TOLD ON A PULLMAN.

"Don't take it, did you say? Well, I'm glad I can say that I can take it or leave it alone, as I please." After that I had heard the very words and tone from poor Randal. Just about your age he must have been when he used to meet my expectations by that perennial boast of young men.
"What's the use of telling me about my uncle, Fred? I never touch it, except for the sake of a little jollity. I can take it, or leave it as I please!"
"But I'll not weary you by details of his youthful escapades. As I said, we believed him to have turned over a new leaf after his marriage in a distant State. He brought his wife home to us for a few weeks—a lovely, golden-haired young creature. Well! well! there's no use telling about that."
He had finally sworn off then, he said, and they were very happy. After that I knew nothing more of him than that he reported, in occasional letters, the growth of his family and his prosperity.

Selected Literature.

The sat letter which you have read came after a wide gap in our correspondence. I instantly determined to make time for a long visit to him, and wrote him to that effect. He responded joyfully, and in early summer I made the journey.
On arriving at the village I was surprised that he did not meet me. Inquiring where Randal's office was, the station-master told me that he would not probably be at his office that day; he was "a little out of sorts," the man had heard. I would find him at home; it wasn't far and the railway man gave me directions.
Following then I walked on through a pretty little town of comfortable houses and shady, sandy streets—a most peaceful place. Reaching the outskirts as indicated, I soon found a handsome house, with an extensive lawn in front, well kept, with flower beds and many evidences of care.
I had associated my brother's confession with the drunkenness seen in my eyes, and conceived of him as being miserably poor, hence I was a good deal relieved by the appearance of prosperity about his residence.

Selected Literature.

"Pooh! I said to myself, going up the gravel path, I had exaggerated his views. No doubt he had taken too much about Christmas time, and was suffering from a bad headache in consequence."
As I approached, it struck me as rather strange that no one was to be seen about the house. I observed that the garden was for back to a cedar wood or swamp, and from this wood I thought I heard faint shouts.
I ascended the verandah steps. Not a face appeared at the windows. As I rang the bell I heard a child crying within. With the faint jingle that came to the child again began his wail, but no one came. I rang again and again. With each sound of the bell the child's voice ceased, to rise again, as the tinkling died away. Much puzzled, I went around to the rear wing.
The kitchen door stood wide open, a bright fire was in the stove, there were dishes half washed and food in course of preparation, but no servants. Entering, I looked into three comfortable rooms, finding no person. In the fourth, a large sitting-room, a very little girl sat in the middle of the floor, surrounded by toys. I knew at once that she must be little Flora, my brother's youngest—his pet, being the youngest girl—a baby of something more than two years.
She looked up at me, round-eyed with wonder. "Is this little Flora?" I asked.
"I'm papa's little girl," she answered, very distinctly. Papa! papa! and she began to cry again.
Unwilling though she was, I took her in my arms and soon managed to soothe her by the ticking of my watch. Then I carried her through every room in the house without finding another soul.
Trying in vain to account for the desertion, I returned down stairs and to the kitchen. As I reached it, two small boys came in—little Randal and Fred. I knew them from photographs.
They stared at me with alarm. Both had been crying, I could see. When I told them I was Uncle Fred they came to me shyly.
And where are papa and mamma? I asked.
The little fellows hung their heads. "Papa is sick," said Randal, the elder, hesitatingly.
"But where is he?"
"He got up and ran out," said the poor little man, raising a chubby hand to his eyes.
"And where is mamma and all the rest?"
"Mamma didn't know papa had gone till he was near in the woods," he said, pointing to the rear of the garden, "and then she ran after him, and she called Kiddy and Jane and Thomas, and we ran after them, and they sent us home to take care of the baby. They can't find papa, and he's lost; so my little nephew explained through his sob."

Selected Literature.

Scarcely had he done speaking when a man appeared at the edge of the wood, and soon afterwards a group following him. Then he stopped, turned, and shook his fist at them.

"Go away! Lemme alone! Don't come near me! I recognized my brother's voice."
Those who followed seemed either to fear or to humor him, for they kept their distance. On he came tumbling over the fence into the garden. Then he picked himself up, reeled, staidied himself, lurched forward again, and sometimes running, but always keeping his feet, approached me.
"The boys, crying and shuddering, stood clucking me till he was two thirds of the way up the garden."
"Come, Freddy," said little Randal, with a sudden recollection, "we mustn't see papa when he's sick," and led the other in.

Selected Literature.

It was the most piteous child's voice—the most piteous thing—those two little lads, fond and ashamed of their own father!
He came on, not noticing me till within a few paces. He was unshod and only half clad, just as he had run out and in semi-delirium, and had staggered through mud and water.
At last he stopped, looking at me in evident recognition, trying to control his sobs; then, as if unconscious of any shame, came towards me.
"It's you, Fred. When'd you come? Why did you lemme know, Fred?"
"His hand closed like a vice on mine; his powerful strength—and he was a very large, powerful man—seemed to fly to his fingers; but his fingers trembled as he grasped mine."
"I could not speak. He looked stupidly into my face, with half-opened, blood-shot eyes, for a few moments; then, ignoring me as completely as if I had been always there, reached out his arms for Flora."
"Come to papa—that's papa's little girl!" At his husky, affectionate, distressing voice I strained the child closer, but she held out her arms to him, and staggering forward, he grasped her.
"Kissing and fondling little Florence, he entered the kitchen and cautiously ascended the steps leading to the hall. I kept my hand on my arm, and of this support he seemed wholly unconscious. It was plain that his debauch had been a long one, for his hair was neglected, his beard a week's growth."
"My brother fell into a chair, still fondling his little daughter, and I looked dumbly around. I seemed no more to him than any senseless object in the room. To me, this solemn, silent man was as I had never known, so changed was his from the bright, alert face of which yours has reminded me."
The young traveller shifted uneasily, and the tale again went on.
"Soon I heard voices, and left the room to meet my brother's wife. Poor Lucy! I was ashamed to meet her, ashamed that she should know that I had been here; I wished that I could have escaped unobserved. Little did I know how far past the pangs of vain efforts to conceal her husband's vice the poor girl had got!"
"She came silently to me, unsurprised—she to be surprised by anything in life. Her fair hair, that I remembered as seeming bluish about her flower-like face, was smooth and lank each side of her forehead. She was very pale, and oh, how old she looked! Her eyes were like tragedy to black-eyed women—I could not have believed that such staid misery could ever look forth from eyes of blue."
"She did not weep, she did not speak. Holding my hand, she only looked at me with those hopeless eyes."
"Seeing us, the servant who had entered went back and closed the door. Then the little boys stole softly down, hand in hand, averting their looks of shame from the room where their father sat, and, standing by their mother, covered their faces in her skirts."
"Not a word was uttered in the group, and the hall clock above us ticked and ticked its strokes of doom."
"We could hear the unconscious baby crying, and my brother's affectionate mumbling to her."
"Papa's little girl—papa's dear little baby girl."
"Sir, I don't think I can tell you the rest," said the narrator, dabbing his hand across his eyes. The young traveller sat silently with downcast looks.
"Well, we stood for some little time, listening. Then my brother said, coaxingly, 'Papa'll leave ill dear girl down, 'n go'n see ill girl's Uncle Fred.' At the same time he rose, and we entered."
"Let me take the baby, Randal," said Lucy, very gently.
"Go away, Lucy dear! Musn't interfere with baby," he expostulated with drunkenness not unkind gravity.
"But you want to go 'pstairs, don't you, Randal dear?"
"Yes, I want to go 'pstairs. Go'n set baby down first 'n give her toys. You oughtn't to take baby, Lucy; she's too heavy—must take care not hurt yourself, Lucy!"
"The survival of his affection through his degradation was, somehow, more heart-breaking than violence from him."

Selected Literature.

"I did not think he could set the child down, but refusing to be assisted in the least, he stooped very carefully, though swaying a little, and placed her again among her playthings on the floor. For a few moments he stood leaning, smiling down on her drunkenly, fumbling his fingers without sound in attempting to snap them for her amusement. The child looked up into his face, and held out her arms."
"Baby want to kiss papa," he said in a gratified tone, and stooping lower. And then, before either of us could reach him, he fell forward—full length, his whole weight crushing little Florry down."
"She cried out, and seemed to smother. The next instant he had rolled aside, and there the little, lovely child lay bleeding at the mouth!"
"The poor mother, with a sigh, lifted her baby to her heart. It sighed, lifted—and lay still. Randal, by my aid, had reached his feet. The struggling fear, hope and horror of his face I shall never forget!"
"Baby! he said, stooping down. 'Baby, look at papa. Baby—just once—look at papa. O my God! Lucy, have I killed my little baby girl?'
"Even so it was, for little Florry never held out her arms to him again. The mother—but I need not describe the anguish of that household. We hardly knew when my brother recovered from the insanity of liquor, for it was followed by the delirium of brain fever. There he lay for a fortnight talking constantly of Florry, and when consciousness returned still lay there, exhausted, silent, a mere wreck, often crying dumbly. Two months elapsed before he left his room."
"He could never look at the liquor again?" questioned the young traveller.
"Sir, he questioned he never would," cried the older man, "swore it, as his letter says, by all that was good and holy. And even between his protests, he said to me, 'I can't keep from it, Fred, I can't—it's too strong for me.' I could not believe that he judged truly of his weakness, but he knew it two well—it was no longer for him to take it or leave it alone!"
"One day, when we believed him safe at his office, he entered the house, looking, I thought, remarkably well. But when Lucy saw his face, she sprang up with a bitter trembling cry. He stood, as if listening at the door of the room, looking in."
"Lucy, where's little Florry? I want to take her out with me," he said in a perfectly natural voice.
"Through quite steady on his legs, and with perfect control of his utterance, he had drunk himself into absolute forgetfulness!"
And from that day out he could not be restrained. He would have liquor. Again and again he escaped from the room in which we tried to confine him. His cunning and agility were preternatural. The demon that he had dared to trifle with never left him afterward, and, at last, searching for him after an escape in the night, we found him half-naked, face down, quite dead, in a ditch.

Selected Literature.

"Oh, horrible! sir, most horrible," said the young traveller.
"And now I ask you whether I can credit any man who says of liquor that he can take it or leave it alone! The most hopeless lot you may know began with that belief. You hold it firmly, and I wish I could have a clearer vision of what your face will be in ten years!"
The young traveller took from his pocket the flask which had led to the story, and poured its A 1 contents into the wash basin of that Pullman car. That was nearly eleven years ago, and when he told me this story or its substance, yesterday, it came from the firm lips of a prosperous man, saved from temptation.

A STORY ABOUT STEAM.
The story of some hot water is one of the most wonderful of stories. About two hundred years ago, a man, bearing the title of the Marquis of Worcester, was sitting, on a cold night, in a small, mean room, before a blazing fire. This was in Ireland, and the man was a prisoner. A kettle of boiling water was on the fire, and he was watching the steam, as it lifted the lid of the kettle and rushed out of the nose.
He thought of the power of the steam, and wondered what would be the effect if he were to fasten down the lid and stop up the nose. He concluded that the effect would be to burst the kettle. "How much power, then," thought he, "there must be in steam!" As soon as he was let out of prison he tried an experiment. "I have taken," he writes, "a cannon and filled it three-quarters full of water, stopping firmly up both the touch-hole and the mouth; and having made a good fire under it, within twenty-four hours it burst, and made a great crack." After this, the Marquis contrived a rude machine, which, by the power of steam, drove up water to the height of forty feet. About one hundred years after this, a little boy, whose name was James Watt, and who lived in Scotland, sat one day looking at a kettle of boiling water, and holding a spoon before the steam that rushed out of the nose. His aunt thought he was idle, and said, "It is not a shame for you to waste your time so!"

But James was not idle; he was thinking of the power of the steam in moving the spoon. James grew to be a good and great man, and contrived those wonderful improvements in the steam-engine which have made it so useful in our day. What will not the steam-engine do! If it could speak, it might say:
"I blow the bellows, I forge the steel, I manage the mill and the mint; I hammer the ore, and turn the wheel, And the news that you read I print."
In the year 1807, Robert Fulton put the first steamboat on the Hudson river, and in 1814 a locomotive steam-engine went over a railway between Wallend and Killingworth in England. And this is the story of some hot water! From so small a beginning as the steam of a tea-kettle resulted the steam-engine, the steamboat, and the locomotive engine by which the trains of carriages are moved with such speed on our railways to-day.
Learn what the power of thought will do. How many men had looked at kettles of boiling water, but how few thought of the force of the steam, and the good uses to which it might be turned.—Youth.

Temperance.
THE LUMP ON HIS SIDE.
A man long noted for his intemperate habits, was induced by Rev. John Abbott to sign the pledge "in his own way," which he did in these words: "I pledge myself to drink no more intoxicating drinks for one year." Few believed he could keep it, but near the end of the year he again appeared at a temperance meeting, without having once touched a drop. "Are you not going to sign again?" asked Mr. Abbott. "Yes," replied the man; "I can do it in my own way," and accordingly he wrote: "I sign this pledge for nine hundred and ninety-nine years, and if I live to that time, I intend to take out a life lease." A few days afterwards he called upon the tavern-keeper, who welcomed him back to his old haunts.
"Oh! lauderd," said he, as if in pain, "I have such a lump on my side."
"That's because you've stopped drinking," said the landlord, "you won't live long if you keep on."
"Will drink take the lump away?"
"Yes; and if you don't drink you'll soon have a lump on the other side.—Come, let us drink together," and he poured out two glasses of whiskey.
"I guess I won't drink," said the former inebriate, "especially if keeping the pledge will bring another lump, for it isn't very hard to bear another; and with this he drew the lump, a roll of greenbacks from his side pocket, and walked off leaving the landlord to his sad reflection.

Selected Literature.

The Churches are making themselves heard with no uncertain sound on the suppression of the drink traffic. A few fashionable preachers who condone the use and sale of drink find their voices drowned amid the general demand for clear declarations of hostility. The Methodist Church has with practical unanimity declared its purpose "by the pulpit, by the press and by all legitimate means to inculcate the responsibility of all Christian men and good citizens to subordinate political party alliances to the great work of securing the abolition of the accursed liquor traffic." The Presbyterian General Assembly at Halifax has, by a majority of a hundred and forty-nine to ten, declared "that total prohibition is the most effective form of temperance legislation," and "urges on all members of the church to use all legitimate means to secure such legislation." The Synod of this diocese seems inclined to take a step forward on this subject, and the smaller religious bodies are certainly not behind the foremost of these great ones. Those who so express themselves are in direct contact with the conscience of the people. Among the masses of the people, and in this they differ from the luxurious classes, no glamor surrounds the wine cup. It has no social status. The minister who denounces it has no quarrel with his social surroundings. The sting of the liquor curse has no gilded covering, nor are its dire effects hidden by curtains and cushions. In these declarations we have the cry of all that is religious and moral and manly in the land. The next thing is for the spirit that has declared itself in the churches to come into action at the polls, and to require of both parties prohibition candidates, and the promise of prohibition measures and a prohibition law.—Montreal Witness.

Selected Literature.

The prohibition vote has been steadily gaining in different parts of the United States. In Connecticut, it was 2,906 in 1884 and 4,810 in 1886, while there was a similar though smaller gain in Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont. In New Jersey the vote has gone up in two years from 6,153 to 10,579. In Michigan it has risen from 10,000 to 35,000, in Indiana from 3,000 to 9,000 in Ohio from 11,000 to 31,000, and in Illinois from 12,000 to 20,000. These figures are significant facts.

REV. G. M. CAMPBELL ON TEMPERANCE.

Rev. G. M. Campbell, the Grand Worthy Patriarch of the Sons of Temperance, paid Intercolonial Division an official visit last evening. As the reverend gentleman is to be stationed here, his views on the temperance question may be interesting. He is out and out for prohibition, and gave the three following reasons for its adoption:

1st. The temperance party has been fighting long, and with little avail to cut off the branches of the drink tree. He believed that this should be stopped, and that the branches should be unmoored, and all attention to the root, as with the uprooting of the tree the branches and all must come down.

2nd. Where the Scott Act has been enforced, it has been proven to prohibit the drink traffic. He had been residing in St. Stephen for the past three years, and on the Miramichi that town there had been 33 taverns; they had enforced the act, and six weeks ago he did not know of one place where liquor was sold. The Scott Act has been an educator for prohibition and has shown that a prohibitory law for the whole Dominion would be a success.

3rd. The time is now upon us, and we are living in a day when something decisive must be done. The disaffection that has existed in the country where the Scott Act has been repealed has clearly shown that half-way measures will accomplish but little. The Scott Act has prepared the people for prohibition and with earnest and determined purpose it must surely come, and with it the demolition of the last clamp of the liquor business.—Moncton Times, June 30.

NEWS FROM EVERYWHERE.

LONDON, June 26.—The town of Sunderland on the Gulf of Bothnia, the centre of the timber trade of Sweden, has been almost destroyed by fire.

A singular fatality is reported from the oyster beds at the mouth of the Seabone river near Shelburne. While reaching for oysters, a boy named Oliver Richard dislodged a stick of timber from a bridge, which in falling struck him and pinned him against another log. He died shortly after being rescued.

The recent death of Dr. Warren S. Stokes, M. D., a noted Boston physician, from blood poisoning through vaccination, has created a stir in society as well as in the medical fraternity, and it is even intimated that the bill abolishing compulsory vaccination may be passed as an expression of public opinion on his death.

A law has recently gone into force in New York which requires all coal dealers to procure a license or have in their employment a licensed weigher, who shall give a certificate of the weight of every ton or part of a ton of coal purchased. The penalty to the weigher for light or heavy is a fine of not more than $100 and imprisonment for thirty days.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., June 29.—Wendell Whitcomb was at his barn killing rats with a shotgun last night. He fired a charge at one of the vermin, but it charged west wide of the mark towards the porch of his house where his two young daughters were sitting. The shot struck both, killing one and fatally wounding the other.

The Salvation Army recently learned that they had distributed a service in St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church, so they sent a note to the Rev. Father Dowd, stating that hereafter they would be especially careful not to play near the church. The reverend gentleman sent a most cordial reply in reply, thanking them for their consideration and courtesy.—Montreal Witness.

The new Year Book of the Young Men's Christian Association gives the number of associations throughout the world as 3,804, of which 1,240 are in the United States and Canada. The American associations own real estate to the value of $6,708,230, an increase of nearly $1,100,000 during the previous year. The association was never so strong and prosperous as it is now.—New York Tribune.

In Cambridge, Maryland, where the liquor shops were abolished several years ago, a drunken man was arrested the other Sunday, but the person who had the keys of the jail could not be found, and consequently the prisoner was allowed to go. If prohibition can not wholly prevent drunkenness, it may yet be so effective that drunkenness is an event for which the community is unprepared.

BERLIN, June 28.—It is stated that the Emperor has sent a lengthy letter to the Emperor William expressing thorough friendship for Germany, and sorry for the loss sustained in the death of the Emperor Frederick. General Pepe will carry to the Emperor the Emperor William's reply written in Russia, in which the Emperor promises to follow his grandfather's advice respecting friendship with Russia.

The Queen's attention is to be drawn to the fact that the woman who made the lining for the superb carriage in which her majesty rode on Jubilee day last year is on the verge of starvation. The poor creature is a cripple, bent almost double and has worked and lived in the same room for 30 years. The lining was exquisite work, but the woman was paid only 2 1/2 p. per yard, and by working from dawn till midnight she was able to make just six yards.

He receiving 4,547 votes against 2,899 cast for his opponent, Knatchbull Higginson, Gladstonian.

At the annual meeting of his Homes, held in Exeter Hall under the presidency of Lord Methu, Dr. Barnardo reported on 34 institutions under his care, of which 19 are for the maintenance and training of destitute and orphan children, while the remainder are either devoted to mission work or the training of children.
