Among the applicants were two sisters, who wanted the applicants were two sisters, who wanted places in his company and in due time made their appearance before the New York public. They were engaged for the ballet, and have danced in this city, Boston, Philadelphia and other large cities, to the delight of the public and the satisfaction of their managers. They lived very quietly, made few acquaintances, and when off the stage were nearly always together. Their pay was increased by work at odd times on embroidery, in which they were very skillful, but their duties at the theater did not allow them much opportunity for this extra employment. Last week one of them received a letter announcing that by the death of a relative each was the happy possessor of ten thousand pounds sterling. As soon as the proper papers arrive they will bid farewell to the stage, and return to London to enjoy the fortune which has unexpectedly fallen to them.—[N. Y. Cor. Boston Times.

In December last there was just such a scene enacted in the Market-piace of Bolton, England. Still later, at Philadelphia, an audience at Forepaugh's circus was entertained in a similar way; but luckily the tamer by an extraordinary effort of will, coupled with a rare presence of mind, three whimself upon the floor of the den and remained as if dead until the manager was enabled to save his life. In the face of numerous experiences of this kind it is a matter for surprise that these disgusting exhibitions are not prevented by the authorities.
