I think these educational results could be better achieved if at the outset the minister made available to the members of the committee, if necessary on a confidential basis, the reports and transcripts that have been made both to the Swackhammer and to the Hugessen commissions. For instance, I refer to the fact that the Swackhammer commission visited nine institutions and received statements from some 580 persons, including penitentiary staff and inmates. If on the basis of full confidentiality these statements could be made available to members of the committee as pre-preparation for the work they are to undertake, I think they would come to their task better informed and prepared.

The constituency that I represent, that of Kingston and the Islands, lives with this problem on a daily basis. It is not something that comes up whenever there is an escape from a penitentiary in a certain part of the country; it is something that we have with us every day. Within our general area there are five major penal institutions. Some 1,500 people in my constituency are employed in those institutions in which over 2,000 inmates are incarcerated. So, not only is the safety of the community and the protection of the public involved in a very real sense; the involvement is much more than that. There is the involvement of the employees working in the prisons, there is the involvement of some 400 to 500 volunteers who work in the prisons on a weekly basis, and there is the involvement of inmates working in the community on temporary absences, on day paroles and in other roles.

As one who has been a voluntary worker in these penitentiaries over the last seven years, I have found it extremely beneficial for me to establish a good working relationship with the administration, the custodial staff and the inmates. My work has given me some insight perhaps into the problems that exist at these particular levels. In view of this, I should like to suggest that the committee take a look at its role and its responsibility from three different perspectives: first of all, from that of the administration and the staff generally; secondly, from that of the inmate; and finally, and very importantly, from that of the community—that is, from society as a whole.

With regard to the administration and staff, I think some of the following questions should be asked. Is there a need to streamline the whole prison administration? How good are communications between different levels of the penitentiary service? Are new programs which are being implemented properly explained to those who are going to be responsible for their implementation? Is the needed staff infrastructure being provided for new programs? Are measures taken to ensure that established penal programs which are working well are not being jeopardized? Further, are all staff being given the opportunity to update their skills through special training programs as reform measures are introduced, or are some being denied that privilege, and does this result in friction among the staff members? How well are the unions providing representation for their members or forwarding grievances on behalf of their members to the administration? What is the guard to warden relationship?

I think it is necessary that the committee and others recognize that there is a divergence of viewpoint between the administrator and the custodial officer, in the same way that there is a divergence of view between employer and employee in any other sector of industry. Is this divergence or difference in view in any way detrimental to the efficient functioning of a rehabilitative penal institution? Secondly, with regard to inmates, I think the committee should direct its attention to the re-evaluation of the concept of a hierarchy of security in prisons—that is, minimum, medium and maximum security institutions. What are the criteria for determining what sort of institution a criminal enters, and for how long? I think there should be a full examination of psychiatric facilities. Are they sufficient? What about the idea of maximum security hospitals?

Then, I think the committee should look at the problems that are brought about when disruption by a few inmates results in restrictive measures being applied to the total inmate population. I think here particularly of the situation at Millhaven when 14 inmates escaped and all recently granted privileges were subsequently withdrawn from 350 inmates. The resulting tension that this aroused did much to lead to the onset of the deterioration in morale both on the part of the staff and the inmates at Millhaven in the following months. I think there should be a detailed examination of guard-convict relations, of how each is perceived by the other. The committee should be allowed to call both inmates and guards as witnesses.

I would specifically ask that the committee take a special look at the problems inherent in prisons for women. Whether or not we care to admit it, there is discrimination in this area. It is all very well to say that the concept of temporary absence should be changed, investigated and reorganized, but a temporary absence or a weekend pass to a woman inmate in Kingston means nothing if she comes from British Columbia or Newfoundland. Since this is the only institution for women in the country, I do not mean to imply that this is the only point of discrimination. I want to mention two areas in this regard that should be investigaged.

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands).]

It is permissible for an inmate to make a long distance telephone call once a month at his or her own expense. If you happen to be an inmate in a prison for women and you come from British Columbia that is a much higher cost for you to bear than if you come from Ontario or Quebec, or if you are in an institution for men, as these are located all across the country. If you are in a prison for women there is only one, and that is often many miles distant from your home. Furthermore, the educational facilities in the prison for women are very mediocre, in fact non-existent, as compared to those provided in institutions for men. The hierarchy of security at the prison for women is very complicated in that the minimum, medium and maximum security prisons are all meshed into one. There should be some way of differentiating between the treatment meted out to women who are incarcerated as medium security prisoners and those who have been sentenced as maximum security inmates.

I should have liked to see the criteria of the committee broadened to encompass the whole question of sentencing, the role of the judiciary and the manner in which crimes of a similar nature receive sentences of radically dissimilar lengths in different parts of the country. This is taking place and it is not fair. Perhaps this could be the subject of an additional study by the committee.

Finally, from the point of view of the public, I think the committee should be empowered to suggest methods to ensure that a new openness exists with regard to penitentiary facilities so that public fears can be allayed. What constructive role, for instance, can the media play? How quickly can visitors' committees with proper authority be set up and made to function? How can community involvement be designed to strengthen rehabilitation? Few prisoners die in jail from natural causes. Most of them eventually are released back into society. How can the public help them if it is not informed of the facts, and the public has the right to know these facts? The committee should press for less secrecy and more openness on the part of the penitentiary system, an openness that is free of distortion and distrust.

In this connection I want to quote briefly from the recent Swackhammer report where it is stated:

> Thirty-eight years ago the Archambault Report commented that under the present system existing in the Canadian penitentiaries, what is going on in the institutions is shrouded with absolute secrecy, giving rise to suspicion and misgivings, which are further exhanced by extravagant and abused tales of ex-prisoners and the imagination of sentimentalists. As a consequence, although, for the sake of security, no undue information should be given, a practical check of what is going on should be made. The prisoner feels that he has no access to a fair administration of justice and is absolutely removed from the protection of his fellow man.'

I may say that the custodial staff and the general public have similar reservations. Those comments which were made in 1938 are equally pertinent today in 1973. I hope that the activities of this committee can contribute to the resolution of these many problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members will agree that most of what has to be said in this debate has been said in one way or another by colleagues on both sides of this House. There seems to be general agreement that we do have a situation across the country today within our penal system which requires, and indeed demands, investigation by this House. I think it is imperative that this motion leads to the investigation of these problems by hon. members of this House and, that the investigation is not relegated to some sort of committee which will eventually bring in a report at some distant time. I hope an obligation will be imposed upon the members serving on the committee to deal with the matter quickly and expeditiously, albeit carefully.

This is important because most of us, and this may be almost an ingenuous thing to say, were profoundly moved during the past election by the number of people—and I think this is true no matter what their party affiliation—who said to candidates and to members who were seeking re-election, that while they did not know all the answers and were not prepared to blame any one person for the problem, they felt a growing uneasiness about the whole concept of law and order in our country. I use the words "law and order" with respect, because without law and order we have exactly the opposite.

I have been a lawyer for 17 years, and while I suppose I am proud of the position I now hold and grateful to those who sent me here, I am perhaps more conscious that whatever else I have been asked to do in my life this is perhaps the most important. I am one of those who has been proud to be a lawyer in this country and one who at any time will defend the concept of civil liberty and the great traditions that have been brought down through the ages, of which we are the proud inheritors. When I say this I say it with great consciousness born of experience in the courts, and born of some understanding of the people who have sent us here. If we are to have a humane and just system of law and order, it must rest on the basis of confidence among the people who send their legislators to the parliament and legislatures of this country.

What disturbs me is that, unfortunately, in some cases tragically, we have made errors and mistakes, and those errors and mistakes have resulted in an appalling lack of confidence. Because there is such a lack of confidence, there are those among us in the community who would be prepared to forget the great traditions and civil liberties of which we have every reason to be proud. It is because of this that I think it is important that those of us who are here because people sent us, and will remain here only as long as the people have confidence in us, are charged with the immediate investigation of those problems that are causing so much concern to so many Canadians.

I think I should say also it is not enough—and I believe all members in the House will agree with me—to point to one or two instances which we all deplore and say this means that our whole system is falling apart. I do not believe that. I believe some mistakes have been made which perhaps are rooted in a false philosophy. Having practised law not only in the civil courts but also in the criminal courts, I believe in a parole system. I do not believe that everyone who is convicted of a crime ought to spend the rest of his life in jail. I do not think any lawyer who ever practised in the criminal courts who had any sensitivity would believe that, nor do I believe any fair-minded Canadian would believe it. However, I believe experience has shown that in respect of a man who is dangerous to the community, those charged with deciding upon his release have upon them the onus to show, at least within reason, that there is a probability if that man is released back into the community his release will not result in that community being victimized.

If there is one thing which I believe we must come back to it is the recognition that experience in terms of what a person does is some indication of what he is, and what he might well be. There is an onus on those who have the very difficult task of releasing such people into society to be sure that these people are released under conditions and circumstances where the public will not again be victimized. These are some of the questions which the committee will have to look into. I have heard hon. members from every party make some very intelligent, sensible and sensitive comments in this debate. If we are to improve our prison system, if we are to improve our system for the security of the public, if we are to ensure humanity to man and if we are to do so in an effort to rehabilitate all of those who can realistically be rehabilitated, we must take this approach.

My colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) said he does not believe that everyone can be rehabilitated. My colleague and I are members of different parties but we are both lawyers. I agree with my hon. friend when he says that, and I hope that eventually in fullness of time and with the increase in our own knowledge and wisdom, perhaps we will be able to rehabilitate everybody. However, as someone who has been involved in the court system and who has lived at least for a few years in a real world. I say that at the present time we cannot achieve the rehabilitation of everybody. When we try to further our own knowledge in these spheres, we must not and cannot do it at the expense of the safety of those innocent people who depend upon us to ensure that we have a system whereby those who have transgressed against society in a dangerous way are put where they cannot any longer harm innocent people.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say one thing in closing. I say this to all hon. members, to the press and to the people of Canada who sent us here. I think it is intensely important that Members of Parliament take part in this investigation. They are not all experts; that we all concede. Most of us, however, in a way that the expert never has to realize in actuality, are in touch with our people. We know what their fears and concerns are. We know also that if the fears and concerns increase much beyond the position we have reached at the present time there is a very real danger that the concepts of freedom, civil liberty, civility and democracy, without which we would not have a decent society, are in very real danger.

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has listened to a great many lectures tonight, and I do not intend to belabour him much longer. I should like to remind him that some months ago, I believe it was in December or perhaps early in January, I brought to him in private and submitted to several of his colleagues in his party as well as to some of my colleagues, a proposal which matched almost in every respect the one we are being asked to consider tonight. I did so not because I had any profound knowlege that there was something wrong in respect of the penal system of this country. I did so at that time because we were engaged in a debate on the subject of capital punishment. We are still engaged in that debate. It was my contention then, and it is now, that most of the people of Canada who have expressed themselves rather vehemently in some cases in favour of the retention of capital punishment have done so not because of any well-founded concern that they might be murdered in their beds or out on the streets, but because they are concerned about the rise in violent crime. They are worried that they might be assaulted in public. A woman might have a well founded concern that she stands in good danger of violent assault and rape.

I say they have this concern with good cause and with the best of all possible reasons. They have watched these things happen. They have seen situations such as that which took place in Ottawa not too long ago where two men were involved in an armed holdup in which an innocent bystander was murdered while they were out on bail, on a charge of possession of a sawed-off rifle. They have read of incidents such as that in Toronto where a man who had committed a series of crimes, including assault on a police officer, was released on his own recognizance and not too long afterward murdered another policeman. They are aware of situations inside prisons, such as the situation which within a few months resulted in riots, murders and beatings. I think they have a good right to ask themselves precisely what their government placed first on its list of priorities and whether or not it was the protection of society. I believe this must be the first priority.

If people are not convinced that the system will protect them, they will panic. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, this is part of the reason members of all parties in this House are having a very difficult time making up their minds whether the government's bill to re-impose the banning of capital punishment should, in fact, pass.

I have spoken for only a few minutes, but in closing I will ask the government not only to make this inquiry a meaningful one, not only to search out every defect in its penal system, its bail system and its parole system—because defects there are without going into tiresome detail—but to consider very seriously withdrawing the bill on capital punishment from debate until there can be a meaningful inquiry which will have the effect of reasuring the people of this country that there is no need to revert to that kind of savage punishment.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, without any reflection on the impartiality or the eyesight of the Chair, I do feel that I might be allowed to mention that I have been on my feet for two days in the last week to ask a couple of questions about the William Head Prison. I was on my feet again yesterday and today to do the same on another sort of question, because unfortunately I have to make it clear that all the problems with penitentiaries are not concentrated in the province of Quebec. Regrettably, British Columbia has its share of them.

[Mr. Reilly.]

I was pleased to see that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) was on the west coast last weekend. Although everything else was working to have him enjoy that particular visit—and I was there too—the penitentiary system failed to co-operate. While the minister was in the area, a dangerous criminal, confined on a grievous sex charge, escaped from William Head Penitentiary. He was not the first to do so, but surely the first to do so when the minister was actually in the area. I do not say that the minister was in the prison at the time because I do not know where he was, but he was in the area.

Since that escape, two elderly people have been attacked brutally in a trailer camp in an area where that prisoner might have been, and a third person has since been attacked, also in an area where the escaped prisoner might have been lurking. All three victims are now in hospital. The man from William Head was still free when I spoke to Victoria about seven o'clock this evening. This is not all. There are accounts circulating in Victoria that a prisoner serving a five year sentence for manslaughter has been absent without authorization from William Head since March 12. The police were unable to say why they did not learn, until the beginning of this month, two months later, that this man had failed to return after the expiration of the pass, which was believed to have been a weekend pass, not a two months pass.

The third matter I had in mind to ask the minister was about the physical measures that were to be taken in William Head in the light of his decision to convert that institution from a minimum to a medium security institution. It was my hope that I would get the answer that those measures would be taken prior to the introduction into that institution of medium security prisoners. I do not yet know whether those additional measures have been taken. But is this why we have been having escapes from William Head, because those to which I referred were not taken. Is it because those measures have not been taken? I am told, for example, that in certain tidal circumstances which I need not elaborate it is possible to walk out of William Head quite easily. This may be an exaggeration, but it is certainly symptomatic of the tales that are circulating and the insecurity that is felt in the area about the institution that is there. The guarding at that institution must be tightened up; physical barriers must be improved, and parole procedures likewise need to be tightened. Finally, I suggest that another site should be selected, one that is not so near the centres of high density population.

These are only the most recent evidences of laxity in the penitentiary system in British Columbia, and let me make it clear that I am not criticizing the guards for this. I have the greatest respect for them. Their duty is an onerous one and we should be proud that they are performing it to the best of their ability. Let us not attack them. They cannot defend themselves from attack in this place. What we must look at are the policies formulated by the government that permit these things to happen. The government which, for some unexplained reason, has decided to place the emphasis, not on the public, which asks for security, or on the injured party, but on the man who has caused the injury. Society demands security. It is up to parliament to ensure that society's safety is assured. The criminal has placed himself outside the law and has earned his penalty.

Why should individual, law-abiding citizens be penalized for the delinquency of criminals? We are bound to ask ourselves these questions.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) spoke of proportion. Can he deny that there has been a rash of escapes across this country? I have mentioned those in the west; others have mentioned those in the central and eastern parts of the country. The large proportion of this country is composed of law-abiding citizens. They want law and order, as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) said so eloquently a few moments ago. They deserve law and order, being law-abiding citizens, and in return for the confidence placed in us by our law-abiding constituents we should spare no effort in providing that law and order for them. One means of doing so is by instituting this inquiry which has now been proposed to us. Aside from that small proportion of our population who are law breakers there is a smaller proportion, happily, which has placed itself beyond the law and has decided to become incorrigible law breakers. Many of these people have been escaping custody. It is not alarm that is being created by this debate, as some have suggested, it is an expression of concern. This is the expression of our concern.

What happens in these circumstances to those who are charged with the responsibility of ensuring the safe custody of these convicted persons, the guardians, the wardens at prisons? Unless we in parliament act now, we will be having increasing difficulty in retaining those who are trained and recruiting the replacements and, I think we should add, in recruiting policemen. Then, surely, we will be in trouble. Their confidence in their jobs must be restored and our actions will contribute to the restoration of that confidence. Our law and the penalties under our law must be applied. Those who obey the law demand it—disobedience of the law requires it.

Many speakers who have preceded me have said—and I agree with them—that our law is a good law and our philosophy of law is right. We must not allow it to be distorted. The maintenance of our law rests on discipline, Mr. Speaker, and discipline may have to be imposed. It may be necessary to determine who among those who resist discipline in detention will have to be detained. I maintain that these are non-rehabilitable, but that is a matter of judgment. There must be a means of determining who is rehabilitable and who is not, and once that is done the methods of rehabilitation can be developed and can be effective.

In the process of selection, we must use some pretty refined and sophisticated techniques. I do not believe they are all in place yet. We are still experimenting, but we must not experiment at the cost of our fellow law-abiding citizens. Any margin of doubt must go in favour of society. Those who cannot be rehabilitated should not be granted parole or leave of absence unless they can, in subsequent days, prove their capacity to live within the confines of the discipline that we must uphold.

This is a matter that we must leave to specialists, but concurrently we must tighten up the administration of our penitentiaries with higher technical in-put for the entire penal system. And I have a feeling that the minister does not entirely disagree with me. Although I would not wish to put words in his mouth, I was very pleased to hear he was fed up with the developments that had taken place when he was out in British Columbia. The Canadian law-abiding public is fed up.

As a guide to the improvement of this administration, a good point of departure is a review of where we are now in the whole penitentiary system. This can be accomplished by inquiring into the temporary absence system, security in the penal institutions, the parole system and, generally speaking, the administration of penalties arising out of the commission of crime. We have plans to get this inquiry under way soon as a result of the action taken in the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee this morning. And while this inquiry is going on, Mr. Speaker, prison guards and inmates should know what the rules of incarceration are. As a result each will know the role he has to play. Let all know who is likely to get parole, and who has earned parole. Let all know how parole can be earned, how weekend passes can be earned and how they can be lost. These privileges can not be earned escaping but by performance and proper conduct within the penitentiary.

What we all look to also is the full meaning of the mini, the midi, the maxi, and I suppose the super-maxi institutions in the penal system. Is it a matter of graduating by good conduct from one grade to another, depending on deportment? And are paroles granted in super-maxi institutions? This whole system must be investigated. Recommendations must be drawn up and approved by this House. That process is now in train as a result of the committee's action this morning. How better to get such an investigation on the road than by a select committee of this House representing all parties, all regions, all professions to be found here in this House? I support this proposal with every firmness I can muster.

Mr. Harry Olaussen (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about the penitentiary system, its administration, security, parole, and the system of temporary absences. I would like to discuss something which comes within the perimeters of this debate, the parole system, which is so much a part of our penitentiary set up. The parole system, as you know, is supposedly a system by which prisoners who have served time in jail can be given an opportunity to go back into society and produce, in the sense that society can accept them as well deserving citizens who are willing to use their knowledge and efforts for the betterment of society.

We release prisoners who are supposedly rehabilitated into a society that is unwilling and unready to accept them. There is a girl in British Columbia who wrote to me recently about her problems under the parole system. She tried to make amends, to look for a job, and to give something to society. She was turned down by each and every employer to whom she applied. In fact, she listed 89 different companies that turned her down because society was not willing to accept her. This is something we cannot accept in a civilized society because we should be willing to forgive and forget. Can we understand a situation like this, when people who have served their time and are willing to make amends become disillusioned and, as a result, go back into the prison system? Are we willing to accept this? Are we willing to accept the idea that such people are non-persons who cannot be accorded the privileges of a decent citizen of society?

We talk about the cost of the prison system. That cost will not be any less if we continue on this road and treat these people the way this girl was treated. But I must say I was very happy tonight, after talking to her mother over the telephone, to learn that she has just been accepted on the staff of the non-status Indians in British Columbia, Maybe these people who have suffered for so many years understand her plight and are willing to accept her. Are we so sanctimonious that we are unwilling to forgive? Are we willing to give these people the chance that they want? Criminals are not all hardened criminals. Many inmates of jails have been peaceful citizens. The fact is that it is quite possible for many of us to land in jail some time or other, because at one time or another we have broken laws. In fact, we may find ourselves in the prison system that we are investigating right now and, if we do, when we get out of that system we may find ourselves in the same position as that girl in British Columbia found herself.

Criminals are not born, they are victims of the environment. As victims of the environment they find themselves formed according to how the environment wishes them to be formed. It is unfortunate that so many of us look within the prison walls and are not willing to look outside the prison walls that are so much a part of the whole system. There are many organizations that are willing to help but cannot because of lack of money or staff to handle the cases brought to their attention. I have spoken to personnel of the Elizabeth Fry Society in Vancouver and was impressed by what the lady in charge and the society is doing. If we are going to investigate the prison society, let us confer with those who have worked through the Elizabeth Fry Society and the John Howard Society and find out how we can help them through financing and by every means at our disposal.

We must teach society to accept those who were once convicted and have served their time. We must have within our law the means to encourage employers to accept those who have served their time and are willing to be productive. We must put our Christian principles into operation if we believe in Christian principles.

An hon. Member: We all believe in them.

Mr. Olaussen: I am sure there are many who do. However, words alone are not enough; there must be action. We need action. We must have this investigation. In order to have a complete investigation, let us not do it only within the prison walls but outside as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to say a few words in this important debate concerning the many escapes from penitentiaries, particularly in the last few months.

Living about 13 miles from the Drummondville penitentiary, I have been witness to the alarm and fear in which the population of my town and region have lived following many escapes from Cowansville. One of the escaped prisoners, for example, a notorious crook, spent the first night after his escape in a house three doors away from where I live. That shows to what extent, in our supposedly well-protected society, we are placed in a very serious and dangerous position by a prison system in which disorder reigns, authority has lost all its power, and criminals draw up their own rules, make threats and command those who represent the law.

Propagandists of all hues, for example, politicologists or sociologists, are allowed into the penitentiaries to distribute all sorts of literature aimed at indoctrinating the inmates and causing uprisings.

Here is a very good example. In March 1973, a supposedly eminent Montreal criminologist, Mr. André Normandeau, Ph.D. went to the Cowansville penitentiary to hand out literature about the Parti Quebecois, give a lecture, and distribute a document entitled: "The manifesto of a candidate for the Parti Quebecois political convention in the constituency of Mount Royal", the constituency of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Clause C of this manifesto includes the following: The Parti Quebecois leadership's criminal justice program. Inmates were allowed to print and distribute this manifesto, organize teach-ins, discuss, meditate and make propaganda about the Parti Quebecois manifesto by Mr. André Normandeau.

Mr. Speaker, this strikes me particularly since I know very well the problems of the Cowansville penitentiary. It is because the penitentiary authorities have no moral or other support from the Canadian justice or the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand). Last night again, not 24 hours ago, at the Cowansville penitentiary, during a meeting of penitentiary officers, they were informed that if any one of them wounds or kills an inmate while exercising his duties, the government does not hold itself responsible for any legal procedures against the officer, damages caused or costs incurred to defend himself before the courts. In fact, the officer will have to get help from friends or relatives or defend himself alone against the procedures which may be taken by the inmate or his parents. On the other hand, the government will assume the costs of legal assistance to help the criminal defend himself against the officer who represents justice.

Before such risks, Mr. Speaker, the officers have refrained from doing their work for fear of losing their jobs and through fear of threats from the inmates to the officers or members of their families.

Mr. Speaker, I know personally some officials whose life is hell among murderers because the law does not give them any protection.

The authority of penitentiary officials over inmates is not recognized by the government; for instance, they can throw their supposedly badly done steaks at the officials who can only smell those steaks which the inmates refuse to eat and which the officials cannot afford for themselves or for their family.

Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has also mislead the House or he is not aware of what is going on at Cowansville. Out of about 400 inmates, 100 should be kept in maximum security penitentiaries while the minister told the House that 25 or 30 inmates should be held there.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to have order in penitentiaries, if we want the laws to be obeyed, the officials, those who represent justice, the officials who are in charge of order must be protected by the law and have moral support from the judicial system and the Solicitor General of Canada.

Officials are keeping out of the way, they do not want to see anything, they let things go because they have no personal protection against hundreds of criminals in penitentiaries and, in order to keep their job, they let everyone free with the results we have known in recent months.

Mr. Speaker, it is urgent that we establish an inquiry commission made up not of those who must live with the problems but of persons completely independent of the present penitentiary system and who could consult both inmates and officials and see what is wrong with the rules.

Mr. Speaker, I know personally of certain rules which are supposed to exist in the penitentiaries and here again because the officials did not get any support, they are right to be afraid because we leave them alone to defend their case against any legal action; they do not wish to set the inmates against them. Everything is permitted, in the penitentiaries.

Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to hear certain officers who really want to fulfill their duties, but who in the circumstances cannot have the law respected, do their job, actually ensure the protection of the inmates, the maintenance of order in the penitentiaries while securing human conditions for the inmates, considering that those persons have committed a crime, that they have been condemned by courts of law and that the officers must ensure that justice and order are respected in our Canadian penitentiaries.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speeches on this matter from both sides of the House. Like all questions that are moral as opposed to being political, there are two points of view, two concepts wrestling with one another. On the one hand, we have the matter of rehabilitation of the prisoner which is something that is worthy of any civilized society to pursue. On the other, we have the question of the protection of that civilized society. Throughout this debate has run a thread and upon that thread this question balances.

I have now come to the reluctant conclusion that in certain respects, the Solicitor General's department, the department under which the Penitentiary Act is administered and the administrators of the penitentiaries have failed. Perhaps to a certain degree, the court system may have failed in that there has been an overbalancing in favour of the rehabilitation of the prisoner. Apparently the escapes, the crimes committed while people are on parole and the crimes committed while people are on temporary absence have demonstrated that. This is a demonstration to the public that perhaps rehabilitation of the prisoner has remained uppermost and the scale is balanced in that direction as opposed to the protection of society.

Rehabilitation is important. I support the concept of rehabilitation. If there is to be any doubt or weighting of the balance on one side of the concept or the other, it ought to be in favour of protection of society. Basically, that is the thread that has passed through this debate. There was concern that that aspect of it has been neglected, perhaps wilfully, perhaps not. None the less, that has led to the concern expressed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). At long last, and somewhat reluctantly from the government's point of view, the attention of this House and, hopefully the country, is being focussed on this very important question.

I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). He stated that he had practiced in the courts for 17 years on both the criminal and civil side. I practiced in the courts for the same period of time on both sides of the law. I have also practiced on the prosecution side. I had the honour to prosecute people brought to justice in Ontario. I have also defended, including capital cases. I listened to the debate that preceded this on the question of whether we ought to have capital punishment, not have it have it in part.

I have perhaps dealt with my constituents in a little different manner. I have asked them to talk to me, not just mark an "X" on a piece of paper which is an easy thing to do, so I can reason and discuss with them. I talked both to those who are vehemently or mildly in favour of capital punishment. The majority of people I talked to took that position. They are very concerned about what is happening in the penitentiary system, the operation of the Bail Reform Act, temporary absence and so on. The majority of them clearly said to me that if they could be assured that society would be protected, they would not want to add another life, albeit the life of a criminal, to the list of people who are the victims of harshness and cruelty in the community.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) ought to take the words of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) to heart. He ought to withdraw the bill so that it can be considered, not in an atmosphere filled with heat, but in an atmosphere where sane and sober thoughts will guide its consideration through this House.

The hon. member for Vancouver South also spoke of confidence in the legal system. The reform that any civilized person wants in the parole system and any other system of incarceration, bearing in mind the protection of society, will not come about unless the people of this country have confidence that the system is working and there is indeed built into it protection. There is a duty upon this government and all members of the committee to ensure that the committee examines in the fullest, widest and most open way every aspect without fear. If members of this House or the committee say the committee should go into the prisons of this country, perhaps on a selective basis, I will agree with them. If they say this committee ought to travel, I will agree with that. If they say this committee's functions are to be carried on in the most public way, I will agree with that.

The committee should examine not just the prison system, but the parole system. They should determine why it has become the habit of the federal Parole Board not to examine prisoners on a face-to-face basis. Is it because of a shortage of staff? If so, this government and this country should move to remedy that. If it is because of some other reason, that reason should be found. If they do not change this, whatever flimsy amount of confidence there is now in the parole system and the operation of the Bail Reform Act, and it is flimsy indeed, will be washed away. That would be a tragedy for this country and for our civilized community. It will for a long time to come be the source of great injustice to those who under the present system could benefit from parole.

The subject we are considering transcends in importance many of the other issues which have been before us. I say to the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) that we have no wish to return to the dark days with respect to our penal system. None of us has taken that position, and I think the hon. member was rather unfair to my hon. friend from Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) in criticizing the speech he made. But we do want to return to an age of reason when a civilized community can expect its government and the institutions operated by its government to protect it against whatever prompts criminal behaviour, against whatever causes some criminals to be incapable of reform.

If we accept the statement that all criminals are victims of their environment, we are saying that completion of a criminal act is a matter of accident. We all know that this is too sweeping a generalization. We want to take the mind of a criminal and change that mind by working on the conditions in which he finds himself. We want to give that chance to those worthy of a chance. At the same time, we want to protect society against those who are unworthy of such an opportunity. This should be the principle behind the committee's investigation.

I am glad it is to be a committee of elected members. I do not believe this work should be foisted upon judges. Judges, by virtue of their position, are not called upon to answer to the public. In a sense, therefore, they are irresponsible in a way in which a committee would not be irresponsible. I welcome the motion and I support the concept that the work be carried out by a committee of this House. The committee has the ability and will, I hope, possess the necessary expertise to inquire into these matters and ensure that society regains the confidence which is lacking today. Perhaps if this is the result, the attitude of society toward the important subject we were considering earlier will be changed as a consequence.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order? I rise simply to ask whether perchance the time has come at which there might be some discussion through the usual channels about the possibility of bringing the debate to a conclusion at a reasonable hour. If this cannot be done through the usual channels, maybe it can be done through some unusual channels.

Mr. Nielsen: There are not many left on this side of the House who wish to participate in the debate. I have six names on my list, and there is my own short contribution concerning the mechanics of this inquiry upon which the standing committee is about to embark. With the tolerance of hon. members, I think we should be able to conclude within the next hour unless, of course, there are speakers from the other parties who wish to enter the debate.

[Mr. Baker.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have none here, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Most unusual.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In light of what the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has said, I wonder whether there could be some discussion, perhaps behind the Speaker's chair. Possibly we could reduce the length of speeches so that we might save some time while still allowing everyone to speak who wishes to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): As the hon. member knows, that can only be done by unanimous consent. While these discussions are taking place, perhaps we can hear the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie).

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to add my support to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), a motion which goes to the root of many anxieties which plague so many Canadians at this time. If we do not decide now that positive action is called for, and if we do not then take decisive action, I am afraid the whole question of who is the prisoner and who is the jailer will be academic. We are on the verge today of losing sight of who it is who needs and deserves the protection of the law.

Things are so bad today, with respect to the prison system, that if it were not for the fact that people who are walking out of our prisons almost daily were not hardened criminals, the situation would be hilarious. In fact, in light of the unfavourable publicity being directed to the department of the Solicitor General I am surprised he even allows some of these people into jail! However, the situation is anything but hilarious when we consider that some of these people are murderers, rapists and thugs, people who do not hesitate to use violence on anyone they may meet. We are familiar with recent examples of criminals escaping from prison to commit heinous crimes in order to get transportation, food or money or just to "get back" at the society which put them behind bars.

Contrary to the contention of many people, these prison inmates are not just a bunch of mixed-up kids. They were put in prison after being convicted of crimes, often crimes of violence; they were incarcerated only after exhausting all the many avenues open to them under our judicial system. The most disturbing aspects is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his appointees in the penitentiary service insist on discussing the situation merely on the basis of reform, rehabilitation and parole. This makes about as much sense as a speech by Jackie Onassis on poverty.

The fact is that it is ridiculous talking about reforming a prisoner unless he makes himself available to be reformed. It has almost reached the point at which a prisoner in a Canadian jail simply will not wait around unless he happens to like it there. If he likes the food and is free to kick the guards and other prisoners around, and if he can run the prison the way he wants it run, then he just might hang around for a while. This is not good enough. Before we undertake to do anything by way of reform or rehabilitation we must ensure that when a lawbreaker is sentenced to jail he is kept there for the duration of his sentence. As it is now, and as it has been for too long, the prisoner is the sole object of the government's sympathy.

Too often we hear of riots in our prisons and we hear afterward that many of the guards are tried or disciplined for being too rough with the inmates. We hear how tough it is for prison inmates, but we ignore the complaints of prison staff—that their lot is even rougher than that of the inmates. I would like to point out to my colleagues in the House that we must not lay the blame for what is going on at the feet of the present Solicitor General. He has not been in that position long enough to be able to get a full count of how many prisoners are at large. When he took over his post there were almost as many convicts outside as inside our jails. Anyone who was sentenced to prison under the previous Solicitor General knew that he would not have to stay in prison unless he really wanted to do so. There were many avenues open to him. If he wanted to go to Spain, for instance, he knew that he would be able to get a passport and be allowed to leave the country. If he just wanted to go into town and take a job, he could get help either from inside or outside the prison.

In short, Mr. Speaker, when the present Solicitor General took over his office the prison system was in a shambles. Under the previous Solicitor General we saw a breakdown of the Bail Reform Act. We saw a complete breakdown of the parole system. We saw instances where convicted rapists were allowed weekend passes from prison to commit still more crimes of rape, undoubtedly feeling that they would never be suspected of crimes while they were serving a sentence. The simple fact is that they were not serving terms, at least not in the accepted sense of serving a term. What is to be gained in having a court try a suspect at great expense, find him guilty and then sentence him to prison, only to have him released on his own recognizance as though he were a soldier on a weekend pass? What can we possibly gain from a system that permits a suspected bank robber to be free on bail, or without bail, and which allows him to commit crimes in order to raise the price of a good defence lawyer? This has happened, as the hon. members here know only too well.

Adding to the confusion we have the justice minister placing the blame for this mess in one quarter, the Solicitor General blaming someone or something else, the courts and judges placing the blame on the laws, and finally the police blaming the whole system. There is an old saying that applies to the military, and it also applies to high political office. It goes something like this: "The chief can delegate authority, but he cannot delegate responsibility". The person who is in charge of the show must be prepared to accept responsibility for it, whether it is a success or a flop. In the case of the penitentiaries system, the parole system and the bail system, the present Solicitor General deserves some measure of sympathy for the mere fact that he has agreed to accept responsibility for the mess they are in, and he has at least admitted that things are not as they should be. He has called for an investigation, possibly because of the pressure brought to bear on his office from the official opposition, and he deserves our support in such an investigation.

I do not envy the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. The former Solicitor General had an uncanny talent for creating confusion and for laying to waste the best laid plans of mice and men. Some of the appointments he made while in that office are clear evidence of his inability to choose the best man for the job, and unfortunately some of those appointments will give the present Solicitor General some sleepless nights. If and when the full scale investigation of the penitentiaries system is undertaken, I hope that it will extend into the area of political appointments to important posts in the system. Some of the jobs handed out to political hangers-on are jobs that call for a large degree of expertise in the prison administration, and I think that the investigation should include the appointment of a former post office employee to the post of commissioner of the penitentiary service. There were excellent people near the top level of the service who had spent their entire working lives in the service. It would have made a great deal more sense to look in their direction for a commissioner when the appointment was made. I cannot help feeling that some of the problems we are experiencing with the penitentiaries system start at the very top of the administration.

While I can commiserate with the new Solicitor General, and I might even sympathize with him. I must say I am disturbed by his statement that he is satisfied with the 18 per cent failure rate in the operation of the parole system. I am afraid that I cannot feel comfortable with a minister who admits that he is satisfied with failure. I would have preferred to have him say to this House that he would not be satisfied until he had achieved zero failure rate in the parole system, and while this is not likely to happen, at least it is a more worthy objective than the acceptance of an 18 per cent failure rate. As it is now, we do not know what sort of objective he has in mind, and it is important at this point for us to at least have some idea as to what he hopes to achieve, and what steps he proposes to take in order to accomplish his objective. His suggestion that a study of the whole situation is needed is a good start. It would be difficult for any of us to suggest at this point what remedial action should be taken to bring some order back to the system—the penitentiaries, parole, and all of the other aspects of the correctional system.

But, Mr. Speaker, the first step is obvious to all of us. Convicted lawbreakers have been sentenced to prisons in our country, and they were sent there so they would be separated from the rest of society. The first step must be to take whatever steps are required to ensure that they are kept in those institutions. While I will not argue the point that our prisons are overcrowded, that is not a valid reason for allowing prison inmates to walk the streets of our cities while we are working out the solutions to the problems.

If inmates are getting help from prison employees in making escapes, these people must be rooted out. If more guards and other personnel are needed, then they must be hired. But these people must be hired on the basis of their suitability for the job, rather than for their political persuasion or favours to the party in the past. I do not think that this is a really serious problem. What I do believe is that there is a serious breakdown in the prison service at or near the top of the administration. When that is cleared up, we will find, I am quite certain, that the other problems can be cleared up in short order. Until the day when the rank and file employees in the penitentiaries system come to believe in the competence of their superiors, right up to the top of the system, we will be faced with a morale problem. As long as we have such a serious morale problem among the guards and correctional officers, we will have riots, protests, prison breaks, and general disorder throughout the system.

Let us stop blaming the guards for the shape the prisons are in, and let us stop directing all of our sympathy towards those people who have been sentenced to prison. Our whole perspective is wrong, Mr. Speaker. It is time for us to make it clear to the inmates of our prisons that that is just what they are, and that they are going to have to earn everything that they receive in the way of consideration. Our primary job is to protect the innocent from the guilty, not the other way round.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a certain amount of sympathy for the present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). He has inherited a problem created by his predecessor as a result of a policy of permissiveness advocated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the former members of his cabinet. The matter has now come to a head like a boil on the back of the neck of the Solicitor General. We live in a supposedly civilized country. A civilized country is one in which its citizens, the average man and woman on the street, you and I, Mr. Speaker, can live without fear of violence. People are concerned about their own safety and they are concerned about the safety of their families and their friends. They read almost daily in the press, they see and hear on television and hear on the radio of persons granted bail committing further crimes. They hear of escapes from prisons of dangerous criminals, or they hear of persons who have been convicted of serious crimes being allowed out shortly after committal, either on a daily pass to work or to attend university or in some cases to attend hockey games. I find it very difficult to explain to a law-abiding constituent who has sacrificed to send his children to university why someone who has broken the law, can, while in jail, at the expense of the state, attend a university and obtain a degree. In some cases, these people end up with a government job.

I feel we have the wrong perspective. The intellectuals, psychiatrists and some politicians, for some reason or another, are of the opinion that if someone commits a crime he or she is not to blame, but that society is to blame. Who makes up society except you and I, the man on the street, the person doing his best to equip himself in our society, raise his family and be a good citizen? We are told that we are at fault. I suggest that is a very ridiculous theory. If a child misbehaves in class at school, do you pat him on the head and say he is not at fault, then punish the rest of the class? I am not suggesting that we should not concern ourselves with rehabilitation, but rehabilitation is a very complex matter. We must first look at the purposes of our laws and the penalties provided. The protection of society must be the first and foremost consideration. This is more important to me than rehabilitation, and it must be given first priority.

The second consideration is punishment. In this enlightened day, because of our educational system and the media, I believe all persons in Canadian society know what is right and what is wrong and when they are breaking the law. They are also aware of the consequences of breaking the law. Punishment should be a real thing; it must be an effective deterrent. There is no deterrent and no punishment when a person, upon being sent to jail, is treated in a better manner and receives more benefits from the state than many of our hard-working low income citizens.

Rehabilitation is vital. I have practised law for some 23 years during which time, I have acted as defence counsel for many people, so I appreciate the importance of rehabilitation. However, rehabilitation is important only in the cases of persons who are capable of being rehabilitated. These persons must be assisted to return to this society and take their proper places as citizens of this great country. I suggest that those persons who are not capable of rehabilitation must be handled in such a manner that they are not a danger to society, either through escape or being allowed out on weekend passes. They must endure their punishment.

The inquiry we expect the parliamentary committee to carry out must be a thorough and searching one; an inquiry which will result in a re-examination of our present system of bail, parole and passes. It should be an inquiry which will result in a reorganization of our present system in order that the public will once again feel secure and have the confidence in and respect for our judicial system which they had not too many years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keith Taylor (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of saying a few words in connection with this motion to refer this very important matter to a standing committee of this House. I know this is a very agonizing matter for the government and the Solicitor General in view of what has transpired in the last few days and, indeed, what has transpired over the last few years. However, the people of this country are not looking to the Solicitor General, the judicial authority, the police or the courts alone for a remedy to the situation. They are looking to this parliament for the necessary laws and recommendations to ensure that every Canadian is guaranteed the protection he expects in a country which cherishes the values we cherish in Canada.

Others have listed their qualifications in speaking on this motion. I want to assure hon. members who are not aware of the fact that I have perhaps the unique experience of having been not only a defence counsel and a Crown attorney, but of having served for some 15 years as a magistrate and a judge of the juvenile court. I know the problems involved in providing an adequate system of justice.

First of all, I think it is necessary that we put the whole matter in perspective and realize that we are talking here of only those who have been committed to one of the penitentiaries for which the federal government is responsible. We are not talking about the majority of people sentenced to jail to serve their time in provincial institutions. While I know the federal government, through the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), is responsible for the enforcement of criminal laws in this country, it is only the federal responsibility for penitentiaries we are dealing with here.

The number of people we are talking about is very minimal in relation to the total population and, indeed, in relation to the total number of people who run afoul of the law from time to time. It has always been emphasized by every court of law in this country that in sentencing an individual who has been convicted of any offence there are three basic principles to be considered. First of all, and I say foremost in any court with which I am familiar, the first principle is protection of society. The second principle is the deterrent effect, any sentence might have upon others who might be inclined to run the risk of committing a similar crime. The last principle, and perhaps this is important from the point of view of society, and one which seems to have got out of balance, is rehabilitation of the convicted person.

The problem is, of course, how to reconcile the interest of protecting society from criminals who have committed serious offences with the necessity and interest of society in rehabilitating those persons. I am sure that anyone who has had any experience with the law knows that people who are to be found in penitentiaries in this country are not people who are victims of some momentary transgression. In almost every case I know of where a penitentiary term has been imposed, it has been imposed on a person who has had many scrapes with the law, and in every case it has been a very serious breach of the law that gave rise to that penalty.

● (12 midnight)

The problem then becomes one of the penitentiary service, and we are dealing of course with the administration of that service and the program they must have in order to do the job. The important part of the program is the rehabilitation of the convicted person. We have heard many stories of escapes from institutions and many accounts of the inadequacy of the facilities therein, and comments have been made by many people on the type of institution that we must have to adequately house convicted persons to ensure that they will no longer be a menace to society. In order to do this we must take into account the fact that adequate staff is required and, what is perhaps more important, a number of people with training, knowledge and the necessary qualifications.

The matter of how much money society and parliament are prepared to allocate to the penitentiary service for the rehabilitation of prisoners has always been a difficult problem. Because of this there has always been a lack of facilities of all kinds. I submit to the House that this is one of the reasons we are having the difficulties that we have been hearing and reading about in the last few days.

I submit that if this committee is to function properly and carry out the responsibility which we are giving it, it will be necessary for it to look into the type of facilities that are required in order to adequately house prisoners. Whether these institutions are maximum security institutions or any other type, they must be adequate and they must be staffed by properly trained and qualified people.

Since, as someone said earlier in this debate, most of the prisoners will eventually return to society, there must be an adequate program to ensure that they are rehabilitated whenever possible. With this goes a system of identification and encouragement for those who can be rehabilitated. The responsibility for this situation is not entirely that of the courts of this country, nor is it entirely that of the penitentiary staffs; it is the responsibility of this government and of all members of the House to see that the necessary remedies are found and the necessary action taken to put those remedies into effect.

I welcome the opportunity to discuss this urgent and important problem which affects the confidence of all Canadians in the ability of our system of justice to protect society as a whole.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, it is now Wednesday morning. We started out this debate on Tuesday shortly after two o'clock. I am sure the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) will agree with me that it was not long after 2 p.m. that he started having to field questions on a very difficult and unfortunate situation that has developed within the Canadian penitentiary service. I think the fact that we are still here on another day indicates the seriousness that Members of Parliament place on the situation that has developed within the Canadian penitentiary service, and I hope some of the things that I will say in the next 15 or 20 minutes will be of some value and benefit to the Solicitor General in the role he is endeavouring to fill in that office.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I must remind the hon. member that although he referred to what he will have to say in the next 15 or 20 minutes, the arrangement was to limit speeches to 15 minutes.

Mr. Coates: It is very kind of the Chair to remind me of that. I hope I can stop my flight of eloquence in 15 minutes, but if it happens that I cannot, there will not be that many members in the House who will object to another five minutes, especially since I have waited until this hour to make my speech.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You could do better still and make it shorter.

Mr. Coates: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggests I make it short, and another hon. member suggested I should sit down. I say to the hon. member who suggested that I sit down that if he paid more attention to what is going on in parliament and stood up more often, perhaps this institution would be better off and the people of Canada would be better off. He happens to be picking up $28,000 a year for being here, and he should be producing some words in this institution that would be of value in solving some of the problems that this nation is facing.

I am standing here at this late hour to try to contribute in solving one of the chronic problems facing this nation in relation to the Canadian penitentiary service and the way in which it is being operated at present. First of all, I say to the Solicitor General, as I have said publicly before this debate, that I think he has adopted the type of approach to the problems related to the penitentiary service that we should have adopted a long time ago. I think the Solicitor General, in the approach he has taken in moving across this country and speaking, not just to the wardens of institutions but to the correctional officers and the inmates, is adopting the right kind of approach and in the end I think he will be successful in solving the problems facing the country as a result of the erosion of the system.

I think that is the only way to solve the problem. I would say that his candid and cogent comments in relation to the escapes that have occurred indicate a very real appreciation of the problems with which he is confronted. I believe that the minister is sincere in the task he has accepted and has tried to undertake it in the best possible way, but I believe also that he has some real problems within the Canadian penitentiary service. At the same time, I am fearful that he might be made a scapegoat for the incompetence that is involved in the way these penitentiaries are being operated at present.

I had a long association with the Canadian Penitentiary Service even before there was a solicitor general's department that administered it. At that time it was under the Department of Justice. I was pleased to see the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) here. For many years he was parliamentary secretary to the minister of justice and worked very closely with me, as did the minister of justice, in the establishment of the first minimum security institution at Springhill and the present-day medium security institution which exists in that town.

It would only be fair at this time to say that the warden, or whatever you might call him now that they have fancy names for people who work in these institutions, of Springhill and the warden of the maximum security institution at Dorchester have done an outstanding job from the point of view of penology and protecting the people who are employed in those institutions and the inmates. I think they performed yeomen service in seeing the lid was kept on, especially at Dorchester. Mr. Bennett, who operates the institution at Dorchester, is a phenomenal person who has had to cope with unbelievable problems from an overcrowding point of view, problems which the Solicitor General, who visited that institution a short time ago and was asked questions about it in the House today, admits are unbelievable from every point of view, overcrowding, personnel, problems associated with inmates and the types of cliques which developed in that institution, and which the Solicitor General in his own way has tried to alleviate. These problems are real. They are real at Dorchester, they are real at Springhill and at every other penal institution. They are real because there has been a breakdown in the penal system.

In carrying out the kinds of inquiries that have been suggested we might assist the Solicitor General in solving some of the problems he faces. Every possible consideration should be given to the undertaking of the studies that have been suggested. I am not a member of the standing committee, but I feel it has tried to do an honest job in producing information for the public and for the Solicitor General by questioning the witnesses who appeared before it. That committee has indicated that it feels a special committee should be established. The Solicitor General indicates that he believes there should be a judicial inquiry. I think it would not be a bad idea if both were undertaken at the same time so that there could be a correlation of the two types of information produced to see if the same conclusions are reached, and if the same conclusions are reached then the Solicitor General will know where to go from there.

More than that, I believe the Solicitor General has been badly let down by people in the public service who are supposed to be serving him. They have put him into most embarrassing situations in this House and throughout the country because of what has happened at a number of institutions. I say to him that although he is dedicated and sincere, he must also show to members of this House and to the public generally that he is tough, that he is willing to make heads roll when they should roll. And I say that heads must roll so far as the Canadian penitentiary service is concerned because of the kinds of things that have been happening in institutions all across the country.

I do not believe that there is any other answer. The top echelon of the penitentiary service must be cleaned out, fast, before we discover that there are more inmates running around outside than there are in the institutions and before we discover that most of the police forces in Canada are spending more of their time tracking down escaped inmates than in performing their other obligations to the Canadian people. For instance, Mr. Speaker, while I did not say anything about it, I was very upset over the fact that three inmates escaped from Dorchester penitentiary with a gun. Where that gun came from, I do not know. How many other guns there are in Dorchester penitentiary, I do not know. But these three hardened criminals, who had bad records, got out and kidnapped two people. They held them captive for a period of time until the RCMP recaptured them and returned them to the institution.

That is a very dangerous sort of situation to develop in any community. It developed as the result of a gun being smuggled into the penitentiary. Such a situation is very frightening for people in my constituency because there is an institution in it, and Dorchester happens to be only about 15 miles away from my home town, Amherst. When inmates escape from there, they pose a real threat; and when those kinds of inmates escape from Dorchester or St. Vincent de Paul, anything can happen. Particularly, anything can happen when we have the kind of laws we have in Canada today, when no man dies no matter what he does, no matter what crime he commits. There is no such thing as capital punishment, so that a murderer who escapes from prison has nothing to lose. He can kill as many people as he wishes. The most that will happen to him is that he will be returned to prison for whatever time the government and the Parole Board determine is the correct time for him to be there. This is one of the reasons why I have indicated that I will support the retention of capital punishment as strongly as I can. There is only way to deal with a murderer who escapes from an institution; he must know that if he commits another murder he is going to the gallows and that will be the end of his life.

My opinion is that the Solicitor General is trying as hard as he knows how to get some sense back into the penitentiary service. Again I say that many of the people serving under him are doing a disservice to him because they are not nearly as willing as he is to put common sense back into the service. The Solicitor General must get rid of these people, and fast. He must get common sense back into the penitentiary service and into our whole approach to penology. I also say to him that if he does not show that kind of toughness, then no matter how dedicated he may be, he will not be long in that job because the Canadian people want common sense put back into the service. We want to know that when a man is sent to an institution, the government will be responsible for keeping him there for whatever time is required until a rehabilitation program indicates that he is ready to return to society.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I did not have any intention of becoming involved in this debate but I think it only right that I place a few points on the record because I believe that the motion the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) has brought before the House is of extreme importance. The recent incident at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary has sparked us all into action, action which was called for prior to the last general election when people were concerned about law and order and respect for the law.

Society has been concerned for a considerable length of time. The repetition of jail breaks has left society questioning the administration of the penal services, questioning parole, questioning temporary leave and questioning the role of the custodial officer. We have to arrive at a happy balance in this matter, Mr. Speaker, because the penal service which was here yesterday is here today and will be here tomorrow. The question is how we can develop such a system to the point that we will have the necessary confidence in it and to see that it receives the proper funding. The committee has an awesome responsibility. I hope they will travel across the country and visit the penitentiaries to discuss matters with the administrators, the custodial officers and the inmates. Unless they do, the results will not be satisfactory.

I am one who believes that you cannot rehabilitate all those who are sent to the penitentiary, but at the same time I am one who believes that in our advanced form of life those who are sent there are deserving of the opportunity, regardless of how depraved they may be, of becoming rehabilitated. What we have to be concerned about is when a person reaches the stage that rehabilitation is no longer a reality; then we must be extremely concerned and take all precautions that are required.

The minister's neck is on the block. The minister must come up with the proper answers because society demands protection. When we talk about society and the inmate, it is the interest of society, the protection of society, that must be borne in mind. We cannot get away from that. I get very disturbed when I read that prisoners are eating steak when we on the outside, the fortunate ones, are eating hot dogs. We must arrive at a proper balance, but it must be weighted in favour of society.

When we talk about rehabilitation some people would say "dig a hole, put them in there and forget about them". What concerns me about that, Mr. Speaker, is that at the end of their term they come out to face society not rehabilitated, and perhaps even more vicious and violent than when they went in. What we have to think about are the alternatives. Do we just put them in jail and forget about them or, in a pragmatic and realistic way, say that during their term in jail they must undergo some program of rehabilitation? I think we must accept the latter view because if we do not, we have been debased and dehumanized. We would be doing a disservice to those we would like to be rehabilitated and to the public which I believe is interested in a reasonable form of rehabilitation.

As I said, we must be concerned about the protection of society. I am an abolitionist because I am concerned about the morality of capital punishment and about the fact that a mistake can be made. I am not convinced that capital punishment is a deterrent. We must be concerned about a proper penal service being established and administered in order that the protection of society shall remain paramount.

The committee has an awesome job. It is expected to solve this age-old problem and have answers within the next couple of months. Whether they can do that or whether the judicial inquiry that the minister has asked for is the better way, I am not sure and I do not think it matters which way it is done. All I know is that at this particular time we are saved by the fact that some chaps are jumping the wall has captured the imagination of Canadians.

I trust and hope that, as a result of this motion, the wisdom of the members who will form the committee will enable them to assess and investigate the situation. Perhaps after due deliberation they will be able to come back with recommendations that will not only satisfy society but that will also satisfy the inmates. We have seen what has happened in the United States; when an inmate is placed in a cell like a dog, he will bark and bite as a dog. The responsibility of this committee is enormous but I have every confidence that it will make the necessary recommendations which the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) can implement in order to make our penal service one of the best in the world.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise to add a number of comments to the debate on the motion before us. As a result of the deep concern that I, and the constituents I represent, feel, we believe that only by means of a public outcry can our confusion be heard. Apparently this is the only manner in which to move the government into a position where it will tackle and solve certain problems. Old standards are being violated but society today wants us to return to basic standards of behaviour and those who break the law will have to be punished accordingly.

Some people wonder why inmates are given privileges which very often are not available to those in the lower economic groups of our society. They look with disbelief when inmates are given hockey tickets and then escape from the game. If I may mention a case in Winnipeg, the Manitoba government paid approximately half a million dollars for hockey tickets to the games of the professional Winnipeg Jets. These were given to many deserving groups, and I do not quarrel with that, but they were also given to various prison societies. The tickets were then given to inmates and we had escapes from the Winnipeg arena as well.

An hon. Member: That was punishment.

Mr. Epp: Watching the Winnipeg Jets was hardly a punishment, Mr. Speaker, though it might be with some other hockey teams! People also question why certain inmates can attend university at public expense. I am not saying this is entirely wrong, but we had a case in our area where an escapee, after stealing property, damaging it and forcing the owner to pay the cost of the damage, was able to attend university and laugh at the rest of us. They question the attitudes which allow this type of rehabilitation system.

I believe our attitude toward crime has, at best, become permissive. Unfortunately, today in our society a person is responsible to no one. It is a basic attitude for too many of our people that one is responsible only to himself. The attitude is: I can do as I please. As long as I do not hurt the other fellow too much, I can do what I please and no one has any business telling me not to do it.

That type of society is one in which I do not want to live. Society has an obligation to teach its young persons basic principles and to expect the middle-aged and old to obey its laws; otherwise, society breaks down and crime increases. We in this country have prided ourselves, perhaps falsely, on the fact that our crime rate is not that of our neighbour to the south, and our cities are safer than those to the south. That may have been the case in the past. Let us not fall into the trap of permissiveness, so that our urban centers will remain the places of safety they have been until now.

The role of prisons is twofold. One is to isolate prisoners from society. Men and women who have broken the law of this country and have been convicted through due process of law have a penalty to pay. If society is to survive, that penalty must be paid. The safety of society through isolating those who insist on breaking the law must be the underlying criterion of imprisonment. We must not lose sight of the fact that incarceration is for the protection of the majority; it is not simply punishment of those who have committed a crime.

Second is the question of rehabilitation. We have now been told that it is not rehabilitation but a reintegration process. This recognition of the need of rehabilitation for members of society is a mark of a civilized society. It is only a civilized society obeying civilized, humane laws which can or will recognize that people who break those laws must be rehabilitated back into the society they forcibly left. Despite the aspects of this society in which we live, the hallmark of our society must be just and equitable laws for the continued well-being of the majority. These laws are not simply for retribution; they are not there for the creation of a police state or for the creation of fear or hatred.

We as individual citizens must subscribe to the laws of this country. If not, we must be punished. While we must be cognizant of the ills in the society in which we live, we cannot allow our attitude to be soft, or one of soft-pedalling those who commit crimes. It might be argued that you cannot legislate morality. You might even take that argument to the nth degree and say that possibly we do not need any laws. The law is there to provide a standard to which all citizens must subscribe. If citizens do not subscribe to that standard, punishment must be invoked. I believe that punishment is a deterrent, not only to the person against being a repeater but to all of us.

Another point that was mentioned today by various speakers was that of Christian principles. In the society in which we live, Christian principles very clearly teach humanity and the value of the individual. Christian principles and the basic view of the value of the individual gave recognition to and became the underlying principle of many of our laws today. While these Christian principles teach the value of the individual, reconciliation and the re-establishment of brotherly love, they also very clearly teach that justice is part and parcel of the Christian principle in a Christian society.

You cannot have justice without punishment. A person who takes it upon himself to break the law of society must pay the penality which society deems necessary for the crime committed. The rehabilitation concept is one of value. However, I believe that a percentage of the inmates who are incarcerated in our federal penitentiaries have made a mockery of the rehabilitation system. They are the ones who have taken advantages of special passes, weekend passes, temporary passes and any other kind of pass that may be devised from one day to the next. They have often broken parole by committing heinous crimes during the period of parole. These hardcore criminals should be dealth with severly; the maximum penalty that the law provides should be imposed.

Society today is questioning the guidelines governing our rehabilitation system. I wish to cite an example of what happened in a provincial jail at Headingley, Manitoba. The Manitoba government hired an ex-inmate who was to work with the inmates and potential employers as inmates were approaching the time when they would be back in society. The guards in that jail protested the hiring of this ex-inmate. The minister of health and social development for the province, in defending this ex-inmate, said that the man had qualifications. He said the man was qualified because he "had gone the whole route". What an apprenticeship program for that particular job!

In order to return to the rationale of protecting society and providing rehabilitation within the restrictions that must be imposed if society must still be protected, it cannot be said that all persons who are advocating rehabilitation are bleeding hearts. They are moved by the massive number of human lives that have been wrecked by crime. We see young men who have made wrong decisions at a very early age and have embarked upon a road leading to crime and imprisonment. I am sure every member is aware of the tremendous price many of these people pay and the price society has to pay in lost ability and potential.

I suggest to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) that we strengthen our rehabilitation program. Personally, I believe that prison chaplains have made a great contribution in our prisons. I would like to see an increase, not only in funds for but in the role of prison chaplains. We must keep in mind that justice can only be served if penalties are imposed and we insist that they be paid by those who break the laws of society.

I subscribe to the establishment of a special committee as the Solicitor General sees fit, that we proceed to strengthen the law and that we fulfil the trust society has given to us. However, it must be an orderly society. Where heads should roll, let them roll. As this clean-up proceeds, the Solicitor General will have our support and I am sure he will earn the gratitude of all Canadian citizens.

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak for very long. I agree with almost everything that has been said by members on both sides of this House. I extend my sympathies to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) because he is in a very difficult position. I was told when I first came to the House of Commons in early January that the job of the Solicitor General was one of the most onerous in the cabinet. I hope the committee, when it is set up, will be composed of people with wide-ranging interests, because with all due respect to the profession of law, lawyers do have limitations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesdoly: I was very interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald). She said the investigation should be wide-ranging and indicated that the whole subject of equality in sentencing should be looked at closely. I have for many years read a lot of newspapers and something I read seven or eight years ago struck me as being very odd. A report appeared in a Saskatchewan paper about prison sentences meted out in the province. One individual who had embezzled $12,000 from a bank received a suspended sentence of two years while another who forged a cheque for $75 got a six month jail sentence. Both of these crimes were first offences. Maybe there were differing circumstances but the disparity struck me then as being peculiar. I had noticed many similar anomalies in the intervening years.

There is a great deal of mistrust of our whole system of justice because of the existence of crime and dishonesty in high places. To the south, we find a government which ran an election campaign on the platform of law and order, but which is itself breaking the law. We must remember that a man becomes a prisoner only if he is caught and convicted. Many offenders are never caught or convicted. They still live in our midst.

I have been a school principal for many years and I have dealt with all kinds of youngsters. In the last 23 years I have noticed a great deal of change in our youth. Youth is becoming extremely cynical about the way in which the laws of our nation are enforced, because different standards seem to be applied to different people. When these cynical people reach our prisons, there are problems.

The enforcers of the laws are themselves sometimes its transgressors. Many a time I have had a young person in my office who would say: Mr. Nesdoly, I did not stop at a stop sign; I was stopped and ordered to pay a $25 fine. I said, all right, you broke the law, so you pay it. Then, he said: You know there is a policeman down Main Street who makes a U-turn in the middle of the street; that is against the law, but he can do it; he was not chasing criminals, or anything. Or a local magistrate can park his car on the wrong side of the street without any attention being paid to it. These things have been brought to my attention too many times for them not to contain some elements of truth.

I believe the committee should look at the high proportion of our prison population represented by Indian and Metis people. It seems to me there is a disproportionate number of them in our prisons. Why are they there, and what sort of rehabilitation program is being carried on to help them?

Perhaps we should be considering, too, the question of the location of prisons. Why do they need to be so close to cities? Why not farther north? Some people say they must be close to services. We must remember that Australia was colonized by convicts. So was Siberia.

An hon. Member: And Newfoundland!

Mr. Nesdoly: I am not going to comment on that remark. I think we should give further thought to the location of our prisons if any new prisons are to be built.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the hon. member speaks now, we hope he closes the debate.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I hope so, too, Mr. Speaker. This has been a long debate, an exhausting debate, a debate which could have been avoided had the motion made yesterday under Standing Order 43 been accepted.

One thing I want to mention before I discuss the mechanics of the committee, which is the purpose of my rising, is that I have listened carefully throughout the debate to members from both sides discussing the various aspects of the motion, but no one has yet mentioned the demoralizing effect which the bail reform law and the ease with which escapes are made from our penal institutions has had on law enforcement agencies. Premature parole and the operations of the bail reform legislation are seriously impeding the work of law enforcement agencies and seriously affecting the morale of those agencies throughout the country.

With respect to the committee itself, the reason a select committee of the House was suggested yesterday under Standing Order 43, and today in the standing committee, and by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) was primarily because of these two factors: first, the workload which now lies on the plate of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and, second, the need for acting with haste in connection with this inquiry. The standing committee will not have finished its examination of the estimates of the Solicitor General's department until the end of the month. It will then embark upon consideration of the wiretapping legislation which has been referred to it. Judging from the interest shown in this legislation during the second reading stage in the House, its consideration will certainly take at least until the third week of June.

The committee which will be authorized by the House to study the matters embodied in the resolution before us must act much more rapidly, so it will be my intention to try to convince the steering committee that a sub-committee of the standing committee be struck, composed, perhaps, of three members from this side of the House and three members from the other side of the House together with one member from the New Democratic party and one member from the Social Credit party. This committee would be small enough to act with flexibility and the degree of haste necessary. I would suggest that it set about its work visiting the institutions which are causing the most chronic problems as well as those which might be described by some in the Solicitor General's department as being models for penal institutions.

In order to set up a subcommittee to accomplish that sort of task it may well be, and likely will be, that the standing committee will have to be enlarged by eight additional members. I understand that discussions have taken place among the House leaders, and the government would not resist an enlarged Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs should the committee make that recommendation to the House. I hope it will do so as its very next meeting, and that necessary steps are taken to enlarge the committee by eight members, or by whatever number the committee deems advisable, thus permitting the subcommittee to be formed and to set about its work at once.

The need for rapid action is demonstrated by all who have participated in this debate and by the events that have occurred. I will not discuss the merits here because I hope to be a member of that subcommittee, if the suggestion is adopted, and there will be plenty of time to make my comments at that stage. Certainly I do not want to flog the Solicitor General any more tonight. We are compassionate people on this side of the House and in my view he has been flogged sufficiently today to draw emphatically to his attention the very deep-rooted dissatisfaction, not only of members of opposition parties but members of his own party, with the manner in which the penitentiary system is functioning.

In addition, there have been comments relating to the bail reform legislation, the parole system and the temporary leave of absence program which must convince the Solicitor General that there is a great deal to be desired. We were promised some kind of action by his predecessor well over a year ago with respect to the bail reform legislation, but we have not had action. Neither have we had action with respect to the penal system.

Not all ill winds blow no good, and perhaps the events of the day have had one advantageous effect, at any rate, and that is to focus public attention on this question and to bring Parliament to the point where it finally takes action. It is my hope and the hope of those on this side of the House that we agree to set up a small subcommittee which will have the flexibility and rapidity of movement to enable an early report to be made to the House, hopefully a report that will not be ignored, one containing recommendations that will be accepted by the government and which will go a long way toward curing the problems confronting the Solicitor General's department.

MANPOWER

LACK OF SUMMER JOBS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that, on the one hand, thousands of young people will be unemployed this summer and that, on the other hand, there is a shortage of skilled manpower in the farming industry, I request the unanimous consent of the House pursuant to Standing Order 43 in order to move a motion concerning this very important and extremely urgent matter. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That a special committee of this House be created without any further delay in order to consider the serious problem of youth unemployment, as well as the shortage of skilled agricultural manpower, and that the said committee be instructed to make recommendations to the minister in order to solve this problem and to report to this House before June 15, 1973.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not and the motion of the hon. member cannot therefore be put.

TRANSPORT

SUPPLY OF FREIGHT CARS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in light of several telegrams I have received in the last few days, I am rising pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On several occasions this matter has been brought to the attention of the House; I am referring to the lack of rail cars available to the lumber industry in British Columbia. The CNR has drastically cut back their supply of cars to British Columbia over the last three months, and this has now had disastrous effects since several plants have had to shut down. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That this House move to strike a special committee under the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to investigate all matters relating to this very serious situation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion also requires unanimous consent since it is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LANGUAGE TRAINING COURSES

Question No. 28—Mr. Coates:

1. What is the total number of public servants who have been involved in language training courses to December 31, 1972?

2. Of the total number, how many were involved in French language instruction and how many in English language instruction?

3. Of the number entering courses in language instruction in both English and French, how many have successfully completed the courses entered?

4. How many persons are now employed by the government in language training programmes and what is the estimated cost in salaries and expenses for these persons in the fiscal year 1972-73?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): The answer, in so far as the Language Bureau of the Public Service Commission is concerned, is as follows: 1, 2 and 3.

	Number of students involved since 1964	Number of students who have graduated and/or who have passed the language knowledge examination
English Courses.....	4,320	1,935
French Courses.....	16,407	2,122
Total.....	20,727	4,057

Order Paper Questions

The data is as of December 31, 1972

N.B. It should be noted that the intensive language training program of three weeks three times a year was begun in 1968. It takes approximately three years for a student to complete this program and, therefore, the first graduates in quantity have only begun to emerge from the system. Further, continuous language training courses will begin this year and these are expected to provide a larger number of graduates by the completion of their formal language training within a twelve-month period.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 450—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Company of Young Canadians adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that agency's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same agency who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that agency?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and by the Company of Young Canadians as follows: 1. Departments' policy on bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

2. At the Ottawa office: 25 employees. (a) English unilingual, 7 employees, 28 per cent; (b) French unilingual, 0; (c) Bilingual, 18 employees, 72 per cent. In the field, field staff and volunteers speak the language spoken by those with whom they work.

3. The CYC was created in 1966. Records at the national office were not maintained in a manner to provide such information.

4. No amount is specifically budgeted for the development of bilingualism. The cost of providing administration, communication and publication services in both official languages is borne out of general operating revenues.

TARIFF BOARD—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 451—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Tariff Board adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that agency's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same agency who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that agency?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and Tariff Board as follows: 1. Departments' policy on bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. (a) 19 English unilingual, 57.5 per cent; (b) none; (c) 14 bilingual, 42.4 per cent.

3. Figures not available.

4. No separate budget item.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 452—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Canadian International Development Agency adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that agency's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same agency who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that agency?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Canadian International Development Agency as follows: 1. Departments' policy on bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. (a) English unilingual		382	49.4 per cent
(b) French unilingual		31	4.1 per cent
(c) Bilingual—
Anglophone bilingual	94
Francophone bilingual	265	359	46.5 per cent
Totals		772	100.0 per cent

3. No statitics on bilingualism are available prior to 1970.

(a) English unilingual		324	58.2 per cent
(b) French unilingual		28	5.0 per cent
(c) Bilingual—
Anglophone bilingual	45
Francophone bilingual	160	205	36.8 per cent
Totals		557	100.0 per cent

4. From 1960 to 1970, no budget was allocated for the development of bilingualism.

—For the fiscal year 1971-1972, $81,000 and 9 man-years were allocated.

—For the fiscal year 1972-1973, $357,000 and 33.5 man-years were allocated.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 453—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Canadian Radio-Television Commission adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that agency's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same agency who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that agency?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Canadian Radio-Television Commission as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. Linguistic status of the CRTC employees at the present time: (a) English unilingual—127—46 per cent; (b) French unilingual—5—2 per cent; (c) Bilingual—142—52 per cent of which: 119 Francophones—43.5 per cent, 23 Anglophones—8.5 per cent.

Total number of employees at the CRTC as of January 1, 1973: 274.

N.B. These statistics do not take into account the casual employees and the persons under contact.

3. Linguistic status of the CRTC employees since 1960: The CRTC having been created in 1968, we shall give statistics only for the years 1968 and 1970. Moreover, since the tests of second language is only relative.

1968: (a) English unilingual—49—44 per cent; (b) French unilingual—None; (c) Bilingual—63—56 per cent of which: 58 Francophones—52 per cent, 5 Anglophones—4 per cent.

Total number of employees as of May 31, 1968: 112.

1970: (a) English unilingual—85—44 per cent; (b) French unilingual—3—1.5 per cent; (c) Bilingual—107—56 per cent of which: 94 Francophones—49 per cent, 13 Anglophones—7 per cent.

Total number of employees as of October 1, 1970: 192.

4. Budget allocated to bilingualism:

N.B. The following figures take into account only the direct costs which were incurred within the official bilingualism programs:

During this period funds were re-allocated from other projects, however, precise information on the amount is not available.

MINISTER OF STATE FOR SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 460—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Ministry of State for Science and Technology adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that department's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same department who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that department?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Ministry of State for Science and Technology as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. (a) 61.2 per cent; (b) 2.3 per cent; (c) 36.5 per cent.

3. Not applicable as the Ministry of State for Science and Technology was formed in August, 1971.

4. The period 1960 to March 31, 1972 is not applicable as all expenses of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology up to March 31, 1972 were paid from Privy Council appropriations. 1972-73, $23,000.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 461—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Public Service Commission adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that agency's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same agency who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that agency?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2.	Number	Total percentage
English unilingual	595	27%
French unilingual	922*	41%
Bilingual	717	32%

* 574 employees of the Public Service Commission are engaged in teaching the French language and 219 in monitoring French language retention. 793 positions, therefore, require a thorough knowledge of the French language.

N.B. An employee who passes the Commission's Language Knowledge Examination and obtains a mark which is equal or superior to that which has been established as the minimum required for his occupational group is considered bilingual. An employee who has not tried the examination (which is optional) is considered to be unilingual. It should be noted, however, that every employee who has not tried the test or has not completed his language training is not necessarily unilingual though the records will show him as such. Because of employee turnover, of the continuous process of testing, and because of language training, the figures given above are not static.

3. Prior to 1968, records were not kept based on this type of identification. In 1969 and 1970 some research was carried out. However, it was centered around the bilingual population. In 1969, 27% of the employees claimed to be bilingual. The instruments for testing and establishing standards were being developed and started to be used in mid-1970. Consequently, no meaningful figures are available to supply an answer to this question.

4. No special budget was allocated before 1969. In 1969, the budget allocated was, $15,585; in 1970, it was; 18,982; in 1971, it was, 204,000; in 1972, it was, 1,209,925.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Secretary of State Department as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. All employees have not been tested for language proficiency. However, a survey across the Department has indicated the following: (a) Employees using English as sole or main language of work 14 per cent or 265; (b) Employees using French as sole or main language of work 16 per cent or 303; (c) Employees using both English and French in their work situation 70 per cent or 1,325.

3. No figures are available as it was not until 1970 that methods for testing and establishing standards were developed.

4. 1960-70, Nil; 1971-72, $64,000 for last quarter of fiscal year; 1972-73, $565,000.

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 477—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Department of Regional Economic Expansion adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that department's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same department who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that department?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. English unilingual, 585, 64 per cent; French unilingual, 100, 11 per cent; Bilingual, 227, 25 per cent.

3. 1960-68—The Department was established in April 1969. 1970: English unilingual, 617, 69 per cent; French unilingual, 83, 9 per cent; Bilingual, 194, 22 per cent.

4. 1969, $20,000; 1970, $27,600; 1971, $65,100; 1972, $215,500.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 478—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Department of Public Works adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that department's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same department who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that department?

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Department of Public Works as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. (a) English unilingual, 2,110, 76.0 per cent of the total non-operational; (b) French unilingual, 226, 8.25 per cent of the total non-operational; (c) Bilingual, 427, 15.45 per cent of the total non-operational.

3. The Department began establishing records of language skills in 1971 and at first, only recorded those that were bilingual—not those that were unilingual English or unilingual French. Out of a total of 2,593 professional, administrative and managerial staff, 337 or 13 per cent were bilingual. It had not established language records for operational staff.

4. 1969-70, $19,644; 1970-71, $32,500; 1971-72, $169,000; 1972-73, $532,000. These figures cover only the direct expenses of the office of the Adviser on Bilingualism. The Department has not segregated expenses involved in translation of documents, manuals, signs etc. nor expenses involved with attendance at language training.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 479—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Post Office Department adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that department's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same department who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that department?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Post Office Department as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

Present Total Staff	Present No. /% of bilingual staff		Present No. /% of employees using French as sole or main language of work		Present No. /% of employees using English as sole or main language of work
	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%
20,588	2,541	10	5,860	29	14,698	71

These figures include only the National Capital Region and other areas or districts where there is a significant bilingual population. Other areas do not keep records of bilingual employees.

3. We have no figures for these periods.

4. Prior to the fiscal year 1971-72 there was no special budget for the Programme on Bilingualism activities and charges were made to the Personnel Branch budget. 1971-72, $100,725; 1972-73, $149,549.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 480—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Department of National Revenue adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that department's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same department who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that department?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Department of the National Revenue as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of Official Language Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

By National Revenue, Customs and Excise:

2. (a) and (b)—Records are not kept in such a way as to make it practical to answer those parts. (c) Number of bilingual employees is 1868. The percentage based on a total work force of 8301 is 22.6 per cent.

3. (a), (b) and (c)—Records are not kept in such a way as to make it practical to answer this question.

4. For the period from 1960 to 1970 inclusive, there was no budget allocated specifically for the development of bilingualism in this department. For the two fiscal years since 1970, the departmental allocation for bilingualism was as follows:

1971-72		1972-73
Man-Years	Dollars	Man-Years	Dollars
12	230,000	148	1,707,500

By National Revenue, Taxation:

2. The following numbers and percentages of departmental personnel are effective on December 31, 1972: (a) English unilingual, 7,854, 75.7 per cent; (b) French unilingual, 1,232, 12.0 per cent; (c) Bilingual, 1,329, 12.3 per cent.

3. The information required by this question is not available. (The departmental language testing and identification program was not completed until the fall '72, therefore, the figures requested are not available prior to 1972).

4. The total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism within the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, is as follows: 1972-73, $1,647,400; 1971-72, $667,920. In years previous to 1971-72, no funds were separately budgeted for the development of bilingualism as such.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 481—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that department's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same department who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that department?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Department of National Health and Welfare as follows: 1. Departments' policy on bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2 and 3. Employees may only be considered as officially bilingual on the basis of having successfully completed the Public Service Commission second language proficiency test and met all standards set for their particular work category. Since this test is not compulsory, there may be certain persons who are in fact bilingual and who are not counted as such. However for the purpose of this question, all employees not bilingual, are considered to be unilingual. There is, at present, no basis for officially identifying unilingual French or unilingual English employees. The information requested in 2 and 3 was not available before 1971. Listed below are the data available since this date regarding the language proficiency of employees is compiled for departmental requirements.

	(a) and (b)			(c)
Year	Total number of employees	Total number of unilinguals	%	Total number of bilinguals	%
1971.....	6,752	6,245	92.5	507	7.5
1972.....	6,938	6,441	92.7	497	7.3
1973.....	7,124	6,559	92.1	565	7.9

4. There is no easily retrievable information as to monies spent for Bilingualism in NHW before 1971. The Departmental Budget for bilingualism allocated in 1971-72 was $138,000 and in 1972-73 is $419,000.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 482—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Department of National Defence adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that department's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) Bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same department who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that department?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Department of National Defence as follows: 1. Departments' policy on bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. On 31 December, 1972 there were (a) 61,960 (76%) unilingual Anglophones (b) 10,422 (13%) unilingual Francophones (c) 9,000 (11%) bilingual Canadian Armed Forces personnel. There are 30,976 permanent civilian employees in the Department. Some have been tested as to their linguistic competence, others have made self-declarations of bilingual capability but these self-declarations in some instances have proven too unreliable to be included in statistics therefore no accurate figures for (a), (b) or (c) above are available.

3. Prior to 1972, personnel statistics did not reflect this information. In order to provide an accurate answer, additional staff would be required in a large number of field units to peruse files to ascertain self-declaration at the times listed. The Department does not have the resources that would be required to employ such additional staff, nor, as indicated in (2) above would reliable statistics result.

4. No cost data is available for the fiscal years 1960-61 to 1967-68. During the fiscal years 1968-69 to 1971-72 inclusive no funds were specifically allocated for language training activities, however, it is estimated that the following amounts were used for the development of bilingualism in the Department: 1968-69—$3,865,500; 1969-70—$3,782,400; 1970-71—$5,757,200; 1971-72—$14,825,100. The 1972-73 estimate is in the neighbourhood of $28,094,600 of which $14,503,500 represents salaries of personnel on Language Training.

N.B. The total number of language training graduates to December 31, 1972 is 3,080. In addition, 977 Language Bureau students passed the commissions language knowledge examination and are considered sufficiently bilingual to perform the duties of their positions.

*Included in the drop-out rate are students who left the Public Service or were transferred out of the country or to regions where training facilities are not available.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Question No. 656—Mr. Coates:

1. How many appeals have been initiated against decisions of the Department of National Health and Welfare by applicants for a disability pension under the Canada Pension Plan?

2. Of the total number of unfavourable decisions rendered, how many were appealed, and of that total number, how many appeals were successful when heard by the Review Board?

3. How many of the favourable decisions rendered on appeal of the Review Committee have been appealed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the Pension Appeals Board, and of those appeals considered and decided by the Pension Appeals Board, how many confirmed the decision of the Review Committee and how many were unfavourable?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): All answers refer to the period from February 1, 1970 (when payment of disability pensions commenced) to December 31, 1972.

1. Appeals to the minister for reconsideration of the initital decision, 1,833.

2. Of the 7,501 decisions which were unfavourable to the applicants, out of a total of 36,881 decisions, 1,833 were appealed to the minister for reconsideration of the initial decision; 833 of these appeals were not upheld by the minister and, of these, 159 requested a Review Committee hearing, 35 being successful.

3. The minister appealed to the Pension Appeals Board in 23 cases. He subsequently withdrew two appeals after obtaining additional medical evidence which allowed him to grant the pension. Of the 21 cases remaining, 10 have been heard: in one case the decision of the Review Committee was confirmed on the basis of new evidence, seven decisions were in favour of the minister and two decisions have not yet been given.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—PREMIUM REVENUE AND BENEFITS

Question No. 757—Mr. Roche:

1. How much did the government receive in UIC employer-employee contributions for the calendar year 1972?

2. Is this the total amount to be received by the government as provided for under the Act, and, if not, what amount has the government estimated to be the total employer-employee contribution for the calendar year, 1972?

3. How many individuals have drawn benefits under the Unemployment Insurance plan from January 1 to December 31, 1972, on a monthly basis?

4. How many individuals drew UIC benefits between January 1 and December 31, 1971, on a monthly basis?

5. What was the average length of time of a benefit period from January 1 to December 31, 1972, not including maternity benefits?

6. (a) What percentage of all individuals drawing UIC benefits during the period January 1, 1972 to the latest month for which statistics are available, received (i) the maximum benefit (ii) the minimum benefit (b) what was the amount of the average benefit?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. $715 million.

2. This represents both the actual revenue received and the estimated revenue for 1972. The final figure will not be known until all T-4's have been collected in August 1973 and any adjustments will be made at that time.

3 and 4. Beneficiaries of Unemployment Insurance Benefits—All Claim Types

January	591,000	620,000
February	692,000	697,000
March	640,000	697,000
April	692,000	665,000
May	550,000	590,000
June	279,000	520,000
July	264,000	527,000
August	265,000	530,000
September	269,000	478,000
October	269,000	492,000
November	319,000	537,000
December	414,000	625,000
Annual Average	437,000	582,000

5. The average length of time on regular and fishing benefits during 1972 was 17.2 weeks.

6. (a) (i) 13.7 per cent of all claimants qualifying for benefits in 1972 were eligible for the maximum weekly benefit of $100. (ii) 0.3 per cent were eligible for the minimum weekly benefit of $20. (b) The average weekly benefit amount paid during 1972 was $62.

CANADIAN-UNITED STATES BOX CARS

Question No. 972—Mr. Korchinski:

1. In the past three years (a) what revenues were received by each railway in Canada as a result of the use of Canadian boxcars on American lines (b) what payments were made to American railways for the use of American box cars and by which railways?

2. What is the average duration in which Canadian box cars are retained in the United States?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The car rental tariffs currently in use by North American Railways are complex in that the rates vary with the age and original cost of cars and the mileages they travel while on lines other than the owning railways'; the information is therefore not at hand.

2. The records of the companies are not maintained in such a manner as to enable ready identification of specific types of equipment, such as box cars.

CITIZENSHIP PROGRAM

Question No. 1,071—Mr. Grier:

1. Does the Department of the Secretary of State plan to provide citizenship outreach programs in 1973?

2. Will such plans include provisions for qualified personnel to be available outside normal working hours, and in locations other than citizenship offices, to process the first and second stages of citizenship applications?

3. When would such procedures be ready to take effect?

4. Will consideration be given to training or otherwise enabling persons, other than departmental employees, to process the first two stages of citizenship applications?

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes, where necessary.

3. A decision on these programs has now been taken and recruitment of the necessary personnel to implement them will start shortly.

4. Where no departmental facilities exist, such arrangements have already been made for a number of courts to process citizenship applications.

CAR RENTAL CONCESSIONS AT MINISTRY AIRPORTS

Question No. 1,294—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the policy of the Department of Transport in regard to the number of car rental concessions allowed at major airports?

2. Is there adequate counter space at air terminals to allow the five major car rental firms proper operating space?

3. Is there adequate parking space at major air terminals to allow four or five car rental concessions?

4. Are difficulties being experienced at the present time by the Department of Transport managers in providing parking space for car rental firms?;

5. Does the Department of Transport have information on how many car rental firms are allowed at the London, England and Miami, Florida Airports or other major cities in the USA or Europe and, if so, what is it?

6. Is it the policy of the Minister of Transport to allow only one limousine concessionaire, one book shop and one barber shop but allows unlimited car rental operators and, if so, for what reason?

7. Would the Minister of Transport consider consulting with Canadian-owned car rental firms to reach an amicable solution to the number of concessionaires to be allowed at major airports?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The policy of the Ministry of Transport with respect to car rental concessions is: (a) The company must be able to serve at least 50 per cent of the Ministry's Airports which already have car rental service and the system must be established in the cities served by those airports; (b) The company must have a Canadian head office with which the Ministry would negotiate, and which would be signatory to the agreement with the Ministry i.e., the Ministry would not deal with individual franchised operators; (c) If the company meets these two criteria it would be required to pay an annual guaranteed fee equal to the average annual concession fee being paid by the other car rental systems established at Ministry Airports.

2. Any new car rental concession could not be assured of receiving accommodation at all airports equal to that enjoyed by the four car rental firms presently operating at these airports.

3 and 4. Parking space is limited at some of the major airport terminal buildings. A new concession could not be assured of being provided with the same equivalent space of present car rental companies.

5. The number of car rental firms allowed at European and United States airports varies, but the Ministry does not have information as to the exact number operating at these airports.

6. The limousine operations are licensed and controlled by provincial authorities. Concessions for the book and barber shops are not exclusive and are awarded on the basis of a public tender call. It is the practice to grant one concession when it is considered that the business offering would not justify the provision of additional facilities.

7. In the past, the Ministry has consulted with the car rental industry in developing the policy and is prepared to continue to do so, either individually or collectively.

PORTNEUF CONSTITUENCY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOLS

Question No. 1,377—Mr. Godin:

Since 1965, has the government contributed financially to the construction of schools and the purchase of equipment in the constituency of Portneuf and, if so (a) to how many projects have such grants been applied (b) what was the total amount for each project (c) on what date were such amounts paid?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Manpower and Immigration as follows: (a) 6; (b) See attached table; (c) This information is not readily available and would require an inordinate cost and length of time to prepare.

Financial Contribution by the Government of Canada for the Construction of Schools and the Purchase of Equipment in Portneuf

PENITENTIARIES—COST OF MAINTENANCE AND PAROLE SUPERVISION OF INMATES, 1972

Question No. 1,471—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What was the average cost of maintaining one inmate during the year 1972 in (a) federal institution of all types (b) maximum security institutions (c) medium security institutions (d) minimum security institutions (e) farm and work camps?

2. What is the average cost of parole supervision per parolee for the year 1972?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. (a) $9,325; (b) $9,839; (c) $8,458; (d) $4,518; (e) farm and work camps are, in fact, classified as minimum security institutions. Accordingly, maintenance costs of inmates in farm and work camps have been included with (d) above.

2. $1,280.

NOTES:—Part 1 The average cost of maintaining inmates for the fiscal year 1971-72 is based on actual operational and maintenance expenditures and the amortization of total capital costs. The decrease in the total average cost per inmate from 1970-71 is due to the implementation of improved accounting procedures which included an amortization of 20 per cent on capital costs and of 10 per cent on equipment costs. Part 2 The figure $1,280 includes the cost of maintaining the National Parole Board, the cost of supervision, communication, travel, training and education, stationery, supplies, administrative support, and capital cost, as well as the cost of revocations and forfeitures, and case preparation for those inmates not subsequently granted parole. However, the cost of hiring a parole officer, paying his accommodation, clerical assistance, travelling, etc., would be approximately $20,000. He could supervise 40 cases on parole. This means that the cost of maintaining an individual on parole would amount to approximately $500, exclusive of general overhead costs for administration of the parole board and case preparation.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—ADVERTISING COSTS

Question No. 1,510—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the total amount being spent to explain the new T4U slip in all media and how is this divided among (a) newspapers (b) radio (c) television?

2. What advertising agency is handling this matter?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Although all the invoices have not yet been received it is expected that the total cost of T4U advertising will be approximately $290,000; (a) Newspapers $200,000; (b) Radio $90,000; (c) Television, nil.

2. (i) The newspaper advertising was handled by Omnicom Advertising Limited; (ii) The radio advertising was handled by our own Public Relations Branch.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Question No. 1,517—Mr. Reynolds:

1. How many Air Traffic Controllers are there in Canada at the present time?

2. How many were there in 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

3. How many hours of overtime have been worked by the Air Traffic Controllers in 1969, 1970, 1971, 1972 and 1973 to date?

4. How much was paid in overtime in 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

5. What are the present salary levels of Air Traffic Controllers?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. Two thousand and fifteen.

2. 1,157; 1,606; 1,734; 1,904.

3. 103,154; 181,713; 163,458; 156,527; 15,530.

4. $1,026,407; $1,607,206; $1,946,579; $2,026,258.

5. AI-00, $5,750 to $6,350; AI-1, $8,175 to $9,727; AI-2, $9,739 to $11,589; AI-3, $11,104 to $13,218; AI-4, $12,539 to $14,930; AI-5, $14,414 to $17,159; AI-6, $16,076 to $18,268; AI-7, $17,052 to $19,377; AI-8, $18,029 to $20,488; AI-9, $19,079 to $21,676.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—OVER-SNOW SUPPORT VEHICLE

Question No. 1,522—Mr. Rowland:

1. Are the Canadian Armed Forces currently considering the purchase of an over-snow support vehicle?

2. What are the names of the vehicles and their manufacturers currently being considered for this function?

3. How many units is it anticipated would be purchased and what would be the per unit price?

4. What is the anticipated total expenditure on the purchase of such a vehicle?

5. Will any eventual contract for purchase contain the provision that the vehicle must be manufactured in Canada?

6. Would any eventual contract for purchase contain provisions for regional distribution of expenditures on the vehicle?

7. On what date may an announcement with respect to the letting of the contract be expected?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and the Department of Supply and Services as follows: 1. Yes, evaluation trials are now under way and are expected to be concluded in July 1973.

2. Dynatrac Mark 2, Oversnow vehicle, Flextrac Nodwell, Calgary Alberta; Volvo BV202, Bandwagen, Bolinder Munktell, Sweden.

3 and 4. Approximately 300 vehicles. Sufficient information is not available to allow a realistic estimate to be made of either the unit or total program cost at this time.

5. The provisions of the purchase contract cannot be determined until the source of supply has been selected. It is Canadian government policy always to take Canadian content into consideration when selecting a source of supply.

6. No special contract provisions are contemplated at this time.

7. Later in 1973.

CAPITAL MURDER

Question No. 1,549—Mr. Olaussen:

In each year 1952 to 1962, what was the number of (a) people executed for capital murder (b) capital murders?

PAYMENT TO TRIDENT STEAMSHIP COMPANY FOR SERVICES BETWEEN HALIFAX AND ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

Question No. 1,655—Mr. Crouse:

1. What amount of money is paid the Trident Steamship Company for services provided between Halifax, Nova Scotia and St. John's, Newfoundland?

2. (a) What are the terms of the contract (b) on what date does it expire?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: 1. A subsidy in the amount of $12 per ton of general cargo carried between Halifax, N.S. and St. John's, Nfld. with a minimum annual payment of $300,000.

2. (a) For the five year period ending March 31, 1977, the minimum service shall be one round trip per week, weather and ice conditions permitting. The above subsidy amount is guaranteed for three years. The subsidy payable for the remaining two years of the agreement will be an amount agreed upon by the Commission and the contractor after a revision of the Company's over-all operating results at that time; (b) The subsidy agreement expires on March 31, 1977.

*POTENTIAL TRADE ACTION BY UNITED STATES AGAINST CANADA

Question No. 1,800—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. On what dates since January 1, 1973, did the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce communicate with the Secretary of Commerce of the United States regarding possible or potential trade action by the United States against Canada?

2. Have letters of protest to the United States Government been sent by either the Prime Minister or the Minister and, if so, on what dates and to whom?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is as follows: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce met with the U.S. Secretary of Commerce, as well as with the Secretary of the Treasury, March 29, in Washington and had discussions on the trade situation.

In answer to part 2, our concerns about possible U.S. trade actions have been made known verbally, both by the minister and in government to government consultations. In addition, there have been a number of formal representations made to the U.S. authorities through normal diplomatic channels, for example, Michelin. In so far as the Prime Minister's office is concerned, the answer is no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a wonderful answer of indefiniteness.

POSSIBILITY OF USING CAR FERRY "PRINCESS OF NANAIMO" BETWEEN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,811—Mr. Neale (Vancouver East):

1. What inquiries were made regarding the possibility of using the car ferry Princess of Nanaimo in the service between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland for which the ferry Travetal is now being used?

2. What was the outcome of these inquiries?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The government of Canada made no inquiries regarding the possibility of using any vessels in the service between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland now being served by the ferry Travetal" as this service is a privately operated service owned by the Trident Shipping Company. We understand that the vessel referred to, the Princess of Nanaimo, has been renamed the Henry Osborne and is in a competitive service to the Travetal.

2. Not applicable.

DISPUTE BETWEEN PELEE ISLAND SHIPPING COMPANY AND UNION

Question No. 1,832—Mr. Grier:

1. Does a legal dispute presently exist between the Pelee Island Shipping Company Limited and the union representing the Company employees and, if so (a) what are the detailed reasons for the dispute (b) what methods have been taken, and are presently being taken, to resolve the dispute?

2. Is the operator of the ferry Pelee Islander in full compliance with the provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): 1. Yes; (a) The union has been seeking to conclude a collective agreement following certification as bargaining agent by the Canada Labour Relations Board on June 30, 1971; (b) The dispute has gone through the full conciliation process under the legislation, beginning with the appointment of a Conciliation Officer, a Conciliation Board and further post-conciliation mediation by the Conciliation Officer. At the union's request, an Industry Specialist was appointed as mediator on March 13 pursuant to Section 195 of the Canada Labour Code. He has brought about a settlement.

2. Yes. The settlement terms comply with the provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

2. With regard to the Canada Pension Plan, from April 1, 1972 to March 31, 1973 (a) what were the total employer and employee contributions (b) what were the total benefits paid out in this period (c) how much money was in the fund as of March 31, 1973?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) $4,404.5 million; (including contributions from the self-employed); (b) $297.8 million; (c) $4,778.5 million.

*2. (a) $897.4 million, (including contributions from the self-employed); (b) $206.3 million; (c) $5,794.1 million.

*The above amounts have not been finalized for the fiscal year 1972-73 and may be subject to minor revisions.

CANADIAN EQUESTRIAN ASSOCIATION

Question No. 1,856—Mr. Paproski:

1. Who is the Director of the Canadian Equestrian Association and what is his salary?

2. What was the total amount granted to this Association for the fiscal years 1971-72 and 1972-73?

3. What is the projected grant for this Association for the fiscal year 1973-74?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. To the knowledge of the Department of National Health and Welfare, no Executive Director has yet been appointed by this association.

2. 1971-72, Nil; 1972-73, $19,280.

3. Not known at this time.

CANADIAN YACHTING ASSOCIATION

Question No. 1,857—Mr. Paproski:

1. Who is the Director of the Canadian Yachting Association and what is his salary?

2. What was the total amount granted to this Association for the fiscal years 1971-72 and 1972-73?

3. What is the projected grant for this Association for the fiscal year 1973-74?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Mr. Terry Phillips (Executive Director). The salary of the Executive Director is the responsibility of the Association.

2. 1971-72, $38,618; 1972-73, $90,689.

3. No grant has yet been approved for 1973-74.

COMPENSATION TO POTATO GROWERS

Question No. 1,860—Mr. Godin:

For the years (a) 1970 (b) 1971, what were the amounts paid by the government to compensate potato producers for damages sustained by their crops in the constituencies of (i) Champlain (ii) Portneuf (iii) Montmorency?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Nil.

*HONOURS RECEIVED FROM KING GEORGE VI AND HER MAJESTY, ELIZABETH II SINCE 1947

Question No. 1,864—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What Canadians have since 1947, and on what dates, received honours from King George VI and Her Majesty Elizabeth II which are the Crown's prerogative to confer?

2. Have any such honours been awarded (a) without consultation (b) with the consent of the Government of Canada and, if so, to whom?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The answer to part 1 is as follows: Since 1947 the following Canadians received from the late King George VI and from Her Majesty The Queen honours which are the personal gift of The Sovereign. Order of Merit: November 17, 1947, Rt. Hon. W. L. MacKenzie King; January 1, 1953, Wilder G. Penfield, M.D.; May 28, 1971, Rt. Hon. Lester B. Pearson; Royal Victorian Chain: July 23, 1960, Rt. Hon. Vincent Massey; Royal Victorian Order: January 1, 1969, Miss Mary Goldie, M.V.O. (IV); January 1, 1972, Esmond Butler, C.V.O. It is usual that The Sovereign informs the Prime Minister when such honours are to be conferred.

The answer to part 2 (a) is: From 1947 to 1968 when the present regulations came into effect governing the acceptance of honours by Canadians, all British honours and decorations other than those listed in (1) were conferred on the recommendation of the Canadian government. Excluding the Korean Campaign, however, only awards in recognition of acts of bravery by Canadian citizens were recommended.

Mr. Speaker, the answer to part (b) is that from 1968, the following Canadians received honours on recommendation by the United Kingdom Government under the provisions of the Canadian regulations. 1968: Jardine, Mrs. Isabel, MBE; 1969: Andrews, Miss Inez M. MBE; Bult-Francis, Lt.-Col. D.S.F. OBE; Campbell, Mr. J. C. CMG; Currie, Miss Mary MBE; Durham, Elliott M. CBE; Galarce, Mrs. Mary J. MBE; Gordon, Mrs. Joan E. W. MBE; Marks, Mr. J. E. CBE; Ross, James J. A. N. CBE; Sharratt, Miss Alice MBE; 1970: Byrne, Leslie D. CBE; Mascari, Dr. A. J. MBE; Talman, Dr. James J. OBE; 1971: Best, Dr. Charles CH; Bleasby, Mr. J. R. G. OBE; Haughan, Mr. W. B. CBE; 1972: Mann, Mr. Charles N. MBE.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION BOARD—DISPOSAL OF 1971 POTATO CROP

Question No. 1,868—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. In what manner did the Agricultural Stabilization Board dispose of the potatoes of the 1971 crop that the Board bought in 1972 in the Province of Quebec?

2. What quantities were placed on the market?

3. What quantities were destroyed?

4. What quantities were simply left to the producers with permission to dispose of them as they wished?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. In those cases where agreement could be reached with the producer, the potatoes were sold back to him for livestock feed. In other cases they were dumped.

2. After being dyed, 23,790 hundredweight were sold for livestock feed.

3. 65,637 hundredweight.

4. None.

BREAKDOWN OF PERSONNEL ENGAGED IN FISHERIES SERVICE

Question No. 1,881—Mr. Haliburton:

What is the total breakdown of personnel engaged in (a) administration (b) inspection (c) protection of the Fisheries Service of the Department of the Environment employed in the Province of Nova Scotia during 1950, 1955, 1960, 1965, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): No data available for the period 1950 to 1960.

CBC—POLICY OF PRODUCING PROGRAMS IN ENGLISH AND FRENCH

Question No. 1,910—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. What instructions have been given by the government to CBC with respect to its policy of producing programs in English and French only?

2. Is the government planning to amend relevant legislation so as to specifically provide for program production or dubbing in non-official languages?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. No instructions have been given by the government to the CBC with respect to its policy of producing programs in English and French only.

2. No amendments to the legislation are planned at the present time to provide specifically for program production or dubbing in non-official languages.

TELEPHONE SERVICE TO PEOPLE IN RURAL ONTARIO

Question No. 1,917—Mr. Wise:

Is it the intention of the government to provide free telephone service to people in rural Ontario telephoning regional government offices?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): No.

CONSTRUCTION OF WHARF ON THWARTWAY ISLAND

Question No. 1,924—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development state in a reply to Question No. 419 on the Order Paper that there were plans to construct a wharf at Thwartway Island in the St. Lawrence River during the 1973 season?

2. Did the office of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development advise the Member for Leeds by letter dated April 11, 1973 that there are no plans for any construction at Thwartway Island in the St. Lawrence River during the 1973 season and, if so, what is the reason for this contradiction to the answer given to Order Paper Question No. 419?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

2. The letter of April 11 stated "that there are no plans for any major construction at Thwartway Island". The apparent confusion arises from the fact that the wharf planned will be constructed by park employees. Therefore, there are no contracts involved and no major construction.

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES TRANSFERRED FROM DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES TO DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT

Question No. 1,925—Mr. Knight:

1. How many employees of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources were transferred to senior positions in the Department of the Environment in 1972 and to April 1, 1973?

2. What positions do these employees now hold in the Department of the Environment and what is their salary range?

3. What qualifications do these employees have for these positions?

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. No employees in the senior category were transferred from the Department of Energy Mines and Resources to the Department of the Environment during the period January 1, 1972 to April 1, 1973.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

INDIAN LANDS

Question No. 1,927—Mr. Godin:

1. Can an Indian who is the owner or the holder of an ownership certificate for a tract of land on a reserve resell the land to a non-Indian?

2. Can a band council buy houses (non-taxable properties) on a reserve and subsequently rent them to non-Indians in order to collect the rents?

3. Is there an actual distinction between an ownership certificate and an occupation certificate?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. No.

2. Under the provisions of the Indian Act a Band Council may acquire parcels of reserve land from an individual Band member who has been placed in lawful possession of the land. An Acquisition of such land would include a house or any such improvements made to the property in question. The Indian Act stipulates, however, that Band held reserve land must be surrendered to the Crown before it can be leased to non-Indians. The leases are entered into with the Crown and moneys collected are credited to the account of the Band concerned.

3. A certificate of Possession is the documentary evidence of an Indian's right to lawful possession of the reserve land described therein and entitles him to quiet possession of the land. A Certificate of Occupation is evidence of an Indian's right to temporary possession of the reserve lands described therein and is normally issued subject to the fulfillment of certain conditions as to the use and settlement of the land. The Certificate of Occupation is issued for a term of two years and may be extended for a further two year period. It is replaced by a Certificate of Possession upon fulfillment of the necessary conditions.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—OVERTIME PAY

Question No. 1,962—Mr. Andre:

During the months of January, February and March 1973, respectively, what were the total amounts paid in overtime pay to employees of the Department of Labour?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Cossitt: Yes, Mr. Speaker. On Monday I asked the parliamentary secretary about question No. 1,769 on the subject of the previous employment over a period of five years of members of the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group. I do not know why it was not answered along with the other questions I asked on the same subject. The parliamentary secretary offered to look into this matter and report. Is he now in a position to say when this question will be answered?

Mr. Reid: I regret I cannot give any assurance at this time. I am still having consultations with the office of the Solicitor General.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall these notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to the answer just given to question No. 1,864 concerning honours. The question asked was, what Canadians since 1947, and on what dates, received certain honours which are the Crown's prerogative to confer. Mention was made of the Victorian Order, the Order of Merit and the Companion of Honour. Those are the three and there are no others. The question on which I wanted some information and on which after a month and a half of gestation I was given an answer was whether any such honours have been awarded without consultation. The answer was that generally there was consultation. That is not an answer to that question at all. The second question asked about honours awarded (a) without consultation and (b) with the consent of the government of Canada and, if so, to whom. That was not answered either except by indirection. Most of the answer given me at length has to do with honours that have nothing to do with the prerogative right of the Crown. I ask the government to give reconsideration to that question so that the facts will come out rather than the fantasies contained in this so-called answer given today.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question raised by the right hon. gentleman simply is that honours under the prerogative of the Crown do not require the consent of the government. There are a series of honours concerning which the government of Canada does make recommendations and give consent, but in those cases it is the natural and normal practice that this be done. In the case of those honours which are in the prerogative of the Crown, the government of Canada is informed by the Crown but the government of Canada does not exercise a veto.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when one asks what the prerogatives of the Crown are and how they are used the question should be answered by the Prime Minister, not by a parliamentary secretary. This is a ridiculous situation.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I might be able to throw some light on this. I believe that only one such honour was accorded during the time I have been Prime Minister, namely, the one accorded to the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. I confirm what the parliamentary secretary said, that I was informed of that in advance but not consulted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not consulted?

Mr. Trudeau: Not consulted.

As regards those previous to my time, I did not have the answer and that is why the parliamentary secretary obtained the answer from Government House which has a record of these things. In so far as my term in the office of Prime Minister is concerned, the parliamentary secretary gave the answer and I confirm it here that I was informed but not consulted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I wanted to know from the Prime Minister, not the parliamentary secretary.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCOME TAX

EFFECT ON PROPOSED TAX CUTS FOR CANADIAN INDUSTRIES OF U.S. PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL RESPECTING TAXATION OF AMERICAN SUBSIDIARIES ABROAD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who will perhaps recall that about a month ago he said he would make inquiries from the appropriate authorities in the United States about the possible implications for Canada arising from the tax proposals made by President Nixon to Congress. I ask the question particularly with regard to the possible invocation of special tax measures by the United States on U.S. companies that make new investments in Canada and the possibility that the tax cuts proposed by the Minister of Finance with regard to manufacturing and processing profits might invoke that kind of action on the part of the U.S. taxing authorities. Has the minister made those inquiries and what are the results?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have made inquiries. They are not conclusive, but the general intention and purpose of the American measures as we understand them, short of seeing a text of the measures as they are introduced before Congress—and certainly until Congress deals with them we will not have the ultimate decision—was not to affect the specific tax reductions proposed by the Canadian government.

Mr. Stanfield: I am not suggesting that was the purpose of the tax, but would the minister not agree that according to certain authoritative interpretations originating in Washington from government sources the proposed U.S. tax measures may very well in fact be invoked in such a way as to affect investment by U.S. subsidiaries in Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There is a variety of interpretations coming out of Washington these days. What I suggest to the House is that short of seeing the precise text, and certainly short of seeing how Congress would deal with the measure, I would think that the Canadian government and parliament could best deal with the situation in Canada as we see it now, and if there are adjustments to be made at a future date they will be made.

Mr. Stanfield: Is this the reason for the minister's delay in bringing forth his tax measures and the legislation associated with them? Is he waiting to see what the U.S. legislation is going to be, or is there some other reason for the delay in doing what he said he was going to do many months ago?

An hon. Member: A year ago.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): As the Leader of the Opposition would expect, I am weighing all relevant factors, but I want to reassure him that I consider the corporate measures to be an urgent matter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —and would hope that the government will be able to introduce these measures at an early date.

APPLICATION OF PRESENT ACT TO CORPORATIONS THAT HAVE FILED RETURNS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue. I believe I have given him notice of it. What measures is the minister taking at the present time to enforce the present Income Tax Act against those corporations that have filed their returns with him, based on the statements of the Minister of Finance last May, according to which corporate year ends have passed long ago? I want to have a full explanation of this from the minister now, if possible.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think you might not wish me to give a full explanation now in view of the length of time this might involve. I have already told the hon. member that, of course, where companies are asking for immediate assessments those would have to be made according to the law as it exists. Otherwise, we are accepting returns in the form that they are being submitted by corporations, and they will be dealt with in accordance with the law at the time each assessment is made.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I want to know how the minister can justify treating one taxpayer one way and not bothering to collect taxes from another taxpayer in the proper way?

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED CORPORATE TAX CUTS IN LIGHT OF PRESIDENT NIXON'S PROPOSAL RESPECTING AMERICAN SUBSIDIARIES ABROAD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that if the government does proceed with its corporate tax proposals this will almost certainly put taxation of manufacturing industries owned by American corporations clearly within the category aimed at by President Nixon's tax proposals, would the minister reconsider his decision to introduce this legislation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the hon. member's preamble.

POLLUTION

MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF WABIGOON AND ENGLISH RIVERS—SUGGESTED INITIATION OF PROCEEDINGS AGAINST COMPANIES UNDER CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the federal interest in preventing the continuing pollution of the Wabigoon and English River systems by mercury contamination emanating from Dryden Pulp and Paper and Dryden Chemicals Limited and the destruction of the livelihood and welfare of the Indians and others residing in that region, will the minister take the initiative proposed by the Environmental Law Association and commence proceedings under the Criminal Code with a view to preventing continuation of such pollution and securing restitution for those whose property rights have been affected, or will he consult with the appropriate provincial authorities to see that they undertake this task?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the pollution released by the plants in the area ceased over two years ago as a result of initiatives taken by the federal government essentially under the federal Fisheries Act. The plants there have been meeting the federal standards with no release of mercury whatsoever from them. The continuing problem arises from mercury in sediment downstream from the plants which was deposited over a long period, but such release ceased two and a half years ago.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister mind answering my question whether action will be taken by the government to prosecute those responsible for this destruction of the livelihood of many Indians and other Canadian citizens?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we have been in close consultation with the government of Ontario, which, incidentally, administers the Fisheries Act in that area, and have been giving technical advice on this subject.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSED CORPORATE TAX CUT LEGISLATION BEFORE SUMMER RECESS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition of the Minister of Finance. In order to settle the doubts that exist in the country and the business community, will the minister assure the House that it is his intention to introduce the measures dealing with corporate tax cuts and bring them to a conclusion before the summer recess?

● (1430)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe I can give the hon. gentleman that assurance, and I would be very interested in the assurance of his hon. leader as to how he is going to deal with it.

SUGGESTED ABANDONMENT OF PROPOSED CORPORATE TAX CUTS IN LIGHT OF PROFIT INCREASE LAST YEAR

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that corporate profits in Canada have gone up by about 20 per cent in the past year, would the minister now consider not introducing the corporate tax bill?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have said to several of the hon. gentleman's colleagues, the corporate tax measures are medium and long term measures to allow Canada to remain competitive in world markets and the new European Economic Community, the United States and Japan.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. I want to suggest that hon. members have now reverted to the first question to ask a series of supplementaries. I was hoping that today an effort would be made to go beyond three or four questions. I would invite hon. members to give the Chair an opportunity to go on to other questions before we get involved in a debate on this very important matter which was raised originally by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Wellington.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KILLING OF TWO CANADIAN GIRLS WHILE VISITING VICTORIA FALLS, RHODESIA—INQUIRY AS TO PROTEST OR EXPLANATION—NOTIFICATION OF FAMILIES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question deals with the tragic incident in which two Canadian girls from my riding by the name of Miss Christine Sinclair and Miss Marion Drijberg were killed when Zambian troops fired across the Zambia-Rhodesia border at a group of sightseers who were visiting Victoria Falls. Before asking my question, Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members would want me to convey to the parents of these two girls our sincere and profound sympathy. My question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he registered a protest or received an explanation of the tragic and criminal deaths of these two Canadian girls, both innocent visitors to that country, and did the Department of External Affairs notify the families of the two girls before they read of the tragedy in the news media?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the expressions of sympathy on this terrible tragedy in Rhodesia. My department will naturally be willing to make any arrangements for the funerals that the families wish. As we do not have diplomatic representation in Rhodesia my department received the information from Capetown and immediately got in touch with the families of the young women. I am not certain, of course, whether we conveyed this news before it was read in the newspapers, but I believe that we did. The Canadian High Commission has been in touch with the Zambian government and has been assured of their complete co-operation. The facts of the matter are, of course, not yet established. The hon. member says that they were fired upon by Zambian troops. That may or may not be the case, and we will try to ascertain the facts as part of the inquiries we are making.

Mr. Hales: In view of the fact that skirmishes and crossfiring have been going for some time in this location, what steps did the Department of External Affairs take to warn visitors of the great danger in this particular area?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, we are not represented in Rhodesia and there is no way in which we could advise Canadian travellers in Rhodesia to stay away from the Zambian border. I think the facts of the guerilla activities that are going on in that area are well known, and I would think the Rhodesian government would be equally anxious to avoid tragedies of this kind.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

PRIVATE OPENING OF TENDERS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the recent revelation that some $1.2 billion of goods and services have been procured in the past year for federal government departments, including the Prime Minister's office, through a tendering process where tenders are mainly opened in private, and in view of the fact that of 11,630 such tenders closed in the past 12 months only nine were opened in public, would the Prime Minister explain to the House his statement of last Friday that he did not know of any such departments in the federal government which procured goods and services where tenders were opened in secret?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that I did not know and I have only learned the details from the hon. member now. After that question was asked the other day I said I would have it looked into. I did ask to have it looked into but I have not received the answer yet.

FINANCE

REASON FOR INCREASE IN BANK OF CANADA INTEREST RATE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance and it is really a matter of clarification. Am I correct in my understanding of the answers given recently explaining the rise in the bank rate that it is primarily to respond to changes in the interest rate situation in the United States rather than an interpretation by the Department of Finance that there is any basic change in economic activities in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not quite accurate either in his own assessment of the situation or in his assessment of what the Department of Finance may or may not have been saying. The reasons are twofold: First, a response to a very strong demand for credit in response to an expanding economy in this country and, second, a response to international interest rates. Both have to be taken into consideration. The Bank of Canada has made it clear, and I wish to reiterate, that the monetary policy is not a restrictive one. It is to moderate a very strong expansion in the economy that will continue.

Mr. Gillies: How can rising interest rates not be restrictive in the economy as the minister suggests? How can it be that with rising interest rates we are not moving toward a tight money policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply briefly, but it seems to me that the minister and the hon. member are getting into a debate. The minister will be given the floor for the purpose of a reply, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Northwest Territories.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if the gross national product is growing at about 6½ per cent to 7 per cent, if the latest price indicator is about 5 per cent and total expansion is about 12 per cent, if money is expanding at a rate of 30 per cent, then obviously there is some way to moderate it without restricting the expansion of the economy.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON FOR PROVISION OF TELEVISION RECEPTION FACILITIES AT NORMAN WELLS BEFORE RAE-EDZO AND FORT McPHERSON

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. With regard to the plans of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to bring radio and television coverage to as many people as possible in the Northwest Territories, can the minister advise the House why it is that Norman Wells, an oil company town in the Northwest Territories with a population of approximately 300 people, will receive a television repeater station before Rae-Edzo with a population of over 1,000 people, or Fort McPherson with a population of 750 to 800 people where only a booster station at about one-quarter the cost of the repeater station at Norman Wells is needed?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question but I would be pleased to refer it to the corporation for a response.

DISSATISFACTION OF PEOPLE OF NORTH WITH TELEVISION PROGRAMMING THROUGH ANIK SATELLITE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. While the minister is referring that question to the CBC, will he also refer to its officials the dissatisfaction of the people in the north generally in both territories with the short programming through the facilities of Anik as a result of the time difference between the southern and northern portions of Canada, which means that television programming terminates at 9.00 or 9.30 in the evening?

● (1440)

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

FEED GRAIN—MEASURES TO PREVENT PRICE INCREASES—PRESENTATION OF BILL

Mr. Leonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

In view of spiraling feed grain prices in eastern Canada, particularly during the past months, which shows the urgency of my question, and in view of the statement made by the present government and the hon. Minister of Agriculture himself in January and February last to the effect that a bill was in preparation to seek solutions to that urgent problem, can the hon. minister tell us whether a bill will indeed be brought forward before the House in this regard and if so, when?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are preparing a program for a feed grain policy for Canada. I am not prepared to say at this time whether it has to be introduced in the form of a bill. It is my own personal opinion that this can be done without the introduction of a bill in the House. I am sure it will be such a fair policy that it well be accepted no matter whether it is introduced by a bill or otherwise.

Mr. Beaudoin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Can the hon. minister tell us when the House will be informed of this program, or whether he will make an explanatory statement in the House?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I can only say that if the House is still sitting when the program is finalized it will be announced to the House. If it is not, we made a commitment in the Speech from the Throne that is would be done before the new crop year and it will be done by then.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY RESPECTING FEED GRAIN—CONSULTATION WITH EASTERN CANADA FARM ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if, before announcing this policy, he intends to consult with the agricultural organizations of eastern Canada?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have asked for the agricultural organizations' opinions and I am sure some of them are going to be implemented in the program. We have also discussed this same program with and asked for suggestions from my provincial counterparts. They have made suggestions too, and I am sure we will probably be consulting with all of them.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE CLOSING OF RESIDENTIAL SCHOOLS AT PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE AND DAUPHIN—CONSULTATION WITH INDIAN BROTHERHOOD

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have given the minister notice. Is it the intention of the minister to phrase out the residential schools for Indian children at Portage la Prairie, and Dauphin, Manitoba, by 1974?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are contemplating this possibility because there are not enough pupils now in the two residences. We have not reached a final decision, but I would not be surprised if that final decision was that we are forced to close those two residential schools.

[English]

Mr. Masniuk: Will this decision be made in consultation with the Indian Brotherhood?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, of course we are keeping the Manitoba Indian Association informed of our actions; nevertheless, when the number of pupils in those residences has become insufficient, we are forced to close them for economic reasons. But in this case, the final decision has not been reached yet.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PANARCTIC OILS LIMITED—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO CONFLICT OF INTEREST ON PART OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS ON BOARD

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of certain statements recently made about the composition of the board of directors of the government-owned Panarctic Oils Limited, and in view of the fact at least three federal deputy ministers and an assistant deputy minister are members of that board, will the minister undertake to assure the House that no conflict of interest is compromising these public servants in their dual reponsibilities to the oil industry and federal objectives in the Arctic?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any conflict of interest between those deputy ministers who represent the government on the board of directors. I can re-examine that question and if indeed there are conflicting interests, we would have to act accordingly. But it does not seem to be the case.

[English]

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister also undertake to provide the House or, alternatively, members of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, with a complete and detailed account of the various other positions occupied by senior members of his ministry?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, a complete and detailed account of what?

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Of senior members of your ministry.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): A complete and detailed account of what? I did not hear the hon. member's last words.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Perhaps I will—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would address his question to the Chair. In this way the minister might understand it. There seems to be a difficulty in communication between two Scots.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Will the minister undertake to provide the House or, alternatively, members of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works with a complete and detailed account of the various other positions occupied by senior members of his ministry. This is in relation to the first question I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would agree that, of all the ethnic groups I should understand, this is certainly one. I would be glad to respond to that inquiry.

CANADIAN CULTURE

MULTICULTURALISM—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF NAMES OF MEMBERS OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for multiculturalism and concerns the establishment of the advisory committee. Can the minister indicate, in view of the fact he has had the list of names in his possession for some months now and has said on many occasions that the announcement would be made soon, what the holdup is and why their accouncement has not been made?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to assure the hon. member that we have taken extensive steps and painstaking consultation to make sure that the composition of the multicultural consultative council will be a good one. I am pleased also to assure him that an announcement will be made soon.

Mr. Paproski: Where? In Edmonton?

Mr. Yewchuk: Can the minister assure the House that he is not waiting until after the next election, at which time there will be lots of defeated Liberals available for appointments?

TRADE

INTERNATIONAL SUGAR AGREEMENT—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN MINIMUM PRICE TO ENCOURAGE PRODUCTION BY DEVELOPING NATIONS FOR SALE TO CANADA

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with the brief presented to him on April 29 by a church group on the GAAT FLY project. Can he tell me whether, as a result of the representations that were made to him in regard to the upcoming international sugar agreement negotiations, he will consider giving consideration to their representation that minimum prices under the agreement should be increased to encourage production by developing nations and sales to Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the representations the hon. member refers to were detailed, technical and, I think, to some extent even complicated. I can assure the hon. member that the representations will be given very serious consideration by my department.

Mr. Gleave: May I ask the minister whether his department and, indeed, the government is going to review its present policy of purchasing major amounts of sugar from South Africa, in view of the representations made by the same church group and in view also of the statement by the Prime Minister in the House that he would take notice of a question asked in the House on this matter? I wonder if either the minister or the Prime Minister would reply to that question.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely clear as to the nature of the question. If the question is whether we are prepared to continue our trading relationship with South Africa, then the answer is yes, we are.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, my question is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. He will, of course, be recognized in a moment. I gather that the hon. member who was just speaking seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Gleave: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether the minister understood my question. I did not ask him about our total trading relationship. I asked the minister a question about our purchases of sugar. I did not think it was that difficult to understand.

FISHERIES

EXPIRY OF FISHERMEN'S SEASONAL UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS ON MAY 15—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION—CATCH INSURANCE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries. Having regard to the fact that seasonal unemployment insurance benefits for fishermen ran out yesterday, May 15, and in view of the fact that persistent ice conditions are hindering the execution of the inshore fishery, has the minister taken any action or has he consulted with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration with a view to extending the date beyond May 15?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the latest information I have is that, in addition to the benefits running out in the last few days, the ice has also been moving off the coast and it is possible for the inshore fishermen to begin to fish again.

Mr. Marshall: Can the minister advise the House whether he has come up with any program to provide catch insurance for fishermen so that this problem may be avoided in future?

Mr. Davis: As the hon. member knows, this matter is under active consideration by the department in consultation with the industry.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY IN LIGHT OF TRANSPORTATION ROUTE FOR PRUDHOE BAY OIL PROPOSED BY B.C. PREMIER

Mr. John Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a question I asked the Prime Minister on Monday when he referred the matter to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that Canadian policy, as stated by the Prime Minister the other day, seems to favour an overland gas and oil route down the Mackenzie, do the recent discussions with Premier Barrett of British Columbia and the apparent study of his suggested oil route which would come down from Alaska through the Yukon and British Columbia indicate a change in government policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker. The view we take continues to be that the Mackenzie Valley would be the best route for bringing Prudhoe Bay oil to southern markets. However, in the case of a serious proposal, such as we believe Premier Barrett's was intended to be, the government does feel an obligation to have an investigation of this alternative route to determine whether or not it is feasible and, in general, whether it would be in the national interest to promote it further.

Mr. Fraser: It has been stated that the policy is to bring Prudhoe oil down the Mackenzie. While we know that some studies have been carried out with respect to a gas pipeline, may I ask whether equivalent studies have been made under the aegis of the government of Canada with respect to an oil pipeline from Prudhoe Bay? Can the minister tell the House what co-ordination exists with respect to planning some kind of joint application with respect to gas and oil? If we proceed on the basis of just one, we shall not end up with any cohesive policy.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the studies carried out by the government of Canada, about $20 million worth up to this point, relate to both a right of way for gas and an oil pipeline in the sense that they deal with ecological problems, soil quality and other related matters. With regard to the possibility of constructing an oil line, I would remind the hon. member that the Mackenzie Valley pipeline research group, made up principally of the Prudhoe Bay consortium, has completed an exhaustive study of the feasibility of such an oil line, the results of which have been made available to the government of Canada. It is fair, however, to point out to the hon. gentleman that while we have reason to believe there will be an application for a gas line in the fourth quarter of this year; there is no indication on the part of any private parties that at this time they will be coming forward with an application for an oil line. It could well be that, depending on the turn of events with regard to TAPS in the United States, they would do so, but neither they nor the United States government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENTS ON INTEREST RATES AND GOVERNMENT'S FISCAL POLICY AND ON EFFECT OF INTERNATIONAL MONETARY SITUATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. On Monday I asked him whether he would consider making statements on motions concerning changes in the government's monetary policy and, in addition, with respect to what I might call the growing tension in the international monetary field. The hon. gentleman said he would take the matter under advisement. Has he now done so, and does he intend to make a statement so that we may be given a full explanation of these changes both on the domestic scene and internationally?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): There has been no change in the government's monetary policy, but in terms of the international situation I would be glad to take an appropriate opportunity, if that develops, to discuss the matter in the House.

PRINCE ALBERT—REQUEST THAT DECISION TO CLOSE TOURIST FACILITIES AT THE NARROWS ON LAKE WASKESIU BE REVOKED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he has received a telegram from the Prince Albert Chamber of Commerce taking strong exception to the decision of his department to close and to dispose of for removal the tourist facilities existing at the Narrows on Lake Waskesiu, wherein it is pointed out that what is being done will eliminate all incentive to people to visit the area. In view of the seriousness of the situation created in consequence of directions that have come from some of the ivory tower Caesars in his department, will he have this matter looked into? Prince Albert national park was created by Prime Minister Mackenzie King as a resort for the average Canadian, and what is being done will emasculate it unless this order is changed.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the telegram, but I will be very happy to look into the question and report back as quickly as possible to the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you. Report to the House.

REDISTRIBUTION OF RIDINGS—DISCUSSION WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Recently the Prime Minister, in answer to a question put to him by the right hon. member for Prince Albert about riding boundaries, promised to consider the suggestion that the present number of ridings be kept in each one of the provinces. Can he tell us today whether he has met the representatives of the political parties to discuss this matter, and whether he has a statement to make with regard to new boundaries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council has in fact undertaken discussions with his colleagues of the other parties, and certain proposals were put to them. For the time being, no final decision has been taken, but the government intends to put the matter before the House, preferably some time before the end of June.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the President of the Privy Council.

In view of the discussions he has had with his colleagues of the other parties, can he tell us what conclusions were arrived at and what steps he intends to take in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, discussions were held but no conclusions were arrived at by the representatives of the four parties. Again I say that the government intends to put the matter before the House, and I trust that, in the meantime, the various parties will have made up their minds about the ideal solution.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED QUESTIONING BY RCMP OF MEMBERS OF NATIVE ORGANIZATIONS AND LEADERS ON ATTITUDE TO WOUNDED KNEE INCIDENT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the minister aware that members of the security and intelligence division of the RCMP have been questioning members of native organizations and native leaders generally on their attitude to the Wounded Knee incident and asking them to identify and give information about other native persons from group pictures which the leaders feel could not have been taken at Canadian demonstrations?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the activity of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. But, fortunately perhaps, the RCMP does not come under my department.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This matter is under study. I will refer the question to the minister, but the hon. member can rest assured that it has been discussed very recently by the minister and the department. I am sure the minister is quite aware of the situation, but in any case I will draw the matter to his attention again.

● (1500)

Mr. Oberle: Can the parliamentary secretary tell me whether cars are deliberately being withheld for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a bargaining position between the British Columbia Railway and Canadian National in certain discussions that are going on?

PENITENTIARIES

COLLINS BAY—ESCAPE OF LASLO EPER

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Has the minister yet received reports that a 30 year old convict serving a sentence for attempted murder and attempting to wound has escaped from Collins Bay north of Kingston and that he used a gun and had a ladder ready for use to get him over the wall? If so, what action is being taken in regard to this escape from that institution?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have a report here, which I received just before coming into the House, about a Laslo Eper. I do not know whether this is the same person and I do not have his record before me, but I do have a report that a Mr. Eper escaped from Collins Bay using what appeared to be a makeshift revolver or facsimile of a revolver. He forced a guard to bring him to the wall with what appeared to be a revolver and got over the wall. The Ontario Provincial Police were called in immediately and they are now looking for Mr. Eper. Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think I said that the fund would be used for the good of the farmers of western Canada. It has not yet been decided in what particular way it will be used.

ROCHDALE COLLEGE—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION IN LIGHT OF DEATHS, DRUG AND TAX PROBLEMS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was recognized for the purpose of asking a supplementary question. I suggest to him that he is now going beyond the limits of a supplementary question. He should ask his question.

Mr. Jelinek: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker; I will rephrase my supplementary question. In view of the fact that thousands of disturbed citizens are concerned about the tragedies at Rochdale College, its death problems, drug problems, unpaid tax problems and many other problems that the government has so far countenanced, is the Prime Minister prepared to or interested in dealing immediately with this deplorable situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter with the minister on previous occasions. As a result of a meeting that I had in Toronto two Saturdays ago, or two Fridays ago—I am not sure which—with some Liberals I undertook to raise the question again and I am looking forward to some discussions on the matter. I have no further comment at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might have supplementaries tomorrow. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it is not every day that one has such an audience in the Commons, and I want to thank all hon. members for their willingness to listen to my remarks. As a mark of appreciation, I might point out that while I have 20 minutes ahead of me I intend to use only about five.

In a somewhat more serious vein, I want to conclude what I said the other day on the question of capital punishment with a reference to one of the aspects of capital punishment which has troubled me the most. I refer to the question of responsibility when it comes to murder, and the matter of justice in the administration of capital punishment. I want to illustrate my concern or the sort of thing that arouses my concern with a story.

One day a woman who was a grandmother called me and asked me to help her grandson. She said: "The boy is 12 years old and he is going to kill somebody. There is something wrong with the boy. He has been abandoned by his father, his mother is working and trying to help out, but the boy has some serious difficulty and I need some help". I spent the better part of the day calling provincial agencies to find out whether I could get some assistance for this woman. I was told by one that they had room for seven disturbed boys in various institutions in that area, that his was the eighth so there was no place for him. They were very sympathetic and understood the problem, but this was one of the difficulties.

I thought to myself that when this boy grows up, and if the fears of this woman are realized, who will be responsible in that case; will it be the boy who becomes a murderer, will it be the mother or will it be society? When that 12 year old boy needed help he could not find it, so surely society has to bear some share of the blame. This is the great dilemma. When you read the biography of some of the assassins of United States political figures, one story emerges. One assassin was a seriously disturbed child. The authorities went to the mother and told her that the boy needed psychiatric care. The mother refused to believe them, feeling this could not be true of her son. When the child grew up, he became a murderer. Who was guilty in that particular case; was it the boy, the mother or society? In virtually every case I have been able to trace in respect of a murderer, I have found a history of a sordid childhood or a history of violence of one kind or another. People do not suddenly become murderers as adults.

If we are really serious, and I have no reason to believe that this House is anything else, about protecting society, and in many ways this is what the debate is all about, then we should stop thinking in terms of hanging murderers. We should stop kidding ourselves that this is the way to protect society. This may be the easy and facile way. It may be reassuring to say that a man is guilty, we will put him out of the way and that is the end of it. That is not the end of it because you cannot bring back a life in that way, nor can you prevent a future crime by that means. If we are serious about this matter of protecting society, we must deal with it at another level. We must know more about the causes of murder. We must remove some of the environmental circumstances that create an atmosphere in which this takes place, and we must concentrate much more on providing assistance to young people who are disturbed in order to make sure that society is adequately protected in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the subject which involves us today is as basic as any that this or any parliament will ever face. It involves life and death, the safety of the individual and the orderliness of our society. These are not issues with which the House can deal summarily, and it did not do so in 1967. Nor are they issues which individuals can resolve easily within their consciences. We are called upon to exercise wisdom and judgment and calmness of decision in respect of a subject which summons emotion and evokes often our most basic passions.

That we cannot all agree on this issue is understandable, for we are dealing with justice which is always a fleeting concept, and almost always subjective. George Eliot wrote:

> Who shall put his finger on the work of justice, and say "It is there?" Justice is like the Kingdom of God—it is not without us as a fact, it is within us as a great yearning.

I am reminded also of the French poet, Paul Claudel who said:

[Translation]

> Justice is masked, not blindfolded and no-one knows who it is.

[English]

If Canada be a civilized place, it is that way because of the concern which Canadians have for one another. Canadians take an interest in one another, look out for one another, help one another. We have managed to avoid here many of the hatreds which are troublesome elsewhere. We have retained in Canada the compassion for our neighbour which in some places has been replaced by indifference, and in others by fear.

This has permitted us to accept many propositions in Canada which are often still argued about elsewhere. We accept the proposition, for instance, that no one should suffer from lack of medical treatment or, treated, suffer from the financial burden of that treatment. We accept the proposition that the aged, having contributed to our society, should be given the opportunity to live with as much dignity and grace as our resources will permit. We accept the proposition that every child should be educated equally, and that the gifted be given the opportunity to fulfil their promise. We accept the proposition that the needy and the handicapped should be assisted by those able to do so.

We also accept the proposition, from which many of my remarks during today's debate will follow, that the wayward should be helped to return to a life that is useful and wholesome. We accept these propositions and willingly bear their cost because we believe they contribute to a better society: One that is open, not authoritative; one that is creative, not stultifying, and one that is understanding, not spiteful.

Underlying all of these characteristics, which make our society so human, is the belief by Canadians that in such a social system they can flourish and pursue their lives free from fear of lawless elements. But without confidence in lawful processes, and in the law enforcement agencies, no community is willing to extend a helping hand to those who have broken the law. The most understanding of persons, in the face of lawless activity, will harden his attitude and will refuse to accommodate changes. Out of fear for his safety, and for the safety of his loved ones, even the most merciful of men becomes unwilling to assist the wayward.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, in this debate of the issue of capital punishment, I suggest that the premise from which we must begin our discussion is the basic one of the safety of Canadians. Our criminal laws, our penal system, our reform programs will be of little value if they do not respect the right of Canadians to live their lives without fear of criminal activity. The attributes of mercy and forgiveness cannot thrive in circumstances of fright and uncertainty. In all our endeavours in this House to remove undue harshness from the criminal law, or to identify and alleviate the underlying social causes of crime, we must take care not to forfeit or endanger the safety of any law-abiding Canadian.

The Bail Reform law, the Parole Act, the various other criminal law amendments introduced in recent years, are all intended to relieve deserving persons from the indiscriminate application of severe sanctions in instances where these are found unnecessary. Those laws were not designed with any thought of trading off the safety of men, women and children in the pursuit of some social experiment. If those laws have been too loosely applied, as appears the case in certain instances, then it is the responsibility of the government to ensure through their administration that errors are not repeated. And as for us, at the federal government level this will be done wherever necessary.

[English]

So on the matter of capital punishment—I begin with two premises. The first is my belief that wanton or unnecessary killing is evil. The second is the requirement for self-protection, be it individual, or collective in the form of a society. Consequently, should killing be the only means to ensure survival against aggression—as in the case of self-defence of a human, or the self-defence of a society—then it is allowable. Life and freedom and justice are so valuable that they must be protected against an aggressor by whatever means are absolutely necessary in the circumstances, including the taking of life. The evidence available to us all has satisfied me beyond doubt that capital punishment—killing—is not effective as a deterrent against murder. Therefore, it is not justifiable for use by society as a means of self-defence.

In reality, the question before the House is what contribution to the safety of persons flows from retention or abolition of capital punishment. That is not a new question. It has been asked in the English legal system for hundreds of years. Pollack and Maitland tell us that under the Norman Kings "a wave of religious sentiment had set against capital punishment". And no wonder, for those learned authors recite the forms of punishment then in vogue: death inflicted by hanging, beheading, burning, drowning, stoning, precipitation from rocks; loss of ears, nose, upper lip, hands and feet; flogging and sale into slavery; emasculation and exoculation.

If the question of capital punishment has been asked for centuries, it has been answered in varying degrees for decades. The death penalty for such minor offences as pick-pocketing and petty theft was abandoned in England in the 19th century; in Canada it was abandoned for kidnapping and for rape in 1955. Public executions, once regarded as contributing to the deterrent effect, have not been practised in Canada since 1868. On each of those occasions, I have no doubt that questions were asked about the effectiveness of the penalty as a deterrent to that particular offence, and about the justness of the punishment having regard to the crime.

Capital punishment and abolition both have a long history in our social system and in its historic forebears. Much of what was once regarded as necessary and ordinary, now causes us all to shudder with revulsion at its cruelty and seeming disdain for human life. Yet it is not our function to judge in retrospect the morals or standards of bygone eras. It is for us to assess the necessity or lack of it, and the moral correctness or lack of it, of the death penalty for murder in Canada in 1973.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the statistical and other evidence bearing on this issue which is available to us all. I have weighed it carefully as I am sure have all hon. members. I have concluded to my own satisfaction that capital punishment is not an effective deterrent to murder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am aware, however, of the widespread feeling that the present way of administering a sentence of life imprisonment may be inadequate. My mind will remain open, therefore, to whatever arguments may be offered on that aspect of the question, to ensure the protection of the public from the repetition of a major crime of violence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: On this point, because of the events of last weekend, I must digress slightly to cover the question of security of our penal institutions. Whatever the jail terms of convicted criminals, society must be able to assume that they will be enforced, and not broken willy-nilly by escape. Our prisons are there to contain unlawful persons. Containment is the primary function. Rehabilitation follows. I urge hon. members not to permit events of the past weekend to colour their views on the issue of capital punishment. Jailbreaks will be dealt with as the inquiries and the Solicitor General recommend. Amendments to other legislation will be viewed on their merits. But today, the issue is capital punishment, a punishment I do not regard to be effective for the only purpose advanced by its proponents, deterrence.

I am not suggesting that these issues are unrelated, or that the events of the weekend should remain unconnected with the subject of this debate. That would not only be impossible, it would probably be undesirable. The provisions of the Criminal Code, the operation of our judicial system, the management of our police forces and parole boards, the security of our penitentiaries are all ingredients of a single, vital process: the administration of criminal justice in Canada. No ingredient in this process is less important than any other. None can be ignored by society; none will be ignored by the government.

The people of Canada, the judiciary of Canada, the police officers of Canada, have every right to insist that criminal offenders, once convicted and imprisoned, remain in prison according to law, and not according to chance. By their very nature reformatories are not pleasant places. Society intended them in the first instance to be secure. And this government intends to ensure that they are secure. I sympathize entirely with the concern expressed in this House and by Canadians generally over prison breaks.

I sympathize, too, with the difficult working conditions faced by many penitentiary guards. Those conditions the government is seeking to alleviate. But I pledge to this House that this will not be done at the risk of further escapes. And I say, too, with all the earnestness at my command that prisoners who have broken jail or who have exploited temporary leave and other humanitarian reforms—and who by doing so have placed these programs in jeopardy for thousands of other prisoners—will be dealt with on recapture with the full severity of the law. Those who mock the desire of Canadians for an orderly, law-abiding community, those who hold in contempt those restraints on human conduct that enable us to live as free men and women, will be shown that society is not only resilient but that it is capable of protecting itself and of meting out whatever punishment is required.

The choice of punishment, however, must be other than vindictive for no society can be vindictive and remain healthy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Capital Punishment

Mr. Trudeau: Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish briefly to reply to the argument made in the House and elsewhere that the government has somehow been "breaking the law" in commuting death sentences to life imprisonment. I was told, thanks to the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who informed me through our Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), that it had even been stated on the radio currently that the government and myself have said that we would commute every sentence and that, therefore, it mattered not what the law of the land said. I cannot emphasize too strongly, Mr. Speaker, that these commutations are carried out in accordance with the law, not in defiance of it.

● (1530)

Any such alleged statement is, of course, one which I deny completely and one that I certainly never made. But there is such a thing as the royal prerogative of mercy, and it is one of the most civilized of the many prerogatives residing in the sovereign. As is the case with others, this particular prerogative is now exercised on Her Majesty's behalf in Canada by the Governor General in council. The royal prerogative of mercy is part of the law of Canada as, in some form or other, I believe it to be the part of the law of every country I know. Nor is the prerogative subject to the normal provisions of the Canadian criminal law, quite the contrary. The Criminal Code of Canada expressly states that nothing therein "in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy".

Are those who accuse the government of some wrongdoing proposing that parliament take from Her Majesty the prerogative? If so, they should take their responsibility by saying so clearly in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There are responsibilities that devolve upon all of us in this House. One is to face issues and discharge our duties with all the wisdom, sincerity and industry that we are capable of bringing to bear upon them. I can assure hon. members that every single case of commutation that has come before the government since I became Prime Minister has been dealt with individually and a decision reached only after exhaustive consideration. There is nothing automatic about commutation in any cabinet of which I have been a member, any more I believe than the right hon. gentleman opposite assures us was the practice in his cabinet. Each case brings with it a heavy responsibility to discharge wisely and justly that part of the law of Canada which provides for mercy.

I believe that by supporting the motion which is now before the House on second reading, we have the opportunity here to act in a way that will not reduce the necessary protection to Canadians from the possibility of violent crime but which will permit Canada to stand with those other nations of the world that have concluded that the calculated taking of a human life, self-defence apart, is not an act which should be countenanced on either an individual or a community basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in this debate today, in connection with which there is a free vote, and I am not purporting to speak for anybody other than myself. But I do wish to express some views on this question which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has described as one of very basic importance, in fact one of the subjects of the most basic importance that we have to consider. It is perhaps ironical, in view of the basic importance of the subject, that we are discussing it long after the expiration of the measure which was adopted back in 1967 for a trial period. In view of the seriousness of the matter, it is rather difficult to understand why the government would have allowed it to expire automatically without the matter having been dealt with in parliament before its expiration.

What does the bill purport to do? The principle of this bill is not really abolition of the death penalty. What the bill purports to do is to extend the trial period of abolition of the death penalty for some types of murder but to preserve the death penalty in respect of the murder of a police officer or a prison guard.

On the question of the abolition of the death penalty, on the question of the effectiveness of the death penalty as a deterrent, which is certainly the only reason that I would be prepared to consider the penalty, I agree that there is, generally speaking, no statistical proof of the effectiveness of capital punishment as such. I believe there are more important elements in the enforcement of the law, such as the degree of certainty of detection and the degree of certainty of at least a severe penalty for an offence such as this. As I understand it, the concept behind this bill is that we need the death penalty to protect police officers and prison guards from those who have nothing to lose by killing them. That, as I understand, is the rationale of this measure and I am prepared to accept it.

As I said, I see no evidence that capital punishment is an effective deterrent. I think we are all familiar with the work done by Dr. Fattah of the University of Toronto, and his finding that the actual threat of the death penalty to the lives of killers in Canada has not been great in the last 90 years. He also wrote that the increase in criminal homicide in Canada during recent years cannot be attributed to the suspension of capital punishment. All the studies done are unanimous on one point: that nothing in the statistics of murders in Canada gives any conclusions about the effect of the suspension of capital punishment. I understand that the University of Toronto study concludes that it is impossible to tell at this stage what effect the death penalty has had for murders of civilians.

So I say to you, sir, and to the House that I am prepared to support the bill in principle—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: —but I have some problems.

An hon. Member: You are right.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the problems.

Mr. Stanfield: My problems are across the floor, really.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You have the whip on right now.

● (1540)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind these little interruptions. Hon. gentlemen opposite are under a good deal of tension. I think it is healthy that, from time to time, we permit them to relieve those tensions by a few outcrys, and I am happy if I can be of therapeutic value to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In his closing remarks, the Prime Minister dealt with one of my problems. In 1967, the House was asked to deal with a measure which preserved capital punishment in respect of the murder of a police officer or a penitentiary guard. This bill is the same in that regard. I have had the impression, and the Prime Minister addressed himself to this today, that as a matter of policy the government has been commuting all death sentences. In view of that fact, I have had to ask myself whether it is straightforward to put a bill before the House, and seek the approval of that bill, on the assumption that capital punishment would be retained in respect of these types of offences when in fact the punishments contemplated by the bill are not carried out. This has been a problem with me. I say quite frankly, and I emphasize this, that I do not want to go back to the pre-1967 situation. But I have had no desire at all to be involved in what seemed to be—perhaps fraud is too strong a word—an attempt to get parliament to approve of something and then not conform to the will of parliament.

I am not looking for ways to be difficult, Mr. Speaker. I am saying very frankly that I do not want to go back to the previous legislation. I cannot question the sincerity of what the Prime Minister said to me and to the House this afternoon, but if I were the Prime Minister, whatever my reluctance might be with regard to permitting the death sentence to proceed, I should allow the law to be discharged under these circumstances, except under the proper exercise of the prerogative of mercy, which certainly exists, which certainly ought to exist, and which I hope will continue to exist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: That would have to be my attitude. The Prime Minister, as I understood him, gave that assurance to the House this afternoon so far as he was concerned. I think that, therefore, I must consider the bill on the basis of that assurance he has given, and that I am justified in interpreting what he said as meaning that this bill is not put before the House in the hope of achieving abolition of capital punishment across the board, so to speak. I assume that this bill is not being put before the House with a view to getting it passed, and then automatically disregarding the view of parliament that capital punishment should be exercised in the event of the murder of police officers and penitentiary guards.

However strongly I may feel about the abolition of capital punishment, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be any part, intentionally or otherwise, of any fraudulent practice towards this House, towards parliament. I, therefore, say to the Prime Minister that I listened to him very earnestly, and I will consider the bill on the basis that the House is being dealt with in a straightforward manner, that the prerogative of mercy will be exercised as such and not in such a way as to frustrate automatically the expressed will of parliament. That is one of my problems with regard to the bill. I realize that this whole subject of capital punishment is laden with emotions, and with moral questions over and above and apart from the practical problem of the state's duty to protect the citizen. I realize that any decision made by parliament is going to be unsatisfactory to a great many Canadians, and that the moral and emotional problems are complicated by the increasing amount of violence that seems to be entering our daily lives.

I realize very well, and I do not say this in any arrogant way, that the views I am expressing may very well differ from the views of the majority of my constituents. I do not want to be pontifical, but I think Edmund Burke was right when he said a Member of Parliament had a duty to exercise his own judgment. It is my responsibility to exercise my judgment and this is what I am doing, not out of any sense of arrogance or superiority with regard to other Canadians, but in the full belief that it is my responsibility to make up my own mind and to exercise my judgment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: But I am doing so on the basis on which the bill is put before parliament, and that is that the police and penitentiary guards are going to get the kind of protection that the bill envisages. I look to the government to honour that commitment. I also hope that we will see heavy emphasis put upon improved methods of crime prevention and detection, that we accept our responsibilities to provide the police with improved facilities, that we make certain that the courts are fully and adequately manned, and that we provide humane and secure penitentiaries.

I am troubled, too, by the question of the minimum sentence, and by what a life sentence means. As I understand it now, a person serving a life sentence under these conditions may be paroled after ten years. I say simply this: If we attempt to define what should be done at this time, and if we are going to remove capital punishment as a form of punishment, then the Canadian people are entitled to more security than they have today, the Canadian people are entitled to a more adequate substitute for capital punishment than we have today. While I am quite prepared to support this bill at this time, I would hope that the committee would be authorized, and find it possible, to inquire into the broader question which I believe should be dealt with simultaneously and that is the alternative form of security that can be offered to the Canadian people in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: With regard to the parole system, I understand that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has said that it is going to be overhauled and re-examined. This has been talked about for some time and it needs to be done, Mr. Speaker.

I have been expressing my views at an even slower rate perhaps than I do ordinarily. This is a highly emotional subject, and I do not want to engender any bitterness into it. I state my position with respect to capital punishment: I want to see the committee examine the alternatives with a view to reassuring the Canadian people with regard to what life imprisonment really means. While the commutation of all sentences during the lifetime of the last measure certainly lent itself to the interpretation that it was the policy of the government to commute all death sentences.

I am prepared to support this measure on second reading on the basis of the assurances that the Prime Minister has given to me and others here today. I take it from that—and I support this bill with a clear conscience—that the House of Commons is not being asked to support a bill which retains capital punishment in respect of the murder of police officers and penitentiary guards while the government actually pursues a different policy. I am not out to seek blood, Mr. Speaker; I do not mean that. I just mean that I am voting for this bill on the assumption that the government is dealing honestly and openly with the parliament of Canada.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as has been said by many who have participated in this debate, the argument about capital punishment goes back a long way in human society and it involves an anxious moral question. I remind this House, if the members need reminding, that at the beginning, 100 or 200 years ago and longer than that, people were put to death for what we now consider minor offences, for theft of a loaf of bread, for example. I remind hon. members and the people of Canada that there has been a steady progress in civilized society away from that kind of treatment of offenders and that today in all modern western societies where the death penalty is retained, it is limited to a penalty for murder or for treason. I remind hon. members and the people of Canada that an increasing number of countries in the world have been abolishing the death penalty in their society.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that what has been happening over the decades is the progress of civilization in societies like our own. Progress in all directions; progress in the direction of social security; progress in the acceptance of the philosophic and social idea that we are indeed our brother's keepers; progress in the opposition to war unless it is unavoidable for the safety of society; progress in all directions of human behaviour, man to man and collectively, man to the creator. It is a major mark of the response which we have developed in a civilized society for human dignity and human life. I watched the abhorrence of the western world toward Naziism, Mr. Speaker, and I was impressed by the fact that it did not derive merely from an opposition to the social system that Hitlerism represented but it derived mainly from an aversion against the denigration of human dignity and the brutal destruction of human life for which Naziism was responsible.

I therefore make my first point, Mr. Speaker: historically, philosophically and morally, mankind in civilized society has been progressing away from the taking of human life by the state, by individual human beings and on a world scale. Continually and progressively, mankind has recognized the dignity of the human being and the sacredness of the human life.

That takes me to the second point, Mr. Speaker, which it seems to me every hon. member must place before himself as he considers this question. The second point is that the state is justified in taking human life only if that taking of the human life protects society against a greater evil. This is the moral justification of some wars; it is the moral justification of military or police action against those who are in the act of threatening the security of the state or the lives of its citizens. The question we are asking ourselves during this debate, if we are serious as I am sure all of us are, is simply this: does the death penalty protect society against a greater evil so as to justify the state in taking a human life calculatedly and deliberately? I hope that every member of this House, I hope that every one of my fellow Canadians, that all of us are agreed that the state ought not deliberately to take a human life as an act of vengeance but that it would be justified only as an act of necessity to protect society.

The discussion here as elsewhere on this issue has been bedevilled by emotional reactions and by questioning motives. Mr. Speaker, there are some people who are in favour of the retention of capital punishment who accuse abolitionists of being bleeding hearts, more anxious to protect the criminal than to protect his victim. Some abolitionists accuse retentionists of being bloodless hearts lacking in moral concern. I hasten, before saying anything else, to admit that I well may have been guilty of this kind of attitude, as much as anyone else. Today, I suggest to hon. members adopting positions on both sides of this question that this is an unfortunate approach to the issue. We can discuss it constructively only if all of us assume that all of us and all Canadians are equally concerned about the moral and security problems involved and that those of us who are in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, as I am, are as concerned about the security of society and the state as any other person is, no matter, on which side of this argument he is. I believe that we would get much farther in understanding each other in this country and in arriving at a reasonable, legitimate and decent conclusion if we ceased accusing each other of motives on this anxious, moral question.

Mr. Stanfield: And on other questions.

Mr. Lewis: And on other questions, as well, although there might be less hesitation on some other questions.

As I have read the arguments over the years, and listened to and read arguments put forward in this House during the present debate, I think it is not wrong to say that those who want to retain capital punishment do so for two reasons. Not all put forward both reasons, but there are those two reasons, one of which is vengeance, and the other, alleged deterrence.

To those who want the state to kill somebody out of a sense of retribution, out of a sense of vengeance, for having committed the act of murder, I simply find it difficult to say anything. I profoundly disagree with them. I do not know how it is possible to persuade those who are moved by vengeance and a sense of anger and retribution against those who have committed the offence of murder—and I hope that if anyone in this House feels this way I will be forgiven for saying this, for I would be less than honest if I did not put this frankly—to see that that kind of attitude of vengeance and retribution is an attitude that belongs to a society of savagery and not to a society of civilization. All religions I have ever read of, all philosophical systems I have ever studied, and all talk about ethics and human morals, stress compassion, mercy and concern for every human being, even the wayward one, as a mark of decency and civilized behaviour. You cannot have collective vengeance and retribution, and compassion and mercy at the same time. You either have one or the other. If you are governed by compassion and by mercy for every human being, you must discard vengeance and retribution, not only as a personal act, but also as an act of the state.

It is true that all through this country there is a great deal of anxiety about this whole problem, a great deal of anxiety about the escapes which have taken place from our penitentiaries. I said yesterday in another debate, and I repeat today, so far as I am concerned, this is a moral and administrative matter. It is the duty of the government and the duty of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to take all steps necessary to rid the system of incompetent and unreliable people, and to make sure that the security of the penitentiaries and the security of the people of Canada is protected by the kind of staff and department that will see to it that these things do not occur in future as frequently as they have occurred in the past. I put it that way because I do not suppose any system will prevent escapes entirely. There will always be some. However, the regular way in which these have occurred must be stopped. Nevertheless, without being presumptuous, I appeal to members of this House and, indeed, to the people of Canada who are so concerned and anxious about this, not to let their anxiety about escapes from penitentiaries, which can be controlled and reduced by adequate administrative measures, affect their thinking on the subject of the state deliberately taking a life.

Next we come to the second argument for the retention of capital punishment, the deterrence argument. We have heard this argument time and again. We have heard the opposite argument time and again. I do not think anyone can say more; at least, I cannot. Having studied the subject for years, as have many other members of the House, because it is not only since becoming a Member of Parliament that I have been concerned about this, having been interested in it as a student, as a lawyer and all through my life, I think it is surely true to say that this at least is the case: There is no argument about the assertion that the statistical evidence does not support the allegation that capital punishment is a deterrent against murder. It may not support the opposite view. Logically speaking, there is no way in which you can support the opposite view.

There is no way in which you can find out how many people failed to commit murder because they thought that if they committed murder they might be executed. As I say, you cannot do that. The only statistical evidence you can have relates to the people who have already committed murder. Therefore, I do not claim that statistics show anything except that there is no correlation between the abolition or the retention of capital punishment and the number of violent crimes. All through history, according to every statistical table I have ever seen, it has been shown that there has been, depending on the general social circumstances of a society, relatively the same rate of violent crime in jurisdictions that retained capital punishment as in jurisdictions that have abolished it. Over the years there has been no difference whatsoever between the rate of violent crime in jurisdictions that have retained capital punishment and jurisdictions that have not. So, I urge on all members this: all statistical evidence shows that there simply is no correlation between the two.

Indeed, some students of penology claim that it is more likely that, in the presence of capital punishment, more people who have committed the crime of homicide or murder are acquitted in court than is the case if there is not the threat of the death penalty. That makes sense to me. This is not merely the evidence arrived at as a result of surveys. Logic, as well, it seems to me supports that assertion. After all, juries in our society are composed of decent men and women and they are as anxious to avoid responsibility for the death of another human being as anyone in this House. That assertion seems logical to me and therefore I accept the result of the surveys and of the statistics, namely, that men and women on juries would hesitate a great deal more about finding someone guilty, if they knew that that finding would result in the death of the accused person, than would be the case if they knew that the accused would be in prison for life or would receive some sentence like that. Therefore I think there is good evidence from statistics and, it seems to me, logic for the proposition that more murderers are likely to get away by being acquitted in the presence of the threat of the death penalty under our kind of system, in which they would need to be convicted by a jury composed of men and women, than would be the case in a situation where the death penalty is not there.

Numerous studies have been made of murderers and people inclined to commit suicide. I am not a psychiatrist or a psychologist, but I am impressed by the fact that in all the reading I have done, in all the reports I have read on this subject, the experts are convinced that the murderer does not take into consideration the consequences of his act at the time of the murder. I do not know a single exception in the studies made by penologists, psychiatrists, psychologists and other experts in this field, though, of course, that may be my fault; exceptions may exist. Surely, this is the main consideration. Those who argue that the death sentence is a deterrent, accept by implication the proposition that a murderer is really a normal human being who says to himself along logical lines: If I commit murder I shall be hanged. He is not that kind of person, according to all the inquiries which have been made. He is not rational at the time of the act of murder, even though he might not, in legal terms, be considered insane as far as events at a trial are concerned.

Every study of which I am aware shows that the majority of murders, 60 or 70 per cent of them, or an even greater percentage than that, are committed among members of a family, among drinking companions, friends who have fallen out, men and women who are normally law-abiding citizens and who are driven by passion or some other uncontrollable emotion to kill someone else. I should like to know how anyone thinks these people could be deterred by the threat of capital punishment. Many other murderers have been found through various studies to be psychotic, and I should like to know how they could be deterred by the threat of the death penalty. As far as the hardened criminal is concerned, the person who commits murder in the process of committing some other crime, every study shows he is invariably under the assumption that he will be able to get away with it. Otherwise, he would not have set out on the first crime.

Thus, I say to hon. members and to the people of Canada that the taking of life by the state by way of the death penalty accomplishes nothing as far as the protection of society is concerned, though it degrades the collectivity by having us murder someone else in response to a murder which has been committed. It is true there has been an increase recently in all crimes of violence, but I suggest that murder has not increased in any greater proportion than others and that the answer to an increase in violent crime does not lie in capital punishment or in other severe penalties. It lies in finding a way to overcome the increasing alienation in our society, it lies in improving the quality of life in a climate of growing urbanization, it lies in finding ways to eliminate poverty and deprivation, it lies in taking steps to improve the quality of life for all Canadians. It is in actions of this kind that the solution to violent crimes is to be found, not in violent penalties.

I wish to comment briefly on two further points. Like every other member of this House I am aware that a good many of my own constituents—I doubt from the replies to my questionnaire that it would be a majority—feel that the retention of capital punishment is necessary. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that every one of us has a duty to vote in accordance with our consciences and judgment and not to consider ourselves as merely rubber stamps for our constituents, because that is not representative government but delegated government and our system is a representative system, not a delegate system. We represent our constituents. We do not act as rubber stamps for their ideas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I would say, I hope without presumption, that as political spokesmen in society we have a duty to give leadership to the people of Canada. It is not new for majorities to have made mistakes—I can think of such lighter matters as elections, for example.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: There have been other occasions upon which majorities in the past have made mistakes, and those of us who are privileged to sit in this House and have access to much more information than our constituents, beside having a duty to consider matters objectively, with reason and careful study, have a duty not only to vote and act in accordance with our consciences but to give leadership to our constituents to rid them of errors which they have been fed by the media or in some other way.

Finally, I want to say this. It has been emphasized that there is to be a free vote. This will be the case in our party. But I am very proud of the fact that almost all the members in our caucus are abolitionists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I am very proud of the fact that our party has, over the years, in conventions both federal and provincial, many times adopted a policy approving the abolition of the death penalty. We, therefore, have a party policy on the issue. But as far as the vote on this bill is concerned, it is a free vote for the members of our caucus as it is for every member in this chamber.

I regret that this bill does not abolish capital punishment completely. I do not accept that there is any acceptable rationale behind the measure we are considering, other than a compromise, making a step in the direction of the abolition of the death penalty. Since this is such a step I intend to vote for it on second reading.

I do not regret that the prerogative of mercy has been exercised. I see no reason why I should not accept the assurance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that every case is considered on its merits. I hope the government will continue to seek the royal prerogative and address itself to the merits of each case, and I hope the result will be, in each case, commutation rather than the death penalty for the person concerned. Our attitude toward this issue is too important a mark of progress in the civilized behaviour of society for us to fail to make even this step toward the abolition of the death penalty. It is my hope that at the end of the next five years, if this bill does pass, parliament and Canadians generally will be able to accept the total abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Prime Minister a question? I was going to ask him a question at the conclusion of his speech but I wanted to listen to the speaches of the two other leaders before I did so. Would the Prime Minister accept a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I must ask for the opinion of the Prime Minister as to whether he is aggreable. Otherwise, I will give the floor to the next speaker. Does the Prime Minister agree to answer a question?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no objection to answering the hon. member here or elsewhere, but if he is entitled to ask me a question, I should like to ask some of the Leader of the Opposition and I am sure other questions would follow. So I do not think the practice is a very good one.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, it is with emotion that I rise today because we are living very serious, very difficult moments. What we are doing now will have great consequences on humanity and the life of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that this is a question of conscience, that every member is free to vote according to his conscience. But there are various kinds of consciences in this House, as I see it. Not many of them are alike. Not many of them really accept their responsibilities, which at times, are huge.

Our society is now "mutilated". Some citizens authorize themselves to take away the life of others under all sorts of pretexts, for the sake of vengeance, for a few dollars. Others say: In all conscience, we do not have the right to interfere with the life of criminals. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, what the hon. members do to protect the Canadian people. I would say, without fear of being mistaken, that generally speaking Canadians want the death penalty retained. Some hon. members say: No, we know better than the people; we are better educated, we are more aware, and in short, we are more ready to compromise. And so, with regard to capital punishment, we will be moderate. But I maintain that the general population demands the retention of capital punishment.

So, faced with this alternative, I do not think we have a right to decide according to what we think, even if we claim to be highly aware. How can a few men be more aware than the whole population? That is the question for me, and I will say right away that we have had the abolition of capital punishment for five years, on a trial basis, as a result of a ruling passed by this House. The experience of this trial period has shown a greater increase in the number of murders and other atrocities than has ever been known before in Canadian history. This has been recently, since we abolished capital punishment.

Moreover, we retained capital punishment for those who had taken the lives of policemen or prison guards. Well, there have been not just two policemen or two prison guards killed, but quite a number of them, and the law has not been observed. What has happened to justice? It has been made into injustice. The law existed all right, and laid down these exceptions, but no notice was taken of them. They were passed over by justice.

A handful of men have taken advantage of certain prerogatives to say: We will respect the law to some extent by keeping capital punishment for those who have the nerve to kill a policeman or a prison guard. But when it has come to carrying out justice, justice has gone by the board. There are your men of justice, your moral beings, who lecture everybody and pose as great saviours of the people, great Canadians. But the laws are not respected. According to me, it would be better not to have any. It is better not to talk about those things at all. When we passed this bill, why did we specify those exceptions? Because we thought we were justified in doing so to some extent. Therefore, capital punishment is lawful. It was recognized and it readily is still.

Capital punishment now protects policemen and prison guards, and that protection should be extended to all members of society, because each of them is as important as a prison guard or a policeman. They are human beings as we are, and as are the other citizens.

In Canada, the number of homicides, according to the 1970 statistics, has increased by 60.4 per cent in comparison with 1962. Thus, the crime rate based on the population has increased by 35.3 per cent during the same period and we are told that the death penalty does not frighten anyone, that it would be advisable to abolish it. We are told that it does not increase the number of murders, the crime rate, when we have some statistics that no one can deny.

The number of murders in 1970 has increased by 213.4 per cent over 1962. Thus, the number of attempted murders based on the population has increased by 180 per cent during the same period and we will be told that it is useless, that nothing can be proved, that it is natural, that the law forbids us to kill certain citizens or murderers.

When we deal with a matter such as the death penalty, we must consider the punishment meted out to a criminal. We find awful the punishment given to a criminal, but he has no consideration for people; he commits some atrocity and we find it normal. It is felt that to be human and social, to have the moral accepted, all this should be allowed at society's expenses.

Men of great value are made to disappear, as we have seen in the province of Quebec, and almost nothing is said about it because all the criminals are now being freed and because of the current law and justice everyone is protesting against this kind of punishment applied to citizens and subsequently eliminated.

We must think of punishment and to inflict it to criminals but we should also consider the reasons leading those criminals to commit violations and of their opinion of their punishment. Therefore, if by reinstating capital punishment we succeed in convincing someone not to commit a crime, death penalty should be reestablished as it will contribute to protect society.

If we have the right to kill several thousand people to protect them from an assailant we also have the right to condemn a criminal to protect society.

The death penalty is a necessity; it is a punishment for criminals, a protection for society and not a vengeance for society as stated by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

In the same way as a man should protect his life it is also his duty to respect the life of others. It is in that sense that homicide or murder is prohibited by moral law as well as by civil law which must reflect natural law.

It is incumbent on the civil authority to protect citizens by laws and it is its right to enforce the law required by common welfare and the protection of the citizen's life and property.

If police officers have been shot point blank and law is not enforced what is the use of enacting laws, what good is there to be prime minister of a province or of the country? If the laws are not enforced what is the use of this justice which is costing millions of dollars to our fellow citizens? If anything is costly in Canada, it is obviously justice. This is the costliest item for the people and it is always for the sake of great principles of justice that such a thing must be done and that they must spend millions of dollars.

Since the civil authorities must ensure the respect for order in society, they have therefore the right of inflicting punishment and demand repair from those who violate law and order. This is the sanction which completes the law. But can the civil power go so far as to inflict capital punishment?

The political authority has the right to impose capital punishment on those who are guilty of homicide.

The civil authority has the right to do all that is necessary to serve justice and provide security to citizens. Capital punishment being necessary to provide justice and security to citizens, therefore the civil authority has the right to impose capital punishment and it is its duty to do so.

Punitive justice or justice through revenge demands equality as much as possible between the crime that has been committed and the punishment imposed for such a crime. Now in the case of crimes like homicide, murder, there is no other punishment than capital punishment to create equality between punishment and crime. Therefore, to serve justice, Mr. Speaker, capital punishment is sometimes necessary, which proves the second part of my minor premise.

It is almost impossible to provide for the citizens' security against the acts of certain men without applying the most powerful curbing device that exists against those criminals. Now the most powerful curbing device is capital punishment. Life imprisonment, suggested as a penalty by certain people, is not a curbing device that is strong enough to stop a potential murderer. As a matter of fact, murderers may escape sometimes and thus not serve their sentence. On the other hand, the horrible crime of taking the life of another person is neither sufficiently nor preventively punished through life imprisonment. Capital punishment is a more effective preventive measure since death is the privation of life, the greatest blessing. Capital punishment must be imposed on those who take the life of other people.

Here are some of the objections. It is said that life imprisonment ensures public security and to that, one must answer that life imprisonment ensures security in a certain way, but is life imprisonment sufficient and sufficiently effective? It may be sometimes but it is not always effective. We often had proof of that.

Mr. Speaker, as long as this appendage providing for the hanging of murderers of police officers is not removed, we shall be accomplices, voluntarily or not. Legalized, institutionalized murder and death voluntarily given, either by an individual or by a just society that wants to punish them remains a crime and an even more serious crime when it is committed by individuals who have been able to think about their actions.

We have received hundreds of folders and citizens have been sending us protest letters requesting that capital punishment be maintained. For instance, I have with me a report from the newspaper Le Droit of December 5, 1969, and I quote:

Capital punishment is necessary to protect society.

During this interview Parliament member and lawyer Rémi Paul stated the reasons against abolition of capital punishment.

He is one man who speaks against abolition openly and proudly.

I have also with me an article rewritten by a former judge, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who, through newspapers, invited people to write to the federal government and request it not to abolish the death penalty. A lengthy summary has been made of that and I wonder whether the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe will have the courage to rise and repeat what he has been saying and asking from the population for a few years. I wonder whether he will follow his leader and raise his arm when his leader will raise his, or whether he will assume his true responsibilities.

I have with me another press article which I quote:

Dramatic increase in murders in Quebec since 1961 (C. Wagner)— —attributed to the abolition of capital punishment.

● (1640)

There is a whole page, Mr. Speaker, which I will not read.

I have also received a letter from the Quebec Federation of Retail Services, addressed as follows:

To all members of the Canadian House of Commons who are from the province of Quebec
Dear member of Parliament:

The Quebec Federation of Retail Services, which groups seven professional associations of retailers from various sectors of the retail trade, wishes to inform you that, upon consideration of the problem of the death penalty, our administrative council has decided in favour of its retention.

We have received thousands of letters like that one, and yet it is said that the population knows nothing about it.

The member for Saint-Hyacinthe certainly knows something about it.

Other associations have written to me; to quote the Civil Service Association of Canada:

As a member of Parliament, you will be invited during the present session to vote on the matter of the abolition of the death penalty in Canada. The Civil Service Association would not normally concern itself with so controversial a matter of public politics. We would consider that our members prefer to decide about this matter in the manner which the government seems to intend to adopt in Parliament, leaving each person free to make his decision individually.

In this specific case, however, our Association has, as an organization, an important interest in one aspect of the problem. We refer to the abolition of the death penalty for murderers of prison employees or guards during attempts at escape or any other incident in which a victim is legally carrying out his duties.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not read them all. Members of parliament are asked to retain the death penalty, at any cost. We receive any number of letters like that one; all hon. members must have received some.

I quote: "Young conservatives in favour of retention." It is strange to notice that the Progressive Conservatives now accept the proposals of the government for abolishing the death penalty for another five years. It was suspended for five years and that should be good enough to know what happened: statistics are there to prove it; the number of murders increased alarmingly over that period and even though I am no "smart aleck", I do not want to carry things too far either.

Conscientiously, I should greatly prefer that none should have to go through such atrocities but we are here, Mr. Speaker to deal justice, to enlighten the people, to enact legislation protecting the people. They need protection and I believe that on the whole Progressive Conservative hon. members and Liberal members as well are prepared to maintain the elimination of a capital punishment for another trial period of five years, claiming that it is barbarous to take a citizen's life.

In many countries, Mr. Speaker, this would not be tolerated. In several countries there are even no inquiries and bums are done away with, who bring evil and discord into society and the lives of respectable citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I should have much to say, but since others want to participate in the debate I shall say that for our part we shall be voting against Bill C-2, an Act to amend the Criminal Code.

The Criminal Code exists, Mr. Speaker. It should be amended, but in order to protect people and not to further encourage the atrocities we are now experiencing.

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, before we are invited to vote upon the motion for second reading of Bill C-2, I would like to say a few words about this matter which has given rise to many debates and votes for a few years.

I had the opportunity of taking the floor twice in this House, when bills were introduced in 1966 and 1967. In 1967, the House passed a bill which suspended capital punishment, except in cases of murders of police officers or penitentiary guards on duty, for a five-year period. This five-year period was over at the end of 1972 and today, the government found it advisable to introduce in this House a bill that is similar to that which was passed in 1967, thus extending for another five-year period the abolishment of capital punishment, except in cases I referred to earlier.

I intend to say a few words, without passion, without emotion and on my own behalf only. I do not intend to convince anybody, and I do not think that I could succeed in do so. I was told that this was an emotional issue; probably there will not be any more important matter before Parliament for a long time.

I listened carefully today to the passionless and emotionless speech of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I take his word and I am sure of it, when he says that each case was or will be fairly assessed. However, I must admit that it might be more difficult to convince the right hon. Prime Minister about the advisability of capital punishment. I am expressing a personal view but I suggest that the Prime Minister is right when he says that each case must be considered or will be considered in all fairness.

I listened to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) whose speech, I must admit, was very vague. We do not really know what will happen during the third reading of this bill after it has been considered in committee.

As for myself, I intend to inform hon. members of my decision when motions on second and third reading will be put. I plan to vote in favour of this legislation on second reading since I believe with certain exceptions that a bill should be considered thoroughly and on its merit.

When this bill comes back before the House I will make my decision, that is to say that if it is not amended so as to propose the complete abolition of capital punishment I will vote against it. Let me explain. I think that those who heard my speeches in the past know that it is not an emotional issue for me. When I opposed certain bills in the past I explained why I was opposing them and I explained specially that I was concerned with other aspects such as parole, criminal records, rehabilitation of inmates, trials and preliminary inquiries. Some improvements have been brought about since then in the field of criminal records, bails, trials, preliminary inquiries and many other areas.

However, Mr. Speaker, I now consider the problem of abolition or retention as settled. The facts are there to prove it. I do not think that this government—and it is my personal opinion—nor any other government which could be called upon to run this country in the immediate future would ever send anybody to the gallows. So I consider the problem as solved. We had better stop talking about it and be realistic and know what to do after. We must then ensure that inmates are rehabilitated when possible.

Some people talk about revenge and protecting society. I have a lot of respect for those who make such arguments; it is their right to do so and it is not my intention to blame them for it. However, I for one think that there is only one thing that counts, that is what we are going to do with the inmates after their detention. I do not believe in those arguments of deterrence. As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said a moment ago, the statistics in that field are more or less good and we will never know the number of persons who committed or did not commit a murder because there was abolition or not. But one thing is sure: the general public does feel that no one will be hanged either under the present government or under the next governments whatever the party in power. So we must reassure the public once and for all and tell them that abolition is a fact.

And what are we going to do now? Later, for any reason, if Parliament sees fit, it will introduce another legislation and restore capital punishment if needed. We must make up our mind now, once and for all. But to say that they will introduce that legislation to have more statistics, this is a unbelievable joke. Everybody knows that within the next five years, nobody will be sentenced to death. Some may believe it, but I do not. It is not a way to gather statistics.

I have listened with considerable interest to the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for York South, who had the courage to say this afternoon that he at least was not satisfied with this bill; he saw a compromise in it and he had the courage to say so.

I consider it takes courage to settle the issue once and for all and to abolish capital punishment. Something must be done. For instance, in trying to convince us or the population, as have done some hon. members or other people who do not sit in this House, some persons give the following argument: As a compromise, of course, to try to have this bill passed, which I consider as inefficient, we will now arrange so that those who under this bill are sentenced to death for qualified murder stay in prison 20 years, without getting out and without remission. This is barbarism.

I have studied the problem of penitentiaries and of their inmates, Mr. Speaker, because I have always been interested in this and I think a good many hon. members in this House know it, and I can say, of course, that a good many persons who know the problem agree with me that if we let someone in a penitentiary without any hope of getting out for 20 years, he will grow crazy or commit suicide.

I know, Mr. Speaker, the case of people who were sentenced to death and were imprisoned for life, for manslaughter for instance.

I can say that if, after 10 years, a person is not rehabilitated and ready to be sent back to society with the necessary safeguards, he will never be. I think we must have in mind what 10 years in prison can represent. I have never been in jail. But we must imagine what it is like.

I know someone, Mr. Speaker, who has been serving his life sentence for 9 years. I think that this person is now rehabilitated. I can be wrong but I think he is. But it is not in the ninth year that he is rehabilitated; it started as early as the first or second year, because it must be understood that if a person is found guilty, he is in a state of mind that prompts him to live in general in a world which does not facilitate his rehabilitation on the first day of imprisonment.

That person, often after one year or two, comes to realize that it is possible, and he takes the necessary means, with the help of a psychiatrist, to rehabilitate himself. But if he were told tomorrow morning that he has no chance to get out after 10 or 11 years, then he would stop being a case for rehabilitation. I am convinced of that.

When I hear people in this House or elsewhere say, always for the sake of compromise or for other reasons—I say "for the sake of compromise" because I believe that is the reason—that criminals will be imprisoned for 20 years and that the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will amend the bill to let the population know that those people will serve their sentence for 20 years, that it will be impossible for them to come out of prison before that, I think one makes another error, Mr. Speaker. So, in my humble opinion, there will be no more joking.

If the matter were referred to a committee, if a bill advocating the complete abolition of the death penalty were considered, I would be the first to support it. I know that my views on the subject are well known, but those who have read my speeches must realize that I have changed. I do not say that there is no deterrent, but I do not believe in revenge. I believe along with others—and the Prime Minister referred to this this afternoon—that there is a punitive factor and the punishment, it must be admitted after all, can be adequate. What can be done about it? When one drives through a red light, a $20 fine is levied. If someone steals $50, $5,000, or a million he will be punished accordingly. Evidence shows generally that a sentence is somewhat suited to the crime, though mistakes are always possible.

We must admit, and this is quite simplistic,—to be consistent with our opinions—that when a person deliberately kills another, it is said that he who voluntarily kills deserves an adequate punishment, which is death. Let us forget about this and stop talking about this problem. We shall never find a solution. We shall never succeed in convincing 22 million Canadians that abolition or retention is necessary. It is impossible.

If tomorrow morning a three-year old girl is murdered for example, people will be shocked and will say: Let him hang! But two or three years later, when the accused is found guilty and the decision is made to hang him, then people will say: It is most unfortunate. After all, it will not bring the child back to life.

We shall thus never find a solution, Mr. Speaker. Then, let the government introduce a bill in favour of abolition and with full knowledge of the facts, honestly and sincerely, let us vote on this question.

Then, I would vote for abolition. I said that I would not try to convince anyone; it is the only thing that I can say. I have tried to convince people by saying: That is enough, let us abolish capital punishment and then make sure that prisoners get what they deserve. When we day "what they deserve", it means that when they are in prison, we should take steps to keep them there, and I am not casting reflections on any member in this connection. Let us see to it that those who can be rehabilitated will be and that those who cannot be rehabilitated stay in prison.

In this way, the population will know where it stands and we shall live in a climate of security rather than uncertainty. In fact, this climate of uncertainty exists in the public as well as in penitentiaries, which is demoralizing for everyone and does not help at all to solve the problem. This does not help society either because it is much better protected when we know where we are going and when there is no procrastination, when there is no last minute compromise which often does no credit to those who makes it.

With this, Mr. Speaker, I end my remarks which I had hoped would be shorter and which, I trust, will not have been too painful to listen to.

● (1700)

[English]

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join some of my colleagues who have said that it is unfortunate that we are required to debate the capital punishment issue at this particular time in this particular parliament. It is unfortunate for a number of reasons. If not the most important, certainly the first reason, is that capital punishment is not the issue that we should be considering. It is but one of the problems that plague our total penal system, as the debate of last night indicated. But in this debate we must restrict ourselves to the issue of capital punishment.

It has been characteristic of this House, during my short career here, that we legislate from one crisis to the next crisis. This is stop gap legislation. We should be addressing ourselves now to the real problems of the country—the economic issues—which include unemployment, inflation, unemployment insurance and income tax. Any one of these problems is more serious than the one that is presently under debate.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the Criminal Code already contains provisions which, although ignored, deal with murder. But we must address ourselves to this most perplexing bill which, if passed, will be a victory for abolitionists and murderers, although it will still permit capital punishment, and which, if defeated, will still be a victory for abolitionists and murderers because, de facto, we have already said goodbye to capital punishment anyway, because the government won't enforce the law.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is a bad bill. It is so confusing that our Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) who, on the one hand, say they are abolitionists, on the other hand say that they will support the bill even though it provides for capital punishment.

Much has been said in this debate, and I do not want to be repetitive. At this point I must say that I shall find myself compelled to vote against the government's bill. This is not necessarily because I am overwhelmingly in favour of capital punishment but because the bill does not provide the Canadian people with the protection that I deem necessary. I stress protection because that is my No. 1 concern—the protection of the innocent members of society, people like our wives and children. Abolitionists overlook this most important aspect and express pity for the murderers. They say, "But you cannot bring back a murder victim." I say "we want protection while we are alive".

The abolitionists point to statistics and say that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder, and so it should be abolished. They point to the statistics to support their claim, but we all know that statistics can be used to prove anything that the statistician wants to prove. Let me give you some examples.

Statistics Canada, on January 19 of this year, issued a report revealing that the average number of murders during the years 1961 to 1967 inclusive was 222 per year. During the four years after the temporary ban was instituted the average number of murders was 376 per year, reaching a peak of 422 in 1971. Certainly, these figures show that the suspension of capital punishment was no deterrent to murder. My colleague from Calgary North has reminded us that the deterrent effect can never be measured accurately because we do not know how many people would have committed murder if there had been no death penalty. But I am not worried about whether a murderer fears being put to death. I am worried about protection of the innocent.

The abolitionists say that retentionists want revenge. I am not concerned with revenge. Probably full life, or even 25 years in prison is a punishment worse than death. I am concerned with protection. You will hear it said that imprisonment will provide the protection. I ask for whom? Certainly protection will not be provided for the prison guards or for the public after one of these murderers escapes.

The bill we are asked to pass provides that the killing of a policeman or prison guard is punishable by death, but other premeditated and violent killing is not. Is this the leadership the people deserve from our government?

You probably also hear it said that the courts can err and the wrong man could be executed. Mr. Speaker, the chance of this happening is so remote that it hardly bears consideration. The courts of our land today have so many safeguards, so many checks and balances, that the risk of being wrongfully executed is hardly measurable, certainly not when it is compared with the risks we all take every day when we get out of bed and go into the streets. It could even be described as a non-existent risk. But the abolitionists do not consider the risk of murder to our innocent citizens.

There is another type of protection that bears mention at this time. A close associate of mine, who is a skilled courtroom lawyer, has said that if his wife or child were murdered and the murderer were later released he would search out and kill that murderer. He does not attempt to justify what he would do, and he fully realizes that his action would be reprehensible, but he would be unable to stop himself. He needs protection just as much as his loved ones. If we do not give society the protection it demands, we shall find ourselves returning to the days when the quickest and the strongest ruled, to the old doctrine of might is right. People will ignore the law if the law ignores them.

I have said many things about protection because protection has long been the concern of every member of every society. Society found long ago that some of its members acted in an anti-social way, and that the majority required protection from the few. They established police forces to provide this protection. In this most important debate, the chiefs of all our police forces are urging us to retain capital punishment. Are we to ignore the men who are hired to protect us?

The aims of the abolitionists are admirable—to murderers! Frequently, the abolitionists are people who say they are concerned with helping mankind. But they seem to be obsessed with helping the few—the guilty few—instead of helping the many—the innocent many. It is time these people began to be concerned about preserving the cream and throwing away the scum!

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) today spoke of passion killing. These would be manslaughter charges and not capital murder, anyway. But the hon. member says in so many words that he would let the hired killer remain alive to escape and kill again.

Since my election, I, like the others in this House, have heard hundreds of opinions expressed by constituents and others. We have heard the scriptures quoted by both sides in the debate, but I am convinced that the vast majority of Canadians want a return to capital punishment, though they want it for various reasons. It is true that some are vengeful or have other reasons, but the single, most moving reason is protection, and my direction is clear. I think the innocent citizens expect their elected representatives to give them the protection of the law, and I am opposed to this bill because it does not give the protection demanded.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, first, I should like to agree with the views of the previous speaker, my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Clark) regarding why there are many more important topics and issues to be debated here at this time, such as our general economic problems and the drastic rise in food prices. Also, there has been so much said on the subject of capital punishment in the last few days, months and indeed years, in this country and others, that one would suppose there is nothing left to say. It seems to me, however, not only due to my own strong feelings, but the personal contact I have had with many people regarding this matter, that no one person has really summed up all the real issues.

Now, I am not going to pretend to be the guiding light as far as a solution is concerned—far from it. I want to merely state, Mr. Speaker, what I, personally, believe is the true feeling and belief of the majority of our society, a society that is not sick or degenerated, but a society trying to live in harmony and peace. Under normal circumstances, it could be called the silent majority, but when it comes to this issue of capital punishment, it is a society far from being silent.

Mr. Speaker, I have stated on numerous occasions to my constituents of High Park-Humber Valley in Toronto, because capital punishment is such an individually emotional issue, that when the vote came up, I would vote on this matter as the majority of my constituents would want me to vote. In that regard, I have recently sent out a questionnaire to my constituents and have had a response of 83 per cent for capital punishment, 12 per cent against, and 5 per cent undecided. Now I can vote on this matter not only as my constituents would want me to, but also as my conscience directs me.

We remember that in April, 1966, an attempt was made to achieve complete abolition, but it was rejected on a free vote in this House. In 1967, the same parliament passed for a five-year trial, a law which was a compromise and which abolished hanging for all but the murderers of prison guards and policemen. But was one man hanged? No. The government has not only made a mockery of the courts, but of their own laws. This law, as we all know, expired at the end of 1972. But murders in Canada continue. I have some statistics, though I really do not want to dwell on statistics as such. One statistic supplied by Statistics Canada shows that from 1961, when the capital murder rate in Canada was one in every 100,000 Canadians, it rose to 2.3 murders in every 100,000 in 1970.

In Great Britain, as we know, capital punishment was abolished in 1965. Four years prior to the bill, 71 murders took place in Great Britain. During the four years after the abolishing of capital punishment there were 161 convictions on murder charges. This figures would have been much higher had the courts not charged dozens of murderers with manslaughter instead. These statistics speak for themselves, Mr. Speaker.

The profound question, then, that immediately faces hon. members in the twenty-ninth parliament is, are we in favour of the death penalty for murder or are we not? It is often contended that too much sympathy is shown the criminals, too little thought given to the victims, to the families and personal communities of which they were members. This contention I would not seek to refute. It's truth is too often only too clear. If it is argued that other considerations are more important, it is not argued that this one is unimportant, or does not deserve more practical weight than it has been given.

It is widely held that a principal aim of the whole system of criminal justice should be reform of the criminal, that the convicted person deserves the right and the opportunity to make a new start in life. That also, is not being contradicted, except by this consideration: that we are concerned here with capital crimes, that what may be valid for 99 in every 100 criminals is not necessarily valid for the hundredth. Even if every dog were entitled to his bite, the rule would not apply to a mad dog. Therefore, once again we ask ourselves the question—should a man who has wilfully killed another man, himself be killed?

Historically, this question has been asked of those living after the event. The prosecuting attorney pleads it in his implacable argument before the judge and jury. The defense attorney denies it in his impassioned plea for the life of the murderer. The judge juggles the question in his summing up to the jury, and the jury deliberates on it, sometimes in anguish, sometimes in great clarity of mind.

Yet in all that has been written and said on the subject of capital punishment, seldom has anyone questioned what the victim would say about it if only he could. And, after all, equally with his murderer, the victim would have a right to speak in the matter of his own death and its punishment. Supposing the intended victim of a premeditated murder were to know in a flash of insight exactly what was in the mind of his assailant. Suppose everything were equal. Suppose the intended victim had a gun in his hand at the same instant as his murderer approached him with a gun in his hand. What would be the inalienable right of the threatened man? What would you do, if you were the intended victim? Would you simply stand there and allow yourself to be shot through the heart? If so, you would voluntarily relinquish your equality before the law and your right to the love of the land. Would you turn and run? Then, you would be a coward. Or, would you employ equal force to his and shoot him dead?

The trouble is, the rights of the victim are often overlooked in the hurly-burly of the trial of his murderer. All of the attention is fixed on the plight of the man on trial. Safe in their own comfortable homes, remote from the confrontation which took place at the moment of a man's death, people are prone in the intervening months to sympathize with this living man who is, after all, one of them and must merit mercy. They forget that the dead victim received neither sympathy nor mercy. There is generally only one recognized sanction proposed as an alternative to capital punishment for crimes of a capital nature, guaranteed lengthy prison terms. Long prison terms, however, may justly be criticized as being repulsive, as being punishment of the sort condemned in the language of the Constitution of the United States of America as "cruel and unusual". A sensitive society must shrink from the infliction of such prolonged punishment as it should shrink from torture. In most cases, it is not a punishment which fits the crime, but punishment which balances slow psychic death against the sudden killing.

Those who speak or think "humanity" must forget long prison terms; a person who has spent many years behind bars and concrete walls degenerates beyond recognition into a class close to vegetation. Let us become humane by not allowing our laws to let humans become vegetables. There are secondary reasons as well for this position, such as the cost of feeding, clothing and housing men and women whose proved relationship to society has been one of violent antagonism, basic opposition to the values and standards accepted by the community. A large group of fellow citizens should not be subjected to the difficult, dangerous and demeaning task of serving as keepers of the enemies of society, who have behaved like brute beasts.

Now, what really should be considered as a capital crime? Well, in Canada as in other countries there has been at work a steady refinement of definition, a narrowing of meaning, as to the crimes for which capital punishment should be imposed. Much of the process has been good; in part it has been extreme. Some comments should be made about the sorts of considerations which must weigh with parliament and the courts. There is a justifiable distinction, but one which it is very difficult to draw, between the premeditated murder and the act of sudden passion. It is surely reasonable to assume that if a person carried a lethal weapon to the place where he kills, he must have forseen the possibility of using it.

The tendency to regard somewhat leniently the person who commits a crime under the influence of alcohol or drugs is one which it is difficult to justify in the great majority of cases which come before the courts. Even when the use of intoxicants and drugs has not deliberately preceded, as an act of preparation, the commission of the crime, it is clear that in many cases the offender must have been aware of the likely effects of their use. Such a person should be held responsible for his choice and its consequences. One who has made a wrong choice of this sort and killed, has destroyed his own case for leniency on the grounds of possible penitence and reform. How can he be trusted again to have freedom of choice in the world, even after 15 or 20 years?

There has been little discussion of capital crimes other than murder. This is unfortunate, because a comparison of crimes can be helpful in evaluating their seriousness. Hanging for rape had disappeared in Canada before the penalty was removed from the Criminal Code, partly because of the extraordinary difficulty of proving guilt. But, as is the case with other crimes of violence, there is an upward trend in the rate of offences. The justification for retaining the supreme penalty as an alternative is that in some cases of psychopathic murder, the results for the victim are perhaps even more terrible than the results of other kinds of murder. It would be a declaration by society of its code of values, if nothing else, if the capital alternative were restored in the statute.

Sea piracy has been rated a capital offence, and the same reasons now require that air piracy be classified in the same way. The pirate, by sea or air, for the most part operates outside the area of national law and police action, and by violence or threat of violence he takes over the command of a fragile carrier, endangering the safety of passengers and crew. He also, potentially, ranks among the most dangerously anti-socials who commit wholesale murder.

Hard drug pushers, not users, could possibly rate as the worst killers in our society and should come under the capital crimes law. They pick on the weak, the confused, the young, the frustrated, and they spread a disease worse than cancer, a disease that could not only ruin an empire but, indeed, mankind. The growing cult of violence may make additions to the list of capital crimes desirable. The use of explosives, with their capacity for mass murder, makes ordinary citizens on the street or going about their business more vulnerable to the whims of merciless killers than has been the case in the past.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is more than clear by now that the majority of my constituents and I are totally in favour of bringing back capital punishment as soon as possible in order to save whatever dignity and freedom there is left in our lives and our own society. There are, however, two final points which I should like to make at this time. First, let us be humane by not allowing a human being to rot in jail over a 20 year or more term, as I have stated; and let us civilize ourselves by imposing the death penalty in a more humane fashion than hanging. There are up-to-date medical facilities and drugs that could be utilized without having to make a production of the execution.

Unfortunately, there are in this country still too many people who believe the death penalty for murder is a cruel and inhuman punishment for a man or woman convicted of such a crime. These people, it appears, have no regard for the victim or the victim's family, as I have said. That and the attitude of the federal cabinet during the five year ban which has just expired makes me bristle. We must realize that men and women "hyped" by speed and armed with weapons walk our streets with violence in their minds and murder in their hearts. You and I walk these same streets unarmed, protected only by the men recruited to keep law and order; and when these men give their lives while protecting our lives and our property, who pays? Does the law of the land demand payment? Yes, it does.

Who, then, should have the right to abrogate that law? The federal cabinet, in an aberration for which there is no sensible reason and which cannot be justified, does and has exercised that right repeatedly. It is time to re-examine this masochistic trait. We teach people that the age of maturity is 18. If a person, after he or she reaches that age, chooses to operate outside the mainstream of society and is convicted of killing a man who maintains the law of the land, you cannot justify commutation. You are doing an injustice to those who live within the law and to those who maintain it. A killer has no right to inflict his presence on this society after he has been sentenced to death for murder. For if he lives, he is living proof that society has no desire to protect itself or protect those hired to protect lives and property. To let him live makes a mockery of the law, makes a mockery of those who enacted the legislation and of those who elected the representatives who passed the legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply moved as I participate in the debate on Bill C-2 calling for a five-year extension of the abolishment of capital punishment. The matter is one of great import, since it relates directly to man's greatest possession, which is life.

Because of the sacred nature of human life I believe legislation should reflect this in reality by applying the maximum penalty to those who deliberately violate the principle.

We live within a society and I believe we all agree that this society should reach a very high level of civilization and that our laws should contribute to achieving this goal by ensuring a maximum of security for members of this society. People are entitled to normal protection, and it is up to the government to provide it. That is why we should pass legislation to ensure public security and also to punish those who jeopardize the liberty and security of others.

The many escapes from our prisons and penitentiaries do not foster a feeling of security among the people. It is the government's responsibility, therefore, to ensure the security of members of society by enacting legislation to increase their feeling of being protected against law-breakers.

We live in a century when each and every one, in his own way, proclaims the right to be free. Freedom is not only for the individual, but for his neighbours. Therefore, whoever takes his neighbour's life harms the other in his life, in his right to live. And in our modern society the tendency is to treat criminals just as though taking one's neighbour's life were not a crime.

When we consult our voters on the matter of the abolition of capital punishment, we see that many of them are worried about the rise in crime in this country, of mass escapes, of parole and sentences that are commuted by the executive, all of which goes to reduce the public's confidence in the judiciary.

The government must therefore provide better protection, so as to create a feeling of security among the population, a feeling which is becoming dangerously rare nowadays. Every day in newspapers and magazines and on radio and television, people are being literally flooded with news of the possible adoption of all kinds of measures to make things easier for criminals, and they might well wonder if criminals really exist, and if society is really protected.

Young people should be better informed about what the police force really is; they should be taught that a policeman is first and foremost the citizens' friend and not a scourge, that his job is sometimes unrewarding, that it is his duty to ensure individual safety, to which end he must enforce the law.

When the Criminal Code was amended to abolish the death penalty, with two exceptions, it was for a trial period of five years. During the trial period, a number of policemen and prison guards were murdered, and certain people were accused, given a fair trial, found guilty and condemned to death. However, how many of those found guilty have been executed?

I have here a reply that was given in the House to a question that I had put on the order paper, which shows clearly that the executive changes sentences passed by the judiciary, rendering inoperative a law whose implementation we are now asked to extend for another five-year period.

The question and the answer can be found in Hansard for March 6, 1972, page 535. I quote:

● (1730)

1. (a) How many death sentences were imposed by the courts from January 1, 1967 to December 15, 1971 (b) how many sentences were executed (c) how many sentences were commuted?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Here is the answer from the hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General):

1. (a) Thirteen, (b) None; (c) Eleven.

So, 11 times out of 13 the government changed the sentence of the court. Here is the second part of the question:

2. For what crime was each of these persons sentenced to death?

Here is the answer:

2. Murder, in each case.

Here is the third part of the question:

3. (a) What are the names of those sentenced to death who have received a commutation . . .

Then follows the list and I will not bother to enumerate those persons. The dates of commutations through orders in council are the following: January 4 1968, eight orders in council allowing eight commutations of sentences. The cabinet is proceeding in series. The three others bear different dates.

Canadian have the right to expect that the law be obeyed and that the crime be punished according to penalties provided in the law.

Any normal human being is upset when he hears of a murder, that the life of a human being has been taken out of malice. This is why I understand the feeling of horror that moves the majority of Canadians to want that a crime as horrifying as capital murder be punished.

I understand that the human justice process is not absolute and that we could always make a mistake. This is not only the case for charges under the Criminal Code but also under the Civil Code, yet they continue to apply penalties provided under the Civil Code.

After a just trial, Mr. Speaker, when all known means to find the truth have been used and an accused has been convicted of having taken the life of his fellow citizen, is there really a compensation measure more just than capital punishment?

Let us take as an example the case of an individual who deliberately makes a device to explode a bomb in a public place, and by the way causes the death of one or several persons and then, it is demonstrated beyond all doubt that he is the criminal. Can we, in all conscience, allow this crime to go unpunished? What would then say the children of a mother who would find death in such circumstances?

I feel that it is just that capital punishement be maintained in the case of the murder of a policemen or a prison guard. The life of a mother or a father should be just as valuable because, as far as the mother is concerned, she is the gardien and the educator of her children, and as far as the father is concerned, no matter what his profession, he is the bread winner for his wife and children.

Why one law for the rich and another for the poor? Is the life of the bank clerk, the working man, the road employee not as useful to his family?

Let us be logical and to be so, the partisans of the abolition of the death penalty should avoid suggesting that some reservations should be made. They should demand the abolition of the death penalty for treachery and crimes committed under the National Defence Act.

Those crimes are nevertheless subject to the death penalty, because they are crimes against the state which is lifeless. If it is fair to protect state representatives, why not protect the life of people who make up the state?

Some hon. members who approve the abolition of the death penalty have referred to judicial errors. However, we all know that hanging applies to capital murders only, when there is no shadow of a doubt that the accused is really guilty.

If the minister is convinced that the maintenance of the death penalty for the murder of police officers and prison guards will have a deterrent effect, that penalty should logically have a deterrent effect in other cases.

I am convinced that it is essential to protect the life of police officers and prison guards by maintaining the death penalty. Therefore, it would be proper to protect the life of young girls threatened with murder and assault. Is there a difference between the murder of a police officer during a bank hold-up and that of a young girl victim of a rape by a sexual deviate?

Who was not astounded and indignant when we learned last fall the murder of two gamekeepers in Quebec? I had known one of them for many years: he was a model employee and father and a honest citizen.

Of what right have the killers of these people availed themselves to act this way? Even though we live in a society which prides itself for being progressive, can we really let such crimes go unpunished? Would that really be showing advanced civic-mindedness to leave injustice and violence without any punishment?

The state is in some way responsible for the alarming crime increase in Canada by letting movie theatres and television stations show several times a day to millions of easily influenced people pictures in which men and women are being stabbed, shot, strangled, poisoned, drowned or handled roughly in all sorts of manners. The state should be concerned with the sacred nature of life and deal severely with the lack of respect for life shown by telecasts and movies that have such an influence on young Canadians.

As representatives of the people in this house, we have some very serious responsibilities and must discharge them to the best of our judgment. I for one, that is what I want to do, even if I do respect the opinions of my colleagues. However, I must also take into account the will of the majority of the people I represent.

We must not only have penal laws, but must above all create a social climate favoring a better understanding of the individuals that make up society. There should be more justice in the sharing of ressources, in order to allow each and everyone to satisfy his vital needs.

Finally, it would also be desirable to emphasize our rehabilitation programs for inmates. The entire society should also be better disposed towards them, once they are released, so they do not feel rejected, and such an attitude would help prevent relapse.

I think also that our laws should be more generous in the matter of compensation for the victims of those who have broken the law, which, in my opinion, would be a proof of generosity; it would contribute towards making the masses more aware of the need for doing more in the way of rehabilitating those who have had the misfortune of erring.

We wonder whether the death penalty is a deterrent; yet, I am convinced that the amendment to the Criminal Code authorizing the use of the breathlizer gave good results. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the holder of a driving licence who wants to keep it has had to be much more careful about the use of alcoholic beverages in the last few years than previously, which proves that the measure has had the expected results, that is, that people are more careful.

The same reasoning can apply with regard to the demerit point system adopted in Quebec. I have repeatedly noticed that drivers are more careful and respectful of the law. That is why I see preventive measures in those sanctions.

As I see it, the best solution to the problem of capital punishment, the most democratic one, would be to hold a referendum. I hope some day the government will take the necessary steps to introduce a legislation authorizing one. We would then have the population participate in a decision in which it is interested.

As for now, Mr. Speaker, I have to make my own decision as a member of this House. I will do so very freely and will, quite objectively, vote against Bill C-2.

[English]

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want to say, through you, to all hon. members that the subject which we are debating has been one that has caused me a great amount of concern for a number of years. I think I speak for all other hon. members when I say that the anguish with which I have at times in the past approached this question convinces me that the vast majority of my fellow men, who are probably rational and sensitive creatures, have also approached the question with a certain degree of anguish. No matter what I am going to say in the next few minutes, I want to assure all hon. members that I commence these remarks with the profoundest regard for the position taken by other members in this House, even though I may differ with some of them.

I believe the first point that I must make is that this is not an abolition bill. This bill is a bill to hang the murderers of policemen and prison guards. It may at best be called a partial abolition bill, but it is not an abolition bill. I think this point has to be made for two reasons. I have received a great deal of correspondence on the whole subject. Those who are for abolition have written to me in the belief that this is an abolition bill. I notice—I must be fair about this—that I have had fewer of those letters lately.

It is because so many people have gone into this whole issue over the last year on the assumption that the issue would be abolition or retention that there is still in the country a degree of confusion. It is hard to disagree with my position that this is not an abolition bill. If that is so, then one must ask oneself where is the logic in advancing the arguments that have been most eloquently advanced in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, and yet not apply them in the two areas where the bill still provides for the taking of the life of the transgressor.

The other evening, on Monday night, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) spoke in this debate. No member who was in this House could doubt the sincerity of his remarks, least of all myself. But when he finished I asked, through you, Mr. Speaker, whether he would allow a question, to which he graciously consented. For the record in this debate and in this speech of mine, I want to read an extract from Hansard for May 14, page 3739. This was my question:

> Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the minister because I did not hear all of his speech, but I wonder if he would be good enough to answer a question which I think troubles a number of us who are very sympathetic to much of what he has said. If one is advocating the abolition of capital punishment on the grounds that the minister has stated—and other hon. members have spoken along the same line—where is the logical distinction between hanging a frightened man who runs out of a bank and shoots a policeman, and not hanging a man who shoots the prime minister, or who may engage in the diabolical business of killing people for the underground.

I meant "underworld".

> I would be interested to hear the minister's views on this particular problem.

The minister answered in this way:

> Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate that question. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) will appreciate from my remarks that I did not attempt to distinguish in any logical way why one particular type of murder rather than another should have capital punishment attached to it.

I quote that because what else could the Minister of Justice say? There is, in my view, no logical distinction. It has been said: "Well, the bill has to be the way it is, otherwise we would never get it through the House of Commons; we would have to continue the law as it became at the end of the year and have capital and non-capital offences". I am led to understand that this was the same argument that was put up five years ago. I was not a member five years ago, but I did wonder then at the logic of it. I have not been persuaded in the intervening years that what I regarded as illogical a few years ago has become logical with the passage of time.

I listened with great interest this afternoon to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He advanced, again in an eloquent way, his personal feelings about the death penalty. I respect what the Prime Minister said. He takes the view—many people take this view—that to have the death penalty is, in itself, something that ought to be abhorrent to a sensitive and civilized community. I know there are others who do not agree, but I respect that position. If that is so, how then can one escape the logical next step, which is that it is just as wrong on a moral basis—this was really the basis on which the Prime Minister put his remarks—to hang a frightened young man who shoots a police officer as he runs out of a bank? In case anybody misunderstand me, I do not justify what the boy does because he is frightened, but there is such inconsistency in hanging that young man and not hanging people who have done and are likely to do more diabolical things that I think it confounds the public's acceptance of the basic logic of what we are doing.

I have heard hon. members here say that it is proven that the death penalty is not a deterrent. I have heard other hon. members say they believe it is. I am more inclined to believe that statistics prove nothing about capital punishment. An intelligent editorial in The Globe and Mail of November 30, 1970 headed in those exact words "Statistics prove nothing about capital punishment", pretty well sums up my own feeling. In that article there is a reference to a study by the University of Toronto Centre of Criminology. Let me quote from the editorial:

> The study, written by Barbara Schloss and N. A. Giesbrecht, concentrates on the 10-year period ending with 1970 and concludes that it is impossible to tell at this stage what effect abolition of the death penalty for murderers of civilians has had. It also concludes that it is impossible to define trends in the murder of police officers and prison guards.

The study may be right, but I have not seen anything that convinces me there is statistical proof for the proposition that capital punishment is a deterrent or vice versa. I happen to think it is a deterrent but I concede as I say that I cannot find proof one way or the other. It may well be that what is a deterrent for me may not be a deterrent for somebody else. I also note that capital punishment may not be a deterrent to all people in every circumstance. If we accept the argument put forward by those who have been speaking in favour of the bill, that deterrent is not a reason for applying capital punishment because capital punishment is not a deterrent in itself. Again, I ask where is the logic for hanging the boy who runs out of a bank and shoots a policeman?

We think of the killing of a prison guard as something which must be heinous, and perhaps planned. The person is waiting at the corner to throttle the guard. I put it to you that it could easily happen under very different circumstances. It could happen in a prison riot where, in the panic and confusion of the moment, some foolish man hits a guard too hard across the back of the head, not meaning to kill him. Perhaps he meant only to grip him or tie him up, but still death can result. The proponents of this bill would then hang that person. Again, I do not see the logic of this, because if hanging is no deterrent, and this is what is said, why hang him?

There is a basic problem when you put before the people a law which does not make sense, and I think I have alluded to that. When you put before the public a law which is intricately linked with other laws which, taken altogether, govern an area of activity, and taken together do not seem to make very much sense, then you begin to get into real trouble because you begin to become incredible as a law maker. The public do not take very long to decide that.

When I say what I am going to say now, I mean no personal slight to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) who has a very difficult task on his hands and who is doing everything he can to deal with a very difficult situation. In view of the remarks made last night by hon. members during another debate, I certainly think that most of us wish him well and want to help him in this job. So, this is no criticism of the Solicitor General. The fact of the matter is that these collateral laws controlling bail reform, parole, tickets of leave and the whole question of what is and what is not life imprisonment, are laws that do not enjoy the confidence of the public at this time. It is because of this that the illogicality of the bill before us becomes, in my view, even more alarming.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to be a few more minutes and I wonder if I might call it six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Was that the request of the hon. member, that we call it six o'clock, or did he want to go beyond six o'clock?

Mr. Fraser: I prefer to go beyond and finish, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: How much time have you left?

Mr. Fraser: A couple of minutes, I think.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We would agree to that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that I will not see the clock in order to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Mr. Foster: Could the hon. member indicate how long he is going to be?

Mr. Fraser: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest another five or six minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fraser: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I extend my appreciation to my colleagues in the House for allowing me to continue.

Because of the basic illogicality of this bill, I now have to ask myself what I am to do as a member here voting according to his conscience. I do not believe that voting according to your conscience means that you should wander into the House of Commons, ignore everything you have seen, heard or been told by other people and suddenly apply some kind of star-struck wisdom from on high. I think what we do in this House when we vote according to our conscience depends to a great degree on how much attention we pay to what we hear outside this House. In many ridings the indication is that the majority of our citizens are in favour of retention of capital punishment. I am not certain what the feeling is in my own riding, although I have received 4,000 answers but I have not gone through them all. The feeling is probably very much along that line.

On the other hand, I probably have had the same experience as other members who have received letters in equal numbers from those who are for capital punishment and those who are against. Those letters have contained quotes from Scriptures and pleas to the effect that I vote according to my conscience. That is the dilemma most of us face.

I have for many years as a practicing lawyer advocated the complete abolition of capital punishment on the ground that, because our great system is made up of human beings and is by definition fallible, there is always the potential for error. There are other arguments for the abolition of capital punishment, but in my view at least that argument is completely irrefutable on any basis. We know that even if our Canadian judicial system has never made a mistake yet, it undoubtedly will because anything which is subject to human frailty will err sooner or later. So I would prefer that capital punishment be abolished entirely.

During the campaign I took the position when asked about this issue that I would prefer the abolition of capital punishment, but that I was not prepared to vote for an extension of the present system because I thought the law was basically illogical and other legislative areas were showing in practice to be deficient in protecting the security of the public. I recognize that in taking the position I do I may return to my riding pleasing no one. There must come a time I suppose in any member's parliamentary life when he must take that position whether he does it wittingly or unwittingly. Perhaps it is just as well that I am forced to take that position early in my parliamentary life.

I wish to close on this note. I would ask all hon. members to think carefully about how illogical this bill is, and to ask themselves why there is not something more logical presented to us. The government of the day has the power to place in front of Parliament a bill that would take these things into account. I must say it seems to me that in the early stages when this bill was being put together somebody from the government side did not adequately consider just what was being placed before the House. I do not think I have an obligation, no matter what my personal preference may be, to vote in favour of legislation which I believe to be fundamentally unsound and which does not appear to be logical, which draws distinctions which do not support morality but rather confound it.

The Deputy Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At 6.06 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

MINERALS

TABLING OF DOCUMENT "MINERAL POLICY OBJECTIVES FOR CANADA"—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2) I should like to lay on the table copies in both official languages of a document entitled "Mineral Policy Objectives for Canada".

A number of meetings have been held between the ministers responsible at the federal and provincial levels for mineral policy, culminating in a meeting in Ottawa on April 13 at which two decisions were concluded with respect to mineral policy in Canada.

The first of these has been the decision to set up a formal consultative and co-ordination mechanism in order to achieve more effective co-ordination in mineral policy development. Such a mechanism is essential for the formulation of mineral policies which are national in scope. While noting that differences among governments on mineral policy matters remain, the ministers agreed that the real significance of their discussions is the beginning of new relationships among governments in the formulation of mineral policy for Canadians.

The meeting also reached agreement on the publication of a document entitled "Mineral Policy Objectives for Canada", which I am tabling today.

The document contains a more detailed description of the goal and objectives for mineral policies outlined in April, and is intended to form a background for further discussions by ministers. While this document relates to most minerals, it does not apply to fossil fuels. These, along with other energy commodities, will be the subject of extensive scrutiny within the context of papers reviewing Canada's energy policies which I will present to parliament in the near future.

Within the context of closer co-operation which is sought at the governmental level, governments must take into account each other's jurisdiction in the translation of objectives into policies. The document is not intended to state or identify policies by which any government would achieve such objectives, nor does it attempt to define or specify the particular role of any one government. However, it is a first phase in the process of intergovernmental co-operation for arriving at a mineral policy for Canada. None the less, governments will choose from a wide variety of strategies, programs, methods and techniques to achieve their objectives. References in the document tabled to possible strategies are therefore included only by way of example.

The publication of this document should be seen as a first step toward the formulation and implementation of comprehensive mineral policies for Canada.

The nation's mineral endowment can support an expanding level of output and thereby continue to contribute substantially to the economic and material well-being of future generations.

However, Canada does not have a monopoly on minerals. Indeed, Canada faces major challenges to maintain an internationally competitive sector because of increasing competition from other resource-producing nations and the efforts of larger industrial nations to secure greater long-term advantage from resource exporters.

Ministers want to explore how mineral development for both domestic needs and exports can be best undertaken to optimize long-term contribution to development throughout Canada. Such development must be sensitive to long-term economic needs, undesirable environmental impacts, the viability of communities dependent on mineral production and fabrication and more precise delineation of the long-term economic potential of our mineral endowment and the ways it can be utilized.

I urge Canadians interested in our resource development to study the contents of this document as the basis for informed discussion of those policies which will govern the important mineral sector of our economy.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We did not receive copies of the statement the minister has made in purporting to table a document under Standing Order 41(2). I suggest it is quite improper for the minister to make a statement without having given notice to the other parties in the House. This is a travesty of the rules. If the document does not contain anything more than the drivel to which we have just been treated by the minister it is not of much value, but I say this is an abuse of the rules and an indication of the manner in which this minister conducts himself. We take the strongest possible exception to this conduct.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, let me say it is my information that copies of the mineral objectives document, plus my statement, were distributed to opposition offices at one o'clock today. I can assume responsibility for delivering the document, but I cannot assume responsibility for its distribution after that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. May I also say in response to the statement just made by the minister that the material he says was delivered to the opposition offices did not reach us either. The other point I wish to make is that the minister began his remarks by saying that he was rising under Standing Order 41(2). This meant that he was about to table something and of course we all relaxed. But he then proceeded to make a statement. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, it should now be agreed that at the end of the question period we revert to motions so that the spokesmen for the opposition parties, once they have seen this statement, may have an opportunity to make their comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for our part, we know nothing about the document the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) says he had distributed. I believe it is out of order, according to Standing Order 41 (2), to make such statements. That is why I agree with the previous speaker that as soon as we have read the document we would like to be able to comment on it.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a very interesting and intriguing one. My understanding, when the minister rose and referred to Standing Order 41(2), was that he intended to table a document, which he did quite properly. At the same time, while he had the floor he made a statement under the Standing Order which normally calls for statements to be made by members representing the parties in opposition. I can understand that hon. members, thinking that the minister had the floor only for the purpose of tabling a document, were not taking into account that perhaps they ought to prepare at that moment to make statements in reply to the statement made by the minister.

At the same time, the Chair must take into account that in so far as it can judge there is no obligation under the terms of the Standing Order for a minister making a statement under the Standing Order to provide copies or even give advance notice to parties in opposition that he proposes to make a statement on motions. I appreciate that the practice has developed over the months or years that ministers normally give advance notice which gives an opportunity to opposition parties to prepare statements or give some thought to the matter that the minister intends to bring to the attention of the House under the terms of the Standing Order.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that at the end of the question period we return to this item for the purpose of allowing members to make statements. I do not think the Chair can do that on its own initiative. I would think there would have to be unanimous consent at that moment to return to the business of Motions, for the purpose of allowing opposition members to do this. There may be a disposition on the part of hon. members to follow this course. Of course it would be the ideal solution to the problem raised by the hon. member for Peace River. I would be pleased to hear the views of hon. members on whether there will be consent for the purpose of returning to motions to hear these statements under the Standing Order from parties in opposition.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, presumably we will be occupied during the course of the next 40 or 50 minutes. Possibly the House leaders could have their usual consultations in an effort to arrive at an arrangement which we could communicate to Your Honour concerning a time when we might have an opportunity to reply, assuming that it was in fact the intention of the minister to make a statement on motions, which he certainly did not indicate. We might have that consultation and communicate our views to Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be agreement on this very reasonable approach to the difficulty. I am sure it should be possible to resolve it easily on the basis of consultation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KILLING OF TWO CANADIAN GIRLS WHILE VISITING VICTORIA FALLS, RHODESIA—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order simply to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he intends to make a statement concerning the incident in which two Canadian girls were killed while visiting Victoria Falls.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have further information. It would be a very brief statement. If the House is agreeable I will make a very brief statement now.

We have had further contact with our High Commissioner in Lusaka and have instructed our First Secretary, Mr. Leith, to proceed to the area of the tragedy in which two Canadian girls lost their lives with a view to doing whatever is possible to aid in recovering the body that is still missing—my information is that the body of Miss Sinclair has now been recovered—and to help in whatever funeral arrangements the next of kin desire. Mr. Leith has already left on this mission. Our High Commissioner has made contact with the Zambian authorities, and I understand he has been given assurance that there will be no interference in any retrieval operations. Furthermore, Mr. Broadbridge has also been in touch with the Zambian authorities to obtain any necessary assurances that a satisfactory investigation of the incident will be carried out.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF AGENDA FOR FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41 (2), I should like to table, in both official languages, the agenda for the conference of first ministers to be held from May 23 to 25.

[English]

I do not have a statement to make, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: But you will have some questions to answer.

MULTICULTURALISM

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RESPECTING PROGRAMS AND TERMS OF REFERENCE AND MEMBERSHIP OF CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement on motions and table documents in both official languages under Standing Order 41(2).

[Translation]

On October 8, 1971, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recognized the importance of the Canadian heritage by announcing the government policy on multiculturalism.

On that occasion, he said, and I quote:

> . . . a policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework is basically the conscious support of individual freedom of choice. We are free to be ourselves. But this cannot be left to chance. It must be fostered and pursued actively. If freedom of choice is in danger for some ethnic groups, it is in danger for all. It is the policy of this government to eliminate any such danger and to "safeguard" this freedom.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian culture and identity are the fruit of diversity. Our literature, our art, our music, owe their wealth to that cultural heritage which we accept and develop.

Multiculturalism

Through our multiculturalism programs, we encourage an awareness of the cultural diversity that is characteristic of the Canadian society, while giving birth to a feeling of pride. We encourage Canadians, as groups and as individuals, to respect their own identity within the large Canadian family.

As Minister of State in charge of multiculturalism, I am happy to announce the expansion in some cases, and the implementation in others, of seven important programs whose purpose is to encourage the multicultural activities of Canadians.

[English]

There is an urgent need to establish a continuing and active communication with our ethno-cultural groups. To meet this need I would like to announce the formation of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism. This council is representative of Canadians from every region of the country, and it is with pleasure that I table the terms of reference and the list of the first appointments today in both official languages according to Standing Order 41(2).

● (1420)

The new multicultural programs will entail an increase from the 1973-74 level of about $4 million to over $10 million. These increased funds for expanded and new programs reflect the government's commitment to the concept of multiculturalism.

As a first step we are enlarging the multicultural grants program which is the cornerstone of our policy of creating an awareness of Canada's multicultural diversity. Through this program, implemented in January, 1972, more than 300 ethno-cultural groups have received grants to undertake cultural and social projects. The response to this program has exceeded our expectations, and so a further $1,100,000 will be added to the budgetary estimates of this fiscal year to enable a greater number of groups to receive assistance for a wider variety of projects.

The second program expansion involves an increased allocation of funds from $154,000 to $654,000 during 1973-74 for the multicultural centres program. Grants have been made to such centres during the past year, and there are an additional 20 under way. These centres provide a vehicle for intercultural understanding throughout the country.

We are establishing a Canadian identities program. This is a major innovation designed to increase an awareness on the part of all Canadians of the cultural richness within our society. Expenditures under the Canadian identities program will be $3,823,500 in this fiscal year, of which $2,314,000 is already included in the estimates.

Assistance will be given to projects in the areas of films, radio and television broadcasting, folk festivals, theatre, literature, ethnic crafts and cuisine, travelling exhibits sponsored by the National Museum of Man, and the collection and exhibit programs of the Public Archives. A further $425,000 is provided for a multicultural studies program to encourage research in ethnic studies.

The ethnic press has a unique and very special role in Canadian life as a forum of discussion of community activities, and in many cases as the sole source of information for many recent and elderly immigrants. The government will make greater use of the ethnic press this year to supply these various multicultural groups with helpful information on such things as pensions, immigration regulations, consumer protection, labour regulations, and National Housing Act provisions among other items.

The government will call its first national multicultural conference of ethno-cultural groups this fall with the assistance of the new Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism.

To help young Canadians learn and retain their ancestral languages the federal government, in consultation with the provinces, has undertaken to provide language teaching aids. Some provinces and ethnic groups have expressed a concern that such aids are now available only from non-Canadian sources and are not sufficiently oriented to our nation's experience. Research on the role of ancestral languages in the retention of a culture is currently under way. This will be extended to include more groups and rural areas. However, the need for Canadian teaching material is already quite evident, and funds have been allocated for the provision of these teaching aids in 1973-74.

In dedicating ourselves to these innovative programs we are doing so convinced that cultural diversity is a positive asset to society. We are helping to provide a climate in which immigrants can immediately enter the mainstream of Canadian life, a climate in which young people can grow with a better understanding of and pride in their ethnic origins, a climate in which all ethno-cultural groups can develop. This policy leads to greater appreciation of the contributions that all our ethno-cultural groups are making to our national identity and, through this appreciation, to a greater appreciation and love for the colourful diversity so unique to our country.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, today we have witnessed the scorn in which this government holds the opposition.

Mr. Trudeau: Not the government, the people.

Mr. Yewchuk: Two statements were made by ministers and both failed to provide information to the opposition parties in time for them to prepare some sort of reasonable reply. I personally was made aware of this document only about two minutes before the House met.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

An hon. Member: Arrogant!

Mr. Yewchuk: If the minister was really interested in a proper discussion of this subject he should have given the statement to us at least a day in advance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Same old bunch!

An hon. Member: No humility!

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister patted himself on the back very vigorously today, as on previous occasions, in an effort to create the impression it was he and the government who invented the idea of multiculturalism in this country. I point out that in 1969, when the languages bill was before the committee and before the House, this party put forward amendments that clearly outlined our support of the principle of multiculturalism and our desire to do something positive to promote the idea.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

In October, 1971, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced that the government had officially accepted the policy of multiculturalism. Of course we welcomed that announcement and I welcome the steps being taken today to promote the concept of multiculturalism. I think we all agree there is a positive value in the contribution made to the Canadian cultural fabric by groups other than the two official language groups. As a matter of fact, if we are concerned about maintaining an identity for this country different from that of the country south of the border, our only hope may lie in preserving and encouraging the growth of these various cultures within our own borders.

I was very disappointed at the lack of an explanation in the minister's statement of how the policy will be implemented. No provision is being made for the consultative council to have a real input into the policy-making process in regard to multiculturalism. As I interpret the document, the policy will be handed down from on high and the function of the council will be to advise the government on how to implement it. I think that is approaching the problem from the wrong direction; there has to be an input from the ethnic groups themselves in the area of policy development as well as in the implementation of policy.

I am somewhat concerned about the method used to select members of the consultative council. From my travels across the country and discussions with representatives of the various ethnic groups I know that there has been virtually no or very little consultation with them on how the members of the council should be selected, and certainly there was no opportunity for ethnic groups to elect members to this council. The appointments were made by the minister. I am not making accusations of any kind, but it does leave the whole thing in question because of the lack of democracy in the way the council was set up.

I was also extremely distressed that no reference was made to changes in the policies regarding the mass media, particularly the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. This applies particularly to the present policy of television and radio stations prohibiting the use of third languages.

If we are serious about promoting the concept of multiculturalism and sensitizing the Canadian public to the concept so that it can be fully understood and therefore more fully implemented, it is obvious we have to use all means at our disposal to make this sensitization possible. It seems to me that use of the mass media is the obvious choice. No reference whatsoever has been made to this, and I am very disappointed.

On the positive side, I am pleased to see efforts are being made to provide teaching aids in an attempt to provide a greater degree of third language education. I think that is a very useful step. I should like to see some change in the teaching of Canadian history in schools. At present, due credit is not given to the third force and its contribution to the development of this country. I think the history books being used in our schools are defective and need to be improved.

If I may touch the conscience of the National Film Board a little, I hope the minister will ensure more open consultation with ethnic groups involved when films are being made about them. There have been examples of films produced in the past when consultations with the particular group about which the film was made were not held, with the result that the films produced were found to be repugnant to the particular groups concerned. I think that is a shameful situation and should not be allowed to recur under any circumstances.

I should like to comment also on the communications portion of the minister's statement. It is indicated that the government will purchase space in various newspapers to publish details of various events and programs in which the government is participating. I think there is a better way of doing this than simply by buying space in this way. I think we could go much further than that in the provision of news to the ethnic press. I suggest that an ethnic press service bureau be established, funded by the department, which would be staffed with a press gallery member whose function it would be to gather news for the ethnic press of this country. The staff associated with him would make this news presentable in such a form that it could be used by the ethnic press.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to chastise the minister for having recently engaged in a massive propaganda campaign promoting himself, the Prime Minister and his party.

An hon. Member: At the taxpayers' expense.

Mr. Yewchuk: At the taxpayers' expense—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to call the hon. member to order. I think it is a well established practice that statements made by members on behalf of opposition parties in response to statements on motions should refer specifically or allude to the contents of the statement itself. I think this is not the occasion for general debate, and I hope that the hon. member, in bringing his remarks to a conclusion, will limit his remarks to the statement made to the House.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, my comments, with all due respect, are directly related to the comments of the minister responsible for multiculturalism who suggested that he would be buying more space in the ethnic newspapers. I am simply saying that we do not want a repetition of the kind of campaign that was waged through the purchase of such space, and I hope the reference in his statement does not mean that there will be more of the same kind of political propaganda.

Mr. Haidasz: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt the hon. member for Athabasca while he was making his remarks, but I just want to tell him that I did issue instructions to my officials to send as soon as possible copies of the document on the table in both official languages. I also wish to inform him that I only received the final version of my statement just ten minutes before the House convened.

Multiculturalism

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the announcement that the government is prepared to increase the support it will give to the various ethnic communities in this country will, I am certain, be supported by all parties and by all members in the House. In making his statement the minister reminded us that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first made an announcement about this matter in October of 1971. There has been much too long a period between the announcement by the Prime Minister and any implementation.

We are not now dealing with the kind of situation the government had to face at the beginning of the LIP or OFY program when organizations had to be established. The ethnic organizations are alive and well and flourishing in all parts of Canada. Until now, however, there has been very little action, and I want to say to the minister that I consider what we have had until now as nothing but the worst kind of tokenism. There is no reason why it took until now to announce that the government was prepared to spend the money that the minister announced today. The ethnic organizations could have spent, from the beginning, ten times what the government has announced it is prepared to put into the program today. This program should have started a year and a half or more ago.

I am disturbed by the fact that, certainly as of several weeks ago, there had been no meaningful discussions with the provinces. A number of provinces have already begun implementing programs to support ethnic organizations in the fields of language, music, dancing and art. It seems to me ridiculous that there is a distinct possibility of duplication of the work being funded by the provinces and that being funded by the federal government. I cannot understand why there has not been not only discussion in a formal way but the closest kind of consultation in planning so that federal and provincial programs would fit together rather than being developed in completely separate ways.

The last point I want to make is that I am not satisfied with the way in which, until now, programs chosen to be funded have been picked. So far as I can find out there have been no real, meaningful consultations with the various ethnic communities. The criteria under which these programs have been funded until now have not been adequately explained to those communities in such a way that they can understand why some ethnic groups have had projects financed while others that seemed to be equally deserving have been passed over. They have been told they have been passed over without being told when or if they will be getting funds.

If the announcement today by the minister that the consultative committee has been chosen means that there will be real liaison between the government department, which in my view until now has been choosing projects at best in a very bureaucratic fashion, and the ethnic communities and the people they represent, if the committee will in fact form a bridge between the government and the ethnic communities, then a real step forward will have been taken. If not, I predict that the minister will be hearing an increasing volume of criticism about the way in which the government has until now been choosing projects.

Mineral Policy Objectives

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, first I must say how surprised I am to see that we are given press releases and all kinds of information concerning the minister's statement, but not the statement itself. There seems to be a mix-up.

Mr. Speaker, we approve all regulations, legislation and decisions promoting the fulfilment of our Canadian identity. We would like to support anything that can contribute to enrich us further from a cultural, artistic and economic point of view. We must simply rejoice at this.

● (1440)

However, we are raising some questions, especially about the multiculturalism program which is obviously important. Indeed, knowing the difficulties which French Canadians among others have been tackling for over 30 years in connection with biculturalism and bilingualism, we are entitled to ask ourselves whether once again millions of dollars are not spent as window-dressing for New Canadians in order to gain their votes. We then have only one wish to express and it is that New Canadians will not have to experience the same delays, the same injustice and the same disadvantages as French Canadians did for many years.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I hope there might be a willingness now on the part of all parties to permit the representatives of the opposition parties to reply to the very interesting statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MINERALS

TABLING OF DOCUMENT "MINERAL POLICY OBJECTIVES FOR CANADA"—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the time I have had to look at the press statement from the minister and the mineral policy objectives set out in the little booklet I have just received, I am just going to make three comments.

The first is that the emphasis of the news release and the booklet is that the ten provincial governments and the territorial governments are going to join with the federal government and consult with each other on joint mineral policies. Somehow, I seem to remember that I have heard this music before.

In 1961 the government of that day set up in conjunction with the provinces, and with the same objectives, the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers through which the 11 governments as equals would sit down together and deal with the problems of mineral development. There was a secretariat independent of the federal and provincial governments to work out mutual policies. Now, 12 years later, this government has awakened to the fact that this was a good idea.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In the setting up of the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers in 1959, 1960 and 1961, the Quebec minister, representing the Liberal party of that province, the Hon. René Levesque, stated publicly that the only way our federation would work would be by the co-operation of all governments as equals in the planning of the multiple use of our resources. Because this government and its predecessor ignored this very sound proposal of co-operation and adopted a policy of confrontation with the provinces, the federal government against the ten provinces, we saw the breakdown of the unity and coherence in resource policy that we had developed during those years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Today, this same very idealistic Canadian, René Levesque, leads the Parti Quebecois, pledged to separatism from this type of government. There is your unity, aspirations and operations of this government. That is my first comment.

The next point I want to deal with is taxation. I have only glanced through these documents, but I could not find any mention of the main curse of the mining industry in Canada, I refer to the taxation system of the provinces and the taxation system of the federal government. I say flatly to the minister and the whole of this country that the Benson tax reforms will destroy every Canadian mining company, the small companies within 10 years and the big integrated companies within 30 years when the mines run out. Unless these taxation laws are changed, there will be no future for the Canadian mining industry. It will go down the drain as surely as the Canadian oil and gas industry went down the drain in the past 20 years because of the taxation policies of the federal government and the type of policies adopted by the provincial governments.

With regard to the provinces, I wish to mention one thing only. I think this will interest the leader of the New Democratic Party. One of the things the provinces have done with regard to both oil and gas and mining, and the federal government is no better, is to front-end load these resource industries so much by all the charges they could put together with their fertile minds. Thus they have added to the capital cost of these very precarious operations, so much so that in Canada today the main cost of mining is the cost of money because of the huge debts owed not only to the lenders but to the provincial and federal government. As far I can see, this is not mentioned in this booklet, but this evil of front-end loading, which will lead to most of the oil, gas and minerals being left in the ground, must be stopped by every government, not just the federal government. We would like to see the minister make a clear statement on these matters in order to make the mining industry what it could be to Canada.

The preamble makes it very clear that there is a great future for Canada. The future of our nation depends on the wise use of our oil, gas and energy resources. It depends on the wise use of our mineral resources. I wish to give an example of what I am talking about. By reason of improper handling of its energy resources, our great neighbour to the south will have a deficit in its international balance of payments by the year 1975, or 1980 at the latest, of $30 billion a year for energy alone because they did not take the proper steps in time. Even though minerals are not a part of their current crisis, by the end of this century, for every dollar that the Americans are short in balance of payments because of a shortage of energy they will be $2 short on minerals. Their estimated deficit in international payments by the end of this century will be $60 billion a year. With this great problem facing our neighbour to the south, it is absolutely imperative we have a government in power that will move in the direction ensuring that these resources are used to the maximum advantage not only of this country but of the whole world.

I hold to the view that a lot of plain speaking has to be done in connection with the mining industry. If we want to share in greater returns from this industry, we have to stop this front-end loading and allow higher returns so the companies can pay off their debts. Under the oil regulations in the north the provinces grabbed all they could in the first year, front-end loaded the industry and were satisfied with 12½ per cent interest. In 1961 under the federal regulations for the north it took an average of 60 per cent to get them into a cash flow position. We can do the same thing with mines if we plan properly. The key is taxation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, these ten years of inaction with no mineral policy and no energy policy have cost this country dearly. We have seen our gas and oil industry become foreign owned as a result of Canadian taxation. We are seeing the mining industry go the same way. All other industries will follow unless we face the fact that taxation today plays a part in international competition. If the provinces and the federal government continue to have no awareness that our tax policies must become competitive, not in order to get less money from the industry but to give more money to the people, then the future of this country is—no future. I suggest that the repentance I see in this statement today comes too late, about ten years too late. If only the government had followed the course that we set between 1959 and 1961 we would not be in this mess today complaining about the lack of Canadian ownership.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the minister's statement went astray. Apparently it was put in the mails and some people have very optimistic ideas about the speed of the mails in this country. The next time the minister wants to put a statement in the mail, I suggest that he make his speech one week later, which is about the length of time it takes to send anything through the mails.

The decision of the federal and provincial governments to set up a co-ordinating mechanism for consultation and co-operation with respect to objectives in developing the mineral resources of this country is, of course, a good one. But when I read the minister's statement and glance at the material that has been put before us, I cannot help feeling that this government is falling into the trap it falls into again and again. Whenever the machine begins to slow down, the government adds another wheel, another pulley, instead of adding to the power that drives the machine. All that happens is that the machine slows down even more.

Of course the provinces need a mechanism for consultation and co-operation, and I support the proposal that the minister is now putting forward. But they also need something much more fundamental: they need a national minerals policy, and they have not had a national minerals policy. You cannot make up for lack of leadership merely by setting up another committee or consultative body, which is what the government is trying to do.

I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) that this country needs a national minerals policy. I do not agree with him that what we need to do is to reduce the taxes on mining companies further. I cannot shed tears over International Nickel Company which has been making hundreds of millions of dollars out of resources that belong to the people of Canada.

The spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party talks about the poor oil and gas companies going down the drain during the last ten years. Imperial Oil, after taxes, made $1 billion during the last 20 years and has paid to the government of Canada royalties of $40 million, or 4 per cent of what they pocketed for themselves from the resources of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I should bring to the attention of visitors in the galleries that they will not be allowed to remain in the galleries if they cannot control their feelings while listening to the hon. member, whose remarks obviously are very interesting.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I think the ghost of Mr. Twaits has walked! It seems to me that what Canada needs in terms of mineral development is a policy that will have two main thrusts. The first will be to develop, in co-operation with the provinces, policies that lead increasingly to the processing of mineral resources in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The federal government has control over the export of these materials since they grant the export permits. I am not suggesting that this can be done in 24 hours, but I am suggesting that the provinces and the mining industry can be told that exports of raw minerals will be phased out over a period of years and that they must be processed in this country. This would create jobs, give a greater tax return and improve economic development for the people of Canada.

The second thrust must be for the federal government—the provinces cannot do this—to join with other mineral producing countries in order to negotiate better prices from the importing countries. Raw materials in the past have had a relatively low return in comparison with manufactured goods which countries like Canada have to buy back. The only way this can be done is for Canada to join with other mineral producing countries and negotiate reasonable prices so that we will get a better return for the people of Canada.

I congratulate the minister and the provincial governments for taking this first timid step to set up machinery for co-operation and consultation. But I say both to the minister and to the government that it is their responsibility to give some leadership and to lay down a policy with which the provinces can co-operate.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have some hesitation in rising at this moment to speak about the statement by the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacDonald), for I seem to be stealing precious time that should be allotted to my colleague from Champlain (Mr. Matte), who has an important motion up for debate today. We have already spent an hour on statements such as that one, although today is theoretically set aside for an opposition party. My remarks will therefore be very brief.

Let me first point out that we have just seen proof of the importance of the motion that my colleague from Champlain is proposing today. Despite our complaints at the beginning of the sitting, we have been given only the English, and not the bilingual version of the document. This again suggests that the implementation of the policy of bilingualism in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is an urgent matter. I have noted this on several occasions: I went in person to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and was met by a bilingual official. I knew he was bilingual, but he categorically refused to speak in French. That is rather a poor showing, Mr. Speaker.

Up to now, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has had little to do with Quebec, and I am pleased to see the start of at least a semblance of co-operation between the provincial and federal governments. This could perhaps bring about more pooling of knowledge by officials, technicians, and scientists in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, so that their knowledge may benefit those who intend to survey for or operate mines, not only in the English-speaking provinces but also in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this new policy will promote mining development in Canada.

REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the events in today's session of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, at which the Chief Statistician of Canada indicated that Statistics Canada's share of federal government expenditures in 1973-74 will be 100 times smaller than the actual figure, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier):

[Mr. Douglas.]

That this House direct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to reimburse the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan) the $10 which that hon. member lost in a wager to the New Democratic Party as a consequence of that error.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume the hon. member does not want the Chair to put the motion at this time. It does not appear to be the type of motion that should be put to the House. The hon. member might perhaps also consider the fact that the motion is probably out of order in that it refers to proceedings that took place in a committee.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Motions:

April 4, 1973—Mr. Howard:

That the second report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, presented to the House on April 4, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if I could obtain unanimous consent to proceed without debate in order that hon. members might express themselves on this subject, I would be very appreciative.

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that he might like to refer to the comments made by the hon. member for Champlain a moment ago, who felt that we should give some thought to the fact that this is an opposition day assigned to the party to which the hon. member for Champlain belongs. Perhaps we should not even seek the unanimous consent of the House for the purpose of taking the time to debate the hon. member's motion.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

PROPOSAL TO ADD ECONOMIC PROBLEMS TO AGENDA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question relating to the agenda of the Conference of First Ministers to take place from May 23 to May 25. Does the reference to the possibility of discussion of the current economic situation being added to the agenda mean that he or his government has asked that this be placed on the list?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the conference, I did indeed have my people communicate with the provinces to see whether there would be an inclination to put that item on the list. There have been various suggestions in respect of that item from the House and from other areas. I merely took the initiative as the chairman of putting it to the provinces, but I have not had a complete answer yet. I am rather hopeful that we will reach an agreement to add that item to the agenda.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister intend to present to the other first ministers a co-operative or combined program of any sort to attack and contain the rate of inflation taking place in the country today?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is a rule of the conference, to which the federal government has adhered as steadfastly as possible, that we should not make our position papers known in advance of the conference. We have asked the provinces to do the same thing. In the past there have been unfortunate occurrences, but I would not want to be a party to such a breach of the rules of the conference.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I was not asking the Prime Minister to disclose even what the proposal might be. I simply asked whether he could indicate to the House that it is his intention to present a proposal to the provincial premiers on the subject of inflation involving a co-operative attack on this problem?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hypothetical question, if the item is added to the agenda the federal government will make a statement on economic matters that concern the country, and obviously inflation is one of them.

SUGGESTED DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES OF POSITION OF APPELLANTS TO IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that amendments to the Immigration Appeal Board legislation may not be placed before parliament prior to the the summer recess, and in view of the fact that the provinces are concerned with the expenditure of money in respect of those waiting for appeals to be heard, particularly in terms of health, education and welfare, will the Prime Minister place this matter before the provinces in order to give some leadership and direction?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, our policy on this matter has already been decided by the government. It is a matter of waiting for the time of the House. We hope that such amendments to the act will indeed be passed by the House before any summer break. There is no item on the agenda under which this specific matter would come up with the provinces, but obviously if the provinces want to bring it into the discussions we will listen with great interest.

REPORTED REDUCTION BY BANKS OF LOANS TO FARMERS, FISHERMEN AND SMALL BUSINESSMEN—SUGGESTED ALLOCATION OF CERTAIN PERCENTAGE OF CAPITAL

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance about a report in the morning newspapers to the effect that loans under federal government guarantee to farmers, fishermen and small businessmen are being reduced, if not choked off, by the chartered banks as a result of the fact that the interest rates at which such loans must be made are lower than the prime interest rate of the banks.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, because of the cost squeeze on agriculture in particular the rates under government guaranteed lending programs were frozen. It may well be that because of the fundamental change in the interest rate structure not as much money as we would like is now being regularly channelled into guaranteed loans for farmers, fishermen and small businessmen. The government, therefore, has that matter actively under consideration to determine whether adjustments can be made.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements by the governor of the Bank of Canada that it was deliberately intended that the increase in the prime rate should apply to larger corporations in respect of loans over $100,000 in one case and $200,000 in the case of other banks, in order to make money available to small businessmen and others who need it, and because of the assurance of the minister that the purpose of the exercise of increasing the prime interest rate was to make sure it would not affect those people in the categories I have mentioned who really need loans, is the minister prepared to discuss not only with the governor of the Bank of Canada but with the heads of the chartered banks the allocation of a certain percentage of their available capital to the people I have mentioned at the rates the government has frozen?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the banks have said they were allocating, and they are in fact allocating, a sufficient amount of funds to small businessmen, farmers and fishermen under their regular lending programs. Of course the question, as the hon. gentleman realizes, is the availability of funds under government guaranteed loans when the interest rate structure is frozen. It might well be that the only way to achieve a flow of government guaranteed loans is to have those interest rates reflect the current market situation, but I will look into that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South may ask a supplementary, and then we will complete the first round of questioning by recognizing the hon. member for Abitibi. We will then have further supplementaries on this subject by hon. members.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the minister correctly, his way of going at it is to raise the interest rates to farmers, fishermen and small business people. May I ask the minister how he can possibly have the nerve to say to the House that such an increase in interest rates will not necessarily result in a tighter monetary policy for Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when the money supply is expanding at an annual rate in the first four months of this year of 30 per cent, there is certainly no tight money policy in force in this country, and the hon. member knows that full well. What I am trying to achieve, by whatever method is adopted, is to ensure that government guaranteed loan programs do receive their share of funds, and that is something the government has under active consideration.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

QUEBEC—REVIEW OF ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR INDUSTRY—PROVISION OF FUNDS OUTSIDE OF MONTREAL

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion but, in his absence, I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary. Following the joint decision of the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Intergovernmental Affairs of the province of Quebec to totally reconsider the industrial assistance program, could the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion tell the House if the federal government will be allowed to demand that those funds be spent outside Montreal, should such expenditure prove advantageous to certain regions sorely afflicted by unemployment?

AVAILABILITY OF FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS—GOVERNMENT ACTION—BANKS' RESPONSE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary and is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Since there have already been some repercussions in respect of the interest rate question in that the Ontario Federation of Agriculture has been advised that branch managers of banks have not received any new instructions with relation to individual loan applications under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, I should like to ask the minister whether he has made any inquiries into this matter and also whether he has suggested any specific guidelines for branch bank managers. If so, what has been the response from the chartered banks?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, we are reviewing this matter actively to see what methods are available to channel more money into government guaranteed loans. The situation becomes difficult because of the widening gap between the market rates of interest and those rates of interest available under government guaranteed loan plans.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS—REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO INCREASE MAXIMUM

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. I notice there has been a bill introduced into the Senate, Bill S-5, which received first reading about a month ago, to raise the maximum amount available to farmers under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Will the minister use his influence to have this bill enacted, because it is needed in view of the greatly increasing costs of farmers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview.

LOANS TO FARMERS AND FISHERMEN—SUGGESTION MINISTER ASK CHARTERED BANKS TO REDUCE ADVERTISING FOR CONSUMER LOANS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the difficulty farmers and fishermen are having in obtaining loans, would he speak to the heads of the banks and ask them to stop their high pressure advertising with regard to consumer loans so that they can apply some of those funds to those specific purposes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St.Barbe.

ALLEGED DENIAL OF LOANS TO FISHERMEN—SUGGESTION MINISTER ASK CHARTERED BANKS FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St.George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that chartered banks are denying fishermen the benefit of government guaranteed loans at preferred rates of interest in favour of loans at conventional rates, would the minister investigate this lack of responsibility on the part of the banks which is hurting the fishing industry, and would the minister fulfil his responsibility by demanding an accounting from the chartered banks with regard to this practice?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the problem is, of course, the difference between international and domestic market rates of interest and those rates of interest available under programs of this kind. That is the question and the problem.

FISHERIES, SMALL BUSINESS AND FARM LOANS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF DISTRIBUTION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, for the third time in about a year, I should like to ask the minister if he would cause to have investigated the distribution of loans across Canada under the three programs mentioned by my colleague, fisheries, small business and farm improvement loans, to determine why the areas of greatest need receive the least amount of money under these various government programs?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to accept the preamble, but I will see what I can do to ascertain whether there is any validity at all in the hon. gentleman's question. I want to meet the point he is illustrating. I am not so sure the factual situation will bear him out.

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS—POSSIBILITY OF MONITORING FLOW OF AVAILABLE CREDIT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he has made any arrangements whereby he would be able to monitor the flow of loans to small business, loans under $100,000 or $200,000, whatever his test might be, so that he would be in a position to follow the extent to which credit is being granted under these limits?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am examining the weekly figures available of the loan structure of the chartered banks to see whether that is sufficient for our purposes and, if not, whether we should have further information.

BRUCELLOSIS—REQUEST THAT COMPENSATION TO FARMERS BE EQUATED WITH FAIR MARKET VALUE—SUGGESTED VACCINATION PROGRAM

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the difficulties experienced by farmers whose herds have been sold because of brucellosis, more commonly known as Bang's disease, is the minister giving consideration to changing the regulations under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to provide for more equitable compensation to farmers by equating fair market value with replacement value?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are giving consideration to this matter. An announcement will be made in due course. It may not be exactly as the hon. member suggests, but I think he will be satisfied with it.

Mr. Nesdoly: Has the minister considered wholesale vaccination in northwestern Saskatchewan where this disease is very prevalent as one means of bringing the disease under control, because it seems the process of trying to eliminate reactors is simply not working?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I was in Saskatchewan a week or so ago and discussed the matter with the officials there. I have also discussed it with some of our officials in Ottawa. I think there are some 40-odd herds infected, so it would be cheaper to eradicate these herds and pay these people proper compensation so they can start all over again, thus making sure that all sources of the disease are eradicated.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for a last supplementary, and then we will go to the next question.

Mr. Nesdoly: Mr. Speaker, is the Health of Animals Branch of the federal Department of Agriculture monitoring hospitals in northern Saskatchewan to see if there have been any cases of undulant fever?

Mr. Whelan: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker. I would have to check.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ALLEGED REQUEST OF STAFF MEMBERS TO MEET MINISTER

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Solicitor General. In light of the expressed desire of staff members of the British Columbia penitentiary service to meet the minister, may I ask him how he plans to deal with the problems they plan to discuss with him, namely, staff morale and public safety within the prisons?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I did not catch the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the member would repeat it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it concerns a request by the staff members of the British Columbia penitentiary service to meet the minister and discuss with him certain problems of staff morale and public safety within the prisons. I am asking the minister how he plans to deal with this request?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when I was appointed Solicitor General in December, one of the first places I went was the British Columbia penitentiary. I met the staff representatives of the penitentiary at that time. We are following up some of the matters they brought to my attention. I have not received another request, but if I do I will try to do what I can to meet with them.

WILLIAM HEAD—INQUIRY AS TO SECURITY PROVISIONS BEFORE CONVERSION FROM MINIMUM TO MEDIUM SECURITY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that the staff members have sent a telegram to the Solicitor General, but perhaps to be more specific I might mention the matter of William Head. Can the minister assure the House that all appropriate security measures were taken at William Head, which he visited a week ago, before converting that institution from a minimum to a medium security institution?

● (1520)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, William Head has not yet been converted into a medium security institution. It is still operating as a minimum security institution. The decision has been taken to make it into a medium security institution, but that decision will not be put into operation until we have a proper staff and proper fencing. The new fence has been authorized for a while now and construction will start shortly.

KILLING OF TWO CANADIAN GIRLS WHILE VISITING VICTORIA FALLS, RHODESIA—PROTEST TO ZAMBIA—REVIEW OF CANADA'S POLICY RESPECTING RHODESIA

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Following the statement of the minister concerning the murder of two Canadian women by Zambian troops while they were visiting Rhodesia, has the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs who recognizes the government of Zambia, but not that of Rhodesia, made protests to the Zambian authorities or does he intend to do so, following the murder of those two Canadians, and does he intend to revise the official position of Canada concerning Rhodesia, which has always been very sympathetic towards the Canadian government?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has no intention of reviewing its policy on the recognition of Rhodesia. We have made inquiries of the Zambian government and have sought their assurances that there will be an impartial and thorough investigation of the incident.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Given the economical sanctions that the United Nations had asked countries of the world to take against Rhodesia, and since the United States have removed those sanctions a few months ago and now do business with Rhodesia, does the Canadian government also intend to change its official position concerning Rhodesia, in the field of trade relations?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. Canada does observe the sanctions which have been recommended and imposed by the Security Council. That is our policy and we have no intention of changing it until the Security Council changes its position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PERSONNEL OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—TERMS OF REFERENCE—SIGNING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. Will he announce in the House, as he has done outside the House, the composition of the inquiry he has set up under section 12 of the Penitentiaries Act and inform the House whether the order in council setting up the inquiry has yet been signed and, if the terms of reference are complete, will he agree to table them?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned some of the names in my speech the other night in the House. The three people on the commission are: the Honourable Jacques Ducros of the Quebec Superior Court, Lieutenant Colonel A. D. T. Gauthier of the Canadian Armed Forces, and Mr. Pierre Jutras, Director of the Drumheller Institution. I would be willing to table the terms of reference. I do not have them with me now, but I will table them as soon as I get them. I might say that I am meeting the three commissioners this afternoon to have them sworn and to issue instructions to them. They will start working immediately.

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF NEW SECURITY MEASURES PENDING INQUIRY REPORTS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): The minister overlooked informing the House, in reply to my question, whether the order in council has yet been signed. I would like to ask him also whether his department or the government has developed any measures that he is prepared to institute immediately which would tighten security in the penitentiaries pending the report and recommendations of the inquiry he has set up and of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and, if so, what measures and when will they be implemented?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): By the way, Mr. Speaker, I believe an order in council has been signed, but I am not too sure about that. We sent one for signature, but I can check on that report.

Following the Cowansville incident we introduced several new measures in that institution to upgrade security. We added guards, we put special barbed wire at the top of the existing fence, and we cleared back the bush. We are having special steel screens put on the windows of the cells.

With respect to the correctional development centre, one thing we are determined to ensure is that the security provisions which were supposed to be in operation will certainly be in operation in the future, in other words, that directives and instructions with respect to the duty positions of the men are being followed.

Mr. Baldwin: Take the vanishing cream out of the cells.

ENERGY

GASOLINE—POSSIBILITY OF SHORTAGE—REQUEST FOR CONTROL OF EXPORTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, arising out of the forecast by the Stanford Research Institute that there will be a gasoline shortage of 400,000 barrels a day in the United States this summer. In view of the fact that the restrictions on the export of oil which the minister announced on February 15 do not apply to gasoline or other refined products, I want to ask the minister whether he intends to use the powers under part IV of the National Energy Board Act to extend the export controls to gasoline in order to ensure adequate supplies of gasoline this summer for Canadian consumers?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised by the chairman of the National Energy Board that the board has been following very closely exports of the refined product from Canada. As the hon. gentleman knows, one of our objectives has been to develop over a period of years a market for the refined products, and we would be reluctant at this point to defeat that objective unless there is a shortage. I can assure him, however, that if there is any threat to Canadian supplies action will be taken under the statute to protect supplies.

OIL—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF TWO PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the spokesmen for the oil industry in Canada have already stated that there is not likely to be a shortage this summer but there will be a substantial increase in price, and in view of the fact that the increases in the price of oil and the anticipated increases in the price of gasoline bear no relation to the cost of production but merely to the higher price in the United States, is the government giving serious consideration and does it intend to take any steps to impose a two-price system so as to fix the price of oil produced and sold in Canada at a fair and equitable level and thus prevent the companies taking unfair advantage of the high prices in the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I would remind the hon. gentleman that about half the Canadian market is supplied by overseas oil which has been going up in price, so that the over-all cost has been increasing. I would agree with the hon. gentleman that the market west of the Ottawa valley line is served by the Canadian product, and we have under very close scrutiny the possibility of imposing a two-price system to make certain that Canadian consumers do not have to bear the cost of the energy shortage in the United States.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that we could try to limit the number of supplementaries so as to give an opportunity to as many members as possible to participate in the question period. I will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, and then we will try to move on to another subject.

OIL—POSSIBLE BILATERAL NEGOTIATIONS WITH FOREIGN SUPPLIERS OF EASTERN CANADIAN MARKET

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a brief supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has mentioned offshore oil. May I ask him if the Canadian government is entering into any negotiations with oil producing countries such as Venezuela and countries in the Middle East with a view to bilateral agreements on oil rather than leaving the eastern market entirely to the tender mercies of the oil companies?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. gentleman knows, there have been extensive discussions with OECD in an attempt to get general OECD agreement on not having that kind of bilateral arrangement. I think it is fair to say that, in view of the fact that some at least of OECD members appear to be making bilateral deals, we are giving active attention to whether negotiations should be opened between some friendly supplier countries and Canada on a government to government basis.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the question I was going to ask was just asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

● (1530)

Mr. Atkey: —and a great source of disappointment for many thousands—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. Atkey: Could the minister tell the House what steps he has taken since the terminal opened on April 29 to see that the situation is improved, particularly with respect to the absence of signs and the great distances that passengers must walk to board this aircraft?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we know that this new terminal building was inaugurated on April 29, I believe. Some readjustments have to be done, and Air Canada has realized it. In the last few days, meetings have taken place between Air Canada and representatives from the city and associations of Toronto, and I am informed that they are progressing very quickly. Therefore within a short time, the situation will be normal again.

REQUEST FOR DISCLOSURE OF COST DATA OF RAILWAYS—GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS FOR A NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the Conference on Western Economic Opportunities to be held in Calgary, Alberta, in July. Can the minister advise the House whether he will be complying with the request made by the premier of the province of Alberta calling for full and complete disclosure of railroad cost data, the extent of fixed compared with variable costs, and public justification for every major freight rate in terms of cost benefit to the Canadian public generally compared with the benefit to the railroads' financial interests?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am quite well aware of the position taken by the premiers of the prairie provinces. As the hon. gentleman knows, I am going to meet with them on June 7, so I hope he will understand that I am not in a position right now to start negotiations before I meet with the premiers.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister indicate to the House whether the government will be putting forth any firm commitments aimed at developing a new national transportation policy within the framework of a national industrial strategy, and in particular will any specific proposals be put forth aimed at overcoming the discrepancies and anomalies within the freight rate structure as it applies to western Canada?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think the House understands that there will be two conferences at which transportation problems will be discussed. There is the June conference and then the Conference on Western Economic Opportunities. On both occasions all these problems are going to be discussed, and I hope we will find solutions.

Mr. Mazankowski: Could the minister answer my question? I simply asked whether it is the intention of the government to put forth any concrete proposals aimed at developing a new transportation policy. I would like a simple yes or no answer.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a straightforward answer in that case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I knew what the reaction would be before I said that. I think that what I am going to say is quite honourable, but hon. members opposite might not understand. The reason is simple. It is because we are interested, the prairie governments are interested, the CPR and CNR are interested. All these parties have proposals to make, some dependent on the position taken by the governments, others dependent on the CNR and CPR. Therefore I cannot tell you all the proposals we are going to make.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Can he tell the House what decision has been taken following the request for renewal of about 516 local initiatives projects in the Montreal area?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a decision was taken this morning. I think it will be encouraging to many, and I will be making the details known tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Rimouski wants to ask a supplementary question. The hon. member for Rimouski has the floor.

[Later:]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister is surely aware that in cancelling 516 projects, the unemployment ratio will rise over the limit fixed for the renewal of local initiatives projects. In view of that possibility, does the hon. minister intend to take immediate action to prevent administrative complications from delaying the renewal of those projects?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand the reference to 517 project cancellations but, as I indicated in my previous answer, I will be making the details of the decision known tomorrow and I think they will be encouraging.

GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE TO SUGGESTED WORLD MINIMUM OF BASIC FOOD STOCKS—POSSIBLE CARRY-OVER OF SUBSTANTIAL GRAIN RESERVES

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Having regard to the upcoming Food and Agriculture Organization meeting in Rome, where a minimum world food security program is to be discussed, will the minister support the concept of a minimum level of basic food stocks for the world as a whole?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the suggestion of the Director General of FAO. He addressed the OECD in Paris while we were there. His deputy director is going to be in Ottawa next week and we are going to discuss the subject further. I think he has some suggestions that are worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Since senior officials of the American grain trade have stated that world grain stocks at the end of June will hardly equal a ten-day to two-week supply on a global basis, can the minister give an assurance that a federally assisted policy of carrying over a substantial reserve of grain will receive favourable consideration?

Mr. Whelan: It is receiving favourable study, Mr. Speaker. That is as far as I can go at the present time.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the government House leader. In view of the fact that Canadians with access to United States television stations are today getting an education through the Senate investigation of the Watergate scandal, and in view of the fact that the government intends to introduce legislation allowing television coverage of parliament, would the minister consider recommending to the Speaker that permission be given to allow, on a trial basis, television coverage of the parliamentary committee's investigation of penitentiary escapes in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid it would require more than my recommendation to influence the Speaker to take that step.

Mr. Roche: Would the minister consider trying to get unanimous consent of the House to allow this on a trial basis for the education of Canadians?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if I thought there was the remotest chance of getting unanimous consent I would try, but I am quite certain that it would not be forthcoming.

FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST THAT MINISTER DIRECT RAILWAYS TO REDUCE RATES IN PRAIRIE REGIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and is supplementary to the one about the Western Economic Opportunities conference. In view of the blatant discrimination against the Prairies in railroad freight rates, and in view of the position taken by the prairie premiers, will the minister undertake to give a definite instruction to the railways to bring down their freight rates in order to allow further development of the prairie region?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that is too general a question to be answered at this time.

TRADE

ALUMINUM INGOTS—ALLEGED RULING BY UNITED STATES THAT CANADIAN EXPORTS DUMPED

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister in a position to confirm that the United States Treasury has ruled that aluminum ingots from Canada going to the United States are classified as dumped and, if so, was he given prior notice of this ruling?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to confirm the suggestion made by the hon. member for Trinity.

CRIMINAL CODE

NON-THERAPEUTIC ABORTIONS—INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF PROSECUTIONS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In light of the concern of millions of Canadians over the more than 40,000 abortions that take place in Canada every year, would the minister be willing to make a statement on motions, either this week or later next week, outlining the progress he has made with the review he announced on March 5 or March 6 of this year of too liberal abortion laws, and can he at that time also tell us the number of prosecutions that have taken place under the law with respect to non-therapeutic abortions, and also inform the House what steps will be taken to reduce the number of non-therapeutic abortions in Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the recommendation of the hon. member. The subject of the enforcement of abortion laws and the apparent differences in their enforcement across the country was discussed at the recent conference of Attorneys General. I will consider the matter of whether I can say anything useful at an early date in the House.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON SLOW GROWTH REGIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that higher interest rates are bound to have a detrimental effect on the efforts of DREE in disadvantaged areas of the country, coupled with the fact that the consumer price index has risen at an amazing rate, being 5.8 per cent for Halifax and 5.6 per cent in St. John's for the last month, has the minister any specific measures in mind to counteract these adverse developments in the slow growth areas brought about by the high interest rates?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government, as has been stated here on many occasions, is first of all to increase the supply of world commodities that are affected by a world-wide inflation; second, to increase the disposable income of Canadians, particularly in the lower income groups through proposals for lower income tax, raising the old age pension, family allowances and so on and, third, by supporting my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in order to improve the infrastructure in those slower growth areas of the country.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. I thank the minister for his answer but what I am really asking is this: In view of these policies which are designed to dampen the inflationary pressures in one part of the country, has the minister taken into account the counterproductive effect his policy is having on the regions that DREE is deliberately designed to help, and is he going to vary his policy to do this specific job?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the policies of the government are orchestrated so as to give special attention to those slow growth areas.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, then the hon. member for St. John's East.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO INCREASE BASIC RATE OF DISABILITY PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the anxiety and concern of a great many veterans over the fact that the basic rate of the war disability pension has not yet been increased as forecast by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech on February 19, and as recommended by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, can the minister say when he will be bringing in the bill to effect this increase?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I feel I will be bringing in the bill before very long. The time has not been reached yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister, in his usual forthright way, tell us whether "before very long" means this month?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would indicate that I am hopeful that it certainly means this month.

[Mr. MacKay.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR CO-ORDINATION OF TRANSPORTATION, MONETARY, FISCAL AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT POLICIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the consumer price index for the regional cities shows an alarming increase in the three regional cities in the Atlantic provinces where incomes are amongst the lowest and unemployment the highest, may I ask the Prime Minister what steps the government proposes to take to co-ordinate the transportation policies, monetary and fiscal policies with the DREE policies as they are working counterproductively in the Atlantic provinces and thus exercising great hardship on the people of those three cities, especially Halifax?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the member is asking for a very detailed enunciation of policy. I guess the simple answer to him is that the various aspects of this question, DREE, transportation, fiscal and monetary policies, are dealt with by ministers within cabinet and we are co-ordinating the program as best we can.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—EFFECT OF TRANSPORTATION COSTS ON COST OF LIVING—SUGGESTED CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the throne speech called for co-ordination of these policies and that there was supposed to be a regional transportation conference in the Atlantic provinces with the governments of the Atlantic provinces and the railways because of the very strong influence that transporation has on these higher costs, may I ask the Prime Minister as head of the government what steps the government is taking to implement this and to co-ordinate these programs which are having such a disastrous effect on the region?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for one thing, a series of meetings between the Minister of Transport and the provincial premiers and a series of meetings between the minister responsible for DREE and the provincial premiers.

TAXATION OF MARKETING QUOTAS—POSSIBLE REVISION IN LIGHT OF REPRESENTATIONS BY FARM GROUPS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. On March 6 and March 20 I asked the minister if he would take steps to correct the inequity in the retroactive capital gains tax on farm marketing quotas because of what I felt was overwhelming criticism of these provisions by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other farm groups. The minister's replies on both occasions indicated that the federation was not really that dissatisfied. In light of the subsequent strong and unanimous condemnation of these provisions by these farm groups, including the federation, may I ask the minister if immediate action will be taken to treat a farm marketing quota as any other capital asset for taxation purposes?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I completely disagree with the premise of the hon. member's question. I have met with the farm people, as well as the President of the Federation of Agriculture last Thursday night, and completely disagree with their attitude.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. Minister of Agriculture rising on a point of order?

Mr. Whelan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been intimated that in an answer to an hon. member I may have said that I disagreed with the President of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. It was not that; it was with the hon. member, because the President of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture stated "You are doing one hell of a good job, Mr. Minister,".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I feel that the House would not want to take up too much of the time which has been allocated to one of the parties for debate this afternoon. Perhaps two or three supplementaries might be asked quickly, although I believe the hon. member for Skeena has a question, and then I would recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and perhaps one or two more supplementaries before calling orders of the day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO DATE AND LOCATION OF MEETING WITH UNITED STATES ON RECIPROCAL FISHING AGREEMENT—PARTICIPATING GROUPS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might put a quick question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has a date and location been established for the meetings between Canada and the United States which are to take place before the end of this month with respect to the reciprocal fishing agreement about which the minister made some comments the other day? May I also ask whether the same groups that participated in the earlier Washington and Seattle meetings will have an opportunity to participate in these negotiations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am discussing these matters currently with the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries and we hope to be able to make an announcement very soon.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—EFFECT OF REGIONAL PAY RATES FOR PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question to the right hon. Prime Minister is related to that of my colleague on the matter of inflation in the general economy of the Atlantic region. Would the Prime Minister very seriously consider an immediate move to eliminate the regional pay rate concept which is having such a detrimental effect on many people in the public service in the Atlantic region and the general wage situation across the Atlantic region, which was demonstrated last week? Private groups are getting as much as $3 an hour more than people working in the same area in the public service.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This question has been raised with the government at various times and we have given it consideration. It is discussed from time to time with various parties, but unfortunately there is no agreement either on an economic or sociological basis between people having different opinions.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Churchill on a last question, and then will call orders of the day.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO USE OF CHURCHILL AS PORT OF EXPORT

Mr. Keith Taylor (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the announcement made by the minister some time ago regarding the use of the Port of Churchill for grain shipments, and in view of the fact that the shipping season is close at hand, would the minister advise the House what specific instructions have been given to the Wheat Board concerning the shipping of grain from Churchill for this season?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the usual booking of grain has taken place. I could perhaps get for the hon. member some detailed information on the export plan as it now appears for this season. In addition to the usual orders, of course, this time there will be some grain moving to the Soviet Union from Churchill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow the minister's supplementary answer by asking the government House leader about the business for this week and next week. I might be allowed to ask the minister, when he replies, in light of the fact that the Public Accounts Committee has not yet dealt with the report of the Auditor

General for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1971, and the report for the next year will be coming out very shortly, if he could see his way clear to refer to the Public Accounts Committee the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If I may answer the hon. member, may I say that with respect to the public accounts, I think we can arrange an early reference.

If I may speak in connection with the business of the House, we have today an opposition day, and one tomorrow. On Tuesday next, I should like to continue with the capital punishment debate and probably take an opposition day on Thursday and Friday. On the following Monday I should like to begin the debate on the bilingualism resolution. I would mention to hon. members that, on looking at the calendar and at the business of the House, I am considering the possibility of adjourning at the end of June. Members will really have to decide for themselves whether they want to debate these measures now, and complete them, or debate some of them in July. I think I should indicate that to the House at this stage in the mildest way possible.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question, may I ask the minister whether the bills to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Canada Pension Plan will be on the order paper reasonably soon, so that they may also be disposed of before the end of June?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, Mr. Speaker, we hope to get technical amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and also the changes to the Family Allowances system on the order paper within a matter of weeks and, hopefully, conclude those also by the end of June. I have in mind as well the corporate and personal income tax measures that will be coming before the House. It may be that the House will have to deal with the question of redistribution, the matter of the Olympics and a possible amendment to the Immigration Appeal Board Act. I mention these as urgent items that have to be dealt with before the House can adjourn. I think hon. members ought to know the picture now, rather than learn it later.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the House may I ask a question about the bill on capital punishment? Is it the intention of the government to conclude the discussion on all stages of the bill on capital punishment? That is to say, is it intended that it go to committee, come back for debate at the report stage, and be debated on third reading? Is it the intention of the government to deal with all stages of the bill prior to the summer recess?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is certainly the intention of the government not to allow this matter to hang over the summer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière. I think I should urge this on all hon. members: an attempt should be made to get on with the order of business this afternoon. It seems to me we are delaying from minute to minute the submission of the motion which stands in the name of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte).

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely why I wanted to rise on a point of order.

In view of the fact that by some strange coincidence two statements were made today in the House which took over an hour and five minutes of the time of the House and which encroached upon our opposition day—as far as I know, it is the third time since subsidies days were instituted—I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to recuperate tonight the equivalent hour that we lost at the beginning of this sitting and which reduces our opposition day and that instead of adjourning at ten o'clock tonight, we adjourn at eleven o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent. I suggest quite humbly and in all fairness that it might be useful to have consultations between the representatives of the parties to find a way to ensure that the colleagues of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) have the opportunity to participate without any limitation of any kind in the debate scheduled in their name for today. In any case, I think we could present the motion and I would suggest that appropriate discussions be held later in the day between the representatives of the parties.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I do not know who shouted no but it can be seen that co-operation works only one way.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE MEASURES TO SAFEGUARD RIGHTS OF FRANCOPHONE AND ANGLOPHONE CANADIANS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain) moved:

That this House deplores the government's decision to postpone the full implementation of the policy contained in the Official Languages Act and censures the solutions proposed by the government, and consequently, urges the latter to find realistic and specific ways of safeguarding the rights of French- and English-speaking Canadians in a much more just and reasonable manner.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I particularly thank you for correcting the error contained in the text of the motion.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is high time in Canada as well as in this House that we clarify a certain situation, because for much too long the government of this country—more particularly the administration—has only put up a bilingual front while we all very well know that we are governed by an exclusively English-speaking establishment.

Mr. Speaker, not to admit that this situation exists is not to be aware of what is happening. For about five years, I have had the honour to represent the Champlain riding in the House and during this period I could notice that the administrative services, as soon as it comes to an important level, do not have any French-speaking person, apart from a number of assistants who are there to help indirectly or in a parallel way but not so as to allow French Canadians to really feel at home here and within the government.

Mr. Speaker, it is urgent that not only the appearance of this country be bilingual but it is also important that the structures and members of administration and management be actually distributed according to a just and fair proportion of the ethnic components in our society. For a long time now we have been living in hope. After the passage of the Official Languages Act in 1969, great expectation arose because we felt that at least we held the key to French Canada's problem.

Mr. Speaker, that great expectation was expressed in the preamble to the motion proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last April 13. The preamble reads as follows and I quote:

(i) aware that, as provided in the Official Languages Act, the English and French languages possess and enjoy equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all the institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada;

cognizant that it is the duty of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada to ensure, in accordance with that Act, that members of the public can obtain available services from and communicate with them in both official languages; while recognizing that public servants should, as a general proposition and subject to the requirements of the Official Languages Act respecting the provision of services to the public, be able to carry out their duties in the Public Service of Canada in the official language of their choice;

Mr. Speaker, we fully agree with that preamble. We would like to see those principles become reality. We all agree on that point but we disagree when the time comes to apply these principles. Since the inception of the law we must say, Mr. Speaker, that not only did we not progress but, according to statistics, we are at a standstill and even rolling backwards in some areas.

On behalf of our party, on behalf of the official French Canadian opposition since our party has 15 out of 16 French-speaking members, we must say in this House what French Canada or, more precisely, what Quebec wants. This is why we believe that it was urgent to introduce a motion dealing with that problem even though the Prime Minister had already introduced a motion. The motion is an attempt to create an objective and realistic atmosphere, an atmosphere free of any emotion, animosity and struggle which might even remotely be interpreted as a racial struggle. No, Mr. Speaker. We are quite fair and we would like, especially on this special day, to see French-Canadian members better represented, especially those of the Liberal party, since I can see only three or four members from the Liberal party, which thinks of itself as the defender of bilingualism and biculturalism par excellence.

We have thus, Mr. Speaker, to concur that we are agreed on the principles on bilingualism contained in the Official Languages Act, and also on the motion introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister, that we have also to admit that we are greatly disappointed by the tangible means by which, supposedly, justice is to be done once and for all. I wish therefore, in my speech, to deal first with the Canadian history aspect, then with the present situation and, finally, to suggest our very tangible solutions.

It must be admitted that French Canadians have been deprived of their rights, ever since they were conquered, obviously, but more especially since 1867. I will not speak of their privileges, because they never had any. That is historical fact. We have been continually forced to carry on "extremist" fights to obtain rights that were sometimes as basic as that of speaking and being answered in our mother tongue.

It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that there were epic struggles to obtain bilingual cheques, bilingual money, bilingual stamps and a distinctive flag. Mr. Speaker, all these struggles should normally have been enough to permanently discourage the French Canadians, but their courage and tenacity have been such that they have overcome all these obstacles; unfortunately, however, the governments that succeeded one another always believed it was sufficient for the French Canadians to be satisfied and content to state principles and they believed they could solve all problems with a French Canadian party leader or Prime Minister. That was sufficient. The mere fact that the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier's name was Laurier, that he was a French Canadian, was sufficient to prevent all French Canadians from recriminating and demanding. The mere presence of a man at the head of the government was enough to satisfy the French Canadians who were then submerged in a period of darkness and were almost all non educated.

Later on, they realized that it took more than that but again the grand and great Liberal party solved the problem by electing Mr. Louis Stephen St-Laurent who, besides being a French Canadian prime minister, advocated good understanding for years. Again that seemed to satisfy the French Canadians since they were then at the dawn of a period of emancipation.

They seemed to be satisfied when the Liberal party was supported wholeheartedly with the Right Hon. Louis St-Laurent. Finally, people came to realize over the last few years that this was not sufficient and then we found a miracle solution with the coming of the Messiah, the current Prime Minister. Now, the Prime Minister is no longer content with having a French Canadian name nor with preaching good-will; he goes, I admit, a bit further. He incorporated into a law the principles that where only spoken about at the time of the hon. Louis St-Laurent and that were hardly mentioned at all at the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Those principles were put in writing in 1968 and particularly in 1969 by the adoption of the Official Languages Act.

The proof is now established, as this happened four years ago, that no change occurred. This is why it is our duty, as the French-Canadian official opposition in this House, to state things as they are, to point out the trouble and all together, I am convinced, with everybody's goodwill, we shall reach true solutions because, as you know, the Quebecer or the French Canadian has changed in that today he will not be content with principles. In fact, a fair proportion of Quebecers are disillusioned vis-à-vis the federal policy and with regards to how they are received by public servants and particularly by top administrators, we must agree that they are right and this is one of the reasons which have lead—I have had the opportunity to witness that on the front benches, for instance—the hon. Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier), his colleague, the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the right hon. Prime Minister himself to show Quebec that it was possible for French Canadians to have their share and obtain in the administration of this country the position they deserve. I do not know whether those three ministers, that used to be called the three doves, are also disillusioned but I have had the opportunity, at the beginning of this session, of hearing not only the Prime Minister but also the Minister of Transport deliver speeches, right here in the House. The latter expressed more or less what I am now saying, disappointment, going so far as to say that he was prepared to drop everything and leave if there were no change.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all we want to do is help the government settle the problem once and for all. This is not the time, when there is so much agitation in Quebec, with the situation critical, when it can truly be said that there is a real problem. It is not when a good proportion of Quebecers want French unilingualism in Quebec that we should come forward with such timid policy statements. I feel that would be showing complete lack of objectivity and realism. Let us be realistic. Let us not, practicing the policy of the ostrich, believe that in 1973 we can solve our problems by policy statements.

Mr. Speaker, the very future of our country rests particularly in the hands of French Canada. I am not saying so to brag, to push one ethnic origin rather than another, but it is well known throughout the country that if there were no French Canada, there just would not be a Canada at all and that if Canada does exist, if we are an entity different from the American entity, it is because there is a Quebec, because there are French Canadians. And therefore, our hon. colleagues from all Canadian provinces, more particularly from the west, and from Ontario, should not only give more concrete acceptance to the French fact in our country, but even more heaven and earth, in favour of great progress in Canada, not only to protect the interests of French Canadians, but also those of all other Canadians.

I think this aspect is important, Mr. Speaker, for however much we talk about unity and harmony, there is no escaping the fact that we must also talk about the facts, and there can only be harmony or unity if there is agreement between Canadians of different origin. So let us not take it for granted that Canadians of French origin are today not ready to co-operate to the full for the emancipation and fulfilment of Canada. We would like to build up a national consciousness in this country, we would like to feel here that we are really true Canadians, but for this to happen, all of us, in all the provinces from coast to coast, have great need of the French-speaking cultural contribution and French-Canadian participation.

Mr. Speaker, this picture of our present situation leads me to think that there have always been difficulties in implementing principles, even the Constitution. Reading the sections of the British North America Act that deal with the rights of the French language in this country, we still find them ambiguous and a source of renewed disputes and problems. Therefore, if this document is not sufficiently clear, it must be changed. And if at some point we find ourselves under the yoke called Confederation, why should we not be able to change this wretched yoke, if that is what is preventing harmony and unity in Canada.

And so, since certain sections of the Constitution are not clear enough regarding linguistic sharing and rights, we should simply think of changing them. Of course, you could answer that the Official Languages Act is supposed to do just that, and that there is no need to amend the Constitution, but then, although the principles of this act are extremely fair, and were adopted by all Members of Parliament in 1969, what has happened since then? We have seen people raise obstacles, people from the establishment try by all means to impede the implementation of the Official Languages Act. Who were those people? We do not know. It seems that in the establishment of high officials it is very difficult to know those things. But in any case some Members of Parliament reacted and I would like to point out a statement made not by anybody but by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who said yesterday, and I quote:

> It would be racial discrimination to want to set up special programs to recruit French-speaking people in the public service.

When we want to implement principles the Leader of the Opposition himself, undoubtedly under pressure from different parts of the country, objects to increasing the participation of French-speaking people in the administration simply to make an abnormal thing normal. But since the country has been in an abnormal situation for years, the suggestion of coming back to a normal situation seems revolutionary because we have grown accustomed to a routine, we have become encrusted and we imagine that when French Canadians demand equality in this country that cannot be done—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point or order?

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I simply want to point out immediately that the Leader of the Opposition did not make any such statement and everybody knows that. The Leader of the Opposition has given his entire support to the Commissioner of Official Languages. This is no time for demagogy.

● (1620)

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I will merely point out to the hon. member that I was reading a text that I have in my hand and the contents of which he may check himself.

Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, the principles must be unanimously approved by the House. We realize that when they are to be implemented, several put a spoke in the wheels.

During the last electoral campaign, there were unfortunately some candidates in several constituencies who took advantage of that situation to get elected. It is not funny, but that is what happened.

Now, Mr. Speaker, such a thing should not happen again. We should not, in order to keep up appearances and soothe the feelings of the various ethnic groups in this country, say that we are in favour. We are all in favour of bilingualism, we want French-Canadians to obtain justice, but we merely agree and remain idle. However, it is too late now, we have reached a much further stage, hence the need for the motion which we are introducing today.

Mr. Speaker, I should also mention that when I speak as I now do, I have major reasons to do so, and roughly I should say that the Commissioner of Official Languages, appointed as a result of the adoption of the legislation, recognizes and deplores the situation, and those who attended meetings of the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and heard Mr. Spicer's evidence were able to see that he made no bones about saying he was disappointed and even disillusioned and that in his opinion things were not going as they should.

Mr. Spicer went so far as to say that the deadline, as far as he is concerned, is not 1978 as planned by the government, but that we have a mere two years from now to achieve the objectives of the Official Languages Act.

Mr. Speaker, when the bilingualism ombudsman, Mr. Spicer, reaches the same conclusions as we do, taking into consideration complaints received and analyses and studies carried out, I do not believe hon. members in this House can doubt his word.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that it is time to act. Words we have heard and no doubt will hear again, but we need action. I refer to the speech that the Right Hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, made April 6, 1966:

> To this end, and having regard to the character of our country, the government for several years has been taking practical steps to encourage bilingualism in the federal public service as part of its fundamental objective of promoting and strengthening national unity on the basis of the equality of rights and opportunities for both English speaking and French speaking Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, again, we all agree on this. That was in 1966, but we are now in 1973. What practical change has taken place? That is the problem. On September 28, 1963, Mr. Gilles Lalande said, and I quote:

> —That the federal government, which has instructed the Laurendeau-Dunton Royal Commission in its terms of reference to make recommendations such as to ensure the bilingual and basically bicultural nature of the federal administration, not only encourage the sporadic use of French in Ottawa, but also allow French-Canadians to start working according to their own culture in certain units of the federal administration. Because it is important to put an end as soon as possible to the era of French Canadian deputy directors, isolated and lost in Anglo-Saxon surroundings, and to do away with the misleading practice of having representatives, French-speaking or with a French name, on boards of directors.

And Mr. Lalande, Mr. Speaker, is not a member of the Social Credit party, as far as I know, and to enlighten the House, I should say he was the co-secretary of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. I go on quoting:

> The wrong solution: Bilingualism.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the problem in this country is not one of languages. The problem in this country is a problem of participation and even if the entire federal administration were bilingual, if 90 or 95 per cent of the administrators are English-speaking, nothing would be solved since the French Canadian would not yet feel at home. Thus, it is wrong to solve the problem by bilingualism.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the point of view of westerners, for intance, when they do not see the necessity of learning French to climb the administrative ladder. I understand them, I approve them; they are right because it is not a problem of languages and we must not ignore people who are really competent on the grounds that they do not know another language. Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, American people with their scientists succeeded in launching satellites in space and they did it in English. We all know as well that the Russian people did it and they did so in Russian. Competence, in any area, is not a matter of language and the world has known geniuses who worked in all languages. I think it is stupid to require that someone know another language to give him a position. It is stupid and those who criticize this point of view are right.

Areas where bilingualism becomes a factor of competence, since it can be in some areas, are of minor significance. It would be rather inappropriate, for instance, to hire a unilingual guide or security agent for the central door of the Parliament building. It would be inappropriate to hire a unilingual stewardess, train engineer, telephone operator or receptionist. At that level bilingualism becomes a factor of competence, but not at other levels.

Therefore, to find the true solution we need parallel administration where anyone, be he French- or English-speaking, will have access to all administrative positions including that of deputy minister. This is the solution. This is the solution we were advocating during the last election campaign and it is clearly established. We know that the solution has already been "preached" in 1963 by none other than the co-secretary of the Laurendeau-Dunton commission and this is why these recommendations are ours today because we know that this is the only solution. We will never be able to impose bilingualism to people—who are not interested in it and I understand them—under the pretense that we want to introduce this concept here. This is a false solution and, Mr. Speaker, I see that you are about to rise to remind me that my time is expired—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Perhaps we could settle the problem by suggesting to hon. members that they grant a few more minutes to the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) to complete his speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is agreed. The hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I will not abuse my colleagues' kindness but I think it is important that the government should adopt the solution we are advocating. We have no exclusive rights to it.

● (1630)

All the less as some people thought about it. So Mr. Lalande said, and I quote:

Nothing would be more untrue and indeed more detrimental to the national interests of French Canada than to seek that basically bicultural character in Canadian institutions above all through bilingualism.

The French Canadians could not settle their participation problem through bilingualism.

Nothing would be more dangerous for the French Canadians than to let the pursuing of a cultural interpretation by the French speaking and English speaking elements in the federal public service or to sit and watch a generalization of the half-English half-French formula already advocated by certain ministers lacking in inspiration. Of course, steps must be taken to spread the knowledge of the French and English languages among the staff of the federal public service serving bilingual people, as it is done in big private business. But where decisions are in the making, where policies, the impact of which will affect the country as a whole, are worked out (in federal departments or within the federal bureaucracy in Ottawa), the administration could never replace bicultural management however imperfect it may be, by purely bilingual elements, should they even be partly French Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, this is the solution. French Canadians must feel completely at home in Ottawa; they must participate and to enable him to do so, executive positions must be opened to him where the rights and privileges of no one will be infringed upon. This is the reason why by setting up separate French and English units within all departments, we will be able to create an equality for which all French Canadians long so much, but not a mathematical or numerical equality but one based on needs. It should be understood, for instance, that obviously, the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation does not have the same scope as the English network because its needs are not as great. The French network of the CBC does not need so many television or radio stations as the English network. This is quite normal, but there is an equality and, as far as I know, nobody has ever criticized the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in this regard and complained that there is only one corporation but two independent networks, though they work along together very well within one corporation.

I go on quoting the statement by Mr. Lalande:

As for us, we are of the opinion that real biculturalism demands at least in part the duality of agencies . . . To refuse systematically the formula of duality is as far as we are concerned, to show preference for the maintenance of a bicultural front; it also means to believe in a myth, namely "national culturalism". But to accept to consider it, on the contrary, means not to refuse to entertain in a concrete manner the seeping of French-Canadian vigour into the concepts and methods that are far too English prevailing in all our so-called Canadian institutions; finally, it means being ready to live a true biculturalism.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to quote those comments made by the secretary of the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission because they agree with our own program. I am sure that even if we persist in trying to implement a complete, awkward and costly sort of bilingualism and quote figures, and even if the government were to order an enquiry into the matter, people would realized that the type of federal administration we advocate would be less costly than the extensive bilingualism that we are now seeking to implement. In fact, although French is being taught to unilingual English-speaking civil servants, will that change anything? Through what miracle will these people transmit their knowledge to those who will come after them?

So, there is no alternative but to give each and every citizen a chance for true emancipation and fulfilment and thus we will achieve, and we French Canadians will be glad to co-operate participation, in building a truly Canadian nation. We shall then be able to work together toward the betterment of our population as a whole.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I want to say as briefly as possible that this afternoon I intend to discuss bilingualism not as a member of the Progressive Conservative party, which would be quite natural, as I am a member of that party—

An hon. Member: We have nothing against that.

Mr. Grafftey: —but as a Canadian Member of Parliament. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that if we do discuss bilingualism along party lines we will be waging an electoral battle here in this House and it is our country, Canada, that will suffer thereby.

I do not want to dwell too long on my leader's position but where bilingualism is concerned, I want to work as a Canadian in this House, along with the Social Credit members, the New Democratic Party members, the Liberal members and my own colleagues. But let us be realistic; you know as well as I do where my leader, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) stands with regard to bilingualism.

I will say it again: if we are to discuss bilingualism and stick to our party lines, it is our country, Canada that will suffer, and this parliament might suffer too, Mr. Speaker.

As member for Brome-Missisquoi, I don't want to go into too many details, Mr. Speaker, but here in Ottawa, I have the honor—and one cannot imagine how proud I am of it—to represent a riding which is 95 per cent French-speaking. Unfortunately, when I entered politics, in Ottawa, my French was awful. But today, I don't want to discuss the matter of length. The fact is that as a member representing Brome-Missisquoi in Ottawa, I have not been commissioned by my constituents to discuss bilingualism and official languages and make a political play of it.

[English]

There will be some who will think I am talking in motherhood clichés, Mr. Speaker, when I say that I want to underline once and for all—I sometimes suspect politicians when they say outside of the economic arena that this thing or that thing must be discussed in a bipartisan approach—that I am convinced as I have never been convinced before that if we discuss language rights in a political arena such as this House of Commons, or back in our ridings or during an election campaign, it is this institution which suffers; it is Canada which suffers. The approach of our party has always been the same. When the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was Prime Minister—and I underline that I do not say this in a partisan way—we were prepared to take a bipartisan approach to constitutional modernization. We were prepared to take a bipartisan approach to language rights and the question of whether or not they should be re-enshrined in the constitution, as they always have been.

Let me say this. It was to be a modern constitution for modern times. Whether or not it involved the improvement of language rights in Ottawa, the right hon. gentleman told me, told the opposition of the day and told every member of his caucus that we must take a bipartisan approach to this issue. At that time Mr. Laurendeau very sincerely put forward the proposition of the B and B Commission. We did not reject it out of hand, but thought we had a better approach. It was at that time unfortunately—and I am not naming any members of any party—that certain individuals both inside and outside this House tried to paint our party as anti-Quebec. Nonsense. We had our way and others had their way.

[Translation]

And unfortunately, since then, and too often indeed especially during the last decade, we have been discussing this business of official languages and bilingualism, within and without this House from political viewpoints.

Many times, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

If in the past I have rarely spoken on this subject, if in the past I have been shy about talking on this subject, it has been because my constituents do not really encourage me to do this. In the little village in which I live there are 500 families, 250 of which are French-speaking and 250 of which are English-speaking. My executive assistant here in Ottawa speaks French to his mother and English to his father. Do you think I have a mandate to discuss in a partisan way this issue which goes to the very fabric of the nation? No.

And I ask each member to take that question out of its political context as soon as possible in the best interests of the country.

Mr. Speaker, the Confederation Act enacted over a 100 years ago was an act of faith in which the Liberals and the Conservatives co-operated to lay the foundations of our country, Canada. The Fathers of Confederation discussed at the very beginning not from a political tribune or as Tories and Grits. They were first of all Canadians. It is therefore quite natural from time to time to deal with the matter as politicians, because the enticements were there. I admit that it was done before and after but in general, it can be said that the debates on Confederation were carried on outside the political field by the Fathers of Confederation.

It seems to me superfluous to say that the issue of official languages must be discussed in the same spirit. I wish to state that each member, either a New Democrat, a Créditiste, a Liberal or a Progressive Conservative, wants to discuss about the welfare of Canada before dealing with the welfare of his political party.

Today, however we do not only have the Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives, but also our friends the New Democrats and the Créditistes.

[English]

But there is one more thing, Mr. Speaker, and let us put the cards on the table right away. If we were discussing the future of Canada as the Fathers of Confederation did 100 years ago, Liberals and Conservatives together putting Canada first, we would have to remember, whether we were discussing constitutional provisions or language rights, that Canada was a different country in those years. Toward the end of the last century, during the beginning of this century and even today, many people have been coming to this great land of ours to share in the experience of nation building, people who either call themselves Francophones or are from the United Kingdom. I am not just speaking of the west where the multicultural force is so great, but those people must certainly feel left out of this debate. It reminds me somewhat of charter members of an old club arguing over who comes first while the new members are left out. Let us stop this nonsense. We can stop it, especially with the makeup of the present House of Commons, if we let every iota of partisanship out of this debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is another thing that I want to discuss very clearly in a not too partisan manner, I hope. But I direct my remarks today especially to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and occasionally to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet).

I deplore the fact, Mr. Speaker, that we are only two representatives from the province of Quebec in the Progressive Conservative party and I am sure that the Liberals are sorry they did not even elect one member from the province of Alberta. It may be unfortunate for national unity but when the ministers see that we are not a national party, can the Liberals honestly think that it is a good thing for national unity and the future of our country? The Liberal party is a great national party, and so is ours, and I do everything I can as a Progressive Conservative member from the province of Quebec to build efficiently the two-party system. And when the ministers see that we are not a national party, when they did not even win one seat in Alberta, they are playing with the fabric of our country, Canada. The Liberals are a national party, and so are we.

In 1958, when there were only 48 Liberals in Parliament and more than half were from the province of Quebec, not even once did we find that the Liberal party was not a national party, because it was indeed a national party. No one should say that. I talked on several occasions with my colleagues of the Liberal party from the province of Quebec and they regret as often as I do the statements made by the Postmaster General, the Minister of Transport and even the Prime Minister.

[English]

Let us nail that to the wall right away. There are two great national parties in this House.

An hon. Member: Four.

Mr. Grafftey: I withdraw. You are right. There are four national parties in this House, whether or not we have equal distribution. I stand corrected. The minute we start throwing rhetoric around—and we never did it in 1958 when over 50 per cent of the Liberal caucus was drawn from my province—it ceases to be a joking matter. Sometimes we say statesmanlike things here on the floor of the House only to appear on television back home in our ridings not always saying the same things. At the risk of repeating one cliché after another, I appeal to the House for the fourth or fifth time to stop that kind of nonsense and approach this subject in a bipartisan all-Canadian way.

[Translation]

In the province of Quebec—let us be realistic—the minister of Transport claims that the sole federalist party in Canada is the Liberal party. If this is really true, we, as Quebecers, at the federal and provincial levels, have only the choice between the Grits and René Lévesque; the Parti québécois will accede to power sooner than expected. Such a belief is ridiculous and I am a federalist even if I reject the kind of federalism or the federalist doctrine of the right hon. prime minister, that of confrontation. I do not accept it but I remain, I hope, as good a federalist as he is.

But when it is claimed that there is but one choice in Quebec, the Grits or the Parti québécois, this is quite dangerous for national unity and everybody knows it as well as I do.

[English]

There is no such simple choice, and no demogoguery or simplistic argument will prove otherwise.

I definitely share, Mr. Speaker, the views stated today by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), as well as most of his ideas, but I am certain that as a Quebecer, I have often heard the speeches of the leader of the Social Credit party of Canada (Mr. Caouette) in Quebec. He is often right when he deals with economic questions: he wants bread and butter on the table of all our fellow-citizens. When the leader of the Social Credit party of Canada deals with economic questions, when he says in Quebec that our fellow-citizens must be in a position to support themselves, I agree. This is why we must not let an issue such as bilingualism be raised up in a political context in the House or at the next election.

Fifteen years ago, I was elected for the first time as member for Brome-Missisquoi. I was not satisfied as far as bilingualism was concerned. I was quite often compelled to return unilingual documents to bureaucrats to obtain a translation. But I did not need a Royal Commission of Inquiry on Bilingualism and Biculturalism to tell me that my secretary should be bilingual, because it is absolutely essential.

I wonder to what extent—the Créditiste leader has quite often spoken about that—the issue will be settled with some regulation or commission here and there. We would rather settle the matter in good faith and in a fine Canadian spirit. I hope that during the next weeks we will speak as united Canadians.

• (1650)

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, there are many issues, not necessarily economic, that we sometimes discuss, although perhaps we should not, in a very partisan way. It is my hope, however, that we will approach the next election fighting on bread and butter issues. There is not a member of this House of Commons, no matter where he comes from in Canada, who has been given a firm mandate by his constituents to let this issue get into the political arena. I believe that, as I have never believed anything before. That is the mandate, the very special mandate of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It is the mandate of all of us. He knows where the Leader of the Opposition stands on this issue.

More than anything it is the duty of the Prime Minister to pull this issue out of the political partisan arena. Whether it is a resolution that is coming before us, whether it is a bill that is coming before us, let us be very careful about the consequences. Any time someone gets up to discuss a detail of that resolution or that bill he may be labelled anti this or anti that. There may be some short-term gain, but there is only going to be long-term chaos.

If I have repeated myself perhaps seven or eight times I have done so because, while we do not talk about it in my riding and I do not think we talk about it all that much in Canada, it is a subject about which if we really believe in Canada and its future, we feel deeply. It is deep down in our dreams of national unity.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we will tackle the issue of bilingualism during the next few weeks as Canadians rather than as members of political parties.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott)—Housing—Rochdale College—Report ordered by Ontario Attorney General on activities—Action by Minister of Justice; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—Manpower—International Nickel Company—Projected production and employment levels—Provision of information to department; the hon. member for Humber—St. George's St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Social security—Request that family allowance payments be tied to cost of living index pending increases.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE MEASURES TO SAFEGUARD RIGHTS OF FRANCOPHONE AND ANGLOPHONE CANADIANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Matte:

That this House deplores the government's decision to postpone the full implementation of the policy contained in the Official Languages Act and censures the solutions proposed by the government, and consequently, urges the latter to find realistic and specific ways of safeguarding the rights of French- and English-speaking Canadians in a much more just and reasonable manner.

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks this afternoon by reflecting a little on the comments that have just been made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey).

[English]

I think, Mr. Speaker, I understand the sentiments that drove the hon. member to make the statement which he just made, that the matters of language policy and bilingualism, the use of the official languages, should be taken out of the political arena, but if I may be allowed what I believe is an important distinction, I believe I would like to take a position slightly different from his. I do not think that a matter that is so vital to so many people in Canada can be taken out of the political arena. Of course, it stands to reason that we not only have the right but the duty to speak of these matters here in parliament, and outside of parliament as well.

Perhaps if he meant that matters of language and language policy should be taken out of partisan debate I would be more inclined to share his views, but the question is political, totally political. Our people are looking for a wise but nevertheless political answer. Of course, if it is going to be in the political arena we are going to hear strange noises from time to time. There will be extreme statements made by some persons. We are, after all, all of us human. There are 260 or more of us. I was going to say 260 odd, but sometimes that word is misunderstood. There are 22 million more throughout the country, and we all have freedom of speech as well as the responsibility that comes with freedom of speech. So it will be, when it comes to the language question, that you will hear jackasses braying on both sides. But perhaps we could take some comfort from the fact that a nation that brays together stays together.

I am simply putting it that way to underline the fact that all of us must feel free at any time to talk about these matters. If we, as representatives of the people, speak foolishly, then the people will take us to account. But in no way can we listen to exhortations that we stop talking about this matter in this parliament, in this country, and on the hustings. I, for one, have paid quite a bit of attention to this question. I was going to say for some ten years now, since the late right hon. prime minister Pearson said that there would be a commission on biculturalism and bilingualism, but my concern goes back further than that. As a matter of fact, if I remember correctly, the first time that the problem of language in this country struck me was that morning in the early summer, or spring, I forget exactly when the date was, over 23 years ago when the Korean war was declared. If I may be allowed I will take some time to repeat the anecdote because it certainly had an influence on me.

At that time, I was working in a factory in the eastern part of Quebec City. The other workers and I used to gather in a square at 7:30 a.m. while waiting for the bus that would take us to the factory. Normally, while waiting for the bus, we would get together and chat.

Of course, the news of the day can be discussed, as well as all kinds of other subjects. At any rate, we were talking, chatting away as serious as you please, but that particular morning I was seated, reading a newspaper, the Journal de Montréal, dealing with the declaration of war in Korea. After a while, I noticed that I alone was reading and that my colleagues were grouped a little to the side. Three of them left the group and approached me, like a delegation. The oldest of the three said: "Listen, is there going to be war?" I replied: "I don't know, you see, I am just reading the newspaper, I don't know much about that". But he added: "If there was a war, would there be a draft?" Again, I replied: "I have no idea. Why ask me that?" They replied: "First of all, you go to college, and besides you are English." Mr. Speaker, I remembered that remark later on. That showed me, first of all, that class distinctions do exist in this country. We can set that matter aside, but let us speak of the second part of the question. It struck me and I have never been able to forget it. With all the good will in the world, one cannot help but notice that there is a difference, and that some people, and for good reasons, feel left outside of certain things; they do not feel that they are part of the great movements in this country. In this case, workers, most of them in their forties, would come and ask a lad of 17 what was going to happen because they thought that little guy knew, just because he spoke English. That struck me, and since then I have been interested in the problem of languages in my country. I certainly intend to discuss the matter in a political arena, and especially this one.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is a very complex matter, of course, and I have said nothing when I said that. We all know that. There are an enormous number of distinctions that have to be made and made by all of the members of this House with regard to the terms that we use to discuss language policy. Obviously, one major distinction is that an official language policy is not a bilingualism policy. Let us make that absolutely clear. You could have, for example, the complete, adequate and thorough operation of the Official Languages Act in the federal service and still have done very little toward the development of bilingualism, as such, across the nation.

Bilingualism has to do with a person being bilingual, with a person being able to speak at least two languages. That is why, Mr. Speaker, although I find it illuminating to some degree, I find it even more confusing to hear the language used very often around this House, around this hill and in the reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages—the language which says that what we are after is institutional bilingualism. Mr. Speaker, institutions do not speak; people speak. I think that is a tremendously important distinction to keep in mind. The official languages policy is not the same thing as a bilingual policy. A bilingual policy does not mean necessarily a policy wherein persons who have only one language. who are unilingual, can have full rights. Obviously, we can see that the government is beginning to move toward this kind of distinction as it proposes the nine principles for our consideration. There is beginning to be a refinement of those distinctions; certainly, there is more refinement now than ten years ago when the "Bi-Bi" commission was first launched.

The speaker from the Social Credit party certainly made some very important points. I cannot agree with what he was specifying as a solution, perhaps because I have not thought about it fully.

[Translation]

But I find it rather difficult to understand him. Perhaps he will be able to explain to me, if we stay here long enough, what he means by a parallel government or a parallel system of government? It is not the story about Mr. Ryan—that I know very well—but when he speaks about duplication of services, I have some difficulty in understanding exactly what that means, and I ask him to be patient, not for a generation, but for sometime, because my colleagues have to study his suggestions. In a way, I come closer to his position, when I note the figures mentioned lately by the Official Language Commissioner, concerning the number of bilingual employees in the public service, because I realize that I must act soon, and vigorously. All hon. members may not have seen those statistics, but here is an excerpt of his text. I will quote that text in English, in order not to mispronounce the figures. Here they are:

Total public service appointments 1971 and 1972, distribution by language requirements: Bilingual 1971, 9.1 per cent; 1972, 7.6 per cent; French, 8.3 per cent in 1971, 11 per cent in 1972; English, 79.2 per cent in 1971, 75.6 per cent in 1972. The figures speak for themselves and they do not need to be underlined. I am sure they have been cited enough in this House to point out that whatever our good intentions may be, we are not moving fast in the direction of giving equality of opportunity to the French speaking citizens of this country. When it comes to service being provided to them by the public service of Canada, we certainly come nowhere near equality of participation by French speaking citizens in this country in the public service of their country.

It might strike a lot of people, Mr. Speaker, that the imposition of quotas is not a matter of common sense, that in the normal way of thinking that we have in this country we believe that people who try for jobs should deserve those jobs; they should be qualified and they should have merit. This is called the merit principle. But I should like to give this House a little warning about common sense. There are many things that we do, and that we believe, which are not common sense. For example, in a very important way it is not evident common sense that such a thing as a trade union movement is good. Obviously, people who work harder should be allowed to move fast and earn more money. Why do we need an institution such as a trade union movement? We need such an institution, we have finally come to realize, because the common sense world we thought existed did not exist in the way we thought it did.

If you cannot follow the trade union example, let me give you another of what common sense tells us. For centuries, Mr. Speaker, all men and women said, "Of course, the sun goes around the earth; it is common sense, it is evident". They also said, "Of course, the earth is flat; it is common sense, we can all see it". So, common sense can be a very dangerous guide. What we, as parliamentarians, have to use very often is uncommon sense—a sense which takes us beyond the surface of things and makes us dig into patterns and shapes which control our lives and society.

So if I advance a notion, it is not exactly the same notion at all as the one presented by the speaker from the Social Credit party that there should be something like quotas for recruiting of personnel into the public service, I know I will be met with a barrage of remarks to the effect that it is not common sense. But I say that in order to preserve this country, and the solidarity of this country, we will just have to use more everyday common sense.

Mr. Speaker, I could give you many other examples of how we, in our society, have done things which at first glance do not stand up to casual, normal inspection, but we know that without those things and those institutions our society would not work.

I support the notion put forward by the speaker from the Social Credit party that we must concentrate on what he calls "participation"; that is the key to the solution of the problem. Eventually, how this participation is to be worked out will have to be a matter of considerable and thoughtful debate. Certainly, I support that approach. We have to make a collective decision about it and take collective action; otherwise, all we are talking about is motherhood and we are only involved in wishful thinking.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot identify with the monolingual Members of Parliament, whether English- or French-speaking, because I can really say that I express myself fairly well in English and that I can also get by in French. I am in a rather fortunate position.

I thank hon. members for their applause, but there is no merit attached to such a position. I owe it to my mother, who is a French-Canadian. I did not learn French in school, although they tried to teach me a bit. But intellectually at least, I think I understand the position of the monolingual French-Canadian, especially in this House, because wherever he goes, he is aware that poeple think he is monolingual "for ulterior motives".

He must be aware that, although we are today discussing seriously the question of the official language in the public service, we are somewhat isolated in Ottawa, that the public service itself is somewhat isolated from the rest of the country, and that even if a completely bilingual public service could be achieved, that would not make it a bilingual country.

Just in case I am somewhat hard to understand because what I am saying is too abstract, I shall now give some concrete examples.

Here on Parliament Hill, everything is in English and in French: the signs, notices, paper work and translations. If you go out towards the fence around Parliament Hill, you see that the signs and notices are still bilingual, written in both the official languages. They say in French that it is "une impasse", and in English that it is one-way. So far so good, but as soon as you are outside this fence, this barrier, you find yourself in the real world of Canada, and the monolingual French-Canadian is confronted with a traffic light for pedestrians which says: "Walk—Don't walk".

This is just an example, but I think it sums up the situation and that there are some alarming phenomena in this country. In the federal public service, some attempt is being made to introduce and encourage the use of both the official languages. You might say that we are encouraging bilingualism, but outside Parliament Hill and the public service, the trend is in the other direction.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a few figures on the teaching of French as a second language in the English-speaking provinces and on the teaching of English as a second language in the province of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue, if he has the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will try to be brief. I think I can probably sum up in approximately three minutes; but may I point out that what I have to say in that time will in no way complete all I have to say on this subject.

I just want to make this one point. If you look at the figures having to do with the teaching of French in the English speaking provinces in Canada, you could be greatly alarmed. If you look at students in English speaking provinces across Canada who were studying French, I am speaking of students in high school, and express their number as a percentage of those who could study French, you will find that these figures hold true: In 1970-71, 55.7 per cent of the students who could study French, were studying French at some time during their high school career. I am not saying how much French they studied or for how long; I am merely saying that that percentage were exposed to some French instruction. In 1971-72, the percentage came down to 53.2 per cent. In 1972-73, the last year for which I have figures the percentage is reduced to 47.0 per cent. The decline is alarming, Mr. Speaker, and I predict that the figures for this year will be even more staggering.

I will end on this note: We cannot here discuss the matter of official languages, bilingualism and the rights of unilingual personnel in the Public Service, in isolation from what exists in the rest of the country, because we could well discover ourselves moving in one direction while the country is moving in another. Although it may not be terribly relevant to the members of the Social Credit party if people in English Canada have some ability to speak French, it is terribly relevant to me, and to many others in English Canada. I, for one, want to ask the government to begin discussions with the provinces, with a view to reversing the present trend; otherwise, no matter what we do to improve the linguistic capabilities of our civil servants, we may well find that we have a bilingual civil service operating in a country that is essentially not bilingual, as may happen in a few years from now.

● (1720)

Mr. Claude Wagner (St. Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, while listening earlier to the comments made by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) in presenting his motion to the House I must say that at the very beginning I could not help smiling when, for instance, the hon. member thinking of the 15 seats won by his party in the province of Quebec did not hesitate to mistake those seats for the French Canadian population of Quebec.

I would remind the hon. member that population should not be counted in terms of seats but in terms of the individuals themselves and I think that the half million Quebec voters who have chosen the Progressive Conservative Party at the last election would feel quite uneasy in considering themselves among the official opposition as the hon. member for Champlain tried to recall.

I was also smiling because the hon. member for Champlain reminded me unintentionally of the comments made in this House by his leader on January 4 and 8 last, and I quote:

> The differences of opinion with regard to linguistic matters did not constitute a real problem but that it was made to look like a problem because of a sad lack of purchasing power in all of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, today the Créditiste party wants to plead in favour of bilingualism. It has the right to do so, even if people are concerned over extremely urgent problems. It has the right to do it because bilingualism is obviously of vital importance for Canada's future. But just the same we should be aware that the House will have to discuss this very problem within the next few weeks when it takes into consideration the resolution brought in by the government. And at that time an exhaustive study of the government plan already on the order paper will be undertaken.

In any event, opposition is our right here and we respect this right. With them, we shall officially reopen the very important record of bilingualism. I confess that I feel at ease to deal with the language policy in Canada in general and in the public service in particular. Just like several other hon. members of all political parties, especially the present leader of the government and the leader of the opposition, I can express myself adequately in both official languages of the country and I am proud of it.

On the other hand, since I have just mentioned it, I would like to add that I am particularly pleased to sit and to work at the side of the leader of my party; all hon.

members, like an increasing number of French-speaking Canadians, must recognize today the highly praisable and already very effective personal efforts he has been making for four years to speak correctly in French.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: If the applause that comes from all sides is any indication, this is an eloquent and worthy example not only for parliamentarians as a whole but for all our fellow citizens. And this attitude, like the attitude of the other party leaders who are here, is worth many speeches and many votes of principle on bilingualism.

Mr. Speaker, all of us in this House, with more solidarity than ever, support the intent and direction of the lingustic policy sketched under the initiative of the late right hon. Lester B. Pearson and already launched in fact by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was leader of the government.

It would be unfortunate if today, in an altogether regionalist spirit, a debate would harden even before it is formally restarted. Nobody will hasten the advent of a large concensus on a linguistic policy developed to its fullest by playing petty politics or harshly introducing a motion that would only deal superficially with the problem. If there is a legislative area where all regional barriers and especially political labels and narrow and partisan considerations must be put aside, it is indeed that of the official languages of a country. Without an open mind, without an unpolitical approach, without mutual understanding, we would easily become, some of us at least, overly racist. Since we have a mandate from our constituents, we have no right to be sceptics, even less pessimists; on the contrary, more than ever, we must stick together so that our flag, which proudly stands to your right, Mr. Speaker, will always be recognized and saluted by the two founding communities of our nation. Now, without any false modesty, I want to address all members in this House as well as all Canadians, and all those who will hear me, and tell them that as a Canadian and as a proud Canadian and French-speaking Quebecer; intolerance, never more! Mr. Speaker, I should also like to say that a new world is emerging in which the majority of Canadians are less than 35, in which the level of education and school attendance are unprecedented, in which the instruments of sub-culture such as the media and modern audio-visual aids develop creativeness as never before, in which people are more concerned than past generations ever were with world problems or with new disciplines such as cybernetics, environment and what not, and where especially, in this new world, dialogue and understanding take the form of community life.

New possibilities exist when interprovincial or international travels—and soon maybe interplanetary—take less than no time, waves know no boundaries, currencies move more and more freely, languages are easier to learn and allow you to discover other people and, finally, when modern pedagogy is both an animator and a catalyst of an international conscience. Finally, I would like to tell them, Mr. Speaker: we must find new solutions. Tomorrow it will be too late.

Are we, as parliamentarians or Canadians from British Columbia, the Prairies, Ontario, Quebec or the Maritimes, again, out of ignorance, intolerance, selfishness, fear, or short-sighted political reasons, barely stated, to become responsible for or accessories to injustices vis-à-vis one or the other of the two founding groups, the two major linguistic communities of this country? Let those from the province of Quebec or elsewhere who cannot, can no longer or do not have to familiarize themselves with the other official language of this country from a practical point of view, allow at least their fellow citizens, let alone their children and grandchildren, to familiarize themselves with the other official language.

That is the way to build a Canada based on the sturdy, mutual respect of partnership.

On the other hand, let us not believe that national unity boils down to the sole question of official languages in this country.

Canada's two official languages, an easier access for French-speaking Canadians to the federal public service, federal services provided in both languages where necessary, even useful, of course, all that is part and parcel of our national unity theme. But basically and in our fellow citizens' every-day-life context, national unity will really be ensured at home by putting an end, in agreement with other levels of government and in a decentralization spirit, by putting an end to social and economic injustices and by tackling more effectively the problem of regional disparities in this country.

That is really our challenge as members of Parliament.

As far as the substance of the Créditiste proposal is concerned, it is only logical for me to think, in view of my earlier remarks, that it is clear: I intend to be more specific when the government motion is officially debated in the House. You see, Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who do not want, as we say, to put the cart before the horse, especially in this area.

In concluding, I wish to make it clear that the solution to the problem of bilingualism, though patterned on the proceedings in this House, will not be stem from the House. It is the whole country that must fall into step.

I think of the privileged class, the leaders, college students, academics' communication agents, publishers and other experts, professionals, leaders of social, cultural, economical movements, industrialists and businessmen, and when thinking of them all, I think particularly and first of all of those who live in Quebec and off Quebec. To all those I just mentioned, I say that the real solutions will come from them.

I want a Canada, Mr. Speaker, where Canadians choose to understand each other and communicate with one another. I want a Canada where the issue of language is not one of political gain but of coherent national leadership. Regardless of my own views as a politician, there are local and community opinion leaders who must do their fair share. The students, professionals, businessmen, farmers, fishermen and others who make up this land will have to make up their own minds and make their own personal commitment. I happen to believe that this commitment will be made. I happen to believe that those who underestimate this commitment underestimate Canada and Canadians; and what is more important Mr. Speaker, they underestimate themselves.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Georges C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, before answering, I should simply like to say that if I could have the floor immediately, it was thanks to the utmost courtesy of the minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) who was scheduled to speak at that time and who, I think, wishes to speak before six o'clock. He has serious things to tell us, so I should not like to encroach on his allotted time, although I would be very pleased to answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Lachance: Do I gather that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe would rather not answer me?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is in a difficult position. I do not know whether that reply said yes or whether it said no. The House is always master of its fate, and if the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) wants to take advantage of the patience of the House, I am sure the hon. member for Lafontaine could ask a question.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe if he agrees in principle, with the resolution the government brought forward to increase the use of the French language at every level in the Public Service?

Mr. Wagner: I will readily answer the hon. member, through you Mr. Speaker, and I shall say that I do not know whether he was absent a few minutes ago, but I have said that we would be pleased to get to the core of the matter when the government submits this resolution for debate, and at that time, we shall say, as a party, what we think of it.

I think that at this time it is not so much my personal views that the hon. member wishes to obtain, as the views of the party.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) rising on a point of order? The hon. member for Lotbinière.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) that according to the Standing Orders of this House and in order for him to be able to speak before his departure for Montreal, an agreement was not necessarily reached with the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) alone, but also with our party which is always ready to cooperate.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe that to be the understanding, that there was an all-party agreement.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, after listening to learned speeches, I would like to tell the House, through you, that I also have a philosophical, a great speech on Canadian policies to make, but that I will not make it today.

I will not make it today for a very simple reason, namely that I am surprised—and I am not the only one—about the procedure adopted by our colleagues of the Social Credit party who deemed it necessary to introduce a motion on an opposition day, while since April 13th a resolution appears on the order paper in the name of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), by which the government announced its intention to allow everybody to take a stand on this matter of vital importance for Canada, which it considers as high priority. The House leader of our party (Mr. MacEachen) announced earlier today, early this afternoon, that this debate on the resolution put on the order paper on April 13th would take place sometime next week.

I will not take up extremely interesting views which have been expressed in several speeches made by previous speakers that I do not wish to take a position, because the government's view is that a debate in depth on this matter cannot take place today, since the motion introduced by the Social Credit party would not permit a beneficial fruitful and exhaustive debate.

I hasten to explain because I suppose our colleagues of the Social Credit party do not agree, but that is my opinion, that of the government, and I would like to specify the reasons for it. This motion does not permit a debate in depth on the matter, first because it contains wrong allegations about the Official Languages Act which is, of course, a major point in any discussion about official languages within the public service and, secondly, because it puts in a wrong light the debate that should be held on this matter, in stating views which we also consider as inaccurate. I will limit my remarks to try and establish those two points of view and explain by the same token our abstention from participating in this debate today.

I would like to show first of all that the first part of the resolution from the Social Credit Party set the debate on the wrong track even before it began. I quote:

That this House deplores the government's decision to postpone the full implementation of the policy contained in the Official Languages Act—

I should like to point out, through you, Mr. Speaker, particularly to the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) who spoke on this question and who is the sponsor of the motion that I think that assertion is incorrect, that the Official Languages Act can very well be implemented in the 60 months provided for in one of the last sections of the act, not in spite of but in the interest of the measures contained in the resolution of April 13 in the name of the right hon. Prime Minister. As was clear at various points in his speech, the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) apparently still entertains an extremely dangerous confusion, which has already been pointed out by some previous speakers, in connection with the official languages, personal bilingualism, and what, despite the objections of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney), I shall continue to call institutional bilingualism.

Indeed, the member for Champlain made a case that seems to be based on a proposition that the government never formulated or defended. He seemed to be arguing against the idea that all federal civil servants, if not all Canadians, ought to become bilingual. There is a very strong expression in French, but I will use it all the same: the honourable member attributes this opinion to us, despite the fact that since the Official Languages Act was passed, we have been killing ourselves, killing ourselves I say, to explain that the bilingualism we are talking about in our policy on the official languages—I personally prefer the latter phrase—does not oblige every Canadian, or all federal civil servants, to learn two languages. It has but two aims. First: that all Canadian citizens be able to communicate with the Federal government and its related agencies in the official language of their choice, whether English or French; and, consequently, second: that if they work in the federal Public Service, they may also carry out their duties in the official language of their choice.

It is therefore absolutely not a matter of forcing all Canadians to speak both languages, or even all civil servants. It does, however, mean that a certain number of civil servants, those who come into contact with the public or who hold supervisory positions and thus come into contact with junior public servants are bilingual, otherwise the two major objectives of the official languages policy could not be achieved.

Well, that is a policy, those are objectives the government has no intention to abandon, nor to postpone full implementation of measures which can be helpful in achieving them.

Second point: The Social Credit motion asserts that the government, in the resolution it tabled on April 13, proposes no efficient means of creating equality of the two languages within the public service, and that those measures proposed are neither realistic, nor concrete, nor fair, nor reasonable. I want to demonstrate the falsity of that premise which can lead only to equally false conclusions.

I shall demonstrate this as briefly as I can, Mr. Speaker, lest I get myself involved in a flagrant contradiction and, after having said that the substantial debate should not take place enter into such a substantial debate. However, I feel hon. members will recognize that, in order to point out the weakness of the Creditiste motion, I must show by contrast the strength of the resolution on the order paper.

Returning just one moment to the Official Languages Act, I was surprised by the kind of absolution whereby the hon. member for Champlain asserted that no progress had been achieved.

I feel that at leisure, when he thinks over his speech while going to sleep tonight—if it happens that he thinks over his speeches when going to sleep—he will realize that he has exaggerated. I would like to give him a specific example. Now to suggest as he did that no progress has been made is an undefensible argument and I would like to give him a rather personal example. During the Holy Week both of us were in Cape Kennedy giving our moral support to the launching of a satellite—that was all we could do—and personally I was impressed—I am sure that the hon. member was too—to see that in a foreign country in Cape Kennedy, the officials who accompanied us and the employees of Telesat Canada were giving explanations to laymen such as we, some of which of a highly technical nature, in English as well as in French. I honestly ask the hon. member—and it is only an example—if we could only imagine five years ago that in a technical, scientific area—and this in the United States, in the heat of Florida—some people speak French because a certain number of the members of the parliamentary delegation spoke French.

I should not want to suggest for one moment that the hon. member is wrong to complain about the state of services in French in the Federal government because being part of this government, I find reasons to complain myself—perhaps not each day but nearly every week—and to try to correct these mistakes. But between this and going to the other extreme which consists in saying that no progress has been made, I think there is a gap which the hon. member did not see fit to consider and I hope that, in the basic debate that will take place when the resolution under the name of the right hon. Prime Minister will be discussed in this House, we will all try to stay within the limits of what is reasonable—I do not say of common sense but of what is reasonable—which is something quite different—and try not to go beyond our thought. We are in an area where emotion plays a great part and where it is unfortunately too easy to go beyond one's thought and to take extreme positions, which are indefensible for all practical purposes.

The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) spoke about the difficulties which persist and which are real, I agree. Again, if I did not want to say it myself, I would just have to refer hon. members to the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages; these difficulties still exist and they are very real. I should say however to the hon. member that it is far easier to criticize them than to correct them efficiently and that in spite of the remarks he has made—and I personally found a great deal of factual truth in them—I am nearly as impatient as he is. I would like to tell him however that it would not be reasonable to indicate only the bad sides and to neglect completely the progress we have made.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, in dealing with the second part of the motion I would like to quote a few figures related to some of the progress we have achieved and which contradict the hon. member for Champlain who claims not only that we have stagnated but that we have even lost ground. We have lost ground in some areas, we do suffer from some stagnation, but there has also been some progress which I should like to review briefly.

First of all, I should like to advise the House that we have made progress in that the use of the French language is more widespread in the civil service. With regard to procurement, the Public Service Commission advised me that of the 88,000 appointments made in 1972, as compared with 1971, there were 4 per cent fewer positions listing a knowledge of English as a compulsory requirement, while the number of positions requiring French increased by 3 per cent. I will admit that the progress is modest, but it is a fact. Of the 38,000 new employees recruited in 1972, 22 per cent preferred to work in French as compared with 19 per cent in 1971.

Disregarding the special recruiting of Francophones in 1971, 23.7 per cent of university graduates hired in 1971 were French-speaking, their percentage increasing to 28.3 per cent in 1972.

In 1972 also, French-speaking university students, administration trainees represented 33.5 per cent of all the trainees. At management level, the number of appointed Francophones has increased from 19 per cent in 1971 to 21 per cent in 1972. During that period, 41 per cent of all appointees in the management category were bilingual, compared to 34 per cent only in 1971.

As to training, the results are not as encouraging. During a five year period, the participation of French-speaking employees in the centralized training courses given by the Public Service Commission only increased from 4 per cent to 9.5 per cent.

This is the reason why the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister provides for an increase of training courses available in French. At the beginning of 1972, 10.5 per cent of the Public Service Commission courses were given in French, and by the end of 1972, this percentage has been increased to 60 per cent. By the end of 1975, all Public Service Commission courses will be available in both languages.

However, in the important career assignment program which is intended for junior officers, the French participation increased from 12 per cent in 1969 to 30 per cent in 1972.

I could go on quoting figures but not, as I said before, in an effort to prove that the problem has been solved, because this would be absolutely ridiculous. A problem which has been aggravated for over a century can certainly not be solved in four and a half, five or six years. But, as one of our colleagues was saying the other day in this House, we should not take another century to solve it.

In my opinion, the rate of progress has been accelerating. We shall have considerations to make in this connection. I hope that the hon. member for Champlain himself, when the resolution comes before the House, will be more specific and will not complacently indulge in the same kind of vague proposals as those he has presented today but will explain the contents of today's motion and produce evidence that the measures provided for in our resolution are neither realistic, practical, fair, or reasonable.

I might say—but again I would enter upon the substance of the debate—that those measures are realistic when they provide, for instance, that anyone in a supervising position must be bilingual; I think this is extremely realistic. How is it possible for employees to work in English or in French if they are supervised by someone who is unable to read the memos they write or to understand the language they speak?

I would also like to say that these measures are practical by giving one example: the chance for French-speaking as well as English-speaking people of learning the second language. French-speaking people also experience the need for a second language.

I think the measures are fair and that anything that looks like concessions in these measures is in fact aimed at protecting the rights of unilingual people to positions they have held for years. For instance, anyone who has been involved in union negotiations is aware of the fact that the safeguard of any rights acquired by a worker is something sacred with which nobody wants to tamper, even if at times these might appear as excessive concessions.

Finally, I think that those measures are reasonable and this is evidenced by the fact that the wording of this resolution has been fully approved by all the Public Service unions. Not only did they accept and approved the conditions stipulated and the measures provided in the resolution but they allowed us to mention this approval publicly.

I will stop at that, Mr. Speaker, and sum it up. We will take no further part in this debate, except perhaps to point out a few things and add a few remarks, because we believe that a truly substantive debate cannot take place until the resolution dated April 13 is introduced in the House for debate.

Mr. Speaker: As it is six o'clock, I now leave the chair until eight p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, after the excellent speech delivered by my colleague, I feel it is important to point out the suggestions and statements made in another study on bilingualism, that of Dr. P. C. Coulombe. The surprising thing about it is that this one was conducted on behalf of the Treasury Board, but, as in most cases, it has been put away on the shelves.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) introduced his motion on bilingualism, did he take this report into consideration? You can pass judgment on it when considering the statements made in this study and the government's action. First of all, let us come back to the Treasury Board. In an article in Le Devoir of October 18, 1972, this was said, and I quote:

> The bilingualism programs are inefficient and inadequate.

The report indicated clearly, with supporting data, that bilingualism too often consists merely in giving simple language courses which are, in addition, pitifully inefficient. From 1966 to 1971, those courses cost $54 million, and of the 22,807 civil servants who registered for them, only 1,851, that is 8 per cent, completed the program.

Attempts were made to silence the Francophones by creating French language units, but there again the results were deplorable. Those units included 2,497 civil servants in Ottawa, that is barely 5 per cent of the total work force in the public service.

What is even more deplorable is the fact that by substracting the number of employees working in the Language Bureau, only 564 civil servants remain in the French Language units, that is 1.1 per cent of the total. Is that representation adequate? I do not think so. One does not have to be a genius to realize the seriousness of the failure. Even in Quebec, the system does not work. Only 55 per cent of the 44,000 federal civil servants in Quebec are grouped in the French units. Does that prove that the French language is respected in the civil service?

Instead of truly encouraging bilingualism according to the original intention of the government, the departments take unfair advantage of the translation services. That enables them to restrict the use of French. Why encourage the hiring of Francophones? They simply insist on translation and so employ English unilingual high officials who have their texts translated to make people believe that all goes well in the best of worlds.

You have there, Mr. Chairman, the hypocritical attitude of the present government as regards bilingualism.

The Coulombe report even indicates that the bilingualism goals set by the Trudeau government for 1975 will not be attained, far from it. Bilingualism in Canada, as advocated by the present government, is all poppycock. And we have sufficient proof of that.

Are people aware that it costs $29,000 to train a bilingual public servant and that it cost $54 million to train the 1,851 public servants who completed the course? Those are the figures.

From 1966 to 1970, the $17 million spent for the training of bilingual public servants may be considered as a total loss since 6,463 of those who had registered dropped out. Out of the 18,627 English-speaking public servants who registered, only 946, namely 5 per cent, completed the course. It was a real success, was it not? On the other hand, out of 4,090 Francophones who had registered, 905 met the course requirements, namely 22 per cent. That is not much better!

Apart from such a poor result, the appointing of higher officers always favours unilingual English-speaking people. Yes! We find those gentlemen in the upper levels and preferably where they are not in touch with the public. Such are the arguments in the Coulombe report. That is another conclusion that proves that my colleague, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), is right, but we shall get back to the matter later on.

Out of the 142 higher officers appointed from outside the public service between 1966 and 1971, only 27 were French-speaking, namely 19 per cent, while the French-speaking people account for 30 per cent of Canada's total population. As regard the higher officers appointed from within the public service, that is by way of promotion, only 16 per cent were French-speaking, namely 42 out of 269. The worst part of it is that instead of improving conditions are deteriorating.

In 1967-68, the employment percentage as regards French-speaking people was 26 per cent; in 1970-71, it fell to 13 per cent, namely a 50 per cent decrease. The leader of the official opposition and his predecessor would say that our system is good.

I said earlier that to silence the French-speaking people, French language units had been created but even in this case the established standards were not respected and that instead of favouring the unilingual French positions, as stipulated in the Official Languages Act, more and more bilingual positions are created within those units. Thus, it is possible to get around the standards and always at the expense of French-speaking people.

The study made by Dr. Coulombe for the Treasury Board is precise, detailed and unequivocal. The only conclusion we can draw from it is that the bilingual policy is a total failure in Canada. However not being satisfied with its failure, the government through the Prime Minister wants to confirm this state of affairs by presenting a motion concerning the unfortunate facts known to date. This motion even says that if a bilingual position is occupied by a unilingual individual, this individual can attend bilingual courses or request his transfer out however if he so desires, he may retain his position as after 10 years in the Public Service he is considered, as actually bilingual although he is not. What about that?

I am sure the Progressive Conservative members must be laughing in their sleeves at the reading of such a motion. But let us consider now the recommendations of this report. First, let me state the substance of this report. Here is what Dr. Coulombe says:

> We are deeply convinced that true bilingualism in the Public Service implies that French should occupy a major position as an actual working language.

This is another tribute to the hon. member for Champlain who declared the willingness of the French-speaking people to participate truly in the Federal administration. Whether one speaks French with ease or not matters very little. What is important is to allow unilingual French Canadians to have access to the same rights of decisions and the same levels of administration as the Anglophones.

First the report of the Treasury Board clearly recommends that the French units be reoriented and reorganized. This sounds very much like the parallel administrations advocated by our group, the Social Credit Party.

It recommends as well that the number and the importance of these units be increased, particularly in the national capital and in more departments.

Does the government choose such alternatives? Not at all, Mr. Speaker. They put this report on the shelf and they continue to increase their failure. The report finally recommends exactly what the Social Credit Party has been requiring for a long time, namely French-speaking departments. It is essential that French-speaking public servants have the same career opportunities as their English-speaking colleagues and, to achieve this objective, only parallel administrations of French-speaking departments will give hope to French-speaking people.

Mr. Speaker, we are no longer speaking of bilingualism among people, but of bilingualism within the administration. Does that not mean respect for language rights in Canada? Every citizen has the right to communicate with its government in any of the two official languages. Instead of paying $29,000 to teach a second language to a person who will retire within a few years, we want to establish a permanent bilingual system, while respecting the individual's ability, his skills of administrator, engineer, technician, expert in any field, without hampering it for language reasons. Being a good engineer has little to do with language, but rather with the knowledge of engineering. Therefore, I may be a very good French-speaking statistical expert with no knowledge of the English language and because I do not speak English, I am not entitled to the opportunities that the public service offers. I will not be allowed to get the necessary promotion to successfully end my career. This is a strange and backward attitude.

My ability depends on my skills, my knowledge of statistics and not on my language. At the same time, an English-speaking person with the same skills as I, a statistician with similar qualifications, and this is the situation which now prevails, would be entitled to reach the higher levels of management, not because he is a better statistical expert, but only because he can speak English.

Indeed such is the conclusion of the Coulombe report; it is also the finding of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

All studies, all statistics prove unequivocally that until now the government deprives itself of a certain expertise because Mr. or Mrs. So-and-So is not bilingual or unilingual and English-speaking.

Therefore, I repeat that bilingualism is not designed for individuals, but rather for the system, the administration. It is evident that a bilingual individual increases the cultural value of a country, but still it is not the responsibility of the government to force or compel the individual to speak two languages. However, the government must be able to answer individuals, to communicate with them in both official languages, French or English.

Consequently, the suggestion of the Social Credit Party of Canada to create parallel administrations is the only one capable of ensuring respect for the language rights of the public employees as well as of the population in general.

As it was so well expressed in the conclusion of the Coulombe report, French-speaking departments must be created to allow Francophones to take part in the administration in the same way as the Anglophones, to have access to the executive positions in the same manner as the Anglophones, without discrimination and, especially, with full respect for the rights of all citizens. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that such a system would ensure the permanence of bilingualism in the public service without, as things are now, swallowing up fabulous amounts in pure loss, because of the necessity of ever starting again and because of the drop out rate of public employees following bilingual courses.

Mr. Speaker, as the member for Témiscamingue, (Mr. Caouette), the leader of our party, said so well on other occasions, it is a fantasy to believe we can make a Frenchman out of an Englishman and vice versa. However, it is certainly possible to create institutions that will respect French- and English-speaking persons.

This is what the Social Credit is suggesting. This is a workable, realistic suggestion. Moreover it is beyond question today as we come to realize the enormous failure of the bilingual policy of the present government.

The evidence is overwhelmingly against the present system, facts speak for themselves, statistics corroborate and magnifying facts, and all this reflects the perspicacity of our party.

We represent French Canada and, in this capacity, we know that French-speaking people want to take part in the management of public affairs. Let us give them the opportunity to really show what they can do by adopting the only possible solution, that is the creation of parallel administrations in all the government activity areas.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, polite as usual, the members of the Social Credit Party stressed this afternoon that there were few members in the House to listen to them. Out of courtesy, I feel I must return the compliment and point out that there are not many of them here to debate a proposal that they themselves made and to support their claim to be the sole representatives of French-speaking Canadians. Their performance this evening seems to me very poor.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say very cordially to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette), who claims that his party represents French Canadians, that I am as much at ease as he in saying that I rise this evening, not to claim that I am the representative of French Canada, but that I am at least a member who believes as strongly as those who spoke before me in the vitality of French-speaking Canadians, and in his right to represent adequately in Ottawa the French-speaking element of the population.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it fitting to speak at length, as it might be merely a preview of our debate in the near future, when the government introduces its proposal on bilingualism, but I would like perhaps to clarify one point, as it seems that our journalist friends are trying to confuse people, probably not intentionaly. At 6:30 this evening I listened to the CBC news, in which an eminent journalist gave a bulletin which, to my mind, misrepresented what is happening today in the House. It must be recognized, and I think it important to point out, that we are not debating a motion on bilingualism. We are debating an opposition motion proposed by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), which, to my mind, involves basically the same issues that we will be discussing in connection with the government proposal. For this reason I have tried to find motives, reasons or explanations for this motion, but, although I have listened attentively, I have been aware that the arguments put forward were more relevant to the motion we will be proposing than to the one before us this evening.

To return to the CBC news, it was claimed that we were debating a motion on which the French-speaking members were remaining silent.

I would like to take exception to that impression which was created by the CBC tonight and which is absolutely untrue, absolutely incomplete, not to say more. I think that as French-speaking Canadians we would be happy to participate in this debate, but we think it would be useless to repeat the arguments we will be putting forward when the motion on bilingualism is considered next week. I would merely like to say a few words on a field which concerns me particularly since I happen to be Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State and bilingualism policies usually come under the jurisdiction of the department where I am fortunate enough to work with an exceptional minister. Mr. Speaker, I think that the impression which was created tonight by saying that bilingualism has not progressed is made up of absolutely unfounded assertions and statements which mislead people who wish to know all the facts. It is clear that bilingualism has not progressed with the pace anticipated. There is no doubt that the progress that we would have liked to see go a lot further have not reached the pace we would have hoped for but, Mr. Speaker, saying that all that has been done in the field of bilingualism is an absolute failure is a statement I am not prepared to accept and which, in addition, is not a true reflection of the situation.

Mr. Speaker, I think I can speak on behalf of the Department of the Secretary of State, a department which was set up by a minister whose reputation has been long established and who played an essential part, I think, in our desire to set up structures where French-speaking Canadians would not replace their English-speaking colleagues but would join with them to form a family truly representative of the two main founding elements of the Canadian nation.

Mr. Speaker, I will simply give you some figures leaving it to you and to the other members to draw the conclusion.

When we consider that in the Department of the Secretary of State, 16 per cent of the civil servants use French as their main language, that 14 per cent of them use English as their main language, but that 70 per cent of those who work for the Secretary of State are bilingual can we seriously maintain that that is not a substantial progress, an interesting achievement? That is enough to make me forget what little Latin I may have.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time to tell the Canadian people that bilingualism has two aspects. We should not attach importance to one aspect only. The first is to teach the greatest possible number of people the use of both languages so that they can express themselves as much as possible and communicate so that a certain group of people can come to the national capital and work in their language within the federal agencies and answer people in the language of their choice, taking it for granted that there are of course two official languages. However, there is also another aspect, the aspect of the representation of French-speaking people and there I agree with my friends of the Social Credit when they insist on the importance of the representation of French-speaking people in Ottawa which must not be left aside and on the fact that we should not maintain the illusion that all problems will be solved in Ottawa once we have reached a sufficient degree of bilingualism.

But from the example of the Department of the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker, I think that it is possible to make a continuing effort and to collaborate at all levels to achieve the basic objectives of a nation where the two main groups can really play their parts not only in the field of the language but also through an effective, concrete and representative presence.

I listened this afternoon to the hon. member from Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) who with all the skill he is capable of tried to keep hon. members from taking a political stand on the policy of bilingualism. This is extremely clever, but I do not agree with his views.

I believe that if the political parties do not have the courage to take their responsibilities and as such to indicate clearly their views on the bilingualism policy, they do not deserve to govern the nation. And if individually, it is normal that hon. members give their views, it is also normal that parties, as entities representing an important component of the nation, give their opinion officially and definitely on the opportunity for changes that must be brought about, and on the necessity to adopt a bilingualism policy. And that policy must not be merely window-dressing which gives only the impression that, as French-speaking people we are tolerated, but it must insure that we are going to play our part and that we are considered as equal partners.

I hope that each party will make it a point, through its members, to express its views officially and will not leave it to the French-speaking people to impose or to express their views on bilingualism. I will stay here to listen carefully to my colleagues to learn their views and get their advice, to hear them say if the member for Lapointe who is French-speaking is really accepted in Ottawa not merely in great words and statements but if in fact something will be done to bring about the necessary changes so that the Canada that we want to preserve can rest on firm foundations through the acceptation of the two main communities.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to end my comments by saying that I am confident in the light of the experience I have gained since 1968 and the progress often too slow which I have witnessed that we are mature enough to understand that the step we are going to take, we must take it together like men who realize that Canada's fate lies in our own hands. And it behooves us to be in the forefront, to prove by our policies and understanding between one another and toward the people that we are ready to make sacrifices on both sides, that we are willing to make decisions which will enable Canada to keep on playing the major role it has been playing throughout the world.

I feel that the meaning and the scope of the motion before us have not been explained to us by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte). I believe nevertheless that he is wrong when he says that the official language policy has been postponed.

It is certain, however, that at a given time the quick rate of growth of some policies should be geared to reality and what should be sought is not to impose bilingualism through legislation, but rather to have members of the House and the people of Canada accept it. I feel that if each member plays his part and explains to the people what bilingualism is, what Canadians, whether French- or English-speaking want is really the same thing: the best Canada ever, where all citizens, of both founding people, can live in happy harmony, that goal will be really achievable.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) who discussed the duties of a Member of Parliament. He said it is the duty of parliament, of parliamentarians and of governments to lead and to explain so there can be understanding in our country as to what is meant by the Official Languages Act. Among the terms he used were "institutional bilingualism" and "personal bilingualism." I listened to him and agree with him. I say, with all respect to the hon. member, to the party he supports and to the government he supports that the failing with respect to bilingualism as a concept in Canada is not in the policy. The failing is that the government, which was charged with the basic responsibility of explaining that policy clearly and unequivocally to the people of Canada, did not do so in terms which they could understand. That is the great failing.

If ever there was a responsibility to be laid on a government and the head of a government, it was the great responsibility of the Trudeau government in this delicate and important matter to give an explanation to all Canadians so that my friend in the Créditiste party would not be debating with the hon. member for Lapointe and they would not be debating this matter with us. This government failed Canadians with respect to the understanding of that statute. That failing is their responsibility. Whatever has happened with regard to the misunderstanding since that time has grown out of that failure.

I represent a constituency from which many people come to work in the offices of the government every day. During the election campaign in my constituency I was faced with the failures of this government with regard to the implementation of bilingualism. I emphasize the word "implementation". During the election campaign I went from door to door and spoke to many thousands of public servants. Not one public servant said to me that he opposed the principles set forth in the Official Languages Act. That is to their everlasting credit.

We must remember the purpose of the Official Languages Act. It is to give equal status to two languages. The duty of all members of this House is to ensure that in the process of implementation there is equality and recognition of equity to all public servants. If we can solve the problems of public servants who are working during this period of transition, a period when we are trying to remake 105 years of history within a short period, we will have gone a long way toward fostering and promoting the spirit of the principles set forth in the Official Languages Act.

We are faced with the challenge of trying to rebuild and extend the spirit of 1967, the spirit of excitement and hope that characterized our centennial year. I say with some sadness that this government has succeeded in widening the divisions among Canadians to the point where it is difficult to see where any government, even one dedicated to disunity, could have done worse.

I wish to state what this policy of bilingualism means to me as a Canadian. Within the limits of practicability, Canadians should have the right to federal government service in English or French. The public service should be attractive to English and French Canadians alike. Government officials should be encouraged to learn both languages in such a way that they never feel coerced. This should be so especially where it means that a public servant will be able to do his job better because of his knowledge. It does not mean that public servants, whether French- or English-speaking, should be penalized because they speak only one of our two official languages. The true spirit of bilingualism in Canada ought to be, and I am sure it will be, one of attitude and commitment to a certain perception of our society.

As a member of this House I would not like to see real bilingualism destroyed by a government that has become so preoccupied with mechanics and numbers that it forgets that in government buildings there are people who are very much concerned because they live in what I referred to on an earlier occasion as the eye of a bilingual hurricane. When we look at the problems of Canada, we look to the eye of that hurricane, the public service of Canada. We must not forget this very important principle.

In our search for equality, the feeling of equality and the commitment to equality we must not forget that entering into the public service and advancement within it must be based on equality of opportunity for all Canadians. The public service must be a place where Canadians can work together. In the time that I am here, I hope I will be able to ensure that the public service is a place where justice is not only done to every public servant but where justice is seen to be done as well.

I say to all members of this House that bilingual institutions have their own significance that sometimes goes unnoticed. Their presence is precisely a guarantee that the individual Canadian has a right to deal in his own language, with his own government. Bilingualism involves the right to be unilingual. That is my understanding. That right applies to both French- and English-speaking Canadians. The great misunderstanding that has arisen is that bilingualism in Canada has become equated with a form of coercion. That is what it means in some quarters. I am committed to the assurance that this will not occur and that this feeling will not continue.

Reference has been made to the bilingual resolutions which we will have an opportunity to debate in a few days. Those resolutions contain nine points. There ought to be a tenth point, namely, that "the proof of the pudding is in the eating." We can put all the fine sentiments on paper in both official languages, write books and paragraphs, make speeches in this House and elsewhere, do all the things expected of Canadians, make calls for unity, concern, understanding and compassion but they will not mean anything if those on the treasury benches, whether from the party that presently occupies that place, or this party that soon will, do not do their part to ensure that the real spirit of those fine words are honoured.

One of the major problems of the bilingual policy in the public service results from the government's failure to administer and administrate realistically. The cabinet has authorized more and more money for training in the public service, much more than $30 million. But the effectiveness of the program has been undermined. The government has failed to understand or accept the fact that the language training program requires adjustments within the public service by the public servant. It has taken the government far too long to grasp the implications of the significantly low success rate and the high drop-out rate in language training. The government has mistakenly added language training to the workload of public servants without providing extra personnel. This has had a very serious effect at various levels in the public service which have spoken about it through their associations.

A survey of drop-outs established that at least two-thirds of the drop-outs had been forced to discontinue their training because it conflicted with their regular workload. It is true that many have complained about the unrealistic administrative policy of the government with respect to bilingualism. However, this must not be misconstrued—and I do not think the people I have talked to ought to be misconstrued—as being in opposition to the principles set forth in the statute.

We are pleased that the government has seen fit to establish, under the auspices of the Treasury Board, an extensive program to hire replacements for public servants assigned to intensive language training courses. The practice of pulling civil servants away from language training to take care of departmental duties has been costly and has weakened the program. Too many language students have failed to achieve any measure of competence, regardless of personal effort on their part, thus affecting their opportunities.

Leaving language training to attend to departmental matters, and then returning only to find one has fallen far behind, has discouraged too many eager people who want to learn a second language, whatever that language may be. The double-banking system which has been proposed to ensure that a position is covered when a civil servant is on language training may be an answer to this problem. It may well do away with the frustration and fatigue caused by the dual responsibilities of departmental duties on the one hand and language training on the other.

There is the question of advancement. I believe these language courses which some public servants can take and which others, at the moment, cannot take ought to be broadened so that all public servants, or at least those who want to attend language courses, have access to them. I believe there is still a lack of opportunity that many public servants find to be a great threat.

For example, there are approximately 55,000 women in the public service of Canada. About 15,000 of them are in the secretarial-stenographic group. Many of them are classified as ST-5s and if they are not bilingual they will probably remain ST-5s for the rest of their career. On the other hand, if they were capable of taking dictation in both official languages, they could move up to the ST-8 category. At this point they are not being permitted to take language training. Given this kind of irritation, it is no wonder that people are emotional about bilingualism in the public service, and the responsibility that rests upon the government, and indeed on this parliament, is a heavy one indeed. It is this government's failure, whether it likes to accept the responsibility or not.

The proof of the pudding with respect to the real spirit will be in the eating of that pudding. We have a long way to go in this country to restore, within the public service and elsewhere, the true meaning and the true understanding of what was meant when the statute was passed. I hope that with good will and understanding on all sides, by people in all parts of Canada, we will reach that objective. The responsibility for seeing that this is the case begins in this House of Commons with the government, which must ensure that that which has become the focal point of present difficulties, namely, the people who work within the public service of Canada, are given the proper atmosphere within which their talents can be utilized for the benefit of this country. In the name of those people, many of whom I have the honour to represent, I ask in the House tonight for that understanding.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is my feeling that the motion we are dealing with tonight as presented by the Créditiste party is an irrelevant one. The motion urges the government "to find realistic and specific ways of safeguarding the rights of French and English-speaking Canadians in a much more just and reasonable manner". In fact, the government motion under item 34 on the order paper is designed to fulfill the aims of the Social Credit motion as it relates to injustice to French- and English-speaking Canadians.

On October 30 of last year the Liberal government discovered, that among other things, a large number of Canadians were indeed disturbed by the attempts of the Liberals to create an instant bilingual society in this country. Indeed, the great secrecy with which the Official Languages Act was being implemented, combined with injustices done in the name of bilingualism, created feelings of unease and resentment among many English-speaking civil servants, and this could not help but manifest itself in similar feelings on the part of English-speaking Canadian citizens throughout this country. This resentment stemmed not from any disagreement with the concept of Canada as a bilingual country but, rather, from the suspicion that the government was acting in an autocratic and prejudicial manner. For my own part, I think perhaps this had some basis in fact.

I agree with the Official Languages Act and that Canadians of the two major cultures should feel at home in their communications with their government. But the Official Languages Act is in no way a bilingual policy for Canada and the Canadian people. In many aspects of the civil service, ease of communication may exist in the predominant use of one language because certain occupations may not immediately require facility in both the official languages.

One of the major faults in the government's Official Languages Act is that the relevant policies were never adequately explained to the Canadian people. Somehow or other the people of Canada, perhaps by a method of osmosis, were supposed to presume what was the aim and the thrust of the government. Contrary to the members of the Liberal Party, who see this act as the great panacea for all Canadian bilingual aches and pains, I view it as relating to only one aspect of Canadian bilingualism.

What is the government trying to do to develop and to nurture a truly bilingual society, keeping in mind respect for the other cultures that exist in Canada? May I for a moment talk about the creation of a bilingual country, a country that has respect for the two major cultures within its boundaries. While the federal government disburses large amounts of money to provincial departments of education for second language instruction, there is no stipulation, or no essential machinery set up to ensure that these funds are in fact used for these purposes. Consequently, in many provinces these funds are finding their way into school construction programs, salaries for other than second language staff, and so on. They are not being used for the purpose for which the federal government designed them. To create a bilingual Canada, surely we must start with young children. We have to start in the elementary schools and with pre-school education programs. Why is second language instruction not started by educational television before a child gets to school, and continued right through the early years?

The federal government ought to allocate funds for the proper training of teachers of the second language. Cultural exchange should be encouraged and expanded, especially exchanges between groups of young students. The federal government, in its disbursements to provincial governments for second language instruction, should attach strings, and such funds should be allocated for pre-school education as well as for in-school education.

Perspective must be used in viewing the proper role of the Canadian federal government in the attempt to create and maintain a bilingual society in our country. Bilingualism in Canada will not stand or fall on its implementation solely at the public service level. To simply create fluency in both languages would be to fall short of the ideal of bilingualism and biculturalism. Knowledge and understanding of sister cultures, with resulting new attitudes, will create respect for those cultures and cannot fail to lead to a united Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, perhaps from the early days of Confederation, French Canadians, particularly those of the province of Quebec, have had snow jobs performed on them and have been fooled by the so-called great bilingualism policies of the federal government. Experience has taught them, in the province of Quebec particularly, through successive elections at four-year intervals, to interpret election language and to reach the conclusion, after repeated disappointments, that bilingualism was actually a convenient parade sword to brandish exclusively during election campaigns, to be hastily returned to its sheath once victory had been achieved.

We listened a moment ago to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) who, by the way, is certainly not a worthy successor of his predecessor, Mr. Gilles Grégoire, who, when speaking of bilingualism, put forward striking arguments, quoted figures and spoke plainly.

When the hon. member for Lapointe referred to silent members, I had the feeling that he was speaking of members of his party, because as far as bilingualism is concerned, I have not often seen Liberal members get excited, except during election campaigns.

As regards Progressive Conservative members, it is quite unfortunate to realize it, but including their leader, they also consider bilingualism as a political asset in order to save face and try to save the last two ridings they still have in the province of Quebec.

I heard the hon. member for Lapointe say earlier that he was going to forget what little Latin he may have learned. I wonder why he refers to a third language, when we have such a hard time having a second one recognized.

Mr. Speaker, the House will have to take into account several factors in the implementation of this policy as well as in the development, if I may say so, of programs designed for the whole country. Hon. members from all across Canada have a tremendous responsibility to assume in this field. Perhaps they are less aware in western Canada, in the Maritimes or in Newfoundland of the social crisis existing in Quebec.

We must not hide the truth. In Quebec, at present, people think in increasing numbers, and it is much more serious. Often in the past people woke up too late. Hon. members should not do the same. Something is happening in Quebec and we must be blind not to see it, or still, we would have to hide our head in the sand. What happens then is that we get a big kick in the pants. I have a notion that many here are about to get one.

The Social Credit stand on bilingualism is a realistic one, and it will enable all Canadians from coast to coast to be heard and respected when dealing with the government. Of course, attitudes will be hard to change. In the exclusively English regions without any contact with French Canadians, problems of understanding and integration will persist, of course. In other words, many will find it hard to accept the French fact in Canada.

The Social Credit is recommending the establishment of parallel departments, so that when a French Canadian deals with a department, he will be sure to speak to a French Canadian. He will be sure to obtain an answer in French when phoning a department. He will be sure if he writes, to get an answer in French. He will not have to wait for three months to obtain a reply and the services of three translators will not be necessary. The French Canadians have been and still are considered as the poor relatives in the Public Service. This at least is shown not only in the findings of the Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Keith Spicer, before the House Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates on Tuesday April 10, 1973 but also in answers provided by the various departments, Crown corporations and other government organizations to the questions asked on January 17 last and which remained on the order paper until we obtained the answers yesterday.

Les us look at those answers signed by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid). The questions asked were as follows:

Has the department, the agency or the board concerned adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

And the second question read as follows:

What number and total percentage of that agency's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

Then, to check if progress had been made in the field of bilingualism the following question was asked:

In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same agency who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

Finally, to complete this information and to see what efforts the government was making to encourage bilingualism a last question was asked as follows:

By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that agency?

I will not talk about the stereotyped answer that we received on the first question: it was invariably that departments' policies on bilingualism are based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policies and directives prescribed by the government.

That answer, Mr. Speaker, does not teach us anything new. It simply confirms that if bilingualism does not progress or indeed progresses so little in the departments or government agencies it is on account of the policies and directives established by the government or as a result of the deficiencies of those policies and directives.

Mr. Speaker, I turn now to the answer given to the second series of questions: What number and percentage of employees of such and such a department or organization are French-speaking only, English-speaking only or bilingual? Some of the replies were suprising, as for example the following from the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The Department claims that its files do not contain this information, in other words that there is no way of knowing how many of its employees were French-speaking only, English-speaking only or bilingual in 1968, 1969 and 1970; but the department adds that it received $11,000 in 1970, $174,000 in 1971 and $671,000 in 1972-73 for the development of bilingualism. It is amazing to learn that $976,000 has been spent to promote bilingualism, but that nobody knows how many unilingual or bilingual employees there are in this department.

The replies from the Department of National Health and Welfare are vague, imprecise. For example, this department and the Treasury Board Secretariat claim quite seriously that all non-bilingual employees are considered as unilingual, and that there is no way of telling how many are French-speaking only or English-speaking only. Finally, however, we learned that in 1973, for example, there were 6,559 unilingual employees, which is 91.2 per cent, and 565 bilingual employees, which is 7.9 per cent. This is typical of our findings in all government departments.

Mr. Speaker, the replies given by the various government departments and agencies on bilingualism indicate that contrary to what some people suggest, "French Power" is not a fact yet in Ottawa. Unilingual French-speaking people are a very small minority. In some departments and agencies there is not even one employee whose working language is French. French-speaking people must speak English to get a job in the Public Service, which is not the case for the majority of English-speaking public servants.

In conclusion, I would like to quote the remarks made by the Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Spicer, before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates on April 10 last. Mr. Spicer said, and I quote:

I would not wish to take more of your time with this introductory statement. But I believe I should recall what I have said many times, most recently in our second annual report: from our observation post, we definitely do not have the impression that the cause of bilingualism is advancing with giant steps. We sometimes hear that the French language and French Canadians are in the process of taking over the Public Service. However, the figures do not support these fears. On the contrary, the French language is still not getting a fair shake in the Public Service.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Spicer said "still not getting a fair shake". He goes on to say:

Last year, I quoted rather discouraging figures on jobs filled in the public service in 1971, showing that it was then roughly ten times easier for a person speaking English than for a person speaking French to enter his country's service. The following new figures, even while reflecting a slight modification, will show you what I mean.

Here are the total number of appointments in the federal Public Service in 1971 and 1972 by language requirements.

Bilingual	9.1%	7.6%
French	8.3%	11.0%
English	79.2%	75.6%
Not Specified	3.4%	5.8%

—that is, for which no specific language requirement was shown in the report.

Of course there exist cases where an English-speaking public servant feels that he or she is in difficulty because of the implementation of bilingualism programs. When such cases are brought to my attention they receive precisely the same careful and impartial treatment as any other case. Some Members of Parliament have indeed had occasion to send to us, with satisfactory results, constituents with problems of this kind.

The great majority of our English-speaking fellow citizens still display, it seems to me, an instinctive goodwill and open-mindedness. The phenomenon called English "backlash" exists; but I believe it has often been over-blown. There is another, and I think more dangerous, reaction we should never forget: French skepticism. To prevent our French-speaking countrymen's skepticism from sliding into outright cynicism, and to prevent them from seeing in bilingualism policies just another "trick" of the federal authorities to win them over, the pace of language reform must not be slowed down, but sanely and sensitively speeded up.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the alarming remarks made by a senior public servant who is paid to observe and report facts honestly. In fact, Mr. Spicer has shown a great deal of honesty in making such a statement, especially after an election where some members, particularly in western Canada, got themselves elected by riding on the back of French-speaking people, the so-called "French power".

These alarming remarks should incite all members to think and act in such a way as to show that indeed they have faith in this entity which is called Canada and to foster the economic as well as cultural growth throughout the country.

The federal government's policies on bilingualism must not be merely a safety valve enabling a minority or group acting among Canadians to express itself. It has to be something concrete and not, as I said earlier, only such a bluff as to make the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) forget his Latin.

Policies will have to be adopted to educate especially the Anglophones for, unfortunately, they are sadly lacking in that respect. They need to be educated to a new turn of mind, that French-Canadians might be accepted in the ten provinces of Canada, that they might take pride in being Canadians, that they might feel at home wherever they are. And when I speak of the right to bilingualism, I mean specially that of the French-Canadians, because it does not seem to bother the English-Canadians very much.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to take part in this debate because I consider the motion completely out of order in view of the fact that the government already has on the order paper a motion which is to be discussed next week. However, something was said today that gave me a strong injection of adrenalin. I find I must react to those comments, otherwise I will not be able to sleep tonight.

An hon. Member: Reactionary?

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): No, revolutionary. In the speech made in the House a short while ago by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) we heard what I would call some very strong accusations. Knowing him as I do, and knowing his integrity, I hope he has not made these accusations seriously. I hope the hon. member is not trying to mislead us or the country into thinking that what he said is the Bible truth.

He said something to the effect that selling the concept of bilingualism to the people of Canada was the responsibility of the Liberal party. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I consider myself to be above that kind of partisanship. I think it was well said today in the House by both the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) that everybody in the House has a duty to sell this policy to the country, not just the members of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): If we are talking about selling the policy, let us sell it with fair play—and fair play means that it must be sold honestly. What was used were innuendoes, accusations and insinuations. Examples were given of minute details which are irrelevant to the over-all discussion, which should be on policy statements, objectives, aims and goals. I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton knows very well what I mean by aims and goals. The aims and goals are to treat everyone equally and to tell the truth. I do not think this has been done here today.

I am sorry to point out, Sir, that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is the only English-speaking member of the House who has spoken today, except for the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi who is a member from Quebec and who knows what it means to treat minorities with equality and justice. He knows this because he lives in Quebec and has done that. However, I am in a minority group in Ontario, where I have lived for 100 years with injustice.

Mr. Epp: You don't look that old.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): I am 43. I might not look as if I were 100 years old, but I feel like it sometimes.

An hon. Member: Why don't you see your chiropractor?

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): If you want the floor, I will give it to you; otherwise, let me have it for a few minutes.

An hon. Member: You don't deserve it.

An hon. Member: We are all listening.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said that public servants should not be penalized. He said something to the effect that there should be an attitude of commitment to a certain perception of our society, or similar words. When one reads the report for 1971-72, of the Commissioner of Official Languages, when one reviews the press reports of speeches made in Ottawa during the last election and understands the sentiment that was behind the insinuations that public servants in Ottawa were being mistreated and dealt with unfairly, all one has to do is to look at the statistics to see that that is not true. Nobody was treated unfairly, if to treat unfairly is to give French-speaking citizens some kind of right of access to the public service commission. I think what the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said is totally wrong.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest that before the hon. member makes accusations about what I meant, he should read the blues of my speech. I have just read them.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Baker: Then I rise on a question of privilege. I respect my friend; we know one another very well. However, before he comes to the conclusions that he seems to have reached he should read very carefully, if he has an opportunity, the blues of the speech which I made tonight, or read Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): I will read the blues, Mr. Speaker, but I took down some of the hon. member's statements word for word, and also I heard him. I will see tomorrow if it reads the same way as it sounded.

An hon. Member: Put your old campaign speech away.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): I did not have to use it in my campaign in Ottawa East; this was not an issue. But someone else made it an issue in Ottawa.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I must say I was very impressed today with the remarks of the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) and I should like to mention two minor points after which I shall resume my seat because I am saving my main speech for next week.

The rights of individuals in Canada, institutional bilingualism, individual bilingualism, that whole question, as the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) said, must be studied in a spirit of good will and good faith. But I do not agree with the hon. member when he says it must be treated in an apolitical way.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we can discuss that important Canadian matter apolitically.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) said:

[English]

"This issue of language is not one for political gain". That is what one hon. member opposite said this afternoon. It is not so funny now.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) said that.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): I will repeat the statement: "This issue of language is not one for political gain".

An hon. Member: That's for sure.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): I invite all hon. members opposite to make positive statements on how we can improve this situation, not how you can beat it or destroy it.

An hon. Member: Let us hear you.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): You will hear me next week. Intolerance, innuendoes, accusations—you are experts at that. I will repeat it for you so you might listen and understand.

● (2130)

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): We have been attacked. Minority, French-speaking groups across Canada have been attacked for a number of years. But recently, in Ontario at least, there has been a breakthrough. Since 1968 there has been understanding and comprehension. At least now we have a system of government appreciation of what 500,000 Franco-Ontarians want and expect, and that is equality, justice and what the hon. member opposite was mentioning a few minutes ago. Justice has no partisanship; justice is not a thing of party.

Mr. Yewchuk: You have been getting justice from a Conservative government.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): You are pretty good at this, but I will handle you the next time you speak.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I would ask hon. members to comply with the standing orders and address the Chair. I do not think that we have much to gain through those interventions and those exchanges, but if we stick to the standing orders, it will help the proceedings.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to go on, because the speech which I will deliver next week will be much more important, but I wanted to make the point.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East).]

The Creditistes who applauded did not understand. They want Canada to become like Belgium, but they will not get it. This is all I wanted to say.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that when discussing such a serious matter, so important for good understanding among Canadians, one can hear stupidities like these which were heard a moment ago.

Mr. Speaker, it is also unfortunate to see that the present government, and those that preceded it, indulge, over the years, in endless talk of bilingualism. Now, we see the government backing away from the solution at the very time when all Canadians thought they could at last put their finger on the real solution to the serious problem of bilingualism in Canada. Unfortunately, we are disappointed, as all Canadians will be when they see that the government, in meaningless texts, do not produce the solution which we had been allowed to expect. The government is backing away from the problem. It is afraid of it. After having created a commission of inquiry for the purpose of defining a problem which was already known to us, it was not necessary to spend $10 million of public funds to learn what the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Bilingualism and Biculturalism taught us.

The commission, after extremely costly work, merely confirmed what most Canadians, and we in the House, already knew so well.

Mr. Speaker, on many occasions, the Creditistes have noted certain things, especially since 1962, and I, for one, when I first came to this House, found to my great surprise in a country which I thought was bilingual before 1962, that even in the House of Commons it was difficult to assert the rights of the French language. It was still more difficult than today, I admit it, at least as far as the House of Commons is concerned to command respect in our language, so that sometimes in the House, we were compelled to break the rules of that Canadian institution which should set the example in Canada. We found much to our surprise that our guide of parliamentary procedure was still only written in English.

After that, some Quebec politicians made fun of us. Others made silly remarks about our fight for the French fact in the House of Commons. Mr. Speaker, other members, for example, even Liberals, have congratulated us, on numerous occasions on our stand concerning bilingualism in Canada, not because we were narrow-minded, but because at the outset, we were surprised at the facts that existed in 1962.

Mr. Speaker, I could give many other examples of what happened in the House of Commons and outside. On many occasions, we have unfortunately found that the ministers statements are too often handed to us only in English, and I don't want to blame the ministers directly, because they receive statements prepared by departmental officers. A minister comes in the House and goes through the statement he has to make in a few minutes. At the same time, we also go through it. That is the main reason why we too often receive in English only statements that should be in both languages, in order to respect the bicultural character of the House of Commons and of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, there is also a situation that many hon. members find shocking. Even if some of us are familiar with the English language when, for instance, we phone certain departments, I would say that 95 per cent of the time, we are told—

[English]

"I am sorry, Sir. I am going to get you someone who can speak French."

[Translation]

And, Mr. Speaker, I have heard a lot of "Sorry, Sir" since 1962. We are in 1973 and these departmental officers give me over the phone the stock reply:

[English]

"I am sorry, Sir. I have been unable to find someone who can speak to you in French".

● (2140)

And they have so much trouble finding someone able to answer in French that I am unfortunately obliged to wait often for five, six, seven or eight minutes before I can find someone in the department, when he is not gone on his coffee break, to give me an answer in my own language. And very often we do not have enough time to wait indefinitely for those honourable gentlemen of the public service and I might be accused of being impolite, but I often had to hang up in desperation.

Another subject supports very well the grievances that have been stated in this House since 1962. Let us say a word now about all the methods used in the different Departments. We had confirmation in this House, two years ago, that all bills were first drafted in English, as well as all administrative forms and that they were translated afterwards in French.

I do not have enough time to give proof of that tonight. But one has only to open the first three files on the desk of any member, which the member uses whenever problems crop up as to some electors, to find out that the forms were translated. As a matter of fact, they leave a definite after taste which shows that the original was drafted in English. I will give you an example—

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The same thing happens in English.

Mr. Rondeau: The honorable Minister of Transport says that the same thing happens in English, which I readily admit. But if it is the same in English, it is an awful mess in French. This is the best example of what I am suggesting. When during the last election campaign, following heavy rainfalls in the province of Quebec, the farmers had to fill out a form in order to receive that famous $400 compensation for the loss of their crops, the most important question in this form, where the farmer was asked whether his 1972 income was lower than in 1971, was disgracefully worded. The best proof is that I have received over 700 complaints from farmers entitled to that $400 amount but who have answered the question as they understood it at first sight and which seemed to mean exactly the contrary of what was requested from them.

Mr. Speaker, I could elaborate much longer on the way those forms are written and on the stupidity of the civil service which only gives the appearance of being bilingual because it is a "function of translation." There are no bilingual people in the Public Service. And in today's La Presse were quoted figures the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) obtained yesterday in this House.

English unilingualism is faring well . . .

. . . 88.9 per cent in the Department of Environment, 65 percent in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; 84 percent in the Department of Agriculture, 37.1 percent in Information Canada; 27 percent in the Public Service; 61.2 percent in the Treasury Board, 72.8 percent of the Secretariat of the Treasury Board; 61.4 percent in the Department of Urban Affairs; 48.1 in the Tax Review Board; 81.5 percent in the National Energy Board; 46 percent in the Canadian Radio and Television Council; 72.3 percent in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; 28 percent in the Company of Young Canadians; 57.5 percent in the Tariff Board, 49.4 percent in the Canadian International Development Agency; 65.3 percent in Statistics Canada.

Those figures demonstrate exactly the opposite of what the Progressive Conservative party tried to have the people of Canada believe during the last election campaign when it was claimed, for instance, that a "French Power" had been set up in Ottawa and that the federal government was under its control. Now, Mr. Speaker, when we read articles in La Presse entitled "L'unilinguisme anglophone se porte bien", (English unilingualism is faring well), which give statistics supplied by the public service, which itself is involved, we cannot doubt those statistics on public service unilingualism.

Mr. Speaker, during the last election campaign, the Progressive Conservative party tried to sell the false slogan of a "French Power" in Ottawa, and I am not obliged to repeat what I have already said time and time again, that is, that the Progressive Conservative party is the most anti-French Canadian party we have ever known since confederation.

Mr. Speaker, had that party been so pro-French Canadian, had it been so much in favour of bilingualism in the public service, today they could do better than the Liberals who are now in office and they could at least have given us a heritage as far as bilingualism in Canada is concerned, a heritage that we do not have today and that we are all seeking.

Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that we must still talk, after 100 years, of the so-called bilingualism in Canada, which should no longer be a problem, particularly in the public service and must ensure that bilingualism in Canada is fully respected and that everyone, as the hon. members for Champlain and Drummond (Messrs. Matte and Boisvert) said, be he a French Canadian or an English Canadian, can communicate with federal departments and agencies in his own language. Mr. Speaker, as far as the grievances we had to air in the House are concerned, we should not be called anti-English; we are pro-Canadian, we want the implementation of bilingualism in Canada and we want the Canadian people to be no longer laughed at by being fed wrong solutions or hopes that federal legislation will never make possible.

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, with but 12 minutes remaining before ten o'clock I felt obliged to rise and say a few words. I wondered why a party which I have always felt identified with national unity in the best possible sense, the Social Credit party, should have found it imperative and necessary to use this particular day to debate this very sensitive subject, when they knew full well that within a week or two they would have ample opportunity to discuss it more fully. At that time they could make a case that all parties could duly endorse, because this is really an all-party position on official languages, and they could do it in the most non-partisan manner, at the same time having full rein of the privileges of the House of Commons to make their case known across the country.

It is very perplexing to know why we have been subjected to this type of diatribe for most of the day. That is the best way to describe what has been the content of the speeches of the Social Credit party. I know of no one in that party who is more concerned about the case of bilingualism than I am, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) and others who grew up in the minority in the province of Quebec, who understand what fair play is, who have never had to suffer economically or in any other way because they come from a minority position in la belle province.

I came here in 1962, Mr. Speaker, and I have seen the progress made since then. For the Social Credit party to suddenly take a negative attitude—and they speak for a large number of the people of Quebec in many important ridings—to give the impression which permeated every speech they made today, that there has been absolutely no progress in the case of bilingualism and the exercise of the rights of French-speaking Canadians in this country, in Ottawa, in the national capital, in the House of Commons, in the government and in the opposition, is to misrepresent the progress that has been made. It may have been slow, but nevertheless it has been made in good faith because of the co-operation of all parties over the last ten years since I was elected to the House of Commons and since the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) was elected.

To pretend that no progress has been made is a deliberate misrepresentation of the facts, and the hon. member knows that. I am perplexed and do not understand precisely what is behind this deliberate attempt to jump the gun on what will be a very important debate in this House of Commons in the next week or two.

One thing was said tonight, and it could very well have been a slip of the tongue; I do not know. An hon. member from the Ottawa area said, quite properly, that if the Official Languages Act was supported by the government and only the government, then we on this side of the House are guilty of not having explained it properly to Canadians across this country. But I was under the impression that this act was adopted unanimously by all parties in the House, and therefore all parties are obligated to explain that piece of legislation.

The first person I would turn to as an example of one who accepted that responsibility is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who, although not one of the younger members of the House, has painstakingly day after day taken the trouble to learn the other official language of this country because he wanted to do so. His progress is there for all of us to measure. It is an example to hon. members on both sides of the House as to what can be done if we approach the language problem in the proper spirit. If he can do this, surely public servants can do it, if that is the price of progress and promotion in certain sensitive areas of the public service.

To skirt that fact is to play politics with an issue that could very well tear apart the very fabric of this country at a time when the average Canadian finally has accepted the reality that this is a bilingual and multicultural country and that every person has the right to be serviced, when dealing with the government, in either of the official languages. It is the responsibility of the public service to make sure that Canadian citizens are given that service in their own official language. This principle applies no matter whether we are talking about correspondence, oral communication or any other means of communication at our disposal.

We cannot run away from that fact after years of tortuous progress, after the courageous policy brought in and enunciated by the late Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson and adopted in this House after inspiring speeches by the then leader of the opposition, by the then leader of the NDP and by the leader of the Social Credit party, who has had the courage to stand up in the most nationalistic areas of Quebec and endorse bilingualism as a logical and realistic step for the future. If he had been here tonight and had listened to some of the silly speeches made by members of his party in his absence, I wonder what he would think. He would be ashamed of some statements which have been made to the effect that no progress has been made in ten years, because if that is so then all efforts throughout the past and in other cultural areas by people of various parties have been for nothing.

There is not enough time between now and ten o'clock to list the progress which has been made as a result of the efforts of the Social Credit party from 1962 onward. As I remember, it was the Social Credit party that raised the unfair position of French Canadians in our Crown corporations. People were saying that you could not find a single French Canadian capable of sitting on the boards of directors of our national railway.

That issue was raised by the Social Credit party. The chief spokesman was a Social Credit member, Gilles Gregoire. I have not forgotten that debate. Today, many Canadians whose mother tongue happens to be French head Crown corporations. One heads Air Canada, another the CBC, and others play prominent roles in other Crown corporations. I am thinking also of departments such as the UIC, Supply and Services and many other similar departments. They are headed by Canadians who happen to be French-speaking Canadians in the same way as I am a Canadian who happens to be English-speaking.

We have got over this problem. As I have said before, in another decade we will get over the concept of hyphenated Canadians because our youngsters are more enlightened than we are, thank goodness. They understand that bilingualism is a mark of culture, understanding and education and that you are richer if you can speak two or more languages. There is hardly anyone of my generation on both sides of the House who does not say, "I wish I were fluent in the other language."

Learning another language is like learning music. It is not easy. We have to be tolerant and understanding of the civil servant who cannot learn another language and finds his progress blocked. That is why hon. members must look at the resolution that was placed on the order paper in April. They will find that ample opportunity is now given for the unilingual civil servant who has been in the civil service for a number of years to apply for a bilingual position so long as he says, "I am prepared to learn the other language and I am prepared to accept the assistance of someone who is bilingual."

Certainly, if we cannot accept the nine points enunciated on the order paper, this country will not be together very long. This applies to everybody here. I think we all support the resolution. That is why I think the members of the Social Credit party are doing this issue a disservice by rising in their seats today and advancing the pretext that absolutely no progress has been made in the public service here in Ottawa. That is false. Everybody in that corner knows that I am just as much a Canadian, just as much a Quebecker, just as bilingual and just as dedicated to the concept of bilingualism as the hon. gentleman who just sat down, and I am political enough to recognize political expediency. It is wrong to say that no progress has been made under the Liberal government, because that is not the fact.

May I call it ten o'clock?

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to participate, even for a few minutes, in this debate so as to tell my colleagues, especially those who are presently on the government side, that today they have put this House to shame by sneaking away under the pretext that a so-called debate has been delayed for over a month. The Minister of Communications has himself stated that a resolution had been put on the order paper on April 13 by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Since then, we have been waiting. A former Minister of Labour has told us, one moment ago, that some progress has been registered. I shall just refer him, in view of the limited time that has been allotted to me, to yesterday's Hansard where he will find figures which put any honest Canadian to shame.

At Statistics Canada, for example, we find 2,453 English unilingual employees, that is 65 per cent of the staff and 318 French unilingual employees.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock p.m., it is my duty to point out that pursuant to section (11) of Standing Order 58 the proceedings on the motion have expired.

Mr. Fortin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I point out—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. After ten o'clock questions of privilege cannot be entertained.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If a question of privilege exists, it can be raised tomorrow immediately after we begin our sitting.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I raised the question of privilege before you began to read the questions to be discussed after 10 o'clock. Consequently, I feel that I was then entitled to raise the question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is probably not a question of privilege. The Chair may have been inexact, within a few seconds, as to whether it was ten o'clock. However, the Chair felt it was ten o'clock and called it ten o'clock.

Mr. Hellyer: It was after ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—ROCHDALE COLLEGE—REPORT ORDERED BY ONTARIO ATTORNEY GENERAL ON ACTIVITIES—ACTION BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, the record will show that over the past two and a half years I have urged the government repeatedly to tell this House why it has not been able to foreclose on the delinquent Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgage on Rochdale College, Toronto. Two years ago I spoke on this topic during the adjournment proceedings. At that time the mortgage on Rochdale was $340,000 in arrears; today it is more than $800,000 in arrears. This is scandalous. On that occasion I was answered by the then parliamentary secretary to the minister of labour. He said there were social as well as financial considerations involved in the Rochdale affair and that on the positive side the government would have to consider the role that Rochdale plays with respect to the youth of Toronto and the surrounding area. That was very interesting. While I am not pressing this case because of its moral implications alone, I would like to give the House some background on the actual role that Rochdale plays in the Toronto area.

First, the Toronto police, the Toronto council, the town council of Mississauga and the Peel county coroner have called for the closing of Rochdale. It has been labelled a festering abscess in the side of Toronto, and Peel county coroner Dr. Martin Dobkin said that it was probably the largest drug distribution centre in North America. Fugitives from justice seek and find refuge in Rochdale. When the police attempt to make an arrest with a legal warrant, they are set upon by the hooligans who make Rochdale their home.

Over the years that Rochdale has been in existence under the patronage of the federal government, many deaths have occurred in the college, most of them connected with the use of drugs. These deaths range from murder to suicide to accidental death. Most of them involve boys and girls in their teens. Young girls are lured to the college, influenced to take drugs and then kept there for the pleasure of the hoodlums, drug pushers and other social misfits. Some youths who have lived for a while in Rochdale have been described by doctors as human vegetables.

Only a few days ago yet another youth fell to his death from an upper floor window at Rochdale. Later, someone went into his room and threw a box of burning garbage out of the window. The box fell on a six-year old girl playing in the street. She is in the Toronto Hospital for Sick Children, in serious condition.

The school boards in the Toronto area have amassed evidence that the drugs which find their way into the schools can be traced to Rochdale; that is then the source. This year alone there have been more than 1,000 arrests of people in the Rochdale building or seen leaving the building. Some of these people are wanted criminals, but the vast majority are charged with drug offences. When this is multiplied by the five or six years the college has been in existence it can be seen that it is a situation that cannot be allowed to continue.

There is another scandalous aspect of this sordid story. That is the fact that the federal government is pouring thousands of dollars per year into Rochdale in Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiative Program grants. This allows the college to survive and to carry on its out-and-out war on society. The people of Canada are paying for this. It is a crime.

Rochdale and the city of Toronto are presently locked in battle over whether the so-called college should pay nearly $750,000 in back taxes. I say to the members of this House who represent Toronto ridings that their constituents are being blackmailed by the federal government. The federal government's refusal to foreclose and recover the property, and their policy of supporting the college with OFY and LIP grants, is helping the hooligans who run Rochdale to avoid meeting their responsibilities.

Earlier this year, Mr. J. A. Houston, Ontario regional director of CMHC, told the Mississauga town council that CMHC was powerless to foreclose the Rochdale mortgage. This is strange indeed in light of charges made this week by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who charged CMHC with being too hasty in foreclosing mortgages. He cited the example of a constituent who had been forced to sell his home to avoid foreclosure by CMHC because of arrears in mortgage payments amounting to $358. On the one hand CMHC cannot collect hundreds of thousands of dollars from a rats' nest like Rochdale, but it can quite easily force the sale of a private home to collect $358. It could be that the homeowner in question was unfortunate enough to be a responsible, law-abiding Canadian citizen.

If there is something in the National Housing Act that prevents CMHC from collecting arrears or foreclosing on institutions like Rochdale, then we had better have a close look at the National Housing Act while amending legislation is before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. I cannot recall any such provisions in the government's amendment, and if it is true that CMHC is powerless to take action on the Rochdale mortgage let us consider this deficiency in the law at an early opportunity. This is public money, and I cannot stand by any longer and watch it being used as though it belongs to CMHC or to the government. This government scorns parliament, but none the less it is responsible to parliament. We have a right to know all the answers in the Rochdale affair and in similar institutions such as Ottawa's Pestalozzi College.

Some time ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that scandals like the Watergate affair cannot happen in Canada. I do not believe it, Mr. Speaker. This Rochdale affair is beginning to smell more and more like a mini-Watergate and it is time the government told us what is going on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) has on several occasions expressed his profound concern, which I am sure is shared by all hon. members, about events which have taken place at Rochdale in Toronto. I want to make it perfectly clear that the federal government is prosecuting an action to gain control of Rochdale as fast as is legally possible. Indeed, the government began foreclosure action in August, 1971, and when CMHC was barred by the Supreme Court of Ontario from gaining possession of the building it was we, the federal government, who took the initiative of having an interim receiver appointed on behalf of all creditors.

I must say that anyone who suggests that the government is dragging its feet is displaying a disturbing ignorance of the facts of this matter. The interim receiver, appointed as a result of the federal initiative, has hired a large security force and has taken other extraordinary measures to police the building. We understand that the receiver will make an announcement relating to this matter tomorrow morning. In the meantime, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs wrote on April 13, over a month ago, to the metro Police Commission chairman and to the Attorney General of the province of Ontario setting out the federal position respecting Rochdale and offering full co-operation in the Attorney General's proposed investigation of that institution. With the consent of hon. members, I wish to table copies of the minister's letter at this time.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that it is the job of CMHC, the mortgagor in this instance, to provide accommodation for Canadians under the National Housing Act. This the corporation is doing to the best of its ability. It is the responsibility of the police to enforce the laws relating to drugs.

I want to reiterate that the federal government has done everything in its power to prosecute foreclosure. Our handicap is that we have had to live within the law. Surely, among ourselves as lawmakers we ought to understand what that is all about.

MANPOWER—INTERNATIONAL NICKEL COMPANY—PROJECTED PRODUCTION AND EMPLOYMENT LEVELS—PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO DEPARTMENT

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) the following question, as reported at page 3370 of Hansard for April 17, 1973:

> Has the minister obtained from International Nickel Company projected employment and production levels at this company over the next few years? If not, is it the minister's intention to ask INCO to provide his manpower consultative services with such information?

Subsequent to the question, the minister wrote me a letter in which he stated:

> Like all the other private corporations, INCO is not required to make public information regarding its internal operations so long as it satisfies the requirements of any applicable provincial labour legislation.

This is a weak-kneed response from a government whose experience with boom and bust mining operations ought to have taught them something. The kind of reply the minister sent me flies in the face of any modern strategy of economic development. To illustrate, the Sudbury area planning study, carried out by the ministry of treasury, economics and intergovernmental affairs, dated March 1973, clearly states on page 9:

> Actual growth will be determined by birth and death rates, migration patterns and particularly by economic factors affecting employment opportunities. In an economy dominated by two large employers, the plans of these two corporations are the largest factors determining employment opportunities.

It further states:

> If substantial industry other than mining is established in the region, further additional population growth could be expected but the available evidence does not suggest such an assumption.

Our communities have to plan our development. INCO dominates our work scene and represents a great deal of public investment vis-à-vis deferred taxes totalling $238 million, no tax paid in 1971, tax holidays on new mines, depletion allowances, fast write-offs on equipment, municipal tax assessments on buildings only, population abatement grants, training on-the-job grants, manpower retraining grants and preferred freight rates to ship out our ore, and it is insulting to my constituents that we should be put into the position of having to ask about this company's plans. This company should automatically file its plans with the government and the community. The minister and this government have the colossal gall to say that this company's future plans are a matter of private concern.

It may be that this minister thinks this multinational corporation has been very sensitive and responsive to the dependence of the community upon it. But maybe the minister does not realize that INCO has as much concern for the people of the Sudbury basin as a tom cat has for a marriage licence. For example, the number of hourly-rated employees at INCO in July, 1971, stood at 18,224, and as of April 30, 1973 it was 13,487. This is a drop of 5,000 jobs at INCO in less than two years. In addition, some 2,000 salaried employees have been cut back in the same period.

In addition to the jobs lost, our workers have paid often with their lives and more often with their health. Our environment has been devastated; air, water, vegetation and wildlife have shared a common fate as a result of noxious pollutants being spilled into the area. Our resources are being shipped out of the country. Neither the Ontario Tory government, the Liberal federal government, their buddy INCO nor other commercial interests have moved to create or entice secondary industry to provide for the future of the Sudbury basin.

Even now this government should instruct the CNR immediately to cut its freight rates in and out of northern Ontario as a first step in establishing a climate for economic development. This government's disregard for the residents of northern Ontario is matched only by the Ontario government's equally callous disregard, and is certainly in contrast to the many favours showered on the mining companies in whose back pockets they have found their pot of gold.

We of northern Ontario demand that INCO and other mining companies be compelled to sit down with government and labour and plan together an orderly development of our resources. We call on the federal government and the provincial government, with local input, to develop an economic strategy which will remove forever our complete dependence on the mining industry.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is no mandatory requirement on the part of business concerns in the private sector of the economy to disclose projections of employment and production levels to the department.

Mr. Rodriguez: Why not?

Mr. MacGuigan: However, industrial specialists and manpower consultants of the department undertake on a continuing basis short and longer term industrial sector studies. This is accomplished through a variety of liaison activities, associations, unions and other government departments and agencies both federal and provincial. In this way the department keeps informed of technological changes, market shifts and other trends in industry, labour, education, and so on, which may affect the efficient operation of the labour market.

Employment and production level projections of any company, including the International Nickel Company, are matters which the company may or may not wish to publicize. However, as the minister indicated to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) in a letter of April 18, departmental officers enjoy a good working relationship with INCO, as indeed with corporations in all industrial sectors. We encourage employers to inform us as early as possible of any decisions that will cause significant employment shifts, expansions and dislocations. Moreover, close liaison with companies such as INCO enables the department to keep abreast of all developments touching on manpower matters.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has spoken of colossal gall. It seems to me the colossal gall is on his part, because he is suggesting that the constitution of Canada should be disregarded. What colossal gall that is, and for him to interject during my speech makes that all the more evident. Perhaps the hon. member is not aware that labour relations in this industry fall under the provincial government, and if not, as a member of this parliament he should be aware of this fact. Perhaps he is not aware of the fact that unions find it very convenient to have full corporate disclosure for use in their negotiating proceedings.

I do not know whether or not the hon. member is carrying a brief for any particular body tonight in suggesting that information which would be useful to unions in negotiations should be made available, but it is not the practice of this government, and it is not permissible under the constitution of Canada to make such information about the industries of the country available. Even if it were permissible, it would not be appropriate because this is a field which is under provincial jurisdiction, as the hon. member should have known himself before he brought this question before the House tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before we get into another ten o'clock situation, may I call on the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

SOCIAL SECURITY—REQUEST THAT FAMILY ALLOWANCE PAYMENTS BE TIED TO COST OF LIVING INDEX PENDING INCREASES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the question I am debating tonight is very basic and deals with what I think is a normal and fundamental suggestion to the government, which if put into effect would tend to relieve the suffering of many hundreds of thousands of children of lower income families across the country until the government is prepared to implement the new family allowances benefits which they say will or should be afforded to Canadians in January, 1974.

My question was simply whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would table an order in council to tie present family allowance payments to the cost of living index using January, 1973, as the base month to ensure that families receive some improvement in benefits starting at once, and retroactively instead of having to wait until next year. The answer from the Prime Minister was, to my mind, immature, irresponsible and unworthy of a person who leads this country. I have been asking questions on family allowances ever since the white paper on income security came out in 1970, and I have been asking them in a manner which I think has been reasonable.

Since the beginning of the session I have asked the minister responsible, and the Prime Minister, in a responsible way, if they would implement the family allowance bill immediately, because I feel that it would help families with small children who cannot fend for themselves and would relieve the ever increasing calamity of malnutrition and high cost of living. All I get is an irresponsible answer that if it had not been for the opposition, the family allowance bill would have been passed in the last session of parliament.

What have we accomplished in three years, Mr. Speaker? All we have is a new paper—but this time the colour is orange—telling the people of Canada that the government has a new approach to family allowances but that it cannot be produced until later in the year. The minister responsible for the original family income security plan was convinced in the last session that his bill—after changing it once during the session—was the best thing for Canadian children. A bill was produced that brought nightmares to those high-priced bureaucrats who were charged with implementing the bill, which in turn would have brought worse than nightmares to the mothers of the country, who would have received the benefits, because of the administrative details which it contained.

Here we are, almost three years later, with a government that is incapable of controlling the disease of runaway inflation, with an incapability of controlling the runaway cost of foods, shelter and clothing, but with a complete and utter lack of concern to implement federal increases in a bill which would relieve the inability of the low and no-income families to partially meet the needs of their children. The present family allowances bill could very easily have been amended as it presently exists, if there was any semblance of sincerity by the minister, instead of playing political football with poverty-stricken Canadians.

All they would really have to do, if they were concerned, would be to amend the clause in the present family allowance bill, which signifies the amount now received, by a greater amount. The only other clause required would be the insertion of a clause dealing with annual increases in the cost of living. This was done very simply under the old age security bill and the war veterans allowances bill, and it could have been passed in record time. But instead the minister plays footsie with the provinces at conferences, and to get every ounce of press value bamboozles the Canadian public and the press, those creative gentlemen who profess to know what is best for the country.

I could state almost word for word what the answer to my question will be. It will refer to the great master plan that exists. But regardless of what I hear, let it ever rest on the conscience of the government that they have already failed miserably to help the children of our country, that segment of our society which we should be preparing, as it is our duty to do, to become healthy citizens of Canada in later years. It is a national disgrace that the government has shown its apparent inefficiency to meet the problem that exists.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has indicated that he knows my answer in advance. I think he should have known his question in advance. He is really suggesting something that is diametrically opposed to everything that I thought his party stood for in the past, that is, legislation by order in council. How stupid can you get to suggest this?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You should know.

Mr. Cafik: I do know, by virtue of this motion. The hon. member is really suggesting that we change the law by order in council. That is impossible. It cannot be done within the law affecting family allowances to bring down an order in council which would, in effect, change the amount to be paid in relationship to the cost of living or any other factor. I thought the hon. member would have known that before he asked the question.

Second, I thought he would have consulted his colleagues who seem to spend so much time in committees and elsewhere opposing actions through orders in council or dollar estimates, or whatever, to supposedly frustrate parliament. Surely parliament is the place where one should deal with this question, not through order in council.

The hon. member talks about us playing footsie with the provinces. Surely it is not too much to expect a federal Member of Parliament to realize that we live in a federal system and that we have a federal government and provincial governments. We have proposed to the provinces a new family allowance program which would offer benefits up to $20 a month per child. At the moment it is $7.21. That particular proposal carries with it the caveat that the provinces have the right, and indeed the obligation, to choose their own provincial priorities and they can adjust that amount depending on age or other factors which they think are relevant to the children in their province.

Surely that is not doing anything improper. Surely we have to recognize the kind of country in which we live. We live under a federal system and we have to abide by it. You call that playing footsie with the provinces! I tell you, if your party were in power, I do not think there would be any provinces to play footsie with, because they would all opt out of confederation if you had that attitude at any kind of federal-provincial conference. I want to underscore the simple fact that you cannot do what you suggest—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Cafik: —and if you had done any research—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Cafik: —in connection with the question, you would have known it before you even put it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is a parliamentary nicety involved here regarding the reference throughout the parliamentary secretary's speech to the hon. member as "you". But perhaps the point has been well recognized by now.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

COMMUNICATIONS

COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION—DISPUTE WITH QUEBEC RESPECTING JURISDICTION—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that on February 23 last I tabled a copy of a letter I had sent to the Hon. Jean-Paul L'Allier, the Quebec Minister of Communications, informing him that the government had taken note of an ordinance issued to community-antenna-television operators by the Public Service Board of Quebec which constitutes a clear attempt to super-impose provincial jurisdiction on an area of exclusive federal legislative authority.

The Public Service Board of Quebec has now issued to most of the community-antenna-television operators in the province a form of temporary certificate purporting to authorize them to continue operating pending the issuance of a permanent provincial licence, for which application will have to be made before a date not yet determined.

Federal legislative authority over radio communications and broadcasting, including community-antenna-television undertakings, has been upheld in all the relevant decisions of the courts. In our view, these actions by the Public Service Board of Quebec, with the support of the responsible Quebec minister, are consequently ultra vires and represent an encroachment on federal authority which the government intends to resist by all the means at its disposal. In practical terms, the issuance of an operating certificate or licence by the Public Service Board of Quebec, or its failure or refusal to issue such a certificate or licence, is irrelevant in so far as the Canadian Radio-Television Commission is concerned in exercising its authority.

[English]

It is particularly disappointing that this unilateral action should have been taken by a single province at a time when the government has put forward its proposals for means of collaborating with the provinces on communications policies and regulatory procedures which will give due effect to legitimate provincial interests. These proposals have been generally welcomed by the governments of the provinces, which are now engaged in preparation for substantive federal-provincial discussions in the fall.

In these circumstances, the government is not prepared to accept unilateral action by any province. The government is, nevertheless, quite willing to enter into discussion with the government of Quebec with a view to determining the most appropriate means for having the constitutional issue involved in this matter settled by the courts, the governments of the other provinces being kept informed of these discussions.

I further wish to give notice that in the event the government of Quebec persists in its intended action, the government will not hesitate to initiate appropriate action on its own behalf including action in the courts, if necessary.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister on behalf of our party for making a copy of his statement available to us in advance of its delivery. In the normal course, the response from our party would be made by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley who is unavoidably absent.

My colleagues and I share the minister's concern over the unilateral decision of the province of Quebec with regard to licencing of community antenna stations. But we must express as well our very deep concern that there appears to exist a serious breakdown here that could affect the development of broadcasting policy throughout Canada for some time. We are particularly concerned that this should have occurred so soon after the tabling in the House of the government's green paper on communication policy. We can only conclude that the action of the government of Quebec is a reaction to the green paper, or that the green paper was developed in isolation and that in many respects the policy position established is one that is not based on any coherent understanding of the position of the provincial government on the matter.

This whole matter raises very serious questions about the future of an integrated broadcasting policy in the country and it raises questions that the minister has not addressed in his statement as to the reaction of the other provinces. I think that one thing is clear: we cannot have chaos in our communication policy in Canada. It will be necessary to work out a policy that can be agreed to by all provinces and the federal government. I think it is a matter to note in the House that the federal government has had five years to work out an agreement on this matter, and obviously on the evidence today it has failed to do so.

It is clear that members of the House and the people of Canada have the right to much more information on this matter. We certainly request the minister to keep us advised of and in close touch with the developments in negotiations with the province of Quebec and with any other province concerned. I would also express the hope that, should the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts make the request, the minister himself will be prepared to go into the matter in some detail before the members of that committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we regret that there is this dispute between the government of Canada and the government of Quebec, but I must say that in our view the position stated in the minister's remarks this morning is a correct one so far as the constitutional position is concerned. Indeed, it is in line with the relevant decisions of the courts. However, we are glad to know that the government is making arrangements for discussions with the governments of all the provinces with respect to this matter and, in particular, that even though this dispute has reached a rather warm point the government is prepared to enter into discussions with the government of Quebec in the hope that the matter can be resolved without having to take it to the courts. We wish the government of Canada and the government of Quebec well in their efforts to resolve this dispute.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, for our part, we are somewhat surprised with the statement of the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) on the problem that exists with regard to Quebec. That statement, in a few words, means that the federal government says no to what Quebec has asked with regard to a cable TV service.

Contrary to the hon. members who spoke before us, we are far from sure that the federal government is right when Quebec is only asking one thing, the jurisdiction that is properly its own, that is, education.

As for the news release of this morning, and particularly its last paragraph, unfortunately I cannot say I agree with it. Indeed, it says, and I quote:

—the government will not hesitate to initiate appropriate action on its own behalf including action in the courts, if necessary.

Mr. Speaker, according to me the end of this statement is extremely overbearing. The federal government wants to deal with a problem over which it is not yet sure to have jurisdiction, namely that of community antennas and education, which is the responsibility of provincial governments. If one is to speak about co-operative federalism, I do not think threats bordering on blackmail should be delivered.

The federal government declares that it will not hesitate to initiate proper action, including legal action if need be, to justify its position. In my opinion, this is a very arrogant attitude that endangers beforehand those agreements which could be reached by other more normal means.

We regret very much the last section of that statement, and if under other circumstances the same methods were applied and the same arrogance shown towards other provinces, I am sure that there would be an outcry across Canada in order to settle federal provincial relations, for I think the statement made this morning will seriously affect future federal provincial relations.

It is most unfortunate that in such an area as broadcasting which in the first place was of provincial jurisdiction, the federal government has assumed those responsibilities because the provinces did not exercise theirs over that matter at the right time. Today the federal government takes over a jurisdiction which was a provincial one in the first place.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we may see from this statement new evidence that the federal government infringes upon the provincial jurisdiction, and that it is a centralizing government at a time when it advocates decentralization.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISCUSSION OF OBJECTIONS TO REPORT OF ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSION FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and I believe there will be found to be agreement in the House that we end discussion on the opposition motion that will be before the House today at 15 minutes prior to the adjournment time, 4.45 p.m., in order to begin discussion on the objections to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for Newfoundland within the requirements of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we have looked at the statute under which this is being done and it so happens, so far as we can decide, that today is the last day on which there can be compliance with that statute by initiating a debate. There is some ambiguity about the statute, which I must say is characteristic of the distinguished hon. gentleman who piloted that bill through the House.

Mr. Bell: He is in the gallery this morning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: We feel there is a statutory obligation upon the House to commence this debate today, but that it need not be concluded, particularly in view of what was said by the government House leader concerning the intentions of the government. It is not our intention, in light of the progress made in the House, to slow up the House's business by engaging in and concluding a debate which may be found not to be necessary because of the action of the government. So I submit with great deference that the proposal made by the minister is correct and that the House has an obligation to initiate this debate today to comply with the statute but that it need not be completed.

● (1120)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we also think it is a good idea for parliament to obey the law.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I want to take the strongest exception to any unkind remarks made about the former Liberal member who used to represent the riding of Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that it should be so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES IN LIGHT OF BANK RATE INCREASE AND DEMAND FOR MONEY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who has indicated that he generally approves the increase in the bank rate and has taken the position that this will not have any particular effect on mortgage rates. Is it the minister's view that there is an excessive demand for mortgage money in the country and it is therefore appropriate that mortgage interest rates should increase with a view to discouraging this demand?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall making any statement directly relating mortgage rates to the present rate, but it is my understanding that at the present time mortgage funds remain in good supply despite the very buoyant activity in the housing field and the high level of demand for mortgage money.

Mr. Stanfield: I gather from the minister's reply that he is not concerned about the substantial increase in mortgage rates that has already taken place and that is anticipated. However, if my assumption is wrong and the minister is concerned, may I ask if he has any plan in mind to keep mortgage rates at a level or reduce them to a level that will make it possible for the ordinary Canadian to apply for a mortgage loan at the rates that are anticipated?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the legislation introduced by my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, goes quite a way toward answering the problem that the hon. gentleman has raised.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the Minister of Finance intend to make any proposals to the House or any announcement of policies that will give an assurance to the ordinary Canadian with respect to the level of mortgage rates that it is anticipated may prevail in this country for the balance of the year? In view of the substantial increase that has taken place, in view of the substantial increase that is anticipated, and in view of the already fantastic cost of lots, has the minister any hope to hold out to the ordinary Canadian who wants to have a home?

An hon. Member: None.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the bill of my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, deals with the problem of land assembly which is one of the high factors in the cost of housing. As for interest rates, I am watching mortgage rates carefully. They are moving between 9 and 9¼ per cent. There is obviously some long-term relationship between mortgage rates and medium and short-term rates. I explained to the hon. gentleman and the House that the interest rate structure in the country at the moment reflects the extremely strong demand for credit, reflecting the strong expansion in the economy. It also reflects the interest rate structure in the world. In Canada we still have interest rates a point or a point and a half lower than those in the United States despite the historical trend, and lower than the rates in any other industrial country in the world.

SUGGESTED ALLOCATION BY BANKS OF CERTAIN AMOUNT OF MONEY EACH YEAR FOR HOUSING LOANS AT SIX PER CENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the story this morning that interest rates on housing loans may go as high as 9¾ per cent by the middle of this year, will the minister give consideration to amending the Bank Act to make it mandatory for bankers to set aside a certain amount of money each year for housing loans at about 6 per cent?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman takes a look at the figures I think he will see that the chartered banks have entered the mortgage market very strongly, and there are indications as well that the trust and insurance companies are also channelling more funds into the mortgage and housing field.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Six or more members are seeking supplementaries. I suggest that the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville be allowed to ask a supplementary and then the hon. member for Calgary North, after that the Chair will move to the next subject.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of stories in the press this morning that funds available for housing are likely to decrease by mid-summer and interest rates will go up to 9¾ per cent, will the minister undertake to make it mandatory that the banks set aside a certain amount of money for housing at an interest rate no greater than 6 per cent?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Questions

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—DISCUSSION BY MINISTER AND BANK OF CANADA GOVERNOR OF MEANS TO CONTROL—HOUSING LEGISLATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Minister of Finance, to whom I wish to direct my question, said there was buoyancy in housing. The vacancy rate for all single family units in Canadian metro areas declined to 18.4 per cent from 25.9 per cent last year. If I may continue on the same line of questioning, historically and financially it has been shown that when interest rates increase to over 9 per cent this always stops housing construction in Canada. It is now predicted and likely that the interest rate on mortgages will be 9¾ per cent on first mortgages and 12 per cent on second mortgages.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would like to ask his question now.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I was leading to it and now I will ask it. I wanted to inform the minister because he does not seem to know how serious this matter is. Has the minister had a serious discussion with the Governor of the Bank of Canada and taken any action as a consequence to divert this kind of policy which is leading to high interest rates and bringing to an end the construction of housing units in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have a regular weekly meeting with the governor of the Bank of Canada. All these discussions are serious and we have been discussing the housing matter.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. As we spent ten hours in the standing committee piloting the bill on housing through and as the leader of the House yesterday, in announcing the business of the House, left this piece of legislation off the list of priorities—it has no priority at all—would the minister now talk to his colleagues, namely, the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and others to get this legislation before the House and get some action?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the list of legislation that the leader of the House announced yesterday was not an exclusive list of legislation to be dealt with.

Mr. Alexander: It was a list of priorities.

Mr. Basford: I and the hon. member are hopeful that the legislation that was reported from committee the other day can be passed as quickly as possible.

Mr. Woolliams: Why was it left off the list?

Mr. Baldwin: Ask Fullerton about it.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, if I can get the Prime Minister's ear. In view of the announcement yesterday that the former minister of industry, trade and commerce has been appointed to the board of directors of Power Corporation, this following hard on the heels of the announcement last week that he had been appointed to the board of directors of Bombardier Limited, and as there is related to this the fact that between 1968 and 1972, when Mr.Pepin was minister of industry, trade and commerce, subsidiaries of Power Corporations received over $10 million in grants from the government and Bombardier received about $1.4 million, I would ask the Prime Minister if he can tell us when we can expect action, and I hope early action, on his conflict of interest legislation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I really regret the preamble to the question. I hope the hon. member did not intend any innuendo or smear by this preamble. It certainly is unfortunate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is an unfortunate way of phrasing a question, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: It is cheap.

Mr. Trudeau: On the question itself, I will repeat what I said not too many days ago, that the intention of the government is to bring forth that legislation, hopefully quite soon, and to make a statement. The legislation, of course, as I told the Leader of the Opposition, would bear on the problem of Members of Parliament, but we would make a statement on conflict of interest as it applies to other areas which are not the subject of legislation.

• (1130)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I do not apologize for the way in which the question was put. There was obviously no intent to suggest direct wrongdoing by the former minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: There was intent to draw attention to the fact that unlike the United States, for example, we do not have such legislation in Canada. I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the serious allegations made last year by a scholar, Dr. Springate, of Harvard University, that millions of dollars in DREE grants simply constituted windfall gains to the corporations and, related to that a serious potential for conflict of interest as indicated by—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question. The preamble is perhaps a little too long. He should come to the question.

Mr. Broadbent: As the hon. member for Calgary North would say, I am just coming to it. Will the minister table a list of the grants made to the Bombardier Corporation and all subsidiaries of Power Corporation since 1968 and have these referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for analysis?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I might say that the type of conflict legislation and policy we are preparing does not cover the future conduct of defeated politicians. If at that time the hon. member wants to introduce legislation to govern the future lives of people who are defeated in elections, he could perhaps move a motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I could not hear the hon. member. Is he rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Broadbent: No, Mr. Speaker. I have a final supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for that purpose and I will recognize the hon. member for Charlevoix immediately after.

Mr. Broadbent: As usual, when it is convenient the Prime Minister misses the point of a question. In view of the fact it has been acknowledged by a leading figure in the Liberal party of Canada that 95 corporations contribute most of the funds to the Liberal party for its campaign purposes, will the Prime Minister assure the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the three lengthy preambles he has proposed to the House, one to the original question and again to two supplementaries, are slightly out of order. I appreciate that hon. members have to preface their questions to some extent, but I hope that all hon. members will try to stay away from the practice that seems to be developing of having these long preambles which make questions sound more like speeches. I am not sure whether the hon. member had reached the point of asking the question. I do not want to be unfair. If the hon. member can ask the question without the preamble, he will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. Broadbent: No preamble, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister assure the House that amendments to the Elections Act will make it mandatory that the amounts of contributions and names of contributors to all political parties will be made public?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will see the legislation when it is given first reading. The final phrasing of that aspect of it has not yet been determined. I am getting information on not only the theory but the practice carried out by the NDP governments of three western provinces. This is not as enlightening as the hon. member would seem to hold.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

COMMUNICATIONS

COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION—DISPUTE RESPECTING JURISDICTION—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC MINISTER

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Communications.

Has he recently met the Quebec Minister of Communications, Mr. L'Allier, before delivering his statement today?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, all the contacts I have had with my counterpart from Quebec have been in the form of correspondence which has been tabled in the House and is available to the hon. member if he cares to look at it.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Considering the importance of this matter and the threats proffered by the minister in his statements this morning, it would be significant if the minister would tell us on what date he met the Quebec Minister of Communications to discuss this problem?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the preamble of this question; the matter is important, but I do not believe I have proffered any threats. On the other hand, Hon. Jean-Paul L'Allier himself had already said that he wanted this matter settled by the courts. Apparently he changed his mind about two days ago, if we are to believe newspaper reports, but I will not allow it to be said that I proffered any threats. As for the exact date of my last meeting with Mr. L'Allier, I could not say precisely to the hon. member or put on the record a date that might not be exact.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary.

In his statement this morning the minister mentioned letters tabled on February 23. Have there been any other communications since then?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): If I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, there was some other correspondence tabled after February 23.

COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION—ISSUING OF LICENCES BY QUEBEC—DISCUSSION WITH OTHER PROVINCES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Communications. Has the minister communicated with the governments of the other provinces concerning the decision of the provice of Quebec to issue what purport to be licences for community antenna television, and can he advise the House whether he has reason to suspect that any other provinces have begun or might begin to issue certificates or licences purporting to authorize such operations?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Can the minister advise the House what he considers to be a reasonable time for the government of Quebec to respond to the position he stated today before the government of Canada might initiate action in the courts, and what specific action the minister intends to take in the interim?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing definite. We explain in the statement itself that we intend to communicate with the Quebec government if they want an order to open up proceedings for an agreement either through negotiation or any other way, and this will be done as soon as possible, I can promise the hon. member.

[English]

COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION—ISSUING OF LICENCES BY QUEBEC

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a three-part question to the Minister of Communications. In the minister's statement he indicated that not all cable operators have been issued permits by the province of Quebec. To the best of the minister's knowledge, have these permits been refused to any present operators and, if so, what action has been taken against them by the province of Quebec? Second, can the minister tell the House whether any prospective operators have been issued licences who are not now licenced by the federal government? Third, can the minister indicate to the House whether these licences were just issued today or were they issued over a period of time?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there were several questions and I do not want to get confused. The hon. member's first question, if I understood him well, was whether temporary licences—or what are called by that name by the Public Service Board of Quebec—have been denied to some companies. I do not believe so. I believe that all companies operating community cable systems have received such licences.

As to the second part of the question, whether licences were granted to companies whose applications have already been rejected by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, I think I should also reply that such has not been the case.

Concerning the last question, my reply is that the temporary licences mentioned in my statement bear no dates. We are therefore unable to know exactly when each recipient obtained his temporary licence. However, the operation took place during the past 15 days and it is on the basis of first indications that we tried to find out.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize one last supplementary on this question.

I recognize the hon. member for Shefford and afterwards the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the evident lack of communication between the two ministers of communications, can the minister tell us whether the end of his statement today suggests that he thus intends to improve co-operative federalism?

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montreal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

As a result of the numerous representations made to the minister concerning the possibility of extending local initiatives projects, the minister told us yesterday that he would make a statement this morning. I wonder if he had the opportunity to prepare the answer to which he referred yesterday?

● (1140)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, a favourable decision has been made and the government has decided that, in addition to projects eligible under the criteria announced on April 27, we will review and consider on their individual merits projects in those areas where unemployment was below the national average in March. This review, I hasten to say, will take special account of high pockets of local unemployment and continued community need and support for the project as well as meeting the general criteria I announced on April 27.

I should emphasize that the review will be very thorough. I do not expect that every project will be extended. I would also say that the length of extensions will be decided on a project to project basis. This is in consideration of the fact that the original objective of the program remains unchanged, that is, job creation. This further extension of the program is a result of representations for the services provided rather than for the jobs themselves. I must emphasize—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While welcoming part of the minister's statement, I want to say that we accept that it is a clear abuse of the rules.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In his remarks to the House yesterday the minister implied clearly that a statement would be made. I think what he has just done is a clear abuse of the rules. The hon. gentleman waited until one of the hon. members from Montreal put a question. It was a set-up job. I am not particularly worried about that, but in future I hope the minister will not use this devious way of making a statement. His proper course was to stand up as a man when motions were called and make a statement—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: —so that opposition spokesmen, who are just as concerned about this matter as the hon. member who asked the question, could have commented. I am ashamed of the attitude the minister has taken today. I hope that in future when he has a statement to make on a subject of such importance he will have the decency to make it on motions so that other members may have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Andras: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would have been very happy to reply to a question by the hon. member for Hamilton West if he had put one to me. I have no apologies to make for replying to a question by an hon. member on this side, particularly since there has been such strong representation and such strong concern expressed by members from the Montreal area in this party.

Mr. Alexander: That is no reason for not making a statement on motions.

Mr. Andras: I indicated yesterday that I would make the information available, and I have done so. I think my reply to the question put to me was far shorter than the preambles to questions asked by members of the opposition this morning and on many other days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Finally, I will be very glad to take supplementaries from the hon. member for Hamilton West if he wishes to put them.

An hon. Member: If he has any.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I have heard the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and I object strongly to anyone trying to deny the member for Montreal-Bourassa the privilege of at least putting questions to whom he wishes in this House. I do not think that I have ever abused this privilege, Mr. Speaker, since I have been sitting in this House, but I must speak on behalf of the people in my riding. Some legitimate representations have been made. I would like to put a question; I put it in the form that you have decided, Mr. Speaker, and I object strongly to the members of the opposition trying to muzzle their colleagues in this House.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously, the point has been made by the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Hamilton West and we have heard the response from the minister and the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa. I doubt there is anything to be gained by pursuing the matter further. Both sides of the argument have been expressed very clearly and strongly. I would hope that the Chair would now be allowed to recognize members who may wish to ask supplementaries on this matter, or go to another question.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Trudel: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In some regional offices of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, there are differences in the statistics we are given, because even if the level is below average in some areas, there are places where the average is much higher. Will the hon. minister be allowing for differences that might exist within the structures, with regard to unemployment statistics?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The import of what I said earlier is that certain of these projects, within those CMC's where unemployment is below the national average, will be considered on their merits.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Will the minister make a statement on motions on the policy of extending LIP grants throughout the country where useful social projects are being carried out and are threatened with discontinuance?

Mr. Andras: If the hon. member will read in Hansard my comments in response to the question put to me earlier, I believe he will find I have covered that situation. Social projects which are now in existence as well as projects in some other categories in areas where unemployment is below the national average across the country will be considered for extension on their merits.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the minister whether he will consider introducing legislation to deal with this matter now that the House has seen the dangers of its being dealt with at the whim of a politically weak government?

Mr. Andras: I always give consideration to the hon. member's suggestions.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON AREAS AND PROCEDURES FOR PROJECT EXTENSIONS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister this question. Has his department decided on the areas in Canada that fall within the category of unemployment mentioned? Has it decided on the way in which to dispense this information to the Canadian public? Has it decided whether any more funds are to be supplied for the program? Has it decided whether any special criteria should go into the program to govern applications made for grants? Has the minister decided on a mechanism to be used in making these decisions, or will the approach be a completely subjective one on the part of the people who are watching from the gallery today?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to all those questions is yes.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member resume his seat. We have to try to make some headway. If the hon. member has a supplementary to ask I will return to him in a moment. Perhaps I might be allowed to recognize the hon. member for Brant and then recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

POSSIBLE MERGING OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH AND LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAMS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the report that the government is going to merge the opportunities for youth and local initiatives programs into one program to be known as opportunities for people, can the Prime Minister tell the House what progress has been made so far with regard to that matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a great deal of progress has been made in the government with regard to this subject. The hon. member will remember that in the white paper the Minister of National Health and Welfare tabled less than a month ago there was reference to community employment projects. As the statement by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration just a moment ago revealed, we are still considering this problem and we hope that before any further LIP projects are initiated we will have some other approach to this problem to set before the House.

Mr. Baldwin: How about the opportunities for Liberals program?

Mr. Blackburn: Will the Prime Minister assure the House that the merging of the two programs will not result in a cutback in funding of the programs?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will remember that LIP projects were essentially designed to meet a serious unemployment problem at the time.

An hon. Member: We still have it.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer given this morning by the minister refers to that fact. Of course, if the unemployment situation does continue to improve as it has, it is quite conceivable that there will be no constitutional basis for the government to involve itself in local programs which are of the nature of social and health services.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON AREAS AND PROCEDURES FOR PROJECT EXTENSIONS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. minister for his very direct answer to my former question. Will he now indicate to the House the specific areas of the country that will receive funds, the specific amount of money to be provided over and above the regular allocation, the specific criteria that he has laid down, the procedures for communicating to the areas the change he has announced, the procedures to be followed in making decisions and the structural mechanism? Can he give that information to the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not allow the minister to make such a long statement as the one I assume would be required to answer the questions asked by the hon. member. Perhaps the minister might like to indicate whether he proposes to provide this information by way of a statement.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): My intention, Mr. Speaker, and I hope it will meet with the approval of all hon. members—the written information is in fact now in the process of being drafted—

Mr. Baldwin: We know what your intentions are.

Mr. Andras: As I indicated, this is a rather lengthy piece of information based on a decision taken yesterday. I will be writing to all hon. members regarding these details and they should be in their hands by Tuesday. All the details to which the hon. member quite legitimately referred will be contained therein.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Lundrigan: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot just get up in the House, give half a statement on the one hand and indicate he is not willing to give the other half on the other hand but will mail a little piece of paper to all of us which we can read. We will be asking questions on this matter for the next three weeks if he does that. I suggest to the minister that in the interests of the House he should get up and make a statement. This would eliminate two or three hours of questioning over the next four or five weeks.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—NEGOTIATION OF LAND CLAIMS UNDER TREATY No. 11

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Having regard to a decision by Mr. Justice Morrow of the Northwest Territories Supreme Court to hear the application for a caveat by the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories, thus resulting in the continuance of a land freeze on 400,000 square miles in the Mackenzie basin until July, could the minister tell the House when his department will begin to negotiate seriously the just land claims of the Northwest Territories Indians under treaty 11 which has never been fulfilled by the federal government but has been the subject of many briefs and commissions over the years?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indians Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question a number of times.

I met with representatives of the Northwest Territories Indian Association several times two years ago, and told them that I was prepared to sit down with them to consider the problem and to honour the Crown's obligations to the Indians, but they told me that they were not ready to talk. I repeat again today that we are ready at all times to honour our obligations as stated in Treaty No. 11, and to this end we appointed an official a few months ago who will meet periodically with the Indians in question, but, unfortunately, they refused to meet him. I am at their disposal at all times, and it is up to them to let me know if they want to reach a settlement.

FINANCE

BUSINESS FAILURES IN FIRST QUARTER OF YEAR

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask this question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's repeated assurances that all is well with the economy, and in light of the recent report by Dun and Bradstreet showing an enormous increase in business failures in the first quarter of this year, well over 1,000, has the minister any explanation, comment or announcement of a change of policy in this regard?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly told the House that there are various aspects of the economy with which I am not satisfied. I am still not satisfied with the rate of unemployment and I am very disturbed about the increase in prices, as the hon. gentleman knows.

An hon. Member: How about Trudeau? Are you satisfied with him?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If we are to refer to newspaper reports, I am delighted to see the revision in the forecast of the National Conference Board in respect of the growth of the economy from 5.5 per cent to 6.5 per cent.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is really my first question. Does the minister have any explanation for the large number of business failures across the country in the first quarter of this year?

An hon. Member: It is because of the provincial sales tax.

STATUS OF WOMEN

GUIDELINES FOR EMPLOYERS TO ENSURE PROPER REPRESENTATION IN JOBS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact it is two and a half years since the Royal Commission on the Status of Women presented its report and over a month since the Prime Minister took notice of a similar question, has the government yet established any guidelines for employers to ensure that qualified women are properly represented at all job levels?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take notice of the question on behalf of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister cannot answer that question, perhaps he can tell us if the government has or intends to establish any precise targets for the reasonable participation of women in senior government positions?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would give the same answer to that question.

HOUSING

REPORTED CLAIM THAT BILL C-133 WORKS AGAINST NON-PROFIT AND CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING GROUPS

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that non-profit and co-operative housing groups are anxiously awaiting passage of Bill C-133, is the minister aware of the concern expressed yesterday at a press conference by the Montreal Housing Committee to the effect that Bill C-133 works against non-profit and co-operative housing groups and in favour of big developers?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the press report and all I can say is that the Montreal housing committee must be reading a different bill from the one before parliament. Bill C-133 has a particular bias in favour of non-profit and co-operative housing associations and groups, and on the basis of representations which I've received I know the bill has the full support of the co-operative housing movement.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, bring it on.

Mr. Basford: That is why the hon. member for Calgary North, for the opposition, and I want to bring the bill on as quickly as possible.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PROJECT EXTENSION—REQUEST FOR SPECIFIC CONSIDERATION FOR CAPE BRETON

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and refers to his statement regarding LIP grants. In view of the fact the present unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island is at the nauseating level of at least 20 per cent and that the president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation confirmed this 20 per cent figure last night before the Standing Committee on Regional Development and said it was appalling, will the minister give specific consideration to that particular area in the sense of expediting grants and extensions and providing more personnel so that action will be taken as quickly as possible?

● (1200)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will give all sympathetic consideration to that.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF RECONSIDERING REJECTED PROJECTS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of his earlier reply relating to the extension of some projects, is the minister suggesting that he can include the acceptance of projects rejected in areas unjustly treated at the time of the first decision? Under those decisions, would it be possible today not only to grant extensions of time but also to review the previous decisions?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my comments would indicate that projects which are in existence now will be considered, provided they fit in with the criteria I announced on April 27 and again this morning.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF SUPPLY OF HERBICIDES TO CONTROL WILD OATS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Because of the crucial shortage of new farm machinery all across Canada, which is forcing the agricultural industry to place more reliance on the herbicides avadex and carbine to control wild oats, would the minister immediately take it upon himself to ascertain the availability of these herbicides to ensure that the supply is adequate for this vital industry?

[Mr. Basford.]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we recently sponsored a symposium which was held in Saskatoon on the control of wild oats. We asked the man who had cleaned up his wild oats and the man who had not to be at that symposium to offer suggestions inasmuch as we realized that over $150 million worth of grain production is lost each year because of this noxious weed. We are working with the provincial authorities, who have first and foremost jurisdiction here, to make sure that we do everything we can to control it.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF REFINERY AT GROS CACOUNA—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION WITH QUEBEC IN DISCUSSIONS WITH SAUDI ARABIA

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact the government of Quebec has had meetings with Saudi Arabia, which is interested in participating in a major refinery project proposal for the Gros Cacouna, Ile Verte and Riviere du Loup region of Quebec, could the minister tell the House whether his department is involved in these bilateral discussions, as it were?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I would have to inquire, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harney: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In the absence of the Minister of the Environment—I find it hard to tell from this vantage point whether he is here or not but I gather he is absent—may I direct this question to the Prime Minister. Even considering the fact that a predecessor of the Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, did promise the people of the region of Gros Cacouna a harbour, is his government taking into consideration the fact that the tidal conditions, the weather conditions and the shoaling conditions of the waters there make it an extremely dangerous place to bring in supertankers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a representation and he must assume that it has been taken into account.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this question is certainly

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the universal unrest throughout Canada over the present inadequate, complicated and unjust income tax forms, is the minister planning to review this matter in the hope that a more practical simplified form for the payment of income tax will be introduced next year in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this is a question which should be placed on the order paper. I appreciate its importance, but I think it should be placed on the order paper.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—FURTHER EXTENSION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to an earlier question which I should like to direct to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister tell us if he will take into consideration the fact that there are less than two weeks left before the end of the LIP period, and is it possible that funds can be provided to extend those projects that will be given reconsideration beyond that point?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We will give some consideration to that in certain cases. We will be advising all projects within a week whether they will be eligible for consideration for extension. This does not mean automatic approval of extensions but whether or not they are going to be eligible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition and then call orders of the day.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO AUTHORIZE SPECIAL COINS BEFORE SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation respecting the coinage proposals associated with the Olympic games in Montreal before any summer adjournment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We hope that before the end of this month we will be tabling in parliament and giving first reading to legislation which would be of an omnibus character. It would attempt to cover the coinage aspect raised by the Leader of the Opposition and would also contain provisions concerning the special stamp issue and the lottery.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are two hon. members seeking supplementaries. I indicated I would recognize the Leader of the Opposition and then call orders of the day because we have gone beyond the period allocated. The hon. member for Hastings rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Ellis: It is just a brief question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister was unwilling to answer my question in respect of the status of women, and since he and the Minister of Labour have collaborated, I wonder whether the Minister of Labour would take my question as notice.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE PENSIONS AND REMOVE INJUSTICES TO WAR VETERANS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe) moved:

That this House urges the government to introduce priority measures to remedy present injustices to war veterans and, in particular, to remove those inequities arising out of basic rates of disability and other pensions, treatment services, allowances, and the Veterans' Land Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my party's motion today is introduced as an appeal to the government in an attempt to emphasize the need to fulfil a commitment made over 50 years ago to a special citizen of our country, the war veteran, a citizen who sadly is becoming less and less recognized at a time when he needs recognition most in his declining years. The motion reads:

That this House urges the government to introduce priority measures to remedy present injustices to war veterans and, in particular, to remove those inequities arising out of basic rates of disability and other pensions, treatment services, allowances, and the Veterans' Land Act.

I am sure everyone will agree that Veterans Affairs is one legislative area that has been non-controversial. In dealing with such legislation over the years, there certainly has been an atmosphere of co-operation regardless of party lines. I believe that, as a group of former soldiers learned in the use of military strategy, we veterans have been wrong in our attempt to have the government of the day fulfill a commitment to war veterans made over 50 years ago, a commitment that Canada owed as a matter of right. The government deserves all possible support in their efforts to rehabilitate veterans in return for their fulfillment of their patriotic duty to our great country. The fulfillment of this commitment would allow them not only a decent living but an equal opportunity to re-enter society and to live a rich, full life along with other Canadians whose best years were not disturbed during the war.

So what have we done? For over 50 years we have followed the "nibble philosophy" because the original drafters of the veterans charter could not see far enough ahead, through no fault of their own, to design a plan which would deal with future needs of veterans in a changing society. However, no one is blaming these legislators, and over the years many good things have come about. Those who came before us and represented veterans in the House of Commons have served the veterans well and are held in the highest esteem.

Without casting blame on anyone, we must be big enough to admit that we have failed in many areas and now it is almost too late to make amends. However, we can correct the many inequities which exist at present. We have a chance to clear them up once and for all by showing a little human consideration and by stopping to think once in a while of the veteran for whom it is our duty to care.

Recently, we passed a bill to increase war veterans allowances, and we passed it in record time. Members from all parties gave complete support to the amendments to the act. We even threw bouquets across the floor to the minister and his government for bringing in the following amendments. First, we proposed that the bill increase benefits under the act to a maximum allowable of $2,293.68 for the single veteran and $3,926.52 for the married veteran. In addition, the table of allowances gave annual increments to orphans of veterans on an annual basis. Second, we proposed that the amendments allow exemptions to veterans on reaching the age of 65 of $15 if single and $30 if married. Third, we proposed that casual earnings be increased to allow the veteran or his wife to earn increased amounts up to $1,000 for the single veteran and $1,500 for the married veteran.

However, there are still a few inequities in the War Veteran Allowances Act which need revision, and by offering the first point of my party's motion we urge the government to introduce priority measures to remedy the following. First, the removal of the Canadian residence requirement for war veterans living abroad, which would involve the amendment of section 3(1) of the War Veterans Allowances Act. It is possible for a veteran to qualify for an allowance by returning to Canada for one year, and subsequently the benefit is continued even though the recipient may take up permanent residence outside the country. Although the required year's residence may be met without difficulty in border areas, it is more difficult for veterans long distances away to meet these requirements. Benefits first became payable outside of Canada through an amendment back in 1960 to permit the continuation of payment of allowances outside Canada primarily for reasons of health or family ties. As of January 1973 there were only 709 persons receiving allowances outside Canada. An amendment to the legislation removing the 12 month residence will extend the benefit to Canadian veterans who are unable to return to Canada to qualify.

Second, an amendment must be brought forth which would enable a surviving spouse to receive an allowance for a surviving child who is attending an educational institution, even though that child is 21 years of age. We must increase that age limit to 25 years or to the time when the child ceases to attend an educational institution. Surely, the government could provide these benefits until the age of 25, as is presently the case under the war dead educational assistance act, particularly when the number involved are so small. Surely, we must realize the basic need to extend this age limit to 25 without the need for any dramatic explanation or elaboration.

Third, the requirement for 365 service days should be eliminated and service in the United Kingdom before November 12, 1918, should be accepted as a qualification for world war I veterans.

The average age of world war I recipients of veterans allowance is 78.4 years, and it is unlikely that it would be much lower in the case of those with limited service in the United Kingdom. The removal of the one year clause would not apply to many veterans, and since almost all of them would be receiving OAS benefits, the cost involved would be small. However, it would provide a certain degree of additional comfort to these elderly recipients, and it would provide them with drugs and other assistance to which they are entitled now.

If these three inequities were corrected, we would have a good act fulfilling our commitment to these veterans once and for all. Surely, our consciences should dictate that we make these amendments in the next few months.

The greatest failure that exists in the present legislation has to do with the basic rate of pensions, and this was one of the main reasons for our motion today. The throne speech committed the government to increases in disability pensions as well as war veterans allowances, but here we are four months later having made no progress in this respect. I can only say that the government has callously reneged on its responsibility.

We have before us today a joint study report on the basic rate of pensions. It was conducted on the authority of the previous minister of veterans affairs and with the accord of the present minister, the chairman of the pension committee, a representative of veterans organizations and others. These individuals and groups brought before the standing committee recommendations that were reasonable and that, most important, were unanimously accepted by everyone concerned.

The report was signed by eight responsible and dedicated Canadians, including the representatives of the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Canadian Pension Commission and of all veterans organizations. They submitted a report which, in the main recommended the following points. First, the basic rate of pension should be established, on the basis of an average of a composite group of public servants, for the single pensioner at $4,529 a year. This is an increase over the present rate of $3,793. Second, the married rate of pension should be established at the single rate plus 25 per cent. Third, the additional pension for children should be established at 13 per cent for one child, 22.5 per cent for two children, and for each additional child an additional 7.5 per cent. Rates should also be established for the widow of the veteran, the dependant parent, and dependant children. Furthermore, a recommendation was included in the report that pensions should be adjusted annually on a fixed date in accordance with changes in the average wage rates for the selected public service group, rather than on the basis of adjustments in the cost of living.

These recommendations were made after three months of study by a responsible group and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. They were accepted unanimously by all parties. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that the deputy minister of the Department of Veterans Affairs, the chairman of the Pension Commission, who was also chairman of the group, and the representative of all veterans organizations gave their signatures of approval. Remember also, Mr. Speaker, that the recommendations were referred to the Standing Committee and, without debate, accepted in record time after only token comments supporting the report by government and opposition parties. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) himself attended the meetings of the committee and supported the recommendations without question.

However, where do we stand today? We find ourselves in a dilemma. The legislation promised in the throne speech has not yet been produced. Why is that? Because the Liberal party hierarchy, the cabinet, will not accept the recommendation which proposes the new formula based on annual increases in accordance with the average wage rather than on the increases in the cost of living. This is the dilemma. They will not support the recommendations of the minister, of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs representing all parties, of the Chairman of the Pension Commission who is charged with the responsibility of dealing with the applications of thousands of veterans who submit claims, nor of the veterans' organizations of Canada, representing over 900,000 veterans.

Reports from the inner circle indicate that the strongest opponent to these recommendations is the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), a former top ranking officer in the Canadian army who led thousands of veterans during the Second World War. He, of all people, is opposing the justified increases to his comrades who followed him during that war, and if I were not a responsible member of parliament I would say something I know I should not say.

My party's motion therefore is justified in requesting priority measures to remedy this injustice. I plead with the minister, with the house leader and with the President of the Treasury Board that, if any legislation is ready for introduction to this House, it had better include all the recommendations of the joint study report or it will not be acceptable. Further, if after indicating, as the government did, that it will produce legislation before the summer recess, and this legislation does not include those recommendations, then I say to members of the government that they will not be fulfilling their commitment to the veterans of Canada.

Moving to another important phase of responsibility relating to disability pensions, it is the responsibility of the Pension Commission and of the Pensions Review Board to deal with new applications for pensions arising out of the Woods Committee report and recommendations. While we have been willing to accept the reasons given for delays, it is now time to take the necessary action to deal with these recommendations on a higher priority than presently exists. In spite of corrective action being taken by the addition of members to the Pension Commission, and in spite of the determined efforts of the Commission, the government must extend every effort to increase the capability of the Commission because too many veterans are dying while awaiting for its decisions. This, again, is a priority measure which must be introduced to remedy present injustices to veterans, as well as the injustices caused by the delays in respect of the treatment of prisoners of war. It is a shame that only now, at this late date, is a study being conducted into the condition of former European prisoners of war.

Another serious inequity has to do with the Veterans Land Act. The present legislation is completely out-dated, and rather than providing the relief necessary in the present period of inflation, veterans are stultified in their efforts to build a home because of the failure of the government to provide for rising costs in the act. Part II of the act provides that any qualified veteran who is approved for a loan under the National Housing Act may receive financial and other assistance to build his own home, on any lot acceptable for a single family dwelling. The amount that may be advanced is $18,000 or the amount of the NHA loan, whichever is the lesser.

The act provides also that a veteran must acquire a lot of one half acre, but in certain cases this can be reduced by 20 per cent. My question to the minister is this: how can anyone build a home for $18,000 at present costs, or how can any veteran acquire a lot of one half acre, less 20 per cent, at present costs before he even starts to build a home? This also brings into focus the terminal date for initial applications for assistance which is set at March 31, 1974. There are some 125,000 veterans with qualification certificates and, according to the annual report of the department, it is expected that only 5 per cent will take advantage of the VLA.

The reason for this is that the loan ceiling is too low in view of present day inflation. Further, the size of building lots required is unrealistic, and the down payment is entirely too high. The government must immediately review the act with a view to (1) raising the ceiling to an acceptable level which, in view of today's inflationary costs, might be $25,000 or $30,000; (2) reducing the size of the lot to that of a normal building lot; (3) changing the down payments to at least today's level, and in line with the National Housing Act; (4) extending the termination date of March, 1974 to a period commensurate with the needs of present Canadian Forces personnel when retiring; and (5) giving consideration to inserting a rehabilitation program into the act to allow veterans to repair their present homes, in the case of need, along the lines stipulated in the National Housing Act. I know that it is the intention of the government to phase out VLA. All I ask is why? What purpose will it serve other than causing 125,000 veterans to join the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who cannot get a home now?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, and returning for a few seconds to the basic rate of pension, in a spirit of co-operation the joint study report was clear, concise and reasonable. The veterans' organizations on behalf of their members have accepted without question the patchwork amendments to the act over the years. We now have an opportunity, finally, to establish a basic rate which will re-establish some faith in the minds of our veterans with respect to the government's recognition of their service. I plead with the government to produce legislation, including the recommended formula of annual increases, so that we will not have to fight every two or three years for a review of the disability pension and the basic rate because of inflation. I plead further that the government call on the same study group to undertake a study and recommend measures to remedy the few remaining inequities in the various sections of the Pensions Act, so that we can settle the long overdue bill which was promised to be paid some 54 years ago to the veterans of Canada.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some hon. members appear to be under the impression that the Veterans Charter is a monolithic affair that has been left virtually unchanged for a generation or more and is now hopelessly out of date. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

The government has been keeping the Veterans Charter under continuous review, and a great number of changes have been made from year to year as the need has presented itself. I might add also that the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs has played a very active part in making sure at all times that veterans' problems are fully aired and sympathetically considered, and I am glad to express the government's thanks to the committee for its helpful contributions.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the Veterans Affairs budget had been rising from year to year, and I would expect that it would continue to do so for some years to come. The departmental expenditure budget has risen almost continuously from $396 million in 1966-67 to $480 million in the current year. Over the years there has been a slight reduction in total staff because of hospital transfers, but the authorized total still stands at 10,455 man years. I propose at this time to review some of the more important changes that have been made in the Veterans Charter during the past few years. First, I will deal with the area of disability pensions.

Since 1944, hardly a single year has passed without new legislation to up-date some aspect of the Pension Act. Then, between 1968 and 1970, the entire act was reviewed in great detail by the Woods Committee which presented no less than 146 proposed changes. The ensuing legislation, which received Royal Assent on March 30, 1971, just two years ago, represented the consummation of the most thorough review of the pension legislation in 50 years.

These main amendments had many far reaching effects, but I should at least mention the introduction of the exceptional incapacity allowance, the broadening of the benefit of the doubt rule, the special arrangements made for Hong Kong prisoners of war, the establishment of the independent Bureau of Pension Advocates and the Pension Review Board. Just last year, as one of the measures, parliament enacted legislation to provide for the first time that the rates of pension would be adjusted in January of every year to reflect upward changes in the consumer price index. Pursuant to this legislation, pension rates were raised by 3.6 per cent last year, and again by 4.5 per cent in January of this year. There will be another adjustment next January, and in every future year. This legislation ties disability pensions to the cost of living, so that they retain their real value from year to year. I need hardly add that the whole matter of the basic rate of pensions is at present under very active consideration by the government. I have already informed the House that I hope in the very near future to be in a position to make an announcement on this subject.

So much for pensions. Let me turn next to War Veterans Allowance, the so-called "burnt-out pension". There have been no less than four increases in WVA rates in the last two years. As in the case of pensions, the WVA Act was amended last year to provide that rates would be escalated each year as indicated by rises in the cost of living, and they were accordingly increased by 3.6 per cent last year and by a further 4.5 per cent in January, 1973. Just a month and a half ago a further large increase took effect, as was mentioned by the hon. member who spoke previously, in the same amounts as the increases under the Old Age Security Act. At the same time the act was amended to remove the "personal property" qualification, so that applicants would no longer be required to liquidate their assets before becoming eligible for War Veterans Allowance. In other words, the long standing "needs test" has been replaced by a modified "income test". We have also been conducting a large advertising campaign in veterans publications, in weekend supplements, in the farm press and on the radio, to make certain that veterans were fully informed on these changes.

With reference to our hospital transfer negotiations, I should like to take this opportunity to clear up a misunderstanding. Our purpose in seeking to transfer veterans' hospitals to local and regional authorities is not to get rid of the hospitals or to reduce our responsibility. Quite the contrary, our aim is to ensure that veterans continue to receive the best possible hospital care. If these institutions were to continue indefinitely as veterans hospitals, the average age of the patients would rise continuously and the hospitals would become geriatric institutions. On this basis, we would gradually lose our ability to attract and retain the best doctors, nurses and paramedical staff, and then the quality of the care of veterans would inevitably suffer. The only alternative is to blend the hospitals into the communities in which they stand, so that they may continue as active treatment hospitals for both veterans and others. Of course, in any transfer agreement the government ensures that a sufficient number of priority beds remain available to meet the needs of the veterans, and the government insists that the present hospital staff is taken over by the new authority without reduction in salary. I need hardly add that, following transfer, the government continues to pay the treatment costs of entitled veterans.

Now, I should like to say a word about the Veterans Land Act. In recent weeks I have received a certain number of letters urging that the statute be amended to continue this program beyond the terminal dates specified in the legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I believe that these requests, understandable though they are, have been based on misapprehensions regarding the aims of this program. The act was not designed as a program of urban housing, nor as a part of a retirement program for persons reaching the end of their productive careers. It was designed to provide financial assistance for the purchase of agricultural land to be used on a full time or part time farming basis by veterans. The purpose was to help them pick up the threads of civilian life following active service. Realizing that not all veterans would wish to use the Veterans Land Act, parliament enacted two other measures, re-establishment credits and postwar university training. I might note here, Mr. Speaker, that most of the letters I received from people wanting to construct under the Veterans Land Act illustrate three things that were available to all veterans. One was to establish them in part time or full time farming; another was to rehabilitate them through university training, and another one was money. In many many cases, we found upon investigation that one or other of these benefits had been received by practically all the veterans who wrote to me. A veteran could use only one of the three measures.

Recognizing that the act was intended as a measure of rehabilitation assistance in the period after wartime active service, as distinct from retirement from postwar occupations or careers, in 1965, eight years ago, parliament established the March 31, 1974 deadline for the purpose of phasing out Veterans Land Act lending operations in an orderly manner. By that date, almost 30 years will have elapsed since the end of the World War II, and 20 years in the case of the Korean conflict.

In the time at my disposal, I cannot of course cover all aspects of departmental operations. I should like, however, to say something about remembrance. First, let me say that each year during the past ten years the government has conducted ceremonies to commemorate the deeds and sacrifices of Canada's veterans, and in each year these ceremonies have been held in Canada and in the places where they fell. Last year my predecessor attended ceremonies in France to commemorate the landings at Dieppe. Within a few weeks I am taking a small delegation to Normandy, where as guests of the government of France we shall be marking the anniversary of the D-Day landings. Later this year, I hope to inspect a number of the cemeteries and memorials in Europe that are maintained at Canadian expense to commemorate the contributions by the thousands of Canadians in two world conflicts.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that the government keeps the Veterans Charter under constant review, and I believe what I have said will amply confirm the point. I can also assure the House that we shall continue to keep all these measures under review. The government fully recognizes its responsibility to its veterans and to their loved ones. We have been fulfilling that responsibility and will continue to do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to refer to some of the points brought out by the hon. member who moved the motion. With regard to the overseas veterans, as I have said in the Veterans Affairs Committee, this has been and is presently under review. As far as additional money for the children to age 25, that is in the same situation.

I want to make reference to the Pension Commission, also referred to by the hon. gentleman who proposed the resolution. We realize that there is a lot of concern on the part of veterans, veterans associations and people across the country that applications are not being processed as rapidly as many of us would desire. However, the House knows that we have added quite a number of people to the Pension Commission and it takes time to train them to deal with this situation and to understand the legislation. We have appointed people who are capable of assessing medical information and bringing the cases concerned to the attention of individuals looking after the pension matter. We are doing our utmost here. According to the last report I have had, pension applications are now being approved a little faster than we are receiving them. Many of those veterans, I have to say with respect, are and have been in receipt of pensions, possibly for a quarter of a century or more. It sounds bad to hear that so many are behind. At the same time, that does not mean that the veterans are starving. In many cases, we have a priority list. We bring urgent pension cases to the top of the list when they are brought to our attention.

It seems to us, in the department, that we have begun to cope with this situation in a much better way than in the past, and we are certainly going to get on top of it. I can say that the Pension Commission is very conscious of this, as is the pension chairman. I have the highest regard for him and know he is dedicated. Many members on the other side of the House, as well as on my side, know that many of these files are extremely thick. Sometimes, when there is no medical evidence to support an application, you have to look for people all over the country who served with the applicant. That is a very difficult job.

Mr. Marshall: Why not give them the benefit of the doubt?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Why not give them the benefit of the doubt? That is right. I think, with that, I will end.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) for the motion he has presented to the House today. I also commend him on the speech he made on introducing his motion. Those of us in all parties in this House who are concerned about the welfare of our veterans welcome the opportunity presented to us today to discuss a number of matters that are of deep concern. Those last few words indicate that there are quite a number of issues relating to veterans that will be discussed. However, I agree with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe that the main purpose in bringing forward this motion today, the main thrust of the speeches that will be made, I trust, by members on both sides of the House, is that we want no more delay on the part of the government in bringing forward the bill to amend the Pension Act, the purpose of which is to increase the basic amount of the war disability pension.

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe pointed out, as all hon. members are aware, that this legislation has been promised since the day the present session began. Early in January, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) indicated that the report of the special joint study group on the basic rate of the war disability pension would be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. That was done within a few days of the making of that promise. That committee took only an hour or two to make its report back to the House, unanimously supporting the recommendation in that report. The minister was present at the meeting and it was clear that he shared the view of all on the committee that it was an excellent report and should be implemented at the earliest possible date.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), when making his budget speech on February 19, indicated that the government was only waiting for the report from the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs before acting. That report came down just a few days after the budget speech.

When we asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs questions prior to the Easter recess about the introduction of the bill to raise the basic rate of the war disability pension, he expressed the hope that he would be able to do it before Easter. Well, Easter is a movable feast, but it did not move quite that far. It has come and gone, and we are still without the legislation. Yesterday, in response to yet another question of mine, the minister said that he hoped to bring the bill in, if I may use his exact words, "before very long". When I asked him whether "before very long" means this month, he replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I would indicate that I am hopeful that it certainly means this month.

Mr. Marshall: The House leader said it would be brought in before the recess.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Here we are, on May 18; the minister has 13 days left in which to do this. I am glad to see the President of the Treasury (Mr. Drury) sitting here and listening to the debate, because he will realize how keen the House is to have this piece of legislation introduced.

As has already been pointed out, the recommendation of the joint study group, which was supported by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, calls for the basic rate of the war disability pension to be tied to the average rate of pay of five selected categories in the public service. That, indeed, is an attempt to fulfil a promise that has been around more than 50 years. I certainly join with all those who, over the years, have spoken on this matter, but I now say that we hope there will not be another arbitrary figure picked by the government and put in the legislation. This time we want what the joint study group has recommended, namely, that the basic rate of the war disability pension be tied to the average annual income of five selected categories in the public service.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Peters: They are not those of deputy ministers, either.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No. I trust that remark is on the record. We are talking about five groups down near the bottom of the ladder.

The report pointed out that war disability pensions are not subject to income tax and that, therefore, in arriving at a figure a certain adjustment has to be made in what would be the gross average pay of those working in those five groups. For 1972, this worked out to the figure of $4,529 per year. There have been pay adjustments since then, so that for 1973 the figure would be a little higher. The amount of $4,529 represents an increase of 19.4 per cent over the amount now being paid as the 100 per cent basic rate. I would hope that, considering the increases which have taken place in wage rates this year, the figure might be somewhat higher still.

The important thing about this recommendation is not just the suggested figure, which is roughly 20 per cent higher than that in the present legislation. The important thing about it is that it recommends that that basic rate be tied to those rates of pay I have mentioned, so that in future years the basic rate will go up, as those rates of pay go up. This is well covered on pages 20 and 21 of the report of the joint study group which was signed by the nine persons to whom my hon. friend referred a few moments ago. May I point out, as well, that it is no longer good enough just to give veterans an increase equal only to the rise in the cost of living. Rather, they should be given increases that are related to the rising standard of living. The joint study group points out that the best way to do that is to tie the basic rate of the war disability pension to the average of the rates mentioned in the public service.

I liked the approach of the minister this morning in making it clear to us that the government has not forgotten these things. I liked his confirmation of his statement to me of yesterday that the bill is to be brought in soon. Yesterday he said that that "means this month", the month of May. I must say to him, however, that I am concerned, indeed, disturbed, that he stands up this late in the game and boasts about the clause in the Pension Act that provides for the basic rate to be escalated according to the rise in the cost of living. He should not still be boasting about that. The report of the joint study group, which included the Deputy Minister of Veterans Affairs, as well as Mr. Solomon, and three or four others, said that that is not good enough. I suspect that is the reason for the delay. I suspect this bothers the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). He does not mind giving an increase, but he is worried about this formula that would provide automatic increases in future years in accordance with the rise in the rates of pay of these selected groups. That is the whole issue. It is not just an issue because this study group recommended it. It has been an issue for more than half a century that the basic disability pension should be tied to certain levels of income and not just be a figure that the government can hand out from time to time by amending the act. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the minister to insist that his bill implement in full the recommendation of the joint study group.

I hope that as a result of today's debate, which is being listened to by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the President of the Treasury Board, the bill will be brought in soon and that it will have in it the formula recommended in the report of the joint study group. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe said that if this is not done, the bill will not be acceptable. We will find that out if we have to go through the sorry situation of the bill not being satisfactory when it goes to committee and the veterans organizations appear before that committee. My suspicion is that if the bill just contains an arbitrary figure without accepting the recommended formula, the veterans organizations will appear before us with some pretty strong representations. All of that can be avoided and the 50 year promise can be kept, if the government will bring in the bill recommended by the joint study group and strongly endorsed by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. That is the main purpose of the motion before us today. I hope it will be the main purpose and main thrust of the debate.

All of us who will take the floor today are concerned about a number of other matters, and we shall have a few words to say about some of those matters. In particular, my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), will have a good deal to say about the Veterans Land Act and what needs to be done with regard to it. There are a few other matters on which I think a comment or two should be made.

With regard to the War Veterans Allowance Act, we welcomed at the time and we are still glad that increases were made in the basic rate of the war veterans allowance. But like other members, I am receiving letters from veterans who are wondering why they did not get the increase. They thought there was an increase. Those over 65 years of age are glad that the ceiling was raised. This permits them to get the full amount of the old age security and guaranteed supplement increase. However, there is no increase for them in their war veterans allowances. The minister covered that very nicely in the letter he sent to veterans with their April cheques. He referred to the changes that had been made and then wrote this interesting sentence:

> At the same time, Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplement combined payments were increased by the same amounts; which means that those of you who are aged 65 and over will find their increases in those cheques, instead of in their WVA/CWA payments,—

The rest of the sentence states that those payments would not be decreased. That is a nice euphemistic public service way of saying you will not be getting an increase in your war veterans allowance. It is true that those under 65 who are not at the ceiling will get an adjustment because of the higher rates. However, I feel it would have been appropriate to raise the ceiling on the permissible income under the War Veterans Allowance Act, not just by the amount of the increase in the old age security and guaranteed supplement adjustment, but by an additional amount so that those receiving the war veterans allowance would have an actual increase in that allowance as well as the increase in the old age security and guaranteed income supplement. I hope that something will yet be done about this. When we get the bill to amend the Pension Act back before the committee, perhaps we can have further discussion about this as well.

I support those who argue strenuously that the time has come to permit a veteran who has service in the United Kingdom prior to November 12, 1918, to be included for the purpose of the War Veterans Allowance Act. The number of those still around is dwindling. The number of years they will live to enjoy, if that is the proper word, these sums of money cannot be great. I hope this change can yet be made.

I agree with those who, when the minister was speaking, protested that all he could say about those who live outside of Canada, in the United Kingdom for example, and cannot draw the allowance unless they have the 12 months back in Canada, was that this is under review. After all these years, that is hardly good enough.

I hope the minister will take a further look at these various matters that relate to the war veterans allowance. In earlier speeches, I had something to say about the different ceilings that apply, depending on whether one is under or over 65 and whether he is single or married. All of this could be avoided if we just established a new higher set of ceilings for veterans under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I see that it is almost one o'clock. I will try to complete my remarks now so that others may speak this afternoon. I leave to my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming, a discussion of the Veterans Land Act. The veterans who write to me know all about the rationale of the act. But I support their contention that because they fought for this land, surely they are entitled to purchase a little bit of it. The argument that it is only for those who make their living in agriculture does not stand up any longer.

With regard to the review of cases of veterans of World War I and World War II, I strongly urge that there be much more liberal interpretations by the Canadian Pension Commission of the benefit of the doubt clause.

In conclusion, may I say that veterans, especially those of World War I, should not have to face any more questions. There should be a level of income guaranteed to them. As far as I am concerned, the age of eligibility for this guaranteed income should be lowered. The place to start is by saying to our veterans, you have earned an income and it should be guaranteed to you. I hope the idea of a guaranteed income for veterans will be considered. But I end, Mr. Speaker, where I started. I hope the result of this debate today will lead to what I believe is its main purpose, that it will support the minister in his efforts to get his bill to amend the Pension Act through the cabinet with which he is associated and into this House not later than the end of next week.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized at two o'clock. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until then.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

War Veterans

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, speaking of veterans, often leads us to think of Canadian history and particularly that of the last thirty years, during which our armed forces have served in the Second World War and the Korean War.

This House must show the greatest concern for these men who have risked their lives in the defence of our country, to enable freedom to survive.

Particularly during the Second World War, even though grudgingly at times, Canadian troops helped to overthrow the Nazi regime, to prevent it from spreading, and carried out great military exploits which should be born in mind when we talk of these problems. The House must show constant concern for veterans, and also continue to shoulder its responsibilities to them.

In our every day life, we come across people who, for lack of work or luck, live in poverty or have other problems. But when veterans are in difficulties, we must recognize that we are somewhat to blame for it.

I therefore hope that the Progressive Conservatives did not introduce this motion on an allotted day in order to make political capital out of the veterans, or just as a way of attracting attention to themselves.

I mentioned the Second World War and the Korean War; we must also remember the peace missions throughout the world in which Canada has given a good account of herself. She has built a good reputation for herself throughout the world.

Therefore, it is a very important duty to look after the interests of those persons and to assume our responsibilities towards them.

Recently, I received a phone call from the wife of a veteran who asked me to help her to obtain for her husband the pension he was entitled to. he was a man who became disabled as a result of his military service, who suffered from gout and who seemed to have been forgotten by the departmental authorities.

Therefore, I lost no time in helping him and in submitting the required representations for that person to obtain justice. It is a fact that those persons are unfairly treated and, as I said earlier, our first responsibility is to ensure that those injustices no longer exist. For instance, I feel that the basic pension rate is unfair. At present, those persons are not treated as they ought to be. They are not treated with the respect which should come before everything, according to the policy drawn up here.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am asking the government to take all necessary steps, in order that those war veterans know better days, that at last they enjoy the social justice that this government has often held out to us.

● (1410)

[English]

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to give my support to the motion of my colleague the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), or perhaps I should say St. Humble-St. George's-St. Barbe. This motion calls upon the government to get on with the job of implementing measures which have the support of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs and of this House. These measures are intended to alleviate the serious and pressing need of those who rallied to the call when Canada threw its resources together behind the massive effort to free a large part of the world from tyranny. Many of those who did answer the call lie in foreign cemeteries, many of those who returned are still in hospitals or confined to wheelchairs or trying to get along on pensions and allowances.

I should like to point out to the House that the motion moved by my colleague cannot be construed as criticism of the manner in which the new Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) is administering his portfolio.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Not too many bouquets now.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): I cannot think of any previous minister of veterans affairs at any time in my memory who has been better suited to the task than the present minister. By temperament and by first hand knowledge of the problems facing veterans, on a day to day basis, the minister is exceptionally well qualified to run that department. Those of us who sit with the minister in committee know that he has the interest of the veterans at heart. He served with distinction in World War II. As most of us on the veterans affairs committee are veterans, Mr. Speaker, I think that I can say without fear of contradiction that our committee is the only committee of this House that consistently functions above partisan politics.

Many thousands of veterans across our country are now looking to those who served alongside them, wondering whether or not we will now rally to their cause. If we do not, then there is nowhere else that they can turn. Where else can they go for help if we in parliament turn our backs on them, or even if we decide what we think is reasonable and just for them, and then let the proposals lie on a shelf and gather dust. Obviously this is not good enough. Those of us on the committee, and the many interested and concerned officials of the veterans organizations have spent hundreds of hours studying, debating and revising proposals and recommendations concerning what we should be providing in the way of benefits, pensions, medical care and the other aspects of a total veterans benefit package.

The package has been assembled and approved. I think that we now have a right to ask the present government: what is holding up the implementation of that veterans benefits package? When I have asked that question in the past I have not been able to get an answer. I will continue to ask the question, but my colleagues and I are running out of patience. We want an answer. I cannot help thinking that the answer is available to the government and needs only to be given to this House and to the veterans who are waiting. The main reason I was so anxious to speak on this motion is that I am deeply concerned about the attitude that appears to exist in the Department of Veterans Affairs in respect of the veterans affairs hospital in London, Ontario. The hospital is the Westminster Hospital, and I do not like to think of what is going to happen to this hospital if the government's announced plans are carried out.

To begin with, I must say that I am not in agreement with the policy in the past few years whereby the Department of Veterans Affairs has gradually gone out of the business of providing and maintaining hospitals for veterans' domiciliary care. There has been a tendency to transfer veterans hospitals to provinces and municipalities for operation, reducing the capacity of these hospitals to deal with bedridden veterans. Provinces and municipalities are not, and have never been, in the business of caring for veterans. This is a responsibility of the federal government, and if I had been in parliament when this policy was first introduced, the department would have had a tough time with me. I would have fought it then, and I am quite prepared to fight it now, right down to the wire.

For some time now the federal government has been discussing with the province, and with the city of London, various schemes for the transfer of Westminster Hospital to the province or to the city. Dr. K. S. Ritchie, assistant deputy minister (hospitals) of the Department of Veterans Affairs said in an interview with the London Free Press last month that the real interest of the DVA was to see the Westminster Hospital become part of the community health facility in order that the future care of veterans will be safeguarded. This is a strange statement of principle. On the one hand, the assistant deputy minister expresses concern over the future welfare of veterans who require hospital treatment and care. At the same time, he says that this can best be assured by having the DVA turn the hospital over to another jurisdiction, jurisdiction incidentally that does not have any responsibilities for veterans care.

In addition to the buildings on the site, Westminster Hospital also has a vast parkland area comprising about 342 acres of prime land. In the past, this parkland has been available to veterans who were able to leave their beds and walk around the grounds, or sit and read or whatever they wanted to do, in a tranquil setting. It may well be that there are people in the DVA who feel this is too good for disabled veterans, men and women who have nothing else but this to look forward to for the rest of their lives. I cannot accept a policy that seeks to transfer responsibility for veterans care to any agency or jurisdiction other than that department in which the responsibility has been vested. That agency is the DVA, and I will insist on a better explanation from them as to why they are not disposed to retain that responsibility.

If some change is called for in the administration of Westminster Hospital, and if some new disposition is necessary, then I have a proposal of my own to make. This hospital was built and has been maintained through the years as a veterans facility. It should remain a veterans facility. My proposal is that it should be declared a national monument to those who have served our country, both to those who did not return, and to those who did return but who are destined to spend the remainder of their lives in the care of the veterans administration.

The grounds around the hospital should be preserved intact to serve the veterans who are domiciled in the hospital and also to serve the people in the community. We have other national monuments across our country that are less deserving of the distinction. I can think of no better way to preserve the memory of, and to do honour to, those of our men and women who have served their country in several wars. I will answer the cranks who would say that such a monument would honour war itself by saying to them that if they had served they would know that those who hate war the most are those who have served in one. I venture to say there are people who would fight my proposal with every means at their disposal. That beautiful land which surrounds Westminster must have some councillors and developers in London drooling and dreaming. I daresay that there are people who cannot wait for the Department of Veterans Affairs to divest itself of the hospital so that they may begin their politicking, scheming and manoeuvring.

I can see high rises, town houses and possibly a shopping centre rising almost overnight on those beautiful grounds. Some people might say at this point that the present council in London would preserve the ground and buildings intact, and that they would do their utmost to prevent it falling into the hands of developers. However, councils change and I doubt very seriously that anyone would suggest that the best way to preserve it as it is would be to have the Department of Veterans Affairs turn it over to someone else. I do not have any more faith in the province in this respect than I would have in any other political jurisdiction. The province does not have responsibility for the care of veterans. I do not believe it would be very long before the provincial government would decide that this area is too prime and too expensive to maintain, and would take steps to enhance the utility and the income potential of this facility.

There is only one way the future of Westminster can be assured as a veterans facility. That is by making it a monument as well as a continuing institution to provide domiciliary care for veterans. The designation of Westminster as a national monument would not preclude or prevent its use in other ways. In fact, if it were established as a continuing facility under the patronage of the federal government many additional programs could be developed for the hospital. For instance, there is no reason that portions of the hospital not required for veterans could not be utilized for other patients. London needs additional beds for children's care. This might be the answer to the problem for some time to come. A hospital such as Westminster would be ideally suited to the new role of a medical teaching facility in both pure and applied research as well as the training of doctors who want to upgrade their proficiency in specialized areas of medicine. In fact, if it could be established now that Westminster would continue in perpetuity as a medical facility with the primary function of ensuring domiciliary care for veterans, any number of additional uses might be made of these facilities through the years.

There is a possibility that we will be able to avoid becoming involved in any future wars. This is the fervent hope of all responsible people. In that event there will come a time when there will not be any need for veterans hospitals as such. However, that time has not arrived, and we have a solemn responsibility to maintain sufficient facilities for the care of our veterans. We cannot slough off that responsibility to anyone else, however well-meaning they might be.

There are some other aspects of veterans care and benefits on which I planned to speak, but I felt I had to make my point with regard to veterans hospitals in general and Westminster hospital in particular. I should like to mention I am a bit disturbed about the apparent lack of real interest on the part of the government in extending the deadline on such an important program as the Veterans Land Act. This act has been a Godsend to the many thousands of returned veterans. Many members have spoken on this subject, but there is one area on which I should like to touch. There are approximately 200 to 300 persons who would qualify under the Veterans' Land Act who are still in the armed forces. When these people leave the armed forces, they must state the area in which they would like to build. If they have not done so by March 31, 1974 they will have to designate a province in which within seven or eight years they might wish to build. I would like to say that the department should extend the program just for that reason alone.

There is another area which is of great concern to me. I have risen twice in this House to seek the unanimous consent of the House to have immediate citizenship granted to war veterans who are honourably discharged from the armed forces. I did not receive such unanimous consent, and I can only assume the reason I did not receive it is that the same people who did not give the consent are the people who are holding up the passage of this bill. There is no reason in the world that we cannot grant at least citizenship to men who fought in the armed forces of this country, not necessarily on request but by right.

On a final note, I would urge the cabinet or whoever is holding up implementation of the benefit package we have approved to turn it loose and let it carry through to Royal Assent. It does not do anybody any good so long as it stays on the shelf. If our troops had discharged their responsibility in combat as loosely and as cavalierly as we seem to be regarding this latest benefit legislation, I shudder to think who would be running our country today. We certainly would not be.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak briefly on the subject of veterans affairs. I am concerned lest our veterans suffer from the political competition that is a normal way of life in this House. As the proposer of the motion admits, committee discussion of veterans business is mostly non-partisan. I should like our House discussion also to be kept on the same plane. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands suggested the motive behind the motion which is before the House. I agree with him, but I also suggest that this member's motivation in applying pressure to the minister and to the government in this manner is to drive in the thin edge of the wedge leading to future promotion of his socialistic theories.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I do not mind being accused of driving in the thin edge of the wedge, but I should like to be identified as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain).]

Mr. Herbert: I offer my sincere apology to the hon. member. I do not believe that such an objective should be a consideration in this debate. As the vice-chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, I have been pleased to see the unanimity of the members representing all parties in safeguarding and promoting the interests of our veterans. I believe we will achieve our joint objective by emphasizing the very special needs and rights of our veterans and their families.

There is one other point I should like to make which is of somewhat local character. It concerns the veterans hospitals in the province of Quebec and the program to transfer these hospitals, along with other veterans hospitals, to provincial jurisdiction in the future. I wish to make the point that the responsibility for the care of our veterans is 100 per cent a federal responsibility and in this respect, until we are sure that these rights and the wishes of our veterans will be looked after to the degree to which we, the federal representatives, want to see them looked after, we should not pursue such a transfer. Also, we must respect the rights of the veterans to have a very strong voice in this decision to transfer their hospitals to another jurisdiction. While there are a number of statutes and regulations contained in what we refer to as the Veterans Charter, I would like to deal at this time with the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

The War Veterans Allowance Act is that part of the Veterans Charter designed to ensure that those whose wartime service meets the requirements of the act shall, in spite of advanced age or incapacity, be assured of an income. This is attained by providing an allowance on a modified income test basis which ensures that the income of a veteran, his widow or orphans, does not fall below the amounts set out in the schedule of the act. We are deeply conscious of the debt we owe to those men and women who risked their lives in the interests of preserving Canada's freedom. This government has been alert to the needs of this important group of Canadian citizens and has taken a number of steps to assure them of a better standard of living.

On March 21, 1972 the regulations were amended to remove the four months restriction on casual employment. The result of this action was that the length of the employment ceased to be a factor and the dollar value of the earnings became the only yardstick to be applied. On May 15, 1972, we exempted the cost of living increases in the old age security and guaranteed income supplement monthly payments amounting to $15 for single recipients and $30 for married recipients. By doing this, the government ensures that those recipients aged 65 and over would receive an OAS/GIS increase and not have their allowances reduced by a like amount.

On May 19, 1972, we amended the War Veterans Allowance Act to provide for escalation of the rates and ceilings effective January 1, 1972, and on January 1 of each succeeding year in accordance with increases in the consumer price index. As a result of this, war veterans allowance and civilian war allowances recipients will no longer have to wait and hope for an increase, wondering when it will happen and how much it will be. They now know that if the cost of living goes up, so will their allowances and income ceilings.

On November 9, 1972 the regulations were amended so that the value of a home in excess of $10,000 would no longer cause a reduction in the allowance paid each month. This was a great help to people whose homes had escalated in value. Before the regulations were changed, they did suffer a loss of income because of the increased values in real estate.

On January 13, 1973 the amount of casual earnings permitted in any allowance year was increased from $800 to $1,000 for single recipients, and from $1,200 to $1,500 for married recipients. This is one of the provisions of the War Veterans Allowance Act and Civilian War Allowances Act which help to make them outstanding pieces of legislation of which we should all be proud. While unfortunately all recipients are not able to avail themselves of this exemption, it is beneficial for those who can. The result of this change is that, in the absence of any other income, a single recipient can have a monthly allowance of $151.14 and earn $1,480 a year, for a total of $3,293.68 a year. Married recipients can have a monthly allowance of $257.21 and earn $2,340 a year for a total income of $5,426.52.

The War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act are two very important parts of the Veterans Charter. Bill C-148, as all hon. members know, increased the rates in the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Allowances Act by $20.14 for single recipients and $39.60 for married recipients. The War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and allowances Act rates have been increased by $30.14 a month or 24.8 per cent for single recipients and $56.21 a month or 27.8 per cent for married recipients since December 31, 1971. The rates for orphans have similarly been increased by more than 24 per cent during the same period.

Like all hon. members, I was pleased to see the rates and ceilings increased twice this year, once on January 1 and again on April 1. I was especially pleased, however, at the amendment to the act which removed for all time the restriction on personal property which, prior to April 1 of this year, was limited to $1,250 for single recipients and $2,500 for those who are married. As a result of the removal of the personal property limitations, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, which were previously geared to a means test, are now geared to a modified income test.

There can be no doubt that the previous restriction caused a great deal of frustration and sadness on the part of many applicants and recipients. I have had letters from widows whose husbands had been receiving the war veterans allowance or civilian war allowances during their lifetime. The veteran died and left his wife $5,000 in insurance. No matter how old or crippled she was, until she reduced her insurance money to the permissible limit through ordinary maintenance, she was automatically ineligible for an allowance. In other cases, a recipient might receive a small inheritance and because the amount of personal property was then more than was allowed, that recipient would lose his allowance and possibly be faced with a recoverable overpayment. This particular amendment is a milestone in veterans legislation and will be beneficial to hundreds of recipients and applicants. I understand that last year alone 1,375 recipients had their allowance cancelled because their personal property increased over the legal amount. In many cases the excess was small, but the result was the same.

I am sure that all hon. members will agree that it is right that we should be constantly on the alert for ways to improve the legislation which affects our veterans and their dependants. I believe that the government has demonstrated that awareness and its willingness to take the legislative action necessary to bring about the desired improvements. These improvements, together with the abolition of the restriction on personal property holdings effective April 1, 1973, are concrete evidence of this government's determination to honour our debt to those who served Canada in her hour of need.

In conclusion, I want to add a word of praise of what our Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has been attempting to do in his short term in this House. I advise hon. members that he is giving his weekend to the veterans, as he has done with so many weekends. He leaves by plane after this debate is concluded this afternoon to attend the Quebec legion convention at Ste Anne de Bellevue. He will be visiting Ste Anne de Bellevue veterans hospital tomorrow morning, and then he will fly out again to repeat the same process in Ontario. I feel that while veterans affairs are in the good hands of our present minister our veterans need have no fear that they will not be given a fair deal in the legislation which all members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs are anxious to see before the House.

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, the first in need of our consideration are the last to be served in this session of parliament. Most of those on a government pension have had an increase established for them in this session of parliament, except the disabled war veterans. A parliamentary committee representing all parties has agreed on the need, and has agreed on the extent of what the increase should be. All parties are agreed on the necessity to make the increase as soon as possible.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) indicated that legislation for the increase was to be brought to the House before the Easter recess. There is now an indication from the same minister that the legislation will be brought to the House before the end of May. There was also an indication from the House leader of the Liberal party that, hopefully, it would be brought to the House before the summer recess. Therefore, the hold up must be in the cabinet. It is easy in opposition to criticize; it is easy in opposition to say what should be done; it is easy in opposition to promise everything, because in opposition one doesn't have the responsibility for acting.

An hon. Member: Which side are you on?

Mr. Arrol: On the side of the DVA, as I hope you are. In opposition one is unhindered by the final responsibility, by the final formula. When one does not have the responsibility, some of the complexities and complications are unknown. A government cannot immediately and always live up to its good intentions. But granted all that, Mr. Speaker, the government should move, because it must move to save the dignity and the peace of mind of those now on inadequate pensions.

Those who have given more than most are getting less than most. More than any, we are subjecting them to the torture of the government's indecision. The disabled, most of whom are denied a life of activity, have more time to think, have more time to be concerned, have more time to be dismayed. No matter what the complexities and the complications of coming through with a formula, the necessity of action now is so great that the government should make it a priority item.

The House has been spending more time in sympathy with the murderers of our society than with those in society who sacrificed to make our society safe for all. Let us get our priorities straight, and with the urgency of an emergency measure let the government act no later than next week to bring in the legislation, to bring justice to our disabled war veterans, to end the uncertainty and the real anguish as they wait from day to day. We cannot solve all the problems of the world or all the problems of the nation, but the government does have the wherewithal to serve the modest needs of the disabled war veteran.

Let the government have the determination. Let not grandiose plans for the future blind us to the practical needs of today. It is not that the disabled war veterans situation is going to result in measures which will cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars. There are not that many survivors of our wars. We, in Canada, have not been directly involved in a major war since Korea. We do not have the problem of a continuing number of disability cases. We have a situation where we are in debt to a small group of men, in debt for a very long time, and the need now is for immediate action in establishing the new basic rate for those on the war disability pension.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to speak briefly on behalf of the veterans with respect to the motion that is before us today. I would like to bring to the attention of the House that, from time to time since last autumn, mention has been made of a possible increase in pensions paid under the Pension Act to veterans who suffered a disability related to military service, and to dependents in the event of their death.

I think it is important to note that the veterans are not just asking for an increase in pension rates. Rather, they seek a base rate of pension tied to one or more groups in the private or public sector. Hon. members will recall that the recommendations contained in the joint report by representatives of the veterans' organizations and officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Pension Commission, were endorsed by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs some time ago. Those of us who were on that committee will recall that five categories in the public service were selected as representative of unskilled labour, a level acceptable to the veterans' spokesmen. Veterans tell me that the principle of finding a firm base for the rate of pension is at this point in time even more important than an increase in dollars. I understand that the matter is now under close study by the cabinet, and the House leader has stated that we can expect a bill before the House before the end of June.

Mr. Marshall: Where do you get your information?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I have a pipeline.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My pipeline says before the end of May.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I also would like that. I did not say that the legislation will not arrive in May. I said it certainly would come before the end of June, and if by chance the House leader brings it in within the next few days I will be most happy. I am sure that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) feels the same way as we do. I am sure that the minister wants to accelerate introduction of the legislation and have it approved as soon as possible. The vice-chairman of the standing committee has expressed his feelings about the minister. What he said was worth while hearing. I know he meant it. I, too, know the dedication which the minister has brought to his job ever since taking over the department. He deserves to be complimented. It is not every minister who will do the work that he does every weekend. It shows his concern for the veterans.

The veterans' organizations also asked for a standard formula, fixing the ratio on a firm percentage basis, to cover the additional pension paid to a veteran on behalf of his wife and child or children. Similarly, it was felt that the same basis should be provided for setting the rate of pension paid to a widow. Historically, an increase in disability pension was announced from time to time, but the percentage increase varied as did the ratio of additional pensions paid for dependants. There would seem to be some merit in the proposals put forward for many years by the veterans groups who have held that an increase in the basic rate when implemented should be measured against some point of reference.

This matter has now been successively before a study group, the standing committee and the government for almost a year, and has obviously been carefully analysed by all concerned. I share the hope of other hon. members that further information on this subject will soon be forthcoming.

Over the past year, most hon. members will have received letters from war veterans or their dependants seeking assistance in urging the Canadian Pension Commission to act on pension applications. I must confess I was shocked to learn only recently that as of April 24 last year the commission was faced with a backlog of 8,975 applications for a basic award, and I understand this does not include many ancillary benefits, including pensions for wives and children.

I have done a bit of research and was referred to a national magazine called The Fragment, put out by the War Amps of Canada. This magazine contains an article dealing with delays by the Pension Commission in granting pension awards, and points out all is not black or white. I will repeat that, Mr. Speaker: it points out that all is not black or white. For example, one must realize it is now 28 years since the end of World War II and while there have been other brush-fire wars, the bulk of the claims outstanding relate to the 1939-1945 conflict. Most of the so-called routine claims from World War II have long since been granted; it is the difficult claims that require a great deal of research. In many cases, there is no intermediate medical report between 1945 and the death of a veteran in 1973. The widow may feel that her husband's fatal heart attack related to his arduous service in a battle area and submit a claim. One can readily understand the correspondence required by the commission, the bureau of pensions advocates, if involved in the case, and frequently a veterans' organization, in seeking records of medical treatment since 1945 and in seeking witnesses who may be able to support the widow's claim that her husband's health was not good over the many years since service.

I think it is of interest to note that since the amendments of March 30, 1971, a widow may claim an award in respect of a condition for which her husband neglected to claim during his lifetime. One need hardly mention the difficulties involved in this exercise, especially since the veteran is now out of the picture and there may be only meagre evidence, if any, in support of the claim.

Many of the claims advanced recently are not new. Hon. members are aware that the amendments to the Pension Act of March 1971 provided for an open door policy to all. This means that in addition to the many new measures introduced, any veteran whose claim to pension since 1918 was not granted is afforded an opportunity of starting over again. It will be readily apparent that a claim that has been aggressively prosecuted on a number of occasions over the past 35 years, has collected many volumes, and all this data again be reviewed if the claim is to receive the attention it deserves.

One must ask, then, what steps are now being taken to deal with the backlog? I find there has been a marked increase in the staff of the commission since April, 1971—indeed the total staff figure now stands at 359, an increase of 14 per cent over the past two years. In addition, hon. members will recall a bill was before the House last July to authorize an increase in the size of the commission to 24 members. Immediate steps led to the appointment of seven new members and, although I am advised a lengthy training period is essential, the new members will play a decisive role in reducing the backlog. In this regard, the chairman of the commission has recently stated he feels the corner has been turned, and since January of this year output is increasing and the number of claims pending has been reduced on successive months. He has cautioned, however, there will likely be surges from time to time, thus requiring constant review of methods to speed up the adjudication process.

To sum up, I am satisfied the officials of the commission are doing their best, but at the moment it is not quite good enough. Hon. members will, I am sure, join me when I suggest no concerned person in the Pension Commission can rest easy until every veteran's claim has received the attention it deserves.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of members of this House the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who for many years has participated on the Veterans Affairs Committee and in fact has always spoken about the various pension boards and commissions, who has dedicated almost all his life to the benefit of people who should rightly receive pensions, who sits opposite me but whom I have always recognized for the work he has done—that hon. gentleman will be 65 years young on June 18. I feel I should bring this to the attention of the House. At that time he will be eligible for the $100 a month pension through what he often refers to as the OAP, old age pension. All members of the House I am sure will want to wish him many more years of active life, health and happiness in doing what he is doing for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Probably the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is rising on a point of order which is well deserved and I shall listen to him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is that I want to thank the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) for telling the House that I am 65 so that hon. members will not think I am 75.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, the hon. member for St. Boniface really did not raise a question that should be dealt with by the Chair, except in a very congratulatory way, and I join with the hon. member for St. Boniface and I think every other member of the House in anticipating something that will happen in a few days time.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I hasten to add that the normal retirement age of the average Canadian is probably not going to affect the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: Therefore, it is only going to be another day in a long and illustrious career of fighting for pensioners. However, I do appreciate the words of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) in relation to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I believe that, in relation to this subject, that appreciation should be extended to most members with whom I have had the opportunity of sitting for 15 years. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who was vice-chairman of that committee, a fact of which I was not aware, started out by saying how terrible it was to raise this question. He condemned the hon. member for bringing it forward, and other hon. members for having endorsed the hon. member's position. He went on to say how wonderful the government has been to our veterans in paying the veterans allowances, not understanding that these only apply to people who are totally disabled and below the age of 60. If they are over 60, they have to pass a means test. That legislation does not apply to them if they are over 65, as those veterans are to get benefits from increased old age pensions and other old age assistance.

● (1500)

Therefore, his remarks were not in keeping with what has been happening for a long time in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. The members of that committee are anxious, on behalf of all veterans in this country, to see the best possible type of veterans charter and legislation adopted. I think the minister would be the first to agree that in thus raising this issue the House is putting its weight behind the proposition that in this country there is general acceptance of the idea that the basic rate for disability pensions should be calculated by taking the average of wages paid for five junior categories in the civil service. This is a change in concept, and members of the opposition consider this so important that they wish to add their support to any application the minister might make to cabinet for such a substantial change.

When I first was a member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, I believe 15 or 16 years ago, the base rate mentioned was to be tied to the rate paid to sweepers, cleaners and similar categories in the civil service. This decision was made by a committee following the First World War on the ground that such categories ranked lowest in the federal civil service. It was felt that if a veteran was totally disabled he ought to get as much as if he were digging ditches or sweeping floors for the federal government. Everybody agreed. The only disagreement was over how one was to establish that concept. In the meantime, the sweeper has departed; the job of ditch-digger in the civil service has disappeared. Those categories were referred to but have not existed for some time. Therefore, the government has arbitrarily set a level of benefits from time to time that has not met a criterion that the veterans themselves believe to be fair and reasonable.

Certainly that was the opinion of the special joint study group that looked into this matter. The amount that group decided on is not large. It took into consideration payments such as income tax that would normally be made by civil servants in the course of their employment. The figure arrived at is, in my opinion, reasonable and will be applicable not only this year and next year but for as long as veterans depend on this type of pension. That, of course, will be for as long as there are surviving veterans from the Second World War and the Korean war.

I think the criterion arrived at is almost ideal. The determination of the basic rate will not be tied to the wages paid to a single category in the civil service. It will be tied to the average wage paid to five categories. It seems to me that so long as we stick to five categories, any one of which may fluctuate up or down but all five of which will be taken on average, we shall be dealing with this problem in a fair and reasonable way. I am surprised that the vice-chairman of the veterans affairs committee did not understand that the committee was totally in favour of that proposition and endorsed it almost without debate. This raises the question of whether we should do these things without debate. We thought everybody understood this position. We were of the opinion that everybody taking part in the debate today would not criticize the government but would support the proposition that the government should take this course of action. Perhaps, for the benefit of newer members, there should be more explanation of the subject. I think, nevertheless, that we would all come to exactly the same position as we now espouse.

The member who moved this motion today did not do so to embarrass the government. He did not move it as a non-confidence motion. His purpose in moving it was totally different. His purpose was to enable us in opposition parties to lend support, publicly, to the minister and to the committee so that the government and other members may have the benefit of opinions expressed in the committee and a decision on this question can be taken as soon as possible. He wanted to bring this matter to the attention of ministers and others who must make the final decision on matters affecting veterans. He did not move his motion for the purpose of getting any advantage from it, or for criticizing the government.

I want to raise a second point touched on by most speakers, that is, concerning the difficulty we are experiencing with a limited number of veterans who are reaching retirement age or are considering retirement and who want to move from the area in which they may have worked for a number of years to an area in which they can retire. These veterans wish to take advantage of the Veterans Land Act provisions which will allow them to buy a piece of land and build a small house—and under the terms of the VLA it will be a very small house in most areas! At any rate, they will be able to build a small house.

For the sake of those members who, like the vice-chairman of the committee, may not understand exactly what we have been talking about, let me explain that after the war three forms of help outside of the normal veterans' assistance were given to veterans. They were given re-establishment allowances which were not exceedingly large. I think the amount was usually under $1,000, depending on the number of months of service. Second, they were given the benefit of the university and retraining program. In many cases these benefits were extensive. I took advantage of that particular program.

The third form of help was given under the Veterans Land Act. Many farmers were re-established under the Veterans Land Act, others were established on smaller pieces of land under the smallholding provisions of the VLA. These holdings varied from two acres to approximately half an acre. Concessions were made to those holding even half an acre if the veteran was 50 per cent disabled. Also, that small piece of land could be fairly close to another piece on which he might build. In other words, the land did not all need to be in one block but all the pieces had to be reasonably close to one another.

It was decided in 1964—and I think it is safe to say the committee really did not put up much of a fuss—that 1974 was to be the cut-off date for building under the Veterans Land Act provisions. Most of us were thinking in terms of farmers and of the age of veterans. We were also thinking, when making that decision, that the final cut-off date was ten years away. Those ten years have gone awfully fast and we are rapidly approaching 1974, the final cut-off date for building. Many veterans really do not consider the smallholding provisions until they are about to retire. I have received a considerable number of letters from veterans in the past two or three weeks. These people are much better informed about the March, 1974, cut-off date than they are about the fact that they should have a certificate of qualification issued before October, 1968, in order to qualify under the Veterans Land Act.

I am asking that we extend this provision and eliminate the qualification date. Under the smallholdings section a veteran was able to obtain up to $18,000 under the Veterans Land Act for acquiring land and building a home. Of this amount $6,000 was at 3.5 per cent interest. Therein lies the advantage of the smallholding legislation. The remaining provision and advantages are involved in the repayment program. If the repayment was completed there were other built-in advantages amounting to about $1,500. In my opinion, there is no justification in cutting off the Veterans Land Act as far as it affects smallholdings. I do not want to see a farmer saddled with an operation from which he has to make a living and make payments at an advanced age, but the letters I receive with regard to smallholdings indicate a number of problems.

One of my colleagues showed me a letter the other day which he received from a person who has lived in Yellowknife since the war. That city is quite northerly and I presume this man does not want to stay there for the rest of his life. He has some savings and now wants to take advantage of the smallholding section of the Veterans Land Act and move to British Columbia. He said he did not know about the qualifying date, and I believe him. Therefore, he cannot take advantage of the Veterans Land Act. He also said he has not been able to take advantage of other sections. But if the record is checked I think it will probably be found that he did receive credits which will now have to be repaid. After 30 years, a person's memory sometimes tends to be faulty. This is not an insurmountable obstacle. That money could be repaid in order to take advantage of the qualification provisions.

I received a letter from one of my constituents who had received a re-establishment credit in 1954 of $270. After repaying his re-establishment credit he qualified under the smallholding section. He looked around for a suitable property but was unable to find one. When he notified the department that he was unable to find a suitable property he was refunded his re-establishment credit. He lost his certificate of qualification because he drew his re-establishment credit for the second time. Obviously, this man has qualified. Even though the qualification was withdrawn, I suggest that he is still qualified regardless of the fact that he gave up his certificate.

If the members of this House really believe the veteran has the right to take advantage of the Veterans Land Act, they will do three things to make it worth while. First, they will have to convince the minister and his officials that it is necessary to wipe out the qualifying date, at least with regard to smallholdings. I am sure that would be difficult for the minister to do. When I asked the minister if he would settle for ministerial discretion he said, "In no way." I do not blame him. If we are going to do this, I do not see why we should load all our problems on the minister and he should have to make the decisions. I think it should just be withdrawn.

Second, in order to be fair to someone living in an urban community I think the $18,000 restriction should be changed. It is unreasonable. In the Toronto Star the other day a lot for a house was advertised at $18,000. The lot was on the edge of a ravine which had not been filled. I am not sure whether the ravine would have to be filled before building, but after paying $18,000 for the lot there would not be much left for the tent he would have to put on it. A much more reasonable qualification would be $25,000, considering the change in land value in urban areas.

Third, if we are going to make this change we should also change that which is bothering the minister and his department, namely, the administration section in the Veterans Land Act. This smallholding section, including the terms and regulations, should be turned over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the Farm Credit Corporation for administration. There is really no justification for duplicating the administrative costs. The amount being spent on the Veterans Land Act program is not being increased but the per unit administrative costs are rising quite steeply. Despite what the vice-chairman of the committee says, we should make these kinds of suggestions. If they have the support of all members of this House, particularly in a minority government situation, they should receive consideration, because we are not necessarily dealing with a costly item.

The minister and the committee should give serious consideration to eliminating the qualification date of October, 1968, as well as eliminating the commencement of construction date of March, 1974, which is rapidly approaching. All veterans should have an equal right in making their own decision. This qualifying date eliminates that right for those who were not in a position to take advantage of this program ten years ago but are in that position today. If they are now in such a position we should make these advantages available to them.

In view of the service these veterans gave to our country they should be entitled to a 3½ per cent interest rate on the first $6,000. The balance would be at CMHC rates. If administration is the costly item, it should be taken over by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If we do this we will be making a contribution to the welfare of the veterans of our country.

I hope the minister conveys to the cabinet and Treasury Board the support he has received from the opposition by using one of their opposition days for the veterans of Canada. I hope the minister can convince the cabinet that the proposal, particularly with regard to war veterans pensions, is reasonable, just and supported by all members of this House.

● (1520)

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell you how pleased I am to be able to contribute to this debate. I was pleased to be a member of the veterans affairs committee. Most of us have only one thought, and that is to make a unanimous decision about the proper treatment of veterans as far as pensions are concerned. At present there seems to be one little snag, but I believe this will be overcome shortly.

All hon. members have been concerned about the availability of medical treatment for veterans. There are still about 900,000 veterans in Canada. In all quarters of the House, arrangements for their medical care are held to be of first importance. The amount of time devoted to treatment of members of the armed services by the Department of Veterans Affairs amounts to 10,455 man-years annually. However, only about 20 per cent of the expenditures of the department are used for this purpose. It should be pointed out, also, that some of this expenditure is recoverable through provincial insurance plans.

After the First World War treatment services and hospitals were set up. Some treatment was, of course, carried out in civilian hospitals and by private doctors. At the present time, diagnostic and other treatment is available to recipients of war veterans allowances. I think most of those benefiting from these services have been fairly generously treated; at least, that has been the case in my experience and I believe most hon. members share this view.

However, the department also looks after current members of the armed forces, members of the RCMP and others in the public service, so the department has to administer about 5,000 beds in eight veterans hospitals in addition to 364 beds in three veterans homes. There is also some contracting-out of veterans care to university centres, especially in cases where hospitals have been turned over to the community. I saw some of this work in Sunnybrook hospital. It became fairly obvious that, taking account of the diminishing number of chronically ill or wounded, people who had succumbed to the advances of age or to their wounds, the treatment of veterans became concentrated on those with acute illnesses and that to carry on highly organized and beautifully equipped hospitals for veterans, when their numbers did not fill those hospitals, was both uneconomic and undesirable.

Moreover, we think very strongly that veterans should be given the very best treatment available; they need a high quality of care such as is available in community general hospitals and university teaching hospitals. For this reason there has been a change of emphasis in the type of treatment carried out. Since 1968 there has been a reduction of 12 per cent in the use made of hospital services on a patient-day basis.

As hon. members have pointed out, we have been very lucky, or blessed, because we have had no new wars to contend with. The number of veterans requiring chronic patient care is decreasing all the time, and we ought now to move in the direction of providing the required service to an increasing extent by reserving beds in community general hospitals. What worries most hon. members who are interested in the welfare of veterans is the feeling that some of the old, well-known hospitals have been graded down by being turned into community hospitals. I have mentioned Sunnybrook hospital. There is the hospital in Ste. Foy, Quebec, and there is the Lancaster hospital in Saint John, New Brunswick. These three institutions have been transferred. I do not think the problems mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie) are insoluble. Since one of my hon. friends may well be speaking about that aspect of the question, I shall not mention it further.

The implementation of hospital and medical care insurance plans by provincial governments is having an effect upon the occupancy rate of veterans hospitals, and we shall have to accept the situation. A high proportion of veterans are now insured under provincial plans so the cost of their medical treatment is recoverable from the province. Again, now that veterans are insured, many of them choose to enter hospitals near their own homes. This results in more vacant beds being left in the veterans hospitals.

In many instances the provinces realize that they already have a major responsibility for the operation of veterans hospitals. Increasing emphasis on regional health planning has encouraged the provinces to reassess the unused assets represented by facilities in veterans hospitals. Throughout negotiations the department has not neglected its responsibilities to veterans. It has intensified programs for the modernization of equipment and accommodation, ensuring adequate treatment and facilities for veterans and assisting in the retention of essential professional services.

Negotiations for the transfer of Deer Lodge hospital, Winnipeg, are nearing completion and they have recently been initiated for Westminster hospital, London. It is also understood that discussions with the provinces appear favourable toward the initiation of negotiations for the transfer of Camp Hill hospital, Halifax; Queen Mary veterans hospital, Montreal; Ste Anne's hospital, Ste Anne de Bellevue; Rideau veterans home, Ottawa; Colonel Belcher hospital, Calgary; Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver; and Veterans hospital, Victoria. Although it is evident that the transfer of veterans hospitals may not be completed by the original target year of 1973-74, there is promise that it may not be delayed too long after next year.

I thank hon. members for allowing me to speak today. I want to add my felicitations to those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in respect of the minister, for his superb handling of his ministry.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to this motion because I believe this parliament should do everything possible to speed benefits for war veterans as unanimously recommended by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I am sure representations have been made in the past year regarding the basic rate of pensions and the inequities of the system, particularly with the inflationary trend. I am sure persons making those representations on behalf of veterans have been told that a joint study group has prepared a report and that we must await the report before we can recommend to cabinet any changes in the present system.

The report has been submitted to and unanimously accepted by the standing committee of this House, and I am sure the speed at which the matter was passed through the committee must have established a record. There was not one dissenting vote. Everyone who spoke said he did not want to hold up the recommendations a moment longer than necessary. We did not even hear all the witnesses who planned to plead the case for war veterans. Newspapers, veterans' organizations and veterans' magazines all praised those who contributed to the study.

Many of us will recall reading newspaper headlines at the time the report went through, some of which were "Pension plan moves quickly", "Basic pension rate recommendations favoured", "Break for veterans", "New regulations for the burnt-out pensioner", "Ottawa moves to raise pension of war veterans". Then came the one that caused some of us to raise our eyebrows, "New veterans pension plan encounters hurdles in cabinet". We were a little bit disturbed on reading that.

The minister is regarded highly by all members of the standing committee. We applauded his statement on the introduction of the joint study report and I am sure we all felt it would be a simple "a-b-c" matter when dealt with by the cabinet, but apparently this was not the case. I thought this year we had made a breakthrough, but with the delay in cabinet I expect we will be told that the recommendations will be changed or shelved. I am very disturbed about that prospect. Emotions run high when this sort of thing happens, especially when we think of the millions of dollars we pour into useless LIP programs; how some of the industry, trade and commerce people toss off a few million dollars to an industry group and say it was a calculated risk or that we are gaining experience in this field.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is pushing for more social increases; and one remembers that time in the past year when we paid out $1.5 billion in unemployment insurance benefits because of poor economic planning and forecasting. Yet now we find the government holding back on increases in veterans pensions. What group of people deserves more consideration than our war veterans? We will, with great fanfare, give millions of dollars in grants to emerging nations and rush to the aid of victims of national disasters in other countries and justify our gifts on humanitarian grounds, but what group in society needs more help than our war veterans?

I was somewhat embarrassed a few weeks ago when I participated in a celebration in memory of the battle of the Atlantic. It was a ceremony to commemorate those who died in that battle during World War II, involving the placing of wreaths by various veterans' groups, the municipality and the province of Ontario on the Cenotaph. It was discovered that the person representing the Department of National Defence had no wreath. I was contacted and I ordered a wreath comparable to those of the province and the municipality. I was later informed by the department that this was not an allowable expense. It is not the dollar amount which bothers me, as that is not important as far as I am concerned; it is the principle involved. I find it incredible that this government would not pay for a wreath to commemorate those who gave their lives in defence of their country.

The minister made reference to the aims and purposes of the Veterans Land Act. Like other members who have spoken, I have had many persons from veterans' organizations, legions and clubs speak to me about this act. We all recognize the original intent, but times and conditions have changed and the desires of those for whom the legislation was framed have changed. We all know that when the first national housing bill was introduced it did not cover all the conditions we find in the legislation today. If the desire of those eligible for VLA smallholdings is to have retirement acreage or a smallholding on which to spend the last years of their lives, then so be it. Let us change the act to bring that about. But let us not cut if off and give as an excuse the fact that the act was not designed as a retirement plan for veterans.

All this motion does is urge the government to bring in measures to remedy certain injustices in veterans pensions. There are 900,000 veterans still alive in Canada, of which about 78,000 receive war veterans allowances, 130,000 receive disability pensions and 30,000 widows and orphans get pensions. There are about 5,000 veterans in DVA hospitals, and about 60,000 benefiting from the Veterans Land Act program.

We urge the government to act on the joint study report passed unanimously by the standing committee, and to allow those receiving veterans benefits to live in dignity and be removed forever from the need to beg for increased allowances. We urge this government to act humanely and with compassion, and to introduce in the House the necessary legislation to enact the recommendations of the joint study group in respect of the basic rate of pensions.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make some comments about the Veterans Land Act and in so doing I think it appropriate to commence by referring to the title of the act and several pertinent sections of the preamble. the Veterans Land Act is entitled "An act to assist war veterans to settle upon the land". The preamble reads in part as follows:

> Whereas many men now serving in the active forces of Canada have recorded their desire to settle on land or engage in farming when hostilities cease, and it is desirable that suitably qualified veterans be encouraged to seek rehabilitation in the agricultural industry;
> And whereas part-time farming coupled with other employment is an increasingly important aspect of rural and semi-rural life in Canada,
> And whereas it is in the public interest as a measure of rehabilitation to assist in acquiring the ownership of farm homes by qualified veterans . . .
> And whereas the great majority of prospective veteran settlers have limited financial assets and the lack of such assets has proved to be the main obstacle to the fulfillment of settlement contracts and to the acquirement of farm home ownership;
> And whereas it is the purpose of the Dominion Government to provide a measure of financial assistance to veterans on their performance of prescribed settlement conditions in order to promote their engaging in agricultural pursuits either as a full-time occupation or as a part-time occupation coupled with some other employment;—

I believe both the title of the act and those parts of the preamble to which I have referred make crystal clear what the intent, nature and purposes were conceived and understood to be when parliament, on behalf of a grateful country, enacted this rehabilitation measure more than a quarter of a century ago. It was not, of course, the only rehabilitation measure enacted. It was recognized that many veterans would not be interested or find it practical to settle on the land either as full or part-time farmers.

● (1540)

For such veterans, alternative benefits to those of the Veterans Land Act were provided. Here I refer to the university training allowances of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act and to re-establishment credits provided under the War Service Grants Act. Each veteran had the option of deciding which of these alternative benefits best suited his particular rehabilitation needs or desires.

With the benefit of hindsight, one might contend that an additional rehabilitation measure should have been enacted in 1946 to offer veterans special financial and other arrangements with respect to urban housing. In fact, because such provisions were not enacted I believe there has been intermittent pressure over the years to try to make the part-time farming provisions of the Veterans Land Act into housing legislation, a field of course that is and has been covered by the National Housing Act.

As I indicated at the beginning of my remarks, the purpose of the Veterans Land Act clearly was to encourage and assist veterans at the end of hostilities and on their return to civilian life to settle on the land as full or part-time farmers. I believe this purpose essentially has been achieved and with a degree of success beyond all expectations. Dealing solely with the category of full-time farming settlement, I understand almost 32,000 veterans have been established on either commercial or family farm units. Public funds advanced to these veterans, including the ten-year conditional grant benefit of up to $2,320, exceed $347 million. Well over 50 per cent of this number have already repaid their contracts and acquired title to their properties.

It would be unreasonable to expect, of course, that every veteran would succeed. When you consider, however, that less than 200 of these 32,000—just over one half of one per cent—have had their contracts with the director rescinded after consideration by and with the consent of provincial advisory boards, I think it is self-evident that the legislation was well conceived, has been well administered and has achieved the rehabilitation purpose envisaged.

I observed earlier that the Veterans Land Act was enacted more than a quarter of a century ago. Today the average age of veterans of World War II is approaching 56 or 57. This is not the time of life to undertake settlement on the land as a full-time farmer, a fact which is borne out both by the limited number of new farm establishments which are being made under the act and by the number of veterans who are repaying the director and acquiring title. In the calendar year 1972, less than 100 veterans were settled on farms, compared with 11,398 in the fiscal year 1946-47, and close to 700 terminated their contracts.

Undoubtedly, having regard to the basic purpose of the Veterans Land Act and the extended period which had already elapsed since the end of World War II, in 1965 parliament approved terminal dates for loan applications with the object of phasing out VLA lending operations in an orderly manner. Taking all circumstances into consideration, I find that I share the opinion expressed by the minister in his statement to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs on March 6 last, when he said it appeared that the deadlines approved by parliament in 1965 were reasonable then and remain so.

Mr. Speaker, I have a few further comments to make about the Veterans Land Act and, in particular, about the provisions of the act which were designed to assist veterans of World War II, and later those of the Korean special force, to pick up the threads of civilian life following wartime active service by engaging in farming on a part-time basis coupled with off-farm employment. It is my understanding that the concept behind the part-time farming or smallholding provisions of the act evolved in part from the economic and employment difficulties of the thirties when many Canadian families found it possible to overcome, or substantially abate those difficulties by supplementing their meagre or irregular income by what they could produce from the land. Even without the environmental benefits available in rural or semi-rural locations, which are today being recognized by an increasing number of citizens, I believe the concept was sound and reflective of the sense of independence and pride still inherent in the majority of the Canadian people.

Undoubtedly, because economic and employment circumstances for the most part in the 28 years which have elapsed since World War II have not demanded the same degree of agricultural utilization of land by those engaged principally in off-farm employment, there has been a growing tendency to look upon the smallholding provisions of the act primarily as a medium to obtain housing accommodation, in urban areas if at all possible, on favourable financial terms.

Urban housing involves, of course, a field of legislation for which the provisions of the National Housing Act have been particularly designed and are fully applicable. Hence, any further departure from the agriculture use concept of the smallholding sections of the Veterans Land Act would bring them into conflict with and duplicate the provisions of the National Housing Act. The inadvisability of permitting this to happen was, in fact, recognized almost 20 years ago. In 1954, following favourable consideration by government of a proposal made by the Royal Canadian Legion, part II of the Veterans Land Act was enacted to provide financial and other assistance to a veteran who was not interested in, or was unable to settle under, the smallholding provisions of the act but who wished to build his own house on a city size lot. More than 4,300 veterans have obtained building loans under part II.

Since the inception of VLA operations 30 years ago, approximately 90,000 veterans have obtained financial assistance under the small-holding provisions of the act, totalling over $826 million. New house construction was involved in more than one-third of these establishments, including 2,673 homes which were built by the director in 1945-46 to help overcome the housing shortage being encountered by veterans on their return from overseas. As with veterans settled as full-time farmers, those established as small-holders have been equally successful in fulfilling the obligations of their agreements of sale with the director. Almost 30,000 have repaid their loans and acquired title to their properties, and some 6,000 have arranged sales to other veterans. Only 150 contracts have had to be rescinded after consideration by and with the consent of provincial advisory boards.

As I stated at the beginning of my remarks, the part-time farming provisions of the Veterans Land Act were designed to assist in the rehabilitation of veterans following their wartime active service. Some 28 years have elasped since the end of World War II, and almost 20 in the case of the Korean conflict. It is difficult, therefore, to conceive a continuing need for the act as a post-war rehabilitation measure. In fact, of the representations I have received recently for an extension of the new establishment loan deadline of March 31, 1974, almost invariably the desire has been indicated of wanting to use the provisions of the act following retirement from post-war occupations or careers.

The benefits of the Veterans Land Act were alternative to university training and re-establishment credit. The university training program was concluded some 20 years ago. The final date for the use of re-establishment credits was October 31, 1968, which corresponded to the deadline for obtaining a VLA certificate of qualification. We are now approaching the terminal date for new settlement loan applications approved by parliament in 1965, and by next March more than 140,000 veterans will have obtained assistance, under the various sections of the act, of more than $1.1 billion. The Veterans Land Act has been an outstanding success.

● (1550)

In closing, I say to the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie) that one of the largest land developers in the city of London is the national president of the Progressive Conservative party. At present he is working on a housing project almost at the back door of Westminster hospital. The hon. member can rest assured that so far as I am concerned he will never get his hands on this beautiful piece of property. I believe this property would make a beautiful city park for the benefit of all Canadians and veterans.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, does the hon. member rise on a point of order?

[English]

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in the interests of a number of members who would like to offer comments on the motion, I wonder if we could obtain the unanimous consent of the House to limit further speeches to ten minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The Chair must have the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the time limit and confine my remarks to ten minutes. I am interested in speaking on the motion in order to try to do something about the long delay of the government in introducing legislation the effect of which would be to implement the report of the joint study group on the basic rate of disability pension for veterans.

In the report of the joint study group there is a recommendation for not only a monetary increase for veterans but the introduction of a new and important principle. Veterans pensions are to be based on the standard of living; they will no longer be based on the cost of living. There is a very important difference here, because the rate of increase in the standard of living is twice that of the increase in the cost of living. If the cost of living goes up by 3 per cent, it follows that the standard of living goes up by 6 per cent. Therefore, this recommendation will be of definite benefit to our veterans in receipt of disability pensions.

I should like to repeat something that has been mentioned before, because I do not think it can be repeated too often and also to convince the government of our unanimity on the principle of an increase in basic pensions. In addition, I wish to give support to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in his battle with his cabinet colleagues to bring this legislation forward. Let me point out again that every member of the parliamentary standing committee agreed within an hour to send this report back to the House and recommend that it be implemented. Certainly all veterans' organizations agreed, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs himself is in total agreement with it. Finally, it was the work of a group composed of representatives of veterans' organizations, members of the Pension Commission and members of our Department of Veterans Affairs.

What is the reason for the delay, then? It must lie in the cabinet itself. It has refused to accept the report of the committee to which I have referred and it has refused to accept the report of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Surely among all members of the House he, better than anybody else, understands veterans because he is a veteran and he was seriously wounded in the defence of his country. He is a double amputee. Here is a man who above all men should be listened to when he makes a recommendation to the cabinet for some action.

It is difficult to understand why the minister's colleagues are so callous in their attitude toward those men and women who dropped their civilian status, left their work on farms, in fishing, in forestry, in the factory and in the office to take part in the war. These are the men and women who gave their lives so that freedom and democracy should not perish on this earth. Why, then, does it take so long for a group of men to make up their minds to move on this vital issue?

Let us not quibble over a few paltry thousand, maybe million dollars. I think it is apparent to everybody, as I said before, that it is not the minister who is giving us trouble but, rather, the Treasury Board. Perhaps we could pin it right back on the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) himself, because I think he feels that if he takes this action it will be precedent-setting and other pensioners will then raise a hue and cry to have their pensions based on the standard of living. Surely the group of people with whom we are dealing is a very special group. Every member of the House and every Canadian knows what we owe these people. This benefit is only the just dues of a group of people who have earned it.

We hope very sincerely that the effect of this debate will strengthen the hand of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and will result in immediate action. I wonder sometimes if he should not carry some of his old hand-grenades into the cabinet meeting, pull the pin and say to his colleagues, "Look here, boys; it is time we settled this matter and brought the legislation forward". We hope that the debate today will have the effect of a hand-grenade under the seats of the people who are so tardy in taking this action.

I want to turn my attention for a brief minute or two to the Veterans Land Act which has been mentioned today. By and large, everybody agrees that it has been fairly administered except on one point. It seems to me that it is totally unrealistic, in today's situation with regard to housing, that it should be required of a veteran that he own one-tenth of an acre before being eligible under the act for a grant to build a house. To purchase a lot of this size would require an astronomical sum of money. Nobody can afford to buy land of the size required in a residential area. Also, land suitable for the building of a house is too scarce; it is just not available. In addition, the municipal building by-laws would not permit the sale of this size of lot in a subdivision where a veteran would wish to build a house.

The veteran's increasing age makes it necessary that he locate his house, not out in the country somewhere where one could perhaps purchase a tenth of an acre on a farm but in a city, town or village where facilities, goods and services which he requires in his declining years are readily available. We raised this matter at one time in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs when the director in charge of the Veterans Land Act was present. He said it would not be fair to change the rules in the middle of the game. I submit that we are in a totally different ball game today from the time this act was first set up and these conditions laid down. I think it would be difficult for anyone to remember the conditions which existed at the time this legislation was brought into effect.

In conclusion, I have a final few words with regard to the cut-off date of March 31, 1974, when the veteran should take up his option to take advantage of the provisions of the Veterans Land Act and build his own house. If the government is adamant in sticking to this deadline, which it says it is, then I think this date should be given the widest possible publicity as it approaches. let no veteran say that he did not know it was coming. We can make it known through the veterans' magazines and through letters to veterans, if we know their address; and I know this is a problem because the department does not know the current addresses of many veterans.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I have used more than my allotted time. I know others want to speak on this motion, but I think we cannot stress too strongly the need for cabinet action to bring forth legislation to give effect to this very important principle of standard of living escalation for veterans disability pensions.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I think it bodes well for the veterans of this country that so many hon. members wish to participate in this all-important debate that we must limit ourselves to ten minutes in order to allow all hon. members to have their say. The veterans should be cheered by this show of interest demonstrated by members on both sides of the House.

With all the splendid improvements in veterans legislation over the past few years one might expect to see a certain amount of complacency set in with respect to veterans affairs. But not so, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that this is not the case, due in large measure to the man who now holds the portfolio of Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), who has seen to it that that portfolio will remain a lively one, introducing legislation with beneficial changes for our veterans. Not to be forgotten is the fact that all the government's legislation introduced for the benefit of veterans is available for their use.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

It seems to me that in a debate on a motion such as this it would be very easy for a member of the government or a supporter of the government to say that we have done so much and to pat ourselves on the back. But I do not think this should be the role of a government member. I also think that the Minister of Veterans Affairs put his case very well today and it does not need any supplementary argument from me.

In the previous parliament I had the honour of serving as a member, as vice-chairman and as chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. This has been one of the highlights of my short parliamentary career thus far, and it may be the reason why I am still receiving letters from veterans all across Canada. One of the things disturbing them is the long delay in rulings upon applications for disability pensions. Today I was very pleased to hear of the changes that have been made to reduce these delays, one of them being a 14 per cent increase in the size of the staff. This should help cut down the delays and should cut into the backlog of cases that must be heard. I was also interested to hear the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) indicate that the backlog of cases does not comprise simple cases, that most cases need a lot of research and a lot of work. Fortunately, we now have the personnel to do that sort of job.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, welcome the idea of the department moving out of the hospital field and the action already taken in that regard. As veterans get older there will be less tendency for physicians to take up work in veterans hospitals, because there they will be treating similar ailments; they will be dealing only with the geriatric type of disease. Because our veterans are entitled to the best care we should get them into the best hospitals. But, Mr. Speaker, that is going only part of the way. There is no suggestion of reducing the amount of money by having them cared for in other hospitals, and I suggest that the department has an obligation to follow up these transfers, to keep an eye on veterans and to see if they are properly treated and given the particular attention they deserve. I would also like to see the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs perform a grand jury role and visit hospitals on an annual basis, talking to the veterans in them in order to make sure that they are getting the care and the attention they have earned.

I welcome the action taken by the minister so far as European prisoners of war are concerned. I have had great interest in the POW situation over the past five years. I know that former ministers made provision for a study of the files of veterans who had been prisoners of war to see if there was a common ailment running through them. Unfortunately, the files do not show many things that are bothering veterans. Many people have had nervous breakdowns and these are not shown in the records. That is why I welcome the study being conducted now by Dr. Hermann. He, too, is studying the files and meeting with veterans groups. I note that he has sent out a questionnaire. In my local newspaper I inserted a plea that veterans not be apathetic about that questionnaire. I pleaded with them to fill out the forms so that Dr. Hermann will be in a position to make a comprehensive report for the consideration of the department.

One other matter I would like to deal with is the pension paid to widows. At present there is a 48 per cent cut-off. If a veteran had 48 per cent disability, then his widow on his death would draw the widow's pension; but if he had disability beneath that level, she could not draw the pension. I believe consideration should be given to paying the widow a proportionate share of the pension. If her husband had 30 per cent disability, why not pay her 30/48ths of the full pension.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where were you when we needed you?

Mr. Cullen: I have been fighting for this for five years. My mother fell into that category, so I know something about it. With respect to the Veterans Land Act, having listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Turner), I think his point is well taken so far as the Veterans Land Act is concerned. But I agree with the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) that we should be looking into the question of a new act. We have been receiving requests from veterans about the kind of assistance available under the act and I believe the department should circulate a questionnaire to find out how many veterans would be interested in taking advantage of a new Veterans Land Act. In that way we could discover positive recommendations for legislation.

I also think the time has arrived for passage of the basic rate legislation. This point has been made by others more eloquent than I am. I know that the minister is doing all he can to bring the matter to a head, and I do not think it is being delayed at the cabinet level. Mr. Speaker, I had many other things to say, probably of a more critical nature, but I see that my time has expired.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the interests of saving time and allowing others to contribute to this debate, and to provide the minister with that additional strength which we all want him to have to take this matter to cabinet, I will not use a number of introductory remarks that I had ready. There are two areas of interest to which I will be turning my attention, but before doing so I want to remind all of us about something we owe our veterans.

There are many things we owe the veterans of this country, but let none of us forget that a great deal of the prestige enjoyed by Canada in world affairs today is due to the commitment of thousands of Canadians in uniform in the various theatres of war in which Canada shared the burden of horror and the glory of victory. Our stance at the United Nations, in NATO and on the world scene at large is in no small measure due to the selfless service our veterans gave to their fellow countrymen and to mankind. This is the background against which we should be considering these matters today.

There are in my riding many classes of veterans. There are some with longstanding claims to benefits of one kind or another. None wants to be a mendicant, yet unfortunately many of these veterans are obliged to adopt tactics that no self-respecting citizens, especially our veterans, should be forced to take. Our veterans should not be put in that position. They are proud men and they have reason to be proud.

My remarks this afternoon are confined to two particular sections—veterans hospitals and pensions to servicemen who retired early because of the age-rank formula at a time when salaries were well below the national average.

In respect of the veterans hospitals and the facilities offered to veterans there, I speak particularly about the veterans hospital in Victoria which serves many of my constituents. Reports are circulating in the area and it came to my ears earlier this week that negotiations between the federal government and the province of British Columbia relating to takeover of that hospital have been concluded or are nearing conclusion. I hope these reports are incorrect, because I would remind the minister that about three weeks ago he wrote a letter to me indicating that nothing that could be described as negotiations were in sight at that time, although conversations on the matter had been under way for some time. It would cause me considerable discomfort and worry to learn that he can say one thing to me in writing and yet sanction the continuance of negotiations to take over that hospital.

Whether we are at the conversation or the negotiation stage, I am wondering what action the minister is taking to reassure those who have an undeniable claim on the services of that hospital that they will continue to enjoy their earned rights. It is indeed my view that more should be done to provide this reassurance. Many of my constituents are worried and asked me for reassurance, and I give it on the strength of the letters I receive from the minister. However, not being in the government I cannot give them that assurance with the same effect as the minister can. I therefore urge that the minister speak specifically to this matter and reassure these people. It is all the more necessary, I submit, in view of correspondence that I have in my office and the rumours that none the less continue to circulate. I merely bring this to the attention of the minister so that the matter can be corrected.

My other concern, and the concern of a very large number of my constituents and of many ex-servicemen across the country, is with the pensions they receive because they retired in that period of our development, in the late forties, fifties and sixties, when their salaries, the base on which the pensions are calculated, were abnormally depressed below the wage and salary levels in effect across Canada. Meanwhile, those who remained in the service saw their salaries increase, so that when their time comes to retire they will have a base that will provide what might be called a livable pension, at least much more livable than those whose base in some instances was as low as $4,000 and few higher than $12,000, as compared with the $10,000, $12,000 and $25,000-range bases that exist today.

An escalation formula seems to be necessary, therefore, and it has been adopted in certain limited circumstances. Something much more energetic must be done in this area to take into account two significant developments: first, the salary increases that have occurred since these servicemen had to retire and, second, the inflationary forces that are attacking veterans pensions and pensions for all Canadians—all pensions, from whatever war. Something must be done to prevent these pensions withering away under the searing wind of inflation.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I hope others will cover those aspects of this question which I should have liked to deal with. I am sure this debate will provide the minister with the ammunition he needs to convince cabinet that much more must be done, and done urgently.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to congratulate the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) for the presentation of his motion this afternoon. We have had already some discussion of veterans affairs during this session of parliament, but I think that now we can isolate, in the debate on this resolution, those points which are still outstanding.

We have some converts, or spokesmen on the government side for these particular points. I must say, however, that I was somewhat disappointed in the minister's reply. I know that nothing has been mentioned about the European theatre of war prisoners, but that the matter is in hand and I am glad to see that progress has been made. I am anxiously awaiting progress reports. I have yet to meet a prisoner of war who has been contacted, and I am wondering just how the choice is made.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Were you?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, but I am a living symbol of all the bad things that came out of it. Regardless of that, I am just wondering how extensive the sampling will be. I have heard some rather odd rumours about the surveys that are being made. Some of the questions may be considered to be rather prying regarding the present level of income, the present value of property occupied, etc. I do not want to compare them with veterans who were not prisoners of war and civilians to see what the position is, but there may be an argument for that. However, I should like to see the package before I agree to it.

I am glad that the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), the former chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, has voiced support for the changes to benefit the widow of a veteran pensioner whose entitlement was less than 48 per cent. We urged this as far back as 1963. The cost of giving a portion of a deceased veteran's pension to his widow is minimal.

Starting four or five years ago one could see the attitude of cabinet toward veterans affairs. They did come through with some things, but reluctantly, and that was only after hard pressure. Perhaps this is just because of the composition of cabinet, because the age group is different. I hope the younger members of this House are not infected with the idea that I have heard some young people express today—"They have had their war and it is a matter of history. We do not need the parades and ceremonies; let's forget about it. They have written about it in books and it is all there." This is the rather callous, unheeding attitude of those who fail to recognize that if it had not been for the sacrifices of those men and women, the young persons of today would not have the opportunity of moving about and enjoying life as they do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The same thing applies in many, many countries. So I say a great debt is owed to a person who is totally disabled today. One has merely to go through the veterans hospitals to see what the results have been.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

One matter on which I must criticize the minister is in regard to the veteran who is residing overseas and who has not come back to qualify under the 12-month residence clause. The minister has said that matter is under review. I would say this question has come under active pressure, certainly from me, for six years and I am sick to the teeth of hearing the same blessed reasons. These are administrative matters. Frankly, considering the limited number of people in the United Kingdom who might be subject to this benefit—there are about 700—the difficulty, with a little bit of good will and the elimination of some of the tunnel vision that seems to exist at certain levels of the department, could be overcome. I could show the minister letters and replies, not from the previous minister but from the minister before that who was not even interested in this subject.

Let me make my last point. I must berate the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, for giving this House the same sort of answer with regard to the Veterans Land Act that has been contained in correspondence from 1971 on. Young veterans who have been in the forces and are now retiring have been kept in the forces because they were wired in, so to speak, under a pension scheme. The minister must know the effect of that wiring in. After so many years in the service, the serviceman pretty well has to stay in until his time has expired; otherwise he would lose too much under the servicemen's pension provisions. That veteran is now coming out. His contributions and sacrifices were as great as those of any veteran who got out of the service at the end of the war and availed himself of the veterans charter. He was in a position to avail himself of it; he took a claim check on it. The only trouble is that the government and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) are saying, "That claim check has now been discounted; it is worth only one-tenth of what it was worth." Entitlement is proportionate to relevant service.

Of course, we are not going to set up an agricultural rehabilitation program, any more than we would set up the homestead program that we set up after World War I. After World War II we did not ask the men to homestead as we had done after World War I. We are dealing with another generation now, and housing is the question that these people must face. The provisions of the Veterans Land Act are adequate; but, today just walk around any city and see how much these men would have to pay.

The department insists on half an acre, with some modifications. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the Veterans Land Act is no longer that of turning veterans into farmers or part-time farmers. We are asking veterans to find an equity of $10,000, $15,000 or $18,000 simply because the government refuses to increase the ceiling on advances that can be made under the Veterans Land Act. Veterans are told, and I have correspondence to this effect, that they can go to CMHC.

Mr. Marshall: Shame.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are told to take their chances there. So in cases of that kind, what is the worth of the veterans charter? Our veterans are told it is not worth the paper it is written on. Borrowing ceilings are limited. These loans are not going to cost the government or the taxpayer more money, because mortgages are taken out. These moneys that are advanced to the veteran are repayable. The terms may be a little easier than those he would get from CMHC or a conventional mortgage company, but that was the very purpose of the scheme at the beginning. So why take the advantage away from him in this case?

I urge these considerations on the minister. I have correspondence on these subjects, some acknowledged, some not acknowledged. I have letters that repeat, frankly, the same out of date arguments as were put forward by the hon. member for London East in justification of the present attitude regarding the Veterans Land Act. In so many words they say, "The veterans program was determined by this government to be a running down program." I should like to see any minister of veterans affairs walk into a Canadian Legion hall tonight and say that the veterans program is a running down program. I wonder how long he would last.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I apologize if I exceeded my time.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, recognizing that we are running short of time, I shall be brief. I welcome this opportunity to take part, as a new member, in my first debate on veterans affairs. I say this with considerable feeling as my father was a veteran of the First World War and as, in a modest way, I served with the armed forces of my country some years ago.

I represent a riding in which there are a great many veterans and veterans' dependents, many of whom were in my constituency before I was elected. I have heard from them about some things which, under the present law, did not seem in their view to be right and I want to bring these to the attention of the minister and the House. In particular I wish to mention a matter that was brought to my attention by a lady of my riding, Mrs. Rodgers, whose husband, Archibald Graham Rodgers, was a soldier in the Canadian army and died recently. He was a veteran of the Second World War and served with the Royal Canadian Artillery, being wounded in action and mentioned in dispatches. As a result, he was awarded a pension of less than 48 per cent. As a consequence of his death, the pension has now lapsed and his widow and children are not able to benefit from it. His widow, Mrs. Rodgers, has said to me that this should be brought to the attention of hon. members of this House, and I agree with her.

It seems to me that there is an inconsistency in a pension system which is geared to help the veteran and his family but which, just when the family has the greatest need for money, takes it away. The second thing Mrs. Rodgers brought to my attention was that the entitlement to the option under the Veterans Land Act, an option which expires in March, 1974, expires if the veteran dies before that time. Again, I think she is right in saying that this does not make sense, inasmuch as the benefit which this country properly gave to its veterans will not go to the loved ones, to the family of the veteran, in case of death.

It is not always that members mention individual cases in the House. In the case of this widow and her now deceased veteran husband I thought it proper that the House hear that the sacrifices he made and the principles for which he fought have been mentioned by the widow to her Member of Parliament. Therefore I have had the privilege of bringing this matter to the attention of the House and am grateful for the consideration and attention I have received.

May I mention something else, Mr. Speaker. Reports from British Columbia indicate that the recent raises in veterans pensions have not been reflected in any increase in that province. I am sure the minister is aware of this and I hope he will give the matter consideration. Lastly, let me repeat a verse that was contained in a book about soldiering and the armed forces that someone gave me many years ago. The verse is part of an old sonnet which has come down, from hundreds of years ago. It goes like this:

God and the soldier we alike adore,
In times of danger, not before.
The danger gone, all things requited,
God is forgotten, the soldier slighted.

I think there is great truth in that old verse. However, I know that all members are united in their determination not to allow this to happen to our soldiers. Posterity will not say that that is an attitude of which we are guilty.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with virtually all members who have spoken in this debate this afternoon to urge the government to take action now to increase the veterans war disability pension. As a former member of the Royal Canadian Air Force and now a member of the Legion in my constituency, I have had of course direct contact with men and women who are concerned about the veterans' increase.

● (1630)

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has since assuming this portfolio done a great job for the veterans of Canada. I join the debate simply to ask him to extend the good work he has done to include this one category that so far has been excluded from significant improvement. On behalf of the government, the minister has promised an increase in the war disability pension but it has not yet been brought forward. We have not yet received a clear indication of the time when that change will be made. I suspect the minister is having a little trouble with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), and perhaps with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), in getting the needed financial resources to implement what I know he desires.

If the efforts of members of all parties can lead to a change in the attitude of the government, surely the debate this afternoon—which is a rare expression of virtual unanimity on an issue—should provide additional support for the Minister in cabinet. I do not want to take the time of the House to repeat the points made by many others. This is an important area of concern. Major improvement is needed. The minister has indicated he wants to take action. The time for action is now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, hon. members who have spoken in this debate have indicated their strongest support for immediate action to bring into line the disability pension. Customarily, when there has been reform of the veterans charter the reform has not proceeded on a piecemeal basis but right across the board.

One of the reasons this great concern has been expressed in this debate is that we have proceeded to increase the war veterans allowance and there has been delay in a similar increase in the disability pension. I hope that as a result of this resolution now before the House—and indeed this is the main purpose of it—the minister's hand will be strengthened and he will be able to convince the government that this matter requires the utmost priority.

The term "utmost priority" is quite frequently used with regard to governmental expenditures. One of the criticisms of the present administration is that it has its priorities upside down; it is dealing with shadow issues rather than substance issues. The group of veterans in this country who were faced with the ultimate priority, the survival of the thin fabric of democracy, should have the first consideration.

I want to make one other observation in this brief presentation, that is, to point out that the issues have been clearly laid down by veterans' organizations in this country. No one has to be uncertain as to where the priorities lie. I pay tribute to them. I hope their petitions, pleas, presentations and briefs will be reinforced by what has taken place here today.

There is one particular veterans' group I wish to mention at this time. That is the Polish Combatants Association which is meeting in Ottawa this weekend. It is the fifteenth conference of that association. They are honouring one of the outstanding veterans of World War II, General S. Kopanski. A lunch was sponsored today by the Minister of State responsible for multiculturalism (Mr. Haidasz) which was attended by General Kopanski. General Kopanski and his Polish comrades were the first to meet the onslaught of the totalitarian system. He is known as the hero of Tobruk. Had the supermen not been stopped at Tobruk in 1941, the history of civilization would have been changed. The Polish soldiers under the leadership of General Kopanski played a large role in that victory.

I mention these gentlemen because in their comments at the luncheon today they expressed gratitude to a former minister of veterans affairs from the Maritimes, the late Colonel Alf Brooks who during his term of office in this important portfolio undertook a major review of the veterans charter. It was as a result of that review that the members of the Polish Association Combatants, the SPK, now resident in Canada were given full benefits under the Canadian veterans charter. Colonel Brooks is typical of the many members of this House who have held the veterans affairs portfolio. I think the present incumbent would give the same emphasis and consideration that was given by the hon. gentleman to whom I have referred. Today is the twenty-ninth anniversary of the victory at Monte Cassino. In view of the convention taking place in Ottawa this weekend, it is interesting to note that the Canadian and Polish soldiers fought side by side in order to achieve that crucial victory.

There is one main consideration. Equalization of the pension rates at this time should have been considered simultaneously with the increase in the war veterans allowance. There is one other point I would like to raise. The benefit of the doubt clause for these veterans, who in many cases made the supreme sacrifice and engaged in the ultimate priority, is still not being adequately applied to veterans in their pension applications. I remind the minister, too, that the current backlog of pension applications is causing unnecessary hardship to these men to whom we owe so much.

All members of this House have indicated that they will give immediate consideration to the necessary legislation. I trust that as a result of this debate the minister will be able to get action through the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity given me to comment on the National Veterans Association and specifically on their representations.

The War Veterans Act has been amended so often that veterans indeed like many other citizens, enjoy greater advantages, but there are still major inequities to be corrected. We request amendment of the act in order that those who have been left out may benefit more by it. In fact, in such associations, certains classes or individuals are always neglected.

We are pleased about the pension increase. We are aware that the budget provided for pension increases for veterans as well as for certain other groups. The budget provided for a number of increases, such as for old age security and disability pensions.

The claims of national veterans organizations are based on a calculation of adjusted incomes, and not just on a means test. These adjustments, Mr. Speaker, are a considerable help to those whose income is limited at a time when the cost of living is rising.

Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of the pension increase, but with certain reservations. We are aware that we will not solve the basic problems by continually raising pensions. We must see to the foundation of our economy. The more we raise pensions, the more we raise the cost of services.

We are aware, Mr. Speaker, that the correct solution does not involve throwing the economy off balance. The economy needs basic rebalancing, and I wish to point this out to my fellow members because we are elected to rectify the deficiencies that exist in our society. By raising pensions of all kinds we get into a visious circle. It puts up the cost of living, and the more that increases, the more the economy is thrown off balance.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to stabilize our economy once again, we will have to use means other than those we have used until now. We will have to modify our structures because a succession of increases will lead inevitably to economic suicide.

Mr. Speaker, the more we raise pensions, the closer we get to an increasingly centralizing state and the use of progressively less revealing and less honest means for the citizens, because as they get higher pensions they lose part of their freedom. And so, Mr. Speaker, we are fighting to protect our freedom.

We also know, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to point it out before closing, that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I am sorry I have to interrupt the hon. member, but it being 4.45 p.m., pursuant to a special order given this day, the debate on the motion before the House is now deemed to be terminated.

● (1640)

[English]

Pursuant to special order made earlier this day, it being 4.45 p.m. the debate on the motion now before the House is deemed to have expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House will now proceed to the consideration of objection relating to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Newfoundland.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

CONSIDERATION OF OBJECTIONS TO REPORT OF NEWFOUNDLAND COMMISSION

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): On April 18, 1973, notice of objection in the form of a motion was filed with Mr. Speaker in the following terms:

That, pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, (Chapter E-2, R.S.C. 1970), consideration be given by this House to the matter of an objection to the provisions of the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Newfoundland, laid before this House by Mr. Speaker on Thursday, April 5, 1973, on the grounds set forth hereafter:

1. Throughout Newfoundland the commission failed to give special emphasis to geographical considerations, the sparsity, density and relative rate of growth of the population, and ignored or overlooked the special problems of communication and transportation when they divided the said province into six new electoral districts.

2. The commission failed to give special consideration and special appreciation to accessibility of one region to another region in many of the rural electoral districts when determining the boundaries of the same.

3. The commission failed to pay proper attention to the physical, social or economic cohesion of many of the new electoral districts created and appeared to ignore and did ignore the question of unity or community of interests thereby rendering adequate representation of the people in Parliament a virtually impossible task.

4. The commission failed to take into consideration that the boundaries of the majority of electoral districts of Newfoundland as they existed prior to redistribution were in accordance with the spirit of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada.

5. The inconvenience to any Member of Parliament attempting to maintain contact with constituents spread over some electoral districts would be considerable. The expense of travel in attempting to maintain such contact might well be considered exorbitant.

6. And such other objections that the undersigned Members may consider applicable in order to carry out the spirit and terms and conditions of the act in question.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. In accordance with the provisions of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act we have to commence this debate today. The objections to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission are set out in the letter which was filed with Your Honour on April 13 and read into the record a few moments ago by Your Honour.

We object to the report of the commission because it fails to take into account all the arguments which we have set out in the letter which will appear in today's record. More particularly, we base our objection on the fact that the province of Newfoundland under the report now before the House will lose a seat and will be placed in the anomalous position of having fewer seats in parliament today than was the case 23 years ago when Newfoundland became a province of Canada and had a population one-third less than it has today.

We should also be placed in the anomalous position of having four seats fewer than the province of New Brunswick, which has virtually the same population but which is protected by the provisions of the House of Commons Act by virtue of which that province has ten seats in the other place. We, of course, have six seats in the other place; consequently, we feel the province will be underrepresented if this report goes through.

I urge upon the government that it take every step possible to ensure that Newfoundland shall continue to receive adequate representation in this House. We feel that if the report now before the House is adopted, the province will not, and indeed cannot be adequately represented because of the fact that we shall lose a seat, and because the six seats which are to be set up under the report of the commission do not take into account community of interest and all the difficulties which would be encountered by those who would be called upon to represent the province within the proposed new boundaries. Their task would be made more difficult, if not impossible.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my first objection really does not lie within the terms of reference of the commission because I do not think its terms of reference were to deal with the question of six seats as such. The first point I wish to make is that Newfoundland cannot be adequately represented by six seats. We are a big province. Labrador alone is over 112,000 square miles in extent. We need more seats. I urge the government to consider the arguments put forward and to increase the number of seats beyond six, possibly to seven or even eight.

What concerns me more every day is the question of representation, the quality of representation we can give as Members of Parliament if we have constituencies such as Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador or Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. I am picking out the two which are largest in geographical area and which are among the most difficult to travel around. While I am quite prepared to serve one of those constituencies, and will do so to the very best of my ability—I am speaking about the people from Grand Falls to Nain—there is a limit to what any one person can do.

If we are to represent our constituencies properly, we need either a redistribution of boundaries or extra help as Members of Parliament, particularly today when large corporations and governments have such control over people's lives. Far be it from me as a new Member of Parliament to presume to tell other hon. members what the duties of an MP should be, but it seems to me that emphasis ought to be placed on the role of an MP as an ombudsman. It is all very well to get up and make speeches in the House of Commons, but I see an increasing need for a buffer between the individual and corporations or government departments whose activities increasingly affect his life and over which he has so little control.

From this point of view, I think our difficulties will be seriously increased by the boundaries which have been drawn. These boundaries do not take into account the changes that have taken place in Newfoundland since 1949. I do not want to be political about these changes; I simply want to say that the boundaries were drawn up when Newfoundland was a collection of bays. It is no longer a collection of bays; it is now a province with highways and access roads. We have improved transportation and communications; Newfoundland is not the same now as it was in 1949. The redistribution that has taken place does not recognize or take into account that fact, and the boundary lines bear no relation to changes that have gone on in the province.

Let me give an example. The line drawn down the northern peninsula of Newfoundland makes no sense whatever. I am sure my colleague for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) would agree that the problems are the same on his side of the peninsula as they are on mine. It would seem to me that this type of matter was not recognized when these lines were drawn with respect to redistribution, so I think there are excellent arguments for redrawing the lines.

The final point I want to make is this, and I have made it before. I represent the unique area of Labrador. It has much more in common, really, with the Northwest Territories and the Yukon than it does with the island of Newfoundland, but it is legally a part of the province as determined by the 1927 boundary agreement and the decision of the British Privy Council. It has unique geographic, economic and cultural problems. These problems are difficult and require attention. They are just now coming to full flower. If we are to really make that part of the province an integral part, we must solve the transportation and communication problems in that area.

[Mr. Rompkey.]

As I said before, I speak for the people of Newfoundland because I am sure they want to see Labrador become an integral part of the province. If we are to move in this direction we must do justice to these people. I would therefore recommend to the commission that when it redraws these boundaries it considers establishing a seat for the district of Labrador alone, for the reasons I have enunciated.

In conclusion, I must say I do not agree that we should cut down the number of seats to six. We need more representation, and I urge the government to increase the number. Secondly, I suggest the boundary lines bear no resemblance to actual reality in the province and require major readjustment.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the couple of minutes I have at my disposal I want to support the objections raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I appeared before the commission when it sat in the city of Corner Brook in my riding of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, and I was astounded when the chairman of the commission told me that when I had another 112,000 square miles added to my district I would still have the easiest district in Newfoundland to cover. I do not know what was wrong with that judge.

The legislation which authorizes redistribution works directly against the purposes for which hon. members are here in parliament. Everyone knows how vast the workload of Members of Parliament has become. People are looking to members for advice and assistance, and at the same time we have a duty to visit our ridings. This whole procedure, to my mind, is not smart and does not make sense. I support the objections and hope, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated some time ago, that changes will be made to the British North America Act which will make representation by population or by geographic area more relevant to the age in which we live.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to have so much time at my disposal because I honestly thought the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) would continue for the next couple of minutes. I just want to second the motion, if you will, which has been proposed today and commend my three colleagues on the arguments that have been presented. Those arguments are fundamental. The people of Newfoundland are against the whole concept as it has been perpetrated in the last couple of years and has come to the forefront today. The people are very concerned.

I speak today not as a Member of Parliament concerned about political interests but, rather, on behalf of the people who have widespread concern about what is happening in the province. They feel there is something radically wrong when a decision is made in 1973 to reduce representation from seven seats to six seats, particularly in view of what has happened to our population. Newfoundland has over 200,000 more people today than it had in 1949.

Those who recommended these redistribution changes must have had some principle in mind that is not well known, because their recommendations are against all common sense and good reason. We were not allowed to present to the commission our arguments against this proposal. I, personally, filed my intention to present such arguments to that noteworthy judge—perhaps that is a bad choice of words—

An hon. Member: "Noteworthy."

Mr. Lundrigan: Yes, perhaps I have said "noteworthy." My intention to present these objections to the proposed number of seats was overruled and I was not allowed to do so. That is one of the reasons we are making these objections today. There is no need to repeat all the objections, but I want to make one final point before we call it five o'clock, in the hope we can proceed later with the debate.

Something has been happening in Canada in the past half a century with which we as Members of Parliament must take issue today. We are using Newfoundland today as the basis for this particular debate, but this has been taking place across Canada in the last half century. I refer to the urban drift. Most great leaders in our country are unable to cope with the problems facing our urban society. We are now seeing the signs and signals of what could in a decade very well turn into a drift away from rural areas. People are placing a great deal more emphasis on material things and the quality of life than they did half a century ago.

It is incumbent upon legislators, whether on a national or provincial basis, to discourage the population movement to urban centres in Canada. Consequently, the government of this country has a responsibility to maintain the number of seats in rural parts of Canada rather than allow them to decrease, thereby diminishing the power and strength exerted by rural Canada. In view of these events now unfolding, I think we will find that the people in western Canada have a great deal in common with those of us who live in the eastern rural parts of this country. If the trend continues we will not have the same power in confederation which has been traditionally ours.

With regard to the United States, I read recently that the agricultural society in that country has been protected by the constitution and as a result the government cannot ignore that sector as a political force. We are rapidly reaching the point that if we are not careful, or if we overlook the rural parts of Canada and allow a diminishing of political power in those areas, representation there will have no part in the decision-making in this country. This is what is of importance.

The hon. member for St. John's East referred to the confederation of states. We all know what effect this has on civilization. Many people in this country have great concern about the decision-making process. We now have only seven Members of Parliament. In the entire Atlantic provinces we have only 32 members at the present time, just a few more than the city of Toronto. Consequently politicians, being what they are, frequently favour areas with the largest political representation and make decisions on that basis. Very often this is not to the advantage of the country as a whole.

In conclusion, we think amendments must be made to rectify the situation. In this country today there are many points of dissension; not all of them are in Quebec or in the Atlantic provinces. Many of these dissensions are the result of lack of reasonableness on the part of our central government and its system and work to the disadvantage of various regions of the country.

Before calling it five o'clock, I should like, on behalf of my colleagues in the House of Commons, not just those from Newfoundland, to appeal to the government to do something to rectify these decisions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair is in a quandary at this time as to whether hon. members wish the Chair to put the question or call it five o'clock.

An hon. Member: Adjourn the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

An hon. Member: Defer the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Pursuant to section 3 of Standing Order 2, this House stands adjourned until Tuesday, May 22, at 2. p.m.

At 5.03 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

OWNERSHIP OF WATERS OVER CONTINENTAL SHELF—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a very important matter for the Canadian nation. In light of the unfortunate cod war between Ireland—Iceland—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: The war would not have lasted this long if it were Ireland—between Iceland and several European nations I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That Canada express its position to the fishing nations of the world, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the principle of ownership by the coastal state of the waters over the continental shelf be upheld.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House.

● (1410)

Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order respecting the proposing of such motions in the House, following which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has taken it upon himself to refuse them each and every day. Today he has done so from a seat other than his own.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what rule pertains thereto, but I am sure that if an hon. member is not permitted to rise in his place and declare his position on an issue certainly it is not permissible for a member to express his position from another seat in the House. I would think that the rules would protect hon. members on that point. I also hope that the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River does not express the attitude of the House of Commons. We have a serious problem on both our coasts with regard to marine resources, and I would have thought that this House would be very anxious to express to every nation of the world our position that the marine resources over our continental shelf belong to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is attempting on the point of order to bring in an argument in support of the motion he proposed in the first place, and that is entirely out of order.

ECONOMIC EFFECTS OF PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. The motion arises out of the revelations of potentially disastrous effects upon the Canadian economy of a major northern gas pipeline contained in a report on the evaluation of the impact on the national economy of a northern Canadian gas pipeline, prepared by the economic impact committee of the task force on northern oil development. I would therefore move:

That the report on the evaluation of the impact on the national economy of a northern Canadian gas pipeline, prepared by the economic impact committee of the task force on northern development and all other reports prepared by or for the task force on northern oil development be referred to the Standing Committees on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, National Resources and Public Works, Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, for study and recommendations.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I too have a motion under Standing Order 43 which is related to that of my colleague, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan). The situation referred to as the cod war between Iceland and the United Kingdom emphasizes the seriousness of depleting marine resources in the North Atlantic community to a status of extinction because of overfishing by foreign nations. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the resolution passed at the North Atlantic Assembly recommending the appointment of a rapporteur to prepare a full report on this situation be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, and that the rapporteur, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), who made an interim report on May 19, be called as a witness.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—ECONOMIC IMPACT REPORT—BODY TO HEAR POSSIBLE APPLICATION—SUGGESTED COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF CRITERIA FOR APPROVAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who last week indicated that an application for a gas pipeline through the Canadian north is expected perhaps in the final quarter of this year. In view of the wide-ranging questions raised by the draft report prepared by the economic impact committee of the task force on northern development, what body does the government intend to have hear this application that the minister expects in the final quarter? Would it be the National Energy Board?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, under the National Energy Board Act the responsibility for approving, at least in the first instance, the construction of any pipeline and, indeed, the export of gas would fall upon the National Energy Board.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the recommendations by the economic impact committee on page 15 of its report referring to certain basic studies that have to be completed before any decisions could really be made, I would like to ask the minister whether those recommendations have been acted upon by himself or by the government and whether the resultant studies will be made public?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I do not have that document in front of me. I cannot be specific, but of course in general terms the government has been studying the impact of the pipeline from the standpoints of the environment, the social impact and the economic impact in order to put itself in preparation to receive such an application.

Mr. Stanfield: Since the government seems to be getting advice from its advisers indicating that the subject is much more complex than the minister has perhaps indicated in his answers to questions in the House, I would like to ask whether he would agree to confer with the government House leader and have referred to the appropriate standing committee the whole question of the criteria to be considered in the hearing, and the decision upon such an application, and the conditions under which such an application will be granted? Will this whole question be referred to the appropriate committee with all the reports and information that the government may have so that these questions may be considered by a committee of this House with public hearings, if necessary, rather than simply being decided secretly by the government?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the hon. gentleman that the conditions and the criteria have been set out by parliament in the National Energy Board Act and, of course, any application there would entail a public hearing. I do not know whether he is expressing want of confidence either in the statute or in the board.

An hon. Member: Just the government.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—TABLING OF STUDIES—REQUEST THAT PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL OF CONSTRUCTION BE OBTAINED

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Since there have been references to a study I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to table that particular study and the various other studies of his department affecting the Mackenzie pipeline?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a great many of the studies with regard to the Mackenzie pipeline have already been published. With regard to internal discussion documents of this kind, I do not think I would be prepared to table them. I think the government should be entitled to examine these important questions within its own circle without having to make them public subsequently.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I have a further question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is somewhat similar to an earlier question but in view of its importance I think it is necessary to have a definitive answer from the government. In light of the important effects the construction of a pipeline would have on every part of the Canadian economy and every part of Canada, will the minister assure the House that it will not be left to an agency like the National Energy Board that is not directly responsible to the House to decide the matter but that the government will entertain an application only if it is made to the government so that the government can answer to the House and a debate can take place, and that no decision on the building of that pipeline will take place without the prior approval of parliament?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should remind the hon. member again that parliament has declared itself on this question. It has declared by law that such an application shall go to a competent tribunal, the National Energy Board. If the board's decision is favourable to the application, it will then come for consideration by the government. If the hon. member is counselling me to break the law, I do not intend to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of members seeking supplementaries. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge. Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I just wanted to indicate that I will recognize the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge for a supplementary and then the right hon. member for Prince Albert for further supplementaries.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In order to clarify the situation, is the minister saying that the government intends to decide on the financing and construction of a pipeline without parliamentary approval and by so doing to repeat his government's political disaster of 1956?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Sir. Parliament has already given approval of the procedures being followed.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—STUDY OF CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROAD AS ALTERNATIVE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the minister has mentioned that the decision in respect of the pipeline will of course have to be made by the National Energy Board. Having regard to the doubts he has expressed respecting the environmental, social and economic effects of a pipeline, as set forth in the report to which reference has been made by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, may I ask the minister whether any task force or group is looking into the question of the efficacy of having a railroad built at approximately the same cost as a pipeline? A railroad would actually have the effect of opening up the north and assuring a large population in the north that would not otherwise take place without railway transportation.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my response to the right hon. gentleman is yes, there is such an evaluation under way. As the right hon. gentleman knows, the initial study made in this regard was the Queen's study which was in part funded by the government of Canada. In collaboration with my colleague, the Minister of Transport, that proposal is being evaluated. I hope to be in a better position to comment further on it by the end of this year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for a very complete answer. Would he be able to let the House know when we might expect a decision in regard to the evaluation that is taking place because generally, all over western Canada, there is a widespread demand for just such a railroad?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would expect that by about the end of this year we would be in a position to respond more fully.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver South and then the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville for supplementaries, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Champlain and return to this matter later.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT POSITION IN LIGHT OF REPORT OF ECONOMIC IMPACT COMMITTEE—SUPPLEMENTARY STUDIES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that three ministers of the Crown have clearly stated that government policy is to favour the Mackenzie route, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether in fact the government agrees with the report mentioned earlier today or whether it disagrees and, further, if it disagrees, upon what possible basis has the government for the last several months been assuring us that it prefers the Mackenzie route?

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the report to which reference was made is an earlier draft of a report which was part of a series of studies that form the basis of recommendations to the various ministers and, by them, to cabinet. Therefore I see no contradiction in the question asked by the hon. member. There was a decision made by government. The hon. member has referred to statements by ministers. We cannot, of course, be bound by working papers of officials, especially earlier drafts of working papers by officials. If we want officials to give their unbiased opinion, it is clear that in some cases there will be elements of these things which will be contradictory of the final decision reached by the government.

Mr. Fraser: In view of the answer just given, can the Prime Minister assure the House that there have been in fact supplementary studies since the study done in October, 1972, which formed the basis of the government's apparent present position? If so, what are those studies, and will they be made available to the public?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that many aspects of these studies have been made public.

An hon. Member: That is the answer to the question?

Mr. Trudeau: That is the answer to the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether we should not, in fairness, give a chance to the hon. member for Champlain to ask a question, subject to returning to this matter. Before calling on the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville I think we should recognize the hon. member for Champlain, after which I will return to this subject matter.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECTS OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF GOLD AND DEPRECIATION OF UNITED STATES AMERICAN DOLLAR—POSSIBLE EXPANSION OF GOLD MINES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the tremendous increase in the price of gold coupled with the decreasing value of the American dollar, could the minister say briefly what effect these factors are having now on the Canadian economy?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to answer this question in only one sentence—

Mr. Matte: I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Could the minister tell us whether the government is now considering the possibility of further promoting the development of gold mines in Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I feel that gold prices show opportunities for the development of gold mines in Canada. As for the general state of the economy, the Canadian dollar remains stable in comparison with the American dollar.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—ECONOMIC IMPACT REPORT—SUPPLEMENTARY STUDIES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary to my previous question and direct it again to the Prime Minister. With respect, I do not think the Prime Minister has answered my question. In view of the considerable publicity today as a result of this report I am asking again, will the Prime Minister tell the House whether there are supplementary reports that negate the effect of this report we are discussing, and is it on the basis of those that the present apparent position of the government is stated?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will not prevent the Prime Minister from replying to the question, but the hon. member suggested that it was a repetition of the first question. The Prime Minister will be allowed to reply if he has any additional information to give to the House, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville on a supplementary.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if I might respond to the last question, the preliminary report the hon. gentleman referred to was negated, of course, in discussions in the committee, and there has been consideration and discussion since that time.

OIL AND GAS PIPELINES—SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF INCOME TAX ON NET EARNINGS—POSSIBLE TAX ON GAS EXPORTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance regarding the economic impact report. In view of information contained in that report that any pipeline would not pay income tax for the first ten years of operation because of tax deferrals and in view of the fact that Trans-Canada Pipelines has not paid income taxes since 1958, the year of inception, can the minister say whether he is considering introducing any changes in tax laws that will require pipelines, either existing or that will be built, to pay income tax based on their net earnings?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this question is still hypothetical, but I will take the hon. member's remarks into consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville for one supplementary, but we will have to try to move to another subject before the end of the question period. Following the question of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North on the same subject.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I believe the question is far from hypothetical. At any rate, can the minister state whether the government is now considering levying an export tax on all Canadian exports of gas from the Mackenzie Valley or elsewhere in this country, in effect creating a two-price system?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is not the sort of policy announcement that would be made during the oral question period.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ESTABLISH GUIDELINES FOR BUILDING NORTHERN PIPELINES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of evidence that the National Energy Board has abdicated its responsibilities under the National Energy Board Act in its advisory function, will the government now consider the advisability of laying down guidelines on the various items that concern parliament and the country vis-à-vis the building of pipelines out of the north?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the preamble, which I think is unfair to the board, I would point out that guidelines have been laid down on a number of occasions directed rather to applicants than to the board as to the manner in which they should make their applications.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Has the minister laid down any guidelines for the National Energy Board to consider when an application reaches them for an Arctic gas pipeline, vis-à-vis Canadian participation in financing?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that the objective of the government would be to give an opportunity to Canadians to acquire 51 per cent of ownership in any such pipeline and the expectation that it would remain under Canadian control.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EFFORTS TO SETTLE DISPUTES INVOLVING AIR CANADA, THE RAILWAYS, AND GRAIN HANDLERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. What progress has been made with regard to efforts to settle the dispute with Air Canada to avert a national airline strike in Canada? Perhaps the minister could also report to the House what progress he is making with regard to two other disputes under his jurisdiction, the railways and the grain handlers?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member that all the disputes in question are in the process of conciliation. With regard to the railways, since the parties could not agree on a chairman, last week the government appointed Mr. Justice Craig Munroe of British Columbia to be chairman of the conciliation board.

Mr. McGrath: Does the minister have anything to report with regard to the Air Canada dispute? Has he received a report on this dispute which threatens to tie up Canada's national airline during the peak traffic period in June?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I have not received such a report, Mr. Speaker.

POSSIBLE GRAIN HANDLERS STRIKE AT THUNDER BAY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. Specifically, what is the government doing in connection with the threat of a grain handlers strike at Thunder Bay? Also, does the government have any plans in abeyance in case a strike comes about and our grain shipments are seriously disrupted?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, obviously the government does not view with any degree of enthusiasm the possibility of a strike in the area to which the hon. member has referred. We are exhausting all available conciliation procedures to try to reach a settlement. We are watching the situation very closely and will do everything possible to prevent such a strike.

PROVISION OF SUFFICIENT RAILWAY CARS TO SUPPLY VANCOUVER TERMINAL ELEVATORS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is related to difficulties in transportation by rail. Bearing in mind that railwaymen are working to rule at the port of Vancouver, could the minister tell us what action he is taking through the Canadian Wheat Board to ensure that the necessary numbers of cars are there to keep the terminals going and move grain through the port? He has put $42 million worth of hopper cars at the service of the railways; yet there is still concern about the shortage of grain at those terminals.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The hopper cars are, of course, improving the capacity of the railways to move grain and move it quickly. There are, however, a number of factors over which no one can exercise control, including a bridge out in the course of the last several weeks. This situation has now been put right and grain is arriving again via the CNR in regular fashion. I am told there were some 1,100 cars in Vancouver today and that all terminals, including the Burrard terminal, will be operating today.

GUIDELINES FOR CONCILIATION OFFICERS IN SETTLING WAGE DISPUTES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Labour. In view of the rapid increase in the cost of living, at the rate of some 13 per cent per annum on the basis of last month's figures, what guidelines is the minister giving to his conciliation officers in terms of settling disputes relating to wage demands?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we have gone a considerable distance from the original question asked by the hon. member for St. John's East. Perhaps we have brought this on ourselves by the inclusion of two additional matters in the hon. member's question. The Chair does not wish to be unfair to the hon. member. The Minister of Labour might reply briefly and then we will go to the next subject.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Without agreeing with the premise of the question, may I say that I believe the question is based on a misconception of the duties of a conciliation officer.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—ESTABLISHMENT OF MINISTRY FOR SPORTS AND RECREATION—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the growing importance of leisure in our society and also of the additional emphasis placed on leisure by the coming Olympic Games, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether while respecting provincial jurisdiction, he intends to appoint in the near future a minister in charge of sports and recreation in Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, and I am not quite sure that if we did so the provinces would consider that we are effectively respecting their constitutional jurisdiction.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Is the right hon. Prime Minister prepared to appoint someone responsible for sports and recreation within the Department of National Health and Social Welfare in view of bringing about recognition of the importance of sports and leisure in relation to the Montreal Olympic Games?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, under the administrative decentralization principle, such a matter would come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

PENITENTIARIES

POSSIBLE SUPERVISION BY PAROLE BOARD OF TEMPORARY RELEASES—STEPS TO PROTECT PUBLIC PENDING INVESTIGATIONS OF ESCAPES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. May I ask whether the government intends to accept the recommendation by the chairman of the National Parole Board that the temporary release program be placed under the supervision of that board? If so, does the government propose to extend the facilities of the board and spread its membership across the nation in various centres so that it can arrive at proper decisions without the risk to society we have experienced in the past?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): As I mentioned on an earlier occasion in the House, a commission was set up last year under Judge Hugessen. That Commission has reported to me. We are presently studying such matters as were mentioned by the hon. member, and I intend to come before the House within a week or two with proposals along these lines.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that there have been further escapes from custody from various institutions over the weekend and bearing in mind that the minister has set up various investigative bodies, may I ask what immediate steps the minister is taking to protect society, particularly at a time when it would appear that the system of keeping people in custody is like a sieve. It is a very dangerous situation, especially when terrible murders are taking place—I have in mind the murder in the city of Hamilton—which are causing unrest and distress throughout society.

Mr. Allmand: With respect to escapes while on temporary absence with escort—I think that is what the hon. member was talking about—

Mr. Woolliams: No, I am talking about escapes. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please.

Mr. Allmand: I understood the hon. member to open his question by talking about temporary absences with escorts and escaping from the escort. With respect to those I have issued instructions that there should be no more of them—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: —no more temporary absences with escort unless the escort understands that the prisoner is not to be out of his sight at any time. It seems that some of these incidents happened after the escort had brought the man to a hospital, or to visit a sick parent, or something of that kind; he left the prisoner out of his sight for a short period of time. I have given instructions that this should be done under no circumstances; if it is, the escort will be suspended immediately.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to clarify my question, Mr. Speaker. I am talking about the sieve whereby these prisoners are escaping, other than those on temporary release. What immediate steps is the Solicitor General taking to prevent further escapes of dangerous, violent criminals from custody?

Mr. Allmand: It depends on the institution. There were a great many escapes from Cowansville. We have already taken steps to increase the number of guards, we have put barbed wire on top of the fence, we have cleared back the bush from the fence, put metal screens over the cell windows, and so on.

An hon. Member: Bolt the doors!

Mr. Baldwin: Let them know the price of food outside!

Mr. Allmand: With respect to the correctional development centre at Laval, the escape there was not due to defects in the walls or the hardware but to a human failure within the system. We are taking steps to ensure that this will not happen again.

TRADE

SUGGESTED VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER TO EUROPE TO PRESENT CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As Canada's export trade with the countries of the European Economic Community and Great Britain has declined by more than $200 million a year during the past two years, and since the loss of the British preference will seriously endanger further $500 million to $750 million of this trade, is it the intention of the Prime Minister personally to visit the heads of the countries forming the European Economic Community in the near future in an effort to improve Canada's trading relationship with those countries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That suggestion was made to me by another member of the hon. gentleman's party about a week ago. I thanked him for the suggestion and said I would consider it most seriously.

Mr. Hees: As Messrs. Heath, Pompidou, Brezhnev and Brandt have just completed, or are in the process of engaging in, meetings to improve the trade of their respective countries, and as President Nixon will be meeting shortly with Mr. Pompidou, Mr. Brezhnev and heads of the EEC countries, does the Prime Minister not consider it would be worth the time involved to announce a visit in the very near future to these important trading countries to improve our own bad relationship with them?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member will realize that these gentlemen he has mentioned are just catching up with what we did in the previous parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I personally spoke to Mr. Brezhnev and Mr. Heath about this subject.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF TAX-FREE PERIOD AVAILABLE TO FOREIGNERS TEACHING IN CANADA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister relating to the Department of National Revenue. In the absence of the minister, I do not know to whom else I should address it. In light of the fact that 40 per cent of the university and college professors in Canada are not Canadian citizens but are from other countries and in light of the fact that many teachers in Canada in other grades of education are unemployed, can the Prime Minister say whether any steps will be taken to end the two-year tax-free period that is available to teachers from foreign countries when they teach in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I could deal with that question since it relates to tax policy. The problem is that the so-called exemption for teachers is provided for under tax treaties and cannot be changed until the treaties are renegotiated. However, we are in the process of renegotiating these treaties at the moment. Our policy has been clearly stated publicly and to the other countries concerned that have bilateral tax treaties with us: we do not intend to include a special exemption for teachers in the future.

● (1440)

Mr. Howard: Would the minister consider giving the same kind of advantage in the future to Canadian born teachers that he is giving nationals from South Africa, for example, and help them to stay at home?

MANPOWER

FARM LABOUR SHORTAGE—PROVISION OF SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS—ACTION TO MEET NEEDS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

As there is a shortage of farm labour on the one hand and insufficient summer employment for students on the other, could the minister tell the House if he will undertake a special program designed to establish a liaison between students seeking employment and farmers in need of labour, thus making possible such a project under advantageous conditions?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly give that every consideration. We are taking some measures relating to this question. One problem is the location of students available for the jobs that are available and, of course, rates of pay and working conditions, but we are addressing ourselves to the problem which has also been raised by other hon. members.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

DEPARTMENTAL POLICY RESPECTING INFORMATION REQUIRED FROM EMPLOYEES

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. Would the minister say for how long it has been the policy of his department to require employees, on pain of prosecution under the Official Secrets Act, to fill out a form requiring them to give their nicknames, their full employment history, whether they are married legally or otherwise, names of blood relatives dead or living, as well as a full itinerary of their travels to communist countries since 1945?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into this matter and reply to the hon. member as soon as possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KILLING OF TWO CANADIAN GIRLS WHILE VISITING VICTORIA FALLS, RHODESIA—PROTEST TO ZAMBIA—ASSSISTANCE TO PARENTS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada registered a formal protest with Zambia in connection with the death of two Canadian girls at Victoria Falls in Rhodesia just a week ago today?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, we have not yet done this. As the hon. gentleman knows, we have an officer in Rhodesia examining the circumstances of this tragedy. As soon as we have a full report we will be in a position to decide what action to take. I should make it clear that we have not accepted the Zambian explanation, and this is one of the reasons we are making the investigation.

Mr. Hales: Can the minister advise the House whether every possible assistance is being provided to the families of these two girls, and what action has been taken in connection with the Zambian murderers?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Leith, our Zambian officer, is now in Rhodesia. He has arranged for the funeral of the Sinclair girl. We are in touch with the parents and, as far as I understand, arrangements are being worked out quite satisfactorily. Mr. Drijberg has now arrived in Rhodesia, and the instructions to Mr. Leith are to get in touch with Mr. Drijberg to see whether we can be of further assistance to him in his tragedy. As the hon. member knows, Mr. Drijberg still hopes that his daughter may be alive.

DANGER OF GRASSHOPPER INFESTATION IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES—REQUEST THAT BAN ON DDT BE RELAXED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture in connection with a possible grasshopper infestation and the danger thereof. The estimate now is that 350 billion grasshoppers are ready to receive the wheat, oats and barley in Saskatchewan alone. We do not want to be host to such an aggregation; therefore insecticides are needed, one of which is DDT. Although it has been banned, it has the record of being not the first but one of the first means of bringing about control. Would the minister give consideration to releasing the ban on DDT for a few weeks in order to meet the terrible danger that is faced not only in Saskatchewan but also in neighbouring provinces?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, several different people from Saskatchewan and the other prairie provinces have made representations about the same matter that the right hon. gentleman has brought to the attention of the House. We have considered DDT. Other sprays and products are available but more of them has to be used to bring about control. I have not had a report today on what the conditions are, but if they do become very bad I would not hesitate to recommend DDT.

INCREASE IN MACHINERY PRICES—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN OVER-ALL PRODUCTION COSTS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. In view of statements by the three prairie Ministers of Agriculture expressing alarm over recent increases of 4 to 5 per cent in machinery prices in Manitoba, and in view of indications of similar increases in the other provinces, would the minister have his department conduct an investigation into the increasing prices of machinery?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the first I saw of this was in the press. No one brought to my attention during the last few days that the price had increased dramatically or to this extent. I have already asked my department to give me a report.

Mr. Gleave: May I also call the attention of the minister to the statement made by the agricultural economics research council—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question. We are running short of time and he has been recognized for a supplementary.

Mr. Gleave: Would the minister also investigate reports that increases of up to 15 per cent in the over-all cost of farm production will be the sort of increases we will be trying to live with in the immediate future?

COMMUNICATIONS

PROPOSED CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Communications. In view of the minister's parliamentary broadside levelled against Quebec on Friday last, has the minister had any success in arranging a conference of communications ministers, or has the parliamentary broadside adversely affected that conference?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any negative effects. The conference of provincial Ministers of Communications has been tentatively scheduled, with the agreement of a majority of the ministers, for next fall, presumably in October.

Preliminary meetings between officers of all the provincial departments and officers of the federal Department of Communications are scheduled for early July.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the fact that the invitation was extended in March for the first couple of weeks in July, I believe, would the minister tell the House whether all provinces have accepted the date in October as a firm date?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): No, Mr. Speaker. We have not set a definite date yet, and when we sent out the invitation or suggested that a meeting be held early in July, we did not know then that the provinces wanted to meet together twice before holding a Federal-Provincial conference. We were not even aware that they would postpone their own conference from the middle to the end of May, and maybe even to the beginning of June.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—ALLEGED IMPLICATION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES IN ORGANIZED CRIME—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of State responsible for Urban Affairs.

In view of the fact that the investigations conducted in Montreal in connection with organized crime have enabled the authorities to identify important witnesses within Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation personnel, could the minister tell us whether he is considering having an investigation initiated concerning the operations of this Corporation in other Canadian cities?

● (1450)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the evidence referred to in the question. I will immediately look at it, but any further answer would be dependent upon that evidence.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—GUIDELINES FOR POSSIBLE APPLICATION—OPPORTUNITY FOR HOUSE TO DISCUSS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who referred earlier to guidelines the government had announced a couple of years ago with regard to the building of northern pipelines. Will the application that the minister anticipates will be made before the end of the year be heard and dealt with under the guidelines as they have been announced or will these guidelines possibly be modified in some way?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the guidelines which were defined in general terms in 1970 were laid out in somewhat more precise terms in 1972 with regard to environmental and social impacts. We now have the national advisory committee on northern pipelines financing considering some of the financial and particularly corporate control aspects. The work of that particular advisory group could lead to additional guidelines on the question of ownership and control.

Mr. Stanfield: Will there be an opportunity provided for the House to consider the guidelines as they are put forward in final form under which any such application is to be heard?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there have been ample opportunities, particularly in committee, to discuss the guidelines up to this point, but I am sure an additional opportunity can be arranged as and when they are made available publicly.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REPORTED STATEMENT BY OFFICIAL THAT HEAD OFFICE WILL NOT BE LOCATED IN VANCOUVER

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him whether the statement made by Donald Morrison, vice-president of the Canada Development Corporation, was a statement of government policy when over the weekend Mr. Morrison said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question asked in those terms is obviously not in order. The hon. member should rephrase his question. He cannot refer to statements made outside the House.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister aware of statements emanating from the Canada Development Corporation to the effect that the head office of this corporation will not be located in the province of British Columbia and the city of Vancouver?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I have not heard of that statement. I will look into the matter.

Mr. Reynolds: In view of the fact the Minister of Finance made the same statement in the House in the first week after the Easter break, and in view of the confusion on this issue, would the Prime Minister see that the president of the corporation makes a positive statement backing up the statement made by the Prime Minister in the House on April 5 that the head office of this corporation would be in Vancouver, British Columbia?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York East.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST THAT COMMISSION MAKE EARLY DECISIONS ON BENEFIT ELIGIBILITY TO AVOID OVERPAYMENT CLAIMS

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that thousands of people who have been receiving and thought they were entitled to unemployment insurance benefits are now being assessed overpayment bills—one of my constituents was recently assessed $2,600 as an overpayment—would the minister instruct that if a person is not entitled to the payments he should be informed sooner than is now the practice in place of the current cruel practice of making payments month after month leading the recipient to believe he is entitled to the money and then billing the recipient for everything he has received?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member appears to be making a representation to the minister and he has to assume it will be taken into account.

FISHERIES

COD WAR BETWEEN ICELAND AND GREAT BRITAIN AND WEST GERMANY—DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA RESPECTING MARINE RESOURCES ON CONTINENTAL SHELVES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question on the situation between Iceland, West Germany and Britain. Can the minister indicate whether there was any exchange of diplomatic or, for that matter, undiplomatic notes between Canada and Britain and West Germany over the situation pertaining to the cod war? If so, can he tell the House the general tenure of the exchange in question and, if not, why not?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to ascertain whether there was any such exchange. If there was, I will try to give a report.

[Mr. Reynolds.]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I am astounded that the minister is not aware whether there was, but may I ask the minister whether he will undertake today to exchange notes between Canada and the various fishing nations of the world underscoring the principle that the marine resources of the continental shelves adjacent to coastal states are the territory of the states in question?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that the position of the Canadian government is that the coastal states have special rights and responsibilities for fishing off their coasts. This has been the position of the Canadian government even before the hon. member was a member of this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of members are seeking supplementaries. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to recognize the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, and then the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, and then call orders of the day.

REQUEST THAT MEMBER FOR LAPRAIRIE APPEAR BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE TO DISCUSS INTERIM REPORT PRESENTED BY HIM TO NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the fact that an interim report has been prepared and presented to the North Atlantic Assembly by the hon. member for Laprairie and in view of the importance of the resolution unanimously approved by the North Atlantic Assembly on the depletion of marine resources, would the chairman of the committee ask the hon. member for Laprairie to appear before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry so that the committee can discuss the report?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly look into that matter.

FOOD PRICES

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF PERSONNEL OF REVIEW BOARD

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tell us when we may expect an announcement about the appointment of the Food Prices Review Board?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be very soon.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker. A short time ago—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway has a supplementary. It might be more orderly to hear her supplementary and then the hon. member on his question of privilege.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he has been successful in making any appointments to the board yet and, if so, how many?

Mr. Gray: I think we are having a high degree of success, but I think it would be more appropriate for me to be able to make one announcement as to the composition of the entire board, which again I hope will be very soon.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, a short time ago today I asked the Prime Minister a serious question about a serious matter. I asked whether he was considering, for reasons which I pointed out, in the very near future visiting the heads of government of the European Economic Community. In reply he said that he had been asked a similar question about a week ago and that he had told the hon. member that he was giving serious consideration to his question. Here is the answer that the Prime Minister gave to the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary South:

RIGHT HON. P. E. TRUDEAU (PRIME MINISTER): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the hon. member's suggestion that I do a bit of travelling.

A lot of laughter followed that.

I have the intention of preparing travel plans for the coming year.

Mr. Speaker, that is not what the Prime Minister today said he answered. He said he told the hon. member he was giving serious consideration to his suggestion that he take such a trip in the very near future. I asked the question again today and he has given a sneering, wise-cracking answer which misleads the House and is an insult to the House and to the people of the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is obviously not a question of privilege. The hon. member, with his long experience in the House, knows that he cannot rise on an alleged question of privilege to make reference to an answer which has been given in the House. The hon. member may be dissatisfied with the answer that has been given and he may feel there is a contradiction. He is entitled to his opinion about such matters, but this cannot be raised by way of a question of privilege. I suggest to hon. members that this is not very helpful in the conduct of the business of the House, and I would not think in the circumstances that the Chair should allow the matter to be pursued further. Is the right hon. gentleman rising on the question of privilege?

Mr. Trudeau: According to your usual courtesy, Mr. Speaker, you allow the person involved in the question of privilege to answer. I just want to put it very gently to the hon. member that when I said I was giving serious consideration to making travel plans I was—

Mr. Hees: You did not. You said you were giving serious consideration to his suggestion—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if I could go on I would suggest that the hon. member should give serious consideration to his question because he prefaced the question to me by a series of statistics which were, I am sure unintentionally, misleading. If the hon. member will look at the statistics for the first four months of this year over the same period last year, he will see that we are well up by the largest measure in 20 years. To the United Kingdom our exports are up 26 per cent, to the ECC 23 per cent, and to Japan 102 per cent.

● (1500)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is obviously a debate over statistics between the hon. member and the right hon. Prime Minister. This kind of debate could go on every day for a long time and I am not sure, as I said a moment ago, that it helps the conduct of the business of the House. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege. I agreed, as I have always done in the past, that there is nothing wrong with the person impugned or referred to in the question of privilege being given an opportunity to defend himself or to respond by making a brief statement, which is what happened. But I have to rule again that there is no question of privilege, and I do not think much advantage would be gained by pursuing the matter further. The hon. member disagrees with the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister disagrees with him. Perhaps they might get together in a private conference and announce to the House tomorrow the result of their discussion.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I cited the figures that were produced for me and other parliamentarians by the NATO legation in Brussels this week. These are the latest figures available to Members of Parliament. What I said is absolutely true, and the Prime Minister knows this.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise in this House today to enter the debate. This is the first time, as a newly elected member for the constituency of Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton, that I have had an opportunity of speaking. My pride in being here as a member of parliament is somewhat tempered by humility, and the thought that I have been selected over two most worthy opponents.

Mr. Speaker, it was with interest and respect that I watched the unfolding of traditions and pageantry which marked the opening of this session and, in particular, the Speech from the Throne and your election to the high office which you presently hold. On behalf of my constituents and myself, I should like to congratulate you on your unanimous selection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: Your reputation as a fair, honest, impartial and just Speaker has spread far and wide to all the distant corners of this great land. I only trust that my presence in this House will not make your difficult task more difficult.

Traditionally, all forms of government by means of councils, whether they were tribal councils or the early councils in the political arenas of Greece and Rome, and through the years the evolution of the English parliamentary system, have contained the principle of allowing representatives the freedom to cast their vote as they saw fit. I am particularly pleased that the topic which we are presently debating will be decided by a free vote. In many respects it is unfortunate that the parliamentary system has evolved in such a way that a truly free vote comes so rarely. I trust that all members of the House will jealously guard and take advantage of their proper right to vote as they see fit on this topic. I trust that each member will treat with contempt any person who might try to cajole that member behind the scenes to vote otherwise than as he sees fit for the sake of some so-called party policy or party preservation. I know that members of my party will be divided on this issue and that my party is allowing each member a completely free hand to vote as he wishes.

I can only hope that every other group in this House allows a similar freedom. I hope that this is what I will see when this debate is concluded, but I expect to find it otherwise. Surely, the NDP will vote as a block in favour of this bill, belying the true representation of their constituents. On the other hand, I expect some token division in the Liberal party, but in the majority, support for the government sponsored bill as pressure is applied.

Today, we are dealing with what is frequently considered to be sentencing for what is an ultimate crime. Perhaps this is the ultimate crime in the criminal context as held in the Criminal Code of Canada, but I would like to point out that the true crime is that we are debating this topic at all at this time when tens of thousands of Canadians find themselves in an economic struggle, squeezed between unemployment and inflation. It is truly the great shame of this parliament that the government has brought in this legislation at this time. Indeed, we have spent some seven days debating this topic since the twenty-ninth parliament began, including almost one week at the very beginning, when we should have been and should now be dealing with legislation to alleviate the problems of housing, of unemployment, the abuses to the unemployment insurance fund, inflation, and the budgetary matters which have been allowed to languish by the side, languish in a barrel of unfathomable political ineptitude. Perhaps I might be permitted to refer to the section in the Criminal Code known as section 319 which deals with false pretences. Let me read briefly from the definition as follows:

A false pretence is a representation of a matter of fact in the present or past made by words or otherwise that is known by the person who makes it to be false and that is made with a fraudulent intent to induce the person to whom it is made to act upon it.

In reading the Speech from the Throne, we note that the government's advisers have stated that the government has assigned the highest priority to two policy areas. The first listed was the economic policy to reduce unemployment, contain inflation, and to strengthen the economy generally. If that is the highest priority, then why are we dealing with capital punishment today. The government stated, first, that they wanted to expand job opportunities; second, to promote stable economic growth; third, to attain a reasonable price stability; fourth, to ensure that the regions of the country benefit through prosperity brought to all regions. It was proudly stated by the government that, having brought forth the two part program consisting of measures to provide more jobs and measures that would add fundamental strength to the economy, they would bring forth in a rush amendments to the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, reintroduce measures announced earlier regarding screening and expand their policy on foreign take-overs, add to the social security system to assure people who cannot work, the aged, the blind and the disabled, a compassionate and equitable guaranteed income.

The entire throne speech refers to those issues which were discussed in the election campaign leading to the election on October 30. These are important issues for the majority of Canadians. Why has this legislation not been introduced? Why did we wait for 60 days to have parliament called. Why have we discussed pilotage bills, considered a lengthy Speech from the Throne which included platitudes and lollipops, had discussions on food prices, when these are only a small segment of the difficult economic problems which we face? Why was all the legislation not introduced so that it could be considered in good time, and why have we been saddled with a debate which affects, at the most, two or three people and only those people who have committed the ultimate criminal act in the context of the Criminal Code of Canada?

Truly, Mr. Speaker, the greatest criminal fraud is debating this legislation now rather than waiting to debate it at a more leisurely time. On January 26, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) stated, as reported at page 681 of Hansard, that there was no person waiting on death row. Last week, in reply to a question of mine the Solicitor General said that no person has been indicted for having committed capital murder, other than the murder of a police officer or prison guard, and has now finished the entire legal process. Any person who has committed murder since the beginning of this year has yet to go through a preliminary hearing, and finish his trial process. The indictment itself would probably be still weeks away. Surely, this debate can be held in the months ahead. If by chance a person has been convicted and is facing the death penalty, which at the moment is not a fact that person would have his sentence commuted by the government. Perhaps such sentences should be commuted until this question is settled once and for all. At least, the date of execution could be postponed.

The great criminal fraud on the Canadian public and the tens of thousands of law-abiding citizens is that they are being made to take second place to a lengthy debate which deals with only two, three, or perhaps four convicted criminals. Somebody has his priorities sorely misplaced. A reading of the throne speech and the platitudes which were enunciated at that time, to the effect that the government was earnestly going to tackle the economic problems of the country, indicates that the government is misrepresenting itself to the people. It is misleading and deceiving the people, hoping that they will act on that deceit and misrepresentation.

Again, I point out that according to section 319 of the Criminal Code those are the ingredients which constitute false pretence. Mr. Speaker, instead of debating capital punishment the public want us to get on with the main issues at hand, the issues of inflation, wage and income control, unemployment, the unemployment insurance abuses, and perhaps even a budget. The capital punishment situation may be inconvenient to two or three people, but the government can commute their sentences. However, it cannot commute, nor does it appear willing or able, and certainly it does not appear to have the ability or knowledge on how to commute the economic squeeze in which tens of thousands of honest Canadians find themselves. Let us deal with commuting their sentences, so that they can live as they should be able to live. Dealing with this legislation now rather than with important economic matters shows a callous disregard for the good, law abiding citizens of Canada. It is an abdication of responsibility in governing this great land.

I should like to take the time to point out that the controversy which is persuading Canada on whether we should have abolition or retention has been caused by the government's ineptitude in handling criminal justice. This whole question of abolition or retention would not be as emotionally charged today if the government had not misused the parole system during the last four or five years. If the government had not allowed convicted criminals to return to society after a far too brief stay in our penitentiaries, society would feel that justice was being served. The granting of weekend passes, for days and months at a time, has eroded the confidence of the Canadian public in our system, and today the Canadian public is demanding a return of capital punishment in order to give itself a feeling of protection from that portion of society known as the criminal element.

The 70 per cent of the Canadian people who want to retain the death penalty are making a conscious decision because they have been betrayed by the easy parole granted and the favouritism shown to the criminal element of our society. If the abuse of parole and the granting of leaves to criminals had not taken place, I am convinced that a true abolitionist bill would pass, hardly challenged. Not only is a true abolitionist bill an impossibility, and so recognized by the abolitionists, but the government has had to bring in this half-baked piece of legislation knowing that the majority of the Canadian people do not want even it passed. I know from having spoken with people in the parole service over the years that the general feeling is that they cannot rehabilitate the people in prisons. They have decided, therefore, to let them out on the streets as early as possible, hoping they could rehabilitate themselves better in society. This is not what the public expects. This is not what justice demands. We must protect society. Rehabilitation ought to be and should be a foremost consideration in sentencing, but the protection of society is just as important, if not more so, and the Canadian public is demanding that.

A second fault of the Liberal administration that has been in power since 1963, and which has undermined the confidence of Canadian society in criminal justice, has been the 100 per cent commutation by the so-called royal prerogative. This House of Commons, supposedly the highest court in the land, which makes the law, has had its powers usurped by a collection of some 20 cabinet ministers who sit in the so-called treasury benches. "Treasury benches" is a peculiar term, because the occupants of those benches cannot handle the treasury but they stick their noses into areas with which they are not supposed to deal. They have usurped and by-passed the laws of the land, and by breaking the law of the land I would say that they have committed a criminal act.

The law of the land as written in this book, the Criminal Code, provides for the death penalty in section 212, but in 100 per cent of the cases the members of the Cabinet have breached that law and made a law of their own, a function which the constitution does not grant them. Certainly, there is a royal prerogative of mercy, to be used in those few cases where mercy properly should be considered. But, Mr. Speaker, mercy should not be granted in 100 per cent of the cases because then mercy loses its meaning. The royal prerogative is not a prerogative when it becomes the final court proceeding.

You cannot tell me, Mr. Speaker, and nobody else in this House could convince me, that the Queen or her representative at any time has suggested that this prerogative be used in 100 per cent of the cases. It has only been used by those members who form the cabinet of the Liberal government, because they did not have the guts or the ability to carry out the law of the land. It was not their responsibility to make themselves the court. That function is carried out by others, by a judge and jury, duly selected.

For those two reasons, the misuse of parole and the misuse of the royal prerogative, the government has now caused society's great concern and has forced itself into an untenable position. This bill is neither fish nor fowl. It is not an abolitionist bill. The Solicitor General is an abolitionist. He has stated so. Even though he is an avowed abolitionist, he knows that he cannot successfully achieve that objective, and therefore is trying to put in the thin end of the wedge by means of this legislation. I say to him that if he is a true abolitionist let him bring in an abolitionist bill and get a true reflection of the feelings of the elected representatives in this House.

For many years I was an abolitionist. I regret, in many ways, that I am not one any longer. I am not voting against this bill because I know that 70 per cent of my constituents want to retain the death penalty. I am voting against this bill because I know that society as a whole feels cheated, and feels a need of protection. I will vote against this bill at all stages until we have adequately given society its proper right to experience a sense of security. I hope that in the next few years the royal prerogative will not be misused, that the parole system and leaves of absence will not be abused, and that this matter of abolition or retention can come up again after society has experienced a period of security. At that time, I will be voting for the abolition of the death penalty.

I have no qualms about the loss of the life of a criminal. Mr. Speaker, we pay lip service to the loss of thousands of people each year through war and on the highways, and now we are trying to pay more lip service to that person who has taken a life than we do the many law-abiding citizens who lose their lives by accident. Life is important and it is precious—probably the most precious thing in this world but only to the person who possesses that life and to those persons who are near and dear to him or her. But nobody can convince me that the life of an unknown person is precious to me, as I did not know that person, so let us not pretend that this bill and abolition is the godly thing to do to protect the most precious thing in the world—life. Mr. Speaker, I am not convinced that we have to treat a person who has caused the death of another person in a criminal act any better than other criminals. It is only some philosophical moralistic burbling which causes certain people to shrink and shirk their proper duty.

Before taking my seat, I should like to inform this House, briefly that I have had experience in criminal law. For three years I prosecuted criminals in Ottawa, the capital city. I have prosecuted bank robbers who have committed five and six robberies and it is all there on their record. They are known as professionals. They call themselves and consider themselves professional robbers. On each occasion they have armed themselves with a sawed-off shotgun, a pistol, machine gun, a submachine gun, automatic rifle and with two or three companions entered a bank or the premises of their intended victim, after having planned for 10, 30 and sixty days in minute and complete detail every step that they were going to take. They have armed themselves, Mr. Speaker, with the full knowledge that they may use those weapons to take a life, and in most instances they are the types of people who would sooner shoot than give you the time of day.

I have no respect whatsoever for those people. They commit an armed robbery and are caught. They are given five years on their first attempt and they are out in 18 months. They are caught again, they get seven years and they are out in 2½ years. Perhaps they do not get caught for the next two or three times, but ultimately they are found out. Then, they are tried on two or three armed robberies at the one time and this time they are sentenced to ten or eleven years, so they are out in three or four years. Finally, in the course of a robbery they kill someone because that person happens to be interfering with their criminal act of robbing. When a criminal has such a record why should we give him special consideration? I think, Mr. Speaker, I would rather have special consideration given to the law-abiding public. Then, on the other hand, I have dealt with the criminals who were just sadists, and I would like to deal with one case in particular which gives some indication of whether or not the death penalty is a deterrent.

On January 3, 1969 at the end of the festive season, two couples, one couple in each car, were minding their own business and driving from Ottawa to Almonte. Three sadistic, brutal, vicious young men followed them for a period of what must have been 15 or 20 minutes or longer, then flagged down the cars pretending they were stranded at the side of the road. Then, having had the opportunity for 15 or 20 minutes of thinking what they were about to do, they cold bloodedly killed two men, the heads of families, while their wives watched, cowering underneath the dashboard of their car. They pumped bullet after bullet into those people, themselves unarmed, who were just good samaritans stopping to help somebody stranded at the side of the road. After having had an opportunity to consider what they were doing their course of action for 20 minutes, they deliberately murdered two men. The names of the three murderers were David John Brault, David Dwyer and Donald Phillion. It became known as the Carp murders. Now, the government and its advisers want us to vote in favour of those people.

Let me take this case one step further. I have here a partial copy of the transcript of the court proceedings, uncontradicted, of the preliminary hearing. The murderers went their separate ways after they had committed this act. One of them, David Dwyer, went to Windsor where he was tracked down by a police officer in the basement of a house. On page 251 of the transcript of the preliminary hearing, in examination in chief when giving identification, Mr. Chippit was asked:

Q. What name did you know him by at that time?

A. Dwyer, David Dwyer.

Q. When you saw him, how was he dressed?

A. He had a brown jacket on; hair blond and he had what appeared to be a .22 calibre rifle pointed at my head.

And a little later:

Q. How long was this weapon?

A. It was sawed off, cut down.

On page 252, continuing the examination in chief of Mr. Chippit:

Q. Was there any struggle?

A. No struggle at all, sir.

Q. Did Dwyer say anything at this point?

A. He just walked out very nonchalantly. After I said "Drop it", he said all right and walked out.

And a little later:

Q. Was there any conversation on the way to the station?

A. Yes there was.

Q. What was the conversation?

A. You are talking about conversation in the car after we left the scene?

Q. Yes.

A. That is correct.

Q. Yes?

A. The conversation was, if I remember, we were talking; it was brought up in regard—we were talking of an armed robbery in the city of Windsor. I stated, well, this time don't worry about it, and he—

Referring to Dwyer.

—said, "No, this is a bad city to pull a robbery." He says, "I have had better luck other places."

Q. This was Dwyer; is that correct?

A. This is correct.

Further, on page 254, continuing examination in chief:

Q. —What was the accused's attitude during the time you were in his company?

A. He was very nonchalant, sir. He asked me for a cigarette, and then when we were leaving the scene, or the car was leaving the scene in the police car W.H.Q.

Q. W.H.Q.?

A. Headquarters.

Q. Did you get the cigarette?

A. I looked at him and said, "You guys are crazy; just had a gun to my head and now you want a cigarette." He said—

This is referring to Mr. Dwyer.

—"I would not shoot you, I would hang for that."

That is the uncontradicted evidence of the preliminary hearing. Those men pleaded guilty and were sentenced for non-capital murder. As indicated, the Windsor police came to where Mr. Dwyer was staying in the basement, where he had his rifle in his hand, having a little target practice in the basement. When the police officer came down the man pointed the loaded rifle at his head but he did not shoot the police officer. As indicated in that transcript, ten minutes later when he was disarmed he asked the police officer for the cigarette and the police officer said "Man, you must be crazy, ten minutes ago you were in a position to shoot me and now you are asking me a favour; you want a cigarette". This person who had already killed two ordinary citizens for which he must have known he was not going to hang, then stated "I would not shoot you, I would hang for that." He did not hurt the police officer, because for that he would have had to hang. You say the death penalty is not a deterrent. There is proof. It was a deterrent for that criminal in that situation. If it was a deterrent for that person, it may be a deterrent for many others. I hope, as I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation brought forward at this time will be defeated.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it clear from the outset that, based on the evidence I have read and studied, I am in favour of abolishing capital punishmment in Canada. I, therefore, support the present bill as a compromise which extends abolition for five more years, except in the case of the murder of a police officer or a prison guard. I take this stand, Mr. Speaker, despite the survey that I sent to my constituents in January, in which 73 per cent of the over 4,000 people who replied indicated that they were in favour of retaining the death penalty. I know it would be politically safe to go along with them in what I consider a sincere decision on their part. But, Mr. Speaker, this is to be a free vote, and it is a vote of conscience. On the basis, of the evidence of my studies, I could not, with a clear conscience, support capital punishment.

I have listened to speeches in this House on capital punishment and read letters from individuals across Canada. What has struck me has been the legitimate concern of the public for its safety; but what disturbs me about much of this public concern is the lack of research and the undue emotionalism on which many of the arguments, both pro and con, are predicated. As I see it, if one is to argue for or against capital punishment, one can do so on three grounds: Whether or not the death penalty is a deterrent to crime; how society is to be protected from a repetition of capital offences by convicted criminals, and this of course involves parole policy; and, finally, to what degree should society seek the punishment or rehabilitation of the criminal. I should like now to put forth arguments on each of these three grounds, which I believe lead one who employs reason and logic to support the abolitionist position.

The most common argument used by those who are in favour of retaining capital punishment is that it serves as an effective deterrent to murder. Indeed, in response to my questionnaire on that question, 52 per cent of my constituents who replied thought that capital punishment was an effective deterrent. Common sense, it is argued by retentionists, tells us that people are afraid of death. Soldiers on the battlefield fear it, you fear it, Mr. Speaker, and I fear it. Likewise, it is argued that the potential murderer will not commit the crime of murder because of fear of execution. Yet does not common sense tell us that if we drive recklessly on the highway, without using a seat belt, we run the risk of a fatal accident? Does the fear of death stop the carnage on our highways? Doctors and medical science tell us that cigarette smoking contributes to death by lung cancer. Surely this warning, coupled with reason, would induce us to stop smoking; yet more people are smoking today than ever before.

The so-called common sense approach to the deterrent factor of death needs to be reassessed. A superficial analysis of this problem has no place in this debate. Common sense may tell us one thing, but reason tells us another. Reason, based on case study analysis, tells us that for many criminals the determining factor is not the fear of death or punishment but whether or not the criminal will be caught. The criminal commits the crime on the assumption he will not be caught. I can think of no better illustration of this than that in nineteenth century England, when pickpocketing was a capital offence and pickpockets were executed at public hangings, pickpockets made their greatest hauls at public executions when the eyes of the crowd were turned upward to the hangman's noose. Also, in nineteenth century England a chaplain who conducted 167 men to the gallows related that 164 of them had attended at public executions. Where was the deterrent?

The professional killers of organized crime, the political assassin or the man who commits homicide in the course of another crime, are not deterred by the death penalty. The professional killer is not deterred because murder is his job and, as he is skilled, he does not expect to be caught. The political assassin is not deterred, because to him the cause is the be all and end all, and he is ready to die for it. The thief who commits murder in the course of a robbery is not deterred, because in the majority of cases he does not plan to kill but does so as an immediate reaction to avoid capture.

According to my studies, such criminals account for only about 29 per cent of all murders in Canada, 71 per cent of murders in Canada being committed as a result of domestic quarrels or arguments with a friend. In these crimes, alcohol is often a contributing factor. Study after study has shown that the murder of a relative or friend, or the homicide committed by a drunk during a fight or by a mentally deranged person, is a murder committed on the spur of the moment, without premeditattion. It is committed in a fit of passion. The person in such a state of emotional hysteria thinks only of killing. He does not reflect calmly on the fear of capital punishment. Capital punishment has not deterred criminals in the past; nor will it do so if it is reintroduced.

Canada abolished the death penalty in 1967, except for the murder of police and prison officials. Did this result in an increase in the frequency of murder in Canada? The important word here is, frequency. The number of murders increased, but this increase was part of the general increase in over-all crime, that is, in crimes of all categories. What is important is the rate of increase in homicides. The detailed and comprehensive study by Dr. Fattah of McGill University shows that the increase in criminal homicide is the lowest among all crimes of violence. Also, there is no indication of any consistent trend in the rate of homicide. The rate fluctuates from year to year. Indeed, the largest increase in the murder rate in Canada since 1964 occurred in the year before abolition, not in the year after. Nor has the retention of the death penalty as punishment for the murder of police or prison officials proved to be an effective deterrent. The largest number of police murders took place in 1962, when capital punishment was in effect. Two murderers were hanged that year. The murder of police has been on the increase since 1967, despite the fact that it is still a capital offence. Research shows that the murder rate of policemen is substantially similar in abolitionist and retentionist countries having the same social and economic conditions. Reason, Mr. Speaker, must convince us that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder. We cannot retain hanging in Canada on the ground that it will reduce the homicide rate in this country.

The second ground for discussing this whole issue, as I mentioned, is, how is society to be protected from a repetition of capital offences by convicted criminals? It seems to me that much of the public's concern about the crime rate has to do with present-day parole procedures, the laxity of which in certain cases has led to the parole of dangerous criminals who have committed crimes while on parole. In my opinion, the way to alleviate this threat to the public's safety is not to parole certain types of criminals where rehabilitation is risky; for example, the sexual offender or the psychotic. Perhaps we should provide that the sentence of life imprisonment means the rest of a person's natural life in the case of a murderer involved in organized crime or a professional killer. The whole parole procedure should be reassessed and a more cautious approach should be taken in the matter of paroles. The public has a right to be concerned about our parole policy. I share their concern. However, I do not wish to dwell on this because I believe it is an ancillary issue to the real one we are debating in Bill C-2.

The other question before us, aside from the deterrent factor and the protection of society, is the degree to which we seek punishment and/or rehabilitation. Much of the debate has centered around the argument of a life for a life; he who murders should not expect mercy. I am perplexed that those who advocate capital punishment on the grounds that the murderer, because he has committed a most heinous crime, should be punished accordingly, do not carry their argument to its logical conclusion. If a man commits a brutal murder and if it is vengeance they want, is not hanging too good to him? Why not make him suffer as much as the victim? Why not revert to the medieval practice of torture before death?

We do not have to go back as far as the Middle Ages for an example of how this could be done. I refer to the case of Jean Calas in France in 1761. This event occurred in an age to which historians refer as the period of enlightenment; today, the age of reason. Jean Calas, a 64 year old Protestant merchant in Toulouse was falsely accused of strangling his son to prevent him from becoming a convert to Roman Catholicism. The public were outraged and wanted vengeance. He was tried, convicted of murder and sentenced to death. Calas appealed his case and, in order to elicit the truth, the court ordered that he be tortured until he confessed. Here is a description of what took place:

> The decision was appealed to the Parlement of Toulouse, which appointed a panel of thirteen judges. Sixty-three additional witnesses were heard. All the hostile evidence was hearsay. . . . The final decision condemned only the father. No one explained how a man sixty-four years old, unaided, could have overcome and strangled his mature son. The court hoped that Calas, under torture, would confess. He was subjected to the question ordinaire: his arms and legs were stretched until they were pulled from their sockets. He was repeatedly exhorted to confess; he repeatedly affirmed that Marc Antoine had committed suicide. After half an hour's rest he was put to the question extraordinaire; fifteen pints of water were poured down his throat; he still protested his innocence; fifteen further pints were forced into him, swelling his body to twice its normal size; he still maintained his innocence. He was allowed to expel the water. Then he was taken to a public square before the cathedral; he was laid upon a cross; an executioner, with eleven blows of an iron bar, broke each of his limbs in two places; the old man, calling upon Jesus Christ, proclaimed his innocence. After two hours of agony he was strangled. The corpse was bounded to a stake and burned (March 10, 1762).

If we carried out executions like that today we could, according to those who favour capital punishment, not only deter would-be murderers by the spectacle but satisfy our blood-lust for vengeance as well. I believe that Canadians are more civilized than that. Just as we no longer hang children for petty theft, as we did in Canada 150 years ago, so let us follow the civilized practice of the United Kingdom, Australia, Italy, Sweden, Finland, Austria, Germany and many other countries and abolish capital punishment. There is enough brutalization of society in our 20th century world without state murder.

If we are civilized, surely we should stress rehabilitation rather than vengeance. Where rehabilitiation fails or is impossible, let the punishment be life imprisonment, that is for the rest of the murderer's natural life. Let us not ignore the preventative aspect of the question. I have yet to see a baby born a murderer. We must work to eliminate these socio-economic environments which breed crime and distort human behaviour. If we put more effort into cleaning up slums, reducing unemployment and poverty, mending broken homes, tackling the problems of alcoholism and drug abuse and bringing in tighter gun controls, we will do more to reduce the crime rate in Canada than by throwing the criminals into jail or conducting them to the gallows.

I have tried to explain why capital punishment cannot be justified on the ground that it is a deterrent to crime. I have tried to show that society can be protected from the convicted criminal repeating a serious offence by a more judicious parole system and tighter prison security. I have emphasized that rehabilitation is more important than retribution. I urge the members of this House and all Canadians not to regress to the barbaric practices of our ancestors. Surely, in a civilized and forward looking society, the philosophy of an eye for an eye or of brutal blood lust has no place. Man prides himself on his ability to reason. We pride ourselves on the rule of law that we have developed down through the ages. As Filippo Grammatica wrote in his treatise Pena de Morte, and I quote:

If the law of man does not allow murder, if murder has neither a human nor a social function and hence it is not lawful, if it is ill-advised, if it is immoral, if it is anti-aesthetic, how can it become lawful, moral, aesthetic and functional for a particular offence?

I suggest it can only become lawful if we forgo reason and regress to emotionalism or a primitive desire for revenge. Boris Pasternack wrote in his novel Dr. Zhivago, and I quote:

If the beast in man could be held down by threats—any kind of threat, whether in jail or retribution after death—then the highest emblem of humanity would be the lion tamer in the circus with his whip, not the Prophet who sacrificed himself.

It was that Prophet who, while hanging on the cross, forgave his murderers and taught us to pray "forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us". It is my sincere hope that, nearly 2,000 years later, we shall finally learn this lesson and abolish capital punishment in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, we are back again today on Bill C-2 and we see speakers rise one after the other, some of them wanting to retain capital punishment, others wanting to abolish it. What surprises me is precisely the fact that Bill C-2 in no way offers a choice between retention and abolition of capital punishment but is a request on the part of the government to postpone the decision on that issue.

We have arguments from both sides. Some hon. members say that capital punishment can diminish or reduce acts of violence in Canada; on the other hand, other hon. members on the basis of statistics, probably the same, say that it is not the solution to the problem. But everybody forgets that in the first place the government is not trying hard enough as far as the administration is concerned to minimize the incidence of murders or other offences. It is not doing enough to rightly help the population to live decently and it can be seen when studies are made in prisons that a good number of criminals come from low-income groups.

Theoretically, arguments and standpoints are easy to put forward but in reality, practically nothing is being done to control the causes of crime.

I read in the speech made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I quote:

Underlying all of these characteristics, which make our society so human, is the belief by Canadians that in such a social system they can flourish and pursue their lives free from fear of lawless elements.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister would say the same thing had he been attacked as some bank employees are, or had a member of his family been attacked as members of other Canadian families are? We realize that philosophizing is easy, but that concrete action is much more difficult. I resume my quotation from the Prime Minister's speech:

Jailbreaks will be dealt with as the enquiries and the Solicitor General recommend.

I remember that on February 9, when I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) if he had read the report on the Pinel Institute inquiry on a psychiatrist who was implicated in murderer Réal Chartrand's case, the Solicitor General told me he had not. We are still waiting for his reply today, still waiting for a statement on the position of the government that part of the problem might be solved before abolishing the death penalty: first things must come first. The first thing the government should do is ensure the well being of society. The second, when citizens have broken the law, been caught and imprisoned, before anything else is to ensure the security of the places of detention.

No need to discuss the problem very long. We only need to read the latest newspapers to realize that there have been 34 escapes. Our prisons have become sieves. Is this the attitude of a law-abiding individual? Absolutely not. What steps are we taking? Inquiries! Inquiries leading where? Nowhere. This is exactly what happened after the inquiry allegedly made by the Solicitor General: no result. The psychiatrist is probably still in a position to parole criminals. Nothing is going to be done about that, yet the government is ready to help those who live on the fringe of society or of the law. As a matter of fact, the right hon. Prime Minister declared, and I quote:

. . . the administration of criminal justice in Canada. No ingredient in this process is less important than any other. None can be ignored by society; none will be ignored by the government.

However, because of the lack of action on the part of the government people are allowed to leave prisons, either as parolees, or as escapees—as is the case now—because of the inefficient prison administration. This is given as much importance as helping society.

I am seriously wondering. What does the government intend to do in this instance? Speaking of prisons, the right hon. Prime Minister said, and I am quoting:

Society intended them in the first instance to be secure. And this government intends to ensure that they are secure.

But what measures is it taking? Inquiries, again and again. Then, Members of Parliament are left to discuss the advisability of delaying or not the decision concerning capital punishment.

This whole system or argumentation is worthless because it does not guarantee prison security, it does not enable society to be sure that prisoners will remain in prison. And as a justification, the Prime Minister adds, and I quote:

And I say, too, with all the earnestness at my command that prisoners who have broken jail or who have exploited temporary leave and other humanitatian reforms—and who by doing so have placed these programs in jeopardy for thousands of other prisoners—

The government prefers helping prisoners to helping society. If some prisoners escape, they are recaptured and kept under surveillance, and people are sorry that they restricted other prisoners' freedom. One remembers the case of a prisoner who escaped, disappeared while visiting the Salon de la femme. How many law-abiding citizens are able to visit important functions such as the Salon de la femme, or go to hockey or football matches, as prisoners are allowed to? Can it be that the government prefers to help prisoners and maintain their standard of living, whatever their crimes, to the detriment of the rest of the population?

This is the funniest part of it all, and I shall end on this: the thing that surprises me most, of all the attitudes we see here in the House, is that those who do not want to take a stand, those who want to allow killers to go on killing, are the first to defend the right of abortion, the right to kill a child in its mother's womb. But they refuse the right to punish those who have killed a person. There is a double standard in the minds of these people.

Mr. Speaker, as long as the government will not consider different steps to be taken, rationally rather than emotionally, that is to say, as I said earlier, to secure the welfare of the people; as long as the government will not be assured that criminals will really remain in jail; as long as the government will not have statistics on the chances of rehabilitating some prisoners, namely those who have committed two or three murders and were allowed to return to society and commit another one before being put back in jail—which is precisely something about which society does not feel secure and in which it does not want to interfere—I suggest that we must at least create a feeling of fear among criminals by retaining capital punishment.

As a matter of fact, as soon as the government has passed legislation which will enable the Canadian people to feel secure and not to fear, whenever they are walking along the main streets of big cities, to be killed by some frightening person in the course of a holdup, we will feel better.

Criminals are ready to defend themselves but is society in a position to defend itself against such individuals? I am prepared to believe that statistics are of little meaning and that it is possible to use them to support opposite views but once again they do not in the least demonstrate the necessity of abolishing capital punishment now.

If the government by adopting measures—and I repeat it—guarantees to society the benefits I mentioned earlier, namely the welfare of the population, the security of jails and the rehabilitation of inmates, then it will be in a position to think of abolishing capital punishment.

This is briefly what I had to say today on capital punishment. Once more, I regret that Bill C-2 is nothing else than a measure to abolish or maintain capital punishment. Indeed, it is nothing else but a measure aimed at delaying this decision for quite a while.

Mr. Speaker, before voting on this bill, we should take our time to think about the pros and cons and above all to permit the government to act more efficiently in other areas than it seems prepared to do for deferring a decision such as that required by Bill C-2.

[Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix).]

This is what I had to say and, once more, I hope hon. members will take an honest decision on such a question before the vote.

• (1600)

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, once more Bill C-2 has been presented to us for debate. To me, it seems stupid and ridiculous to waste the time of this House debating this bill when there is much more important business before the House which is of the greatest concern to the people of Canada. Parliament has been sitting for over four months now, and while some good legislation has been passed there is a great deal more waiting in the wings which is of vital importance, legislation that certainly should have been presented and passed into law by this time.

During the earlier part of the session when the debate took place I believe there were 35 eloquent and passionate speeches made both for and against capital punishment. The news media have polled about 91 members of the House and, with their expertise, have decided that the vote is going to be close. I believe only 10 members are wavering and have not yet made up their minds which way they intend to vote. I suppose it could be said by a great many of the members that just debating and debating the bill is an exercise in futility. We could quote the old statement: "My mind is made up, so don't confuse me with the facts".

We already know from the many eloquent speeches and quotations that anything that will be said from now on will only be repetition. I understand the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that as long as he is Prime Minister no one will hang. That statement was made a couple of weeks ago, but I believe he refuted it a little later. But regardless of that, since he has been Prime Minister, and in fact since 1962, there has been no capital punishment carried out. This is proof that this bill cannot be considered a high priority item and could very well be put at the bottom of the pile.

I understand that in Canada there is one lawyer for every 1,653 persons. However, the ratio is much greater in this House; I believe there are 63 lawyers among the 264 members. In fact, there could be even more, since some members who are qualified lawyers have another profession and may be differently classified. But with due respect to this august and most learned group, these legal people go on at great length speaking in terms and in language that the ordinary layman, especially the new member of parliament, does not understand. They speak about de jure, de facto and so on. I see no reason why they cannot speak plain, ordinary English so most of us can understand. Then, when these members send copies of their speeches in Hansard to their constituents, they will be able to understand it, too.

To get down to the bare bones of the case, I wish to state my position in no uncertain terms. I believe in some form of capital punishment as a deterrent, in the final analysis. If I decide to walk across this chamber, pull out a gun and shoot the Prime Minister in a cold-blooded and calculating manner, and if I am proven sane, I feel there is no other alternative for me but capital punishment. However, I am not in favour of hanging. I think it is a gruesome and terrible form of capital punishment. Neither am I too impressed with the electric chair or the gas chamber. I feel some form of humane capital punishment is more appropriate, such as administering a drug which would be painless.

As we all know, statistics can be quoted one way or the other, depending on the views of the speaker. It is my belief that certain types of cold-blood and calculated murder can only be dealt with in one way. The dastardly murder of Pierre Laporte, a cold-blooded, premeditated murder, was a murder no one could deny fell into this category. We are all aware that the great majority of murders are crimes of passion, and there is no question that such murderers, if found guilty, will be sentenced to prison terms of varying duration. However, there are certain types of fiendish murder, such as rape killings, molesting and murdering of small children, which are so terrible and horrible that the greatest punishment must be available if circumstances warrant.

I am aware that many of the persons who commit this sort of murder are of unsound mind and on a great many occasions are committed to an institution. I have listened with great respect to many previous speakers, both at the present time and during the earlier debate, and in fact re-read a great many of the speeches that were made, and I was most impressed with them. However, whether we like it or not, we are living in a violent society. We have a great many depraved individuals running around loose who are potential murderers. We also have potential murderers running around loose as well as convicted murderers.

There are a great many cold-blooded gangsters who at this very moment in all probability, are plotting crimes which may lead eventually to the killing of some innocent victims. These certainly are not crimes of passion or crimes which are committed on the spur of the moment. This is the type of crime for which there should be the death penalty, if circumstances prove it is warranted. We have heard statistics quoted by previous speakers. While they concede that the number of crimes is up, they believe there are mitigating circumstances. The latest figures provided by Statistics Canada show that the number of violent crimes of murder has increased 113 per cent. Again, let me emphasize that I would recommend the most humane form of capital punishment available. This, I think, could be provided through an amendment. A great many speakers on the abolitionist side have gone into the gory details of hanging. They have resurrected ancient history by going back a thousand years.

One hon. member a short while ago cited a murder, and the terrible punishment involved, in the year 1762. Hon. members have gone into the matter in great detail. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) cited cases. I believe he went back to the time of William the Conqueror. Mr. Speaker, we are intelligent people. We are talking about capital punishment in this day and age, 1973. It is not necessary for us to refer to the gory details of ancient times or as far back as 1,000 years. This makes very good reading and makes cold chills run up and down the spines of many people. It starts them thinking that probably capital punishment should be abolished. Every day members of the police forces risk their lives trying to capture and imprison criminals. Then, they watch in dismay and anger while the courts juggle sentences that do everything except fit the crime. The more dangerous the criminal is the more protection the law seems to give him or her in attempting to evade prison, utterly ignoring the victim or possible future victims as soon as the criminal is loose again.

We seem to be going overboard in this permissive age in giving the greatest consideration to those who evade the law rather than to those who are the victims of the criminals. Several hon. members have forwarded questionnaires to their constituents. A great majority of these have been returned overwhelmingly in favour of the retention of capital punishment. Surveys taken by newspapers have also verified this. A survey taken by the Ottawa Journal last fall, with additions added to it, verified that over 90 per cent of the people were in favour of retention. Certainly, these 90 per cent could not be classified as morbid, vengeful people who have no compassion. I am aware that among younger people there are more in favour of abolition, but still the majority, the population favours some form of retention. I have received many letters from citizens in my riding outlining their views. The great majority favour retention of capital punishment. They also point out that this should not be restricted to the killing of policemen or prison guards, which would be the case if this particular bill should be enacted.

This brings up the point mentioned by previous speakers that this bill is neither flesh nor fowl. It is neither a bill for abolition nor for retention. There are, I believe six clergymen who are members of the opposition. I believe we should listen more closely to what is said by the six clergymen in this august House. A poll of these six members shows that three are in favour of abolition and three are in favour of retention. Certainly these distinguished and honoured members of this House should not be classified as vengeful people. I believe there is one clergyman on the government side who, I imagine, would be an abolitionist.

I should like to comment on that great moulder of public opinion, the news media. I believe a poll of this group would probably show the great majority to be in favour of total abolition. Therefore, it follows that editorial stories and news reports are slanted quite often in such a way as to portray the position of the writer. Cartoons show the scaffold and noose in the chilling dawn. On Tuesday morning of last week, I was up bright and early listening to the CTV news program "A.M." which I believe came on at eight o'clock. The reporter was giving news of the world. Then, he casually mentioned that the capital punishment bill would be debated on that day, which it was. Certainly, that statement was not biased in any way. However, behind him there was a cartoon denoting the noose and the scaffold. If that is not biased reporting by the CTV news media, then I do not know what is.

The Toronto Star some while ago made some comments on this bill and included a cartoon with a grey coloured chilly dawn, a scaffold and a rope. This makes the situation as gruesome as possible. Why should the cartoon not depict the sordidness of the murder of a young woman or child rather than this. Weekend magazine had quite an article on hanging. Again, however, this is a misnomer in a way. This bill is called the hanging bill. It is a bill to retain capital punishment. It will enable the cabinet to reprieve the sentence, as the have done in the past.

Mr. Speaker, last week we listened with great interest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party when they spoke in sequence. As we know, they are all abolitionists. The Prime Minister cited the position of the government as well as the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and voiced his opinion. Our own leader voiced his opinion. The eloquent and knowledgeable or know-it-all Leader of the New Democratic Party stated his opinion as if it were the Papal edict and the only one which should be considered. He stated he was an abolitionist. He conceded that the people in his riding were in favour of retention but that they probably did not know what they were talking about. He went on at great length to point out that this House should make the decision. Naturally, he was putting across his case for total abolition.

It has been emphasized during this debate by those who are putting across the case for abolition that those who are retentionists must be acting primarily on the basis of vengeance or on the basis that capital punishment is a deterrent. However, this idea of vengeance is really pleaded in a most vehement way. And, of course, they cite vengeful forms of capital punishment in use throughout the past 100 years.

There is one other thing which we must emphasize, and this has been brought out time and time again. We speak about compassion and mercy. It seems to me that all the compassion and mercy is for the criminal or the murderer. There does not seem to be too much consideration or compassion for the victim or for his loved ones who are left behind. They do not seem to be considered. It is the opinion of the abolitionists that no matter how depraved the criminal is, he can certainly be rehabilitated and put back into society. I think we are all aware that there are certain individuals for whom redemption is not possible and, therefore, they should be eliminated from society in the most painless way possible.

The ordinary man and woman have lost their faith in justice and those in authority, seem to be on the side of the criminal. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) suggested in the earlier debate that a referendum be held at the next general election. I am certainly willing to stand up here and vote as my conscience tells me. If it is the opinion that there should be a general referendum, then possibly there is merit in this suggestion. However, let me tell you that it seems to me the great majority of those who favour abolition are diametrically opposed to any referendum being held, and with good cause. They know only too well that a referendum will show that people are overwhelmingly in favour of retention, and we have these figures, 70 per cent, to put it at its lowest, or 90 per cent to put it at its highest, to prove that is the case.

Capital punishment for the criminal who has committed first degree murder must be put back on the statute books and enforced. Beyond the shadow of a doubt, justice must not only be done but must be seen to be done. A great many members of this House have been quoting learned people and experienced penologists. They have quoted Dr. Fattah, Dr. Thinner, and so forth. It might be a good idea to read into the record some of the comments of just plain, ordinary citizens. I have some letters here. One of them reads:

> Dear Mr. Darling: We wish to inform you we are against the government continuing its policy of abolishing the death penalty.
> Mr. X of Bracebridge.

Here is another one, and this one might be considered biased because it comes from a retired Royal Canadian Mounted Policeman. He writes:

> Mr. Stan Darling: Mad dog murderers should be disposed of permanently, not stored up in the pen. This means not only for the killing of policemen and prison guards, but for any other person. The entire population must receive this benefit. It is not the question of a deterrent, it is the question these murderers mut pay with their life—as simple as that. Politicians must be virile, strong people, look the matter squarely in the face. If any of their family or close friends were murdered, they would be the first to raise a fuss. As an ex-mountie, I, like other policemen, are sick of the pampering of criminals. No wonder the country is weak and divided . . .

And he goes on.

The following was conveyed to me by telephone by a merchant in the town of Huntsville:

> One of your voters wishes you to know that I have been talking to hundreds of people re capital punishment and they want it reinstated 99 per cent.

Then, he said: "Are you in favour of it?" Here is another letter which reads:

> We, the undersigned, wish to express to you our desire for the restoration of capital punishment for the crime of murder.

I could go on and on, and read all these into the record. These letters are from God-fearing citizens. Certainly, I have received letters from those who are in favour of abolition, but the letter run ten to one in favour of retention. I believe that three of the ministers in my riding stated that they hoped parliament would consider abolition on compassionate grounds.

We must forget about this inane compassion and mercy toward premeditated killers. This House will have to decide. I know the vote will be close, and I know the people of Canada are looking very closely at how this will turn out. When the time comes, I will be casting my vote for the retention of capital punishment. Let me hope that if I am privileged to be in the House for a number of years I will be here long enough to see the time when Canadians will be able to abolish capital punishment, but we are in a society now that does not warrant it.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate with some reluctance only because I want to see the bill sent to committee at the earliest possible moment, and I do not want to prolong the discussion. But I do hope that having reached committee stage certain amendments might be considered. For while I support the bill in principle and shall vote for it, I have two major reservations. First, being in favour of the total abolition of capital punishment, I find it illogical to make exceptions for any one group, be they prison guards, police officers or heads of state. Others have dealt with this aspect of illogicality, and I shall not repeat their reservations which I share. Second, I do not believe that we need another five year trial period, and I shall return to that point later. Also, I regret that this debate on the retention or the abolition of capital punishment—for that is really what we are debating—is taking place at a time when the viability and effectiveness of both the penitentiary system and the parole services have been called into question by an increasingly sceptical and resentful public.

Recurring prison breakouts have become synonymous in the minds of many Canadians with the present debate on capital punishment to the extent where some people are quite convinced that all inmates are guilty of murder. I think we have a responsibility to delineate the differences in these major areas of concern, that is between capital punishment and reforms to the penitentiary and parole systems, in order to correct the distortion and the confusion that now abound.

We are all primarily concerned with the protection of society from the crime of murder. That goes without saying. There is no one here who does not consider the protection of the public to take precedence over every other concern. The question that naturally follows is whether or not capital punishment is a protective measure. It is, only if it can be clearly proven that it has a deterrent value. But the statistical evidence for such a conclusion is lacking.

I have heard statistics used to support the abolition of the death penalty and I have heard them used to support the retention of the death penalty. One statistic I have not heard used is that there have been only two murder repeats in Canada since 1897. Professor Fattah's study, which has been referred to repeatedly in this debate, shows that murder as a component of violent crime has risen less than other crimes of violence in recent years. His conclusions firmly state that "the increase in criminal homicide in Canada during recent years cannot be attributed to the suspension of capital punishment." He rejects the argument that capital punishment is a significant deterrent.

● (1630)

Other studies based on research done in the United States where, until a recent United States Supreme Court decision, individual states had the right to establish a death penalty or not for whatever crime they deemed necessary, have shown, (a) that the death penalty has had no discernible effect on homicide death rates; (b) that abolitionist states have fewer killings of police officers than states with the death penalty, and (c), that a comparison of homicide rates in states that have abolished the death penalty, before and after abolition, shows that abolition did not give rise to significant change in homicide rates. In Canada murder rates have increased less than many other indictable offences. Since the abolition of the past five years has resulted in no significant increases in murder rates, we can probably predict with some degree of accuracy that a return to capital punishment would not significantly reduce homicide rates.

But the area to which I would like specifically to direct my attention is rehabilitation rather than the contentious, and to this point unresolveable, argument about deterrence. And I must admit candidly that I find it difficult to discuss this or any other aspect of the capital punishment debate with dispassionate objectivity.

Having been involved in voluntary work in the prison system, having spent long hours in discussion with people sentenced for murder, having seen the work and effort put forward by individuals to rehabilitate themselves, all make it impossible for me to approach this debate impersonally. And I must say in this connection that having seen what some individuals have accomplished in the way of rehabilitation, my response to them is one of admiration. On occasion, I have accompanied inmates on their day out, have had women sentenced for murder visit my home while on special passes, and I have seen them go on to earn their parole and re-establish themselves in their communities. I know businessmen and community workers, in this city and in others, who were once convicted of murder and who are now contributing members of society.

There are other individuals currently in our penal institutions who have utilized their time to upgrade their skills and their education—yes, people who have committed murder, but who have spent long years working through correspondence to a university degree in social work, in law, in the arts and in other fields. And their acquired knowledge is being used to benefit their fellow inmates.

I mention these people only to express my firm belief in rehabilitation. These people, on whom society might have inflicted capital punishment, remained instead to contribute to that society. You may ask, but what about their victims and the relatives of their victims? What about compassion for them? I admit that I have never known the relatives of a person who has been murdered. But my stand in favour of abolition would in no way be changed were I to do so, for execution of a murderer would not restore the victim to life, nor would it comfort or solace his family and friends. It makes no sense to me that one protects the sanctity of human life by taking a life. If we consider that an act of violence, hanging, is necessary to avenge an earlier act of violence, murder, then surely we are saying that our society is bankrupt in its struggle to reach new levels of humanitarianism.

I cannot rid my mind of the possibility of mistakes being made in our judicial system. Neither our judges nor juries, like all other human beings, are without their imperfections. In this connection just the other day I read a letter in the Ottawa Citizen as follows:

> We have heard quite a few times about the date of the last hanging in Canada. How much do we know about the first one? While reading in the Kingston Public Library about the town (or village as it was then) of Bath, Ontario, in 1795, I found it was there the first hanging took place. The man was charged with stealing a watch and later was proved to have been innocent.

That was our first public hanging in this part of the country.

I wish to return now to my reservation about the five year trial period. We have already had one five year trial period, much of which has been wasted because the government and the department ignored, neglected or deliberately decided to do little or nothing in the way of research that would have provided the basic data and hard facts about murder on which a better informed judgment could have been made of this question at this time. I realize that Professor Fattah's study has been published, but its terms of reference were limited primarily to the deterrent effect of capital punishment. Professor Ciale of the University of Ottawa is engaged in a more in depth study, but when will it be available? At the committee stage, I would like to see an amendment introduced reducing the trial period from five to two years, during which intensive efforts would be made to correlate information about those who have committed murder with mental stability, social and economic background, motivations, and many other factors, for I am convinced that not only murder but most crime is rooted in our slums, in our broken homes, in our deprived areas and with our deprived citizens.

Capital punishment is not the answer to the eradication of crime, but a concerted attack on the ills of society could be the answer. I urge this intensive study, Mr. Speaker, for we know so little about the reasons that turn people into criminals. In this connection, I wish to recount an incident which took place recently in one of our federal institutions. Dr. Jean Vanier was speaking to a group of about 200 inmates and his message to them was his well known appeal for change, for sharing, for love. "Every man has the right to know he is loved," he concluded.

A moment of silence followed Dr. Vanier's address. Then, one inmate in the audience burst out in an emotional indictment of the social conditions which brought him to a long sentence in prison. His words were like these: "You were speaking about, like, children going through hell. Well, you had it easy. You don't know what it's like to have your bloody brother stand by when you're eight years old while boy friends rape you. You don't know what its like to be burned with a cigarette. "You don't know what it's like to be six years old, and your junky old man comes home too sick to think, and you reach out and you cook the dust for him. Friends call you from the lane. You go to the window and say 'Wait a minute.'

"Your little sister bumps you. Out goes the fist with the fix. Your old man jumps from where he is sitting at the table, kicks you in the head and breaks your jaw, picks you up and throws you clear across the room against the wall. "You don't know what its like to have to steal out of parked cars and sell in pawn shops to feed yourself and your little twin sister, your kid brother and kid sister. And you have to end up hustling your body when you're nine years old because you can't provide no more by stealing—you can't get enough to fill their needs.

"You don't know what it's like to end up trying to escape the same way your folks tried to escape, with a fix, and you're ten years old—having to hustle even more. "You don't know what it's like to be 11 years old and walk into the room at 2 o'clock in the morning just to have the man in blue grab you and haul you away to a reform school until they can find a foster home for you, because they have busted your folks, and you have to bounce around. "Until you know—until the world knows and does something about it they better never speak to me about love cause I'll kick their head in!" That was the answer given to Dr. Vanier.

Until we know—until we know that it is situations like this in which crime flourishes and escalates—until we are willing to face up to the relationship between crime and social and economic injustice, we shall go on arguing and agonizing about the band-aid approach of capital punishment to a deeply ingrained cancerous illness which afflicts our nation.

Let us bring this debate to a quick conclusion so that we can direct our efforts and our energies to tackling the problem at its roots.

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, this is a debate centering on the government's proposal for suspension of the law on capital punishment in Canada for a further five year period. It is an important debate and is being followed, I am sure, by a great many Canadians in every part of the country, but it is a curious debate. It is curious because the government, as far as I have been able to ascertain, has given no indication that in the event of the defeat of its proposal in parliament it will respect that decision any more than it respected the decision of parliament taken about six years ago requiring the death penalty for the murderers of prison guards.

Mr. Speaker, aside altogether from whether we favour abolition or restoration of capital punishment, and I have heard extremely good arguments on both sides, as we have heard them today, I submit that the government's failure to respect the decision of parliament, of this House and this body of people representing the people of Canada in the matter of carrying out the decision taken six years ago regarding capital punishment has, in my view, led to a lessening of public belief in parliament and to an eroding respect for that part of our democratic fabric known as the law of the land. Mr. Speaker, I say this is a curious discussion with great towering speeches which, so far as we know, will have no real effect on whether the policy of Canada will or will not be that of capital punishment. As has been said by a notable speaker of many centuries ago about the speeches of one of his contemporaries, "His speeches are like palm trees—they soar high but bear no fruit."

This is the first point I should like to make; that the government should state clearly that it will now respect the decision of parliament in this matter as to the retention, suspension or abolition of capital punishment. Otherwise, our talk here will be empty and those who sent us here will know it. It is natural that there has been a good deal of emotion in the speeches we have heard so far. The death penalty is a matter about which we are apt to have feelings and beliefs and/or prejudices that have their roots perhaps far back in our ancestral past. These feelings naturally influence our views and utterances on this subject.

For example, I suppose that we all know of people who will listen to no arguments for the abolition of capital punishment. Their hearts, and therefore their minds, are already made up. Some of them, surprisingly to me, are religious people. They are among the foremost in demanding restoration of the death penalty, seemingly not so much for any hope that it may save human life by acting as a deterrent. Really, as I understand their letters and I think many hon. members will have recieved similar letters, these people have feelings and desires for retribution and indeed vengeance in this situation.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, we have abolitionists, not a few of them in my own party who recoil, who shut their ears and close their eyes to any arguments that it may well be right for a community to take a life which has destroyed the lives and liberties of other individuals and which threatens to do so again or which acts as an example, if unchecked, to others with like murderous or violent designs. No such prejudice motivates me, Mr. Speaker. I approach this subject as pragmatically as I did 15 years ago when I first proposed to the then Conservative government that consideration should be given to a five-year suspension of capital punishment for a trial period.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, as you may recall, back in 1958 there was at least in my part of the country, British Columbia, and no doubt other parts, a great controversy over the question of capital punishment or no capital punishment. Indeed, it continues to this day. It appeared to me then, and again in 1968 after I was elected to this House, that we should have a five-year or at least a test period without capital punishment. This came into being about 1967 and it was taken, I thought, after a great deal of soul-searching and debate and was supported by some members, including myself, solely on the basis that it would indeed provide some gauge or test of whether capital punishment was necessary in this modern age. I certainly supported that vote for the five-year suspension and, like many others, I kept track of the results of that five-year period.

The question I asked myself then and which I ask myself today is: does the absence of the law of capital punishment in the form of the death penalty utilized by the community, result in the increase in capital punishment which takes the form of murder by individuals who decree death and who carry out the execution of another? If it does, if the absence of capital punishment results in the loss of human life and liberty, then surely we must still, at this stage of our social development, retain it. If it does not, if collective capital punishment is not a deterrent to individual capital punishment, then I believe we should get rid of it.

In making the representation for a five-year trial period suspension of the death penalty in Canada in 1968, I did so as a writer, not then a member of this House. My feeling then and since has been the pragmatic one that such a test period could help to provide the public, the parliament and government of our country with a gauge to help to decide whether people still require the preventive and deterrent factor of the death penalty. I did not know and I had on open mind. I retain that view.

As I have said, and as others have said, I kept close tabs on the result of the suspension of capital punishment. The result is disconcerting to those who claim that capital punishment does not deter killing. Statistics Canada has the record and the record is this. An average of 360 people, being about one per day, have been murdered per year in Canada during the five-year non-death penalty period as compared to 233 persons per year in the previous five-year period. In 1971, the last year for which I have records, the number of murders had risen to 422—this against the 233 figure when capital punishment was at least on the books. That is an increase of 65 per cent in the number of murders during the five-year suspension period, from 1.3 murders per 100,000 population to 2.5 per cent. In light of those figures, I think the government would do well to take back the present proposal for a further five-year extension of the period of non-capital punishment.

Like the previous speaker, I would agree to a shorter period, say of two years. In view of the importance of the issue of violence, death, crime, and all the factors that are involved in it, I think the entire subject might be given further consideration and a more realistic decision might be arrived at than the one we are liable to arrive at now on the one or other side of this question. Certainly, the absence of capital punishment for murder in the past five year suspension period has been accompanied by a very substantial increase in the number of murders in Canada and the murder rate in Canada has gone up. The absence of the penalty, in my view, is not necessarily linked to the increase in the rate; nevertheless, it is there and I think that a further five year period of trial is too long. I think the further trial period should be for two years when, as I suggested, the whole matter could be further discussed.

It seems to me that those of us who wish and work for a more humane, more small "L" liberal, philosophy with respect to the rehabilitation of criminals should stop and take note of the fact that in recent years in North America it almost seems as if the rate of violent crime has been rising in direct proportion to the extension of so-called permissive steps. We will not help the improvement of the treatment of those who break the law if we close our eyes or our ears to the facts of life—in this case, to the facts of death. That will not help those who seek to reform our system of discipline. I think the reverse very likely will be the case.

In the light of the record of the previous five-year suspension of capital punishment period, in the light of the rising wave of crime and violence and the erosion of civil rights and liberty, I cannot support the present proposal of the government for a further five-year suspension of capital punishment. I think that if the suspension period were two years, as I have suggested, there might be a more comprehensive investigation of this cancer of violence which is afflicting North America in particular. I think a two-year ban would win support not only among members of this House, but among many members of the public who, having seen and felt the results of the first five-year suspension, would be unwilling to risk a second such period.

In conclusion, may I refer briefly to an article I wrote for the Toronto Star in the fall of 1971 on this subject. I said that the rate of murder in the suspension period up to that time was up by 53 per cent. Assaults were up by 52 per cent, according to my article. The rate for attempted murder had doubled in the same period, and so on. In fairness, I also noted that in 1970 one fire accounted for 40 victims, but only one person was charged. That should not be overlooked. Nevertheless, the rate of violent crimes had increased and has increased since then in Canada. These factors are important in determining how we are to review the matter of parole, sentencing, and rehabilitation procedures, which we are trying to improve.

Capital Punishment

We are dealing with a subject of extreme and vital importance to all Canadians, and I think we had better deal with it before, as has happened in many American cities, it is unsafe for us to walk alone at night and citizens, knowing themselves to be without real protection from violence by their constituted authorities, take the law into their own hands in the form of guns. If that happens, we will have everybody's law, which is nobody's law, and murders and violent crimes will grow among us. I, for one, hope to see us taking logical and sensible action on the issue before us. In my opinion, it is preferable that we not have a five-year suspension of capital punishment but a two-year suspension period. If that were done, we might well offset something, which I foresee arising in addition to crimes of violence, namely, an outraged and fearful public, whose backlash can erode our civil liberties just as surely as those are now threatened by the violent.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, some members regard this debate on capital punishment as a waste of time because each member knows how he or she will vote, irrespective of the speeches of colleagues. However, I think the debate has been good, because it has shown the serious division of opinion not only in this House, but among the public. Thus there is no immediate answer that will receive genuine, widespread approval. We must search for the best possible solution that will ensure as much as possible the proper penalty for murder and the security of the state.

As we know, and as those who have taken part in the debate have dwelt on, we have been asked to debate a bill that has three purposes: To reinstate the five-year extension of the ban on hanging, which expired on December 29, 1972, and to extend the ban to December 31, 1977; to eliminate the term "capital murder" in relation to murder punishable by life imprisonment; and to ensure that the definition of murder punishable by death refers to the murder of a police officer and prison guard, and so on.

The main issue, as we know, is whether Canada should abolish or retain capital punishment. Since 1962, no one has been hanged in Canada, and although there have been four convictions for the murders of police officers since 1968, the cabinet has commuted each one. Studies about the effects of capital punishment as a deterrent are inconclusive, not only in Canada but in other countries. For instance, the New Zealand experience of abolition and reinstatement of capital punishment shows that there is no significant effect on the murder rate.

From this point I want to develop my argument in depth Mr. Speaker, so I wonder if I could call it five o'clock and return to my remarks after the supper recess.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 40, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Unemployment Insurance—Study on decentralization of offices—Publication of report; the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly),—Agriculture—Brucellosis—Request that compensation to farmers be equated with fair market value—Suggested vaccination program; the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse)—Housing —Rochdale College—Possible use after foreclosure.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH PERMANENT VOTERS' LIST

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West) moved that Bill C-17, to amend the Canada Elections Act (permanent voters' list), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, is to change our present system of enumeration and to provide a permanent voters list. I am proposing this bill with the full understanding of the objections raised by such people as the Chief Electoral Officer and the representation commissioner about the feasibility of such a system. Our present system may be good; however, the problems of disenfranchisement, particularly those of the last election, indicate to many of us that it is not good enough. We, as a nation possessing high quality technical and human resources are capable of something better.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I should like to briefly outline why a change is needed in our present system, why a permanent voters' list would be more advantageous and what some of the possible systems are that we might borrow from or adopt. It is my belief, Mr. Speaker, that all members of this House are concerned that thousands of Canadians are denied the right to participate on the most fundamental level of our political system, elections. It is my hope that out of a concern for this problem, the members of this House will refer Bill C-17 to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so that a thorough and extensive discussion of this important question can take place.

As in many western democracies, the concept of political participation plays a very important role within the Canadian political system. The right of a Canadian citizen to vote in elections has evolved from a period of restricted male suffrage to our almost complete state of universal suffrage. Because we have not always enjoyed universal suffrage, Canadians regard highly their right, at one time their privilege, to participate in the electoral process. Compared to our neighbour to the south, we enjoy a relatively high enumerated voter turnout with some 70 to 80 per cent voting at each federal election. Thus, when the right to participate is denied a legitimate claimant, there is a grave and serious problem that must be overcome. The individual voter is upset and so are the foundations of our democratic system.

Our experience, particularly that of the last election, tells us that a great number of eligible Canadian voters were not enumerated and were unable to vote. During the election campaign of 1972, newspaper editorials and letters to the editor pointed daily to the inadequacies of our present system of enumeration. Many blamed these inadequacies on the new electoral law, on the shortage of time in which the election was called or on the fact that there were not enough good people to carry out the enumeration properly. However, problems such as these have existed in the past and we have coped with them. However, with the increasing population and the growing complexity and mobility of Canadian society, their present adequacy is in question.

Failure on the part of our present system to enumerate those who have a permanent and fixed residence is only one problem. It has been estimated that at least 6 per cent of these potential voters are not enumerated. There is another larger group of citizens who are continually disenfranchised because our present system has an enormous difficulty in coping with their residence status at the time of an election. These are the eligible voters who are living away from home, within or outside Canada, at the time of the election or those who are travelling here or abroad. The Canada Elections Act of 1970 did make provisions for proxy voting for fishermen, prospectors, the physically ill and students. However, the procedure involved is almost intimidating to the potential voter. For those Canadians who are travelling or temporarily living abroad, no real provision for absentee voting exists. At present, before this House, there are three bills, C-43, C-56, and C-140, and one motion that are attempting to rectify this problem and extend the franchise to those who are excluded. It is my belief that a permanent electoral list would provide the necessary checks and information to facilitate absentee and proxy balloting.

Poor enumeration can restrict people from voting but, perhaps more important, it can foster feelings of alienation and/or discontent among those affected. Even if people want to vote, they seem reluctant to overcome the obstacle of not having been enumerated. Often they turn to one of their candidates for help, but in a great many cases they are too late and succeed only in further aggravating themselves.

Another problem that supports the argument for a change in the system is the length of our present campaign and the resulting time span between parliaments. In the 1970's, with our systems of transportation and communication, one wonders if a 60-day election campaign is not an anachronism. Long campaigns involve an excessive wastage of time, energy and money. The public become saturated to the point of distinterest by the continual bombardment of events and news of the election. A shorter election campaign would ease the physical and emotional burden of all those concerned, including the candidates.

Of greater importance is the fact that the inevitable disruption in government caused by elections could become a serious problem. Since 1867, the average time between the date of the election and the first day of the new parliament is 82.7 days. On 20 occasions since 1867, the period has been more than 60 days. If we add this period to a long election campaign, almost a third of our year has vanished. In the world today, things happen too fast. If emergencies arise or problems have to be dealt with, will our present system allow us to adequately deal with them?

In trying to evaluate and compare systems of enumeration, I think that there are four basic criteria which should be kept in mind; first, comprehensiveness of enumeration; second, possible effects on voter turnout; third, time required to hold the election after the election writ is issued and, fourth, cost per person enumerated. It seems highly possible that we can develop a system of a permanent electoral list, which is updated periodically and which may be revised up to the fifteenth day before polling day, which would surpass our present system on all of the basic criteria except the fourth, cost per person enumerated. I would like to discuss briefly some of the present systems of permanent voter lists in our country and elsewhere, and to point out their advantage in the areas of enumeration, voter turnout and time. Before proceeding with this, I think it is necessary to examine the question of cost.

Nelson Castonguay in his report on "Methods of Registration of Elections and Absentee Voting" in 1968 concluded, and I quote:

> The system of continuous electoral rolls currently in use in the Commonwealth of Australia, including the method of compulsory registration on the part of the electors, can be adapted for use in federal elections in Canada, to reduce the time required for the holding of elections and to provide improved facilities for voting by electors.

However, he felt that such a system would be very costly. Other analysts have reached the same conclusion, that a permanent electoral list would cost more. The important question must then be asked: Are the benefits that will be derived from a permanent list worth the cost? If a permanent voters' list means that fewer people will be left off the rolls, the answer must be yes. In addition, if the same list were utilized by other levels of government, the provinces and municipalities, the cost per voter at each election would be significantly reduced.

On a more practical level, it must be noted that we have experienced an election every 3.6 years since confederation. When elections have been close together, such as the ones in 1957 and 1958, the cost of the latter enumeration has been very low. In 1957, 4.38 persons were enumerated per dollar spent. In the present period, when parliaments do not sit the full five years, the cost of the permanent list will not be as great as predicted.

Another practical administrative detail that should be considered is the problem of getting a sufficient number of relatively competent enumerators in the future. This problem was used as an excuse during the last election. Effective implementation of a permanent list, which would be updated annually and have provisions for revision prior to the election, would require a permanent staff, and temporary employees needed could be used every year. If Canada were to adopt a system with a permanent electoral list, we would have to tailor one to meet our own needs. Because of our geographic size and the mobility of our population, it is clear that a permanent list, if it is to be an effective one, must not only be updated periodically, but must also be subject to revision quite close to election day.

The province of British Columbia and the Commonwealth of Australia are two examples of systems of continuous electoral rolls allowing revision up to a fixed date before polling day. From the Representation Commissioner's report of 1968 on "Methods of Registration of Electors and Absentee Voting", I should like to summarize the main points of these two systems and the benefits afforded by others mentioned.

In British Columbia, no yearly registration campaign takes place. Persons duly registered who vote at each election have their names retained on the electoral rolls. If a person moves and notifies the Registrar of the fact, the rolls are amended accordingly. If he does not so notify the Registrar, he may vote by absentee ballot as if residing at his former address, provided such address can be considered his place of residence by the terms of the Elections Act. Registrars keep their rolls up to date throughout the year by the addition of new registrations and by noting changes of address forwarded to them by the electors concerned. Registered persons who did not vote in the election are sent postcards and if they are returned undelivered, their name is taken off the rolls. Several years ago, all the rolls were cancelled and a complete registration took place. The method usually employed to keep the rolls uo to date is to cancel the rolls for certain electoral districts and take a door-to-door canvass, carried out by enumerators to compile new rolls for those districts. In other electoral districts, a partial cancellation may take place with registration centres set up at convenient places for the use of electors. Before the 1966 election, all registered voters were sent a card telling them they were eligible to vote. Those cards which were returned indicated to the registrar that the voter had changed his status in some way. A massive advertizing campaign encouraged those who did not receive cards to register at local centres or by mail. The onus to register is thus placed on the individual. The mailing procedure is supplemented periodically by a door-to-door campaign. Since there is a permanent list, a relatively secure system of absentee voting is possible.

Under the Australian system, enrolment as an elector is compulsory and responsibility for enrolment rests on the elector. In order to be enrolled, persons must sign an electoral claim which is available from all post offices and electoral offices. An annual review of the urban areas is carried out by casual labour making use of such aids as death certificates, prison records, etc. In rural areas, this review is undertaken by means of an electoral agency system which employes persons, usually public officers such as postmasters and police officers, who are appointed to note the changes which have taken place. Postal voting is permitted in Australia for several classes of citizens who may be absent from their electoral division on polling day. This privilige extends to citizens travelling under conditions that may preclude voting—including travelling abroad—or who are seriously ill, infirm, or, in the case of women, approaching maternity, or members of certain religious orders. The percentage of electors voting by post generally averages from 2 to 3 per cent of the total vote polled.

As in the case of other methods of voter registration, it is difficult to judge with accuracy the success of the enumeration undertaken. Under these systems, a great deal of emphasis is placed on the elector, the on-going updating that takes place, and the revision before an election. Under these systems voter registration is facilitated and encouraged, and late revision allows any concerned individual the opportunity to vote. When permanent lists are established, many persons who are normally excluded by other systems are able to vote by absentee or postal ballot. Moreover, the time needed before an election can be greatly reduced. In Great Britain, three weeks is all that is needed because no provision is made for revision. In Canada, the period of time needed would be four to five weeks.

The problems of complete enumeration will probably forever plague us. If we entrust the citizens of our country with the duty or responsibility of registration, then only they are to blame for any shortcomings. If this duty or responsibility is further strengthened by legislation and a systematic review, a great deal will have been done to encourage maximum participation at the electoral level.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, we can do better than our present system. To my mind, a permanent electoral list affords the best opportunity to bring about meaningful and necessary changes. As active participants in the last election, we are aware of the problem involved. There is a real need to review our present system and perhaps make a change—if only temporary in nature. It is my hope that Bill C-17, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, will get second reading today and be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections so that we, as Members of Parliament, can discuss, and make recommendations on, this most important question.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. gentleman who has just spoken for his very fine research as well as for his sense of priorities. I think it is important we should constantly take stock of our electoral machinery and seek means whereby we can improve the process of elections.

After a good many years of studying many jurisdictions, I believe we are much blessed in this country; we have a very fine election doctrine and a good elections Act. A good election process is, it seems to me, far more important than a grandiose Bill of Rights—some countries have the latter in abundance but on polling day the practice and the theory are often far removed. We are intent on improving the Elections Act.

I believe every member will agree with me that we have been fortunate during many years that the person occupying the office of Chief Electoral Officer has been a man of ability and impartiality. We are blessed in this. I agree with the hon. member that there are always areas in which improvement is possible. It used to be the practice that as soon as was reasonably possible after an election, the whole of the Elections Act was sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for careful examination. Whenever this was done, good suggestions were forthcoming. We did learn lessons during the last election. We found that mistakes had been made, and the day will come when these will need to be considered. For example, there were too many spoiled ballots. I have been a member of the committee for almost ten years—I am almost like a Father of Confederation on that committee. We thought what was done would be an improvement, but, somehow, we erred. Perhaps the city of Ottawa has come up with a better ballot, one with a circle. This is a matter which will have to be considered.

There is, of course, no perfect solution, no way of attaining that glorious day when every single qualified elector will find his name on the list. I agree with the hon. member that it is far better to be working on the list, structuring the list, at a time other than the beginning of a campaign. We found during the last election that it was a mad scramble to get information about the enumerators available to the returning officers 59 days ahead rather than 54. Even in a highly-organized, progressive and perceptive constituency like Hillsborough, where people have shown their good judgment for a long time, some effort was required to get those names in. So, people are appointed quickly, they do not have time in which to receive the necessary instruction, and they have to carry out their duties quickly.

It would be far better, in my judgment, as in the judgment of the hon. member, if there were an office, an emanation of the state, in which the lists were brought up to date regularly. I like the hon. member's suggestion that other jurisdictions could use the list. If they were smart enough, they could do so. But we need to be sensible about this; we cannot have one province saying a person is mature enough to vote at 19 while others say they are not mature until they reach the age of 21. Some pattern of co-operative federalism needs to be forthcoming. I should like to see an officer appointed who would look after the registration of voters. Other jurisdictions would make use of that office. The hon. member suggested that lists be kept open closer to the election date. Some countries open the lists only once a year, which allows for too much slipping in the accuracy of the list. He thought the list should be open until 15 days before polling. In other words, you would get 99.9 per cent of the job done. Then, you have properly trained officials with the required expertise who do their very best to get the other names in.

I quite agree with the hon. member that, while it is easy to say that if a citizen wants to vote he should make sure his name is on the list, we have found that that is not enough. This is the point of having revising officers and agents under the act. All of those involved in party politics—some of us get involved in that at election time, if not at any other time—would suggest we could give a little nudge there so people will get their names on the list. Parties spend money on advertising and I think they could suggest to these people that they put their names on the list. I am sure that every member of this House has been with the person whose name, by jove, is not on the list, but they do not tell you until it is too late, which is a most unfortunate thing. All people should be able to exercise this important act of citizenship, namely the right to vote.

I am not going to predict that we are going to have a series of minority governments; I think we will sweep through and have a comfortable majority next time. But the question is all the more serious if we are going to have elections every two and a half or two and a third years. I have gone through seven elections now. Constitutionally, we say it is a five year term, but politically it is a four year term. I should be 100 instead of looking like 100. If we are going to have the disruption of dissolution—and that does disrupt the country—there is also disruption in having a series of minority governments, so let us try and get some permanency into our structure by making provision for a permanent voters list.

Another argument that the hon. member put forth in a very reasoned and well organized presentation, if I may say so, was that his proposal would allow for absentee voting. I have always found that proxy voting is not enough, though there were certain examples in the last election that showed that proxy voting was too much. However, that was an aberration of the system, certainly not the purpose for which it was intended. The absentee voting system can function well, and in a practical way, if we have a permanent voters' list. We live in a more mobile society than ever before, and there are Canadians all across the country and in many parts of the world whose interest in, knowledge of and concern for, the parliamentary process is not vitiated by the distance they happen to be from their home. We can hardly expect Canadians to sit around waiting in case someone calls an election, and one of the great uncertainties of our system is that we are never quite sure when an election will be called.

I have also heard, as has the hon. member, of this question of expense, but I am not so frightened of that. I suppose having spent so many years in this place I have watched the big money spenders in action time and time again. However, I believe that once established, in view of the increasing cost of enumeration as election follows election, the cost differential will not be so enormous. Even if it would be more costly, the question we ask is not that but: Will it allow more Canadians to exercise their franchise? On that test, and on that test only, in my opinion, should this proposed bill be viewed. After the most careful consideration of the matter, I believe we would be well advised to push this bill on to committee, and in committee I do not think I would have the slightest hesitation in supporting it and doing everything possible to have it become part of our election structure before we next go to the polls.

I close, as I began, by commending the hon. member and assuring him of my complete support for his efforts to improve our election machinery.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this bill presented by the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan), I want to say at the outset that I agree with his motives, which I think are to make it possible for the largest number of Canadians to be in a position to exercise their franchise. I think this is the hon.

member's main motive. His second motive is to shorten the election campaign period, and I want to take some issue with that. However, I am glad that he has brought this bill forward. I have no objection to its passing second reading and going to the committee on Privileges and Elections because it is unlikely that we will be dealing with electoral law of much more significance than this, namely the matter of the control and limitation of election expenses.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), myself and several other hon. members were members of the committee on privileges and elections in 1968 and 1969 when the committee dealt with the report of the commissioner, Mr. Castonguay, on a permanent voters list. If I am not incorrect, I believe the committee was unanimous in accepting Mr. Castonguay's report. Although the cost of the hon. member's proposal would be two to four times as high as the cost of the present system of enumeration, given a country with our kind of geography, mobility of population—a matter the hon. member for London West mentioned in presenting his bill—climate, living habits and a number of other factors, we chose to accept the report of the electoral commissioner.

This is not to say that the principle of a permanent list is invalid. Perhaps over the next number of months or years parliamentarians and people expert in electoral law may come up with a system that suits our needs. But let us not be under any illusion as to what will be the cost. In 1967 and 1968 when the electoral commission was conducting their investigations, they estimated the cost at $1 per voter. We suspect that by now the cost would be $1.50 per voter. If one updated the list once a year, that would entail spending $20 million to $30 million a year on maintaining a reasonably accurate and updated permanent voters list.

However, even a permanent list will always be out of date to some extent. We should remind ourselves that there are literally tens of thousands of people in this country who choose not to vote for religious, political or economic reasons, or a combination of all three. I would not be surprised if they amounted to one or two per cent of the electorate. They are people who will not vote for a variety of reasons, no matter how accurate the method of putting their names on the list.

I must also comment on the fact that in the course of the meetings of the committee on privileges and elections we talked with people from other countries, and I was surprised to find how complimentary they were about our method of enumeration, bad though we think it is. I have listened to people from Puerto Rico, Australia and some of the states of the United States being very complimentary to us in terms of the method we use in trying to enumerate the maximum number of people possible prior to a general election. So let us look both at what we are now doing to improve the system and at the establishment of a permanent list, something I do not foresee happening until at least one or two further general elections have been called. In light of the present parliamentary set-up, it is unlikely that a permanent list could be established.

However, we could make some relatively simple amendments to the present electoral law to increase the eligibility of the number of people able to vote on election day. Some of these have already been mentioned such as, for example, a method for absentee balloting and a larger number of days for advance polls.

We have had reference, also, to swearing in at rural polls as well as urban polls. I had the misfortune of driving three different voters to the polls on election day in Regina last fall, all of whom thought they were on the enumerator's list because they had that little slip of paper which the enumerator had left with them. They did not read the slip of paper carefully enough and thought their names were on the list. They were all born and raised in this country, but could not vote. Had they lived a mile, or even one yard, outside the city limits of Regina they could have cast a ballot in a rural poll by being sworn in. This situation seems to me to be intrinsically unfair. These are some of the things we could do now to improve the present system.

I wish to take some issue with the remarks of the hon. member about shortening the election period. His riding is London West. I do not know how much rural area he has in his riding. It is all very well for members who can walk around the constituency in a day because it is a mile wide and three miles long to talk about shortening the election period, but they should think of their colleagues who have 40, 60 or 80 communities in their constituencies. These members, even if they spent half a day in each community, would not be able to cover all of them between the time the election is called and the time the vote is cast. Members such as the hon. member for London West should think about other members who are entitled to as much opportunity as anyone else to visit a maximum number of their constituents. This is what I meant when I spoke about taking our geography into account when talking about the election period which it is alleged we could shorten by having a permanent voters' list.

My riding is of moderate size. It encompasses nearly 6,000 square miles. In it there are between 40 and 50 hamlets, villages and towns, in addition to half the city of Regina. I am ashamed to say that there were 12 or 14 locations which I did not have time to visit during the last election campaign. My campaign manager tells me, however, that this might have been a good thing, because I won in two or three of them. If one were to follow that argument to its logical conclusion, we would all stay home for the entire campaign and still be re-elected.

When talking about a permanent list, I believe it is legitimate to remember our geography and our climate, as well as how difficult it is for candidates of all parties in a reasonable manner and in a meaningful way to visit a maximum number of their constituents. If the election period were shortened in terms of the period between the time the writs are issued and election day, it would mean that the voters in a number of constituencies of Canada would have much less opportunity to see, meet, hear and question their candidates.

I feel, and have felt for some time—and this provision was included in the government's proposed bill last year on the control and limitation of election expenses—that the public is angry about the high cost of election campaigns and the continual bombardment on radio, television and the press for seven or eight weeks by all the political parties and their candidates. The bill which the government brought forward last year proposed to limit the period in which that kind of campaign could take place to the last 28 days of the campaign. I submit that that is the kind of shortening of the campaign period the people of Canada want.

Most of the people are not particularly interested in, and do not care about the mechanics of setting up the election machinery, and so on. However, all of us who are experienced in respect of returning officers, election clerks, the Chief Electoral Officer and his staff, as well as the amount of work they have to do even once the election machinery is all set up, know that there is need for every possible day because of our thinly spread population, our geography and the problem of communications. So I submit we should look into this question and do everything we can to devise a permanent voters' list. In the meantime, there are a number of things which could be done to make the electoral process much better than it is now, by using the present law.

Proposals for a permanent voters' list have taken a number of different forms. From what I have been able to find out from the people who lived in British Columbia in the first few years when they had a so-called permanent list, it would seem that it was a debacle, a complete disaster, in some parts of the province. A large percentage of the population was unable to vote on election day. I have heard complaints about this type of system from people in Australia and Puerto Rico. However, that is their problem.

One could think of placing in a computer the name of every person in Canada and running the names off according to their social insurance numbers. In that way we might have a permanent list. The date of birth of each person would have to be on the social insurance card. The information on the social insurance card, which everybody has, ought to be sufficient. The card could be presented at the polling booth with other appropriate identification. Perhaps that would accomplish the purpose, or perhaps the Canadian citizenship card would accomplish the purpose.

The question is whether every voter would carry his card to the poll on election day. We all know the answer to that question. There would be those who would say that they had left the card in their other suit, or that it has been lost or stolen. Also, there would be the possibility of fraud. But I submit that no matter what kind of electoral system we have, there always will be the possibility of fraud. However, since such a tiny percentage of the electorate would resort to fraud, I would rather err on the side of making it as easy as possible for people to vote while maintaining reasonable safeguards.

This is a good bill for us to discuss and to turn over to the committee. I find it passing strange—or perhaps it is not too strange—that there is silence again by members of the government and of the official opposition concerning legislation on the control and limitation of election expenses. Unless we have some measure of control in this respect, a permanent list, enumeration or whatever method is used, the system will still involve wholesale inequities and there will still be in the minds of Canadians suspicion about how our elections are financed. I submit that much of the suspicion is justified.

In view of the scandals in our history, and the use to which political contributions have been put recently in the United States, it is all the more urgent that strong, effective and forcible legislation be brought in at once. Since 1966 I have listened ad nauseam to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He said this reform is a must, a high priority item. I listened last year to the members of the government when they brought in a bill with two major loopholes in it which rendered meaningless the entire legislation. There was a limitation on candidates, but no limitation on parties. Isn't that handy for the bagmen of the old-line parties? There was not even an attempt at a modest form of disclosure, which rendered meaningless everything else in that bill.

I hope the House will agree to send this bill to the committee and that the government very shortly, I hope tomorrow, will bring in a half decent bill to control and limit election expenses.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I am going to speak in favour of Bill C-17, in the interest of greater democratization, so that democracy will apply to all citizens, without restriction or bias, because it is well-known that when an election is announced, a voters list is hastily put together, made up of members of political parties who are committed people, not necessarily objective, and that during election campaigns you often come across passions and hatred in constituencies, with the result that the enumerators are often somewhat less than objective.

This is how certain abuses have been discovered in the past. Voters from areas that supported an opposition candidate were simply not on the voters list. This even happened in my constituency, during the last elections. Most of the tenants in the same block of apartments who shared the same political opinions were not to be found on the voters list. This is something that would not happen if we had a permanent voters list. These deliberate omissions could not occur, since people would have enough time to correct them.

Some elderly citizens, for example, who had lived in the same place within the same municipality for maybe 50 years, ever since they were born, discovered upon arriving at the polling station that their names were not on the list, that they had no more privileges than if they were Africans or Europeans. This sort of thing could not happen if we had a permanent voters list.

I will not comment on what is done in a move under hand manner, "fiddling" with lists, etc. In addition, the names of some individuals appearing on lists shown in public places, on posts for example, may not be included in the official book. When the official voters list will be used on voting day, these people will be unable to vote.

At the present time, there is no previous registration in rural areas, that is people vote if they can prove that they live in the area. There is no problem in that connection. Thus, the permanent voters list could perhaps apply only to urban areas, since this is were problems are found. A permanent list could be drawn up in cities. Such a system has been established in Quebec this year. This very month, enumerators have undertaken their work even if no election has been called.

There would be no objection for the federal government nor the Quebec government to use the Quebec permanent electoral list, since in that province as in the federal system the same voting rules apply, I mean all citizens over 18 have the right to vote. The federal government could use those lists and pay a financial compensation to the province of Quebec for saving it the trouble of doing that work.

In those cases where there are provincial electoral lists, the federal government could use them without having to incur additional expenses to establish its own.

Speaking of costs, I do not think it is a sound argument, at a time when we genuinely want to democratize politics, when we really want to give all citizens the opportunity to express themselves, to defeat a government, as will happen, I hope, at the next elections. I think such thing is priceless. I much prefer paying a few cents more to give the franchise to a 50-year old who has always lived where he is to vote than to see others pass "telegraphs".

At this time, every one in Canada has a social insurance number. Now I suggest that the electoral officer might consider using that number to draw up the permanent list. No extraordinary expense would be involved and even if 10, 20 or 100 citizens bear the same name identification would be achieved through the different numbers.

I shall not go further into this issue as I should like to see this bill put in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, there has been consultation and I think that if there were agreement in the House to send the subject matter of the bill to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and to discharge the bill, the government would have no objection. I hope this is acceptable to members of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the suggestion. Is it agreed that the order be discharged and the subject matter of the bill referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is so ordered.

Order for second reading discharged and subject matter of Bill C-17 referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Reid: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Do hon. members agree to calling it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hour appointed for consideration of hon. members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 5.45 the House took recess.

[Mr. Boisvert.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in the few moments for which I spoke before the dinner recess I stated that in this critical debate we must search for the best solution possible that will ensure justice, the proper penalty for murder and the security of society. We are dealing here with the highest question Members of Parliament can face, the question of life itself. We cannot slough off our responsibilities in the guise of adhering to questionable public opinion surveys. We are responsible to our constituents and to parliament itself to use our best judgment in resolving the capital punishment issue. The people who sent us here must be able to evaluate our reasoning process.

My mail on this issue has been sharply split into the retentionist and abolitionist camps. I will quote two letters, expressing opposite opinions, which are reflective of the opinions expressed in my mail. Mr. Robert B. Manly, of Edmonton, writes:

> My family, my friends and neighbours with whom we have discussed the matter are deeply concerned with the increasing lawlessness in Canada, especially the increase in the number of murders and other crimes of violence. We are therefore strongly opposed to any extension of the present ban on the death penalty .... No one is afraid to commit murder any longer in Canada. Even when, despite all the technicalities which hamper police officers in obtaining evidence and getting convictions, a conviction is obtained, our judges and juries have been too lenient, judges frequently giving out sentences that are absurdly inadequate.
> The only real deterrent to vicious crime is the certainty, upon conviction, of adequate punishment. In the case of premeditated murder such punishment must be the death penalty. Even the most vicious murderers do fear the death penalty. They certainly don't fear a sentence of four years in prison.

An opposite view is expressed by Mr. and Mrs. Lavern Burkhardt who urged me as in follows in a telegram:

> Please support legislation to entirely abolish capital punishment irrespective of type of victim. We favour life imprisonment for a minimum period of 25 years. Executing convicted murderers sparks more sympathy for executed person than for victim. Death is not a greater deterrent than imprisonment. Civilized people should not be vindictive.

The weight of my mail is on the Manly, retentionist, side rather than the Burkhardt, abolitionist, side. But as I studied the opinions expressed to me I became convinced that most of those who support the death penalty do so out of a desire for more safety in society and less so for revenge or retributive justice. In the present mood of Canada it is not enough simply to be an abolitionist or a retentionist. The people are clearly disturbed at the rising crime rate and want more protection. More than a "yes" or "no" on the question of capital punishment is called for.

● (2010)

Another constituent, Hans D. Ehrenlechner wrote me. It was his letter which most clearly pointed out a moderate course for the country to follow. Here is what Mr. Ehrenlechner wrote:

As a voting member in your constituency, I would like to express by deep concern over the forthcoming decision by free vote to either completely abolish or reinstate the practice of capital punishment in some form.

From a religious, metaphysical and moral point of view I am most certainly opposed to the reinstatement of capital punishment in any form whatsoever. However, we live in an imperfect world and such a step would likely not accomplish in practice what theoretically it should—i.e., contribute to the humanization of our society. Nor do I feel that the majority of citizens want and expect total abolition of the death penalty. You must be aware of the rising concern over lawlessness which the average voter believes is taking a sharp upward trend in recent years, and all those who advocate the reinstitution of the death penalty rest their case on this and similar grounds.

Mr. Ehrenlechner continues:

Surely there is an alternative solution to the problem that would both serve to protect the public—which should be the first concern of the law—and yet not detract from the high standards and ideals it is in our power to realize in this generation.

Having thought about the matter for some time, I feel that the only fair course of action at this time is to initiate another five-year extension on the banning of capital punishment in Canada. Reluctantly, I agree that the capital punishment be retained for the murder of policemen, prison guards, etc., and all those whose lives would be immediately endangered by the absence of any form of capital punishment. Again, from an aesthetic point of view this discrimination between police officers and the general public does not make sense, but then we are dealing with an emotional issue here and any strictly intellectual or "religious" arguments could hardly come up with a solution acceptable to the people.

Mr. Ehrenlechner closes his arguments this way:

One further point. Let's put a stop to the farce of life imprisonment. If we are to relax the laws in some respects, let's at least enforce the ones we have. I'm sure you've heard the stories about the Parole Board and their candied sugar-plum attitude to criminals, lax granting of paroles and easy bail for law breakers. Our entire judicial system, and the government backing it, is to be severely reprimanded in this respect.

I am of the opinion also that an enforced sentence of life imprisonment would equal or even excel capital punishment as an effective deterrent to crime, if an effective deterrent exists, that is.

I have gone into some detail in revealing the various views of my constituents to indicate that I have taken them most seriously into consideration. It was through this correspondence that I realized just how strong is the desire for improved security in our country today. We are paying a heavy price for the permissiveness of modern society. But I have to ask myself if the death penalty will achieve the safety the people want. Thus, I have examined that precise question.

There is no way that I can abdicate my responsibility to use my conscience in forming my decision as to how to vote. Some people think a Member of Parliament is a delegate to carry out automatically the wishes of the majority of his constituents, assuming the majority can be defined. But that is not my concept of the job. I believe a person is elected by constituents who repose a sense of confidence, for the time being at least, in his judgment and expect him to use it. The assurance that he will always vote according to his conscience is the best service that a Member of Parliament can offer his constituents.

The starting point for my analysis of the capital punishment issue is my belief in the sanctity of life. When a murderer violates the sanctity of life by an act of violence on his victim, how is the sanctity of life preserved by another act of violence on the murderer, this time by the state? We are allowed to kill in self-defence, as we know, but for the state to execute a criminal is to perpetuate violence. I believe in a morality which excludes violence as permissible conduct. If we accepted execution as retributive justice in an earlier period, we should be thankful that society is becoming more sensitive and that there is a movement throughout the world for total abolition. I agree with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) who said when introducing the present bill in the House:

The state must set the clear example of respect for human life, through the tolerant and patient application of law which looks to other more effective means of protecting society and discouraging crime, even murder.

In addition to the philosophical side of this question one must study the practical. As many have noted, the strongest argument for retention is that capital punishment acts as a deterrent. But does it? The government sponsored the now famous study of the deterrent effect of capital punishment by Dr. Ezzar A. Fattah, associate professor of criminology at the University of Montreal. Dr. Fattah studied the circumstances surrounding the slight increase in criminal homicide in Canada over the past eight years and concluded that the increase could not be attributed to the suspension of capital punishment. The increase in criminal homicide is the lowest among all crimes of violence studied, a fact, he says, which indicates that such increase can neither be attributed nor related to the suspension of capital punishment. In short, Dr. Fattah concludes:

A study of homicide statistics in Canada jointly with the statistics of other crimes of violence and comparisons between the provinces and between the years do not lend support to the assumption of the uniquely deterrent effect of the death penalty. Thus, in deciding on the question of the reintroduction or abolition of capital punishment, reintroduction cannot be justified on the argument that it is a more effective deterrent to potential killers than the alternative of protected imprisonment.

Others in this debate have quoted statistics showing there does not seem to be any relationship between the existence of the death penalty and the rate of murder either in jurisdictions where capital punishment has given way to abolition, as in New Zealand, or contiguous abolitionist capital punishment states in the U.S.A. The case for deterrence has not been proved, and thus we cannot look to capital punishment for safety in society. On moral and practical grounds, then, full-scale capital punishment should not be reintroduced in Canada. And yet, as I have said, a simple abolitionist position is not sufficient.

The government has undermined the safety of society by giving the impression that all sentences of execution for killing policemen and jail guards are being automatically commuted. We know that there have been no executions since 1962. Moreover, the escape rate of convicts, including killers, has been inordinately high, and the rehabilitative system of early parole and weekend passes scandalously lax. I believe the news coverage of the aberrations in the penal process has obscured much valuable rehabilitative work. None the less, as a result of government mismanagement the people feel that the rehabilitation of the prisoner has been given a higher priority than the protection of the public. The people need to be assured that public safety will be given a higher priority than prisoner rehabilitation.

I am convinced that minimum mandatory sentences for killing, and stricter enforcement in penitentiaries, will actually act as more of a deterrent and give the public a greater sense of security than capital punishment, which will likely be commuted and followed by parole only ten years after the crime. The question is: What is a minimum mandatory sentence? At first I thought the judge should make this determination in sentencing, but as a result of the impressions made on me by correspondents I now believe that parliament should fix the specific minimum sentence for premeditated murder at 25 years. Again, I say that such a well-publicized sentence will, in my opinion, act as a stronger deterrent than capital punishment which is rarely invoked.

Thus, I shall vote for Bill C-2 on second reading, because at the very least it extends the trial period of partial abolition for another five years. But the principal purpose of my affirmative vote is to send the bill to committee where the 25-year amendment can be examined. It may be that the committee, and ultimately parliament will decide that we do not yet have enough evidence to justify taking a definitive step. If so, the next step should be the appointment of a royal commission charged with responsibility for collecting the needed factual information and for conducting public hearings where individuals and groups can express their views.

There should be no hurry to come to a quick decision; it is better to take a slow course to help develop public understanding of the complexities of this issue. One of the benefits of such an organized examination would be to throw a spotlight on the reasons for violence in our society and its effect on the murder rate. As the United Church of Canada recently put it:

> Our entire society needs creative outlets for expression of frustration or anger. Violence has become a way of life that we accept and that we condone in our so-called entertainment, and in our general approach to life. The death penalty is only one more violent reaction to violent action.

In other words, the causes of violence, from frustration through rage and all the way to murder, need to be examined so that we can purge our society of violence. A vast canvas will appear before us, including such factors as alcohol, drugs, gambling, emotional disorders, sexual deviation, the effects of brutalization dramatized on television, and the availability of deadly weapons. By reducing those elements in life which promote or lead to anti-social behavior we will be taking a big step forward, not only in the safety of society but in enhancing the dignity of human beings and the right to life itself.

[Mr. Roche.]

If Bill C-2 fails to pass second reading, Mr. Speaker, then we will have reverted to capital punishment. Many people think that the simple act of retention will improve society. But it will not, for unless we get a better understanding of crime and what leads to it, unless we pass stringent gun control laws, unless we make productive and valuable citizens out of men and women who would otherwise lead lives of crime, we will be deluding ourselves that progress is being made. We will improve society by attacking the reasons for violence.

The public must be adequately protected. The guilty must be punished, and proper systems of reform maintained. But to take simple recourse in retribution is to close our eyes to the sanctity of life and the complexities underlying crime in modern society.

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, a new member rising to join in the debate on capital punishment cannot help but recall the speech delivered by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) shortly after this session began. At that time the dean of this House advised new members that their first speech would be the most difficult they would be called upon to deliver. While this is not my initial opportunity of speaking in the chamber, it is my first encounter with a speech on such a complex matter that is to be decided by what is termed a free vote. Out of respect for the sage counsel of the right hon. gentleman, I am inclined to agree that this is indeed the most difficult speech. Moreover, I hope that future events will bear out his words, as I cannot contemplate facing a more difficult challenge than that presented to every member by the question of capital punishment.

Certainly, I have never had to make as difficult a decision and I do not believe that any more years of experiencing the workings of parliament, or experiencing life itself would have made the issue any clearer, the burden lighter or the decision easier. Rather, Mr. Speaker, I have spent the same months of study and research, anguish and soul-searching that have accompanied every member of this chamber in his or her consideration of the question of capital punishment. As we all know, the companion of this issue is the question, as old as parliament itself, as to the basis on which a member should decide how to vote. I believe that this latter, over-all question must be resolved before a member can begin to consider the specific legislation on which he shall vote.

My purpose, then, in rising today, Mr. Speaker, is to place before you and my colleagues, and before those whom I am honoured to represent, both my decision and the reasons for that decision—the basis on which I shall vote. I would no more have constituents agree with me for the wrong reasons than I would have them disagree because I failed to explain my position.

It is to the credit of all party leaders in this House that we are being given what is termed a free vote on this legislation. As a new member, I am particularly grateful to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) whom I am proud to support as leader of my party. The granting of this free vote acknowledges that the decision which hon. members are called upon to make transcends usual partisan considerations and so very deeply involves our concepts of justice, morality, the powers of the state and, indeed, the value of human life.

We are summoned to this chamber to represent the people who have elected us. For whatever period they decide, we have the responsibility to share their dreams about this country, to advance their hopes, to voice their opinions and to ensure that they are represented when the decisions are made which affect their lives. I believe that my foremost responsibility is to represent here those who have sent me. Further, I believe that I represent them best when I act, on the basis of both intellect and conscience, to do what I honestly think is best for them and for our society.

This approach to my responsibilities is not to indicate that the views and feelings of my constituents should be unknown or unheeded by me. Quite the opposite. I am particularly grateful to the many who have taken the time and trouble to express their opinions on capital punishment. Every letter and conversation has received deep consideration and played a significant part in my decision.

I have tried to approach the extremely difficult question of capital punishment with an open mind and have weighed, to the best of my ability, the many and valuable arguments on both sides. All of us know that there are some people in this land who are so convinced their viewpoint is right that the possibility does not exist of there being another side to the question. No such intellectual luxury is open to the Member of Parliament, who must give fair and full consideration to all viewpoints. There is a tremendous gap between the onlooker who need only hold an opinion and the member of this House who must make the public decision on behalf of his constituents.

Of course, throughout the whole process of heartrending consideration I sought anxiously that one argument, that extra statistic, that new bit of information which would suddenly decide the question for me. As we all realize, no such convincing argument is to be found which would give us greater insight or more wisdom than that allowed to mortals. Rather, we have all sought and received from various sources the inconclusive statistics, the different viewpoints and the reams of information. It is left to us as individuals to consider all these things, to interpret them as best we can and then to face the questions. As uncertain as I am about this question and the ability of any man to deal with it, I do not shrink from the responsibility.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, go into the numerous arguments on both sides. Time does not permit, and they are known to hon. members. Simply, I want to tell you that I have decided to favour the reinstatement of capital punishment for the crime of premeditated, rationally calculated and intentionally committed murder. I do so, not out of a lust for vengeance, not even out of a call for justice—for what is to be gained by revenge, and what justice can there be for the ultimate crime against a member of society? Rather, I call for the reinstatement of capital punishment out of hope—hope that even one innocent life might be saved, that society might be a bit better protected, by the restraint on he who ponders murder of the penalty to which he will be subject.

The deterrent effect is the crux of the question. Some state, with absolute sincerity, that capital punishment offers no deterrent effect; others believe, with equal conviction, that it does. The deterrent effect is an uncertain proposition, I readily admit, because one cannot prove it absolutely one way or the other. Nor can we ever lay claim to fully comprehending the actions of any man. However, in full consideration of the information available, and given my limited understanding of human behaviour, I believe that the threat of capital punishment can act as a deterrent to one who in full possession of his mental and physical faculties contemplates cold-blooded murder.

If one wished to get cynical, Mr. Speaker, he might even suggest that it is the deterrent effect of the threat of death that accounts for the success and loyalty to be found for decades in organized crime. A man's greatest temporal possession is his life, and his greatest fear is the loss of that life. That is my belief and the basis of my hope, and that is the reason I want innocent lives given the maximum possible protection. At this time might I just say that the over-all questions of the increase in crime and the need to review our laws and their enforcement are of great concern to me and I hope we shall find it possible to deal further with them during this parliament.

Being in favour of the return of capital punishment I am, of course, opposed to the provision of Bill C-2 as introduced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). However, it would not be surprising for me to join other retentionists, whatever their reasons, in voting "yea" on second reading so that the bill might be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This would allow further detailed study and an opportunity for amendment.

If the minister, for whom I have personal regard and respect for his efforts in his department, had introduced a bill for total abolition I would certainly agree to vote so that such bill might receive study in committee. I would, of course, reserve the right to vote against the bill when it returned to the House for third and final reading. However, Mr. Speaker, I can lend no such support to Bill C-2 in its present form—for while the end result of giving this bill second reading would be to have it referred to committee, the vote on second reading is known as approval in principle. I cannot give approval in principle to the furtherance, not even for study, of a bill which I regard as hypocritical.

For one thing, the minister—and, I would predict, almost all of his cabinet colleagues—are abolitionists. Yet they present us with a bill that provides for the death penalty in the case of murder of a prison guard or law enforcement officer. If that alone is not questionable, surely the hypocrisy of this legislation is clear when the government presents us with a proposal it has no intention of carrying out. If a government is unable, or just plain unwilling to carry out legislation, it insults this House by presenting such legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Sullivan: The present government would not enforce the penalty provided for in this legislation for the murder of a policeman or prison guard. To suggest it would do so is preposterous; to incorporate that suggestion into legislation is hypocritical. For that reason, I cannot even consent to give this bill second reading.

Having put before this House my reason for asking the reinstatement of capital punishment, I wish to acknowledge that I rather doubt that my reason, my fervent but admittedly uncertain hope, will sway the decision of others. That is my intention for, as I have stated, this decision is a lonely one; to be made by each individual member, alone.

Mr. Speaker, I would end my remarks with an appeal to all hon. members to recall their duty, which is higher than just carrying out the wishes of their constituents. It is the duty to do what one thinks is right and is best for his or her constituents and for our society. In making this choice I ask hon. members to recall that we, just as murderers and criminals, will one day be called to judgment and for sentence by He whose work we are called to do but whose role we should not presume to play here on earth. Recognizing our shortcomings as those of all humans, I tend to think that He will be less concerned with how each of us voted on this question than with the sincerity and honesty behind each of our votes.

Given this most difficult decision to make, we might apply to ourselves the last words of society, under the British system of justice, to one sentenced to death: "And may God have mercy upon your soul."

● (2040)

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of the few minutes allowed to me to express certain opinions on Bill C-2, which is quite simply an extension of the current legislation concerning the death penalty.

I respect the opinions that have been voiced here, and all those that will be expressed by hon. members who speak after me. I think it is important for every member to express his opinion on this bill, and I am glad that there will be a free vote on this matter. Hon. members will thus be able to satisfy the wishes of their constituents and the demands of their consciences.

This bill, which—the term is appropriate—is of capital importance, has been before us for some days, and we all know by now that it was necessary to introduce it, since more than five years have gone by since the legislation at present in force was adopted in 1967. The legislation before us, which is identical to that which existed previously, prescribes hanging for the murder of two sorts of people, prison guards and policemen. I need hardly say that this bill incurs very great responsibility for us, and we must think seriously about all the briefs and communiqués that we have received, as well as the statistics provided by the news media and official bodies.

After all this reading, I wished also to know what were the opinions of the constituents whom I represent. And so, a few months ago, I distributed to my constituents a questionnaire on the death penalty, and after receiving 6,000 answers from 83 per cent of my electors I came to the conclusion that they want me to vote in favour of the retention of capital punishment. I think that I cannot ignore those answers because as federal members of this Parliament it is our duty to respect the feelings of the people who elected us, and I will respect the wish of my electors.

In any case, it so happens that the wish of my electors coincides with my own. I think that some people have been trying for a certain time to inspire sympathy for the hard-core criminal. I am wondering to what extent we as members of this Parliament must let ourselves be influenced by statements from psychiatrists who say that society is always too hard on those who feel free to do anything.

For example, I am thinking about the improvement of our penal institutions. According to some people we must ensure that those criminals have the services which society offers us to the extent we abide by the law. It must be said that the criminal who was sentenced to a number of years in prison deliberately chose to deprive himself of certain liberties.

Perhaps I will now sound cruel by refusing to listen carefully to the advice and recommendations that are often made to improve prisons so as to make them really interesting for those who have to live there. In fact, now and again we hear complaints about the food, the lack of facilities to fill leisure time. I think it must be recognized that the condamned acted deliberately. They have run the risk of not getting caught in the act and, today, I clearly have the impression that people seem to take a little too seriously all these amendments which appear, to some individuals, a priority within our society. Therefore, I may appear somewhat less sympathetic than most to these reforms.

I refer to the professional criminals, because they certainly exist. For all sorts of other reasons, some inmates deserve a certain measure of rehabilitation and attention. There exist, however, some criminals in respect of whom we must take severe action because of the extremely severe action they have personally taken against their fellow human beings.

I should like to insist on prevention. Indeed, people are increasingly inclined to favour parole systems as preventive measures; yet, they must be seriously examined. It would be certainly too late to wait until an individual has reached an advanced age to consider prevention or rehabilitation in his case.

Very objectively speaking, it is the function of the state, I think, to provide for the most expedient implementation of preventive measures.

Therefore, in the present social context, there are shortcomings; one will readily admit that our society is faced with both economic and social problems. These are interrelated and, in certain environments, may result in some individuals becoming criminals because of extremely difficult circumstances.

To what extent can the state improve these difficult environments? How, in the present social context, will we succeed through enforcement of the death penalty in reducing the number of criminals? Hanging itself is certainly not a solution. I think however that, for the hard-core criminal, hanging is a cause of great concern.

The criminal who did not hesite to kill his neighbour to carry out his aim deserves a similar treatment. Endlessly repeating "Thou shalt not kill" is not a deterrent. Did the murderer also think about those words? And in the present social context, for instance, if we only reinstate capital punishment without thinking of other solutions which could possibly decrease the number of murderers, we will certainly be wrong. I am one of those who believe that the killer must suffer the same fate as his victim. Others, for all kinds of reasons, think differently.

We are dealing with a bill introduced by the government; all members are still free to express their views about this bill. We all know very well that the bill specified hanging for two categories of person.

We must recognize that capital punishment has not been applied for five years and I am concerned and disappointed. And we know also that the bill before the House calls for the suspension of capital punishment for five more years except for the death of prison guards and police officers. And until now the government has not taken a firm position against capital punishment. Does that mean that criminals responsible for the death of prison guards or police officers would have the advantage of having their death sentence commuted to life imprisonment? In view of the statements made this afternoon by a number of government members, we must ask ourselves some questions while evaluating the bill before us. If we are against hanging, we can absolutely not support this bill. If we are for the maintenance of capital punishment, we cannot support this bill either. Therefore, this bill is clearly inadequate and from our passed experience it is obvious that the former law was violated even though it was adopted on a free vote five years ago. I regret the government did not respect, as the House wished, a law which has been adopted in a most democratic way.

I would remind the House that 83 per cent of my constituents have participated in a poll made in my riding. I would like to invite the House to give special attention to what might be called the correction of a social climate. It has been demonstrated—and we realize this through various organizations and commissions—that our social context includes what we call underprivileged classes where people live under difficult conditions. To what extent is it possible for a government or a Parliament to set up organizations or commissions responsible for implementing a prevention system? I think we have much to do in this field and, once more, I will not insist by blaming the government. However, as members of Parliament, we should see to it that this prevention system be implemented so as to prevent an ever increasing number of people from taking inadmissible liberties, whatever their motives.

I think it is incumbent upon us to set up organizations which could improve considerably our social climate. We are perfectly aware as well of the fact—and we admit it—that 30 per cent of the people live in poverty. Certainly, in such conditions, there are people who do not have what we call the vital minimum and, therefore, if we do not correct this injustice, if we do not improve social conditions, we might experience difficult times when it comes to criminality. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we must seriously consider deterrents.

As for parole, many people have spoken about it. We know the results of some experiments that took place; it is out of question, of course, to release on parole a criminal recognized as such. However, there are groups of criminals who have committed quite serious crimes, but not the most serious, and who surely deserve special consideration for rehabilitation. I suggest that it is our responsibility to enable these groups of criminals to be rehabilitated, but we must first proceed with a careful screening.

In my opinion, we should give priority to all possible deterrents which would eliminate at the same time the need for rehabilitation.

Of course, our law enables the accused to defend themselves. It is quite normal, in a civilized society, that criminals be able to defend themselves. We often come to wonder whether a given crime was premeditated or not. We must not hesitate to bring back capital punishment for so-called hired guns. We are perfectly aware that there is a group of people who, for a few hundred dollars, do not hesitate to kill somebody, and the real criminal, as a rule, is not quite he who commits the crime. Nevertheless, the indivudual who decides to take someone's life must expect the state to take action to protect society and to ensure respect of the right to life. And I believe the paid killer should expect no sympathetic treatment from justice.

I also have in mind the man who does not hesitate to commit a bank robbery, or to gun down either a teller or a policeman. We will often be told, of course, that he did not intend to kill. Why, then, did he enter a bank after taking good care to load his weapon?

My opinion is quite clear on that point: the same man could carry out his robbery without necessarily loading his weapon. If his intention is only to frighten the teller, he will achieve it. But if he goes to the trouble of loading his gun, I believe he accepts the idea of killing in case it should become necessary, and in my opinion it is evident that if he foresaw that it might be necessary to kill in order to succeed in his venture, we are dealing with a criminal who has no right to freedom.

In the underworld, there is no reluctance to use a gun and I believe it is the government's responsibility to protect society against this group of people who, as we well know, have leverage in many places. I feel the mafia should not escape severe justice and that we should therefore not hesitate to restore the death penalty, at the least for murders of policemen and prison gards. There are other categories of murderers who, for debatable reasons, may win some sympathy either from the court or the public.

For about ten years now, we have been dealing with drug users. In some minds, it is clear that whoever, for some reason or other, takes a small dose of drugs, is not responsible for the carnage he may provoke. Still, it is surprising that the same man should be able to go to the address he was given to commit his crime. Some will be tempted to prove, by all sorts of means, that he was not aware of what he was doing; yet, he committed his crime perfectly. I therefore have many reservations about whoever justifies himself by claiming that he was drunk or under the influence of some drug or other, and who therefore is not responsible for his act.

Let me return again to a wider use of preventive measures. It is important for parliament to set up a mechanism whereby young people can, at early age, be withdrawn from an unwholesome environment, conducive to making of him a hardened criminal.

We know that with the parole system, some criminals may serve a certain number of years in jail and then be released. The people are very much concerned about this and I have had the opportunity of getting several opinions on this from the public. I have read the brief presented by the police association which is very much concerned about the freedom that is being granted to some dangerous criminals. And we recognize more and more that guards and policemen are worried about the release of certain dangerous criminals. I think that this should make us show much more severity toward these criminals.

They will try and justify themselves with statistics. What is the use of statistics when one is faced with crimes such as those we have seen these past few years? For those who believe that the death penalty is not a deterrent, I repeat that it gives the most hardened criminal cause for reflection and I think that for the one who took the liberty of killing his neighbour, there is no other punishment than that of death penalty.

The recent escapes may have been found more or less funny. I think that the department concerned must quickly undertake the investigation which it requested and find who is responsible for those escapes. I would not dare say that the minister must be held responsible for those escapes, surely not. I know the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and his great sincerity. However, we find it very strange how easily some prisoners recently escaped. I think that the investigation should be held as soon as possible and that we must ask serious questions about the management of our prisons. I imagine that the inquiry will bring us sufficient evidence to show that there are guilty parties in the prisons; as for those outside, I know nothing about them. One thing is sure, however; offenders should be severely reprehended and escapes have become a joke among people as well as a most serious and alarming problem. They should end as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make these few remarks because I consider the legislation under consideration quite important. I believe that as members we should take part in this debate and express our views. In fact, it is important that the opinions held in our various regions should be made known in the House. There will always remain this basic question: Why and how does one become a criminal? I think this will be the everlasting question for us to ask ourselves every day and that the state's task is to spare nothing in order to set up these prevention and rehabilitation systems whenever the latter is possible.

The government and Parliament have the responsibility to severely punish whoever abuses individual freedom. Therefore, it is quite clear that I shall vote against this bill which is the repetition of a law that we have had. Being dissatisfied with the legislation already passed, I could not honestly support the bill that is before us now.

[Mr. La Salle.]

And if this bill is to be defeated, I shall be only too happy about it because I believe in the reinstatement of capital punishment for the criminal who does not stop at anything to make his wishes come true by any means. And I trust that Parliament will continue to try and set up prevention services which would also reduce the number of criminals. To the extent where the social climate is improved, their number will be reduced. To my mind, we have a great deal to do to set up various institutions in order that these corrective measures be applicable and applied as soon as possible.

In conclusion, I would like to say once again that I admit that it is not only by reinstating capital punishment that we will improve our society, but through the implementation of several corrective measures. If the responsible departments use a great deal of imagination, if the social climate is improved, we may at last reduce the number of criminals. I am convinced that the criminal who deliberately commits murder must be severely punished and that means the death penalty.

[English]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I enter this now rather agonizing debate because of my own moral conviction that capital punishment serves only to wreak social vengeance on the one hand, and brutalize our entire penal system on the other. Although I believe in total abolition, I am prepared to support Bill C-2 which calls for a further extension of the trial period of abolition of capital punishment except in cases relating to the murder of policemen or prison guards as defined in the Criminal Code.

For those who would argue on fundamentalist grounds that the noose should be brought back, I can only say that it is my belief that the Christian ethic of love and forgiveness precludes the taking of a life for a life. In my opinion, one act of violence does not in any way call for or demand another act of violence. In the past decade we have seen, on a global scale, violence beyond imagination where legal murder in the name of war and political idealogy has wiped out many thousands of lives. We have lived through a violent decade. Must we continue, through capital murder, the destruction of human life?

I am not a bleeding-heart when it comes to sympathizing with a convicted murder who in cold blood and full knowledge of his act has taken the life of an innocent person. But what advantage is gained in legally murdering the perpetrator of a crime, no matter how useless a human being the convicted slayer might be? To me, capital punishment is morally and socially debasing. It appeals to the lower animal instincts of revenge and retribution, totally disregarding the years of effort, study and the practice of rehabilitation on the part of those dedicated to improving the dignity of even our most anti-social citizens. How can you rehabilitate a dead person?

This latter view is particularly cogent when one considers the following statistics, although I am aware of the fact that in this particular debate statistics can be misleading. Between 1920 and 1967, 151 persons who had been sentenced to death in Canada had their sentences commuted and were subsequently paroled. Of this number, 92 were successful in that they were never returned to prison on any charge. This experience is similar to the experience in the United States in respect of recidivism related to parole. The recidivism rate of paroled murders is very low.

It is interesting to note that of all types of criminals, most murderers, with the exception of the mentally ill, are the most responsive to rehabilitation. Indeed, experience has indicated that a majority of persons convicted of murder are not criminals in the sense that they earn their living from crime but, rather, are involved in a crime of passion, often of a domestic nature, and their violent act is a once in a lifetime matter. Such persons often can be safely and usefully released back into society long before 25 years. Some members have proposed a 25-year imprisonment period, which is totally unacceptable to me personally because we would be lumping all convicted murderers into one group. Some, obviously, cannot be rehabilitated in 10 or 15 years, and perhaps some never.

I wish to emphasize that I am not referring to convicted murders who fall into the general category of the criminally insane, the sexual psychopath and the hardened criminal. In fact, we must tighten our parole and pass system to ensure that such criminals do not gain even temporary freedom until fully cured, if indeed they can be cured at all. If the latter is the case, and unfortunately it is in most cases, then society must be protected and they must be denied their freedom even if it means for a lifetime. It is my opinion that inmates who are incapable of parole should not be left to rot behind bars but, under very controlled circumstances, should be put to work in gainful employment contributing in some way to the development of this country. For example, why not put them to work in various parts of the country building highways, bridges or airfields, or put them to any other gainful employment?

For those who argue for the retention of the death penalty on grounds of the deterrent factor, a great deal already has been said. Impressive arguments for and against the effectiveness of capital punishment in deterring others from committing murder have been made, and statistics have been used and abused. Murderers usually fall into three main categories: the person, otherwise law abiding, who in a fit of passion kills a person without premeditation; the mentally ill or the psychopath; and the hardened criminal whose life of crime one day results in murder, premeditated or otherwise.

Jealousy, greed and emotional instability are difficult to control by those so afflicted although they live useful lives within the law. To what extent does the threat of the death penalty deter those caught up in passion and rage? I suggest there is no deterrent factor here at all. Let us keep in mind that this first category comprises the vast majority of murderers. Also in this group are those who kill as a result of being in a state of intoxication or under the effects of drugs, or a combination of both.

Does capital punishment deter the mentally ill? Again I suggest the answer is no. The only real deterrent here is cure through medical science, which unfortunately is woefully ill-equipped to handle such persons in our mental institutions today due to insufficient funds for research, lack of staff due to inadequate salaries compared to those of psychiatrists who work in a free enterprise system and, as a consequence, difficult working conditions for the personnel who have the courage and dedication to enter upon such difficult careers. Trying to cure the criminally insane today is a horrendous undertaking, and I suggest that governments at all levels must drastically improve the situation.

We come now to the hardened criminal. In most cases these people come from socially deprived backgrounds; not always, but usually. They often come from broken homes where a sense of human dignity and the worth of the individual are virtually non-existent. They have been battered and bruised both physically and emotionally for years—unfortunately, the young, impressionable years. They develop anti-social attitudes and a complete disrespect for authority. They turn to crime because they have no respect for their fellow human beings. They have no sense of human involvement or community involvement. Society is to be paid back for what society has done to them in the form of neglect, poverty or rejection: at least, this is their attitude. It may be a warped attitude, but it is their attitude.

Does capital punishment deter this kind of criminal? It might in some instances, but statistics neither prove nor disprove that the threat of being hanged enters a hardened criminal's mind on the way to the bank with a loaded pistol that results in the death of the manager or some innocent bystander.

Professor Fattah, in "A Study of the deterrent effect of capital punishment with special reference to the Canadian situation", concludes that the effectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent is so limited that its abolition cannot have any serious effect on the incidence of murder. He cites the following limits of deterrence: first, deterrence is irrelevant to the bulk of the population which follows the normal norms of society and whose self-concepts will not permit them to commit crimes. I am referring to the conclusions in his report.

Second, deterrence cannot be effective in the case of certain acts of an impulsive nature where high emotions or strong motivations are involved. Third, deterrence cannot be effective for certain categories of criminals such as insane, abnormal, impulsive or compulsive offenders or those consciously or unconsciously seeking to be punished. Fourth, the death penalty cannot be an effective deterrent for those who are not afraid to die or those who have a conscious or unconscious desire to die. This includes murderers who commit suicide. Fifth, deterrence cannot be effective in cases where punishment can be avoided.

The error of the deterrence theory can also be shown statistically with reference to the United States. Now that several states have had no death penalty for several years, it is possible to compare some neighbouring states with similar populations and educational and economic levels, some with and some without capital punishment. For example, Rhode Island, without capital punishment, has a consistently lower murder rate in proportion to the total population than its neighbours, Connecticut and Massachusetts which do have capital punishment.

Similarly, Michigan, without capital punishment, has a better record than Indiana or Ohio both of which have capital punishment. Wisconsin, without capital punishment, has a better record than Iowa or Minnesota which do have capital punishment. If all the states are compared, the murder rate is from two to three times greater in the states which have and enforce the death penalty than in those that do not.

This by no means proves that abolishing the death penalty will reduce the crime rate by one half, but it does prove that other considerations—social, economic, educational, racial—have far more to do with deterring or favouring crime than does the kind of punishment called for by the law.

If the retentionists are really convinced that capital punishment is in fact a deterrent to the commission of murder, then I wonder why hangings are held in secret, in the middle of the night, and not in the market square in public, complete with colour television cameras. I know this has been said before, but it should be repeated: once hangings were done in public—without the cameras, of course—but we still had murder.

The Ontario Association of Professional Social Workers argues that the issue of the death penalty is really one of ethics and morality. I quote their words:

> As social workers, we feel that the worth and dignity of man is cheapened and lessened by state execution. We are in strong support of abolishing the death penalty.

The association goes on to say:

> We believe that there are more important issues than the issue of capital punishment, such as the inadequacy of current rehabilitation schemes and the need for effective programs in combating the causes of crime.

This brings me to the crunch of the whole argument as I see it. It is my opinion that due to the obvious increase in the crime rate as a whole, the general public, concerned about public safety and protection as they should be, are confusing the death penalty as a deterrent to murder with the death penalty as a deterrent to all serious crimes. In other words, bring back hanging and we will have fewer bank robberies, muggings, crimes of breaking and entering, and so on. This is a fallacious argument, in my opinion. While the crime rate has gone up in recent years, the murder rate has not gone up at a corresponding rate; in fact, Statistics Canada report that in the year 1972 the crime rate in Canada actually declined slightly.

I mentioned earlier that we must get tougher with first and second offenders while they are still young and at least potentially responsive to proper rehabilitation. We must also make sure that dangerous inmates are not prematurely released back into society to pose a threat to life and property. We must continue with an enlightened parole system based on successful rehabilitation, provided that the authorities are not lax in the screening processes they have developed. If a person is given a life sentence, and if he cannot be rehabilitated, then his freedom to mix in society must be permanently curtailed. We must tackle the social, economic and educational problems which create and promote criminality.

The increase in the murder rate in the last five years was the lowest among all crimes of violence, a fact that indicates that such increase can be neither attributed nor related to suspension of capital punishment. The increase in murder is part of a general increase in criminal violence. Most murderers are not responsible for their crimes in a vacuum; all of us in Canadian society must share the responsibility because we allow conditions of poverty, exploitation and discrimination to exist in the context in which murder takes place.

I call on hon. members to vote for Bill C-2, to give their support to another five-year trial period in the hope that more evidence at the end of that time will unquestionably show that the state taking a life for a life is not a deterrent, or at least an effective deterrent to murder. If Luxemburg could abolish the death penalty in 1822, Belgium in 1863, Portugal in 1867, Holland in 1870 and Brazil in 1891, then surely we in Canada can support this bill extending the moratorium on hanging in the hope that at the end of the new trial period we will abolish capital punishment forever.

Some speakers in this debate have made reference to the growth of violence. Unfortunately, we live beside a nation which from its very origin has to some degree almost boasted about the law of the gun. I am not anti-American when I say this, but for generations the gun has been law in certain parts of the United States. And yet we have had hanging in the United States, we have had the gas chamber, we have had electrocution: until recently we had the death penalty in 39 of the 50 states. It is true that in the last two or three years they have not been putting people to death, but up until five years ago some states were putting convicted murderers to death; yet the crime rate increased.

Unfortunately for law-abiding Americans, the American city today is no longer safe. I ask those who are retentionists to reflect upon this point, that that country in its major cities has become a violent nation. Yet for generations, indeed for centuries, it put people to death for murder and for other acts of violence. And we still have this growing crime rate.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the retentionists that hanging in the United States has not worked as a deterrent. It is possibly the best example of any country in the world where hanging, or the death penalty in general, has not worked as a deterrent. I think that should be adequate proof that at least this bill to extend the moratorium on capital punishment should be passed on second reading.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the many speeches made in this House and I feel that by now we have aired all the views both pro and con. Consequently, it is my intention to make my remarks brief and of a general nature only. It is my opinion, having discussed the question of capital punishment over the years and listening to the speeches made in this House, that it is virtually impossible to convert a confirmed abolitionist into a retentionist or to convert a confirmed retentionist into an abolitionist. Both have arguments to support their views, both are sincere and both are able to adduce statistics to support their arguments.

Bill C-2 which we are debating today has the effect of placing a moratorium on the death penalty for a further period of five years except as it relates to the murder of police officers and prison guards or officials. We are being asked to extend the ban after a five-year trial period because, in the words of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the government does not have the full data for the whole of the previous five years. He said in the debate in this House on January 26, as reported at page 688 of Hansard:

> Statistics are some two years behind and therefore at the moment we are only in possession of full data covering the first three years of the trial period.

I find that statement hard to accept in this age of computers. Surely the government, being aware of the fact that there was need to deal with this matter on or before December 30, 1972, could have given top priority to the compilation of statistics in order to have the information available to this House. But supposing we did have the statistics, Mr. Speaker—what would they prove? I suggest they would prove nothing, because since 1962 no person has been hanged in Canada. In effect, there has been no capital punishment in Canada since 1962. Since 1968 there have been four convictions for the murder of police officers and the government has commuted their death sentences.

After listening to the remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in this House on January 30 last, I can appreciate the heavy responsibility that is placed upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and members of his cabinet when faced with the decision of whether or not a sentence of death should be commuted. But I find it hard to believe that the circumstances surrounding all murders since 1962 have warranted commutation.

There is great concern amongst responsible citizens in Canada as to the direction in which our society is going. They are concerned about the safety of their families, and well they should be under present circumstances where bail procedures are such that potentially dangerous criminals are allowed out on bail to commit further crimes, where weekend passes from prison are almost a right rather than a privilege, and where prison breaks in Canada are almost a weekly occurrence.

It is the responsibility of the government and of this House to take steps to make certain that society is protected and that citizens are able to live without fear of violence. How does a government assume this responsibility? Mr. Speaker, it assumes it by passing the legislation which makes certain that we have law and order in our country, laws which provide the rules by which we live and penalties that are punitive in nature and will deter an individual from breaking the law.

It is a further responsibility of a government to see to it that the law is enforced and that the sentences handed down by the courts are carried out. The extent of the punishment depends upon the seriousness of the crime. There is no point in having the same punishment for robbing a parking meter of a few dollars as there is for robbing a bank at gun point of $10,000. Therefore, we must have punishment which fits the crime in that the punishment must be of such a nature that it will act as a deterrent.

There is no greater crime than the taking of another's life. It has long been recognized, however, where a person was insane at the time of commission of the crime and did not know the nature and consequences of his act, that he was not guilty of murder. It has been recognized that killing in self-defence is not murder. It has been further recognized that people, being human and having emotions, at times due to aggravation, are unable to control their emotions and kill one another. This is not necessarily murder, depending upon the degree of aggravation.

Mr. Speaker, in instances where someone deliberately and with premeditation kills another, that is murder. It is also murder when a person kills someone in the commission of a crime, for in these instances he knows what he is doing and must be held accountable. If he is prepared to knowingly assume the risk, he must also assume the consequences if we are to have law and order.

In my opinion, there is no distinction between the killing of a policeman or a prison official or the killing of a private citizen. It is a life of an individual, not the life of a person in a particular occupation that is important. It is my opinion that capital punishment should be extended to those persons who kidnap another and hold them for ransom in fear of their lives, or those persons who hijack an aircraft and endanger the lives of the passengers. This, Mr. Speaker, is the stand I took throughout the election campaign and a conviction I have held for a number of years. It is not based on any poll that I took of my constituents, or on public opinion.

I know that the abolitionists will say that capital punishment is revenge on the part of society, but I ask them: Is it revenge to spank a child when he misbehaves? Is it revenge to send a man to jail for robbing a bank, or to fine him for speeding? It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that a man who commits murder has forfeited his right to live and remain as a part of our society.

I was disappointed to hear the hon. Solicitor General in the closing part of his argument recite some of the gory details of execution, possibly in an atttempt to emotionally shock retentionists into changing their opinion about capital punishment. I did not hear him speak of the victim or the families of victims. Perhaps he has not spoken, as I have, with members of families who lost a son or a daughter as a result of murder, or to a woman who was present when her husband was murdered. Perhaps he has not given thought to the terror experienced by a young female child or young woman who was sexually assaulted before being violently beaten to death.

With respect to the method of execution, I am not satisfied that hanging or the gas chamber or electrocution is the means by which the death penalty should be carried out, because surely in this day and age there must be a more sophisticated means of putting a person to death. It is the fear of death, not the method of death, that is the deterrent.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we live in a democratic society, one in which the government must express the will of the people. I do not feel that simply because I was able to win an election and come to Ottawa as a Member of Parliament that I have suddenly become more knowledgeable than my constituents when it comes to making a decision on what I believe is basically a moral matter. The Gallup polls have indicated that an overwhelming majority of people in Canada believe in capital punishment. That is the will of the people; that is democracy. If the abolitionists who are in the minority can satisfy the majority that capital punishment is wrong, then it will be abolished. But let us not, as representatives of the people, be swayed by emotion or by statistics which are inconclusive.

Mr. Speaker, it is therefore my intention to vote against this bill.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the subject of abolition of capital punishment has been under debate in this House for at least the past two decades. I have just listened to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) express his viewpoint and I recall that it was an earlier member for Moose Jaw who introduced the private member's resolution for the original debate in this House on the abolition of capital punishment. I refer, of course, to the late Ross Thatcher who once was the member for Moose Jaw. At that time the abolitionists were outright abolitionists and you had a clearcut decision when the vote came before parliament. In response to the debate during that decade, the government of the day moved forward with legislation which again gave Members of Parliament a firm legislative basis upon which they could make a decision.

The government of the day back in 1961, I think it was, introduced legislation which divided the crime of homicide into two distinct categories, capital and non-capital. That was the legislation that applied until the more murky decade of the 1960s when the element of uncertainty, which hovers over this debate tonight as it has during the whole period the matter has been under discussion, was introduced. We are not debating abolition, and we are not debating retention tonight; we are debating a compromise piece of legislation which would retain capital punishment, for reasons that can only be known to the government, for two isolated instances of homicide.

As a matter of fact, we are back to the legislation of 1961, because the trial period that began in 1967 expired at the beginning of the year and we are now operating under the legislation of the two distinct categories, capital and non-capital murder. It is my submission, Mr. Speaker, that the compromise legislation of the government only tends to confuse the issue.

I think there is a much more important issue which demands the attention of this House, otherwise we are going to lose the progress we have made in the field of the rehabilitative approach to the handling of crime in Canada and we are not going to settle the very difficult issue of capital punishment. The atmosphere and the mood, as I have listened to the debates in this House of Commons and as I have read the editorial comments in the newspapers across the nation, refer to the fact that because of the breakdown in our penal system it is impossible for either parliamentarians or the people of Canada to make a clearcut decision on this matter at the moment. The issue we should be discussing, and which will be considering in committee when the committee starts functioning, is the whole question of penal reform.

As the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) himself has indicated, our prisons are overcrowded and rehabilitation programs are inadequate. As we know, the inevitable result has been the increase of breakouts, which have been referred to by hon. members and which have brought our penitentiary system into disrepute during the past few weeks.

I would also remind the Solicitor General that there is a piece of legislation that is fundamentally important to rehabilitation but is being left in a state of suspension. I refer to the government's attempt to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which fell by the wayside one year ago. It was withdrawn and has not yet reappeared on the order paper. If there is any period in life when it is more important than in any other period to deal with the rehabilitative approach to crime, to recidivism and to all the other problems associated with lawbreaking in this country, it is the juvenile years when there is some hope for bringing about reform and in redirecting the lifestyle and personality of young Canadians.

It is tragic that Parliament is being forced day after day to discuss an issue which from the standpoint of retention or abolition is to some extent phony. Even the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), when he spoke the other day, said that he is an outright abolitionist but will be forced to vote for this bill which is partly retentionist.

My recommendation, Mr. Speaker, is that we remain where we are at the moment. At least Members of Parliament will know where they stand, and at least the people of Canada will know where we stand. The legislation which provides for capital and non-capital categories of murder makes it possible for the courts of this country, under our system of jurisprudence to exercise a rehabilitative approach in cases of non-capital categories which involve unpremeditated murder, and so on. On the other hand, the law makes it possible for the courts—that is, the judges of Canada—to exercise their responsibilities, and surely they have responsibilities under our system of jurisprudence, and decide what categories of crime shall come under the capital murder category.

At present we are living in an era of moral confusion and uncertainty in this country. That may be the reason for the government's fuzzy thinking on this issue. There are murderers, perpetrators of homicide who will not respond to rehabilitation under any circumstances. The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) dealt with one such specific instance in his contribution to the debate this afternoon. Some murderers are placed in the category of psychopaths. They have no sense of values, no conscience, and murder with impunity. Their existence, I think, reflects the fact that we live in a society that is confused and morally sick.

Many editorials have appeared on the subject. One appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 22 of this year. An article on rehabilitation under the byline of Jackson Toby referred to the fact that some criminals will never respond to any attempt at rehabilitation because of their childhood circumstances and experience. There is the childhood of the unwanted child, the slow learner in school, the stigmatized child in the neighbourhood. When these people grow up they are incapable of rehabilitation because they have developed what the psychologists call a psychopathic personality. Those are the categories to which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) referred this afternoon. No prison, no probation, no psychiatrist can provide a new childhood, said Mr. Jackson Toby, and anything but a new childhood is too late in dealing with this category. Perhaps that is why the founder of Christianity referred to the new birth as the only solution to behaviour of this kind, and why modern psychology is working on the whole question of behaviour modification.

Scandinavia has recognized the problem and has now resorted to what it calls internment, which is long deprivation of liberty without duration fixed in advance. In other words, for the psychopathic personality involved in homicide there is indeterminate sentencing. Internment is their treatment of the crime, in place of capital punishment.

One of the reasons for moral breakdown, of course, is that there is breakdown in the basic institutions of our society. The family, which should be the healing place of the soul, has become the breeding ground for juvenile deliquency, divorce and all the other problems which beset the modern family. I think we are all aware that the late Governor General, Georges Vanier, and Madam Vanier instituted the Vanier Institute of the Family to deal with this fundamental problem in our society.

Our schools are having the same difficulty. As someone has said, and oversimplified, in addition to teaching the three R's, our youngsters are being taught the fourth R, that of rebellion. The problem is reflected in some of the legislative initiatives of this government, inasmuch as the permissive legislation of recent years has reflected the moral decline of society. Several members have said during this debate that to resort to capital punishment even for the heinous kinds of crime that have been referred to, even for murder performed by the psychopathic personality who has no moral compunction, is to brutalize society and lessen respect for life.

To show the moral confusion that this reflects, let me say, as I think we are aware, particularly since the Alliance for Life was in Ottawa some two years ago, that the so-called therapeutic abortion legislation in effect means on demand. This indicates an absolute disrespect for life inasmuch as thousands of unborn human beings can have their very lives terminated in the name of therapeutic abortion. When the Alliance for Life was in Ottawa it referred to the moral crisis of the nurses who have to gather the dismembered bodies of those children. They referred to the slaughter of the innocents. That indicates how life has become brutalized and how confused we are in our moral concepts. On the one hand we defend the right of the psychopathic criminal to life, and on the other hand we deny the right to life to the innocents who are now being eliminated by the thousands in what, in effect, is abortion on demand.

Murder is the ultimate crime. I am not going to argue the problem on religious grounds because you can get theologians to argue on both sides of the question. There is a phrase that I think is appropriate, that man was made in the image of God. When someone commits murder against his fellow man, that creature made in the image of God is destroyed. It is the ultimate crime. In some instances it deserves the ultimate penalty.

As society has progressed there has been a gradual elimination of the death penalty. I only wish that in the society in which we live Canada could go for complete abolition. This is not possible. This was determined back in the fifties by legislation of that day. The government in its wisdom has concluded that it is not possible to do so because it retains capital punishment for the murder of prison guards and police officers.

This House would much better use the time at its disposal by dealing with urgent issues awaiting the consideration of hon. members, leaving this matter where it stands with capital and non-capital murder. The safety of the state would be assured in cases of syndicated crime, the Mafia sort of homicide, hijacking, treason, murders carried out in cold blood by individuals who in many instances are psychopathic.

I am not going to argue from the standpoint of deterrence. That is beside the point, because social scientists can quote statistics on both sides. I argue that there is something in mankind; as the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) said the other day when quoting Pasternak, there is a beast lurking in every human heart. The same thought is expressed by the concept of the id lurking in the murky labyrinth of the subconscious which is supposed to bubble to the surface and cause the perpetration of all sorts of heinous crimes. I am talking about the Christian concept of human nature which says that the heart of man is desperately wicked beyond all human understanding. Here is the situation, in human nature, in the moral confusion of society at the present time that has brought about the growing feeling of concern and anxiety of an increasing number of people in Canada.

Let us get on with the task of dealing with the breakdown of our penal system. Let us get on with the task of a comprehensive examination of the growing problem of crime and violence. Punishment is something we must retain in our criminal system unless we are going to make the whole system meaningless. Whether that punishment be life imprisonment, capital punishment or a different penalty, we have at the moment legislation that is adequate to deal with the problem as reflected in the expressed concern of thousands of Canadians across this country who want to see capital punishment retained for certain crimes and eliminated for others.

Let us carry on with the business of the nation, and not compound and confuse the issue with the half-baked legislation before us. Some will vote for the legislation as retentionists, some will vote against it as retentionists, some will vote for it as abolitionists and others will vote against it. Nothing will be settled; we will be back where we started. The problem of penal reform is much more important.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—STUDY ON DECENTRALIZATION OF OFFICES—PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on two different occasions I directed questions to the attention of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) relating to the administrative costs of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. These were on March 7 and March 16 of this year. At that time I asked whether there was a blitz on in the department against administrative efficiency and excessive expenditures to correspond with legislation presently in effect whereby claimants were being given a hard time with regard to their UIC benefits. I do not wish to be quarrelsome this evening but there are a few points I wish to raise in connection with the administrative costs of the unemployment insurance program.

There has been a great deal of verbiage this session about the various ramifications of Governor General's warrants and other aspects of the unemployment insurance program. However, little has been said in this House about the horrendous increase in costs and the great problems of inefficiency that have been manifested to those who have studied what has gone on in this department in the past few years.

I want to raise just a few points. First, I wish to protest against the administrative costs that have resulted in the misguided attempt to restructure the unemployment Insurance Commission. According to my information, two or three years ago the administrative costs were in the vicinity of $43 million to $46 million. At that time the committee and the public were told that when computers and decentralization were brought in regional pay offices and the so-called improvements, they would result in benefits to the claimant and the taxpayer. Unfortunately, this has not been the case.

Recent news items and news releases indicate that in this administrative year the commission is going to spend $14 million to put the service back to where it was in 1971 before district offices started being closed. The real scandal is that it is now costing in the vicinity of $145 million for administrative costs, whereas a couple of years ago this cost the taxpayers of Canada between $43 million and $46 million.

What has happened is that in many areas of Canada there has been great hardship. My constituency is only one of several areas where people have had to spend a great deal of money and go to a great deal of trouble in order to receive the service they once received as a matter of course. The former national employment service was not bad in that respect. One of its architects was Tom Kent, at that time an eminence gris in this venerable place.

● (2200)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): He won his war on poverty.

Mr. MacKay: He was the man who came out with the concept of a national manpower strategy. This has been nothing less than a disaster. What has happened is that labour unions, claimants and all those affected by the Unemployment Insurance Commission have borne the brunt as far as the organization of the UIC is concerned. The ridiculous part is that after causing a lot of misery to the people of Canada, the government is spending $14 million to put back what they took away only a few months ago.

I want restoration of the type of service once provided for my constituents. I say this as a result of many complaints and representations made to me by labour unions and by people who have legitimate complaints to make against the UIC. My complaints—I want to make this clear—in no way reflect upon the efficiency or the co-operative spirit with which the UIC staff has acted in the terrible situation which has been foisted upon them by those who are supposedly in control of the department. The Halifax regional office and, indeed, the New Glasgow regional office have done their best in individual cases to bring satisfaction to individuals who have been adversely affected by government policies. But the way in which administrative costs have gone up by millions of dollars, at the same time as service to the client has degenerated, is nothing less than a national scandal. There has been a complete failure of planning and, as a consequence, unnecessary work has come to the attention of Members of Parliament in all parties.

I hope the government has learned a lesson from this colossal blunder involving the administration of the UIC. I take pleasure in stating that unless some effort is made to put the blame where it belongs, that is, on the senior officials of the department, the government will encounter even greater difficulty in obtaining co-operation from Members of Parliament. The minister has requested hon. members to put forward suggestions. He has asked that we be patient. But unless the government pays attention to the situation it is creating as a result of these bureaucratic blunders, it will receive no co-operation either from the people of Canada or from those directly affected. The way the government has administered the affairs of the UIC amounts to nothing less than a disaster.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have just come from a meeting of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration at which colleagues of the hon. member closely questioned my minister on these very matters. My answer here must naturally be much more summary than that which my minister was able to make before the committee.

I am advised that a special report prepared after implementation of computerization concluded that in 1970-71 the Commission realized a saving of $1,841,000, based on the 1967-68 manual operation. The reason for the increase in costs is therefore other than the institution of the computerization program. In actual fact, administrative costs for 1971 and 1972 were as follows: the costs for 1971 amounted to $86,098,000; for 1972 the cost was $122,174,000; and the estimated cost for 1973 is $145,163,000.

Starting in 1970, increases in the workload and major operational changes resulting from the introduction of the new act have caused expansion of the regional facilities. The increase in program administration costs is due to a number of factors. Escalating costs, such as salary increases, accommodation, rental costs, postal rate increases and the elimination of mailing privileges have affected the administrative expenditures. Increased costs have also been incurred in providing improvements in service to the public through a more personalized approach in dealing with claimants and the decentralization of the commission's operations. In addition, the increase in the workload I have already noted has resulted in the need to increase the staff complement to a level commensurate with that workload.

Last year the commission responded to 13 million inquiries, handled 2.5 million claims and made 17 million benefit payments. These are impressive figures indeed, and when we put up against them the fact that only in a fairly small number of cases were there problems on the part of claimants, problems that we are doing our best to remedy, we realize that the system is working very well.

If we had thought it was working perfectly, we would not have felt it necessary to implement the changes that were recently brought into effect. However, I assure the hon. member that the commission itself is making every effort to provide the best possible service, and the new system of decentralization which is being instituted we believe will ensure an even better service than has been the case in the past two or three years.

AGRICULTURE—BRUCELLOSIS—REQUEST THAT COMPENSATION TO FARMERS BE EQUATED WITH FAIR MARKET VALUE—SUGGESTED VACCINATION PROGRAM

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I asked a series of questions last Thursday, May 17, and also on the following day, regarding Bang's disease, more scientifically known as brucellosis, which has occurred in northern Saskatchewan. Some of the answers that the minister gave me at that time were quite satisfactory, although I think some of them were slightly evasive and not too satisfactory so far as some of my constituents are concerned. It is unfortunate that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is not in the chamber; he was here until a few minutes ago.

Saskatchewan was a Bang's-free area until several years ago. During the 1950s there was a program of extensive vaccination of cows or heifers against Bang's disease. This program was dropped by the federal government in the late 1950s and early 1960s in favour of eradication of the disease by eliminating reactors. Some veterinarians now tell us—there seems to be some conflict here among veterinarians—that cows are not suitable for the export market if they have been vaccinated against this disease because they can show up as reactors or give a positive result when tested. On the other hand, I hear from good sources that many states in the United States do not accept imported cattle unless they have been vaccinated. I am told that the only countries in the world that do not accept cattle vaccinated against Bang's are countries like Japan and Russia.

In addition to the questions I asked the minister last Thursday, there are several other questions that I want to pose to him tonight in response to points raised at a meeting held in the area of Big River, Saskatchewan, in my constituency, by a group of farmers who are very concerned about the spread of this disease. There have been cases of this disease in the area around Prince Albert, Debden, Victoire, Big River, Meadow Lake and Pierceland. This covers an area of about 200 miles from Prince Albert to the Alberta border. It also extends south and north of this line.

Some of the farmers whose animals have been affected by this disease made the following suggestions at a number of meetings they have held in the past several weeks. I would like the minister, or his parliamentary secretary, to reply to some of these suggestions. First of all, it is felt that the Animal Contagious Diseases Act should be amended in such a way that farmers who have an infected herd would be required to dispose of their herd entirely, and the federal government should exempt those farmers from income tax for a period so that they could restock their herd. Further, a farmer should be required to restock only after a waiting period of one year, under the supervision of the health of animals branch, and compensation for cow and calf should be in line with the replacement value plus one calf crop for one year.

I might add that I have received many letters from farmers who have been asked to dispose of their cattle because of Bang's disease. On the average they have been receiving around $200 for a cow at the stockyard. Further, they receive on the average about $100 in compensation. It works out to an average figure of $300 per animal. When a farmer buys a cow, he must pay $400 to $450 on the open market. Since the farmer probably has lost a cow which has been aborted, he has also lost a calf which would be valued at between $100 and $200. These farmers feel the compensation should be considerably higher than it is, and that it should be equivalent to the replacement value.

The Canadian producers in our area, and I would say throughout northern Saskatchewan or any area in Canada which is affected, feel there should be a little more provincial-federal co-operation in respect of the control of brucellosis and that, particularly, there should be more stringent action regarding disinfecting stations. The farmer who sells diseased animals to the stockyards should have access to proper disinfecting equipment. I understand that in many cases they do not have access to such equipment.

There should be more stringent regulation of community pastures. The farmers also feel that where there is any possibility of infection, or where animals have been in a community pasture and have had Bang's disease, there should be a hay area or buffer zone established around the area so that the animals in community pastures would be controlled so far as contact with healthy animals is concerned. It is also felt that many patrons who use the big community or PFRA pastures should be notified that there is Bang's disease in the area, so they can take appropriate precautions.

Furthermore, many farmers in the area feel that the Department of Agriculture should post a notice on property where infection is known to have occurred, indicating the presence of brucellosis. This notice should remain in place for a period of one year or until the property is properly disinfected and certified as being free of Bang's disease. It is also felt that the Department of Public Health in areas where there is Bang's disease should be notified so that it can monitor hospitals to determine whether or not Bang's disease has spread to humans. In humans this disease is known as undulant fever. There are four things—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member because the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Leopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the level of compensation payable under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. The problem is under very careful study, and it is hoped that there will be a statement on this matter soon.

The number of reactors to this disease, in Saskatchewan, are as follows:

1966-67	889 cases
1967-68	711 cases
1968-69	389 cases
1969-70	885 cases
1970-71	1078 cases
1971-72	2033 cases
1972-73	2544 cases

For 1973-1974, 1109 reactors have been found to date. The situation is under constant surveillance, by the department's Health of Animals Branch.

At this point, I should perhaps mention that there are two justifications for this increase. First, the slaughter of entire herds when there is evidence of a large number of reactors. As the herds increase in size, the number of reactors follows suit.

The incidence of the disease has increased in the north of Saskatchewan. The department has intensified surveillance and testing in cattle enclosures, auctions, etc., and is doing everything possible to have animals identified as reactors slaughtered as quickly as possible. An extra official has been sent to the area to help implement the checking program.

The hon. member spoke of vaccine; I should like to mention that there is an available vaccine for calves. However, it is not 100 per cent efficient and it interferes with the testing program, since it is impossible to distinguish between animals that have been vaccinated and those that have been infected naturally.

[Mr. Nesdoly.]

As regards cases of the disease in human beings, the Health of Animals Branch gets its information from officials of the provincial health units.

For Saskatchewan, three cases were reported in 1967, three in 1968, one in 1969, two in 1970, one in 1971, and four in 1972.

The Saskatchewan Department of Public Health stated that it had not yet obtained statistics for 1973.

HOUSING—ROCHDALE COLLEGE—POSSIBLE USE AFTER FORECLOSURE

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his attendance tonight. This subject was discussed last week in one of the adjournment debates and a statement was made by the parliamentary secretary that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) wrote on April 13, over a month ago, to the metro police commission chairman and to the attorney general of the province of Ontario setting out the federal position respecting Rochdale, and offering full co-operation in the attorney general's proposed investigation of that institution. He asked for the consent of hon. members to table copies of the minister's letter at that time.

I called Sessional Papers this afternoon asking for a copy of that tabled letter, but was told that it had not been received because it was contrary to the rules for any documents to be tabled during these adjournment debates. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, I would welcome a copy of the minister's letter if I could receive it in some other way.

Recently at Rochdale college in Toronto a young man in my constituency met a tragic death. Nothing can be done to restore him, but something must be done to prevent this tragedy being repeated. Rochdale college should become a place in which the public can believe and of which it would not be ashamed. It was erected as an institution for free education; it has become a supermarket for drugs. The government has been urged many times to put this government-financed building to better use, but it has been slow to act. Perhaps it has been reluctant to admit it made a mistake in the first place when it funded the construction of Rochdale and then subsidized it with LIP and OFY grants. Whatever the reason, it has been slow to act.

The government has begun foreclosure proceedings in the courts. It has appointed a management receiver to supervise administration. But such steps are not enough. While foreclosure proceedings drag on, the drug traffic continues. While the receiver makes his efforts at reform, violence still reigns. A report on police activity at Rochdale shows how sordid a record this social monstrosity has. This report tells of drug trafficking so extensive that since January 1, 1973, 379 persons have been charged with drug and narcotic offences, 100 have been charged with trafficking and seizures have been made ranging up to 450 pounds of marijuana. Other offences have included robbery, dangerous weapons, thefts, obstructing and assaulting police, harbouring criminals, dangerous driving, driving under suspension, and even one case of murder.

J. S. Boldizar, vice-president of Rochdale, is reported in the press as saying that as many as eight major drug suppliers and 75 dealers operated in Rochdale last summer. The receiver has recently announced that drug traffickers and users must go. This action is welcome, but in many ways it is too little and too late.

I urge the minister to take an action on which I have sought legal advice. Let him, through the management receiver, take over full authority for this building. Let him appoint new administrators. Let him clear out the present tenants. Let him replace them with other citizens who will devote this building to a decent and useful purpose. It could be a home for senior citizens. It could be an apartment house for low-income earners. Every week I receive appeals from pensioners who now have to wait up to two years for public housing because the need is so great. Every week I receive appeals from low-income earners whose names are at the bottom of an Ontario Housing waiting list 17,000 names long.

The minister may defend his policy of doing little and as late as possible, but the people of Canada cannot take him seriously if he says they have put about $5 million into a building and yet must allow it to be abused this way. The management receiver is said to have told the Rochdale college council that his firm had no mandate to clear out the building. I urge the minister to give the receivers that mandate and tell them to act on it.

Rochdale is reported to be more than $1,375,000 behind in mortgage and tax payments. Over $150,000 in collected rent is said to have disappeared in five years. What home owner, struggling to pay his mortgage and his taxes, could get away with that? When representatives of the government tell us that the law forces us to tolerate this, the ordinary citizen must conclude that Mr. Bumble was right and the law really is an ass.

I urge the minister to take an action that the law will permit—to take over the management of Rochdale college and devote it to a purpose the public can support. Threats of riot and mayhem must be rejected. We have been told that there would be a bloodbath, that there would be chaos if the government moved in this direction. But if a group can blackmail a government with that kind of threat, we no longer have a government.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member with some dismay because this analysis of the situation, with all due respect, comes from a person who is either being deliberately mischievous, ignorant or grossly stupid. When the hon. member suggests that the government should do this or that, and that the minister should tell the receiver manager to do this, that or the other, I would like to put the facts on the record.

The fact of the matter is that the position of the Government of Canada with regard to Rochdale is simply that of anyone who has lent money on a mortgage. That mortgage is in default and CMHC has acted as quickly as the law allows. We have to live within the law—I think even the hon. member would agree with that—and the government has proceeded within the law to secure its rights under that mortgage with all the expedition that the law allows. It commenced foreclosure proceedings on August 17, 1971. At that time it sought in the courts of Ontario interim possession and interim receivership of the building, and was refused by the courts.

If the hon. member is telling me that in spite of that court order which refused Central Mortgage and Housing, refused the Government of Canada possession of the building, the government should take possession illegally, then he is very ignorant or is being very mischievous. Having failed through the courts to get interim receivership or interim management of the building, we took unusual and novel proceedings, which have worked, by applying to the courts for the appointment of a court appointed receiver, not for Central Mortgage and Housing but for all of the creditors. That was granted and on September 1, 1972, the Clarkson company was appointed by the courts as interim receiver and manager of the building.

That receiver accounts, not to me, not to Central Mortgage and Housing but to the Ontario Supreme Court. He reports to the court and is under orders of the court. On the basis of Friday's press release, I think he is making progress in cleaning up the situation in Rochdale. In the meantime, Central Mortgage and Housing and its solicitors, under my instructions, are proceeding as expeditiously as the law allows to prosecute its foreclosure proceedings. I hope they will be set down for trial as early as possible.

I hope the Chief Justice of Ontario, who is responsible for placing matters on the trial list, will see that the action of Central Mortgage and Housing on foreclosure receives an early trial and is handled expeditiously in the Supreme Court of Ontario. That is not under my control. As the hon. member knows, the setting of the trial date is a court proceeding in itself. However, I hope it would not be improper of me to suggest, in regard to these proceedings, that the Chief Justice take note of their special nature and the need for the protection of the interests of the taxpayer and give this matter an early trial.

In the meantime, if the hon. member and his colleagues want to continue making political hay out of this situation in which the government is acting as fast as the law allows, he should use his political influence to get an answer to the letter he mentioned which was written to the chairman of the metropolitan board of police commissioners, and send a copy to the attorney general of Ontario asking for co-operation. He might get a reply to that letter from his Conservative colleagues in Ontario. It has not been replied to as yet. If the hon. gentleman wants to make political hay, I will meet him on these grounds. But he is rather silly to be urging the government to take action that the courts of Ontario have specifically barred it from taking.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

FLOODS

HIGH WATER LEVEL IN LAKE ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the increasingly serious threat posed by high water levels on the Great Lakes, a problem now emphasized by the evacuation of more families from their homes along Lake Ontario, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That the government immediately take emergency measures to relieve the hardship suffered by residents of East Hamilton, Saltfleet Township and other areas, who have been flooded out of their homes along the shores of Lake Ontario, and that the government take short and long-term measures to avoid further threats to the well-being and property of those families.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43, occasioned by the receipt this morning of information in a news release from the Unemployment Insurance Commission on what is called the new approach, and the like. I would therefore like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

This House expresses its appreciation for the distribution to members of the information relating to the Unemployment Insurance Commission reorganization, and further appreciates that it only took the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a period of 42 days to accomplish this feat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member does not wish the Chair to put the motion. I have some hesitation in doing so.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS FOR YEARS ENDED MARCH 31, 1971 AND 1972, AND AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORTS THEREON TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of very urgent and pressing necessity. Since we are now four and a half months into this session and there has been no complete examination of the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1971, it is imperative that the accounts of two years ago be examined immediately before they are of historical interest only. I therefore ask unanimous leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

That the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1971—

And because of what the Acting Prime Minister has just done I have now added:

—and for the year ended March 31, 1972, and the reports of the Auditor General thereon, together with the evidence adduced by the committee during the fourth session of the twenty-eighth Parliament, be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Rochdale College

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be unanimous consent. There seems to be no protest, and I am prepared to put the motion to the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR PARITY BETWEEN RETRAINING ALLOWANCES AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion related to a very important matter which is undoubtedly pressing.

It has to do with workers who are screened by manpower centres for retraining in their trade in order to meet the requirements of demand on labour market as well as trade and work regulations and who lose their entitlement to extra unemployment insurance benefits for the duration of this training. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette):

That a special House of Commons committee be instructed to study this serious problem and to make relevant recommendations for amendments to the act and the regulations as well as to Department of Manpower programs tending to facilitate better co-operation between manpower centres and unemployment insurance offices.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity and the motion therefore cannot be put.

ROCHDALE COLLEGE—TABLING OF LETTER FROM MINISTER TO CHAIRMAN METROPOLITAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE, TORONTO

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table a letter dated April 13 to Judge Carl O. Bick, Chairman, Metropolitan Board of Commissioners of Police, Toronto, with regard to Rochdale College. It is being tabled because it was mentioned in two adjournment proceedings this week and last and under the rules could not be tabled during those proceedings. It should, I think, be tabled at this time, and it would be useful if hon. members would give their consent that it be appended to Hansard.

NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

PROVISION OF SEVERER PENALTIES FOR OFFENCES AND DENIAL OF BAIL

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-181, to amend the Narcotic Control Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Narcotic Control Act to provide more severe penalties for the offences of trafficking, possession and importing and exporting narcotics and to deny bail to those persons charged with these offences. The bill represents a declaration of all-out war on those who violate the Narcotic Control Act.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INCLUSION AS DEPENDANT OF CHILD BORN AFTER PARENT FOUND TO BE DISABLED

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-182, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (disabled contributor's child).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the disability provisions of the Canada Pension Plan in order to remove an anomaly. The act as it now stands does not permit a disabled parent to include as a dependant child, a child born after the time the parent is found to be disabled. In other words, once found to be disabled under the act as it now stands, the pensioner is presumed to be impotent or, at the very least, sterile.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—POSSIBLE OPENING OF CONSULAR OFFICES IN CANADA

Question No. 225—Mr. Dinsdale:

Is the government giving consideration to the request of the People's Republic of China that Consular Offices be opened in the major cities of Canada and, if so, in which cities would the Consulates be located, and at what time would they be operational?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the Canadian government wishes to negotiate a consular understanding with the People's Republic of China, we consider that it would be desirable to define the terms of our consular relations before giving more detailed consideration to the Chinese Embassy request to establish a Chinese consular or trade office in a Canadian city outside Ottawa.

INFANT MORTALITY RATE AMONG INDIANS AND INUITS

Question No. 724—Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands):

1. What was the infant mortality rate among Indians and Inuits between 1964 and 1968, and between 1969 and 1972?

2. What was the life expectancy of Indian and Inuit males and females in 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. See below.

2. Tables of average life expectancy for Indians and Eskimos (Inuit) for the individual years 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972 are not available. Canadian Indians: Average life expectancy (based on mortality for 1965-68): *at age 0, males 60.49, females 65.60; at age 1, males 63.16, females 67.80.; The only known Eskimo Life Table is based on observations of the mortality experienced amongst Eskimos of the Northwest Territories from 1963 to 1966. One difficulty is that the number of Eskimos involved of either sex, at any year of age, in any one year during the observation period never exceeded 250 and, in fact, only reached that number at birth. In a small racial group only careful observations recorded over an extended period can give any really reliable basis for a life table. The four year period chosen was barely adequate. Observations over a more extended period would probably have resulted in somewhat lower mortality rates. For these reasons the table deals with Eskimos as a whole and cannot be applied to either sex with any degree of accuracy. Canadian Eskimos: Number of years of further life expectancy (based on reported mortality for 1963-66): *at age 0, 50.59; at age 1, 54.85.

*Due to a high incidence of infant mortality, it is necessary to indicate life expectancy at age 0 and at age 1.

Infant Mortality Rates per 1000 Live Births
Both Sexes

Year	Canadian Registered Indians	*Eskimos of the Northwest Territories
1964	Not available	93.7
1965	49.3	95.4
1966	48.5	108.8
1967	49.7	83.8
1968	44.5	89.1
1969	41.5	90.5
1970	34.9	105.0
1971	Data not yet sufficiently complete to permit calculation of rate	97.8
1972	Data not available	Not available

*Data on Quebec Eskimos are not sufficiently complete to permit rate calculation.

Most provinces no longer report racial origin in vital statistics data.

PRACTICE OF ACUPUNCTURE IN CANADA

Question No. 1,030—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Is any branch or division of the Department of National Health and Welfare pursuing any program of research into the feasibility of the possible practice of acupuncture in Canada and, if so, what is the nature and extent of research and how many researchers are involved?

2. How many individuals or groups have suggested the clinical utilization of acupuncture techniques?

3. Has the Department positive knowledge of acupuncture technique being used in Canada and, if so, what and how frequently?

4. Are there at present any licenced practitioners of acupuncture in Canada and, if so, what is their number and location?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. No.

2. The Canadian Medical Association has expressed an interest in evaluating the validity of the technique. Both the Canadian Medical Association and the Federation of Registrars of the Provincial Medical Colleges are in favour of properly conducted research within Canada on this subject. A delegation of Canadian doctors and health administrators visited China from April 20 to May 5, 1973, as guests of the All-China Medical Association. The use of acupuncture in the treatment of certain diseases and also anaesthesia during surgery are amongst the subjects which received particular attention during this tour.

3. It is known that acupuncture techniques are being examined on a research basis at a number of university medical centres in Canada. These projects are not, however, being financed by the department, with the result that the precise details of techniques and frequency of use are not known.

4. No. The registration and licensing of health professionals is a matter which falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces. To date, no province has made specific provisions for the licensing of acupuncturists.

RIGHT OF BRITISH SUBJECT TO VOTE

Question No. 1,053—Mr. Whittaker:

1. Does the government intend to enforce Subsection 3 of Section 14 of the Canada Elections Act after JUne 26, 1975 when the right of British subjects to vote will terminate and, if so, what are the plans to publicize this fact?

2. Will the government give consideration (a) to improving citizenship facilities to cope with the last minute rush of applicants facing disenfranchisement (b) to amending that Section of the Act to eliminate the disenfranchising of the many persons who have spent most of their lives in Canada?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Pursuant to section 4 of the Canada Elections Act, it is the Chief Electoral Officer who has the statutory responsibility to enforce the provisions of Subsection 14(3) of the Act. The provisions of that subsection were publicized by the Chief Electoral Officer at the recent federal general election through pamphlets and other media. Similar action will be taken in respect of future elections.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

2. Improvement of existing citizenship registration facilities will shortly be carried out; (b) no.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Question No. 1,371—Mr. Kempling:

For the 1971-72 LIP Programme (a) how many LIP projects were financially audited (b) what proportion of LIP projects were financially audited (c) how many individuals were determined as receiving a weekly salary of $200 or more and for each project what was (i) the name of each individual who was paid a salary of over $200 (ii) the specific salary (iii) the number of weeks worked (iv) the total salary each individual received (d) what was the total number of work weeks known to have been paid at a rate of $200 per week, or more (e) what was the total payment known to have been made for weekly salaries in excess of $200 (f) what were the names and number of projects known to have had inadequate work attendance records?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): (a) 1395 interim audits and 1623 final audits; (b) 30 per cent (c), (d), (e) and (f) to provide accurate information would involve costly expenditures and the hiring of additional staff resources to undertake the extensive research required.

NATIONAL NUTRITION SURVEY

Question No. 1,393—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Did the government decide to discontinue Nutrition Canada and, if so (a) on what date (b) what were the reasons for this decision?

2. Is it intended to publish a final report of the surveys taken and, if not, for what reason?

3. What is the total amount of expenditure on this project to date?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. No. The field work for the National Nutrition Survey has been successfully completed, and at present, the data processing is under way and on schedule. It is expected that the laboratory analysis will be completed very shortly.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

2. The Government has already announced its intention to release the provincial reports to the public about mid-October of this year to be followed by release of the statistical findings intended for the use of the scientific community as they are available.

3. $2,573,000.

COST OF FEDERAL ELECTIONS

Question No. 1,657—Mr. Harding:

1. What was the total cost to the Federal Treasury for each of the Federal Elections held in 1962, 1963, 1965, 1968 and 1972 inclusive?

2. What was the cost of printing the ballots for each of the above years?

3. Has a study been done on the cost of using voting machines in Federal Elections and, if so, what would be the comparable cost of using such machines over a period of five elections?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Chief Electoral Officer as follows: 1. 1962, $10,898,486; 1963, $12,463,203.

Note (1):—Comprises the expenditures incurred by electoral districts and expenditures for election materials and supplies by the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer. 1965, $12,974,456.35; 1968, $13,841,484.08.

Note (2):—In addition to the items referred to in Note (1), these expenditures include items of expense incurred by the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer such as express, telephone, postage, etc. 1972, $20,435,277.54.

Note (3):—In addition to items of expenditure contained in Notes (1) and (2), this item includes salaries and wages of casual personnel engaged in the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer in respect of the election.

2. 1962, $143,684.81; 1963, $171.628.16; 1965, $178,673.55; 1968, $188,850.69; 1972, $311,472.66.

3. No; not applicable.

FEDERAL ELECTION EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,730—Mr. Danson:

1. What candidates in the October 1972 Federal Election reported election expenditures in excess of $50,000 in their returns to the Chief Electoral Officer and what amounts were reported by each?

2. What is the largest sum ever recorded by any candidate in a federal election in the returns to the Chief Electoral Officer?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Chief Electoral Officer as follows: 1.

Electoral District	Candidate	Return of Election Expenses filed with Returning Officer
York North.....	Stephen B. Roman.....	$92,103.00
Don Valley.....	Jim Gillies.....	64,278.85
	Robert P. Kaplan.....	52,306.48
Portneuf.....	Claude Bernard.....	57,921.96

2. $92,103.

Note 1:—Pursuant to the provisions of section 63 of the Canada Elections Act and its predecessors, a return of election expenses is required to be filed by a candidate and his official agent with the applicable returning officer and not the Chief Electoral Officer. Such information is only requested of returning officers and received by the Chief Electoral Officer as a result of an Order of the House for such information. Such an Order was issued by the House of Commons in respect of the 1949 general election and each subsequent general election. In all cases, the returns, as prepared by the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer based on information received from returning officers, have a cut-off date of a few months subsequent to polling day and information is not available respecting returns which may have been filed with returning officers subsequent to the cut-off date.

Note 2:—Information respecting election expenses returns filed with returning officers is not available for elections prior to the 1949 federal general election.

INCREASE IN SALARIES TO DEPARTMENT HEADS AND DEPUTIES

Question No. 1,766—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

What was the average increase in salaries given to department heads and deputies in the Public Service in each of the years 1960-72 inclusive?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Records are not available to give details of actual salary increases awarded since 1960; it is possible, however, to give details of the movement of the salary ranges. One difficulty to be taken into account is that in 1968/69, the salary structure for the executive category was changed from single salary rates to salary ranges. (See First Report of the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service.) The figures given below are based on the actual salary of the middle DM level before 1968-69 and on the mid-point of the DM 2 range since 1968-69.

Year	Percentage increase in salary
60-61	5.0
61-62	—
62-63	13.6
63-64	—
64-65	8.0
65-66	—
66-67	6.5

PETITION FROM CAPE SMITH ESKIMO PEOPLE

Question No. 1,873—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. Has the Minister or the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development received a petition from Mr. Moses Smith, a representative of the Cape Smith Eskimo people who are now residing in Povungnituk, Arctic Quebec, and are desirous of returning to their ancestral settlement at Cape Smith, Northwest Territories and, if so (a) on what date was this petition received (b) what action has the Department decided to take on this petition?

2. For what reason has the Department not invited representatives of the Cape Smith people to Ottawa and Quebec City to discuss their desire to return to Cape Smith, Northwest Territories?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes; (a) March 12, 1973; (b) The department arranged a meeting between representatives of the Cape Smith Eskimo people and departmental and N.W.T. officials to discuss the matter further. The meeting was held in Ottawa on April 11, 1973.

2. See answer to part 1.

CANADIAN AND INTERNATIONAL AIR TRAFFIC, CN TOWER, TORONTO—HAZARD NOTICES

Question No. 1,876—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What special notices does the Minister of Transport intend to issue to the Canadian and international air traffic of the critical hazard that the proposed 1800 foot CN Tower in downtown Toronto poses?

2. For what reason did the Minister not exercise his authority under Chapter A-3, Part 1, Section 6(1)(j) of the Aeronautics Act to limit the height of the Tower to the height of other buildings in the area to achieve maximum air safety?

3. When flight rules are applied that concern "Visual Flight Rules" and "Instrument Flight Rules" flights in the vicinity of high obstacles, how many cubic miles of otherwise navigable airspace will be lost to air traffic presently using Toronto International Airport and Toronto Island Airport as a result of the CN Tower being constructed?

4. Will the erection of the CN Tower result in the minimum enroute obstacle clearance being raised in that area of Toronto and, if so, to what specific height?

5. Will the erection of the CN Tower mean that the approach procedures will have to be changed for aircraft landing at the Toronto Island or Toronto International Airports and, if so, what specific procedural changes will be required?

6. Will the erection of the CN Tower disqualify the Toronto Island Airport from "Instrument Flight Rule" capacity?

7. Were consultations carried out by DOT, prior to the decision to preceed with the Tower, with the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association or with the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association and, if not, for what reason?

8. Were similar consultations carried out by CN with either CALPA or COPA and, if not, for what reason?

9. Did CN consult with the Department of Transport seeking approval of their plans prior to the decision being made to approve and proceed?

10. Were general atmospheric conditions, such as haze and smog, taken into consideration before approval by the Minister was granted and, if so, what were the results of such considerations?

11. Did the Minister of Transport seek a legal opinion from law officers of the Crown respecting liability for accident claims against the government and the Department of Transport with respect to duties and responsibilities charged to the Minister of Transport under the Aeronautics Act and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, what was the opinion or the nature of the opinion?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. It is not intended to issue any special notice indicating that the proposed CN Tower in downtown Toronto is a critical hazard as this is not the case. It is intended, however, to ensure that it is shown on aeronautical charts and in other publications, in order that the flying public will be aware of its location and height.

2. No specific regulation has been enacted under the section of the Aeronautics Act referred to in the question because it was not determined to be required in the interests of air safety.

3. The aeronautical study has determined that the tower will have no effect upon airport traffic patterns in the Toronto area, and will raise the minimum en route altitude of R1 airway from 2,500 to 2,800 feet, but this will not be of any consequence because the minimum flight planning altitude is 3,000 feet.

4. One minimum en route altitude will be raised on R1 Airways from 2,500 feet to 2,800 feet but this will not be of any consequence as the minimum flight altitude is 3,000 feet.

5. No procedural changes are anticipated.

6. No, Toronto Island Airport has no IFR capacity now, for conventional operations, due to existing structures.

7. No, it is not the practice of the Ministry to consult with industry concerning these matters since the decision to approve or not is based on established specific obstruction clearance criteria which have been discussed with the industry.

8. This is unknown, but is being investigated.

9. Yes.

10. Yes, all factors were considered and it was decided the tower was acceptable.

11. No. There are no zoning regulations made under the Aeronautics Act relating to this location.

[Mr. O'Sullivan.]

ALBERTA—TELEVISION AIRTIME

Question No. 1,882—Mr. Paproski:

1. What is the anticipated increase of "airtime" to be allocated for Alberta programs in Alberta?

2. What are the anticipated increases in Alberta's allocation of budget to cover (a) program production (b) capital equipment (electronic) (c) technical and production staff?

3. What guaranteed increase of access to television will now be available to Alberta writers, performers, actors, musicians, events, producers, etc.?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. For the fiscal year 1973-74, plans are to increase local CBC radio programming in Alberta by approximately five hours per week. In television, no significant change in the number of local program periods is anticipated for 1973-74, but it is planned to extend the CBXT "Hourglass" period, telecast Monday through Friday, over 43 weeks instead of 39 weeks.

2. An increase in both CBC operating and capital budgets for Alberta radio and television is anticipated for 1973-74 over the previous fiscal year, over and above normal price increases. The increase for program production, including technical and production staff, would amount to between five per cent and six per cent of the operating budget. The increase for capital equipment would amount to about sixty per cent of the capital budget. It should be noted that despite this apparent disproportion in the percentage figures, the dollar increase in the operating budget for program production will actually be several times greater than the dollar increase in the capital budget for equipment. This is due to the fact that the operating budget is much larger than the capital budget, hence the bases from which the percentages were calculated are not comparable.

3. The projected over-all increase in talent spending for 1973-74 over the previous fiscal year amounts to approximately ten per cent.

AIR CANADA—COST OF ECONOMY MEAL

Question No. 1,884—Mr. Leggatt:

What is the charge, at Toronto, for a single economy fare dinner served by Air Canada and supplied by CARA Operations Ltd.?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: Details of contracts are proprietary information.

NATIONAL REVENUE—DISCONTINUANCE OF SENDING PERSONALIZED TAX FORMS TO ELDERLY PEOPLE

Question No. 1,888—Mr. MacLean:

Is it the intention of the Department of National Revenue to discontinue the practice of sending personalized tax return forms to the poor elderly people who could not possibly be liable for income tax, capital gains tax, tax on recapture of capital cost allowance or Canada Pension Plan contributions and, if not, for what reason is it being continued?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): In so far as the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, is concerned: At the request of the government of the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba only, personalized returns were mailed to all taxpayers of the said provinces who were receiving the Guaranteed Income Supplement, to ensure that each would have an Income Tax return on which to claim his provincial tax credit. Since it is in the interest of elderly persons to have the opportunity to obtain a provincial tax credit to which they may be entitled, the department will continue to distribute personalized tax forms to elderly people of these provinces.

CONSTRUCTION OF TWO POLAR ICEBREAKERS

Question No. 1,901—Mr. Forrestall:

1. To the knowledge of the government is Lockheed Shipbuilding Company, Seattle, Washington, currently in the process of constructing two polar icebreakers within the order of 100,000 horsepower each, with estimated completion date later this year?

2. Does the government consider that such icebreakers would be used for the American North Slope oil and gas deposits?

3. If the North Slope reserves are accessible and ice free 12 months of the year, then in what areas does the government think such polar icebreakers will be employed?

4. Would the government consider the use of U.S. icebreakers in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago in the interest of Canadian claims to sovereignty?

5. Has there been any consultation between Ottawa and Washington on the use of such icebreakers, for probable use in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago and (a) if so, what use are they intended (b) if not, for what reason?

6. Has there been any technical consultation with regard to these polar icebreakers with respect to design or construction characteristics with the Canadian authorities and the U.S. authorities and (a) if so, of what nature (b) if not, for what reason?

7. (a) Does the above information in terms of a U.S. construction plan for polar icebreakers have any influence on Canadian plans to do the same in terms of projected date of necessity (b) is such a plan being accelerated in the light of the U.S. development capability?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, two vessels with a shaft horsepower in excess of 60,000 and scheduled for completion in 1974 and 1976.

2. If the U.S. intends to ship oil and gas out of the North Slope area by surface tanker, it is likely that their new icebreakers would provide assistance, if required.

3. The Antarctic.

4. In accordance with existing Canada-U.S. agreements, U.S. vessels and aircraft assist in search and rescue operations if requested to do so. Canadian ships and aircraft also assist in U.S. waters.

5. (a) No; (b) none has been required.

6. There has been technical consultation, U.S. officials have visited Canadian ships and Canadian officials are visiting Lockheed.

7. (a) No; (b) no.

DREE GRANTS TO INDUSTRIES IN CHAMPLAIN CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,903—Mr. Matte:

1. How many industries established in the constituency of Champlain received grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

2. What are the names of such industries and what amount did each receive?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. From the coming into force of the Regional Development Incentives Act to March 31, 1973, there were 13 net accepted offers in the Constituency of Champlain.

2. The names of the companies and the amount of the accepted offers are as follows:

(c) Wharfingers receive annual remuneration for their services on a commission or percentage basis. They are paid a portion of the wharfage tolls and dues collected for the use of the wharf at the following rates: 100 per cent of the first $100 collected; 90 per cent of the next $300 collected; 50 per cent of the next $300 collected; 25 per cent of the next $1,800 collected; 15 per cent of the next $13,500 collected and 5 per cent of any remainder.

CANADIAN TECHNOLOGY SATELLITE PROGRAM—DESIGN AND TEST INFORMATION ON CANADIAN TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 1,918—Mr. Saltsman:

1. Under the Department of Communication's Canadian Technology Satellite Program does NASA receive complete design and test information on Canadian developed technology and, if so, for what reason?

2. What assurances does Canada have that NASA commercial division will not transmit design data to American communications industries?

3. Is the government subsidizing development costs of American industry by sending complete design data packages to NASA?

4. Is NASA reciprocating by sending design data details and drawings of their subsystem to the Department of Communications?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): 1. No. NASA does not receive complete design and test information on Canadian developed technology under the joint DOC-NASA Communications Technology Satellite (CTS) program. However, this is a joint program covered by a formal Memorandum of Understanding and there is a joint obligation to ensure the satellite is technically viable. There is, therefore, an exchange of technical information to this end and also to permit the proper integration and testing of the various subsystems contributed to the program by DOC and NASA.

2. NASA has undertaken to respect the confidentiality of information received under this joint program.

3. No.

[Mr. Prud'homme.]

4. There is an exchange of technical information as noted in the answer to Question No. 1.

COST OF CANADIAN TECHNOLOGY SATELLITE PROGRAM

Question No. 1,919—Mr. Saltsman:

1. Is the Canadian Technology Satellite Program the first in which the government is acting as a spacecraft general contractor?

2. What practical business experience do the Canadian Technology Satellite project manager and program manager have in general contracting?

3. Have these gentlemen ever been employed by private industry in the capacity of managers?

4. Does the reported program cost of fity-one million dollars include the cost of government supplied services, personnel, materials and accommodation?

5. What is the expected total cost of the Canadian Technology Satellite Program?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): 1. No. The Alouette I satellite was produced primarily within government laboratories with a small portion of the work being done through contract with industry. The Alouette II satellite was produced with the government acting as prime contractor much in the manner of the CTS satellites.

2. The CTS program manager has had twenty years of experience in the management of research and development programs involving large contracts with business firms. The CTS project manager has had eleven years experience in management involving large contracts with business firms, including the Alouette and ISIS series of satellites.

3. No.

4. The estimates given in the Blue Book include direct costs of government personnel employed on the project, of materials and the capital cost of the spacecraft assembly and test laboratory.

5. The estimated cost of the Communications Technology Satellite program, as reported in the Blue Book, is $51.143 million.

CANADIAN TECHNOLOGY SATELLITE PROGRAM—NASA COST CONTROL SYSTEM

Question No. 1,920—Mr. Saltsman:

1. Is a NASA cost control system being imposed (unaltered) on the Canadian Technology Satellite Program and, if so, for what reason?

2. For what reason is the cost control system being changed in the middle of the program?

3. What evidence of poor cost control caused this system to be implemented?

4. What is the estimated cost of implementing the new cost control system?

5. What delay or disruption of the program might the new system cause?

6. What is the estimate of savings expected as a result of the new management control system?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): 1. No.

2. There has not been a change in the cost control system for the CTS program as a whole. New procedures in cost reporting are being introduced in the normal course of moving into the manufacturing phase of the CTS program.

3. Same as Question 2.

4. Same as Question 2.

5. None.

6. Same as Question 2.

CANADIAN TECHNOLOGY SATELLITE PROGRAM—CONVERSION OF CONTRACTOR'S EMPLOYEES TO PUBLIC SERVICE POSITIONS

Question No. 1,921—Mr. Saltsman:

Is it the policy of the government to give Canadian industry experience in the design and construction of communication satellites and, if so, for what reason does the Canadian Technology Satellite Program management continue to convert contractor's employees to civil service positions?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Yes. There has been no substantial conversion of contractors employees to Civil Service positions. There are approximately 350 Canadian contractor employees working on the CTS program at the employer's premises and sixty-six contractor employees, twenty-eight private contract personnel and twenty Public Service personnel working on the CTS program at the Communications Research Centre. Of this number, two former contractor's employees have won PSC competitions for permanent public service positions and two more have been hired as term public servants for the duration of the CTS program.

CANADIAN TECHNOLOGY SATELLITE PROGRAM—CONFIDENTIAL BUDGET

Question No. 1,922—Mr. Saltsman:

Have the Canadian Technology Satellite Project Manager and the Canadian Technology Satellite Program Manager sent copies of their confidential budget and schedule contingencies to the contractor's management and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): One senior manager from each of the two major Canadian contractors was retained by the Program Manager in an advisory capacity to help assess the impact of program redefinition. Since cost and schedule, as well as technical parameters were involved this information was provided as essential background data.

TRANSPORT—CAUSEWAY AND BRIDGE TO BIRCH ISLAND IN SAND LAKE

Question No. 1,933—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has the Department of Transport been examining the situation of the causeway and bridge to Birch Island in Sand Lake, Township of South Crosby, County of Leeds, Ontario and, if so (a) on what date was this examination begun (b) what date will it be concluded (c) what are the results?

2. Specifically will the Department of Transport take steps towards removal of this causeway and bridge as requested by municipal officials and property owners in the area?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The Ministry of Transport is examining the situation of the causeway and bridge to Birch Island in Sand Lake, Township of South Crosby, County of Leeds, Ontario. (a) April 12, 1973; (b) no firm date has been determined; (c) investigation is continuing.

2. If the owners do not comply with the conditions of the approval given under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, steps will be taken towards removal of this causeway and bridge.

DREE GRANT TO BERGERONNES AIRPORT

Question No. 1,985—Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix):

1. What conditions did the Department of Regional Economic Expansion set for the granting of $12,000 to the Bergeronnes Airport?

2. Were the conditions met?

3. If no condition was set, for what works was the grant made?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has not provided any grant to the Bergeronnes Airport.

2. N/A.

3. N/A.

*EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Question No. 1,999—Mr. Stevens:

1. As of April 18, 1973, what were the total number of signed contracts executed by the Export Development Corporation and still outstanding under section 29 of the Export Development Act?

2. As of the same date, what were the total liabilities outstanding under section 29 of the Act and what was the relationship of such liabilities to the statutory ceiling on section 29 financing?

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the answer to that question is somewhat lengthy, I would suggest that it be printed in today's Hansard as having been read.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The answer to the above question follows:]

Export Development Corporation states that:

(1) the total number of signed contracts executed by the Export Development Corporation and still outstanding under section 29 of the Export Development Act, as of April 18, 1973, was 130; and

(2) (i) notes receivable under section 29 of the Export Development Act, for which the foreign customers' liability under section 30 at any time may not exceed $850 million ($1,500 million following the amendment to section 30 on that day), amounted to $513.8 million as at April 18, 1973; in addition the Corporation had signed loan agreements aggregating $377.0 million outstanding on that date which, subject to the fulfilment of the terms and conditions of these agreements, may result in a foreign customer liability of the same amount; and (ii) as of April 18, 1973, the relationship of the total liabilities mentioned in paragraph (i) to the statutory ceiling on section 29 financing, was that the liabilities were $336.2 million lower than the ceiling, fixed in section 30, as it stood before the amendment which came into force on that day; Bill C-3, an Act to amend the Export Development Act, received Royal Assent on that day, and following that amendment, the liabilities were $986.2 million lower than the ceiling.

LIST OF BOOKS AND PHONOGRAPH RECORDS PROHIBITED ENTRY TO CANADA

Question No. 2,007—Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra):

With reference to Section 14 of the Customs Tariff Act and to Item 99201-1 of Schedule "C" of the Customs Tariff, what are the titles, in alphabetical order, of all the books and phonograph records currently prohibited entry to Canada?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Material related to this tariff item is treated in the same manner as other imported goods in that each shipment is examined and classified as admissible or prohibited and the importer is provided with a ruling in each case. Because of the volume of titles and issues of the publications involved and the innumerable changes in both their titles and content, it has been found impractical to maintain a list as such. Accordingly, the information requested is not available.

CUSTOMS OFFICES

Question No. 1,765—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

1. How many Customs Offices are there in Canada and where is each located?

2. What was the total cost to maintain and staff each Customs Office in Canada for each of the years 1960-72 inclusive?

3. How many Customs Officers are there in each of the Customs Offices in Canada?

Return tabled.

GAME SANCTUARIES

Question No. 1,821—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

How many game sanctuaries are there in Canada and (a) where is each located (b) what is the size of each (c) what type of game is protected in each (d) how much is the cost to the government to maintain each sanctuary?

Return tabled.

● (1420)

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order for the third or fourth time with regard to question No. 1769. On two previous occasions the parliamentary secretary told the House he would look into the matter to see when the answer would be forthcoming. This question concerns the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group and the employment for the previous five years of the personnel of that group. All other questions on this subject have been answered. I have been unable to get an answer from the government as to why they will not answer this specific question. Could I be enlightened today in this regard by the parliamentary secretary or the Solicitor General?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, that question will be answered on Monday.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I rise to inquire from the parliamentary secretary about question No. 1047 which has been on the order paper in my name since February 20. I may say I do not feel I have overburdened the order paper with questions. I put this question on the assumption it would have been answered long before one is called upon to make any decision on the estimates of the fisheries services of the Department of the Environment. I would like to have an answer before that deadline is reached because my position on certain aspects of the estimates hinges on the answer to this question.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I will look into this matter, but from a cursory look at the question it is evident that it involves answers from as many as three or four departments.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notices of motion for the production of papers Nos. 214, 216 and 220 are acceptable to the government.

TRIDENT STEAMSHIPS LIMITED—COPY OF FREIGHT TARIFF

Motion No. 214—Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Trident Steamships Limited freight tariff.

Motion agreed to.

Motions for Papers

"M. V. TRAVETAL"—OWNERSHIP PARTICULARS

Motion No. 216—Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the full particulars as to ownership of vessel M. V. Travetal.

Motion agreed to.

"M. V. CHIMO" AND "M. V. CABOT"—OWNERSHIP PARTICULARS

Motion No. 220—Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the full particulars as to ownership of the vessels, M. V. Chimo and M. V. Cabot.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 217 and 218.

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION AND NEWFOUNDLAND STEAMSHIPS LIMITED—COPY OF AGREEMENT

Motion No. 217—Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the agreement between Canadian Transport Commission and Newfoundland Steamships Limited.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no agreement between the Canadian Transport Commission and Newfoundland Steamships Limited. In these circumstances the hon. member may be willing to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

NEWFOUNDLAND STEAMSHIPS LIMITED—COPY OF FREIGHT TARIFF

Motion No. 218—Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of Newfoundland Steamships Limited freight tariff.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Newfoundland Steamships Limited is not required to file freight tariffs with the Canadian Transport Commission under any statute. Hence the tariff is not available from government sources. In these circumstances, the hon. member may be willing to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue this matter as this steamship company is receiving a subsidy from the government. I ask that it be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED SENDING OF BILL TO MARC CAYER FOR TRANSPORTATION COSTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister will recall that on February 12 he gave an assurance that the transportation costs of Lloyd Oppel and Marc Cayer, prisoners recently released from Viet Nam, would be paid. His words were:

> . . . my instructions are that the public should pay the expense of the return of these two Canadians.

Can the minister explain why on April 5 Marc Cayer was sent a bill under the auspices of the Minister's department for $1,275.50—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: —and a follow-up letter on May 5 demanding payment of this sum, though admittedly some $50 odd related to clothing to replace the prisoner's uniform and is not strictly transportation? Has the minister any explanation to give as to why the assurance he gave at that time has not been lived up to?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Cayer has not been sent any bill. Mr. Cayer has been asked by my department to let us have a response to the list of the expenses that Mr. Cayer presented to the organization called International Voluntary Services. At no time has Mr. Cayer been asked to pay any of these expenses.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not, of course, wish to question the word of the minister, but do I understand him to say that no bill in the amount of $1,275.50 has been sent to Marc Cayer for transportation or other expenses following his release as a prisoner in Viet Nam, and that no follow-up letter of any sort was sent to Marc Cayer on May 5 seeking payment of this amount?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, on May 1 the director of consular operations of my department wrote to Mr. Cayer asking him what results he had got from the submission of his account to International Voluntary Services.

Mr. Stanfield: Taking the minister at his word, of course, why did he say in the House on February 12 that his instructions, I take it to his department, were that these accounts were to be paid at the expense of the public, and then change his position?

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in position. At no time has the government asked Mr. Cayer to pay any part of his expenses.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While we are on Viet Nam, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not the government has advised Canadian personnel on the ICCS that they should be prepared to withdraw—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously that is not a supplementary. I recognize that the hon. member may have an important question to ask. When we have completed the first round of questioning the hon. member will be given the opportunity to ask that question as a leading question rather than as a supplementary.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE— GOVERNMENT DECISION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister at the conference of first ministers, may I pose a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. During the question period yesterday, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the Prime Minister stated that a decision was made by the government with respect to something concerning the Mackenzie valley route. May I ask the minister what decision has been made by the government with respect to that question?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look at the response to the actual question. The decision I have in mind is the decision to proceed with a highway in the Mackenzie valley, and the decision made specifically on the timing of it and the ecological studies that would precede any further construction in the valley.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that none of the questions asked yesterday—I was not in the House but I have read them carefully—had to do with a highway but with a pipeline, may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether the government has made any decision respecting a pipeline, gas or oil, down the Mackenzie valley?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the government has put before the House and the public several times in the last several years some guidelines with respect to the development of a Mackenzie valley corridor, in the first place, and, second, with respect to development of pipeline routes in particular. Those decisions have been made. With regard to the construction or non-construction of a pipeline, of course no decision has been made, and under the law passed by parliament the government will not be presented with that question until an application has been made to the National Energy Board and that board has found in favour of the application and referred it to the government for decision.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether the decision he is now talking about bears no relation at all to the invitation he has informed the House has been publicly made to corporations to make application to the National Energy Board? Has that invitation in fact been made and, if so, has the government made up its mind that a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley is desirable?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we have not made up our minds on the last question because we do not know all the facts. Indeed, we will not know all the facts until a specific proposal is put before us. Of course, the law has always been there with regard to the making of an application, but we have indicated within the past 12 months that we are completing our studies for the purpose of evaluating such an application and that we expect about the end of this year to be in a position to evaluate any application that comes forward. For that reason we have not issued an invitation to any specific group, but we have indicated that we are in a position to deal with such an application under the law.

MANPOWER

PARITY BETWEEN RETRAINING ALLOWANCES AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS—PROPOSED MEASURES

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or in his absence to his parliamentary secretary.

Considering the mess in the administration of the department concerning the co-ordination of the manpower retraining program on one hand and the unemployment insurance benefits on the other, can the minister or his parliamentary secretary tell us what steps have been taken to ensure better understanding between both divisions of the department in order to remove penalties levied by the Unemployment Insurance Commission on citizens enrolled in the retraining program?

[English]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the question. If the hon. member could be more specific either here or elsewhere, we would try to get him an answer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN PERSONNEL FROM CONTROL COMMISSION—EXCHANGE OF CIVILIAN PRISONERS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask about Canada's role in the International Commission of Control and Supervision. Has the government issued any advice or instructions to the Canadian participants to be prepared to withdraw early in July and, if so, on the basis of what advice, and can we construe that to mean that in fact the government has now arrived at a tentative decision?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has not yet made a final decision on the matter. No instructions have been released. I was as puzzled as the hon. member by the reference in what I understood is a weekly newspaper in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, it is one of the finest weekly newspapers in Canada. As we approach the time of decision-making and in light of the extreme importance of this question to Southeast Asia, has the government made any overtures or taken any initiative with the signatories to the agreement in respect of this incredible cease-fire, if you will, and proposed specific initiatives that the commission might pursue such as inspection in relation to persons detained as so-called political prisoners?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it has been the purpose of the Canadian delegation to the International Control Commission to see that the commission itself carries out the terms of the peace agreement. It has certain limited responsibilities for the exchange of prisoners, civilian prisoners included, but these are very limited. As my hon. friend may have noticed, Michel Gauvin has been promoting these purposes and we are very anxious, as I am sure all hon. members are, to see the release of all civilian prisoners, whether held by the South Viet Nam government or by the PRG.

VIET NAM—INSPECTION BY CONTROL COMMISSION OF PLACES WHERE CIVILIAN PRISONERS HELD

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question really covers the same ground, but I should like to ask the minister specifically whether Ambassador Gauvin has sought to have the control commission arrange for the inspection of camps and prisons where civilian prisoners are being held in South Viet Nam, whether administered by the Provisional Revolutionary Government or the other government and, if so, what success has he had in his endeavours to arrange for such inspections?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I recall the provisions of the peace agreement, they provide that the International Control Commission shall simply check that the people who are being released are the people included on a list. Its responsibilities otherwise are very limited. The Red Cross organization, of which it was thought at one time that Canada might provide a unit, has other responsibilities but so far these have not been discharged. The situation is not very promising except in one respect, and that is that a large number of civilian prisoners have already been released under the supervision of the ICCS.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that we would limit as much as possible the number of supplementary questions. The hon. member might ask his supplementary question and then the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings might ask his—order, please; the hon. member might resume his seat for a moment—and following that I will recognize the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister answered whether Ambassador Gauvin has written a letter to the other members of the commission asking that the commission act together in respect of prisoners.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would doubt very much that Mr. Gauvin would have done that. We are finding enough difficulty in enforcing the terms of the peace agreement and trying to get the other members to agree with us that we do not want to extend the responsibilities until the commission has discharged the responsibilities laid upon it by the peace agreement.

SOUTH VIET NAM—POLITICAL PRISONERS—REQUEST THAT MINISTER MEET GROUP PRESENTING PETITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact a considerable group of public-spirited Canadians is in Ottawa today and tomorrow who desire to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs about this matter of political prisoners in South Viet Nam and claim to have specific knowledge that as many as 5,000 are being held, is the minister planning to see this group today or tomorrow, and does he have any information about the possibility of such a large number of political prisoners being held in South Viet Nam?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman made a slip of the tongue. The group in Ottawa today that has presented this petition with many thousands of signatures is claiming there are 200,000 political prisoners in South Viet Nam. If possible, and if the question period does not last too long, I intend to see this delegation.

AUDITOR GENERAL

REQUEST THAT PRESENTATION OF BILL BE EXPEDITED

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as acting head of the government and Acting Minister of Finance. In view of the problems created by the difficulties the Auditor General has experienced in recruiting staff, and in light of the fact that a new bill was to be presented to cover the situation about which the Auditor General states in the report just tabled, "I consider the draft bill in the form proposed to be highly satisfactory and have no hesitation in commending it to the Public Accounts Committee and to the House", will the hon. gentleman do what can be done to facilitate the presentation of this bill to that committee and ultimately to the House?

[Mr. Brewin.]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the initiative taken in preparing the new draft bill and I heartily agree that it should be studied by the Public Accounts Committee. However, I think it would be extremely useful to have the comments of the newly appointed Auditor General before proposing it to the House.

MANPOWER

PARITY BETWEEN RETRAINING ALLOWANCES AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS—PROPOSED MEASURES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerning the one asked to him by the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Since the parliamentary secretary answered that he did not understand the question thoroughly and that this is an extremely important matter, I want to ask him the following question: Since manpower centre officials are making inquiries to find workers qualified to undergo retraining and since the persons who follow those courses receive from the Manpower centres allowances which are lower than Unemployment insurance benefits, may I urge the parliamentary secretary to examine this matter very seriously in order to do justice to that category of persons?

● (1440)

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe that is a representation and we will examine it as such.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST THAT ALL TENDERS BE OPENED IN PUBLIC

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the minister's statement in the House that he has been studying for five months his department's irregular practice of opening tenders for government work in secret, in view of the minister's statement 12 days ago that he had that day received a report on this subject from his officials, and in view of reports that over $100 million a month is still being awarded by his department after tenders are opened in private, some 11,600 contracts worth over $1 billion having been signed in the past 12 months, would the minister now inform the House if he is prepared to end this highly questionable and in fact shameful procedure immediately?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will not ask the hon. member to rephrase the question because we have already taken some time during the question period, but hon. members appreciate, I am sure, that questions worded in this way are really not regular. Hon. members should ask questions and not put questions that include statements or are prefaced with suggested facts and figures. Hon. members should seek information, not provide information as part of the questions they pose during the question period. All this having been said, the minister might be given an opportunity to reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not accept these premises as the hon. member has formulated them. I have indeed received the report. I have already studied it with the department officials. It is a very complex matter, involving a large number of problems, but I shall be glad to give the hon. member any further information he may desire. I intend to continue with my study. For the hon. member's guidance, and to throw light on some points he has already raised, let me say the Ontario practice is exactly the same as that of the federal government.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Would the minister explain why his department has found it necessary to order from the private sector hundreds of thousands of forms to be printed at a cost of several million dollars where tenderers are given as little as eight business hours to submit their tenders and then the tenders are opened in secret?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister should be given an opportunity to reply, but I suggest to the hon. member for York-Simcoe that his second question is the type of question that should normally be put on the order paper.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would not want the hon. member to be allowed to smuggle in that kind of allegation without some kind of response.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: I will be glad to look into that allegation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: So it is true.

Mr. Stanbury: But as hon. members know, supplies are normally obtained through the Department of Supply and Services, and I presume—

Mr. Hees: On the advice of the Liberal organization.

Mr. Stanbury: —that that was the case. No doubt the usual procedures were followed, but I will be glad to inquire and advise the hon. member.

ENERGY

CONSIDERATION OF ENVIRONMENTAL PROBLEMS ARISING FROM PROPOSAL SUPERTANKER PORT IN GROS CACOUNA-ILE VERTE AREA OF QUEBEC

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. It has to do with the proposed supertanker port in the Gros Cacouna-Ile Verte region of Quebec. In view of the fact that the McGill University Marine Science Centre report published in December states that from an environmental point of view Ile Verte is probably the worst possible site for an oil tanker terminal in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, would the minister inform the House whether the government has given full consideration to the environmental problems entailed in the building of a supertanker port in the Cacouna-Ile Verte area of the St. Lawrence River?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the government is vitally concerned with the environmental problems associated with supertanker port construction anywhere on Canada's east or west coasts. This is increasingly so in respect of inland or close-in locations such as the one the hon. member mentioned.

POSSIBLE SUPERTANKER PORT IN ILE VERTE REGION—PROPOSED DELIVERY OF OFFSHORE OIL ACROSS OTTAWA VALLEY LINE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the proposal to build a supertanker port in the Ile Verte region also includes a proposal to deliver offshore oil landed at that port across the Ottawa valley line and possibly to Oswego, New York, would the minister inform the House whether or not the government is preparing to change the national oil policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, of course any proposal of that kind would have to receive the approval of the National Energy Board. At the present time we do not have any intention of changing the policy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I appeal to hon. members. Will the hon. member resume his seat. If there are two or three supplementaries to each question we will find ourselves short of time. Hon. members will have only themselves to blame if only a few members are recognized during the question period. The hon. member wishes to ask a third question.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, my question is now directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact the resources minister of the province of Quebec stated last December that approval had been received from the federal authorities for this supertanker port, could the Acting Prime Minister please inform the House who in the federal government has given this reported approval?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

Oral Questions

PROPOSED SUPERTANKER ROUTE IN PLACENTIA BAY AREA—CONSULTATION WITH FISHERMEN

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries and it concerns the tanker route corridors being planned for eastern Canada, in particular in the Placentia Bay area where a large refinery is about to go into production. Can the minister say whether these corridors will be specifically for supertankers or will they involve other shipping as well? Can the minister also tell us whether fishermen in the area are being consulted in the negotiations dealing with these corridors?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, there is close consultation not only with fishermen but between the federal and provincial departments concerned with developments of this kind. It should be noted in this case that the provincial government took the decision to build a refinery in that area, and the tanker problem is a serious one.

FLOODS

HIGH WATER LEVEL OF LAKE ONTARIO IN HAMILTON AREA—REQUEST FOR MEETING BETWEEN OFFICIALS OF DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT AND CITY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. Can he advise the House whether he is in receipt of a telegram from the secretary of the Hamilton Board of Control reading in part that the high level of Lake Ontario in Hamilton harbour has caused serious flooding conditions and damage to residences on the beach strip in the east section of Hamilton? Is the minister aware of such a telegram or has the city of Hamilton made any representations in this regard to him?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have not personally seen the telegram but I will make inquiries to see if it has been delivered during the question period.

Mr. Alexander: Because of the urgency of the matter the telegram has been circulated to members from that area. In light of the urgency of the situation, can the minister assure the House, and particularly members from the Hamilton area, that a meeting will be set up with his department and officials of the city of Hamilton in order to look into the possibility of long-term and short-term measures to alleviate the situation? Can he give us that assurance?

Mr. Davis: Yes, I think I can. However, as is normally the case, we will work closely with the provincial government in this regard. As the hon. member knows, the Canada Centre for Inland Waters is located nearby.

REQUEST THAT TARIFF BE REINSTATED ON IMPORTS OF COMMERCIAL CATTLE FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the fact that hundreds of commercial cattle, particularly grade bulls, have been imported into Canada, causing a financial burden for the established Canadian purebred cattlemen, would the minister report to the House why he has not demanded that import tariffs on cattle from the United States be immediately reinstated until such time as a reciprocal agreement can be negotiated with the United States government?

● (1450)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time this has been brought to my attention—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Where have you been?

Mr. Whelan: —at least in the same terminology that has been used by the hon. member to emphasize that a certain species of animal is coming into Canada. I will check on the bull shipments as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker, this is the second time that I have asked this question in the House. Some 50 cattlemen travelled distances of up to 150 miles and asked me, on my third try, to get an answer from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Whelan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I met the Canadian Cattlemen's Association last week. We went over all these figures on the movement of cattle both ways across the border, both out of Canada and into Canada, and it was not pointed out to me that there was any large movement of bulls into Canada.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE PROSECUTION OF CAN COMPANIES FOR FALSE ADVERTISING REGARDING RECYCLING OF SOFT DRINK CANS

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister tell the House whether he has decided to prosecute five major can companies in Ontario for false or misleading advertising as a result of their full-page newspaper advertisements and radio announcements which lead the public to believe that soft drink cans are being recycled and therefore are not a pollution problem, when in fact less than 2 per cent of the garbage processing facilities in the province now have this capability?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is that the matter is presently being studied by officials of the combines branch.

Mr. Atkey: Is the minister aware that the only plant having the capability referred to in the advertisements is the plant in the city of Hamilton, the so-called solid waste reduction unit, and that it does not seem to be working because it cannot separate other garbage from the tin cans?

Mr. Gray: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have read the same article as the hon. member.

GRAIN

AVAILABILITY OF SHIPS FOR MOVEMENT OUT OF THUNDER BAY—POSSIBLE GRAIN HANDLERS STRIKE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Has the minister ascertained whether shipments of grain out of Thunder Bay are being seriously jeopardized because of Russian grain ships being tied up in the American gulf ports and, further, has the government taken any action to herd off a grain handlers' strike?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour commented in the House yesterday that this labour problem is at the conciliation stage and he is watching it very closely, representing our earnest concern to see that grain continues to move. The hon. member is right in thinking that the problem the United States is facing in bringing grain to the gulf ports particularly and loading it on ships is having some effect on the presentation of ships in Canadian ports, and as a result not as much grain is moving out of Thunder Bay as we would have the capacity to load if ships were presenting themselves.

PUBLIC WORKS

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW POST OFFICE AT LAC MEGANTIC—INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF TENDERS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Is he aware that tenders for the construction of a post office or federal building in Lac Megantic were supposed to be called six years ago, that they have never been called and that it was recently decided irrevocably that these same tenders were to be called by the end of April 1973? Will the minister tell us what has been done about this and when the tenders will be properly called?

Mr. Speaker: I would point out to the hon. member, as I did before, that questions having to do with calling of tenders for construction of post offices should normally be put on the order paper.

GRAIN

THUNDER BAY GRAIN HANDLERS DISPUTE—CONSULTATION WITH COMPANIES ON ESTABLISHMENT OF SEVEN-DAY WEEK

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether, in regard to the Thunder Bay dispute, he has had consultations with the grain companies on a seven-day week, and whether he is putting any pressure on them to establish a seven-day week in the Thunder Bay area terminals?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not had direct consultations in a recent period of time with the companies concerning this matter. However, I think it is well known to the industry generally that it is the view of everyone, I believe, who has considered the matter that it is much more expeditious for the total movement of grain, and therefore advantageous from a cost point of view, if a seven-day operation exists throughout the whole delivery and handling system.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED RESCINDING OF INCREASES IN POSTAL RATES TO ASSIST ETHNIC PRESS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. In the light of the announcement last week by the Minister of State in charge of cultural affairs of government assistance for the ethnic press, when will the Postmaster General be announcing the rescinding of the sharp increases in postal rates that have forced some of the ethnic papers out of business?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but there was so much noise that I could not understand the hon. member's question. I could perhaps read it in Hansard and reply to it tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might like to repeat the question.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to repeat the question because it is an important one. In the light of the policy announcing support of the ethnic press in Canada, when will the Postmaster General be rescinding the sharp increases in postal rates that have forced many of those papers out of production?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, there are various ways to help the press I think, the ethnic press especially. Projects have been drafted for this specific purpose. This has nothing to do, I believe, with current rates at the Post Office.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL CAPITAL

TASK FORCE STUDY UNDER DOUGLAS FULLERTON—PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact Mr. Douglas Fullerton has now entered upon his duties as chairman of the task force with respect to the national capital, has the government made any decision with regard to the methods of investigation to be followed by this task force? Specifically, has it decided whether or not the practice of public hearings will be urged upon the chairman so that in formulating his opinion he will have the benefit of the views of all interested parties with respect to this question?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the chairman, who commences the duties to which the hon. member referred in June, made statements yesterday as to the method that he envisaged in carrying on his study. He envisaged proceedings more along the line studies and analysis and research projects which would then form the basis of his report. I am sure that the chairman, of course, would welcome whatever views people wish to provide him with. Further, in the announcement of his assuming this task for the government it was envisaged that the government would give consideration, as I mentioned before, to parliamentary hearings on that study. These hearings, of course, would be public proceedings and, hopefully, would be accompanied by briefs and comments not only from members of parliament but from all sectors not only of the national capital region but of the country by people who are concerned about developments in the national capital.

Mr. Baker: Would the minister consider discussing the question of public hearings with Mr. Fullerton in view of the importance of this subject to the Ottawa area?

Mr. Basford: I really think that the place for public hearings is a function of parliament and of the parliamentary committee, but I will be happy to discuss the hon. member's comment with the chairman.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED SENDING OF BILL TO MARC CAYER FOR TRANSPORTATION COSTS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he table in the House copies of the account rendered Marc Cayer on April 5 and of the letter written to him on or about May 1. Also, has the minister any explanation as to why this account was sent for collection from International Voluntary Services, as the minister suggests, in view of his statement that his instructions were that the public should pay the bill and in view of the fact, as I understand it, that quite properly no similar account was sent to Lloyd Oppel?

● (1500)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the assumption had been that the former employer of Mr. Cayer, International Voluntary Services, might wish to pay part of these costs, but that is for them to say. All we have asked Mr. Cayer to do is to let us know the response of International Voluntary Services. At no time have we ever submitted an account for payment to Mr. Cayer. I have the correspondence here but I have only one copy. I think I must table it in two copies, and I will do so.

GRAIN

REQUEST THAT HARBOURS BOARD TERMINAL NO. 2, VANCOUVER, BE UTILIZED FOR MOVEMENT OF SPECIALTY CROPS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board on a matter that has been raised yearly for the past three years. In view of the representations made to the minister and others in the government to make use of the National Harbours Board No. 2 terminal in Vancouver to handle specialty crops such as rapeseed, mustard, and so on, to relieve the terminal congestion in handling bulk quantities of wheat and barley, could the minister tell the House whether further consideration has been given to this matter and if he has made representations to the National Harbours Board to make modest renovations and open the terminal for that purpose?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, one of the problems associated with that terminal is that it is not necessarily possible to open it with modest renovations but, rather, with quite significant renovations. We have had the availability of the terminal as a possible vehicle for moving grains constantly in our minds, and in our studies we have examined a number of different forms of its use and operation. At no time have we been able to conclude that the advantage of putting it into use would outweigh the combination of costs and the disadvantages in terms of rail movement which are involved, or either one of them.

Mr. Benjamin: In view of the fact that the head of the National Harbours Board has told some Members of Parliament that, for purposes of handling dry specialty crops, with modest renovations this terminal could be put to use, will the minister now prevail upon the Board of Grain Commissioners, if the National Harbours Board will not operate it, to repair the terminal for that purpose?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it may be true that certain very small quantities of very specialized products could make use of the terminal, but with certain problems in relation to the over-all movement. At no time has it been shown to us that those products were not capable of being moved by the other terminals and facilities in operation without such costs being incurred.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

HUTTERIAN BRETHREN OF CANADA—REQUEST FOR EXEMPTION FROM PAYING PREMIUMS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the Hutterian Brethren of Canada take vows of poverty and perpetual poverty, and because they are church-employed, would the minister indicate whether he will present legislation to the House to exempt the Hutterian Brethren of Canada from paying Canada Pension Plan premiums?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that a question such as this should be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency, the hon. member can ask that it be given priority at the time of adjournment.

PENITENTIARIES

WILLIAM HEAD—REQUEST THAT CONVERSION TO MEDIUM SECURITY PRISON BE SUSPENDED PENDING REPRESENTATIONS BY LOCAL RESIDENTS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Last week a prisoner at William Head minimum security prison reported back from pass at 10 p.m. and chose to escape at 11 p.m. Before being apprehended he apparently committed two acts of violence and robbery. The residents of the area are now taking up a petition concerning the future of William Head prison. Will the minister assure the House and the residents of Metchosin that he will now hold in abeyance any progress that has been made in the conversion of William Head to a medium security prison until he has received and considered the representations of the residents of that area?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I visited William Head penitentiary last week on the day after this escape took place. At that time I met with representatives of the Metchosin ratepayers' association. I also spoke to the president of the ratepayers' association at great length on the telephone this week, or at the end of last week, and promised him that I would examine his proposals. I pointed out that the decision had been taken to make this into a medium security institution but that the decision had not been implemented yet, and that we would look at his proposals first before doing anything.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR EXAMINATION OF EFFECT OF INCREASED POSTAL RATES ON PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. When the Postmaster General examines the postal rates for the ethnic press, would he also examine the financial damage that has been done to other classes of publications in Canada, namely, scientific, educational and religious publications, as a result of the high increase in postal rates brought in by the government three years ago?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PLACING OF CATTLE ON COMMUNITY PASTURES BY FEED LOT OPERATORS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. As a result of the reorganization of his department, has the minister come out with a policy that allows feed lot operators to place cattle on community pastures at the expense of breeders and farmers?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can answer that specific question other than to say that part of the review involves the whole future of the operation of feed lots and community pastures. I have within the last six days talked with representatives of three prairie provinces and set up discussion groups on this and a number of related issues.

Mr. Korchinski: In the course of his investigation, would the minister also investigate the mutual feed lots at Kenora that have placed 143 cattle, while farmers in that area have not been able to place cattle?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALES AS BENEFIT CONTROL OFFICERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in view of the government's expressed determination announced by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in April, 1972, to remove discrimination and to move toward the full participation of women in all aspects of Canadian society, and in view of last night's prejudicial statement by the chairman of the Unemployment Insurance Commission that there are only eight female benefit control officers in all of Canada, can the minister inform the House when he intends to correct this discriminatory practice, and to what extent?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this matter was brought to the attention of the minister last night.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR PATROL BY ARMED FORCES NAVAL VESSELS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries in order to underline Canada's concern about the overfishing that is taking place off our east coast and on the eve of the Law of the Sea Conference. Is the minister prepared to ask his colleague, the Minister of National Defence, to provide Canadian Armed Forces naval vessels to patrol our coasts, especially in view of the fact that the aerial surveillance is totally ineffective at night when most of the incidents occur?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the fisheries service has been receiving excellent co-operation from the Department of National Defence. In this regard, as the hon. member knows, a special effort has been made to step up air surveillance. Other methods, of course, will have to be introduced as equipment becomes available.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the question period. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to recognize the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte. I recognize that a number of members are still awaiting the opportunity to ask supplementaries to this or other questions and I will try to recognize them tomorrow and give them some kind of priority. For the moment, before calling orders of the day the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED OIL REFINERY AT EASTPORT, MAINE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. There has been a great deal of publicity about the possible construction of a refinery at Eastport, Maine, and the fact that there will be large tankers to support this refinery that will be travelling a very hazardous route. Has the Minister of the Environment decided to make any representations to the proper authorities in respect of the possible effect on the environment of the Bay of Fundy and, if so, what are the representations he has made or plans to make?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will be making representations, and they are opposed to the construction of that refinery on the United States side near Eastport, Maine.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker—

● (1510)

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Originally we had intended to have an opposition day tomorrow. Instead, if this debate is not completed today, which is not likely, we would call the capital punishment bill for debate tomorrow, Thursday, and would have an opposition day on Friday and another opposition day on Monday. We would call the capital punishment bill again, if need be, on Tuesday.

In any event, following discussions with other parties in the House it has been agreed that it might be possible to have an order of the House indicating that all questions, including any amendments necessary for the disposal of the second reading stage of the capital punishment bill, Bill C-2, would be put at 9.30 p.m. on Tuesday, May 29, 1973. That agreement could be put in the form of an order of the House. This would determine our business for the next several days.

Mr. Baldwin: That is satisfactory, Your Honour.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree to this, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be agreement and unanimous consent for the proposition submitted to the House by the President of the Privy Council. Is it agreed that it be so ordered?

Sone hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask the government House leader, now that one phase of government business has been satisfactorily concluded with this order of the House, clearing the way for the government to bring on legislation, what priority the government intends to give the legislation respecting the proposed increase in family allowances, and when will that legislation be brought before the House?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I certainly give very high priority to the family allowance bill. I should like to see it cleared away if possible before the summer adjournment. However, it is not likely that we will have the bill until early in the month of June.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Prior to our adjourning for the Easter recess the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated that he would be bringing in legislation which would exempt the Old Order Mennonites from making compulsory payments under the Canada Pension Plan. Could the government House leader indicate the priority for that legislation?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the changes that my hon. friend mentioned would require amendments to the Canada Pension Plan Act. That is on my list; I attach great priority to it and, hopefully, we will get it through.

Mr. Alexander: What about the Immigration Appeal Board Act?

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allowed me, I would like to express my views on the important question of the abolition of the death penalty or the retention of certain restrictions in the act, restrictions which have been incorporated since 1967 in the Criminal Code, as stipulated by Bill C-2 now before the House, with a view to extending those restrictions for another five years.

Mr. Speaker many hon. members have already spoken on this subject, and I must say I followed the debate very closely in order to weigh the pros and cons of that important matter, in the light of the research I have done, just as the other hon. members did, I am sure.

Unfortunately, I am disappointed with the way this debate is shaping out: once again we find that statistics are tricky to manipulate and that, on occasion, they can be misleading.

I see that hon. members in favour of passing this bill currently before us enlighten their speeches with official statistics showing that the existence of capital punishment has no effect in Canada or in other countries that they mentioned in their remarks.

On the other hand, those among us who want capital punishment in Canada to become really effective, as prior to 1967, are trying to prove with official statistics that since capital punishment was abolished the rate of major crimes has increased in Canada, precisely as a result of that abolition.

I think that in fact capital punishment still exists in Canada. Thugs and professional killers and all the others who continue as I speak to take it upon themselves to inflict capital punishment but through illegality and crime—call it assassination or whatever you want—kill shamelessly and without any fear of justice those who stand in their way. They mercilessly riddle with bullets all those who could prevent them from committing their rapes, robberies or other crimes. I think that they are now the unchallenged masters in Canada because they no longer fear the gallows, and I think that fear is the beginning of wisdom. They are increasingly becoming masters everywhere.

That is why I blame this government for not administering the act as passed in 1967. There have been many murders of policemen and prison guards since 1967, and all criminals convicted of those reprehensible acts were reprieved in last recourse by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Governor in Council.

I do not wish to produce here tons of statistics to show whether capital punishment influences criminals or not. Moreover, I have dealt with the matter on several occasions in this House during the last parliament and I then quoted statistics in support of my speech.

Today, I wish to make my position clear and according to my conscience, I should take a logical and reasonable stand. I had then consistently asked for restoration of the death penalty and I have not changed my mind.

I think that my role is to state in the House what are my constituents' views as if they were present.

Mr. Speaker, I have promised my constituents after my first election to seek their advice on every important matter of general interest concerning the Criminal Code or any other legislation coming under federal jurisdiction.

• (1520)

I have therefore held information meetings in the past—I still do—and taken the habit of contacting my electors at least every month on any subject of concern which is bound to have an effect on their life. In the light of their answers, I can make up my mind more easily and truly say what they think on the basis of papers in my possession.

So, during the last election campaign, I confirmed to my electors that I would uphold my position on this matter and they approved me. And I think that they approve my habit of consulting them, because I was elected with a stronger majority than in 1968. In October 1971, I asked all voters of the Richmond riding to express themselves on the restoration of the death penalty and more than 25 per cent answered my questionnaire. Of these 25 per cent, 92.6 per cent were in favour of restoring capital punishment as it existed in 1967. And I sincerely believe that at this time the percentage of those in favour of reinstating capital punishment in Canada would be still higher.

Mr. Speaker, my decision has therefore been taken in the light of the wishes expressed by my constituents, and I insist on pointing out to the House that I shall vote against Bill C-2 tending to suspend capital punishment in certain cases. I am in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment in all cases where the guilt of the accused has been established without any doubt whoever his victim might be. I shall even go so far as to extend application of this punishment to abortionists who bring death to children who have the right to life.

In order to justify their wish to vote in favour of this legislation, a number of people will resort to such arguments as dignity, the right to life for murderers, and moral progress. I wish to point out incidentally that I differ from the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) who, a few days ago, urged the government to eliminate capital punishment from the Criminal Code, whereas for the past five years she has repeatedly been asking the government to legalize abortion in Canada.

In my opinion, an individual who deliberately provokes an abortion should, after adequate evidence, be punishable by death and such a provision should be introduced into the Criminal Code.

Mr. Speaker, those who want to abolish capital punishment from the Criminal Code resort to weak and contradictory arguments. Have they considered for a single moment that it is society's strict obligation to protect the integrity of the individual against all that threatens it? I suggest that murderers are a threat, directly or indirectly, to society.

In my opinion, the legislator born of a society which has elected to be respected and respectable must punish the individual who is really found guilty of having willfully taken the life of one of his fellow citizens. Moreover, the Canadian legislator who, owing to his duties, is responsible for protecting the members of that society, must give the courts, by including some provisions in the Criminal Code, the necessary tools in order that the chief justice of the court and the jury might, if they wish, prescribe capital punishment for the individual guilty of the premeditated murder of a policeman or anybody else.

I have already said and I repeat that, at birth, the individual is pacific and that it is our society which makes him aggressive, nervous and unsociable. One of the reasons for this is the apathy shown by the parents in assuming their responsibilities towards their children, for too many young mothers work outside home to make both ends meet or pay the income tax. A child left to himself, without his mother and often without supervision, starts to commit minor offences against the society around him and sometimes against himself, and as he grows these offences grow correspondingly bigger.

Our modern society also contains the monstrosities that are called "schools" or "colleges", in which, supposedly to increase efficiency, 1,500, 2,000 or even 3,000 pupils are heaped together, almost without supervision because there are too many of them; these school children, who are often quite young—from 9 to 15 years old—are treated like numbers. I call these groups of schoolchildren school herds, in which the child is deprived of the love and understanding of his teacher, society and those around him.

Our governments have failed, in my opinion, to get to the roots of crimes committed by groups of young people. Every day one sees young children, in school or elsewhere, committing offences, using drugs, etc. for lack of supervision.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a large-scale undertaking that would require a lot of patience and effort, but I am convinced that the only way to abolish the death penalty, which is the matter before us, would be to take better care of society before young people, especially, start to commit offences. Our schools should become more humane, while aiming also at providing education and instruction. At present, we hand out instruction to students, but when they leave school with their diplomas, there is no place for them in our society. That is why we see so many young people aged between 17 and 25 turning to crime.

Young people, Mr. Speaker, are our future. It is incumbent upon us to give our young people everything they need to succeed in life. Thus we would see no more unbalanced people steal and sometimes, under too strong a tension or from the effect of drugs, kill to get what they want.

Let us give young couples the possibility of raising their children in happiness and safety without their having to wonder always about their future. Let us legislate so that we can live under a system of distributive justice, of comprehension and love where money, luxury as we know it, vanity and envy are no longer the masters of our destinies and then we will not longer be required to discuss a bill such as the one before us now.

Finally, I must say that we should rid Canadian society of its undesirable citizens but even more I think that the government should seriously consider the deep-rooted reasons which prompt society to adopt such a legislation. In my opinion, I think members of Parliament and the federal and provincial governments, because they have adopted certain laws, are mainly responsible for this high proportion of murderers. A murderer is an individual who spent his childhood in the street. He has grown up like a tree; in my opinion, we surely should grant more importance to the surveillance of young people in our society. Thus, tomorrow we will be able to see a responsible and flourishing society flourish and people who will learn to enjoy life.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to place on the record, as have many members, my views on this bill and on the matter of capital punishment. Perhaps this is one of the most important problems with which this parliament will have to contend. The end result will likely be very little different from that of the present situation. It is good the House will have a free vote on this matter. I think the discussion will be useful to whatever will be the ultimate decision.

It is significant that in western civilization the death penalty at least has been steadily eliminated and is now applied only to so-called capital murder. Since legislation on this matter was last passed in this House no death sentences have been carried out on persons convicted of killing prison guards or policemen; these cases have all been commuted by the Governor General on orders from the cabinet.

There has been widespread discussion on whether capital punishment acts as a deterrent to those who would commit murder. From my observation of murder cases about which I have personal knowledge, the deterrence of capital punishment was only vaguely recognized by the murderer when he carried out his crime. My position with regard to capital punishment being a deterrent to an individual carrying out the act of murder is that it is very secondary.

Man is essentially a creature that is both aggressive and suspicious. Wars and acts of violence seem to be a legacy in our long history of evolution and development. By nature, man is a violent person at times. The overlay of social conscience, customs and inhibitions seems to have determined that society will obey considerable restrictions in order that people may live in communities and obey some laws. It is interesting to note that when our cities become increasingly congested, there are increasing acts of violence, murder and rape. The people in these large cities become depersonalized and have little interest in what is happening to individuals about them.

My own feeling is that most murderers are of distinct personality types. Whether or not they are insane, as has been assumed in many successful defences of murder cases, I think it can be said that certain mental states will cause temporary loss of normal inhibitions and murder may take place. It has been insufficiently recognized that a murderer is a distinct personality type and commits murder according to his own dictates and ideas. Also, it has not been recognized that these people always will have such personality deficiencies. Faced with the same circumstances, a murderer will always repeat the crime. To him, that is the immediate solution to the problem and he can see no other way. With this in mind, I believe these people must be removed from society. There are two obvious ways in which this can be done. The first is the institution of capital punishment whereby the murderer is put to death. The state is thus spared much expense and society is protected from the murderer forever.

I am reminded of an answer to a questionnaire sent out by a member of this House. The respondent's reply was: "I am for capital punishment. It may not be a deterrent, but at least it prevents repetition." The second solution would be to lock up the murderer for the rest of his natural life. In this way society would be protected from individuals who had committed murder. It would be simple to assume that the first solution, the removal of the murderer from society by death, would be easy, final and would recommend itself to many people. However, I believe that this final solution does not remove the risk of putting to death those who are innocent but happened to be in a circumstantial position whereby suspicion was laid upon them.

After an innocent person is condemned to death and suffers the ultimate fate, society in no way can repay him for the loss of his life. But if he is confined to prison by misadventure and is serving a sentence, society can make some recompense to him for the injustice and punishment that has been meted out to him.

My position on capital punishment is that if I were sure that justice was always right and that the accused had committed a crime, I would not hesitate to have the death penalty carried out. But history is full of significant miscarriages of justice, and at times innocent people have suffered the death penalty.

In times of great national emergency this might well be a necessity and people might find themselves unfairly but inadvertently victimized. In the normal course of events, which regard to murder that occurs in society we should take all precautions possible to make sure that the innocent are not convicted and lose their lives. In other words, I feel that the risk of making an error is greater than the value obtained from the deterrent effect of capital punishment.

At this time there have been no convincing figures to show that capital punishment acts as a deterrent, at least in what is called normal times in our society. Perhaps at some time in the future we will have to recognize this or that statistic, and other indices may show that capital punishment is necessary as a deterrent. But that time is not yet, and I do not think this House has to vote for capital punishment on the basis that only in this way will murders be reduced, or because the incidence of murder is getting out of hand.

I stated previously that murderers had a definite personality problem and that these people should be removed from society forever. In other words, I think that life imprisonment should mean life imprisonment, particularly for these people. We seem to be living in a very permissive society and I believe that one of the public's concerns and anxieties is over the laxity of a penal system that allows murderers to be paroled after what seems a short time and again inflicted on the public. We as well as all the other citizens of Canada would like to believe in the parole system; that criminals should be rehabilitated and that there should be a place outside the prison walls for them. But in so far as murderers are concerned, I believe that we should apply to them severe restrictions by imprisoning them for life when they are found guilty of capital murder.

There are those who say that this is a fate worse than being committed to death. This may be true in the eyes of many. I believe, though that society as a whole wishes to preserve life, and that until fresh evidence comes forward to make a decision for us it is the best solution to what is obviously a problem in respect of which all possible solutions are not very satisfactory. I would be more happy to support this legislation if we could be assured that in committee amendments would be introduced to make a life sentence mean a life sentence. One who has committed a murder has certainly forfeited his right to continue being a citizen with the same rights and privileges as is afforded to most other people. One of the criticisms of capital punishment is that the death penalty is not applied uniformly but selectively. It is done in a way where risks are both arbitrary and discriminatory.

A recent editorial suggested that a total of 701 convicted murderers have been executed in Canada since confederation. An almost equal number, more than 600, have had their sentences commuted by the cabinet. The cabinet was exercising the Queen's prerogative, but the cabinet is a political rather than a judicial body which, by its very nature, can have no fixed criteria in such matters. I do not see how the federal cabinet of, for that matter, any cabinet in this country could have such criteria because of their make-up.

So, Mr. Speaker, from the aforementioned figures which show that almost half of the total number of murderers in this country have had their sentences commuted by the cabinet, it is evident that sentences passed by the judiciary in carrying out justice are somewhat less than a final judgment. In other words, the judiciary, who presumably should know best and are better trained than anyone else, have had their sentences opposed in almost half of the cases where the murderer was sentenced to capital punishment.

The tide at this time seems to favour the retention of capital punishment by the public as a deterrent and as a means of stabilizing society at a time when values appear to be deteriorating and lawlessness is on the increase. I do not feel that the bill passed in 1966 has definitely proven one way or the other that capital punishment must be abolished altogether or brought back to its pre-1966 status. According to my research, it seems that there have been no hangings since December 1962, and this is significant. It seems to indicate that whatever the judiciary may say, the cabinet is very reluctant to have the death sentence carried out. But, Mr. Speaker, the public does want more assurance than it has been getting that if the death sentence is not carried out, then there must be more protection for the public within whatever means are currently available.

In committee I would hope that amendments or some indication will be made by the government that the parole system will be revamped, that murderers are not considered to be rehabilitable but that they should be removed from society for the rest of their lives. Certainly I as an individual taxpayer would be happy to pay my taxes so that these people would not be again inflicted upon society. I do not think this problem is altogether solved, because I do not think it is yet possible to ascertain just what effect the complete abolition of the death penalty would have. For this reason, unsatisfactory as it may be, I think we have to wait longer before a suitable solution may become apparent. But it seems to me that unless amendments are made to ensure that murderers are confined for life, then surely we will have to return to capital punishment as the only way that society can be protected.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of debate in this House by many hon. members on the subject of capital punishment. Hon. members on both sides of the House have spoken both for and against the bill. Let me make it clear at the outset that I have listened to their remarks with interest and to their expressed opinions with respect. My contribution to this debate will, hopefully, be a mixture of my own personal views and the expressions of the majority of my constituents, the people of Elgin, as they have been conveyed to me by many means over past weeks and months.

I am glad to see that throughout the debate there has been consensus that the present treatment of murderers, as a substitute for capital punishment, has been far too lenient. This is a refreshing change from the position of some who have shown the most overwhelming concern for the criminal, to the point that they fail to show any genuine concern for the innocent members of society, members of society whose lives have been jeopardized by the fact that the life of a murderer has not only been spared but that he has been permitted to walk the streets, free again, after only eight years in prison.

I understand that there have been four documented cases in this country of murderers who have been released on parole and who have killed again. I wonder whether they will be paroled after another eight years or so? People are fed up with this ridiculously lenient treatment of criminals and are becoming concerned. And deeply concerned they should be, Mr. Speaker. The average law-abiding citizen is genuinely worried about the safety of his family, the safety of his friends and himself, and is having grave misgivings about the ability of the law to offer the protection that he deserves.

Some hon. members have argued that we should ignore what appears to be a majority opinion that the death penalty should be reinstated. It is true there has been no official, scientifically planned survey to gauge the feelings of all Canadians, but judging from the response of constituents over this issue and the results of some public opinion surveys, the general opinion is that capital punishment should be retained. To completely ignore this attitude is somewhat dangerous and is a slap in the face of true democracy. I caution this House, Mr. Speaker, that we would be courting a backlash of public opinion if we were to totally ignore the arguments of many responsible constituents and the general attitude of the Canadian people.

What I particularly dislike about the present treatment of murderers is the fact that we seem to have twisted our values around. The government has permitted cold-blooded and callous murderers to walk the streets again after only eight years in prison. A thief, in many cases, can receive a longer sentence. Does this perhaps mean that the material goods stolen by a thief are worth more than the life taken by a murderer?

Surely we can all agree that murder is the worst crime; so it follows that a murderer should receive at least a harsher penalty than a person guilty of any other crime. To this extent I assume we are in general agreement. It is a little ridiculous to give a murderer about the same sentence as that given to a dangerous thief. In a sense we are equating the value of human life with that of material wealth. Fortunately, we have advanced from the time when a thief could be hung, but now we seem to have gone full tilt in the other direction and our values are just as warped as they were in earlier times. When any human life can be equated with anything other than human life, we can scarcely be surprised at the moral consequences.

The argument has been put forward by abolitionists that a civilized, compassionate society does not have the right to take a human life. I suggest that whether or not we are a civilized, compassionate society is a matter in itself for debate. Putting that aside, Mr. Speaker, I believe our society, in fact any society, has the right and indeed the responsibility to use, in the words of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) "whatever means are necessary to protect itself from those forces that would seek to destroy it".

The ideal purpose of a society is to protect the individuals within it and to ensure their total well-being. If any members of that society are attacked from within or from without, that society is fully justified in using whatever means are necessary to defend its members. Surely we can agree that our society is justified in making war if truly endangered. This is actually a civilized and compassionate action in that it reflects a concern for the over-all well-being of its members. Society is justified in taking the life of a murderer who attacks it from within.

The abolitionists will argue that the death penalty is not necessary and serves no purpose in that it is not a deterrent. Some pretty convincing statistics have been presented to prove this. Most abolitionists agree that the death penalty should be retained for the murderers of policemen and prison guards. But why? Are their lives worth more than those of civilians? The answer is, of course not. Even abolitionists agree that the presence of the death penalty will deter murderers of law enforcement officers. So in fact abolitionists do agree that the presence of the death penalty does have some deterrent effect. Why should civilians not have the same right to this protection? The death penalty should apply to the premeditated murder of any citizen.

There appear to be two types of murderers. First, there are those who are mentally deranged or are suffering temporary or prolonged mental shock. The law should, and does provide for leniency in such cases. What about the brutal, callous murderer who has deliberately planned his crime and is fully aware of the consequences? How do we deal with the hired killer in organized crime who murders for money? How do we deal with the revolutionary assassin who coldly plots his crime against the very society from which he expects justice? How do we deal with such people as the bank robber who coldly informs his hostages, "I will shoot anyone in the bank, and the Supreme Court will let me get away with it. The is no death penalty, so I can shoot everyone here, then throw down the gun and walk out and they cannot put me in the electric chair"? For such people the death penalty is clearly a deterrent. They are fully aware of what they are doing and the consequence of their act.

The argument is also put forward that the death penalty is vengeance pure and simple and as such is a barbaric vestige of man's animal nature. In all honesty, is not all punishment for crime a matter of vengeance? Whatever penalty was imposed for murder, it will still be vengeance. Is not this vengeance largely the result of justifiable moral outrage by society against the viciousness of the murderer's act? Vengeance, as we call it, is actually an act of self-defence by society. A murderer kills a child, and the parent reacts by demanding his death. The murderer has in a way attacked that parent, who responds in self-defence. In much the same way, society is a single, living unit of which its individuals are a part; an attack upon one of them is actually an attack upon society, and society has the responsibility to act defensively for the benefit of the rest of its members.

To conclude, it is the fate of a deliberate killer that we are deciding, not the barbaric means of execution used today. I believe the law should recognize all the circumstances and give the benefit of the slightest doubt. But when the courts have referred those persons they can for psychiatric care, when they have acquitted others for lack of conclusive evidence, when social and economic conditions have been improved in order to remove the breeding grounds of crime and violence, when the penal system has been restaged to provide rehabilitative services instead of apprenticeships in crime—when all this has been done society inevitably comes face to face with the real issue in this debate.

We are dealing with the fate of a callous, brutal murderer who has planned his crime with full awareness of the consequences, has weighed the life of his victim in the balance and has valued at less than his possible gain. The death penalty would remind such a murderer who has lost any sense of the value of life that a life is in fact very dear, at least as dear as his own. What other way is there to understand the horror of taking a person's life, if not directly equating it to the life of that person's killer? In all honesty, capital punishment is an obscene thing, but I believe it is necessary to establish the value of life in our society and I will vote against the bill.

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity of thanking you for allowing me to deliver my first speech in this House. Like my colleagues sitting in the House for the first time, I have been looking forward to this opportunity for some time.

The bill on capital punishment presently before us in the House is one of Canada's most explosive political and legal issues ever placed before this House. It is an issue in respect of which there are not any cut and dried answers. It is an issue which, regardless of the outcome of the vote, will never be resolved. Many of my colleagues have presented very strong and excellent arguments for and against punishment. Many members have quoted statistics to back up their stand. Yet even these statistics counterbalance each other and we are left with that nagging question as to who is right and who is wrong. Many of us in this House represent many of the religious faiths of this nation, yet even our religious leaders are divided on this issue.

Putting aside all the arguments for and against capital punishment, there still remains a basic fact which many of us, including the abolitionists, seem to have overlooked. We must all face the fact that increased permissiveness in today's society has created a climate in which respect for law and order is no longer accepted by many of its members. This being the fact, the crime rate in Canada and throughout the world has steadily increased over the past ten years, and continues to increase. This increase in crime will continue unless legislators enact stiffer laws which will make the penalty for murder and other serious offences heavier than the penalty for robbing a bank.

Every country in the world is faced with these facts, and many countries which have abolished capital punishment or placed it on a five-year trial basis are having second thoughts on the matter. England and West Germany are experiencing, as we are in North America, a new wave of thought which is leaning very strongly toward the retention of capital punishment. Our abolitionists would say to all this, "Hogwash". Nevertheless, the fact still remains that with the increase of permissiveness in our society, our crime rate has increased and will continue to increase unless we legislate stiffer penalties for crimes committed against society.

Those of us who are retentionist are often accused of coming out of the dark ages in our ideas. Yet I wonder if man has ever, or will ever come out of the dark ages so far as his relationship with his fellow man is concerned. It seems ironical that men have walked on the face of the moon, that technology has advanced beyond man's wildest dreams, that in the field of medicine we are capable of replacing run down parts of the body with new parts and in the near future we will see a whole new generation of test tube babies, yet in spite of all man's advancements, man continues to kill his fellow man just as he did so indiscriminately in the dark ages. Have we progressed to the point that we are regressing, or has man, with all his advancement, ever really progressed?

In our benevolent or liberal-minded attitudes today we have created a society in which the criminal elements are protected while society is left unprotected from the onslaughts of our criminals. A couple of weeks ago in the Montreal Gazette, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) was quoted as stating that things have gone too far, and he announced an independent judicial inquiry into the recent rash of escapes from federal prisons in Quebec.

I do not doubt for a minute that the minister is sincerely concerned, but he is quite correct when he says that things have gone too far. This sort of nonsense occurred constantly during the term of office of the previous solicitor general when the government had a majority in this House. At that time the people of Canada strongly voiced their indignation, as they are doing now; but their cries of indignation went unheard. Now our Solicitor General finds himself to be a member of a minority government and neither he nor the cabinet can ignore the outcry of the Canadian people.

The Solicitor General has issued orders for stricter security measures in all federal prisons. Why was this not done before? Why was this not done during the period in office of the previous solicitor general? It is obvious to me, and I am sure to others, that the government realizes that they can no longer ignore the voice of the people and if they want to remain in power they must smarten up. Thus, stricter controls are now being initiated in all federal prisons.

The increase in crime and prison outbreaks has made a mockery of our system of justice, and all Canadians are angered and concerned and want action. I feel that this is an appropriate time to bring forth a fact that too many of us, including the present government, seem to forget once we are elected to this House, namely, that we are elected at the will of the people and for the people. I feel that it is time the present government was reminded of the fact that the people of Canada gave it a minority vote in the last election because they were not satisfied with its past performance. Unless the government smartens up and stops making excuses or appointing special inquiries, and gets down to the business of cracking down on our increase in crime and prison outbreaks, it will again soon feel the wrath of the Canadian people in the next election. Our country can no longer afford this breakdown in our judicial system. We have seen this happen in other countries, and it has brought disastrous results. Justice can no longer continue to be mocked by our criminal elements. This is one of the many reasons why I am a retentionist.

Unlike some of my colleagues, I am mindful of what the people in my riding expect of me. I have a federal prison and a county jail in the riding of Portage, and the people who work in these places have expressed deep concern over the breakdown of penal reform in our prisons. They are also concerned about the way in which our prisoners are pampered and coddled while society is less and less protected from criminal elements. Much of the correspondence from my constituents has been in favour of the retention of capital punishment. My constituents are not pleased with the present system and they want the death penalty brought back for all murders against society, not just for the murder of prison guards and policemen. My constituents are not revenge-seeking people, but they want justice dealt out fairly. They want to feel secure in their homes. They want to know that their rights and freedoms are secure and that their lives are safe from our criminal elements.

People today are no longer fooled by political talk; to them this is no longer acceptable. They want action to curb the increase of crime in our society; and they want action, not talk, to curb prison outbreaks. We have the obligation, as their elected representatives, to provide them with such security as will protect them from our criminal elements.

Some people will argue that hanging is not humane. I agree. But can anyone in this country or in the House come up with a more humane method? Is it more humane to lock up a man for life in a prison where he is denied all the freedoms and pleasures that we enjoy and which he enjoyed before he committed his crime? We could all argue left and right on these points and not come to any agreement, but the fact still remains that we have not found a proper or workable solution in dealing with crime and penal reform.

Perhaps the old methods were not humane, but at least we had law and order and respect for law and order which we do not have today. My people want law and order and respect for law and order brought back. I am sure that this is also the wish of the people of Canada generally. Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that the reason I shall vote for the retention of the death penalty is that I want to bring back that law and order to which the people of this country are entitled.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate on Bill C-2. It was not my intention to speak at this point in the debate, but in view of recent events, including attacks on police officers, I feel it is my duty to make known my position on this issue.

One of the problems seems to be lack of clear understanding of what we are discussing. Talk about vengeance and punishment is out of place. Most people do not regard the issue in that light. Some speak about the deterrent value and hinge the whole debate on that issue, yet the deterrent aspect is not the central issue. Let us look at the central issue. It appears to me that the central issue is the responsibility of the state to render adequate protection to the individual. Accompanying this is the expectation of the individual that the state will afford security to himself, his family and his property.

Let us consider the rights of the murderer. These rights are balanced against the rights of a person who has been found guilty, after due process of the law, of wilfully and violently taking away the life of another person. Does a killer have some sacred right to life which is denied the ordinary person? Some people taking part in the controversy on capital punishment have suggested that the state does not have the right to resort to ultimate means to protect the individual citizen. I respectfully beg to disagree. If the state has the duty to protect citizens, then the state has the right to exercise the ultimate sanction in that regard. Even peacekeeping troops are given sidearms with instructions to use them if their lives are menaced. Does anyone deny the right of a government to issue those instructions?

● (1600)

In dealing with the harsh realities of life, societies must be prepared to face unpleasant facts, among which are murder and the homicidal urge which motivates some persons to the peril of others. Until such time as governments, by brainwashing, hypnotism or some other scientific or chemical means eliminate the urge to kill, the state must continue to retain the right to the ultimate sanction. One thing at least is certain. Capital punishment is an effective deterrent to the person to whom it is applied. He at least cannot kill again.

If the state fails to provide a degree of security sufficient to reassure individuals, then individuals will be tempted to look after their own security and we will face anarchy. This is exactly what is happening in those states where capital punishment has been suspended for a long period. Householders are arming themselves all over the United States, and that kind of violence is spreading into Canada. I think it is safe to say that our society is experiencing a wave of violence such as we have not seen for many decades. Every day newspapers carry almost unbelievable stories of shootings, murders of various kinds and other crimes too horrible to describe. Citizens feel they are without protection and that if their homes or properties are invaded they must rely on themselves for defence.

Let us look at the deterrent argument. The deterrent argument is a specious argument; it is simply a red herring. Does the threat of prison deter bank robbery? Shall we now abolish prisons? When I see what kind of people are escaping, it might be better for us to be in prison. Do fines deter speeders? Shall we abolish fines and speed limits? The threat of capital punishment deters some people and saves some lives. We know that some criminals cannot be deterred, regardless of legislation. The question is, shall they be free to kill again?

Experience shows that long-term sentences are not, and will not be carried out. Anyway, what is so humane about putting a person in jail for 25 years? Nowhere in the constitution of this nation or in the constitution of any nation does it say that a person who has wantonly and cruelly killed—that is, who has taken away someone else's life for his own advantage—retains a God-given right to enjoy his own life. It has been held through the ages that those who wantonly take away life forfeit their own right to life. Whether one believes this or not, I submit it is difficult to make a case in favour of an inalienable right to life for confessed or convicted killers.

Most people will share the opinion that a person who wantonly kills another forfeits his own right to life. It is possible that the state, in consideration of a recommendation for mercy, may refrain from putting the death sentence into effect. No one denies that right. On the other hand, no one should deny the state the right to take away, by the most humane method possible and after due process of law, the life of a person convicted of one or more murders. The duty of this chamber is not to make the world safe for killers. It is not to underline and confirm some imaginary right to life on the part of those who have taken life. Such a right never existed.

We live in an era where violence has become a way of life, where violence is organized, where violence has been granted privileges, where violence and organized crime are apparently tax-free, as revealed in evidence in Montreal recently. The existence of professional criminals and fanatical groups dedicated to the liquidation of their imaginary enemies makes it all the more mandatory that the state must not surrender its right to defend the citizen and his family.

While I admit that polls are not infallible and are not a substitute for conscience, I am convinced in this case that the polls reflect a reality that exists in the minds and hearts of Canadians disturbed by growing violence, disturbed by the apparent inability of the state to ensure protection for themselves and their families. Surveys show that Canadians are not prepared to surrender the right to exact the ultimate penalty from confessed and convicted killers. Very few in this chamber are likely to be threatened or menaced, or have their homes or the lives of their loved ones put in danger from violent men. But in October, 1970, when fanatical groups ran riot, the situation was different. Many members of this chamber were given protection in the form of armed guards. The ordinary citizen is denied that kind of protection. He must take his chances. It is up to the state to see to it that those chances are kept at a minimum. Capital punishment is a weapon in the arsenal of national security.

The situation in the last ten years has been conducive to the utmost licence in the area of violence. The law exists but it is not applied. Either the law should be scrapped and capital punishment abolished, or the law should be applied. The present situation constitutes the worst of both worlds and is simply a wide-open invitation to kill. I strongly doubt that police and prison guards will go on meekly being targets for the violence and animosity of conscienceless individuals. Policemen are liable to start shooting back, and when they do people are going to get hurt, some of them innocent people.

A continuation of the present situation invites widespread anarchy. The present motion should be defeated and members should be given a clear choice either to retain the right of the state to undertake the ultimate sanction or abolish it. Personally, while I recognize the dedication and courage of police officers I nevertheless feel that the life of any individual is as valuable to him and his family as that of a policeman or guard.

I do not feel that the violent removal of an individual's life by a cold-blooded killer is adequately dealt with by a few years in jail at the end of which the killer is free to kill again. The violent removal of life must be met by the power of the state to exact the ultimate penalty, otherwise we reduce murder to the rank of an ordinary misdemeanour.

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my views on capital punishment. I intend to vote against the motion for continuation of the moratorium. This bill is neither an abolitionist nor a retentionist bill but is, rather, a measure of partial abolition or partial retention, whichever way one would like to look at it. The government could have introduced a bill to abolish capital punishment and we could have debated it on that basis. I think the Canadian people are ready for that question, and most of them actually think that is what we are debating.

I believe that in any society there must be law and order. Order is the prime requirement: Without it you have chaos. We ask the police to keep order and carry out our laws. They favour capital punishment; they feel it will help them to carry out their duties. I feel it is my responsibility to co-operate with them and help them, so the least I can do is to vote for capital punishment. I am not certain why they want capital punishment, and I am not sure I should question each of them about it. Governments must trust and take advice from many sources. Basically, it is simple: We ask the police to maintain law and order and they in turn ask us to retain capital punishment.

I say, let the abolitionists convince the police that capital punishment is not necessary and I will vote to abolish it. Failing that, let the abolitionists discover some other method to maintain order. I feel it is necessary to stand with the police and prison guards because I would like to encourage the best young men in Canada to become part of the police force, and I want them to feel they have the confidence and support of legislators. If we fail to do this, the police will become a law unto themselves; they will shoot first and ask questions later. If they were about to capture a person who had killed many times, they might not be inclined to risk their lives to capture him so that he may become a guest of the state.

In this debate are we not asked to choose between life imprisonment or death for a handful of convicted murderers, on the one hand, and the morale of the police force on the other. The choice for me is a simple one. I am in sympathy with the police. I know it is not the modern thing to do, in an age when we tend to worship the misfit and apologize to him on behalf of society.

Another reason for voting against this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that I share the concern of thousands of Canadians about the rapid increase in violent crime. I know we have been quoted figures which indicate that the increase of murder has not been as rapid as the increase of lesser crimes. Is this a reason for voting for abolition? More people speed at 65 or 70 miles an hour than at 100 or 110 miles an hour, so should we lessen the penalty for speeding at 100 miles an hour?

Murder is the ultimate crime. If we lessen the penalty for murder, Canadians feel that penalties for all crimes will be lessened and that crime itself will be more acceptable to our society. This is why Canadians are urging us to retain capital punishment. They want to bring about respect for law and order in our society. They feel that if we maintain a severe penalty for the ultimate crime, the penalties for other crimes will be maintained.

The abolitionists say that it is barbaric for the state to take a man's life;—that we are committing group murder. Can the state blindly lead society, or must it mirror society? In my opinion, in the maintenance of law and order we cannot afford to be idealistic and we can only reflect what society is. Pretending that people are good, and that if we do not hang the murderer there will be no murder, is wishful thinking. By all means let us make every effort to become more civilized. This is a challenge to our educational institutions and our churches, to our schools and universities where our society spends so much of its time and where we spend so much of our money. Let these institutions do more than mirror society. Let them lead society to greater things. But let the law and the way it is enforced reflect what society really is.

Our whole basis for law is an attempt to have the punishment fit the crime. We assume that time to everyone is precious, and to try to keep order the state says: If you break the law we will take some time away from you. This process if not new, but ancient. It is understood by everyone. We do not have laws to punish people; we have laws in an attempt to prevent crime and to protect people and property. No one desires to see the state execute anyone; the intention is that the crime be not committed in the first place. Retentionists are not blood-thirsty. We would be content if no murders were committed; then there would be no murderers to deal with.

The reason we must maintain capital punishment is that we must distinguish between crimes like making homebrew or liquor illegally, between destruction of property, between speeding on the highway or not stopping at a stop sign, between stealing of material things including money, and the taking of a human life. Without capital punishment there is no clear distinction between the taking of property and the taking of life. Surely there is a difference, but not according to the law of the last ten years. If you rob a bank, you might serve a seven-year sentence. If you rob the same bank and kill the manager, you might serve a year or two longer. Paper money and those who possess it apparently are as important as a human life. There is a difference between a human life and a material object, and our laws must indicate that difference. There must be a difference not only in time but in the kind of penalty.

The state executes many times and nothing is said. Recently a man was shot and killed as he stood in the doorway of an airplane he threatened to hijack. They managed to get him to the door, and he was holding a girl hostage with one hand. I am sure the person who gave the order to shoot was told to kill. In this case the state executed that man. He had done nothing. He had threatened to hijack the plane, but he had killed no one. The state executed him and nothing was said. However, if he had killed the girl, had been captured and had sat in jail for months, some in our society would have heaped sympathy upon him. Perhaps 20 per cent of our society would have said, "We cannot bring back the victim; let's be easy on him."

Capital punishment is an admission that the murderer cannot be rehabilitated. This is a statement often used by those who would abolish capital punishment. I do not deny the statement, but I certainly question the ability of doctors to say for certain who will not murder again. There needs to be much more study and research done to learn about the behaviour of man before we can say who has been rehabilitated, who it is safe to return to society.

A few years ago, near where I live a man was released from a mental hospital because they said he was fit to return home. Ten days later he killed eight people. Obviously, he was a very troubled young man. In no way was he fit to return to society, but in the opinion of the doctors he was. This kind of thing happens all the time and it is the reason why Canadians are so concerned and are looking to us to restore order and bring about a society in which their families can feel safe. Mr. Speaker, it is for these reasons that I am prepared to vote against the moratorium.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, with the knowledge that the issue of capital punishment would come before this House I have reviewed the subject extensively, taking advantage of the information provided by various parliamentary sources, reviewing numerous position papers presented by various groups, assessing press coverage and various research agencies and, above all, analysing carefully the attitude of constituents who have expressed varied opinions on the matter.

It has been my impression, and I feel it is important to emphasize this, that in the many discussions I have had with groups of individuals on the merits of capital punishment, the content of the dialogue invariably goes beyond a political discussion and each person decides the issue according to the dictates of his conscience and his judgment. It is a rare individual that will alter his opinion from reading reports, studies or statistical surveys; but it is also a rare individual that will not be aroused emotionally by acts of violence.

I would like to illustrate the latter point by referring to an article in the Chatham Daily News of January 13, 1973, which carried the headline, "Suspect picked up for the killing of Mr. Wilson." The suspect was serving a life sentence handed down in 1966 for non-capital murder of a child. The victim lived but a short distance from my home and I can assure the House that the fear experienced in our area and the criticism directed toward the ineffectiveness of our system of justice was shared by all residents, including myself.

I would like to enlarge on the matter of conscience and judgment which I referred to at the outset. The Concise Oxford Dictionary defines "conscience" as a moral sense of right and wrong, and "judgment" as a critical faculty, discernment or good sense. I wish to re-emphasize the words "conscience" and "judgment", not to suggest that there is a similarity in meaning but, rather, to make it clear that the meaning and intent of the two words is distinctly different and in my opinion must be assessed separately before a rational union of the two can occur. If we are guided by conscience alone, a meaningful solution is not possible because the faculty to analyse all the available data has been ignored. If we are guided by judgment alone, we are then ignoring our moral values which are fundamental to our Christian way of life.

Theologians and philosophers have debated the subject of conscience for centuries. Their arguments for and against capital punishment on philosophical and religious grounds are well documented. There are those who recall Calvin's delcaration that a judge who imposes the supreme punishment is also administering devine vengeance and obeying God's orders. Others recall the words of St. Augustine in the fifth century A.D. following the murder of Christians:

> We do not wish to have the sufferings of the servants of God avenged by the infliction of precisely similar injuries in the way of retaliation. Not, of course, that we object to the removal from these wicked men of the liberty to perpetrate further crimes, but our desire is rather than justice be satisfied without the taking of their lives or the maiming of their bodies in any particular; and that by such coercive measure as may be in accordance with the laws, they be drawn away from the insane frenzy to the quietness of men in their sound judgment, or compelled to give up mischievous violence and to take themselves to some useful labour.

There are those who support their views by the Judaic Christian scriptures. One position is frequently supported by Romans, chapter 13, verse 4:

> For he is minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain; for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil.

The other position is frequently supported by the scriptures, for example, Matthew, chapter 5, from the Sermon on the Mount:

> Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth . . . But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you.

I do not find it difficult to understand this divergence of opinion. I can appreciate the strong convictions of both groups, and I do not challenge the conscience of another individual; but I, too, have a conscience for which I am accountable to a supreme being, a conscience that has been shaped by religious and moral convictions, and in my instance, as a physician dedicated to saving lives, my conscience will not permit me to take a human life.

During my postgraduate days in Washington, D.C., I practised medicine in private and public hospitals, and at the District of Columbia General Hospital I was in close association with the Washington Penal Institution. On my return to Canada I established a medical practice and, in addition, served as a coroner. This varied experience with all elements of society, including numerous medical-legal problems, has taught me the value of human life and the tragedies accompanying death.

As I indicated previously, conscience alone without judgment cannot result in meaningful solutions. Fear exists within our society, an apprehension of excessive permissiveness is voiced by the majority of Canadians, and a genuine belief that law and order has, and is deteriorating is shared by most Canadians. I share these views and would like to take a few moments to dwell on the matter of judgment, as I see it, in relationship to the previous observations.

I do not intend to elaborate on the role of society and our present system of values. I shall not bore you with endless statistics and detailed studies, many of which have been adequately covered by other hon. members. But I would like to mention briefly the matters which I feel are relevant and in keeping with the thinking of most Canadians. I must concur with the comments of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) and his observations with respect to rehabilitation and parole. Although the word "rehabilitation" has been used for years, it has taken on a new meaning and new "implications in the field of psychiatry and sociology, and more particularly as it relates to penal reform.

I do not object to such studies, and indeed such should continue, but I would remind hon. members that there are adequate studies to reveal that at our present stage of development, rehabilitation in many instances is impossible. There are innumerable instances of murders committed by psychopathic personalities or schizophrenics, crimes that have been committed on impulse, without reflection and with no thought of punishment. The offender's total thought is of killing. Such a person is a threat to society and a sentence of life imprisonment should, in these circumstances, mean life in prison. The present policy of life imprisonment permits parole after ten years, and this in my judgment is neither a deterrent nor a substitute for the death penalty.

A view frequently expressed is the inherent risk that an innocent man may be put to death. I can accept this opinion and recognize that it can be substantiated by specific cases. I also recognize the great safeguards through various legal procedures to ensure the protection of the accused. What I cannot understand is the limited safeguards and ineffectiveness in the assessment of a criminal who is paroled. In my judgment, if there is the slightest risk that the criminal continues to harbour an abnormality in his psychodynamic pattern, then the public should have the assurance that such individuals are segregated from society indefinitely.

I must mention in this regard the sentence imposed by an Israeli tribunal upon the surviving Japanese terrorists who aided in the mass slaughter at the Tel Aviv airport. The tribunal maintained that life imprisonment was the worst punishment that could be imposed. Both prosecution and defence lawyers insisted that incarceration for life would be most effective in preventing a repetition of the insanity that took place in the airport customs hall.

I wish to comment briefly on the deterrent effect of the death penalty, which is the major argument presented for its retention. Despite my previous comments I have always held the view that if the death penalty was unequivocally a deterrent, I would be forced to reconsider my entire position. Extensive reviews have covered this aspect in depth and the studies agree that the present statistics provide inconclusive findings and no final consensus exists. I must make mention, however, of the study carried out by Dr. Fattah on the deterrent effect of capital punishment with special reference to the Canadian situation. I shall not bore listeners with his detailed conclusions but simply quote from the introduction of the conclusions:

> We have seen that there has been a slight increase in criminal homicide in Canada over the past eight years. Can this be attributed to the suspension of capital punishment? Now after having examined the different aspects of the problem we are able to answer this question and the answer is no!

To summarize, I feel we should abolish capital punishment; but to obtain effective reform in the Criminal Code and to offer the protection and safety our citizens demand, we must recognize that murderers are rarely amenable to rehabilitation, and major reform in the parole system is essential to ensure that life imprisonment means life imprisonment.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, as I begin these comments on a matter of such great concern for the Canadian public, especially following the diversified advertising campaing to which we have been submitted over the past few months and whose purpose was to bring the government to spend a few days debating the issue of retention or abolition of capital punishment—a debate which must be concluded by a free vote—I should like to bring to your attention the fact that at long last a member of Parliament will have the opportunity to decide freely on a very important issue of general interest. This is the part of the decision making process which is an improvement over the established custom in respect of the procedure within the political parties of our so-called democratic system. If, in the present circumstances, this practice contributes to increase in a practical way the respect for the freedom of opinion within our parliamentary institutions, we should at least have contributed to the establishment of a climate where every one could freely assume his responsibility. In fact, this is what the citizens of this country want, namely that their elected representatives decide according to the general interest of the country rather than that of a party, for the purpose of really improving the situation in all areas.

On a number of occasions, many people who are aware of the Canadian circumstances have urged that a referendum be held to give the Canadian population the opportunity to indicate its feeling on retention or abolition of capital punishment. Unfortunately, those who have been in authority for the past five years have disregarded the request for such a referendum.

In view of the present circumstances, I believe that most of my constituents share my opinion, having received a great many answers to a questionnaire; while a very limited number appear to favour the abolition of capital punishment, the majority have indicated they are in favour of its retention.

Various suggestions have been made to me concerning possible methods of execution; most of my constituents would recommend using the gas chamber, and I share this opinion.

I wish also to point out that I do not understand the reasons behind the attitude of those who claim that capital punishment can be retained for certain classes of people. I see no difference in value between the life of a father or mother, and that of a policeman or a prison guard, a manufacturer, a businessman, a poor man or a rich one. Each and all of them have a right to live.

In many fields, supervision is inadequate. It is as though the publicity media are used to adapt society to an inverted social system, for their harmful mood of irresponsibility encourages excessive laxity in publications such as newspapers and magazines, and in the broadcasting of films in which the criminals often seem like heroes, giving the impressionnable mind the most striking examples of crimes, thefts and other misconduct. After our lack of judgment in harbouring certain undesirable immigrants, we become alarmed at the consequences of our stupidities. Courts of justice sometimes become a theatre for all kinds of provocations.

Right here in the House, we have witnessed the uncovering of scandals that were hardly calculated to inculcate in citizens a respect for the established authority. Can we say now that we have used every possible means to make life pleasant for all citizens of Canada, a young country on which Providence has bestowed unlimited riches? This is the task that members of Parliament should pursue with determination, instead of talking about the abolition or retention of the death penalty. It would be much wiser, at this time, to bring about renewed hope for a better life among Canadians, by means of less materialistic and more humane legislation.

If we had a system that allowed each and every citizen to find work, or at least, a sound occupation that would be suitable to them and means of living honestly, I have good reasons to believe that the number of criminals would be reduced.

In the light of the present situation, we should try to find a middle way between excessive severity and exaggerated clemency. I feel we should try everything to rehabilitate an individual who took the wrong direction. But keeping in mind the present situation, we must necessarily adopt a position which will help reduce the number of murders. We have had the opportunity to read newspaper articles written by authorities on this issue, who recommended that capital punishment be maintained for a certain percentage of criminals. I am therefore reluctant to give a green light to the hangman.

In my opinion, capital punishment must be maintained, and that for several reasons. First of all, we must at all costs protect honest people against gangsters, offenders, thieves and mostly against murderers. It is imperative that we take right now the appropriate measures under the present circumstances. It would involve the establishment of a national indemnity fund to help dependents of murderers' victims.

I find it difficult to understand why criminals deserve so much protection against the death penalty, because nobody compels them to commit such a crime. When dealing with criminals for whom all possible means of rehabilitation have been used, with those who leave jail only to commit again the most hideous crimes, with those who have vowed to make a career for themselves in holdups and looting, society has the duty to protect itself as best it can. Indulgence would then become connivance. I feel very sorry for prisoners but I do not forget the harm they are causing by their offences. May I add that, in having recourse to drastic measures, society does not take vengeance but protects itself.

[English]

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, in participating this afternoon in this debate I am reminded of the situation that existed here in 1966 and 1967 when protracted debates took place on this subject. Many of us felt that the debate in March and April, 1966, settled the question of abolition or retention of the death penalty. The House of Commons had fully debated this subject and decided to retain the death penalty for capital murder. However, 18 months later the government introduced another bill that would in effect have abolished capital punishment for all murder except in the case of policemen and prison guards.

As I think back to that second debate in 1967, I remember that many members who rose to address themselves to the question wondered why the government had reintroduced the same question to the same parliament within a matter of months. At that time my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), asked the government about its priority list. I wish to quote from Hansard of November 9, 1967, at page 4084 where the hon. member for Calgary North asked:

> Where is the program that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) speaks of with great pride while government ministers go on spending to combat the obvious and admitted financial debacle that is facing the nation? Where is their program for dealing with high interest rates? Where is their program to arrest the high cost of living? Where is their program to eliminate high government spending, high unemployment, and lay-offs?

I suggest we could ask the same questions today and they are just as appropriate as they were back in the days of 1967. It is obvious that the five and a half years of Liberal government since that time has not changed the situation; in fact, these problems have become more serious during that five and a half year period. I wonder now, as my colleagues did in 1967, why the urgency to hold this debate at this time? The decision that is registered will not affect the actions of the government in dealing with murderers.

A number of hon. members in 1967 saw, as well, there was an obvious economic diversion here. They were perceptive enough to see that the bill introduced in 1967 by the then solicitor general was a government ploy, first of all, as I have stated, to divert public attention from economic problems, and second, through the inclusion of the clause on capital punishment for the murder of police officers and prison guards, to influence members into thinking that they were not voting for abolition, and thus get the bill passed by parliament.

So I suggest it was clear then—and history has proven us correct—that the government had no intention whatsoever of carrying out the wishes of parliament. The government disregarded the will of parliament in 1966 by introducing the new bill on capital punishment in 1967. It has disregarded the will of parliament since that time by commuting death sentences passed on those convicted of capital murder. In my view, the government has acted in a lawless manner in not upholding the law, and as well has attempted and is now attempting to deceive parliament and the people of Canada. As in 1967 it had no intention, in 1973 it has no intention of obeying the will of parliament if this measure is passed at this time.

I believe this situation has led to a general and widespread deterioration in our total system of justice. The abolitionists state that murder statistics are meaningless because all crime is on the increase, and that if there are more murders it is only because there is more crime. I submit there is more crime in part because of the bad example set in this connection by the government.

If, as the abolitionists state—and I attribute to them honesty of purpose, intention and thought—the murder statistics are not really that bad when compared with the over-all crime rate, it may well be that the publicity campaign of "don't resist a criminal" has been heeded and that, in the words of the Canadian Association of Police Chiefs, "there are less dead heroes today than there were yesterday". I would, if I were permitted, call attention to a number of illustrations that point out the seeming failure of the government to recognize its responsibility in properly handling this question of administration of justice, but I think enough of them have been brought to our attention in previous debates to make this unnecessary.

Our friends who believe and are promoting the view that capital punishment should be abolished speak in idealistic terms of removing the convicted killer from society. They speak of protecting the public through the imposition of life sentences for capital murder and extended sentences for other classes of murder. I believe two hon. members of the House intend to propose amendments to this bill that will effectively remove murderers from society for 25 years. However, I am sure all hon. members of the House would agree that not all murderers deserve a sentence of 25 years. There is a difference between the cold-blooded, hired killer and those who perhaps under stress, strain and in extenuating circumstances commit murder.

Secondly, I would ask what assurance we would have that the government would carry out a mandatory sentence. The government has refused to fulfil the will of parliament in allowing the penalty for the murder of policemen and prison guards to be carried out, so what guarantee have we that they would ensure that killers in this particular category would remain in prison for 25 years? If we could be guaranteed in some way that a convicted murderer would be isolated from society for the rest of his natural life in the case of premeditated murder, or until rehabilitation could take place in other cases, I am sure many Canadians would re-evaluate their position on this particular matter.

Again, there are those who would transfer the burden of responsibility from the shoulders of the murderer to society as a whole. I think I dealt with this matter in a debate a few days ago when I said that I and a great many Canadians objected to being blamed for the fact that people were put in jail. I cannot agree with this transfer of responsibility. The question is: Should there be any rules set in society? I believe that all or most hon. members agree that there should be. If we are going to have rules, let us obey them. Personally, I am in favour of the rules applying to everyone. Although various arguments have been advanced in support of the retention of capital punishment, my main contention in this respect is that punishment in general is a technique for preventing breaches of rules, and like any technique it must be judged by its results.

Our society has set up a system of rules, one of which is that one person shall not willfully and intentionally take the life of another person. This system of rules or laws, like any other system of rules, once adopted implies there is a case for implementation in particular instances, so that in any normal case it is sufficient to point to a breach of a rule of the appropriate type to justify a penalty.

As well, when we allocate punishment to a class of offences we are, in a sense, deciding how much crime of that type we are ready to tolerate in preference to the alternative of a stricter penalty. If the penalty for taking the life of an individual is not severe, then we as a society are admitting that we are willing to tolerate more crime of that type. If, on the other hand, the penalty for taking a life is severe, then we are admitting that we are willing to tolerate less of that type of crime. If the penalty is not used, then the whole system breaks down. We set up rules and then let them be diluted, we insist on people being free and responsible, and then we make excuses for them so they do not have to take responsibility for themselves. Punishment, then is not the sole technique for ensuring that laws are kept. There are more responsible people who obey laws because they respect them than there are people who obey them because they fear the consequences of breaking them.

The government complains that there has not been sufficient time for an intensive study into the problem of capital punishment to warrant a decision one way or the other, be it abolition or retention. That is no reason for complaint. For 11 years we have had in Canada de facto abolition; every death sentence passed during that period of time has been commuted. In the last five years the number of death sentences has been lowered because of the provision in the bill passed in 1967. The majority of those convicted of premeditated murder were sentenced by the courts to life imprisonment; the rest of the sentences were automatically commuted to life imprisonment by the cabinet. The lack of action by the government in not undertaking a serious study in the last five years particularly indicates to me that the government really has no intention of carrying out the provisions of this bill, if it is passed by parliament, and that it will continue its policy of commutation, hence de facto abolition.

● (1650)

The question of the double standard for murder, death for the killers of policemen and prison guards and not death for murderers of others, has been dealt with adequately and effectively by other speakers during this debate. I would simply reiterate that I do not believe the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) seriously believes in this double standard. I have the utmost respect for the Solicitor General; I think he is sincere in his belief in abolition of the death penalty, as I think all hon. members are who espouse that view, and for this reason I cannot understand why he would introduce a bill that would perpetuate this double standard.

This bill only confuses the question of capital punishment. If the government had the courage and the fortitude to face Canadians with a clearcut alternative, to retain capital punishment or abolish it, we would be in a much better position to decide on this question. However, I am afraid that if this bill is passed the situation we have had in the past five years will be perpetuated in that the cabinet will continue its practice of automatically commuting the death penalty.

My desire is that the government should invoke the law and the will of parliament, whatever that may be. If hon. members, in their wisdom, decide that the bill should pass, my desire is that the will of parliament be upheld and that murderers of policemen and prison guards be executed. If hon. members, in their judgment, pass an amendment that for instance would require a mandatory sentence of 25 years imprisonment for premeditated murder, then my desire is that the government obey the law and have the murderer serve the 25 years. If we decide not to pass the bill and decide that we should retain the death penalty for premeditated murder, I believe the government should obey the law as parliament has enacted it. In conclusion, then, I would say that it is the responsibility of members to decide what the law should be, but it is the responsibility of the government to carry out the law and to see that it is enforced. The people of Canada have the right to expect that much. We all expect the citizens of this country to obey the laws we enact, but what example do they have when even the government does not uphold the law? Finally, I would urge the government to respect and abide by the decision of parliament whatever that decision might be.

Mr. Joe Hueglin (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, it is often the ploy of abolitionists to raise the spectre of the horrors of hanging; of an innocent man being sent to his death and of the state being more deliberate, and thus more callous, with human life than the individual convicted. Retentionists do not insist on hanging, but on death; execution only for those clearly and unequivocally guilty on the basis of hard, and not circumstantial evidence, and then only for those who have premeditated a murder. These are my views and the views of the vast majority of the citizens of Niagara riding who returned a questionnaire sent to them in February of this year.

This questionnaire did not seek simply a yes or no answer to this question. Rather, it asked the citizens to select one of five options and to state their reasons for holding the positions they hold. The choices were: retention for all who premeditated and executed a murder, retention for all who murdered police officers, abolition totally with a minimum of ten years sentence to be served, a minimum of 25 years to be served and, finally, total abolition but with the sentence to be incarceration for the rest of the murderer's natural life. More than 5,500 questionnaires were returned. On the vast majority the names of the respondents were written, and in most cases two names were to be found; on many three, four and even five opinions were noted. It was a great outpouring of opinion that any professional pollster would find astounding and beyond his experience of percentage of return.

Both during the election campaign and after, many of my fellow Niagarans asked me what my views were on this issue. That the question was posed so many times illustrates clearly the interest my people have in this matter. Each person was given the same answer, that in my opinion anyone who uses his reason to plan and carry out an act which costs another human being his life has, by that act, forfeited his own life. I submit that it is reason which has developed society from chaos, and that the misuse of reason in planning the death of another places an individual in the position that he must be permanently removed from society. Both during and after the election this view was accepted by the vast majority of those who asked the question.

When this bill we are debating was introduced, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) quoted figures from a survey he said his department had undertaken. In order to determine whether the citizens of Niagara riding would affirm my position or whether they would support that of the Solicitor General and the government, the questionnaire was distributed. Overwhelmingly, those who replied rejected the present bill and seriously brought into question the validity of the Solicitor General's survey, a survey upon which he bases the desirability of the present bill being enacted into law. In his survey 20.9 per cent favoured complete abolition. In Niagara riding only 16.1 per cent were disposed toward complete abolition, and of these 8.9 per cent only on the basis of natural life being the penalty, something this bill in no way guarantees. In his poll, only 19.1 per cent favoured retention in all cases of premeditated murder, and 59 per cent in limited cases.

How different this is from the 80 per cent of Niagarans who chose retention for all premeditated murders, whereas only 1.3 per cent opted for selected instances such as the murder of police and prison guards. Clearly, the Solicitor General's survey was not conducted among a constituency representative of all Canadians. Rather, it presumably was held within a selected group. I say this for two reasons, firstly because the results of the poll in Niagara riding have been supported in ridings from one end of the country to the other, overwhelming public support for retention, and secondly because it follows the precedents set by other government soundings of opinion, be it the LeDain commission, the Committee on Youth, or what have you; the precedent of blithely ignoring the opinions of the silent majority and of mouthing the beliefs of the permissive, vocal minority that ignores responsibility to society and seeks personal freedom of action.

The abolitionists make light of the outpourings of public sentiment contained in the various polls we have conducted. Remember it was the Solicitor General who in opening this debate introduced his survey to enable him to justify this bill which, as it is written, can satisfy neither an honest abolitionist nor an honest retentionist. At page 689 of Hansard the Solicitor General is reported as having stated, using his poll as his basis of assessment:

> —it would appear that to move to either extreme; to move either toward total abolition or toward total retention at this time is neither possible nor desirable under prevailing circumstances.

It was he who introduced a survey to justify this bill. It must now be he who, if he wishes to remain credible, must recognize that "prevailing circumstances" are not as he perceived them through his limited survey but, rather, that there is a clear consensus among Canadians or, if you will, an absolute majority of somewhere between 70 per cent and 80 per cent that all convicted premeditated murderers should be the subject of sentence of death.

The minister stated that no alternative to this bill was possible and that it would not be prudent to go in either direction. There is an alternative clearly acceptable to the vast majority of ordinary Canadians but this abolitionist government cannot agree to it, just as it could not agree to honour the law of the last five years as it was written. The Solicitor General quite rightly states it would not be prudent to seek total abolition. Why should the government be imprudent by giving us a clear choice when it can have abolition in fact through the passage of this bill, even though it does not grant abolition in law? We all know that commutation for the murderers of police officers will follow their conviction surer than night follows day. This is the way honest, law-abiding Canadians perceive this bill and that is the reason it is so widely opposed.

Let us state it clearly: Canadians want retention; this government does not. It is using its survey as an argument for denying us a clear choice which it knows would be against its wishes, and offers us instead this compromise which has in the last five years, and will in the next five if this bill passes into law, enable it to achieve by executive decree what it could not obtain by legislative act—complete abolition of death as a punishment for the murder of anyone, by any means.

I find it ironic that this cabinet, by championing permissiveness in other areas, has been in large measure the author of the great popular resistance it is encountering in implementing this de facto abolition which it now seeks. It is interesting to look at the Gallup polls over the years. In 1953, 71 per cent were in favour of retention; in 1966, the number dropped to 53 per cent; in 1972, it rose again to 63 per cent; in 1966 to 1972, the years of the present government's administration, the number has risen and I would suggest that it has further risen since this poll was taken in February of 1972.

That this has been recognized by the cabinet and even by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can be proven by his speech of May 16 in which he cast himself in the role of the protector of society. It can be proven by his speech in which he stated that adjustments may be needed in certain areas and in which he begged people to differentiate between the present debate and the problem of the general direction of our society in matters of peace and order.

May I suggest that although the media may have considered this speech as proof that his countervailing theories are again coming to the fore, or as another act of contrition and renewal or as a brilliant recognition of reality sincerely delivered, in fact it was none of these. Actually, it was a thoroughly political move designed to shore up utterly bankrupt prison policies. The Prime Minister stated that he would save us from the perils that many of us feel, that others of us have suffered from directly, some to the point of their own death, and which arise directly or indirectly out of the innovations of this government over the last five years.

[Mr. Hueglin.]

The Prime Minister spoke of protection from fear and uncertainty and he told us how he would provide protection. It was a speech that a pied piper of old could have given, a pied piper who, having deliberately introduced rats into a town, when faced with the cries of concerned citizens states, "Yes, there are rats and I will take care of them for you. Follow my tune and all will be well".

Many of my more learned colleagues will debate this bill on the basis of abstract theory—deterrence versus no deterrent effect, and moral right versus moral wrong. While some of the people in my riding argue this way, and as stated previously they believe overwhelmingly that retention is a deterrent as well as a moral imperative, most are concerned not with the abstractions of theory but with the practical reality of living. Their reasons for supporting retention are based upon their very real sense of insecurity.

The Prime Minister recognized some of the reasons for their concern when he stated that these factors should not be considered in dealing with this bill. But they are considerations of very real importance to most of the people in our society. Let the Prime Minister ignore these honest concerns, if he will, as he ignored them prior to October 30, but let his followers take note of the fact that the law of retaliation still exists and that artificial distinctions are not acceptable to a populace that considers itself at the mercy of the criminal element in our society.

It is my intention to put on the record the thoughts that have led the good people of Niagara riding to support retention. The ease with which criminals are able to return to society, the adoption of permissive attitudes on the part of this government, the fact that no death sentence has been imposed, together with the widespread statements regarding the cost of maintaining prisoners in the increasingly better-appointed penal institutions, have all led to increased support for the retention of the death penalty. Argue as you will, security of life and property is the greatest concern of all those who do not have it. Intellectuals and the wealthy, both of whom are insulated from the reality of life, can argue theory but the rest of us find real only that which is tangible.

In Niagara Falls we have experienced a particularly vicious and undoubtedly premeditated murder. A man and his mistress drowned his pregnant wife in her bath. By this act two lives, not one, were taken—one life that had quickened and another which some at least consider no less real, but as yet unborn. The man received a life sentence and the woman seven years for this heinous act. Within three years Louis Vigna may be given a weekend pass. Within ten years he may be released, and he surely will be for he is no doubt a model prisoner. In fact, he wrote me a letter congratulating me on my victory, wishing me a good Christmas season, and casually mentioning his parole. My people see no justice in this, and I find it strange to receive a letter from a man I would condemn, but so widespread is the belief that this government will countenance anyone obtaining an early return to society that it is the common belief in Niagara Falls that this man has already been released a number of times.

The cabinet must bear the responsibility for the abhorrence felt by the public at large and for their demand that such creatures who are able to return so easily to society must be destroyed. Not only abuse of early parole and weekend passes is responsible for this insecurity, but also the manner in which the so-called bail reform act has been implemented. Time and time again, when men are apprehended in the commission of a crime, with no thought as to their past record, they are returned immediately to society under this bail reform act. When they go beyond their normal occupations of drug pushers and thieves and become murderers as well, does the government accept blame for the fact that they are at large? Not likely!

Not only will the government not accept any blame, but the police are accused by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) of attempting to subvert the act by returning these men to society. Not content with this, this same minister who is responsible for justice tells judges who criticize his policies that they are to remain silent, that they are not to comment on this government's policies. Surely it is irresponsible for a minister, when faced with the patent failure of a law to protect the public—however much it may be protecting the criminal—to further increase the insecurity of an already jittery public by attacking the very men upon whom our security rests on a day to day basis.

In this I do not exaggerate. Some of my people are concerned about the fact that under prevailing conditions it may no longer be possible to attract good men into our police force. It is clear that the present government has acted in such a manner that the police are seriously inhibited in the performance of their functions, and that this has engendered such insecurity that retentionist sentiment has grown.

The easy return of criminals into society is the greatest cause of insecurity, but the general tone of permissiveness that this government has engendered has played its part as well. Parents are concerned about the world into which their children are growing. The people of Niagara riding are concerned about drug abuse because they see its effects upon many of our young people. But the LeDain commission and the Committee on Youth are all for legalization. The Prime Minister stated "there is little difference between marijuana and alcohol use," and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) said that Rochdale is "an experiment worth continuing." The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) downgrades the drug problem by making alcohol the prime concern. These acts by the government have not gone unnoticed. In fact, they have led to many suggestions that drug pushers should be executed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) wishes to rise on a question of privilege?

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the hon. member would want to mislead the House, but neither the LeDain commission, the government, the Minister of Justice nor the Minister of National Health and Welfare have ever suggested that marijuana should be legalized. I suggest that the hon. member read the report of the LeDain commission. It did not make that recommendation, nor did any members of the government.

M. Hueglin: I did not mislead the House. I did not say that they said it should be legalized—the LeDain commission said that.

Mr. Allmand: It did not. It suggested that the penalties should be changed.

Mr. Hueglin: What is the difference?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Unless these kinds of interventions are made so as to correct a misunderstanding, they are not in order.

Mr. Hueglin: I take the matter under advisement, Mr. Speaker. If the minister wishes to make a distinction between removing the penalties and making marijuana legal, then I am prepared to accept the criticism. It makes no difference in the minds of the people.

● (1710)

"Doing your own thing" until the October 30 election was the theme of the government, and while it has not been so pronounced during this Parliament, the damage of four years has taken its toll. Average law-abiding citizens are concerned about the direction of the society in which they and their children are living. But what assurance did they get from the government, even as late as the Speech from the Throne? They got the reassurance that rehabilitation of the criminal element came first and that protection of society came second. First comes the individual, even though he has already outlawed himself, and only then comes society. Most Canadians are tired of being used as guinea pigs for fancy theories.

It is strange that even the argument used to justify the release of prisoners has come back to haunt the government: Save money by releasing prisoners. Save thousands of dollars per head. Well, this argument is now advanced by many who have been influenced by such propaganda, but in this form—if it costs so much to incarcerate a murderer, let him hang. Ironic, isn't it, how governments' arguments are of times used against them? Try as he will, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister cannot make this question academic. He cannot do so because our citizens are concerned about the safety of their families and they perceive the law relating to premeditated murder as the keystone in the arch of justice, a keystone that if removed will cause the whole arch to tumble and leave them defenceless at the hands of criminals. In the words of Bernard Cohen, published in Chitty's Law Journal of March, 1972:

> Nowadays, by common consent, murder is considered as no more than the principle highlight in a broad spectrum of impermissible acts. Since the intention is that everyone be penalized in proportion to the gravity of his offence, scarcely any sociological commitment is required on the part of anyone, to discover that the scaling down of the traditional penalty for murder, in all logic, ought to be attended also by some adjustment of penalties for secondary crimes such as manslaughter, rape, theft, and so forth; and this adjustment has indeed taken place. The cancellation of the death penalty for murder can be said to have marked the beginning of, and set the stage for, our present era of laissez faire towards all crimes and criminals.

Peace, order and good government are the primary responsibilities of the federal government of Canada under the written section of our constitution. That the peace and order of this country are threatened is clear in the minds of most citizens. That the government's policies, as described above, have contributed to this insecurity cannot be honestly denied.

This present bill is an intellectual compromise, arrived at to bring in abolition in fact when it could not be brought in by law due to the oft expressed opinion of the vast majority of our fellow citizens. Both as an individual member acting on my own conscience and as the representative of the people of Niagara riding, I shall vote against this bill in favour of the maintenance of peace and order in our society.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, one might deem this to be an historic debate: we debated this subject in 1967 and we are debating it again in 1973. But before I begin to talk about the theme of the debate, which rests mainly on law and order, I would like to make reference to a recent murder committed extraterritorially of this country. I refer to the recent foul and deliberate murder of two young Canadian girls by Zambian troops along the Zambezi River. I call on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government to demand a national apology to and restitution for the bereaved families of these girls from the Zambian government. Mr. Speaker, I took the liberty to make these remarks knowing that you, too, would be sympathetic.

Secondly, while still talking about law and order, which are the basic requisites of any civilized society, I take more pleasure in my next remark. On this occasion I wish to pay tribute to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as they and this nation mark the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of this typically Canadian body of men. One can truly say that Canada would not exist as it does today were it not for the services rendered in the past by this respected institution. Law and order and the protection of persons and property have been their duty and watchword. As just one of 22 million Canadians, I thank and congratulate the RCMP as they mark their centennial.

I am very pleased to be able to participate in this debate on Bill C-2, a bill that seeks to extend the temporary ban on capital punishment. In one way, Sir, it is unfortunate the recent rash of prison breaks and the concurrent rash of murders of police officials have been occurring at a time when Members of Parliament are attempting to deal objectively with one of the most pressing problems of our time. On the other hand, it has become very clear in recent months that we cannot deal with this problem on an emotional basis. We must be prepared to be as objective as is humanly possible when we decide what we, as parliamentarians, must do in order to ensure that innocent people are not made to suffer because we are too squeamish and indecisive.

We hear over and over again that it is wrong to take a human life even in the name of justice. We are told that legal execution should not be reinstated as an instrument of the state and that there is no evidence that the death penalty is a deterrent against murder or other violent crimes. Mr. Speaker, you and most members of the House know where I stand regarding capital punishment. I say again that I am in favour of the retention of capital punishment, first because of my basic belief—and it is very basic and fundamental—that all civilized nations which use what is called the democratic system should never relinquish the right to demand the life of any one of their citizens for certain capital crimes.

Arguments such as those that I have mentioned are specious. In the first place, there is no way that anyone can assess the effectiveness of a law unless that law is applied in the manner called for by its wording. The present government has not applied the law, approved by parliament, that we are debating today. The law as it exists today calls for the death penalty for convicted murderers of police officers and prison officials. This was supposed to extend for five years, during which time we would be amassing some good, solid evidence as to how this law would work if it were made permanent. At the end of the five-year test ban, parliament was committed to decide whether or not the death penalty would be permanently banned or whether it would be reinstated. We are not debating that issue, Mr. Speaker; we are debating whether or not to extend the test ban for another five years. In other words, we are being asked to allow the government to pass the buck to some other parliament five years from now.

This is the same government that was in power when the present law was approved by parliament. It knows very well what the intention of parliament was at that time. It is not surprising that the government wants to put off a decision as long as possible. I do not think that it has anything to do with the question of whether or not it is inhumane to carry out legal executions. The plain fact is that the present government cannot bring itself to make a firm decision on a matter as controversial as capital punishment. Over the past five years the government has commuted every single death penalty imposed by our courts on murderers of policemen and prison officials. Being realistic, I say that is not a good record because they have in this manner flaunted the orders put forward. This was a clear abdication of responsibility, and in a sense was tantamount to flouting the law.

● (1720)

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the government has tried to follow two courses. I have here an article which appeared in the Kingston Whig Standard on Thursday, May 17. The front-page headline reads, "Trudeau backs legislation to retain death penalty". How devious can a headline be? It reflects either very poor proof-readers or a deliberate attempt to fool the readers of this newspaper. It is a perfectly good Canadian press article, but the headline is most devious. Referring to the Prime Minister the article says:

> And he assured parliament that commutation of the death sentence for such murders will not be automatic if the bill is approved.

In the very first paragraph, correctly reporting the Prime Minister's speech the writer says:

> He reaffirmed his position against the death penalty and he defended the government's actions in the past in commuting death sentences.

How equivocal can the Prime Minister be in his efforts to bolster his faded image regarding protection of persons and property in this country and the carrying out of the laws which this parliament has legislated? It cannot be said by anyone that there were extenuating circumstances in each and every one of those commutations. Some of them were calculated, cold-blooded murders of policemen who happened to be in range of the murderer's gun; some were so completely senseless and brutal that I cannot see how any responsible minister of the government could vote to spare the life of the murderer. In commuting all these sentences the government served notice to all those who might be inclined to murder a policeman in order to avoid capture that the most they could expect by way of punishment would be a short prison sentence.

We know that our former colleague in the last parliament—I forget the name of his riding—Mr. Cowan, did a lot of homework during a former debate and found out that on average the death sentence meant a little more than eight or nine years. All recent death sentences have been commuted to life imprisonment, as we know. What is a life sentence? It is perhaps eight or ten years unless the prisoner gets tired of prison life and decides to climb the fence.

There is another aspect of the commutation of the death sentence that makes a mockery of the situation; that is the fact that the last five years have been a waste of time with respect to being a test of this legislation. When the government persisted in commuting all the death sentences imposed by the courts, it destroyed the validity of the data collected on this problem and it destroyed its own credibility, in the judgment of the Canadian people.

There is no way that anyone could talk knowledgeably about the deterrent effect of a law that has never been applied, Mr. Speaker. I cannot accept arguments that are based on the findings of the last five years in the operation of this temporary test ban. The temporary ban on capital punishment has been treated by the present government as a moratorium on capital punishment across the board, so the data that has been collected is useless to us. That is one reason why I am not quoting statistics in my speech. I have heard them quoted, and I give fellow members credit for digging them up, but I say they are no use to us because of the posture of the government during the past five years.

I do not want to pass the buck to some other parliament, and neither do other hon. members, for a number of reasons. The incidence of violent crime, against police officers in particular, the breakdown in the parole system, the increase in the number of prison breaks and the general deterioration in all aspects of law enforcement demand that we as parliamentarians take a firm and positive hand in these matters because the Canadian people are filled with revulsion at the way things are going now.

There are scores of specific cases that I could relate with respect to the seriousness of the situation, but these are well known to all of us. I will refer to one case; it concerns an inmate of Collins Bay medium security prison. That is the riding of Kingston and the Islands, but it is my neighbourhood. This man, Laslo Eper, was convicted of attempted murder of a policeman and was serving two life sentences. As I was preparing my remarks last night, Eper was still at large. A few days ago he stole an automobile from a prison employee at gun point. His warning to his victim should go into the record: he said, "If you warn them in any way, I'll kill you and the cops as well. It'll be a bloody day today."

Mr. Speaker, this is a perfect example of how a criminal looks upon a law that he knows will not be carried out. Eper knows that if he kills anyone, even a policeman, he will have another life term tacked on to the two terms he is already serving, which does not mean very much to him.

This situation has been reflected in other parts of the world and other parts of this continent. I should like to quote an excerpt from the "Canadian Intelligence Service" of April, 1973. This is the truth, too. It does not necessarily reflect upon the Liberal party, but it reflects upon the type of liberalism that is rampant in the world today. I refer to it because I think the House would be interested to hear what it is all about. The article entitled "Incentive to murder" reads:

> Does the death penalty provide a deterrent to murder? Learned authorities argue about this and often quote statistics which they allege support their conclusions. I suspect that most participants in the debate select the statistics they use to confirm conclusions they have reached by other means. However, when all the "experts" have given their arguments, most sensible people remain convinced that fear of the penalty of death will deter some people who may be considering committing homicide. Most of us know that the possibility of the death penalty would deter us if we were tempted to such a horrendous act.
> While there is debate concerning the role of the death penalty as a deterrent, there can be no doubt that the abolition of the death penalty has created an incentive to kill. Most people who indulge in criminal activities wish to escape detection and punishment. Consider a criminal engaged in a major crime such as kidnapping or armed robbery. He is anxious to escape capture and punishment. If he is caught and convicted, the penalty is substantially the same whether he has killed or not. His security is enhanced if no witnesses survive who can identify him for the police and give evidence against him in court. The temptation to kill potential witnesses must be strong in such circumstances. The criminal has much to gain and nothing to lose by murder.
> The abolition of the death penalty has placed the lives of many innocent people in jeopardy. It illustrates the paradox that characterizes this epoch: Intense concern for the rights and well-being of the criminal; little concern for the rights and well-being of the victim.

Is that not true, Mr. Speaker? I now come to the part of the article which impressed me most:

● (1730)

> A shock of horror swept this nation when in Khartoum, the capital city of the Sudan, the Black September group of Palestinian guerrillas cold-bloodedly and brutally murdered the U.S. Ambassador to the Sudan, Cleo A. Noel, Jr., and the Chargé d'Affaires, George C. Moore. Those who have succeeded in abolishing the death penalty in the U.S., share some of the responsibility for these deaths.
>
> The guerrillas claim they killed because their demands were rejected. One of these demands was that Sirhan Sirhan, Arab assassin of Senator Kennedy, be freed. This demand was possible because Sirhan Sirhan is alive. After the death of Senator Kennedy, he was arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to death. This sentence was commuted to life imprisonment when the death penalty was abolished.

That is, it was abolished in the United States. I continue:

> His presence in prison provided an incentive for the crime.

I think the hon. member who spoke a few minutes ago will agree that Sirhan Sirhan should not be alive. However, as his sentence of death was never carried out, he stayed alive and this provided the incentive to the Black

September gang for its actions, which led to two more murders. I will finish quoting from the article:

> Most violent criminals have colleagues and friends who are also violent. Doubtless many ruthless men are presently considering their choice of victims to kidnap in order to force the release of some imprisoned murderer. One successful venture would trigger an epidemic.
>
> Many thinking people throughout the world must have been startled when the U.S. Secretary of State, William P. Rogers, urged the Sudanese authorities to execute the murderers of Cleo A. Noel and George C. Moore. They knew that the American authorities could not have executed the assassins if the crime had been committed on American soil. To them this must have seemed imperialist hypocrisy, flavored with colonialism and racism—one law for the rich, the U.S.A.—another for the poor, the Sudan.
> Whatever their motives, those who have succeeded in abolishing the death penalty in this country—

That remarks applies to this country also.

> —have merely substituted the deaths of the innocent for the guilty.

I think that article is worthy of being included in the record and that is why I read it, Mr. Speaker. We can take this as the basis of a hypothetical case, and make a projection as to how an extension of the temporary ban would work in the future. We can suppose that a man such as Eper, to whom I referred, might kill a prison guard or two in making an escape and then shoot it out with the police to avoid being apprehended and returned to prison. He might kill one or more policemen, and in the end he might be given three or four or even five life sentences to serve. After a while it becomes ludicrous. Instead of dealing with crime, this bill will simply make a mockery of the law. And, Mr. Speaker, I cannot, nor can some other hon. members, be a party to anything that makes a mockery of the law. We already have a situation in which the only people who have any respect for the law or fear of retribution are those who obey the law.

It might be said by the total abolitionists that I have do not have any feeling for the sanctity of life. But nothing could be further from the truth. I have a deep-seated revulsion for violence and no one could have any more feeling for the finality of death than I have. However, unlike the abolitionists, perhaps, I reserve my deepest sympathy for the victims of violent criminals. My sympathies go first to those innocent, law-abiding Canadians who might be unfortunate enough to be in a bank when it is being robbed. My sympathies are for the policemen who are shot down in the course of their duties while protecting our lives and property from violent criminals. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I have been concerned since the convict Eper escaped that he might kill someone as he tries to get automobiles and money, or that he might kill one or more policemen if he is cornered.

In my view, it is strange logic when someone casually accepts the deaths of criminals in a gun battle with police officers at the scene of a crime. Hardly anyone mourns their passing. But if there happens to be a survivor and he is convicted and sentenced to death, there is a hue and cry about the sanctity of his life. He cannot be put to death by the state because, it is said, legal executions are barbaric. Some people even excuse this attitude by saying that anyone who choses the police as a career knows in advance that he might at some time be required to put his life on the line. They say it is one of the hazards of his profession. I cannot excuse killers of policemen as lightly as that, Mr. Speaker, and I doubt if many people can accept this if they look deeply enough into their conscience.

I would not attempt to influence any of my colleagues in the way they will vote on this bill. It is much too serious a matter and can only be decided on the most personal basis. It is a question that defies an answer that would deal with criminals as harshly as they deal with their victims, but at the same time satisfy those who place the sanctity of the lives of murderers above the barbarity of the criminals' acts. However, although I would not attempt to influence them directly, I think it would be in order to suggest that every member of this House should think seriously about the way our statements and actions in this House will be viewed by the lawless elements in our society. I am sure that they are going to be heartened by comments to the effect that the sanctity of a murderer's life overrides the barbarity of a brutal, premeditated murder of an innocent victim.

There are hardened, vicious inmates in our prisons who would like very much to get out. Some of them will take the calculated risk involved in resorting to violence in order to gain their freedom. If they believe that the worst they can get is a prison sentence, then what have they to lose? The plain fact is that over the past year the violent criminal has been getting more attention and more consideration from the present government than has been given to his victims. Unless this attitude changes abruptly I am afraid the efforts of our police, our courts and our prison system in dealing with crime will be thwarted.

Sir, we have an opportunity right now, while we are debating whether or not we will pass the buck to another parliament, to take positive steps to deal with one of the most pressing issues of our time and of our civilization. We can decide now that we will not put off this opportunity to wage war on crime and on those who make crime their profession.

There can be no doubt in anyone's mind that the government's handling of the test ban on capital punishment has created confusion in the minds of criminals and law-abiding citizens alike over the past five years. For one thing, we appear to take the same attitude toward the person who kills without intent or plan, and the criminal who kills in the course of following the profession of crime. When the government commutes the sentences of those specifically mentioned in a piece of legislation and accords them the same treatment as those who might be guilty of manslaughter, there is no way we can convince law-abiding citizens that their well-being is uppermost in our minds.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must say to this House that I cannot in all conscience accept the premise of this bill. It is not designed to correct the present tendency toward violence in our society. It will not further the ends of justice and certainly will not serve to deter anyone who decides on a life of crime. It will not deter people from taking the lives of policemen or prison guards, and it will not give anyone the impression that we in parliament are interested in erecting safeguards for the innocent victims of crime. In fact, Mr. Speaker, short of giving comfort to criminals and potential criminals, passage and implementation of this bill will accomplish exactly nothing. I cannot, and will not support it and will register my vote against it.

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill I think it is important for me to clear up a couple of matters. First, it is important to decide what this bill is not about. This bill is not about the present parole laws or their application in this country. This bill is not about the present bail laws or their application in this country. These are matters for the administration of justice. I know that this House is certainly taken up with concern over these matters and, along with many hon. members, I hope there will be a thoroughgoing debate and considerable deliberation in relation to them.

What we are talking about is a bill which has to do with the ultimate punishment, death, for certain crimes. I know that many members of this House, as well as members of the public, feel that the exercise we are going through is in a sense futile. Certainly it is a very slow and deliberate one. Even though it is a slow and deliberate exercise and some observers outside the House, as well as in, may feel that this parliament is not progressing all that much in the sense that not very many people are changing their minds, I rise to speak not in the hope that I will be able to change many minds but with the knowledge that men's minds have been changed over the years.

In the middle of the nineteenth century, in the city of Montreal a boy of 14 was hanged for stealing a cow. It is even more ironic to consider that his name was Clement. Certainly, none of us in this House today would consider restoring that kind of law which could apply that kind of severity to such a young person committing so paltry a crime. Over the years, slowly and imperceptibly, our minds are changed. We have arrived at a different conception of ourselves as human beings. We have different views with regard to our attitudes and how our attitudes affect our actions.

It is a matter of historical record that as the years have gone by and legislatures around the world have removed the death penalty from crime after crime, the incidence of those particular crimes has not gone up, but down. Members of this House were apprised of a study this year which indicated this fact very clearly. This fact was very well founded in statistics.

It is obvious to me, as it is to everyone else, that human progress, though slow at times, is sure. I take it that very few members entering this debate have quoted the ancient biblical words saying that we must take an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. However, if the adage was quoted in support of the retention of capital punishment, I would have to say that the import of the adage was misunderstood. When it was said in those ancient days that we should take an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, it was a progressive statement. Before that, more than an eye was taken for an eye and more than a tooth was taken for a tooth. It was a clear statement against the principle that vengeance had to be complete and thorough.

The principle had been that if a man found that another man had taken his brother's life, he was not only allowed to take the life of the killer but the lives of the killer's wife, his children, brothers, sisters and all those in his house. We cannot go back to that adage and say that was a strict code of justice calling for total retribution. In its day, it was a progressive step. Just as it was a long time ago a progression in the ascent of man into a better conception of himself, so today we are considering an act which is a step, albeit a very small one, in that ascent of man toward a better conception of himself.

Along with many members of this House, I have received word from my constituents on the question of the retention or abolition of capital punishment. I am not disclosing any secret when I say that the opinion of those who responded to the questionnaire I sent out early in the year was overwhelmingly in favour of the retention of capital punishment. I forget the exact percentage breakdown, but roughly 70 per cent of the people who wrote in from my constituency said they wanted capital punishment retained or, more accurately, restored. Some 30 per cent were either indifferent or opposed to the retention of capital punishment.

I could try to explain away those figures by saying that I received only 2,000 answers and there are some 55,000 voters in my constituency. I could try to kid myself by saying there are many, many people in my constituency who did not answer and who probably favour the abolition of capital punishment. I can certainly try, as I do, to weigh this expression of opinion against the consistent expression of opinion on the part of church and other groups in my constituency, my city, province and country, which have written to me, as they have to other members of this House, asking us to vote for the abolition of capital punishment.

Certainly, there is a strong division of opinion. I cannot kid myself into thinking that there are many people in my constituency, city, province and country who agree with my point of view. However, I detect many of those who wrote to me in favour of retention were concerned about public safety. I have to respect their concern because it is very real. I cannot for one moment condemn them for expressing this concern or judge them harshly for resorting to the belief that the restoration of capital punishment would increase public safety.

I could certainly use an argument that would run like this: If you are so concerned about saving human lives, then why not concern yourself with changing the law as it controls construction safety in this country, because many more people are killed at work than are killed by murderers. I forget the exact figure for the last year, but it amounted to well over 900. If our concern was to preserve human life against accidents which are avoidable and which happen because we are all somehow greedy and want cheaper buildings, more profits and so on, then we should certainly address ourselves to the laws which control construction safety. As I suggested a moment ago, I am not going to divert the argument in this direction, although it is an important consideration.

I want for a moment to consider what justifications there are for punishment, and not just capital punishment. It seems to me there are three basic justifications for punishment. Safety is the first one. We put people away for reasons of public safety, and under this rubric of safety is the notion of rehabilitation. We feel that if we put a person away for a time we can get him to mend his ways, to use an old term; that we can rehabilitate that person so that when he emerges into society again he will be no cause of threat to public safety. Very obviously—I am not trying to be ironic here—we cannot justify capital punishment on the basis of rehabilitation, so we have to look elsewhere for justification.

● (1750)

Deterrence is the second justification for punishment. For some years now I have become convinced that capital punishment is not a deterrent. It is understood, of course, that I tend to see statistics in quite a different way from a person who is convinced that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder. But to me, the argument about deterrence is neither here nor there. I quite readily grant to those who argue that we need restoration of capital punishment that the case for a deterrent, either for or against, is not proven.

I repeat: the case presented by the statistics satisfies my judgment, but I can understand if other members of the House do not have their judgment satisfied by the figures. In an absolute sense, the case for deterrence is not proven. It is not destroyed. It is not established. It is not proven. However, I cannot help but be affected by the fact that in those jurisdictions where there is no capital punishment there seems to be a very low rate of capital murder.

A critic of my view could say, "Well, which came first? Was it the case that at first you had a relatively non-violent society which in turn felt no need for the imposition of capital punishment and therefore removed capital punishment from its laws, or did it work the other way around?" I do not think we can go through any kind of mechanistic calculation that will give us the answer. I suspect, indeed I believe very strongly, that a state that says simply and clearly that it will not take a life deliberately somehow sets up a tone, an attitude, a mood, a way of looking at things in that society which in turn tends to reduce the level of violence. And as it reduces the level of violence, so it also reduces the level of capital crime.

So I say to those who are concerned with public safety: Look to those states that have eliminated the death penalty and see how they have also reduced the amount of violent crime. The correlation may not be exact, the logic relating the cause to the effect may not be clear, but nevertheless it is there. If we are concerned about saving lives, I would advance the thesis, which may appear to be paradoxical, that the abolition of capital punishment might have more to do with the saving of lives than the harshest punishment can propose.

The final justification for punishment is that of retribution. I spoke earlier of retribution when I referred to the ancient adage of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. I suppose that one form of retribution is vengeance, but I do not suggest for one moment that any member of this House supports the retention of capital punishment for reasons of vengeance. I do not even suggest that the people in my riding who want capital punishment reinstated are motivated by vengeance. I think what they are seeking is a sense of justice, a feeling that somehow this universe is a moral and fair one; that those who go to the ultimate step of taking another person's life deliberately must somehow make retribution so that justice is served.

The only argument in favour of capital punishment that is worth while looking at in a moral or philosophical sense is the one that says that society must impose capital punishment for certain crimes in order that society may clearly indicate to all its members its abhorrence for that kind of action. That is a serious argument, one on which we must dwell for a moment. I grant its power as an argument and I suspect that behind much of the debate we have heard in support of retention we can find the premise that somehow or other society has to indicate that certain actions cannot be taken with impunity, that punishment for certain actions must be absolute. Against this argument I pose a counter argument which says very simply this, that the state must indicate through its deliberate and considered action its sense of the value of human life, and it must state that it, the state, will not lower itself to the status and level of the criminal.

If you will allow me another 30 seconds, Mr. Speaker, that is all I need to finish my point. I understand the motivations for vengeance. I have the same feelings myself. To the person who asks me what I would do if a rapist strangled and killed my daughter, my immediate reaction is to say that I would strangle him with my bare hands. But I know that I must not act in this way. The history of man is such that any man who acts according to these urges knows that this is the wrong way to act. What we are doing here is sitting in full, considered and cool deliberation, not in the heat of the moment. We parliamentarians, men and women representing the people of this country, must decide that our country, our state will not lower itself to the level of the criminal.

I hope that before this debate is ended I will have an opportunity of voting for total abolition. In the meantime, I simply want to put my position before the House. I urge the few hon. members of this House who may be wavering to reconsider, because although it is a slow process we are here again re-establishing and restating our full consideration of the value of human life.

At 6.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

Minister of State
Urban Affairs
Canada

April 13, 1973

Judge Charles O. Bick
Chairman
Metropolitain Board of Commissioners of Police
590 Jarvis Street
Toronto, Ont. M4Y 2J5
Dear Sir:

I wish to thank you for having your Executive Secretary send to me a copy of the report dated March 9, 1973 from the Chief of Police concerning Rochdale College in the city of Toronto.

I join with the members of your board in expressing concern over the contents of this report and I appreciate your courtesy in sending to me a copy of it.

Because of statements attributed to members of the Toronto Police that Rochdale College should be closed, I feel that the federal government's responsibility in this case must be clarified. Our involvement, as you are aware, is through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation who hold a first mortgage dated February 15, 1967, which said mortgage was made for the purpose of financing what appeared to be a legitimate student co-operative residence. The loan was made following consultations with representatives of the University of Toronto and the government of Ontario. This residence was subsequently sold to Rochdale College and the mortgage went on repayment March 1st, 1969.

With the build-up of mortgage arrears, CMHC issued a writ of foreclosure on August 17, 1971, claiming foreclosure, suit on the convenant and possession. Due to the fact that the action for foreclosure and possession was opposed by Revenue Properties Central Developments Ltd., a secondary encumbrancer, and by Rochdale College, the owners, the main foreclosure action has not yet come to trial, and CMHC was barred from possession of the building. However, pleadings have been noted closed and appointments are being made to examine witnesses as the result of issues that have been raised by the said pleadings. It is most difficult at the present time to give you any firm indication as to when this action will be finalized and possession and management obtained by CMHC but the solicitors have been instructed by CMHC and personally by me to proceed as expeditiously as possible with this action.

You are aware that CMHC's solicitor, having been denied possession by the court, made an application to the Supreme Court of Ontario for the appointment of an interim receiver to act on behalf of all creditors and obtained an order on September 14, 1972, appointing Clarkson and Company as the interim receiver and manager. It is to be noted that this court order was for the benefit of all creditors and specifically excluded CMHC from taking over possession and management of the residence. The administration of this institution would now seem to be accountable to the Supreme Court of Ontario.

I would like to assure you of all possible co-operation in resolving this very unsatisfactory situation but I must emphasize that the onus of law enforcement at Rochdale College is clearly the responsibility of the police and not that of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs or CMHC.

I have read with interest that the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario has asked for a report on Rochdale College following a recent coroner's jury recommendation which stated, "If there are any existing legal reasons why Rochdale College cannot be closed down, that the provincial Attorney General facilitate legislation to close Rochdale as it now exists, at the earliest possible time." In view of this I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to the provincial Attorney General.

In response to your last point I wish to assure you that officials of CMHC will welcome the opportunity of discussing the situation at Rochdale if, and when, the court grants possession and title of the building to CMHC, at which time we will look forward to your co-operation to enforce our rights.

Yours sincerely,

Ron Basford.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

Third report of Standing Committee on Transport and Communications—Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH MARC CAYER ON TRANSPORTATION EXPENSES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the text of correspondence between the Department of External Affairs and Mr. Marc Cayer on the subject of the expenses associated with his return to Canada, as well as the text of a departmental memorandum itemizing these expenses. I have also included an English translation of the letters and a French translation of the memorandum.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PHASING OUT OF VETERANS LAND ACT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's- St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I ask for unanimous consent to move a motion under Standing Order 43. The decision by the government to phase out the Veterans Land Act in March, 1974, will deny a majority of 125,000 veterans now qualified and other servicemen who will retire the opportunity to take advantage of the act because of the lack of flexibility in qualifying due to changing conditions. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That a joint study be appointed immediately to look into the problem, and that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

MANAGEMENT STUDY PROPOSED BY AUDITOR GENERAL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent business arising out of the report of the Auditor General tabled yesterday and having to do with his call for a management study of government organization, administration, methods and procedures involving federal expenditures now exceeding $20 billion per year. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the government to take immediate steps to supply the Public Accounts Committee of parliament with expanded resources, including research, legal and other staff necessary to conduct a thoroughgoing, in-depth and in-breadth examination of our immense and complex expenditures to enable the most effective and economical use of such outlays in the public interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Shefford might allow the Chair to make one comment about the proposed motion of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock. I have serious doubts whether this motion is in order. The hon. member is referring to a report which is before a committee at the present time. I have stated before and I should like to restate now that hon. members should not take it for granted or assume that any motion proposed under Standing Order 43 is in order and that the Speaker is under an obligation to put it to the House to determine whether there is unanimous consent. The motion has to be in order before it can be put. However, I am prepared to give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt and ask whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

FINANCE

MEASURES TO IMPROVE PROVINCIAL ADMINISTRATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I solicit unanimous consent of the House to bring forward a motion related to a matter of specific and urgent necessity.

In view of the fact that federal-provincial conferences almost always end up in a deadlock and bickering over fiscal matters, and in view of the serious danger to the unity of the country such fiscal bickering represents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House consider the monetary possibilities proposed by the Social Credit Party of Canada in order to arrive at a solution which would release the federal government from its deadlock and allow provinces to administer according to the spirit of Confederation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: It appears that there is unanimity among members of the hon. member for Shefford's party, but no unanimity in the House. The motion therefore cannot be put.

MEASURES TO PERMIT BANK OF CANADA TO GRANT LOANS TO PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, to allow the discussion of an extremely important matter, particularly during the current federal-provincial conference of first ministers.

As the provinces have executive powers, under the British North America Act, and the central government has the appropriate financial means to help those provinces fulfil their obligations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That this House study without delay the means to enable the Bank of Canada to make available to the provinces the financial resources required to meet their constitutional obligations.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, it requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: As consent is not unanimous, I regret to advise the hon. member for Richmond that his motion cannot be put to the House.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ENTITLEMENT TO PRESCRIPTION DRUGS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of utmost urgency under Standing Order 43 arising from a joint communiqué by officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Indian Affairs dated April 3, 1973, affecting medical entitlement of treaty Indians and particularly entitlement to prescription drugs. In view of a letter issued on May 8, 1973, to the Saskatchewan Pharmaceutical Association advising them that Indian health services will no longer be responsible for provision of drugs to treaty Indian people falling into certain groupings as of June 1, 1973, and since this appears to be an abrogation of the "Medicine Chest Clause" in Treaty No. 6, I therefore move—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should not make a speech in support of the motion he is presenting under Standing Order 43. I appreciate he is at the point of proposing the motion. For the advantage of the hon. member for Meadow Lake and other hon. members I point out that the case in support of a motion under Standing Order 43 should not be made but that the motion should be put to the House for the consideration of the Chair under the terms of Standing Order 43.

Mr. Nesdoly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the question of health and pharmaceutical services to the Indian people be referred immediately for study and report to the Standing Committees on Health and Welfare and Indian Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

HOLIDAYS ACT

AMENDMENT TO DESIGNATE JULY 1 AS CANADA DAY

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-184, to amend the Holidays Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to make the national holiday celebrated in Canada to commemorate the confederation of Canada as a country a celebration that is more relevant and meaningful to Canadians of all races and nationalities. The bill proposes that the holiday on July 1 be known as Canada Day.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is prepared to put the second reading motion now.

Mr. MacLean: There is not unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. At the next sitting of the House.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

PROVISION OF LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR EMPLOYEES COMING UNDER CANADA LABOUR CODE WHO ARE CANDIDATES OR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-185, to amend the Canada Elections Act (leave of absence).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to open membership in parliament to many who cannot seek it now because they would jeopardize their employment if they were candidates. It would give all employees under the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Code the right to a leave of absence with or without pay during an election campaign in which they are candidates and give them the right to a leave of absence of up to five years without pay if they are elected to serve in this House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

OBJECTION TO REPORT OF COMMISSION FOR PROVINCE OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Sherbrooke, Gloucester, Madawaska-Victoria, Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine, Lapointe, York-Sunbury, Westmorland-Kent, Carleton-Charlotte, Glengarry-Prescott-Russell and Sarnia-Lambton has been filed with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, Chapter E-2, R.S.C., 1970 to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of New Brunswick.

[Translation]

If the House is agreeable, I would propose that the text of the objections be printed as an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY IN LIGHT OF RECOMMENDATIONS IN REPORT, "CANADA'S COMMERCIAL POLICY AND ENERGY"—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to a study entitled "Canada's Commercial Policy and Energy" prepared by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and alleged to have been sent to the National Energy Board in November, 1971. I assume it was also sent to the minister's department. Were the recommendations in this report approved in principle or simply rejected or ignored? I ask this in light of the finding in the report that Canada's oil and gas were being sold abroad too cheaply and unless the government of Canada took action this would continue and the Canadian economy would be badly damaged.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with regard to one of the questions involved, namely, possible negotiation for further access of Canadian petroleum products to the United States, I think it is obvious that the conclusions have now been followed and have been overtaken by events. In fact, there are no negotiations on this question with the United States. Indeed, since I have assumed this portfolio we have taken steps to put an over-all ceiling on our shipments to that country.

● (1420)

With regard to the question of prices, particularly the effect on the Canadian market of the increasing price in the international market, I responded earlier last week to a question along these lines from the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands by pointing out that the question of a two-price system, and trying particularly to insulate the Canadian market against the impact of international prices, has been receiving detailed study. The issues involved in this Star story are much more fully argued out in the energy policy studies we hope to make available to the House in the very near future.

An hon. Member: You have been saying that for months.

Mr. Stanfield: Granted the minister made some comment about a two-price system in the House last week, can he give any reason why this report dated in November, 1971, has not been acted upon, and why, since this report has been in the hands of the government all this time, he is only now getting around to making some preliminary comments with regard to energy policy? Has the minister any excuse for this?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would point out to the hon. gentleman, as I did at the beginning of my last response, that it is apparent that the argument in the report has been acted upon, that there has been no initiative taken by the government of Canada to seek increased access to the United States market. I would say now, as I have said many times in public since I have been minister, that as the report indicates we have a distinct advantage here. It is not necessarily in our interests that we should be prepared to make an over-all pact with the United States with regard to energy commodities, and through the actions of the National Energy Board under regulation 11A and in other ways we have been seeking to get improved payments to Canada for our resources. Indeed, the further processing provisions of the mineral policy objectives which I set before the House just a week ago are a further indication of our efforts in this regard.

Mr. Stanfield: With all due respect to the minister, they do not indicate that any action was taken until Alberta moved.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is not so.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to table promptly in the House this study entitled "Canada's Commercial Policy and Energy" and similar background papers so that we can be fully apprised of the stakes involved in formulating a new policy? Will he do this immediately rather than wait until he is ready to table some papers of his own?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It seems to me that the energy policy studies are a much fuller treatment of the all the interprovincial, national and international issues involved and that they would provide a far better presentation of these important issues.

Mr. Hees: So it seems to you.

REQUEST FOR TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR OIL AND SUPPLYING OF WESTERN CANADA PRODUCT TO EAST

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that this report was prepared by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce 18 months ago recommending a two-price system for oil in Canada, may I ask the minister whether he is prepared now, after a year and a half of study, to announce a two-price system for oil in view of the fact that prices of oil and gasoline in Canada are going up at a totally unjustified rate?

An hon. Member: Totally justified.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I would remind the hon. member again that part of the Canadian market, with regard to oil in particular, is dependent on foreign supplies and as the cost of offshore oil goes up so inevitably will prices in Canada. It is because of the complexities of our market, the division between east and west and also the conflicting interests between western Canada and the eastern Canada market that we think there is an important question to be decided not only internally by this government but also by the provincial governments. No, I am not prepared to announce a two-price system today. I believe this is one of the national issues which should be debated fully after the studies have been made available.

Mr. Douglas: If the minister has studied this document entitled "Canada's Commercial Policy and Energy" he will have noticed that the writer says the present oil policy with its Ottawa Valley line is no longer in the public interest. May I ask the minister whether he is prepared to allow western crude oil into the eastern market and fix the price of that oil so that the people of eastern Canada will have western oil that will compete against offshore oil for which they pay a higher price at the present time?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. gentleman, as he knows, that western Canada oil, even with the increase in the international price, still costs more in the Montreal market than the international product. On this basis, what the hon. gentleman is proposing is an increase in the cost of oil for the Canadian market east of the Ottawa Valley line. This is just one indication of the complexities that may result from a rather simplified approach to this proposal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously a number of hon. members want to ask supplementaries on this question. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue and will then return to the hon. members for Trinity, Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, Yorkton-Melville and others who appear to want to debate this matter.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF GOLD—POSSIBLE EXPANSION OF GOLD MINES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since the free market for gold is increasingly prosperous abroad, did this government conceive any projects aiming at inciting companies to undertake works in eastern Ontario and western Quebec in order to encourage the opening or re-opening of gold mines in these areas?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the high price of gold is, of course, a very great encouragement and I would not be surprised if there were a revival of gold mining activity in Canada as a result.

ENERGY

AWARENESS OF MINISTER WHEN HE ASSUMED PORTFOLIO OF REPORT, "CANADA'S COMMERCIAL POLICY AND ENERGY"

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the question that was directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What intrigues me about the answer the minister gave is that he prefaced his answer to the Leader of the Opposition by saying, "since I have been minister".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member prefaces his own question by referring to what intrigues him about the minister's response to a previous question. I would hope the hon. member would ask a question rather than refer by way of preface to the statement made earlier this afternoon by the minister. I am making this suggestion in the hope we will be able to proceed a little more quickly.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is based on the preamble to my question. When the minister became Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources 14 months ago, did he see this report from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that is now reported in the Toronto Star?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, when I became minister I saw a great many documents, but I am certainly familiar with all the arguments that are made in this particular document—

Mr. Hees: Answer the question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —which are among some of the central policy issues to be resolved in Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Does this evasion on the part of the minister explain why the chairman of the National Energy Board was reluctant to answer questioning in the standing committee in regard to whether he had—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This kind of questioning, to my way of thinking, is entirely out of order. The hon. member for Trinity on a supplementary.

ALLEGATION THAT INTERNATIONAL COMPANIES HAVE SUPPLIED FOREIGN OIL TO EASTERN CANADA AT ARTIFICIALLY HIGH PRICES TO REDUCE TAXES

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the government investigated the allegation that the big international oil companies have supplied foreign crude to eastern Canada at artificially high transfer prices in order to reduce taxes paid in Canada and to move taxable income into tax havens? If so, what are the results of the investigation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board has had international prices under close scrutiny. Whether a specific investigation of this kind has been made by the board I am not sure, but I can certainly find out.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister find out, and if an investigation has been made would he present to the House the report of the Energy Board?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to consult the board and report my findings to the House.

TAXATION

ACTION TO PREVENT MANIPULATIONS BY CORPORATIONS DESIGNED TO AVOID PAYMENT OF INCOME TAX

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Following my questioning of the minister on Tuesday in the committee concerning alleged tax evasion by the Chrysler Corporation, and in view of the related criticism by the Auditor General in his report just released, I should like to ask the minister whether he is now prepared to take immediate steps to enforce the Income Tax Act in order to prevent corporate manipulations designed to avoid payment of corporate income taxes. If he does plan to take such action, will he inform the House of what it will consist?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, without referring to any particular taxpayer, the kind of action the hon. member recommends is being taken by my department.

REASONS FOR REMISSION OF DUTY AND SALES TAX ON CERTAIN IMPORTED CARS AND PARTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Following that very informative answer, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he will inform the House of the reasons that led to the order in council dated February 10, 1972, which enabled a car manufacturer to obtain retroactively duty and sales tax remissions on imported cars and parts in the amount of $6 million as indicated by the Auditor General in his recent report?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): That was before my time, Mr. Speaker, but I will be glad to find out and advise the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Oral Questions

ALLEGED FAILURE TO REPORT TO HOUSE REMISSIONS OF MACHINERY DUTIES IN EXCESS OF $1,000 GRANTED TO CORPORATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my final supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but since he is not here I will put it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the finding of the Auditor General that remissions of duties on machinery in excess of $1,000 granted to corporations are not being reported to the House of Commons as required by law, and in view of the fact that these remissions for the past year amounted to approximately $78 million, will the minister take steps to ensure that this illegal practice is stopped immediately, and will he further ensure that the names of the corporations and the amounts remitted to them will be reported forthwith to the Public Accounts Committee in conformity with the law?

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, without necessarily agreeing with the member's statement, I will bring the matter to the minister's attention who, with his usual attention, will look after it.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

MANAGEMENT STUDY PROPOSED BY AUDITOR GENERAL—PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the additional well documented revelations of administrative incompetence and spending misappropriations, is the government now considering the proposal or suggestion of the former Auditor General that the government commission a management study of government organization which would take the form of an audit of all organization and management procedures?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think before reaching a conclusion on this point I would welcome the views of the newly appointed Auditor General.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. I take it that the minister's answer means the government intends to do nothing. Having in mind the repeated warnings about the loss of parliamentary control of current high levels of government spending, will the government in collaboration with the House consider finding ways and means of rectifying this very serious situation and restoring to parliament the right of control over spending that it should have?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the proposition, and I am sure my hon. friend would not want to accept the proposition that parliament does not control the expenditure of public funds.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. Sharp: It obviously does. The committees established for this purpose probably represent the best system that has been in effect during my time in Ottawa. It is certainly an enormous improvement over the situation when estimates of the departments had to be considered in Committee of the Whole. The committee system is an enormous improvement, and I hope the hon. gentleman will learn to use that committee system.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KILLING OF TWO CANADIAN GIRLS WHILE VISITING VICTORIA FALLS, RHODESIA—PUBLIC APOLOGY BY ZAMBIA

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he received a public apology from Zambia in connection with the coldblooded murder of two Canadian girls? If such an apology has not been received or if it is not received shortly, does the government intend to reappraise Canada's aid to Zambia?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to associate myself with the hon. gentleman's concern about the way in which this matter has been dealt with by the Zambian authorities. We have received the report of our first secretary who was sent to Rhodesia to investigate the circumstances of this tragedy. We have instructed our High Commissioner in Lusaka once again to contact the Zambian authorities at a very high level and to make clear to them that we are treating this matter very seriously indeed and wish the fullest possible investigation to be continued. We are not satisfied with the public statement that has been made, and we have received no direct communication from the Zambian government.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, in view of the conflicting reports that appear to be emanating from that area, will the minister give consideration to referring this very serious matter to the United Nations for a report?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, before taking any further action I would prefer to see what is the result of the representations we are now making to the Zambian government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock on a supplementary to the previous question and then the hon. member for Shefford.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

EXPENDITURE OF FUNDS—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF AUDITOR GENERAL AND PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE CONCERNING ECONOMIES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question in respect of the subject of the Auditor General's report which I should like to direct to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board. Having in mind the many recommendations over the years by the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee in respect of economies that might be made in the expenditure of public funds by various departments, I should like to ask whether the minister will, in light of the report of the Auditor General tabled yesterday, give early attention to the implementation of those recommendations?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking that we give early attention to the implementation of recommendations. I might point out that a number of them have in fact been dealt with not only by the committee but by the House, even though they continue to be referred to in the report. I think that probably the most useful approach would be for the Public Accounts Committee to receive a report on the status of each of these so-called recommendations at an early sitting. I would be glad to have that prepared.

Mr. Baldwin: Some go back to 1963.

Mr. Drury: We have had two major debates on postal rates and you have not said a word.

Mr. Baldwin: Those horses are dead now.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KILLING OF TWO CANADIAN GIRLS WHILE VISITING VICTORIA FALLS—REQUEST FOR REPORT BY RHODESIA

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since the minister has just stated that he has not yet obtained news about the murder of two Canadian women in Rhodesia by Zambian troops and that he has not heard from the government of Zambia, does the Canadian government, through the Department of External Affairs, intend to ask the Rhodesian government for a report giving us its own account of those two murders?

[English]

Hon. Michell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman may not have heard the answer I gave to the previous question. I have asked the Zambian authorities to give us a full report. We are not satisfied with the public statement they made and we are pursuing this matter most vigorously.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF COMPTROLLER AS RECOMMENDED BY AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board arising from the report of the Auditor General which points out, among other things, that the accounts of the National Harbours Board were so inadequate as to prevent the Auditor General from expressing an opinion on the validity and accuracy of the 1971 accounts. Will the minister advise the House whether the government is seriously considering the Auditor General's recommendation calling for the appointment of an experienced comptroller with full authority to co-ordinate the administrative and accounting procedures of the National Harbours Board?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will realize that the National Harbours Board is a semi-autonomous body which reports to parliament through the Minister of Transport. I would prefer that he would answer as to what action has been taken to restructure and reform both the practices and the organization of the National Harbours Board.

• (1440)

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate the minister's reply but in view of the fact that this appears to be in violation of section 77 of the Financial Administration Act, under which I believe the minister and the Treasury Board have full authority to govern, would the minister not reconsider his position in this matter with a view to recommending to the Minister of Transport that this recommendation be implemented?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary question is in the form of a representation.

AIRPORTS

MOUNT HOPE—DATE AND TYPE OF MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER AND CITIZENS OPPOSED TO EXPANSION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport may I direct this question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the commitment made on behalf of the Minister of Transport by the Minister of Labour, can the parliamentary secretary advise the House as to the date of the meeting in the Hamilton area between the minister and citizens' groups opposed to the expansion of Mount Hope airport and whether these meetings will be open to the news media and the general public?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Catharines.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT CONCERNING CONTINUANCE OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN CONTROL COMMISSION

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the stalemate which is obviously present in the International Commission of Control and Supervision, I wonder when we can expect an announcement or pronouncement concerning the indecision of the government as to what is going to happen in respect of our troops in Viet Nam?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I promised the House that before the end of this month a decision would be made. That is still our intention, and I expect that one day next week I will announce the government's decision.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REASONS FOR SALE OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT TO VENEZUELA AND ALLEGED INCREASE IN COST OF CERTAIN DESTROYERS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to explain to the House why the government recently sold 18 CF-5 aircraft to Venezuela and still has 43 of these aircraft in storage in view of the fact the minister's predecessor, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, advised the House only a few months ago that these aircraft were completely satisfactory for the needs of our armed forces and necessary for the operation of those forces?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this subject has been discussed quite fully in committee and in the House, but if I do consider it will be helpful to make a further statement I will do so.

Mr. Hees: I have attended all the meetings that have been held and it has not been discussed since last fall, as the minister very well knows. Has the minister started departmental inquiries into the reasons the four DDH280 destroyers, which were originally estimated to cost $150 million, have now cost more than double that amount and, in addition, the costs are still increasing and the destroyers are reported to still be in unsatisfactory condition?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the DDH destroyer program is within budget. It is within the figure approved by Treasury Board.

Mr. Hees: Would the minister not agree that the cost is more than double the original estimate?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is, of course, argument.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRANSPORT

SUBSIDY TO FOREIGN REGISTERED VESSEL, MV "TRAVETAL"—SUGGESTED REQUIREMENT OF CANADIAN REGISTRY

Mr. Harry Olaussen (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Transport but since he is not here today perhaps the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary would reply. In view of the fact the federal subsidy to the Singapore registered ship, MV Travetal in the past fiscal year amounted to $368,000, can the minister tell the House if federal government financial assistance to this foreign-registered and foreign-manned vessel will continue as part of the financial assistance by it for the purpose of enabling this ship to carry automobiles between Halifax, Nova Scotia, and St. John's, Newfoundland?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I fail to see the urgency of the question, although I have been wrong when it comes to judging urgency. In asking questions hon. members always suggest that they should be answered the very day they are asked, but it seems to me this question could very well be placed on the order paper or perhaps asked and answered at the time of adjournment. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Olaussen: Yes. Mr. Speaker, I would like to rephrase the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order, but if the hon. member can ask the question in such a way that it will appear to be urgent certainly it will be accepted.

Mr. Olaussen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the question to the Minister of Transport in the hope that I may receive an appropriate answer. In view of the fact that this ship, the MV Travetal of Singapore registry, has been picketed since yesterday, does the minister intend to require the Travetal to assume Canadian registry and employ some of the vast army of Canadian unemployed?

Mr. Speaker: The rephrased question seems to be a little more urgent. Perhaps the mister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to bring the matter to the attention of the minister.

FINANCE

PROVISION OF LARGER SHARE OF REVENUES TO PROVINCES IN LIGHT OF LEVEL OF URBAN PROPERTY TAXES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether there has been any agreement with the provinces to get a better and greater share of the revenues in light of the fact that property taxes now in urban centres have made it almost impossible for the average Canadian to meet the instalment payments on his home?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, discussions are now proceeding in another place as to the division of revenues and so far as I know there has not yet been complete agreement.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know whether or not this is a leak, but in light of the fact that the national press of Canada says there has been a breakdown in the discussions that have taken place on this important subject, would the minister undertake that later when the Prime Minister returns he will make a full statement on this matter which is so important to the provinces and particularly to the urban centres of Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think I can give an undertaking on behalf of the Prime Minister that first thing he would do after his return would be to give a report on the negotiations now proceeding.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

LAND FREEZE IN MACKENZIE RIVER BASIN—EFFECT ON OIL EXPLORATION AND TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN COMPANIES

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As a result of a court hearing in Yellowknife last week an article appeared in the press which stated that the land freeze prevents transfer of ownership or the granting of any further use of any portion of the 400,000 square miles in dispute and effectively covers the entire Mackenzie River basin. Does this mean that oil exploration activity in the north and normal land transactions between companies must cease until the claim is resolved, or that permits and leases granted to oil companies are in jeopardy?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this action lodged before the courts has in no way affected the activities of the people doing oil exploration work in the delta of the Mackenzie and the Arctic islands.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Calgary South might be allowed to ask a supplementary, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, in view of the extreme concern expressed by residents of northern communities, will the minister issue a statement on this subject to reassure them as well as those who are planning substantial Mackenzie River shipments this summer to carry out oil exploration next winter?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, according to my information the companies are carrying on their development program just as they started it. The court ordered a land freeze but did not forbid the Crown to issue permits under normal conditions.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF BRINGING OIL AND GAS INDUSTRIES UNDER PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and is supplementary to questions asked earlier. In view of the recent Gallup poll indicating that the Canadian people now wish energy resources to be under public ownership, can the minister say—

● (1450)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Some of the reactionaries may not agree, Mr. Speaker, but I would still like to ask this question. In view of the fact the Canadian people now want consideration to this matter, is the minister considering bringing the gas and oil industries that fall within federal jurisdiction under public ownership?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Sir.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELIGIBILITY OF CERTAIN NORTHERN ELECTRIC EMPLOYEES FOR BENEFITS

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, or his parliamentary secretary, advise on the situation of some 2,000 staff employees of Northern Electric Company who have been suspended without pay by the company and, specifically, will those people qualify under the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act regulations?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, although these employees are losing employment because of a labour dispute it would appear that they are not participating and are not directly interested in the dispute. Provided they are not members of the same grade or class of employees, they would be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. Some 160 claims have already been filed in the Montreal West office.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASONS FOR WITHDRAWAL OF SHOWING OF FILM "CHISSIBI" CONCERNING NATIVE PEOPLE OF JAMES BAY AREA

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State. Would he have his minister bring a full report before the House on the events leading to the postponement or withdrawal of the showing on the French language CBC network of the Joyce Richardson film "Chissibi" concerning the native people of the James Bay area, including a full disclosure of any involvement in that withdrawal by the James Bay Development Corporation, Quebec Hydro or the Canadian or Quebec governments?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am personally interested in these important matters and I shall be pleased to convey my hon. friend's request to the minister who is now attending the first ministers' conference where he will discuss questions falling under his jurisdiction.

[English]

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Would the minister advise whether it is the position of the CBC that this film is sub judice and, if so, whether that has been the consistent advice of lawyers consulted on this question by the CBC and, if not, when will the film be shown?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY RESPECTING PROVISION OF ARMS TO PORTUGAL

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since Canada has stopped sending Canadian arms to Portugal for fear that the Portuguese might use them to repress independence movements in Angola, has the hon. minister also asked Canadian companies such as General Foods Limited, Nestlé (Canada) Limited and Standard Brands Limited to stop importing Angolan coffee, since this might encourage and maintain the situation in which Angolans are kept in slavery in forced labour camps—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the impression that this question has already been asked but the hon. minister might perhaps answer it anyway.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman has any evidence that Canadian arms are being used by the Portuguese in Africa I would be very happy to have it because that would change our attitude toward the provision of arms to Portugal, which we do now as a member of the NATO alliance and purely for the purposes of the alliance.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

As the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs has just thrown some light on Angola's forced labour policy, which is contrary to United Nations Resolution No. 2918 for which Canada voted in November 1972, does the hon. minister intend to ask these companies to put an end to these imports?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in supporting the resolution to which the hon. gentleman has referred, Canada specifically reserved its position on the question of economic sanctions against the Portuguese territories. We do not intend to apply sanctions against those territories.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—REQUEST THAT MINISTER APPEAR BEFORE HEARINGS ON INJUNCTION SOUGHT BY NATIVES

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that Mr. Justice Malony has said that he wants the testimony at the James Bay injunction hearings completed by the end of May, would the minister give very serious consideration to taking this final opportunity to appear before the hearings to indicate the federal government's constitutional support for the injunction applied for by the native people of the James Bay area?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have stated several times that the Quebec Indians are actively pleading their case; as regards the government's constitutional position, the lawyers for the Indians are quite familiar with the 1912 and 1898 transfer acts and with the Royal Proclamation of 1763, and I am sure that they have brought these to the judge's attention more effectively than I could myself.

FISHERIES

SALMON FISHING BAN IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—SETTLEMENT OF FISHERMEN'S CLAIMS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can he tell the House how he is making out in his efforts to settle finally the claims of fishermen in the Atlantic region arising from the ban on salmon fishing?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the officials have settled all but a dozen of the approximately 1,000 claims for adjustment assistance which we received from the commercial fishermen taking Atlantic salmon. Unfortunately the official who has been carrying out these negotiations has suffered a heart attack. We are completing the remaining dozen negotiations as quickly as we can using other officials.

BAN ON WHALING—COMPENSATION TO THOSE AFFECTED—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary relating to the benefits paid to fishermen. Would the minister inform the House what progress he is making in negotiations with the fishermen who were operating in the whaling industry at Blandford, Nova Scotia, and were put out of business when he closed down the whaling industry in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the task force which has been working on this subject has held discussions with the companies and the fishermen affected by the whaling closure. I will shortly be making a recommendation to cabinet as to the nature and extent of the adjustment assistance that we will be paying to the affected parties.

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED KINGDOM AND WEST GERMANY ARISING OUT OF COD WAR OFF ICELAND

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, while we are on fisheries may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can respond to the question which was raised on Tuesday and say if Canada, as a member of NATO, has expressed its concern to the United Kingdom and to West Germany in regard to the cod war off Iceland?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that this question is supplementary. The minister will be allowed to reply, but I have the impression that when a question is asked about salmon members think they can also ask about whaling in Labrador, or perch in Cornwall. Again I suggest that this is not entirely a supplementary question, but the minister will be allowed to reply.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, of course we are concerned about any dispute such as this between two members of the NATO alliance and in that sense we have expressed views. But there have been no direct communications of the kind the hon. gentleman asked me about in his previous question, and I can confirm my answer now.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Lundrigan: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we will return to the hon. member later, but the Chair has been anxious to recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West.

PROPOSED NUCLEAR TESTS BY FRANCE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION—FURTHER STEPS TO PREVENT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the proposed nuclear tests by the French government in the South Pacific, has the minister conveyed to the government of France the unanimous opposition of the Canadian House of Commons to these nuclear tests?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harding: Is the government taking further steps to try to stop these tests, and, specifically, has action been taken at the United Nations level, or in support of Australia and New Zealand in their action before the International Court of Justice to try to obtain an interim injunction pending final judgment of the court regarding the tests?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, Australia and New Zealand have taken action before the International Court of Justice on the grounds that these nuclear tests are in an area of special importance to them. That is the basis on which they have taken this action. It is not generally against nuclear tests; it is against tests in their part of the Pacific. Similarly, when we protested very vigorously with respect to the United States nuclear tests in the North Pacific, Australia and New Zealand did not associate themselves with us.

FISHERIES

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED KINGDOM AND WEST GERMANY ARISING OUT OF COD WAR OFF ICELAND

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter to Canada even though it is directly an Icelandic problem. In view of the fact that Iceland depends on its fisheries resources for 84 per cent of its exports, will Canada, through the Department of External Affairs, ask the British government and the West German government to respect the territorial claims of Iceland? Will the government also ask these countries of 50 million and 60 million people to withdraw from the territory of that small country with only 200,000 people and recognize the claim of coastal states for jurisdiction over the continental shelf?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this question is sub judice as it has gone before the International Court of Justice. I am quite sure the hon. member would not want me to intervene at such a point.

Mr. Lundrigan: That is a lot of nonsense, absolute nonsense. It is not before The Hague Court. You have not got the courage to stand up—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Oral Questions

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF DATE FOR COMPLETION OF COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader with respect to the requirement under Standing Order 58(14) that committee reports pertaining to estimates have to be in by the end of this month. In view of the difficulty that members of the committee are having in completing their work, particularly the committee dealing with DREE but also others, the difficulty in part being due to the problems my hon. friend's colleagues have in manning the committees and also the difficulties in getting information, would the minister be prepared to consider any means of postponing this requirement in order to enable committees to complete their work properly?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to consider any reasonable request but I am certainly not prepared at the moment to say that a change would be made. However, I will consider it.

AGRICULTURE

SEIZURE OF MANITOBA EGGS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—EFFECT ON INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Since on Tuesday, May 22, British Columbia tried once again to seize a shipment of Manitoba eggs, and in view of the fact that a serious problem is developing in the area of interprovincial trade in Canada, can the minister inform the House what progress has been made primarily under the National Farm Products Marketing Act in solving this?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the dispute is between the British Columbia Egg Marketing Board and the egg broker, for whom I do not have much sympathy nor, I think, does the egg producer and egg consumer have any sympathy for him. He is trying to make a buck. I met with the national egg group this morning and I am sure they will have a proper working body, hopefully by the end of June.

Mr. Murta: Since the National Farm Marketing Council was formed, in part at least, to correct marketing disputes such as we have seen, can the minister inform the House exactly what success, if any, the council has had in solving what could become a very serious problem for interprovincial trade in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this question is in order. The hon. member is asking for an interpretation of the legal authority of a government or departmental agency. I think a question in those terms is not in order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

HARBOURS

CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF STUDY ON FUTURE DEVELOPMENT TO TRANSPORT COMMITTEE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to a previous question with regard to the National Harbours Board. In the absence of the Minister of Transport, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if he has had a chance to consult with the minister to see if we can have the study on the future development of the port of Churchill referred to the Transport Committee for action?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In view of the activities of the members of the committee, who are doing an extremely good job, I will be most pleased to request the minister to do just that. I hope it will be the case.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—POSSIBLE ERROR IN UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS USED AS BASIS FOR EXTENSION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in his absence I will address it to his parliamentary secretary. I hope I get more than the standard reply that he will take it as notice. In view of the minister's announcement that local initiatives projects in areas where unemployment is above 6.8 per cent will be eligible for extension up to November 30, and in view of the fact that Statistics Canada does not provide unemployment figures on such local areas and that Manpower's calculations of area unemployment have a statistical error rate varying from 15 to 30 per cent, does the minister intend to review this policy so that worth-while LIP projects seeking extension will not be disadvantaged by the lack of accurate figures?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were aware of the fact that the minister last week announced a further extension of LIP projects I do not think this question would arise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are coming to or have reached the end of the question period, but perhaps the Chair might be allowed to recognize one or two members, the hon. member for Yukon, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and perhaps another member in the back row.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ALLEGED SUPPRESSION OF NEWS OF SIT-DOWN STRIKE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General if there is any good reason for suppressing the news of a recent sit-down strike in the British Columbia penitentiary, and can he explain to the House the reasons for that sit-down strike by the inmates?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I, personally, have no news of the strike in the B.C. penitentiary and there has been no attempt to suppress any news.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—LENGTH OF SUSPENSION OF THREE GUARDS—STABBING OF PRISONER—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Yukon. Can the minister explain how long the suspension of the three guards in connection with last week's escape will last, and has he any information on the stabbing that took place in the prison which has still not been reported?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into the suspension of the three guards. I do not have that information at the moment. I did look into the question of the stabbing. It seems that a protected prisoner was being brought into the penitentiary and on his first day there was stabbed. An investigation took place but they were unable to determine who did the stabbing. I have a longer report and I would be prepared to give it to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rises on a question of privilege or a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a question of privilege. In responding to a question on the cod war today the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that he could not reply to the question because it was sub judice. I am not a lawyer but it seems to me that means it is before the courts. First of all, it is my understanding that the issue was before the Hague Court and has now passed through that stage so it is no longer before the courts; second, I believe it is not in order for a member of the Privy Council of Canada to take refuge behind something that might be before an international court. I have talked to hon. members who have been here for a number of years about this, and the answer, "sub judice" pertains only to Canada. I suggest that the minister has every right not to answer a question but does not have the right to proclaim the position he has taken today. If he is really going to talk about matters being sub judice he might like to look at No. 34 on the order paper under government business. Perhaps he could take a stand on that one as well when he is explaining his position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I should like to amend my answer. Perhaps it would meet the hon. member's point of view, to say that I think it would be inappropriate for us to comment on a question that is now before the International Court of Justice. I believe our position in such a dispute should be one of impartiality as between the parties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What a wriggler!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There should not be a debate. The hon. member raises this issue as a question of privilege, but I do not really believe there is a question of privilege. I have said often that many members could rise in the House on suggested or alleged questions of privilege when they are not satisfied with an answer given by a minister. It is well recognized by long practice that this cannot be the subject of a question of privilege. If there is a dispute between the minister and the hon. member in regard to the answer given by the minister, I would respectfully suggest to both that there is no point, either by way of point of order or question of privilege, in pursuing the matter further.

● (1510)

Mr. Lundrigan: On a further point of order, Sir, may I indicate that a precedent is being set in the House today. If the minister, first of all, is permitted to make a claim which is not correct, since the issue is not before the International Court, it having already passed through that particular body, and if he is also permitted to make a claim, and make it stick in the House today, that the government is not obliged to respond to questions that are before international tribunals or courts, we will be setting a precedent and giving the Privy Council further protection which it does not deserve to have. I contend that the minister has every right in the world to say that Canada does not have the gumption to take a stand on the issue, or that he refuses to answer, but he has no right to say what he has said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not propose to go into the matter further. Any minister can simply say that he refuses to answer a question.

Mr. Lundrigan: I agree with that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members may argue with the minister, but they are not going to argue with me. Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader the usual question as to the business of the House for the rest of this week and for next week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today we will continue with the debate on capital punishment. Tomorrow and Monday will be opposition days and on Tuesday, if need be, we will continue also with the capital punishment debate. The other government business that I should like to call after Bill C-2, would be the Judges Act, the National Housing Act amendment, the residential mortgages bill and the languages resolution. It may be that we will want to consider early next week whether we want to deal with the languages resolution on Wednesday. We may begin it on Wednesday or Thursday. If we decide to begin it on Thursday, we will call an opposition day on Wednesday.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak on the issue of opposition days, I wonder if I might be allowed to ask the minister if he would try to restrain the natural and understandable ardour of his colleagues for making long and controversial statements on opposition days. If they need to make them, would they make them on Monday rather than tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the coming business of the House, can the minister indicate whether high priority will be given to the bill to amend the Family Allowances Act and to the measure to provide increases in war disability pensions?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does that affirmative answer mean that we will be dealing with these matters before the end of June?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance until I see what progress is made with other measures that are now before the House. It would be my wish to have those items cleared before the summer adjournment, whenever that takes place.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) what fate he has in mind for the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some serious doubts and reservations about questions that are being asked as points of order as to what priority the government is giving to a certain piece of legislation or what the government intends to do about one particular bill or the other. It seems to me that these are questions which ought ordinarily to be asked during the question period. I mention this only by way of caution because, certainly, it seems to me hon. members would not want to ask about many proposed bills that are before the House, or about much proposed legislation.

Having said this only by way of caution—

[Translation]

This being said, I certainly have no objection to the minister answering the question of the hon. member for Abitibi.

[English]

I will of course recognize the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Greenwood, who may have similar questions to ask.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced on January 5 last and every day we are in touch with people who are claiming unemployment insurance benefits. This bill contains a number of amendments which would favour unemployment insurance recipients and I feel that we should give consideration to this legislation as quickly as possible.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in view of your statement, and as I do not want to break the rules, may I ask the leader of the House one question. When he mentioned the list of legislation that has priority, the Housing Act was omitted. I raise this question merely to ask if he will bring that bill in as a matter of high priority. I should like to know what kind of priority the government attaches to that bill, if I might go that far.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had mentioned the housing legislation. If I did not, I intended to. It will be called very early as part of the government's legislation. For example, if we complete the capital punishment debate today or early on Tuesday, I would certainly call the National Housing Act amendment following the Judges Act, which I expect will require a very short time to complete. If I may reply to the question of the hon. member for Abitibi, it is my intention to call the unemployment insurance debate at the first appropriate opportunity.

Mr. Hees: Some time next fall.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the leader of the House whether he is aware that his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, pointed out to the committee the very urgent need for dealing with the Immigration Appeal Board legislation. Has that legislation high priority?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, my colleagues are almost as troublesome as hon. members opposite in urging the priority of their legislation. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration is pressing to have his item of legislation dealt with quickly, but there are other items that have to be dealt with first. I have indicated to the House that I want to deal with capital punishment, the languages bill and the corporate tax changes as major items which must be dealt with. The others will be given their place in almost the same rank of priority, and they will be dealt with.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, if I may raise another point of order similar to that raised by the hon. member for Greenwood, is the minister aware that there are something like 16,000 persons waiting to have their appeals heard and that these appeals are being filed monthly in huge numbers? Does he not think, surely, that he ought to reassess his priorities, in order to bring that much needed bill before the House, so that we can expedite this matter?

Mr. Speaker: After these points of order and questions, perhaps we might call orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Peters: Let us have the question on the motion.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) had the floor when we adjourned yesterday.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, I was just leaving my seat to leave the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the issue currently before this House, namely that of capital punishment, is most sensitive and very controversial throughout Canada.

It is not the first time that the retention or complete abolition of this punishment is discussed. It has been discussed since 1914 and each year since then it has been debated in this House and particularly in 1917, 1948 and 1950.

I have myself received letters from everywhere throughout Canada. Some of them were urging me to vote against capital punishment while most of them asked me to vote for retention.

I would like to express the basis on which we are advocating the re-establishment of capital punishment and summarize the principle of the Thomist philosophy on capital punishment. Generally speaking it is as follows: Anyone must protect his own life and also respect the life of others. It is in that sense that homicide or murder is prohibited by moral law as well as by civil law which should reflect natural law.

It is incumbent upon the civil authorities to protect the individuals through laws and it is their right to adopt and enforce the legislation required by the common good and the protection of the citizens' life and property.

Since civil authorities are responsible for maintaining order in society they are also entitled to inflict punishment and demand reparation from those who break law and order. This is the punishment which come as a complement to law. But can civil authorities go as far as inflicting the death penalty?

This is the question asked by most of those who are advocating total abolition. St. Thomas' thesis is as follows: Political authorities have the right to inflict capital punishment on those who are guilty of homicide. Civil authorities have the right to do everything necessary to serve justice and insure the security of the citizens. Now, capital punishment is required to ensure justice and the security of society; therefore, the civilian authority is entitled to impose this penalty.

The proof of the first part of this thesis is that punitive justice requires that there be equality, if possible, between the crime committed and the sentence for it. Yet, against specific crimes like homicide, murder, there is no retribution other than capital punishment to make the sentence fit the crime.

And let us note, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in a vengeful mood, as some people try to suggest, that I advocate retention of capital punishment. It is not a policy of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, an arm for an arm, a leg for a leg, but a policy of justice. The would-be murderer knows beforehand the consequences of his act should he commit murder. Then, if he knows he is aware of it and that punishment is nothing more than fair penalty. No sentence other than capital punishment can restore equality between the sentence and the crime. Therefore, in order to serve justice, capital punishment is sometimes necessary.

As to the proof of the second part of this Thomist thesis, it is almost impossible to ensure the safety of citizens against some people's acts without applying the most powerful restriction against these criminals. And the most powerful restriction is capital punishment. Life imprisonment, that some people suggest as a punishment, is not powerful enough to deter potential murderers. Indeed some murderers may escape and not serve their sentence. On the other hand, the frightful crime of taking someone's life is not enough punished, and a deterrent measure like a life sentence is not enough. Capital punishment constitutes a more efficient deterrent. Death represents the deprivation of life, the greatest property, therefore capital punishment must be imposed to those who take this property from others.

It is said that life imprisonment ensures security. To this argument it must be answered that life imprisonment ensures the security to a certain extent, but is it enough and efficient? It may be but not in all cases.

Is the death penalty homicide? Homicide is forbidden by natural law. Now, according to some, the death penalty is homicide. The imposition of capital punishment must therefore be forbidden. So speak those who advocate the death penalty.

A solution must be found to the problem posed by the word "homicide". In fact, natural law does not forbid every kind of homicide. It does not object to the unjust homicide, that is when life is taken unfairly. That capital punishment constitutes unjust homicide must therefore be denied.

Some claim that an innocent man can be inflicted capital punishment and that, then, it is too late to make up for the judicial error. It is true that the death penalty can accidently be applied to the innocent, but the construction of automobiles or aircraft cannot be brought to a stop just because there are accidents. By the same token, because judicial errors are made—that is a fact—though seldom, it does not mean that we should depart from the basic principle.

However, to those who uphold the absolute right to life, it must be replied that murderers do not respect that right of others. If that right is absolute, the soldier who kills an enemy would be a criminal. The right to life is not absolute; it can be denied to those who do not respect it. The murderer who takes the life of another cannot claim absolute right to life to escape the death penalty.

Mr. Speaker, many people, in the past, have made representations to the government and I myself—and some of my colleagues as well—have suggested a referendum throughout Canada to ascertain public opinion and in order not to impose in an autocratic or dictatorial manner a measure which the people reject, which the people do not accept.

Let us go back to the years 1960, 1961, 1962, and examine statements made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), for instance, who was then Minister of Justice of Quebec. You could read in the papers: "Fantastic increase in murders in Quebec since 1961, (Mr. Claude Wagner)". And the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe invited the public to write the federal government that the death penalty should not be abolished.

Mr. Speaker, those were lawyers.

Another, a former federal Member of Parliament, Mr. Rémi Paul, a former Minister of Justice of Quebec, stated: "The death penalty is necessary for the protection of society". Not for purposes of revenge, but for purposes of justice, and in order not to encourage criminals at large, or potential criminals who, because the death penalty has been eliminated, have no respect for the life of others and, when they are caught, feel they must solicit clemency on the basis of their right to live.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members in this House assume quite peculiar positions concerning the death penalty. I actually heard members of this Parliament make a stand against those fighting abortion, openly advocating abortion. I have in mind members of the New Democratic Party, Progressive Conservatives, Liberals who accept abortion as a good thing and say that the solution or decision must rest with the mother or the woman and her doctor.

Mr. Speaker, abortion is a crime amounting to killing a child who never did anybody any harm. Some want to legalize it by way of legislation in this House of Commons and they have had a certain degree of success. However, the criminal, the killer, the thug, the assassin who takes life away after planning his crime, in the name of humanity, in the name of society, in the name of the right to live must be handled gently, spared the rope because he is a human being and we must not exercise vengeance against a human being.

Mr. Speaker, how can those people reconcile their stupid reasoning by saying you can kill a child before he is born but you have no right to kill him if he becomes a criminal later on.

Mr. Speaker, several studies have been made across Canada. I received letters from all parts of this country, as I said earlier, urging me to ask for the restoration of capital punishment. Some of my colleagues also received similar letters from their electors. I received one in January 1973—so it is not too long ago—from the Sept-Iles Chamber of Commerce, which is not located in my riding. That letter was addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and read as follows:

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Find enclosed a sworn compilation indicating the results of an official poll taken by the Sept-Iles Chamber of Commerce last December in the suburb area of the Manicouagan-Duplessis county on the subject of capital punishment.

The results of this poll lead us to think twice about—

I tell you quite honestly that if we conducted the same poll we would get similar results. And now this government wants to impose that legislation on us under the cover of freedom of vote, while saying: Vote with us!

I go on with the quotation:

The results of this poll lead us to think twice about the advisability of your government holding a national referendum to have the population express its opinion on the abolition or retention of capital punishment.

● (1530)

Now, if the referendum said: Yes, abolish capital punishment, then I would vote for that. I am all in favour of an innocent man not being condemned to the gallows, as soon as there is the least doubt concerning the culpability of a murderer, because he must be given the benefit of the doubt. But, when it has been proved that the murder was premeditated, that the criminal cannot possibly be rehabilitated, even if he were to be freed after 20 years, he must pay with his own life for having taken the life of another. And that is why we are in favour of polls being held across the country.

To quote again Mr. Jean L. Mailloux, the director of the Chamber of Commerce:

Many citizens are worried about your government's indecisive position on capital punishment for it is one of the most fundamental questions in a democratic country such as ours. We believe that, before taking a final decision, your government should consult the people of Canada.

Yours faithfully, etc.

And here are the main results of the poll in the Sept-Îles area:

1. In favour of abolishing the death penalty. Comments: Yes 35; No 210.

2. In favour of retaining the death penalty as enforced formerly. Comments: Yes 206; No 25.

3. Do you think that murders have increased in Canada over the last five years? Comments: Yes 220; No 17.

This is corroborated by the former Quebec Minister of Justice, who said in 1967 that murders had increased more than threefold in the province of Quebec alone.

I continue to quote:

4. Are you in favour of parole . . .

This is something rather different, but 63 were for it and 80 were against.

To continue:

5. Have you ever been a direct or indirect victim of the activities of a murderer? Comments: Yes 30; No 208.

This means that 208 Canadians have never been bothered by a murderer, but they nevertheless use their intelligence to judge the government's actions in this field.

Mr. Speaker, I have here other evidence. I have referred to Sept-Îles, but let us now turn to my own constituency, Témiscamingue, where I asked the question: Are you or are you not in favour of the death penalty? That is clear enough. The response was: 390 in favour, 92 against. There you have the opinion of people at the other end of Quebec province. Let us ask questions in other areas, in the English provinces.

Mr. La Salle: Don't forget my constituency.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Which constituency?

Mr. La Salle (Joliette): Joliette.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): It is my friend from the constituency of Joliette, I think.

Mr. Speaker, we see the same everywhere. I have in my hand a letter from a priest in Lévis who wrote to ask me to urge the government to re-establish capital punishment, not out of revenge, but for justice's sake.

When we consider what happened in Quebec in 1970 and when we see now the results and the consequences, we cannot but be puzzled. Here are individuals directly involved with the foul murder of a public man. One is released after two years and a half or three years.

An hon. Member: Just for fun.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Sure, it is just for fun that those three guys hid under a house, in a hole for rats. You will not make me believe that they hid in such a place just for the fun of it. It is because they had done something wrong which compelled them to go into hiding. People keep forgeting that and, in Quebec, they may come up with some legal gimmick which will make us believe that Pierre Laporte is still alive, that he has not been murdered.

Mr. Speaker, when faced with such a parody of justice, I am not the least surprised that Canadians have lost all confidence in the judiciary and the administration.

A few years ago, there was this gangster disguised as Santa Claus, in Ville Laval or Duvernay, I think it was—

An hon. Member: In Ville Saint-Laurent.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —yes, in Ville Saint-Laurent. He was disguised as Santa Claus as though to distribute gifts to small children at the shopping centre. He was there to take part in a hold-up. Not satisfied with having shot two policemen down, he put five slugs in their heads. I wonder if the killer is still in jail; perhaps he is out on parole; perhaps he is at large. There have been all sorts of escapes. An inmate escaped while supposedly watering the skating rink in Bordeaux, another escaped from Cowansville, another from Saint-Vincent-de-Paul—

An hon. Member: During a hockey game at the Forum—

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —during a hockey game at the Forum, and without a hose either.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Speaker, some odious crimes have been committed in the Shawinigan area. Two young girls, 15 or 16 years old, were picked up by two young bums, taken into the woods, raped and killed in cold blood. In the name of humanity, let us save those bums! One of them committed suicide in Saint-Vincent-de-Paul—

Mr. La Salle: He was quicker than the administration!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, quicker, the hon. member for Joliette is right. As another hon. member was saying the other day, it is easier to get out of jail than to get in.

Gangsters and bums are no sooner behind bars than they quickly get bailed out and find themselves free to roam the streets after two hours. That is how society is protected. Let us stop fooling the people. We are not against humanity, but in favour of it. But any man who has, not the courage but the nerve to go and kill his neighbour ought to realize, in the name of the most elementary justice, that he is putting his own life at stake. If he makes an attempt against his neighbour's life, all right; his own will be attacked. That is it. That is justice; not vengeance, but justice. No revenge would be exercised if this man acted like a human being. Why does he not do so? There are homicides, of course, involuntary homicides or manslaughters. But as regards sordid crime, we are for the restoration of capital punishment in order to punish it.

I have here another letter from Chandler. That community is not in my riding, but it is in favour of capital punishment. According to Mr. Armand Langlois, from Chandler in the riding of Gaspé South, we should act as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker, we have a lot of evidence. I have here a letter from Malton, Ontario, addressed to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand).

● (1540)

[English]

It is addressed the Hon. Warren Allmand, Solicitor General for Canada, Ottawa, Ontario and reads, in part:

> I urge, therefore, that you consider very carefully before you decide how to deal with this matter in any decisive way.
>
> My hope is you are inclined to listen to those we have in positions of authority, such as the chiefs of police, and the attorneys-general of the provinces, and guide yourself, according to their ideas.

[Translation]

For the reinstatement of capital punishment, let us again take the evidence of police chiefs at their convention. What did they advocate? The reinstatement of capital punishment because under the present act, if a criminal kills a policeman he should be sentenced to death. This act was never implemented those past five years. Policemen were murdered in cold blood. The murderers were convicted to life imprisonment. Capital punishment was not deemed fit for those people!

Mr. Speaker, while my opinion is that we should protect policemen and their families, I also think that the life of my children, my wife and wives of hon. members is as important as that of a prison guard or a policeman. They are human beings and gangsters do not have more right to assault a mother than a policeman. Then, capital punishment must be reinstated when there is deliberate, well proven murder. If it is not, let us give the accused the benefit of the doubt, as I said earlier.

I could quote a letter from Sudbury, Ontario. It even has references to articles from the Globe and Mail and to the Bible itself in support of the re-establishment of capital punishment. I have another letter dealing more harshly with our work in the House. It states the following:

[English]

It is so simple. Yet our idiot parliamentarians—

[Translation]

That's us!

[English]

—are unwilling or totally incapable of following the police chiefs of Canada and their wise advice. The citizens of Canada want restorations of severe penalties if we are to combat—all the ills in our society and those people who are trying——to undermine our youth with drugs and crime.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I could have brought in a complete file of documents to prove how strongly Canadians favour the re-establishment of capital punishment. I shall now quote a letter from Victoria, British Columbia:

[English]

As a citizen of Canada, I am writing in regard to the matter of capital punishment, shortly to come up for review in parliament.

[Translation]

This is what we are reviewing right now.

[English]

I am a believer of the Lord Jesus Christ; we thank God for the favourable government in this country, and pray constantly that those in authority may be helped to do what is right.

I feel strongly that capital punishment should be reinstated fully in Canada—because it is a morally right principle, set up by God and supported in the scriptures, which are the inspired word of God. In Romans chapter 13, it says: "Rulers are not a terror to a good work, but to an evil one . . . if thou practisest evil, fear; for it bears not the sword in vain; for it is God's minister, an avenger for wrath to him that does evil". Genesis, chapter 9, verse 6, says: "Whoso sheds Man's blood, by Man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God, He hath made him".

I trust that you will find these few sentences helpful in arriving at a right judgment as to this important matter.

Yours sincerely

Sam Burrowes

[Translation]

B-U-R-R-O-W-E-S, from Victoria, B.C.

I have here another letter from Winnipeg, another from Niagara, one from Toronto, asking for the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, we have countless examples such as those and I say that if there were a referendum in Canada, 85 or 90 per cent of the electors would say: Reinstate capital punishment but as it was before. I say so to present miscarriages of justice, but capital punishment must be reinstated in order to prevent more and more filthy crimes from being committed in the future.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

I gave a while ago examples of a falsified justice, under which the gangster is almost more important than society, and I am always asking myself the following question: Should we pass laws to protect society against gangsters or gangsters against society? That is what we should ask ourselves. If we wish to protect gangsters, let us follow the course we have already taken. But if we wish to protect the life of our children, of our society, of our social classes, of our workers, of our farmers, of our aged people who are being bound hand and foot at every turn in the Montreal-Trois-Rivières area by scoundrels who steal $200 or $300 from them, we must take the necessary measures. Once gangsters are denounced, they are prosecuted; but we do not have sufficient evidence. Let them commit another crime tomorrow night, as they have thrown off the mask. When they are finally recaptured, we tell them: We let you out on bail! Get back on the street. If you did not get enough last night, try to mug two more persons tonight. Gangsters knock out or kill car or taxi drivers, for instance, to steal $30 or $40 from them. If those people have a heart I really wonder where our supposedly well organized society is leading us. I realize that capital punishment will not eliminate all criminals, and everybody knows it. But if there were at least that sword of Damocles to deter those who could be tempted to commit murder I believe that justice across Canada would be significantly improved.

In any event, the evidence that we receive as well as my attitude and that of my colleagues are not likely to hinder the overall administration of justice in Canada far from it. We want a more reasonable justice, a justice that respects and protects society. I think that the reinstatement of capital punishment would tend to reduce the number of crimes across Canada. I think we have had enough of the abuses observed since the abolition of capital punishment five years ago. It is time to reinstate it, not only to punish or seek revenge against criminals but also for the ultimate purpose of protecting society.

● (1550)

[English]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, the current debate on capital punishment has been before parliament and the country for several months. From that, it is obvious the issue is not clearcut and that the decision as to whether it should be retained is not an easy one to reach. This bill does not really ask us to make a decision on that point. The bill neither retains capital punishment nor abolishes it, or, conversely, it both retains and abolishes it. It is a bill which negates the arguments in favour of capital punishment as well as those against it, and leaves everyone frustrated with a non-decision. I suppose one might say the situation is rather typical of the present government and its method of carrying out the mandate given by the people of Canada. It is obvious that the present government is not willing to make decisions on important matters such as this, and it is obvious that it is not willing to live up to the responsibility of enforcing the law as it now stands and has stood over the past five years.

I have very grave doubts as to whether there is any intention on the part of the government to enforce the law which will follow should this bill pass. Combining the performance in the application of the law dealing with capital punishment as well as in the administration of penitentiaries and rehabilitation programs, one might easily conclude that the trend under the present administration is to accept as normal ever increasing amounts of crime as well as ever increasing numbers of murders.

There have been many speeches made by representatives of the government, including several ministers. I did not hear all of them, but it is my impression that none of them indicated any willingness to live up to the law as it has stood over the past five years in relation to carrying out executions of murderers of police and prison guards, and no minister to my knowledge has indicated there is any willingness to carry out this particular aspect of the law over the period of the next five years should this bill pass.

It strikes me as rather hypocritical that the government is not willing to take a position. If it is the intention of the government to abolish capital punishment, which was the tenor of the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) as well as others, then why not do it? The Solicitor General has indicated that capital punishment for murder of a prison guard or policeman will be retained only as a concession to policemen and prison guards. He might have created the impression in the next breath that they do not intend to carry out that part of this law. This is an example of the lack of courage on the part of the government to carry out its own laws.

If the Solicitor General is truly convinced that capital punishment is not a deterrent, then why leave it in the bill? On the other hand, if he is of the opinion that capital punishment is useful as a deterrent in cases of murder of policemen and prison guards, people who are exposed to unusual amounts of danger, then surely he has to admit it is also a deterrent in cases of murders of any other type of individual.

However, let us take a look at some of the statistics. Prior to the trial period commencing in 1967 an average of 222 persons other than policemen or prison guards were murdered in each of the preceding seven years. That is a period when the death penalty was in effect for all capital murders. For the following four years when the death penalty was abolished for murders of individuals other than policemen and prison guards the average number of murders rose to 376. The figure for 1971 was 422, nearly double the average in the years preceding abolition. It seems to me that no argument is better than the actual figures. These figures indicate to me a very significant increase in the number of murders since abolition occurred. While the abolitionists put forward various arguments that other crimes have also increased, in my view they are irrelevant as far as the present debate is concerned. The fact is that the number of murders has nearly doubled with abolition, and that is a fact we must not forget.

If we look at the comparable figures for the same 11 year period in respect of the murder of policemen and prison guards, for which capital punishment has been retained, we find the increase was from 3.6 murders annually prior to the suspension to 4 per year following the suspension. If we put this into a similar range of figures for comparison purposes, as I have given for other types, it would increase from 360 to 400, a much less significant increase in the murder rate of individuals for whom capital punishment was retained, even though the deterrent effect of this was significiantly diluted by commutation. This comparison has to be looked at as a very significant and major factor in this decision making process.

I previously said this bill does not really do anything for anyone. Those who are abolitionists can vote for the bill because it partially abolishes capital punishment, but they can also vote against it because it partially retains capital punishment. So, the abolitionists can, with a nearly clear conscience, vote either for or against it. Those who are retentionists can also vote for the bill because it retains capital punishment in some cases, and they can also vote against it because it abolishes capital punishment in certain cases. So, those who are retentionists can also vote for or against the bill with a nearly clear conscience.

The whole point is that the government has failed to make a decision or, if it has made a decision, it did not have the courage to put it into the form of legislation. As a matter of fact, the debate on this issue, for the reasons I have just stated, does not call on anyone to indicate whether he is for or against the abolition or retention of capital punishment because no matter where you stand you can vote for or against this particular bill. My firm belief is that the bill does not really change anything. If it passes, we will continue the same manner of law enforcement and the same treatment for convicted murderers because of the right the cabinet has to commute sentences.

Experience since 1962 shows that all convicted murderers have received commutations. From the remarks by the ministers and the Prime Minister, we have no reason to believe the situation in the next five years will be any different. If this bill is defeated, then the pre-1967 law will be in effect and the cabinet will still have the right to commute death sentences. Therefore, if the bill is defeated we have no reason to believe the cabinet will not continue to commute death sentences, just as it has done in the past. When we examine these facts we begin to wonder what the purpose of this bill is, and what the purpose is of putting forward a bill of this nature when the end result in the handling of murderers will be the same. As a matter of fact, it would have been the same had this bill not been before parliament and had this debate not taken place at all. In short, the debate on capital punishment is an exercise in futility because it is very doubtful that there will be any changes as a result of it in the application of the law or indeed in the treatment administered to convicted murderers.

● (1600)

The Association of Police Chiefs refutes the effectiveness of rehabilitation, and we all know that rehabilitation does not always work. We all know also that murderers who are imprisoned for the precribed period of time and then released on parole have, on occasion, murdered again. The main argument against capital punishment which I can accept, and which really makes good sense to me, is the possibility that an innocent person could be executed. That argument in itself is almost enough to convince me that capital punishment should be abolished. But if we look on the other side of the coin, we find that murderers who have been imprisoned and released have murdered again, executing an innocent individual without trial, without charge and without judge and jury. While I do not have firm statistics on this, it would appear that the possibility of a murderer murdering again is much higher than the possibility of the Crown hanging an innocent person. So, we must decide where our obligation to society really lies.

I want to point out that I do not feel emotional about this issue. I am looking at it as objectively as I can. While I have dedicated a portion of my life to the saving of people's lives through the work I have done in the past as a physician, the arguments in favour of retention of capital punishment seem to be much stronger than those in favour of abolition of it. I know from information obtained that there are some types of personalities that are not capable of rehabilitation. I know also there is no way to determine whether a murderer will murder again until he actually does it. There has been a significant amount of discussion as to whether criminals should be treated by means of a rehabilitation program only or whether punishment should be part of the treatment as well. I am of the impression that discipline is a good thing and that it can be better achieved through the use of selective punishment. But I agree also with those who say that discipline should not be carried out as a form of revenge, but rather as a rehabilitation measure in itself.

From the statistics I have previously read, I am convinced that capital punishment does have a deterrent effect, in spite of the emotional arguments put forward by the abolitionists. Quotations have been used which suggest that convicted murderers have indicated they did not think of capital punishment at the time they committed murders. There have also been quotations of statements made by individuals who had committed a crime indicating that they would have committed murder had they not been afraid of capital punishment. So, arguments incorporating this approach cancel each other out. I think we must look at this question from the point of view of protection of society, particularly in respect of repetition of murder by the same individual. This of course could be done by a mandatory life sentence without the possibility of parole, but that so far as I am concerned does not carry the same degreee of deterrent effect.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we must consider the views of the population of Canada. It has been clearly indicated in many studies and constituency surveys by various members, including myself, that the majority of Canadians are in favour of retention of capital punishment because of its deterrent value. The practice of commutation in respect of all capital punishment sentences in the past few years is of some concern to me because it undermines the authority of the law and of parliament. If parliament passes a law which suggests capital punishment for certain crimes, then the government is obligated to live by this law. The cabinet has not been doing so, creating the impression that the cabinet itself disregards the law as it exists. The average Canadian might well say if the cabinet does not live by the laws it passes, why should I? Therefore, this practice of commutation of the sentence of all murderers is not acceptable. If commutation is the course the government desires to follow, then it should bring in a bill which would abolish capital punishment completely. This would give members in this House a clear-cut bill on which to express an opinion. Once that is done, the government should be prepared to live with that decision.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, because the whips are not here we can disagree with our colleagues. It is rather interesting for me to follow my hon. friend who, as he mentioned, is a physician. However, the figures he quoted, obviously in an effort to support his case, concerning the repetition of murders by the same murderer conveniently overlook an important point. It is my information that only one such murder has occurred in the last 20 years. I am open to correction on this. The other point on which I must disagree with him is the matter of commutation. Commutation, the royal prerogative of mercy, has not changed. It was not changed by the law of 1967 and it will not be changed by this law. I very much hope the cabinet would continue the practice of commuting sentences. However, I do not see how that aspect of the debate adds very much to the issue.

In any event, I am an abolitionist and have been a convinced one for many years. I think there have been many eloquent speeches in support of this bill, but sadly the discussion is really a continuation of other debates on the subject which have grown in intensity during the past 10 or 15 years. It is a pity—and here is where I indict the government—that the government and parliament seem unable to face the issue squarely and abolish capital punishment once and for all, because this debate will have to be repeated in another five years. I think in a sense we are postponing the inevitable. I believe it is a pity we did not face this issue in 1967. We are faced with it again now, and we will have to face it again in a period of five years.

I wonder whether in all the words which have been spoken—and I certainly include the words I will say—in this and in other debates on the subject, the case for abolition has been put more shortly, more convincingly and with more personal feeling than did Mrs. Pauline Maitland, a brave widow of a brave Toronto policeman brutally murdered in February, 1973 while on duty. This young woman, facing not the strident and blood-curdling outcries of constituents which make many of us cringe, but the terrible tragedy of her husband's death said, "I don't believe in capital punishment. Taking another life would not bring my husband back." I think really that that says it all. I can think of no more poignant statement, and I rather apologize for taking another few minutes, Mr. Speaker, because Pauline Maitland has said all that parliament needs to say on this issue of capital punishment.

I happen to be a convinced abolitionist and will vote for this bill as the second best alternative to outright ending of the death penalty. The death penalty, of all forms of punishments, is the one most rarely carried out. The last hanging in this country took place in 1962, but as members of parliament we do not seem able to take the final legislative step which would end state killing forever.

This is a curious dabate because very few of us will be moved by what others, who are opposed to our views, say on the issue. It is a debate in the sense that people are making their speeches for the record. Some of us, of course, will resort to techniques and excuses for delaying a decision which is inevitable.

I have heard of some colleagues who are frantically polling their constituents by means of thousands of questionnaires. Well, here speaks a rather old fashioned parliamentarian. I had understood that my role as a member of parliament, in our system of responsible and representative government, was not to be beholden to opinion polls, in which ofttimes the questions are over simplified. I really wonder if we should take refuge behind somewhat simplistic questionnaires. Rather, should we not tell people where we stand and, if they do not approve, they have many opportunities to tell us that they do not approve. I have taken part in five general elections since 1962. Surely, the people of the constituency I have the privilege of representing have had many opportunities to indicate to me whether they approve or do not approve of my being an abolitionist. I have never hidden it. I have discussed it at election time, but I have not sent out a questionnaire on the subject, and I have no intention of doing so.

I am an abolitionist because I can find no evidence that convinces me that the death penalty is a deterrent. Quite the contrary, I feel that the certain knowledge that nothing lies ahead but the death penalty may well mean that hijackers, or perpetrators of other crimes punishable by death, may take a much more fatalistic and devil-may-care attitude. They have nothing to lose. The death penalty exercises a baneful effect on the administration of justice, arousing mistaken sympathy for the defendant even when guilty. The cabinet surely must understand that statement. Capital punishment cases make bad law. In many jurisdictions increasing difficulty has been found in getting juries to find defendants guilty because of the cruel finality of the punishment involved. Hanging brutalizes us. Hanging is a defeat of society. Hanging substitutes the violence of the state for the violence of a criminal. I assert that there is no proof that the death penalty has special deterrent power against crime, and up to now I have heard no evidence during the speeches of the retentionists which proves otherwise. For the state to take life as an act of retribution demeans the state and makes hangmen of us all.

Throughout my public life I have been trying to find the key to a mystery. I suppose the answer is understood by sociologists. It is this: why should there be such an emotional fervour surrounding debate on this issue? As Dr. Thorsten Selling put it:

> Attitudes toward it are rooted deep in the sentiments of people and arouse powerful emotions whenever its justification is questioned. Antagonists bombard each others with "facts" (which are rarely facts at all). Beliefs and opinions are offered, often without substantiation, in support of one or the other viewpoint, and the Holy Writ is liberally quoted by both sides.

I am grateful for the eloquent and timely statement on capital punishment, on the very matter of quoting the Bible to support a point of view, which was given recently by the Conference of Catholic Bishops, who now join many other religious denominations in Canada in their opposition to capital punishment. The Catholic bishops spoke of the scandal that is inherent in utilizing selective parts of scripture in support of a fundamentalist point of view. I think it is a sad commentary that we have to resort to these techniques. I happen to believe that one's religion or lack of it is a private matter, and people who parade their piety make me nervous as well as suspicious. Nevertheless, it is comforting to have the major churches in our country speak clearly and without equivocation about this issue.

Some parade what to me—and it is a plural society, we all admit that—are narrow biblical quotations, forgetting or deliberately ignoring what I suggest is an enlarged and uplifting addition to the Bible, namely what we find in the New Testament. Fortunately, we are not engaged in a theological exercise. I certainly would not presume to be an expert in this area. What I can do is to add to the sum of what I think is social policy, to add an opinion, supported eventually I hope by a vote for abolition. I am helped in this by scientific inquiry, but scientific inquiry is not an end in itself. It provides only the data upon which politicians must take decisions.

As a New Brunswicker, the most convincing fact to me is that the State of Maine, which shares a common border with us, abolished capital punishment in the year 1886, almost 90 years ago. Actually, Maine had abolished it before that, and returned capital punishment for about three years until the final abolition took place in 1886. Maine people and New Brunswick people come from the same socio-economic background. Their geography in relation to their respective countries, the United States and Canada, is similar. I have checked the figures, and I am afraid I am repeating myself because I used this in the debate in 1967. However, I was glad to see that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) picked up this example of Maine and New Brunswick.

As I say, I have checked the figures from 1886 to 1971. For those who are made uncomfortable by concepts in world or macro terms, I thought this backyard or micro-analysis should prove relevant and helpful. I find that the murder rate in the state of Maine is not revelantly different from the rate in the province of New Brunswick, one with capital punishment and the other where capital punishment has been abolished for 90 years. During the years that capital punishment has been a major and important issue I have had a chance to read statements on this subject, statements which to me go the complete range from the sublime to the shrill. I will not take up the time of the House to list those writers who have impressed me most, although I must say that Albert Camus' "Reflections on the Guillotine" and Arthur Koestler's "Reflections on Hanging" are eloquent books which require no embellishment from me.

A more up-to-date statement, if members are made nervous by books written a few years ago, appeared in The New Republic of February 3, 1973, and a couple of paragraphs are relevant to this debate. The editorial was discussing the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States of last spring that the death penalty as now administered in the United States is unconstitutional. The editorial reads:

> The argument for the death penalty—the only civilized argument, since all that's left otherwise is vengeance—is that it may deter. It obviously does not deter numerous crimes, but it may—no one can be sure one way or the other—deter some premeditated crimes, like hijacking, whose commission is contemplated by a sane, cold-blooded, smart, well-informed, calculating person. Ever then, the death penalty will deter only if the threat of it is credible, which is to say, if law enforcement and the administration of justice work speedily and effectively. If they do, as they now generally do not, although with respect to hijacking there has been improvement, then penalties other than the capital one will probably deter no less than capital punishment.

The decisive argument, therefore, is the humane argument. Society ought not to kill. There is enough killing, in just wars, in self-defence, to protect the innocent in an emergency, which cannot be helped, and enough killing in error. But society ought not to kill by deliberate choice. It brutalizes us, not to speak of what it does to the agent we employ to do our killing.

Mr. Speaker, I have been indulging in a bit of self-analysis. By this I have hoped to avoid traces of arrogance in my certainty that by voting for abolition I am taking the correct stand. Colleagues whom I respect tell us of the agony of their decision; phrases such as "loneliness" and "soul wrestling" make me wonder if my assurance on this issue and, if I can put it in these terms, my serenity about the stand that I take might have overtones of blindness. Yet, what more can a person do than study the issues, analyse the data, read the evidence, examine the world-wide trend toward ending capital punishment and then reach the decision and vote and "let the devil take the hindmost" as the expression goes. I am aware that man's long struggle toward civilization has had periods of dynamism and periods of stagnation. By passing this bill, the parliament of Canada would add an important forward step in man's eternal search for civility.

May I end as I began, by quoting the poignant words of Pauline Maitland, a policeman's widow: "I don't believe in capital punishment. Taking another life would not bring my husband back." Should not this House of Commons say "amen" to that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) has noted, there have been many speeches on this subject in recent weeks. I confess that I do not expect to be able to add much if anything new but I do feel, not for the record but in order to try to impress upon all of us my perspective on this issue, that I should like to say a few words.

Perhaps I am in the minority: I, for one, did not come to this debate with any fixed opinion. Not having been a member in the parliament of 1967, I did not have to take a public position on the matter: I suppose, as I look back, I was mildly abolitionist at that time. But as I approached this debate, I really did so with an open mind—that is with as much of an open mind as I could muster, and I have tried to evaluate the expressions of opinion which have been repeatedly made to me by my constituents as well as my colleagues. I am bound to say, however, that without for a moment denigrating the importance of the vote on this bill I feel that capital punishment per se is not the issue of greatest concern to the public at the present time. It has perhaps become a symbol of a wider worry but I do not believe in itself it is the crucial area of concern.

I think there is a wider worry which goes well beyond whether a person should be hanged for committing the crime of murder. It is a worry which is easily recognizable to governments, and I am sure it is recognizable to this government, a worry sometimes expressed in the loose terminology of law and order but a worry which is focussed on an awareness of what appears to be increasing crimes of violence, a worry about public safety and security. One does not have to be particularly sensitive to appreciate how much less casual air travel is these days than ten years ago; one does not have to be particularly sensitive to appreciate that slowly there appears to be growing in our urban areas problems generically similar to those being experienced in other large cities on this continent. I think that public concern, that wider worry about public safety and security, is a legitimate concern and one to which this parliament must respond.

I shall support this bill because I do not believe the retention or extension or capital punishment is in any sense a response to this wider worry. Although to many, many people it is something of a symbol, to me it is not in any useful way an answer. I suggest that this debate, which may well have gone on long enough, has been useful in that it has enabled parliament to focus on this wider problem of public security, on such matters as the administration of bail, procedures of sentencing, and provisions for parole.

I am not a lawyer and I am not an expert in this area. I, myself, am given to at least some of the same kind of anxieties as I am sure my constituents are, perhaps in my ignorance but none the less I feel these anxieties. I would like to be fully assured, first of all, that this parliament—and I am using the term "parliament" rather than "government", Mr. Speaker, because this is in a sense a nonpartisan vote—is sufficiently sensitive to this wider concern that, having dealt with this bill, it will not simply say "That's that" for five years.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and other members of the government including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have given assurances that they will be receptive in committee to suggestions for amendments dealing with such matters as parole. The other day the Prime Minister appeared to give the assurance that he was aware of this mounting public concern. I shall support this bill on second reading and hope that those assurances take concrete form in committee stage.

I want to re-emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that I think it would be a very, very serious mistake for parliament to conclude that passage of this bill, satisfies in any meaningful way, the wider worries to which I have alluded. I, therefore, would urge upon government and upon the appropriate authorities, some of whom may in fact be provincial as well as federal, that we not let the matter drop there. The public, in my judgment, has a profound right to express its viewpoint on this wide range of anxieties. It has the right to be heard and the right to influence the course of legislation and other decisions which will follow.

I confess that, on this particular matter, I do not believe this present House of Commons has been a particularly accurate channel for the reflection of that public anxiety. Each one of us will explain his vote according to his own lights. Some members have quoted Edmund Burke, who was by no means a democrat, I might add, in defence of their right to make up their own minds. I am not questioning the right of members of parliament to make up their own minds. I am not altogether sure, however, once we have done so in the fairly certain knowledge that we are not representing the general will of our constituents, that we should necessarily be awarded a bouquet. I think some of us are too anxious to take credit for the fact that, on this issue, we are not being representative. However, whether we are being representative or not, whether or not our votes will sufficiently represent the public anxiety, I do not think the matter should be allowed to be dropped at that point.

I should like to see ordinary members of the public given a much greater opportunity to express themselves in front of some body or group which represents those who will in the end be making decisions on the wider issues of public safety and security. I do not care whether that is a royal commission, a task force or a joint federal-provincial group. When we run into difficulties on matters such as airports, we are quite ready to set up inquiries that go on for one year or two in order to establish that the public shall have every right to express its view. We hear much talk about the value of participatory democracy. Yet on this issue concerning public safety and security, I sense a tendency to reserve the solution of this particular problem for the experts, the parliamentarians, the lawyers and those who have made a study of this matter. Perhaps, unconsciously, we have brought to bear on this subject a somewhat elitist, somewhat narrowly restricted focus.

I should like to see the public given a far greater opportunity to express itself, not through the medium of any member of parliament, but on its own behalf. Let the members of the public have a chance to confront, to ask questions, and to be answered by those who have responsibility for administering and deciding in the whole area of public safety. I think that would be useful in two ways. First, it would give those in positions of responsibility, perhaps, a first hand impression of the nature and intensity of public opinion. At the same time it would provide a channel in the other direction, by which the public itself might become aware to a greater extent than at present of the parameters of this problem. I think we should make a far greater effort than we have made before to invite public participation on a first hand basis in our discussions on the whole question of public safety and security. Let us not leave this matter merely to lawyers and parliamentarians. In considering this problem, let us give as much opportunity for public input as if we were considering an airport or other matter of public policy.

I do not believe that voting one way or the other on this bill is going to do much about the wider worries I have expressed. I believe it is our duty to do something about those wider worries and to seek ways to deal with them. I hope that as this bill proceeds to the committee stage and becomes law, as I hope it will, that this parliament and the government will not let that wider concern drop but will immediately make a visible effort to engage the public in a substantial dialogue or exchange of opinion on this whole subject. If we do not do that then I suggest that five years hence the public's concern over the substantial problems of public security will be even more out of symmetry with the purposes of this bill or its successor than it is at present.

I do not think we, as legislators, can permit ourselves the luxury of merely voting on a bill of this kind and saying that the matter is settled, at least for five years. It will not be settled. I think we have a profound responsibility to look beyond the issue of capital punishment, to the larger problem of public security. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that that will be a matter of high priority on the agenda of this parliament and, I would hope, on the agendas of the legislatures of the provinces.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it has become more and more apparent to me during this afternoon's debate that not only the press, television and radio but even members of Parliament are completely mistaken as to the precise meaning of the bill before us.

I have heard some hon. members, and even one of my most highly respected colleagues, arguing for total abolition of capital punishment. That is beside the point, because the 1961 act is in force today. What has in fact happened is that the moratorium expired on December 31 last.

And the government is now returning to the attack and asking us to renew the same five-year moratorium retroactively from January 1. This has nothing at all to do with abolishing capital punishment!

Why therefore do we hear and read in the papers about—

[English]

Why are we hearing about a hanging bill, about a retention of capital punishment? What is all this discussion about the abolition of capital punishment? It is totally out of order in this debate. The question before us is, should there be or should there not be an extension of the five-year moratorium, that is, of the law presently embodied in the Criminal Code. There is a redefinition in the law that applied during the moratorium of what is capital murder. In the present bill that same definition is preserved. It is confined to the murder of a policeman on duty, of a peace officer, of a security guard, and of a prison guard on duty, and that is all. There are limitations also in minimum sentences that a convicted murderer must serve. The convicted murderer sentenced to life must serve a minimum of ten years. There are othe restrictions, as well.

What actual difference has the limitation of categories liable to capital punishment made? I say, Mr. Speaker, it has not made one bit of difference because, since 1962, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the other day, and the proof of the pudding is in the eating, there has been an automatic and consistent use of the royal prerogative, something that should be rare and should be used only in the appropriate cases. However, there has been what I call an abuse of the royal prerogative.

● (1640)

[Translation]

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if, in the excitement of the end of 1970 and the beginning of 1971, during the unfortunate crisis in the province of Quebec, the phrase "police or security officer" applied, under the act, to a soldier in a peace-keeping rôle. If a member of the FLQ, or anyone else, had murdered a soldier, from one end of the country to the other there would have been cries of: "To the gallows, post-haste". And the cabinet would have agreed.

[English]

Those were cases where the cabinet could have utilized that sense of authority that was assumed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and some of his ministers at that time. One remembers their television appearances at the time of the crisis calling for the apprehension and punishment of people committing the dastardly crimes of the day. Is there any difference between those men or any man, woman or child whose life is wrongfully taken as described under the terms of the law as it exists? What is the differentiation between those people and a policeman or prison guard?

Last night over television, a man described capital punishment as murder. How does he describe the killing of the man in Toronto who killed two policemen and was then shot by a third policeman? What about men killed by police when fleeing from the scene of an armed robbery and there is an exchange of gunfire? Is that also legalized murder? I suggest it is sophistry. People are entitled to hold those views, but I disagree with them most violently because capital punishment exacted by the state is for the security of its citizens and is in no way legalized murder.

I insist that the individual citizen has the right to the protection of his life. The state has to assume that. If the state abdicates that right, we will have gun law and an individual will have the right to carry a gun or another weapon to defend his life. That is the alternative. I find it somewhat strange that society is castigated as being a collective murderer for punishing an individual who has wrongfully and maliciously taken the life of an innocent fellow citizen, whether it is a two year old child or an 85 year old woman.

There are great cries about the fact that there is no proof that capital punishment is a deterrent. Has anyone ever canvassed the nation to ask how many men or women did not kill because they were afraid of capital punishment? After all, they did not kill anyone and so how could they be found. It could also be said that 15 years hard labour is no deterrent to armed robbery because there are still many armed robberies. However, how many people have contemplated armed robbery but were not prepared to face the potential penalty? People will not come forward and say, "I was one of those who was deterred by the penalty".

It is an exercise in sophistry to say that capital punishment is no proven deterrent to committing murder. The burden is not on those who say that the law of 1961 is the correct law to prove the value of capital punishment. The legalistic burden is upon those who seek to change the law. No amount of self-righteous wrapping of cloths of so-called intellectual or civilized superiority over a fellow citizen will add one cubit of additional value to their arguments. It has been reported in various newspapers and said in this House that abolitionists are more civilized than others, and that we will progress to a higher civilization by the abolition of capital punishment. That is a sort of self-proclaimed aura of moral superiority which only has validity by reason of the fact that it is being stated.

I find it strange when I read in the press and hear in this House statements, such as the one made this afternoon by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier), that this debate has gone on long enough and parliament should turn to other matters. Those who say that have made up their minds. They have had an opportunity to speak. However, we are not debating a matter of government policy upon which party stands have been taken. Some parties have indicated they have a party stand on this issue. At least one party has done so. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated the other day that there was to be a free vote. I do not know what has happened to government supporters in the last couple of days, though; they will not be heard through the press, because at the present time there is not one person in the press gallery.

An hon. Member: Yes, there is.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is. I beg his pardon. But the press are not going to interpret what members say to their constituents. Only in one or two newspapers does one see reports of the debate which has been going on here for a number of days. Yet during the election campaign this was a major issue, one which candidates debated at their forums in many parts of the country. In some constituencies this may not have been the case but as far as my constituency is concerned it was an issue which was raised at almost every meeting. I must justify my stand before the electors if this bill is to be subject to a free vote. I cannot simply say I voted with my party, because it is obvious there are many differences of opinion within my own party on this issue, just as, hopefully, there will be within the government party, provided the vote is really a free vote and there is not a "transparent whip". I know that other parties will treat it as a free vote. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) can have both a party vote and an independent vote, but that is all right.

In any case, since the government has announced that there is to be a free vote, there is no urgency attached to the matter. So far in 1973 some eleven people have been charged under the law of 1961, people whose cases have not been disposed of. The procedure for appeals and so forth is open to them, and at the end of the road there is still the royal prerogative. So, no one will wrongly pay the penalty should the decision of the House ultimately be to grant the moratorium. No priority is attached to this legislation, none whatsoever. Yet it has been brought forward, and since this has been done on the basis of a free vote, members must declare themselves. We have to speak while the debate is on.

Members have the right to speak, and I find it particularly offensive to hear journalists and others say the debate has gone on too long. They have had the luxury of making up their minds and they want to turn to something else regardless of the fact that parliament, which is a national forum, continues to discuss the matter. I also find it odd that under the criminal law of Canada, which is in force from Newfoundland to Vancouver, there should be a declaration by an attorney general of one province that he would determine what charges should be laid. Are the people of Saskatchewan, in the matter of the criminal law, to be treated differently from those in any other province?

I say this is an abuse of the prerogatives of a provincial attorney general.

I objected to the law being changed in 1967 because it seemed to me at that time that a double-cross had been played on parliament. A year earlier, on a private member's resolution concerning the question of abolition or retention, the House had divided strongly in favour of the retention of capital punishment. Yet less than a year later the government came back with a bill, on which there was no free vote allowed for government members, introducing the present moratorium. Oh, they threw in a sop about prison guards and policemen, a sop which abused every argument used by government speakers in support of abolition, that is, the assertion that it is morally wrong to take the life of a convicted murderer. All of the arguments, esoteric and otherwise, in favour of the abolition of capital punishment were swept aside by the government when it introduced the equivalent of Bill C-2 in 1967.

I find the consequences extremely difficult to explain to any citizen of Canada. A few cases immediately occur to me. What about an old age pensioner who is mortally wounded in an exchange of fire during a robbery at a bank or a credit union? What about a bank employee, male or female, who is killed during a bank robbery? What about the grocer at the little corner store who is attacked by a couple of hoodlums and knifed or bludgeoned to death? What about the case in Toronto the other day when a 75-year-old woman was assaulted by two or three men and kicked repeatedly in the head, over a matter of a few dollars? She was grievously injured. If she dies, is there any reason the treatment of those cowards who attacked her should be any different from the treatment meted out to one who shoots a policeman or kills a prison guard? I just cannot see the reason for any difference. Whose life is the more sacrosanct—that of a peace officer or that of an ordinary citizen?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 40, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Recovery of income tax from employees stationed in United States—Refusal by corporation—Position of minister; the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Agriculture—Farm machinery—Implementation of recommendations of Barber Commission—Action to increase imports; the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—Transport—Alleged deterioration in western Canada railway passenger service—Request for investigation.

Disclosure of Documents

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills and notices of motions (papers).

[English]

Since there are no private members' bills for discussion, the House will proceed to consider notices of motion for the production of papers. I will call upon the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, there might be agreement to consider motion No. 87 on the order paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REQUEST FOR COPY OF PROGRAMS FORECAST OF DEPARTMENT, INCLUDING BUDGETS A, B, X

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a complete copy (including budgets A, B, X) of the Program Forecast (Program Review) by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the latest year for which parliament approved departmental expenditures.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) on a point of order.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to you that, since we did not have time to consult the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), who had a motion on the order paper, I should be glad if we might agree to pass on to Notice of Motion No. 87 for the production of papers, with the provision that we will return as soon as possible to Notice of Motion No. 78 in the name of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations in the usual manner as to what motions would be called, and I can assure the hon. member for Shefford that the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Bellechasse will stand and retain its position.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I must point out however to the hon. member that as a result of an agreement among hon. members, the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse keeps its rank. I do not believe there is any problem in this regard. In any event, the hon. member being absent from the House, it might perhaps be difficult to proceed with his motion for papers.

[English]

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, this order, along with a number of others of a similar nature, was proposed by me for one very fundamental reason. As a member of parliament it is my responsibility, along with my colleagues, to vote my approval or otherwise of some $18.5 billion worth of expenditures by the federal government on the basis of information that is all too scanty and all too difficult to obtain, and to arrive at a judgment counselled by some educated information as to the nature of government programs and their value.

At the moment members of parliament basically have available to them information contained in the blue book of estimates, which is a veritable sea of figures. Perhaps a member who has been here for a generation or longer may be able to find his way through them, but most of us have not been here for that long. I feel sure that most of us encounter difficulty and frustration in trying to find information on the basis of which we can come to some kind of sensible judgment as to the wisdom of various programs and as to whether or not funds are being spent in the wisest possible way.

It is true that in recent years the presentation of the estimates has been altered somewhat, and there are now contained in that blue book program descriptions and outlines of objectives which, frankly, shed no light on the expenditure programs detailed in its pages, pages that probably were written several years ago and which are hardly changed from year to year. I had occasion yesterday in a committee meeting to be referred to one of these descriptions by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), and I think it was evident, as he read it out to me, how useless it would have been in answering the question I had asked; and I suspect that the President of the Treasury Board was himself privately embarrassed. The order of the House for the provision of a complete copy of the Program Forecast of this ministry, and indeed of others for which I have asked, is for the purpose of establishing some logical basis for judging the value of government programs.

Reference is made in the motion to budgets A, B and X. Not all hon. members may be aware of the meaning of these interesting designations. Budget A is the forecast expenditures of the department, taking into account those activities of an on-going nature. That is to say, if one took the activities of the previous year and attached current year costs to them, that would be budget A. Budget B contains an estimate of the costs attached to new programs and activities that the department wishes to undertake. Budget X, which perhaps would be the most revealing of all, indicates those programs which, in the judgment of the department, are of the lowest priority and might well be cut out if it were necessary to provide funds for the items referred to in budget B.

It seems to me a matter of common sense that the kind of information contained in these Program Forecasts be made available to Members of Parliament who, in the end, must give their approval or otherwise of multibillion dollar federal expenditures. If this information is good enough for the Treasury Board, I suggest it is good enough for parliament. These Program Forecasts are made available in great detail to the Treasury Board and its officials as they attempt to determine the spending priorities of the government for the coming years. Yet they are withheld from Members of Parliament.

Putting the best light upon it, one can only assume that the government feels that if such figures were made available to members of parliament we would abuse them, use them to narrow political advantage, misunderstand them, and that they would be beyond our competence to assess and therefore we had better not have them. Putting it in its worst light, this seems to me to be a deliberate attempt to withhold from parliament, which historically and traditionally is sovereign in the granting of supply, the very evidence upon which some sensible judgment could be made.

In the Program Forecasts that are made available to Treasury Board by each department, every single item of expenditure is defined in detail, justified in detail, described in detail that could turn the forest of figures in the estimates blue book into useful information. This program forecasting approach to budgeting has been established by the Treasury Board for government departments in recent years. Manuals issued by Treasury Board indicate in very specific detail how each department is to go about setting its program forecasts, thus establishing the kind of information that Treasury Board will require in order to make an assessment. It seems to me, as I said earlier, that if that kind of information is needed by Treasury Board to establish government spending priorities, then surely it is needed by, and should be made available to, members of parliament.

There has been criticism over the years of the growing difficulty that this body encounters in trying to get to the bottom of government expenditure programs. For that reason the committee system to deal with estimates has been set up, but to one who, as a new member, has had some brief experience with committee procedures the difficulty is not immeasurably reduced by the opportunity to ask questions for ten or fifteen minutes of a minister who is almost by definition doing his best to provide as little information as he possibly can.

● (1710)

Members of this party during this session have asked that evaluations of the effectiveness and efficiency of certain programs of this ministry of industry, trade and commerce be provided to the House. We were told these evaluations were going on but they have not been made available. On March 14, the President of the Treasury Board indicated in the House that virtually every department of government now has the resources to carry out evaluations of the efficiency of its operations and the cost effectiveness of its programs.

I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) whether that statement applied to his department. He said, in part, he was not sure whether he had any budget to enable his department to do evaluations and did not think his estimates provided for that. So, while we are told by the department that evaluations are going on, and by the President of the Treasury Board that within each department there are now resources to carry on evaluations, the minister is not sure whether such evaluations are going on or whether the resources are available to his department. In fact, there is no branch of the ministry of industry, trade and commerce set up for the specific purpose of conducting evaluations.

Such evaluations as may be made are conducted within the branches and divisions which themselves are responsible for administering the programs, and one might be excused for suspecting that such evaluations might not be utterly objective. The absence of that information and the unwillingness of the government to provide us with this kind of evaluation and study, is all the more reason the Program Forecast, including budgets A, B and X, should be made available to members of parliament.

These are not secret documents, but there is a tendency on the part of governments in Canada to regard all pieces of paper written on in the offices of the ministries as confidential or secret whether or not they are worth anything. So, those Program Forecasts are regarded as confidential and withheld from members of parliament. However, it is possible without a great deal of ingenuity to acquire copies of those Program Forecasts, at least for some departments. When one opens them to get some clear description of the programs which are identified in the estimates merely by figures, one appreciates how clearly are set out the objectives and descriptions of these programs. They are readily identified and the changes in government programs are visible. It is easy, as indeed it should be, for members to establish which programs are being adjusted or changed, and thus to ask on behalf of the people of Canada why they are being changed. It is also possible under budget X to identify which projects in the judgment of the departments involved are of least importance and which can most readily be dropped without serious damage to Canada. That kind of information seems to be incredibly important.

Let me refer briefly to such a Program Forecast dealing with one department. The description of a new wing being established to undertake policy planning and research is set out in a way which would permit members of parliament serving on a committee to get straight to the heart of the changes in policy and to ask sensible questions on behalf of the Canadian people instead of milling around day after day with the very limited resources placed at the disposal of parliament by the ministry to get at what in fact is actually going on.

In the ministry of industry, trade and commerce in the last few years the sum of $1.3 billion has been expended on programs for the purpose of aiding Canadian industry to develop Canadian technology and exports. These are laudable objectives, but $1.3 billion is a lot of money. We have only the department's word for it that the money is being effectively and efficiently used. Forgive me, Mr. Speaker, if I regard the department as a prejudiced witness in this case: it has a vested interest in maintaining and augmenting the funds at its disposal. It seems to me quite within the framework of the parliamentary democracy of the 1970's that members of parliament should be provided with the kind of information which can test the competence of the department as it asserts that, in fact, its programs are being carried out effectively. That kind of information, I put it to members of the House through you, Mr. Speaker, is to a large extent available in these Program Forecasts.

I may say in passing that the absence of evaluations of programs of the kind I have mentioned, this $1.3 billion alphabet soup program which our party has criticized at some length in recent months, leads me to wonder whether in fact even the Treasury Board is being given any reason for the continuation of these programs. On what basis, I wonder, does the Treasury Board decide to allocate $151 million in this fiscal year for these programs if in fact the evaluations are not being done or not being made available? If they are available to the Treasury Board and to the minister I think they should be available to members of parliament.

We are dealing here with a fundamental principle which has two aspects. One is the sovereign right of parliament to get at the facts of the case before granting supply. The other is the newer idea that government, to the greatest extent possible, must be carried on with a minimum of information being made available to the public. There is a tendency to regard all documentation as privileged or confidential. I think that is a dangerous tendency because, regardless of whether it puts one government at a political disadvantage by providing its opposition with that information, looking at the totality of the government process what happens is that departments grow. We see evidence of tremendous increases in staff at upper levels right now. These departments grow, programs are undertaken and money is being spent at increasing rates each year, yet less and less information is available to those ordinary members of parliament who in the end accept the responsibility for deciding whether the programs make sense. I put it to you that the kind of request we have made makes sense and is in keeping with the concept of modern government, and the role of members of parliament in a modern government. If we are not to give members of parliament that kind of information, we might as well concede that we are being run by a rapidly growing bureaucracy, building upon itself and concealing from those to whom it is responsible all the information it can.

I think that is a regrettable and dangerous tendency, and I would urge this House to order that these documents be made available in order that we may in the future deal more intelligently with the multibillion dollar expenditure programs.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the motion presented to this House by the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Grier), I find myself in a very difficult position. I think the principle the hon. member has put forward, the ideal that the public and certainly members of parliament should have access to as much information as possible, surely is supported by members on both sides of this House. However, it is a matter of getting down to the practicality of whether the government can supply all the information to which it has access in making judgment decisions and still be sure that when it makes decisions, subject to opposition reaction and comment, it can act in the best interests of the people of Canada. Frankly, my reaction is that if any of us sit back and think about it sensibly, we will understand it.

● (1720)

When you talk about the planning, programming and budgeting structures used by Treasury Board you are referring to a concept that was adopted by the government a few years ago to do its very best to bring together the complexities of governing a country such as Canada and indeed to decide on priorities for the use of the limited tax revenues available and giving the political leaders the best advice available from all the various sources of the Public Service. To say now that the government should present, on demand of the members of the House, all such papers and advice surely is to negate the whole system of parliament as we know it. If this suggestion were carried to the extreme, the decision-making would no longer be the responsibility of the political leaders but would fall back one step and would be given to the people who create policies. So, while the principle is good, I think there is great danger in applying it across the board.

In order to promote the effective management of financial resources through improved accounting systems, the government employs a system commonly known as planning, programming and budgeting. The concepts common to all planning-programming-budgeting systems are these, if I may outline them for the House. First, the setting up of specific objectives; second, the systematic analysis to clarify objectives and to assess alternative ways of meeting them; third, the framing of budgetary proposals in terms of programs directed toward the achievement of objectives; next, the projection of the costs of these programs a number of years in the future. In addition, there is the formulation of plans of achievement year by year for each program and, finally, an information system for each program to supply data for the monitoring of achievement of program goals and to supply data for the reassessment of the program objectives and the appropriateness of the program itself.

In other words, there is planning ahead to find priorities and make readjustments as situations change from year to year, and to make sure that there is communication back and forth among all the various departments. So, indeed this planning program and budgeting system is responsive to, and always alert to, changes. The elements of the Canadian government PPB system have been developed in harmony with the aforementioned general concepts and within the context of total resource allocation. By the latter phrase is meant that there is an explicit recognition that the total resources are limited in terms of the individual and collective demands of departments, and that there has to be a setting of priorities by the government itself in light of which departments can plan and budget.

Intensive study is made of feasible alternative ways of attaining defined objectives with a view to determining the approach which is most likely to achieve the greatest benefit for a given cost or, conversely, the approach by which a given objective will be achieved at minimum cost. The government, of course, has a grave responsibility in trying to reach that objective. A number of techniques have been found useful in such studies and the application of these techniques has been found useful in such studies.

[Mr. Fleming.]

The application of these techniques is properly the work of analysts trained in their use. I very much question whether those analysts will confidently go about their duties in this regard if their decisions and recommendations are subject to political question before they can be given to the government which must exercise its responsibility in respect of decision-making.

The adoption of an analytic approach to government decision-making of the kind that underlies planning-programming-budgeting is probably inevitable in a complex society such as we have in Canada today. The minimum needs of shelter, sustenance, internal order and the like having been met, there are innumerable possible ways of improving the quality of life and not all the ways can be pursued at one time because of the limited resources the government has. Choices have to be made as to what should be done, in the full realization that the choosing to do some things means that resources will be unavailable to do other things. The complexity of the considerations having a bearing on these choices invites the application of all that modern techniques of analysis and of gathering and processing information have to offer. Departmental program forecast submissions, which are an integral part of this process, are therefore voluminous documents which would be very costly to reproduce for purposes of tabling. In addition, they sometimes, of necessity, refer explicitly to cabinet decisions. As a matter of policy, documents of this character are not tabled and surely should not be if this is against the public interest.

As I have indicated, program forecasting is an important element in the budgetary system of the government. One of its main purposes is to provide the Treasury Board with information which forms the basis of an optimum allocation of resources among the competing requirements for all programs in the coming fiscal year. This information is also important for improved over-all government planning in subsequent years beyond the coming fiscal year. In addition, the Program Forecast is a useful vehicle for departmental management in focusing attention on the pattern of current and future expenditures, and in decision-making in respect of the priorities which will be attached to the various programs, activities and projects for which the department is responsible.

The activities of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, involving as they do industrial development and trade promotion ventures, obviously reflect directly on the plans and initiatives of individual companies and business organizations. In explaining the advantages of the proposals contained in program forecasts to the Treasury Board it is often desirable, indeed necessary, to employ specific examples which expose the interests of those individual companies. For example, most firms regard their research and development work as being highly confidential. They are normally attempting to develop a new or better product before their competitors do so. If it is successful, the firm is likely to have an advantage in both the domestic market and in export markets. This is where Industry, Trade and Commerce steps in.

In some instances the Canadian firm is competing against other domestically-based companies, although in many cases it is competing on an international basis with a wide variety of enterprises in other countries, some with much greater resources at their disposal. Because of the costs of developing new products and the need to protect their interests, most firms will only participate in departmental programs if they have assurance that their affairs will be kept strictly confidential; indeed, there is a confidentiality clause contained in some of the contracts signed between the department and the participating companies.

In respect of dealing with the matter of revealing papers and the adoption of some system for this by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I am pointing out some of the shortcomings. As I tried to make clear in my opening comments, it is the responsibility of the political leaders to exercise their responsibility in making decisions and to answer the hon. member or any other member of this House in respect of matters of policy being presented for action. However, if the documents in respect of the planning were circulated among members before the government exercised its responsibility in dealing with our democratic system this surely would undermine the system itself.

I understand that in committee—and it is on record in recent months—the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has made a very real effort, on several occasions, to bring forward and present every bit of planning and programming material that he felt he could safely make available without jeopardizing long-range planning where there has been a political decision and where private interests, private industry, would not be jeopardized internationally in competing against firms in foreign countries.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the power to govern must rest with the government. If we come to the point where we roll back the cabinet decision-making process to this House, where this House sits as a cabinet, instead of the government, then it will be a denial of the basis of our democratic system where government must accept responsibility for the decisions it makes.

If we begin to judge before the programs of the civil servants have been brought to a political head and decided upon, then surely we undermine the decisions to be made and we weaken the ability of the opposition to focus its attack on government. If we can talk about or judge, before the fact of a political decision by cabinet, the priorities and directions of a particular program then it may well be that when the cabinet makes its decision it can say, "You cannot blame us entirely; two or three other parties have been involved in this." Moreover, it would place in great jeopardy the morale, and indeed the competence of the civil service if the decisions of civil servants suddenly become the area of criticism rather than the government's choice as to the proper decision being rightfully the area of criticism.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) said in his concluding comments, as I recall them, that less and less information is available, that more and more there is bureaucracy, and that less and less the members of this House have available to them the information they need to carry on and cope with the kind of modern government that we have in the 1970s. I believe that the opposite is true. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make brief reference to a committee of this House which this morning held an in camera meeting. It was the justice committee. The meeting involved the RCMP and a discussion in great detail of several matters of much public concern. The government felt that the members of the committee had the right to know, without revealing matters of security which might place the public in jeopardy. But, Mr. Speaker, what we are discussing now is a different matter, which might jeopardize long-range planning before political decisions are made on programs drawn up by civil servants.

I end as I began, by saying that I cannot deny the principle of freedom of availability of as much information as possible on government activities and planning. But to intrude on long-range forecasts, bring the civil servants into the forefront and deny political responsibility being placed where it should be, would place our system in great jeopardy.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, it is axiomatic that if next year's resources are to be higher by a certain amount than this year's, expenditures for all purposes taken together can rise by no more than the same amount. It is intuitively obvious that it would be more beneficial for the increase to be distributed unevenly among functions according to the exigencies of the period under review. In other words, expenditures should increase at a faster rate than average for some functional programs, should remain stable in others and should actually be reduced in still others to free funds for higher priority purposes. Consequently, not only should departmental programs be viewed as competing with one another for share of the total resources but each program should be viewed as competing with all other programs belonging to the same or other departments.

A major element of the PPB system, therefore, involves seeking the government's guidance as to priorities to be served in allocating resources. This guidance will be sought in the light of forecasts by the Department of Finance as to the magnitude of the funds likely to be available for the next few years according to specific assumptions as to the rate of growth in the economy, tax rates and the appropriate level of borrowing for budgetary and non-budgetary expenditures, subject of course to any overriding considerations as to the fiscal stance necessary to correct any imbalance in the economy.

The recommendations as to priorities are based on analyses made of information drawn from various sources and, in particular, from departmental program review submissions. It will be obvious that the determination of spending priorities and government policy is closely linked. Consequently, these program forecasts necessarily contain information confidential to government as well as to those private institutions or persons who may be involved in the programs financed by the estimates when these are ultimately presented.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has appeared before a committee of this House on several occasions this month during examination of the department's estimates. He has endeavoured to answer fully the questions of committee members in relation to the department's programs and related spending. I believe that much of the information which hon. members might expect to find in the program forecast working documents has already been provided, while preserving the confidentiality of those matters not in the public domain. The proceedings of these committee hearings are available to hon. members who may be interested.

I want to speak of the types of control which management has. There are two kinds of control, one output oriented and the other input oriented; that is, one emphasizing steps taken to promote the achievement of chosen objectives of a program, and the other emphasizing expenditure limits that are not to be exceeded, or statutes or regulations that are not to be violated.

One is achievement control and the other is resource control. Resource control as defined here is well known to government managers. Whatever specific form this type of control may take it is required because, (a) the control by parliament over votes and over cash appropriated is paramount in our political system; (b) some initial or primary segmentation of votes by major levels of responsibility or by activity or the like will be made, and some control over the financial and personal resources allotted to these segments will have to be maintained; and (c) where a contract or some other form of covenant is made that requires payment in the future, some record of the commitment is likely to be necessary to avoid overcommitment.

These guidelines which are laid down for management control will obviously only be operative if management realizes that some of its basic considerations are to remain confidential in nature, as in executive consideration in any organization. When this confidentiality no longer exists, then these considerations must be of such a guarded nature as to detract from their value to the persons receiving them. I think that any freer release or any lessening in our controls over the confidentiality of documents is going to detract from the value of the reports that are submitted to our ministers and the heads of departments. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I must support fully the retention of confidentiality in this type of document, while still believing that through committee discussions all essential information that members must have in order to continue their job as watchdog of the public purse is available in these committee discussions and is freely given.

● (1740)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau).

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I mean the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Breau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I had a preference I would be called the hon. member for Gloucester, because Gloucester, New Brunswick, is a very fine place and I am pleased to be part of it.

In relation to the speech of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier), the most inportant part of it concerned matters other than the need for disclosure of program forecasts. The hon. member has pursued that point before, but I think he is confusing the need for program forecasts with the need for evaluation and the need for control over government expenditures. I have very great difficulty in relating these to the need for program forecasts.

The hon. member spoke about forecasts and about the need for parliamentary control, but they are not necessary interdependent. It is not necessary, for example, to have a forecast for a party which hopes to be the executive. It is not necessary for opposition parties to have in their hands the results of program forecasting, because really that is what they are, in order for them to make a judgment. I have never asked for, and I do not think I need, copies of their minutes—if they exist, and I do not think they do. I do not need to listen in to caucus meetings of the New Democratic Party to make up my mind on their policies.

I cannot understand why the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore would need forecast submissions by various ministers, various departments, that come to Treasury Board and cabinet in order to make up his mind on the value of these programs. Secondly, I do not understand why he should have trouble arriving at a political judgment as to which programs should be voted for. It seems to me it could happen that they would be interdependent, but not necessarily.

On the question of forecasts, I believe the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges have explained the point very well. We are in a parliamentary form of government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I hate to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, but it is five years—1968—since the county of Vaudreuil-Soulanges was enlarged to become the county of Vaudreuil.

Mr. Breau: I am very happy that the hon. member has brought about a correction, Mr. Speaker. My error was unintentional. We cannot forget the riding of York West because we have had very prominent members from that riding. I was saying that these two members have explained the difficulties the government is faced with in this request.

Program forecasting was initiated out of a planning budget system with which I am sure the hon. member is in agreement. For that system to work, the President of the Treasury Board requires that every department plans its programs and submits them. These are programs of individual departments and individual ministers. In fact, when a minister goes to cabinet or to Treasury Board with a submission, he is committed to that submission and puts his name to it. He says, "I want this program". The Minister of National Health and Welfare for example, is not responsible for the financing of this country; he is not responsible for fiscal policies nor in deciding how much money should be put into the economy. His job is to look after the health and welfare programs of the country and to have with the provincial governments programs which meet that part of federal government responsibilities. Are we in the kind of parliamentary system that does not protect the minister? A minister may come to cabinet and ask for something for his department, but the government may feel that because of other priorities or lack of revenue, or because it is time fiscal policies were geared to putting less into the economy, government spending should be reduced.

I believe our parliamentary system of government could not work if a minister had to make public his submissions to cabinet, and this is what the hon. member is asking for. He is asking for the forecast of a minister, a forecast the minister may have arrived at over three, four or five years before going to cabinet or the Treasury Board and fighting his point. Because there is only a certain amount of money available from taxes and other sources of revenue, and because the Treasury Board, the Minister of Finance and other ministers responsible in this area so recommend, the cabinet may decide on priorities which apply not only to that particular department but to all departments. The hon. member may want a system of government that would make available what he asks for, but I do not know of any system which works that way.

A program forecast is a study by a certain department and a forecast of its expenditures for existing or future programs. It seems to me that is the reason we have a cabinet and the reason our type of parliamentary government has an executive. As the hon. member for York West explained, the executive is responsible for presenting programs to parliament, and if they do not work the executive is also responsible. I do not see how a government could function if this type of motion were accepted and forecasts were tabled in the way the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) suggests. The hon. member for York West also explained this point in regard to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

That brings me to the famous evaluation reports. In committee the minister explained that there was no conflict between what the Treasury Board had said in an answer on March 14 and what he had said. The type of evaluation that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) was talking about is being made by the department. Like other departments, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce does not spend money without questioning how it is spent. Every year when the minister goes to Treasury Board with his estimates, he is responsible for them to cabinet, to Treasury Board and ultimately to this House.

Evaluations are being made, but there are different sorts of evaluation. What the members of the New Democratic Party seem to want is independent evaluation. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) explained that to me in a committee not long ago when he said he would like to see independent evaluations made. Maybe this is possible, but if any evaluation reports are to be made public they will have to be from an independent body. If you ask a government official who is hired under contract or employed by the public service in a government department to make an analysis of a program or to evaluate it, he will probably take a critical stand. Perhaps he will take such a stand because he wants to improve the program. Are we to put that official on the block and say the evaluation report is to be made public? I do not know any government which functions that way. I wonder if the NDP governments in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia do that.

Mr. Stevens: Let us deal with Ottawa.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, members of the opposition want to deal with Ottawa because they are ashamed of what their provincial supporters do. They suggest that Ottawa should do something else. The fact is that Ottawa has the same problems as any province. I say this to illustrate that it is not possible to do some of the things the notice of motion suggests. It would not be possible to do them if this matter had been raised in the Ontario legislature or any other legislature that operates under our system. I do not know of any parliamentary system in the world in which any member of the executive, while preparing forecasts and submissions for the cabinet, would make them public.

Mr. Stevens: Surely no government is as secretive as the one the hon. member supports.

Mr. Breau: I wonder what kind of student of parliamentary affairs the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has been. That cabinet proceedings are secret is well established; I think this applies to any form of government.

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about this government's tinkering.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member could have made a speech had he wanted to do so. I do not know of any government in Canada that operates that way. I should like hon. members to tell me whether there is any parliamentary government which makes public submissions of ministers to cabinet. That system just could not work. This is also true in business. If the board of directors asks somebody in the company for an analysis or an evaluation, that analysis is not made public. The evaluation is for the board of directors to consider and it is confidential. I do not know how any government could function if such evaluations were made public. They are made for the purposes of the department, to enable it to evaluate programs. I do not see how we could make such evaluation reports public and maintain the type of government that we have in Canada.

The hon. member also spoke about parliamentary controls. I do not think program forecasts or evaluation reports have anything to do with parliamentary control. I admit that the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore supports a party that does its homework, as is evident when members of that party come to committee and examine officials and ministers. All opposition parties are not like that. I have seen many instances which illustrate this. Indeed, I remember when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) appeared before a committee to present his supplementary estimates and members of the Conservative party were not interested in questioning him on the programs being submitted; they were concerned about procedural questions and making headlines. That is their privilege.

Mr. Stevens: Stick to the facts.

Disclosure of Documents

Mr. Breau: It is the privilege of members to deal in any way they want to with these matters, but they cannot have it both ways. They cannot say, on the one hand, that the committee system does not provide enough opportunity for scrutiny of government spending and, on the other hand, act as if committees exist only to enable them to make political points. Certainly they can make political arguments; they can try to catch the headlines. That is fine. However, they cannot come here and say that the present system does not provide for parliamentary scrutiny of government spending. I submit that it does.

There are many examples to show that since estimates have been studied in committee, there has been better scrutiny. Some hon. members take time to do their homework before questioning officials. I think that is better for them, better for the minister concerned, better for parliament and better for the public. I do not think it is necessary for members of the opposition to have the forecasts of various department or to have the evaluation reports in front of them to scrutinize government spending.

The previous parliament provided opposition parties with funds for research. Some of them used this money for better scrutiny while others used it for different purposes. That is their business; they can do what they want. But they cannot say this government has not been sensitive to that problem, that it did not want better scrutiny and more intelligent discussion of government spending and legislation.

Mr. Hueglin: What about the Auditor General's report?

Mr. Breau: The hon. member refers to the Auditor General's report. There are Auditor General's reports relating to Conservative governments in Canada, and they are no better than the reports we have seen in recent years.

Mr. Hueglin: Stick to Ottawa.

Mr. Breau: It is the job of the Auditor General to be critical, to look for waste and to suggest ways in which accounting procedures can be improved. That is his job. In any big organization, certainly in any government organization, there is room for critical comments by an auditor. If we consider the provinces of New Brunswick and Ontario which have Conservative governments, and examine the reports of their provincial auditors general, we will find that the tone is about the same as that of the report tabled yesterday. In some instances they are worse.

Mr. Stevens: They could not be worse.

Mr. Breau: An hon. member on the other side was scandalized because some tenders were opened in private. Let me tell him that his supporters run provincial governments in this country which do not even call for tenders.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the debate is getting somewhat off the course on which it is supposed to stay.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, my remarks have to do with parliamentary control. That is what this notice of motion is about. I will stick to the motion.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Breau: I cannot support the motion, for the reasons I have stated. Like the hon. member for York West and the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), I cannot support the motion. You cannot ask a minister to come to cabinet and make a good case for something if he must make public the reasons for his stand. That is what this motion seeks. The hon. member asks for certain forecasts to be made public. Surely that is not acceptable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let us take the vote and find out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, the time appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired and I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was indicating to the House that on the basis of my personal persuasions—and they represent the views of the majority of the people I have consulted in the city of Edmonton and the surrounding area—I do not favour the passage of this bill. The people whom I consulted preferred the law of 1961.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) discussed one aspect of this matter the other day on which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) expressed great reserve. That was the question of the royal prerogative. The royal prerogative has been used in countless cases. In fact, it has been used in all cases since the last execution in 1962, sometimes literally one minute before midnight, even after the government had announced it would not interfere with the sentence. I recall in particular a case in Montreal generally known as the Santa Claus murders.

This question of the royal prerogative bothers me. It exists in law. We are not attacking the authority of the constitutional monarch in these matters, but the consideration and advice given to the monarch, or the monarch's representative, which must be followed is that of the treasury benches. Knowing something about the composition and the actions of individuals on the treasury benches, if the Prime Minister or other senior ministers have the personal persuasion that total abolition is right, no cabinet minister is going to make an issue of a matter which, if his views were to prevail, would mean the death of an individual. There are far better grounds for dissent than that.

I do not think there is any member of this House or many people in this country who, as a matter of principle and after consideration, would go to a showdown vote in order to execute a man if there should be a change in the law. One reason for using the royal prerogative is the view of the Prime Minister, whoever he may be at the time, and we have had a succession of abolitionists at all times. I find it uncomfortable that odd kinds of pressure of a political nature can be brought to bear in any case. There is a political aura or atmosphere that applies in the final determination of the exercise of the royal prerogative. This makes me uncomfortable, because whether a man shall die or not usually depends upon the political situation.

Earlier this afternoon I said that I very much doubted that with the cabinet we had in October, November and December of 1970 at the time of the Quebec unrest, when a brave stand was taken by this government in invoking the War Measures Act, anyone involved in a killing during that crisis would have benefited from the royal prerogative. The situation has now changed. There have been appeals, and so on, and we do not know how these cases are going to turn out. I will not comment on them because they are still subject to appeal. However, that is the wrong type of influence that can apply in the exercise of the royal prerogative.

I do not know what the ultimate answer might be. Perhaps we should return to the days when the royal prerogative was used sparingly and in appropriate cases; it then had much greater value. To my mind, the royal prerogative has been abused and as a result it has become somewhat meaningless. One could say it has been used as a device to bring in the abolition of capital punishment by the back door. If there is to be abolition it ought to be as a result of a decision of Parliament.

Let us approach the issue in a straightforward manner. Then, I am sure, if the majority is in favour of abolition everyone will accept the decision. I am not in favour of abolition, but if that is the will of parliament I will certainly accept it as I have accepted other legislation passed by the House over the last 16 years which I have not greeted with much enthusiasm. However, since it was passed by majority decision in a democratic country, one accepts these things and loyally tries to fulfil the law.

I know that many of my hon. friends wish to speak on this subject. I will say, in resumé, that I do not believe a case has been made out for an extension of the moratorium. Certainly there is much need for us to spend our time on other and more important business. Again, I do not favour what one might describe as the spurious nod or bow toward abolition which is embodied in the present bill. Either the government should have the courage of its convictions in applying the moral and logical principle of abolition, or it should abandon many of its present arguments. I do not agree with those arguments, but I certainly support the right of others to hold those views—and they hold them strongly. But let us bring them out in clearcut fashion, not in a crablike, sideways fashion. What I did five years ago with regard to the bill then presented, I propose to do with the bill before us now. I do not think it should go any further.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, if I were an abolitionist I could not support the bill before us as it would retain the death penalty for certain crimes. Those who in conscience are against any form of capital punishment should reread the bill before voting on it this coming Tuesday. Indeed, I would urge them to read it and then ask themselves whether in all conscience they, as abolitionists, can support it.

As a retentionist, I cannot support the bill on second reading, which is agreement in principle. In my view the bill is too limited in its definition of murders punishable by death. Should the bill carry, however, I hope to be able to propose certain amendments which, if adopted, would widen the number of cases in which murder would be punishable by the loss of the offender's life. Later I intend to outline in more detail the nature of my suggested amendments in that respect.

First, let me summarize my position on this measure, one which causes a great deal of concern to many people including myself. I am pleased that 89 speakers have already taken part in the debate, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) who is sponsoring the bill. These speeches have given me the opportunity to review the thrust of the arguments put forward by those who support this legislation and those who oppose it.

One might ask whether, as the ninetieth speaker on the subject, there is anything left for me to say. I am sure there is a great deal to be said. The sponsor of this bill, the Solicitor General, and his leader, the Prime Minister, are abolitionists. Their speeches are quite clear on this point. Yet they wish parliament to accept a bill which is retentionist to at least a limited extent. Read the speech of the Prime Minister and then try to justify his support for the bill as an abolitionist.

The fact is this: what is taking place is a sham. Let us judge the government on its record. No one has been executed in this country since 1962, yet many have been convicted of murder and sentenced to be hanged. All sentences have been commuted by this government or its predecessor. In fact, on one day in 1968, January 4, they commuted 18 death sentences. Is it just coincidence that the amendments to the Criminal Code which provided for the death penalty in circumstances similar to those outlined in the bill now before us came into force on December 29, 1967? This was six days prior to the 18 commutations.

Is it not fair to suggest that those in the government at that time who supported the bill in the House in November and December, 1967, deliberately delayed commuting the sentences so that their action would not influence the passage of that bill through the House? I am suggesting that here we find a clear example of the actions of those who formed the government being in sharp contrast with the legislation they recommended that parliament pass in 1967 and which they again recommend in 1973.

Having said this, I believe it is important we review the situation as outlined by the Prime Minister when he spoke in this debate. Early in his address he said:

> If Canada is a civilized place, it is that way because of the concern Canadians have for one another.

I hope there is no question in this chamber that Canada is in fact a civilized place. The Prime Minister then touched on another matter. He said he believed we should take our place with other countries in the world, by, in effect, voting for abolition. I think it is wise for this House to remember that there are only nine countries in the world that in fact have abolished capital punishment. Is the Prime Minister suggesting that if we do not become an abolitionist country, somehow or other we are not as civilized as countries that have? The countries which, according to the United Nations, have abolition at the present time are as follows: Austria, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Finland, Iceland, Uruguay and Venezuela. Those are the only member countries of the United Nations that have not retained capital punishment in their judicial systems.

● (2020)

In considering the bill before the House it is wise that we not be caught up in the general impression that somehow we are catching up to the rest of the world which to a great degree is abolitionist, because the fact is that the rest of the world to a great degree is retentionist. If we are to follow the world, then we should be retentionist. On this point I have before me a publication produced by the United Nations, dated February 23, 1972, which is very revealing. This report reads:

> Whilst the imposition of the death penalty for reasons of vengeance or revenge finds few if any advocates and the notion of a premeditated judicial killing is generally abhorred, retributive justice and necessity in the public interest are still considerations which hold considerable sway as new forms of terror and violence evolve in society; the tendency to revert to the death penalty as the main deterrent is conspiciously increased.

This, I remind hon. members, is a United Nations' report. It continues:

> There are large bodies of people and a wide range of authority who believe capital punishment is necessary either as a deterrent or at least as a matter of basic justice.
>
> For every state member of the United Nations devoted to the abolition of capital punishment in law or fact, there would appear to be three others legally committed to the sanction and use—at least as a very last resort. Moreover, there are examples of some states abolishing the death penalty but then returning to it, either in law or practice, either because they saw no adequate way of dealing with certain offences or because they feel the need for some final and extreme public denouncement of the particular behaviour for which the sentence is awarded.

The publication then goes on to state:

> An important consideration in any truly international appraisal is that most published studies have taken their data and orientations from the developed world and largely from the western world. The result has been a rather misleading picture which has frequently given unwarranted universality to values, theories and practices prevalent in the west in academic circles.

I emphasize the words "academic circles".

[Mr. Stevens.]

> It has sometimes become unfashionable to support capital punishment. Civilization is tolerance, and severity in punishment is a sign of backwardness and regression and so liberal thinking and the abolition of the death penalty are expected to coincide. Therefore writings available on the death penalty leave the impression that there is a certain inevitability about the movement to more "civilized standards" and fewer executions. A reader could be excused for concluding that throughout the world there is in fact an irresistible and ineluctable trend to abolish capital punishment, or that even where the death penalty is still a last legal resort, the penal codes have fewer offences leading to capital punishment, or methods of execution are becoming more humane, or that the person liable to the extreme penalty will usually have the benefit of the best legal safeguards.

This is the conclusion to the United Nations' report:

> In fact, the world picture provides no such assurances. It is extremely doubtful whether there is any uniform progression towards the restriction of the use of the death penalty.

Surely it is important, when we consider the bill before us, to bear in mind that we are the ones who will be out of step with the world if we accept a judicial system that does not include the death penalty among its provisions. On this point it has been suggested by some that we should vote for the bill, allow it to go to committee and there amend it to overcome one of the objections that people sometimes raise, which is that while they feel the death penalty is wrong, there should be a mandatory 25-year sentence of imprisonment or a life sentence.

I believe that a life sentence would impose an impossible burden on prison officers who would look after men who had nothing to lose, in effect. Just think, Mr. Speaker, of the ramifications of the suggestion of a mandatory life sentence. You would be suggesting that men would be confined to prison for life. Should they, either as a result of an escape or even within the prison walls, murder someone, they have nothing to fear. They would not fear any greater judgment. I suggest that those who advocate passage of the bill with a view to its being amended to include a provision relating to a life sentence are being unrealistic in their attitude.

I also believe that it is important that the government and Members of Parliament bear in mind that there is a great danger of the law getting out of line with the moral feelings of the majority of the people in the country. This is a point that I know many like to skip over. In this regard, I found it very odd that in speaking on this subject the Solicitor General used figures in, I felt, an extremely unfair way. Let me quote what he said on January 26, when he referred, at page 689 of Hansard, to what he called a profile of public attitudes in respect of the death penalty. He stated that the profile showed that those in favour of capital punishment in all instances, and those opposed to capital punishment in all instances balanced each other off with 19.1 per cent and 20.9 per cent respectively; and 59 per cent favoured retention of capital punishment in limited cases.

What an interesting twist to put on figures! Any member of this House might have taken the same profile and pointed out, with the same weight, that in fact 79.9 per cent of the people in that profile said they wanted some form of capital punishment. However, the impression left by our Solicitor General was that somehow those for retention offset those who were against, and there was a great middle area in favour of some form of capital punishment in at least a limited number of cases. I feel this is not being frank with the people of Canada.

If the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General and other members of this cabinet are abolitionists in fact, I suggest they should accept the defeat of this bill and introduce an abolitionist bill which they feel is in line, presumably, with their conscience and actions. I think it is unfair to talk abolition yet introduce a bill which appears to be retentionist. This is particularly true in view of the record since 1962, which shows a lack of serious intention to allow the preceding bill to be effective in the sense that there were executions.

In respect of the question of what people want, I think we should take note of the Gallup poll held fairly recently in Canada; that was in February of 1972. It showed that 63 per cent supported the restoration of the death penalty in Canada. This was broken down to indicate that in English-speaking Canada 58 per cent were of that feeling, while in French-speaking Canada 74 per cent were in favour. It is interesting to note that going back to 1968 the figures show that those in favour of retention of the death penalty amounted to only 53 per cent. There is obviously a growing tendency among people in Canada to favour the death penalty.

I suggest the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General, instead of taking an academic approach and catering to those who favour abolition, should trust the people. In many ways, the present government since the election of October 30 has shown mystification as to why it did not receive a bigger mandate. I suggest one reason is that it has forgotten to listen to and trust the people of this country.

Many hon. members have canvassed their constituencies to determine local feelings on the subject of the death penalty. In my riding, of the 5,203 who responded to the questionnaire, 89.4 per cent indicated they wanted the death penalty retained in some cases, while 10.6 per cent were in favour of abolition. This is not unique. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) carried out a similar poll in which it was asked whether the death penalty should be restored to the statute books. He found that 87.2 per cent of the families responding were in favour. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) carried out another survey and found an overwhelming majority in favour of the restoration of capital punishment.

That hon. member's questionnaire asked whether capital punishment should be abolished. Forty-four per cent of those who responded strongly disagreed, 26 per cent indicated some disagreement and only 11 per cent agreed strongly it should be abolished. Surely these statistics mean something, and if we in this House ignore them I feel we are not giving proper representation to the constituents who elected us. Having regard to the world situation, contrary to the impression perhaps left by certain government spokesmen, the fact is that the death penalty is universally favoured throughout the world. This is borne out by the United Nations' report of February, 1973, to which I have referred.

The Prime Minister did touch on whether capital punishment is in fact a deterrent, although he did so very quickly: he said all of us have the figures, and he is satisfied it is not a deterrent to murder. I hope all members of the House take the opportunity to look at the statistics. I am surprised that the right hon. Prime Minister was able to satisfy himself, after looking at the figures, that capital punishment is not a deterrent. If those statistics prove anything at all, I suggest they prove exactly the reverse.

On page 6 of a Statistics Canada publication entitled "Murder Statistics, 1971" we find listed the number of murders reported to Statistics Canada for each of the years 1954 to 1971. It also gives the rate per 100,000 of population. In 1954 there were 125 murders reported, and in 1962 there were 217 reported. Between those years there was a relatively insignificant increase as far as rate is concerned. In 1954, Statistics Canada shows exactly one per 100,000, and in 1962 there was 1.4. In 1971 there were 425 murders, which was a rate of 2.2 per 100,000. Rather than showing this as an insignificant increase, I think it is fair to point out to the House and to the people of Canada that it is an increase of more than 100 percent. It is an increase from one per 100,000 to 2.2 per 100,000.

Surely the suggestion that if it could be shown that capital punishment is a deterrent, some of those who are not satisfied would be in favour of capital punishment, is not relevant. The point is that statistics only show the number of crimes and the failure of capital punishment as a deterrent. Those statistics can never show how often capital punishment has deterred a potential murderer from committing a crime, or how often it has encouraged one to leave his gun behind. I suggest that is an important point to be borne in mind when considering the bill before us. I suggest that the question of whether capital punishment is or is not a deterrent is secondary to the main question.

Are we in this House prepared to accept that there is no crime, no evil so heinous that capital punishment need not be inflicted upon the person who commits it? To me that is the basic question before us. If you say yes, but only yes, then you are an abolitionist. Surely if you say no, then you are a retentionist and it is only the degree that has to be determined. If we suggest it is possibly not a deterrent to have the death penalty, that is an extremely weak argument because taken to extreme it would mean that we should drop all penalties. Should we drop penalties in respect of all crimes? I think the statistics offered by the academics would also show that in respect of crime generally there has been a substantial increase. If one accepts the argument that has been suggested in this House concerning capital punishment, that capital punishment is not a deterrent to crime, perhaps we should give up on all forms of punishment.

Let me come to a specific matter which I find quite hard to reconcile. In his speech, the Prime Minister began with two premises. The first is his belief that wanton or unnecessary killing is evil. The second is the requirement for self-protection, be it individual or collective in the form of a society. He then stated that it is justifiable for society to use capital punishment as a means of self-defence. Is the Prime Minister suggesting it is all right to take another person's life in self-defence, and that somehow it is wrong if a police officer apprehends that person, brings him to justice and he is finally convicted and executed? Is he inviting people literally to take the law into their own hands, or to arm themselves, in the sense that if they are to be attacked they can do no wrong so long as it is simply in self-defence? This philosophy frightens me.

I believe public opinion in this country indicates that the public wishes the retention of capital punishment at least for certain crimes. Canadians do not want to see a sort of self-justice encouraged in the country. I believe it is an integral part of the judicial system that there be a penalty for the most heinous or evil crimes which may be committed. It is very easy for members to sit in this House in their comfortable chairs and speak on this subject in academic terms. However, I can assure members that if they had been at the scene of a crime, as I have, and if they had seen the victim of a murderer lying on the street bleeding to death, and had seen the risks the police officers took in bringing the person who committed the crime to justice, very few of them would stand up in this House and suggest there should be complete abolition as has been suggested here.

To those who have played a part in commuting death sentences, may I say it would be wise for them to read their own publications in which cases are cited number by number indicating actually what has transpired in respect of the crimes in which the death sentence has been commuted. Let me read some of those cases in which the death sentence has been commuted. For example, there is case No. 27, of July 18, 1969. It reads:

> The killing took place in St. Boniface, Manitoba, and the victim was a police constable who was responding to a burglar alarm at a local store. When he stepped out of the cruiser car he was shot by one of the hold-up men. Four men were charged with capital murder. Three men were convicted of non-capital murder and sentenced to life imprisonment. The fourth man was convicted of capital murder but his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

Then we have case No. 28, of August 23, 1969, which reads:

> This killing took place in the town of Sandwich West, Ontario. The victim, a police constable, Sandwich West police department, was responding to a call concerning domestic complaint. As he approached the residence of the accused, he was shot and killed. There were three shots fired into the victim. Two other Sandwich West police constables who went to assistance were also shot by the accused and wounded. One member lost sight of one eye and the second suffered the loss of a lung. The accused, age 24, was arrested and charged with capital murder. He was found guilty and sentenced to hang. Sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

I could continue reading the various cases in which commutation has been allowed. I feel it is a very sobering thing for a moment to start thinking about the victims who were involved in the various crimes. Basically, however, I want to put on the record, as I indicated, that I believe there is a place in our criminal process for the death penalty.

I do not believe the government is being fair with the people of Canada. The government has introduced a bill which it thinks perhaps caters to both sides. It looks as if it is retentionist, yet the government does not seem to have an honest desire to bring in retentionist legislation. To that end I feel this bill, if it should receive second reading—and I sincerely hope it will not—should be amended at the committee stage so that crimes which are punishable by death include others in addition to those suggested in this bill. My hon. friend in the NDP indicated that he thought it should include pickpocketing. I would point out to him that certain communist countries have included that offence under capital punishment as well as various other economic matters.

Let me summarize my proposed amendments. I would point out that in my opinion it is necessary that the law with regard to the death penalty should apply where a person causes the death of a human being while committing or attempting to commit rape. This was included in our law until a few years ago. I believe there should also be provision for the death penalty where a person causes the death of another while committing or attempting to commit an offence under section 24 of the Criminal Code, which is the kidnapping section. I believe it should apply where a person causes the death of a human being while committing or attempting to commit a crime under section 76.1 of the Criminal Code, which is the section on skyjacking.

I also believe it should be applied in respect of any person who counsels, procures or incites another person to commit murder, whether or not the murder itself is punishable by death. I do not propose those amendments, Mr. Speaker, because I understand it is virtually impossible for me to propose them at the present time, but should the bill be passed into committee I hope at that stage to be able to raise them.

In short, as I mentioned at the beginning, I am the ninetieth speaker on this subject. I feel that it is to the credit of my party that I am its forty-third speaker so far. I also wish to point out that speakers from the Social Credit party have been 11 in number, from the NDP 15, and from the government party 21. In short, I believe that this bill should be voted down, be you an abolitionist or a retentionist.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) would mind accepting one question. When he gave a list of countries which he said were all the countries in the world that were abolitionist, how come he missed the United Kingdom?

Mr. Stevens: I spoke today to the person who prepared the report for the United Nations in New York. I asked him to give me the up to date list as to which countries they tabulate as being those that did not have capital punishment in their system at the present time. He gave me that list. I specifically asked him about the United Kingdom and he said it still had capital punishment for certain crimes, I believe one of them being treason and other crimes of that nature.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the hon. member checked with the authorities in the United Kingdom to find out what is the nature of the legislation passed there?

An hon. Member: You don't believe in the United Nations?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I don't believe in the hon. member's statistics.

Mr. Stevens: If our government telephone privileges allowed me to make a long-distance call to London, England, I might well have done that. But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member does not believe my statistics, perhaps he believes the statistics of the New York Times in which the report was originally published.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House, concerning the abolition of the death penalty, being of the highest importance, reflection and soul-searching should be the keynote of the debate for all of us. All my colleagues who with me will have to reach that important decision, know that it weigh heavy with responsibility. As for me, I do not feel that anyone can avoid his responsibilities by basing himself on a so-called public opinion which has been, and will be, shaped by well orchestrated propaganda bent on exciting the masses, moving them to cheap emotions and sentimentalism.

One thing has always struck me, Mr. Speaker, on hearing speeches on the abolition of capital punishment: individuals are so human, when capital punishment is being discussed, that they want to "humanize" dangerous criminals, rehabilitate them and spare them the death penalty.

On the other hand, it is these same people who cry out loudly for abortion, to kill innocent human beings and satisfy the whims of the weak and the depraved. They want to be humane to criminals who endanger the lives of innocent people, and they think it a crime to bring innocent people into the world. And so to my mind these people bear the sign of the beast in a century in which truth has become falsehood, and falsehood truth.

The Hon. Pierre Laporte was a victim of too much leniency in the enforcement of the death penalty. Not for a moment did his killers fear the death penalty, because it did not exist. Nor did Kennedy's murderer fear the death penalty for an instant, for the same reason. Assassins of all kinds and revolutionaries do not want the death penalty. Nor do anarchists, who advocate and organize violence, want the death penalty. You have to be pretty simple to think that murderers can still be made "humane".

The 24 Nazi war criminals at the Nuremberg trials in October 1946 would also have been glad if the death penalty had not existed to make them pay for their crimes. The death penalty was all right for the nazi murderers, but some think that the death penalty should not exist for murderers who are not nazis. There cannot be a double standard. There must be a death penalty for all murderers, as for the Nazi murderers.

In 1935, just before J. Edgar Hoover said, at the end of three years of repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment, that they were three years of "the most terrible period of criminal history in the history of America," Dick Borden wrote:

> Death for dealers of death is a policy that works.
> At the close of the seventeenth century the English faced a crime wave far worse than ours. A trip from one English city to another, in those days, was a hazardous adventure. Some roads were so unsafe as to be literally impassable. Endless murders and robberies took place on the streets of London.

In spite of the repeated statement that hanging is not a deterrent to murder, American gangsters long complained that it was. Nor have statistics belied their complaint—far from it. Life imprisonment is not only more cruel, but is a most unfair and a much greater burden on good citizens. Let us not give up one unpleasant measure only to adopt a more unpleasant and much less successful one.

Melvin Mann in Life Line, Dallas, Texas, reprinted in The Sword of the Lord and reported in Evangelical Baptist of February, 1973, wrote:

> Americans for Effective Law Enforcement believes that if the threat of capital punishment were real, rather than imagined, murders would in many cases, in fact, be deterred. Evidence to support this contention was found in the study made in 1970 and 1971 by the Los Angeles police department. This study included the compilation of statements taken from persons who had been arrested for crimes of violence. Those from whom statements were taken either had been unarmed during the committing of their crimes or had not used arms which they carried.

Estrada, a 19-year old youth with a four-year criminal record, was arrested February 8, 1960, just after he had stolen an automobile from a parking lot by wiring around the ignition switch. While being returned to Los Angeles for prosecution, he made the following statement to the transporting officers: "I think I might have escaped at the market if I had shot one or more of them. I probably would have done it if it wasn't for the gas chamber. I'll only do seven or ten years for this. I don't want to die. No matter what happens, you want to live another day.

I could supply a long list of confessions by criminals with files in various police departments, who have said time and time again that the death penalty was a deterrent against more serious crimes.

And the article ends as follows:

[English]

That society which coddles criminals and does not consider the victims of crime needs to rethink its system of justice.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the Christian Crusade Newsletter of April 1, 1973, one could also read a very interesting article on the deterrent effect of capital punishment on murder. It said:

[English]

Most sensible people remain convinced that fear of the penalty of death will deter some people who may be considering committing homicide. Most of us know that the possibility of the death penalty would deter us if we were tempted to such a horrendous act.

The abolition of the death penalty has created an incentive to kill. Consider a criminal engaged in a major crime such as kidnapping or armed robbery. He is anxious to escape capture and punishment. If he is caught and convicted, the penalty is substantially the same whether he has killed or not. His security is enhanced if no witnesses survive who can identify him for the police and give evidence against him in court. The abolition of the death penalty has placed the lives of many innocent people in jeopardy. It illustrates the paradox that characterizes this epoch: intense concern for the rights and well-being of the criminal; little concern for the rights and well-being of the victim.

A shock of horror swept this nation when in Khartoum, the capital city of the Sudan, the Black September group of Palestinian guerrillas cold-bloodedly and brutally murdered the U.S. Ambassador to the Sudan, Cleo A. Noel, Jr., and the Chargé d'Affaires, George C. Moore. Those who have succeeded in abolishing the death penalty in the U.S. share some of the responsibility for these deaths.

The guerrillas claim they killed because their demands were rejected. One of these demands was that Sirhan Sirhan, Arab assassin of Senator Kennedy, be freed. This demand was possible because Sirhan Sirhan is alive. After the death of Senator Kennedy, he was arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to death. This sentence was commuted to life imprisonment when the death penalty was abolished. His presence in prison provided an incentive for the crime.

Most violent criminals have colleagues and friends who are also violent. Doubtless many ruthless men are presently considering their choice of victims to kidnap in order to force the release of some imprisoned murderer. One successful venture would trigger an epidemic.

Many thinking people throughout the world must have been startled when the U.S. Secretary of State, William P. Rogers, urged the Sudanese authorities to execute the murderers of Cleo A. Noel and George C. Moore. They knew that the American authorities could not have executed the assassins if the crime had been committed on American soil. To them this must have seemed imperialist hypocrisy, flavoured with colonialism and racism—one law for the rich, the U.S.A.—another for the poor, the Sudan.

Whatever their motives, those who have succeeded in abolishing the death penalty in this country, have merely substituted the deaths of the innocent for the guilty.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, any criminal who intends to commit any criminal act thinks about the consequences he might suffer. If the law is very liberal, as some people want to keep it in Canada, and his act or acts cannot passibly put him in a serious predicament he will make little of the consequences resulting from the act he intends to commit. In any case, a law that is too liberal, too permissive is the main cause of murder.

Mr. Speaker, it is strange to see how some members like to quote excerpts from statements by individuals who never had anything to do with criminals. For example, most judges in Canada have asked for retention of the death penalty on several occasions; a brief submitted to Parliament in January by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police included recommendations on capital punishment. I am very surprised to see that up to now this government has disregarded the recommendations made by those with the most experience with criminals, those who have to chase them. Policemen in Canada highly recommend capital punishment for criminals, not only for murderers of policemen but for any individual, any Canadian. They consider that if the law is to protect policemen it should also protect all members of society without any form of discrimination.

On page 15 of the brief submitted to the House of Commons early in January 1973, one could read, and I quote:

● (2100)

[English]

The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police go on record at this time as stating publicly that unless the voice of the people is heard and that the comments made by this association, as a result of practical experience, are seriously considered and acted upon accordingly, society might well tend to take the law into its own hands and create more problems than the abolitionists' suggestions would propose to solve.

It is sad that in this day and age people are starting to think that they will have to take whatever means necessary to defend themselves rather than rely on the law and the courts.

Acceptability of the death penalty is also maintained by the overwhelming majority of judges who surely must be recognized for their sense of justice, impartiality and fair play.

[Translation]

And, on page 3 of that same brief, the Chiefs of Police of Canada had this to say:

[English]

Is society justified in taking away a life? This question can be answered by another question, is society justified in making war? There is a fundamental answer which even from the philosophical point of view cannot be refuted and this applies in all cases! Society does have the right to protect itself by whatever means are necessary.

In supporting the retention of the death penalty, the strongest argument probably lies in the fact that the objections submitted by abolitionists are based on argument and debate. On the other hand, the retentionists rely on simple facts... our system of government is based on the will of society. Independently of what the legislators think or feel and independently of what academics may advance, if we accept the principle of democracy we must accept the will of the people. It would appear that the eloquent description of Lincoln of a democratic government referred to in the introduction of this brief has not been given full value of late. We do have a government "for the people" and "of the people" but certainly not "by the people", since their wish, as so openly expressed, for the retention of the death penalty as well as the imposition of that death penalty for which legislation presently exists has constantly been ignored.

For example, in support of the police approach to the deterrent value of any punishment, Dr. C. H. S. Jayewardene, professor of criminology at the University of Ottawa states that "if a threat is an empty one that cannot or will not ever be actualized, it will not influence conscious or unconscious deliberations of the individual". It is therefore not a question as to whether society imposes capital punishment or life imprisonment for murder, it is whether those sentences are actually carried out. It is only if the sentences in either cases are actually carried out, will the punishment serve as effective deterrent. As stated in an article of the Ottawa Journal of Saturday, November 11, 1972, it is not the severity of the punishment but the certainty that appears to be related to crime rates. Therefore the certainty of the death penalty for the crime of murder amongst others would certainly qualify as the maximum deterrent.

In the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons report of June 27, 1956, it is stated in part that "capital punishment is not an effective deterrent; it has no unique deterrent effect which would not be accomplished by imprisonment." We respectfully submit that the so-called life imprisonment of 20 years for the most callous murder simply means that at some time in the seventh year of the sentence, the murderer is eligible for parole.

The Royal Commission on Capital Punishment in its 1949-1953 report, speaking against capital punishment suggests that the death penalty, because so many sentences have been set aside, tends to degrade the administration of justice.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, irrespective of the sentences which could be passed by the judges and the convictions which could be executed, it must be recognized that if those sentences are not effectively served and that the state reverses the decisions of judges and jurys—because the cabinet can always reverse legal decisions—the effects of the death penalty under any circumstance will be absolutely destroyed even if stricter legislation is passed.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate to note that the Canadian government has given up its responsibility as far as the protection of the individual is concerned. We all have humanitarian feelings for criminals, but when we discuss the protection of the individual in this House, we would appear to be out of step with what the government would like to see as established policy for the Criminal Code.

Mr. Speaker, we should also consider that a number of homicides could be prevented by having the death penalty in our statutes. It will be said that the number cannot be known. Evidently it cannot be known, there can be no computation of homicides unknown and which have not taken place. However, it is clear that such legislation is like a sword of Damocles held over the heads of would-be criminals, a sword which can fall at any time once justice has rendered its verdict. If the death penalty does not have a dissuasive effect on the murderers of Canada, why would all sentences meted out by all judges of Canada have a dissuasive effect on crime in Canada?

If the death penalty does not prevent a murderer from committing a murder, why would a two- or three-year prison sentence for burglary lessen in criminals the will to repeat such a crime? Such an argument makes one question the rationale of justice in Canada. If the death penalty has no value as a deterrent for criminals, why would the sentences given by all judges have any value in reducing infractions against Canadian laws?

Mr. Speaker, we have made a try since 1967, when the death penalty was abolished. Now, since that time, all sentences were commuted by the cabinet, and that is one reason why we realize today that murderers are not afraid of justice, are not afraid of being convicted and are laughing at the judges. Why? Because they know very well that at the right time, the cabinet—and especially the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who declared that as long as he would be Prime Minister there would be no hanging in Canada—will commute the sentence.

Mr. Breau: He did not say that.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, as a result of such a policy of liberality in the face of the law, we will unfortunately witness more and more difficult situations where the individual will be less and less protected, because the criminal feels more and more protected by the law.

[English]

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to add my remarks to the debate on Bill C-2 I would like to lend my support to those speakers who have pointed out to this House that we are not debating the issue of capital punishment. We are, in fact, debating the question of whether or not we should put the question in mothballs and debate it again five years from now.

● (2120)

I do not agree with this method of dealing with such a serious matter, Mr. Speaker. When we debated this same bill in the very same manner more than five years ago, it was the understanding of those who took part in that debate that the House would deal with the issue of capital punishment at the end of a five-year trial period. It was very clear to all of us that for five years there would be a ban on capital punishment except for murderers of policemen and prison guards.

The five years are up, Mr. Speaker, and we are saying today the same things that we said back in 1967 about the pros and cons of capital punishment. We do not have any new material and we certainly do not have any new statistics. We do not have any new material to discuss for the simple reason the federal cabinet did not carry out the wishes of parliament. The federal cabinet has commuted every death sentence handed down by the courts since that day in 1967 when parliament decreed that there would be two types of murder, capital and non-capital, and that those persons convicted of capital murder would suffer the death penalty. The guidelines laid down by parliament were clearcut and it is obvious that the federal cabinet has been following a policy of flouting the law and the will of parliament.

Webster's dictionary describes the word "flout" as "to treat with contemptuous disregard." That definition is the best we could find to describe what has happened over the past five years. We in parliament had good reason to think that in those five years we would learn a great deal about the deterrent effect of the new approach that we worked out in 1967. However, as it has turned out we might just as well have said that murderers of policemen and prison guards would be treated no differently than other criminals.

What has happened is that parliament has been ignored and the federal cabinet has placed itself above the will of this House. We have been treated with contempt, and now we are being asked to go along with this very same policy for another five years. Mr. Speaker, if the federal government is determined to abolish the death penalty for all crimes, then why should we not debate that issue instead of taking part in what all of us know now to be a sham? We know and the government knows, that we are in effect avoiding the issue of abolition or retention of capital punishment. In a few days we are going to vote on a bill that says one thing and yet we know the government intends to do quite another, if we can go on the government's past performance. I think we can judge the government on its past performance in this area, Mr. Speaker, and I find it very disturbing.

I would have preferred the government to table a bill that sets out what the federal cabinet really wants, instead of asking this House to vote for or against something that does not even apply. If we say again to this government that we want murderers of policemen and prison guards executed upon conviction, can we be sure that our wishes will be carried out? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. If we say by majority vote that we insist on the death penalty being applied for capital murder, can those who follow careers in our police departments and the penitentiary service be assured that they have our support in carrying out their duties? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. How can they have any faith in our resolve to exact heavy punishment on capital murderers when the cabinet has allowed so many of them to escape the penalty?

We have a strange situation here, Mr. Speaker. Those who favour abolition of capital punishment will vote for this bill because it is the closest thing to abolition. Yet if they vote for this bill, and if the government discharges its responsibility under the terms of the bill, the abolitionists will be voting for capital punishment. On the other hand, if the federal cabinet follows its practice of commuting all death sentences for capital murder, the retentionists will in effect be voting for abolition. When viewed in that light I think we have the right to ask why the government did not table a bill that draws sharper lines of distinction.

It has been pointed out that in granting stays of execution the cabinet has not distinguished between those convicted of deliberate and brutal crimes and those who really had no intention of committing any crime as serious as murder. We all know that even in crimes of murder a case can sometimes be made for temporary insanity and for other circumstances that might influence juries in the favour of the accused. We also know that the ability of an accused to obtain the services of an experienced and talented criminal lawyer can weigh the scales in his favour.

It would follow that the government's policy of commuting all death sentences has the effect of providing those legal services to convicted murderers of policemen after the fact. The way it is now, a cop killer who is not successful in having his charge reduced to manslaughter would only have to bide his time. He would know that if he received the death penalty, he would in fact get a life sentence. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, this is mockery. If we do not say now that we really want abolition or retention of the death penalty, then we are all party to mockery. I say the government should have tabled a different type of bill altogether, instead of asking us to debate an issue that has been proved to be neither fish nor fowl.

I do not intend to repeat the passages from the Bible that are used by both the abolitionists and the retentionists in support of their views. It would only indicate that one man's interpretation of the passages would be as good as the next man's. However, I would like to say that it could hardly be considered Christian to put legislation before this parliament that in effect places the life of a murderer on a higher plane than that of his victim.

That is what we are really saying when we vote on a bill that will not have the effect of deterring people from cold-blooded, calculated murder. The victim of a murder is quickly forgotten by the general public, while the murderer gains public attention for months on end while his guilt is decided. If he is found guilty and sentenced to die, he is again made the subject of groups and individuals determined to see that justice is not done. The life of the convicted criminal becomes sacred, Mr. Speaker, while the victim is out of sight and out of mind. It is almost as if he did not even matter. The forgotten victim means a great deal to me, I cannot stand by silently while the natural order of things gets turned upside down by a government that tries to take the easy way out.

There might be some hope of salvaging something from the motion and the debate, Mr. Speaker, after the bill passes second reading and goes to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Perhaps when we are able to have dialogue, in place of prepared statements, we will be able to put some safeguards into this bill for policemen and prison guards. Perhaps we will be able to put as many safeguards into the bill for the lives of potential victims of the murderers as we have placed in it for the lives of murderers.

The sanctity of human life is certainly a valid and acceptable argument for those who favour abolition of the death penalty, but it should not be used as a crutch by those who are only trying to avoid facing up to an unpleasant problem. I do not want to see it used as an excuse to avoid coming to grips with this serious problem and making a decision as to who we should be protecting.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, my sympathies are reserved first for the victims of crime. When I have exhausted my sympathy for the innocent victims of brutal, senseless crime, I will direct some to the criminals. However, I cannot accept the position that our responsibility today is to ensure that no person shall suffer the death penalty for deliberate, premeditated murder. My own responsibility is very clear; that is, to erect some sort of safeguards for law-abiding Canadian citizens against violence or loss of their lives and property. That is the issue I want to debate, Mr. Speaker, and I call on the government to table legislation that comes a lot closer to what we really want and what we should be trying to do.

● (2130)

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to take part in this debate on Bill C-2, I follow many members of this House who, I am sure, have done a lot of soul-searching and agonizing over their position in their concern to give leadership to the country and to represent adequately not only their own thinking and their own consciences but the thinking of their constituents.

As we look around society today we see members of that society who are reacting to the permissiveness which they find around them. They are reacting to the looseness which they see in our prison system and in its administration. They also look with concern at the increase in the homicide rate in 1972. Since 1968 we have been in a five-year trial period of the ban on capital punishment.

The arguments of those who favour the abolition of capital punishment are well known. They see capital punishment as barbaric, a carryover from the past which is inhumane and has no place in a modern, moral society. It is, they say, an act of revenge and we should concentrate on rehabilitation instead. Possibly as a result of my background I take a different view of capital punishment, for reasons I shall outline. I feel that the abolitionist view has one weakness: there is a disregard of the moral laws upon which our country is established, laws which are part and parcel of the Judaic-Christian philosophy which many of us have inherited.

Man is not in a position, I submit, to establish his own moral code. It is not within his ability to do so. Today we see and hear much about man's ability to structure society as he sees fit. The position is taken that he is responsible to no one but himself. I submit this is wrong. I believe punishment and justice are part of our moral standards and that the establishment of these standards is not a human prerogative but a prerogative of the Creator of life. One of the precepts taught by the whole of the scriptures emphasizes the sanctity of life. Life is sacred and we have no right to destroy it. But along with this maxim is clearly set forth the concept of divine justice; the state has the responsibility to maintain security and individual freedom can only be maintained in a state whose leaders take upon themselves the responsibility of maintaining justice for all.

I see an anomaly in our society. Many people today who are abolitionists are also people who are sponsors of liberalized abortion. They feel no concern about the increased number of abortions which approached 40,000 in 1972 in Canada. Yet I submit that this involves the removal of the life of the unborn who has the same right to live as you and me, Mr. Speaker. The sanctity of life is underscored by many writers both in holy scripture and in secular philosophy. The breaking of an immutable law such as "Thou shalt not kill" carries with it a penalty, and the penalty which is exacted by divine justice is that a person who takes the life of another in premeditated fashion must lose his own life. Freedom can only exist in the light of the complete and free functioning of justice.

There are two types of murder, as I see it, as has been stated by many speakers. One is unpremeditated murder. If we check back, we find that even in biblical times, when we hear so much about "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth", there were certain cities designated as cities of refuge to which one who had unfortunately killed his brother could escape and in which he would be considered safe from retribution. The second type of murder is premeditated, or cold-blooded murder as it has been called. Despite the emphasis on rehabilitation, justice demands and exacts the death penalty for murder which has been thought-out beforehand, murder which takes away the life and the opportunities of someone else.

A few moments ago I made reference to the maxim "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." I believe this is not vengeful. I suggest that on close examination, Mr. Speaker, you would find that its effect is to deter men from the exaction of a greater penalty than is called for by the crime committed—that retribution should not give way to revenge or to a penalty far exceeding the gravity of the crime in question. The death sentence as a penalty for those who deliberately take away someone else's most prized possession, life itself, is not a matter of revenge but a matter of justice.

It might be argued, Mr. Speaker, that in my own philosophy, in my own thinking there is a conflict on the issue of rehabilitation, and I readily admit this is so. I recognize that rehabilitation, either from a spiritual or secular point of view, should be the goal of all hon. members and should be open to all in our society who are unfortunate. Once a person's life has been removed, rehabilitation is obviously not possible.

There are many instances throughout history where mercy has been shown and where rehabilitation was the overriding consideration. So the prerogative of mercy must remain part and parcel of our judicial system. But the prerogative of mercy cannot be given such emphasis that in cases where immutable moral laws are broken, where the penalty is inescapable, where premeditation is clearly proven, rehabilitation can supersede the supreme penalty which must be accepted for crimes of that type.

Therefore, I favour a set minimum period of incarceration for those convicted of non-capital murder or non-premeditated murder. Emphasis should be on rehabilitation. Secondly, the reinstatement of the death penalty for those convicted of premeditated homicide must be based, not on revenge or on the adage "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" that is traditionally referred to, but rather on the basis that only when we exact the supreme penalty from a person who has chosen to take the life of another can we have justice and freedom. Therefore, I cannot vote in favour of Bill C-2 since no attempt has been made to differentiate between these two types of murder, with the sole exception of the murder of police officers and prison guards.

I feel there is another anomaly in this bill in that its originators, by drawing it up in the way they have, seem to indicate that they feel that capital punishment is a deterrent since they retained its imposition for the murder of police officers and prison guards. I believe that if capital punishment for premeditated murder as opposed to non-premeditated murder is extended right across the board, across the wide spectrum that we are looking at in Bill C-2, we can then return to an era in which not only society will be protected but in which our laws will be just and humane. We will also exact from each one of us the penalty appropriate to the various actions we take. I believe if these criteria were extended to those convicted of wilfully taking their brothers' lives, society would be the better for it. This would not be a revengeful act but an act of justice, based on the supreme laws that exact justice from all. For only by having justice can we have freedom.

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise as one more member in this House to speak on Bill C-2 relating to capital punishment, a responsibility I feel first of all to my own conscience, and secondly to the views of the majority of the constituents in my riding.

We have all heard many times the comment that we as members should vote as our conscience tells us. This statement comes almost 100 per cent from those who are abolitionists. I feel that in some cases there is an insincerity in this remark—what percentage, we will never know—since these particular abolitionists present this argument to known retentionist members knowing that they have only to change one mind, that of the member.

I am also satisfied that a certain percentage—and here again we will never know how many—are just as insincere in trying to convince the pro-abolitionist member that he should not vote as his conscience dictates but in accordance with the wishes of his constituents, because they well realize that the majority of the people of Canada support the retention of capital punishment. These people know that by trying to convince the pro-abolitionist member to vote as the majority dictated, they would have a better chance of their opinion winning, because it would mean that many thousands of people would have to reverse their decision before they would lose their case. But, Mr. Speaker, this is one problem that I am not faced with; I will be voting as my conscience dictates and as I sincerely feel the majority of my constituents would want me to vote, namely, against a meaningless type of bill for another five years.

We have heard many hon. members quoting statistics, members on both sides of the debate. The abolitionist says that execution is not a deterrent; the retentionist, just as sincerely, quotes figures showing that it is a deterrent. We hear the abolitionist referring to statistics which show that policeman and prison guard murders are no higher in number than they were previously. On the other side, the retentionists contend that murders in 1961 were at the rate of 230 per year, whereas in 1971 they rose to 430, practically double the former rate.

These are all credible arguments in what will probably be considered one of the most emotional and sincere debates that we will witness in this twenty-ninth Parliament. However, as I said before, I do not necessarily feel that statistics prove the point either way. But there is one argument proving that capital punishment is a deterrent—and I challenge any member of this House to contradict me—and that is the pure and simple statement that it deters the one-time murderer from committing a second murder.

I think this is the issue that we are all faced with in this debate. We have conscientiously to ask ourselves which is more important—the ultimate protection of society, or the protection of hardened criminals? As I said before, we have all heard many arguments that capital punishment is no deterrent. If it were, why did not it deter the murders that have been committed in this recent trial period, of policemen and prison guards?

[Mr. Epp.]

With all due respect to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his middle-of-the-road approach to this very serious and emotional debate, it is pretty hard to convince Canadians in general that each and every one of the potential subjects for execution in the last several years was worthy of commutation. That, Mr. Speaker, is no meaningful deterrent as far as I am concerned. The so-called trial period that we have had for the past five years, and which this government is asking us to reinstate once again, is nothing short of being a complete farce in view of the way we have seen it administered by this Prime Minister's government and that of his immediate predecessor.

At the very first all-candidate meeting that was held at the beginning of the election I made the public statement that I was in favour of retaining capital punishment, or at least to keep it within the Criminal Code for the protection of our law enforcement officers and prison guards. I felt very strongly about this being at least moral protection for our law enforcement officers. If we could not at least do this to support them, eventually we would see a gradual exodus of our law enforcement officers until all we would have left would be a so-called sadistic, power-hungry, gangster-type individual who would not be afraid to protect our society on the theory that he would shoot first and ask questions later.

I am sure if I wanted to take the time to cite the experience of individual states of our neighbour to the south, and also in one of the larger cities in our own country, I could find policemen in those particular areas who would fit the category of the individual that I have just described. I know Canadians would not want to see this kind of deterioration within the ranks of our law enforcement officers. Canadians can be proud of these members of our society who are dedicated to keeping law and order; and there can be no better example than in the fine young men we see every day around this great institution that we call Parliament Hill.

As I said before, that was my opinion at the beginning of the campaign last September. Having very seriously considered and reconsidered the many aspects revolving around this decision we have to make, I have conscientiously to say that not only do I still have that same opinion but I have had it strengthened to the point that I think capital punishment in some form should be meted out to all criminals who have been found guilty of capital murder.

It has been said many times in the past there is the chance of executing an innocent man. With the opportunities open to our courts today, if there is just the slightest degree of doubt as to a man's guilt, the court can change the charge from capital to non-capital murder. This to my mind takes away any possibility of the execution of an innocent victim. The government still has the sincere and conscientious right to commute that sentence should there be any further doubt.

I cannot help but ask which is the greater crime, the state carrying out an execution of a criminal or the state being directly responsible for the death of numerous citizens, the victims of these committed criminals if and when they should make their escape? Judging from the recent pattern, it is not a case of "if"; it is just a case of when will they be back out, either by impulse or on parole. After all, when you finally analyse the thinking of dangerous criminals in relation to the system of automatic commutation that this government has obviously practised in the last several years, why would they not try to escape? What is the deterrent? What is the penalty when recaptured and returned from whence they escaped? What have they lost?

When I say I favour capital punishment, I do not necessarily mean in the form that has been followed in the past. I am sure a more humane and painless method could be devised to accomplish the same end. On the other hand, some people would then say a criminal would be afforded too easy a way out, and before you know it a whole new debate would be opened up.

In conscientiously trying to assess the feelings of my pro-retentionist constituents on this subject, I felt a great percentage could be persuaded to change their minds from pro-capital punishment to abolition if the record of imprisonment in past years, particularly in the last 12 months, had proven successful. I think our correctional record has been an utter disgrace and has deteriorated to the point where it has become a source of jokes and cartoons. Regardless of who or what is the cause of this deplorable situation, the result of these escapes is certainly not a joking matter, particularly when th public is automatically subjected to further threats to their safety with these criminals at large, perhaps even in their own communities.

"Uncivilized" and "barbaric" are two of the favourite terms used by abolitionists to describe the taking of a life by the state through execution. I wonder how many innocent children and adults in our communities will have to die before Canada's "uncivilized" and "barbaric" parole and bail regulations are revised. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents could rightly accuse the state of allowing their relatives and friends to be murdered, just as surely as if the state had executed them. Since when is it civilized to trade innocent lives for criminal lives for the sake of rehabilitation programs, valid in theory, perhaps, but discredited by the fact that they have been carried to such irresponsible and tragic extremes? Please do not interpret my remarks, Mr. Speaker, as an indication of my being against rehabilitation programs which, if properly administered, are the ultimate approach to penology, but surely the law should attach some value to the lives of murder victims as well as murderers.

In conclusion, I would like to touch on the preconceived opinion of many adults that our young people, particularly at the secondary school level, are basically abolitionists. This is not necessarily so. During the Easter recess I visited the pupils of several of the secondary schools in my riding, and the pupils of others visited me here in Ottawa. During these visits capital punishment was discussed to at least some degree. Our future citizens are also concerned about what has happened to our law enforcement structure, and because of this past and perhaps future concern an average of more than 50 per cent are in favour of capital punishment. Here, again, I expect their opinion could be altered if and when our penal system proves credible.

I have taken longer than I anticipated in this debate, but I trust that the degree of genuine concern and sincerity that I feel personally and is felt by my constituents has been projected in a way that all members of this House appreciate these feelings. It would benefit all of us as members in this House not to forget that we have an obligation and a privilege to exercise our free vote on this bill in such a way as not to leave anyone with a troubled conscience.

Mr. Ellwood Madill (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on Bill C-2 I wish to make some observations about the feelings of my constituents. The constituents of the riding of Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe feel very strongly about the upcoming free vote on capital punishment. The number of letters I have received both for and against retention of the death penalty is indicative of the intense emotional and indeed spiritual conflict which has stirred the people on this issue. The vast majority of correspondents, 95 per cent to be exact, have strongly urged retention of capital punishment for all persons convicted of premeditated murder.

It should be noted that the arguments are not based solely on a desire for revenge. Indeed, most persons are concerned about the ease with which chronic killers are returned to society. In addition, despite certain statistics which imply that the death penalty is not a deterrent, the majority of people are of the opinion that if the laws were enforced this would in fact be a deterrent to some potential killers.

You will note the importance of the phrase "if the laws were enforced". More than 50 per cent of the correspondents in favour of capital punishment strongly urge Members of Parliament to insist that the government carry out our laws to the letter. While there will always be need for a certain amount of leeway, there is little doubt in the minds of many people that there has been too much leeway and clemency; therefore, the government must be prepared to enforce the laws to protect Canadian citizens. Those persons and associations in favour of abolition should not be regarded as bleeding-hearts, because their ultimate goal is the same as that of retentionists, that is, to improve Canadian society. In addition, they have come to this decision after some thought and soul-searching.

One suggestion which appears to be the strongest and the weakest argument for abolition is that a man should not take another man's life in our civilization. The weakness in this statement is that man has not progressed much, if at all, since leaving the Neanderthal age.

We must look far and wide to safeguard humanity. Perhaps a letter I have just received from one of my constituents sums this up. It states that no matter how we may shrink from it, we must have the death penalty to deter cold-blooded, calculating murderers. Such killers are the type who fear for their own skins. The children who may be these killers' victims need our sympathy far more than the homicidal types. The letter I have referred to is from a woman.

The numerous reports and presentations regarding studies on the impact of capital murder on the number of murders leads to one conclusion, that temporary abolition of the death penalty in this and other countries has not led to a dramatic increase in the rate of murders. I have a table here I should like—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps it would be convenient for the hon. member to interrupt his speech at this time and present the table to us on Tuesday when the debate is resumed.

PROCEEDING ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—RECOVERY OF INCOME TAX FROM EMPLOYEES STATIONED IN UNITED STATES—REFUSAL BY CORPORATION—POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, this debate at this time is the result of the failure of the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) to provide satisfactory answers to the questions I asked on January 10 and January 23. Those questions related to the recovery of income tax by the CBC from employees stationed in the United States. Some very basic and fundamental principles are at stake in this issue, and I trust my efforts in this regard will not be considered perfunctory.

This issue arose when the Auditor General reported to Parliament in 1969 that a Crown corporation for which he was the auditor, namely the CBC, failed to remit income tax and social security to the United States government for 17 of its employees while stationed in the United States. I realize there was a period during which the CBC was not sure whether the employees fell under Canadian income tax laws or United States income tax laws. During the period in which the CBC was trying to settle this dispute it continued to make deductions from its United States-based employees at the same rates as Canadian income tax, and kept this money in trust; then for some reason or other it was later returned in the same year, 1965.

The total amount of income tax owing by these 17 people was $134,573.99. One of the employees in the group had an indebtedness of $15,000, which is included in the figure I have just mentioned. Realizing the complexity and seriousness of this whole problem, the public accounts committee appointed a subcommittee chaired by the very capable and distinguished Liberal member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik). It held six meetings, and the public accounts committee held 15 meetings to discuss this whole matter.

Witnesses from the CBC and from the Department of National Revenue were heard as well as many others, including Mr. J. A. Coates, legal counsel from an outstanding international taxation firm in Toronto, who gave evidence for the guidance of the committee. The committee reported its findings and made a 13-point report to the House. I wish time permitted me to place the whole report on the record. However, I shall mention only two recommendations. First, recommendation No. 7 reads:

> That the corporation's action in 1965 was seriously inadequate in terms of taking steps to avoid exposing itself to a corporate liability without having made provision to recover the funds from its employees.

The last, and most important, recommendation made by the committee was that the CBC should immediately take steps to attempt to recover the $134,573.99 from the 17 employees involved. This matter now rests at that point. I should simply like to ask the minister the following questions, and I am sorry he is not here. First, was it not a reasonable assumption for the 17 employees of the CBC to assume that they should pay income tax in one country or the other? No one in their income bracket should be exempt. Second, I should like to ask the minister whether he feels that the hard-earned dollars of John Q. Public should be used to pay the income tax of the employees of the CBC, especially the one who had a tax liability of $15,000.

Further, I should like to ask, on what basis can a Crown corporation to whom parliament grants estimates to the tune of $200 million defy or disregard a recommendation tabled by an all-party committee of this House? Next, I should like to ask why the registered letter of March 29, 1973, was sent by the CBC to the 17 employees when it did not demand payment by the recipients. Finally, I should like to ask the minister this important question: Does he intend to instruct the CBC to collect this income tax, as recommended by an all-party committee of parliament, or does he intend to accept the refusal of the president to collect the income tax? That is the issue. It is a very important issue and one which must be settled.

I cannot understand how the president of the CBC can be taking a stand which defies a recommendation made by an all-party committee of this House. That is the issue. I hope the minister will answer these questions. I am sorry he did not feel that this was an important enough subject for thim to be here tonight to answer these questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I will not return the compliment to my hon. friend by telling him that he is not important, even though he is not a parliamentary secretary, because he knows that it has always been a custom for a parliamentary secretary to answer questions and I will try to do my best.

After the discussion which took place during the meeting of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, before which CBC appeared on April 5, last, I can only reiterate, in the name of the Secretary of State (M. Faulkner), the statement made by the President of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Mr. Picard.

As the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales), already knows, the attitude of the CBC as regards the recommendations of the Committee on Public Accounts in its report of June 30, 1972 was adopted following the advice from the CBC leagal advisers. The hon. member will also understand that those legal advisers were assigned under a law enacted by Parliament.

Therefore I am not expressing an opinion in my name or in the name of the Secretary of State since it is a legal matter. The CBC inquired from its legal advisers what right it had, on the basis of the recommendations by the Public Accounts Committee, to claim this money from its employees, and the legal advice was the following:

If the corporation should lodge such claims against its employees before a Canadian court, it would probably have no chance of succeeding.

As parliamentary secretary to the spokeman for the CBC in this House, I wish to assure the hon. member that the Secretary of State had lengthy discussions about this problem with CBC officials. Following the oral question directed January last by the hon. member to the Secretary of State, the president of the corporation wrote to the hon. member to assure him of his full co-operation towards a solution. The Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, which I personally attended, reviewed the question before approving the corporation's budget. The president of the corporation then answered the recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee, before which he had not appeared since the previous administration. He replied quite clearly, basing himself on documents in support of the legal aspect of his position. I therefore wish to assure the hon. member, and all other hon. members, of the interest taken in this matter by the CBC, the Secretary of State and myself, as a parliamentary secretary.

One thing, however, is certain: the Secretary of State cannot be asked to exceed his jurisdiction, but we will try to take action within our powers, and to find a solution if there is one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) for the purpose only of providing the date for the speech he made previously.

Mr. Hales: June 27, 1972, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE—FARM MACHINERY—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF BARBER COMMISSION—ACTION TO INCREASE IMPORTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on February 5 I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) a question regarding the Barber commission which studied the cost of farm machinery. I asked him what recommendations of that commission he was planning to implement, in view of increasing farm machinery costs. His answer was, "None at the present time." Because of that inadequate answer I want to pursue the question for a few minutes this evening. I also asked about a commitment made by his predecessor regarding imports of farm machinery into Canada. Again his answer was very vague; he said that he had met two ambassadors. As a result, I want to pursue that question also this evening.

The three prairie ministers of agriculture said, after a meeting last week, that one of the issues they are really concerned about is the increase in the cost of farm machinery, farm machinery parts, and repairs. These costs have been going up very rapidly in the past year. As a matter of fact, when I go around my constituency, as all of us from the rural areas do, one of the biggest complaints I receive is about the rapid increase in the price of farm machinery and of parts and repairs. These prices have been increasing much too rapidly in the last few years and this must stop.

In this House we hear a lot about the problem of increasing food prices. If production costs could be brought down, this would affect the price of food or would at least slow down the increase. If the input of the farmer could be controlled as to price, in the production of a bushel of wheat or a hog or beef it would be reflected at the retail level. The same thing is true, of course, of the input of such things as fertilizers, gas and oil that a farmer uses.

As we all know, the farmer is being squeezed off the land. This is mainly due to the drop in farm income. In my province, between 1968 and 1970 farm income was cut in half, but in the last few years it has gone up. The rural areas are being depopulated and one of the reasons is the increase in production costs to the farmer. The government will have take action in this area very quickly if it is to help the small and marginal farmers in this country.

Sad to say, the government has the solution at its fingertips in the Barber commission report, but that has been put away and is gathering dust. This report should be brought forward and its recommendations put into effect along with the recommendations of the governments of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. The report says that farmers are the victims of the farm marchinery companies, that they are paying too much for machinery and repairs. I suggest that the government should act on the recommendations listed in the report.

Apart from implementing this report, the government should establish a prices review board for all products. Then it could investigate the increase in the price of farm machinery and the cost of parts and repairs. If these increases were not justified, the government would have the statutory power to control or roll back prices. I think the government will have to take this step to ensure that the price of farm machinery is maintained at a level which will enable the farmer to survive.

There should also be more standardization of farm machinery parts. Perhaps machinery could be imported from countries such as Roumania at more favourable prices. There should also be more public involvement in public-private enterprise to produce more machinery, and perhaps aid and assistance could be given to the co-operative implements' plants in this country. These are some of the suggestions contained in the Barber commission report or advanced by the provincial governments.

I take this opportunity tonight to urge the government to act on the report as it refers to farm machinery and parts. If world depopulation continues, rural communities will be eroded and before long most of the people will live in a few large metropolitan areas that are unplanned, polluted and depersonalized. The only institution that can prevent this is the federal government. It has the power and the jurisdiction, and it is about time it shifted gears, got into action and implemented some of the recommendations of the Barber commission report.

Adjournment Debate

[Translation]

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said, and I quote:

> ... the undertaking by the former minister of agriculture that Canada would import more farm machinery from other countries ...

I should like to say at the start, Mr. Speaker, that although I have not been able to find texts in which the former minister gave such an assurance, I know that he tried to limit the prices of farm machinery by encouraging more competition. This was in line with a recommendation by the Barber Commission, which promoted negotiations and discussions aimed at making tractors from unaccustomed sources available to Canadian farmers.

For that purpose he will be meeting with delegations, officials and other representatives from such countries as Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Japan as well as officials from other countries including the USSR.

Since his appointment the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) also had discussions on the subject and undoubtedly there will be other initiatives in that field.

Tractors and other farm machinery from those countries are now available in Canada. I am convinced that all hon. members will agree with me that the government should intervene in purchases of farm machinery for farmers only to reduce import problems to a minimum. I would like to remind hon. members that equipment such as tractors enter Canada duty-free.

As several members know, the building of new lines of farm machinery in a foreign country results in various problems, the main one being undoubtedly the knowledge of our marketing methods to guarantee an adequate supply of machines and spare parts as well as adequate service. Solving those problems required more time than anticipated; however, there is a renewed interest in some countries for exporting farm machinery in Canada and it is hoped that the plans and ambitions of the department will meet some degree of success.

TRANSPORT—ALLEGED DETERIORATION IN WESTERN CANADA RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, on March 8 I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) to find ways to improve rail service between Edmonton and Calgary and I specifically cited instances where passengers had to stand in the baggage car for want of seating accommodation. I gave the minister the names of individuals who had been so affected, and I am sure that proper apologies have been proffered. But that does not alter the central question I raised. What are the government's plans to save the railways as a vital means of passenger transportation in an age dominated by jets and big airports?

Transportation is the lifeline of western Canada and improved transportation is essential for its continued development. Unfortunately, rail transportation has become an unwanted stepchild and it is time for the Minister of Transport and the railway companies to listen to the protests of western Canadians who want, and need, the kind of service the railways were subsidized by government to provide. As an example, a fast and efficient passenger train between Edmonton and Calgary is not a luxury but a necessity. The return air fare between the two cities is beyond the reach of the ordinary traveller or businessman. As Art Evans, a columnist for the Edmonton Journal, put it in a recent article:

> The air fare between Alberta's two major cities is now $18 one way. On a round trip, taking one taxi fare at each end, you're now looking at $40, a fair bite and one that only an expense account can handle regularly without wincing.

Mr. Evans feels, as I do, that one fast train making daily runs between Edmonton and Calgary would have no truble attracting passengers, especially if the round trip fare were lowered to $10. It is not just lack of seating on the Edmonton-Calgary line that is involved; it is the generally haphazard way the Dayliner is operated. For example, no businessman is going to take the train to Calgary if it makes four stops. Why could we not have a daily fast train, non-stop or with only one stop at Red Deer? This would bring travellers to downtown Calgary from the heart of Edmonton in two or two and a half hours. Increased efforts should also be made to provide clean cars and food.

The railway committee of the Canadian Transport Committee has asked for a study of passenger service throughout the country. Well, let the voice of Albertans who have been deprived of efficient and economical rail transportation be heard. Let the voice of Edmontonians who are fed up with the lack of action in getting rid of the level crossing on Whyte Avenue, the main street of south Edmonton, be heard.

Obviously, a piecemeal approach is not the solution. What is needed is a comprehensive program to improve service, serve passengers and lower freight rates. Why has the minister refused to set out a transportation policy which would serve the total transportation needs of western Canada? We know now that only such an all-embracing policy will broaden the industrial base of Alberta.

The facts are clear. The railways have discontinued rail passenger service at a number of Alberta communities. This adversely affects their social and economic development as well as the development of the province as a whole. Such communities are crippled in trying to attract industry. In other words, lack of federal concern about the needs of Alberta's communities hampers the economic and social wellbeing of the province. The cost to the public is one of those hidden expenses that is smothered by the excessive layers of bureaucracy in Canada. I believe that where rail service is discontinued for perhaps valid reasons, the federal government should give a commitment to provide passenger service by alternate means. The Western Conference on Economic Opportunities is fast approaching. Albertans want action on transportation. The passengers who had to stand on the Edmonton-Calgary Dayliner are just the tip of a very large iceberg of protest.

I understand the Minister of Transport is out of the country attending a conference. I hope the absence of his parliamentary secretary, who is a western Canadian, is not to be construed as further evidence of lack or real concern on the part of this government in solving the transportation problems of western Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) has referred to the first question he had asked and he forgot, probably by mistake, to indicate that the minister had personally answered him in a letter dated March 16, providing him with all the explanations he had obtained about matters that the hon. member had raised.

To the second part of the hon. member's question, I will answer in six points. First of all, many passenger train services are now being subsidized through the Canadian Transport Commission. In its 1972 annual report, the CTC indicates that $56,636,787 was paid on claims for passenger train services in 1971. The claims for 1971 exceeded $87 million.

Second, the government is subsidizing the development of so-called light rapid comfort or LRC trains. These would operate on existing tracks but at higher speeds due to improved suspension systems. A three-company consortium has been working on the development of these trains, and so far has been subsidized through the PAIT program, that is the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The consortium is preparing to test the cars and engines and further financial support is possible.

Third, the turbo train developed by the Canadian National and United Aircraft of Canada Limited will be retested this summer.

Fourth, the CTC has been funding various studies designed to improve railway passenger service, especially for high density areas.

Fifth, the Canadian Institute for Guided Ground Transport at Queen's University is doing studies for the government on magnetic levitation systems. They have received $380,000 from the Transportation Development Agency and $133,000 from the National Research Council, these sums totalling over half a million dollars. They are to build a test facility.

Sixth, the University of Toronto Institute for Aerospace Studies has been granted $20,000 by the Transportation Development Agency to study dynamic tracked air-cushion suspension systems.

I note the suggestions of the hon. member. I shall convey them to the minister who is now abroad; I shall try to find out whether he will make a statement on motions should he feel one is warranted.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BROADCASTING

SALE OF RADIO STATION, CKSB, WINNIPEG, TO CBC—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the decision by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to approve the sale of radio station CKSB, Winnipeg, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Because this decision has created hardship for many ethnic groups and because of CBC broadcasting policy, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts for study and report to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

INCOME TAX

CORPORATE MANIPULATIONS DESIGNED TO AVOID PAYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from public concern about the amount of taxes paid by the Chrysler Corporation in recent years and from the Auditor General's recommendation for more stringent control to prevent corporate manipulations designed to avoid the payment of income tax. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight):

That this House do recommend an amendment to Section 247(2) of the Income Tax Act which would remove the discretionary power of the minister where two or more corporations are separated solely for the purpose of saving taxes and not for operational efficiency, and make it mandatory that such separation be not permitted for tax purposes.

Mr. Speaker: This motion, also proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put at this time.

ARCTIC WATERS POLLUTION PREVENTION ACT

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION TO ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC COASTAL WATERS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-186, to amend the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

● (1110)

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, it seems apparent that the United States government is going to move its Prudhoe Bay oil across Alaska and down the west coast by tanker while this government sits idly by and wants to see it happen. The purpose of this bill is to extend what the government has described as the finest piece of pollution control legislation in the world, the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, to the Atlantic and Pacific coasts in order to protect our land from potential injury by what can only be described as an inconsiderate and irresponsible course of action by both the American and Canadian governments.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will take exception with the terms of the explanation given by the hon. member. It is not an explanation but a speech in support of the motion proposed by the hon. member and that is not in order.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND MACHINISTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ACHIEVE SETTLEMENT AND AVOID STRIKE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister with regard to the differences existing between Air Canada and the International Association of Machinists. In view of the fact the commissioner appointed by the government has been unable to recommend solutions for the four critical issues relating to matters other than money, what initiatives is the government taking toward the settlement of the dispute and the avoidance of a tie-up of Air Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an opportunity to discuss this dispute with the Minister of Labour before giving an answer.

RAILWAY AND GRAIN HANDLERS DISPUTES—GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES TO SETTLE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on a related matter. Does the Acting Prime Minister have any information about the railway and grainhandlers disputes and can he indicate to the House what initiatives, if any, the government is taking with regard to the settlement of these disputes?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would give the same answer as I gave in the other case.

Mr. Stanfield: May I express the hope to the Acting Prime Minister that the government will really consider these disputes as serious matters and seriously involve itself in methods of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONSIDERATION OF ESTABLISHMENT OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES COMMISSION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government giving consideration to setting up an industrial disputes commission, as recommended by the Woods task force report of 1968 and by this party, in order to define areas in the public interest and to provide a mechanism whereby industrial disputes that threaten to tie up the national economy can be averted?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that general subject is very much before the government. It is one of the reasons the Woods commission was appointed. However, the government has not found it easy to deal with this question in a satisfactory manner. In response to the Leader of the Opposition, may I add that the government is taking these disputes very seriously indeed. The Minister of Labour reports to the cabinet from time to time on his progress. To date, I think he has a fair measure of success in these matters.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the Acting Prime Minister assuring the House that the Minister of Labour reports to the cabinet from time to time. However, as these three disputes threaten to tie up the economy of this nation at a very critical time, can the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that the Minister of Labour will give the same kind of information to the House he has given to the cabinet?

Mr. Sharp: That is a matter of judgment. I would think the main purpose of all these negotiations is to achieve a satisfactory settlement and if the Minister of Labour finds it necessary to maintain the confidence of the various parties from time to time I would support his judgment.

STRIKE BY AIRLINE EMPLOYEES ASSOCIATION MEMBERS AGAINST AIR CANADA AT WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Would the Acting Prime Minister discuss with the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport the strike by members of the Canadian Airline Employees Association against Air Canada which began this week in Winnipeg, a strike brought about by the refusal of Air Canada to accept the unanimous report of the conciliation board? That strike will have an effect in the very near future on the whole operation of Air Canada.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): My answer to the first part of the question is, yes, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for his contribution.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In view of the serious nature of the impending strike, would the Acting Prime Minister involve himself with the Minister of Labour in order to ascertain whether he should intervene directly in order to arrive at a peaceful settlement?

Mr. Sharp: I think this question illustrates the confidence of members of the opposition in the effective work being done by the Minister of Labour, and I am sure he will intervene if he thinks it will be useful to do so.

ENERGY

GASOLINE—POSSIBILITY OF SHORTAGE—REQUEST FOR CONTROL OF EXPORTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On May 17, in answer to a question of mine regarding the danger of a possible gasoline shortage in Canada, the minister said that the National Energy Board was following the export of refined products very closely. Has the Energy Board drawn to his attention the fact that exports of gasoline for the months of January and February combined amounted to only 11,500 gallons and that in March exports had climbed to 5,332,000 gallons compared with 72,000 for the same month in 1972? In view of the fact that gasoline is being drained out of this country to meet the shortage in the United States, is the minister now prepared to extend the export controls which he imposed last February to cover gasoline and other refined products?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): It seems to me the critical question is whether there is short supply in Canada. My information from the board is that at the moment there is not, although these contracts which are made from day to day obviously have to be watched very closely. I can assure the hon. gentleman that if there is any evidence of short supply export control will be extended, but at the moment my advice from the board is that there is not.

Mr. Douglas: I am not sure from where the minister is getting his information. Is he aware of the fact that some of the independent dealers have already closed their doors and that others have been informed they cannot be guaranteed supplies of gasoline beyond the end of this month? In view of these facts I ask the minister whether, over the weekend, he will get in touch with the National Energy Board and then make a statement to the House on Monday as to what he proposes to do to meet this very serious situation as it affects not only the independent dealers but also the customers who deal with them?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I shall be glad to check and determine whether the hon. gentleman's assertions are facts.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister, if he is going to make a statement on Monday, whether he will secure from the National Energy Board the figure for exports of gasoline in April and an estimate of what they will be for May? All the information available seems to indicate that the astounding increase for the month of March has been escalated even further during the months of April and May.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I shall be glad to see what the facts are.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE CLOSING OF SAINT-MARC SCHOOL—DISCUSSION WITH BAND COUNCILS—REPRESENTATIONS TO MINISTER

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

There have been reports in Abitibi of closing down the Indian School at Saint-Marc. Can the minister tell us whether the Indian band councils served by that school were consulted before this decision was taken or whether they will be consulted if no final decision has as yet been taken as to the closing of the institution?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the facts in this case but I shall make inquiries. However, I can assure the hon. member that before closing down that school or of any institution coming under the jurisdiction of my department, sometimes motivated by lack of pupils, we invariably inform the communities involved, and this will be done in the present case.

● (1120)

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Can the minister tell us whether he has received briefs or other communications calling for continuing the institution?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire and report to the hon. member.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER INCREASE IN PRIME BANK INTEREST RATE—CONSIDERATION OF INTEREST EQUALIZATION TAX

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that American banks have announced another increase in their prime interest rate, and given the fact that the explanation for the rise in interest rates in Canada has been the differential between the rates of the two countries, is it reasonable to expect that the prime bank rate in Canada will be raised again in the near future?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is contrary to my custom to engage in speculation of this kind.

Mr. Gillies: Is the government giving any thought to an alternative way of dealing with this problem rather than constantly raising domestic interest rates in a period when there is some question whether this is an effective way to handle the domestic economy?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking me to engage in a debate on the relation between interest rates in Canada and the United States, and I really do not intend to do so.

Mr. Gillies: May I ask very specifically whether the government is giving any thought whatever to introducing a domestic interest equalization tax so we can slow down the outflow of funds from Canada because of the differential in interest rates on the short end of the market without following a policy that is causing all Canadians to pay more for mortgages, consumer credit and things of that sort?

Mr. Sharp: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. An interest equalization tax was once imposed by the United States. My recollection is that it did not prove to be very effective and eventually came under very strong attack.

Oral Questions

PENITENTIARIES

DECISION ON NEW TRIAL FOR YVES GEOFFROY—REASONS FOR TEMPORARY RELEASE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has any decision been made by the government with respect to the new trial asked for by Mr. Yves Geoffroy?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that is a question for the Minister of Justice who is absent today, but to my knowledge no decision has been made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister, who is in charge of penitentiaries, how it is that a photograph of this vile murderer, Yves Geoffroy, who killed his wife and whose appeals have been denied right to the Supreme Court of Canada, appears in an article in the Montreal Star, along with the woman for whom he committed the murder, sartorially perfect with hair cut and mustache trimmed in a manner that would do honour to anyone in that profession? How does this man happen to be out of prison? When prisoners are taken from penitentiaries, are they allowed to dress themselves up in perfect civilian attire? Why was the preliminary hearing not held in the prison in so far as the evidence was concerned, having regard to the fact that this man disappeared for three months at the time he was given freedom to get married?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will look into that. I do not know whether that picture is one that was taken when he was out recently, but I will be pleased to look into the matter and report to the House.

An hon. Member: He had that picture taken in Spain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, was the minister not asked to give permission for this man to get out to go to Joliette along with this woman to whom he is now married? With murderers disappearing from penitentiaries today, surely this pampered pet should not be placed in the favoured position in which he is.

HEALTH

ACTION TO PREVENT USE OF CHEMICAL FENITROTHON FOR SPRAYING

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the near disaster at Port Alice, British Columbia, this week, which was only prevented by the action of a local doctor who advised that the chemical fenitrothon, which was to be sprayed on trees in the area, contained enough nerve gas to kill 200,000 people, will the minister assure the House that he will review the regulations and legislation which allowed this situation to occur in order that recurrences will be prevented?

[Mr. Sharp.]

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to investigate the incident mentioned by the hon. member and ask my officials to make a report on the present situation. I can assure the hon. member that if supplementary action is needed, we will not hesitate to take it.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who was here in the House but has now departed. Perhaps I should wait until later in the question period to see if he returns. If he does not I will put the question to the Acting Prime Minister.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT NOT SEEK RETURN OF OVERPAYMENTS TO FARMERS UNDER WHEAT INVENTORY REDUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the Auditor General's report points out that the government has written off $6 million in taxes owed by a large United States automobile company and at the same time is trying to collect $228,000 in overpayments under the Lift program, which were mainly the result of government mistakes, can the minister indicate whether the government is giving consideration to forgiving these overpayments to farmers?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's facts are a little twisted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Your answer certainly is.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I will study the implications of the hon. member's question and try to give him an answer, but he is certainly not interpreting the Auditor General's report as I read it.

Mr. Fairweather: You are twisting it.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, in view of the indication in two reports of the Auditor General that the government has in fact spent a considerable amount of money attempting to collect overpayment under Lift, while at the same time we see no evidence in the reports of any attempt to collect the $6 million owed by a large U.S. automobile company, will the minister give serious consideration to writing off the $228,000, which I suggest would be cheaper than trying to collect it?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, in respect of the question of recovering overpayments under Lift, I do not think this would be a matter for the Department of National Revenue. In so far as the $6 million is concerned to which the hon. member has made reference, there is no suggestion in the Auditor General's report that this is money owing to the government.

BROADCASTING

SALE OF RADIO STATION, CKSB, WINNIPEG, TO CBC—REQUEST THAT DECISION BE SET ASIDE AND REHEARING HELD IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Is he aware of a petition to the Governor in Council, which has been presented to the government, asking that approval by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission of the CBC takeover of radio station CKSB, Winnipeg, be set aside and that the matter be referred back to the commission for a rehearing to be held in Winnipeg where all interested groups could be heard? If so, what decision has been made on this matter?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such a petition but I will check with my office. It may be that the petition has been sent to the Minister of Communications.

Mr. Yewchuk: Would the minister give the House his assurance at this time that section 38 of the Official Languages Act will be enforced in respect of this takeover and that the established and customary rights of ethnic groups will not be violated, not only during the next 12 months but thereafter?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can comment on that question at this time. I am prepared to discuss it with the hon. member. I do want to tell him that I have now received the petition. Several copies have just been placed on my desk.

COMMUNICATIONS

DISPUTE RESPECTING JURISDICTION—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC MINISTER AND PREMIER BOURASSA

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Communications.

In view of the serious difficulties between the Quebec and the federal governments with regard to telecommunications, and as the federal minister stated that he is quite willing to let the dispute go before the courts for a settlement if need be, can he tell us whether, in the interest of both parties, he will try to meet again his opposite number for Quebec before the matter has to be solved before the courts?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My statement on motions last week did contain an indication to that effect.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

The Quebec premier having spent the last two or three days in Ottawa, did the minister take advantage of the situation to discuss this matter with him?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): No, Mr. Speaker. The Quebec premier, like all other provincial premiers who were here, looked very busy. Anyway, I had learned that the Quebec Minister of Communications was abroad when I made my statement. He will be returning to Canada very soon.

AGRICULTURE

INCREASE IN FARM MACHINERY PRICES—POSSIBLE INVESTIGATION BY FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD—MEASURES TO CONTROL

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the position of the three prairie ministers that recent price increases on farm machinery are not justified, does the government intend to instruct the Food Prices Review Board to investigate farm input costs and, as a high priority, present farm machinery prices?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the terms of reference of the proposed board do not encompass that question. If it were to be extended in that direction it would, of course, lose its character which is to deal with the food prices.

Mr. Balfour: Would the minister tell the House whether the government is prepared to establish price guidelines for farm machinery and is it prepared to act with the provinces to control farm machinery prices if necessary?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we will take that suggestion under consideration.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

KAMLOOPS RESERVE—LEGALITY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA GOVERNMENT ACTION TO INCORPORATE PORTION WITHIN CITY LIMITS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact the government of British Columbia has by order in council and against vigourous protests by the people involved moved to incorporate part of the Indian reservation in Kamloops within the city limits of Kamloops, has the minister consulted with the Minister of Justice concerning the legality of such a move?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I sent a telegram to the government of British Columbia indicating that I did not agree with that decision. However, the province of British Columbia can pass any legislation it wants, but I can assure the hon. member that, as far as I am concerned, the status of Indian reservations will not be changed for all that, and I do not believe that the move initiated by the province of British Columbia is appropriate at this stage because there has been no previous consultation whatsoever with the Indians. I have already discussed the general problem of the relations between the government of British Columbia and the Indians of that province with the Attorney General, and I wrote to him, but, to this day, we have not been able to solve all the difficulties.

KAMLOOPS RESERVE—NULLIFYING OF ELECTION OF CHIEF—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF TRANSCRIPT OF HEARINGS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also related to the question of the Indians at Kamloops. EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED NATIONS' DESIGNATION OF 1974 AS WORLD POPULATION YEAR—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON PREPARATIONS BY CANADA FOR CONFERENCE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact the United Nations has designated 1974 as world population year, with a big conference scheduled similar to the Stockholm conference on pollution, will the minister be making a statement as to Canada's preparations for input into that conference and, if so, when may we expect a statement?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in view of the widespread interest in this question I would respond to the hon. lady that we would want to give great support and if it would be useful for me to make a statement on our participation I would do so. I cannot say at the present time when would be the most suitable time. I would think it would be closer to 1974.

[Mr. Oberle.]

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): The reason I raise the matter now is that I believe it is of the highest importance that the minister should be thinking of plans to involve the Canadian people in seminars and discussions ahead of time. Otherwise the whole thing will just die—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is a representation, and the member will have to assume that the minister has heard and noted it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PAY OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL ON VIET NAM SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Some time ago I drew the minister's attention to the fact that the foreign service allowances being paid members of the armed forces serving on the International Commission of Control and Supervision in Viet Nam were considerably less than those paid personnel from the Department of External Affairs. I asked him to see what could be done to correct this anomaly. Can he report to the House on the success or otherwise he has had in this regard?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall from earlier statements that in addition to regular pay and allowances we pay a foreign service allowance of $150 for a single person and $180 a month for married men. As this allowance was some $70 below the allowance paid to Canadian civilian personnel serving on the International Control Commission I have recommended, and the Treasury Board has now approved, a new special foreign service allowance of $70 a month for all personnel in our armed forces serving on the International Control Commission. I might add that this special allowance will be tax free and will be retroactive to January 29 for those personnel who left Canada on that date and to later dates for personnel who left later. I am certain the House will agree that this additional foreign service allowance is deserved by our personnel serving in Viet Nam.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the minister on his constructive action and wish to say that if other departments would come through with such action this government would not be in the spot it is in today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

REQUEST THAT GERALD BLACKMORE BE REMOVED FROM DELEGATION ABOUT TO VISIT POLAND

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the information for this question has come to me on very short notice, but the matter is urgent and very real in its aspects. I have spoken to two ministers about it. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister to take steps to eliminate Gerald Blackmore from a mining delegation about to visit Poland.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have heard the gentleman's name, but I will take that representation into account.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why the minister has not heard the name because I have been kicking it around in the House for six years. I would ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he is aware that Gerald Blackmore was, in Tom Kent's words, recently separated—that is the sophisticated way of saying he was fired—from a position with the Cape Breton Development Corporation, a Crown company?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I must insist on this because this is very urgent. I think the least the Acting Prime Minister can do is take notice of these questions and the importance of not having this man, who has been the architect of ruin in Cape Breton, on an international delegation. The minister from Cape Breton is well aware of this and will substantiate the statement that this man was dismissed from a Crown corporation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his representation.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Give him a one-way ticket.

SUGGESTED PROCLAMATION OF NON-SMOKING DAY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but first I should like to say that I am glad to see him safely back in the House today. In view of the continued heavy incidence of death and disease associated with such diseases as lung cancer, emphysema and thrombosis, associated with cigarette consumption, will the minister give favourable consideration to the proclamation issued by the government of British Columbia setting aside May 31 as non-smoking day in that province?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question a few days ago. I will certainly give consideration to his suggestion. I would like to have some assurance, however, that smokers will not take double rations on June 1.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that fertilizer ordered last February by farmers in central Alberta is not available now, and in view of the assurance of the Minister of Agriculture to the House that there would be an adequate supply, would the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce state now what action the government plans to take to meet this national emergency?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the premise that it is a national emergency, I will be pleased to look into the matter and report back.

Mr. Towers: If the minister finds this statement to be correct, which I am sure he will if he checks with central Alberta, will he be prepared to stop immediately all export of fertilizer until domestic requirements are supplied?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In spite of the hon. member's assurance, which the Chair does not doubt, I will have to rule that the question is hypothetical. The hon. member has made a representation and he has to assume that the minister has noted it.

Oral Questions

BROADCASTING

SALE OF RADIO STATION, CKSB, WINNIPEG, TO CBC—CBC POLICY ON MULTICULTURAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State regarding the sale of radio station CKSB. In view of the petition that has been received by the minister and his cabinet colleagues with regard to the sale of CKSB, and in view of the recent multiculturalism program outlined by the minister in charge of that department in Edmonton recently, could the minister indicate to the House what changes the CBC is considering in its policy regarding the use of CBC facilities relative to multicultural broadcasting?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I have suggested before on this matter if members of the House, particularly members of the Broadcasting Committee, want to pursue this matter with the CBC they should do so while the estimates of the corporation are before the committee. It seems to me that this is the most intelligent way to get at the problem in depth.

SALE OF RADIO STATION CKSB, WINNIPEG, TO CBC—ACTION TO SET ASIDE CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION DECISION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, now that the minister has had a chance to review the petition and because there is a good deal of urgency in setting aside the CRTC decision, the deadline being Monday next, can the minister indicate whether he plans to take any action prior to the expiry of the period during which he can launch an objection to the decision?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ENTITLEMENT TO DRUGS—DIRECTIVE LIMITING PROVISION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to ask him whether a directive has been issued by his department indicating that the department will no longer assume responsibility for the cost of drugs taken by treaty Indians after June 1 other than by those who are resident on reserves or indigents? Why was this change in policy necessary, and what provisions have been made to identify those Indians who qualify so as to avoid any hardships?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to a situation in Saskatchewan. I heard about this situation only yesterday afternoon and I have asked for a full report. I will be glad to inform the hon. member later, some time next week.

SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF MEDICAL SERVICES FROM HEALTH AND WELFARE TO INDIAN AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has he received any representations to have the medical services section transferred back to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development so that he can assume the responsibility for health services as provided for Indians under existing treaties?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this problem, but with regard to the hon. member's suggestion, I believe that the area of the Indians' health is very well administered by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. How can the minister make that statement when the minister is abdicating his responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Meadow Lake.

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the question asked by the hon. member for Mackenzie. Is the Minister of National Health and Welfare aware of the medicine chest clause in treaty No. 6 and the several court rulings in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that a question asked in those terms is in order. The hon. member might like to rephrase the question.

Will the livestock inventory provisions in the last budget be made retroactive to January 1, 1972 and, if not, what steps will the minister or the cabinet take to cure the one-year tax hiatus between the termination of the basic herd provisions in 1971 and the commencement of the inventory provisions in the recent budget?

ENTITLEMENT TO DRUGS—DIRECTIVE LIMITING PROVISION—PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the one asked by the hon. member for Mackenzie. I wish to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he was consulted in connection with this matter before the Department of National Health and Welfare took action which is in direct contradiction and contravention of the treaty rights of these Indians?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have not been informed of it, but I had the opportunity to discuss this problem this week with the Indian Association of Saskatchewan. I already made representations to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on this matter and he assured me that he was considering the problem and that he would be in a position to report to both the House and myself early next week.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the minister is the custodian of the rights of the Indians under the treaties, did he point out that what was done was in direct violation of the rights of the Indians and that it should be immediately set aside and countermanded, and if he did have a chat with the Minister of National Health and Welfare as he has just stated, when was it that he gave his views?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I was informed of this problem long before the right hon. member raised the question in this House and as soon as I had a chance to do so, I met with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday I discussed the matter with him and he is now considering the issue. I think that everything to be done will be done in due course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot brush aside the rights of the Indians in that cavalier manner.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister: did he protest against the wrong that is being done to these Indians by this bureaucratic order that is totally unjust?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, unlike the right hon. member, I examine all the facts before protesting and as soon as the Saskatchewan Indians asked to meet with me, I was pleased to receive them. PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—CABINET COMMITTEE ASSESSMENT OF ANALYSIS—COMMUNICATION OF POSITION TO QUEBEC

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wished to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his capacity as chairman of the cabinet committee co-ordinating federal activities relating to the James Bay project but in his absence I would direct it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who I presume is still a member of that committee. Can the minister tell the House whether the committee has examined the recently presented analysis which shows, first, an over-exaggeration by the James Bay Corporation of Quebec's power needs and, second, the advantages of nuclear rather than hydraulic power, and has the federal committee's assessment been conveyed to the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this question of resource development in the James Bay area is still under consideration by the government; all the elements of the case are being continuously considered. This is one of the elements of the case now under consideration and consultations take place quite regularly with the Quebec government. As regards the number of kilowatts and the cost, etc., this comes under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I shall bring to his attention the question asked by the hon. member.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR POSSIBLE ADDITIONAL PROJECTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State. Since the minister has now advised Members of Parliament that there is going to be an increase in the number of opportunities for youth projects funded this year, may I ask whether a different set of criteria has been used in the selection of the additional projects compared with the first batch?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure that I understand the hon. member's question. No additional funds have been provided for the program. What might take place is that, with the extension of certain LIP projects, projects that we might have been involved in through the opportunities for youth program will be funded that way. If this happens, then these additional funds will be applied to projects that were turned down but against the same criteria that applied to the first batch. There will be no change in the criteria.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, a letter from the minister's office advised my office that there were four additional projects to be funded in my riding. I do not know what has happened in other ridings, but 50 per cent of those additional projects funded are not from the rated list at all. I asked the question to find out whether new projects have been selected on a different set of criteria from the former ones?

Mr. Faulkner: No, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to look into that particular case because that is not my understanding.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Yukon on a supplementary, then the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe, and then call orders of the day.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ALLEGED NOTIFICATIONS THAT PROJECTS REJECTED AS A RESULT OF CONSULTATION WITH MEMBER FOR AREA

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Is it the practice in his department when notifying applicants whose applications for OFY projects have been rejected to state that the rejection has been arrived at as a result of consultation with the Member of Parliament of the area? If so, will the minister cease and desist from the continuation of this rather reprehensible practice unless it is in fact the case?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have had some strong representations on the phrasing of the letter of rejection, particularly from my colleagues on this side. In my judgment, and I know this view is not shared by many of my colleagues, if one views the letter objectively and dispassionately the opportunity for consultation was open to Members of Parliament. Where the confusion seems to arise is on what consultation means.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Faulkner: If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, I think I have made it abundantly clear to hon. members and to the public that consultation does not mean that the member of parliament has the final say. It simply means that, as an individual who in my judgment knows his constituency well, he should be approached for advice on projects, but the final decision—I repeat this for the fourth or fifth time—lies with me. Responsibility for rejection does not lie with Members of Parliament; it lies clearly with me and I am prepared to take that responsibility.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise now because this matter affects the privileges of all members of the House. There are some members who have chosen not to reply to the letters that have been sent by the minister and have not offered any advice to the minister one way or another. It is an offensive practice and contrary to the privileges of members for the minister to leave any inference, directly or indirectly or in any manner, that such grants have been rejected after consultation with the Member of Parliament. The question of privilege centers upon the abuse of ministerial prerogatives to that extent. The minister is not entitled to do it and it is an offensive practice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West and also the Leader of the Opposition are seeking the floor. In view of the fact that we have reached the end of the question period I suggest we should try to get on. I was hoping to recognize the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe, but the hon. member for Fraser Valley West rises on a question of privilege after which I will recognize the Leader of the Opposition and then, hopefully, the hon. member of Grey-Simcoe.

Mr. Rose: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, that was raised by the hon. member for Yukon, I would ask the Secretary of State whether he is aware that a prominent former member of the government, former employee of the government and former member for Burnaby-Seymour has been quoted in print as implying that Members of Parliament in their constituencies have the power to approve or veto any project.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a question. Again, in the hope that we can make some progress the Chair will recognize the minister for the purpose of replying and then recognize the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Faulkner: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that statement, but I will certainly make it clear to my colleagues, if there is a continuation of OFY in the future, that there is no support for consultation among members of this House. It seems to me that is a regrettable retreat.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not.

Mr. Faulkner: Of course it is.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are obviously getting into debate. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Hees: Consultation consists of you saying no; that is what it is.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Would the minister not agree, as the fair-minded man I always thought he was—

Mr. Hees: Until now.

Mr. Stanfield: —that a letter going out over his signature indicating that a grant had been rejected after consultation with the Member of Parliament indicates to the recipient that the Member of Parliament has objected to the grant?

Mr. Hees: That is straight dishonesty.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, in fairness I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition should note that the letter of acceptance contains exactly the same words.

Mr. Hees: There are a lot more rejections.

Mr. Faulkner: All we attempted to do through that rather longer letter—

Mr. Hees: —is pass the buck!

Mr. Faulkner: Just relax, George—was to explain to those whose projects were refused, as well as to those that were accepted, the process. It is perfectly true—the hon. member for Yukon makes this point and it is a valid point which I will probably have to consider—that those members who systematically stayed out of any consultations and did not want to see the list of projects are left in an ambiguous position. I think probably we should try to clear that, but the fact remains that all Members of Parliament had the opportunity to look at the complete list of projects and the preferred list—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps there will be an opportunity to look into the matter a little more deeply later, but for the moment we have to make some headway. I am still hoping to recognize the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MEAFORD TANK RANGE—INQUIRY AS TO FUTURE USE

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that Camp Meaford, better known as the Meaford tank range, has to some extent again been reactivated as an armoured training area for the army, can the minister inform us whether this is a temporary measure or one of a more permanent nature because of the concern of the people in the area whose basic desire is to use this range as a national park some time in the foreseeable future?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have advised those concerned that the Meaford range will be required for training purposes long into the future. It is not a short-term program.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED LACK OF PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL OF PUBLIC FUNDS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved:

That this House, protesting the Government's continuing takeover of Parliamentary control of public money and the Government's mismanagement in spending escalating public revenues, warns that immediate and decisive action must be taken to restore control of public funds to Parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before I begin my comments may I say that there has been general understanding that after the first four speakers have taken the time allotted to them under the pertinent rule, all other speakers shall speak for 15 minutes. There has been great interest in this subject and that time limitation will give more members an opportunity to make comments and intervene in the debate.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member suggest that after the first round of speakers have completed their remarks, each speaker is to be limited to 15 minutes. We are in agreement with that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Is the House in agreement?

Mr. Laprise: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, one wonders why this subject is being brought before the House again today. This is the fourth time in three years that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has considered it essential to bring this matter to the attention of the House, of the government and of the country. A good many other subjects could provide a topic for discussion today. Nevertheless, we take such a serious view of the situation regarding government expenditures that we feel, as the government has done nothing at all as a consequence of the three debates held in the last three years since 1970, that it is our duty as well as prerogative to make sure that the facts are ventilated so that, hopefully, at some time in the future this government will be aware of its delinquency in the area of government spending.

The government has a duty to perform in three areas, as has parliament. First, we must enact legislation; second, challenge and scrutinize the accounts of the government generally, on a day-to-day basis; and, finally, deal with government expenditures and approve government expenditures when they are brought forward in the proper form. In my opinion, the last of these areas is the most important for us to consider.

I said that there were lots of other topics which we might have discussed today. I do not know how much attention will be paid to the present debate. I know there are stirrings across the border in Washington, in connection with certain events going on there. In the United Kingdom, the senior chamber of the United Kingdom parliament apparently is showing more activity in certain respects than is our senior chamber and is securing a great deal of attention from the press. A conference is going on in Ottawa, about which I will say something later. All the same, I suggest that we can spend our time in no better way than in discussing, for the balance of this morning and this afternoon, the tremendously important question suggested by the motion.

The other day I was at the National Arts Centre. Anyone who has been there lately will have seen the reconstructed skeleton of the dinosaur. It certainly reminded me of this government. When it was alive it must have been heavy, covered with scales, and fierce looking. It had a big mouth. It was carniverous and had a great appetite. If we had seen it in action, no doubt we should have found it adept at concealment and deception.

An hon. Member: Like the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Nielsen: And it probably changed colour when the occasion was right.

Mr. Baldwin: Despite the other attractions I have mentioned it is evident, from my reading of news stories and editorials printed in various newspapers across this land, that the statements made in the last report of the Auditor General have revived the interest of the people, particularly of the poor, harassed taxpayer of this country, in what this government is doing. This fact has reinforced our determination to continue to bring this matter to the attention of the government so that, at least when this government has gone and we have replaced it, we shall have our own words to contend with and there will be a new deal for the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: For the forgotten majority.

Mr. Baldwin: My colleagues will be dealing with particular items of waste, extravagance, stupidity and misspending. I am particularly anxious to direct the attention of the House to what I believe to be one of the most serious issues we must face, namely, the loss or weakening of parliamentary control over government spending.

I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) about this yesterday, and in his reply he brushed the suggestion off, saying, "Why, parliament has even more control over spending than it had before." That, I say, is nonsense.

Mr. Nielsen: Sheer rubbish.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Baldwin: The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) who has replied on behalf of the government in a number of similar debates no doubt will be trotting out the 1973 version of the rather juvenile and attenuated remarks which he has brought forward in debates of this kind. In addition, he will probably say, "You have more powers than you ever had; you have more weapons at your disposal and more means of dealing with estimates." That, I say, is wrong. I know it is wrong; my colleagues know it is wrong; parliament knows that is wrong and it is not in accordance with the facts. Something will have to be done about it.

I suggest that the minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are entitled to the degree, "master of obfuscation". When I thought of that word I looked it up in the dictionary and saw I was right in using it. Obfuscation means to darken, to obscure, to confuse and to stupefy. That is what the minister and his colleagues are doing with respect to this particular issue.

There are two aspects of the issues at which we should look, namely, what I call the aspects of pre-spending and of post-spending. Let us look at the issue of pre-spending and what we can do about it. The minister may say, "You may use the committees to examine estimates". The President of the Treasury Board knows as well as every member of this House that all the members of my party and, I believe, all my friends to my left have participated in parliamentary committee proceedings have done so diligently and earnestly, but in spite of this many here will agree with me when I say that, so far as being a vehicle for a reasonable examination of estimates of departments and Crown corporations before the money is spent, those proceedings are an absolute flop. They have failed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: True, they have provided opportunity for the cross-examination of witnesses and the basis on which facts can be gleaned. Those facts can be used at a later date, possibly in debates in this House. However, as a method of conducting a rational and sensible examination of estimates before the money is spent, those proceedings are not satisfactory. One of the things my electors in Peace River said when they sent me here was, "Go down there and do something about the government's extravagance in spending." Hon. members opposite look honest to me. They try to be honest. Sometimes they do not completely succeed, that is in a parliamentary sense. They will agree that if they talk to their constituents, they will be told to do something about this government's escalation of expenditures. This government is poised like a space satellite; all system set to go right up to the stratosphere.

• (1210)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: A better method must be adopted. If time permits, in spite of the discussions on the other side, I intend to do just that.

This debate is not just for the purpose of criticizing, but, in a spirit of friendly co-operation, to try to show the government what can be done. This is the last opportunity for the government to do these things. If they do not, we will be doing them before too long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I hope my friends to my left will join with us in our attempt to achieve our objection through this debate. Both the New Democratic Party and the Creditistes have supported us in other motions we have presented. I hope they will continue to do so. That is the reason we did not put this motion in the form of a confidence motion, as we might have. At this stage, this situation is too serious and we want their support. I know the NDP have been having a few problems recently. They have been so busy concealing their doctrines with one hand and covering their dogma with the other that they stand almost indecently exposed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: But, I hope they will join with us in meeting one of the most serious situations in this country. When the estimates are included in an appropriation bill on the final opposition day, it will be our intention to challenge and vote on certain items. I hope the government will make public its position before that item. Will it regard the loss of an important supplementary item such as Information Canada as a question of confidence? What will be the position of the government on this? What will be the position of my friends to the left? We intend to treat our responsibility seriously in this matter and make a valiant, reasonable and diligent effort to bring this monster of government under some kind of control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The former Auditor General has had a lot to say in his report. We must bear in mind that the Auditor General's report is prepared by more than one man. The Auditor General holds that office together with members of his staff. They are competent, diligent, hard-working, independent people who do a very tough job under circumstances which have not been made easy by the efforts of this government. The Auditor General's report has stated that expenditures are now $20 billion. By the time we take into account certain loans, advances and future payments which will be presented in the form of supplementary estimates before we finish with this fiscal year, the figure will be well over $20 billion. The Auditor General has made reference to this fact and has pointed out the dangers.

I suggest that hon. members read carefully the Auditor General's report. I hope they do. It should be done in the proper way. It is like drinking brandy. You put it in a snifter, sniff it quite often and drink it drop by drop. Only in this way can you get the full flavour of the report. It cannot be done hastily. It must be done with competence, diligence and patience. You have to be a good reader to understand what it is all about. If hon. members opposite do that, they may have a completely different approach to this particular issue.

What is to be seen behind the dry language of the accountant and the lawyer is the unfolding of the details of a fiscal assault of massive proportions against the taxpayer, with completely inadequate weapons given to those representing the people to repel the assault or even to uncover the details. The federal government first woos the voters with deceptive and seductive calls for the implementation of great new social and welfare proposals, always concealing the true escalation of costs. Then, there is established a huge bureaucratic machine with a new minister or ministers and their accompanying menageries, and ultimately parallel provincial counterparts.

The inevitable result is a spending program of enormous stupidity and duplication, waste and extravagance. The unfortunate taxpayer is then sternly told he will have to pay for the great benefits which a kindly and benevolent government has conferred upon him. When the Auditor General, in pursuance of his duties, attempts to ferret out and detail what these expenditures are, the government says that he is snooping and is going beyond his authority. Their subtle, and sometimes not so subtle, methods delay and impede any attempt to examine the control of expenditures in the detail required.

To add insult to injury, the federal government, having fixed a habit on the people like drugs for an addict, calmly suggest that they should pull out and leave the resulting mess as well as the massive costs to be dealt with by the provinces. This is what this meeting in Ottawa today is all about. I have some views, as do others, on what is going on in this city today. These eleven people, the sultans, caliphs, emperors and the Caesar from Ottawa are like eleven doctors conducting a premature postmortem and autopsy on a still breathing and struggling taxpayer. This is what it amounts to. Some day I would like to see a federal-provincial conference with one item on the agenda, finding ways and means to reduce the huge duplication of administrative expenditures. I may not live to see the day unless in the near future this Conservative party forms the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I suggest to the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), who is now making more noise than usual, and sometimes it is a good noise, that he will support what I have to say today. I know this is how he feels. I want him and some of his colleagues to say they feel this way. Let them be honourable members, speak up and say they agree with me. I know that is the way many of them feel. All they need is a little courage to stand up and say so.

My time is limited. I want to refer briefly to some of the comments contained in the Auditor General's report. Although I should like to deal with all of them, time will not permit. I am referring, Mr. Speaker, to the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972.

● (1220)

It is one of the fundamental principles of our constitutional heritage that the House of Commons control the finances of the country.

Who disagrees with that assertion? Yet it is not the case today. How many hon. members can stand up and honestly say that this situation exists in parliament, in this House of Commons, today?

An hon. Member: No one.

Mr. Baldwin: And on page 10 we read:

> Expenditures of public moneys at the level of $20 million a year are today over three times larger than they were a decade ago. The number of employees on the federal payroll, which in 1961-62 was 330,000, reached 405,000 in 1971-72. This figure could well reach 450,000 in 1973-74 on the basis of the recently tabled estimates for that year.

And this does not take into account all the contractual arrangements which are made, by means of which people can be brought in without being shown on the payroll.

> The changes which have taken place over this period, and the nature and diversity of public spending, including its presentation to parliament, continue to add vast new dimensions to the problem—In my 1968 report to the House I suggested it would be of material assistance were parliament to consider commissioning a management study of government organization at least once every decade.

I support that. My colleagues support that proposal. I asked a question of the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) yesterday. I think he tried to skip over it. I hope I am wrong. I hope that before this debate is over he will stand up and say he accepts that proposition. And, finally, on the same page:

> It is the right, privilege and duty of the House of Commons to control the finances of the country.

Mr. Speaker, this is simply not being done today. Look at some of the ways in which the government evades its responsibilities. Reference to committees I have shown to be useless as far as real control is concerned. Then, there is the method of using dollar items in the estimates. It is quite improper but it is used frequently in spite of admonitions from this House and from the Auditor General.

Take statutory fixed payments. The House passed the relevant bill, of course it did. Hon. members were deceived at the time as to what the ultimate cost would be. Yes, they were deceived. The President of Treasury Board gives me a pained look. If he goes back to those debates and reads what was said, as I did—and I have the relevant copies of Hansard here, but I do not have the time to go through them—he will find I am right. The Liberal government from 1963 to 1973 engaged in actual deception through deliberate miscalculation of what the cost of some of these programs would be, and today we are faced, as taxpayers as well as in our capacity as members of the house, with a fait accompli.

Take subsidies. Millions of dollars are being disbursed by way of subsidies under programs such as LIP and OFY. We do not have time to debate the issues involved here, but the government knows, and we know, that expenditures of this nature are undertaken, programs are entered into, and only ex post facto do we in this House have an opportunity to deal with those expenditures. Hundreds of millions of dollars are committed and all we can do is approve those expenditures, the money having already been spent. That is a fact of life. That is one of the ways in which the government evades its responsibilities.

Then, there is the device of omnibus legislation. I could refer to items in the report—paragraphs 52 to 63. Failure to file annual returns. I could go on. There are 15 or 16 methods itemized by which the government succeeds in evading its responsibilities, preventing the House from carrying out its duties to the taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, my time has almost expired. I said I would make some suggestions. I shall not simply end my comments on a critical note. I believe it is part of our duty to be critical when we see wrongdoing and my hon. friends and I will exercise our rights without fear or favour. But I believe we should also make some suggestions and I have a few suggestions I should like to put before the House. First, there must be a new Auditor General's Act. The minister says: Wait and see what the new Auditor General has to say about it. That is reasonable. But I submit that the Public Accounts Committee has a responsibility to undertake immediately a study of new legislation and to complete that study before this House adjourns. If not, what will happen is this: the new Auditor General will not take over until July 1. The act will not be studied by the committee until well into the fall of this year. It will not come before this chamber until, probably, the early part of 1974 and there will not be a new act until at least a year has gone by. That is too long to wait, and I, for one, do not intend to see such a length of time elapse if I can prevent it.

The form of the estimates has to be changed. I see the President of the Treasury Board writing busily at this time. He and I know that the estimates conceal rather than reveal, like some of the dresses which were worn a few years ago. I believe the form of the estimates must be studied in committee so as to produce a simplified form which reveals, rather than conceals, information.

Then, as I have said over and over again, there must be brought into the House, into a revived Committee of Supply, at least four or five departments every parliament so that we may have an opportunity in this House to subject to full scrutiny at least one of the important departments once each Parliament. The choice should be that of the opposition. The proceedings in that Committee of Supply should be televised. They should be open to live radio and television. The issue is too important to be concealed from the people of this country, and I suggest this is one debate which should be televised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: My colleagues may agree with me or not, but I think this is important.

A vote should be taken at the end of every opposition day. It is a travesty of parliamentary procedure to conduct debates of this kind in the absence of a division. I recognize that not every vote need be in the nature of a confidence motion, but it is imperative that every opposition motion on an opposition day should be decided by a vote.

Yesterday or the day before I was obliged to drag out of the government, using Standing Order 43, agreement to refer to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts the reports of the Auditor General going back to March 31, 1971. Such a reference should be automatic. What happened was a shocking example of dereliction of duty on the part of the government. There should, therefore, be a change in Standing Orders to provide that automatically at the beginning of each session the Public Accounts for the preceding year and the report of the Auditor General should go to the committee, which would be in business at once. There should be a mandatory date by which the committee should report back. The committee should be armed with sufficient professional staff and facilities to make it possible to report to the House by a date which would allow time for a mandatory debate. There should also be in the standing orders a provision that the chairman of the committee bring before the House the report of the committee for its consideration; the opposition would then have the right to move an amendment or call attention to any shortcomings which in its opinion showed that the government was failing to carry out its duties properly, or failing to pay attention to the recommendations of the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee. This should be mandatory, and these proceedings should be carried out in the full glare of publicity, attended by live television and radio. I might add that the government should have the right to table its response in advance so that we might engage in a debate with the issues clearly defined.

I suggest, finally, that an attempt should be made by the government to eliminate some of the practices to which I referred earlier in my remarks. There is no reason these things should be so esoteric. Consider the extent to which the people of this country are involved in the escalating cost of living. It has been said by the Economic Council of Canada and by a great many others that as far as domestic issues are concerned, the increasing cost of government constitutes the largest element in the present inflationary process. I think this statement is accepted in all circles. It is essential that this House show the people of Canada a determination to grasp this nettle and deal with it. No better way can be found to do that than by this government indicating to this House and the country its recognition of the problems, its defects of the past, and its preparedness to accept some of the proposals I am sure will emanate from this side of the House before the debate is concluded.

● (1230)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first occasion, as the mover of the motion has recalled to us, on which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has moved a motion along the lines of the one we are now debating. Almost exactly a year ago he expressed similar concern in almost the same terms, lacking some of the suggestions he included in today's remarks.

I should like to be able to think that the hon. member is showing only a general, highminded and meritorious concern for the principles upon which our parliamentary system is founded, a concern which I am sure is shared by all members. I should like to believe so, but I cannot leave it at that when I study his motion which presents a charge so much at variance with the facts. I could try to excuse him on the grounds that he has not had an opportunity to be informed, but last year and on other occasions it has been my lot to reply to motions on this subject that he or his colleagues have placed before this House.

Mr. Baldwin: I am still uninformed.

Mr. Drury: I have, in the clearest and simplest terms, attempted to allay any real concern he may have felt. Had I not done so, and had no member of this government spoken about the matter, the evidence of what this government had done should have been enough to show him that he was the victim of unfounded fears.

An hon. Member: Let's have a look at the evidence.

Mr. Drury: In the face of this evidence and in spite of what he has been told, he continues on the same theme. I can only conclude that he has some deep-seated paranoia, however vague his apprehension of the cause of it, and the best that can be done is to try again to set him at ease by again reciting the facts. I must reach this charitable conclusion about his inability to see and grasp reality to avoid the contrary conclusion that he is being irresponsible and partisan.

Let me again go through the record as I have on previous occasions. When the present government assumed office in 1968, it had as one of its priorities the up-dating of a financial apparatus very much unsuited to the needs of a contemporary government and a contemporary parliament. We had a system that had originated, in many respects, in times when governments had a very narrow role to play in a society of a much less complex sort. It was a system that had hardly been altered in a fundamental way for more than three decades.

In particular, parliament was annually being presented with the government's expenditure proposals in a style reminiscent of these earlier simpler times. This style of presentation heaped detail upon detail with little apparent structure. Parliament, as is evidenced by the debates of those days, turned away from the actual and factual consideration of the estimates. It used the days on which estimates were scheduled for study much as this day is being used, in treating topics in a very general way.

I want to ask hon. members to recall that period of last January in which we reverted in a substantial measure, because of unusual circumstances, to the procedures of earlier days as we dealt with the first supplementary estimates for 1972-73. There were relatively few items in those estimates.

Mr. Baldwin: But oh, what estimates!

Mr. Drury: All of them were concerned with matters of urgency and, I believe it fair to say, all were quite straightforward.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Drury: If hon. members were to examine the debate over the many days that this House was occupied with those estimates they would find that the House dealt with the matter and substance of the items in the estimates hardly at all. Instead, hon. members engaged in general discussion of general topics, proving again that the floor of the House of Commons is not a practicable forum for the detailed examination of expenditures.

To revert to the situation as it was assessed in 1968, the government undertook to pursue vigorously the investigations that had been going on under the previous Liberal administration into modern developments in government budgeting systems. Steps were taken to bring these investigations to a head; to effect radical changes and to put into effect new forms of documentation and new procedures designed to give parliament a better opportunity to scrutinize expenditures. The hon. member for Peace River has chosen to present a picture of a government that seeks to slight and ignore parliament in the matter of expenditures. I shall be able to offer sufficient evidence to refute, if not to ridicule this charge.

I should like now to refer to the many profitable discussions which were held with the Public Accounts Committee of this House in 1968 and 1969 about the new form of estimates then under development. I spoke to the committee in November of 1968 at some length about our general thinking in this matter. In particular I said:

> The blue book of estimates constitutes the framework for parliamentary control and the examination of departmental expenditure plans. The primary objective of the proposals that I have presented to you is designed to facilitate your task in carrying out your responsibilities as Members of Parliament.

I spoke about a new system of expenditure coding to replace the existing one that had become outmoded, a new system that permitted the classification and cross classification of expenditures in many different ways. I said that the new form would include much more information about Crown corporations than had been included in the past.

Mr. Nielsen: What a laugh that is.

Mr. Drury: I showed how we proposed to make a clear distinction between grants and contributions; an important distinction obscured by changing circumstances. There were many changes proposed, but most fundamental of all was the proposed system of classifying the expenditures of each department and agency onto one or more programs, each with its own appropriate vote structure. In each program, statements of objectives would be made in the estimates, supported by descriptions of activities to be carried on in pursuit of these objectives as well as by much detail about the manpower to be used, the nature of the expenditures to be undertaken, the related major capital projects and other matters.

This open end frank presentation of our plans to the designated representative of this House in matters relating to financial procedures was followed by several meetings at which the committee questioned officials of the Treasury Board. Of significance is the fact that these meetings resulted in changes in the proposals of the government in response to the suggestions of the members of the committee; changes made because the government recognized the importance of a clear presentation of ample information about expenditures to parliament to facilitate the work of parliament with regard to expenditures.

I may say, and recall to the hon. gentleman, that this committee charged with the responsibility of improving this presentation gave unanimous approval to the new form.

Mr. Nielsen: It was not unanimous, and that fact has been raised as a question of privilege before.

Mr. Drury: The research work undertaken to prepare the remarks, from which the hon. gentleman has read, represented another means of improving the efficacy of the tools available to Members of Parliament. I will not dwell on that, but his remarks rather indicate that the new form of estimates was some form of concoction by the government designed to mislead the House.

Mr. Baldwin: Right.

• (1240)

Mr. Drury: This new form of the estimates, I repeat to the hon. member, represents the unanimous approval of the conclusions of the committee of which a member from his party was chairman and of which, on an off-and-on basis, he himself has been a member. I can only wish that in formulating his criticisms of the present form of the estimates—the present form of the presentation—he had taken a little more time when this matter was under discussion to improve them in the manner he is now suggesting.

Mr. Baldwin: There are three official languages, French, English and bureaucratese.

Mr. Drury: I would interject that there is another official language the hon. gentleman uses which falls under none of those headings. He is, perhaps in his own terms, obfuscatory. The new form was put into effect first with the main estimates for the year 1970-71 and the form of the supplementary estimates was altered subsequently. Since that time, the government has gone on to make changes this year to further improve the quality and increase the quantity of information in the blue book and its supplements.

If any member of the House has further suggestions for improvement other than general ones I—and I can speak on behalf of the government—would be glad to have these and to take them into consideration. To refer again to the situation in 1968, pre-1968 experience indicated that the House had ceased to deal with the estimates in an effective way. There was clearly a crying need for some changes in procedures that would give hon. members a chance to discharge their responsibilities in this regard. With the concurrence of the House, amendments were made to the standing orders calling for early reference of various sections of the main estimates to the Standing Committees according to the subject matter in which each committee specializes. For the last few years, the estimates have then had a much more searching review in these committees than it had been possible to give them in the House for many years. This has been the case, I may say, despite the seeming inability or unwillingness of some members of the official opposition to use the opportunities for inquiry given them.

Mr. Nielsen: What tripe!

Mr. Drury: The mover of the motion said that the work of these committees was "flub". I am not sure what that term means. My dictionary does not contain it. I would suggest that if this is pejorative, then he might examine the performance of some of his henchmen in respect of these committees, if indeed they are not working satisfactorily as a means of making effective inquiries.

In summary of my remarks to this point, let me say that the government has understood, as the hon. member apparently has not, the essentials for parliamentary review and control of expenditures. And having understood them, it has gone on to provide for them. The first essential is information about the proposed expenditures. To this end the government has increased the amount of such information and improved its form of presentation.

Mr. Nielsen: Don't read us fairy tales.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, if I could respond to these uniformed interjections, I am suggesting, in respect of the method of presentation of information related to expenditures, that this information is two years late. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would just listen to how parliament does its work or should. The Auditor General's report by definition is an audit of the events which have occurred. The estimates purport to be, and in fact are, a representation of plans for future implementation. At the moment, I am talking not about the audit subsequent to the event, but the presentation of plans for the future.

The second essential, which would also seem to have escaped the hon. member, is ample opportunity to question ministers and their officials, to seek yet further details. This opportunity is abundantly provided through the committee system, now incorporated in the Standing Orders through amendments introduced in the early years of the present Liberal administration.

Mr. Baldwin: The other day a minister refused to appear when the committee asked that he appear.

Mr. Drury: It is to be greatly regretted that some of the hon. members colleagues in opposition have chosen to waste the time of the committees in pointless haggling over procedure rather than address themselves to the country's finances, as he professes they are so anxious to do.

The third essential is the report to parliament of the expenditures after they have taken place. The government has acted in this regard as well in restructuring the form of the public accounts to mirror the new form of the estimates, in adding more information, and in advancing by a number of months the date on which these accounts are tabled.

I am led to speculate about what the hon. member means by the phrase "control of expenditures". He may be caught in the grip of some nostalgic vision of a day that never existed or he may have some dream of himself as a departmental financial officer examining individual transactions. The fact of the matter is that in a real sense, parliament does control expenditures fully and in the only way it ever has. That is, not one dollar is spent that has not been authorized by parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh! oh!

Mr. Nielsen: A fairy tale.

An hon. Member: That is not what the Auditor General says.

Mr. Drury: This authority may be found in continuing statutes such as the one which calls for the payment of family allowances, or it may be found in the Appropriation Acts through which the estimates are given effect. This is the way it has always been and this government has worked only to improve the procedures which Parliament follows in giving these expenditure authorities.

Now, let me spend some minutes on what I suppose might be called the second theme of the hon. member's motion, the so-called "mismanagement in spending escalating revenues". As is so often the case, the meaning of such motions is difficult to grasp from the way they are worded. The hon. member has done little in this case to explain his meaning when he spoke to us today. Nevertheless, I will try to look at the motion and continue to place his concerns in proper perspective.

Perhaps, first, I should say it is good of the hon. member to acknowledge by implication the successful economic policies of this government in reference to increasing revenues.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that is not so. They are lousy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, is the hon. member seriously raising a point of order?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the minister put words in my mouth by suggesting I indicated I was satisfied with the economic policies of this government. Mr. Speaker, that would cause me to lose my social standing throughout the country if people thought I had said that.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I can well understand the hon. member's worry about his social standing. It is sufficiently frail that he should be preoccupied.

In relation to increasing revenues, these are revenues to a government that has cut taxes a number of times. This I would suggest provides convincing evidence of economic policies favourable to economic growth. Where have these increasing revenues gone? The publication "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent", issued in each succeeding year, and in particular the one for the current year 1973-74—which, by the way, is another attempt by the government to inform not only members but the public—shows a growth from expenditures for 1968-69 to the estimates figure for 1973-74 of about 70 per cent. The publication breaks down the expenditures into their functional components to show where the new revenues have gone. This breakdown shows that the emphasis is being placed by the government on areas where it is difficult to believe that even this opposition would not agree it should be placed.

● (1250)

Expenditures on health and welfare have gone up by over 200 per cent, as have those on educational transfers to the provinces and on general government services. Expenditures have also risen more than the average for culture and recreation, and for foreign affairs as a result of aid to developing countries. The smallest relative growth has been shown in internal overhead expenditures and defence expenditures. This is management of increasing revenues in the broadest sense, and the record shows a government with a sense of priorities appropriate to the national situation and the world situation.

Possibly the hon. member is unaware of what the government has done in improving management in the more usual sense. First, let me tell him that the government of Canada has been among the leaders in the almost worldwide movement to rationalize the procedures by which governments arrive at expenditure decisions. It has adopted the basic principles of planning, programming and budgeting, adapting them in a unique way to Canadian institutions and constraints. As part of this new system it requires each spring long-term, detailed forecast from each department and agency as to the requirements of the existing programs and their proposed new programs. It assesses all these potential demands in terms of available resources and then provides guidance to ministers and their officials as to an optimum allocation of available resources. This guidance is then given effect in detail by the treasury board in its review of departmental expenditure plans and by the departments and agencies as they prepare their estimates.

At a still more direct level of management, the government has in every way advocated and supported the introduction and advancement of modern techniques and methods of management. Through the treasury board it is causing departments to undertake in an organized way studies of the effectiveness of their programs, and these have led to modifications that have enhanced effectiveness.

The board secretariat has also worked with several departments and is to work with others in the application of efficiency measures to as many of the actual operations of departments as possible. These measures will give the government an indication of comparative efficiency as between operations of a like nature in different departments and a means to raise productivity to higher levels for the same or a lesser expenditure of resources.

In addition to the measures that have been taken and are being taken and to which I have referred, the hon. gentleman suggested a new approach to the work of the public accounts committee. The public accounts committee, as I think all hon. members are aware, has addressed itself to a consideration of events that have taken place—an examination of the past rather than the work of examining estimates, which is a look into future plans.

I have suggested that the committee system of detailed review of departmental estimates is a much more effective way than the hitherto employed system of examination of the estimates in the committee of the whole for understanding and learning what the programs are all about and how they can be improved. May I repeat that the experience that we gained, even this year in the current session, from reverting to an examination of estimates of departments in committee of the whole has shown that this method is not productive, is not useful and is not an informative experience.

I think I would have the same kind of reaction to the suggestion made by the hon. member that the rules be changed to provide for time in the House to discuss departmental estimates. I suspect that he intends, though he did not say so in his proposal, that this be in addition to the number of supply or opposition days now provided in the rules. He suggests that we revert to what, in my view, is a non-productive exercise for the committee of the whole, and at this juncture I would find it rather difficult to go along with that suggestion.

[Mr. Drury.]

The hon. member has also suggested that we might bring in a new Auditor General act. I recall to him that an earlier attempt to formulate an act proposed by the public accounts committee and to introduce it into the house was rejected by the hon. member and his party, without even making any suggestion as to what changes would be useful or examining the document itself.

Mr. Baldwin: Nonsense.

Mr. Drury: I hope that the approach of the hon. gentleman and his party to the new act which is being prepared under the auspices of the same body, the public accounts committee, will receive a rather more reasonable or rational reception when it is proposed to the House than his party accorded the last one.

Mr. Baldwin: It is being prepared by a committee outside of the public accounts.

Mr. Drury: That interjection, Mr. Speaker, was "It is being prepared". I suggest that the bill is being prepared by, and will be the product of, the public accounts committee and cannot be described as the product of some body outside of the public accounts committee.

Mr. Baldwin: Oh, come on!

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman cannot have it both ways. If his scriptwriter talks about overburgeoning bureaucracy, he cannot now try and throw back on to this bureaucracy any claims regarding what he says it should be doing.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not suggest anything of the kind in my interjection. I simply said that there is a committee established by the public accounts committee which is engaged in preparing the bill and will bring it to the public accounts committee. I know as well as the minister knows that that is right, so why doesn't he say so?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, we have had some remarks about use of time in standing committees being non-productive and perhaps we are having some examples of the non-productive use of time at this moment.

Mr. Baldwin: We have for the last 25 minutes.

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman suggested that the form of the estimates must be changed and he said that his new government would do this. I said earlier, and I repeat, that we would welcome any suggestions for improvement in the form of presentation of the estimates; and if, to use his words, they are now designed to conceal rather than reveal—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order.

Mr. Drury: —they are, in effect, the product of the committee of which his party is chairman.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. It being one o'clock the House will now adjourn until two p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I had limited time left and very few remarks left to make, but I would like to close by saying, in respect of items mentioned by the mover of the motion and threatened for further advancement by members of his party, that I expect that supporters of the government on this side of the House will respond in detail to these allegations.

However, I should like to say a word in respect of the suggestion made by the Auditor General for a periodic management review of the government service every ten years or so, and also advocated by the mover of the motion. As I indicated in my remarks, since 1968 there have been substantial changes both in the management structure and in management responsibilities within the public service. We have been endeavouring, and indeed are still in the process, of reforming the old and introducing new management techniques designed to make the various operations of the government both more efficient and more effective.

This, in terms of a very large organization, being relatively new, I think that perhaps the time is a little premature to call in a large formal organization to review what is only the beginning of a reformed process. Perhaps at some later date when we have had more experience with these new measures such a review could be undertaken. I have said that before reaching a final conclusion on this I would like to secure the advice of the new Auditor General when he formally assumes his duties and has a chance to look at the government apparatus. He has had considerable experience in his professional career with both the management operations and with making observations and recommendations on them. I would regard his unofficial advice as being of considerable value before reaching a final conclusion.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the mover of the motion has failed utterly to demonstrate either his understanding of the way control of expenditures is achieved or, if not a lack of understanding, then perhaps a wilful blindness to the facts of the situation. As a consequence, I do not think that we, on this side of the House at any rate, can either in spirit or in fact support the motion.

In respect of his other suggestion, a reform of the practices of the House to provide a different framework within which the public accounts can be examined, I am not at all convinced by his notion of a television spectacular in the House as being an effective way of learning what is going on.

He has suggested that every opposition motion should be the subject of a vote but when given this option, as he was today, he declined for what I suppose to be partisan or other reasons. I find that rather convincing; while he does not want to see it happen, he is nevertheless inclined to force on everybody else the necessity of voting on every motion. When given the chance to put into operation this useful device of his choice, he chooses not to do so.

Mr. Baldwin: We will remind you of that at the time you bring up one and are defeated on it.

Mr. Drury: As for the suggestion with regard to the Public Accounts Committee itself, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on this. We have a Standing Committee charged with the responsibility for organizing the procedures of the House, and perhaps he should make his suggestion to that committee rather than me with respect to how the Public Accounts Committee might be improved.

I would repeat, Sir, not only to the mover of the motion but to all members of his party that if they have ideas on how the form of presentation of the estimates could be improved to make them more effective and useful, I personally would welcome them and would give them—it would be cynical to say the consideration which they deserve but I would go further than that and say every consideration.

Mr. Nielsen: In due course.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the official opposition's motion which is before us today protesting the government's takeover of parliament's control over the spending of public money and which criticizes their mismanagement is very closely related to, and perhaps has its reason for existence in, the report of the Auditor General recently tabled in this House.

If that is so, I would think that a great deal of what either the government or the opposition contends about this motion would have to do with the credibility of the Auditor General. I do not think there is any doubt, Mr. Speaker, that auditors general everywhere are more likely to be popular with the opposition than with the administration. The nature of their work is to find the waste of public moneys by the government and its agencies and to try to correct that. This is a very useful and helpful function. I mention this at the start because much of what I have to say will also be related to the report of the Auditor General.

As a member of the Public Accounts Committee of the House, and thus with knowledge of his work, I have found him to be a conscientious public servant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mather: His work and proposals have saved a good deal of the taxpayers' money or put it to better use. In his report the Auditor General leaves no doubt that there have been, on the one hand, deterioration of parliamentary control over the use of public funds and, on the other, an immense increase in the level of the amounts of funds so expended. He states that in the last ten years the federal spending of public money has tripled. We are now in the spending area of $20 billion every 12 months and he says:

> . . . it is the right, privilege and duty of the House of Commons to control the finances of the country. It is the responsibility of the government to assist the House by submitting the proposed spending to the members in as simple and straightforward a manner as it can devise.

He says that, while he believes the Treasury Board seeks to discharge its responsibility conscientiously, he thinks, and I quote:

> I question and deem it my duty to draw to the attention of the House increasing tendencies displayed by the Treasury Board and its staff to devote their energies and resources toward circumventing parliamentary control rather than toward improving the efficiency of departments and agency regulations and remedying situations which for years have demanded attention.

Those are pretty tough words from a man in an extremely responsible position, Mr. Speaker. The Auditor General goes on to point out that his annual report over the years, and also many recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee based upon his findings of waste in government, could have achieved a more efficient use of men and money and have guided departments to avoid the continued repetition of mistakes.

In his current report, which we received just the other day, there are 130 cases that need to be dealt with. In many instances—the Auditor General estimates 65 per cent—these cases could be disposed of by the Treasury Board. Yet he says that never has a President of the Treasury Board responded to the criticism of such mistakes by replying and detailing steps which should be taken or have been taken to assist the departments and agencies in improving their financial performances.

He calls for the issue of treasury minutes—that is minutes from the Treasury Board—in response to and in respect of each of the Auditor General's detailed comments on public spending in the various departments and agencies. He says, and I agree as I think others on our committee would, Mr. Speaker, that these would be helpful to all concerned—the department, the Public Accounts Committee, the House of Commons and the taxpayers of the country. He laments, as well he may, the lack of such constructive action by the Treasury Board.

On page 12 of his report he gives details of the accounts he has been unable to certify involving large sums of money. He mentions some cases where the agencies or the departments criticized in his report or in the report of the Public Accounts Committee, have taken the advice themselves and have benefitted the public thereby, but he says he has never understood why the Treasury Board would not participate in promoting efficiency in cases as serious as those he has listed.

Mr. Speaker, this is one area where there is a growing lack of parliamentary control over public money; another is the use by the government of non-lapsing balances of votes available for spending in subsequent years. There is a government contingency program with reserves of money, millions of dollars, the need for which the Auditor General states the Treasury Board has been unable to demonstrate. There is a supplementing of parliamentary appropriations and there are loans and advances representing grants. Mr. Speaker, time does not permit the cataloguing of all the Auditor General's complaints as to the handling of government funds. There is in his report—

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. President of the Treasury Board on a point of order.

[Mr. Mather.]

• (1420)

Mr. Drury: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman would like to mislead anyone. I am sure of that. Unfortunately, in quoting from what the Auditor General has said he has been using the present tense. At that point the Auditor General was talking about a period prior to one year ago and was not talking about the way things are, even though the present tense is used. He was talking about the way things were. The hon. gentleman is, I know aware that these non-lapsing accounts to which moneys have been granted have ceased. Not only are funds not being granted to these no longer existing accounts, but authorization for granting has also ceased.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Although the minister may be allowed to raise a point of order if he wants to clarify something, I do not think he should be allowed to go as far as he has gone. Other hon. members on his side of the House who take part in the debate may make the argument he seeks to make at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister knows that the situation is much worse now than it was then.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to the minister for his interjection; it means that some reform has been made in recent times. It is a step forward. Nevertheless, I am going by what is contained in the Auditor General's report. I think it is substantially on the mark.

As I said, a book has been published containing many paragraphs outlining in a detailed way what the Auditor General of Canada considers as improper, wasteful or non-productive expenditures on the part of the government and government departments. Many of these items have been reported in the newspapers recently and no doubt many more will appear in the days ahead. There is no point in taking up the time of hon. members by going over these items in detail. I commend the Auditor General's report to hon. members. It ought to be one of the best sellers in this country today. Canadians in recent days have been reading about the Watergate affair in Washington. We also read that another kind of human interest story is unfolding before the House of Lords in London. In this parliament we have not been able to arouse much interest in that kind of thing since that affair which some of my friends on my right were interested in about eight or nine years ago. I think the Auditor General's report contains certain items which would be interesting to all Canadian readers, especially if they are interested in retaining Canadian content in our publications.

As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, and as one who believes in public enterprise as well as private enterprise, I support the Auditor General's report and join him and the official opposition in the concern over the lessening of parliamentary control in the expenditure of public funds. This concern is all the more valid at the very time when those expenditures are escalating. I think they have tripled in the last decade.

It is no friendship to the cause of public enterprise to close our eyes to mismanagement or to poor and wasteful management of the public business. The reverse is true, and I speak as a social democrat. We live in a society in which the public sector is necessarily becoming more and more important. It behooves us to make public enterprise, as represented by the departments and agencies of government, work in a businesslike manner.

While we, on the Public Accounts Committee, examine the Auditor General's report, interview representatives of departments he criticizes, and do our best to rectify or at least recommend reforms to reduce non-productive expenditures, we are but dealing with the tip of the iceberg. That iceberg at the federal level has now reached proportions of almost $20 billion in spending per year. It is one thing to demand, as does the motion of the official opposition, action to restore control of public funds to Parliament. We support that, Mr. Speaker, but, even with improved accounting by Treasury Board to parliament and even with an improved system of examination of estimates, there is more to it than that. We need to deal with the continuing cause and not just with the annual result of waste in public spending.

The Auditor General in his report points out that it is more than ten years since there was a management study of government organization, its administration, and methods and procedures by a qualified team, for the benefit of parliament and taxpayers. He specifically asked the House to consider this. In the House yesterday, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I sought to move the following motion:

> That this House urges the government to take immediate steps to supply the Public Accounts Committee of Parliament with expanded resources, including research, legal and other staff necessary to conduct a thoroughgoing, in-depth and in-breadth examination of our immense and complex expenditures to enable the most effective and economical use of such outlays in the public interest.

That motion was not accepted yesterday. I commend the proposition which it contains to the attention of the government and to all other hon. members. If we are to get proper parliamentary control over government spending and not merely over the examination of accounts, essential as that is, we need to know the roots of waste as well as the branches.

Mr. Baldwin: A new government would help.

Mr. Mather: Provincial governments as well as the federal government, for the most part, are spending more and more. They are responsible for more and are taking over more and more from the private sector. To my mind, this is inevitable and good. We are passing from a once essential but now outmoded social order. Science has pushed us on to deal collectively, through government, with common problems.

As I deplore the waste of private enterprise, as evidenced by the 230 different labels or companies producing and duplicating, at consumer cost, essentially the same products, by the blocks of duplicating supermarkets and by the expensive advertising of these things, I deplore all the kinds of waste that have developed, including the waste in public enterprise. We, of the New Democratic Party, consider the motion before us today as an important and timely one. We seek reforms in this important area. We are glad to see that the Auditor General referred favourably to draft legislation involving a new auditor general's act. He recommends it. The objectives of the Public Accounts Committee, in so far as it was involved in producing this new draft legislation, was to combine to the fullest degree possible independence for the Auditor General in his war on waste, and security for the members of his staff. We hope that a new auditor general's act will provide for both these essential points.

As I have already noted, Mr. Speaker, we are calling for an expanded and greatly strengthened public accounts committee. If we are to do our jobs properly as members of that committee and save the public's time, our time, and public money, we must have researchers, legal help, permanent secretaries, and so on. In addition, I would urge that the committee be enabled to meet even during recesses, in order to get on with the job of dealing with how the public's money is being spent. To my way of thinking the average Canadian thinks few things are more important than knowing how the money that he or she has contributed through taxes is being spent. Taxpayers want to know if that money is being spent properly. If there is doubt in the public mind as to the efficiency and effectiveness of money spent on public business then, surely, that would undermine public confidence in Parliament. So, from every point of view, financial, social and democratic, I think the Public Accounts Committee, the instrument available to us in Parliament, ought to be strengthened, expanded and given more power. So far as the official opposition motion coincides with the criticisms which we have levelled with the proposals we have put forward, we support it.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the motion presented before the House today challenges the post of the Auditor General of Canada with the powers required for the carrying out of his function of an honest and impartial supervisor of government administration.

Indeed, in December 1972 the same mover appealed to the Auditor General, Mr. Henderson, to proceed to a scrutiny of the Unemployment Insurance Commission's books, and here is what could be read in the Quebec newspaper, Le Soleil:

> Mr. Baldwin stipulated that a report of Auditor General Maxwell Henderson should be brought forward before Parliament immediately upon resumption of its sittings in January.
>
> "Government comments on the colossal amounts handled by the Unemployment Insurance Commission were not successful in inspiring credibility", Mr. Baldwin stated in a press release.
> "From the start, a mixture of deceit and ignorance was apparent, and the true facts are still unrevealed even today. It is time to call for the intervention of the watch-dog and to be apprised of the results of an autonomous and thorough examination of the books", he added.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) was well aware of the fact that the Auditor General's report would be tabled on March 31, 1973.

After reading the report and noting the most serious discrepancies denounced by Mr. Henderson, we are astounded to see that the Auditor General presents this report each year, without succeeding in changing the administration by one jot.

And I would even add this: when the Auditor General expressed himself rather severely over the last few years, he was threatened with dismissal because he was too cumbersome for the government.

Surely you have noticed that this year again the size of the report is bigger, that the remarks are ever more numerous and the warnings ever more to the point. But nothing changes except the thickness of the report. Besides, this explains why the Auditor General resigned from his most important position which is, in my opinion, the most important of our administration system. Mr. Henderson is simply fed up of talking to walls. Today, the official opposition is protesting against government actions by introducing a motion worded as follows:

That this House, protesting the Government's continuing take-over of Parliamentary control of public money and the Government's mismanagement in spending escalating public revenues, warns that immediate and decisive action must be taken to restore control of public funds to Parliament.

When you speak about Parliament control of public funds you wonder who surrenders this control to the government. I would immediately reply that it gets this control from the laws themselves. I have always noticed that after passing a law which has been studied for one or two months, you find on the last page a small subsection stating that under any circumstances the minister may act on his own. Therefore let us not wonder why laws are broken. After lengthy discussions a law is passed and, in the end, the minister is the master of the situation.

I could give dozens of examples. Let us take the Regional Development Incentives Act, let us consider the distribution of funds by the Regional Economic Expansion Department; this was again noted during the last election campaign: $500 million were distributed left and right provided it replenished the election coffers and collected voters. Why did the minister do it? Because it was authorized by law.

In my opinion, as as long as the matter is not seriously considered and the legislation is not given sufficient authority, we will continue to hear those criticisms against the government, this one or another. During past years, criticisms were not directed more against this government than the previous one. But I suggest that our legislation has too many loose ends and that we leave too much scope to politicians who use it to play politics.

What about bad administration? Again, the reason why the administration is often deficient is purely political. The aim of the administration is not common good but the next elections. Any project must be electorally profitable. Once again this applies to our successive governments. It is unfortunate, but as long as we are governed by the electoral fund, we will have bad administration.

● (1440)

We have revenues as well as expenditures and we notice on page 23 of the report from the Auditor General the statement of our revenues, and we see that they increase from year to year. In 1970-71 they were $12,803,051,000, and $14,226,558,000 in 1971-72. Compared with those revenues we have expenditures of $13,182,143,000 in 1970-71 and $14,840,865,000 in 1971-72.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

I think, Mr. Speaker, that when you look at those figures you come to the conclusion that a serious government should first consider spending according to its revenues. And we see, particularly in recent years, that the increase in expenditures occurred mainly in the field of services, that is to say the public service. The expenditures for the public service nearly doubled in the last two or three years and we are getting fewer services than ever.

I think that those areas should be looked at to see if we could not find a way to reduce expenditures in order to balance the budgets and avoid regular deficits and hiding or transferring funds so the people will not come down on us.

I have here, for example, the figures for the amounts allocated to the commissions which were established. I have always said that often a royal commission was a smoke-screen to hide government scandals or to prevent a problem from being considered. In fact, it is the only raison d'être of those commissions and $36,738,000 were spent in 1972 in that respect.

I think that when the Auditor General draws the attention of this House on certain things a serious government should at least listen a bit and consider a more concrete reform.

In view of the cautious and up-to-the-point comments of the Auditor General, and there are 178 of them in his last report, it seems to me that if a government is concerned with the well-being of the people, instead of hicking back as it does it should tackle the problem to try and right the monstrosities, if only that.

I wish I had the time to read each one of those remarks, not to convince the minister or present government—it is far too concerned with camouflaging its bad administration—but to inform the people, and tell them where their income tax really goes, and that the government could not care less about their opinion and well-being.

I have already said in this House that if private enterprise were managed the way the government is, it would not last six months. Bad administration poses no problem to the government: all it has to do is increase taxes. The taxpayer will always be the one who pays for administrative blunders. In his report the Auditor General denounces errors, voluntary or otherwise. Here are a few:

Weakening of parliamentary control.

Non-lapsing balances of votes available for spending in subsequent years.

I will skip some and stop at the following:

Faulty computer system planning.

Computer purchased on the instalment plan.

I did ask a question in the House about those computers because I suspected shady maneuvers as there often are with big building contracts. I have always wondered why the government always rents large blocks of offices. They are to be found all over Ottawa and Hull, built by companies that are friends of government and negotiated 20-year leases with the government. These buildings will be paid for in 20 years, and the government will still be paying rent. I wonder if these people have any administrative sense.

Instead of building office blocks that would belong to the government in 20 years, they prefer paying rent for 150 years. Building themselves would not help out their friends. Indeed, the Auditor General mentions this in his report.

To get back to computers, this is a matter that I studied at the unemployment insurance. I was told that these computers were second hand, that they were rented to "try them out", and that the government was paying an exorbitant rent for the use of them. The replies I got from the department were quite true: these second hand computers had been rented, but the government was paying for repairs as well as rent. The owner might at least have undertaken to keep the machines in working order! The government pays exorbitant rent instead of simply buying new computers. But that would not have benefited the in-group. There are a number of such cases involving computers, and I can even quote names. The rented computers did not work properly, and caused a multitude of problems when it came to paying out unemployment insurance allowances. And yet the machines are still being rented.

In another department, computers were bought on the instalment plan. To quote again from the Auditor General's report:

81. Computer purchased on the instalment plan.

Instead of paying for the computer in full, they paid $190,000 in interest on one computer alone. I believe that the government pays this amount of interest now because the large companies are very generous at election time, you have to admit.

To continue my quotation:

Escalation of costs relative to developing and implementing a computer-based management information system.

Grant paid without parliamentary approval

Grants paid without approval remind me of the grants awarded in election campaigns, grants which were distributed to everyone. I repeat:

—without parliamentary approval

Then, there is question of a payment of interest to the Army Benevolent Fund. I quote:

Interest on the public debt improperly charged to departmental programs.

Reimbursement to Bank of Canada for bonds improperly redeemed.

Inadequate accounting for appropriation and Indian band funds.

And there is ever so much. Then comes this one:

Local Initiatives Program

What does the Auditor General say about the Local Initiatives Program? The following:

115. Local Initiatives Program. Manpower and Immigration Vote 10 provided $125 million for payments to municipal and other public bodies and community organizations and private groups with respect to projects undertaken by them for the purposes of providing employment to unemployed workers and contributing to the betterment of the community. This Program, known as the Local Initiatives Program, was announced in the House of Commons on October 27, 1971.

At March 31, 1972, 5,672 projects had been approved, on which $83,716,000 was disbursed during the year.

The principal objective of the Program was the creation of additional jobs between November 1971 and May 1972—persons hired by project sponsors were to be drawn first from the unemployed . . .

Notice these words:

. . . drawn first from the unemployed through Canada Manpower Centres. The objective was to be achieved through innovative and imaginative projects to provide new facilities and services for the benefit of the community as a whole. Participation of municipalities, community groups and unemployed individuals in the development and management of the projects was invited.

Guidelines for the Program included the following:

—projects were to be capable of being put into effect quickly so that the main employment impact occurred within six months after November 1, 1971;

The amount of financial support was related directly to labour and other costs of the project. For labour the contribution was based on the level of prevailing wages and the skills required in each project but was not to exceed an average of $100 per man-week.

And what happened? Fifty per cent of those who worked on these projects were not unemployed. They were all friends of the party, but not unemployed, and that is what the Auditor General denounces in his report.

I see that my time has expired, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the motion that we are discussing is one that is aimed at the insidious, rather lustful and deliberate attempt by the government, the executive, to increase its powers of control. This motion is based also on the Auditor General's report, and the rapidly accelerating encroachments that are being made by the present government to weaken parliamentary control over the expenditure of national revenue. From listening to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) this morning, it was very apparent to me that a little time in opposition would do him a good deal of good. As a matter of fact, it does all governments a good deal of good to come over to this side of the House from time to time and experience the feelings and frustrations of the members of the opposition.

I want to discuss this question today in the short time available to me from three points of view. The first has to do with the depths to which the institution of parliament itself has fallen as a result of the policies that have been followed by the government; second, I want to discuss the motion as it relates to the committee system; and lastly, if I still have time, I want to deal selectively with one or two specific examples. I maintain that not only since 1968 but from 1963, when the government changed, a deliberate course has been followed to weaken the institution of parliament. What we have now is not the ultimate result of that kind of undesirable policy but certainly very close to the ultimate result.

I maintain that this place has become a very flabby and ineffective debating forum. All we have to do is to look around at the benches of the House this Friday afternoon to determine the degree of interest in this debate. We were confronted with changes in the rules under the guise of parliamentary reform, under the guise of making more opportunities available to Members of Parliament to perform their functions more effectively, under the guise, as the minister who spoke just before lunch would have us believe, of providing members of the opposition with more opportunities to get information. The minister who uttered those words knows full well that they are not true. Why is there no interest in debate? I can recall when debates of this nature would have almost filled the benches in this chamber. Why is it that there is this lack of interest now? The reason is that there is no effective debating forum here any longer because of the absolute control that the executive, the government, has garnered unto itself.

From 1963 onwards the government has adopted policies which in turn were embraced by the new head of the government in 1968. These policies have gradually weakened and watered down the effectiveness of the opposition, thus resulting in this rather regrettable lack of interest in this chamber. We are no longer effective in this House. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is aware of the lack of interest and he knows he can implement further encroachments upon, and erosions of, the authority of parliament itself and he is doing exactly that. He and his colleagues in government are guilty of further abuses of the parliamentary process which in the end can only make this institution a rubber stamp for the executive authority.

With regard to the committee system, yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) tried to pass off the committee system and what he called the "reforms" which were implemented in 1968 in the regime of the present Prime Minister as something which have resulted in committees being able to perform their function with a great deal more efficiency than in the past. This, Mr. Speaker, is simply not the truth. I was here before 1963 when estimates were brought into the House and discussed in committee of the whole. I have been here since that time and I have found, even in the minority situation we have this session, that the committee system has been an absolutely useless procedure.

We are told by the President of the Treasury Board that we have more opportunities for access to information. I think he should speak to some of his backbenchers, such as the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) who is one of the central leaders in a constant effort to stonewall members of the opposition and keep them from getting information. These members are constantly throwing up barriers of points of order and points of procedure in order to prevent this kind of information from coming out. I see the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) in his seat and he is one of the biggest offenders.

The committee system is set up to provide the opposition with an opportunity to examine government spending estimates when the estimates are referred to committee. But do we get the information that we want? No, Mr. Speaker, we do not, because hon. members like the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, the hon. member for Ontario, the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson), the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) and the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) are constantly throwing up a barrier by raising spurious points of order and points of privilege in order to—

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Cafik: I certainly am, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) happened to refer to me and said the hon. member for Ontario was constantly raising points of order in committee. I should like to suggest that the hon. member does not sit on any committees on which I normally sit and that he certainly cannot make that kind of unfounded allegation, which is totally untrue.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member who has just risen on a point of order has said simply bears out what I have been saying. He has raised a spurious point of order.

Mr. Cafik: A further point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I am sure hon. members know they must not engage in debate between themselves. I will hear the point of order.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I quite legitimately feel aggrieved by this unfounded allegation and I certainly have the right, as does any other member of this chamber, to defend myself and my reputation and I intend to do so. I think it is unworthy of the hon. member to make a statement that he knows is unfounded.

● (1500)

Mr. Paproski: Why don't you come in tomorrow? We will give you the whole afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Although it is a very serious point of debate I would remind the hon. member that he will probably be the next speaker and can make the point during his speech.

Mr. Nielsen: For the second time the hon. member interrupts on a spurious point of order.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Nielsen: I am not going to suggest that the hon. member has no reputation to defend, because obviously he believes he does and I accept his word; but I would have expected him, not only now but during previous debates in this House when similar conduct has occurred, to have shown a little humility, learned from the fact that only four votes separated him from his opponent in the last election. Obviously, he has not learned that humility.

This is the kind of tactic used not only here but in the committee by hon. members on the other side to provide their ministers with the vehicle with which to give members of committees just enough information and no more. They seem to delight in getting away with telling members as little as possible. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) speaks about providing Members of Parliament with information. He appeared with his officials before the miscellaneous estimates committee where one after the other delighted in circumventing and circumambulating questions, simply to give us as little information as possible. I have spoken about the President of the Treasury Board, but I speak also about the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), who are pastmasters in the art of circumambulating. They take about ten times the length of time required to ask a question to answer it, and at the end of that time they have said nothing. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) rises day after day, week after week and month after month and speaks in great circles, never ending, saying nothing.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) considers the ultimate in the discharge of the responsibilities of his portfolio to be a visit to Rochdale College where he puts his feet on the table, watches television for an hour or two and returns here in an effort to answer questions, but says nothing. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is a pastmaster of the technique of evading answers to questions in this House. He not only circumvents every question but in his answers he gets in a little political jab.

Hon. members on the other side and those to my left say, "Let us make this Parliament work. Let us make this House work. Let us not go to the people for an election right away." I suggest they do not want to do that. How do they make this Parliament work? They talk about information, but in answers they provide us with just as little information as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member wants to interject, I should like to hear him rather than have him try to smuggle his interjection on to the record of Hansard without my being able to hear it.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is, in my opinion, one of the most valuable members of the committees and the House. We are now discussing an important motion brought forward by a member of his party. I should think that, with his ability and the time at his disposal, he would provide more facts in support of the motion than he has provided so far. I think he could employ his time to better purpose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. With regard to the hon. member's point of order, the Chair was about to rise and make a suggestion to the hon. member who has the floor. My English is not 100 per cent perfect, but I can follow speeches quite well. Having reread the motion I had intended to mention to the hon. member that his remarks were slightly off base, as we say in common language.

An hon. Member: Off the rails.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member is a respected speaker in the House and I am sure he will try to make his remarks a little more relevant to the motion before us.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have always had great admiration for your ability to follow debates, and great respect for your rulings. However, in this instance perhaps it is the difficulty Your Honour has in following the refinements and sophistications of my argument that prevents your concluding that I am exactly on point in discussing the subject matter of this motion. What we are speaking about is the weakening of the authority of Parliament over government expenditure. I am advancing several convincing arguments as to why this erosion is occurring. I know that hon. members opposite will suggest they are unconvincing, just as sure as those on this side will feel they are convincing.

I am not going to take issue with the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather), a riding in the beautiful province of British Columbia, but I listened very carefully to him and feel he made an extremely useful and meaningful contribution to this debate. I was, however, somewhat taken aback when he said he deplored the duplication or multiplication of products by private enterprise which find their way into the market. I have always wondered whether, should this policy be implemented, I would object to everyone in the country brushing his teeth with Crest, or everyone buying McGavin bread or what-have-you, in order to avoid this kind of duplication. I cannot understand this kind of philosophy.

The President of the Treasury Board has said new procedures were introduced to offer more opportunity to Members of Parliament to scrutinize the estimates. That, Sir, is rubbish, and the minister knows it is rubbish. It has been called by several other names in this House, and if I wanted to be more explicit I could refer to it in worse terms. The minister also said that not one dollar is spent that is not authorized by Parliament. That borders on gross deceit. Of course, he is right in one sense; certainly no money is spent on government programs unless it is authorized by Parliament. What the minister does not say when uttering those half-truths is that he and the government have developed the practice of spending the money first and then coming to Parliament for authorization, perhaps as long as a year after it has been spent.

No better example of this can be cited than the government's conduct since dissolution of the previous Parliament. During the interval between dissolution and the commencement of this Parliament multi-millions of dollars were spent in respect of unemployment insurance claims. Governor General's warrants were obtained by this government to implement plans which had not even been exposed to Parliament but which the executive decided should be implemented. The government spends money today and then comes to Parliament after the event and says, "This is what has been done. This is the money that has been spent, and now it requires approval." What sort of parliamentary approval is that? The minister knows this is the course being followed.

The Auditor General referred in his report to unexpended portions of authorized expenditures. These were moneys left over from departmental programs passed in a previous Parliament. Because of a change in procedures, about which the minister speaks, this is available to the government without parliamentary authority in respect of future programs. Again, after the event the government comes to Parliament and asks for approval. The moneys have been spent: we can criticize, but that is all. The whole purpose of this institution is to have the government bring in its programs, tell us about them, tell us how much money they cost and then ask us to approve, (a) the program and (b) the sums to be expended. That is the manner in which this institution should operate, but everything is "bassackwards" with this same old bunch over there.

● (1510)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I should like to remind the hon. member that his time expired three minutes ago. I exercised some generosity in order to give him an extra few minutes because of the points of order which had been raised. The hon. member has already been given an extra three minutes; therefore I regret to inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Nielsen: You have been most generous, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to spend too much of my time dealing with the comments of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It is a long time since the hon. member attacked me for something he knew nothing about. The last occasion was before I was elected a Member of Parliament. While I was a candidate he made some rather erroneous charges.

However, I should like to point out in all fairness and honesty that to my knowledge I have never sat on a committee of this House of Commons of which he has been a member. So I find it difficult to understand how he can be so authoritarian about anything that happened in a committee on which I sat but he did not. His contention is that hon. members on this side are really trying to frustrate the operation of committees for members on the other side. I should like to use a specific example which can be well substantiated by the records of the House. If one looks at the record of the 3.30 p.m., Thursday meeting of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, he will find that the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare were before the committee and that the members of the committee decided they would like the committee to vote on the estimates. One member of the Conservative party did not want to vote. I agreed that we should not vote because he wished to deal with the matter later.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cafik: That certainly is an indication that the charge made is unfounded.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but he is a very experienced member and knows he cannot discuss committee evidence in the House when that committee has not filed its report. I think he would do us a great favour by dealing with the subject matter of the motion.

Mr. Cafik: Although I have mentioned the committee, I am merely responding to the allegations which have been made. To get down to the motion itself, it is really twofold. First, there is the allegation that the government is continuing to take over parliamentary control of public moneys. I should like to speak about that for a moment because I think it is a serious matter. In my view, Parliament is supreme and any government which would try to spend money without the approval of Parliament certainly would not be doing the right thing either by the letter or by the spirit of the law.

Let us look at what really has happened. First of all, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) mentioned the form of the estimates. I have no objection to that, but I would remind him and other hon. members that within the last five years the form of the estimates has been studied by the public accounts committee. The committee spent many months trying to make recommendations so that the facts in relation to the estimates would be more clear to Members of Parliament. If there is something still wrong in the form of the estimates and they are confusing to hon. members, then by all means let these members come forward with suggestions to clarify them and to make them more understandable. A great deal has already been done to this end by the parliamentary committee. Recommendations were proposed to and passed by the committee, and adopted by this government.

The second thing I should like to point out is that the time spent on the consideration of estimates seems to be a problem. Members now feel, since we have moved from the procedure of considering estimates in committee of the whole House to one where the matter is largely in the hands of the standing committees, that they are robbed of time to deal with the estimates. First of all, let us deal with the study of the estimates in committee. In my five years' experience as a Member of Parliament, when estimates are before a committee it is very seldom that a member really talks about the estimates which are before the committee. The questions range from policy matters to God knows what else. They do not really zero in on the amount of money allotted for a specific purpose and whether or not the expenditure is justified. Members on the other side who are concerned about this question ought to use their time more wisely and deal with the estimates which are before the committee rather than complaining now that they do not have adequate time to study them.

The last point concerns the House itself when dealing with the estimates. I understand that when the rules of this House were changed to bring about three periods a year with 25 opposition days, six of which could be used for votes, this was done in lieu of not having committee of the whole. Why do not members opposite use that time to zero in on and talk about the estimates of the government? Why do they not exercise their responsibility as Members of Parliament to scrutinize the estimates then, rather than try to make political points? They should fulfill their responsibility in that regard.

We might look at the estimates themselves to determine whether in fact they are worded and prepared in such a way that Parliament's will is frustrated. In my experience as a member of the committee on public accounts, the Auditor General on numerous occasions has brought to the attention of the committee that the will of Parliament has been frustrated. What he considered to be frustration of the will of Parliament was the actual determination of Parliament itself. For instance, I remember a couple of years ago that this allegation was made in respect of Vote L-55 concerning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, where $25 million was voted by Parliament for the current year and subsequent years. Parliament passed that vote. I presume Members of Parliament read what they are passing. The Auditor General, however, said that it should not apply to subsequent years. But Parliament said it was to be for subsequent years.

If there is any erosion of power, it is certainly not the erosion of the power of Parliament. It may be a change in direction, but it is something that was done with the approval of Parliament. If Parliament does not want to exercise its responsibility by authorizing expenditures which would occur in subsequent years, then it should not do so. But members should not come back and cry "wolf", saying they as parliamentarians made a mistake and therefore the government is at fault. We cannot expect the government to run a training program for Members of Parliament so they will know what they are doing before they do it. That is their responsibility and I would hope they would exercise it.

An hon. Member: That is arrogance.

Mr. Cafik: I do not see anything arrogant about expecting Members of Parliament to do their homework before they exercise their responsibility. I recall a time in the public accounts committee when members were surprised when they found they had passed a particular vote. I do not think that is something about which a Member of Parliament should be proud.

The last point I want to make concerns the whole question of the mismanagement of public funds. I have been a member of the public accounts committee since 1968. I think all Members of Parliament will agree that the public accounts committee ably carries out its role in trying to make sure there is no waste of public funds. The Bonaventure is a good case in point. I personally spent over a year working on a one-man committee to try to expose the problems involved, so I do not need to produce my credentials in that regard.

I think one thing we must understand is that the report of the Auditor General is a report to Parliament through the committee of public accounts. It is not a report that we can prejudge at this moment. For that reason I am not bringing forward statements made in the most recent report because it is a matter for the committee to deliberate upon, decide whether the report is right or wrong and what kind of action should be taken. To prejudge that report is to prejudge Parliament itself. The whole, basic argument is that we want to uphold this institution of Parliament. Surely we can all agree that the report should be dealt with by Parliament in the way in which Parliament decides to deal with it, rather than all of us shooting from the hip and trying to make political mileage out of a subject that has not been adequately discussed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: In summary, I conclude by saying, first, if there is not enough scrutiny of public expenditure, it is because the opposition has not used dilingently enough the time that has been given for that very important and essential job. I leave it to the voters to deal with them accordingly. Second, if there is waste of government expenditures, then I for one—and I am sure all members of the House—would want to see it stopped. But let us ascertain the facts before we make judgments. Third, let us look at last year's report of the Auditor General, which we have not yet done, before we start making judgments on this year's report; and let us allow parliament to study it in the institution we set up to do that, namely, the public accounts committee.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's interjections while the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was speaking, and I listened to his speech. I must say that his concluding remarks are an example of the reason this motion was moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Also, it is the reason the Auditor General indicated in his final report to the House of Commons and to the country just why he is so concerned about Parliament and the fact that this government has done everything in its power to prevent the country from knowing the facts regarding the operation of the business of this country. I believe that is why the hon. member for Peace River has spoken so often about the operations of the government, the secrecy of the government and its divisive means of hiding the facts from the public almost continuously since 1968.

I think the hon. member for Peace River is justified in taking the kind of action he has taken over and over again because the people of this country said on October 30, 1972, that this government does not deserve a majority of seats in the House of Commons. Indeed, the people of Canada came very close to saying that it does not deserve to be the government of this country because of the ways and means it has devised to try to hide its actions from the public.

We, as the opposition, were certainly justified by the vote on October 30 in taking the type of action we took prior to that date, and the type of action we have taken since then to try to make Parliament the institution it once was, and no longer is because of the devious methods used by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the government as a whole to try to hide from the public the facts about the government's wastefulness in spending the taxpayers' money. What this government has been doing is nothing short of a national scandal. They sit like a bunch of satraps, spending the taxpayers' money as if they could not care less. I think one has to conclude that they could not care less about how they spend the taxpayers' money.

They wrap around themselves, apparently to try to keep away the criticism that has been mounting in the nation regarding the way they operate the country, a clique that has become almost alarming, of executive assistants of various sizes, shapes and forms to tell them what they want to hear and not to let the country tell them what the public thinks. We discovered in the last general election campaign that the people of this country were trying to get the message across to the government that they did not like the way they were running this country and they would have little or no opportunity to run the country any longer, especially after the next general election.

I believe one of the things that must be done quickly to eliminate the bureaucratic morass that has been developed by this government is to solve the problem of the tremendous increase in the cost of operating the public service of Canada and the amount of money that has been spent by this government to pay for professional and consultative services since it took office. Everywhere you look today there are people working for cabinet ministers, with friends working for that cabinet minister's department in some way or other. Everybody who is a Grit in Canada is looked after by this government. Never in the history of Canada from 1867 has there been a government that has indulged in patronage to the degree that this government has done and continues to do. The way they throw the taxpayers' money around is nothing short of shocking.

An hon. Member: It is criminal.

Mr. Coates: It is worse than criminal, because what it is doing more than anything else is producing the inflation that we face in this nation. There may be unemployment in Canada, but there is very little of it among the Grits—and are they ever generous! For instance, in my province of Nova Scotia we discovered that one of Pearson's pets, Tom Kent, who was at first a special adviser to Mr. Pearson and then became a deputy minister in the public service of Canada, moved from deputy minister of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to president of a Crown corporation. You can look at that as a promotion, I suppose; you can look at it in many ways. But it seems to me that Ottawa in one way or another was not happy with what Mr. Kent was doing in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, so they sent him to Cape Breton Island to try to solve their problems there.

● (1530)

Mr. Nielsen: Aren't you lucky?

Mr. Coates: I do not know whether we are lucky or not. What really upsets me is that a man goes from the position of deputy minister of one of the biggest departments of government, to a Crown corporation in Cape Breton Island with an increase of something like $15,000 in salary just to make the trip. I would have gone for $15,000 more a year; I think anybody would.

What concerns me, Mr. Speaker, is that if you are a Grit and you are in need, then the payday is big if they decide to look after you. The only Liberal I know who has not been looked after by this government is Jim Tucker of Newfoundland. Poor old Jim really feels left out. This practice has been going on steadily since 1968, but it accelerated after October 30, 1972. That is when the people of Canada opened a whole new area in which the government could indulge in patronage. The way they have been looking after their friends is nothing short of a national scandal.

When I came to this House, Mr. Speaker, a minister had to sit over there, with his deputy minister and assistant deputy minister beside him, and he had to tell members of this House everything they wanted to know about the operation of his department. It was not just one or two ministers; it was every minister. Ministers had to appear before this House and before committees to answer questions posed by members about the operations of their departments.

[Mr. Coates.]

For the President of the Treasury Board to stand up with his bare face hanging out, suggesting to us that there is public scrutiny of the estimates today compared with then, is nothing short of ridiculous. He knows it and we know it. Some sense must be put back into the way the government is spending the taxpayers' money and the opportunity that parliamentarians have to scrutinize government spending. If we went back to the old way, Mr. Speaker, there would be much less patronage that the taxpayers of this country would have to pay for in order to look after defeated Grits, or Grits who cannot secure employment any other way. It must have been a happy day for them when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said he was going to hang on, even by the skin of his teeth.

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) is the greatest grab-bag of the bunch—contracts, without tenders, all over the place!

Mr. Coates: The minister has at his disposal a great many opportunities to make available to friends of Liberals all across the country whatever he feels they should have. He could be the dispenser of the biggest legacy of patronage any government has ever had.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to the point I was making about how damaging this government's policies have been with regard to inflation. I should like to quote from an article written by Lubor J. Zink in the Toronto Sun on May 4, 1973. He was talking about the buying power of our dollar, which has dropped since 1961 to 62.3 cents. He wrote:

> Since that framework is shaped primarily by our governments, blaming labour and business for inflation misses the ultimate source of the malaise.
> For a comprehensive picture one has to look at government spending. Coming as it does from taxpayers' pockets, it has direct bearing on cost-price levels, for every increase in taxes finds reflection in higher production costs and consumer prices.
>
> In 1952 federal government expenditure on goods and services amounted to $3,620 million. Canada's population at that time was slightly over 14 million and gross national expenditure almost doubled (to $6,608 million) while population increased by 28 per cent and GNP by 74 per cent. By 1972 government expenditure zoomed up over $20.5 billion—more than three times the 1962 figure. Population during the last ten years grew only by 17 per cent (to 21.8 million) and the GNP, while topping $100 billion at market prices increased only by 65 per cent in constant (1961) dollars.
> In other words, government expenditure grew much faster, particularly since 1968, than population and the aggregate wealth the country generates. The root of the cost-price inflation that has by now cut the buying power of the 1961 dollar to 62.3 cents can thus be traced to runaway government spending that provided the impetus and "justification" for wage demands far in excess of what economic growth and productivity gains can sustain without currency debasement.

Mr. Speaker, that is what has been happening—and it has been happening because this government does not take seriously the operation of the country and the concern that should be shown for the taxpayers' dollars that are being pulled out of our pockets at a degree unprecedented in Canada's history. To support my contention about the type of pay increases that have been made available to public servants in this country, especially friends of the Trudeau government, I would like to quote from an article by Douglas Fisher which appeared in the Toronto Sun on May 14 this year. It reads:

Opposition MPs are sniffing at one of Ottawa's startling stories. This is the literally "fantastic" increase in recent years in the numbers of government personnel drawing what may be called "executive salaries" and, even more startling, the wonderful generosity in the salary increases themselves. The public tends to bitch about MPs "voting increases for themselves." The mandarins make the MPs seem pikers, without the need for any formal vote.

Only the outline of the story can be given here, and that in rather jerky fashion. Perhaps the best way is to personalize it a bit through one man, the Hon. Charles (Bud) Drury, President of the Treasury Board, the watchdog of the federal purse.

Mr. Fisher outlines Mr. Drury's history in this way:

Mr. Drury, of course, is a "silver spoon" type and a former federal deputy minister. His daddy controlled the big Montreal-based manufacturing complex of Canadian Car and Foundry. Private schools; McGill; post-graduate study abroad; a war-time brigadier; a post-war mandarin; then the co-opting in the days of the chief into the Liberal Party; a cabinet minister for ten years; and first minister of the already defunct ministry of industry.

Mr. Drury is cool toward—indeed I think he dislikes—trade unions.

I do not think there is much doubt about that. Mr. Fisher continues:

My conversations with him (usually abrasive) suggest he considers unions, at best, a necessary evil.

Mr. Nielsen: He doesn't like the public service now.

Mr. Coates: He doesn't like anybody except himself and the Grits.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the recitation of the motion tabled by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) today I could not help wondering if it was not an updated version of the motion he tabled on May 26, 1972.

Mr. Nielsen: It has got worse since then.

Mr. Dupras: In that debate most hon. members proved how futile and what a waste of time the motion was. Nevertheless, one must realize the great improvement they have made in this motion. Consider the subject of their motion of March 6, 1973. After two months of sitting, the only thing they could find wrong was the wording of the 1973 income tax forms which were to be used in respect of 1972 incomes.

● (1540)

Mr. Nielsen: It is still not legal.

Mr. Dupras: I was somewhat surprised when the mover of the motion began his remarks by saying something like this, "One wonders why this subject is brought up again today." That ought to have been our line, but not his.

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Dupras: I think he has left the House. Up to now I think the most convincing argument put forward by any opposition member was that of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather). His remarks were well documented. Having sat on the public accounts committee with him for over two years, I know his dedication to that committee. In my judgment, his intervention was the best coming from the opposition side. I say that because the mover of the motion is not an authority on this subject, having sat on the committee only once in the last two years, namely, on March 14, 1972.

Mr. Nielsen: He used to be the chairman.

Mr. Dupras: He is not familiar with everything that goes on in the committee. I do not think he is an authority.

Mr. Nielsen: He used to be the chairman of that committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupras: And, Mr. Speaker, the mover of the motion went on to say how he deplored the Canadians' apparent lack of interest in the Auditor General's report. It appears that Canadians are being distracted by what is happening to our unfortunate neighbours, the Watergate affair, and also by what is happening in the British cabinet and House of Commons. I believe that the mover of the motion deplores in his remarks that there is not the slightest scandal to exploit here in Canada. For my part, I do not mind in the least if we dig up an old scandal. We could perhaps find one without going back too far; maybe we could find some juicy topics in the last 10 years, and then we too could exploit our little scandal, and make the headlines more easily than the Auditor General's report.

There is perhaps another reason why Canadians are not as interested in the Auditor General's report as the opposition and the Progressive Conservatives would like them to be. And I wonder whether he is not the one responsible for this lack of interest when one considers what he did last September and October, particularly out west in Calgary, if my memory serves me right, when he would have liked to help his friends on the other side by highlighting the shortcomings of the government. He failed, in fact, to convince Canadians that he had a good argument and could really help his friends. And I even wonder whether, in some circles, he has not been prejudicial to his friends of the other side of this House rather than being helpful to them.

At any rate, we have read comments and editorials on the behaviour of the Auditor General who was criticized at that time by serious writers throughout the country who questioned his credibility and popularity.

As we know, he gave again in his last report—which we received only last Wednesday when we should have had it on January 16—the same reasons for this delay in presenting his report. Therefore, if I may, since the mover of the motion has quoted some extracts from the report, I would like also to quote a passage of this report. On page 4, section 8, we can read and I quote:

8. In my Report last year I referred to the downgrading of the 28 senior positions of my Office, . . .

Well, when the committee considered this statement in 1972, it was found that among the 28 persons to whom he referred in his statement, only one had a grade 4 or 5 position which would, in a way, rank high within the organization of his office.

I go on quoting:

. . . I have stated before and do so again that this action by the Treasury Board Secretariat was unfair and discriminated against the Auditor General.

Once more, those are arguments which have been negated on several occasions, I believe, for five or six years. This is an excuse, I suggest, to hide his lack of ability and perspicacity to recruit his staff and I think that one of the qualities of a good administrator is to be able to recruit personnel, train them and keep them. And if he had to grieve over the fact that a good number of his employees did not stay in the service, I believe he has nobody else to blame but himself.

Let us look at the statistics he is using in his report to tell us and I quote:

The staff situation has not improved materially during the year.

It is wrong to resort to such excuses, especially if we recall that he has sole responsibility for obtaining funds. Each of the seven or eight last years, whenever he presented his estimates for the coming financial year, he always got every dollar he asked for.

And the year 1971-72 was no exception as during that year, the Auditor General wanted an amount of $3,739,000 to pay the salaries of his employees and provide for the recruiting and training of his staff.

Since he mentioned his staff, I will say that within nine months, namely from March 31, 1972 to December 31, 1972, no fewer than 34 persons were hired, which represents a 12 per cent increase, while the strength of the whole public service increased by only 20 per cent in ten years, from 300,000 in 1961-62 to 405,000 in 1971-72.

There we have irrefutable evidence of the totally unfounded allegations of the Auditor General's when he speaks of the ability of the government or of the Treasury Board to provide him with the required staff so that the report, which should be out 15 days after the opening of a session, be produced on time.

● (1550)

The failure and the incompetence of the opposition are evident. The present shortcomings and disputes result from the Progressive Conservative party's dependency on the opinions and the assistance of the Auditor General. They have relied so heavily upon his assistance and co-operation to embarrass the government that they have been weakened. Everyone could see that the mover, the hon. member for Peace River, was making every effort to woo the representatives of the New Democratic Party.

As I mentioned earlier, the best contribution so far by a member of the opposition was made by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) who has shown much more authority on the subject than the mover.

In his comments, while dealing with the Auditor General's report, the mover recommended not to read it in one sitting. I agree with him on this point because the more one progresses, the more one realizes how this report, full of venom, has gone "sour" on the government. Everything went to achieve its aim which is evidently to embarrass the government. It recalls some measures previously recommended to the government which were taken.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct the number of recommendations with which the government did not comply; they are very specific recommendations made to various departments. There were 15 recommendations which were followed on. Eight of them suggesting the appearance of a minister before the Public Accounts Committee were acted on. I could go on to the recommendation urging the government to introduce a new bill on the Auditor General, a measure which was accepted immediately by the committee. A sub-committee was set up to examine and prepare a bill to amend the terms of reference of the Auditor General.

When listening to the speech of my hon. friend from Peace River, Mr. Speaker, we could say that his epistolary style is much the same as we find in the Auditor General's report and I wonder if it is not the same writer. We are often accused to have people drafting our speeches and after listening to that speech, I wonder if it was not the same person who wrote it. A wisecracking member went as far as suggesting that maybe it was Bill Davis who has written the speech.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members of what is going on in the various committees and my hon. friend for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) referred to that fact when he said that no fewer than 124 committee meetings took place during the 4th session of the 28th Parliament in order to examine the estimates. And quite often, if we follow carefully what takes place in those committees, we must deplore the total lack of interest of opposition members with regard to specific items involving rather important amounts.

And, as the hon. member for Ontario suggested, we are more interested in making statements like those made Tuesday by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) in the Committee of External Affairs and National Defence, when he deplored and condemned the participation of our country in NATO. He said that, since 1968, we had reduced the Canadian representation in NATO, and how we were judged severely by our NATO partners in Europe. Perhaps it would have been better for him to use this valuable committee time to inquire about specific points that might have interested him and should be of concern to us.

And as I said a while ago, some often complain about the lack of opportunity to study the estimates; yet, the committees held no less than 124 sittings during the fourth session of the 28th parliament. There is no doubt, then, that opposition members who are really interested in looking into the estimates of all departments, have ample opportunity to do so, and they have never been denied that right, I am sure.

[English]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this motion could read that this House protests the government's continuing takeover of parliamentary control in the spending of public money and that we must take action to restore this power and control to the House. I wish to cite one or two examples. The hon. member who just resumed his seat said that someone on this side of the House deplored the fact that there was not a scandal at this time. There is a scandal at this time, Mr. Speaker. Today, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) was asked why payments for drug care for the native people of Canada, including those in my province, were being cut off. The government is supposed to be the protector of the people, yet the minister, without introducing any legislation, has decided to deprive one of the weakest and most defenceless groups in this country of benefits which they have had until this time. As far as I am concerned, that is a scandal.

I wish to make one or two comments with regard to agriculture. The feed grain issue is one of the most important. It affects the welfare of the grain producers in western Canada and the farmers in eastern Canada who purchase this grain. On May 16 the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) whether he proposed making changes in the pricing of feed grain. The minister answered yes. The minister said, as recorded at page 3836 of Hansard for May 16:

> Mr. Speaker, we are preparing a program for a feed grain policy for Canada. I am not prepared to say at this time whether it has to be introduced in the form of a bill. It is my own personal opinion that this can be done without the introduction of a bill in the House. I am sure it will be such a fair policy that it will be accepted no matter whether it is introduced by a bill or otherwise.

The minister stated in this House that he intends to bring in a policy with regard to the sale and movement of feed grain across Canada. He stated that he hopes he does not have to bring before Parliament in the form of a bill the measures which he proposes. The committee discussed the feed grain issue the other day. If my memory is correct, between $20 million and $25 million a year is being spent on this program. I apologize to the House if my figures are not precise, but the amount is not the important factor. The important factor is that a minister of the Crown has decided not to give Parliament an opportunity to debate measures and proposals he intends to introduce. Many people in western Canada are fed up with this cavalier attitude adopted by the Minister of Agriculture.

It was practised in the previous Parliament by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In order to get the minister to carry out an act of this Parliament, four farmers in Saskatchewan had to threaten to haul the government into court. Not until the deadline had almost expired did the government decide to conform with the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and pay the money it was required to pay under the terms of that act, money which it had been withholding for almost two years. I am citing a case which has actually occurred. Then there is the course which the minister has told us he proposes to follow in connection with feed grains.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act is still on the statute books. The minister announced on May 15 that payments would continue in areas where crop insurance is not available this year. For the information of hon. members, the act is supposed to operate except in circumstances in which a farmer himself takes out crop insurance. The minister went on to say the department was in the process of phasing out the provisions and requirement of the act; they would be introducing legislation this year to end PFAA in 1974.

Mr. Speaker, this act continues in effect until such time as another bill is passed either to amend it or to replace it. The money which is supposed to be collected under PFAA is not being collected. Nor do we know whether payment will be made in the coming year to farmers in areas where crop failures may occur. The minister said in his statement that farmers in the Peace River area will be paid. He stated that only in Alberta are there areas without crop insurance where PFAA payments will be available in 1973. Farmers who are not sure whether they will be covered are told to write in only to find out whether they are eligible.

Mr. Speaker, if an act is in force it should be applied. The statement declares that approximately $10 million will be left in the prairie farm emergency fund at the end of July, and that whatever money is left after payments are completed for the 1973 year will be used for the benefit of prairie farmers. In what manner is this $10 million to be distributed? By what right? Under whose warrant? Apparently, just such as is the whim of those who set themselves up as the arbiters of power. It almost takes one back to the famous statement about "nobodies" who are elected to this House.

An hon. member across the way said there was a complete lack of interest shown in committees by opposition members. There is not a total lack of interest in committees but there is darned near a total lack of information. Try to get it. A committee has been considering trends in food prices. With this in mind, I decided in the agricultural committee to try to find out a few of the things which were happening. The Kraft corporation for example, controls around 66 per cent of the total market in Canada, so I started asking the Canadian Dairy Commission some questions in an attempt to find out what was really going on under the present structure. Anybody knows what is happening in the Belleville market in Ontario. It is an auction market and everyone knows the prices that are being paid. However, I asked the Dairy Commission to tell us the prices in the Montreal market.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. It could be extended by unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall not take very long. As I was saying, I asked the Canadian Dairy Commission, which is spending aroung $122 million of the money of the people of Canada—in any case, that was the figure last year—to support the price of raw milk, and so on; and we are certainly in favour of that. I asked them to tell us the prices on the Montreal market. You see, I began to wonder how the consumer was faring.

Kraft corporation handles about $80 million out of total sales amounting to $190 million in Canada. There is a very large co-operative in Quebec which sells its total production to Kraft, and I asked the Canadian Dairy Commission for what price they sold it. The commission said it did not know. I quoted figures to show that consumers in Montreal were paying anywhere from six cents to 15 cents a pound more for cheese over a 16-month period, at the wholesale level, than was being paid in Belleville. I asked the Dairy Commission at what prices this cheese changed hands on the wholesale level in Quebec. The commission said they did not even know whether they had a legal right to find out. I suggest that a corporation which is spending so much public money should make it their business to know whether or not the consuming public is getting a fair shake.

I thank the House for its indulgence. I shall conclude very shortly. I find the only opportunity I have to ask these questions and get answers in the interest of my constituents and of the Canadian public is in committee; but, to use an old phrase, getting information out of some of the witnesses who appear before our committees is like pulling hens' teeth—there just aren't any. If the people on the government side expect us on the opposition side to take committees seriously, they had better instruct their public officials and the heads of various commissions such as the Farm Credit Corporation, the Dairy Commission and the grains commission to give the information that is required. They may then find they will receive co-operation, and hold the interest of opposition members.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the matter before the House I feel it is particularly important that we bear in mind the wording of the motion. I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that we are dealing with the government's mismanagement in spending escalating public revenues, and we warn that immediate and decisive action must be taken to restore control of public funds to Parliament. As a newcomer to this House, I should say that I have indeed been shocked by the lack of co-operation that the government, its officials and others tend to show when we try to get the facts about what is happening in regard to business transactions of the government.

I should like to touch on certain aspects that have become apparent to me. In view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) are in the House—they are the only three cabinet ministers present—it is perhaps appropriate that I specifically comment on activities that have been taking place within their departments or within Crown corporations for which those ministers are answerable.

Let me first deal with the Department of Supply and Services. This is a department that handles approximately $100 million of contract business letting for the government each and every month. During the last 12 months they have let 11,630 contracts involving over $1 billion. Of that number of contracts, only nine have been publicly let in the sense that the tenders were actually opened in public.

What I find most startling about this kind of activity in the department of the Minister of Supply and Services—who very appropriately is presently talking to the President of the Treasury Board, I hope about secret tendering and when it is going to end—is that the minister has made it clear that he does not believe his department's present practice, to use his own words, is entirely legal. This minister has publicly stated that a process exists which he believes is not entirely legal, yet he has taken no action to date to put a stop to it.

When this minister is questioned in the House or by the press, he is very quick to say that this is a practice that has been going on for years. In fact, he likes to go back to certain years, such as 1957 or 1960, and say that this has been a long-standing custom. But surely the Minister of Supply and Services does not seriously expect us to accept that. Has he forgotten that his department was formed on April Fool's Day, 1969, and that it has only existed since that date? Yet he tries to put up a bit of a smokescreen by saying that what is going on—that what he admits, to use his own words again, is not an entirely legal practice, has been going on for almost an indefinite period.

I intend to get to the facts concerning this practice of secret tendering on the part of the government. I believe the time has come for an inquiry into the tendering practices of the government, particularly the practices in the Department of Supply and Services. Surely the public has a right to know whether this tendering is being handled in an above-board manner, whether the government is getting the best possible prices, why there should be any suggestion of secrecy, or the why the minister has to say, to use his own words, that he intends to look into the matter to see what are the advantages and disadvantages of this practice. I believe the only way that this House can get the facts is by having an inquiry, and in due course I hope to be able to move a motion asking that the House conduct an immediate inquiry into the tendering practices of the government.

While I am dealing with this department let me touch on another aspect. I refer to how the government seems to have no hesitation in concealing facts. There is a Crown corporation answerable to the Minister of Supply and Services; it is called the Canadian Commercial Corporation. In an auditor's certificate bearing date June 4, 1972, the Auditor General of Canada commented on the fact that he felt certain funds retained by that corporation had been improperly held by the corporation and not returned to the consolidated revenue fund. That comment was made, as I say, by the Auditor General of Canada in regard to a transaction of a Crown corporation. I think it is very interesting to trace what happened here. In regard to this matter I have had on the order paper since February 7, question No. 832 which asks specifically whether the situation has been rectified. I have found that not only has it not been rectified but the matter has been further complicated.

Moving over to the other department, which for some odd reason was also created on April Fool's Day of 1969, namely, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I find that a Crown corporation answerable to that minister, the Export Development Corporation, rushed to the aid of the Canadian Commercial Corporation and extended a $28 million loan, the largest loan it made in that year, to an entity in the Bahamas in order to help finance certain notes that the Canadian Commercial Corporation had taken back regarding the sale of certain aircraft to Venezuela.

When the president of the Export Development Corporation attended before the finance, trade and economic affairs committee I pointed out that the Auditor General had made some comments concerning this transaction. To show the complete contempt that the president of this Crown corporation has for Parliament and for the Auditor General, he had no hesitation in saying, as reported at page 11:18 of the committee report for Friday, April 13 last:

—I objected strongly to the Auditor General qualifying our certificate because I felt that—

At that point I interrupted him and asked:

Is that not his job if he thinks there is a serious enough breach?

● (1620)

Then Mr. Aitken said:

Yes, but I think he is mistaken. I disagree violently with the attitude he took in criticizing us.

Who else is to criticize a Crown corporation which has done something wrong? If the Auditor General is to be chastised or to have his attitude disagreed with violently, I do not know who we in this Parliament can turn to in an attempt to get the facts concerning these irregular transactions. When the president of the Canadian Commercial Corporation appeared before another standing committee I tried to quiz him about his version of what actually transpired, and I specifically asked whether he was prepared for the type of statement the Auditor General would probably make in his forthcoming report. I got nowhere; I received a very evasive answer. I was told that the Department of Justice had supplied a legal opinion, which they had followed, and based on that legal opinion they felt everything was all right.

In his report to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972, the Auditor General takes up three or four pages on this subject, pointing out what he calls the improper retention of public moneys. I suggest that hon. members read those pages which begin at page 53. For example at page 55 the Auditor General said:

Such procedures were clearly devised to circumvent parliamentary control

There the Auditor General was commenting on the intrigue he traced between the activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the Export Development Corporation, and what he believed was quite unlawful. He stated at page 56:

That the law officers of the Crown are of the opinion that the retention from, and investment outside of, the consolidated revenue fund of public money in this way is lawful—

He went on to state:

That is a most serious situation and we recommend to Parliament that it require the law officers of the Crown to draft for Parliament's consideration suitable amendments to the Financial Administration Act that will ensure that the retention of public funds in this way can no longer be considered lawful.

Perhaps in partial answer to the comments of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) I should say that this is a good illustration of the frustration we in the opposition meet when trying to get at the facts concerning these devious and irregular activities which have been developed and certainly expanded by the present government. This is why I believe there should be an inquiry into some of these activities, and in particular into the secret tenderer policies of the Department of Supply and Services.

Control of Public Funds

Touching on another matter, I think we should bear in mind that the government, through various devices such as the airport revolving fund, has been able to obtain moneys without parliamentary sanction, to be subsequently used for whatever purpose the minister deems appropriate at the time. I have in mind a matter that is of importance to my area, namely, the new airport in Toronto to be known as Toronto International Airport No. 2, at Pickering.

Here we find that through the device of getting the government committed and then coming to Parliament for funds, we are put in the position of refusing to allow the government to meet that commitment. It is interesting that in this case the hon. member for Ontario was most adamant. He suggested that if we refused the estimate in respect of the proposed airport at Toronto, the people in his area would not have the funds to carry out certain expropriations involving 18,000 acres of land. We are told that if we attempt to block the funds, the commitment cannot be honoured and the people will not have the funds required for the expropriation. I suggest this is a circumvention of the whole process of approving the expenditure of public funds.

This question is particularly important when we consider the magnitude of the project. It was estimated that the land acquisition in the Toronto area would cost approximately $60 million. After the commitment was made and the expropriation finalized, we learned that it was to cost $90 million. This is a commitment in respect of which we had virtually no say. It amounts to the expenditure of about $90 million, for an average of $5,000 per acre. This has been done by the central ministry of transport, and I emphasize "central" because there has been no reference to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue, however, with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members for allowing me to continue. I would summarize by saying that in my view the central authority, namely, the ministry of transport, is continuing to develop the airport in the Toronto area notwithstanding the fact that the expenditure will eventually amount to at least $500 million and that this is the only authority in North America at the present time proposing such an airport development.

This is in sharp contrast to the situation in the United States, where the federal authorities do not get involved and where the airport activity in the case of the O'Hare airport in Chicago is five times as great as the activity in the Toronto area. The Chicago authorities do not feel they need a new airport facility, whereas the authority in Toronto, where the activity is only one-fifth, is developing an airport which will eventually cost over $500 million. The Toronto airport is rated as number nine in activity on the continent, Montreal rates as number ten, New York as number one, Chicago as number two, and Los Angeles as number three. In spite of the fact that Montreal and Toronto are rated number nine and number ten, we in Canada will have two of the largest superairports on the continent, thanks to the irresponsible spending of this government. In short, this is ridiculous and irresponsible.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the motion before us, I should like to take up at least two gratuitous statements made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in this House.

He suggested that the reason for the poor attendance in this House this afternoon for the debate on this motion, might be the new procedure for the study of estimates. I think another excuse will have to be found because we know that sometimes on Friday afternoons few members are present in the House.

Moreover, he claimed that some government members, during the study in committee of bills or estimates, kept raising point of orders so as to prevent opposition members from obtaining information. Among other things he indicated that the hon. member for Gatineau was one of those who abused this procedure, and I will not use the excuse given by my colleague, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) this afternoon, when he said that he did not sit with the member for Yukon, because since January 4, I have attended various committees with the member for Yukon and I have no excuse to offer, either to the members of committees I have attended or to the House, with regard the points of order I have raised on a number of occasions, because if I did, it was to draw the committee chairman's attention to the fact that the member who had the floor was dealing with a question that had not been referred to the committee. I am not blaming the members in question for trying to engage in discussions outside the subject.

I will now make a few remarks on the motion, specifically about the following part:

That this House, protesting the Government's continuing takeover of Parliamentary control of public money—

When the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) brought in a similar motion on May 26, 1972, I had the opportunity to make some comments and I referred to the new procedure used by this House since 1968 to examine the estimates. I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who believe that the present procedure is better than the one that existed since Confederation.

And it is since 1968 that at the beginning of February every year, the President of the Treasury Board tables in the House the estimates for the coming year. That is what the President of the Treasury Board (M. Drury) did last February when he tabled the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974.

Before 1968, the estimates were examined by a special committee known as the Committee of Supply of the House, where members could only put questions to the minister responsible for the items under study. But the current procedure which consists in referring the estimates to the 16 standing committees of the House, enables the members to put questions not only to the minister responsible but also to the officials.

Mr. Speaker, committees also are empowered, if they deem it necessary, to call other witnesses from the private sector. We had from 40 to 60 days to study the estimates, or an average of about 200 hours per fiscal year.

Under the new procedure, taking the year 1972 as an example, almost 500 hours were used by the various committees to study the estimates. Again, I insist that the current procedure is much better than the one in effect from Confederation to 1968.

The President of the Treasury Board repeatedly said, and again this afternoon, that the government is always looking for a new procedure to improve on the current one designed to protect public money.

An hon. Member: Oh! oh! Listen to that!—

Mr. Clermont: The hon. member for Simcoe-North mentioned that the Department of Supplies and Services did not resort to public tendering. He said that the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) did nothing to change that practice. I must say that I was sitting on the committee on miscellaneous estimates when the hon. member for Simcoe North was asking his questions of the minister.

• (1630)

[English]

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member intended to refer to me, I am the member for York-Simcoe.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: I thank the member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) for calling my attention to the fact that I referred to him by the wrong riding, but I remember quite clearly, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member put his questions to the Minister of Supply and Services, the latter had answered: "As soon as I became responsible for the Department of Supply and Services and got acquainted with the procedure, I asked my officials to draw up a report, and when I get that report, I will assume my responsibilities."

I felt duty bound, Mr. Speaker, to say how things happened in the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Speaker, some have criticized the $1 items, giving the impression that this procedure has only been in effect since 1963 or 1968. I have in hand, Mr. Speaker, photostats of estimates for 1958, 1959, 1961, 1962 and 1963, and if time allowed me, I could quote various $1 items. I remember that the member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), former minister in the Robarts and Davis governments, said in the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates that this procedure was commonly used, and when the President of the Treasury Board submitted his main estimates for 1973-74 to the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, he undertook to give explanations on every $1 item.

That procedure already existed for a couple of years in the Senate and the President of the Treasury Board undertook in the future to follow the procedure used when he was asked to appear before the Senate committee which has the responsibility to consider those estimates.

So criticism is passed on a vote that applies not only to the current year but to subsequent years. It is again a practice which existed for many years.

The report of the Auditor General for 1972 also mentions the fact that the government failed to do anything about the 38 recommendations and comments made by the Public Accounts Committee. When I spoke on the motion on May 26, 1972, I mentioned the action taken by the government concerning those 38 recommendations and comments. I said, and I quote:

A tabulation of these 38 recommendations indicates that the government has indeed responded to them, although not necessarily by acting in the fashion proposed. A substantial number of the issues have been subject to hearings before the Public Accounts Committee. I may say that in most cases these have satisfied the committee, because the subsequent reports of the committee have not raised the issues again.

I now refer to tabulations of issues and action taken. Many of these have been subject to lengthy debate. In this regard the committee has played an effective role and the procedure is not as ineffective as indicated. Mr. Speaker, the following is a summary of action taken on recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee: First, recommendations on which there has been specific comment by the minister involved, 14; second, recommendations on which there has been subsequent specific testimony by departments to the Public Accounts Committee without any new or changed recommendation by the committee, eight; third, recommendations on which departments have not been called upon to testify to the Public Accounts Committee but on which they have taken action which has not received publicity, three; fourth, recommendations which call for continued observation by the Auditor General of departmental practices rather than government action, one; fifth, recommendations subject to action re formulation of separate Auditor General Act, one.

And on the subject of a separate act for the Auditor General the Public Accounts Committee during the fourth session of the 28th Parliament, of which I was a member, called upon a committee of experts to draft a bill to be submitted to the Public Accounts Committee. I am sure that the Public Accounts Committee will take its responsibilities and make recommendations to the Parliament of Canada or the government.

On this committee were, I think, Mr. Ball, assistant deputy minister of the Department of Supply and Services, the parliamentary counsel for the House of Commons, the parliamentary counsel for the Senate and a representative of the Auditor General's office. And I go on with the quotation:

Sixth,

I go back to the recommendations and comments made by the Public Accounts Committee in recent years, and I quote:

Sixth, action could not be determined in time available since tabling of Auditor General's report, four.

Seventh, recommendations made too recently for action to be taken, seven.

So, that is what happened to the 38 recommendations, Mr. Speaker.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to insist once again that I am one of those who believe that the present procedure is an improvement over the one that existed from 1867 to 1968. Such a procedure enables members of the various parties to put questions either to the minister or to the officials.

I again stress the fact that if a member, under the rules, requires a witness from the private sector for additional information to those given by the minister or an official, he can give notice to the chairman of the committee, and this witness must then appear before the committee.

And I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House, the Public Accounts Committee as well as other committees will keep on looking for improved procedures so that, as I said earlier, the public moneys will be closely controlled.

● (1640)

[English]

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to speaking today on this subject and backing up my colleague who proposed the motion. I do so because I think we are expressing, through this motion, not only the feeling of the official opposition and of the other opposition parties in this House, but the feeling of uneasiness of the people of Canada when they see what is transpiring in their Parliament.

I listened to the speeches today because I am sincerely interested in this matter. I was very impressed by the speakers on this side who brought forward various points demonstrating their concern over Parliament's control of the expenditure of Canadian taxpayers' money which has reached tremendous levels. We appreciate this fact when we talk of the disbursement of $20 billion. No wonder the Canadian people not only are concerned about, but have a right to know how these moneys are disbursed. Those who are disbursing them should be held responsible for their policies and for the manner in which these moneys are distributed.

I was struck again today—I do not say this unkindly; I say it factually—by the arrogance of the speakers from the government party when they tried to demonstrate once again that Canadians have never had it so good, that they have never had a system that has been working so well. In their speeches they have demonstrated their unveiled contempt for the feelings of the people of this nation. That is the prime reason this government is in political trouble. Everyone makes errors. It is only normal that a group of individuals acting together will make errors; and this government makes errors. That is why we bring this matter to the attention of Parliament today.

It is not good enough for this government to assure Parliament that they are infallible in the way they are conducting the business of our nation, and that the Auditor General should not dare to criticize their expenditures—the man whose responsibility and prime objective is to study those expenditures. They do not think he should dare to question any of their disbursements. This indicates the feeling of the government toward Parliament and the people of Canada.

I was both upset and shocked by the speeches of members of the government side. I refer to one in particular, whom I shall not name, who spent his entire time criticizing the Auditor General, the man who in latter years has done more than any other individual, in the exercise of his duty, to safeguard the expenditures made on behalf of Canadian taxpayers. That was his job, and we must give him credit for trying to do it to the best of his ability. We must not criticize him because he dared to suggest that in the spending of the Canadian taxpayers' money the government was less than wise.

In the time allotted to me I would like to deal with one other subject. It is the subject of parliamentary control of the expenditures of this nation under the changed parliamentary rules which this government introduced; a change, they said, that was going to make Parliament more efficient and would give us a better opportunity to study in detail the expenditures of the government. There is no doubt in my mind that those who studied this question and proposed the rule changes meant well. In theory it looked as if the system could work, but in practice Members of Parliament soon realized that the parliamentary committee system today is not only useless but is absolutely futile in discharging the responsibility with which it is charged. I should like to give some examples, not in a partisan way but in a practical way, of what is actually going on. The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) spoke about the committee system. He is a member with some experience, having been a chairman. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker, that when 16 standing committees have to sit at the same time as Parliament during a session, it is absolutely impossible for any political party including the government, to man them adequately.

● (1650)

Mr. Bell: They are sitting this afternoon.

Mr. Danforth: We have 16 committees sitting this session, and last session there were 23. With the restricted number of members that we have in the House, it is impossible to man them adequately. The first thing that government members tried to do in bringing in this new committee system was to decrease the number of members necessary for a quorum. This so-called committee system is so bad right now that on a committee with 20 members, members of the government have proposed that we should have votes with only one member of the government sitting on the committee.

Mr. McGrath: Shame.

Mr. Danforth: This indicates the degree of confidence the government has in its own committee system. They said that it did not work and they were dissatisfied with it. The only people who have proved to be dissatisfied with the government's committee system of examining government estimates in detail are the members sitting on the government benches. To say that we can study estimates in detail is just a sham. Under the old system, as has been illustrated in debate today, the responsible minister sat in this House and answered questions in full. Under the present system they may or may not attend the committee, as they choose—not as the committee chooses. As a rule, however, out of courtesy the minister usually comes in and makes a prepared statement which takes perhaps an hour, and he usually remains in committee for another hour.

We have had instances, though, where a minister would not even come to committee or, having made an initial appearance, has never returned. This system of dealing with estimates, where we are dealing with thousands of millions of dollars and a member may get 10 or 20 minutes once a week to ask questions in a committee that sits only during two or three months, is ridiculous. It is impossible to deal with more than a fraction of the expenditures of a particular department.

Mr. Speaker, this is the system this government says efficiently deals with the scrutiny of the expenditure of $20 billion of taxpayers' money. If the government sometimes admitted that it made mistakes, it would be a lot more popular with the Canadian people. Why do they not admit this? The Canadian people would accept it, but this Liberal government is not one iota different from the previous Liberal government.

Mr. McGrath: The same old bunch.

Mr. Danforth: When an ill-founded or irresponsible expenditure of millions of dollars has been made, the government feels that the only course of action is to conceal it, not reveal it. The government states that the information is available to the opposition and to the people of Canada. Mr. Speaker, all the people have to do is read Hansard and they will see for themselves the lack of responsibility demonstrated by ministers when they are asked questions, and how they constantly seek not only to conceal information but demonstrate a derogatory and contemptuous manner when doing it.

This system is not working, Mr. Speaker, and our debate today will have little effect on the thinking of this government, I am afraid. They feel that they are right, regardless of the fact that every opposition party in the House believes the system is not working. Even though the people of Canada are showing a lack of confidence in the system, the government still feels that it has attained perfection. If things continue as they have in the past, the only change the Canadian people can expect in our parliamentary system in the next few months is one carefully designed by the Liberal government to restrict even further the ability of opposition parties to obtain full information on the expenditure of the tax dollar. Mr. Speaker, they show contempt toward the system we have had since confederation.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine has a question to ask.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member complains that the present committee system does not allow opposition members to scrutinize the estimates of every department. Could he explain why during hours and hours of session, members of the opposition did not ask any question on the estimates but only on government policy?

[English]

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, the question just demonstrates the arrogance I have been speaking of, because not only do they now want to restrict our questions, but they want to tell us the type of questions we should ask. This is one of the reasons we feel we will not make any progress with the present government.

In conclusion, let me say that I think the people of Canada will appreciate and support any parliamentary rule that is designed for the welfare of the people of Canada. All that has been designed in the last few years by this government is a rule to restrict the power of the people to have knowledge of what is going on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have expired.

This House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(3).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER ON FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I have the honour to table the press release issued at the end of the conference of first ministers which took place in Ottawa last week from May 23 to 25.

Upon reading this release, hon. members will see that there has been considerable progress toward harmonization of federal and provincial government goals in several areas of mutual interest. For instance the federal proposal to increase family allowances while assuring the continuation of national standards and the possibility of amendments brought about by the provinces has received significant approval. This will be a major innovation in an area of shared jurisdictions of the two levels of government.

The joint revision of the social security system now has full approval of the premiers. Within the framework of this review there will be a special effort to safeguard and increase work incentives, while social welfare ministers will see what place is to be taken by programs of assistance to housing and manpower training.

There has also been closer harmonization of goals and programs in the field of regional economic expansion. The views of the provinces on policies related to industry and foreign investments have been very useful to the federal government. It was agreed that the next conference of first ministers will give these issues a high priority.

[English]

First ministers expressed the wish that matters such as these, where the question is not directly one of fiscal resources but rather of co-ordinating policies and programs in relation to national objectives, should be given increasing attention at future meetings. It was also proposed that the broad question of government responsibilities and fiscal resources should be considered at some other opportunity.

In the health field, there was a discussion in depth of the federal financial proposals which had been revised since the First Ministers' Conference of November, 1971.

I should emphasize that the original agreed purpose of this long exercise was to provide greater provincial flexibility in determining priorities, to provide incentives to rationalize the health care systems and to provide effective services at reasonable cost. During the conference, the federal government offered to leave to the discretion of the provinces the expenditure of the $640 million of thrust funds. These funds form an important part of the over-all federal proposals and are designed to enable the provinces to improve health care systems.

General agreement was again expressed on the broad objectives of the proposals. A difference of view was evident even as between provinces on the basic question of whether the federal government should participate directly in the programs or whether, in such mature programs as hospital insurance and medicare, it should contribute by providing tax room to the provinces on some agreed formula. First ministers indicated a desire to study the proposals more closely over the next few weeks and to report their conclusions to the federal government. It was agreed that our proposals would remain on the table for the time being. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that a consensus will emerge around the proposals which we have put forward.

After discussion of the new federal formula for continued financial support for post-secondary education, it was agreed that the existing plan would remain in force for a three-year period commencing April 1, 1974. Further studies will be carried out on the sort of arrangement that should come into effect at the end of that period.

Mr. Speaker, the communiqué reports the substance of our discussion of the economic situation including the problem of inflation and its control. It also reports our discussion of the important problem of foreign ownership of land in certain parts of Canada, especially as it relates to recreational and agricultural land. We agreed to establish a joint committee to report on the legal, constitutional and land use aspects of the problem. The federal government made it clear it would not support restrictions on landed immigrants, or on Canadian citizens owning land outside their province of residence.

The communiqué also records our agreement to give permanence to the present secretariat serving the Conference of First Ministers and to make its services available, as desired, to other intergovernmental meetings of ministers and officials.

Mr. Speaker, the conference agenda covered a wide range of government responsibilities in areas of shared concern. I believe better mutual understanding of each others' goals and perspectives was achieved and important steps were taken to harmonize approaches to policies and programs in the interest of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for sending me a copy of his statement before two o'clock. I received it quite late, but I appreciate the difficulties the Prime Minister must have experienced in preparing a positive statement on the outcome of this conference.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps the greatest achievement of the conference was the success of one reporter in breaking security to hear the briefing given by the Minister of Finance on the economic position of the country. I do not know how much the reporter learned but it was at least one achievement that came out of the conference.

The Prime Minister referred to a number of positive achievements such as the agreement on family allowances and the general proposal for some degree of flexibility. I think this was assumed in advance. The Prime Minister also referred to the agreement concerning a joint review of social security programs. I would assume this would be very welcome to provincial first ministers. But we shall see how things turn out and whether, in fact, this government, if it is given continuing responsibility, has the capacity to work out a common approach with the provinces that is generally acceptable in this area.

The Prime Minister also referred to the discussion on regional economic expansion. Here again, there is no indication at all of any more effective program to attack this great problem. Shared programs in the field of health have been discussed for some years now, with the federal government putting forward suggestions to the provinces. These suggestions were not agreed upon. The Prime Minister referred to disagreement among the provinces themselves, and I think this is so. But I believe the provinces were united in their belief that the proposal of the federal government did not provide them with sufficient security against increases in the cost of the continued implementation of these programs should the provinces accept the federal proposal. The proposal has not been accepted.

The Prime Minister recently pointed out that the proposals of the federal government in regard to shared-cost programs are a different thing from any discussion or proposal generally regarding tax sharing arrangements. I accept that is so. These proposals related to specific joint programs. But I do say to the Prime Minister that the question of the allocation of shared costs between fields must be faced. The government cannot assume it can just go along on the basis of the legislation passed last year. It is particularly urgent that the matter be faced in light of the proposal of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to introduce an indexing concept into personal income tax. While I was very pleased to see him adopt this principle, I have always recognized, as I hope he will recognize, that it has an unfortunate effect on the revenues of the provincial governments and therefore does necessitate a reconsideration of the present tax-sharing agreements.

No agreement was reached in regard to post-secondary education, so the federal government is carrying on.

Apparently there was some discussion of inflation but the federal government put no proposals before the provinces that might involve some kind of joint attack or effort to contain inflation in this country. This is particularly alarming on a day when we find that the wholesale price index has increased by over 16 per cent between April this year and April of 1972.

Basically important questions such as an industrial policy for this country and a policy for foreign investment were simply deferred until the next conference. The Prime Minister has not explained what the implications of this may be as far as any legislation before the House is concerned, or indeed what the implications may be in regard to the federal government taking any initiatives in the area of industrial strategy and policy to further discussions taking place.

There is no need for me to speak at greater length. The conference accomplished very little. I doubt whether any conference between the federal government and the provinces for a good number of years, called for the purpose of discussing general concerns between the two levels of government, has achieved so little in concrete results. Certainly the government, in its relations with the provinces as exhibited at this conference, has not come to grips with some very basic problems such as tax sharing, inflation, foreign investment and industrial policy. I hope that the discussions look as if they were more useful than the results because the results are certainly minimal.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the first ministers have just concluded another ho-hum conference. One of the local papers summed it up by saying that the federal-provincial conference of Canada's first ministers that began in disagreement ended undramatically on Friday after three days of talk but little in the way of concrete results. The only thing they seem to have agreed upon unanimously was to have another meeting in the future. I suggest that the reason for this lack of accomplishment is that, instead of the federal government providing the kind of leadership necessary to strengthening federalism and to promote a sense of national purpose and set out national goals, it spent this conference in the main seeking to shift to the provinces the responsibility for very important programs such as post-secondary education and health insurance.

● (1420)

I am glad that the provincial governments did not buy the federal government's idea of giving up a shared-cost program for post-secondary education to be replaced by a per capita grant. As the communiqué indicates, the provinces recognize that these per capita grants would not meet the growing needs of post-secondary education. The same is true of the health insurance programs. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in the statement he has made today, talked about flexibility in determining priorities and providing incentives to rationalize the health care systems and the provision of effective services at reasonable cost. This is simply rhetoric used to clothe his attempt to load on the provinces the federal share of the costs of health insurance in this country.

Of course the provinces agree about the need for flexibility in determining priorities, but that can be done without removing the federal government's guarantee to meet 50 per cent of the cost of health insurance. Certainly the provinces want to rationalize their health care systems, and the thrust fund could be used for that purpose.

The federal government tosses around the figure of $640 million for the thrust fund. Spread over six years, that is $106 million roughly per year and less than $5 per capita. That will be only a small contribution which the provincial governments will have to more than match in order to provide nursing facilities, community health clinics, home nursing and medical care. What the provinces require and what the federal government has consistently refused, is continued federal involvement in the guarantee that 50 per cent of the cost of present health insurance programs and additional health insurance services that inevitably must be added to the present programs will be shared by the federal government.

The attempts by the federal government to pass this responsibility on to the provinces can mean only one thing. The additional sources of revenue that the federal government is offering to the provinces will enable some of the wealthier provinces to continue to maintain a fairly high level of health services. It will mean for the other provinces lower health services. It will mean that they will have to apply deterrent charges and residence qualifications, and all the talk about uniform standards and portability will inevitably go out the window. You cannot develop national unity by fragmenting Canada's health policies so they vary from province to province, depending upon the financial condition of the particular province.

I notice that according to the communiqué the conference agreed that at one of its next meetings it will discuss industrial policy and foreign investment. Before that conference is held I hope the Prime Minister and his colleagues will present to this parliament what their industrial policy is and what their policy is on foreign investment, because you cannot have an industrial policy unless they also have a national energy policy, and we have been waiting for years for such a policy.

Finally, I notice that in the communiqué there are these words concerning inflation:

> ... there was general but not unanimous support among first ministers for the view of the federal government that it was not of a character which could be dealt with effectively in present circumstances by controls over prices and incomes.

Mr. Speaker, the communiqué tells us what the first ministers, or at least some of the first ministers, agreed should not be done. We have had no statement from the government nor from the conference concerning what should be done to meet the problem of rising prices in this country. We have had no statement from the government, and I doubt whether the government even raised the matter, concerning whether or not the provinces would be prepared to pass enabling legislation giving the proposed Food Prices Review Board concurrent powers to deal with unjustified price increases across the country. Did the federal government ask the provinces if they were prepared to pass such enabling legislation? We were not told. As a matter of fact, the federal government has no policy and is now seeking to pass the buck to the provinces by saying that the provinces agree with it that price controls are not necessary. This conference apparently achieved very little in the way of concrete attainments, largely as the result of the failure of leadership on the part of the federal government to set forth concrete proposals and give the necessary leadership to the provinces and to the nation in these critical times.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, with respect to statements that are empty, devoid of any sense, let us speak of a statement like the one the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has just made. There is no doubt that, when he read the document he was given by one of his writers, he must have laughed up his sleeve because, in fact, he brings us the results of a conference where people agreed, while the provincial premiers in fact were not in agreement at this conference and went back home, without any exception, disappointed with the way the federal authorities had welcomed them in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, in the case of the Quebec premier, he admitted that fact to newsmen, saying: I did not get anything tangible; I came back with principles. He went back to Quebec with principles, but without any money! The same goes for the Ontario premier. The other premiers also complained of the way the Prime Minister snubbed them when they came to discuss their fiscal problems with the federal authorities. The premiers did not come here to ask what they should do, but to get federal assistance in the fields of social security and post-secondary education.

Mr. Speaker, each and every premier went back to his province empty-handed. Three days were spent discussing the redistribution of that rarity: money. The provinces said to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada: We do not have enough money. The right hon. Prime Minister of Canada replied: Be content with what you have. We can do no more now, but the situation may improve after 1974.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind the conference was the right opportunity to discuss the use of the Bank of Canada in the service of the provinces. Instead of allowing the Bank of Canada to lend to the provinces for periods of six months, the government should order it to make loans for periods of 60 years. The provinces would thus be allowed to settle themselves their very urgent and important problems. But no, they preferred to discuss the short supply instead of abundance.

● (1430)

[English]

> After discussion of the new federal formula for continued financial support for post-secondary education, it was agreed that the existing plan would remain in force for a three-year period commencing April 1, 1974.

"It was agreed".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that was not accepted. The provinces were asking for something better because they are all facing problems in the field of education, in order to help young Canadians carry on with their studies.

Mr. Speaker, this conference is no exception to what we have experienced during the last 20 years or so. First there is some bright project and then it goes flop. The one that has just ended was like the others that we have known, and so long as we do not come to grips with the heart of the problem, that is finance, so long as we keep beating about the bush, arguing about who must and who must not tax, this Prime Minister like the ones who will come after him, or the ones who came before him, will parade around making these foolish, worthless, and empty statements that do not settle anything at all, neither at the national nor at the provincial levels. Let us have a policy that will enable the federal government to be useful to the provinces and to the Canadian people in general and the results we shall achieve will be quite different from those we have achieved so far.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTING COMMISSIONERS AND SETTING FORTH TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), a copy in both official languages of the order in council appointing the commissioners of the Food Prices Review Board and giving its terms of reference.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the minister assure us that, before the business under motions is completed, he intends to make a statement to try to justify the document he just tabled?

Mr. Gray: The merits of the document speak for themselves and I think are agreed to by the majority of the Canadian population.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

JURISDICTION OVER WATERS ABOVE CONTINENTAL SHELF—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I want to move a motion under Standing Order 43. I have served notice to the various parties and to the House leader of the party across the aisle who I understand has been in discussion with the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister.

Because of the public statements of the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries outside the House over the weekend supporting the concept of Canadian control of the marine resources of the continental shelf, and because of the consistent position of this party and the other parties of this House on this issue for some years, and in order to get the House to express its support of such a resolution, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House supports the concept of the jurisdiction of Canada over the waters superjacent to its continental shelf and that this position form the basis of Canada's presentation at the upcoming Law of the Sea Conference.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate requires the unanimous consent of the House. The Chair will inquire whether there is unanimity. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government blocked it.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not challenging Your Honour, but I wonder whether you could put the motion again. I am not challenging Your Honour, but the wording of the motion is such that I cannot imagine why the party across the way is objecting to it after the presentation by the minister and the consultation that has taken place.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is required under the Standing Order to inquire whether there is unanimous consent. I have done this and there was not unanimity. The hon. member referred a moment ago to discussions that have taken place between representatives of the parties. Perhaps these discussions might be resumed later on with a view to bringing this matter before the House in some other way.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, if no other member wishes to move a motion under Standing Order 43 I would like to move another motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the continued downgrading of Canadian Coastguard services, which was highlighted by recent deaths by drowning at the doorstep of Tofino lifeboat station, necessitates that I rise, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek consent to move a motion. I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the petition signed by almost 400 residents of Tofino, Ucluelet and Bamfield demanding immediate restoration of 24-hour manning of Tofino and Bamfield lifeboat stations, which I have been requested to place before parliament, and a copy of which I now send to the Minister of Transport, be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for immediate investigation and report.

Mr. Speaker: This motion also requires the unanimous consent of the House in view of the fact that it is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion therefore cannot be put.

An hon. Member: The government blocked that one too.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REFUSAL TO GIVE INFORMATION TO MEMBERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of extremely urgent and pressing necessity.

Indeed, since it is increasingly difficult for the elected representatives of the people to obtain information on the use of public funds and more especially concerning the carrying out of projects under the Local Initiatives Program which is a breach of the supremacy of Parliament, I therefore move, seconded by the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That a special committee of the House be established to consider the reasons which have caused the government to deny to the members of this Parliament valid information concerning the use of public funds as a result of the carrying out of projects under the Local Initiatives Program and that the said committee report to the House with pertinent recommendations before June 30, 1973.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion therefore cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POSITION AT FORTHCOMING ICNAF CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that Dr. Needler is now leading the very able Canadian delegation to the ICNAF conference in Copenhagen, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canada achieved agreements at the 1972 International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fishery that all member countries work within a quota system, and in view of the fact that at the forthcoming ICNAF conference starting in Copenhagen on June 3 the Canadian delegation will present the position that Canada should have the right to harvest whatever marine resources it is capable of taking within this quota, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House support the position taken by the Canadian delegation at the 1973 ICNAF conference and that this House will further support the use of any reasonable bargaining leverage in the delegation's attempts to achieve its aims.

I gave notice of that motion also.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put at this time.

● (1440)

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is a very urgent matter. I know I am perhaps infringing a bit on the good will of Your Honour, but in view of the fact that this motion, like my first one, was not accepted I wonder whether there is some way in which the minister on motions tomorrow, or even today, can move to express the feeling of the House and give support to the Canadian delegation, which is working on a matter so immediate and so urgent—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lundrigan: —that if Canada's position is not accepted our fishermen—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member resume his seat please. He is now arguing in support of a motion which has not been accepted by the House.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION ADMINISTRATION

Question No. 439—Mr. Alexander:

1. Is it the intention of the government to increase the recently announced amount for UIC and, if so (a) for what reason (b) by how much?

2. What was the actual cost of administration of UIC for the years 1971 and 1972 and the projected cost for administration for 1973, and if the cost is different for the years 1972 and 1973, for what reason?

3. How much money was spent for consultants in every aspect of the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act for the years 1968-1972 inclusive?

4. (a) How many computers are used by UIC (b) where are they situated (c) what was the savings predicted (d) how many breakdowns have occurred (e) what extra funds have been spent on the computers since installation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): It has been recently announced that the Commission has set the employee contribution rate for 1973 at one dollar per $100 of insurable earnings. In addition, it was also announced that the maximum benefit rate would be $107 for 1973. The Commission is constantly monitoring the premium rate requirement and if a change is necessary, it will be announced at the appropriate time.

2.

1971 Actual	1972 Actual	1973 Budget
$86,098,000	$119,587,000*	$145,045,000

*The 1972 figure is not yet finalized as our accounts do not close until the end of February.

The increase in costs between 1972 and 1973 are due to a combination of factors. Escalating costs such as salary increases due to collective bargaining, postal rate increases and accommodation rental costs have affected administrative costs. Increased costs have been incurred in providing improvements in the service to the public through a more personalized approach in dealing with claimants, decentralization of offices, and improvement of the record of employment. Additional costs are also due to increasing the complement of Benefit Control Officers, Insurance Officers and Enquiry Personnel to a level commensurate with the workload.

3. Payments of individual fees totalling $2,000 or over were: 1968-69, $120,792; 1969-70, $41,880; 1970-71, $328,301; 1971-72, $285,495; 1 April-31 December 1972, $68,018.

[Mr. Gray.]

4. (a) and (b) UIC uses six computers under its direct control, one at each UIC Computer Centre, in Ottawa, Moncton, Montreal, Belleville, Winnipeg and Vancouver. There is also a minicomputer in St. John's, Newfoundland, which serves as the terminal of a telecommunications link connecting that city to the main Atlantic processing site at Moncton. Occasional use is made of external computer facilities for overflow and back up in emergencies. In Winnipeg and Vancouver, commercial facilities with similar Burroughs equipment are used in the same way. In Ottawa, several of the local service bureaus have been used, from time to time, for statistical and developmental work, and for the Canadian Government Annuities System; (c) the original proposal to computerize U.I. payments indicated a savings of $2,000,000. A special report prepared after implementation concluded that in 1970/71 the Commission would realize a savings of $1,841,000 based on the 1967/68 manual operation; (d) since January 1, 1971 there have been a total of 75 breakdowns; (e) starting in 1970, increases in workload and major operational changes resulting from the introduction of the new act have caused expansion of the regional facilities. The equipment rentals have increased in the past three years from $43,923 to $65,842. per month. In addition a sixth site, in Ottawa, has been added for central statistical purposes and for program development. It was contracted for in May, 1971, at a rental of $23,325 per month. The present equipment configuration in Ottawa rents at $25,485.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—BILINGUALISM POLICY

Question No. 466—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Has the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources adopted a definite policy on bilingualism?

2. What number and total percentage of that department's employees are (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

3. In 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968 and 1970, what was the number and total percentage of employees of the same department who were (a) English unilingual (b) French unilingual (c) bilingual?

4. By year since 1960, what was the total budget allocated for the development of bilingualism in that department?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as follows: 1. Departments' policy on Bilingualism is based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Translation Bureau Act and policy and directives prescribed by the Government.

2. The number of continuing full-time employees who claim language proficiency is as follows:

	Number	Per cent
(a)	2,348	78
(b)	33	1
(c)	634	21

3. No statistics available for the years 1960 to 1966 inclusive. The number of continuing full-time employees who claimed language proficiency is as follows:

	1968		1970
	Number	Per cent	Number	Per cent
(a)	3,264	81.5	3,329	79.0
(b)	20	.5	20	.5
(c)	723	18.0	860	20.5

4. The development of bilingualism has been carried out since 1969 within the total operating appropriations provided by Parliament and has not been segregated from other operating expenses except for the following: In December 1971, the department was given supplementary resources of $64,000.00 to assist in implementing bilingualism for the balance of the fiscal year 1971-72. Similarly, $246,800.00 has been provided for 1972-73.

RESEARCH PROJECTS

Question No. 685—Mr. Muir:

1. How many research projects were contracted out by the Prices and Incomes Commission between 1968 and 1972?

2. What was each project and its total cost?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. Eleven.

2. Project	Total Cost
(i) Preliminary investigation into whether there are regional Phillips Curves, particularly in the Maritimes and Quebec	$ 800
(ii) Preparation of a report analysing letters to the Price and Incomes Commission in response to mass mailing	15,000
(iii) Preparation of a report on "Fee Setting by Independent Practitioners"	3,000

(v) Preparation of a study of inflation in hospital construction to determine the degree to which individual components of construction costs have increased during the past five years	4,250
(vi) Preparation of a report on medical care prices	4,438
(vii) Preparation of studies on partial wage price models and related research, and estimation of reduced form monetary models of the Canadian economy	56,500
(viii) Preparation of a study of the magnitude and timing of economic fluctuations in Canada and government responses to them over the past fifteen years	9,918
(ix) Preliminary work regarding inflation in the health industry	3,625
(x) Price effects of the 1971 federal excise tax reductions on household electronic equipment	2,666
(xi) Study of inflation in non-residential construction	1,000

GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT OVERPAYMENTS

Question No. 768—Mr. Coates:

1. How many recipients of the Guaranteed Income Supplement were overpaid during 1972 and of that total number, how many of the overpayments were as the result of changes in the law that made Unemployment Insurance benefits income insofar as the Guaranteed Income Supplement was concerned?

2. Of the total number of overpayments, what was the total amount involved and how many of the overpayments were as a result of actions not being taken by officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare to correct the amount received by recipients of the Guaranteed Income Supplement who were also recipients of Unemployment Insurance benefits?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Since the Guaranteed Income Supplement payment year is a fiscal year, the answers given are for 1972-73 and are approximate. 1. (a) 27,400; (b) 4,200.

2. (a) $886,000 represents the amount of overpayments resulting from receipt of Unemployment Insurance benefits; (b) 3,600.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO FINANCING OF COMPOSITE HIGH SCHOOLS

Question No. 999—Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix):

Does the government contribute to the financing of the construction of composite high schools in Quebec and, if so (a) how is this contribution made (b) how much has it cost in all (c) how many schools have benefited from such contributions (i) in general (ii) in the constituency of Charlevoix?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No.

GRANT FROM CMHC TO PEOPLE OF BURKEVILLE

Question No. 1,066—Mr. Reynolds:

Is it the intention of the government to approve the grant from CMHC announced during the election for the people of Burkeville to do a study on the future of their community in relation to the rest of Sea Island and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): A grant of $40,000 to the Sea Island Community Ratepayers Association was approved on April 17, 1973, under Part V of the National Housing Act, to enable the Association to undertake and present, in co-operation with the township of Richmond Planning Department, the Department of Transport, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and/or the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, a plan of redevelopment of the Burkeville area, to prepare feasibility studies of the redevelopment plan, and to investigate the organizational measures which would enable the Burkeville residents to participate to the greatest possible degree in the redevelopment.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS—INCREASE IN OFFICE SPACE

Question No. 1,388—Mr. Orlikow:

1. In the past ten years, how much new office space, by square foot, have government departments (department by department) increased their office space (a) in Ottawa (b) outside Ottawa?

2. Of this space, how much is in (a) buildings owned by the government (b) privately-owned buildings?

3. Of the space in government-owned buildings, what was the cost of building construction per square foot, and what is the actual cost of maintenance per building per square foot?

4. Of the space occupied in rented buildings, what is the actual rental per square foot and what is the cost to the government of maintenance per square foot?

5. For what period is the government committed to remain and to pay rent in the buildings in which they have rented quarters?

6. Does the government assume financial responsibility for structural and decorating costs of rented space?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): The information is not available to provide an accurate answer to this question. The costs in manpower and time to undertake the very large amount of work which would be required to gather such detailed data as is obtainable for the period covered by the question, would be prohibitive.

GRANTS TO SEA ISLAND RATEPAYERS ASSOCIATION UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Question No. 1,702—Mr. Reynolds:

Has the Minister of State for Urban Affairs reached a decision yet on last year's request (renewed from 1970), on behalf of the Sea Island Ratepayers Association for financial assistance to carry out studies on the future of Burkeville subdivision?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): See the answer to question number 1,066.

IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD HEARINGS

Question No. 1,721—Mr. Saltsman:

1. (a) Of the number of cases waiting to be heard by the Immigration Appeal Board, how many of those cases arose as a result of people entering Canada as visitors (b) what countries, by numbers, were these visitors from?

2. What does the government intend to do about the backlog of cases before the Immigration Appeal Board?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) and (b) The records of the Immigration Appeal Board are not maintained in such a manner as to provide the statistics requested. To provide accurate information would involve the physical search of each individual file for over 14,000 cases for which the hiring of additional staff would be necessary.

2. The matter is under consideration and when a decision is made it will be announced in the usual manner.

Order Paper Questions

SALARY PAID TO MR. PETER CONNOLLY, OCTOBER 30, 1972 TO MARCH 31, 1973

Question No. 1,754—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How much money has been paid by the government, before any deductions at source, in the nature of salary, honorarium or retainers to Mr. Peter Connolly between October 30, 1972 and up to and including March 31, 1973?

2. Has any money been paid to Mr. Peter Connolly as an expense allowance of any kind whatsoever and, if so (a) what is the total amount of such expenses paid (b) what is the exact description of each expense and the amount involved in each case?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Mr. Peter Connolly received a salary of $689.98 from the Department of Manpower and Immigration for the period November 6, 1972 to November 17, 1972 and a salary of $4,063.19 from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for the period December 15, 1972 to March 31, 1973, based on an annual salary scale of $17,500 to $20,000.

HOUSING OWNED BY CMHC

Question No. 1,793—Mr. Godin:

1. Throughout Canada, how many (a) single family dwellings (b) semi-detached duplexes (c) apartment buildings (d) rental housing are owned by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

2. How many dwelling units are involved in such dwellings or buildings and what is their total value?

3. How many dwellings or buildings of each category had to be repossessed by CMHC over the past five years, owing to contractors' bankruptcies?

4. In each province what is the total value of all dwellings and buildings seized under such circumstances and at what civic address are these houses or buildings located?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation keeps it records on the basis of the number of housing units, all of which are for rental purposes. The number owned by CMHC or administered by it on behalf of various insurance funds, under the National Housing Act as December 31, 1972, are given in the table following:

Number of Housing Units

	Corporation owned	Administered on behalf of Insurance Funds	Total
Single houses	527	988	1,515
Row houses	2,468	270	2,738
Apartments	6,413	2,478	8,891
Total	9,408	3,736	13,144

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

2. The number of dwelling units is given in 1 above, and their book value at December 31, 1972, was: (a) Corporation-owned, $48,455,000; (b) administered on behalf of Insurance Funds, $30,182,000.

3. All repossessions arise from financial difficulties of one kind or another on the part of the borrowers, some of which have involved the bankruptcies of contractors. It is not possible, from information available, to identify those cases of repossessions where bankruptcy was the primary cause.

4. Not applicable; see 3 above.

CORA BROWN AND McDONALD SUBDIVISION—OBJECTIONS TO EXPROPRIATION

Question No. 1,847—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Is it the intention of the Minister of Public Works to table all the transcripts of objections to the expropriation of the Cora Brown and McDonald Subdivision and, if so, on what date?

2. Did the Minister accept any recommendations and, if not (a) for what reasons (b) were the people involved so informed?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): 1. No. The Hearing Officer's report was tabled April 2, 1973 and summarizes the objections. Therefore it is not considered necessary to table the transcript, which is quite voluminous and for which translation and tabling procedures would be costly and time-consuming. The transcript is available in the department and may be examined by arrangement.

2. No recommendations were made in the Hearing Officer's report and none is required by the Act, the duties of the Hearing Officer and the nature of his report were explained to the people who were present at the Public Hearing. The two main objections were: (a) That the municipally-owned boat launching site not be expropriated; (b) That extensive environmental studies be carried out before building a new runway. Both of these objections were satisfied. The boat launching site was not expropriated and a complete study of the effects of a new runway is being made.

MR. PAUL MASON

Question No. 1,867—Mr. Bawden:

1. Was a Minister's permit issued to enable Mr. Paul Mason to enter Canada?

2. Did Mr. Paul Mason enter Canada under such a permit?

3. If a permit was issued, what were the special circumstances that made it impossible or inconvenient for Mr. Mason to seek admission in the ordinary way?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. No. A Minister's Permit was, however, issued to allow Mr. Mason to remain in Canada.

2. No.

3. It is not in the public interest to divulge this information.

CBC AND NFB—PRODUCTION OF THIRD LANGUAGE FILMS

Question No. 1,909—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. How many films in non-official languages are presently in the (a) planning stage (b) production stage at the National Film Board?

2. How many are scheduled to be available for distribution in two years time?

3. To date, how many submissions regarding the making of films have been submitted to the National Film Board by ethno-cultural groups in Canada?

4. Has the National Film Board prepared any short films or feature films in languages other than French or English and (a) if not, does it intend to do so this year (b) if so (i) how were the ethnic groups concerned involved in this production (ii) were they consulted?

5. Will such films be shown with sub-titles in English and/or French and, if not, for what reasons?

6. To date, has any consideration been given by CBC to provide films and produce radio programs in languages other than English and French and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. (a) As part of the Multicultural Program, the National Film Board is producing original films about ethnic populations in both official languages only. English: 1 complete; 3 in production; 5 in planning stage; French: 1 in production; 1 in planning stage; In almost every case, members of the ethnic group involved play a key part in the planning and production. Liaison with Ethnic Associations is direct and also through the Citizens' Cultures Division, Secretary of State Department. (b) Foreign language version program: This is a long-time program at NFB in which films produced originally in the official languages are versioned into non-official languages. The titles are selected after consultation with the Department of External Affairs and intended for distribution abroad. However, under the multicultural program, the National Film Board recently conducted a survey in Canada to determine which ethno-cultural groups wish to have NFB films in their ancestral language and which subject areas were of interest to the various groups. Well over 1,000 ethnic associations and groups were contacted during this survey. As a result, prints of films already available in non-official languages will be put into distribution in Canada. In addition, as new films become available, versions will be made, on a selected basis, for use in Canada. Full scale distribution of this material should be in force in the autumn of 1973.

2. (a) Multicultural Program, English and French, 11, (b) Versions in non-official languages for use abroad and in Canada—approximately 60 plus prints of 100 films already versioned in the Foreign Version Program.

3. Approximately 10 or 12, most of them routed to NFB via the Secretary of State Department. All dealt with films about ethnic groups in both official languages.

4. As part of the on-going version program for distribution abroad, approximately 70 to 100 versions are prepared each year in approximately 20 major languages and 30 other languages. Additional prints will be ordered for use in Canada to meet the needs of the various ethnic groups.

5. As a rule no, because the original films will be available in English and/or French. Exceptions have been on a few films produced on Indians and Eskimos with their collaboration. Such films carry sub-titles in French, English and Indian (Cree) or French, English, Eskimo.

6. No, other than programs produced in other languages by Radio-Canada International for foreign consumption. Domestically, the Corporation's operations have been confined to English and French, plus a modest amount of native language broadcasting for the North. This policy is based on the CBC interpretation of the various Broadcasting Acts over the years. The Corporation believes its language policy is so firmly established and of such major importance that any contemplated change would require a clear indication to this end from Parliament. The current Broadcasting Act provides CBC with specific priorities and Corporate policies, energies and resources are devoted to the attainment of those objectives.

ALBERTA—CREAM SUBSIDY ELIGIBILITY QUOTA

Question No. 1,945—Mr. Mazankowski:

Is any action being taken to reinstate the 5,480,000 pounds of cream subsidy eligibility quota which was lost to the Province of Alberta, as requested in a submission to the Hon. E. Whelan by the Hon. Hugh Horner?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Subsidy quota was never allocated on a provincial basis. When the subsidy quota was originally allocated, it was allocated to producers on the basis of previous performance. Any reduction from the level originally allotted to producers in a province was brought about by: (a) producers discontinuing production and (b) producers delivering less than their subsidy quota.
