and changing his opinion in the light of further facts that have been adduced by community bodies which have made their weight felt following study of this matter.

From what I have learned, the death penalty is wrong and I certainly cannot vote to bring it back. I would vote for complete abolition, given the chance. If that choice is not before me and I must choose in favour of abolition with certain restrictions that may be applied following amendment during the committee stage, I am prepared within limits to vote for the abolition of the death penalty in instalments. I want to see the death penalty abolished, but I shall be happy to see the trend towards that objective continued. Having said this, I shall be very proud, as an honest woman, to go back and tell my constituents what I said and what I did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on the record the views of my constituents on this subject of capital punishment, and at the same time I should like to express certain personal thoughts on the legislation now before this House.

I find it most regrettable that the government has demonstrated what I believe to be little sincerity in its approach to this very serious and important subject. This legislation first came before the House four months ago. At that time, the government indicated it was, in its opinion, a matter of top priority to be dealt with at once. It became obvious, shortly, that it was anything but a top priority with the government, and that almost the sole reason for its introduction in the House at the beginning of this session was that the government intended to use it to gain time. The government had no idea where it was going in relation to the major problems that were facing Canada and, instead of coming to grips with those major problems such as inflation and unemployment, for which it had no solutions, it floundered aimlessly and brought in the capital punishment bill in order to stall for time. When it suited the government's purpose the debate, which was supposedly of such great importance, was abruptly terminated for some months. Now, we are debating it again, and I suggest to the House that the story is once more exactly the same.

This government is again using this legislation as a means of gaining time. It needs time, for example, to decide what to do about the corporate tax legislation it has hesitated to introduce to this House. It wants time to sort out its inner cabinet dissension, which it hopes desperately to keep from public view. Indeed, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is to be complimented for his extraordinary ability to come into this House every day with a smile and supposed lack of concern. It is unfortunate that this serious subject of capital punishment is being used for such a purpose and in such a fashion.

It is even more unfortunate that the people of Canada have been asked by this government to believe there will be a free vote in this House on the subject. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has made it abundantly clear, beyond any doubt, by some of his utterances in recent weeks that in reality the only members who will take part in a free vote in this House will be members of the opposition. In my opinion, the members on the government side of this House are, in fact, actually being subjected to pressure to do as the Prime Minister says. It would seem that really what he is saying to them is—

Mr. Allmand: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member, in the statement he just made, is reflecting on the freedom of hon. members on this side of the House, and I ask him to withdraw that statement. I have said on behalf of the government that this will be a free vote and that no pressure whatsoever is being applied to any member on this side.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, on that same question of privilege, I should like to ask the minister how he can equate that affirmation with the Prime Minister's stated position and complaint that other parties do not have a position on capital punishment, leaving the direct inference that his party does have a position?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask the minister the question since the minister does not have the floor to answer. The hon. member for Leeds has the floor, and I recognize him for the purpose of continuing his remarks.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I find the interjection of the minister somewhat interesting. If he gives me a moment or so of additional time, I am quite prepared to elaborate on what I meant when I suggested I did not believe members, other than those in the opposition, would be taking part in a free vote. I suggest that the Prime Minister is, in effect, saying to those members on the government side: You can vote exactly as you wish on the subject of capital punishment as long as you listen to me and as long as you do as I say.

● (1530)

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Cossitt: I will illustrate how I arrive at the conclusion that there is not a free vote atmosphere in this House. It is not surprising, I might add, that there is not a free vote atmosphere in this House, because it is quite in keeping with the principles of Liberal participatory democracy which really mean nothing but plug-in and get orders from above.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind the hon. member that this is a debate about capital punishment. The hon. member has been speaking about inflation and free votes and about party politics. I think at this point or very soon he should make an attempt to attack the question or initiate consideration of the matter before us which is a specific bill.

Mr. Cossitt: Well, Mr. Speaker, I recall some weeks ago at a fund-raising dinner meeting in the city of Toronto the Prime Minister—if I might conclude this portion of my remarks with a quotation which I think is relative to the point I am making—was reported to have asked a question something like this: "What is the Conservative policy on capital punishment? I don't know. Can anyone tell me what it is?" I think this is a very valid point to be raised about the Prime Minister. I think the answer which should be given to this question is that he should not judge others by his conduct or that of his party. On this side of the House, it is truly a free vote. The Conservative party has not attempted to dictatorially thrust a policy down the throats of any member of our party. The fact that it is a different story on the other side of the House should not be taken as any indication concerning what it is like over here.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Cossitt: I see that the trained seals are acting as one would expect. More recently the Prime Minister was quoted in the news media as telling the people of Canada, in what I consider to be somewhat sarcastic and ridiculing tones, that the Conservative party is in favour of the retention of capital punishment. The obvious intention, I suggest, was to convey the impression that the entire Liberal party supports the opposite view. I believe he is trying to conjure up some sort of ridiculous picture of the ghastly ghouls on one side compared to the lily-white Liberals on the other. The Prime Minister is following the degrading tactic of playing cheap politics with the issue of capital punishment. I see no harm in that being said in the House. He has made statements which he must know are not accurate. The distortion, the innuendo and the smear are approaches hardly worthy of his office. I hope that before this debate concludes he will do what the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has said he has already done, namely, reaffirm to this House that it is indeed a free vote in so far as the government is concerned.

The legislation, I think, fails to seriously come to grips with the question of capital punishment. If it is passed into law it will succeed only in perpetuating for another five years the state of suspended animation that has existed during the past five years. During the last five years, this government has made it quite clear that it has no intention of allowing capital punishment to be carried out in this country, regardless of what parliament happens to decide. This has been clearly illustrated by the fact that during this time all those who have been sentenced to death for murder of a police officer have had their sentence changed to life imprisonment, despite the fact that the law in force which we are now being asked to extend provides the death penalty for such crimes. So, in effect, this House is being asked to pass something that had been disregarded and will continue to be disregarded by this government. In many ways this debate, therefore, is becoming an exercise in futility. But at the same time it is a perfect illustration of how the government can show contempt for the decisions made by the House of Commons of this country.

I should like to place on record the views of my constituents on the subject of capital punishment as shown by the result of a survey taken in the riding of Leeds a while ago. I sent a questionnaire to just over 20,000 homes which is the total number of homes in my constituency. I received between 6,000 and 7,000 replies, a fact which clearly shows the great public concern about this subject. It can scarcely be argued that this is not a greater response than usually is received to surveys or questionnaires of this type. Furthermore, I do not believe the accuracy of the result can be disputed since the number of replies represents well over 30 per cent of all the households in my constituency. If the Gallup Poll can accurately assess the views of the entire country by sampling less than 1,000 persons in the whole nation, the views of the constituency of Leeds are most accurately reflected by the sampling of 6,000 to 7,000 homes. Ten per cent of those responding in Leeds favoured complete abolition of capital punishment. One and one-half per cent found themselves unable to make a definite decision.

Mr. Nelson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Leeds is using misleading and inaccurate information. A home cannot vote. If a questionnaire goes to a house there could be six voters in that house. There are 88,000 voters in my constituency. My homes cannot vote. My voters vote.

Mr. Cossitt: I do not follow the point the hon. member is trying to make. I must object to his statement that I am misrepresenting the situation. I am not. I made the simple statement that I sent a questionnaire to 20,000 homes in my constituency and received between 6,000 and 7,000 replies. I certainly take exception to the hon. member saying I am misleading the House. I can assure the House that is something I would never do.

Mr. Nelson: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I did not intend to imply that the member was misleading the House intentionally. If I may address the hon. member through you, Sir, my point is that I think he said that a certain number of questionnaires were sent to so many households which indicated that they were in favour of capital punishment. A household is made up of people. Presumably a meeting is held in the household and the people in the household fill in the one questionnaire.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure all hon. members see the point made by the hon. member who rose on the point of order and also the point made by the hon. member for Leeds. Perhaps we may assume the matter has been resolved and allow the hon. member to pursue the substance of his speech.

Mr. Cossitt: I might explain that many of the replies on the questionnaires which were returned contained information that there were four or five people living in the house, two of whom thought such and such and two of whom thought otherwise. In other words, I believe there was a very clear indication of what the people in Leeds thought. The hon. member tells us that people live in households. I never doubted that. As I said, ten per cent of those responding favoured the complete abolition of capital punishment. One and one half per cent found themselves unable to make a definite decision on the question. Eighty-eight and a half per cent favoured retention of capital punishment in full or to some degree. Of this latter group, 80.9 per cent favoured the retention of capital punishment completely and 19.1 per cent favoured retention for the murder of police officers and prison guards.

I believe that the over-all conclusion to be drawn from the results of a survey of this type is that there exists very definite public rebellion against what is viewed as a too permissive society. In some ways, stronger support for retention of capital punishment is a reflection of a strong demand for a return in this country to what perhaps we too commonly and simply call law and order. But I should like also to mention that a great number of persons answering the questionnaires said that our bail and parole regulations are too easy.

A further point that was made abundantly clear by my constituents was that many who are now asking at this time for full retention of capital punishment might well be prepared to consider supporting abolition if life imprisonment really meant what these words imply, namely, imprisonment for the rest of the offender's natural life. They do not want convicted murderers paroled to walk the streets again in a few years time after commission of the crime. I might add that this view has become more evident as a result of the events of the past few days. If there were first a complete overhaul of our penitentiary system in Canada to put an end to this government's "easy exit" policy, many of my constituents might support abolition.

There are those who have criticized the Association of Canadian Police Chiefs and other law enforcement groups because they have taken a strong stand in favour of retention of capital punishment. I do not believe such criticism is valid, nor is it deserved. These are the experts in the field of criminology, and I see no reason why those who are authorities on the subject of crime should be criticized for voicing their views, no matter what those views may be at any time. There are those who have said that by even expressing such views police officials are entering and interfering in the field of policy whereas they should remain silent. It is contended that they should simply carry out the laws in force at any given time. I believe such criticism is also completely out of order. The experts should be heard in the process of making a decision on this subject. Obviously, it is parliament that will make the decision, but parliament would be remiss if it did not carefully consider the expert opinions on both sides of this subject.

The Canadian Police Association has suggested a national referendum on the subject, and I must say I do not believe this to be necessary. It would establish clearly and beyond any doubt the feelings of the Canadian people from coast to coast, but so many surveys have been taken in so many areas of the country—and generally speaking with the same emphatic result in favour of retention by a very heavy percentage—that there is no doubt in my mind, and I cannot see how there can be any doubt in the mind of anyone sitting in this House, what the result would be. There can be no doubt what the actual result would be if the Canadian people were to register their views on capital punishment through a national referendum.

Much has been said during the debate as to whether capital punishment is or is not a deterrent to the crime of murder. I do not believe there has been any proof in either direction. I have heard figures used by persons across this country who have been attempting to justify their viewpoints, but it seems to me that one can always find figures to justify any side of any question. There is, of course, one very definite factor which makes it impossible to judge whether or not the death penalty is a deterrent in Canada at this time. While the death penalty has existed over the past five years for specific classes of murder, it has never been enforced. It has been common knowledge and very obvious to all Canadians that this government did not intend to enforce it. Measuring with any accuracy the possible effect of the death penalty as a deterrent during this period of partial abolition is, therefore, quite impossible.

This government has made a mockery of the existing law, and I think that this must be admitted by those on both sides of this question. Proper observance of the existing law would have meant that sentences should only have been commuted where there was a recommendation of mercy at the trial of the accused person or in a case where it was established later that there was an error in the conviction.

The people of my constituency of Leeds have spoken overwhelmingly in favour of the retention of capital punishment, and as their representative in this House I would be turning my back on them and turning my back on the principles of democracy if I failed to listen to the people who elected me to this House. To those who sanctimoniously use the word "conscience" to justify ignoring the wishes and views of the people of this country, I suggest that it should be a definite matter of conscience to them if they ignore the emphatically expressed desires of those who went out to the voting booths of this country and sent them to this House. In accordance with the overwhelmingly expressed wishes of the people of Leeds, I intend to follow the principles of democracy and I will vote against the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but after hearing the remarks made today and recently concerning the appeal to hon. members' conscience and the fact that a member should not take into account the opinion of those he represents, I think it is my duty to say a few words on this bill.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, a debate on the same subject was held in 1967 and at that time the House approved in a free vote a bill which we are asked to extend for another few years.

If we refer to that debate, Mr. Speaker, we see that in 1967 the House held a free vote and abolished capital punishment, except in two cases: the murder of a policeman or a prison guard on duty.

There have been murders of policemen and prison guards in the exercise of their duties since 1967, the year in which the act came into force, and yet there have been no executions.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the executive's power to reprieve condemned men, I really wonder why we are having this debate, since the 1967 act has not in fact been implemented, and since we may suppose that the renewal of the act will not alter the executive's power to reprieve criminals who have been condemned to death.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there is one important point which should be brought up in this debate, namely that we are the representatives of the people, and the laws must exist to serve the society that they govern.

I think that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) was right on this point, except, of course, when he claimed that all liberal members would support the government.

I suggest that the majority of the population has a genuine feeling of insecurity with regard to the laws on criminals and murderers, and this is the main point that the House should bear in mind. We must somehow promote and enforce laws which at least give people the feeling that they are in safety.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the population, which, in general, has just as much heart and conscience as some hon. members who lecture others and talk about conscience, feels constantly insecure. Why is this? Precisely because, for most of those condemned to death, the creation of the parole system has made it impossible for their sentences to be carried out.

And I repeat, Mr. Speaker, without any political motive, that there have been no executions since 1962, either under the Conservatives or under the Liberals.

Without, of course, speaking against the parole system, I think people are worried, because they know that the sentence that the judge gives has in fact no real effect, since the parole system completely changes the structure and nature of the sentence that was given. Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, this is likely to destroy the judicial power and to endanger the security to which the population is entitled from the judicial power.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that as long as the rights and powers of the National Parole Board would not have been fundamentally changed, it will be illusive to discuss any longer the question of being for or against capital punishment. In fact, I think all members have sentiments generous enough to know that this punishment is the ultimate resort and that we have in fact to determine if the death penalty is a dissuasive factor or not.

Theories and opinions may vary, but when the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) called a few minutes ago on the members' conscience, saying not to be too concerned with how their constituents might feel, I think she prompted me to join the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) who said that this is a matter of free vote, for we live in a democratic country.

Personally, I am inclined to become an abolitionist, and if I am hesitant to say whether capital punishment is a deterrent or not, I am convinced that 80 per cent of my constituents want me to express their views in this House. I think it is also my duty to say that I am in favour of capital punishment without believing that the people are wrongly concerned if they want this penalty for murder, and in this way express their concern towards the inadequate parole system and rehabilitation service. As a matter of fact, the latter has proved to be inefficient and there is a need to think about it in depth before going in for eloquent speeches or heart rending protests to say: I am in favour or against capital punishment.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the debate to decide if I am for or against the death penalty for a criminal is an utterly outmoded process and a totally inopportune one since a similar debate took place in 1967 without results. The proof is that in spite of restrictions, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, no death penalty has been imposed one way or the other.

I do not say it is bad. I do not say that the then Prime Minister and the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice, who must sign the execution evidence, should or should not have done so. What I am saying it is that we should not thus dissect legislative and coercive measures, but rather introduce a set of laws which will reestablish in the public opinion the prestige of the judicial power and put again into the hands of those who have the responsibility to decide, with the members of the jury, what sentences will be imposed and to insure that these sentences are executed in nearly all cases.

This is the way we will restore confidence in the public opinion. I am persuaded that the population as a whole will then feel as strongly for abolition as does the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

I already discussed this question with several groups in my riding and I expressed the views of several hon. members in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, telling them that I was not convinced at all that it was a deterrent against murder.

I also pointed out that the life of an individual or the execution of a criminal does not bring back the murdered victim. Obviously, it is, in a way, a panacea or a very clear element. But the moment those groups are assured that the sentences given will be fully carried out and that the Parole Board will not alter the decision of the judicial power, then, Mr. Speaker, people are relieved. We immediately witness a wish to become abolitionists, as are some members who expressed their views.

Mr. Speaker, since our duty is to protect the citizen and that about 80 per cent of the voters I represent are in favour of retaining capital punishment, not because they are enthusiastic about executing a criminal but because they want to show their insecurity in view of the inadequate laws that exist in the parole system, and since I am living in a democratic state, I shall vote against this bill which to my mind, has not been applied, since it was implemented.

Therefore, I would urge the Solicitor General to table a legislation on an overall reorganization of the Parole Board to give back to the judicial power the authority it is losing over the population following the erosion and the continuous cuts which are made in the sentences given by the courts.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to associate myself with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme) who has just spoken. I also enjoyed some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse) when he spoke yesterday, and the excellent speech made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). As a comparatively new member of this House, I have listened with great interest to some of the history of this topic we are debating today. The hon. member for Montmorency also alluded to it. I know that in 1966 there was an interparty resolution which called for the abolition of the death penalty and the substitution of the mandatory sentence of life imprisonment. That was rejected by the House in a free vote by 143 to 112. Then, as the hon. member for Montmorency said, there was the 1967 development which resulted in the present five year trial period which has just come to an end.

Since 1968, I believe there have been four convictions for the murder of police officers and the government commuted the sentences in all cases. The Governor in Council, of course, has the power of granting mercy or clemency and this is as it should be, but it can also be argued, I suggest, that the present practice of invariably commuting every death penalty to life imprisonment is undermining both the legal process and the power of parliament. It can also be argued with some effect that this practice has removed any deterrent effect that the death penalty may have, in theory.

In speaking on this bill I think one cannot avoid the philosophical, religious and legal questions. This bill makes no final determination of the fundamental issue of capital punishment and, in its present form, it discriminates. It discriminates between the victims and imposes a greater penalty for the murder of a police officer than for an ordinary citizen. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the reasons I intend to vote against the bill. In her remarks before ten o'clock last evening, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) coined a phrase when she said that this bill should be debated in "quiet reasonableness". I think this was a particularly apt observation on her part, and I think that in bringing forward this legislation the government has shown a singular lack of appreciation of priorities and a singular lack of timing.

I have some sympathy with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). From my knowledge of him, I realize that he is a forthright and frank minister. I would say that this is quite a contrast to his predecessor for whose policies he is now responsible. When one hears of the almost ridiculous things that are happening in the administration of our penal system and realizes that under the doctrine of ministerial responsibility he has to bear the brunt of much of the criticism, one can feel a certain sympathy. I noticed with some amusement that in answer to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) earlier today, when the minister referred to what is commonly known as "the hole" in Dorchester, he called it the "disassociation area". As far as convicts are concerned, I guess the whole prison system would be called a "disassociation area". Convicts can hardly wait to disassociate themselves from it, and are doing so quite regularly. Hopefully, things will improve in this area.

The thing that concerns me about this legislation is that the chaotic state of the administration of justice is infringing to a large extent on the primacy of the judiciary. Those of us who practise law and who have had an opportunity to participate in criminal trials and murder trials, realize that under the present system the accused has a great deal of protection. There are the rules against self-incrimination, the protection of the preliminary inquiry, the grand jury which makes sure that the case is judicially sound and should be sent to the petit jury, the knowledgeable judge, the jurors, who are selected from a man's peers, who sit in judgment on him. It is still the tradition in our courts to say to the jurors "Look upon the prisoner and harken to his cry; he puts himself upon his country, whose country you are" and I believe that this gives the accused the greatest guarantee of a fair trial. This system should be cherished.

What disturbs me, as one who has practised law, is that a judge who, after careful consideration as to what is appropriate under the circumstances, gives a sentence which he feels is appropriate, often finds that this sentence means nothing because the effect of it is changed by some functionary or a parole board. This is an unfortunate atmosphere as far as the primacy of the judiciary is concerned. In light of the chaos that is presently abroad in the administration of our prisons, I think it is a shame that this issue of capital punishment comes up for debate in parliament. The "quiet reasonableness" that is so desirable cannot be created in this House under the present circumstances. I think the people of Canada are fed up with the undermining of judicial authority and the bizarre events that take place when dangerous prisoners escape, almost casually, from maximum security institutions because the guards are out having lunch. I would not be surprised, Mr. Speaker, if it came out in evidence that box lunches were requested and given to these prisoners at eleven o'clock so that they could escape without having to miss their lunch, but perhaps that is unkind.

On the issue of whether a Member of Parliament should vote according to conscience or reflect the will of his constituents, I am fortunate because I find no conflict there. I feel, as do the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) and the hon. member for Montmorency, that when it comes down to it a Member of Parliament would be remiss if he sought to impose his own will in an issue that he knows enjoys the almost overwhelming support of his constituents, to the detriment of the clear conscience of the majority of the people he represents.

I think parole and penitentiary boards are relative to the matter under discussion. I am under the clear impression, perhaps erroneously, that there is not only this conflict between the legitimate sentences passed down by Supreme Court judges and the carrying out of those sentences, but there is even conflict and a grabbing for jurisdictional influence between the parole services and the penitentiary boards. I believe that when weekend leaves are granted it is often on the initiative of penitentiary boards without the compliance or knowledge of the National Parole Board. I may be wrong and no doubt the Solicitor General will deal with this topic. If I am correct, however, this situation is not conducive to a proper atmosphere for debating the subject. I cannot see how, within the context of the present social fabric of Canada, this is the time to consider the abolition of the death penalty. I say that this is a poor time in terms of priorities because there are many social needs in this country, people who are suffering from malnutrition, who do not have work or who have been hurt by inflation. These are legitimate concerns on which the government should do something constructive yet here we are, debating an issue that has been debated before, being asked to give a continuing trial period to that which has been tried before and has been frustrated.

The hon. member for Scarborough East last night referred to the professional criminal, the Mafiosa, the hit man or the soldier. I suggest that, like other professionals, these people have their own rules, their own argot. They know the odds, Mr. Speaker, and that they are engaged in an illegal and highly dangerous occupation. If they can be assured that no matter how heinous the crime they commit, whether it is a cold-blooded mercenary killing, a political assassination or an extreme case of putting cyanide in a water reservoir, something that is absolutely despicable and unspeakable, there is not the slightest chance of being executed, that will improve their odds. That is the kind of game these men understand.

As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) pointed out, there is also the need to consider the argument whether there are some crimes which perhaps do require the ultimate in penalties. As a Member of Parliament, a lawyer and someone who is basically a very reluctant retentionist at this time, I find it very difficult to say unequivocally that under no circumstances should anyone in this country be executed for any crime. My logic may be erroneous, but I feel strongly that if the government would put its house in order and the penitentiary services, the parole board and the various factors that make up the successful administration of justice in Canada were put in order and the primacy of the judiciary were once more established, the social climate would be better. That would be a far more appropriate time to consider the very important philosophical question of whether we should once and for all abolish the death penalty. This bill does not do that. All this bill does is perpetuate the status quo or status non quo. For that reason, I have no hesitation in announcing my intention to vote against this bill. By doing so, I think I will be doing the people of Canada a service.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about capital punishment. It is a most controversial subject and not particularly inviting since it deals with the elimination of some of our fellow humans. However, in all justice, anyone of us is entitled to life. When someone has deliberately attacked the life of someone else, we do not have to protect his life more than he has protected that of his victim.

We are probably directly responsible for the fact that those human beings have become some kind of wild beasts as many did after living too long unbearable lives because of our egoistic attitude. To oblige us to take care of them they have had to protest and use the only means available to them. However, abolishing capital punishment amounts to protecting convicts and forsaking the innocent. It is one way of saying to the potential murderers: You can go ahead, the law forbids anyone to harm you. Even more it provides for the maintenance of your life at your victims' expenses.

The life of any individual is worth that of a police officer or of a jail warden. This is why there should not be two weights and two measures. If the death penalty is applied it should be considered that life has no age and is valuable to anyone of any social class. A murder is a murder and should be punished.

Anyone must protect his own life but should also respect that of others. So homicide or murder is prohibited by moral law as well as by civil law which should reflect natural law. It is around the word "homicide" that a solution should be found. Indeed natural law does not prohibit all kinds of homicides. It only forbids unfair homicide, namely the fact of taking a life with impunity. But we cannot agree that the death penalty amounts to unjustified homicide.

It is said sometimes that the death penalty may be inflicted upon an innocent and that there is no means of correcting such an error. It is true that the death penalty may be applied by accident in the case of an innocent person. But it is not because accidents may happen that we should prevent the building of automobiles or aircraft. It is not because there are miscarriages of justice, very scarce I should say, that we should depart from the general principle.

On the other hand, to the supporters of the absolute right to live, we should answer that murderers have no respect for that right when it applies to others. If such a right were absolute, a soldier killing an enemy would be a criminal. The right to live is not an absolute right. We can deprive of it those who have no respect for it. The murderer who takes the life of another person cannot base his claim on the supporters of the absolute right to live in order to escape the punishment his crime deserves.

If this country were at war, nobody would take offence at the fact that death would be the fate of the enemy and, in my opinion, we are at war against criminals.

Those whose conscience speak against capital punishment could at least request with us that life imprisonment in murder cases be really imprisonment for life.

At the present time, criminals know very well—and they joke about it—that the death penalty is for their victims and that they will be automatically and eventually released and able to start all over their life of debauchery.

Therefore, I strongly request the reinstatement of hanging for wilful murder and I emphasize that he or she who puts a loaded revolver in his pocket or in her handbag premeditates something. Therefore I will vote for the reinstatement of capital punishment.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, we have before us Bill C-2, a bill to amend the Criminal Code. It deals only with amendments concerning what is presently called capital murder in the code. In my view, the amendments to the Criminal Code dealing with the taking of life should be dealt with in full.

There are perhaps three classifications of the crime of taking a human life or, if you want to use that expression, murder. In those three categories of murder, perhaps the dealth penalty is appropriate for one type. To specify that classification of murder, it should be attributable to those who commit the heinous crime of premeditated murder. I refer to not only the murder of police officers and prison guards, but the heinous murder of children of prison guards, murders committed in the course of airline hijacking, murders committed by people who are paid to kill, the hired gun, murders committed in the course of a bank robbery, when there is no question that the life of whoever gets in the way is forfeited, and murders conducted in the course of a kidnapping where the kidnapper has no intention of doing anything but destroying the life he took as a ransom.

The categories of murder for which the death penalty is required are far more broad than those set out in this bill. This bill does not go far enough. It should go further. It should clearly set out that those murders involving people who are killed in the heat of temper, defending their property, in a family dispute or brawl, in a barroom, on a pier, matters of instant flare-up, are certainly not in the same category as heinous premeditated murders. These are offences which should attract long terms of imprisonment, bearing in mind that there is a possibility of reform.

There is already under the Criminal Code a third classification, infanticide, covering cases where the life of a newborn child is taken. Perhaps this classification should include the crime of illegal abortion; it should perhaps include the crime of euthanasia where for some honestly given reason life support is removed—killing is regarded as the best way out. That class of murder should perhaps be punishable by a five-year prison term.

I think it is imperative that the government review its thinking about the bill before us as it relates to crimes involving the taking of life. The proposals now before the House are unsatisfactory. We have already spent ten days debating the subject, and I understand that member after member still wishes to speak. This clearly indicates that the House is extremely dissatisfied with the legislation brought before it. I suggest to the minister that the Bill ought to be withdrawn and something better produced.

During the last election campaign, I told the people in my constituency that I would be in favour of capital punishment for those who murdered police officers or prison guards, those who murdered in the course of airline hijacking and those who murdered when it was proven they were paid killers. Since that time I have altered my views. I have done so partly as a result of representations made to me by people in my constituency, partly as a result of perusal of answers to questionnaires, and as a result of hearing speeches made in this House and exchanging ideas with members of the National Parole Board and others involved in law enforcement. Some of the considerations which have led me to change my mind are as follows.

The first which occurs to me concerns the question of capital punishment being a deterrent to murder. The idea of deterrence runs through our entire criminal law. Provision is made in the criminal law for various degrees of punishment depending on what is considered to be the gravity of the crime committed. There is undoubtedly a supposition throughout the criminal law that punishment will deter a person from acting in a certain way. The offence of keeping a common gaming house, not too serious a crime, attracts a two-year penalty. Indecent assault brings a five-year term. We have often heard friends who go to cocktail parties refuse another drink with the explanation that they have to drive home and do not wish to be charged with impaired driving. Clearly, penalties do deter. I suggest to hon. members that the prospect of a penalty is similarly a deterrent in the circumstances we are now discussing.

Our whole concept of the organization of life revolves around the idea of nemesis, the feeling that if a man undertakes certain acts he is inviting retribution. The preponderant feeling of those who commit premeditated murder is that they are inviting the death penalty as the only adequate response society can make to that kind of crime.

A great deal has been said in criticism of the parole system and the penal system. As a lawyer, I had to deal with a great many people incarcerated in jails or allowed out on parole. While at times the National Parole Board has made serious mistakes by allowing certain people to get out too easily, by and large it is motivated in the right way; it is working for the reform of prisoners and it is doing a good job. What I find abhorrent in this debate is the attitude of those who say that anyone who commits murder should be thrown in to the hole and kept there for a minimum of 25 years with no hope for the future. This seems to be the course which people opposed to capital punishment are recommending. It is not possible to reform everyone. On the other hand, our aim should be to reform those who are capable of being reformed. As for persons who commit heinous, premeditated, animal-like murders, there is not much chance of reforming them, and when we retain them within our penal system, the whole system has to be organized accordingly, with regrettable consequences. Maximum security precautions must be in force at all times to contain them, because we dare not let them out; they are animals. This means there are less funds and fewer resources available from our limited social capital to reform those who are capable of reform. Thus, what we have left is the worst of both worlds.

The recent reform of bail procedures has also attracted criticism from some quarters. I commend the present bail reform legislation though, it is true there have been some shortcomings in its implementation. I remember practising law in the days when a man charged with careless or impaired driving was picked up and put in the Don Jail and kept there until he could find $200 bail on a Monday morning.

The bail reform legislation has done a great deal to help people by allowing them to be free on their own recognizance rather than treating the public on the basis that only those who can raise the cash can get out on bail. Some limitation of the act is required, since it appears there have been certain abuses. But it really bothers me when I hear opponents of capital punishment argue that people should not be let out on bail in any circumstances. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that they are adopting a regressive attitude.

If we are to improve our penal system, we must recognize that there are some poeple who can only be handled by giving society the maximum of protection. Many people who abhor capital punishment use the great hoax of the rope and the trap door; you can almost hear the trap door swinging open and the horror of public execution by hanging. I, too, am abhorred by hanging, but I suggest that any argument based on the rope and the trap door is a poor argument against capital punishment. It is not a reasoned argument. There are many other ways today that are much more humane for removing people from society.

In my view, the law of this country must respect the wishes of the vast majority of the people. Every poll that I have taken, every poll taken by newspapers in my riding and across Canada, every poll taken by high school students on a statistical basis throughout my riding, indicates that for heinous, premeditated murder of the kind I have described the overwhelming percentage of the people of this country demand the death penalty. Justice must appear to be done. The law must reflect the mores of society. Any suggestion that this parliament can enact laws that do not reflect the mores of this society, the clear, overwhelming feeling in society, is wrong. A member of parliament who votes for a law that he clearly knows does not demand the respect of the society that he represents is acting wrongly and that member does not deserve to be here.

It has been suggested that in a criminal trial there is a possibility that an innocent person will be charged with murder and executed for that murder, that that possibility always exists. But we have a great number of checks and balances in our judicial system. In almost every province of this country today there is free legal aid. We have a competent and capable bar and we have competent and capable judges. We have a very well organized jury system, and there is a system of appeal. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in my experience a miscarriage of justice that would result in the death of an innocent person is not a possibility.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) quoted the Bible last night. I suggest to him that the instruction "Thou shalt not kill", one of our ten commandments, does not mean that we shall not kill in the absolute; it means we shall not kill without just cause. To kill in protecting your nation in time of war is justifiable. To kill in protecting your family is justifiable. But I suggest that those who, in a premeditated and heinous fashion, murder members of society are not justified. I suggest that the commandment to love one's neighbour certainly does not mean that when one's neighbour is murdered, your neighbour's killer, who may well kill again, should go free.

There have been many improvements in medical science over past years and in the science of altering a person's personality, a science that is developing bit by bit. I hope in years to come that society will be able to change the attitude of people toward life. But we have not yet demonstrated anywhere in our penal system, in our psychiatric studies, in medical or sociological work that we can change the personality of hardened, dangerous criminals. Until we can demonstrate some degree of success in changing the personality of those who are the kind who commit the heinous type of premeditated murder of which I have spoken this afternoon, we owe society the ultimate protection of capital punishment.

I am a member of the United Church of Canada, and my church clearly calls for the abolition of capital punishment. I have suggested to my church, and I suggest to this House, that at this stage of our social development the abolition of capital punishment is not possible. When our society develops, perhaps when it becomes more loving, more capable of organization and able to alter people's personalities, able to effect some cure of those who are engaged in forms of anti-social behaviour, then perhaps the abolition of capital punishment will be possible. But at the present time this is not the case.

Our prison system is brutalizing. The investigations that followed the Kingston riots clearly demonstrated that some of the persons incarcerated in the institution bore only a likeness to human beings and were really animals. The death penalty as a punishment is a lever of protection and discipline, a lever which at this stage in the growth of our society cannot be dispensed with. Members of this House should examine closely what police associations across the land have said. Police officials deal more with the criminal element of society on a daily basis than anyone else. Right across Canada these associations have said—indeed, the wives of police officers have collected petitions to this effect—that we cannot abolish the death penalty.

We still retain the provision that the Governor General in Council has the right to direct that a person convicted of murder can have his sentence commuted, and that is as it should be. Executive clemency must be maintained.

This is a bad bill, Mr. Speaker. This bill lists police officers, ancillary sheriff's officers and prison guards as exceptions, and thus discriminates against other categories of persons who might be murdered. My daughter will not be protected. A member of the House of Commons will not be protected. You can kill the Prime Minister but under this bill his killer will not hang. It is a bad bill and I will vote against it.

I think it is imperative for the government to rethink this bill and produce another one. It must analyse the crime of taking a person's life and set new standards. The government must present to the House a bill that the vast majority of members are happy with. The very length of this debate clearly indicates a division in the country, and clearly indicates that this House is not satisfied with this bill.

● (1640)

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the last time I rose to speak in the debate on capital punishment was some five years ago. Just before I came into the House at that time I was handed a very urgent and important letter from a constituent, a school teacher of my sons. She urged me to support hanging as the only way of protecting children. She was very sincere and very concerned about what she thought was happening. This was probably as cutting a letter as a person could receive, especially when he knew he was going to vote for abolition. I have a very high regard for that teacher, as I have for other people who do not necessarily agree with me on this question of abolition. I intend to continue to be an abolitionist and to support this bill with its deficiencies. I think there are some deficiencies in this bill and my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has pointed them out. In principle, we will support the bill in the absence of a measure proposing total abolition.

As much as anyone else, I am aware of what polls indicate are the attitudes of the people of Canada. I have conducted polls in my own riding and have read the results of national polls. After reading them, one would think this was a hanging country, that the public very much wanted to bring back hanging and is determined to do so. If that is the impression left by the results of polls I suggest it is somewhat erroneous. I am sure if you asked the fast and facile question, do you want hanging, do you want to bring back capital punishment, that is the kind of answer you would get when you live in a society where, for one reason or another, the fears of people have been increased by prison escapes and their security is a matter of importance. I sympathize with and understand that attitude.

Like other Members of Parliament, I should like very much to feel I was in harmony with my constituents and could go along with what they appear to want. However, I do have a responsibility, and I am sure my constituents will recognize that I have a responsibility to act and vote in the best way possible on the basis of the information before me. I have a conscience as has every other member of this House of Commons. Sometimes a debate gets off on the wrong track when we assume that because everyone on this side has a conscience everyone on the other side has not. Let us assume that we all have a conscience and act according to that conscience. I know many of the members of this House personally, and have no hesitation in saying that they act on the basis of their own conscience, whether or not they agree with my decision. I do believe that hon. members are making a mistake when the results of polls have much bearing on their decision. I say that for two reasons.

It is important not to take these results as being representative of public opinion. It is far more important, in my view, to sit down with these people and ask them what they really mean and what really bothers them about the situation. When you do that you get a much different impression from the one you get on the basis of what the polls indicate. I suggest you will find that the people of Canada are not in favour of hanging. After explaining the complexities of the situation to members of the public you often find they have a different view, usually one that is softer and more understanding.

I find that many individuals are confusing problems in respect of parole and prison escapes with the concept of capital punishment. When you talk with them you find they are not worried about capital punishment, but are worried about permissive courts, paroles and other things of that type. When you point out that the one has not much to do with the other, they want to be assured that these dangerous people will be kept in jail, will not be allowed to escape and will not be paroled. I am not suggesting we get tough in respect of parole but that we should be wiser. We must learn from our mistakes. Most people will agree that a good parole system is a necessary part of society, but we must separate clearly the one problem from the other. When you give people an assurance that these dangerous people will be removed from society, and no longer will be a menace, their feelings in respect of capital punishment undergo a degree of change.

Before I became a Member of Parliament I had an instant opinion, as I am sure other hon. members had, about various things. If you asked me a question I would give you a quick answer. It is rather easy to have an instant opinion when your hand is not on the lever that opens the trap door. Our hands are on that lever in that we are making this decision. I have the opinion that if my constituents were in my place, in possession of the evidence and information I have, and given the opportunity to listen to the debate taking place in the House, and had the same responsibility of exercising the small degree of power to send a man to his death, they would feel somewhat different from what the polls indicate.

My reservations about capital punishment, and perhaps in this sense I am different from some of my colleagues, are not the result of any squeamishness or reluctance to kill when necessary. In common with other hon. members of the House, I served five years during the war, and I suggest that if you had any squeamishness you lost it after that period of time. If the evidence before us demonstrated that capital punishment protected society and saved lives, I would not hesitate to support it. No such evidence exists, and to kill for unnecessary reasons is wrong. Perhaps killing is never necessary, but certainly if there is no evidence to support the belief it is, one should not take another person's life.

What is it that we must consider during this debate? We must consider whether hanging is a deterrent. At the very best, I suggest the evidence leads to a standoff. The statistics available do not support the fact that hanging is a deterrent. If anything, the statistics indicate that during the years when capital punishment was abolished the incidence of serious crime declined. Should we take a life for the sake of vengeance? There was a time in society when those in authority did take life for vengeance. Many of us have forgotten the real meaning of the eye for an eye and tooth for a tooth concept. I had to draw on my experience as a young man studying under my rabbi to realize that you were not being asked to be more harsh or to require more in the way of retribution, but rather require a minimum. In those days if someone insulted you, you look his life. If someone punched you too hard you killed a member of his family. The meaning of the concept of an eye for an eye is that you do not take greater vengeance than is absolutely necessary.

In a society like that the fear was that if the authorities did not take vengeance on behalf of the population, the population would take it itself. We are talking about lynching, stoning and other acts of instantaneous violence. Therefore, violence by government was necessary to preserve the cohesion of that society. Is that the kind of society we are living in today? Are we afraid that if two or three lives are not taken over a period of years there will be riots in our streets, and that people will take things into their own hands, that blood victims will take blood and that children will kill child murderers. I think we have progressed over these thousands of years to the point where vengeance does not have to be taken in that particular way. It may be that some day—and I hope it never comes—our society will become so concerned that there is this danger of public violence that those who are abolitionists will have to reconsider their position. However, I see no evidence of that now and I do not think the time will come.

I was remarking to my colleagues, in recalling the debate which took place some five years ago, that one thing which strikes me about this particular debate is that it is being conducted in an infinitely calmer way than the debate of a few years ago. While the polls show that this is a hanging society, this is not being reflected in this House. The debates here are marked by a more logical and more reasoned approach from both sides of the House. There is less anger and more concentration on argument in support of positions.

Perhaps one would argue that justice demands capital punishment. I wish to speak for a few moments about justice and what it is. First of all, we can never be sure, so long as we have capital punishment, that the state does not make or has not made an error. As the speaker before me said, I think the possibility is small, but the possibility does exist and justice on the part of the state demands that that possibility not exist. As people, we cannot condone the law that may take a man's life unfairly or a life which should not be taken. That is always a possibility which hangs over any society which maintains capital punishment.

One might point to laws we have in respect of which elements of injustice exist and may be exposed from time to time. The difference is that most of those injustices can be corrected. There is now way to correct the injustice of a life which has been taken by an act which should not have been carried out. We have examples in our society—and one might wonder how a society makes judgments about things—of intelligent men or women who become drunk, get into a car and kill an entire family. They are remorseful, but nevertheless they kill an entire family. In no way does our law say that these are persons who should hang. It was not premeditated or planned; it was an accident. At the worst, it will involve a charge of manslaughter. Yet we have the example of someone who is stupid, who has been torn apart by some internal demon over which he has no control, who in a moment's passion or in a moment of stupidity kills. He hangs. We make this kind of distinction.

Perhaps we forgive drunkenness but not a man's stupidity. In some way, the person who has intelligence and drinks is more guilty than the stupid, foolish man who has so little control over his emotions. These are the types of things one faces when one decides what is justice. We talked about bank robbers. I heard one member say that a bank robber who kills during a premeditated bank robbery should pay the penalty. Let us take the case of two men who go into a bank armed. One man worked up the scheme and is really responsible. He persuades someone of lesser intelligence than himself to accompany him. So often the criminals in this country are not the brightest people in the world, at least those who land in jail. In the course of the robbery both guns are fired, but the shots from only one gun kill someone. Both persons should hang. One man hangs; the other does not. How does one talk about justice in this kind of a situation?

Mr. Speaker, I have other things I wish to say. May I call it five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter)—Harbours—Atlantic area—Request for improved facilities for fishermen; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave)—Agriculture—Small farm development program—inquiry as to agreement with Saskatchewan; the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick)—Administration of justice—persons indicted for capital murder other than murder of police officers or prison guards—completion of legal process.

Urban Transportation

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

NATIONAL URBAN TRANSPORTATION AUTHORITY

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AUTHORITY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved that Bill C-26, to establish the national urban transportation authority be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to support adoption of the bill which I have the privilege to introduce today, I would point out first that the terms of the bill are set out quite fully in the draft which is available to all members of this House. The purpose of the bill is to promote and improve rail, air and water passenger traffic in urban centres in Canada. To that end, we are proposing that a national urban transportation authority be established for the entire nation which in turn would have the power to establish local urban or regional transportation authorities in our urban centres.

● (1700)

I would draw the attention of the House to a motion, tied in with this bill, which I proposed on January 12 and which is on the order paper as No. 67. That motion reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to the establishment of a National Urban Transportation Authority empowered with authority over all rail, air and water passenger traffic within designated urban centres including the authority to set rates, negotiate agreements with provincial and municipal authorities and to expropriate land for the purposes of carrying its duties and objects into effect.

In rising to deal with this subject, I believe it is important to first look at who administers our transportation needs in the domain of air, rail or water in our urban centres at present. As hon. members know, this matter is generally handled by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). I have had the privilege of attending certain of the Transport Committee meetings—the chairman tables his first report today—and I must admit that in dealing with, say, the matter of a second airport in Toronto I was very startled to hear the Minister of Transport state:

I really do not mind that the government of Canada lose $100 million—I do not mind—but what I would mind would be, if it were needed in 1980 and were not there, because we relied on something that did not happen. This is quite a responsible thing but I think it preferable to take the risk of losing the $100 million than not to have it if needed.

Here is a Minister of Transport seriously suggesting to that committee that he is willing to shoot crap with $100 million of public funds rather than seriously delay the opening of the Toronto international airport No. 2. At an earlier stage at that same hearing, the minister was asked to comment on the revolving fund that the department has for dealing generally with airport development and expansion. That fund runs up into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and an hon. member made the comment:

It is a very handy kind of fund, is it not?

Whereupon the Minister of Transport stated:

Oh, yes, especially at election time.

I feel that perhaps jokingly the minister conveyed a great deal in those two comments that I have quoted. While I introduced this bill for consideration some time ago, I believe that it is more imperative today than ever that we stop the centralized control of urban transportation with respect to railways, air traffic, and also the handling of our water passenger service as that related to our urban harbours.

Let me first lay down a few facts on this subject. Here we have the Minister of Transport stating that there is a serious possibility that an airport in the Toronto area, a new airport, will be needed by 1980. In a form tabled on April 26, 1972, the department put in a schedule listing what they proposed to do and the number of passengers in the various airports of our main North American cities. I believe that hon. members should note that if one follows that schedule and checks out what they project for the year 1980, one finds that Toronto is No. 9 in the expectation of passengers and Montreal is No. 10. The projection is that, for example, the number of passengers passing through Toronto in 1980 will be 15.5 million and through Montreal in the same year there will be 12 million. This compares with the fact that New York in the same year is projected to have 89.1 million passengers, the No. 1 city on the continent; Chicago, the No. 2 city, is projected to have 68 million passengers, and Los Angeles, the No. 3 city, is projected to have 48.9 million passengers.

I believe that in considering the bill I am proposing we should take a serious look at the irresponsible approach of the present Minister of Transport. The fact is that, in spite of the fact that Toronto and Montreal are rated in their own schedule as being ninth and tenth so far as traffic projections are concerned for the year 1980, those two cities are the only cities in North America that are contemplating or developing an airport of the magnitude of Pickering or Mirabel. Surely, it is time that we asked ourselves: why does New York decide after due deliberation that they do not need an additional airport? Why does Chicago decide that they do not need an additional airport, and why does Los Angeles decide in the same way?

To bring this into perspective, I believe it is time that the government started to be more candid with the people of Canada. For example, the John F. Kennedy international airport with 4,900 acres of land, approximately 100 acres smaller than the present Malton airport in Toronto, is handling approximately double the traffic that is projected for the entire Toronto area in 1980 today. To give you another example, this morning I spoke to the commissioner for aviation for the city of Chicago and I asked him what their plans were for future airport development in that city. The commissioner laughed and said: "We have no plans". I said: "Is it not true that in Dallas and Fort Worth they are planning an airport of some 17,000 acres?" He said: "The Texans like to do things big. They've got the money, more power to them, but in our case we cannot, from the capital standpoint, afford such luxury. And besides that, we do not need it". I asked the commissioner what in 1972 and 1973 would be the likely passenger traffic at O'Hare airport, for example. He informed me that for 1972 it was 34 million passengers and for 1973 it will be 37 million passengers.

I checked with the Canadian authorities regarding the actual amount of traffic through Toronto and Montreal, and I found that the comparable figures were seven million passengers for Toronto and between four million and five million passengers for Montreal. Here we have a situation where the commissioner of the biggest airport on the continent, or as they claim in the world feels, that there is no need for new facilities until 1990 or the year 2,000 and there may not ever be the need for such new facilities. I would suggest that one of the reasons we have got ourselves into this position of contemplating a half billion dollar airport in the Toronto area and a half billion dollar airport at Mirabel in Quebec is that we have a civil service that is out of control. The civil servants have decided, not the people of Toronto and not the people of Montreal, that both of those centres need an airport, that they will have an airport, and that their brainchild will be constructed.

• (1710)

I suggest that if we had local authorities dealing with this matter we would not get such irresponsible actions. I suggest also that one of the political reasons an airport of the magnitude of Pickering is being contemplated is that it was first decided that there should be an airport of this size in Mirabel, and then—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. Is the hon. member for York North rising on a point of order?

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was given to understand that we were discussing Bill C-26, an act to establish a national urban transportation authority, and I was very much looking forward to speaking on that bill. Has there been a mistake? The hon. member is not referring to that bill at all? He is talking about an airport.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I must say that the point of order is well taken. Of course, in private members' hour we are not as firm as at other times, but if we really check Bill C-26 there is no doubt that part of the hon. member's explanation has taken us some distance away from the basics of the bill. Perhaps he would return to the bill in order to keep in order.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker. I am sorry if I have conveyed that impression, because the point I am making is that we do not have local regional authorities dealing with the questions that I have been discussing. I believe that the question of an airport in Toronto would be decided differently if we had a regional authority dealing with air traffic, with rail transportation of an urban nature, with the harbours in Toronto, and likewise if we had a regional authority dealing with those subjects in Montreal. I have chosen to refer to the situation in the United States because the fact is that all such developments in the United States are handled at the city or local authority level. This situation is peculiar to Canada, and is not typical of the development of similar facilities in England and in France. I could cite many other countries that have a central authority determining what type of facilities are needed or should be put into a local area.

My bill is designed to give the authority to an overriding national authority which, in turn, can delegate its authority to these regional levels, similar to what they have in New York where there is the Port of New York Authority, similar to what they have in southern California where there is the Southern California Association of Counties, and similar to the Chicago situation where there is actually a department of the city of Chicago running the local airports. But I would stress, for the attention of the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson), that the federal government of the United States has consistently refused to give federal assistance to the type of airport development which his minister is contemplating at Toronto International No. 2. The developments through these authorities are handled with local financing.

For example, a comparable development to the one being proposed at Pickering is in Dallas-Fort Worth, to which I have already referred. The money for that project is being raised through a revenue bond issue of some $400 million. That bond issue is guaranteed 100 per cent, jointly and severally, by the air carriers that will use that airport. The total cost anticipated for the development will be $700 million. I emphasize that that is a smaller development than the proposed one at Pickering, but the initial cost will be $700 million, and eventually $1 billion. However, I would emphasize that the local authorities throughout the United States, in all of the areas I have referred to, have no airports of the nature of Pickering and Mirabel in the planning or development stage at the present time, in spite of the fact that their projected needs could well be three, four, and in some cases five times the projected needs for any future airport facilities in Montreal or Toronto.

I would also mention that this national authority, if established, would give the people in the local regions what they want. For example, in my own area of Toronto for many years we have attempted to have better transportation facilities, of a commuter transit nature, than presently exist. We have been constantly told by the federal authorities that they have no funds, and they have in fact brought very little effective action to bear on this subject until now. Up until a few months ago, they relied on the fact that they were waiting on a Toronto commuter rail study which they had commissioned, jointly with other bodies, to be undertaken by Dr. Soberman. Mr. Speaker, now they have had that study in their hands since November of last year. That study indicates that a fully developed commuter service, on lines which Dr. Soberman considers desirable, would cost between $80 million and $130 million, and would carry 11,789,500 people a year. I am simply pointing out that, according to the federal government, there is no money available for the development of a service that would help the man going to work on a daily basis, that would help the relatively poor person in our area, but on the other hand it can find money for the development of airports, which are essentially for the rich, to the tune of half a billion dollars or $1 billion per airport. Under a national urban transportation authority, I would hope that there would be a better reflection through the regional authorities of the true needs in each of the regions.

Dealing with need, Mr. Speaker, we have a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who, from time to time, takes a trip through our area. When asked about the airport, he indicated that if the majority of the people were opposed to it, then of course he would not go ahead with the airport. Public opinion polls have reflected that the majority are opposed to it, but I would suggest that because of the centralized federal approach to this project there is no way that the public opinion in my area will be felt in a decisive decision-making way. However, if there were a local authority, and if that local authority first had the responsibility of financing the project and, secondly, for making sure that the project was a worthwhile development for the area, I am confident you would not have the rather autocratic approach that has been taken to date by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and by the present government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. Before I recognize the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) I would like to note with respect to Bill C-26, which the hon. member for York-Simcoe has presented to the House, and to the point of order that was raised by the hon. member for York North, that the impression might be left by the speech given by the sponsor that this was a debate more on the Pickering airport than on the bill itself.

When hon. members present bills, in all fairness to all hon. members, they should debate the basic principles of the bills. Therefore, if other hon. members do not address themselves to the contents of this particular bill, and I have to call them to order, I hope the House will understand and excuse me.

• (1720)

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I had not anticipated entering this debate but as I entered the House and heard the subject matter, I thought I should like to say a few words, although I confess I seldom enter debates on the subject of transportation for the very odd reason that I do not know very much about it.

Mr. Stanbury: That does not stop anybody else.

Mr. Brewin: It does not stop too many people. I should like, in general, to support the principle set out in the bill introduced by the hon. member for York Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). The subject of urban transportation is of great importance to all those who represent urban areas. As the bill suggests, the situation is not satisfactory. There is a clear lack of co-ordination between the provinces, the municipalities and the federal authorities, all of whom are concerned in the effective working out of the very serious problems of transportation which not only affect the environment but the whole economy and the lives of many of our people.

I agree with the hon. member that one of the best illustrations of this is in the metropolitan area of Toronto, and that is the history of the so-called Pickering airport. It is a good example of what should not be done. Had the urban transportation authority which he proposes or some similar machine been in existence, we might never have had the difficulties that have been experienced with this proposal. There, without any adequate inquiry, a tremendously expensive and tremendously dubious proposition was almost foisted upon the people. Had it not been for the reaction of the people concerned in the city of Toronto and elsewhere, an immense project might have been undertaken on the wrong premises, and without proper pre-examination. Certain officials took one aspect of it. The location was selected by provincial authorities and so far as we know the municipal authorities were not consulted at all and if they were, they decided that they did not want the project. Although my constituents would be served by the airport in the east end of Toronto, they do not want this project to proceed.

If we had a national transportation authority, as is proposed by this bill, the elected representatives of the people would be in a position to object to such projects. One of the reasons against this project is not only doubt whether the need has been adequately demonstrated but is the indirect results of this project in this neighbourhood. How many houses in the riding of Greenwood would have to be torn down in order to provide transportation to the airport? That matter should be discussed and the local representatives should be given the opportunity to take part before the project is approved.

A national transportation authority could do all sorts of other things. It could pressure for greater development of new technologies in the field of transportation. One of the dangers of the present rate of progress is that we get a new scheme and by the time it is put into practice it has become obsolete. There are all sorts of novel developments, but I disclaim being an expert on the subject so I hope no one will ask me what those developments are. However, I have seen and read a good deal about all sorts of new forms of transportation which are essential to the solution of these problems and which could save millions of dollars but which become obsolete before they become operative.

In the draft bill there is a provision which is not acceptable, however, but it could be dealt with when the House comes to second reading, which I suppose is prima facie rather than probable. Clause 3, "Objects and Powers" should be looked at very carefully. Clause 3(c) provides for federal, provincial, regional and municipal representation to be established by the board itself. I do not think that any federal parliament has the right to establish regional, provincial and municipal representation. What it has is the right to create an authority, with which, by either co-operation or delegation of powers, these local and provincial bodies can participate. I think that is the main purpose of the bill and I support it. Although second reading of the bill is dubious, I think the hon. member deserves the thanks of this House for bringing forward a subject which is of immense importance to a large number of Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, as a newcomer in this House, I think I was asked to take the floor on Bill C-26 and that is what I am going to do. I noticed that two hon. members tackled the matter of an airport and I think that Bill C-26, as it has been drafted, does not apply only to the building of a national airport like the airport of Pickering. Thus, it is with considerable interest that I take part in this debate because it is a subject which, I think, all hon. members as well as my constituents are interested in.

Bill C-26, introduced by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), deals with the question of urban transportation in metropolitan areas and elsewhere, but in Ottawa-Hull, it is a topic all residents of both provinces are interested in.

[English]

When I read the bill, Mr. Speaker, I wondered if the hon. member for York Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) was not proposing to undo the momentum already attained in solving urban transportation problems whereby the government engages in patient, careful negotiations in the most intelligent way possible, to arrive at long lasting solutions. What I am getting at, Mr. Speaker, is that the hon. member for York Simcoe has left out of this proposed legislation a fact which is very important and that is the inter-relatedness of things municipal and urban. Everyone of the social problems of our urban centres has to be regarded and understood and the inter-relatedness of all those social problems, be they technological or otherwise, are affected by all other problems such as housing, etc. We are not so ingenious that we can allow ourselves to review problems in such a vacuum as proposed in Bill C-26.

Legislative programs and agencies must be seen in context. My hon. friend's bill does not take account of this very important factor of the inter-relatedness of urban issues. He has failed to grasp what I would call the obvious. Urban transportation, urban housing, urban neighbourhood, urban services cannot be treated in isolation. He might be talking about Pickering and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), who has more experience than we two combined, repeated some of the arguments regarding the airport but I think the bill in question could have been the object of some more constructive comments in its defence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): We have enough, not to say a lot of municipal, regional, provincial and federal agencies and I think there are enough structures in Canada to deal with all the problems we can imagine, especially as regards urban transportation.

We have—and this is what the government is trying to do—to solve our problems by the adopting innovative measures through government agencies open to wide consultation with provinces and municipalities in order to find long term solutions to the numerous social problems generated by modern communities.

● (1730)

[English]

I am not an expert on transportation, but from reading Bill C-26 I realize that it ignores the realities of transportation in Canada. One cannot deal with transportation in urban areas as something distinct and set apart from transportation between urban areas. I am thinking particularly of the Ottawa area. It would be nonsense and folly if Ontario, for example, and the Ottawa regional council established one system of urban transportation, such as the proposed rapid transit that the provincial government has announced for this area, without involving the whole of the capital area including Hull-Outaouais on the Quebec side.

I was amazed some time ago when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) asked if the federal government would participate in such development and deal separately with each provincial government in the granting of funds for a system on only one side of the Ottawa River. I repeat myself, Mr. Speaker, but one cannot deal with transportation in urban areas as something distinct and set apart from transportation between urban areas. This principle is most important to the Ottawa area if we want our dream of a national capital to become a reality in the near future. I am sorry to say that in Bill C-26 the distinction I have referred to exists, and I will not encourage it by supporting the bill.

[Translation]

The residents in my riding of Ottawa East, Mr. Speaker, are facing all sorts of social and other pressure as regards urban transportation. I must say that this is a topical issue because we in Ottawa East are convinced that the hardships we must suffer concerning roads, asphalt, expressways and high density housing are not proportionate to our wish to maintain a good environment and quality of life.

I have a voluminous file on the development of six-lane roads across my riding in Ottawa and I object to this kind of planning which ignores the interrelation of social problems—and we can see that easily—as does Bill C-26.

Obviously it is necessary to draft a general transport policy, a national policy to establish standards for all municipalities and provinces in the field of public transportation. Neither the municipalities nor the provinces have the necessary funds to develop alone those large public transport systems and the federal government must participate in the preparation, the planning and the cost of such wide-ranging projects.

[English]

There is another aspect of the hon. member's proposal which I find disturbing. What is the phrase "urban centres" supposed to mean? To which urban centres is he referring? Is he referring to the 22 metropolitan census areas recognized by statisticians, or is he referring to our 52 cities with populations of over 30,000? Is he speaking of urban regions, municipalities, cities, towns or villages?

The hon. member's bill provides in clause 2:

> In this act, "urban centre" means a city or an urban community so designated by the governor in council.

When these so-called urban centres are designated, on what fancy will a decision be made? How will we deal with the country's three massive metropolitan areas? I am thinking of Montreal, where the tradition of civic administration goes back further than the history of this honourable House, where dedicated, knowledgeable people are trying to work out an acceptable definition for the Montreal urban community and what constitutes its urban centre. The Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is grappling with such problems. It is working to solve the problems of urban communities, urban transportation being one of them.

None of the simplifications contained in Bill C-26 would come near to curing the havoc that would result from the hon. member's less than adequate appreciation of the constitutional issues inherent in his proposed authority. Urban transportation is a field of mixed jurisdiction where conflicts are quick to crop up. In support of this contention I remind the House that recently the Premier of Ontario, having made a public statement about Ontario's urban transportation policy as it applies to the Ottawa-Carleton area, invited the co-operation of both the federal government and the province of Quebec in dealing with transit problems for the national capital region. It is true that the federal government has authority over traffic interprovincially; however, the rules and regulations that control traffic within specified regions are the responsibility of the provinces.

[Translation]

That is the kind of co-operation and planification we need as regards the growth of cities and municipalities. And I was pleased to hear the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) announce recently in the House that he was taking the appropriate steps to meet very soon with representatives of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec to discuss the whole matter of urban and interurban transportation, together with municipal and regional governments. Co-operation, Mr. Speaker, is the real solution to our problems of urban transportation.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we all know that our big cities badly need more efficient and more modern means of transportation, but that provinces are entirely responsible for this matter which falls under their jurisdiction. When there is an alternative which respects the constitutional reality, we must act, and the federal government acts throughout the country when it holds trilevel meetings like the one the minister referred to relating to the national capital region.

[English]

Through this channel the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, by means of consultation, is funnelling valuable technical assistance and is dovetailing policies and research to take into account the transportation needs of the people who will be making the decisions in these areas, that is, the provinces and the municipalities. What Bill C-26 fails to make clear is the relationship between the national authority and the regional authorities. It raises several questions. How does the hon. member propose that these regional regulatory bodies be established? What is their relationship to the provinces?

The best mechanism, Mr. Speaker, for exercising federal influence in areas that are outside the competence of this House rests in the trilevel consultations now being developed by the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. It has taken many years of elaborate planning to devise these consultations. Let us not jeopardize this inevitable step by creating some new bureaucratic machine. We have enough machinery, and we are establishing innovations such as trilevel consultations to make it more effective. That is the way we must proceed.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak for a few moments on this bill. I congratulate my colleague on his foresight and understanding of the basic problems which the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Gauthier) was talking about and the interrelation of transportation systems in this country. As we know, there is the difficulty of co-ordination of various services and functions in an urban community.

Before dealing with the bill I wish to refer to a matter raised by the hon. member for Ottawa East. He referred to the position I took on an earlier occasion in this House with respect to dealing with the problems of co-ordinating policies of transportation between two municipalities in two provinces, and the federal government. If the hon. member reads carefully what I said during an adjournment debate a few evenings ago, he will see I said that in so far as the development is concerned on both sides of the river, it is a good thing in principle. However, I think the present situation is unfair, unreasonable and inequitable for people on both sides of the Ottawa River—which the hon. member and I know so well—who wish to develop together an area which requires this type of service and needs it, and who are prepared to accept the contribution offered by the government of Ontario, to have to wait for another jurisdiction to decide. I feel the government of Canada has waited too long since January 30 to accept the invitation of the government of Ontario to make a contribution to the development of the system.

I asked the question, on March 5, I believe it was, for one purpose, that is, to prod the government into establishing the trilevel conference which it announced it intended to establish to discuss this question vital to the national capital area. Out of all this it is my hope that the national capital area, which after all is the capital of this country—people are beginning to look upon this area as the capital—will be, with respect to transportation and every other municipal service, a model for the rest of the country. As the hon. member from the national capital said, I hope this will happen. I believe, and I say this with all the modesty I can muster, which is considerable, that as a result of this prodding the government has finally decided to move in the right direction.

Our problem in the national capital epitomizes the problem in the country generally under a federal system. The bill put forward by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is an attempt to alleviate the difficulties of co-ordination. This country is not like other countries which have a single government. We are ten provinces and two territories which possess differing aspirations, differing requirements, differing needs to be satisfied in their urban areas. We have all seen the statistics projecting the growth of our urban areas. The bill before us focuses on the problems facing our cities. If the bill is adopted, governments at all levels will be obliged to co-ordinate their efforts to make urban living a more reasonable proposition.

I think the hon. member for Ottawa East missed the point of this bill. Its purpose is to improve co-ordination. I commend my hon. friend for proposing it, since it also provides within its framework an important avenue by means of which contributions can be made by localities affected by legislation passed in this chamber and elsewhere. I cannot imagine anyone responsible for decisions made in this chamber affecting Ottawa, Toronto or anywhere else to be reached in the absence of feedback from the communities directly concerned. Any machinery for improving lines of communication with the national government is important in this respect.

I note that the hon. member for Ottawa East dealt with the constitutional issues which are involved in this question. We have been faced with constitutional questions in Canada since 1867; they are part of our national life. But I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that such constitutional difficulties are really challenges to governments. Parliaments and legislatures which continually cite the British North America Act as grounds for objection to reasonable action are invoking a principle which is less than relevant to the needs of Canadians today.

My constituents tell me they do not care about the British North America Act. They say they are interested in solving the problems of our urban communities, in putting an end to pollution whether of water, air or soil. Their environment is affected by these things and they want solutions. They say to parliaments, "Do not tell us about the British North America Act. Do not tell us what you cannot do. Tell us what you can do and what you intend to do." This bill focuses on the effort which ought to be made by the national government to deal with the question of co-ordination.

I believe the establishment of a national urban transportation authority could well lead the way to the development of new technology in Canada. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) touched on this point. We might well find the ground upon which we could develop a new industry right here in Canada, rather than import machinery and technology from elsewhere. This also applies to anti-pollution measures. The federal parliament and the provincial legislatures are concerned about pollution, yet we seem to import almost every device which is used in the fight for clean air and clean water. In this field, too, we have an opportunity to develop a completely new technology based in Canada.

I feel the spirit of this bill is a sound one. The establishment of an authority which would co-ordinate various urban projects would be valuable. Such an authority is needed in this country, and certainly it is needed in this community as the hon. member for Ottawa East should know. All of us acknowledge the necessity of provincial, municipal and federal governments getting together to deal with the challenges which face us. We are faced with the necessity of meshing older forms of transportation with present-day innovations such as the new STOL program which is possibly the forerunner of further experiments of this nature. There is need to collect and disseminate information on all such developments.

I think the difficulty that faces this government in many fields—I suppose the hon. member for Ottawa East, having sat in the caucus of the Liberal party, knows this better than anyone else—is that of co-ordination. On one hand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will upset the programs of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson); on the other hand the Bank of Canada will tighten the money supply while the Minister of Finance suggests his budget is expansionary. These are examples of lack of co-ordination.

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that within the field of transportation as it affects a growing number of city dwellers, in a society that is moving from agrarian to urban living, there will for the first time be the element of co-ordination which is needed and which was not present hitherto. I know the hon. member for Ottawa East will applaud those sentiments.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to address the House on the subject of transportation. You will forgive me if I do not limit my remarks to the terms of reference of the so-called national urban transportation authority which the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) would have this House consider.

When first reading the proposed legislation I was dismayed to see we were being asked to create yet another government agency. Upon further study, my dismay gave way to anxiety when the implications of what was being proposed became clearer. Bill C-26 is irrelevant to the emerging pattern of urbanization in this country. More importantly, it contains elements of constitutional discord. The hon. member is suggesting that we circumvent or run afoul of existing provincial jurisdiction by setting up regional federal authorities with local powers. Can he be serious? Or is he, like the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), talking of direct dealings with cities, clearly the responsibility of the provinces, for some political gain?

There is more to dealing with issues than introducing new concepts without consideration of all the factors. There is more to coming to grips with an immensely complex issue like urban transportation than merely creating yet another agency, yet another authority. There is much more to rationalizing the existing laws and regulations and jurisdictions that govern transportation in this country. Creating still another tribunal is not going to work toward the creation of viable urban transportation policies—

Mr. Stevens: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is misunderstanding the bill when he suggests that somehow there is a jurisdictional problem. The bill is very careful to deal only with railways, air transportation and harbours which are all federal matters. It is simply proposing that "urbanwise" they be put into separate regions.

Mr. Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the details, but I know what I am talking about. I have been interested in transportation for 33 years, so I know a little about it. In fact, this bill would have quite the contrary effect, further delaying the day when hon. members can speak intelligently about a matter that is of crucial national, provincial and local interest. Urban transportation is of crucial interest countrywide. That is the point this government wishes to make when it introduces legislation, as it will shortly when the railway relocation measures are placed before the House. This government has not been idle about transportation, especially urban transportation.

I should perhaps remind hon. members that there already exist government agencies that deal with transportation on a day to day and on a long-range basis. There is the regulatory body, the Canadian Transport Commission, that has a direct role in doing exactly what the hon. member would have the new legislation do, namely, improve rail, air and water traffic. There is the Department of Transport, which last year, with expenditures of $409.2 million, was in the business of doing exactly what Bill C-26 would do; that is, promoting and improving rail, air and water passenger traffic; not only passenger traffic to urban centres in Canada but also the movement of goods across the country and between cities.

The Department of Transport has also entered new fields. In 1971-72 a major national highway policy was set in motion which includes participation with all provincial governments. A federal-provincial advisory council on motor carrier regulations was created. The development of a transportation strategy for the Canadian northwest was started. Through greater participation with other governmental and private institutions, new and more advanced transportation systems are being developed. These initiatives all have impact, in one way or another, on urban transportation.

I am only skimming the surface in pointing out these examples. The point to be made here is that the government is fully aware of the need to improve urban transportation. But more important than this awareness is the conviction that planning new strategies, be they in transportation or any other area, demands a co-ordinated orchestration of all the elements involved, not simply the creation of another agency.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for interrupting his remarks, but it is six o'clock. Before the Chair calls it six o'clock, I believe the parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid) wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the House leaders concerning the special debate on penitentiaries that was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). I believe there is agreement to debate a substantive resolution which would read as follows:

> That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be empowered to investigate the administration of the penitentiary system, including security, parole and temporary absences, and that it report its recommendations as soon as reasonable after a thorough inquiry.

I believe it is further agreed that there be a limit of 15 minutes on speeches, that at the conclusion of the debate the motion be deemed to have been adopted, and that the motion be non-amendable. I think the House would be agreeable to accepting that motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: If there is agreement, perhaps the proposed motion might be read by the mover.

Mr. Reynolds: Then I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be empowered to investigate the administration of the penitentiary system, including security, parole and temporary absences, and that it report its recommendations as soon as reasonable after a thorough inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: It is understood that this is the motion that will be put at eight o'clock this evening, subject to the conditions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary to which hon. members have unanimously agreed. I gather that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is rising on the same point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to indicate that as far as we are concerned, we agree with the suggestions that have been reported to Your Honour.

● (1800)

However, I should like to enter a caveat, Mr. Speaker, in respect of the right some time this evening to suggest that we set a time when the debate will end. This is not part of the agreement as it was not possible to achieve that, but I think instead of the debate going on all night we might agree to a cut-off time some time this evening. Perhaps one of us might propose that later.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we agree to discuss this motion. As suggested by the hon. member who just spoke, we too would like the length of the debate to be limited.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There appears to be unanimous agreement to the conditions expressed by hon. members including the hon. member who proposed the motion. I believe this agreement would dispose of two matters: first, the motion under Standing Order 26 proposed earlier today by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.In view of the fact there is to be a debate on this question this evening, we should not, of course, proceed under the proposed motion. Second, I believe consideration of this motion and its disposition at the end of the debate would effectively dispose of the notice of motion for concurrence in the report of the committee tabled earlier today by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

[Translation]

Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The debate which was under way at five o'clock will, of course, be deemed to have been adjourned. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

At 6.04 p.m. the House took recess.

[Mr. Speaker.]

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

AUTHORIZATION OF INVESTIGATION BY STANDING COMMITTEE OF SECURITY OF PENITENTIARIES, PAROLE AND TEMPORARY ABSENCES

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) has moved:

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be empowered to investigate the administration of the penitentiary system, including security, parole and temporary absences, and that it report its recommendations as soon as reasonable after a thorough inquiry.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, permit me to state, on behalf of not only the people of my riding of Burnaby-Richmond-Delta but all Canadians who are concerned about the present state of affairs in our penitentiary system, that I am happy there has been unanimous agreement of the House to debate this motion. It is gratifying to see that the concern of the people of this country can result in the transcending of political lines and that action can be taken on their behalf and in their best interests on very short notice.

The latest break-out from St. Vincent de Paul of five highly dangerous criminals was indeed the last straw in what has become a matter of almost national disgrace. During a recent visit to the British Columbia penitentiary I learned that some of the inmates referred to the almost daily reports of escapes and violations of leave passes as "Comedy Night in Canada". But, Mr. Speaker, this is anything but a laughing matter. These break-outs are only part of the existing problem in our whole judicial and penal system. Our courts are bogged down, our prisons are overcrowded and our rehabilitation program is in a sorry state of disrepair.

The parole system needs a complete overhaul, and authority for deciding the length of sentences must be returned to the trial judge. What is the point of a judge carefully considering all the evidence, having the opportunity to view the accused during what is often a lengthy trial, being fully aware of all aspects of the case, and in many cases even knowing the accused having dealt with him before, and then after reaching a decision as to sentence seeing that sentence commuted by a body far removed from the actual scene of the crime? It is no wonder that judges are speaking out in irate tones against the Parole Board.

Certainly, it is no easy task for a judge to pass sentence on a man, but when he sees the same man before him again at a time when he is still supposed to be in jail from the previous offence, he wonders about the mentality and the thinking of the person who released the man back into society. Possibly if this body known as the Parole Board had to serve the sentence of anyone who violated the terms of the parole, greater care would be taken in selection for parole than is currently the case, for indeed one must consider their actions criminal in some of their recent decisions.

At the very least, the presiding judge should be allowed some input into the final approval for parole of any convicted person, particularly in cases of crimes of violence. It might surprise the parole board to know that judges, after years on the bench, have a contribution to make in the assessment of a person's rehabilitative chances in society; yet this expert, professional advice is not sought and hardened criminals are being released back into society with disastrous effects on honest citizens. Perhaps, too, the entire make-up of the parole board should be changed to include more lay people and less social workers who often tend to pay more attention to the poor convict than to the victim of his crime.

In so far as the security of our penal institutions is concerned, this is a technical matter and should not even be before this body. Either you have a man competent in his job of keeping prisoners in jail or you get rid of him and employ a man who can do the job. In this regard I have no hesitation in recommending the immediate dismissal of the warden and senior officers of St. Vincent de Paul for gross neglect of duty if not for any other reason. There has been some suggestion that inside help was made available to the five convicts who escaped very recently. If this is the case, I trust the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) will pursue his investigation to the fullest and that the most severe penalty will be imposed upon those responsible for the escape. That five such dangerous men should be allowed to escape in broad daylight during a lunch hour, and that all four watch towers should be unoccupied, is more than anybody could even remotely find plausible.

● (2010)

The whole incident reeks of collusion and corruption; even more so when one realizes that there was almost one guard on duty to every prisoner. Again, in light of the fact that instructions had been issued to man these towers on a 24-hour basis, I would call for the immediate resignation of the warden of St. Vincent de Paul prison and the officials of any other prisons where the job of security for the protection of society is not being carried out adequately. Such incompetence must not be permitted to exist in our penal institutions.

Perhaps the most unfortunate effect of this entire incident will be the detrimental effect on future chances of parole for deserving men and women presently in jail. When the record is reviewed, it is the Parole Board and their sometimes senseless granting of weekend passes and early parole who must take partial blame. The remainder of the blame must be taken by this government which has permitted this situation to exist and to grow into its present state. To award weekend passes to sex deviates, rapists and murderers is beyond all reason, particularly in cases where the victims of sex deviates and rapists have not and will not ever recover from the effects of the injuries done to them.

I hope and pray that a thorough and complete investigation into the pilicies and procedures of the National Parole Board is included, and indeed receives the highest priority in this investigation of the penitentiary system. This is the crucial issue here, not the simple one of housekeeping in the penitentiaries.

If we must spend additional funds to erect an institution to house our hardened criminals, then let us do so. But please let us not spend millions of dollars in this regard and then flood that institution with weekend passes and overnight leaves. Let us face the fact that there are those who have no regard for others, who spit in the face of honest men and regard work for society as something others do. Let us say to these men, "You shall be incarcerated in prison, and there you shall stay. You were given a chance, you were given a second chance or even a third chance, and you shall receive no more. Society shall be protected from you from now on". Perhaps, then, those individuals will be separated from others and their insidious, hardened habits will not spread like a cancer among other prisoners.

To the others we can begin to offer a sincere program of rehabilitation, not making licence plates or hand carvings, or putting patches on mailbags for the Post Office, but introducing an educational program coupled with learning a specific trade. Instead of being turned back into society with no specific training, he can look forward to employment in a given area. Certainly this program is going to cost money, but will the cost be any greater than is presently the case in housing and feeding these men year after year?

It is unfortunate that these men often become entangled in a continuous cycle of being in and out of prison. It has often been said that it is not a case of having too few policemen but of having too many criminals loose in society. Let us offer them the opportunity to increase their knowledge, to learn a trade; let us assist them in gaining employment. Then if they continue to follow their criminal routine, let us incarcerate them and separate them not only from society from their fellow inmates who truly wish to turn a new page in their lives.

In conclusion, let me reiterate the point I made earlier. Let us not become bogged down in the mechanics of security in our prisons. This is a simple matter to resolve. Let us concentrate on the real issue facing us right now, and that issue is the complete investigation of the current practices and guidelines under which the National Parole Board is mishandling the responsibility with which it is charged.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, we consider the motion before the House of considerable importance, but I want to make very clear at the outset that we consider it of importance not for the hard-rock, red-neck reasons to which you have just listened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: It is all very well for hon. members to say that they are in favour of rehabilitation after they have said everything that feeds the worst in human nature and calls for incarceration without limit, except the limit of the judge, and creates an atmosphere of fear and resentment against modern attempts to rehabilitate the criminal. I say to the hon. member who has just spoken that if the second part of his speech was sincere—and I have no reason to doubt it—the first part of his speech was shamefully contrary to the spirit which he indicated in the second part of his remarks. He cannot have it both ways.

It is not possible to introduce a system that tries to remake human beings who have committed a crime, it is not possible to have a system of parole, it is not possible to have a system of temporary absence without some mistakes. No member in the Conservative party could do it without making some mistakes. Mistakes are inevitable because the system is being supervised by human beings. It is inevitable that a mistake will be made from time to time, and in my view it is reprehensible that people take advantage of these mistakes to create an atmosphere of fear and of almost unlimited anxiety about the situation. That is not necessary, because it does not help anybody.

Mr. Reynolds: Tell us what helps.

Mr. Lewis: I will in a moment. I live in the same country as the hon. member does and I read the same newspapers. He spoke as if at least 50 per cent of the prisoners in the penitentiaries were roaming the streets of Canada. He knows darned well that that is not true. He knows perfectly well that it is not helpful to the people of Canada and to the system to speak in such exaggerated terms about a situation that is unhappy. I think it is shameful that these exaggerated terms are used.

The hon. member says that the worst thing about the situation is that it will do something against the system of rehabilitation. Let me say to people who talk like that, that they are responsible for the spirit abroad in this country that is making it difficult for those who are trying to create a system of rehabilitation that would be of benefit to Canada. On the other hand, I say to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), and I do not pretend to know the details of his department or the details in every one of the penitentiaries, that it seems to me obvious—there is a Latin phrase that lawyers use, res ipsa loquitor, "the thing speaks for itself"—that when these escapes have been taking place, particularly in the province of Quebec but elsewhere as well, at a fairly rapid pace, as it were, there must be something wrong in the Solicitor General's department. These things could not happen if there was no incompetence and inefficiency in high places in his department.

I am not prepared to ask for the dismissal of "A" or the dismissal of "B" without giving "A" and "B" an opportunity to state their case. I do not think that is fair either. But I say to the minister that I give him credit, as do all my colleagues, for being sincere and genuine in his attempts to run his department for the benefit and security of the people of Canada. I say to the Solicitor General that history is full of instances where the good intentions of a minister are destroyed and frustrated by those under him who are incapable of carrying out the policy which he wishes carried out, or who deliberately sabotage that policy.

I say to the minister that nobody can look at the present situation without concluding that even at the level of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries—and I do not think I have had the pleasure of meeting the gentleman, let alone being in a position to judge him—what has been happening in the system indicates the present commissioner may not be the best person for the job. I say that it is the duty of the Solicitor General to look into the staff in his department and to be tough and ruthless about getting rid of those who do not do the kind of job which alone can support a policy of rehabilitation and efficiency in the system.

The minister ought to look at the situation and, if necessary, clean house without any hesitation so that there may be some competence and some efficiency in the services over which he has authority. Also, I cannot help feeling that in addition to that there must be some very serious loss of morale, if not worse in some instances, in the penitentiaries across this country. If you permit me to put it this way, Mr. Speaker, I have personally been saddened at the way in which over the last number of months, or years for that matter, many people in Canada, in my constituency as well as in others, have developed a sense of revenge against others in society and have forgotten the biblical injunction that mercy and compassion are pretty important in a civilized society.

I think it is not only desirable but urgently necessary that criminals in this country be given an opportunity to be rehabilitated. I, personally, approve of the temporary absence philosophy, although not necessarily in every case where temporary absence has been granted. That has been a matter of judgment which went awry in some cases. But I think it is right to have a program of temporary absence for those persons in our penitentiaries and other prisons who in that way can be reintroduced into their families and can be reintroduced into society on a developing basis, so that when they are paroled they feel themselves a part of society instead of pariahs as many of them are made to feel at present.

Therefore, while I say to the minister that he cannot permit the present situation to continue, that he cannot permit the incompetence which is obviously there to continue, I plead with him, certainly on behalf of my colleagues, that he not permit these unfortunate incidents to affect adversely the decent programs of rehabilitation which have been undertaken by his department and which should be improved in the future.

It will be a mark of courage if he treats those in charge who have failed in their duty as I suggested he treat them, either get rid of them if necessary or give them very severe instructions if he considers that enough. But it will be a mark of cowardice if he joins the ranks of some in this House who, because there have been these escapes and because there is a feeling abroad of anxiety among many people in this country, now wish to end rehabilitation programs. It will be a mark of cowardice if, because these things are facts, he now permits himself to be influenced to deviate from a policy of rehabilitation which includes a policy of humane parole, which includes a policy of carefully vetted and humane temporary absences from prison.

As I have watched our judicial and penology system over the years, I have often wondered whether we realize what we are doing to human beings in our society. The hon. gentleman who preceded me said something about the judges who sentence people. My impression is that the Parole Board does in fact obtain information of that sort.

But surely it is right that the judge who first sentenced a person should not be the man or woman to whom is entrusted the later assessment of that person's development after that person has been in prison for some time. It is surely right that the Parole Board consist of people independent of the judicial system, but it has to consist of people who are sensitive to the needs, who have the courage to follow a consistent policy and who have the courage to say no as well as to say yes.

It has not been my experience, and I am certain I have had just as much experience as the Conservative member who preceded me, that the Parole Board has gone hog wild with paroles. Indeed, I have had many cases coming over my desk which, from the information I had, appeared to me to deserve the consideration that the Parole Board refused to afford those people. As I say, it is not my impression that they have gone hog wild about freeing people.

I hope this motion will pass. I understand there is an agreement to that effect. I think it is important that the committee goes into all the aspects which the motion covers; but I plead with the committee, as I plead with the Solicitor General, not to permit the rednecks to prevent programs and policies that are genuinely rehabilitative and which genuinely try to bring back into society people who have committed crimes. That should be the objective of our prisons and penitentiaries. It should not be our objective merely to punish people, to incarcerate them forever, as has been suggested, but to put them into an environment where those who are capable of becoming decent citizens in society are given the training and the opportunity to be rehabilitated. So far as I am concerned, if one good person gains rehabilitation as a result of that kind of policy, then all the mistakes that may have been made are well worth while.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the motion that is being proposed to the House, in view of the number of escapes that are happening now. The government seems to have a number of crises to face in Canada, and I wonder which of them will lead to its defeat. Will it be the crisis in the prisons? Or will it be that of unemployment, or again that of the cost of living?

In any event, the one before us is pretty serious. For the last two or three years at least, the government has been trying to apply certain reforms to the prison system with a view to helping criminals to be rehabilitated, and it seems to have had the desired effect only in a few cases. But in spite of all the leniencies which the government has introduced into the prison system, it seems that those who stand to gain the most from them are working hard to offset the beneficial effects of these reforms.

Attemps are now being made to find the causes of the many escapes that have happened, especially since the beginning of the year. It is reported that in Quebec federal prisons alone, there have been 26 escapes since the beginning of the year. And this morning's papers report that the Quebec provincial police have had to organize a special corps of 60 policemen just to track down individuals who have escaped from penitentiaries.

This is a sign that the situation has become very serious, and I wonder if the relaxation of prison regulations in Canada is really the solution to this unrest. I wonder whether, after trying two or three times to rehabilitate certain individuals, we should continue to waste our time on them.

• (2030)

The former Solicitor General had tabled a comprehensive program during the last session; he had even mentioned that golf courses would be built in some penitentiaries. I think that was going a little too far! And the way we treat criminals in our prisons is the envy of lots of honourable family heads who have to toil to earn a living.

Nowadays, we notice that bandits indicted on a charge of murder are travelling throughout the province with a private chauffeur. I would not be surprised to realize before long that they get free world-wide trips. And in spite of all that, they are not satisfied.

Therefore, I believe Mr. Speaker, that a rehabilitation system should be introduced in prisons where the inmates are mainly juvenile delinquents. I think we should give all our attention to that aspect.

As to the individual of a certain age who has ignored the laws of society for 15, 20, or 25 years, I think it is a waste of time to try to rehabilitate him and make of him an honest citizen like everybody else. But if it is a first offense on the part of a young man or of a young girl and if there is a lack of institutions for juvenile delinquents, that should be the object of our attention and I believe that in that case, chances are that those young people could be rehabilitated before it is too late.

Certain reasons were given these last few days that could have been of some help in the escapes we know about. We heard that the guards may have aired grievances which were not taken into consideration or whose examination was delayed for many months and that they do nothing to prevent such escapes because they do not care or shut their eyes to the behaviour of certain prisonners.

Mr. Speaker, unrest exists among prison guards, there is no doubt about that; it was mentioned on a few occasions. It was even discussed here in the House of Commons. If those men whose task is most difficult do not enjoy working conditions and wages comparable with those available elsewhere, I think we are making a gross mistake.

If a commission is appointed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to study this problem, it should start right there and would surely achieve something.

Anyway I think that the situation is serious and should be studied immediately. If a commission is appointed as stated by the Solicitor General, its reports and recommendations should come forthwith; otherwise the situation will get worse before measures are taken. I am not sure that the government is unable to take action now or that it has to wait for the report of such a commission.

I therefore ask most seriously to the Solicitor General to take action quickly in those cases. The individuals now at large are dangerous; those who have escaped from prison are dangerous individuals; they are a danger to the life of people who have to live in freedom and safety and also jeopardize the life and safety of those responsible for bringing them back to jail.

The adoption of some measures is essential within the shortest possible delays and if the Solicitor General wants to act he will certainly have his colleagues' support.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when I was appointed Solicitor General approximately five months ago I said that my principal goal would be to reduce and prevent crime in Canada, and that all the agencies and all the resources of the Solicitor General's department would be directed toward that goal.

While it is obvious that this is the goal of the RCMP, it is not always so obvious that it is also the goal of the Canadian Penitentiary Service and the National Parole Board. Charges are often made, and they were made tonight, that these agencies are too soft toward the criminal, that they often care more about the criminal than they do about the victim. This is not so, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian Penitentiary Service and the National Parole Board are concerned with rehabilitation; and rehabilitation means protection for the public, not being soft on crime.

I cannot emphasize too often that over 99 per cent of those sent to prison are sent for terminate sentences. That means that they are going to be released one day, whether we like it or not. Consequently, we have two choices. We can either put them in prison for five years, six years or whatever it may be, put them in a cell and, when the time is up, put them back on the street without any programs or any resocialization, and so on, or we can try to do something with them while we have them under our care. Mr. Speaker, this is what we are trying to do. But I admit that there are no perfect answers. Nobody has solved all the problems of the behavioural sciences; there are no dogmatic responses as to what should be done with a man in penitentiary in order to put him back on the street as a constructive or peaceful citizen. We are taking the best advice possible and we are trying to accomplish that result. We have had some successes and some failures.

With regard to parole, we have a choice. We can wait until the end of the man's sentence—and that end will come—and put him back on the street without supervision or assistance. He will probably be a more dangerous person and return to crime if we do that. On the other hand, with the use of parole we can let him out under supervision before the end of his sentence, with a continuing program and someone to help him if he needs help, whether he has an alcohol problem or whatever. That is what we are trying to do with parole. At the end of his sentence, his parole is finished.

The other day before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs the chairman of the Parole Board pointed out that approximately 82 per cent of those granted parole since the establishment of the Parole Board 14 years ago had completed their sentence without incident. There have been failures in 18 per cent of the cases. He pointed out that those on parole are earning incomes, paying taxes and supporting their families. On the other side of the picture, the man who is in prison is being supported to a great extent by the public. He is not earning any income and usually his family is being supported under a welfare program. This is what we are trying to do with parole. The criteria for parole are that the applicant must show the Parole Board two things: one, that he is rehabilitated; two, that he is no longer a danger to the public. The Parole Board tries to assess that question with all the reports and documents given to it. Last year there was a great reduction in the number of paroles. We reached the high point in paroles granted in Canada in 1971. In that year, including all types of parole, there were approximately 6,000. Last year there were approximately 4,800, a cutback of 1,200.

The Parole Board is a quasi-judicial body. It makes those decisions on its own. I do not have anything to say with regard to the granting or refusal of parole. We have something to say about the regulations pertaining to the Parole Act but not with regard to granting or refusing parole. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) spoke in terms of the Parole Board frustrating what the courts are trying to do. He made it appear as though the Parole Board is acting in an almost illegal way.

The judges of this country know that there is a Parole Board and a Parole Act. They know that a man is eligible for parole after serving one-third of his sentence, or four years, whichever is the lesser. They know that when they sentence a man, he will be applying for parole in a few years. Usually the judge gives a sentence with that fact in mind. As a matter of fact, if he is a wise judge he tries to give a sentence that is related to a rehabilitation program. The sentence is geared along those lines, to put the man back on the street after the sentence as a safer person.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta also said the members of the Parole Board were wishy-washy social workers. The chairman of the Parole Board was a judge of a court in Ontario. One of the most prominent members of the Parole Board, Mr. Gilbert, was a former chief of police in Quebec. There are members of the Parole Board who were policemen, judges and criminologists. They are not a group of wishy-washy people; they are a broadly-based group concerned about the protection of society. They are trying to put these people back on the street in a condition safer than when they went into penitentiary.

I want to say something about the temporary absence program. This program is also mentioned in the resolution. I remind hon. members that temporary absence is granted under section 26 of the Penitentiary Act. That act and that section were introduced into parliament the last time by a Conservative government. It was introduced by a former minister of justice, the Hon. Davie Fulton. This program was not passed into law by the Liberal party; it was passed by the Conservative party. It is interesting to note that when in power they did not use it very much. The Conservative party provided for this program in the law, but it became used on a wide basis only from 1966 to 1968. I am talking about the section that provides for temporary absence, without escort, for rehabilitation purposes. Before that it was used without escort for medical and humanitarian purposes, but rarely for rehabilitation purposes. There have been changes.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta spoke about allowing sex deviates out on parole. I admit there were some bad cases in 1970 and 1971. There was the very bad incident of the Head case in British Columbia where a dangerous sexual offender viciously murdered a young girl, the daughter of a prison guard. Following that incident, my predecessor and those in the Solicitor General's department took some very important steps. They ruled from that point on dangerous sexual offenders would no longer be eligible for temporary absence. They also ruled that in many other categories of offences, the waiting period before being eligible for temporary absence would be extended. The temporary absence program was tightened up considerably in June or July of 1972.

The former minister appointed a three-man commission under Mr. Justice Hugessen of Montreal to study all the problems related to temporary absence and parole. They spent the better part of last year travelling throughout the country, meeting the people in penitentiaries, parole people, experts in universities, and so on. They prepared a report on temporary absence and parole. I received that report just before Christmas. The department has been working on the report. Recently I presented a document to cabinet proposing further changes to the temporary absence and parole program in line with what was contained in the Speech from the Throne. That matter was before cabinet last week and will soon be ready to put before parliament.

Parliament has now agreed to go ahead with another study on temporary absence and parole. I tried to make public the report of Mr. Justice Hugessen a few months ago. Unfortunately, it was delayed by translation and publication. It is at the Queen's Printer at the present time. It has been there for a couple of months, waiting its turn behind all the other books to be published. I am not sure when it will finally be completed, but it will be made public before the committee reports. We have taken those steps.

We have been concerned about the failures of temporary absence and parole. We know the program is not perfect. In addition, a Senate committee has been working on this matter since last year. It was set up because of the concern about failures in temporary absence and parole. The committee was first under the chairmanship of Senator Prowse, and now Senator Goldenberg, a very prominent Senator. The committee has been receiving briefs from police departments, parole officials, the John Howard Society and many other groups in this country who are concerned about parole and temporary absence.

In the short time I have held this office I have recognized the fact that there are many shortcomings. There have been shortcomings in the security system. This was made evident in recent weeks. There are shortcomings in the program. We have staff problems, and so on. Things are far from perfect and I have been trying to do something about it, as did my predecessor.

This week there was the serious escape of five prisoners from a penitentiary that was designated as super-maximum. When I was a member of the penitentiary committee of this House in 1966 we visited this super-maximum, special correctional unit. We were told that nobody would ever escape from the institution. That was shown to be wrong this week, maybe not because of the hardware and the buildings but because of human failures. We considered those escapes to be very serious. Within 24 hours of their happening I decided to have an independent judicial inquiry under the Penitentiary Act. That inquiry has all the powers of the Inquiries Act.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister accept a question at this stage?

Mr. Allmand: As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, I only have 15 minutes. Perhaps the hon. member could ask his question when I have completed my speech.

● (2050)

I intend to make public the terms of reference of the inquiry. We were drafting them today. I went over them again tonight, but they are not completed. In general terms, this commission will look into the escapes from the special correctional unit—that is not the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary; the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is nearby. The special correctional unit, which is now called the correctional development centre, is the first job it will do. The second will be to look into the Cowansville escapes, and the third will be to examine security problems in Quebec generally.

Just before entering the House I was finally able to confirm that the man I wanted to head the commission has accepted this task. He is Mr. Justice Jacques Ducros, of Montreal. He was a Crown prosecutor in Montreal and prosecuted the FLQ cases, a man whose experience was either associate deputy minister or assistant deputy minister in the Quebec department of justice, a man with a very good reputation. I have trust in him and I am confident he will get the job done for me.

The second man is Pierre Jutras, who is director of the institution in Drumheller, Alberta. Mr. Jutras is considered one of the best directors in the penitentiary service. He has had experience in both maximum and medium security institutions. He is familiar with security; he is also familiar with progressive rehabilitation programs. I have not received confirmation from the third man yet; I am approaching a man from the armed services security branch and hope I can announce his name tomorrow.

Mr. Nielsen: How can it be a judicial inquiry, then?

Mr. Allmand: It is an inquiry under Mr. Justice Ducros and it will be run according to the Inquiries Act. I don't know what else you would call it.

Mr. Nielsen: An inquiry.

Mr. Allmand: It is an inquiry under the Inquiries Act. One of our great difficulties this year has developed without any warning, the serious overpopulation of our penal institutions. In answer to a question from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) today I pointed out that Dorchester penitentiary in the maritime provinces has taken in 100 new, maximum security inmates since the beginning of the year. This is a fantastic increase. I was told by the people in the penitentiary service there that an increase of this size has never before been known. Usually the increase in the penitentiary population is proportional to the increase in the general population. The general population has been increasing by about 4 per cent, but in British Columbia, for example, the penitentiary population went up by 18 per cent. The opposition put forward this motion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I am sorry, but I must interrupt the minister because his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand: I thank the House. I will conclude my remarks in another two minutes. We shall continue with the inquiry to which I have referred. As I said earlier, we have already conducted some serious, in-depth studies of parole and temporary absence. But I respect the wish of the House; if hon. members wish to study those matters again, we will co-operate with them and we look forward to their recommendations. I understand that this committee of the House will study security right across the country. That is a broader and more comprehensive study. I have suggested zeroing in, with the commission I am setting up, on security problems in Quebec because the escape problem has been more intense there than elsewhere recently. We will welcome the committee's suggestions.

There are members in the House who have worked with the penitentiaries. The committee will soon learn that when you work with penitentiaries, and especially maximum security penitentiaries, you are involved with a very difficult area. The men you work with are very difficult. They were difficult on the outside and they are very difficult when they are on the inside. There are no easy solutions. I will welcome any help the committee can give. We are in a minority situation here in parliament, and opposition members will have more seats on the committee than the government side.

Mr. Nielsen: Not at all.

Mr. Allmand: Any help they can give me and the department will be greatly appreciated, whether it relates to escapes, to overpopulation, to staff morale or whatever it may be. I shall sit here this evening and listen to the suggestions which are made. Tonight our speeches are limited to 15 minutes and I have dealt with this subject as quickly as I can. However, we will be appearing before the committee on our estimates, when we will be prepared to give hon. members as much information as we can and we shall assist them as much as we can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Morgan: May I ask the minister a question? Can he tell us whether under section 12 of the Penitentiary Act he will allow the inquiry to be a public inquiry, with all the evidence open to the public?

Mr. Allmand: I think that can be done, but my feeling is that it should be left to the discretion of the judge who chairs the commission. Obviously, if the commission is being told about a communications system within a penitentiary, it would not be in the public interest for such information to be made public. Making it public might alert the public to aspects of security within a penitentiary. That kind of evidence would have to be given in camera.

Mr. Nielsen: They obviously know all about it already.

Mr. Allmand: I expect the hon. member to take this matter seriously. I think he realizes that there are some hearings which could not be held publicly. But the judge will be in a position to decide, independently, what can and what cannot be heard in public. Hon. members will be able to make similar decisions about their own committee. I would not be surprised if they wished some of those hearings to be private.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, many people seem to be very surprised at the situation which has developed across our country as far as the administration of justice and the penal reform system are concerned. I do not think there is anything to be alarmed about, or at least to wonder about, because to my mind this is just the result of a new attitude which has been taken and of the new policy which has been promulgated with respect to penal reform. As we look at the situation today we find that the whole system is in a state of chaos. We can go back to the statement made in the House by the former solicitor general on October 7, 1971, when he said:

> We have decided from now on to stress the rehabilitation of the individual rather than the protection of society.

We find another statement which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of November 15, 1972:

> Pierre Emond, executive assistant to State Secretary Gérard Pelletier said, "I would not check the prison record of anyone. Most people go to prison by accident. Society is responsible for it, not them."

A great many law-abiding citizens are getting fed up with being blamed for everybody who goes to prison. They say that society has failed them, that somebody has failed them, and the result is that they have run afoul of the law and find themselves behind bars. But every man has a conscience of some kind. He knows right from wrong, as far as the broader principles of social living are concerned, and if he decides to take a contrary course and go against the accepted standards and the laws of the nation, he and he alone has to accept the responsibility and the blame for that decision. I, along with a great many others, am tired of being blamed for people being in jail.

I should like to give a brief quotation from former Judge Mulligan in Weekend magazine of November 25, 1972. He said:

● (2100)

> It is the law of the land, laid down by parliament and by the Supreme Court of Canada, that certain rules will be followed with respect to the treatment of criminals. First and foremost is the protection of society. Second, the deterrence of the particular individual from committing that particular crime again and the deterrence of others disposed to that crime, and third, the rehabilitation of the offender.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has indicated that his convictions follow something along the same lines, and he has given me his personal assurance that he is concerned about the safety and welfare of communities. But I believe there must be greater recognition of the fundamental principle that society must be protected. With regard to the rehabilitation of individuals who have transgressed the law, instead of turning them out without supervision for even short periods there have to be iron-clad guarantees that they are not going to perpetuate the crimes for which they have been incarcerated.

I realize there are those who say you cannot give iron-clad guarantees, that you cannot have an absolute assurance that there will not be an repetition of the offence. But I say that society has the right to expect it to the fullest possible extent, and that has not been so in the past several years. I think there has been an admission of this fact by speakers tonight. Therefore I call attention to this particular situation.

Since that fateful day when the former solicitor general announced this new government policy, the newspapers of this country have been filled with all manner of parole violations—murders, thefts, assaults and rapes—by dangerous criminals who have been let loose in the community in an exercise that is an experiment by the government. I do not believe that this is acceptable to the great majority of the Canadian people.

I speak as a representative of a community in a constituency where there are several penal institutions. For some time I have followed reports of court proceedings in the papers, and almost every week there have been reports of people who had been let out of jail on a pass and were unlawfully at large because they had not returned. We had a considerable number of violent and tragic crimes committed in our community by individuals who were out on pass or had been able to get out through lack of adequate security. This reached the point where the council of the municipality protested to the Solicitor General. The response of officials in charge of one of the institutions—the one to which I referred just now—said that the community was overreacting. I ask, how many rapes, how many thefts and how many other types of crime are we going to tolerate before we get stirred up and demand that something be done?

I suggest that because of laxity within the administration of the Department of the Solicitor General or the penitentiaries branch, which I suppose is an agency of the department, we are now facing a situation where people are alarmed. I even heard a very prominent resident of my community say that he had been giving serious consideration to moving out of the community, to moving out of the province altogether, because he was afraid for his family's welfare.

An hon. Member: Where would he go?

Mr. Mackasey: Send him to Verdun.

Mr. Patterson: It is suggested he be sent to Verdun. I mention this fact because I have another news article here which reads:

> A spokesman for Solicitor General Warren Allmand said today a three-man inquiry commission will be established this week to investigate penitentiary security in Quebec.

This is not only needed in Quebec; it is needed right across the country.

Mr. Mackasey: Verdun is in Quebec.

Mr. Patterson: I realize that. I have talked to people who have worked in institutions in various provinces and they have presented me with a picture. Some say that very soon there will be no one in jail because guards are not allowed to exercise any discipline, they cannot fulfil their responsibilities, and they are given instructions not to rock the boat. I suggest this is a strange way to protect our society.

I do not think I have to draw on any illustrations tonight to indicate what is taking place as a result of the actions of the Parole Board. The chairman of the board has made a spirited defence of his organization and stewardship. But the people of this country are not satisfied when they see people out on parole engaging in violence and in crime, shooting people in cold blood, and so on. If I had time I could refer to one case, that of Robert Leroy Barber, but unfortunately I do not have time to go into detail.

One of the things that concerns the people of Canada is the question of security. Reference has been made to the Head case, a prisoner who during his last escapade—I say his last, but I do not know whether it will be his last because possibly he will be out again one of these days—brutally murdered Tanya Bush in the province of British Columbia. Not long after that, when his trial came up a man was transferred from Dorchester penitentiary, in New Brunswick, to testify at the trial. At his request he was placed in a medium security institution, and after two days he was allowed loose for about seven hours. He broke into a trailer home, tied up the husband and forced the wife to drive him to the city. On the way he sidetracked the car and raped the woman. All this by a man who was supposed to be confined under strict maximum security conditions and at whose own request was placed in a less secure institution!

How can these things take place? I guess it is like the other things that take place, such as at Cowansville where prisoners walked out of jail, and the latest incident where they walked out of one of our super-duper maximum security prisons. We find these things happening right across the board. I suggest it is the government's past policy, a policy that has not been corrected to this day, that has allowed a great many of these incidents to occur.

Last October the warden of Millhaven maximum security prison in Kingston stated that it was impossible to control 365 tough criminals housed in the prison. He said he had been stripped of disciplinary power by incompetent or inexperienced officials. Then he said:

● (2110)

> This has not only made controls of the inmate population impossible . . . but has almost completely destroyed the staff morale.

I can understand why. In any event, someone has suggested he got out but I do not think he used the same method as others have used. In this connection I want to mention that I have in my possession a series of letters from individuals and groups of individuals in my constituency who are tremendously concerned. For instance, I have a petition signed by about 650 people living in the Agassiz area in which is located the Mountain prison and another institution not far away.

I also have communications from the district of Kent and the city of Hope. These have the backing of the municipalities and suggest that the priorities expressed in parliament by the former solicitor general should be reversed and that prime consideration be given to the protection of the public rather than the rehabilitation of inmates. They go on to refer to parole, passes and lack of security and call upon the government to take action to remedy the situation before it gets completely out of hand.

I have a letter here from the Public Service Alliance of Canada presenting the same argument with reference to the Kaiser case, the man who escaped from prison and broke into a trailer. I have another communication from the Mount Cheam ratepayers' association expressing concern for the safety of women and children in the vicinity of federal prisons. It reads in part:

> We have also expressed our concern regarding the pay and conditions of prison guards and the conditions the RCMP have to work under in the Agassiz area.

These are documents received from concerned citizens. I know that some will say I am not in favour of rehabilitation. We listened to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) denunciate the suggestion of my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. (Mr. Reynolds). He said that the biblical standard is one of compassion and mercy. He then called upon the Solicitor General to be tough and ruthless when dealing with prison guards and persons in responsible positions. He cannot have it both ways. The Solicitor General has said, in respect of dangerous criminals, that they do not let them out. All I can suggest is that they still find some way or another of getting out.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, may I express my regret that the minister is in the difficulty he now faces, and also my sympathy regarding the advice he has received. I suggest it is not much different from that received by his predecessor which led to many of the problems the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) now faces.

I suggest we must first get rid of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries. He was chosen for political reasons. He has been, and obviously still is, incompetent as the administrator of penitentiary services. I say that because I have had experience over a number of years with the penitentiary system. I have read some of the history of this service. A few years ago when Alan McLeod was appointed commissioner of the penitentiary service it was taken for granted by most guards that when a judge sentenced a man to a definite period of imprisonment he was to be kept in prison for that definite period. It was felt that after he had been let out we had strong police forces who would return him to jail if he did not live up to his parole conditions. Many police forces hounded these men to the point that it was almost impossible for them to remain out of prison.

Over the years we have been enlightened as to the penitentiary service. Schools have been established to train guards and to give them assistance in handling some of the problems that arise between guards and staff. Over the years we have changed the personnel in our penitentiaries and in my opinion we were reaching the point of developing a fairly progressive system.

The minister in his remarks paid careful attention to the Parole Board. I suggest that everybody knows the chairman of that board has no guts. Let me remind hon. members of the Tanya Bush case and the case of the two little boys from Montreal, or Toronto who were murdered by released prisoners. Whenever such a thing happens, the Parole Board tightens its regulations and we find there are no more paroles. This board will not take a chance.

The criticism made today by several hon. members was in respect of the construction of penitentiaries. I remember visiting the maximum penitentiary at St. Vincent de Paul some years ago. It was built like a dog kennel. There was wire over the top of the cages on which one could walk to see what the prisoners inside were doing. It was originally so bad that the recreational area was fenced, with the prisoners inside and guards, with dogs, circling the outside. That sort of treatment was obviously so bad it had to be discontinued and that penitentiary was changed.

I do not know why the new commissioner was appointed and I am not aware of his qualifications. I do know many employees of the service are highly dedicated and competent men, but many are incompetent. I suggest there should have been an inquiry conducted after the riot that took place in Kingston some time ago, and the result of that inquiry should have been made public. With the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) I visited Millhaven soon after the transfer of prisoners from Kingston. We found that almost every prisoner had been beaten unmercifully, and we were told by the then solicitor general--

Mr. Allmand: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. member would not want to mislead the House by his suggestion that there should have been an inquiry following the Kingston riot. There was an inquiry conducted by Mr. Swackhammer, and his report was made public a month ago.

Mr. Peters: It was made public in the same way that other reports have been made public. I have in mind the report of the department in respect of the St. Vincent de Paul riot. I read that report, but only parts of it were made public.

In any event, there was no justification for those guards to beat up the prisoners. We do not believe in that kind of treatment in our society. When two Members of Parliament visited that penitentiary they found that the rules had been changed. Members of Parliament can no longer visit penitentiaries and those two members were told to leave. I suggest to the Solicitor General that he should re-establish the procedure of allowing Members of Parliament to visit penitentiaries as a right. I am sure this procedure will result in the obtaining of information which would allow the Solicitor General to correct the situation before riots could develop.

● (2120)

Members of Parliament for years had visited penitentiaries. In my opinion they did a fairly good job. They knew what was going on and they interviewed the prisoners. What happened in this last case? I am told that Coco Mercier, who was to be on trial for a number of days, went before the court and pleaded guilty to the murder of two persons. Why? Because he wanted to go back to the penitentiary that night and not be kept in the jail in Montreal. That was the only way he could get out. He knew this some time beforehand.

The Solicitor General spoke about security and lines of communication. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) laughed when the minister said that. There are all kinds of lines of communications. Many of them are outside the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General. I have probably received more mail from prisoners, through unofficial channels, than through official channels. I am sure the hon. member for Yukon, who has been interested in this field and has had some experience with inmates, has also received more communications through informal rather than formal channels. I am sure this is also true of other members.

Let us look at the case of the criminal whom the previous speaker wanted to mention. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, when the riot took place in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. The leader of that riot appeared before a judge who is now a member of this House, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), who gave him a sentence of one day, when other people were receiving sentences of 14 years, because this involved damage to public property. In this case the judge knew the man had been badly beaten. This man was one of the most dangerous criminals. However, he has now been out of jail for a number of years. He is a businessman and employs 25 people today. You will not see him in prison again.

Another person involved in the same riot and who received a sentence of 14 years is out now operating an organization in Hull for the benefit of other ex-prisoners. He has helped 900 ex-convicts over the last four or five years. Surely society's responsibility is to get these people back into society. They have done something in opposition to society, and if they can be rehabilitated the effort should be made to rehabilitate them.

I think, however, that when arrangements can be made such as those made in respect of Coco Mercier we had better look at the question of morale in the penitentiary service. I suggest that the morale must be pretty bad in most of these institutions. Nothing is done about the guards who beat prisoners. There have been occasions when guards have formed a line through which the prisoners must pass. I was there the day after one such occasion and saw the bruises. The prisoners were beaten as they walked down the line. The solicitor general of the day covered it up. This practice should not be covered up; it should be dealt with, because all the guards in that institution who believed they could assist in rehabilitating prisoners in the institution obviously knew they would not be able to do so when the solicitor general of the day was willing to cover up the situation, as were most other people.

I understand we are to pass this resolution. This means that a committee will be established to investigate the penitentiary service in Canada. This committee which is to be established is not to have the right to travel. I warn the Solicitor General that it may be difficult to bring to Ottawa as witnesses all the people concerned from Stoney Mountain, Dorchester or from any of the penitentiaries in the Montreal or Kingston areas. It seems to me it would be wise to have the committee travel rather than to have witnesses travel to Ottawa. It seems to me that this has been an ill-thought out way of trying to resolve the major problems in the penitentiary service.

If we should reach the stage of agreeing with the previous member—and I have listened to him making the same speech for many years—then we will have reached the point where the only solution will be for the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) to build more penitentiaries to contain these people. I suggest, however, that that is not what the ordinary Canadian wants. I think the ordinary Canadian wishes us to embark upon a modern form of penology so that we rehabilitate into society as many people as possible in the shortest possible time.

The building of penitentiaries such as the maximum security one we have established in Montreal is a disgrace to an enlightened society. It goes back to the dungeon days. I do not believe it accomplishes anything. If I should lock up my dog, who is very quiet, for two or three weeks, he may even bite me, let alone everybody else afterwards. That is exactly what happens in respect of many of these prisoners. That most dangerous man in Canada, Coco Mercier, because of the action of a member of this House in another office has turned out to be a good citizen and in my opinion will never return to any of our institutions. This is a credit to the man who had compassion and provided justice in that instance. This is the type of case I have seen many, many times since I have been interested in this field.

I plead with the minister to give consideration to this question. Mr. Fulton, who was minister of justice at that time, said it was a British right for any Member of Parliament, at any reasonable hour, to visit any pentitentiary. The previous solicitor general believed we did not have that right. I suggest to the minister that he can help himself and the department if, when these complaints are made, Members of Parliament have an opportunity to look into some of them. It may be a way of permitting prisoners to let off steam.

I hope the committee will take another look at the type of investigation it is to undertake. I plead with the members of the committee and everybody else not to merely criticize penal reform and the mistakes which have been made, and not to let the news media draw attention only to those things which are bad in our penal system, but to give credit to some of the things which are good and which are of benefit to society.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, originally it was not my intention to participate in this debate. Frankly, I am not in favour of the motion, but I believe it will be adopted and so be it. I think the tack taken by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is the right one. That is the position I wish to support. I think the Solicitor General has set out well what is in fact the policy of the government, of his department and of the penitentiary service.

I was very disturbed—I am not sure whether I was angry or sad—to hear the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) tell us about the 650 names on a petition. He quoted the comments made by a warden of a penitentiary who apparently is no longer a warden. We do not know why he made these statements and we do not have an opportunity to question him. I think the response of the hon. member was a cowardly one to the petition he received. I think that rather than quote one or two sentences he should go to the jails, talk to the prisoners and guards and find out how difficult the situation is. He should go into the courts and find out what the courts are doing, because that, unfortunately, has been the failure of many people who consider themselves leaders of society but do not bother to find out what the situation really is and how difficult the problem is.

● (2130)

Probably the most notorious case where a mistake was made in the past occurred in Sarnia. One gets the impression that no mistakes have ever been made in the past, but "Red" Ryan fooled a lot of people. Every one thought he had been rehabilitated. He did all the things that had been asked of him by the padre in the prison and the people who were supervising, so they let him out. But it was not too long before he held up a liquor store and killed a policeman. I suggest that that crime got so much publicity that it had the effect of setting back for many years the rehabilitation process for prisoners. If we focus on that kind of dramatic incident, as I am afraid the opposition party seems to be doing tonight, we will be doing a grave disservice not only to those whom we are trying to rehabilitate but to Canadian society in general.

We are not to blame. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East said we are taking the attitude that society is to blame. We say that no individual has to accept the major portion of that responsibility. But there are some members of our community who have to bear responsibility and who turn the other cheek or do not look at what the situation. They create such an environment that an individual finds the only outlet he has, in effect, is to lash out at society and go to prison. Canadian society says: Let us give this man or woman another chance.

I agree with the leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis) when he chastised the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). Let the judge make the decision; he should make the determination. The judge is concerned with whether the individual is guilty or innocent of a particular crime, and then he has to make a judgment. On what does he base his judgment? He turns to the social worker and the probation officer to find out what kind of sentence the particular individual should receive. I suggest we should let the judge make the decision.

The hon. member suggested that we should go straight to the police and forget about the judge, and if the man is guilty that is the end of it. That would be a retrograde step. I do not think the hon. member recognizes this, but that is what it would be. He seems to be trying to have it both ways, and you cannot have it both ways. You cannot talk about rehabilitation of the criminal element in our society, the toughest and most dangerous people, and then expect that there will be no mistakes. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East wants a lead pipe guarantee. I suggest, with respect, that that cannot be done with people in our community who have already broken the law. There are going to be some mistakes, there have been some mistakes and there will be some in the future.

[Mr. Cullen.]

The Solicitor General made one of his best speeches. He presented the situation very cogently. I hope the hon. member for Fraser Valley East will have a few hundred copies of that speech printed and will send them back to the people who signed the petition to which he referred. He should not just climb on their bandwagon and say to them, "You are right; we have to do something about this." He should at least give the other side of the issue. He should take a strong and courageous approach, and not climb on the bandwagon of those 650 people. Let him send them the speech of the Solicitor General.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta is already calling for resignations and naming names. I suggest that he is prejudging the issue. I wonder why he wants to support this motion at all. He has already made up his mind. He has made his determination that we must have the study. I think that, also, is the wrong approach. We have a good penitentiary service and a good parole system, but no one has ever suggested it is perfect. We know that mistakes have been made and will be made in the future. However, we have an obligation not to give the impression that criminals are running all over the country and that we are in a dangerous situation.

I think the tendency of those who are criticizing the system today is that they are highlighting what the press is bringing out, the dramatic incidents and mistakes. I suggest to the hon. member for Fraser Valley East and others who are criticizing the system, that when they send copies of the Solicitor General's speech they should also send some of the statistics that we have heard, such as that there has been an 82 per cent rate of success. We also heard the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) indicate the success that has been enjoyed by an individual who was a dangerous man in a maximum security prison and who later helped some 900 ex-convicts. This is the kind of person we want to get back into society. We want to rehabilitate them and get them to support the community. We hope they will help us with our penitentiary and rehabilitation service.

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, the other day a man called me to discuss the problem that we have before us tonight. He said, "We need a new minister". My reply to him was, "I do not think we do. I think the minister may need a new broom." The minister has every right to the confidence, support and respect of the members of this House. He certainly has mine. But I do believe that he will have to initiate decisions and actions that will end the possibility of the kind of thing that has brought to a head the issue that we are discussing tonight. There will have to be a cleansing of the administration of the system over which he presides.

We do not quarrel with the system. Indeed, as has been pointed out by earlier speakers, when the Conservative party was in office it had much to do with the introduction of the system in terms of establishing the National Parole Board and, indeed, authorizing temporary leaves of absence. We agree with the system. What we cannot agree with is the way in which it is often being administered. That is why we believe it is in the interests of the people who are subject to the system, and in the interest of the welfare of Canadian society as a whole that parliament take a good, long, serious, probing look at the way the penitentiary system and the Parole Board are being administered and, as well, the way in which the leave system is being administered.

I take it from what I have heard tonight that this resolution will receive the unanimous support of the House. However, after listening to some of the speakers I am somewhat bewildered by the unanimity of that support, because some speakers addressed the House in such a way that one realizes they do not seem terribly impressed with the necessity for this kind of investigation. In fact, they seem to regret the fact that the point has been raised at all. But I would suggest that the hon. member who has introduced this resolution deserves the commendation of the House for bringing it forcibly and clearly to the attention of parliament and the public. He should be commended for giving us the opportunity to participate in this debate which is of such concern to every responsible citizen throughout this land.

The reason it is a matter of great concern is not simply because of the breaking out from Laval of five prisoners over the weekend. That, surely, was the last straw that the public could bear. It was, surely, the final incident in a long series of events which taken together have so weakened public confidence in the way the penitentiary system is being administered that the kind of debate we are having tonight is the least that parliament could do, and the kind of investigation proposed in this resolution is the least action we could undertake.

As I say, it is the last in a long series of events of a like kind. For example, when we think of the way in which the temporary leave of absence program has been administered, we have to look at how time after time prisoners have been released on temporary leave and have not come back. Some prisoners released without escort have taken the opportunity, not as a chance to adjust to society but to return to organized crime.

● (2140)

In March of this year alone we saw one prisoner allowed out to look for a job escaping his escort in a department store in Vancouver. In Sault Ste. Marie we read of a man who was allowed out to visit his home and he did not go back to prison. In Joyceville we read of a man who was allowed out to attend a prayer meeting. Indeed, he must have thought this was an answer to his prayer. Anyway, he did not come back. Then we read of a man allowed out to attend a funeral parlour, which it may be said has a certain function in covering up, and he did not come back. This sort of thing goes on and on. The minister has admitted to this House and to the committee that the system is not perfect. We agree, but we ask him to take those steps that will lead to reducing the number of prisoners who, without escort, are allowed out of prison even though they may have a record of crimes of violence.

Similarly, with respect to the administration of the parole program we are only asking that this program be reviewed in such a way that we can take a serious look at the number of people being granted parole, who have received parole not for the first time, possibly not for the second time but have received a number of paroles and have shown a singular lack of desire to take their parole responsibilities seriously.

We are asking the minister to take a look at parole so that this record will be changed. We are simply asking that that program and the penitentiary system be administered with responsibility. We are not asking for any kind of punitive policy. If that was the policy of the penitentiary service in times past, certainly we would not wish to return to it. But we would not, and could not accept any suggestion that we ought to allow a continuation of the kind of policy which has brought us to this situation tonight. That is what we want to change.

Believe me, Mr. Speaker, it is in the interests of a rehabilitation program that we make changes in the way the system is being administered, because if the public is to have confidence in the kind of reform and rehabilitation program to which the minister is committed and to which parliament as a whole is committed in terms of passing the budget necessary to maintain that program, then the public is entitled to have a penitentiary service that is administered with due respect for security. That is what we are asking. We suggest that once the public loses confidence in the administration of the penitentiary service because of the way in which this kind of escape is allowed to take place and these violations of the temporary leave of absence program are allowed to take place—these things which negligence has allowed to take place—then we cannot expect people to have any confidence in the leadership and the direction of the rehabilitation program.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have made it abundantly clear that our concern is not in any way to minimize the need for a healthy, responsible rehabilitation program; that our concern is to see the program carried out with common sense and prudence so that public confidence will be maintained.

I hope that when the committee is established it will have the opportunity, as mentioned by a previous speaker, of visiting penal institutions and talking with the custodial staff, and indeed with the inmates and with anybody else who has testimony and evidence to offer, so that a report will come back to this House along with recommendations that will tighten up the program to the extent that it is loose, that will fill in the holes to the extent that they are there, and that will recommend changes in the program to the extent that they are necessary so that public confidence can once again be placed in the penitentiary service.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the events of recent weeks cannot be laid at the door of the present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). He has brought to his office a dedication, a spirit and a sincerity that have won the support of the members of this House and of Canadians generally. When he stated that the events of recent weeks had made him feel flabbergasted and disgusted, I could quite agree with him. Indeed, the guards at Cowansville and at St. Vincent de Paul make the Keystone cops look like Scotland Yard.

It is time we took a different approach to the problems facing us today. When a young man is charged, convicted and sentenced, two obligations face society. One is to hold the inmate in custody for the period of his sentence, subject to remission and/or parole. The second is to prepare the individual for permanent return to community living as a law-abiding and contributing citizen.

With regard to the first obligation, to hold the inmate in custody for the period of his sentence, penal institutions over the last 50 years have not changed from the times that Dickens described in England. However, back in 1962 the Conservative party attempted to make changes with regard to penal institutions and their design. To the credit of Mr. Fulton, moneys were set aside for a ten-year period to build institutions which would not be a repeat of the past but would be more modern in design and in comfort. We have taken a step in that direction. The $200 million that was set aside for that program has not been used; in fact, less than $100 million of it has been used. It is time the government undertook a new initiative with regard to continuing the building program that was launched in those days.

The second problem of preparing an individual for permanent return to community living as a law-abiding and contributing citizen is a very difficult one with which to contend. It is difficult to rehabilitate and reform people to become law-abiding and contributing citizens if after we convict them we place them in an institution which deprives them of many things, which takes them away from their family, their community and employment and isolates them in an abnormal society. The lack of opportunity for an inmate to practice decision-making worsens the problem.

To the credit of the solicitors general of the past ten years, they have attempted to solve the second problem with regard to rehabilitation. They embarked upon a program which had the support of most Canadians. They developed programs with regard to prerelease centres. They allowed visits for the family of an inmate, with a condition of privacy. They developed a permanent advisory board. They developed a committee of eight psychiatrists to study the particular problems in that field. They provided additional medical services. They set up inmate committees whereby the inmates could relate their problems to the officials. They corrected the correspondence problem whereby when a letter was sent to an inmate it was read by officials before being given to him. A style of haircut was adopted which did not make the person look like a criminal. Identity numbers were removed from uniforms and the living unit concept was developed as well as the cafeteria system. These are some of the accomplishments for which the government of the day and the solicitors general of the past can take credit.

Mr. Speaker, that is a long list of reforms in connection with the rehabilitation of inmates. These are steps in the right direction towards restoring the dignity of an individual which will enable him to take his place in the community after he has served his sentence. In the past few years the government has attempted to develop an educational program. Some of the inmates have been given the opportunity to upgrade their education and some have received university training. There has been a better development of trade training and this is to the credit of the present government.

There have been mistakes, Mr. Speaker, and I guess the reason we are having this debate tonight is that some of the mistakes have come to the attention of the public. I agree with the Solicitor General's (Mr. Allmand) view of the Parole Board. They have had an 82 per cent success rate and that is to their credit. I agree also with him that the composition of the board is a fair mix of members of the bench and members from the social sciences, but it may be that we have to strengthen the criteria used when a person is released on parole. On the question of the temporary weekend passes, there have been mistakes and there will be mistakes in the future because we are dependent on human factors in making these decision.

The Commissioner of Penitentiaries gave his evidence before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs this morning and he said that one of the things that would be done, in fact was being done now, would be to give more protection at the perimiter of penitentiaries. That made me hope that we were not taking an approach that is too harsh. I agree that we have had problems and that maybe more protection at the perimiter is necessary, but I had hoped he would concentrate on some of the more fundamental problems that may arise, those that the Solicitor General set forth tonight, such as staff morale. There is a gap between the custodial officials and the administration officials in the penitentiaries across the country. Many feel that this problem has to be resolved. The idea of having a custodial official as a warden is not acceptable in my view. I think we should have a person who not only embraces the custodial view but embraces the rehabilitation and training concepts that are necessary to solve the problem.

We in the New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker, welcome the debate that is taking place tonight. We welcome the motion that has been agreed upon for the committee to study in depth the matter of security, the matter of parole and the matter of temporary weekend passes. I hope that the committee will travel across the country and visit the different institutions, not only to see the physical aspects of the institutions but to talk to the officials and the inmates and get their response with regard to the problems that face us. We should not despair because we have made a few mistakes, Mr. Speaker. We have to continue our approach to rehabilitation and we have to take the necessary steps to tighten security so that the public are protected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, rehabilitation is the magic word in the Solicitor General's department. The penitentiary service appears to be more interested in having the criminal's fears allayed, his hostilities washed away and preparing him to put up with a society that failed him than it appears to be in punishing the criminal or protecting the public. This would be a laudable idea if it worked but it has been tried and the crime rate continues to climb.

In British Columbia we have the Agassiz correctional work camp and the William Head minimum security prison, both about 12 years old. The idea was that the "best" criminals would be allowed to go to these institutions. They would know that they had one chance to visit these places and that if they misbehaved in any way they would be sent to a more secure and more unpleasant prison. Prisoners were allowed to work in the community, even take box lunches and wear ordinary clothes. Even the usual prison guards were replaced with men from the community who were called correctional officers. But there were not enough in the "best" category of prisoners because the minor criminals and first offenders were in the provincial jails. It takes a two-year sentence to send you to a penitentiary. In addition, the correctional officers would not stay in their jobs because of the lack of response from inmates and because many guards were attacked or threatened by inmates. All of this happened in spite of the near luxury conditions of diet, entertainment, passes and so on.

The easy prisons in British Columbia have all been failures. Statistics have shown that escapes and failures to return from leave are so numerous that local municipal councils have asked that leaves be stopped, only to be told that they were over-reacting. Only 36 per cent of inmates in British Columbia in March, 1972, were in maximum security prisons, while over half of them were in medium security prisons. Medium security means a wire fence which can be climbed easily and minimum security means no fence at all.

The Solicitor General spoke today of the increased population of the penitentiaries and of the inability of his department to obtain another site for the 100-year old British Columbia penitentiary at New Westminster. This is a maximum security institution and New Westminister does not want it any more. Has the Solicitor General wondered why nobody else wants these institutions, either?

Let me tell you of a correctional seminar which I attended as an observer in Vancouver just two years ago. The story that unfolded was this. The city of Mission which suffered economically since it ceased to be the western terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway line, reluctantly agreed to be the home of a new federal prison. There was to be a small minimum security area, some medium security and a large maximum security building with perhaps 400 inmates. The land was cleared, the preliminary plans were prepared, and municipal services were installed at great cost to the government and to the city of Mission. In fact, the idea of the new prison came to be welcomed by Mission City as an economic shot in the arm. It must be illustrative of the government's planning that the participants in this seminar succeeded in persuading the federal government to stop construction of the Mission prison, leaving the people of Mission holding the bag. They are still holding the bag as far as I know. They had their economic hopes dashed and were left with an uncompleted eyesore upon which a few prefabricated buildings have been placed.

● (2200)

This group persuaded the federal government that increased maximum security prisons were not needed because of the new rehabilitative programs that were in effect. Now, the present Solicitor General tells us he is having difficulty handling the increase in prison population. Is it any wonder that the government is having difficulty finding a home for the prison to replace the British Columbia penitentiary at New Westminister? The government cannot be relied upon to keep its plans or its prisoners under control. In short, the government has proved that its prisons are not good neighbours and the people of British Columbia do not want bad neighbours.

It is clearly time that a proper investigation was held. I give my urgent support to this motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds).

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should not like to let slip the chance to take part in such an important debate, on a subject which is causing great concern and anxiety to the population.

Earlier today, in the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, I expressed to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) not only our sympathy but also our compassion for the problems he is up against, but I also reminded him that, while we understand his problems, we expect a lot of him. We expect him to give an account of himself and to explain to the people what has caused this series of escapes.

I say this by way of introduction and I should like to add immediately that this series of incidents, especially considering that there have been 46, I believe, this year in the province of Quebec, 18 in the last few months, and five this week, seems to me to be a tragedy rich in implications.

It is a tragedy which can first of all expose to ridicule the administration of justice in general and, secondly, lead to scorn for public institutions and penal institutions in particular. This series of escapes has the further disadvantage of undermining the morale of the officers and guardians of the peace. Another disadvantage is that they frustrate the police who, day after day, attempt to carry out their duty in the face of opposition, and whose sole consolation sometimes is seeing those they have managed to put in prison get out as quickly as they went in.

The brunt of this tragedy is the growing concern of the public, at a time when the population of Quebec in particular sees murderers who have been condemned to life imprisonment, who have managed to escape once and commit other murders, being condemned anew, only to escape again today. Let us hope that they will commit no more crimes!

And finally, Mr. Speaker, the true meaning of this tragedy lies in the fact that there is real danger in jeopardizing positive progress achieved in the field of rehabilitation because the gravity of these developments might blur the prospects of rehabilitation held forth to the people by dedicated people who strove towards a better future for inmates.

I confess that I was not free from emotion when, a few minutes ago, I heard the hon. member for Timiskiming (Mr. Peters), as an example of rehabilitation, recall the case of the young man who appeared before me in 1963 or early in 1964 following the St. Vincent de Paul riot. I can still see him stand there, a strapping fellow with a record of armed robbery and all kinds of things, with a smashed jaw and a bruised face. He had been badly battered by the guards, and I told him that his punishment had been severe enough to preclude the court, in the name of society, adding to it. That fellow, in spite of his experience, standing before the court, broke into tears and swore to the young presiding judge that he would not have to regret his attitude. Today it is a happy moment for me to learn from the hon. member for Timiskaming that my forbearance bore fruit, that one can still believe in rehabilitation, that one can still believe that there exists in a human being, even the most corrupt one, a potential that deserves respect.

I fear, Mr. Speaker, that those escapes might bring about among the people the feeling that we should put an end to that rehabilitation attempt in our penitentiaries.

And in concluding those introductory remarks, I say it is essential for the minister to reassure the public, to preserve and protect justice which is being undermined by that event, to protect our institutions. For that reason it is important that the minister tell us the truth on those escapes.

It is an easy thing for public men to pass on the responsibilities to boards of inquiry, to compel judges to arrive at conclusions which they themselves could have drawn had they had enough courage to face facts. And I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is not by creating a judicial inquiry which will have to last weeks and months that we shall know the truth about that.

I respect the choice of the minister who announced a while ago that Mr. Justice Ducros of the Superior Court, had been appointed for that duty. I will not make more comments about that but I still believe that we Members of Parliament, assembled in a special committee, as was recommended this morning, would be able to obtain immediately the facts, hear witnesses, experts and come to conclusions.

However, I would have thought that the minister would have told the House and the people today about the written instructions that were given to guards and the oral instructions that were repeated to them. Were there or not any suspensions since the Sunday incidents? We should consider particularly the fact that the same guards might still be on duty as well as the director of the penal institution who, so it seems, is said to have been warned of the escape plans by the director of the Quebec Police Force. And yet the same director is still in office. I know that you should not prejudge and condemn someone without even hearing him, but it seems to me that to reassure our fellow citizens the suspension of the people involved would certainly have been appreciated.

I am surprised that we do not have yet the evidence that should have been collected over the last three days by the RCMP officers. It would have been quite simple for the minister to table in this House the affidavits and the witness evidence so that we might know where we stand instead of having to rely on the minister's word, on press reports or simply on hearsay.

This morning I pointed out to the minister an enlighting experience which was the escape of Lucien Rivard in 1964 or 1965. In this case, the man was far less dangerous than those currently at large. Perhaps he was more dangerous for the safety of some politicians of the time but, as an individual, there was no risk that he might commit murder.

[Mr. Wagner.]

And yet what happened? Within 48 hours after the escape—I remember this affair because I was responsible for it—overnight, we had interrogated all witnesses, obtained affidavits, collected evidence, seized revolvers and prepared everything so that the next day everything was available to the House. For three days, in reply to questions arising rightfully from everywhere, the House and the Canadian public was informed and we were not required to refer the whole matter to a royal commission which would have convened months later.

That is why I feel that swift, accelerated justice can, while reassuring the concerned public, give satisfaction to the people. That is why, with my colleagues, I was happy to accept the motion for the institution of a special committee of enquiry of the House. I believe we should proceed quickly. Some of the information obtained to date worries us deeply. We have noticed, in particular, that two of the prisoners at large were in the past suspected of FLQ activity and that, at one point, when the Cross incident occurred, those gentlemen were listed among the prisoners which the FLQ wanted departed to Cuba. It seems to me those things should be looked into without delay.

I wonder why, for instance, reports on inquiries into previous escapes involving those same persons might not be tabled in the House. If we were to study those reports and establish who helped or took in the criminals after their first escape, it might be easier for us to find out what the facts are.

I convey this information to the House and make those suggestions in all modesty, as my contribution to this debate. I say to the Solicitor General that, while we understand his problems, the fact remains that in our present political and social system, the members of the cabinet are answerable for the actions of the civil servants. This solidarity and responsibility is one thing from which there is no escape, and I urge the Solicitor General to take good note of my observations, as well as all the speeches made in this House. I will be pleased to co-operate, that justice might be done to all.

• (2210)

[English]

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief, because most of what I had intended to say has already been said very ably by speakers who have gone before me.

All of us in this House who are concerned with the protection of the public have a very special responsibility. That responsibility is to refrain from fanning the flames of passion over the escapes and the failures in the parole system. If we are genuinely concerned about the protection of the public, we must endeavour to see that the public is ready to support a decent system of rehabilitation. We are doing public protection no service at all if we play on the fears of the public as the media are inclined to do.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said that in any good program of penal reform and rehabilitation, mistakes are inevitable. Of course, if that were the only test we must have one heck of a program, because there have been a number of monumental mistakes. My hon. friend from Broadview said the program had received public support. He used the past tense. My overwhelming concern is that public support for what was basically a sound program is fast disappearing, and will continue to diminish unless we can lessen the number of errors which are occurring. I shall not dwell on those errors. In this party we think that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has been doing a good job and we wish him well. What we are sorry to see is that some of his officials have been letting him down. I think we can all congratulate him on his candour and on his honesty; those are very refreshing qualities in this House.

It seems to me that the Parole Board has over-reacted and that every time an incident occurs the cutback is so overwhelming the jail population grows, and when there are so many people in jail there are bound to be escapes. Inconsistency on the part of the Parole Board has led to some of the difficulties we face. I think there should be consultation on the part of the parole boards with respect to inmates in the penitentiaries. Before they let someone with a psychopathic personality free, there should be consultation with other prisoners, because a man who is able to "con" a number of people might not have been able to "con" his fellow inmates who often have good judgment of the people around them. There should also be consultation with prison guards who are often in a position to make an astute assessment of the characters of inmates. Much of the good work of rehabilitation is being destroyed as a result of the errors which have occurred.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) has placed a good resolution before the House; it is one which our party will support. Like him, I have had an opportunity to go through the B.C. Penitentiary. It is an institution which should be torn down. It is not rehabilitating anybody. We cannot operate a civilized and humane system when we hold people in cages. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) told us about all the problems, but I do not recall his offering any solution to them. The solution is a decent and humane system of rehabilitation because, let us not forget, these people are going to enter society again.

The last question I intend to deal with concerns the psychopathic inmate. Too little attention has been paid to this question. The studies which have been going on in British Columbia have not been funded, despite requests to the Solicitor General. This is too bad, because there are very real problems involved in the treatment of a few inmates who are not capable of being rehabilitated. Perhaps the reason the system is encountering failures is that it has been operating on the basis of a belief that everyone is capable of rehabilitation. I do not accept this. A good penal system must pay attention to the psychopathic criminal who cannot be released. We must study this problem, if necessary at the elementary level, so as to try to identify people with this kind of behaviour. Much work is needed in this area.

As I say, I welcome the resolution and support it. I hope the justice committee will be given the opportunity to travel and to visit penal institutions, and particularly be allowed to speak to inmates, because as much can be learned from them as from anybody.

Penitentiaries

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say at the outset that I welcome the fact that a parliamentary committee is going to look into the operation of the penitentiary service and its many facets. There have been in the past a number of royal commissions on this subject. There was the report of the Archambault commission of the 1930's, the Fauteux commission of the 1950's, the Ouimet of the 1960's, and more recently the Swackhammer commission into the Kingston penitentiary riot. Presently, we are awaiting the Hugessen report into parole and temporary absence.

Some of the reforms that these various reports and commissions recommended have not yet been implemented, even though many years have passed since the recommendations were made. It seems to me that others have been implemented with over-zealous haste and little preplanning. I think that for the time being we have had a surfeit of judicial or independent inquiries. The time has come for us, as parliamentarians, to educate ourselves, and in so doing educate the public, as to the nature of the malaise and discontent which afflicts our penitentiaries system, and may I say as well the progress in penal reform that has been made over the years. Too often this is overlooked.
