House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, March 14, 1946.

SECOND SESSION—TWENTIETH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the eighteenth day of December, 1945, met this day at Ottawa, for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker, The Honourable Gaspard Fauteux, in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Charles H. Larose, Esquire, Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house having returned to the Commons chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is just over six months since Canada emerged from six long years of war. The turmoil which has followed in the wake of war has created new problems for governments in all parts of the globe. The world is full of unrest. Hunger, privation and suffering, have become the lot of millions. Other millions are homeless, many of them in exile. The problems which face the statesmen of every nation are formidable indeed.

It is only in the light of the world situation that all our problems can be seen in true perspective. The future of our own and of every country depends upon success in the task of world reconstruction, and the establishment of an enduring peace. Many of the measures you will be called upon to consider at the present session will be concerned with this wider aspect of human affairs.

Of world problems demanding immediate action, the most pressing is the provision of food to those peoples facing acute shortage, and, in some regions, widespread famine. The chance of a peaceful reconstruction of the world depends on food. The shortage at the present time is very great. The problem, moreover, is not only for the next few months, but also for the next few years. Unless the need is met, grave disorders, endangering peace itself, must be anticipated.

The government is seeking by all practicable means to make available for export the maximum supply of foodstuffs. Every encouragement is being given to increasing production. The gravity of the situation demands, on the part of the people of Canada, a united and wholehearted effort.

The maintenance of a high level of employment and national income is a fundamental aim of government policy. Employment and income alike are bound up with the restoration and expansion of world trade. To the productive employment of vast numbers of Canadians, export markets are essential.

The government has steadily pursued its efforts to restore former markets, to secure new markets and generally to expand peace-time exports. In pursuit of this policy, export credits, for which additional provision was made at the last session, have been extended to several of our war-time allies.

At this session you will be asked to approve an agreement, recently concluded, for a loan to the United Kingdom which will help maintain the British market for Canadian food products and other exports. The agreement will also contribute to the steady development of trade between the two countries, the removal of trade barriers and the free use of currencies for international trade.

While Canada, in common with all countries, continues to experience dislocations inevitable in a period of transition from war to peace, in no other country has the transition proceeded more speedily or with less friction.

Conversion of war industries to civilian production is progressing steadily, with a minimum of industrial strife, and increased cooperation between labour and management.

REVISED EDITION

War-time restrictions and controls are being removed as rapidly as conditions will permit. Price ceilings on many articles have been suspended. Wage and salary controls have been relaxed. Certain subsidies have been discontinued. Only such controls are being continued as are deemed necessary to prevent inflation and to safeguard the public welfare.

Except for the forces still employed in connection with the occupation of Germany, practically all of our armed forces are now home. Demobilization of both men and women is taking place rapidly. Every effort is being made to ensure the orderly reestablishment of veterans in civil life.

To complete consideration of the "Veterans Charter" you will be asked to reconstitute the special committee on veterans affairs.

You will also be asked to make provision for the permanent armed forces, to the composition of which much consideration has been given.

In our own as in other countries the demand for housing continues greatly to exceed the supply. Despite shortages of materials and labour, a very large number of houses have been constructed since V-E day. Special efforts are being made to expand the supply of building materials to meet the demand for permanent housing, and, meanwhile, to provide emergency shelter. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been established. Its activities are being closely coordinated with those of War-time Housing Limited and the Veterans Land Act administration, with a view to having all matters relating to the construction of housing brought, as largely as possible, under the administration of one minister of the crown.

You will be asked to make provision for the redistribution of representation in the House of Commons.

Among other measures to which your attention will be invited will be bills to revise and clarify the definition of Canadian citizenship, and to bring the legislation respecting national status, naturalization and immigration into conformity with the definition of citizenship; bills to place in statutory form a number of orders in council to which it is desired to give permanent legislative effect; also a number of amendments to existing statutes.

Since the close of the last session, the initial meeting of the general assemply of the united nations has been held in London. The assembly will conclude its first session in New York in September. The security council, the economic and social council, the commission on atomic energy, and the international court of justice have been established. Our country was represented at the general assembly by a delegation including ministers of the crown, other members of parliament, and leading officials of the public service. Canada was elected to the economic and social council and to the commission on atomic energy. A distinguished Canadian was elected a judge of the international court.

It is the policy of my ministers to see that the utmost support is given by Canada to the united nations organization.

The problems of peace-making are exacting and arduous.

Germany and Japan continue to be under allied military control. Early in the year, a Canadian mission was established in Berlin to safeguard Canadian interests in Germany. Canada's interests in Japan are being watched through Canadian membership on the far eastern commission, which recently visited Tokyo. The commission has its headquarters in Washington.

Time will be required for the drafting of the treaties of peace. A conference is to be held in Paris later in the year to consider proposed treaties with Italy, Finland, Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria. Canada will be represented at this conference.

A meeting of the coordinating committee of the dominion-provincial conference was held in January. Progress was made in the consideration of proposals submitted by the dominion and provincial governments. The committee will meet again on April 25.

As a result of the conference, there may be further legislative proposals.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make financial provision for all essential services, and for credits required to maintain export trade and a high level of employment and national income.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

My term of office is now almost at an end. You have already been informed of the appointment of Field Marshal Viscount Alexander of Tunis as my successor. Lord Alexander will arrive in Canada early in April. As this is the last occasion on which I shall have the honour to address you, may I be allowed to strike a personal note.

In 1914, I was unable to succeed His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught in the position of governor general, for the simple reason that I was at that time a serving soldier. The disappointment I had sustained was, however, more than compensated for by my reappointment in 1940, strange to say, during another world war. It was for me a great honour to have been chosen. The intimate association with my prime minister, ministers, parliament and the people of this great country has brought you all very close to the hearts of Princess Alice and myself.

The years we have been in Canada have been the most eventful years in world history. It has been with profound admiration that we have witnessed the great part Canada has had in the preservation of world freedom, in the relief of suffering peoples, and in helping to lay the foundations of a new world order.

Princess Alice and I will ever recall that in these momentous years it has been our proud privilege to share in your anxieties and rejoicings. Throughout our lives we shall cherish an abiding affection for Canada and her people.

May Divine Providence continue to bless this nation, and to guide the parliament of Canada in all its deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, government notices of motions and government orders, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved :

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Mackenzie, Chevrier, Casselman, Johnston and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable Ian Mackenzie, Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Right Honourable J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. A. MacKinnon, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Right Honourable L. S. St. Laurent, Minister of Justice, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled: An Act respecting the House of Commons.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

DOCUMENTS RELATING TO PROCEEDINGS OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): No doubt the house will wish to have as early as possible the documents relating to the proceedings of the royal commission established by order in council P.C. 411 of February 5, 1946. For the convenience of hon. members I have arranged to have these documents printed in advance of an order by the house, but I assume that the house will be agreeable to ordering copies once the documents have been tabled. The documents included in the booklet I have in my hand contain the statement which was made by myself on February 15, 1946, with reference to the appointment of the commission to investigate alleged violations of the Official Secrets Act; text of order in council P.C. 411 of February 5, 1946, establishing the royal commission; letter of the commission counsel to the Minister of Justice of February 23, 1946; text of order in council P.C. 6444 of October 6, 1945; and the first interim report of the royal commission to His Excellency the Governor General in council, of March 2, 1946.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the Prime Minister intend to make a statement to the house on this situation within the next few days?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had expected the house would be anxious to have a statement at as early a date as possible. I shall be speaking on the address on Monday next and will avail myself of that occasion to make a statement to the house.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to take this opportunity of complimenting the Prime Minister on having arranged to let us have these documents. I believe he mentioned first the documents having to do with the loan to Britain. I was about to ask as a matter of fact that copies of the agreement be made available to us. I am satisfied with the provision which the Prime Minister has made. We are glad to have as well copies of the documents in connection with the espionage matter.

I had planned also to ask the Prime Minister a question with respect to that. Perhaps I might ask it now; he has partly answered it by intimating that he would have something to say about it when he comes to speak on Monday. My question is this, and I ask it because of a feeling of unrest and criticism which is abroad through lack of understanding of the procedure followed by the government in this case. My question was this—perhaps the Prime Minister will take it into account and deal with it when he comes to speak on Monday, if not before:

In view of the extraordinary procedure followed by the government in holding certain Canadians incommunicado in connection with this matter, will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice take an early occasion to clarify if possible their justification of this procedure?

Everyone in Canada will want to support the government in trying to stamp out espionage in this country, but some of us find it difficult to explain, let alone to justify, the extraordinary character of the procedure followed.

I would like the Prime Minister to take that into consideration. I trust he will see the wisdom of making a clear explanation because a great many thoughtful and honourable people in Canada find it difficult to understand why that particular type of procedure has been followed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the request which has just been made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) is one which I anticipated he would make, and I share with him the feeling that it is desirable that the country should be given the fullest explanation of the reasons which have caused the commission to detain a certain number of persons before making their final report. I understand, in fact I know, that the commission has made a second interim report to His Excellency the Governor General. That report has been made to-day, and I hope to be in a position to table it to-morrow. The house will then have before it two reports from the commission before this matter is discussed by the house generally.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To-morrow it is intended to table further reports, departmental reports and other returns, and, if the house is agreeable, we shall proceed with the debate on the address, the mover and seconder speaking, and then have the debate adjourned until Monday, when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition will follow.

We have just heard from His Excellency the Governor General that he will be taking his departure almost immediately, on Saturday in fact, and I have felt that hon. members of both houses of parliament would wish to give some expression of appreciation of the services which His Excellency has rendered Canada in such a splendid way during the time that he has been His Majesty's representative in this country. I purpose therefore to-morrow, if it meets with the approval of the house, at the beginning of our sitting to introduce a motion in the nature of a farewell address to His Excellency, which I know my friend the leader of the opposition will be pleased to second, and which hon. members will be free to speak to if they so desire.

There is nothing further to announce. I would therefore move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.35 p.m.

Friday, March 15, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

ARREST OF MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT—SECOND INTERIM REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the business of the house I wish to rise to a question affecting the privileges of this parliament. I do not intend to discuss their historic background, or to refer to the usages of the British parliament or the statutes of this parliament by which they are established. They will be found sufficiently outlined in the introduction to Beauchesne's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms", third edition, 1943, part of which I will quote:

Several acts suspending for a time the Habeas Corpus Act have been passed in Great Britain with the special provision that no member of parliament shall be imprisoned during the sitting of parliament until the matter in which he stands suspected shall be first communicated to the house and the consent of the house obtained for his commitment, or if parliament be not sitting, then immediately after it reassembles in like manner as if he were arrested on a criminal charge. This is the general rule. The house is usually apprised of the cause of commitment of a member after his arrest and whenever he is in custody, in order to be tried by naval, military, air or courts-martial, or after he has been committed for any criminal offence by a court or a magistrate.

The newspapers report today that Mr. Rose, representative in this House of Commons of the division of Cartier-Montreal in the province of Quebec, has been taken into custody by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This house has no knowledge of the charge or charges against him. If the suspected offence is indictable under our criminal law, either under the criminal code or by a special statute, then I submit that this house should be informed now of the nature of the charge, in conformity with the established usage.

If the newspapers are correct in stating that the action arises out of a disclosure of secret information laid before parliament, during the war, the offence would appear to be a breach of the privileges of this house and should be a subject of inquiry by the appropriate committee. I am confident that no member of this house, certainly not I or any member of our party, would condone improper or illegal action by any other member. But the privileges of this parliament must be safeguarded no matter who may be involved.

In my opinion the house should require a satisfactory statement from the government now, and I therefore raise the question so that we may receive it today.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before coming into the house I received word from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) that he intended to ask a question which I believe would be very similar to the one which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Coldwell) has just put to me. Naturally I anticipated that a question of the kind would be immediately raised when the house met this afternoon, and therefore I shall proceed at once to make a brief statement—not the statement to which I referred yesterday, but a statement which I hope will help to explain the circumstances attending the absence of an hon. member from his accustomed place in the house.

Perhaps I might be permitted to proceed by first of all tabling the second interim report of the royal commission that has been appointed to investigate the unauthorized disclosure of secret confidential information. I have now copies of that report in printed form, in both English and French, and I should like to table them immediately so that they will be before the house at this time.

In the statement which I made on February 15 in reference to the investigation by the royal commission, I said it was the intention of the government that prosecutions should be instituted in cases in which the evidence warranted it. I have been advised by the Attorney General of Canada that charges have been laid against the four men named in the second interim report of the commission, namely, Doctor Raymond Boyer, Harold Samuel Gerson, Squadron Leader Matt Simons Nightingale, and Doctor David Shugar.

The charge against Doctor Boyer alleges conspiracy with an intermediary, who was not named in the commission's report because he had not been examined by the commission. The intermediary referred to in the report by the cover name Debouz is believed to be the hon. member for Cartier, Montreal. I am further advised by the Attorney General of Canada, who has taken the advice of counsel whose opinions I wish to lay on the table of the house, that effective prosecution of the charge against Doctor Boyer requires similar action in respect of the hon. member for Cartier, against whom an appropriate information has been laid and a warrant for his arrest executed.

In accordance with parliamentary practice, I have taken this first opportunity of communicating to the House of Commons the reason why the hon. member for Cartier is prevented from taking his seat in the house. I may say that I had intended to make this statement before being asked any question. I intimated yesterday that I would table today the second interim report and the proceedings that have arisen therefrom.

Perhaps I should now read the letter to which I have just referred, namely, that from counsel consulted by the Attorney General of Canada with reference to the question of the possible arrest of an hon. member of this house.

I have in my hand a letter signed by the counsel for the commission, E. K. Williams, Gerald Fauteux, and D. W. Mundell, addressed to the Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, K.C., Minister of Justice, Ottawa. It is dated March 14, which was yesterday. This letter must help to answer in part at least the question that has just been addressed to me:

Ottawa, 14th March, 1946.

The Honourable L. S. St. Laurent, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Minister,—

When we reported to you the gist of the evidence developed against Doctor Raymond Boyer and the fact that it seemed to implicate a member of parliament you asked us to consider the two following questions:

(a) Whether a federal member of parliament who would have committed a crime under the Official Secrets Act can be arrested either during the coming session of parliament or within the few days which remain before its opening on the 14th instant?

(b) Whether taking into account the whole of the circumstances surrounding this investigation it would be advisable or inadvisable to obtain the issue of a warrant of arrest against this member at the same time as that to be issued against the individual who divulged to this member certain important war secrets for the benefit of a foreign power?

Our answers to these questions are:

(a) Yes.

(b) It would not only be advisable but the interest of justice would not be served and the other trial would be prejudiced if a warrant were not issued against the member at the same time as that issued against the individual.

Our duties before the royal commission made it impossible to consider this question as thoroughly as we should have liked to do and we requested Hon. F. P. Brais, K.C., counsel appointed by you to prosecute the other individual, to assist us with his opinion.

We have now received it and it confirms the views we held in this matter and sets out the authorities upon which the opinion is based. We are enclosing it with this letter as we entirely concur in it.

Each of us will be available for further discussion if deemed necessary.

Yours very truly,

E. K. Williams,
Gerald Fauteux,
D. W. Mundell,
Counsel for the Commission.

I have attached to this letter the legal opinion given by Mr. Philippe Brais, K.C. Perhaps I need not read it at the moment. I should like however to table it, and have it printed and appear with the other documents, with the interim report and the communication from the commission's counsel.

Mr. COLDWELL: Even if the Prime Minister does not read that important opinion, I think it should appear in Hansard with the general discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had better read it:

Secret and Confidential

Dear Sirs:

You have asked my opinion whether:

(a) A federal member of parliament who would have committed a crime under the Official Secrets Act can be arrested either during the coming session of parliament or within the few days which remains before its opening on the 14th instant?

(b) If question (a) is answered in the affirmative, whether it would be advisable or inadvisable to obtain the issue of a warrant of arrest against this member at the same time as that to be issued against the individual who divulged to this member certain important war secrets for the benefit of a foreign power:

(a) I have not been informed of any of the activities of the member in question save what appears from the deposition of the individual whose arrest we discussed over the week-end.

That statement does clearly show that the member obtained important information and declared that it was for the use of a foreign power.

It would appear clearly, therefore, that a charge could be laid against the member under section 3 C and probably 4(1) A and B, 4(2), 4(3), of the Official Secrets Act.

No specific penalty is provided in the act for the commission of the above offences and the offender would therefore be subject to section 14 which declares them to be indictable.

Chapter 147, R.S.C., "An Act Respecting the Senate and House of Commons," sections 4 and 5 provide:

> "4. The Senate and the House of Commons respectively, and the members thereof respectively, shall hold, enjoy and exercise,
> (a) such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as, at the time of the passing of the British North America Act 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and by the members thereof, so far as the same are consistent with and not repugnant to the said Act; and
> (b) such privileges, immunities and powers as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, not exceeding those at the time of the passing of such act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom and by the members thereof respectively, R.S.C., 10, s.4.
> 5. Such privileges, immunities and powers shall be part of the general and public law of Canada and it shall not be necessary to plead the same, but the same shall, in all courts of Canada, and by and before all judges, be taken notice of judicially. R.S., c. 10, s.5."

Bourinot's "Parliamentary Procedure", third edition, page 143, chapter 2, under the heading "Privileges and Powers of Parliament," discusses "the privileges, immunities and powers" to be enjoyed by members. After discussing the origin of privileges, he declares that it is a general principle of English parliamentary law that . . . "the privilege has been always held to protect members from arrest and imprisonment under civil processes, whether the suit be at the action of an individual or of the public; but it is not claimable for treason, felony, breach of peace or 'any indictable offense'."

Bourinot further states that a member may be committed for contempt of court when it is of a quasi-criminal nature, "and the English house has not of recent years deemed it expedient to interfere in cases of an open or gross character."

The right of courts to enquire into the question of privilege is discussed by Bourinot at page 147 as follows:

> "As parliamentary privileges rest on statutory as well as customary law it follows that they can be inquired into and determined by courts of law like any other rights. In the words of an authority: 'It seems now to be clearly settled that the courts will not be deterred from upholding private rights by the fact that questions of parliamentary privilege are involved in their maintenance; and that, except as regards the internal regulation of its proceedings by the house, courts of law will not hesitate to inquire into alleged privileges, as they would into local custom, and determine its extent and application'."

It would appear clear that a member who has committed an indictable offence is therefore liable to arrest at any time and any place except on the floor of the house when it is sitting.

(b) Would it be advisable or inadvisable to charge the member at the same time as the individual from whom the information was obtained.

The failure to charge the member at the same time would appear highly inadvisable. The origin of the trouble, the cause of the temptation and downfall of the individual in question arises entirely and exclusively from the actions of the member. The failure to charge the latter at the same time and bring him before the courts if possible would inevitably give rise to a reaction which in my opinion would be entirely prejudicial to the proper disposal of the complaint.

Obviously at the present time and in so far as my information goes, the only evidence against the member would be the testimony of the individual who gave him information. The member might see fit to offer his own testimony and deny the whole story. The court might then have to decide between the credibility of a witness and an accused. The fact, however, that the witness has incriminated himself by the story and is himself separately charged should, in my opinion, lead any judge to conclude that the version cannot be untrue, the more so in that there is nothing to indicate any unfriendliness whatsoever between the two persons.

Obviously they would have to be separately charged. There should be in my opinion, added a count of conspiracy referring to the substantive offences themselves.

I have not before me all the information arising out of the cases and it is quite possible that certain facts may lead one to another conclusion, but relying for the moment solely on the deposition which I now have, I feel quite definitely that the non-arrest of the member would not only be prejudicial to the other case but to the interest of justice in general.

Yours very truly,
F. P. Brais.

I should like now to table copies of both the communications I have read.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think the Prime Minister gave the date of that opinion.

Mr MACKENZIE KING: The first was, Ottawa, 14th March, 1946; the one from Mr. Brais, which I have just read, Montreal, March 12th, 1946. The letter from Mr. Brais, it will be noticed, is in reply to the communication from the commission's counsel. That is how it came to be written before their letter to the Minister of Justice.

While I am dealing with this matter I might perhaps answer, from the report of the commission which I have just tabled, the question which is very much in the minds of us all—I can assure hon. members, in the mind of no one more than my own, namely, why it is that certain individuals should have been detained for the length of time that some individuals have been detained in connection with this inquiry. The commissioners themselves have doubtless seen that the public, as well as parliament, wished to be informed on this matter. I shall read the concluding paragraph of the second interim report which I have tabled. It is as follows: I quote from page 20:

> In conclusion we may add that we regret not having been able to complete as yet the hearing of evidence with regard to the five other persons who are detained under the provisions of P.C. 6444 passed on October 6, 1945, but we hope that we will be able to do so shortly. On February 14 last we concurred in the advice given by counsel for the commission to the Honourable the Minister of Justice that certain named persons should be detained, and we did so because of the serious nature of the disclosures then indicated by the evidence we had heard, and the fact that cover names of persons who had not been identified appeared in the evidence which indicated that the ramifications of the disloyal practices and the persons engaged therein might be even greater than then appeared and might well be continuing. In effect the matters with which the inquiry was concerned appeared to us to be of so serious a nature from the national standpoint that we believed the course advised by counsel should be pursued in the exceptional circumstances existing. The further evidence which we have heard has not caused us to change this view but, on the contrary, has confirmed it.
> In a case of this nature where the evidence has revealed the existence of an organization constituting at least a threat to the safety and interests of the state, as evidenced by the fact that some witnesses holding strategic positions have made the significant statement under oath that they had a loyalty which took priority over the loyalty owed by them to their own country, and for that reason they acted as they did, and would unquestionably have continued so to act had they not been detected, we are of opinion that should these persons be allowed communication with outsiders or between themselves until their activities have been fully investigated, some of the basic purposes of this inquiry would be entirely defeated.
> Respectfully submitted,
> Robert Taschereau,
> Royal Commissioner
> R. L. Kellock,
> Royal Commissioner.

There is a further point which I might clear up, and that is the impression that those who still remain to be interrogated feel that as no charge has been made against them they should not for that reason be detained. May I make it clear that those who are being detained by the commission are being detained for purposes of interrogation, for the purpose of getting their evidence under the section of the Inquiries Act which authorizes the commission to take that course. There is no charge against them at the moment. The purpose of the interrogation is to see whether or not, in the light of all that is known, a charge should be laid. When the commissioners come to the conclusion that a charge should be laid against anyone who has been interrogated, they bring before them the persons being interrogated and so inform them and ask them if they wish to retain counsel and if there is anything further they would like to say to the commission before the commission expresses the view that a warrant ought to be issued for their being taken into custody. All of those who have thus far been taken into custody have had that opportunity before the commission. Those against whom charges have been laid, of course, will have their case investigated by the courts and will have all the opportunities which are accorded to persons so situated to retain counsel and to take the course which they deem most advisable and which may be justifiable in the circumstances. I think that answers what the leader of the opposition had intended to ask and what the leader of the C.C.F. party has asked.

With the permission of the house I should like to introduce a motion which will permit of the printing of the documents which I have just tabled.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the Prime Minister would permit me a word before he makes that motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: The Prime Minister has tabled the interim report of the commission to which he referred yesterday. In doing so he also referred to the arrest of a member of this parliament. He read certain legal opinions with respect to the procedure followed in that arrest, and he referred to a question of which I had given him notice and which I intended to put at the proper time today. I believe everyone will agree that these important developments have justified the bringing up of this matter at this time; therefore, I think I should put on record the question that I had proposed asking. The Prime Minister has only partly answered it. The question was as follows:

> In answer to questions directed to him yesterday, the Prime Minister indicated he would make a statement on Monday next in connection with espionage.
> Since that time a letter has appeared in the press, reported to have been directed to certain members of parliament from one of those already detained in this investigation, complaining of a disregard of his constitutional rights; and, in addition, this morning's press carries a report of the arrest of a member of parliament, while parliament is in session, in connection with a matter related to this investigation.
> My question is: In view of these incidents and in view of the consequent mounting public interest in this matter, will the Prime Minister make to-day the statement he proposes to make rather than delay it until Monday?

As I said, the Prime Minister has made a statement referring to these matters in part. If my question had been answered in the affirmative we would have had a fuller statement. I presume, the matter having gone this far, that the Prime Minister does not feel that he can say any more at the moment. Whether he does or not I should like to say this further word, that the refusal of habeas corpus proceedings, the holding of men without a legal charge against them, without the right of bail and without the right to have counsel, is a serious matter to all who pride themselves on the principles of British justice. The Canadian people will be behind the government in searching out and in punishing crimes against the state, but the Canadian people are not in sympathy with any departure from the regular procedures of our courts, established over long years, for dealing with matters of this kind, unless the circumstances are most unusual, such as, for instance, the safety of the state being in danger.

I am sure the house appreciates the information which the Prime Minister has given us to-day; whether he cares to say anything further now is a matter for him to decide.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say a further word. I thought I had pretty well answered or adequately answered the questions which my hon. friend had intended to ask me; but may I say to him at once that with what he has said about the importance of securing the freedom of the individual, his right to habeas corpus proceedings and anything else that will seek to preserve individual liberty I am in complete accord, and I would be the last person in this country to wish to see the liberty of any individual curtailed in any way at all that it is possible to avoid, short of, to use my hon. friend's own words, the safety of the state being the main consideration.

Yesterday I stated that I would wish to make a statement at length on Monday purposely in order that hon. members might have an opportunity before my statement is made to read the interim reports of the commissioners, the two reports which have been tabled. One report has been tabled only this afternoon. Hon. members have not yet seen that report. I do not believe they have seen any reference in the press to what it contains, and I do ask that hon. members of this house read that report from beginning to close before Monday's discussion on this very serious matter takes place. I would also ask that hon. members read the first report from beginning to close before we proceed with further discussion. I believe that hon. members will be very deeply impressed by the statements which these reports contain. I would also ask hon. members to remember in reading these reports that they have been prepared by two justices of the Supreme Court of Canada, gentlemen who, above all, would be anxious to maintain in every way possible the full freedom and liberty of individuals in our country.

With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That two thousand five hundred copies in the English language and one thousand copies in the French language of the documents relating to the proceedings of the royal commission, established by order in council P.C. 411 of February 5, 1946, and including the first and second interim reports of the royal commission, laid on the table of the house on the 14th and 15th of March instant, be printed forthwith, and that standing order 64 in relation thereto be suspended.

As I mentioned yesterday, I arranged to have these reports printed without waiting for the authority of the house, feeling quite sure that authority would be given, inasmuch as I took the course I did for the convenience of hon. members.

Motion agreed to.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

REQUEST FOR TWO-DAY RECESS

On the order for motions:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether immediate provision will be made for a two-day recess so that hon. members of the house and our friends can properly celebrate the seventeenth of March without interfering with our work? I may say that this has been denied us during the war years, and now that peace has come we hope that this matter will be given consideration.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I can imagine of no better way for my hon. friend to celebrate the day of which he speaks than to attend church on that day.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

FAREWELL ADDRESS BY BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As hon. members are aware, His Excellency the Governor General and Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice will be taking their official departure from Canada to-morrow. I intimated yesterday that I thought it would be the wish of all hon. members that some expression should be given by both houses of parliament to the appreciation which we all feel of the great services which His Excellency has rendered Canada during the years that he has represented His Majesty in this country. I stated at the time that I proposed to introduce a motion which would give expression to the feelings which we cherish in common. I have the motion before me and I will introduce it in a moment.

Before bringing forward the motion in a formal way may I say that I am sure all hon. members were impressed yesterday by the reference made by His Excellency in a personal note in the speech from the throne to the relations which he had enjoyed with the ministers of the crown, with members of parliament and with the people of our country. Those relationships, as Lord Athlone stated, have extended over many years and have in many ways been quite intimate. His Excellency said that they had endeared the people of this country to the hearts of the Princess Alice and himself. This afternoon I should like to say that the sentiments thus expressed by His Excellency are I believe warmly reciprocated towards himself and the Princess Alice by the people of Canada, and, in particular, by their representatives in this parliament.

Speaking personally, if I may be permitted to do so, I cannot begin to say what a privilege, what a pleasure, what a help in every way it has been to me to enjoy the close association which I have had with His Excellency during the years he has been His Majesty's representative in this country. All the relationships to which His Excellency referred, his relationship to the Prime Minister, to the ministers, to the members of parliament and to the people, have been in most complete accord with the spirit and the letter of constitutional procedure and constitutional practice. They have in addition been of very great assistance to the ministry and to the country at a time of its greatest need.

To mention only one of many good offices, I doubt if one can begin to appreciate what it has meant to have at Government House in these years in the persons of His Excellency Lord Athlone and Princess Alice, the Countess of Athlone, two persons who have given so generously of their time and their thought, not only to matters immediately concerned with the war effort of Canada but also have done so much to welcome to our country in Canada's name so many of the distinguished personages who have visited our country during the last six years. There never has been a time when so many have come to our land from other countries. As an instance of the growth in international relations in that period of time I might mention that when His Excellency arrived in Canada there were only nine missions, four headed by high commissioners from other nations of the British commonwealth and five from foreign powers in the nature of legations or embassies. To-day there are some twenty-six in all, five from other parts of the commonwealth and the remainder from foreign countries. This serves to indicate the extent of the development of Canada's international relationships. In connection with important aspects of that development no persons have played a more helpful part than have His Excellency and Her Royal Highness.

I should like to say many things in bidding farewell to His Excellency and Her Royal Highness. I have however expressed something of my own feelings in this address which I am about to ask the house to approve. I believe the sentiments there expressed will accord completely with those of all other hon. members of this house. As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), who has seen the proposed address, has kindly said that he would be pleased to second the motion which proposes it. I shall not say more, but will immediately move:

That whereas the houses of parliament desire to present an address to His Excellency the Governor General on the occasion of the termination of His Excellency's official connection with this country, it be resolved by this house that the said address be presented in the following words:

"Farewell address by both houses of parliament to His Excellency the Right Honourable the Earl of Athlone, Governor General of Canada.

To His Excellency Major-General the Right Honourable the Earl of Athlone, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, a member of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Grand Master of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, one of His Majesty's Personal Aides-de-Camp, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of the Dominion of Canada.
May it please Your Excellency:

We, the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, beg leave to convey to Your Excellency an expression of the general feeling of regret with which the people of Canada have learned of the approaching conclusion of your official relationship as the representative in Canada of His Majesty the King.

Your Excellency's period of office has extended over the most eventful years in the history of the world. It must be a source of profound gratification to you, on your retirement as Governor General, to realize that your years in Canada have witnessed victory over the enemies of freedom, and the emergence of Canada as a world power, with a foremost place among the united nations.

We cannot bid Your Excellency farewell without expressing our grateful appreciation of your helpful cooperation in the tasks of government through these years of constant anxiety. You have, throughout, given unsparingly of your time and thought to sustain and strengthen the morale of the nation at war. By word and example, you brought courage and cheer to the armed forces, to the auxiliary services, and to the workers in all the fields of wartime production and supply. You lent your support to every worthy national appeal. Universities, schools, hospitals, and other agencies of health, and welfare, have all benefited from your personal interest and concern.

Your extensive travels have given Your Excellency an intimate knowledge of our country, its resources and its potential future. You have seen Canada at work under the tragic stimulus of war. You have also watched its industries being converted to the purposes of peace. We are pleased that you have been able to glimpse the broad expanses of our country and that you have found delight in its scenic grandeur. Your journeys to all parts of Canada, including many remote areas, have been greatly appreciated. Wherever you have gone, you have been warmly welcome and will be long remembered.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

At no time in Canada's history has our country been visited by so many of the leading personalities of the world. Both at Government House in Ottawa, and at the Citadel in Quebec, you have extended warmest hospitality in the name of Canada.

Throughout your life, Your Excellency has given constant proof of devotion to public service. We do not forget that for seven years you were His Majesty's representative in the Union of South Africa. In Canada, as in South Africa, your unfailing courtesy, your broad and generous sympathies and your wide experience of constitutional government have helped to further the ideals of tolerance and good-will. You have thereby helped to strengthen national unity, and the ties which bind, in close attachment to the crown, the nations of the British commonwealth.

The presence of Your Excellency and Her Royal Highness in Canada has also strengthened the place which the royal family holds in the hearts of the Canadian people. We would ask Your Excellency, on your return to the United Kingdom, to convey to Their Majesties the King and Queen, the assurance of Canada's fidelity to the crown, and of the devotion and affection felt by the Canadian people for Their Majesties. We should be pleased if you would also convey to Queen Mary an expression of our kind remembrance. We hope that in the near future Canada may be honoured by a visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Princess Elizabeth and the Princess Margaret.

In saying farewell to Your Excellency, we cannot express too warmly our appreciation of the helpful part so graciously taken by Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice in the discharge of Your Excellency's high responsibilities. The active, generous and sympathetic cooperation of Princess Alice in the performance of your public and social duties has won for Her Royal Highness an enduring place in the admiration and affection of the Canadian people. Your Excellency and Her Royal Highness have been as one, in all you have sought to foster of a high sense of public duty and social responsibility.

To Your Excellency and Her Royal Highness we extend, on behalf of all Canada, the best of wishes for the future. We hope that, in the eventide of life, you may enjoy together, in health, strength and happiness, the reward of your many years of devoted public service."

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there are not many occasions when I can generously support a motion made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). This however is one time when I can. I regard it as a very great honour and a very great privilege to support and to second a motion of this kind.

With what the Prime Minister has said about His Excellency our Governor General I am in entire accord. The present Governor General of Canada has brought distinction and dignity to a position which in the last few years has required unusual tact, and poise and judgment. During his term of office he has ably represented the crown and maintained the great respect for that institution which is everywhere prevalent in Canada. And as for his consort, Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice, she has brought to her position a grace and a charm which will be long remembered particularly by the women of Canada who have had the privilege of meeting her.

Mr. Speaker, had I been drafting this resolution there are two or three things I would have added. I would have asked His Excellency, for instance, to take back to Britain the general appreciation of the people of Canada to the British people for the way they faced the perils of the last six years and for the way they are facing the problems of to-day. I would have asked him to tell them that we recognize they have given not only the blood of their sons but also a quarter of the total of their material wealth in order to head off the domination of the world by a false philosophy. I would have asked him to tell them that we shall not forget that twice in a generation they have stood between Canada and defeat in war. Finally, I would have asked him to tell them that we in Canada shall not fail to remember these things in the fateful and challenging days upon which we are entering.

As I said, it is a privilege to have the opportunity of seconding this motion. I trust that they will take back with them happy memories of Canada, and that they will live long and further cement the ties which bind this country to Britain and to the British traditions of justice which everyone in Canada so much admires.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should very much like to associate this group with the motion which has just been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and also perhaps with the suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) as to the expansion of the terms of the resolution.

As the Prime Minister has said, we have been well served in Canada by His Excellency and his charming consort. They have followed the constitutional procedures of our country and the traditional usages of the land from which they came and whose institutions we follow so closely.

Saying good-bye to them takes me back a good many years. When I was a lad, the first time I ever saw any members of the royal family was when the present Governor General of Canada and his young and beautiful lady visited the small college in which I was a student. At that time it was known as Exeter university college; to-day it is the university of Southwest England. I well remember the charm of that visit, and, perhaps because of that, I have been interested in watching Their Highnesses for some years. I have been glad to notice that they have always taken a profound interest in the welfare of the people. I recollect that when they were in South Africa they were most active in assisting in every way possible the re-housing of the people who dwelt in the depressed areas around Cape Town; and in our own country they have long advocated, with constitutional circumspection, improved educational facilities, and in these respects have shown judgment and breadth of vision. While I find it very difficult to discover any logical reason for the continuance of a royal house, none the less I feel that as long as we have members of the royal family who conduct themselves as Their Majesties the King and Queen, and as the Earl of Athlone and the Princess Alice have done, the institution will serve a useful purpose in our commonwealth of free nations. I am therefore very glad to join with the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition, and I am sure, all other hon. members in wishing them godspeed and many years of happiness in what is a probable retirement.

Mr. SOLON LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, members of the Social Credit group are thankful that Canada has been privileged to have the Earl of Athlone as Governor General during the years of the war. We are mindful of the splendid and devoted way in which he has conducted the affairs of his high office. Now that the time has come when we must bid farewell to the Earl and the Princess Alice, we join with other members of this house in wishing them godspeed, and we want them to know that our best and sincerest wishes for their future health and happiness go with them. We are glad, therefore, Mr. Speaker, unanimously to join with the Prime Minister in supporting this motion.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I be granted the privilege of adding a few words in French in support of the motion which has just been moved and seconded with such good taste by the hon. members of the house who spoke before me.

His Excellency the Governor General and Her Royal Highness Princess Alice have very often and with complete mastery expressed themselves in the language used by Canadians of French descent to convey their feelings towards us and to encourage us in our loyalty to our traditions and institutions. Therefore, it is fitting, and I feel sure everyone will agree, that, using the same language,

I should tell them that we unanimously and heartily endorse the congratulations, thanks and good wishes expressed in the farewell address which we have just heard.

There is no need for me to repeat them nor to attempt any amplification, but I wish to say to Their Excellencies that the last but one paragraph of yesterday's speech from the throne moved us very deeply. The words referred to are the following:

> Princess Alice and I will ever recall that in these momentous years it has been our proud privilege to share in your anxieties and rejoicings. Throughout our lives we shall cherish an abiding affection for Canada and her people.

Their Excellencies know that the motto of my province is "Je me souviens". We too will forever treasure the imperishable memory of these two impressive figures who upheld with such personal dignity and éclat our inalienable loyalty to the monarchial government which is at the same time democratically constitutional. During the dreadful war years, this loyalty was a constant inspiration to our people, and the presence of Their Excellencies among us, as well as their continuous participation in all our efforts have forged bonds of admiration and affection, and we are proud to register the fact in the records of parliament.

Motion agreed to. (The members standing.)

ALASKA HIGHWAY

QUESTION AS TO OPENING FOR PUBLIC USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) a question. I notice that the hon. gentleman is not in his seat, but perhaps the question can be brought to his attention and he can answer on Monday. Is the Alaska highway to be opened soon to the public?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The matter is one that comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence. I shall be glad to bring it to his attention, but I should think the highway would not be closed to the public.

FOOD

FACTORS OPERATING AGAINST FULL PRODUCTIVE CAPACITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question, of which I have given him notice. In view of the critical food situation throughout the world, will the minister please inform the house what steps have been taken to remove those factors in Canada's food production which have worked against the use of the country's full productive capacity?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry I did not receive the notice. I know of no such interruptions to the production of food.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You will hear of them.

SUGAR

ALLOWANCE TO BEE-KEEPERS FOR HONEY PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance or of the hon. member representing him in the house. In view of the sugar situation obtaining in western Canada, will the Minister of Finance not consider advising the sugar administrator to increase immediately the allowance of sugar to Canadian bee-keepers sufficiently to stimulate honey production in 1946? I should like to have the question answered on Monday.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I will see that the question is brought to the minister's attention.

POSTAL SERVICE

RATES ON FOOD PARCELS OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Will the Postmaster General consider the advisability of establishing a temporary reduction in the rate of postage on food parcels to Britain and the devastated countries?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): These rates are determined by agreement between the British postal authorities and ourselves, and they could not be reduced without first having a conference.

Mr. BRYCE: Will the Postmaster General be prepared to do it?

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. FERNAND VIAU AND SECONDED BY MR. R. H. WINTERS

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. FERNAND VIAU (St. Boniface) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour for me to have been chosen to move the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne; I am a young Canadian making my first steps in this House of Commons, this honourable house where many eminent and enlightened men have, since confederation, discussed and debated economical, social and political questions which have helped to mould out of Canada a nation true to the longings of our fathers of confederation. Numerous valorous and unforgettable Canadians, of British and French extraction, have come into this house to find means of ensuring a lasting welfare for their generation and our own.

The honour which is bestowed upon me is rather an homage to the veterans whom I represent in this house. Although the war is over many veterans are still returning from overseas and I avail myself of this opportunity for thanking the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government for honouring the veterans in this house by asking me to speak on their behalf.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the fact that I have been chosen is also a mark of respect and gratitude to the population of St. Boniface county which I represent here. St. Boniface is not a historical county, from the political viewpoint, but it is representative of the growth of the Canadian west. It was at St. Boniface, at the confluence of the Red and Assiniboine rivers, that the first explorers of the Canadian west arrived over a century ago. The first settlers and first missionaries landed on the shores of the Red river, at the very place where St. Boniface is now situated, to establish the first post which was instrumental in the growth of the Canadian west.

Today, St. Boniface is the largest industrial city in Manitoba. It is a cosmopolitan city, where the great races of this country live in harmony and I may add that the city itself is setting an example of good understanding for Canada as a whole.

The population is not very large as yet. However, I would like to say a few words in regard to my city and my constituency. Here, in St. Boniface we have the two largest slaughter-houses and the two largest flour mills in the British empire in addition to a large number of other industries. Not only do those industries serve the rural sections of Manitoba but they serve the whole of western Canada. My constituency comprises two important sections, one rural and the other urban. In several French-Canadian villages our farmers have for a great many years grown wheat to meet Canada's needs as well as those of the whole world.

If the Prime Minister has kindly chosen the humble representative of that constituency to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne it is in recognition of the fine work done by all the citizens of St. Boniface and the place which this city now occupies in the economic and social development of western Canada.

On behalf of the citizens of St. Boniface, I wish to thank the Prime Minister for this unforgettable gesture.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss for a moment a single question, namely, the loan which the Canadian government has just made to the British government to enable them to pull through the post-war transition period and reach that enduring peace so highly desired by all nations of the world.

Several Canadians wonder whether the government has acted wisely in making to England a loan of $1,250,000,000, when it is considered that the Canadian government has already agreed to loan $750,000,000 to other allied nations: France, Belgium and Holland who have already received a portion of this sum.

Mr. Speaker, in examining this loan to England, every member of this house must keep in mind two things:

First, from the standpoint of brotherhood. I use this word because inasmuch as Canada is a member of the British commonwealth of nations, it must be admitted that Great Britain deserves our esteem and our admiration. Let us not forget that in 1940 when the nazi hordes invaded the whole European continent and vanquished France, that great Catholic nation, Great Britain with the assistance of Canadian troops stood firm and almost single-handed fought the enemy, thus enabling the other nations of the commonwealth to arm themselves not for the defence of England but to save the world from a tyranny bent on destroying the principles of Christianity and to guarantee to each and every one liberty, peace and happiness. We must not forget that England, by her fortitude, her courage and her tenacity, by her self-denial and her sacrifices has enabled the Canadian armies to join the armies of the other allied nations not only in pushing back tyranny to the place where it had originated but to force the tyrant responsible for that revolting doctrine to destroy himself with that same sword which he brandished for so many years and with which he intended to destroy the social order and the peace of Christian nations.

In this grave hour, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that any Canadian, who is a member of the House of Commons, will be happy, when the bill dealing with the loan to England is introduced, to give it his approval in order to enable the British nation to reestablish itself economically and to regain the credit which it enjoyed so freely before the war. It is our nation's duty and such, I am sure, is the unanimous desire of all our soldiers, sailors and airmen, both French and English speaking, who have gone overseas and fought so courageously and so valiantly and who are now returning to Canada, happy in the thought of the great victory which they have achieved. They have been a credit not only to their nation but to their racial group, whether of British or French descent.

Secondly, I should like to emphasize that, apart from being a brotherly gesture toward Great Britain, that loan primarily confirms the determination of our nation to fulfil its pledges in regard to financial and other assistance, and to abide by the resolutions agreed to at the San Francisco conference.

The financial assistance granted to allied nations will enable them to recover their moral, economic and social balance in the post-war period. However, from an economic standpoint, and in conformity with the agreement made between our government and that of Great Britain, the credit extended to the latter nation will be used for the purchase of Canadian goods. It goes without saying that such a sum of money spent in Canada for the purchase of our products will also enable us to restore our industrial economy and provide Canadians with work that is so essential to the welfare and prosperity of this country; it will ensure Western Canada and all our farmers the markets that are so necessary for their products such as wheat, cheese, milk, butter, cream, meat and other foodstuffs. When the prosperity of industry and agriculture is assured, every Canadian, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, benefits thereby.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that, when, very shortly, this bill is introduced in the House of Commons, it will meet with the unanimous approval of every member from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Before concluding, I wish to say a few words to my fellow-citizens of the province of Quebec, this wealthy and gallant province who has ever played an admirable part in the development of our great nation. Recently, I have attended the sessions of the second annual meeting of Radio-Ouest francaise and have had the opportunity of witnessing the efforts and devotion to duty of my fellow-citizens from the west to promote this gigantic enterprise which will put them in a position to tune in on concerts, speeches and plays in their mother tongue. Needless to say that such a worthy undertaking could not be realized without financial assistance. The members from the noble province of Quebec, who have the privilege of sitting in this house, have no doubt noticed that, last fall, a subscription campaign was organized through the various parishes, under the auspices of both religous and civil authorities to help the western Canadians of French origin. You have been very generous, the total subscriptions being in excess of $200,000, and I take this opportunity, as a member of the constituency where the first French radio station will shortly be inaugurated, of thanking you from the bottom of my heart.

(Text): Mr. Speaker, in being accorded the privilege of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I do not view it as a personal tribute, being one who has just taken his first steps in Canadian politics and who has yet to give proof of his wisdom in such an important duty, but rather is a tribute to the fighting forces of our dominion, an honour bestowed upon them, and I take the liberty to extend sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of this government for the honour so bestowed upon a veteran. I am sure that every man and woman who wore His Majesty's uniform during the long years of war would wish me to convey their thanks in these simple terms.

Yesterday the members of this House of Commons proceeded to the Senate chamber to hear the reading of the speech from the throne, which was the last official duty of His Excellency the Governor General, the Earl of Athlone. His Excellency has been with us and laboured with us for the well-being of our people and those of the commonwealth and empire through what history will probably record as the most crucial years that humankind has ever known. His Excellency the Governor General and his gracious consort, Princess Alice, will soon depart from our midst to return to the land of their birth where they may enjoy a well-earned rest. It is with deepest regret that we of this Canadian parliament see them leave. It is with deepest regret that thousands of Canadians who have come to know them as friends will look upon their departure. The counsels of His Excellency in all those things which contributed to the good of our people, to the well-being of men, women and children, have only served to emphasize his concern for the welfare of this our land and for the well-being of the people of Canada.

The kindness which Her Royal Highness Princess Alice has brought to the many arduous tasks and duties which she has so graciously undertaken has only served to endear her to the hearts of Canadians everywhere.

In the departure of Their Excellencies we shall pause for a moment of thankfulness for their having come into our midst, and to wish them godspeed, a happy journey and joy upon their return to their home in those isles which have throughout the ages stood for the glory and dignity of man and the freedom of the human soul. We pray that God will be with them and bless them in all the days to come, and I am quite sure that all Canadians will unite with me in repeating those words so graciously used by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth on her departure from Canada on her royal visit in 1939: "Farewell; au revoir".

But as they leave, Canadian people welcome to this dominion one of the greatest soldiers of our time, one of the greatest military leaders of the second world war, Viscount Alexander. The Canadian active army in the field had the honour of fighting under his command, and I know that our people will join with our Canadian soldiers in extending to Viscount Alexander, his lady and family, a heartfelt welcome with the hope that they may be long with us and that their life in our midst may be a happy one. Above all our thanks will go to His Majesty the King who has so graciously seen fit to appoint to this high office this great man of our time.

Mr. Speaker, as this second session of the twentieth parliament convenes, we still find a world of unrest not only in the economic, financial and social fields but also in the minds of the people and of the legislators of the world at large. As a young Canadian who has endeavoured to make a very careful and close study of all problems affecting not only my nation but also other nations of the world, I consider responsible legislators to be men and women of good will, although most of us differ as to the methods and means of translating that spirit of good will into concrete action.

One thing has impressed me most vividly and it is this. Speaking for my nation alone, I think every man and woman in the House of Commons to-day is intensely aware of the critical times in which we live, of the great issues that prevail, of the necessity of action and of the urgent need to put into practice the principles of the four freedoms as expounded by the ex-Prime Minister of Great Britain and the late President of the United States some five years ago during their meeting in mid-Atlantic. Those four freedoms were not an idle dream but a living reality which, in my opinion, is attainable for all of us. It is for us, the living, to translate those ideals into concrete attainment. I wish to say emphatically: It can be done. We differ as to the ways and means of doing it. Therein lies statesmanship, or lack of it. We cannot hope to build a fruitful, free world on mere tenets of sectionalism. We cannot hope to create a united Canada by pinning up banners of race, creed or narrow provincialism and sectionalism, and then shouting from the housetops. Our outlook will have to be broader, kindlier, and exemplified in the spirit of good will to all men. Statesmanship that is not exercised in this spirit is of no lasting importance; it does not stand the test of time or the indulgence of thinking men.

Canada, among other nations, has now emerged from a second world war, the most widespread and fierce that has ever been known in the history of mankind. Canada has emerged from this war with honour, dignity and the thanks of the civilized world. She has done her part nobly; Canadians now enjoy the honour and respect of thinking people in every part of the globe. Canada has stood four-square within the British commonwealth of nations for right and justice. History will prove that her contribution has not been merely that of lip-service. Her contribution has been in human lives, in material and in a spirit of fellowship with all men and all nations who had the courage to stand up against tyranny and oppression when these threatened to engulf the whole earth. Canadians are coming home from the war in this knowledge. They are resuming their peace-time vocations with a view to a future of good will that is not merely on paper but is rather a living thing for the Canadian people and all people elsewhere.

The members, new and old, of this House of Commons have assembled also in the same spirit; and here I may state that in this twentieth parliament the Canadian people witness the appearance of a very great number of fine young Canadians eager to ensure that the new ideals will be translated into active legislation, and all have come to this capital city with the firm purpose of building a still better Canada, a land of decency, of freedom from want, fear and futility. It is up to us all to make it so. We cannot deny that we have in Canada everything that living man could desire. We enjoy the fruits of the earth in its fulness, for all that is within our borders. In this period of recovery from war we must share those fruits with the less fortunate in those lands who by our side fought the nazis, the fascists and the Japs, and we shall see that this is done.

The British isles have sent to our shores many great people who have inculcated in the thought and culture of this land the great and broad principles of character which belong to the British people. Their ideals of freedom have become our ideals of freedom, their love of liberty has become our love of liberty, their sense of tolerance our sense of tolerance, and by the very token of this which will one day become a universal brotherhood, their cause has been our cause through the years, in peace and war, to stand as a beacon of hope and a symbol of survival in the world's darkest hours. No living man or woman will ever forget the time when the commonwealth stood alone, when its armies stood off the hordes that had enveloped a whole continent in slavery and torture. No person will ever forget the courage of our people, who by nature are kindness personified but who, when the flame of war swept across Europe, stood their ground with fortitude never before matched in the history of the world.

We, and all the world, owe such people a debt, one that can perhaps never be paid. But our sense of admiration and gratitude persuades us to do such things as are within our power to sustain them in their hour of recovery from the awful conflict. Thus it is fitting that Canada, as a partner in the commonwealth and an ally in the war, should see fit, through a unanimous vote in this House of Commons, to approve and sanction the loan recently arranged to assist the United Kingdom in her post-war rehabilitation. I know that I voice the sentiment of all Canadians, whatever their race or creed, when I say that this token of admiration and gratitude is given by unanimous consent.

The main factors to be remembered in granting this loan are simple, even if they are difficult of solution. The first factor to be considered is that the reestablishment of Britain as a solvent trading unit in a post-war world cannot be done too hastily. Every Canadian who has followed her history during the years of war will remember that Britain placed her whole industry on a war footing from the start of the war, and it will take many more months before this industry can return to a position to swing freely into peace-time production and thus increase her exports, which would allow her to pay the great debt she has contracted during the long struggle.

Canadians from coast to coast, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, no matter of what race or creed, must realize that we do owe a debt to Britain and that during this war, on account of her valiant stand, she lost a large part of her foreign investments, which were liquidated to pay for war supplies which she urgently needed. Canadians must remember that foreign currency used to be available to Britain in many countries, on account of her credit established over many centuries by investments of her surplus exported abroad. At present that great nation is not able to purchase goods abroad as simply as it used to do, which is why Canada extends a hand to her, a credit of $1,250,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that all members of this House of Commons, Canadians not only of British descent, not only of French descent, but also Canadians of foreign extraction who have been chosen by the people of Canada as their representatives in this House of Commons, will by unanimous consent approve the attitude of the government in granting the loan to this former creditor nation, a loan which will also benefit Canada during the years to come in an increase of export trade and markets, and also will ensure to the world that Canada stands behind those four freedoms, as expressed in the early part of my speech, thus guaranteeing one of the most vital keynotes of the world's happiness and prosperity—freer trade among nations of men of good will. We shall watch with hope and increasing faith as the British people attack the problems of recovery as they did the problems of war. May good fortune attend their labours.

While we view with joy their return to the normal ways of peace and freedom, we turn to those problems which face this country and for which we are now assembled to find the solution. One of the most important events in the months to come will be the third session of the dominion-provincial conference, which convenes next month. When the problems that come before that conference have been dealt with and the functions of the dominion and the provinces defined for the purpose of the orderly and effective application of measures to carry this country through the reconstruction period, we may feel confident that we shall ourselves be on the way to recovery from the ravages of war which for more than five years disturbed the economy and life of our people. I suggest that we and the people of this country should face our problems with the calm and calculated firmness with which we attacked the problems of war, and that we should so cautiously build the framework for the future that it may be sound when the time comes for its application to the governing of our affairs. Things lasting and things worth while are not accomplished in a day, but rather by careful planning and repeated consultation. Thus it is that we should view with patient understanding the deliberations that are taking place and will take place in the months to come in bringing mutual understanding and respect among the governments of the provinces and the dominion.

Thus will the welfare of our people be enhanced, a return to normal national life accomplished, and the future of Canada made the more secure because care and caution ruled the day when plans were being laid. Let Canadians beware of haste, but pursue with determination and courage the problems which are before the country and for which within months we shall have a solution that will stand the test of time and circumstance.

Canadians must be aware, that is all those who have given time and study to our own national problems, that the purpose of the present Canadian government in convening the heads of the nine provinces forming our confederation, is not to centralize all economic powers, but to establish an economic programme by which the nine provinces of Canada will share all benefits equally and give to the people of Canada, from coast to coast, on an equal basis, the economic, social and financial securities which have been long desired and which were the aims and aspiration of the fathers of confederation when in 1867 the great British North America Act was drawn.

The world situation is still disturbed and will remain so for many months. People everywhere are restive, alarmed, living in fear of this ism and that, in fear of the future. But wars have all through history brought such periods, and the leaders who have piloted their peoples through those years have become the great men of history. We and our allies held firm through the years of war, and although disagreement and misunderstanding have arisen in these months of post-war recovery, we may look with faith to the future, and with our allies of the war period hold firm the torch of liberty and freedom for all people.

We should carry on the fight for freedom from all the doubts and travails of life for all people everywhere, and in God's good time the nations of the world will embrace those principles so nobly stated in the Atlantic charter and blue-printed at the San Francisco conference.

In this dominion of ours we have had sound administration of the country's affairs through all the war years, and that soundness of administration is carrying us into the years of peace. This has been due in great measure to the leadership of one who will go down in history as one of the statesmen of the world one who more than any other man or group of men is responsible for the fact that under God, Canada's status to-day among the free nations of the world is greatly enhanced. This love and devotion, not only for his country, but also for the world at large, stem from a sincere love of freedom, a hatred of foreign undemocratic control which animated also the soul of his revered grandfather, that leadership which has led our country during the years of war and peace, a man who has a tenacious, strong and virile belief in freedom not only for the two great peoples which form this dominion of ours, but also the same philosophy for all mankind irrespective of creed or colour. This leadership is in our midst, this leadership rests with one man who parallels this high quality of heart and mind with devout faith in the cohesion of the British people united in their own commonwealth of nations, a pattern for all nations. Mr. Speaker, this leadership rests but in one person, the leader of the present government, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters):

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada: May it please Your Excellency:

We His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament asembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and great honour to second the resolution so ably presented by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau). I would compliment him upon his splendid address, and particularly upon his fluency in Canada's two official languages.

The mover of the resolution and I are fully conscious of the honour that has been conferred upon our respective provinces in western and eastern Canada by virtue of this invitation to speak on the resolution. In constituencies, situated at a great distance from Ottawa as the capital of the dominion, as is Queens-Lunenburg, on the Atlantic seaboard, frequently there develops a feeling of remoteness and detachment, and sometimes even of neglect in the over-all picture of national affairs. But I am sure that the people of Queens-Lunenburg will construe this honour accorded their member as recognition of the part they have played and are continuing to play in the development of Canada. On their behalf I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues.

On the eve of their departure for England, may I say what a great privilege it has been for Canada to have had Their Excellencies, the Governor General and Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice, with us for the past nearly six years. Since their arrival in June, 1940, they have worked tirelessly in the interests of Canada, during a period full of stress and grave concern. To be obliged to be absent from England whilst their country was undergoing such great tribulations was not easy. Their Excellencies made a great sacrifice on behalf of Canada. They have taken their place in the life of this country and the hearts of the people. They will not soon be forgotten.

We are indeed sorry to have them leave, but are grateful that they were able to be with us for even a comparatively short period and that they made such an outstanding contribution to Canadian life. We wish them long life and happiness in the future.

In casual thinking it sometimes seems that the war is a long distance behind us, and we tend to be impatient when in these days of peace some condition arising out of the conflict appears to be unfair or to impose hardships. When it is recalled, however, that Japan surrendered only a little more than six months ago, we must realize that much has been done by way of restoring normal conditions in a short period of time.

The programme of reconstruction in Canada is going forward smoothly. This is due in no small measure to the inspiring and capable leadership of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). It was expected that there would be temporary dislocations, with some unemployment, during the reconversion period; and it is, in fact, true that in some instances these conditions have manifested themselves. But when we compare progress made and present conditions in Canada, with progress and conditions in any other country of the world, there is good reason to feel that our problems are being handled competently. The desirable condition, of course, is full employment and a high level of production, and every effort is being made to attain those ends. There are no grounds for pessimism in the light of results to date.

In a consideration of the problem of reconversion the generally satisfactory relationship obtaining between labour and management in the dominion should not be overlooked, especially in the light of less favourable conditions in this regard prevailing in many other countries in recent months. Due credit for this favourable state of affairs must be given to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), whose honesty of purpose and forthrightness are widely recognized. The evident desire on the part of both labour and management to cooperate in solving their problems on a mutually satisfactory basis in the interests of the country as a whole has been commendable. It is hoped it will continue with the minimum of interruption in the difficult days ahead.

War-time controls, regulations and restrictions are being removed as rapidly as present-day conditions warrant. The recent steel situation wherein shortages were brought about by strikes across the border served to illustrate that controls can still be relied upon to further the nation's interests under unusual and emergency conditions. The government's record in the field of national economics during the war and since stands as the best evidence of its desire and determination to exert its special powers in the interests of the national good. Canadians in all walks of life know that these regulations are applied to their advantage and that the government is most anxious to remove what remains of them at the earliest moment that conditions permit. It is very difficult for individuals to look beyond their own immediate problems. Isolated cases of hardship, brought about by regulations, are undoubtedly encountered, but when they are integrated into the national pattern the over-all result is beneficial.

During the war Canada grew, not only internally but in the assumption of a more important and vital part in world affairs. Internally our output of products of all kinds rose to a level believed unattainable prior to the war. This expanded production was brought about through demands generated by the war. Britain and other allied nations relied heavily on Canadian production and we met our commitments. Many of our plants turned out warlike stores which have no place in a peace-time economy. Other facilities produced an expanded volume of their normal run of commodities to meet these heavy external demands. Except in isolated instances we had sufficient man-power to develop the full output of these enlarged facilities, and a condition very close to full employment resulted. Our output was far in excess of that required to satisfy Canadian requirements alone.

The demand for warlike stores has fortunately now virtually disappeared and the need for other of the commodities has decreased. As a further consideration hundreds of thousands of our service men have now been discharged from the forces and have entered the labour market. Therefore, unless we can convert those of our plants which were devoted to this expanded programme to produce goods for which there is a demand, and develop foreign markets, we shall be faced by the danger of unemployment. To sum up, we must replace war-time markets by peace-time markets.

One obstacle in the way of foreign trade is the poor economic conditions prevailing in most potential buying countries. This government has taken steps to circumvent this situation by making available credits or loans on a large scale to many western European and other countries. These loans will serve the two-fold purpose of assisting in the re-establishment of the ravaged countries of our allies and ensuring a foreign market for our products. To date, loan agreements have been entered into with England, Belgium, China, Czechoslovakia, The Netherlands, The Netherlands East Indies, Norway and Russia. Furthermore, negotiations are well advanced toward making a very large amount of money available to France. Except in the case of England, these funds will be used entirely to purchase goods in Canada and will be paid back in due course at normal rates of interest.

The credit to Britain is also a loan which will be repaid with interest. As I understand it, it is basically a business proposition, intended to give Britain an oportunity of buying Canadian products, and as such it will be enthusiastically endorsed. Except for this loan, and a larger one from the United States, Britain might, and probably would, be forced to do most of her export and import business with countries dealing in sterling, thereby increasingly excluding Canada from this important market.

Moreover, loans of this kind to Britain are needed if she is to be able to pay for her imports in currency that can be used in other countries, as we wish her to do and as the Bretton Woods agreement requires if it is to work properly. We want to be able to sell our products in Britain for money that we can spend not only in Britain but also in France, in the United States or elsewhere. We want Australians who sell wool in Britain to be able to use the money they receive to buy goods in Canada. This credit to Britain, together with the larger one from the United States, will help to make this possible.

The loan to Britain, accordingly, does not oblige the British to spend all the proceeds in Canada. But the fact is that the British within the next two years expect to spend considerably more than the amount of the loan on purchases in the dominion. It would be generally recognized as fit and proper for Canada to wish to help England to the greatest possible extent, in the light of her extreme and disproportionate war-time sacrifices. But at the same time it is well to remember that the loan is greatly to Canada's interest from the point of view of business and post-war trade. The government is to be commended for its forward looking policy in extending these credits, which are proving, and will continue to prove, of such great advantage to Canada—the lender—as well as to our allies—the borrowers.

As was pointed out in the speech from the throne, Canada's internal problems must indeed be viewed in the light of world conditions to be seen in true perspective. This country's status among other nations is continuing to grow under the splendid and outstanding leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). We must now be prepared to play our part to the fullest extent called for by our obligations. We anticipate a fair share of the world trade and we want, of course, to live in peace. Therefore we must expect to contribute in full measure to any programme necessary for the readjustment of commerce and to the organizations established under the general assembly of the united nations, with a view to avoiding future wars.

We can well be proud of the part the Canadian delegation, headed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), played in the first meeting of the united nations organization in London. They brought great credit to Canada, as we knew they would. It is gratifying to know, further, that Canada is to participate in the forthcoming peace conference in Paris, and this House is well aware of the part the Dominion is taking in conferences dealing with international finances. These are all problems of an international nature which have a very direct bearing on our Canadian standard of life and we must be prepared to view them in that light.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would say a few words about the armed forces and the veterans. Except for the occupational forces in Germany, the bulk of our troops have returned from foreign theatres. Considering the strengths of our forces abroad in the three services, the number of nations requiring troop carrying facilities and the fact that there were two separate theatres of war, one cannot avoid being impressed by the amazingly outstanding success of the repatriation programme. I would take this opportunity of expressing to the ministers of national defence our admiration and commendation for the vital task so well performed under difficult conditions. We do not overlook the fact that many of our soldiers are bringing war brides and families with them to Canada, and we wish to assure them of a welcome in this country. They are desirable citizens and will play an important part in our future. This intake will serve to offset to some extent our losses through emigration. We must bear in mind that this country needs in increasing numbers immigrants of the right type.

Many of our soldiers, sailors and airmen have been discharged from the services, and either they are deriving educational or other benefits under the veterans legislation, or they have been rehabilitated. Others will remain in the services to seek their careers. Some, already discharged, will be reattracted to the forces, and there will also be new enlistments.

Members of this house have frequently emphasized the value of modern weapons and equipment for the peace-time services, both permanent and reserve, and have insisted on pay comparable with what could be obtained in civil life for employment at corresponding levels. We have also asked for a generous programme of retirement benefits, and are anxious to make life in the services attractive since it is desired to have the best type of men in our forces.

On the other hand there is a heavy responsibility devolving upon the chiefs of staff, and right down through the chain of command, to see that the services, in turn, make the maximum contribution. We want to see in our forces officers and men who are well turned out and proud of their uniforms. They must be kept busy, interested, and made to feel that they are important units in the pattern of Canadian life. That the forces can make a worth-while contribution to our national life goes without saying. We have but to refer to their contributions and initiative in scientific developments and exercises such as musk-ox to remind us of the vital roles they can play. Full advantage should be taken of the great fund of knowledge and experience accumulated in the past few years. Further and continued progress must be encouraged.

Veterans who have been rehabilitated are pleased with the consideration which has been extended to them through this government by a grateful nation. On the basis of the splendid legislation enacted thus far and exemplified by the War Service Grants and War Veterans' Allowances Acts, they have the greatest confidence that at the earliest possible date this house will consider all outstanding veterans' matters and promulgate a veterans' charter which will be a credit to them and to this country.

The importance this government, and indeed this parliament, has attached to the welfare of veterans, was reflected by the spirit prevailing in the special committee on veterans affairs last session. As a new member, it was a pleasant revelation to me to see how representatives of all parties and groups on this committee forgot party politics and worked together in the common interest of the veteran. In my opinion this attitude does great credit to this house and raises its esteem in the eyes of the country. It is hoped it will set the pattern for greater unity of purpose in other phases of legislation.

The throne speech sets forth the urgent food situation obtaining throughout the world, and states that food is the key to peaceful reconstruction. Canada's accomplishments in the field of food production during the war were magnificent because of the untiring efforts of thousands of men and women, many of whom had passed the normal age of retirement, but who carried on in the absence of their sons and daughters in the armed forces or in munitions plants.

Under the continued outstanding and forceful leadership of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Canadian farm community can be relied upon with confidence to face the new peace-time challenge of maximum farm production to alleviate the current critical world situation.

Canadian fishermen wish to emphasize that any and all food negotiations should include fish, which is an important item on all food programmes. We feel that we can rely upon the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) to safeguard our interests in this field.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say a few words about the dominion-provincial conferences. To date, there have been three meetings, and the fourth is scheduled for April 25. In my opinion the importance of these conferences is vital and we in Nova Scotia hope that they will produce satisfactory results. The dominion proposals are laudable, and such objectives as the improvement of the tax system, encouragement of employment and advancement of social services, such as medical care and old age pensions, in particular, are in the nation's best interests.

Nova Scotians commend this government for recognizing the dominion's great fishing industry by declaring in its proposals that it plans to do research on fish biology, utilization of fish products and transportation of fish. The proposals involve consideration of means by which credit can be provided for improving the catching, processing and distribution of fish. In fact, they offer every assurance that this industry will be encouraged.

By virtue of heavy foreign demands for fish, Canadian fishermen have enjoyed a well merited measure of prosperity during the past several years, and they are, of course, most anxious that all precautions be taken to ensure maintenance of present standards. Conditions must not be allowed to deteriorate to the point where fishermen will be faced by poverty such as they encountered for so many years prior to the war.

The main contentious problems to date in the dominion-provincial discussions have been in the fields of taxes and subsidies or grants. I must express agreement with that part of the January submission by the government of Nova Scotia which stated:

> The ideal condition would be found when all the provinces of the dominion would have such revenues and such levels of economic well-being among their people as to make the granting of subsidies by the dominion government unnecessary.

This is undoubtedly the ideal condition. But in a country the size of Canada, with economic, geographic and climatic inequalities throughout its entire length and breadth, the ideal may quite likely never be attainable in all provinces. Under these circumstances, if we are to be a nation in fact as well as in word, these inequalities must be levelled out to the greatest possible extent, and subsidies or grants then become of great importance.

We speak today of nationhood in Canada, and we are to discuss this session a bill on citizenship, as well as to give consideration to the design of a distinctive national flag. These are healthy evidences of growth, but we must keep in mind that if we are to be a nation we must go forward as one unified country and not as nine separate and loosely coordinated provinces with boundaries closely drawn. To the greatest possible extent the same fruits of nationhood should be available for enjoyment by all citizens regardless of where they happened to be born or dwell. The government is to be highly commended for its forceful leadership in this direction through the medium of its proposals.

To Nova Scotians, being located as we are, at the end of a long, slow rail haul from central Canada, this is of the greatest significance. Nova Scotians want to be part of Canada as a nation, and they want to have Canadian citizenship. They want, also, to enjoy all the benefits accruing from these factors. Among other things they are justifiably eager to have access to central Canadian and foreign markets on a fair, bilateral basis. They are looking forward to faster rail transportation to and from central Canada, and to having better facilities, both rolling stock and road beds, within the province. The important project now under consideration, of linking up the Nova Scotia mainland with the highly industrialized island of Cape Breton, by means of a bridge or causeway, should be a vital part of any programme of improvements in our transportation system.

We do not expect that any common ground reached between the dominion and the provinces will provide the basis for a cure-all, but we do look forward hopefully to an understanding, because we feel that it would be a great stride forward, whereas failure to reach any understanding may well prove a step backward.

The speech from the throne reflects in good measure the progress being made in Canada and by Canada. It bears repeating that to a great degree that progress is directly attributable to the Prime Minister. He is a great leader, a great Canadian and a great world statesman, of whom all our countrymen are justifiably proud. His place in Canadian and world history is assured.

There is one other word I would say about great men, Mr. Speaker. I would feel that I had not discharged my responsibilities to all Nova Scotians, and indeed to all Canadians, if I did not say a word in appreciation of the services of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). In Nova Scotia we take full and justifiable pride in our minister. No man has worked more diligently, more sincerely and to better advantage for his native province and his country than has the Minister of Finance. He has established a reputation for integrity, even in a field which is sometimes unpleasant to himself as well as to the rank and file, which is unsurpassable. He has carved in our history a place which ranks him among the great public men of the nation.

In closing I would say, having in mind the incomparable war record of the dominion, with its population of only some twelve million people, that we have a splendid background of experience and accomplishment upon which to build in meeting the challenging and complex problems of peace.

The keystones of our war effort were initiative, determination and unity of purpose, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Nothing less than the same spirit on the part of all Canadians will suffice if Canada is to discharge her enhanced responsibilities as a nation at home and abroad.

With the full knowledge that in the spirit of unity we did it under conditions of war, we can go forward now in complete confidence that we can and will do it again in peace.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): The speech from the throne is an old institution in British parliamentary practice. It is a speech which is prepared by the government and read by the representative of the crown. The debate upon it is one in which custom gives the honour of moving and seconding it to two of the junior members of the house, junior members on the government side. It is a debate in which both tradition and custom favour, by these two men, speeches which shall not be too controversial, which see nothing to commend in the opposition and which see only virtue in the government. I wish to commend both speakers for the manner in which they have maintained the tradition so long established.

If they see only virtue in the government, this is one occasion when we can excuse them. If they see nothing to commend in the opposition, this is one occasion when we can forgive them. Without further comment on that particular aspect of the matter, let me say quite sincerely that this is one occasion upon which, without agreeing with all that these hon. gentlemen have said, we can commend them for their effort, and personally I wish to extend my congratulations to them on their contribution to the debate.

I shall refer to only one matter to which they made reference, namely, the departure of our present governor general and the coming very soon of a new one. Earlier this afternoon we paid our respects to Lord Athlone, who is shortly to leave us. With respect to the coming governor general, I am sure we shall all extend to him a sincere and generous welcome. He comes to us as an outstanding British citizen and a great soldier as well as the representative of the king. I am sure that all Canadians will welcome him in all three of these capacities, and I am equally sure that his duties here will be carried out in a manner which will bring credit to himself and to the crown which he will represent.

As custom provides, I shall reserve my further remarks until the next sitting of the house. I wish, therefore, to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.30 p.m.

Monday, March 18, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

WILD LIFE

PROVISION FOR APRIL 10 AS JACK MINER NATIONAL WILD LIFE DAY

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, respecting the Jack Miner National Wild Life Day.

[Mr. Bracken.]

He said: I deem it a high privilege to move the introduction of this bill, seconded I may say by another great friend of the late Jack Miner, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), which proposes that April 10 be proclaimed as The Jack Miner National Wild Life Day. It would seem to me that April 10 is a fitting day on which to initiate and proclaim such an act. At that time of the year all varieties of insectivorous birds return to Canada from their winter resting place in the south. Everyone knows the value of insectivorous birds to the country's production. At the same time these great wild fowl, the Canada goose, and ducks as well, are leaving their southern winter home and flying back to our own Arctic ocean area to nest. I cannot do better than quote what the late and celebrated Irvin S. Cobb said with reference to the late Jack Miner, because many words at this stage of the bill would be superfluous. Mr. Cobb said of Jack Miner that he was "the greatest practical naturalist on this planet." He was indeed the greatest conservationist of wild life on this planet, and in his memory I am very happy to move the introduction of this bill. I heard Jack Miner say on more than one occasion: "I am not so much interested in the number of spots on the woodpecker's tail as I am in the preservation of the species." That was his life work—conservation. He was Canada's greatest conservationist, and April 10, when the birds are coming back, would be a fitting time for schools, humane societies and other organizations interested in wild life to inform their pupils or members of the value to Canada of wild life conservation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT

POWER TO PROHIBIT SOUND SIGNALS AT CROSSINGS IN OR NEAR CITIES AND TOWNS

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: This bill is identical with the one I introduced at the last session of parliament. It merely extends the power of municipalities adjoining or contiguous to cities, but which are in fact physically part of the same metropolitan area, to pass by-laws dispensing with the statutory sound warning, by bell and whistle, at specified level crossings within the confines of the said municipalities. It confers the same power on urban municipalities which may be designated as townships or villages as on those designated as cities or towns, which have this power by authority of the Railway Act as it now reads.

The amendment does not constitute a blanket authority, as every crossing covered by such enabling legislation must be inspected by the board of transport commissioners, who must be satisfied with the safety measures provided at each crossing so designated.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

INMATES OF INSTITUTIONS FOR THE POOR

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

He said: This bill is exactly the same as bills I have introduced on other occasions, seeking to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938. The purpose is to remove the disqualification imposed on inmates of institutions for the poor where such persons are disqualified from voting at a provincial election. The removal of this disqualification will enable all such worthy persons to vote at federal elections whether they are qualified or not to vote at provincial elections.

The paragraph proposed to be repealed reads:

(k) in any province, every person who is an inmate of an institution which is maintained by any government or municipality for the housing and maintenance of the poor, if such person is by the law of that province disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and did not serve in the military, naval or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-1918.

The disqualification which I am trying to have removed is one that should have ceased to operate many years ago. We are supposed to be moving into a new world, and the fact that some people have been or are housed in any institution maintained by a municipality, county or province, should not disqualify them from voting at a dominion election. There are now only three provinces that adhere to the old law—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario—and they ought to be modernized by parliament so far as the Dominion Elections Act is concerned.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

COMMISSIONS TO AGENTS IN CONNECTION WITH SALE OF WHEAT

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5 to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

He said: This bill also is one that has been introduced before. It was talked out at the last session. I do not know what its fate will be this session, but the purpose is to amend the Wheat Board Act of 1935. Under that legislation the wheat board is at present restricted and the board has to use the facilities already available for the sale of wheat, as provided by the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. In my opinion, and in the opinion of every farmer organization as well as of many other organizations in western Canada, this is not desirable, nor is it in the interests of the Canadian people as a whole. I should like to have the support of the house in order to have this bill carried at the present session.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING MINISTERIAL HEAD

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Department of External Affairs Act.

He said: When the Department of External Affairs Act was passed in 1912 it was provided that the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs should be filled by the Prime Minister. That section still remains. The purpose of this bill is to revoke the section so that the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs may be filled by any member of the government.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WHEAT

INITIAL PAYMENTS FOR 1946 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In order to assist Canadian farmers in formulating plans for seeding of the 1946 crop, will the minister state what the initial payments for 1946 wheat crop and other grains will be?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I spent the morning in a discussion with the Canadian wheat board and my colleagues of the wheat committee of the government, and I hope to be able to make a statement within a day or two.

GASOLINE

INCREASE IN MAXIMUM PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the widespread protest from the prairie provinces against the proposed two-cent increase in the price of gasoline, effective to-day, would the government be prepared to reconsider its action and rescind the order permitting such an increase?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): This is an increase in the maximum price which may be charged for gasoline, and was the result of an order made by the war-time prices and trade board. However, since the withdrawal about January 1 of part of the subsidies paid on importations of petroleum it has been well known that this increase would necessarily follow.

I should explain to the hon. member that the subsidies were by no means entirely withdrawn; that from now on currently we are paying $3,500,000 a year in subsidies which all goes in reduction of the price of petroleum products in the prairie provinces, and that no subsidies are payable in respect of similar products in other parts of Canada. It was our feeling that if we are ever to reduce our subsidies with a view to eventually getting rid of all of them, to continue to pay very large sums for the subsidies which would be necessary in this particular area would not be justified. Therefore there was a partial withdrawal of the subsidy resulting in this price increase.

I have had so much correspondence about this matter and so much consideration has been given to it already that I am afraid I cannot promise the hon. member any reconsideration.

The house resumed from Friday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last His Excellency read to us the government programme for the session. On Friday a motion was made for its approval. The debate on that motion affords hon. members an opportunity to discuss not only what has been outlined in the speech from the throne but any other matter that may be regarded as of importance. But before I proceed with the subject matter of my remarks may I refer to the fact that since we last met here two among our members have been signally honoured by His Majesty the King: the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) have been made members of the imperial privy council. I wish in all sincerity to extend to them both my most hearty congratulations. I know of no two men more worthy of that high honour, and I know of no honour the bestowal of which has been more acceptable to or more generously received by the Canadian people.

My remarks this afternoon will not be brief.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am glad I have one supporter. Before I get through I shall be making recommendations that the debate on the speech from the throne be shortened, but to-day I am not going to practise what I preach, because I expect it will take about two hours to persuade this house that it should shorten the debate.

First I shall touch upon the subject matters mentioned in the speech from the throne; then I shall deal rather briefly with the business side of government. After some discussion of the procedure in this house, I shall refer to a matter that has been of very great public interest in this country during the last few weeks, namely, the espionage charges. I shall close with a discussion of foreign relations, a question which has an important bearing upon our success in dealing with our own domestic problems.

The speech from the throne indicates that a high level of employment is the fundamental aim of the government. I am sure it is the aim also of every hon. member in this house. But, is the government achieving it?

In these days it is the duty of the modern state so to organize its economy that every individual able to work and desiring to work shall have an income from his efforts commensurate with his contribution and adequate for a reasonable standard of living.

In spite of all its promises to give full employment the government is failing to do so. The records of the bureau of statistics indicate that as of the middle of February last there were more than 250,000 unplaced applicants registered with the national employment service across Canada. The number of live claims for unemployment insurance was 145,000. The number of unemployed veterans drawing out-of-work benefits was 37,000. In addition there are still in the armed forces large numbers of men not engaged in productive service, and there is an unknown number of unemployed who are not registered. In these days of astronomical figures these amounts may not impress this house, but when I say that in the thirties, in the ten years of the worst depression this nation ever knew, the average number unemployed was about 450,000, these figures do become impressive. The plain fact is that Canada now has an unemployment problem of serious proportions on its hands.

The whole reconversion programme has bogged down. It is not a reconversion programme; it is a status quo programme, a bits and pieces programme. Let me illustrate. On May 22, 1945, before the election, the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) is reported in the press as having said:

> There are 180,000 high priority jobs at present unfilled in Canada.

Then, after paying a compliment to hon. gentlemen to my left, he said:

> Our C.C.F. friends have been predicting general unemployment during the transition period from war to peace in Canada.

Then he continued:

> There is no such situation existing, and I see no signs of there being any in the future.

He went on:

> Reconversion is about fifty per cent finished in Canada.

That was last May, nine months ago. On February 11, 1946, according to a press report, the same minister had this to say, on the same subject:

> "Canada's reconversion job is about fifty per cent done," Hon. C. D. Howe said at a press conference to-day. The Reconstruction minister painted a bright picture for production, employment and national prosperity over the next few years. "Our exports are good," Mr. Howe asserted, "far above the level required for full employment. They will remain high during this year and next. This is mainly but now wholly due to loans to buyer countries, including China."

Apparently, as I said, the Minister of Reconstruction believes in the status quo. Reconversion was about fifty per cent finished last May and to-day is still about fifty per cent finished. Well, at least we can be thankful that we have not gone backward in the meantime.

The fundamental criticism of the government is that its approach is negative rather than positive. It seeks ways in which to correct the ills of unemployment, but does little to prevent unemployment by the creation of new opportunities for work. That I regard as the basic weakness of the government's approach to the problems it is facing to-day—attempting to cure them rather than to prevent them.

Recently the government issued a publication on the future population of Canada. I am surprised that the government has given no evidence that it has examined the implications of this report. On page 32 of bulletin F-4, "The Future Population of Canada," it makes the astounding prediction that even at the end of the century, fifty years from now, the Canadian nation will have no more than fifteen million people, or only three million more than it has now. On page 9, this document indicates that in 1971 the total population of Canada, based on present trends, will be only 14,600,000. In the whole of the maritime provinces there will be only a million and a half people; in Quebec, 4,700,000; in Ontario, 4,400,000; in Manitoba only 850,000; in Saskatchewan only a million, in Alberta only a million and in British Columbia less than a million.

If that is the goal this government accepts for Canada, it is a doubtful compliment to the initiative and enterprise of the Canadian people. I wonder if this had anything to do with the "middle-power" philosophy of the government, which it proposed in the days before San Francisco. The Canadian people ought not to rest content with this challenge to their future.

On another page in this document it is indicated that after the end of the present century the population will begin to decline. Not merely is it going to be only fifteen million, but at that time it will begin to decline.

Either this country is capable of maintaining more than fifteen million people or it is not. If this is to be the extent of our future, it is time we knew it. If this prediction for our future is erroneous, we should find it out. I do not believe Canada's future is limited by any such narrow horizon. It anticipates an increase of only 100,000 people a year for the next thirty years. The natural increase is 150,000 a year. If these figures are true we shall not be able to maintain our own natural increase. I have travelled over every section of this country; I have seen its developed and undeveloped resources, and I say to the government it ought not to rest content under this indictment of our future.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Those figures take no account of immigration.

Mr. BRACKEN: This is a document from one of the government's own departments, and I say if it is going to take that objective as our aim we ought to find out what is wrong with things in Canada and make some plans to correct the situation. The government has been making economic examinations by fits and starts. Is it not time the government undertook an examination of our economic structure as a whole, with a view to relating our problems and policies to our economic possibilities? Are we to sit still under the suggestion that on one-half of this continent we are going to be content with fifteen million people.

What the government is achieving is not higher incomes by increased production, but a partial redistribution of existing wealth on the basis of scarcity. What we should be aiming to do is to place the emphasis on raising standards by increased production rather than by the division of a restricted production. Production alone is the source of material goods or wealth. Some of our Canadian laws discourage production, thereby lessening the supply of material goods and thus working against a high standard of living for our people. Canada is not now giving to all men who want to work, and thereby produce, an opportunity to do so.

One of the chief weaknesses is the lack of team play between workers, business, agriculture and the government. There is no spirit of unity or sense of partnership between these four segments of Canadian enterprise. The government's policies have not given us a harmonious working arrangement, and the government alone is responsible for not having brought these different interests into a closer and friendlier relationship. When Canadian laws are such as to bring about a sense of partnership and team play in Canada, production and wealth will expand for us all, and the standard of living will be raised.

With respect to the rehabilitation of returned men, the speech from the throne suggests that the government proposes to reconstitute the committee on the "veterans' charter". There is widespread criticism of the manner in which the government is carrying out its responsibilities in connection with the rehabilitation of returned veterans. Many veterans are out of work, and many of these unemployed veterans are not in receipt of benefits. Furthermore, a great number of those who are in employment do not find themselves in satisfactory work.

A survey of reestablishment trends was published by the rehabilitation information committee covering the Montreal area. If this is a typical sample of rehabilitation trends throughout Canada, it is no wonder that the Canadian information service so severely criticizes the government's administration of veterans' rehabilitation. Maclean's magazine of March 15, 1946, summarizes what it had to say in this way:

> Frustration and disappointment, borne with fortitude—that's the typical condition of the demobilized veteran; and it's our own fault, not his.

The magazine is quoting a report of a committee appointed by the government. The report means that in spite of all the eloquent phrases and glowing promises made by the government, the government is failing to bring about a satisfactory rehabilitation policy.

I come now to another serious matter, namely, housing. The speech from the throne tells us that the demand for houses exceeds the supply—as though that were news to anyone. Among the major failures of government administration is that of housing. In no field has its ineptitude been more glaringly apparent. The government's housing policy, from the beginning, has been characterized by lack of cabinet teamplay. People seeking houses have been bombarded and confused with political promises made by cabinet ministers. But still they cannot get houses. The shortage of houses in Canada has been variously estimated at from 300,000 to 700,000. There were insufficient new houses constructed in the ten years before the war; and during the war there was not enough building to offset obsolescence or to meet the needs of new families. The result is greatly accumulated needs at the present time.

The government's own reconstruction committee estimated Canadian requirements at at least 60,000 houses a year for the next ten years; and this estimate in my opinion gave too little consideration to the needs of rural Canada. But even on this estimate, the government is falling pitiably short of the objective.

It is beyond my comprehension to understand why the government should have applied controls to almost every other thing within the economy of this country, and allowed the price of houses to get so much out of hand that it is far beyond the means of the returning veteran or the average man to buy one.

The government parades its generous rehabilitation allowances for returned men. But it fails to parade the fact that these allowances, however generous, are all lost to the veterans who, under these conditions, are forced to pay inflated values for houses, whether produced under government plans or otherwise.

From what I can gather, the housing situation to-day is worse than it was a year ago, and offers little promise of a satisfactory solution. The failure of government administration on housing has been complete. The present situation in Canada to-day is a disgrace, and the government cannot help knowing it.

Housing is our number one national emergency. Many veterans returning from the fighting fronts are unable to find homes. Many families are living in hovels and garrets. The consequences to the nation are little short of disastrous. How can we build a healthy, contented nation in such a condition of unrest?

It is not that the situation could not have been avoided. Even the government itself believed that it could have been avoided. Do hon. members remember the election posters which proclaimed to all and sundry that Liberal policies meant 60,000 homes immediately? Yes—not next year, or even next month, but immediately. This was last May—ten months ago. Some of them promised a million new homes in ten years.

Do you remember those advertisements, Mr. Speaker? I am sure you do. You probably used some of them yourself. Do you remember the beautiful advertisement protraying a house which would appear to be worth at least $8,000, and alongside which appeared the caption: "What! You're buying that lovely little home for only $13.82 a month?" I have a copy of this advertisement in my hand, and I should be pleased to show it to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) so that they may refresh their failing memories. Here is what this Liberal election advertisement says:

> We are planning for at least 600,000 housing units, and perhaps 1,000,000. No matter where you live, you will be able to reside in a comfortable home of which you can be proud.
> The Liberal government believes that it is the right of every family to own its own home—and live in it. The new housing plan is one of many brought about by the Liberals to provide the people with genuine social security now.

That was last May. This copy advocates the election of the distinguished hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Sinclair). I wonder what the people of Oshawa think of it to-day. I wonder how many are buying homes at $13.82 a month. I wonder how many veterans are getting suitable homes at all.

The housing situation is a festering sore on the body politic, an inexcusable blot on Canada's war effort. Could it have been avoided? Certainly it could have been. When one assesses the causes of the situation, he realizes that this government during ten years of office could have avoided the trouble.

What were the causes? They were lack of planning in advance; lack of coordination of government agencies involved; divided authority; divided responsibility; failure to tie in with provincial and municipal authorities; government frustration of private builders; the monopolizing of building materials; rigid controls holding up production of necessary fixtures. In addition there was the usual story of laws against production impeding recovery.

I have no words in my vocabulary adequate to condemn the lack of unified and aggressive action in this matter. A national emergency exists. During the war we met the national emergency courageously and forthrightly. Surely we shall not be less resolute in peace.

I now come to a discussion of agriculture and food. The speech from the throne tells us that the most pressing problem demanding immediate attention is the food problem. That is a fact we have known for months—that is, everybody except the government. We heard about their new policy first in the speech from the throne. Then instead of taking the advice that he gave to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) to go to church on Saint Patrick's day, the Prime Minister comes out on that day with a new programme on agriculture.

It is only a few weeks since the government held an agricultural objectives conference with the provincial governments on the subject of the agricultural programme for the coming year. At that conference there was no substantial change made from the programme of last year, yet since last year the world picture for food has changed very greatly for the worse.

Every one will recognize that a nation of 12,000,000 people cannot be expected to prevent starvation all over the world, but no one expects it to. We are only expected to do what we can. Famine can be offset only by food, and food can be saved by those who have it and increased by those who grow it. Canada should be helping in both directions. Our criticism of the government in this respect is that it has made no major effort to revise its last year's plans to meet the more pressing demands of this year. We have heard nothing since we last met of an organized plan to save more food until, as I said, we had this announcement in the speech from the throne and then the present announcement made yesterday by the Prime Minister.

The stubborn attitude of the government in connection with the food prices is in sharp contrast with the action of other important food producing nations. Only three weeks ago the United States government made important upward revisions in its food objectives for 1946. They have raised its goals for wheat, corn and soy beans by at least one million acres each. Increased seedings of other crops are also called for. Australia has requested her farmers to bring her wheat acreage back to pre-war levels by seeding four million acres more this year. Except for the belated statement of the Prime Minister issued on Sunday we have heard nothing since we last met of an organized plan to save more food. We have heard nothing of any plan to increase the production of food.

In his long prepared statement on the food crisis the Prime Minister spent more than half his time extolling the productive efforts of the farmers of Canada during the last four years. I join with him in that, because they did a good job. It is all very well to talk of the past, but what we want now and in the immediate future is more food. The government admits that the food crisis will last for from two to four years, but in all that long statement there was not one word about the efforts being made by the government to increase food production. The government confines its efforts to increasing the amount of wheat and oats exports immediately available out of the present crop. Surely the government realizes that this is a more serious emergency than that kind of policy will meet. The greatest needs are for this year, and the second greatest needs will be for the year after this.

Commenting upon the dominion-provincial conference objectives the Prime Minister says that no further statement is required in respect to the target for the 1946 wheat acreage. The farm population is urged to plan its farming so as to produce the maximum quantity of food during the next three or four years. There is only one saving grace. Even if the government does not know how to produce more food, the farmers do, and that is by producing more wheat. So we can look for a greater seeding of wheat this year, not because of the government's recommendations but in spite of them, just as the farmers will produce less hogs and dairy products this year in spite of the government's asking, recommending, and hoping for more. Just so long as the government has a so-called objectives conference and puts out pious hopings, recommendings and askings and does not give any other incentives to change, then just so long will the farmers of Canada pay little heed to them.

The government called the agricultural conference of last December an objectives conference. As I said, they put forth recommendings, askings, estimates and mostly hopings without any clear guidance in the form of varying price relationships to guide the farmer into the required or hoped for production.

The ridiculous results have been these. The government asked for four per cent more hogs; they will get twenty per cent less. They asked for two per cent more milk; they will get two per cent less. They asked for five per cent more butter; they will get five per cent less. They asked for the same wheat acreage, but the farmers are ignoring them and will soon seed more acreage. Our reports indicate that that is what they are planning to do. Is it any wonder that the farmers do not accept the government's agricultural suggestions? Unless there are some material incentives in the place of mere suggestions and hopes, they will not change their plans to suit the government.

We have had no call from the government until to-day's announcement in the house for a major effort to save food. There has been no call at all for a major effort to produce food. Those are the only two ways in which we can help. I believe that the Canadian people, if appealed to in a national drive for the conservation of food, will respond generously. I believe if the farmers are given the lead and the necessary incentives in the way of more farm labour and, in some cases, increased price, a considerably larger volume for export can be achieved. The amount that will be obtained from this request to save more food will be considerable, but it will be infinitesimal when compared with the amount that could be obtained by an increased acreage of wheat.

I believe the people of Canada can save enough food and produce that much more to raise materially the standard of nutrition in Britain, or, if it is used elsewhere, to make a material contribution to the lessening of the ill effects of under-nutrition and semi-starvation that exists in some areas. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), according to press reports, holds the view that the acreage of wheat ought not to be increased in this emergency . As I have said, the Prime Minister has taken the same position on behalf of the government.

I hold a different view. I hold the view that wheat acreage can be increased, and that it can be increased without serious risk to good farming practice and without lessening the normal acreage sown to feed grains. I hold the view not only that wheat acreage can be increased to a considerable degree to help meet this need, but that it ought to be increased for this emergency and that the government ought to come out and say so.

I know that there are lingering fears of the depressing effect of wheat surpluses on wheat prices and wheat deliveries. I know the arguments about the need for cereal grains for feed for live stock. I know the argument that in dry areas a certain proportion of the land should be allowed to lie fallow to conserve moisture for next year's crop. It has been my business for thirty years, both in research and in practice in connection with farming, to understand that. But I know also that the only way to get extra food for hungry people is either to share what we have or to grow more. We have done splendidly in both directions, particularly in the line of production, during the last few years, but we can do more.

I know we need to encourage live stock production. I suggest no diminution in efforts in that direction, but this is not the time to be increasing it or trying to maintain it on the basis of war-time demands. To-day in western Canada nearly one-third, thirty per cent, of the cultivated land devoted to growing cereal crops lies fallow each year, producing nothing. Prior to 1941 the normal amount lying fallow for that purpose was about twenty-five per cent. We have increased the percentage of fallow land lying barren every year since we started paying people to grow less acres of wheat. The wheat acreage of western Canada can be increased by nearly four million acres by going back to the percentage of summerfallow that was used prior to the time we started paying people to summerfallow and not to grow so much wheat. We do not need to reduce the acreage that is being used for feed crops for animals.

Just in that connection let me point out to hon. members one fundamental fact. An acre of land devoted to the production of cereals and producing fifteen bushels of wheat to the acre will provide a million calories, one of the chief measures of nutrition in human food. If that same amount of cereals is fed to hogs, then the calorific value of the bacon and other hog products produced will be reduced to 250,000 calories; and if it is fed to beef cattle the calorific value will be reduced to less than 100,000.

In thickly populated areas famine is not overcome by feeding to live stock cereal grains that can be used to feed people. The cereal crops fed to human beings give more than four times the amount of food value than the live stock products grown from the same amount of cereals would give to them.

I am not suggesting that we should get out of the live stock business. We need it to balance our agriculture. But we have to-day 19,400,000 acres of summerfallow out there growing nothing. The acreage in fallow under pre-war conditions would be about fifteen or sixteen million. By going back to that amount of summerfallow we can get three or four million acres more to grow wheat, which would give us thirty or forty million bushels; and in this way we will do many times more to help correct famine conditions in Britain or somewhere else than will be accomplished by all the effort to save food—though I am not discouraging the government in that policy. Save food by all means. I know that summerfallowing is good farming practice in dry areas, but in time of need it may be better to summerfallow a little less and grow more wheat to help supply this need.

The Prime Minister's statement on food policy will be a stunning blow to the food producers of Canada. It is a defeatist statement, and it places Canada in an embarrassing position compared with what other nations are doing. The dairy farmers were looking for higher returns to encourage them to increase milk production, which would not necessarily call for a very largely increased use of grain. The wheat farmers are willing to seed more wheat in the 1946-47 emergency. They are looking for more positive action.

Under present policies, food production in Canada this year will decline. Farm labour is scarce and dear. Farm costs are rising. The price ceilings and subsidies that were sufficient during the past few years are not high enough to-day to call for an expanded food production. This is the simple fact. Why are people going out of these lines of agriculture which require a lot of labour? Because of the very greatly increased cost. If the government is really anxious to help starving Europe it must provide for increased returns to food producers. The dairy farmers must have higher prices to stem the decline in milk production. Wheat farmers need to be allowed to get more of the world price if they are to seed three or four million acres of this land which will otherwise lie fallow this year, if they are to decrease the amount of fallow land from 19·4 million acres to about 16 million acres. All they have to do is, instead of summerfallowing a hundred acres, to summerfallow eighty and use the other twenty for crop.

I trust that the government's new plans will be revised further and that they will encourage greater production of cereals than their objectives conference accepted. I am pleased to note that the government's plans will include a programme for the prevention of waste of food in Canada, and I trust the government will revise its system of subsidies to provide the price incentives needed to bring forth additional production.

That means more labour for Canadian farms. Labour has been tempted away by high wages. A good many farmers feel that they cannot pay those high wages to get them back, and a good many people do not want to go back. It means price incentives which will meet the increased costs of that labour and encourage, while the scarcity of food exists, the greatest production of food that it is possible to achieve in Canada. This does not need to bring about any continuing change in farm practice. Farmers could increase the amount of summerfallow later on, from twenty-five per cent of the total to thirty per cent if there is reason for doing so. They can easily change now from letting thirty per cent lie idle to letting twenty-five per cent lie idle and thus produce more. They did not change from the old practice of letting twenty-five per cent lie idle because they thought it was wise; they changed because they were paid to change. We paid the farmers to sow fewer acres. Naturally they sowed grain on the best prepared land, and so, after paying them to grow less, we actually got more. They sowed on the better land and, with better weather and other conditions to help, the smaller acreage actually gave more wheat.

I come now to the question of restrictions and controls. The speech from the throne indicates that the government is planning to remove certain controls but to continue certain others in order, as it says, to prevent inflation. For the purposes of war this government established a system of price and wage and other controls. The nation was behind it in this principle, if not in all the details of its application. These price controls were applied in war time for the purpose, among other things, of discouraging the use of labour in the production of unessential goods where more essential things were required for winning the war. The war is now over, but the controls in considerable degree still remain. The government's policy of decontrol is so slow and so lacking in skill and foresightedness that the dangers of inflation increase. This danger threatens because of one or both of two causes—too much purchasing power, or too little goods.

I do not need to tell this house about the vastly increased purchasing power now in the hands of the Canadian people. The Royal Bank of Canada states in its monthly letter of February of this year, that bank deposits in currency alone totalled $458 per capita compared with $224 per capita in 1939. In 1939 the average monthly deposits amounted to $2·6 billion; in October, 1945, this had increased to $5·6 billion. Notes in the hands of the public increased between 1939 and October of last year from $216 million to $999 million. Eleven victory loans were floated, in which twenty-three million individual applications were made. The total bonds purchased amounted to some $12 billion. Additional surplus purchasing power was invested in $170 million of war savings certificates and war savings stamps, and $225 millions of compulsory income tax savings. A great deal of this surplus purchasing power cannot avoid being released over the next few years, and thus increase the danger of inflation.

The second danger arises from a continuing shortage of goods. A measure of control on some things is necessary; but what the government seems to forget is that by its policy it is perpetrating the very conditions that it seeks to correct, namely, the shortage of goods. The people of Canada want goods, and they want work. They do not want to see machines lying idle while those who can operate them go without work, while those with the money to purchase goods have to go without them.

[Mr. Bracken.]

The government seems not yet to have learned that price controls in peace time are laws against production. What is required more than anything else to-day to head off threatened inflation is increased production. With all respect I suggest to the government that in perpetuating unnecessary controls they are defeating the very objectives they seek to reach and are postponing the early restoration of normal peace-time conditions. I do not urge the government to engage in rash efforts of decontrol, but I do urge the government to prepare and make public, now that the war is over, a planned programme to relax wage controls on low-wage people and to free the productive processes of the country by relaxing those price control laws against production, which were made necessary in war but which in times of peace discourage what is most essential to the production of needed goods.

The speech from the throne indicates that the government is going to ask the house to approve the loan to Britain. A few days ago the government announced that it had negotiated a loan to Britain in the amount of $1,250 million, interest free for five years, and had made certain other adjustments in British-Canadian financial relations.

From the point of view of the selfish interests of Canada, the loan is amply justified. On grounds of simple justice to an ally and senior member of the commonwealth, which had suffered more severely than any other in this war, as well as on the grounds of reestablishment of good will and faith and peace in the world, no reasonable alternative is open to us. Britain sacrificed not only the blood of her sons but a quarter of her material wealth. Now, having done perhaps more per capita than any other people in the world, they find themselves having to pay tribute to other nations because they have to borrow from those nations in order to buy the goods they need. I think we have every justification for supporting this loan; we see justification for it on purely selfish grounds. The money will be spent here to give employment in this country. As a matter of fact, it is an unemployment measure for us as much as anything else. From our point of view we support the loan, not alone on the ground of British and world welfare, but on the ground of our own self-interest.

But we might as well understand what we are doing. The public has been allowed to think of this as a loan of $1,250 million. The facts are that, apart from the loan, there are several other agreements and transactions having to do with our financial relations with Britain. Among these are the cancellation of the United Kingdom debt to us of $425 million, arising out of the commonwealth air training plan; also provision for the extension of the 1942 interest-free loan to Britain until 1951, a loan which originally, I understand, was $700 million and which has been reduced now to $500 million. In addition there is the settlement of war-time claims and counter-claims between Britain and Canada, including the cost of food and other supplies furnished Britain since V-J day.

Speaking of these huge transactions, we sometimes overlook their full implications. What this loan in fact means is that for five years the Canadian taxpayer will pay interest on it which, even at 2½ per cent, will be $30 million a year, and at the same rate on the extension of the 1942 interest-free loan he will pay $14 million. On the $425 million obligation which has been written off, the Canadian taxpayer will still have to pay $10 million a year in interest, and eventually the principal as well. These figures total an annual payment exceeding $50 million for each of the next few years.

At the same time it is well that we appreciate that after all it is a contribution to prevent unemployment in Canada till trade is once more resumed. We have unemployment now. I ask anyone in Canada who opposes this measure, what unemployment would be like if we did not lend this money to Britain and have it spent in Canada in order to give jobs. As I said, it is in fact an unemployment prevention measure, to be paid for by the Canadian taxpayer to the extent that interest and principal are not fully paid by the borrower, the British taxpayer.

With some members of the government I went through the difficulties of the depression years of the thirties in Manitoba—the difficulties encountered in connection with unemployment—and I suggest that if we had been doing then some of the things that we are doing now we would have come through that condition much better than we did. In the whole of those ten years this government spent only one thousand million on relief. Now, in one loan to another country, to buy goods from us, which will enable us to give jobs to our people, it is raising and giving a loan of $1,250 million.

I come now to export credits. The government says they have extended certain credits. There is on the statute book an Export Credits Insurance Act giving the government power to advance credits to foreign countries to an amount of $750 million. I believe—

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Since the house prorogued, it is reported that a number of credits have been extended to different countries. I make no comment on this. We support the idea in principle. I should like, however, to ask three questions which I hope the minister will answer in his budget, though I would appreciate it if he could give the answer sooner. I wish to ask that the Minister of Finance advise us, at the next sitting if possible, all the countries to which credits have been advanced and the amount advanced to each. We see reports of these things in the papers, but I would ask the minister to inform us of the interest rate and terms of payment under each of these loan transactions. I also ask that the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance advise us of the financial position as between this country and Russia, what mutual aid has been given and received, and what credits or other transactions have occurred since the end of the war.

The speech from the throne refers to trade —exports and imports. This country, like many others, is seeking to save itself by increasing its exports. Somebody has told us that three persons out of every eight have jobs in Canada because we have an export business. In this connection I trust the government has learned the lesson that the last two decades have taught so clearly, namely, that nations cannot continue to export and be paid for their exports if they do not import. The nations of the world are all trying to export. Only in recent months has there been a general recognition that we have to import if we are to export.

In connection with trade matters I have two questions to ask the government. The United States government has announced plans for calling an international conference on trade. The government of Canada has been invited to attend. The United Kingdom government has invited the commonwealth countries to a free conference on the same matter, and I presume Canada will attend. In this connection I wish to ask, and I think that parliament is entitled to know, what attitude the Canadian government will take at those conferences with respect to the question of empire preference.

We are hearing much about trade agreements which the government has been negotiating with other countries. I would ask the government to make a statement at the earliest possible moment as to the terms of any agreements made since the last report was made to the house, and the present state of any negotiations now under way.

I want to refer briefly to a matter not mentioned in the speech from the throne, the question of cartels. The government tells us it is entering into agreements with the governments of other countries to permit a wider volume of international trade. The government tries to do this with a view, among other things, to increasing employment. At the same time the business of production and trade is, in some instances, falling under the domination of cartels and other production and trade agreements. Those who enter into such cartel agreements have no primary responsibility for employment, and may in some instances be defeating the purpose of constructive trade laws. This government appointed a commission to inquire into the question of cartels in Canada, and that commission has presented a report. Recommendations have been made. I am surprised that, having this report in its possession, the government has made no reference in the speech from the throne as to what it proposes to do about the recommendations the commission made. What the Canadian people will want to know, and what this house will expect to be told, is what steps the government proposes to take to implement any or all of four or five recommendations the commission made.

I should like to refer to one other item not mentioned in the speech from the throne which has to do with another report. Last year the government set up two commissions, one to deal with the taxation of family corporations and annuities, and the other to deal with the taxation of cooperatives. Both these commissions have reported. The findings of the commission dealing with the taxation of family corporations were implemented in full in so far as the commissioners were in agreement; but upon the other report no action has been taken and none has been suggested. I am aware that this is a matter to be more fully dealt with in the budget. I am referring to it now to suggest to the Minister of Finance that we shall expect some statement from him upon it. What I wish to ask is that the government advise us what it proposes to do with respect to the findings of the commission on the taxation of cooperatives. I do not want to anticipate what the minister will say in his budget, but this is one of the things we shall expect to hear about.

The taxation laws on the statute books of Canada are an accumulation of makeshift measures of over a quarter of a century and are based on no scientific taxation principle whatever. Like Topsy, they have just "growed"; and they have outgrown the capacity of the government for effective administration.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Generally speaking the taxation structure is obsolete. I think I am only saying what the government itself knows. The administration has been driven into becoming autocratic. Not only have the taxation laws become a hodgepodge of hit-or-miss measures improvised to meet the pressing needs of revenue and without regard to their effect, but many of them are fundamentally unsound in that they are regressive, discourage production, and thus defeat their chief legislative purpose, that of securing the maximum revenue with the least damage to our economy.

I am sure we were all glad to hear from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that a major reduction in taxation is to be effected in the coming budget. In its report of his address at Renfrew on March 11 last, the Ottawa Citizen quotes him as follows:

> The budget for the coming year will be reduced. It is hard to say how much. We cannot know until after the dominion-provincial conference, but it should be down some fifty per cent.

This is an important statement, especially when it comes from the Minister of National Revenue. I presume that a statement of this importance was not made without the approval of the Minister of Finance. With such a big reduction as has been promised, we will expect that when the budget is brought down it will announce an all-round tax reduction of fifty per cent. When the Minister of National Revenue accomplishes that, I think we shall be prepared to replace the present Minister of Finance and appoint him.

I come now to the question of labour relations. During the war, both organized and unorganized workers played a great part in our success. Since the war, labour in Canada on the whole has displayed commendable patience in waiting for the government to complete its reconversion programme, which the election advertisements told us would make "jobs for all". It is to the credit of labour and its leaders that during the period of waiting for the fulfilment of election promises, Canada has suffered from labour disputes in a lesser degree than some countries. But, despite labour's patient waiting, nothing is suggested in the speech from the throne to help bring confidence to labour in its search for a secure position in our economy. Nor is there even a word of tribute to labour for the part it played.

In the past the British North America Act has been cited by the government as the reason for our having no national labour code. To an extent this does present some difficulties, but there is nothing to prevent parliament at this session from passing a national labour code covering government services, crown companies, government contractors, transportation services, such as railways, steamships, canals, et cetera.

A proper labour code covering these employments would be an indication of good faith on the part of the federal government and would lend encouragement to the provincial governments to join in the national code, or to make their own in conformity with it. It would constitute an example and a model. It would help greatly to achieve industrial stability and industrial peace throughout Canada.

The national code should provide for the certification of trade unions; make possible collective bargaining in keeping with present-day trends in harmonious labour-management relations; provide for minimum wages sufficient to establish decent standards of living, maximum working hours, a minimum age for those entering employment, equal pay for equal work, regardless of sex; vacations and statutory holidays with pay, and the setting up of administrative machinery truly representative of labour, management and government.

I do not suggest that the obligations of the government would be concluded with the passage of such legislation. I believe that there rests upon the federal government a responsibility to give leadership, and that the government should at once summon a dominion-provincial conference on labour relations to set in motion plans for what might be called a charter of industrial peace and progress of Canada. This is a matter distinct from the taxation problems now occupying the attention of a dominion-provincial conference, and should be considered separately. At such a conference, an attempt should be made to secure agreement on the major principles of labour relations on their merits, and an agreement on the part of the provinces to pass the required uniform statutes to bring about a standardized procedure from coast to coast in Canada. It is not enough to pay lip service to the cause of labour. Definite and specific action is required if labour is to be brought into that real partnership in our economy without which harmonious and proper national development is impossible. The goal of full employment can be achieved only by a true partnership of labour, industry, agriculture and the government. This goal cannot be achieved unless we can find a way to lessen the losses of time, wages, money and production that arise, if our economy is constantly disturbed by strikes and lockouts.

I come now to another matter not mentioned in the speech from the throne, a matter which was the subject of a good deal of discussion here last year. I refer to the question of orders in council. The Canadian government claims to be a responsible government. Parliament delegates sparingly its authority to the government, yet in war time much of its legislation was enacted by order in council, sometimes behind the back of parliament and even when parliament was sitting. Once the war was over it was expected that this practice would cease. We fought this issue in the last session of parliament. Parliament nevertheless granted the government a modified form of this authority. In doing so we were assured by the government, or so we understood, not only that orders in council would be made available to us but that there were no secret orders in council. It now transpires that there was at least one secret order which had been in existence for two months at the very time the government gave us the assurance that there were none. We were misled generally on the question of there being no more secret orders, and we were misled specifically when the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) stated, as reported in Hansard of December 6, 1945, at page 3026:

> That is not a secret order, and there are no secret orders.

I feel sure the Minister of Justice did not mean to mislead this house, but I say quite frankly that when that statement was made we were misled, because there was then in existence a secret order in council which came to light only a few weeks ago. Last session parliament granted the government special emergency powers, but these were granted in the expectation that no orders in council would be withheld from us. We certainly had a right to expect that the government would not mislead us in so serious a matter. Whatever justification the government can now make for having passed this secret order in council, it certainly misled this house last year. Will the government say now whether there are any other secret orders in existence?

The speech from the throne states that demobilization is proceeding rapidly and that most of the veterans are home with the exception of a few in the occupation army. This government has had much to say about the status of Canada as a nation. It has spread abroad the idea that Canada is to play its part as an important power in the maintenance of international peace. It has subscribed to the united nations organization, committing this country to do its fair share in the maintenance of peace. In that spirit it undertook to share the duties of occupying enemy territory in Europe, but it has recently announced that we will no longer share these duties.

With the policy of bringing back to Canada those who went abroad to fight the war, we are in agreement; but according to peace-time plans announced by the Minister of National Defence we are to have a standing army of 25,000 men. Meanwhile the government gives us no indication as to whether the occupation forces that are being withdrawn are to be replaced by any other troops. This government committed itself at San Francisco to sharing in the responsibilities of peace. Having sent an occupation force into Germany, it now withdraws that force, leaving Britain to assume Canada's self-imposed task. What the people of this country expect and what parliament desires is a satisfactory explanation of that procedure—not as to bringing home the boys who went away to fight the war, but as to the government's sudden change of policy in respect to sharing the occupational duties with our allies. What we want to know is whether the government is backing away from the international responsibility it assumed at San Francisco, or some other explanation that will justify leaving to Britain alone the burden of occupying the British zone in Germany.

Now I should like to say just a brief word on dominion-provincial relations. The speech from the throne tells us that the coordinating committee met in January, and progress was made. It is to meet again on April 25, and we are told that we may have some legislation arising out of that meeting. Throughout the life of this government this problem has been before the Canadian people. For ten years it has been before it in an intensified form, yet the government has been scarcely able to keep abreast of the problem, let alone accomplish its solution. The government knows the problem; it has known it for years, yet it has permitted inequities to continue. This parliament, if I do not misjudge it, will expect the government to see to it that whatever weaknesses are inherent in our dominion-provincial set-up are corrected in such a way as to assure a reasonable standard of social services for Canadian citizens in whatever part of the country they may happen to live. I think the parliament of Canada will support such a policy, and I sincerely trust that the representatives of this government and the representatives of the provinces will be able to accomplish an understanding that will achieve this objective.

I have now referred to most of the matters touched upon in the speech from the throne, but parliament and the House of Commons has more to do than pass and administer laws. The parliament of Canada is a big business institution. The business of government in Canada is the biggest business in Canada, and it affects us all very intimately. For five minutes I want to refer to that business. I referred to it a year ago, and the Prime Minister did not like it. He thought it was a matter for the budget, but this is the last opportunity to raise these matters before the budget is brought down, hence I want to leave these suggestions with the government before that time.

Before the war the government's annual expenditures were, in round figures, $500,000,000. In the last fiscal year they were ten times that amount, over $5,000,000,000. I am not at the moment criticizing that. In 1950, with the war five years behind us, it has been estimated that unless the government mends its ways we shall be spending between $1,500 million and $2,000 million a year; in other words three or four times what we spent in the peace-time years shortly before the war. At the moment I am presenting these facts only in order that we may look at them and try to figure out how best to meet the situation.

In the war years about half the cost of the war was paid out of taxes; the other half became a mortgage on the taxpayers in the form of debt. In the last year before the war our gross debt was $3,700 million. At the end of the fiscal year ending in 1945 it had grown to $15,700 million, or more than four times the pre-war amount. At the pace at present indicated by the government, the gross debt in 1950 it has been estimated may approach $20,000 million which, even at 2½ per cent, would carry an annual interest burden approaching the total of all government expenditures in the year before the war.

With respect to taxes, the government collected from all sources in the year before the war, in round figures, the sum of $500 million; and in the 1945 fiscal year it collected more than five times as much or over $2,600 million.

What is the result of all these increased expenditures, increased debts and increased taxes? In 1929 the government took just eight per cent of the people's total income in taxes. In 1939 it took over twelve per cent. In the war years it took much more, for which we make no complaint. But when the end of the war is five years distant, if we are to judge by the way government commitments are piling up now, the proportion of the people's income taken in taxes by the government is likely to approximate twenty-five per cent. This may vary four per cent or five per cent either way. What the taxpayers will think of that tax load, when they protested so vigorously against paying eight per cent before the war, it is not difficult to guess.

I have four general criticisms and one suggestion with respect to the government's conduct of its business affairs.

1. The government is going too deeply into debt, and conducting its business too extravagantly, having in mind the possibility of a lower national income or a set-back in our economy, once the immediate domestic and post-war needs are met.

2. The weight of the taxation to carry the heavy load imposed upon us by the government is discouraging production, both on the part of workers and on the part of business.

3. Government extravagance, inexcusable at any time, is criminal at a time like this; and the government has shown no evidence that it is capable of checking that extravagance. In this connection I trust that the committee dealing with war assets will be set up early and that it will get to grips with a situation which is far from satisfactory in the minds of many people in Canada.

4. The government has completely failed to live up to its election promises with respect to reduced taxation and, in this regard, has misled the people. They were promised reduced taxes, and this condition has not been forthcoming. I suggest that, whatever else it may do, it is imperative that the government increase the exemptions allowed to the lower income groups.

I now approach a question which may be somewhat of a surprise to hon. members—although I do not think it will. This is a matter which has been considered from time to time for many years and about which very little has been done. I refer to the matter of government procedure. I have been discussing legislation and administration, and have touched briefly upon the business arrangements necessary for the carrying out of that legislation. I should like now, in a constructively critical way, to look at the procedure we follow in the house to get our work done.

I watched carefully last autumn the procedure of the first session of the twentieth parliament of Canada, and tried to appreciate its maze of forms and conventions. After faithful attendance and critical observation throughout the whole session I formed several definite impressions. I had already learned to respect the necessity for rules based on the precedent of long years of British parliamentary practice. But British parliamentary practice has left us far behind. Our Canadian practice is still in the ox-cart stage of half a century ago. The theory seems to be that because these were once regarded as good and because they came to us from the mother of parliaments, there is not much we can do to effect improvements.

I found that the procedure followed was centred too much around legislation; that it invited talk to occupy too much the right of way. I found, also, a too-meticulous worship of outmoded rules, and I found that the business of government was relegated to a secondary place. We know the brief time that was allowed to consider the expenditure of about $5,000 million of the people's money.

I found that this worship of outmoded rules was leading us into dictatorship in the form of order in council government, and this to the detriment of a really effective and responsible parliament. My impressions and suggestions can be briefly stated as follows:

1. I found the procedure to be slow, clumsy, wasteful of time and excessively conventional.

2. I considered that the rules required simplification and modernization, and to be made more democratic and more practical.

I trust that the government will not take offence at my next impression. It is this:

3. I reached the view that the government allows itself to perpetuate these antiquated forms because they enable it the better to thwart the opposition and to protect its own interests as a party in control of the procedure of the house. I am frank to say that I was in the position the government now occupies, for more than twenty years, and I know how these complex procedures get in the opposition's way. I was convinced that, whatever merit these rules may have as a whole, they succeed in frustrating private members of the house.

4. I reached the conclusion—

(a) that the debate on the speech from the throne should and can be shortened;

(b) that the legislation brought before the house should and can be expedited;

(c) that the budget and the estimates both should receive far more consideration than government procedure allows.

5. It is my view that—

(a) The debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne could be shortened by agreement among the parties as to the disposition of time. To such mutual agreement, for the sake of expediting business, I am prepared now to commit this party.

(b) The legislation can be expedited by dealing in the house with only the main principles of measures introduced, and by referring to committees the consideration of the detail they contain.

(c) with respect to the budget and estimates, it is my view—

(1) That the estimates, as is now customary, should be tabled immediately after the speech from the throne is disposed of.

(2) That the budget should come down at the same time or closely following. This has not been the rule. What do we do now? We vote away millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money, before we know how much we are going to get by way of revenue or what changes in taxation are proposed. Then, after having done that, the Minister of Finance comes here and says, "We have undertaken to spend so much; we will have to raise a revenue of this amount." I suggest that this is not business-like, and that members of the House of Commons ought to know what the provisions are for the raising of revenue at the time they are passing the expenditures.

(3) That motions to go into supply should be made at least once weekly, on a day when such motion is debatable, so that members of parliament may not be denied the right to discuss matters they may regard as of pressing public importance. In Great Britain, where they adjourn a little earlier than we do here, I understand the adjournment motion is debatable. My suggestion is made so that hon. members may not be denied under the rules the right to raise matters of major public importance at least once weekly.

(4) That much more time should be allowed for consideration of the estimates and that definite days from the beginning of the session should be set aside for this purpose.

I do not think we should be giving the major part of our time at the beginning of the session to the consideration of legislation with the temptation to do too much talking and then be crowded into pushing money appropriations through without due consideration. The unseemly and unbusinesslike rush in voting away the people's money at the end of each session is a procedure unworthy of a responsible parliament. It is in our hands, the hands of the members of the different parties in this house, to remedy this matter. I am prepared to sit in and help. I suggest that the way to proceed is to have, not a large committee with everybody having different ideas as to how to do it but a committee made up of a few people determined to modernize the rules and ready to go about doing it

(5) That the estimates of each department should be referred to a committee for the consideration of detail, the discussions in the house to be confined as far as possible to major items.

The government may not like some of these things, but the members of the House of Commons are entitled to know more of the details than they now get.

(6) It is my view that the whole committee structure of the house should be revamped, many of the present committees having no relationship to reality and some of them seldom functioning. There should be ten or more committees to cover the work of the different departments of the government. Each committee should have the power to review orders in council. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how many members of the House of Commons have read one-hundredth part of the orders in council that have been passed by this government? We just do not know what they contain. As I say, each committee should have the power to review orders in council affecting the work of the committee, to consider estimates, to ask questions relating to any departmental matter of public interest and to consult any or all officials. The members of the House of Commons are relatively ignorant of what is going on in these departments because we do not have access to the people who know the details. In the house there are 245 people who want to ask questions, but the great majority have no chance to ask them.

Each committee should have the power to consider the public accounts of the department concerned. Coming into this house from the outside, I thought one of the most serious criticisms was the failure of the house to use the public accounts committee. It is not for the sake of trying to prove that somebody is a rogue. I do not think anyone sitting over there is a rogue and I hope you will not force us to wait until we think you are rogues before you let us get into these departments and ask what is going on in order that we may know the people's business better. I think it would do the government itself a lot of good to find out the things that are there that need improvement and that the government itself would like to remedy.

These committees, if allowed to develop, could become a really effective aid to more businesslike and constructive parliamentary government. It is my opinion that if some procedure such as I have suggested were adopted we could get through the work of the session in three-quarters of the time and do much better work.

I come now to a question which was not mentioned in the speech from the throne but which has been the subject of great public interest during the last month—espionage. The speech from the throne mentioned many things, most of which, as I have said, were mentioned when parliament met last year, but one thing it did not mention. It did not mention the one matter above all others that is occupying the attention of the Canadian people to-day. It did not mention the espionage proceedings that have been so much before the public.

On the day the government made its first announcement with respect to this matter I was given some intimation by the Prime Minister of the nature of the facts that had come to the attention of the government. On the same day, after the announcement had been made public, I issued a statement to the press that the government was to be commended for proceeding to take action on the basis of the facts in its possession. I have not since varied from the position that I took on that day.

When oaths are violated against the provisions of the Official Secrets Act, when information is improperly conveyed by civil servants in high ranking positions to the government of a foreign power, when these civil servants hold important positions as some did in this case in departments of government, such as the national research council, the office of the British high commissioner in Canada and one in a very confidential position in the office of the Prime Minister of Canada—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not in the Prime Minister's office, in the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: A department the Prime Minister presides over.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not the Prime Minister's office.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister presides over it.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am glad to be corrected by the Prime Minister. It is more correct to say that one of these persons was in a very confidential position in the office of a department over which the Prime Minister presides. When, as we were informed the latter part of last week, these things are being done in some instances because of a higher loyalty than that to Canada, then under such conditions it is high time that the facts of the matter should be speedily and thoroughly investigated and exposed and that those charged, if found guilty, should be brought to justice and that the public service of Canada be purged of all such influences of disloyalty and disaffection.

But there is a well recognized procedure that modern states follow in such instances, and that procedure guarantees certain rights to individuals who are charged with crimes against the state. In this case some sections of the public have become alarmed. It is charged that the government has resorted to star chamber methods and has denied to individuals certain rights guaranteed by law. We commend the government for searching out enemies of the state, particularly in the field of conspiring with representatives of governments of other powers, but the Canadian people in large numbers have become concerned lest in the carrying out of this duty the government is invading one of the inalienable rights that British justice has secured for individuals. It is feared by many that a dangerous precedent is being established.

In this respect, criticism of the government may well await the government's fuller explanation of its departure from ordinary procedure in such matters. But we will expect a clear and explicit statement from the government as to why, in its judgment, such extraordinary procedure was necessary. Until that statement is forthcoming the government cannot expect to be immune from doubt on the part of many who, while wishing to search out the guilty, will wish to preserve inviolate the rights of individuals that British justice has not denied for generations past. The Prime Minister last week, in reply to questions, promised to make a full statement on this matter in his speech to follow mine to-day. He answered it partly the other day. I wish now before he speaks to direct some questions to him, which I trust he will answer in the course of his address.

The order in council initiating the proceedings was dated October 6, 1945. One question I would ask is this: why was this matter held in suspense from that date until a few weeks ago? I am sure the Prime Minister will be answering that; probably he would have done so in any event, if I had not asked it.

Will the Prime Minister advise the house whether this matter was the subject of discussion with the governments of the United States and Great Britain?

Will the Prime Minister give us some indication as to how widely these subversive activities have extended throughout Canada? It may be that he cannot answer that definitely.

In seeking information on this matter, I have no thought of embarrassing the government. This is a matter which may have very far-reaching consequences for all Canadians; and I believe that the ends of justice and the interests of Canada will be best served by the government taking the parliament and people of Canada into its confidence, and making the public fully aware of the extent and seriousness of the matters involved. We are anxious not only that the public service be purged of all such subversive influences, but also that we as members of parliament can assure those who sent us here that we are taking effective steps to ensure that there will be no recurrence of these activities in the future. I feel sure that these are matters with which the Prime Minister will deal to-night.

I come now to a matter which the government, in the speech from the throne, indicated was very important. Its words were:

> The future of our own and of every country depends upon success in the task of world reconstruction, and the establishment of an enduring peace.

That is a question not of our domestic affairs but of our international affairs. I want for the remainder of my remarks to deal with the question of foreign policy.

We are met here to-day at a critical time in the affairs of a troubled world. The nations are facing one of the great cross-roads of human history. They have no choice but to make solemn and far-reaching decisions. Upon those decisions—the wise charting of our future course—the destiny of mankind very largely depends. I agree with the government when it says that this is an important matter. The alternative paths become clearer day by day. They are clearer now than they have ever been before. We can have peace and progress or we can have anarchy and the reversion to worse conditions than the dark ages. The choice is in our hands to make.

In the first glow of victory of last May, and again in August, when the welcome news came that the war was over, the vision of permanent peace and progress appeared to be realized. Since then, slowly but inexorably, the fearsome knowledge has been borne in upon us that we still have another fight to win: this time a battle for peace, a battle that is quite as urgent, quite as difficult, and in some respects harder to fight than the battle for victory in war. The end of armed hostilities we now recognize as but the commencement of an even more stubborn and relentless battle for peace and progress among men.

I have used the phrase, "the battle for peace and progress." There is no better phrase for what lies ahead. It will be a battle, a great and unceasing struggle against all the forces that have been the cause of war and poverty and pestilence in the world. On the side of right will be ranged the intelligence and sanity bequeathed to us by the accumulated wisdom of generations of mankind, and against us will be ranged all the dark forces which have denied the peace and prosperity and well-being which is the gift of science to this generation if we have but the collective wit to use it.

In war we met German aggression by our own aggression, German destruction by our instruments of destruction. We must now by sanity disarm aggression, substitute production for destruction, and settle our international disputes, not by the blood of our sons but by the force of reason.

In recent months optimism has given place to pessimism. Recurring waves of hope, of cynicism and of fatalism have swept across the world. It has become fashionable to be critical of the united nations organization. It is easy for men of little faith to predict its failure. As for myself, I am not one of those. I believe that a good beginning has been made in the building of a new international order, one which eventually will be strongly based on moral precepts and the rule of law. This new order of diplomacy is suffering growing pains. Plain speaking has replaced drawing-room courtesy. The nations of the world have reached a point of crisis.

It is a time for steady hands, a time for restraint, a time for caution, a time for sanity in both our thinking and our speaking. In these days we must recognize that enduring peace can be founded only upon the intellectual and moral solidarity of all the nations of mankind. Peace based upon political and economic expedients will not survive. The defences of peace must be soundly laid on the basis of free exchange of knowledge and ideas and resources throughout the world and a recognition of the rights of all peoples to govern themselves without dictation from outside.

The united nations organization is the present hope of mankind for world peace. To that organization this parliament has already given its unanimous allegiance. That allegiance we shall never withdraw. The obligations assumed we shall carry out. There are some who fear that this organization may fail.

But it can succeed. It will succeed, if ordinary people the world over are helped to recognize that peace is the responsibility of all, not merely the responsibility of delegates of governments.

Where does Canada stand in this picture? What is our role to be? In this new world of science and modern transportation Canada has suddenly discovered herself to be the geographic and strategic centre of the continents. In the past we have thought ourselves protected by the oceans and isolated from the spheres of influence making for war. Bounded by three great oceans, we appeared to be a favoured and protected unit in a world that had not learned to live without war. If ever that were true it is certainly not true to-day. The three oceans no longer isolate or protect us. On the contrary they but provide an uninterrupted highway over which hostile agents of destruction can search us out between dawn and daylight from any angle of the compass. Any global map shows us where we are, in the centre of the great land masses of the globe, a possible modern Flanders in a world war.

Our geography has become at once our greatest danger and our greatest challenge. We have no choice now but to throw our weight positively in the direction of peace and order in the world. We are not mere spectators of the international scene. From this time on we are actors as well as spectators on the world stage. Those sacred acres of European and other soil "which are forever Canada" will not permit us again to shirk our responsibilities as a nation.

To make our full international contribution Canada must have a continuous and consistent foreign policy. Improvisation is not good enough to ensure continuity. To ensure the full assumption of our world responsibilities it is imperative among other things that a separate ministry of external affairs be created. Foreign policy is too vital to be left to the spare-time direction of a harassed Prime Minister. I was glad to hear the announcement this afternoon that the Prime Minister recognizes that he is already carrying too heavy a load, and that provision is being made so that sometime, I do not know how soon, that load may be shared by someone else.

Canada is now an international power. Her responsibilities in the cause of peace are potentially heavy. Her obligations are great.

Complacency in the past has been the scourge of our generation, and unpreparedness and appeasement the cause of war. All this complacency, unpreparedness and appeasement will have the same results in the future as in the past. Let them be cast off now and forever. Canada is now invested with the moral responsibility for sharing the price of world peace, and I venture the solemn prediction that unless we are true to the sacrifices of our sons we will be equally guilty with aggressors for any anarchy that may again confront us.

We have paid a terrible price for a war that could have been prevented. Our default was not wholly in lack of military preparation. It was also in a negative attitude of irresponsibility. Everyone preached about rights, but little was heard about responsibilities, and the dictators saw in this attitude a lack of unity of purpose and of faith. Furthermore, there were in our midst people who exalted novel and foreign types of government and at the same time condemned British institutions upon which our Canadian way of life was built.

Dictators preached that our democratic institutions were decadent. After world war 1 we placed all the emphasis on status, autonomy, political decentralization; meantime, the technological forces of the universe were driving nation states against their will toward world inter-dependence and forced cooperation.

I do not raise these matters for the purpose of recrimination, but I trust that from now on there will be less irresponsible talk on the part of public men in this country. Canadians will expect that public men will not again seek votes in certain parts of this country on the basis that they, if elected, will keep the country at peace and that their opponents, if elected, will drive the country into war.

The ultimate solution is of course a world government, but humanity will have a long and hard road to travel before that utopian objective is achieved. In the meantime, this parliament must decide what part Canada is to play in our journey along that road. What then is to be our policy? Where in fact do we stand? Let us be done with any doubts on that matter.

We see before us a world dividing into blocs and spheres of influence. It is recognized that there are now three great powers. Does anyone here wish to see these major spheres of influence reduced from three to two? What would the next step be? It would be a contest between two powers for world domination, and Canada would find itself in the front line of that contest.

Surely that is a prospect that none of us can contemplate with equanimity. I suggest therefore that the preservation and strengthening of the commonwealth of British nations is at this stage in our history the best hope of permanent peace in a world dominated by three spheres of influence. Within that family of nations there is now no single dominating land power. Its organization by its very nature makes for peace and not for war. Positive knowledge by the world as well as by members of the commonwealth that Canada means to be a loyal partner in that family of nations will do more than anything else to give it the moral power and prestige now so essential to the cause of world peace.

If we now fail that great family of British nations and it should thus be made weaker at this critical time in the world's history, Canada will eventually find itself but a satellite of the United States of America, at first to become dominated by it economically, and later on to become absorbed politically into that great republic.

I am one who does not think that Canada can achieve her highest destiny by weakening the family of British nations only to become eventually a forty-ninth state in the American union. If any such world calamity as the break-up of the fraternity of British nations should occur, the North American continent would find itself eventually an island in a potentially unfriendly world, a consummation which I feel sure no friend of world peace can look forward to with an easy mind.

Looking at the geography and political structure of the world at the moment, I am of the firm belief that the British commonwealth and empire, with its ramifications in all corners of the world, constitutes the greatest cohesive element in that structure of world unity which is now for the first time taking a definite form in the minds of men. Let us then preserve the important balancing factor in the three spheres of influence that dominate it. Let us strengthen that community of nations called the British commonwealth. Let us be proud to acknowledge our faith in it and the part we are to play in it. Let us no longer be hesitant to say that we will do our part in preserving it. Let any nation that raises the ugly prospect of destroying peace in our time know that we in Canada are a firm and loyal partner, not alone within the family of British nations but in the larger family of the united nations as well, and that we are prepared to take our part and assume our obligations within both.

Mr. Speaker, in some of these remarks I have been critical of certain of the policies of the government and its administration of them. I wish now to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

That the following words be added to the said address:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:

(1) Failed to meet the needs of veterans and workers by planning reconversion so as to avoid unemployment and dislocation;

(2) Failed to take adequate and timely action to ensure the provision of suitable housing for Canadians;

(3) Failed to adjust their agricultural production plans to meet the altered conditions of the world's demands;

(4) Failed to relieve the tax burden particularly on low income groups."

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) continued the debate following the mover and the seconder on Friday last, he very appropriately introduced his remarks by reference to the departure of the then Governor General and the arrival in the near future of the Governor General designate. I should like immediately to join with him in what he said with respect to both governors-general. We have parted with Lord Athlone and with Princess Alice, with the deepest regret. I believe that regret has been felt in all parts of Canada.

I am sure the house will be pleased to know that on Sunday I received a telegram from Lord Athlone from Washington expressing very warm appreciation of the manner in which the citizens of the capital had turned out to greet him and Princess Alice on their departure, and referring more particularly to the feelings which they will always cherish in regard to the years they spent in Canada. Lord Athlone used the expression that their association with the people of this dominion will be for each of them an imperishable memory.

As the house is aware His Majesty the King has designated Lord Alexander of Tunis to be the successor of the former Governor General. I think I am correct in saying that when Lord Alexander's appointment was announced there was not only approval but rejoicing in all parts of Canada that one who had played such a brilliant part in the great war, and who, as their Commander, had been so closely associated with Canadian troops in the battles in Sicily and in Italy, and in the victories there achieved, was to come to this country as the representative of the king. The approval given at that time, and the expressions of feeling, have deepened since the announcement was made. I need not say any more at the moment than that I am sure that when Lord Alexander arrives in Canada he will receive one of the warmest welcomes ever extended to any representative of the crown in this country.

My hon. friend also very kindly made reference to the speeches delivered by the mover and the seconder of the address, my friends and colleagues in my party, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters). I should like to join my congratulations very warmly to those of the leader of the opposition. The mover and the seconder with the accustomed modesty of young and new members credited their selection as being a compliment to their constituencies. I may say I think the constituencies may feel complimented by the manner in which they were represented in the speeches which were made by their representatives in this house. The hon. members come not only from two of the very important but two of the historic regions of Canada. At the moment, time does not permit me to speak of St. Boniface and its relation to the development of the Canadian west, or of Queens-Lunenburg and its association with the development of the maritimes, and the place which each of those constituencies holds to-day in the industrial and commercial life of our country. But I should like to say that there were other reasons as well which caused my colleagues and myself to feel that we would wish to have these two members, in particular, address the house at the beginning of this debate. They are among the younger men who came into parliament for the first time after the last elections. I should think that for that reason alone we as their colleagues in this house have reason to be proud of the addition which has been made to the debating strength of the house by their presence here. But they are also veterans of the great war. May I say that naturally the people of Canada would wish to have as those first to participate in a great debate, members of parliament who have taken their part in the service of their country as members of the armed forces.

In recent years both of the hon. members have also taken an active part in the public service of Canada. In different ways they have been public servants holding trusted positions, and have filled them in a manner that was most creditable to themselves. These are but some of the reasons which caused me to extend the invitation which I did. May I repeat how pleased all their colleagues were at the manner in which they addressed the house. I think I may associate members of all parties in the congratulations which I now extend to them.

There was just one thing, perhaps, that I found a little embarrassing in their remarks; it was the extremely generous way in which they referred to myself and my leadership of the party. I have no doubt that that will be offset before very long by something from the other side which may help to adjust the balance; but I should like to say that if I have been spared through many years to hold the position I have it is due above all else to those who I have had immediately around me as my colleagues in the cabinet and, other members in the House of Commons in the party to which I belong. In enunciating Liberal policies I have sought as best I could to give expression to what I believed to be the views of the Liberal party in Canada. Through the years that I have held my present position I have been extremely fortunate in having about me colleagues second to none any prime minister has ever had in his cabinet or as loyal followers in parliament.

I come now to my hon. friend's address of this afternoon. Here may I note at the outset what he has said, and rightly said, about what may be said in a debate on the speech from the throne. My hon. friend intimated that, after all, the debate on the speech from the throne is partly formal procedure for the purpose of opening parliament and therefore should be made brief in order that the house may get down to business—the business about which he said a good deal this afternoon—and not lose too much time. He did not set us the best example in the matter of shortening the debate. May I say that I am ready to join with him and the other leaders immediately in seeking to work out an agreement as to shortening the length of the present debate. I think it is desirable that the debate on the address should be brief; but may I point out that when it comes to making these arrangements it is not always as easy to bring about the result as it is to tell others what should be done. If there were only my hon. friend and myself, the two of us, or myself and any one of the other two leaders, we could I think come to an agreement; but where there are one, two or three leaders of the opposition, not to mention one or two others who feel they have a sort of right to lead as well, it is very difficult to get an agreement by which all parties will be bound. However, I do hope we may come to some agreement at once in regard to the length of this debate.

Then, with respect to the rules of the house, of which my hon. friend has spoken, may I say that the government intend to recommend the reappointment of the committee on the rules of the house. I hope and pray that the committee may get down to work immediately and that it may be able to present to parliament at an early date something in the way of a revision of the rules which will help to shorten the discussion. I am not going into the various points my hon. friend raised this afternoon. Many of them have been raised over and over again in this parliament for years by others who have had just as high motives as those of the leader of the opposition in the proposals they have made. But this House of Commons is a big institution; it is the master of its own house. It is not the government that is responsible for the rules and much of the procedure; it is the house as a whole.

In connection with proper procedure may I say to my hon. friend that I believe the one thing above all others which will help is that we recognize there is an appropriate time for everything. With all due respect may I say that to-day my hon. friend tried to cover nearly every subject that is likely to be discussed in the course of the present session. That is a pretty big order; it has taken a good deal of time. He has spoken on employment, on housing, on repatriation, on the loan to Britain, on credits; he has made a budget speech as well as a speech on the address. Not only that—he concluded with a lengthy speech on foreign policy. May I suggest that if he wants to improve the procedure of the house from now on he select one topic at a time, limit the number and not try to cover everything in the course of the debate on the address.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would you confine the leader of the opposition to one topic on the speech from the throne?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, by no means; as my hon. friend rightly said, the speech from the throne affords an opportunity to discuss anything. But I should have thought in the light of the amendment he has proposed what my hon. friend would have done would have been to make one general blast; that he would have come out and said in one short denunciation that everything the government had done was wrong, and that as a matter of fact they had failed to do anything. He could have greatly shortened his speech if he had just put it into those few words, but he lost the effect such a statement might have had by first of all running through a long list of topics and trying to exhaust all that he could say on every single one.

However, my hon. friend failed to point out to the house that while employment may not be all that we would wish it to be; while housing may not be all that we would wish it to be; while repatriation may not be all that we would wish it to be, and so on in regard to all these and the other subjects he has mentioned, nevertheless, Canada is to-day in a better position than any other country in the world. When one hears from all the countries that are really struggling with their problems to-day, whether it is the United States, whether it is the United Kingdom, whether it is Belgium or Holland or the other countries of Europe or other dominions that were involved in this great war—I am not referring to enemy countries because we know they are all destroyed—from every one of these countries comes word, "We wish we could be like Canada. We wish we were in the position Canada is in." No other country in the world stands as high in the eyes of the world as Canada stands to-day, and I think it an unfortunate thing that the one view to the contrary should be expressed in this House of Commons by one of our own Canadian citizens, the leader of one of our political parties. That is the corrective I want to make this afternoon to what my hon. friend has said. As far as employment is concerned there is not, in any other country in the world, as large a percentage of men employed as there is in Canada at this time; nor is there, may I point out, another country in which there has been as little in the way of industrial strife. That is a very important thing. It has not been a matter of chance. It has been a matter of the policies of this administration over many years and, may I say, it has been due in very special measure to the exceptional ability of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) of this government in adjusting labour relations. That is something to be proud of, something this country can, I will not say boast about, but at least feel a tremendous satisfaction in, namely that we have had such a record of comparative industrial peace since V-J day.

In regard to rehabilitation, my hon. friend knows that as far as the return of our forces from overseas is concerned we stand very much in the lead in the numbers that have been successfully repatriated. Certainly we have not been able to meet the situation in its entirety, but what country has, not only at this time but at any time? What is needed it seems to me is a proper sense of proportion in these matters. In regard to housing the speech from the throne mentions quite clearly that the demand is in excess of the supply; but here again I ask, in what other country, relatively speaking, is there a larger proportion of houses available than in this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask my hon. friends to mention any other country. Will they say that in Great Britain they are in a better position as far as housing is concerned? Will they say that in the United States they are in a better position? Will they say the position is better in Belgium or in Holland; in Australia or New Zealand, South Africa or anywhere else? As a matter of fact when one compares Canada with these other countries in the matter of housing we make a better showing, in relation to our numbers, than any other country at the present time.

Mr. MACDONNELL: Give us some figures to prove it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's leader is the one who made his statement to begin with, and perhaps he will give us his figures.

Mr. MACDONNELL: Give us the figures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will just bide his time he may get his chance for leadership, before his life is over.

The leader of the opposition next spoke about food production and agriculture in general. I would again ask him: Can any hon. member in the opposition point to any country in the world which has made a finer contribution in the last few years than has Canada, and which to-day is continuing to make a finer contribution in the export of food stuffs to help other countries?

Then my hon. friend found fault with controls. Again I wish that he might take a little more to heart what other countries are saying about Canada in this respect. I wonder what country would not give a great deal to be in our enviable position, because of our anti-inflation policy and the successful manner in which it has worked out? Will any hon. member mention any country which has dealt more successfully with that most difficult of all problems, namely, the combatting of inflation?

The truth is that my hon. friend has not stopped to ask himself where this country would have been but for the government's policies in all these matters. I ask the people of Canada to think deeply on that point when they are asked to express condemnation by those who are saying the government has failed in this, failed in that or the other thing.

All one has to do is to compare the relative costs of living in Canada with those in any other country of the world to realize that in Canada the government's policy has been a great help to the masses of the people, and has been more successful than similar activities have been in other countries. That is the kind of emphasis that is needed.

My hon. friend has said that we failed to do this and to do that. The truth of the matter is that my hon. friend has failed to grasp what our policies—framed not at the last moment, but years in advance—have meant to Canada, and what they mean to-day.

Had we not introduced and passed at a previous parliament legislation setting up the Department of Health and Welfare, with its administration of family allowances, and the Department of Veterans Affairs—again, administering, the best measures for veterans to be found anywhere in the world—my hon. friend would have found a situation very different indeed from the one to be found in Canada to-day.

Had we not provided in advance for the Department of Reconstruction, to replace the Department of Munitions and Supply, thereby making preparations in advance for the work to be carried on most effectively in the post-war period, I wonder where we would be to-day. And may I add this—and I do not think the fact will be disputed,—that the Liberal, Conservative and every other political party in this country is loud in its praise, and rightly so, of the magnificent work done by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). In like manner the veterans of this country are loud in their praise of the magnificent work done on their behalf by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). War veterans to-day have in Canada a charter all but completed, in which is to be found legislation related to the many sides of their work and of their lives. Again I say the like of this is not to be found in any other country.

My hon. friend did say he approved of the loan to the United Kingdom, and I was pleased to hear him say that. I believe he appreciates, as do all thoughtful persons who have given study to the condition of the world to-day, the sacrifices made by Great Britain during the war, and the position in which she finds herself to-day in seeking to meet her obligations. I believe it is realized that if Great Britain is to be maintained in a position where she can play a helpful role among the nations, then she must be re-established in a way which will help toward that end.

My hon. friend spoke of a gift. This is not a gift; it is a loan. True, it is being made for a long period of time; and I have no doubt in the world that as my hon. friend has said if the loan were not made this country as well as the United Kingdom would find itself in a very difficult position within a short time.

Mr. BRACKEN: Did the Prime Minister understand me to say it was a gift? I did not mean to say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the hon. member did say that, because I made a note of it at the time. It may have been a slip on his part, and I am quite prepared to accept his word. It is wise, however, to make it clear that we are making a loan. However this is one of the matters which will be discussed at considerable length, later in the session, and I feel I need not take too much time in discussing any aspect of the measure at this time. I expect the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will introduce the necessary legislation, and at such time will speak at some length upon it.

My hon. friend touched briefly upon financial and trade matters which, as I have already said, are directly related to the budget. I believe we might well defer consideration of these matters until we are discussing the budget.

Mr. Speaker, I might take considerable time in reviewing other matters discussed by my hon. friend; but, as he has said,—and I believe I have his words before me—the matter which above all others occupies the attention of the people to-day is the deplorable question of espionage and disclosure of secret information to a foreign power which so unfortunately has come to the fore.

Having in mind what my hon. friend has said, namely that this disclosure of secret information to a foreign power is attracting keen attention throughout the country, I felt I should take it up at the earliest opportunity. With that in mind I announced a day or two ago that I intended to deal with this matter when speaking to the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

As I am about to deal with this new subject, Mr. Speaker, it would I think, meet with the convenience of all hon. members if you would call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, on Friday afternoon last I expressed the hope that hon. members of this house would read with care the interim reports which had been presented by the two justices of the Supreme Court of Canada who are acting as commissioners to conduct an investigation into the disclosure of secret information to unauthorized persons for communication to a foreign power. This afternoon my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, asked me to take the house and the country into my confidence with reference to matters pertaining to this investigation. May I say at the outset that in this I am necessarily confronted with one serious handicap, one to which I have referred in a statement which I have given to the public, namely, that the whole matter is one which is sub judice at the present time. For that reason there is very much that I should like to impart to the house and to the country which unfortunately I will not be able to impart and which cannot be given to the house or the country until those who have been or may be committed for trial have had their trial and evidence has been taken in public upon which verdicts will be based.

I have been asking myself at what point one would necessarily have to draw the line with respect to what is not permissible because of matters being sub judice and, up to what point matters might be discussed quite frankly. I am right I believe in assuming that anything that took place of which I had knowledge up to the time of the appointment of the commission and which influenced the government in its action with respect to the course it took in appointing the commission and in acting on the advice of the commission in certain particulars would be a matter that I should be quite free to discuss openly, being careful all the time not to say anything, if that is possible, that would in any way prejudice the trials that may take place.

I do not think I can do better in speaking to the question itself and giving to the house at once some idea of its vast significance and importance than to quote from the first interim report of the royal commission. I am not disclosing anything that should not be disclosed because of sub judice reasons if I quote from a published report which is in the hands of all hon. members of parliament. Therefore I would bring immediately to the attention of the house the gravity of this question and its far-reaching significance and importance by reading what the commissioners have said with respect to the inquiry they are holding, what they have found thus far, and what they have felt should be given as soon as possible to the public. On page 11 in the document which was tabled on Friday last relating to the proceedings of the royal commission will be found the following paragraph:

> The evidence establishes that a network of under-cover agents has been organized and developed for the purpose of obtaining secret and confidential information particularly from employees of departments and agencies of the dominion government and from an employee of the office of the high commissioner for the United Kingdom in Canada. The evidence reveals that these operations were carried on by certain members of the staff of the Soviet embassy at Ottawa under direct instructions from Moscow. The person directly in charge of these operations was Colonel Zabotin, military attache of the embassy, who had as his active assistants in this work Lieutenant-Colonel Motinov, chief assistant military attache, Lieutenant-Colonel Rogov, assistant military attache air, Major Sokolov, of the staff of the commercial counsellor of the embassy, Lieutenant Angelov, one of the secretaries of the military attache as well as other members of the staff of the military attache, all of whom, as well as the agents whom they employed in the pursuance of their activities, were, in the interests of secrecy, known by under-cover names.

In the next paragraph will be found the following:

We have had before us a former employee of the Russian embassy at Ottawa, Igor Gouzenko, the cipher clerk of the military attache, who has described this organization and its functioning, and who has produced original documents, the authenticity of which we accept.

I need scarcely say that these paragraphs describe as serious a situation as has existed in Canada at any time. If the house has had to wait some little time for the information which I intend to give it this evening, it is because the government have been only too conscious of how serious this situation is and how far-reaching its repercussions may be.

Perhaps I cannot better take the house into my confidence than to begin with an account of how I personally became informed of this situation and how the government became aware of it. Hon. members perhaps recall that when the first session of this house opened on the 6th of September last we met in the morning to choose a Speaker and the proceedings were to begin at eleven o'clock. Hon. members may have noticed that at that time the house was kept waiting, for a few minutes at least, before I found it possible to come in. What had happened was this—I was informed that morning by the under-secretary of state for external affairs that a young man from the Russian embassy had been to the office of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) asking to see the Minister of Justice. He said that he had most important information to impart to the government, that it disclosed a situation which threatened very seriously conditions in Canada, that it was an extremely serious situation and that he wished to warn the Canadian people with respect to it. He said that he had in his possession documents which would make wholly clear what he was saying and he wished these documents to be in the possession of the government. He said that he had taken these documents from the vaults of the Russian embassy and also from among papers which he had collected over a short time with a view of making the disclosure which he now wanted to make.

I was asked what should be done in these circumstances I replied that I thought this was a case where we could not be too careful or too cautious; that this man represented that he had come from the Russian embassy; that we could not say whether the documents he had in his possession were fabrications or not; that we did not know what his own state of mind might be, or how responsible he was; that we knew nothing of the circumstances which had caused him to leave the embassy and come to the government and that I thought he should be told to go back to the embassy with the papers he had in his possession.

He had been anxious to see the Minister of Justice. He had not seen the Minister of Justice. He told his story to the secretary of the Minister of Justice, who gave a full account to the under-secretary of state for external affairs, and he gave me the particulars which I have just mentioned.

What I felt most important was to see that nothing should be done which would cause the Russian embassy to believe that Canada had the least suspicion of anything which was taking place there, or which could be regarded by them as unexpected in the circumstances.

This advice was given to the man who came, whose name has been given in the commission report—Igor Gouzenko. He was a cipher clerk in the Russian embassy. He had been in the embassy in Ottawa here for some two years, associated with the military attache. Prior to those two years he had been for a couple of years in the secret service in the U.S.S.R. He had been trained particularly in ciphering and deciphering messages. That, he claimed, was how he had got possession of the documents to which I have referred.

Perhaps at this point I should indicate what I subsequently learned about Gouzenko's movements. Apparently he left the embassy around six-thirty in the evening of the day prior to the one at which he went to call at the office of the Minister of Justice. He left with the papers in his possession and went from the embassy to one of the newspaper offices in this city. It was to the Journal that he went and told his story to one of the persons whom he found in the office. He wanted to see the editor. The editor was not present; but, I am told, he gave a fairly full account of what he believed the people of Canada should know, what he wished to impart, and seemed very anxious that full publicity should be given to the statement which he was making. He claimed that his purpose was to let the Canadian people know of a situation about which he felt they should know. I understand that though his story seemed fantastic he was told—as he had documents with him—that he should go and see the mounted police, that if he had information of this kind they were the persons he should see.

He went back to his house that night. Next morning he came to the office of the Minister of Justice. Not seeing the Minister of Justice he then left for other parts. He had his wife and little child with him. During the course of the day—I need not relate all his movements—he visited the office of the crown prosecutor in the city and spoke there about his situation, again wishing to give publicity to the information that he had. During the afternoon he left his little child with a neighbour to be cared for, while he and his wife sought to meet others and discuss the situation with them. Then, at night, he went to his home, and when he was there he asked immediate neighbours, a gentleman and his wife, if they would be kind enough to look after his little child; that he was very fearful that something might happen to him that night, that he felt that by this time it would have been discovered that he had left the embassy and had taken with him certain papers which were of significance, and that he might expect to be killed in the course of the evening unless he got protection. The persons in whom he confided his situation took him into their apartment along with the little child and had them all stay in one of the rooms. Meantime the gentleman whose apartment it was, seeing the fear and the dread which he had, went to the city police and told them of the situation and asked that protection should be given to him. Arrangements were made with the police to be in the near vicinity lest there should be any incidents.

About midnight there was an incident. His apartment was entered by four persons—I believe he maintains that it was broken into. At any rate, the four persons who entered the apartment were from the Russian embassy or connected with it. The city police wanted to know from them just why they were there. They claimed immunity, being members of the embassy. No arrests were made. They were allowed to return to the embassy. In the meantime, Gouzenko had been safe, secreted as he was in the other apartment. Later in the evening another visit was made to his apartment, but nothing came of it and Gouzenko asked the city police if they could put him in contact with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He said that he had information which he thought was of importance to Canada and, indeed, to his own country if it could be disclosed, and that he would like to give this information to the government through the police.

He was promised that he would be taken to the mounted police where he could tell his story. Later in the morning he was taken to the mounted police, and he gave a full statement, producing the documents that he had in his possession, and asked for protection for his life and the lives of his wife and little child. They were given protection by the police.

The documents were then very carefully studied together with other information he gave.

Let me repeat, from the outset I felt that the situation with which we were confronted was one that could not be viewed too circumspectly. I felt we must make sure what type of person Gouzenko was, and what the motive was that prompted his action. I have come to the conclusion, from the statement which he gave to the police, that his motives were just as he himself described them, a desire to expose a condition which he thought was intolerable and which was likely to work injury to our country and to his own country as well. To the police he made a very careful statement in which he said that he had been in Canada for a couple of years, had been immensely surprised when he came here to see the freedom of the people, the way in which democratic institutions worked in this country. He said that he had been very greatly impressed with the way in which general elections were conducted, the different political parties speaking freely in the open, having candidates who opposed one another and the like. It impressed him deeply in contrast with what he had seen in his own country. He said he felt that, having witnessed for two years what this country was doing to assist its ally with munitions, money and food, and in every other way, and at the same time affording to himself and to others every facility that could be extended in the way of freedom, he could not stand it very much longer, and he had made up his mind that, regardless of what the consequences might be, even if it were life itself, he owed it to the people of this country and to his own people to reveal the condition of affairs as he had come to know it at first hand. And having made up his mind in this way, he then began to gather some of the documents which he felt would be absolutely convincing in themselves if made public.

I wish the house to note that his actions corresponded with that profession. He did not come to the government in the first instance. He went to a newspaper office, and he paid a second visit to a newspaper office with a view to having the documents published and having his story made public. He later came to the police to give them the full story, and the documents which were in his possession.

One may take what view one wishes of Gouzenko. I have stated my impressions as gathered from what evidence has come before me. But what I attach importance to in speaking to the house to-night is not the individual and what he said but the documents which were produced. Some of these documents are in the handwriting of some of the persons who have been examined by the commission, while some are in the nature of transcriptions; many of them are cipher messages that have been sent back and forth; some are messages that have come from Britain to Canada and passed on from Canada to the U.S.S.R., and there is much that relates to plans and records that have to do with the manufacture of munitions, explosives and the like.

It is upon the documents which are in possession of the government now, and which will be made public as the trials proceed, that such subsequent action as was taken by myself and my colleagues was based. We have not acted upon hearsay. We have taken the reports which have been made to us by the police, and which are verified and authenticated by the documents themselves.

These documents disclose among other things that Canada was being made a base to secure information on matters of very great and grave concern to the United States and also to Great Britain; that information was being sought through agents here with respect to many matters that were of the utmost concern to Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom.

I speak of myself personally because I must take the main responsibility. In fact, I am prepared to take the whole responsibility if necessary for the steps that have been taken, though the Minister of Justice and myself were together in considering and dealing with the questions that had to be considered. There come times, however, in a government when, sooner or later, the decision as to what course is to be taken has to be made by the head of the administration.

I realized at the outset that this was no small matter, not a domestic matter only, by any means. We could not ignore the evidence that there were in our public service a number of trusted employees who were giving information to agents of a foreign power to be of assistance to the foreign power and that it was clearly necessary that there should be an investigation. It was inevitable that an investigation would have repercussions, having regard to what might be revealed, in many parts of the world, and for that reason one had to consider other nations as well as one's own before taking a step that might come to be considered premature.

I should perhaps have mentioned this as a central feature of the Gouzenko statement. He claimed that what was being created in Canada was a fifth column; that it was being created through Russian agents in contact with the members of the public service and others in this country and that it had extended very far; that the infiltration of this effort had gone in very wide directions and for that reason there was the necessity for the completest investigation. I felt it was my duty, regardless of what might come, immediately to inform both the United States and the United Kingdom of what had been disclosed here and to let those two countries know of the government's intention to have the matter investigated.

My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, asked me to inform the house to-night whether, when I visited the United States and the United Kingdom, I informed the authorities there of what I have told the house this evening. I did. I felt my first duty was to visit our immediate neighbour the United States, to see the President and let him know that there were certain matters being revealed to us here which caused me to feel that Canada might be being used as a base for the discovery and the imparting of information that was of concern to the United States, and I was most anxious to have the President know that we intended to have the whole matter fully investigated.

Before I say anything further I think I ought to let the house know what was the kind of information that was in my possession at the time that I decided to visit the United States and Great Britain, and here again, so that I shall not be imparting any information that might bear on what is sub judice, I shall, I think, be safe if I take the statement which appears in the first interim report of the royal commission and quote what is set forth there. I should like to make it clear that it was during pretty much all of the month of September that the investigation was being made by the police. I was being informed of what was being brought to light, and pretty much the whole case as it has since been developed had at that time been worked out at least in outline by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The matters of which I had knowledge in this indirect way are pretty much the same as are set forth by the commission from the documents before them. I quote from the first interim report of the royal commission:

As shown by these documents, the specified tasks committed to Colonel Zabotin were the following:

(1) As described in telegrams from "The Director" at Moscow addressed to Colonel Zabotin under his cover name of "Grant," in August, 1945.

(a) The technological processes and methods employed by Canadians and the English for the production of explosives and chemical materials.

(b) Instructions as to which of the members of the staff of the military attache should contact particular Canadian agents and the suggestion of names of persons in the Department of National Defence for Naval Affairs who might act as agents.

(c) Information as to the transfer of the American troops from Europe to the United States and the Pacific also the army headquarters of the 9th army, the 3rd, 5th, 7th, 13th army corps, the 18th armoured division, the 2nd, 4th, 8th, 28th, 30th, 44th, 45th, 104th infantry divisions and the 13th tank division, together with the dates of their moves, the location of the army headquarters of the 8th and 16th armoured corps, the 29th and 89th infantry divisions, the 10th tank division and the location of the Brazilian infantry division. Whether or not there had been organized a staff for the American troops in Germany and, if so, its location and the name of the officer-in-command.

The location of the 1st parachute troops and the plans for their future use.

(d) Instructions to take measures to obtain particulars as to the materials of which the atomic bomb is composed, its technological process and drawings.

(2) As described in writings under the hands of Zabotin, Motinov and Rogov, during the period March to August, 1945.

(a) To obtain from the national research council models of developed radar sets, photographs, technical data, periodic reports, characterizing the radar work carried on by the council and future developments planned by the council.

(b) Particulars of the explosives establishment at Valcartier and its work, including the obtaining of formulas of explosives and samples.

(c) A full report on the organization and personnel of the national research council "Give more details of organization of research council. Manipulate so as to get to their leaders and find out what they do."

(d) Particular work of specified employees of the research council.

(e) The obtaining of documents from the library of the national research council so that they might be photographed, with the expressed intention of ultimately obtaining the whole of the library of the national research council.

(f) Particulars as to the plant at Chalk river, Ontario, and the processing of uranium.

(g) The obtaining of a sample of uranium 235, with details as to the plant where it is produced.

(h) Specifications of the electro-projector of the "V" bomb.

(i) Research work being carried on with relation to explosive materials and artillery.

(j) The obtaining of material on the American aeroplane radar locator type, navigation periscope.

(k) A list of the army divisions of the Canadian army which have returned from overseas and the names, or numbers, of the divisions which have been divided, or re-shaped, or undergoing re-shaping.

(l) The number of troops in the Canadian army in the post-war period, together with the system of its organization.

(m) Information from the Department of Munitions and Supply of various kinds relating to guns, shells, small arms, ammunition for small arms, arsenals, optical and radio appliances, automobiles and tanks, apparatus for chemical warfare and particulars of plants producing same.

(n) Information as to electronic shells used by the American navy.

(o) To endeavour to keep agents in government departments threatened with discharge as a result of shrinkage in size of the departments, in order to maintain their usefulness for the future.

(p) Information with regard to depth bombs and double charge shells for cannon.

(q) Information as to telegrams passing into and out of the Department of External Affairs and the office of the high commissioner for the United Kingdom.

It must not be assumed that the above list is exhaustive, but it illustrates the nature of the objectives of these operations.

The commissioners then make the following statement:

It has been stated to us by commission counsel that the method of presentation of the evidence before us is with the object of ultimately establishing the identity of the greatest number of those persons who have acted as agents, but the question of the relative importance of the above subject matters has not been dealt with to an extent where we are yet able to pronounce upon it. To proceed in any other manner might have been prejudicial to the ultimate attainment of the purposes of the investigation.

I read that now because of another question which the leader of the opposition asked me this afternoon to answer, namely, how far this espionage system extended.

I should like my hon. friend to notice that commission counsel have attached particular importance to ultimately establishing the identity of the greatest number of those persons who have acted as agents. I shall return to that a little later, as one of the reasons why the commission have thought it desirable that certain persons should be kept incommunicado pending their interrogation and the taking of their evidence. It has been with a view to finding out in the most effective manner possible how far-reaching this particular infiltration has been.

I could not very well leave Canada until the end of the debate on the address. It was the first session of the new parliament; there had been no division; I had to make perfectly sure that the government was going to remain in office, so that I felt it advisable to wait until after the first division. However, before leaving I did call into my office the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) and told them individually one of the reasons why I was leaving at that time. The house will remember that Mr. Attlee had communicated with me somewhat earlier, asking me to come over for purposes of consultation. I had been obliged to reply that I could not leave at least until the session was under way; but this matter coming up in the first month of the session made it important that I should not delay my departure longer.

There was one other reason why I went at that particular time. Part of the information secured by the police was to the effect that a scientist who was quite high in his profession and very much trusted by the British government; who was a citizen of Britain but was engaged in research work in Canada; who had perhaps as much knowledge as anyone of matters pertaining to the release of atomic energy and researches in that connection, was about to leave Canada; that he had taken passage on a plane and would be arriving at a certain time in London, where he would make contact with the agent of a foreign power. Information of this kind cannot be easily trusted to telegraphic communication. I thought I should give to the British government as full information as I could with regard to what we had ascertained.

I left for Washington about the end of September. I called upon the President at the White House and had a short talk with him before leaving for New York to catch the ship on which I was crossing to Britain. I arrived in London on a Sunday evening and immediately, on Mr. Attlee's invitation, spent the evening with him at Chequers, where I told him of what had been discovered here. Later I had talks with Mr. Bevin, the foreign secretary, to whom I gave such information as I thought the British government might wish to have. As hon. members know, I returned later to Washington, in company with Mr. Attlee, where a conference took place with the President in respect of atomic energy, in connection with which a report has already been made. I then came back to Ottawa accompanied by Mr. Attlee and, after Mr. Attlee returned to England, took up anew the question into which I had been looking so anxiously before I went away.

One question that undoubtedly presents itself to the minds of hon. members is why there should have been such a long delay in disclosing this condition of affairs. Why was the commission not appointed at an earlier date? Well, I think I have indicated enough to show that it would have been a very great and grave mistake to have taken any premature step in regard to the time at which the investigation should take place. The last thing this country would have wished to be responsible for was that in any way it had affected the relations between any of the united nations in a way that might prove prejudicial to all. Hon. members will recall that there was a meeting in London of the council of foreign ministers at which the British, American and U.S.S.R. foreign ministers were present. That particular meeting did not get very far. After it was over, there were recriminations of one kind and another. I think it would have been most unfortunate had these disclosures taken place while that meeting was being held. There were other meetings which would be held in the near future to consider. It was a question not only of what was the wisest step to take, but also of the best time at which to take it.

In order to be perfectly sure of an objective view being taken of the whole situation, the government decided to secure special counsel and have him go over with the police the whole record they had, and the documents which were in their possession, and advise the government as to the course which in his opinion it would be best to follow. The first question was what counsel to select. Hon. members are now aware that the government chose Mr. E. K. Williams of Winnipeg to be counsel to advise the government in this matter. Mr. Williams was made the choice of the government because of his eminent reputation in his profession and because at the time he was president of the Canadian Bar Association. We were anxious that whoever was chosen to advise the government and later on, as it proved, the commission, would be one in whom members of the legal profession and the country would have every confidence. We felt that Mr. Williams, being president of the Canadian Bar Association, and occupying such a prominent position in the legal profession, would be the best person upon whom to call.

A report was made by Mr. Williams, which I hope some time later may be given to the public. It cannot be given now because it contains information that would have a bearing on some of the trials about to take place. In that report Mr. Williams recommended that the best course to pursue would be to appoint a royal commission and to obtain as commissioners the best persons it would be possible to secure. It was on that advice that the government came to request the services of Mr. Justice Taschereau and Mr. Justice Kellock, two members of the Supreme Court of Canada. Here, again the government realized that questions as to the liberty of the subject and of individual freedom were certain to arise in the exploration of the extent and development of this system of espionage, and that it would therefore be most desirable and indeed, absolutely necessary to have as commissioners persons who, above all, would be most anxious to protect the liberty of the subject, and to see that justice was done—and justice only.

I have heard hon. members opposite speak about the importance of upholding justice, and of having justice followed in every step in this matter. That is why, to the exclusion of all others, two justices of the Supreme Court of Canada were selected. The government did not know where in Canada it could find two persons who would be more certain to uphold justice in every particular, or who would be more zealous in protecting the freedom and liberty of the subject than would two justices of the Supreme Court of Canada. I hope this will be kept in mind by hon. members if at any stage they are inclined to criticize some of the methods which necessarily have been adopted to fulfil the purpose of the inquiry.

I said a moment ago that there had been other conferences. Hon. members will recall that in December there was a meeting in Moscow at which the Secretary of State for the United States, and Mr. Bevin, the Foreign Minister of the United Kingdom, met with Mr. Molotov in Moscow to discuss matters of mutual interest and concern. That would not have been an appropriate moment at which to have gone into this matter. Had an investigation been started at that time in Canada, it might conceivably have been said, or it might have been thought that it had been planned with a view to making difficulties in connection with that particular meeting.

Then there came the united nations meeting in London, the preparatory commission of the united nations organization, the meeting of the assembly and of the security council. It was most important that these bodies should be organized with as little as possible in the way of mistrust, suspicion or recrimination. Here, again, was another factor which entered into the judgment of my colleague, the Minister of Justice and myself as to the time at which it would be most appropriate to begin proceedings.

And here may I make a statement which I think it is important to make. My hope had been that it might be possible to have an inquiry which would attract very little in the way of public attention, at least until matters were in such shape that only those against whom evidence seemed to be conclusive would be apprehended and committed for trial. I thought that possibly we might have members of the public service whose names unfortunately have been brought into this situation examined by deputies and ministers of the departments, in the presence of the Minister of Justice, and that the matter might be dealt with in that way. That illustrates only one of several ways in which we hoped the matter could have been dealt with so as to have as little effect as possible on international relations.

A moment's consideration, however, made it clear that anything of that nature was wholly impossible. In the first place it would not have been possible to have made more than a very limited inquiry. And in this situation, because of its vast proportions, it was all important that if there was anything to it at all we should go into it thoroughly and see that nothing was left undone which could possibly be done to clean up a situation of the kind.

I now come to the question of the apprehension of the persons who have been detained. This afternoon my hon. friend asked me to explain when speaking this evening why the order in council passed on October 6, giving authority to the minister to have individuals apprehended and detained, was not made known to the House of Commons at the time the Emergency Powers Transition Act was passed and a question was asked as to whether there still remained any secret orders in council under the War Measures Act.

The explanation, in a word, is this: I have spoken about a very trusted official who had left Canada to go to England, who was to make contact there with certain persons, who had, as we have reason to believe, very important information in his possession, and who was in a position to give perhaps as much in the way of information as almost any other with regard to certain aspects of research on atomic energy, and matters pertaining thereto.

Contact was to be made in London on October 7. It was understood that if this person should make contact and thereupon be apprehended and brought before the police for examination, a similar step would have to be taken here with respect to the others in Canada who were believed to be in a similar position. October 7 being the date upon which this man was to be apprehended in London, if caught in the act of making the contact it was thought he might make, it was understood that on the same date we should make similar arrests here.

The War Measures Act was then in force, and the order in council was passed in my absence on the recommendation of the Acting Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice. I would have done exactly the same, had I been here, so as to give authority for the apprehension of persons here the moment it was thought desirable that such steps should be taken.

However, the contact in London did not materialize. One of the reasons it may not have was that it had been known in certain quarters for a couple of weeks at that time that a good deal of information was in the hands of the government here, but it was still thought probable that the expected contact might be made. However, as it did not come at that time, the matter here was also held in abeyance. No steps were taken at all under the order until the time came when in was thought necessary and advisable to take the course recommended by counsel and approved by the commission.

Up to that time use had not been made of the order; it simply lay in abeyance until the beginning of the time at which the commission asked that certain individuals should be apprehended and brought before them for interrogation and to give evidence. I doubt very much—the Minister of Justice will speak for himself—whether the matter was in the mind of the minister as to that particular order still being on the list when he was asked in the house whether there were any other orders. I confess that I never thought of it. I was here, I think, when some one asked if there were any other orders. The order had lain dormant; it had not been used at that time. I imagine that that would be the reason why the minister made no mention of it. Even were we to assume that he had knowledge of it, I think it would have been most unwise for the minister to have disclosed to parliament and to the country at that time that there was such an order, and that under it persons could be apprehended for the purpose of the inquiry that has since taken place. What I would have done and what I think the minister would have done if it had entered into his mind would have been to have told my hon. friend and the leaders of the other parties in confidence that the order was there and that it was being kept intact in case use might have to be made of it a little later on. That is the position as I see it.

Let me emphasize this fact. Before any persons were apprehended at all, the commission had examined carefully the man Gouzenko to whom I have referred and all the documents that had been presented to the police. The commission met in camera for a week before any one was apprehended. The two justices of the Supreme Court of Canada were satisfied in their own minds beyond any doubt that the documents that were before them were authentic, and it was the documentary evidence they had that caused them, when the commission counsel expressed the view that certain persons ought to be apprehended and detained until they gave their evidence, to recommend to the minister that he issue the orders for apprehension.

May I ask hon. members this question? All that I have described thus far and much more was known to the minister and myself at the time the commission was appointed. While the commission sat we were further informed of what the commission themselves had found with reference to the documents and to the situation generally throughout the country. If, knowing all that, the Minister of Justice, when the commission recommended that in order to get to the bottom of this thing it was necessary to apprehend the different persons whom they named, had refused to accept that recommendation, had refused to act and had said, "Well, we will have a political question; the question of the freedom of the subject and the like will come up and for political reasons we had better not take any steps," I ask, what would have been the responsibility the minister would have had upon his head to-day before this house?

It is an easy thing to criticize others for taking particular steps before all the facts are known. I believe that already many criticisms have been made which would not have been made if the facts had been fully known or even partly known as I have explained them to-night.

At the time the commission asked that certain individuals should be apprehended, I gave out to the public a statement which I think I ought to read at this moment because it helps to make clear the caution with which the government was proceeding from beginning to close. This was issued by myself on February 15:

> Information of undoubted authenticity has reached the Canadian government which establishes that there have been disclosures of secret and confidential information to unauthorized persons, including some members of the staff of a foreign mission in Ottawa. In order to make possible the full investigation which the seriousness of this information demands, the government has appointed Mr. Justice Taschereau and Mr. Justice Kellock of the Supreme Court of Canada to act as royal commissioners to hear evidence and to present a report which will be made public. The commissioners have appointed as their counsel Mr. E. K. Williams, K.C., of Winnipeg, Mr. Gerald Fauteux, K.C., of Montreal, and Mr. D. W. Mundell of the Department of Justice; the commission has already commenced its investigation, which is proceeding in camera.

Let me emphasize that the commission had been sitting a week at that time or longer. They had made perfectly certain that the persons whom they were asking should be apprehended were persons whom, upon the evidence before them, they felt justified in asking to have detained. My statement continued:

Upon the application of counsel, and having regard to the serious nature of the evidence already adduced before the commission, the commissioners recommended counsel to apply to the Minister of Justice for orders for the interrogation and detention for that purpose of a number of persons known or suspected to be implicated. This action has been taken to-day. The persons involved include some now employed or who have been employed in a number of departments and agencies of the government.

It is the intention of the government that, after the report of the royal commissioners has been received, prosecution will be instituted in cases in which the evidence warrants it. It would not be proper at this stage to make a more complete statement or, in particular, to make public the names of those concerned. Some of them appear to have been far more deeply and consciously involved than others. Some will probably be found to be more or less innocent instruments in furthering activities much more serious than they may have imagined. Obviously, the whole matter should be treated with caution and reserve, pending the time when it will be possible to issue a fuller statement. Until the investigation by the royal commissioners has been completed the case remains sub judice.

In other words, there again the government, on the one hand, was taking every step possible to make the fullest possible investigation and, on the other hand, to protect persons or the liberty of persons, to protect the names of persons until the very last moment at which some disclosure would have to be made with regard to what had been done in violation of the Official Secrets Act. This step was in part to protect these persons themselves, some of whom to-day are on trial. Until the last moment everything was done to keep their names out of the press.

The authority granted to the commission was to investigate persons who were or had been in the public service, and that is as far as the commission has been investigating. I must confess that I regret, as every member of the house regrets, very deeply that the work of the commission has taken as long as it has. When the commission was appointed we hoped it might be a matter of only a few days that any of the persons would have to be detained, but perhaps I have told the house enough for hon. members to realize how extensive this inquiry necessarily is. In order that the inquiry may be as thorough as possible the commissioners have gone about the taking of evidence in a way that will leave no stone unturned to establish the facts. We have indeed reason to be grateful to the commissioners for the manner in which they have given unremittingly of their time and thought to their exacting duties. Particularly are we indebted to them for the manner in which they have sought to guard against publicity being given to the names or actions of any persons until this became wholly imperative.

Perhaps I should deal for a moment, before concluding, with some of the international aspects of this matter. The house will have noticed, as the public have, that in the statement I gave out I made no mention of any country by name. But before giving out this statement I did ask the charge d'affaires of the Russian embassy to come to my office: I read to him the statement, and I told him that the country to which reference was made was the U.S.S.R. Hon. members will have noticed that it was the Soviet government itself which was the first to state that Russia was the country that was referred to in that statement. There has been no communication from the government of the U.S.S.R. to our government other than a statement which was handed to our representative to the U.S.S.R. at Moscow and to which much publicity was given in the Russian press. That was the statement which made light of many aspects of the statement I had given out, but which did have this significant paragraph in it, that the Russian government admitted that the military attache had taken a course of action here which was, I think the term used was, "inadmissible", and that he had been recalled. May I say that in the course of this inquiry three or four other persons have since returned to Russia from the Russian embassy; this at the instance of the Russian government itself.

This brings up, of course, a very large question, that of the relations between Russia and Canada. Some persons may feel that we ought to sever relations, as they would say, by having the Russian embassy withdraw from Canada. I hope that no view of that kind will be expressed by anyone in a responsible position. We in Canada want only the best of relations with the U.S.S.R., as we do with every other country, and we must not be too ready to judge until we know all the circumstances connected with the particular situation. I believe it is true that there are agencies working, may I put it, at the side of the Russian embassy which are doing things that possibly are unknown to the ambassador himself and members of his immediate staff. That may be so and it may not be so. At any rate I am not going to be the one to judge as to who has knowledge of this and who has knowledge of that. The time will come when all this can be worked out and, I hope and pray, will be worked out in a manner which will let us get rid of whatever there may be of wrong and evil in the whole business and establish the friendliest of relations on a true and sound basis, one which will be above suspicion in every way.

It has I think been said that I should perhaps have smothered up this business altogether, that it was bound to have serious implications and that it might have very serious consequences. May I say, Mr. Speaker, I have done what I thought was right, and I have yet to find that taking the course which is right is doing other than following the course which will prove the best in the end. I cannot imagine anyone in a responsible position wishing to smother up a condition of this kind. That would only help to spread the evil through the country, and extend it through time, until, perhaps, consequences very serious indeed would arise. The best way in which most social ills can be cured is not by penalty but by publicity. The light of day will cure much in the way of evil that nothing else is able to cure. That is a belief which I have held all my life in regard to all questions that have to do with social evils of different kinds. I am sure that as a result of the present inquiry once the whole situation has been cleared up, we shall all be able to breathe more freely, with greater confidence in each other, and in other countries.

I think in the statement issued by the Russian government it was said that I ought first to have let their government know about these facts. Well, I did think at one time of going to Russia myself and of speaking with Generalissimo Stalin in reference to it. What I know, or have learned of Mr. Stalin from those who have been closely associated with him in the war, causes me to believe that he would not countenance action of this kind on the part of officials of his country. I believe that when these facts are known to him and to others in positions of full responsibility, we shall find that a change will come that will make a vast difference indeed.

However, I did ask myself the question, were I to attempt to convey to the Russian government what I knew, without documents, which I could myself explain and prove, might I not be met with the statement that, after all, as it was Canadian government officials who were concerned, we had better clean our own house first? If the time should come when it would be of any service in helping to meet this situation, I am prepared to take any step at all that may be deemed advisable with a view to having it cleared up in a manner which will not only maintain but strengthen friendly relations with that great power.

May I add this word. The Russian statement mentions that Canada's action had been taken because of some feeling that Mr. Bevin, the British foreign minister, had as a consequence of discussions which took place at the security council. Let me answer that by drawing the attention of hon. members to the fact that the security council met months after the time at which this information came into the possession of the government. The security council meetings were something apart altogether. Our action here had no possible connection with events in the security council.

One other thing which is being said is that the alleged actions of the persons being detained were due to the secrecy with respect to the atomic bomb. I had a letter only yesterday from the secretary of one of the councils of Soviet-Canadian friendship, stating that all this had grown out of the fact that Russia was being denied information which the United States, Britain and Canada had with respect to the atomic bomb. May I impress upon the house this fact,—the disclosures of which I have been speaking to-night go back to 1943 and 1944. The organization for the purpose of espionage of which I have been speaking has been in existence for three or four years in this country, and the greater part of the information which it obtained or sought to obtain was secured before anyone knew anything about the atomic bomb outside of those in the immediate know. The attacks on Hiroshima and Nagasaki were, if I recollect aright, on the 6th of August and at a later date in that month, the 9th of August, I think. Documents in the possession of the government are in large part prior to that time altogether. This espionage business has not arisen out of the atomic bomb in any way or any secrecy in connection with it. Now that the atomic bomb is a known factor, undoubtedly information is being sought in that connection, but the espionage net which has been referred to to-night has been in existence for a much longer time that the past seven months. It was the 8th of September when the documents came into the possession of the government.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything about the statements which have been made in reference to myself as being anti-labour and anti-Soviet. My feeling towards the great mass of the people in this and other lands and what should be done to improve their position is well known in this country. In regard to Soviet friendship I recall that a year or two after first coming into office twenty-five years or so ago the government of which I was then the head was the one which promoted an "Aid for Russia" fund, to help the starving children of that country. I did what I could to help further that great movement at that time. I have done what I could to further the Soviet-Canadian friendship movement. I have spoken on the platform in Toronto in support of it and on the platform in Montreal in support of it. The government of which I am a member has given aid to Russia in munitions and in food and assistance in other ways. It is the same government that invited the Russians to come and open a legation here, the same government that has sent an ambassador to Russia. All through, from the beginning to this hour, my attitude and the attitude of those who sit around me and with me on this side has been one of furthering to the utmost the friendliest and best of relations with all countries. And may I say that none of us will ever forget the heroism of the Russian people. None of us will ever forget their sacrifices and what we all owe to them, along with those of other countries in saving the freedom of the world. We are not going to let these years of sacrifices and the sacrifice of millions of lives go by in order that allied nations may become separated rather than drawn together into one great family.

I wish to conclude by saying that I hope that members in the course of the further discussion of this question will be very careful not to attempt to judge any country or any individual until we know all the facts as fully as we can possibly know them.

As far as the Russian people are concerned I am as sure as I am of anything that the Russian people are just as anxious for friendly relations with Canada and with peoples in other parts of the world as our own people are. But in this country, as in some others, there are persons who for their own selfish ends will do many things that would not be countenanced by the great majority. We have seen how a few men may get power into their own hands, and how, power once secured, they will do with it for selfish and ambitious ends many things that are not approved by their fellowmen. What has happened in this instance may have been the action of a few men which I am certain would not be countenanced and will not be condoned by the Russian people. So far as this matter is concerned, I intend, with whatever little power I have, to unearth whatever may be wrong, and for the remainder of my life to devote my time to trying in every way possible to see that the greatest amount of friendship and harmony and good will is promoted between all peoples, and between the Russian people and the people of Canada in particular.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, to-night I find myself in a somewhat difficult position. We have heard a story which I think has impressed itself upon the house and will undoubtedly impress itself further, and it is very difficult now to enter into a discussion of the speech from the throne or even of the remarks of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I realize, however, that we are late in meeting this session, and that there is a desire on the part of the house to proceed with its business. Therefore I shall refrain from doing what I might otherwise have done, ask the house to allow me to call it eleven o'clock, and proceed to say what I have to say to-night.

First I should like to make some comments on the speech which has just been made by the Prime Minister. I think that in view of the very uneasy international situation we should follow his advice and be careful in the phraseology we use in discussing what has been placed before us to-night. If I may say so, the first thing I would remark is that in reality we are discussing events which have led up to charges against Canadians and British nationals in this country in peace time. Espionage is the word that is used in this connection, and I think wrongly used, because espionage can, in my opinion, properly and best be defined as the sending of persons into an enemy's country in order to watch what the enemy is doing. But here we are dealing with persons of our own nationality who, it is alleged, have violated their trust, and who, if found guilty, will invite punishment under our Official Secrets Act. I think this should be kept in mind in discussing this matter, and that is why I try to make that point quite clear.

I say, too, that if the accused are found guilty after a fair and proper trial, they must be dealt with according to the law as laid down by this parliament. It is no excuse, as some cynics in this country are suggesting, to say that all nations employ foreign agents. We are not trying a foreign power; we are charging our own nationals with an offence against their fellow citizens which, if proven, no right-thinking person can possibly condone. That I think should be made abundantly clear, because some sections of the press in our country and in the United States have publicized this matter in a way which I believe has tended to complicate a very difficult international situation.

The Prime Minister's statement of February 15, which he read to the house to-night, was couched in careful and I think unprovocative language, and I regret that some sections of the press did not exhibit that sense of responsibility in discussing the matter which characterized our Canadian newspapers during the war. Such newspapers may have overlooked the fact that a violent press campaign directed against Russia would be regarded in a country where there is no free press, as the official attitude of this country. Considerable mischief has arisen because of that. It has lent colour, too, to the charge in the communist Labour Progressive papers in this country, widely quoted in the Soviet union, that Canada and its government are engaged in a plot against what they are pleased to call the left wing of the labour movement or in an anti-Soviet campaign, when I am confident that nothing is farther from the truth. Actually the fact is that everyone with any sense of responsibility realizes that the peace and welfare of the whole world depend upon what? Upon the establishment of friendly relations and confidence among all nations, and particularly between Russia and the English-speaking world. Failing to achieve this, lacking this hope, the united nations organization will be shattered. Upon our understandings and good relations the future of mankind depends.

In this atomic age the united nations organization must be made to work so that we may proceed to the establishment of government at the international level. I believe there is no other way of preventing a terrible catastrophe, a third world war, in which, with the new weapons and scientific knowledge we now possess, millions of people may be wiped out in a single night. And when I make that statement I do not make it as my own. Had I been present in December when the matter of the atomic bomb was discussed—unfortunately I was ill—I would have told the house that early in December I heard some of the leading scientists who were responsible for the discovery of atomic energy and the making of the atomic bomb make that very statement; that with the knowledge they now possess it is possible in a country like the United States, by planting atomic bombs in the industrial centres, to destroy as many as forty million souls in a single night.

Now I want to say something about the method pursued by the government in the handling of this situation. I appreciate the difficulties; I appreciate the defence of the government's procedure which the Prime Minister has offered this evening, but I believe there has been too much secrecy, too much mystery in the government's handling of the matter for the public good. The air has been full of rumours, some wild but many which subsequently proved well founded. This has been bad and, may I say to the government, indicates serious leaks from persons who might be expected to show a greater sense of responsibility. A case in point is that of the arrest of the representative of a constituency in this house. A week before the action was taken a dispatch to a London newspaper quoted in a Montreal newspaper, I believe the Montreal Herald, said that such action was about to be taken, that the Prime Minister would denounce a member of parliament in the house when we met. Well, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) was arrested the day we met, and the next day the Prime Minister informed the house that the unknown agent who had received information from an accused for the benefit of Russia was believed to be the representative in parliament of the constituency of Cartier, Montreal. There have been other similar news items.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I saw the item to which he refers, and if my recollection is aright it stated that I was going to complain about something having been revealed in regard to some secret session of parliament. Nothing of the kind that I know of has entered into the present situation. More than that may I say that I had no knowledge that the report which was received from the commissioners on Thursday would be made at the time it was. It was that report which necessitated the arrest of the hon. member. There have been leaks, I admit, but that was not one of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I am very glad to get the Prime Minister's assurance; but he states there have been leaks, and indeed it was at least quite a coincidence that a week before the action took place a dispatch containing such a story should go from Ottawa to the London Daily Mirror, I think it was.

In view of what the Prime Minister said this evening I wish to say that through the ages our forefathers have fought vigorously to prevent secret trials and actions affecting the liberty of the subject without fair and proper trial. During the war hon. members who were here will recollect there was considerable debate in this house. The defence of Canada regulations were modified, but many hon. members were disturbed by the manner in which those regulations and the War Measures Act were used not only against those who endeavoured to assist the enemy but against members of religious sects and, indeed, Canadians of Japanese origin. Quislings and traitors must be punished, but we dare not allow any government to act except in accordance with the established principles of justice.

The persons now held are believed to have violated the Official Secrets Act and betrayed their trust. I repeat that if they are guilty, they must be punished. But I have carefully read the reports that were tabled in this house by the Prime Minister last Friday, and I confess that I still have grave doubts concerning the procedure followed in some of these cases. Indeed, I do not believe the Prime Minister is aware of all that has gone on. I almost hesitate to say this because when I heard it first it seemed to me unbelieveable. But I was informed by a minister of the gospel last week that he saw a person who had been held at Rockcliffe for some time, and that for six days and nights that person was in a room which was brilliantly lighted, and the lights were never out. I wanted to check that statement, and I telephoned the counsel of another of the accused, asking if such a thing could have occurred. I was told by that counsel that his client, a different person, had told him precisely the same story. It may be said, of course, that this was done in order to prevent the possibility of suicide, but again I asked questions and was informed that neither of these persons was ever left alone.

I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to look into this. If that is so it savours of the totalitarian system, and it must be neither permitted nor condoned in this country. I said I could scarcely credit the story, and indeed that is so. No one can have sympathy for those who betray the interests of their own people. For our nationals, who accept the rights of our citizenship but give their first allegiance to any foreign power, and thus gear their political and secret activities to its external policies, I have nothing but the utmost contempt. These are the quislings who, if their guilt is properly established, must be dealt with according to the law; but it must be in accordance with the law.

Let me sum up my feelings in this way. In spite of all that has been said to-night and last week the fact remains that men and women have been summarily arrested. As a letter I received from one of them states, they have been held for weeks without charge, without access to their friends and without counsel. From the documents tabled here I have gathered that this procedure had been followed not on the initiative of the government but upon the advice of the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada who are the commissioners under order in council P.C. 411. For my part I shall await with a good deal of interest some further statement from the Minister of Justice at the proper time. In the meantime I should like to recommend something for his consideration. I have in my hand a copy of "The Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier" by Doctor Skelton. In the press and in a letter which came to me I saw a reference from this book. I looked it up and should like to put it on the record, and I commend it both to the minister and the government. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was speaking on the case of Louis Riel in this house in 1874. It was his maiden speech; he entered into an argument and then said this:

> It will be argued, perhaps, that the reasons which I advance are purely legal subtleties. Name them as you please, technical expressions, these legal subtleties, it matters little; for my part, I say that these technical reasons, these legal subtleties are the guarantees of British liberty. Thanks to these technical expressions, these legal subtleties, no person on British soil can be arbitrarily deprived of what belongs to him. There was a time when the procedure was much simpler than it is to-day, when the will alone of one man was sufficient to deprive another of his liberty, his property, his honour and all that makes life dear. But since the days of the Great Charter, never has it been possible on British soil to rob a man of his liberty, his property or his honour, except under the safeguard of what has been termed in this debate technical expressions and legal subtleties.

That is something we might recommend to the government for its perusal and for its consideration.

I want now to deal with some of the other pressing problems before the country. I think I have said all I wish to say to-night in connection with matters which have arisen under the Official Secrets Act.

We are to-day in one of the great periods of human history. Revolutionary changes are in the making throughout the world. In America we have been spared the suffering and pain so widespread in Europe and in Asia. I am glad to voice approval of those references in the speech from the throne which foreshadow increased economic aid to suffering peoples by Canada. Indeed, these are the only constructive proposals in a speech so barren and unrealistic in other particulars.

I would add, too, that the appeal made by the Prime Minister last evening for Canadians to restrict their own consumption of foodstuffs needed by starving peoples, meets with our wholehearted support. I wish he could have gone further, and prohibited the wasteful use of cereals in non-essential luxuries, such as in the manufacture of liquor. I can assure him that, in my opinion, if food for starving peoples involves further rationing in Canada, the people of Canada will support any intelligent and necessary move in that direction.

We can remember, in the words of Geoffrey Francis Fisher, Archbishop of Canterbury, that "There is one task ready to the hands of the united nations in which we can all unite and which divides none—the task of common humanity, which makes the world one. That is to relieve as fast as possible the famine and starvation that is bringing many millions in many nations to misery and death."

The house will, I am certain, give its approval to the proposed loan of $1,250 million to the United Kingdom. The agreement is a recognition not only of the suffering of the British people but, in part—and I should like to emphasize the words "in part"—that our future prosperity depends upon the future ability of our best customer to trade with us.

Again, I want to use the word "trade" advisedly for, while the United Kingdom cannot export commodities in exchange for our goods just now, she can do so in the future. I believe that she will, if our own domestic tariff policies make it possible for us to receive those goods. If we receive those goods, they will make a contribution to our own standards of living in Canada. I am glad to know that there is in prospect a conference at which the opening up of channels of trade and the wiping out of these unnecessary barriers will be discussed by some of the great nations.

But let us bear in mind that the proceeds of that loan spent in Canada will provide only partial and temporary relief to our unemployment and farm problems. Other more comprehensive domestic policies must be promoted.

I am glad to note, then, that the government intends to encourage the highest possible production this year. I had been disturbed by reports of speeches by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in western Canada urging what seemed to me, and I think also to the people of western Canada, a somewhat different policy.

Certainly advice to prairie farmers to increase cereal production invites some risk—and I admit this readily—of a reduction in otherwise necessary summerfallow, which may lead to the depletion of moisture in 1947. But 1946 is the crucial year, and we must take some risks in order to assist in sustaining human life in many countries.

I think there is little likelihood of our accumulating any surpluses; but if there were, this country, profiting surely from past experiences, should establish intelligent policies under which surpluses of grain would become national reserves against future shortages.

The lack of intelligent policies accounts for the fluctuation in the production of agricultural commodities. Uncertainty with regard to prices of farm products is already causing a serious decline in some products. Agriculture needs the assurance of floor prices which will be reviewed from time to time and be set in relation to the cost of production and the sacrifices farmers made or are making to the maintenance of price ceilings. I wish to say at once that we cannot subscribe to the grain exchange propaganda that farm prices should be allowed to find their own levels by open market trading. True, levels of some farm products, notably wheat, would reach a high level now; but inevitably the day would come when they would become equally low. Consequently we believe the farmer desires, not high prices at one period and low prices at another, but some stability in price levels.

The farmer, like the industrial worker, wants fair, stabilized returns so that he may maintain a decent standard of living every day of every year. Such a plan can be achieved for agriculture through the encouragement of the cooperative movement and through public organizations under producer-consumer control having authority to regulate the assembly, storage, transportation and grading of grain, live stock, fruit, dairy and other farm products. This is not an easy task I readily admit; but I believe it is an essential task. And I hasten to say I also believe that it can and ultimately will be done.

A guaranteed farm income, however, requires, too, a comprehensive crop insurance plan. That is true not only in the prairie provinces but also in other parts of Canada. If this is to be successful we must survey the soil, utilize the water of some of our rivers for irrigation, and drain marshlands and swamps in some other parts of Canada. This will mean, too, at a time when we may need it very badly, productive work for thousands.

There is already a great deal of unemployment. It is useless to say that conditions here are better than they are in some other countries. I do not know that that statement is true, nor would I accept it until I have figures which will prove that statement. But even if it were true, the fact is that we have to-day considerable unemployment. Figures from the Department of Labour tell us that employment increased by 170,000 between July, 1945, and January 24, 1946. It is estimated that nearly a quarter of a million are without employment now.

Let us not be complacent about this. The governor of the Bank of Canada warns in his last report to the Minister of Finance, dated February 8, that:

> Looking to the future there is no reason for complacency. Most of our real problems of post-war adjustment are still ahead. The backlog of demand will not be large in relation to productive capacity when industry has been fully reconverted and inventories built up to normal levels. The prevailing optimism on the North American continent is dangerous if it diverts attention from the conditions which have to be faced.

There is too much, I think, of a prevailing optimism on the other side of the house. So far, in spite of what the mover and the seconder of the address in reply said in this regard—and may I take this opportunity of doing what I should have done earlier on behalf of my party, namely of congratulating them upon the able manner in which they moved and seconded the address in reply—so far, in spite of what they said, we believe the present administration has failed to plan adequately the reconversion from war-time to peace-time needs. Without a full employment plan, satisfactory national wage and farm policies, standards of living will be forced down and all will suffer.

Inextricably linked with reconversion and the maintenance of employment at the highest possible level are the problems of housing and of settlement of returning veterans in satisfactory civilian employment. Even veterans who wish to enter into farming operations are met with endless delays in obtaining decisions regarding the suitability of the land and sometimes, I may say, the suitability of their wives to go with them on the land. I have no doubt that most hon. members have had many cases of exasperating delays and investigations brought to their attention during the recess. There is a dangerous sense of disappointment and frustration abroad in this country. The red tape in the Department of Veterans Affairs and many other departments also must be cut, and cut quickly. We in the C.C.F. believe that there can be no true democracy without economic democracy; that there can be no true freedom without economic freedom. The time has passed when liberty often meant merely the liberty to starve and be homeless. We believe, further, that only social ownership of the principal means of production and distribution will permit economic security and political stability. I know the government believe otherwise. Very well, but it is up to the government to make their system work and as yet it is not fulfilling the promise made last June of jobs for all.

Closely allied with this condition is the problem of housing. Housing conditions in Canada are deplorable. They are a disgrace to a country possessing our wealth and resources. For years before the war private enterprise failed to provide adequate housing; yet the government has entrusted practically all our needs to private firms again. There is not a single city or nation that I know of which has solved its housing needs through private enterprise. Any successful programme has invariably been accomplished through a properly planned public housing system.

The government, through its Curtis report, admits that 700,000 houses are required in the country, and this is only half the number required to house the nation in reasonable health and comfort. One needs only to look north from this building to see the truth of that statement. The provisions of the National Housing Act make it impossible for the average citizen to build with any assurance that he can complete the payments on a home. No provision whatever has been made for adequate low rental houses within the reach of the low wage group.

We are told that 50,000 houses will be built this year, but there is little evidence that even this inadequate objective will be reached. Canada is faced with more than a grave problem in this respect. It is indeed a national emergency and should be treated as such. I believe the proper planning of the use of material and labour could provide this year 100,000 new houses. This would give employment, so it is estimated by those who know how to make such estimates, to more than a quarter of a million Canadian workers in all branches of the building and allied trades.

The unnecessary export of needed building materials should be halted There is no need for Canada to provide the United States with materials for luxury building when people are homeless. I have been told by people who have visited the Pacific coast, San Francisco, Los Angeles and so on, during the winter that they have seen magnificent homes being built in those states of No. 1 Canadian lumber. These are mansions that are costing many thousands of dollars, and I say that we have no right to export lumber for luxury homes when we need homes for our people so badly. Non-essential and deferable building in Canada should be prohibited and supplies rationed so that top priority may be given to housing which costs under $5,000 per unit.

In conjunction with such a policy crown companies should be set up to break the bottle-necks created by monopoly industry, and workers should be trained in the needed building skills just as they were trained for war-time industry. A long-term housing plan should be introduced immediately which would co-ordinate the resources of the federal, provincial and regional authorities to ensure that sufficient houses are constructed.

Linked, as I have already said, with the housing and unemployment difficulties facing the country is the problem of the returned veteran. Thousands of young men who have served our country so well in war have found neither jobs nor homes upon their return to Canada. Many are living only on their army savings and gratuities. Many are forced to take inadequate jobs because they cannot find work which offers either promise of security or anything else. Thousands have been forced to discontinue needed schooling because of lack of living quarters and high rentals, which make their allowances inadequate to meet their needs.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) referred to the survey of the Montreal area which was recently published by the rehabilitation information committee. Many other hon. members may have seen this survey, so that I am not going into that, although I had intended to do so. Referring to married veterans the report stated:

> Most of the personal difficulties arose less from psychological than material obstacles, such as housing need and inadequate income, against which veterans and their wives were struggling calmly and courageously.

I regret to say that I have run across some cases, particularly of brides who have recently come to this country and who have had to find temporary accommodation with their husband's relatives who were strangers to them. In many cases this has had a disastrous effect upon these young couples who have come, on the one side, as newcomers to a land which is strange to them. This condition of affairs is an indictment of the lack of policy in this regard on the part of the government and it also endorses the warning the governor of the Bank of Canada gave.

There is much more that I could say if time permitted, but I see I have just three minutes left. I should like to say something about the dominion-provincial conference and the possible agreements, agreements which have been delayed too long. I should like to say something about a national health programme, old age pensions at a lower age with increased amounts without a means test, federal grants for education and the needed comprehensive programme for the building up of a Canada in which our people may find not only the means of life but the amenities of life as well. To sum up, I wish to move an amendment to the amendment that was moved this afternoon by the leader of the opposition in order that we may place our position clearly before the house. This is seconded by the hon member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and reads:

> That all the words of the amendment after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "We respectfully submit, however, that in the opinion of this house, Your Excellency's advisers in their reliance on private enterprise have failed to propose the comprehensive national planning which the present emergency demands;
> We submit further that such planning is essential in order to achieve full employment, provide for the adequate rehabilitation of war veterans, assure the maintenance of stable and adequate farm income, build urgently needed homes for the Canadian people, and attain the high volume of both agricultural and industrial production which alone will enable Canada to provide a rising standard of living for our own people and contribute to the pressing needs of war-ravaged countries in such a manner as to help lay the basis for a lasting peace."

Mr. SOLON LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, this has been a very heavy day; and, since the hour is late, I am sure hon. members would welcome an adjournment. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think we should go ahead. I felt the same way, but I went ahead, and I think the business of the house demands that we should proceed. I am objecting to adjournment now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that some arrangement has been made by the whips that my hon. friend would have the right to adjourn the debate. I was informed of that just a little while ago. If that is the case, I do not think we should go on.

Mr. COLDWELL: Our whip knows nothing about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not know anything about it.

Mr. COLDWELL: This was done last year, you know, at the same time.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

Tuesday, March 19, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

FOOD

AGREEMENTS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM—SUBSIDIES ON FARM PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, and possibly also of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. According to newspaper reports these two gentlemen visited Great Britain a short time ago for the purpose of making contracts and perhaps agreements for Canadian food products. Will they, at as early a date as possible, acquaint the house with any contracts or agreements that have been entered into, as well as the terms of those agreements and the prices to be obtained for the products?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The agreements that were under discussion while we were overseas are still being discussed by the British government and this government. We have an understanding with the British government that no announcement shall be made here until forty-eight hours after the agreement is finally signed, the object being that they may have an opportunity of making an announcement to their house at the same time as it is made here. The exact date of the announcement will have to be left, therefore, until such time as the decision is finally made.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will hon. gentlemen please speak louder? We cannot hear them at all.

Mr. SENN: May I point out to the minister that seeding operations will soon begin and that this is really the breeding season for live stock. I suggest that the announcement should be made at as early a date as possible.

Mr. GARDINER: I expect it will be made before the end of the week, but I do not want to be too definite about that.

[Later:]

Mr. GARDINER: I think I should supplement the answer I gave a moment ago to the hon. member for Haldimand. The suggestion was made that before seeding takes place, farmers should know what the prices are to be for this season's production. I may say that an announcement was made a year ago last fall and it has a bearing on some of the discussions that have been taking place in the house. The contracts which covered this year's food products were on a two-year basis and were made in the fall and winter preceding last winter. There is no intention on the part of the government to have these lowered this year. The price for delivered bacon was established down to December 31, 1946, and on cheese and milk down to the spring of 1947. Those prices are still before the farmers, and they have some knowledge of what their floor returns at least will be. When I speak of "floor returns" I include both subsidies as well as prices.

Mr. SENN: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that a large proportion of the grain produced this year will not be marketed for another year, and therefore a new contract will be needed.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to ask a supplementary question based on the minister's last statement. Does that mean no further farm subsidies will be taken off farm products during the coming year?

Mr. GARDINER: There may be an adjustment of the returns that have been given to farmers, but that will be announced in due course. What I am saying is that the farmer was given assurance a year ago last fall that he would have a certain return for the year 1946, and I do not think anyone has in contemplation a downward revision of those returns. What I wanted to make definitely understood was that the farmer can, as he has been able to do ever since the war started, anticipate what his returns are going to be for the year that he is seeding the crop.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): May I be permitted to ask an additional question in regard to barley and the policy of the government in regard thereto? In the west we find that there is a definite move to cut down barley production. Will the minister make a statement as to the barley policy for this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I have made so many statements on that point that I do not suppose it will do any harm to make another one. I have consistently and persistently stated that barley acreage should be kept up. That is one of the reasons I have been suggesting that wheat acreage should not be increased. I am sure that if all hon. members who represent constituencies in that part of Canada will take the same attitude there will not be any danger of barley acreage being decreased this year.

VETERANS LAND ACT

PRIORITIES AND DISCOUNTS FOR FARM MACHINERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I wish to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) a question, notice of which I have already sent him. In view of the urgency of increasing agricultural production and the necessity of the early and satisfactory reestablishment of veterans on farms, would the minister give immediate consideration to allowing veterans not coming under the Veterans Land Act, but who wish to become bona fide farmers, the same priorities and discounts for farm machinery as those who now come under the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that the rule forbids the making of any statement. His question should be brief and to the point.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): It is of urgent importance.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

QUESTION AS TO OPENING FOR PUBLIC USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): On Friday I asked the Minister of National Defence a question; I wonder if he can answer it today.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I have just forgotten what the question was; I was not in my seat at the time.

Mr. IRVINE: It was whether the Alaska highway would be opened in the near future to public use.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no probability that the Alaska highway will be open to the general public in the near future. As my hon. friend knows, it is to be taken over from the United States army by the Canadian army on or about April 1. There are no facilities for servicing civilian motor cars and supplying them with gasoline, and so on; consequently it will not be possible for the Canadian army to undertake the responsibility of permitting ordinary civilian travel on the road in the immediate future. We shall have to look into it further after we have taken it over.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask a supplementary question? Is there to be any official ceremony when the highway is taken over on April 1?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, there will be an appropriate ceremony. The date is not yet fixed, but it will be some time early in April. I am now discussing the matter with the chairman of the permanent joint defence board. Of necessity the ceremony will have to be on a modest scale because of the lack of suitable accommodation for civilians in the area.

MAPLE PRODUCTS

RATIONING AND PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. Is there any chance of the government easing the rationing of maple syrup and maple products in order that production may be increased?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall have to take the question as a notice. No notice of it was given and therefore I am unable to answer it now.

SUGAR

ALLOWANCE TO BEE-KEEPERS FOR HONEY PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): On Friday last the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) asked whether the Minister of Finance would not consider advising the sugar administrator to increase immediately the allowance of sugar to Canadian bee-keepers sufficiently to stimulate honey production in 1946.

The answer is: The wartime prices and trade board is fully aware of the necessity of encouraging the production of honey in 1946. The following instructions have been issued by the sugar administrator:

For feeding in the winter of 1945-46 a maximum allowance of fifteen pounds per colony was permitted. For spring feeding an allowance of five pounds per package may be granted where necessary, but only to the extent of packages imported to replace colonies destroyed. In the case of veterans wishing to import packages to reestablish a comparable apiary given up on enlistment, sufficient sugar may be granted to carry bees through to the honey flow. Ex-servicemen studying bee husbandry in vocational training classes may be permitted a maximum of twenty pounds of sugar should they desire to gain some practical experience through the operation of one or two hives. In addition, provincial apiarists have been authorized, when in their opinion the circumstances might warrant, to grant sufficient sugar to prevent starvation of colonies. Applications for sugar in such cases should be made to the provincial apiarist of the province in which the bee-keeper resides.

POSTAL SERVICE

RATES ON FOOD PARCELS OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General with regard to the food shortage in the United Kingdom. Will the Postmaster General facilitate and encourage the sending of parcels by Canadians to friends and relatives there by (a) reducing the postage to the same rate as was charged for parcels to members of the armed forces during the war; (b) speeding up the time taken in transit at the present time? Will he take the necessary steps to shorten the time for air mail letters to the United Kingdom? These letters frequently take from one to two weeks.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I suggest that this question be placed on the order paper. I shall have to give it some consideration before I can answer it.

FISHERIES

INVESTIGATION OF JAPANESE FISHERIES AND FISH CANNING PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Will the minister take some action toward having appointed as soon as possible suitable and competent Canadians to join with the officials sent by the United States and now in Japan to investigate on behalf of Canada Japanese fisheries and fish canning plants?

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): I thank the hon member for giving me notice of this question. I am pleased to inform him that steps have already been taken by the department, in consultation with the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Reconstruction, under which it is hoped that Canadians competent to observe and examine the Japanese fisheries will join United States delegates for the fulfilment of this purpose. While arrangements have not yet been fully completed, it is hoped that they will be shortly.

The house resumed from Monday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): First I should like sincerely to join with the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken), the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in expressing regret at the departure from Canada of the Earl of Athlone and Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice. I join with them also in congratulating the two right hon. gentlemen who so recently have been honoured in their appointment to the imperial privy council. I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), the mover, and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters), the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, on their very fine efforts. Considering what they had to go on by way of material, Mr. Speaker, I should say both hon. members did an excellent job. The Liberal party is indeed fortunate to have the support of young men of their high qualities.

The speech from the throne seemed to reflect something of the gloom that must be in the minds of the leaders of the government. It certainly could not be called an optimistic document in any respect. In two or three passages the government made an obvious effort to congratulate itself by resorting to comparisons which, to say the least, were convulsive attempts at unfounded optimism; but I found little in the whole speech to indicate that in reality the government is aware of what things are absolutely essential if Canada is to break the bloody cycle of unemployment, want and war, and to make this country strong in peace. It takes more than pretty statements in a speech to set things right. The best evidence of honest meaning will not be found in the theories of their writers or in the speeches of their speakers, but rather in the practices of the government itself. For that reason the true test of effective government is to take a good straight look at the state of the realm, and that I propose to do for a very few minutes.

It is now more than six months since the war ended. The speech from the throne points out the conditions of hunger, privation and suffering for millions which are following in the wake of those six tragic years of human experience. All our hearts, I am sure, bleed for the sufferers in the various countries throughout the world. The most pressing world need to-day seems to be for food for the people who face serious shortages or who indeed face conditions of actual famine. If the need is to be met; if human suffering is to be cut to a minimum, then Canada's duty seems quite clear. My group will join in any effort to see that the suffering is cut to the absolute minimum. The flood-gates of production must be opened wide. They should have been opened wide months ago. Now our reserves of foodstuffs are gone. Any one with any gumption at all could see the danger inherent in restricting production, as we did in connection with wheat some time ago simply because our existing storage facilities were taxed to the limit and were not sufficient to take care of more wheat. At that time a few of us said that in view of the potential world tragedy it would be a criminal act against humanity to curtail wheat production, as was being advocated. We suggested the construction of adequate storage facilities to handle all the wheat the Canadian farmers wanted to produce at that time. Needless to say we were looked upon as blithering idiots, and wheat production was restricted. Then the world surplus vanished overnight, and now men, women and children must die of hunger. I say the Liberal government must take its share of responsiblity for this tragic condition in the world.

I have been surprised that though each week the shortage of necessary commodities has been growing more acute, little has been done by the government, at least in the way of national organization to stop, the decline and increase the flow of wanted goods and services from the farm, the sea, the mine and factory to meet the tremendous demand that has developed both in Canada and in foreign markets. It is true that the other day the Prime Minister announced his nine-point programme for increasing production in order to meet the shortage of supplies; but in recent months I have noticed that luxury goods have been far easier to obtain than the plain, ordinary necessities of life. What does this indicate, Mr. Speaker, if not a woeful lack of experience and practical knowledge on the part of the legion of controllers and bureaucrats who have become the most serious handicap to productive industry in our country? What Canadians want, in common with the other peoples of the world, are the plain, ordinary necessities of life, not the luxuries; and it seems to me every thinking man can see that the situation is so serious that nothing but an all-out effort to increase the production of foodstuffs and ordinary civilian goods like rubber footwear, socks, shirts, nylons, underwear, bath tubs, houses, washing machines, automobiles and radios will even begin to prevent tragic results.

The whole Canadian scene continues to be overshadowed by the spectre of inflation. Abundant production and the successful distribution of ordinary consumer goods is the only defence against inflation; yet the government persists in a policy of drifting along, afraid to take bold and effective action to remove the bottlenecks and the discouragements that have dulled incentive and checked productive capacity from one end of this country to the other. For instance, what has the government done about taxation? The system of punitive expropriation followed by this government has contributed more than anything else to the discouragement of productive enterprise. Endless and overlapping regulations, rulings and decisions continue to confuse and exasperate the people, and little is being done by the managers of our financial affairs in this country to remedy the situation and free Canadian enterprise from this millstone which hangs about its neck.

Social Crediters everywhere, in common with all progressive and sound thinkers, urge the government to begin an immediate and progressive downward revision of taxation. Those taxes that bedevil and restrict production should be revised at once in order to provide incentive to industry to step up its output and restore confidence once more. And coincidentally with the increase in production of consumer goods the personal income tax schedules must be revamped to exempt from taxation the incomes of all Canadians up to $2,000 per year. We are prepared, Mr. Speaker, to organize a fight to see that this is done at the earliest possible moment, and we are simply serving notice of that fight. Nothing would do more to rejuvenate the workers and farmers of Canada and to induce an all-out productive effort than the lightening of the taxation burden upon them, especially the burden of income tax. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the appointment of a tax commission to investigate, simplify and revise our whole system of taxation is long overdue. The people of Canada should unite in demanding these things. They can and must be done.

Another old man of the sea which has been dragging down industry and slowing our reconversion is the government's price policy. I supported price fixing for the duration of the war. I supported the continuation of price control until the flow of consumer goods to the Canadian market should remove the danger of inflation. But when I gave this support I war fully aware of the necessity for some revisions in certain lines as we got along into the post-war period. It should have been perfectly obvious to the government that even before the war, producers of staples and ordinary commercial goods operated on a very narrow margin of profit. Further they should know that in the last two years production costs have gone up materially. With a much narrowed margin of profit, increased costs and restricted volume, producers certainly have been in a squeeze. Where was the incentive, therefore, to increase production to meet the demands of this time? It has been a heart-breaking business for producers to get long overdue revisions of an obsolete price control structure. If our country is to meet the desperate needs of this most critical time, the government will have to revise quickly and sensibly its price policy. And, what is just as important, it seems to me that the hordes of officials, large and small, will have to be paired down to a minimum; for today it is almost impossible to get quick action because of the many strata of bureaucrats through whose hands things have to go for final decision.

I do not advocate by any means even now the complete removal or abolition of the price controls, but I do say that in many cases there must be a fair revision of ceiling prices if we are to release the flood of ordinary commodities that the world needs in such a desperate hurry. We are not so concerned about the luxury goods, on which there has always been a very large margin of profit, but we are concerned about ordinary consumer goods.

The government, it seems to me, must wake up and do something about this very important matter—and do it soon. If agriculture is successfully to respond to the call for increased food volume, then the farmers of Canada, and in particular of western Canada, will have to be assured of a much better supply of labour than they can see available at the present time.

What is the government doing about it? Is there coordinated effort among the departments of Labour, Agriculture and National Defence to speed up demobilization and rehabilitation of the men in the services, and to make many of them available for the work of food production? I have noted that our cities recently have become full of idle people, thousands of them drawing unemployment insurance.

[Mr. Low.]

His Excellency's speech mentioned the recently concluded agreement for a loan to Great Britain of $1,250 million. I personally was glad to see that this credit had been made available to Great Britain. As a matter of fact a similar credit should have been arranged for Great Britain last fall. I am satisfied that if the various parts of the commonwealth had risen to the occasion last autumn, they collectively could have prevented the United States from bludgeoning Great Britain into submission to the nefarious Bretton Woods agreement.

But while I am pleased to see a huge new credit advanced, which will I feel stimulate trade between our two countries and materially contribute to employment in Canada, yet I think the loan should have been made to Great Britain interest free. Two per cent on the yearly balance outstanding will, in time, be found to clutter up and finally to make impossible the balancing of payments between Great Britain and Canada, especially if we persist in maintaining our senseless system of financing foreign trade.

While I am speaking about trade, may I offer one word of comment on that part of the speech from the throne which reads:

> Employment and income alike are bound up with the restoration and expansion of world trade. To the productive employment of vast numbers of Canadians, export markets are essential.
> The government has steadily pursued its efforts to restore former markets, to secure new markets, and generally to expand peace-time markets. In pursuit of this policy, export credits for which additional provision was made at the last session, have been extended to several of our wartime allies.

This, Mr. Speaker, seems to indicate no new approach whatever to the government's plan of foreign trade. It is essentially the same old approach. I see nothing in the speech from the throne of His Excellency, nor yet in what the government is doing, to assure me that they are determined to look after the home market—the very best market we have.

If foreign trade continues to be the main objective of the country's productive effort, then we are going to see the same old races for markets, the same old idea of favourable trade balances, followed by economic and military war. But if the emphasis is changed so that consumption, first at home and then abroad, becomes the objective of our production effort, then foreign trade in normal times will be concerned only with our real surpluses—that is, those over and above what the people of Canada want and can use.

When those surpluses are trade into other countries, Canada must be prepared to receive goods and services in payment for them. And if she is so prepared, then we must set about finding a way equitably to distribute those imports among all the people. Foreign trade must be a two-way street, if we are to have in future a warless world of free men. I should like to hear from some government speaker during this debate who will tell us what the government is doing about that.

Now, while it is on my mind let me suggest to the government that it bring forward its legislative programme for this session at the earliest possible day. This group is prepared to facilitate the business of the house, just as much as any party or any group in it. We will shorten debates; we will do everything we can to help out. But we do plead with the government to bring forward at the earliest possible moment its legislative programme, so that we may see what it is. There is absolutely no sense or reason in holding back important measures until the dying days of the session.

I do not want to see a repetition of the Bretton Woods fiasco of last December. If anything of the kind should occur, I will not give any understanding or undertaking that my twelve valiants, who have so well demonstrated what thorough study and unity can do, will not keep the house sitting all summer and fall, and all winter if necessary, to get right to the bottom of whatever schemes may be hatched up to take us off our guard.

I think, too, that the government must recognize that the all-too-frequent practice of talking out private members' resolutions is the negation of the true democratic principle. Democracy needs to be revitalized and strengthened in this country, rather than to be weakened and rendered anaemic by such practices as that of "talking out" in this assembly. Private members' days should mean something. They should be valuable to the country. If some resolution is brought forward and catches the support of a majority of hon. members, then the government ought to have the courage to allow it to come to a vote. By their example in doing so they would encourage true democratic practices throughout the whole country.

For a moment or two I should like to refer to the question which is currently uppermost in the minds of all our people—this whole business of espionage. I wish first to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon his determination to bring this whole sordid matter of espionage into the full light of day. Had he not done so, I believe he might have been branded as the arch criminal of this age. I want to congratulate him upon the way he handled the situation from beginning to end. I have no criticism whatsoever of his action in that regard. I must say however that I was not at all surprised when the story broke some weeks ago. I have known something of communist activity in this coutnry; and the Social Credit organization—and I along with it—has repeatedly warned the people about what was going on. As a result of this warning we have been called red-baiters, nazis and fascists by those who would seek to hide their own guilt by trying to smear the other fellow.

I join with the Prime Minister in expressing the fervent wish that Canada may be able to live at peace with all nations. There is nothing we want more than peaceful relations with all countries—and I am not picking out any particular one; I refer to them all. But I believe that good straight talk is sometimes necessary to clear the air. If I do a little straight talking this afternoon it is for the purpose of trying to clear the air, and to put our finger upon some of the difficulties.

I think enough has already been said about holding suspects in the case incommunicado. Serious as that is, especially from the point of view of personal freedom and human rights, there are other aspects of the case which now require most earnest consideration and with which no one yet has dealt. I should like to know how these men and women who are charged before the courts in this country got into their important positions. I should like to know too who appointed them. I should like to know who recommended them, which is a very important thing. I should like to know too if there was any investigation of their background and their past before they were given such key responsibilities as they seem to have been given. Some person or persons in the government service must be responsible for putting these people where they were and, furthermore, for retaining them there as long as they were retained. In this connection I should like to quote from a report furnished me by a former intelligence officer in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—and I say "former." It reads:

> Prior to the first conference of the united nations at San Francisco last year, Ottawa authorities were furnished with information indicating that the communist party power would be further expanded as a result of such conference. Also that after the next federal election (which has since taken place) the communists would have more strength in the Canadian government than ever before, as it was known that they were running under various colours other than their own. However, such information was obviously not acted upon, and I would say that the public is now quite capable of judging whether communist party power has increased.

Surely it is quite obvious that the government service, if not its ranks, has been shot through and through with communist sympathizers and actual members of the communist party. The Liberal government stands charged to-day with gross negligence as a result of which vast spy rings appear to have grown up within our country.

Perhaps some member of the government will furnish the house with the reason why Ralph Wesley Clearwater, formerly a detective corporal in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, was removed in May, 1945, from the position he held as non-commissioned officer in charge of the intelligence section of the R.C.M.P. for the province of Saskatchewan. This officer furnished many reports to his superior officers in the force concerning the growth of communist and nazi espionage in Canada over the past several years. These reports were repeatedly ignored. This man was shifted from the intelligence section of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to another branch, and in frustration he did resign from his position.

Why was not a most careful inquiry conducted to determine the loyalties of these suspects who are now before the courts, and many others not yet suspected? At least one of those at present scheduled for trial was repeatedly discharged from Research Enterprises Limited for unseemly conduct. Why was he immediately given a commission and a position of high trust in the navy? There seems to have been little difficulty for communists and others of very doubtful loyalties to secure highly important and key positions in the government services. Perhaps if we could find out how, we might also find out how so many of their ilk have secured key positions on university staffs throughout Canada where they find opportunity to undermine the faith of our young people in Canada in true democracy and in Christianity. It must have struck thousands of Canadian readers as peculiar that so many of the suspects already charged with serious offences were either on the staff of or were graduates of McGill university. That is not surprising to me when I think of some of the heads of that university, and of the fact that for some years back there has been definite information that the institution is a "red" hotbed.

In the second interim report of the royal commission of inquiry is an arresting statement, namely:

> . . . some witnesses holding strategic positions have made the significant statement under oath that they had a loyalty which took priority over the loyalty owed by them to their own country, and for that reason they acted as they did.

[Mr. Low.]

This is getting to be an attitude widespread over Canada and is not by any means confined to the unfortunates who now find themselves in the toils of the law, or, I might say, even to government employees. You find them in all ranks across this country. There must be a reason for the attitude, and the safety of our beloved country impels us to seek that cause. We must find it, and we must correct it mighty soon if we are to have a warless world of free men in future years.

I am convinced that we will find the cause largely in the flood of propaganda which was loosed shortly before the outbreak of the war and which was designed to shake Canadians loose from their attachment to the crown, from their loyalty to Canada and from their will to remain as a part of the British commonwealth. It also was aimed at preparing Canadians to surrender their sovereignty to some kind of supranational government later to be set up. That propaganda has continued through the years since, with increasing volume and intensity. It has gone on over the radio, in the press, at public forums and through the distribution of thousands of tons of printed matter. It has done its work mighty well in some of our institutions of higher learning.

Some of the propaganda looked harmless, but its subtle effect was deadly. For example, in March, 1943, one B. K. Sandwell spoke to the Ottawa branch of the league of nations society. The Ottawa Citizen of April 1 of that year reported Mr. Sandwell as saying:

> A supranational authority with power to settle questions of immigration, natural resources, treatment of minorities, repudiation of debts, finance, and other questions was predicted by B. K. Sandwell of Toronto.

The report continues:

> To bring about Canada's acceptance of the new "authority," however, Mr. Sandwell said it would be necessary to bring all the people to a diminution of their loyalty to the crown by substituting a new loyalty to an "authority" wider than Canada, than the British commonwealth of nations, and the United States or all the democracies together—

And again:

> It is up to such organizations as the league to endeavour to develop among Canadians the will to sacrifice a substantial part of their national rights for this new "authority."

Mr. BLACKMORE: Government at the international level.

Mr. LOW: I might point out that Mr. Sandwell, as a reward for all he has done in that respect, is today one of the governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and still travels about Canada spreading supranational hysteria. Mr. Sandwell may have been sincere and honest in his aims, and the members of the league of nations society may really have believed that what he said was right and sound, but it is my conviction that the endeavours of such men and organizations over the years since, influenced as they undoubtedly were by the flood of propaganda which all but swept away faith and reason, have been mainly responsible for the condition because of which people find within themselves a loyalty which takes priority over their loyalty to their own country.

The wind has been sown and now we are about to reap the whirlwind. Man cannot serve two masters. Either his loyalty will be to Canada or it must be to some other country. What has the government across this floor done to counteract the ill effects of this terrible and subtle education of our people into becoming subjects of an ethereal supranational or international thing that no ordinary man can understand, leaving them easy marks for communist persuasion? What indeed? While they are examining unfortunate Fred Rose and the others, let them take a look through the other end of the telescope. All the while that this supranational propaganda has been influencing large numbers of Canadian people as well as some members of the government, Russia has been very busy developing communism and making it bring alleged benefits to the Russian people. Those benefits have also been widely heralded to a fear-burdened Canadian citizenry labouring under a crippled and shackled capitalist system, but few if any of the disadvantages and heavy disabilities of communism have been publicized.

Let me say right here that I admire the Russian people for their great bravery. I admire them for their devotion to their "ism". They have not been victims of this supranational propaganda, and that is significant. But one thing is beginning to stand out very plainly. From now on capitalism and free enterprise, in fact, Christian democracy, must compete with communism on the basis of performance—not talk. Capitalism and free enterprise—that is, Christian democracy—must provide jobs and spread abundance to the limits of the people's ability to produce and their desire to consume; otherwise in due time it will be succeeded by communism. Ignorance, apathy, and ridicule can afford us no protection. The only certain bulwark for Canada is a superior economic and political life, if we are to preserve the freedom and security of the Canadian people.

Any system which exacts the price of unemployment, depressions, and wars is nothing to cheer about. But I for one am not prepared to swap our system of Christian democracy, so-called free enterprise, for communism, because I believe that with the proper adjustments and the proper opportunity our system can work best for the Canadian people. Our big problem is to make those adjustments so that every Canadian can be assured of complete economic security with full personal freedom. I say to you, sir, that the application of the Social Credit principles to the system of capitalistic free enterprise will make that system yield so much greater results than communism can ever yield that I would have no fear at all about who would win the race with communism—none at all. That is why I am glad that Russia is trying out a new economic system, within its own borders. I hope they will keep it within their own country until they have proved it. It can save us in Canada the pain of pioneering a new idea that would prove to be inferior to our own. But this government must wake up, get the kinks out of our system, and make it yield us the benefits we want; otherwise a dissatisfied, disgruntled, propaganda-victimized people with loyalties weaned away from their country will kick the system overboard and adopt communism. There is no alternative for the future. It is Social Credit or communism —Christian democracy or slavery.

The government of Canada has a tremendous responsibility in these trying times. Whether our country becomes a strong, united land of abundance depends to a very large extent upon the quality of government leadership. Canada can be the greatest country in the world. But if she is to become the greatest country in the world the government must immediately undertake the reeducation of many thousands of people to a fervent loyalty to Canada; to a faith in their great land, a dynamic faith that will impel them to work as hard for Canada as Russians do for Russia. This can be accomplished only by getting the whole truth to the people, by making our system yield for all Canadians superior results, by strengthening the sinews of democracy and by revitalizing it, and by lending Canada's full cooperation as a completely sovereign state with other nations in a real effort to bring about a warless world of free men. God grant that we may meet the necessities of this grave time!

Mr. LEON JOSEPH RAYMOND (Wright) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, while I am quite late in doing it, allow me, on this first opportunity that I have to address this house, to tender you my congratulations for the dignity and impartiality with which you are discharging your high functions.

I also wish to join those who have preceded me in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

In that speech His Excellency the Governor General takes his leave from us and we are deeply moved in reading the following words:

> Princess Alice and I will ever recall that in these momentous years it has been our proud privilege to share in your anxieties and rejoicings. Throughout our lives we shall cherish an abiding affection for Canada and her people.

Such words attest the noble character of those who have just left us, and I wish to tell them that the Canadian people will, in turn, hold an undying affection for them.

No one who reads the speech from the throne can fail to notice the emphasis that is put on our international relations and on their effect upon our domestic policies.

In the second paragraph it is stated:

> It is only in the light of the world situation that all our problems can be seen in true perspective. The future of our own and of every country depends upon success in the task of world reconstruction, and the establishment of an enduring peace. Many of the measures you will be called upon to consider at the present session will be concerned with this wider aspect of human affairs.

A little further on, we find the following statement:

> It is the policy of my ministers to see that the utmost support is given by Canada to the united nations organization.

While many other paragraphs of the speech from the throne refer to world problems, I do not deem it necessary to make further quotations from it in order to assert that primary importance is given to our international relations, and let me add, rightly so.

Without claiming in the least that I am an expert in such matters, but merely because I wish to bring my contribution to the common work, I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks on our international relations and at the same time to add a few words about relations as they are today within this country.

Whatever may be thought about the last war, all Canadian citizens must admit that our country has emerged from the conflict with a greater stature. Canada has achieved a tremendous effort in the industrial, military, economic and financial fields. Thousands of her soldiers, sailors and airmen have fought on all theatres of war; the products of her factories as well as those of her farms and forests have spread her name to the farthest corners of the world; the savings of her people have buttressed the allies in the darkest hours of the war, and later hastened the common victory.

Before 1939, Canada was already recognized as a world power, but the last war has much more clearly brought home to other nations that status of our country. Those nations which, until then had the least knowledge about Canada or underestimated her economic, military and political importance, have taken cognizance of her. Since that time, they understand better and better the potentialities of our young country, which is endowed with an abundance of partly developed natural resources, enjoys modern economy and occupies a strategic position of primary importance.

We have much evidence of that growing recognition of the importance of Canada in the international sphere. At the beginning of the war, four countries only, except the members of the British commonwealth, had diplomatic representation in the capital. Those nations were the United States, France, Belgium and Japan. Since that time, about 18 other countries have deemed it proper to open legations in Ottawa.

In addition, the Vatican, the highest moral authority in the world and the best friend of true democracy, has just given to Canada a testimonial which puts her among the greatest countries of the world by appointing to the Sacred College a second cardinal in the person of His Eminence the archbishop of Toronto. Although some countries whose population is greater than ours have but one cardinal, Canada now has the same number as Poland, Brazil and Argentina. That is undoubtedly a recognition of the spiritual value of Canada among the nations.

Finally, our country participates in the great international conferences, and despite her youth, she commands the attention of older nations through her well-balanced thought and her matured judgment.

Some may be prone to exaggerate with too great complacency the part played by our country in international affairs, while others are given to minimizing its importance. These two extremes should be avoided.

Canada has much to learn in the field of international affairs, but there is a reality that should be squarely faced; it is that our country ranks among the greatest in the world through her economic, if not her political, power. While remembering the fact that she is an American country and is a member of the British commonwealth, she must have a foreign policy of her own, a policy consonant with her legitimate national interests as well as with the interests of the great family of nations.

Mr. Speaker, our foreign policy should not be a source of serious dissension among us, but rather one of union. It is surely human to disagree as to what are the best procedures to follow, but, as far as the fundamental principles of our foreign policy are concerned, the great majority of our people should be able to come to an agreement, if they wish to do so. There are certain fundamental principles on which all Canadians, without distinction of racial origin, should be able to come to an easy understanding, provided there is goodwill.

The first is international cooperation. This may seem like a set phrase, but although many people talk about international cooperation, very few put it in practice and it is not sufficient to talk about it. Every Canadian should have a firm belief in international cooperation and when I speak of international cooperation, I do not mean unilateral cooperation, but cooperation based on reciprocity, law, justice and charity.

It is only logical that this cooperation should begin with our neighbours. Geography is one of the natural factors which influence the foreign policy of a nation. What is Canada geographically speaking? Our country is part of the American continent. Whether we like this fact or not, we are not free to change it.

International cooperation is essential, among American nations, first and foremost with the United States. From the economic and military standpoint, Canada is linked to the North American order. Our economy and that of the United States are closely knit together. On the other hand, Washington cannot see Canada attacked without feeling itself threatened, just as Canada could not look on indifferently should some powerful nation attack the United States. There exists, in fact, a Canadian-American military alliance. That is the logical outcome of the geographical position and common interests of two neighbouring nations, and it is necessary to accept all that is implied by this responsibility.

Canada and the United States alone, however, do not spread over the two American continents. South of the United States lie several republics holding many things in common with us as American nations. Canada cannot ignore them. As a matter of fact, we have taken an interest in them, but I feel that we should develop our commercial and cultural relations with them to a far greater extent than we have done in the past. South America offers an extensive market for Canadian products. It is up to us to make the best of it.

If Canada is geographically part of the American continent, it is also a member nation of the British commonwealth and this, whether we like it or not, is also a fact.

So long as Canada remains associated with this group of nations, it must take this partnership into account when framing its foreign policy, and even if it were not bound to the British commonwealth, it should nevertheless base its foreign policy on the interests which it has in common with Great Britain. This cooperation is essential, however, between Canada and the other members of the British commonwealth acting in the capacity of sovereign nations. It must rest on complete reciprocity and be governed by their respective legitimate interests.

This cooperation, however, should allow Canada complete command of its own foreign policy which ought to be framed first of all according to the common welfare of its people.

In other words, our cooperation with the nations of the commonwealth should be conceived not on the colonial but on the Canadian level. Canada, moreover, is a member of the universal comity of nations. This is the third fact which must define the fundamental principles of our external policy.

The interdependence of nations has always existed, but it has been brought out much more forcefully by the last war and it is still obvious now that the war has ended. The nations of the world depend upon one another for their prosperity and their security.

The economic set-up of nations is so much interrelated to-day that prosperity has become as it were indivisible. It appears that no part of the globe may prosper if another section of the world is in the throes of economic depression. The economic upheaval which now hinders the economic recovery of the world, exemplifies this truth.

Likewise peace is just as indivisible. Such progress has been made in the manufacture of armaments in the atomic age which now dawns that the next war, if ever there is one, will be a war between continents. Bombs may be launched from one continent to another, and within a few hours waves of planes may spread death and destruction amongst the enemy. In such a conflict, as a result of the economic interdependence of nations, all would be inevitably involved. Our prosperity, based mainly upon foreign markets, and our security make it imperative for us to seek international cooperation.

It is within the United Nations Organization that we must strive to uphold the principles of justice which will bring back in the world normal trade relations, and will ensure world-wide security.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that the United Nations Organization is not perfect. But, notwithstanding its lack of perfection, it is a step and an important one in the right direction; and Canada must do her utmost to ensure its success and to perfect it.

Obviously, we must assume a fair and just share in the policing of the world under the direction of the new League of Nations. But it is worthwhile to pay it this insurance premium against war, against a war that everyone is agreed would send the world to its doom if it should break out some day.

Finally, Canada must be in a position to ensure her own security against any potential enemy. Of course, we do not want war. But the last conflict was for us a painful experience. What is now taking place in the world reminds us that we must be prepared to protect efficiently our borders against any aggressor.

According to scientists, such progress has been achieved in the manufacture of armaments that, should another war break out, the most powerfully armed nation will have the advantage. The countries which will not be ready to defend their borders will not have time to prepare their defences as during the last war.

So long as the new League of Nations has not taken the necessary steps to establish the peace of the world upon solid foundations and to effect worldwide disarmament, we must be prepared for any eventuality.

I do not advocate specific measures. It is believed that the voluntary system is sufficient to furnish all the men needed by this country for the efficient defence of her borders, but I say that so long as the United Nations Organization is not sufficiently strong to silence agressor nations, Canada must stand prepared. This is not a matter to be discussed from the standpoint of party politics, but it is the protection of our country and of our loved ones which is involved.

However, Mr. Speaker, our relations with the rest of the world must not overshadow our national problem.

I do not delude myself with words, and when I look at the situation in our country, I am struck by the same mistrust which seems to exist between nations.

I find such mistrust between the two main racial groups in our country, notwithstanding the smiles that are sometimes so readily exchanged.

[Mr. L. J. Raymond.]

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): That is perfectly true.

Mr. RAYMOND (Wright) (Translation): To my mind, a state can never be powerful as long as mistrust of this nature exists. I also detect this suspicion between the various provinces. Last August, the federal government called a conference in Ottawa for the purpose of submitting to the provinces a new scheme for the distribution of financial responsibilities. So far, an understanding has not yet been worked out. I know full well that such an important task cannot be completed in a few months. The conference met again in November of last year, and again in January. New sittings will take place next April. What is most apparent in some of the participants, is the sentiment of mistrust, fear and doubt.

The same spirit seems to prevail in the economic field. Suspicion pervades the ranks of employers and workers and I do not think it could be said that the two groups trust each other. The same applies to the relations of the rich and the poor. The individual who has money or properties distrusts the masses. He fears their demands. On the other hand, the public holds the owner of worldly goods as a suspect.

The following statement may appear rather childish, Mr. Speaker, but I am convinced that all our problems can be solved provided we base their consideration on a spirit of mutual trust. However, this sentiment can only be awakened, nurtured and matured provided justice and charity govern the consideration of all these problems.

On the national level, what is wanted above all else, as common sense tells us, is that every one be both sentimentally and legally loyal to one country only: Canada.

Besides, our country is a federation organized by two groups of different ethnical origins: the Anglo-Canadians and the French-Canadians. The principle behind this charter is the equality of treatment of the two racial groups which officially make up the nation and the respect of the peculiarities of each race in their loyalty to the same country, Canada. Two races, two cultures, two civilizations, living in harmony and progressing in peace and mutual confidence: such is, in my estimation, the dream of the fathers of the Canadian confederation; such is the object which we must be willing to bring about and to enhance if national cooperation between two official racial groups is to be established on a solid foundation.

Once this sentiment is prevalent, it will become increasingly easier to establish good relations between the federal and provincial authorities. I do not intend, now, to review the scheme submitted to the provinces, last August, by the central government. However, I may be allowed to state that, provided all the members of this conference are sincerely willing to safeguard the principles of the Canadian confederation, it should be relatively easy to arrive at an understanding on the revision of federal and provincial financial prerogatives without interfering with provincial autonomy and without preventing Canada from attaining the rank of a powerful nation. Where sincerity and fairness exist, mistrust is readily replaced by mutual confidence, without which it is well nigh impossible to attain a satisfactory understanding.

Mr. Speaker, we should always carefully avoid representing the federal government and the provinces as antagonists. This is a false conception of the functioning of confederation as intended by its authors.

Sovereign in their various fields, the federal administration and the provinces are intended to cooperate in the respect of the legitimate traditions of each of the two official national groups and in the social and financial interests of the various provinces for the greater good of the whole country. It is in such a spirit that federal-provincial relations must be inaugurated.

In the economic field, it is by a similar policy that rivalries between capital and labour will be surmounted. Capital and labour are interested partners in the success of a large common undertaking and I do not believe there is any more room for strikes in our economy, than there is for war in the world.

May I sum up my idea, Mr. Speaker, by saying that since Canada has become an important international power she should assume her full share in international affairs in order to bring to the world the greatest of all temporal assets: peace.

Peaceful relations between nations, between employer and employee, between capital and labour, peace that will bring back normal business conditions and ensure collective security.

In order to achieve that aim, international realations must be based on mutual confidence and cooperation animated and strengthened by reciprocity, law, justice and charity.

In relations between ourselves, such cooperation must also exist because our country will not prosper in mistrust, division and lack of loyalty or in unification, but in understanding, tolerance, unity and loyalty.

Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I wish to recall what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said at London, in November 1918, while addressing a meeting of young Ontario Liberals. These words have been quoted over and over again, but they are of lasting interest and they may be applied not only to Liberals but to every Canadian, whatever may be his racial origin, his party or religion, and they may even apply to the whole world.

(Text):

As for you who stand on the threshold of life, with a long horizon open before you for a career of usefulness to your native land, if you will permit me, after a long life, I shall remind you that already many problems rise before you; problems of race division, problems of creed differences, problems of economic conflict, problems of national duty and national aspiration. Let me tell you that for the solution of these problems you have a safe guide, an unfailing light, if you remember that faith is better than doubt and love better than hate.

Banish doubt and hate from your life. Let your souls be ever open to the promptings of faith and the gentle influence of brotherly love. Be adamant against the haughty, be gentle and kind to the weak. Let your aim and purpose, in good report or ill, in victory and defeat, be so to live, so to strive, so to serve as to do your part to raise ever higher the standard of life and of living.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): As indicated by the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), when he spoke last evening, we of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation are deeply concerned about conditions within Canada, particularly housing and unemployment. But as one who has just returned from several months overseas, during which time it was my privilege to be one of Canada's representatives at the meetings of the united nations organization held in London, I feel that my remarks in this debate should be in the nature of a report of my experiences. Indeed international affairs are of such importance that it is my desire to devote my entire time this afternoon to this subject.

It seems to me the time has come when, in the words of Prime Minister Attlee, Canada should very definitely make UNO the overriding factor in this country's foreign policy. This concept to me has certain definite meanings. First of all I suggest that we should realize clearly the true nature of the united nations organization. I have in mind what I regard as an inadequate if not false impression of UNO that has been gained because of the extensive publicity given to the conflicts which took place in London, particularly at the security council table. It is true that one of the principal organs of the united nations organization is the security council, and that one of the principal functions of this new world organization is to prevent the outbreak of war through the work of that council. Accordingly its work is of great importance, and the security council deserves full publicity when it is in session. The point I should like to make, however, is that the work of the security council during the period we were in London really occupied only a minor portion of the total time we were there. Including the preparatory commission as well as the meeting of the general assembly, we were in session in London for a total of almost eleven weeks. The amount of time consumed by the security council was a relatively small portion of that total period. In other words, the greater part of our time over there was spent in dealing with matters other than the immediate question of peace and security. Those other matters were principally at the social and economic level.

It would take far more time than is at my disposal today—but I am hoping that other members of the delegation may add to what I have to say on this point—to discuss even briefly all the subjects that were dealt with. For example, we spent considerable time on the food problem that faces the world today, and on the problems of agricultural production related thereto. We dealt with problems of labour and the relationship between the new world organization and organized labour. We dealt with relationships between UNO and the specialized agencies that have been in existence or have come into being in recent months: the food and agricultural organization; UNRRA; UNESCO; the ILO; PICAO, and other organizations of this nature. The purpose of all these discussions was self-evident; namely, that it was the desire of those who attended the UNO meetings in London to establish a basis for government at the international level. When I use that phrase I am conscious, as one who was there, of the fact that we have not as yet achieved world government. As another speaker in this debate has already suggested, that ideal may still be a considerable distance away. But what impressed me was the number of responsible leaders of governments from all parts of the world who made clear their realization that we had to move to an era of world government in which the nations of the world would not meet just in a sort of continuing peace conference, still jealously guarding their individual sovereignty, but would meet rather to plan the basic social and economic life of our world so as to build up conditions that would not only make war unnecessary but achieve a higher standard of living for the peoples of the world all over the globe. As a matter of fact, the thing that thrilled me most in my experiences at London was the extent to which that concept was present and was expressed. In public addresses I have referred to it as a groping toward the concept of world government, and in my view Canada, as a nation that ought to make UNO the overriding factor in its foreign policy, should be concerned about making the greatest possible contribution toward the creation of conditions which will make world government possible.

I emphasize that, Mr. Speaker. It is not enough just to seek the passing of a resolution to bring world government into being. It will not come in that way. We are going to get it only if we create conditions which will make it possible. There are various conditions which are necessary. I mention first of all the need for the removal of suspicion and fear among nations, and the replacing of that suspicion and fear with trust, good will and positive friendliness. Then I mention the achievement of economic policies within a country such as ours, and, indeed, within all countries, which find their expression and their fruition in cooperation among the nations rather than in competition with each other. Toward that end I see the various things that I feel we should be attacking in this country, our social and economic problems, not just as something we should deal with for our own good here in Canada but as the basis for our giving a stronger lead toward the creation of conditions that will make possible government at the international level for the good of all mankind.

It has been said that this is a difficult ideal to achieve and that we will have a hard time getting there, but I suggest that a much harder time is ahead for mankind if we do not achieve it. It has been my experience to see something of the destruction that occurred during the recent war, before the atomic age; and I am sure that others who have seen what I have seen, especially those who were there when the destruction took place, and anyone who uses his imagination at all, will agree that we simply have to make it an overriding concern that we achieve world conditions that will prevent the outbreak of another war, for another war there must not be.

I have said already that our first aim in strengthening UNO should be to realize its true nature, namely that it is the basis for world government and that what the nations of the world are aiming at is the possibility of planning together our whole social and economic life so that we may achieve a higher standard of living and thus not only prevent war but win positive human accord. In the second place, I would urge that Canada give the fullest possible support to the united nations, by positive and active participation in all the organs and specialized agencies of which we are a member. I cannot emphasize too strongly the significance of the social and economic factors in the new world we are trying to build. I have already mentioned a number of the specialized agencies. As a Canadian I am proud of the fact that we have been elected to the economic and social council. One cannot say too much about the importance and significance of our being on that council. I call upon Canada to give a strong lead in the economic and social council, and in the deliberations of the general assembly and its various committees of which, as time goes on, we shall be members.

This may involve increasing the size of the Department of External Affairs, so that more work can be done in this field, and so that the strongest advice and support can be given to our delegations at the many meetings that must be held year in and year out. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that here is one place where, surely, no member of parliament would object to an expenditure of money.

A few minutes ago I was trying to do a bit of rapid calculation to find out what it cost us last year to maintain what then remained of the league of nations. The figure I was able to get was about $300,000. To any one of us that amount of money might seem large, but in terms of what it cost Canada to finance the war I would point out that it is less than the cost of Canada's part in the last war for the duration of only one hour per year. That is all it cost us last year to maintain the league of nations. I suggest we can easily increase that amount of money, and find whatever amount is required to build up our staff so as to be able to give the best possible lead in our power within the united nations, and for the support of all its organs.

I urge not only that we press our support for UNO, by what we do at the meetings of the assembly and of the various organs, but that we realize that as a member of UNO we have made certain commitments. When one uses the word "commitments" in connection with UNO the first thought which comes to many minds is of our commitment to the security council in terms of military force, in the event of it becoming necessary to put down aggression. That is one of our commitments, but I urge hon. members to realize that it is only one of them, and that more significant are the commitments we have made by becoming members of an international organization, the aim of which is to improve the social and economic life of the people of the entire world. And having made that commitment—a moral one, if you wish to call it that, and that makes it all the stronger—we have an obligation to the world to do all we can within our own country to improve conditions of life here, and to achieve the highest possible standards—standards judged not by boastful comparisons with those of other countries, but by comparison with our own capacity.

Much has been said about the way other countries look to Canada. That is true. I was amazed at it. But it seems to me that we should respond to those eyes that are looking to us by giving the strongest possible lead in terms of an economy and social order that will provide the very best of living standards for the human beings within our borders.

There is one further thought I should like to express in connection with UNO—and here I address myself not only to the government, but to all members of parliament as individuals. I am sure all the delegates who were in London will support me when I say that in the last analysis the strength of UNO lies in the support given to it by the people of the member countries. The opening words of the charter are indeed significant: "We, the peoples of the united nations," are determined to do certain things. It is not an organization of governments; it is an organization of the peoples of the world.

So I speak to individual members of parliament rather than to the government when I say that one of our jobs as public representatives is to do all we can to enlist interest in and support of the united nations organization from the people of this dominion. In this connection I should like to refer to the work of the United Nations Society in Canada, an organization which is seeking to do this sort of thing. I believe two or three dozen members of the house are members of that society, but I feel that all ought to be. All hon. members should be giving it all the help they can in its effort to enlist the support and the interest of the people of Canada in UNO.

I note from the estimates of last year that we made a contribution of $3,000 to the work of the League of Nations Society in Canada. Certainly that is a small amount, considering the importance of its work. However, I know the United Nations Society, as it is now called, would prefer to carry on independently, so that it may be perfectly free to express any views it may wish to at any time. But because of the difficulties of getting started in this new era I should hope that if the United Nations Society were to ask the government for a contribution—even a fairly good-sized one—to get started in its work, the request would receive sympathetic consideration. Surely an expenditure of this kind is as nothing when compared with what we have spent on the war. Surely its purpose is one which commends itself to all of us.

I turn now to another thought which impressed itself upon me most forcibly while I was in the United Kingdom. As hon. members know, it was my privilege to be there for more than three months. During that time I had an opportunity not only to learn something about the work of UNO, but also to make extensive contacts with members of parliament and of the government of that country. I had, too, an opportunity to rub shoulders with the English people themselves, and for a few delightful days with the people of Scotland.

May I say as forcibly as I can that although I feel keenly about Canadian citizenship and although I am one who insists that Canada's position within the British commonwealth should be one of clear independence, nevertheless I insist that as Canadians we should recognize the significant place in this era of human history now being filled by the British people and their government. A good deal has already been said in the debate, and I imagine more will be said, about the present conflict in the world among various ideologies. Sometimes it is assumed that the choice ahead is one between the ideology represented by the Soviet Union and that represented by the United States of America. But that is not the complete picture. Despite the political differences hon. members may have with me and members of my group, I appeal to them to realize that the success of those things all of us hold most dear in our democratic way—and I mean by that an adherence to the principles of democracy and freedom, together with a determined effort to improve the lot of the common people—depends very largely upon the success of the experiment upon which the British people have embarked under the leadership of the government they have recently chosen. Having said this, it seems almost unnecessary for me to suggest that I will give wholehearted support to the loan to Great Britain. But I point out that we must go farther than that—and here again I address myself not only to the government but to hon. members generally. We can do a good deal in the way of moulding public opinion and public attitudes throughout Canada. I urge the strongest possible support for what the British people are doing in this reconstruction period. They are putting into their post-war task the same vigour and determination they displayed during the period of the war, and they deserve all the support and good will we can give them. Indeed, they are once again fighting our battle.

I was impressed by the calibre of the men who are in the government over there and by the calibre of the members of parliament. I was impressed, too, by the attitude of the British people. Life is grim in the United Kingdom, as others can bear witness to; yet the way in which the people are taking the continued austerity with which they are faced, and their determination to pull through to the achievement of a new Britain, convince those of us who have been there that Britain will yet give a real lead to the world in terms of a new era. I call for all-out support on the part of the Canadian people for what the British people are doing under the leadership of their new government. Our connection with them is one of which we can be very proud, and I believe that will be even more true in the years that lie ahead.

I should like to turn to another subject which I feel is important in terms of Canadian foreign policy. I urge that Canada should take definite steps—before I am through I shall suggest some of the steps that I have in mind—looking toward the achievement of positive and friendly relations with the Soviet Union. I am fully conscious of the atmosphere in which one must make such a proposal at the present time; yet all I am doing is going on from where the Prime Minister left off last night. The house will recall that at the end of his speech not only did he deplore any suggestion as to the severing of diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union; he said that he himself was prepared and anxious to do everything he could to establish and maintain the friendliest possible relations with all peoples, and then he added, in particular with the peoples of the Soviet Union. I only wish the last part of the Prime Minister's speech could be publicized in the U.S.S.R.

As the house knows, it was my privilege a few short weeks ago to make a brief visit to Moscow. I went, of course, entirely on my own. I went because my experiences in London from the time the preparatory commission first convened in November strengthened my realization that understanding between the Soviet Union and the western world is one of the things most fundamentally needed in our era if we are to achieve peace and if we are to build the united nations into the effective instrument we want it to be. So I welcomed the opportunity that was mine to go to Moscow at the end of the meeting of the general assembly and I had a very interesting time.

I could make my appeal for understanding between the west and the Soviet Union on the basis of a human interest story about my own experiences in Moscow. If there were time to tell such a story, which there is not, I could indicate something of the experiences I had and something of the vigour of life I found there. If I had time to describe conditions as I saw them I would point out that it is a different world and that we cannot make comparisons between conditions there and conditions here, but that having in mind their past of only thirty years ago the fact is that they have made tremendous progress. I found what one would expect to find in any country, that is, things that were surprisingly good and some things that were disappointing. But the general picture as I have tried to give it, when speaking elsewhere with more time at my disposal, is that of a great group of human beings who have chosen a way different from ours, but a way to which they are thoroughly devoted, and on the basis of which they are going ahead. They are a group of people who have unlimited faith in their destiny and certainly a solidarity that cannot be questioned.

It is true that there are some things about the system in the Soviet Union, and they have some ways of doing things, that do not satisfy me. May I say very clearly that in our western world, in our democratic tradition, we have something that is priceless, something that we must guard with everything that we have. But the way to guard it is not to sing songs about it or wave flags or make speeches denouncing other ways; the way to guard it is to see to it that our democracy achieves in terms of social and economic conditions something that is better than other people are trying to achieve in their way. That is what counts, and will count as time goes on. I urge upon everyone the importance of realizing the significance and force of that concept.

I started out to say that I felt I could make an appeal for understanding of the Soviet Union and her people, and the building of a bridge between them and us, on the basis of a human interest story, but I prefer to do it on the basis of political and international realism I confess that the world seems a lot smaller to me now than it did a few months ago, having found it possible to get half way round it in a pretty short time. One realizes, perhaps more clearly than before, that the neighbour to the north of us is just about as close as is the neighbour to the south. We never even discuss whether we should be on friendly terms and have friendly relations with the United States of America; we take that for granted. It seems strange that we should have to discuss and advocate friendly relations with the Soviet Union.

I suggest that in a world which has become as small as ours—in a world where surely it is a basic consideration that war is unthinkable—we must find ways and means of living together on this planet whether or not we like the systems that other people may have chosen. Accordingly, so far as relations between the west and the Soviet Union are concerned there are three possibilities. One could take the position, if he were completely lacking in grey matter, that we cannot get along, and that sooner or later one must get rid of the other. Surely that position, at least in the atomic age, is unthinkable. The second position one might take would be to agree to get along together but to maintain a sort of armed camp relationship, tolerating each other but not really establishing a friendship. That might survive for a time, but I have no faith in that kind of relationship having any chance of lasting in our present-day world. We do not talk of our relations with the United States on that basis. We take it as a matter of course that between the United States and Canada there must be positive friendship, and we do not even marvel at the fact that we have three or four thousand miles of frontier without a fortification. That situation is dictated by the proximity of the two countries, and I suggest that the proximity of Canada and the Soviet Union also dictates that an armed camp relationship is not good enough. We must go on and achieve positive, friendly relations if we are to build anything that is permanent and lasting.

I am trying to be realistic about this; therefore I should face up to the main argument that is sometimes posed seriously against the position I am taking. That main argument is that we may have been fooled by what has been taking place; that perhaps the Soviet Union is bent upon a policy of expansion step by step which in due course will gobble up the whole world, and the sooner we wake up to that fact the better. This is an argument I have heard expounded in this country, but I deplore it, not only because to me it is warmongering but because I think it ignores a basic economic fact. To put it in the simplest way I can, the basic fact is that whatever else we may think about the Soviet system, there is all the difference in the world between the economy of the Soviet Union and the economy that did exist in nazi Germany under Hitler. There is not the slightest question about that, and I do not like making the comparison even for the purpose of refuting it, but I mention it because this is argument that we sometimes hear. The economy of the nazis was one which required expansion, and in due course there was no alternative but for the world to be thrown into the catastrophe we have just come through. The Soviet Union is based on a totally different kind of economy, which does not require expansion, which in terms of the ideology to which the Soviet people adhere, eschews war. I am convinced that they are neither bent on war nor will they be driven to it. The fact is that by the very economics of the situation they are a force for peace, if we can only realize it and only connect with that element of the situation.

One asks what is going on at the present time in areas immediately surrounding the Soviet Union. Surely one can understand their position, even if he deplores the conditions that have prompted some of the steps that have been taken. What you have there is an attempt to secure the frontiers of the Soviet Union, growing out of her fear of the western world. People here say that we are afraid of Russia. The opposite is equally true; they are genuinely afraid of us, and our task is somehow to cut across that vicious circle and get moving in the direction of friendship and understanding rather than to heighten these fears. To this purpose we must bend a supreme effort.

Last night the Prime Minister said he was convinced that the Russian people as a whole desired peace and friendly relation with Canada and all other countries. I want to underline that statement. I was in the Soviet Union at a time when it was tested. By a strange coincidence I was in Moscow when the Prime Minister issued his statement on February 15 concerning the violation of the Official Secrets Act by certain Canadians. I was still there when the Prime Minister's statement was published a few days later, in the Russian newspapers, and I was still there, a few days later still, when just at the end of my visit Pravda made its attack on the Prime Minister, and particularly on the press of this country, for its bitter anti-Soviet attack. Yet right in the midst of that I had the experience of talking with people whom I did not know, in the subway system and on the streets, and also the opportunity of talking with semi-official people at a reception held at the Canadian embassy the night before I left, and they raised the question now before this country. But the question they raised was not the so-called spy incident itself but

Soviet-Canadian relations in which they were deeply concerned, as I was too. When I tried to explain that on my return to Canada, some of the press who interviewed me found it difficult to understand that position. They thought that not only were the Russians evading the basic question, but that I, too, was evading it. But the same charge can now be laid against the Prime Minister, because last night in the latter part of his speech he was taking exactly the same position. He too declared his primary interest in friendly relations between our two countries. Yes, the so-called spy matter is one that must be brought to light and cleaned up; but when that is done, in fact even now while the process is going on, it seems to me that we must put—the government, and all of us—just as much energy and planning into the effort to reestablish friendly relations with Russia as are being put into the unearthing and cleaning up of the situation now before us, and toward that end I wish to make a few suggestions. I make them not as all the suggestions that might be made, but to get across the idea of doing something definite, for that is what we now have to do. This thing has happened. I am not condoning any of the wrongs that may have been committed. Canadians I feel are unhappy about the state of Canadian-Soviet relations as a result of all that has happened, and they want something done about it. There are, indeed, some things that can be done to improve those relations, and I hope my suggestions will be given serious consideration.

The Prime Minister said last night that he had considered going to Moscow. I urge him to go. He may by chance be going over to Europe this summer for the peace conference, and Moscow is only a few hours by air from Paris. The Canadian embassy will be glad to arrange for his coming, and I know from experience that they will see to it that he has an interesting time in Russia. I am sure that it is the kind of gesture that will help to reestablish friendly relations between the two countries. I urge him to be sure to go.

I suggest, too, that despite the difficulty there is in getting into the Soviet Union, we should consider sending missions there for the purpose of promoting good understanding. We could send a few members of parliament, together with trade unionists, farmers, and students—and a few business men, if you want to add them to the delegation. In return, we should invite the Russians to send similar missions here. We might perhaps have an exchange of students, writers, scientists, artists. The point is that relations between the two countries being what they are, it is up to us to make some special effort to improve them.

The road will be difficult. We may be rebuffed, just as Mr. Bevin was rebuffed by Stalin, who said he saw no difference between Bevin and Churchill after the effort that Mr. Bevin has made to establish friendship between Great Britain and the Soviet Union. No one would call Mr. Bevin an appeaser. That same Mr. Bevin knows how serious the situation is and yet having received a slap on one cheek he comes right back and repeats his offer of a fifty-year pact with the Soviet Union. Bevin knows better than I do the differences that have arisen between democratic socialism and soviet-communism. I take my stand with Mr. Bevin for democratic socialism. But I realize how important it is that all nations in UNO be in the organization on a friendly basis, with complete confidence and trust in each other, and we have a particular responsibility to do what we can to establish relations between us and Russia looking toward bringing them wholeheartedly into the family of nations that UNO must be.

There are other suggestions that might be made. One occurs to me now. I hold in my hand a copy of a paper. I shall not attempt to read it. It is in the Russian language. Its name is Britanski Soyuznik, which translated into English, means British Ally. It is a paper published in Moscow by the British to help the Russians understand Britain and the British ways of living by interpreting them to the Soviet people. The last day I was in London I heard this paper discussed in the House of Commons, and one suggestion made there was that a tremendous increase in the circulation of this paper should be made in the Soviet Union. It so happens that on the back page of this issue there is a story about the Canadian frigate Swansea. My suggestion is that under the auspices of the Canadian information service we should establish a similar paper for circulation in Russia which might be called Kanadski Soyuznik, or in English, Canadian Ally. Better still, I would like to suggest Kanadski Droog, or Canadian Friend. Such a paper might well be started in Moscow. It would cost a little bit of money, but it would be only peanuts compared with the value of cementing friendship between the two countries. I urge this concentration on Soviet friendship, not because the Soviet Union is the only country in the world. No. I agree with all those who have said today, and at other times as well, that what we want is not just bilateral friendship but friendship among all the nations. Being a realist, however, I suggest that if the united nations organization is to succeed, world relations being what they are, the key to that success is Soviet-western understanding. But the underlying purpose must be the strengthening of UNO. We must make it the kind of organization to which all nations and all peoples can give their loyalty, so that we can make it what we want it to be—an effective instrument for the achievement of peace, happiness and human accord.

Mr. A. P. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): In taking the floor with all the reluctance of a new member in this house, may I be permitted to make mine the words of a man I know quite well and whom I admire the more for it, Senator Claude Pepper of the United States Congress:

> Although I have reached only the age of 42, which may be young or old, as one looks at it, I have begun to derive considerable consolation and satisfaction from the sense of perspective.

And I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot easily adapt myself to the gay-nineties —or, shall I say—the decadent Victorian age of modus vivendi yet prevailing on certain spots of parliament hill.

Yes. Although I had previously heard, from a distance not too far, that there existed in this house an atmosphere of dust-powdered, heavy-curtained and blackened windows, a stuffy-aired and inconceivably poorly acoustic'd chamber of deliberations, unbearable working quarters in which the lawmakers of the land have been, up to now, accustomed to strive with or to mind not at all, for being self-conscious of Bernard Shaw's notion that "members of parliament should not make laws but should criticize them", I never anticipated, when I ran for parliament, that my services to my country would be limited merely to attending the session, once a year, as a shareholder in a large trust corporation does, for rubber-stamping the decisions initiated by Tory brain-trusters for a Liberal government. But one has to remember, of course, that this government now derives its authority, at least as we were told during the last session, not from the people, as we used to think since the days of the grandfather of our grand Prime Minister, but from the crown. True enough, though, that we were also told, in the same breath, that it was irrelevant to claim in 1945 that Queen Victoria was no longer alive.

And, sir, although I was quite aware of the anchluss of the protectors of the trusts, of the sovereign state profiteers, of the high pressure propagandists and lobbyists, and of the indoctrinators of the plague of "back to peacetime normalcy" policy, I could not but believe that the atrocious war, out of which we are just emerging, must have taught all kinds of peoples that the world had surely come to the cross-roads of its destiny, that it is, "Whither humanity—a paradise in this world or annihilation?" A life paradise, if the gap from science to politics and economics is being filled; annihilation, if not.

As it is impossible and not even advisable, if it were possible, to stop the scientists' progress, and since the scientists are so far ahead of the politicians and the economists, it surely is not too early to ask the latter groups to push forward, and all the nations of the world to force upon their sovereign-state authorities a dose of wisdom and dynamism strong enough to make them reach for and join effectively the scientists of all lands with their discoveries, so as to make sure that those discoveries will serve peace rather than war—discoveries that I shall not try to define or even to understand, being least of all a scientist, but that I take for granted like the people of London, Berlin and Hiroshima; discoveries that the world scientific dares challenge the world politic and economic to hide, conceal, bury or what have you—meaning a negative approach; discoveries that can be classified by a layman as the atomic power and the jet propulsion. In other words, inconceivable speed joined to incredible power.

And may I simply quote here the Swedish Sven Lindequist, who was the first in 1924 to predict high-altitude aviation engines and sub-stratosphere bombing, so as to give at least a small idea of what those discoveries are and, by inference, what can be expected from that as a force of destruction. I quote:

> Jet-propelled monsters guided by radio at speed from 200 to 2,000 miles per hour . . . landing within a few hundred yards of selected targets on the other side of an ocean . . . will obliterate cities . . . The sneak attack of an atomic bomb falling like a giant meteor from the stratosphere will inflict annihilation.

And he adds:

> Civilization cannot survive a third world war.

Do you think, sir, that with such implements of warfare it is possible to witness a war which will not be a world war, more so if one considers that the world has shrunk to-day to smaller frontiers than continents or even countries of two decades ago? It was, I think, Anthony Eden who said at San Francisco that the world is today one large city and the countries its several parishes. And he added, "therefore we have become citizens of the world."

(Translation):

In the international sphere, it is surely time to get rid of the old man and all these idiosyncrasies and to look at the world from an objective point of view rather than an egocentric and narrow-minded one. In doing so, politics could well profit by a theory which has not yet erred, but on the contrary is proving its continued truthfulness, and I mean the universality of the Catholic church, from which it will also learn peaceful means—in honour since the crusades—of looking at the world in its true perspective.

(Text):

Anyway, if there ever was a time in the history of mankind which called for reorientation in politics and economics, it surely is ours, because, may I venture to say, that in the realm of international relations the famous "what we have we hold" or the concept of imperialism is no longer an up-to-date enunciation of realities; no more than the obsolete policy of balance of power or sphere of influence.

Furthermore, if there is no doubt that an atomic and a rocket era has been given to mankind by the scientists, what then will the politicians (or let us call them the statesmen, for it may give them a jet propulsion in the right direction) and the economists alike do about it? Will these forces be considered only in relation to war, either as offensive or as defensive weapons, or on the contrary why not use them as God's gifts to mankind so as to present the world with a victory but this time a true victory over disease, poverty and famine, because with the "know-how" the politicians and economists can certainly use those discoveries for peace and this time a peace which must mean for mankind abundance of shelter, clothing and food.

Here again, I have not the pretension of being able to establish under what conditions these results can be brought about, but please let me assume the possibilities that the scientists are already forecasting, for they have at least come to quite definite anticipations.

And irrespective of the fact that I may scandalize the old beards, conformists, who live only in the past and are unable to visualize the future with its "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin" written on the walls, but who dare call themselves realists and smile at so called idealists who are at least able of rational thinking, I say, "Laugh, laugh, political hermits, but begone with your fetishes; they are being destroyed as surely today as the atom is now being split."

What are Canada's responsibilities in this year of grace, in this new era, Canada which is one of the two spots of the world known up to date as producers of uranium—a fundamental element for splitting the atom—and one of the three to "know-how"? Surely it is to contribute to make this atomic age the best epoch known as yet.

Thus, by what ways and means such a big order can be delivered, you will ask me. Well, surely not on the international front, through the old, bankrupt and passed-out method of diplomacy and policy. Then, what about trying law and order in the international sphere or, let us say, rather, the universal sphere, as law and order have been known to us in the national sphere.

Without going into a demonstration with regard to this aspect of world order, may I venture to say that if law is the only foundation upon which social life in modern society can exist because we cannot trust men's promises not to kill, that law is also the sole prospect upon which peace in this new era can last, because treaties and diplomatic relations cannot in the light of past or recent experiences line up people like little good sheep, irrespective of the shepherd and the pastures.

I do not want to convey, nevertheless, the impression that I am opposed to seeing Canada participating with other nations in diplomatic discussions of policy and treaties. On the contrary, but as long as Canada, in such meetings, does not merely carry the satchel for any larger power. I, for one, fully realize the difficulties with which the Canadian delegation met at the London meeting and which resulted in having Canada sidetracked from the security council of UNO.

Without the support of the United States it surely was an impossibility. I am afraid that Americans still believe that we are, as ever, the summer-kitchen of Great Britain and therefore we are not with regard to the Munroe doctrine an independent state of this hemisphere. That is why, I fear, the Americans supported Mexico rather than Canada.

Yet it has to be borne in mind that we are sandwiched between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R., which, for all practical purposes, should give us at least an animal instinct of preservation.

Also, "Lest We Forget", even if our stupid inferiority complex as an adult nation seems to belittle all our international endeavours that, thanks to our great leader the Prime Minister, and his government, we have emerged from the war anything but a puppet in the hands of the "master traders" of the world.

Not only is Canada one of the few solvent nations of the world to-day, thanks to our Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley)—who strikes me as being more at home with bills than the bill of rights—but she has become a creditor instead of a debtor vis-a-vis Great Britain, which should be sufficient to allow us, now, to do away with the British preferences on behalf of an open door tariff policy vis-a-vis U.S.A., and the world at large; for it is surely not too early for us Canadians to pay the same prices for our automobiles, washing machines, electrical appliances and farm implements as the Americans do.

Besides, we can now welcome this kind of free trade because Canada now is the first power of the world in the production of nickel, newsprint, asbestos, platinum, uranium, radium; the second in gold; the third in aluminium, copper, zinc and silver. Canada was the fourth allied nation in the production of armaments; why should she not be of peacetime commodities? In one word, Canada is to-day the third nation as far as universal trade goes.

Thus there is only one consolation that remains for us Canadians, all proud of our country, namely to hope that this first setback in international recognition of our status and destiny—and here I think the leader of our delegation at London, the right hon. Minister of Justice, Mr. St. Laurent, should be congratulated upon his tactful smoothness and French gallantry under unbearable circumstances—may be conducive to a grand price of a greater pride, that is to see the dean of the statesmen of the world—what am I saying?—the greatest statesman of the world to-day, our beloved leader, the Prime Minister, become the recognized angel of peace, to which peace he has devoted every minute of his political career, in being elected chairman of the coming peace conference.

Then the nations, aware of the fact that the inescapable realities of our time make it imperative for them all to reorient their thinking with regard to their respective sovereign state authority in relation to world wide sovereignty, will, I hope, establish a universal government under the guidance of our Prime Minister.

As far as Canada is concerned I am sure there will be no difficulty toward such a realization, for fortunately for our time we have here in Canada statesmen in the government who are not afraid to tackle new responsibilities in correlation with rights based on functional contributions.

Such a universal government would provide social as well as national security. It would accelerate free trade and reassure full employment. Full employment would surely bring about better education, better medical care, better housing and more food. With social security at home no people can feel nationally insecure if similar conditions prevail all over, more particularly so in the neighbouring countries. And to reassure a better distribution of wealth which is, of course, the best safeguard against aggression, it would implement international monetary agreements, stabilization funds, international banks or at least clearing houses.

But on top of it all I firmly believe that the most important factor to coordinate and consolidate all the elements conducive to peace is a world wide unity of purpose. Such a unity can be reached only if all the peoples regard the world in its true perspective and from the same angle, and such an achievement can be reached only through public enlightenment. Before loving his neighbour as himself one has at least to know him. Thus people have to be made to know one another, respect one another's property, understand one another's way of living and in return expect to be known better, understood better, liked better, through a professional job of international communications incorporating all kinds of vehicles of information.

Now let us see what should be the responsibilities of Canada in this new era on the national front and what can be expected for the betterment of the situation for Canadians. Canada's first responsibility in this new era is surely not to adhere to that plague policy of going back to peace-time normalcy, as advocated by reactionary bigwigs, but rather to make Laurier's prediction un fait accompli —"le 20ême siècle sera celui du Canada." We have nearly reached the half-way mark, yet there is so much to be done. There should be no more laissez-faire, because opportunities, as stressed by a great American newspaper man, are now ours:

> When the fume of combat will have ceased, Canada will emerge a great nation of the world. And after peace, Canada should know an era of expansion similar to that of the U.S.A. after 1900.

By the way, who is the ordinary compos mentis citizen and more particularly the returned man who would wish to condemn the government's efforts to preserve life in peace time after having spent so much money to destroy life in war time? Who is the normal human being, even with a "tid-bits" memory, who would like in 1946 another 1,517,531 Canadians on relief as was the case in 1933? Who will not rather fight to his utmost to keep employment at the 1943 figure? Who is the ordinary layman who would think it rational to use wheat again as fuel? Who is the politician who can squarely state in this house that Canada's best insurance policy against depression is to reduce the burdens of the moguls of finance by reducing public services and social security? No sir, what Canada needs more than ever is social legislation and reconstruction coupled with peace-time financial reorientation. Let us give chips away, we who have chips, to people who have none if we want to start another game of poker; otherwise we shall have to play solitaire. But—and there is a but—let us have nothing of the sort with a marked pack of cards, or with players who stack the cards.

Who is the decent easterner who could agree that fifty-one per cent of the total population of a western province should receive the dole? I, for one, still remember too vividly the heart-breaking appeal of a great Liberal in this house, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) at the Reform Club in Montreal, in the depression years, to send apples to people who, in his province, had not eaten one in four years, to consent to any kind of put-over policy that would be conducive to such a state of affairs in a country of plenty.

Who does not remember newspaper clippings of the thirties showing unfortunates sleeping on doorsteps of public buildings? Yet early 1946 already sees the returned men's invasion of semi-public buildings. I do surely prefer a "soak-the-rich" promoter—on behalf of the masses—to the humbug advocate of the "tie-your-belt for the benefit of the greedy" going to the Bahamas to conceal his rapine. Let us realize once and for all that the pre-war old days and old ways are gone, let us hope forever. Let us consider service rather than profit; let us praise society's wealth rather than So-and-so's gold. Let us keep in peace time the same public purpose we had in war time.

And may I quote my good friend Mr. L. W. Brockington who in turn was quoting D'Arcy McGee:

> All we have to do is, each for himself, to keep down dissensions which can only weaken, impoverish and keep back the country; each for himself—to welcome every talent, to hail every invention, to cherish every gem of art, to foster every gleam of authorship, to honour every acquirement and every natural gift, to lift ourselves to the level of our destinies, to rise above all limitations and narrow circumscriptions, to cultivate that true catholicity of spirit which embraces all creeds, all classes and all races . . .

Yes, let us keep down dissensions; the war must have taught us the stupidity of the ideological myth of a superior race. Let us rather have union in diversity. Yes, let us in the American way boast of one's talent instead of cooling it off in the Canadian way. Yes, let us hail every invention for the purpose of giving the masses a higher standard of living, rather than giving the cartels a greater control over lives. Yes, let us cherish every gem of art in promoting its significance through multitudinous museums and art galleries; it may thus at least help artists to remain in Canada, if statesmen have not enough culture to subsidize, to commission and to secure them. Yes, let us also not forget the writers of all calibres and denominations, by securing them also against abuse, so as at least to assure freedom of expressions in this country. Yes, let us lift ourselves, irrespective of creeds, classes and races, to make this Canada of ours the greatest country of this new era.

True enough it is that our system of social security has already put Canada on its way toward a great destiny. Our social legislation is the most advanced in the world today, due to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) who has almost accomplished miracles in the short time he has directed this most needed service.

But what about our reconstruction programme? I do not see why the so able minister who presides over the ministry and who accomplished such a tremendous job at the Department of Munitions and Supply, that even the gossipers claim he should be the more honourable for it, cannot get the ball rolling quickly in peace time. I am sure he can and he will. But we are all most anxious for the starting gong. We have so much to do yet. Have we not to rebuild our railroad systems—at least their rolling stock? Have we not enough pride to finish the Trans-Canada highway, without borrowing passage from the United States? And we surely must have as much ambition to pay for it as we had to pay for the Alaska highway.

We are surely not to let go by the unique opportunities that our great systems of air communications offer us, by placing us at the "Times Square" of the skies.

Are we not badly in need of public works throughout Canada? And here I wish to point out that if in se it may be a good idea to do away with the slums in the capital area, outside Ottawa it is also Canada and elsewhere there are slums to be cleared, parks to be created, health and cultural centres to be organized.

Must I remind you, sir, that there are still electrical powers to be intensified and reforestation to be encouraged. Decentralization of industries has become a matter of vital necessity in Canada. Reorientation in agriculture is urgent. Development of the mines and of all the rich resources of our immense northern country and of the Gaspe peninsula await reconstruction activities. Oh yes, you are going to hear more about the Gaspe peninsula.

Oil has to be welled; coal has to be shafted and mined, and fishing has to be expanded. And it is no longer up-to-date political wisdom I am sure to leave entirely to private or so-called responsible enterprise, if you like, those extensive developments.

Therefore what must be done? If I may venture to express myself in this regard, I would say, sir, that I have no hesitation in endorsing the Liberal way; mixing government interference and private enterprise collaboration in directing economy.

(Translation):

However, be it on account of the beggars on horseback or the czars masquerading as civil servants who are still in charge of controls or restrictions, or on account of the inconceivable and so unfortunate inertia of government control over financial institutions which have already been given the responsibility of setting private ventures in motion, there are all too many concerns that hesitate and finally refrain from contributing to that development.

That is why the assistance acts introduced by the Minister of Finance are without any effect in so many places where their application is demanded; they will have either to be rescinded or to be made fairly applicable in the case of all taxpayers.

(Text):

In conclusion, may I be permitted to quote Eric Baldwin's poem, written in the thirties at the Montreal Press club—on one of those pleasant evenings—and entitled "The Road to Eldorado". This has nothing whatsoever to do with the mine of the same name:

> Dig out the silver of your soil
> The gold that's in your ground,
> Convey the copper from your mines
> And Canada is found.
> But quit your dolmens and your dole
> Your sons will pioneer
> But bury sects and party strife
> That makes all humans fear.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make what I hope will be some contribution to this debate, I begin by paying my respects to the mover and the seconder of the address. I do that for two reasons: First, tradition says we must and, second, my kindly feeling toward them and my admiration for them prompt me to pay my respects and to offer my compliments.

I came down on the train with the mover and his charming wife. He was then working on his speech. Of course I am not suggesting that I collaborated with him in what he said. I noticed he followed tradition to some extent. I was pleased to note the way he complimented his leader, and I was sure he was conscious of the fact that other people who had adopted that policy are now living in some comfort in what we call another place. It seems to me, however, he may be a little late because, if rumour and certain statements we have read are accurate, he has not acted soon enough.

Turning to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters), I find that he did not make that mistake. It was clear that he complimented everyone he thought might ever wear a red carnation. No, he left out no one, at all. However, I pay him a special compliment and it is this: I realize that in the House of Commons there are some great linguists, some dialectical giants; but his French was the only French I have understood since I came here.

But I am not going to stop there in my felicitations, because I noted that when, following the speech of my leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) addressed the house, he complimented two of our number who richly deserve the very fine distinction which has been granted them.

I say nothing about the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) for two reasons: First, he is in my profession, and second, he might catch me out. But I am going to say something about the right hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) of which, I am quite sure, none of you Eastern people are aware. This might constitute an additional reason why His Majesty saw fit so to honour him. Out in Western Canada the minister is known as a second Michael Angelo, the greatest painter of his time. By that I mean simply this, that one needs only to drive through Alberta these days in order to see that every farm building is beautifully painted with money the farmers took away from the Minister of Finance because they could charge it up against their tax. So that at least by volume, in any event, he is the greatest modern painter.

Then the Prime Minister, perhaps thinking that some other member of his flock had been slightly overlooked, took care to compliment the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). And in the blushing contest which followed the thing I observed most closely was that the Minister of Labour won, in a walk. There can be no doubt about it.

Speaking seriously for myself—and I believe I might speak in this respect for all new members in the house—I wish to compliment and thank all the senior members in all parties for the great kindnesses they have shown and the help they have given to those of us who for the first time came here last September.

I intend to mention only one feature of the speech from the throne, that having to do with veterans' housing. I hope to be helpful, and I am quite sure this may mean something to those in authority. We have been told all over Canada that we cannot get housing for veterans. There is in my home city of Calgary a radio station called CFAC which has a good idea. Those of us who come from there or who live near there know it is impossible to get accommodation, but this station has devoted fifteen minutes of its time during afternoons to interviewing veterans and their wives and families, if there are families, who are seeking accommodation. The offer made by the station was enthusiastically accepted by Mr. White, secretary of the rehabilitation council there. The result was that when the first programme period was completed the telephone started ringing and six offers of accommodation came in. That particular couple were placed as well as two other families. This continued from January 14 until February 15, during which time twenty-five veterans were interviewed, 101 replies were were received and ninety homeless veterans with their families were placed.

I think that record speaks for itself. It takes care of one of our major difficulties in finding housing accommodation for these people. Many people would be glad to open their homes or rent flats now available in their homes if they were sure of the type of people who would occupy them. I know ninety-nine per cent of our veterans are splendid people, but there is the odd bad apple in every barrel, particularly in Ontario apples, although this does not happen in British Columbia. The simple fact is that that excellent response was obtained in thirty days. Why? Because the people who had accommodation listened to the personal interviews that were carried on by the radio man named Jack Stewart, and they were able to get some idea of the type of people who were seeking accommodation. I am just giving that to the proper minister because it seems to me that if that practice were followed, especially in our larger cities, it might take care of a great deal of our veteran housing problem.

I turn now to a subject on which I intend to speak, not at length but only for a few minutes. I am referring to this espionage matter. I begin by giving you, sir, and the house my undertaking that my language will be temperate. I do not intend to accuse anyone of a violation of good faith or anything of that sort, nor will I say anything which might be interpreted, when coming from a humble private member, as having anything to do with international relations. But I do intend to criticize the course which has been adopted, and I trust that it will be based on at least some reason. The farthest that I intend to go is to say that I think a serious mistake may have been made.

Having said that, I wish to dispose at once of the criticism which may be made because I criticize the government's action. I say at once that I have no sympathy with people who break the Official Secrets Act. One small change in the circumstances and they would be traitors, they would be guilty of treason and liable to be hanged. If that circumstance were changed, in other words if this were an enemy country, they would richly deserve that most severe punishment of our law. With that I leave it.

But I do mention this: When I read this first in the paper and as I listened last evening to the explanation of the right hon. Prime Minister, I took a look at a book which I had read years ago. This was a book published in 1935,—written by Sinclair Lewis and called "It Can't Happen Here." You cannot get it because I have the library copy at the moment, but I recommend that book to hon. members as preferred reading because it illustrates how a subversive movement requires much less than a majority occasionally to operate a country.

What has happened? In this Dominion of Canada we have watched our nation grow. I do not think there are any here who remember when we were a colony, nor do I think there are any who remember when we became a dominion. My mathematics are not very good, but it seems to me that 1867 is quite a considerable time ago. Then we came along to the Statute of Westminster which, after all, did nothing more than declare an existing state of affairs. In other words, our growth has been healthy; it has been constitutional. Any change in status or growth in status at all times has been in conformity with the British way and with the unanimous consent of the British government, of the British House of Commons and the House of Lords.

We find ourselves grown up, and to prove that we are really out of our swaddling clothes and short pants, that we are now mature as a nation, we have this spy scare. We used to read about this sort of thing in books that I remember that had to do with the mythical kingdom of Graustark. I can remember that those books were beautifully illustrated. There was always a princess who was going to be abused, but the right man came along at the right time and the kingdom of Graustark still went merrily on. It is too bad that one cannot deal with the matter which now confronts us with a light touch but, as the Prime Minister so well said last evening, that is something which just cannot be done.

What has happened historically is this. On September 5 last, or early in September some time, the Prime Minister became apprised of some information in the hands of a man who was an employee of some sort in the Russian embassy here. The only point I make about that is this: That information has been in the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for a period of over five months. Lest anyone think I have any doubts to the contrary, it was in the hands of one of the ablest police organizations that this world, let alone this country, has ever known. They are an organization with plenty of money and plenty of brains. I have seen their laboratory in Regina and I know they have the finest instruments than one can imagine. I ran squarely up against it not long ago when a man made some photographs of paint that had come from here and there and elsewhere which startled me, and I thought I knew something about criminal investigation. I mention that in passing merely to show that this matter was in splendid hands, in able hands, in the hands of people who times without number had coped with serious crime in this country.

The first document which I mention is the first order in council which was issued I think early in October. The reason I mention that now, and I am going to come back to it, is that by that order in council government policy was set. Nothing that happened after altered the position which was then taken.

I now leave a direct discussion of what took place on this occasion and turn to a bit of history which I think all of us may very well remember. That has been the development in British countries of the position of an accused person before the law. Under magna charta it was provided that a man should have a fair trial and a speedy trial, and in all the developments in our law from that day to this the trend has been in the direction of throwing safeguards around accused persons whose liberty might be at stake. I know it is very easy to snipe at lawyers and say that we are archaic and bound by this and that and never learn anything new, but the common law has been and is constantly growing and has fairly well kept pace with new developments in this or in any other country. I refer to this one fact. Up to within the last eighteen months in any event we always said that if an accused person's statement were to be used against him—a statement made to a person in authority as a police officer—the onus was on the crown to show that that statement was voluntary, and among other considerations by the court in coming to that conclusion was whether or not warning had been given to the accused as to what his position was. In short, he was told that he was not obliged to say anything. He had nothing to hope in the way of favour and nothing to fear, and what he said might be used against him. That is as close to the short warning used by the mounted police as I can remember. But in the case of Rex v. Gach the Supreme Court of Canada in a judgment written by or concurred in by Mr. Justice Taschereau, now sitting on this commission, the court held that it was a rule of law—not just one of the things to be considered but a rule of law—that no statement made by an accused person to a person in authority could be used against him without that warning having been given.

I mention that to show the trend there has been in our administration. I think Canada is the only country that has gone thus far in looking after the constitutional right and the interest of the person who is accused of a crime.

I now go a step farther and say this. Everything we have by way of administration is based on the innocence of the individual until the crown proves him guilty. That has been the corner-stone of everything we have done. You may have a little different superstructure here or a little change there, but that basic fact has never changed from the time we administered criminal law in any British country since magna charta.

Let us compare that with what obtains in some other countries. I do not make this comparison in a disparaging way or to be critical of other countries, because other countries certainly have the full right of setting up their own method of handling the administration of criminal justice. Let us go to France and see what happens. We will say that a person is suspected, an information is laid, and he is arrested. The first thing that happens to him there is that he is taken before what is known as an examining magistrate, and that examination is in camera, and it is indeed a real examination. We saw repercussions of it in the recent trial of Mr. Laval, and I am quite sure that it was not edifying to those of us who are accustomed to our own system.

Go to the United States of America. Today in many states of that union there is not even a preliminary hearing. In fact, in famous cases reported in their press I have seen it said that the crown had a star secret witness up its sleeve, and so on.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

Our position has been so different. Here a man is entitled to a preliminary hearing. He is entitled without cost in all the provinces of Canada, if he has no money, to get a copy of everything that was said. In the event that the crown discovers witnesses between the preliminary hearing and the trial the accused is entitled to a full statement from the crown counsel of everything he may say. That has been the British way of proceeding, and with what result? If we take the number of persons charged with crime in this country or in Great Britain and compare it with the numbers in the other countries I have mentioned, and take the number of convictions under our generous treatment here—you may not logically justify some of it, I know—our convictions compare five to one as against those of one other country I have mentioned and twenty to one as against those of one great state in that union. I suggest that that must give us an idea of just how fine this method is which we have had in administering our criminal law.

Now I intend to discuss what took place in this case, and with respect, Mr. Speaker, may I ask you now to declare it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock, or at a time when, according to one of our rules, we are permitted to "call it six o'clock", I advised you that I intended to deal chronologically, and fairly I hope, with the incidents in connection with this particular case. But before doing so, I intended to read two paragraphs from the first order in council, which I did not have before me at the time. What I wish to read is contained in the white paper, "Documents relating to the proceedings of the Royal Commission", at page 9. The first paragraph reads:

> Whereas it has been ascertained that agents of a foreign power have been engaged in a concerted effort to obtain from public officials and other persons in positions of trust secret and confidential information the disclosure of which might be inimical to the safety and interests of Canada and friendly powers and that secret and confidential information has been communicated, directly or indirectly, by certain persons to the agents of the aforesaid foreign power to the prejudice of the public safety or interests of Canada and of friendly powers.

That is the beginning. One might be constrained to wonder just what the distinction in that paragraph is between foreign powers and friendly powers. It seems to be just a little jumbled. Then at the bottom of the page there appears the following:

1. The Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice, if satisfied that with a view to preventing any particular person from communicating secret and confidential information to an agent of a foreign power or otherwise acting in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state it is necessary so to do, may make an order that any such person be interrogated and/or detained in such place and under such conditions as he may from time to time determine.

These last words are of course the important part, and I merely read these two paragraphs now because, when the house rose, through my own fault I did not have them in front of me.

What has taken place? The first thing that we knew was the statement of the Prime Minister with respect to this matter. May I in my humble way quite deferentially say that I think the Prime Minister adopted a very wise course in the first statement which he made. I do not believe that, having regard to his statement of last evening, his hopes that this might not create much public interest could be justified. At least it was a hope which he was quite entitled to entertain, and I am sure that many of us would share that hope with him. Remember, I mention this date in early September when this information came into the hands of the Minister of Justice.

Prior to February 15 certain people were detained. In short, they were arrested. They were arrested without warrant, and they were arrested not because, as in a case under the criminal code, as the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) well knows, they were actively caught committing a crime. They were arrested under the special provisions, if I may say so, contained in the order in council which I have just read.

The fact that people are arrested does not normally mean very much. People are arrested every day. I have been arrested myself. As a matter of fact, it was not a very serious charge and I got out of it without any difficulty. But I really know what the thing means. When you are arrested you cannot do what you want to do. You do what the policeman tells you, or else. That is the position of a man when he is arrested. But here is where we really start to differ with the normal procedure. These people were held incommunicado. What does this mean? We all know it means that they were not allowed to communicate with anyone, and I am quite sure their movements, their letter writing and all that sort of thing, would receive excellent supervision, not to use a stronger word.

If the information given by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) last evening is correct, this thing cannot end here. Surely it can never be said again in the Dominion of Canada that people were held for six days with glaring lights upon them. That has never belonged to the administration of justice in this country. It smacks of that which we have read about elsewhere.

The next thing which we have not been told about is whether or not these persons before this commission, under the Inquiries Act, had the benefit of what we know as section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act. In other words, for the benefit of the lay gentlemen present—I say that in the most complimentary fashion because they always abuse us lawyers and I am returning good for evil—it means that a person examined under certain circumstances will be told that the evidence he gives will not be used against him in any proceeding and that the only thing he is liable for is perjury in the giving of that evidence.

This house has not yet been told—and this is not sub judice. The Prime Minister pronounced that much better than I do although he does not belong to us. At any rate, that is not part of the sub judice end of the picture. This has reference to proceedings before that commission. I am not saying they were not given that protection. I will say to the prosecutors, whoever they may be, that if that protection were given, then they have a good deal tougher job than they think they have at the present time. But we were told that what was done was for the safety of the state. I am going to have something to say about that, inferentially perhaps, though I think it will be plain before I shall have concluded.

I turn quickly and in passing to two cases; first, the case of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), in which a very proper procedure was followed. He was arrested, charged and brought up in the court in Montreal the following day. We may also observe, with respect to the doctor, the professor at King's College, London, whose name escapes me at the moment—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Doctor May. He was arrested and charged in Bow Street the following morning. What does a man or woman want when he or she is arrested? Let us assume that they have not had my experience and have never been in gaol before. They go in there and are locked up by themselves. What do they want? The man first wants to see his wife, and then his lawyer. The woman wants to see her husband, and then he tells her that she needs a lawyer just because she is there. I am sure that the Postmaster General will agree with me that counsel is sought in ninety-nine cases out of every one hundred when they have never been in the toils of the law before. That is a natural human reaction. I am going to assume that these people reacted humanly and naturally; that they were the same as everybody else and sought assistance. They did not get it.

Then a royal commission was appointed. I am not going to say anything at all against this royal commission. I am fortunate in having the acquaintanceship of the two judges; I am fortunate in having the friendship of Mr. E. K. Williams of Winnipeg. Both of these judges and Mr. Williams are highly respected in Canada in matters of civil law, but I do not think anyone of the three ever had very much to do with criminal matters.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Mr. Fauteux?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That does not apply to Mr. Fauteux. I think I heard an hon. member mention his name. He is one of the ablest prosecutors in Canada; but I leave the word "prosecutor" to rest just where the Postmaster General called it to my attention. There is not a word of criticism in my mind about the motives or about the honesty of purpose of these men; yet I ask this simple question: why was it that two judges of the Supreme Court of Canada were chosen when the appeals may ultimately come before that court? Why not two judges away from the industrial section, because apparently all these questions mentioned in the report of the commissioners apply to the industrial section of Canada? Why not someone from out there? I am not saying for a moment that either Mr. Justice Taschereau or Mr. Justice Kellock would sit on this appeal. They certainly would not; they respect their profession and their position too much to do that, but why were judges taken from a court to which in the ultimate end of proceedings this matter might come for final adjudication?

Let no one think I am saying that when the Minister of Justice chose these fine gentlemen to carry on this work he had anything in his mind of a nature which was not of the best. The most that I have said or ever will say about this matter is that in my opinion a terrible mistake has been made.

We were told by the Prime Minister that these people were offered counsel. I have no doubt that they were. The commissioners say in their report that they did it in conformity with sections 12 and 13 of the act respecting inquiries. I am going to read those sections because they are very short:

> 12. The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this Act, and shall allow any person—

The first is "may", the second is "shall".

> —against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.
> 13. No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him and he shall have been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel.

Something that I think we need to be told is this. I gathered—and if I am wrong I hope I shall be immediately corrected—that once these men had given evidence before this commission they were offered counsel. I gathered that from the Prime Minister's remarks and from reading reports of this commisison. If that be so, let us hark back to the main principle upon which justice has been administered. Here you have people already in gaol, in solitary confinement with a man at the door. We heard something about failure to attempt suicide and that sort of thing. The man at the door is the only person they ever saw. They have never been in gaol before. They are brought before this commission. There you have two supreme court judges whose names are well known, and who are no doubt known to them, eminent and able counsel, clerks, secretaries, stenographers and all that sort of thing which go with royal commissions, and they were largely meant for us lawyers, generally speaking. But you have all this. These people come in singly, and what happens? They are examined under oath. If the newspaper report of the other day was correct they are sworn to secrecy as to what happened there. True, it is only a report in one of the Ottawa papers, and I do not know whether or not it is true, but that is what was said. What in the world is the good of offering people counsel after they have been in solitary confinement, after they have been examined by this commission?

You and I, Mr. Speaker, and all other hon. members know there is nothing so aimed to break down will power and voluntary action as solitary confinement and being rushed in before a tribunal of that kind. Under these circumstances no one suggests that these would be voluntary statements. To my mind, and I think the Postmaster General will agree with me, it is absolute nonsense. People need counsel before they are aiming for trouble, and before people are trying to cause them trouble. Those are the people who need the protection of people who by their training are expert in giving them advice in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has already spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope Your Honour will allow the hon. member to proceed; I am sure it is the wish of the house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry, sir, to have broken a rule and my promise that I would not speak for more than fifteen minutes, but time seems to get away from me. We did not commence our session until about five minutes after eight, sir, I would point out with the greatest of respect.

All I have to go on are the newspaper reports. I assure you, sir, and everyone in this House of Commons that I have not communicated with any of these accused nor have I communicated in any way, directly or indirectly, with counsel for any of the accused. So that I am speaking entirely from the record and from what I have read in the Ottawa newspapers only. I have not enough money to subscribe to the Globe and Mail, which I am told supports our side.

Just what has happened? We read in the newspapers that when Mrs. Woikin, the lady who came from Blaine Lake in Saskatchewan, appeared before the magistrate she was quite distracted and greatly disturbed, and endeavoured to plead guilty. I do not know Magistrate Strike but he must be an awfully good chap, because he refused to accept that plea. That was the physical and mental condition of this woman after having gone through experiences which I can perhaps better imagine than speak about. I am not going to use my imagination, but I have some idea of the things that run through the minds of people who are incarcerated in lonely silence.

We are told by the Prime Minister that they were waiting for Doctor May—I gather that it would be Doctor May—who was going to England in October to make a certain contact. Well, the mounted police are practical people; I have never known them to be naive. In September Gouzenko moves out with an armful of files and documents. This other man leaves Canada in October, and we waited to see if he would make a contact. Well, nobody is quite that dumb.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is mistaken as to the time he left. I believe he had left earlier than that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I thought my right hon. friend said October.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe he arrived in England on October 7.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thank you. My point is that a month passed by. Let us consider the Russian embassy, which was engineering this spy ring. Gouzenko is gone; all their documents are gone. Who would think that Doctor May would make his contact in London under such circumstances? No one is quite that dumb. That is a simple statement of the situation.

I have said a word already about the plea of the hon. member for Cartier and the plea of Doctor May. Now I continue. How regular this procedure is! Will not our minds go back to the first great war when hon. members will remember Mr. Von Papen ran the German embassy in the United States? This whole thing seems to fall into line with that sort of thing. I am almost through, sir, and will not trespass much longer on your generosity.

What does this all mean? In short, what is my complaint? Many years ago one of the greatest judges in English law said something that has never been disputed in any courthouse in the Dominion of Canada; that in the administration of justice it is better that ten guilty men go free than that one innocent man be convicted. Do not for a moment think I do not agree that we need a royal commission. I believe we need something to purge the government offices of this country of people like those who have been turned up in this particular business. I think it is also time that in employing civil servants scholastic attainments should not be given the greatest consideration in appointing people to positions of responsibility. I go farther in my effort to be fair and say that of course this sort of thing is entirely new in this country. But I am asking you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of this house to imagine the normal procedure under the law. In September we had the information, and an excellent police force which worked over it for five months. Now what happens? It is not of very great importance if two or three persons should escape imprisonment. Of course we have the statement by the Prime Minister at page 51 of Hansard that the idea of the continuation was to see that no one should escape the net. That is not nearly so important as that we should maintain what has really made us what we are, in other words the rule of law in everything we do. What is law? Law is nothing more than the codification of honesty in business and good morals in social conduct; and I do not see why we have not been able to proceed along that line in the good old way. Surely the deputy ministers of the various departments in which these things have gone wrong are in a position to make a purge of their own departments. If we ever needed a house-cleaning we need it now. Surely it is not a matter of great importance that two or three individuals might escape punishment.

May I close by saying just this. It is true that we have had this commission. It is true that persons have been suspected of crime because, as the Prime Minister indicated, the documents pointed to them. It is true that they have been brought before the commission without warning, without protection, without an opportunity to see their families or to get legal advice. In six months, Mr. Speaker, this spy scare will be forgotten. Unfortunately our people are a bit too apathetic about matters of this kind. But I say to you, sir, that during your lifetime and mine the people of this country will always regret and will never live down the fact that we threw aside and abrogated the rights and liberties of our citizens. Indeed, sir, Canada now has seen black days.

Right Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I expected that we would hear some pretty strong criticism of what it was found necessary to do under the extraordinary conditions this government has had to face in connection with what I think I may describe, without violating any rule as to matters being sub judice, as a conspiracy for the establishment of a dangerous fifth column in this country. I would have been disappointed had that criticism not been made; because it is good, when extraordinary measures are taken, that they should be looked at very closely, and that those who venture to take them should feel that they have to respond to the tribunal of public opinion for those actions of which they have been the authors.

But I did not expect that it would take the line that has been indicated in the last few remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. For almost five years now I have occupied the office to which the leader of my party did me the honour to call me. It was my good fortune during the whole period of the war not to have been called upon to exercise any of the powers that had been conferred upon the incumbent of that office by the defence of Canada regulations.

Those regulations were quite drastic. Under them drastic action had been taken. But whether it be because drastic action had been taken or not, this country went through six years of war without any sabotage, and without any incident that retarded the effect of the will of the large majority of the people to put forth a gallant and valiant effort in the struggle for the maintenance of our institutions.

After I came into office it did happen that on two occasions internment orders had to be made. I suppose it was childish on my part, but I did take some satisfaction from the fact that, through no pre-arrangement, it so happened that I was not in Ottawa at the time those orders had to be made. And it was with great satisfaction that, when the war came to a close, I felt that the only orders I had been called upon to sign under those regulations were orders putting an end to the detentions that had been brought about under them.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat has said that he was speaking from the record; and it is quite natural that, in doing so, some discrepancies may creep into the facts as one states them. It is not the fact that the events narrated last night by the Prime Minister came to the knowledge of the Minister of Justice on that first day, when this Mr. Gouzenko tried to impart the information.

On the morning of September 6 he came to my secretary and asked for an interview. Being unknown to my secretary, as is the practice he was asked to state what his business was. When afterwards I was informed as to what his business was, I immediately said I could not receive an official from a friendly embassy bearing tales of the kind he had described to my secretary. And it was only after the police of the city of Ottawa requested the assistance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that, in the ordinary course of the exercise of their duties, which includes the giving of assistance to local authorities when called upon, they were put in possession of some of these facts.

We did hear that among those facts was the narration of an arrangement made for a contact to take place in London on a certain date, at a certain hour, at a certain street corner, where parties were to be recognized, with all the frills of an Oppenheim detective story—a newspaper under the left arm, or carried in one's pocket in a certain fashion, and by the exchange of greetings in terms which had been determined upon.

It did not seem to me probable, after this Mr. Gouzenko had disappeared, that this meeting would take place. Nevertheless, one of the gentlemen concerned did leave Canada on the date that the pre-arrangement indicated would be the date of his departure. I did not think much would come of it; but on October 6 we were requested to be ready to take action here in Canada if an arrest were made in London on the following evening. It is under those conditions that the order in council printed in this white paper was made.

The meeting did not take place; and I felt a substantial relief from the fact that the provisions made in this order did not have to be carried into effect. I had other matters to attend to, I never saw that order again until after the order in council appointing the royal commission was made, and counsel for the commission came to me asking me to sign orders for the detention and interrogation of certain persons. We then had a quite lengthy discussion over it, and I told them that if the order were one that was going to be made, then it would not be in that form; that I did not think in peace time it was proper that any member of the executive should have the kind of powers the order expressed; that I thought no one should be detained, even for interrogation, without there being some form of intervention of the judicial authority; that we would act only as if that were the provision, and that there would have to be a recommendation from some organ of the judicial authority to make me feel that I should exercise those powers.

It went so far that I was finally asked if I was going to take the responsibility of refusing to exercise them. I felt that that responsibility would be a responsibility for the safety of the state, whilst the other would be merely a responsibility that might involve some political discredit, and that between the two I would choose to assume whatever political criticism might be directed against me for following the advice I got from counsel for the commission, acting on instructions from the commission.

I shall now refer to the statute from which my hon. friend read. I do not think there is anyone in this house who will disagree with anything the hon. member has said with respect to the prosecution of individuals. But does not the hon. gentleman realize that there is more than the prosecution of individuals involved in this investigation? Does not the hon. member realize that the Inquiries Act was put into the statutes precisely to take care of situations which concerned the safety or good administration of the state, whilst all provisions which deal with the prosecution or otherwise of individuals who have committed offences are in the criminal code? What was required here was not some form of prosecution of an individual; what was required when it was determined by this magnificent body to which the hon. member has paid tribute, the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, that this was something serious was a commission to determine the extent to which it had vitiated the administrative life of this free country. It is for that reason that the commission was appointed to inquire into the matter.

The hon. member has stated before the house that a serious mistake was made in the selection of the commissioners, in choosing two justices of the Supreme Court of Canada instead of taking some other justices from some other courts in Canada. Well, I am willing to submit our judgment about the selection of those commissioners to the country as against the judgment of the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You can submit it in Calgary West at any time you want to.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And in many other spots too.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It so happens that this is the spot it has to be submitted to at this time. We in this house represent no spot; we represent the whole of Canada. The Inquiries Act, which is chapter 99 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, was placed on the statute books by the parliament of Canada for the purposes which are described in the statute. It provides:

> The governor in council may, whenever he deems it expedient, cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of Canada or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof.

That is not the criminal code. That is a statute passed to enable the governor in council to have an investigation made under conditions which will satisfy him, the parliament and the public of Canada that it is being proceeded with in a fair, judicial, careful and prudent manner. For the purpose of making that investigation the government of Canada was happy to follow the advice of the gentleman referred to by the hon. member, whom both he and I know well and than whom no one stands higher in his profession in this country. That gentleman at the present time is the president of the Canadian Bar Association. His first suggestion was that the commissioners be three members of the Supreme Court of Canada, and he afterwards modified that to the extent of recommending that two commissioners might be sufficient for the purposes of this commission. It was his opinion, an opinion which commended itself to His Excellency's advisers, an opinion which I think will commend itself to this house, that it was proper to ask these two gentlemen who are now the commissioners to undertake that service, that onerous and disagreeable service to the public of Canada, which this royal commission has to perform.

They made an examination of the papers which had been handed over to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by this man Gouzenko under the conditions which were described last evening by the right hon. the Prime Minister and which I will not repeat. They came to the conclusion that there was no doubt about the authenticity of those documents. Not many of them have yet been published and I cannot speak of those that have not been published. This investigation is proceeding in camera, but they came to the conclusion that taking these documents as authentic it was necessary for the purposes of a full and complete investigation that certain persons be detained for interrogation and they recommended that that be done.

I did not think at the time it was going to take as long as it is taking. It has really been a disappointment that it was necesasry to hold these persons so long before they could be interrogated and the commissioners make their final report. That is unfortunate, not as much for the persons who are detained, although they have my full sympathy, as for the public opinion of this country. It has made it appear that the important question before the country at the present time was not whether the security of the state was being undermined by the infiltration of this fifth column into many of the public offices but whether there had been anything done which might be prejudicial to an accused person when he came before the court of justice. We are all as attached as the hon. member for Calgary West to the proper administration of justice, whether it be criminal or civil, as it has been practised under the British system which has become our own, but there has been nothing shown anywhere which constitutes any violation of any right which any individual may have when he comes to answer for any charge brought against him.

One person not reported against by the commission, who could not be reported against because he had not been heard by the commission and because he could not be called upon to appear before the commission, was mentioned in the evidence that was put before the crown prosecutor for the purpose of making charges against some one who had been heard and who had been examined. Counsel retained came to the conclusion that it would not be proper to prosecute one person for conspiracy with the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) without at the same time bringing charges against him. Those charges were laid, an arrest was made and the next morning he appeared before the court in Montreal and within a very few hours was released on bail.

Doctor A. N. May was arrested in London, certainly as much as three weeks ago, and the Ottawa Journal's five o'clock edition today reports:

> Bail refused for Dr. A. N. May in London Court—British scientist held for trial in spy case.
> London, March 19.—Dr. Allan Nunn May, 34-year-old British physicist who worked in Canada on nuclear research in the war-time pursuit of atomic energy, to-day was held for trial in Old Bailey Criminal Court, April 13, on charges of violating the Official Secrets Act by giving atomic information to an undisclosed person.
> Dr. May was refused bail by Magistrate McKenna of Bow Street Court, who said the defendant's release might be "against public policy."

Doctor May, like everybody else, is deemed to be innocent until found guilty, but Doctor May was refused, pending further investigation of the charges against him, to be allowed his temporary freedom on bail because it might be against public policy.

Here the royal commissioners held that it would be against public policy and would be apt to defeat the basic purposes for which this basic investigation had been instituted if the persons they wished to interrogate were not detained pending their interrogation. That has taken more time than we hoped it might take, but there was only one of two courses to follow. One would have been to treat this as of not sufficient importance to warrant any other action than perhaps a discreet dismissal of those who might be suspected of having engaged in the spying proceedings. The other was to take steps to make sure that we would ascertain, as far as it is possible to do so, to what extent this virus had penetrated into branches of the public service and, as is suggested to me, throughout the country at large. We knew that there would be serious political embarrassment for us in taking the latter course. One of the most embarrassing features about public life that I have been up against in the short time that I have been in it is the necessity of making decisions based upon facts you know but cannot fully disclose to the public. This is not the first time that I have been up against that difficulty. Some hon. members were here in 1944 when I had to take a stand based upon the facts which I knew and which in my opinion fully justified the stand I took, but at that time those facts could not be made known. Last May it was possible to go to places where my conduct had been severely criticized and tell them then the facts which I knew at the time I made the decision and to say to them: Is there any one of you here who, had you been in my place and had known those facts, would not have done as I did? And I got a satisfactory answer.

This is another occasion where we are not free at the present time to disclose more than has been disclosed by public statements or by this white paper. We had to make a decision, well knowing that in the meantime it would involve the probability of criticism, the probability of serious criticism. My colleagues know to what extent I pointed out what criticism we would be up against when we had to defend this line of conduct, but I am confident that the public of Canada when this thing is over will, as did the public of other parts of Canada last May, feel that we took the right course, the courageous course, the only course under which it was possible to satisfy the responsibility we had for the safety of government—I do not mean the government of a party but the safety of our form of government in this country.

With respect to individuals, whenever the moment arises for them to have to answer to the charges against them, even before an adverse report is made about them by the commission, they are brought before the commissioners as required by these sections read by the hon. member are told what the facts are which indicate that they should be critically reported upon by the commissioners and are asked if they wish to have counsel. They are told that they are free to adduce further evidence if they see fit to do so, and after that they are not found guilty because the royal commission has no power to find anyone guilty or to impose any sentence upon anyone. The royal commission makes a report, and on that report the government has to take the responsibility, as the Prime Minister said in his statement of February 15 it would take, of determining whether or not such person will be prosecuted.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the minister permit a simple question? Was it after they had been examined under oath that they were given that opportunity?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is after they are examined under oath that they are given that opportunity. They are examined under oath, not to determine whether they have done anything personally, but to inform the commission what they know about the extent of this conspiracy as it affects the body politic.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Including themselves.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Including themselves and including the rest of the 11,500,000 or 12,000,000 Canadians.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Agreed, but about 11,999,990 of the others are out of gaol, are they not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This investigation had to be made or had to be omitted. I would not have taken the responsibility of passing over the information that was characterized by the experienced members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as being probably authentic.

Some suggestion has been made that we first heard of this in September and that it was not until February that a royal commission was set up. In due time full explanations will be available to the Canadian public for that delay, and when those explanations are available I think the Canadian public will find them satisfactory.

The Prime Minister indicated last night that we did not feel that this country should be made the base for spying out information affecting our neighbours to the south or affecting the United Kingdom, and that it was proper to communicate to them beforehand such information as was available. The information on which Doctor A. N. May was charged was information obtained at the same time in the same way, and those proceedings, hon. members will recall, coincided with the institution of proceedings here. It was felt, and I think properly so, that our action should be synchronized with all such action as might be taken elsewhere arising out of the same set of facts.

The hon. member says that a great judge has stated that it would be better that ten guilty persons should escape condemnation than that one innocent person be found guilty of an offence which he did not commit. That is all very well, and that is no doubt the rule which will be followed and strictly applied in the courts of justice before which this case will have to appear. But in this royal commission the purpose was not to pronounce upon the innocence or guilt of any of ten or thirteen or more persons but to find out to what extent the security of this state had been endangered by a conspiracy to set up this fifth column in our country. I submit, and I take full responsibility for the view, that when gentlemen such as the two members of the royal commission, such as the eminent counsel who have been associated with them, report that the only effective way to make the investigation which the circumstances require is to detain and interrogate persons who may have knowledge about it, it was proper to accept that advice and to proceed with that investigation.

Had it not been at this time it could not have been done in that way. It was done in that way only because it so happened that an order in council which had been made on October 6, 1945, was still in force. If there had been no legal way of doing it I would have felt no responsibility. But when there was a legal way, when there was a way by which it could legally be done, I could not take the responsibility of refusing to comply with the advice which was given to me. I will not say I was happy that there was a legal way of doing it. It would have been much more comfortable for me to be able to say, "This cannot legally be done".

Reference has been made to the excluding of habeas corpus. That is not technically correct. There has been no setting aside of the statute of Charles providing for habeas corpus. All that the habeas corpus statute provides for is that anyone who is detained may require that he be brought before a judge so that the judge will determine whether or not there is a legal case for his detention. Any one of these persons could have applied for and obtained a writ of habeas corpus, but it would have done him no good, because as soon as the judge would have been shown the order in council under which such person was detained, and the order in council which authorized it, he would have said, "You are legally detained". And that would have required the quashing of the writ. So that no writ of habeas corpus would have had any practical effect under these proceedings, any more than the writ of habeas corpus which was issued during the last war and which was the occasion for the leading case that decides the effect of the War Measures Act.

The writ was issued and it went through to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the decision was that things done under the War Measures Act had the effect of a statute to provide a legal cause for the detention of the man. The same would have happened here. The writ of habeas corpus is not set aside. There is provision for the detention of an individual, something which is not according to the ordinary rules of law, and if it is regularly provided by parliament, or under the authority of parliament, it requires the writ to be quashed just as effectively as if it were a conviction in an ordinary court.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. FULTON: Will the minister permit a question? Will he tell us how a person held incommunicado could bring a writ of habeas corpus?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My hon. friend is himself a lawyer and he does not need my advice—

Mr. FULTON: A lawyer, not a magician.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —as to how that could be done. It is no business of the custodian of a person who is held to provide opportunities for the issuing of these writs. There may be facts which create difficulties in the way of having a writ. One could imagine, for instance, someone being arrested and detained in the wilderness of the north.

Mr. FULTON: Not in Canada.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would not be easy for him to have a writ issued, but that would not mean that he did not have his legal right to the writ. These are circumstances which result from the facts, but they create no legal obstacle.

There is just one other point to which I wish to refer. It is personal. I do not like to have to refer to it but I think I should. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) called attention to a statement I made in the crossfire of discussion when the emergency powers bill was being debated in committee on December 6 last. There had been some discussion there over a secret order in council providing for the examination of seamen. It was an order which it was alleged had not been published but had been tabled in this house about a month before. I said that was not a secret order and that there were no secret orders. The leader of the opposition was kind enough to say he was quite convinced I had not meant to mislead the house, and I hoped no one in the house would believe that on any occasion I would wish to mislead the house. I had no thought at that time of this order, which had not been used, which had been prepared for use in the event that this rendezvous which the hon. member for Calgary West says no one would have been dumb enough to keep after Gouzenko had abstracted certain papers from the Russian embassy had not taken place.

As I said before, I felt a great relief that no orders were required to be made under this, and it had entirely slipped my memory. Had I thought of it at any time since and looked at it, I would have been inclined, before December 31, before the date when the War Measures Act ceased to be operative, to have had it modified, to require the proceedings which in fact I did ask to have accomplished before I signed any orders, because once again I do not think a member of the executive branch of government should in peace time have powers of that nature that he can exercise of his own volition. It is only very rarely that any extraordinary proceedings can be taken, because the whole of the normal legislation has to be statutory, and there is nothing in the Inquiries Act which authorizes the detention of persons for interrogation. They are compelled to appear. They are not allowed counsel unless the commissioners feel that they should have them. This denial of counsel of which so much has been made is something which has been provided by this parliament before the hon. member for Calgary West or the member for Quebec East came into this parliament. This parliament decided that in cases of royal inquiries the right to counsel would exist from a given moment. Parliament determined that up to that moment it would be discretionary for the commissioners as to whether those called before them would have counsel or not.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They may.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commissioners may do it, but they are not required to do it, and they may refuse to do it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They did, apparently.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And they did; but in doing that they were carrying out a provision passed by this parliament which has stood on the statute book for a great many years.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It was never intended to track down spies.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Until quite recently in this country it was never thought that any government would have to track down spies in its own service, and I hope that from this time onward the result of this commission will be such that that unpleasant duty will never fall upon any other government. But if it does and should it at any time again become necessary I hope there will be in office a government that will not shirk the responsibility of doing its duty.

Mr. COLDWELL: I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on his feet. Would he permit me to ask the Minister of Justice a question? I suggested last evening that two persons who had been held had been treated in a particular manner. To-night the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) referred to it. Would the minister tell us what he knows about it? I think it is something that should be cleared up.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I fully agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Had it been possible for me to get to the Department of Justice to-day I would have been in a position to give the answer. Unfortunately I was not able to get to the department to-day. There was a meeting of the treasury board at half-past nine o'clock, and from that moment until this it has not been possible for me to get to the responsible officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to find out exactly what are the facts in that regard. I know that I discussed with the commissioner at the outset the treatment to be accorded to these persons, and we both agreed that they should be subjected to as little inconvenience as possible, and that we should endeavour in our representations to the commission and to the counsel to make the duration of that inconvenience as short as possible. I shall make inquiry, but I shall not promise to give the answer to-morrow, because I think it is serious enough for the commissioner to make a full inquiry and have before him all those who were in charge of the persons who were being detained for interrogation.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I be permitted to ask a question? When the minister was speaking he corrected the hon. member for Calgary West with respect to one factual matter. The hon. member for Calgary West thought that the matter had been brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice in September last. The minister said that was an error, but he did not tell us when it was brought to his attention.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In a general way it was reported to me on the following day.

Some hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Hon. members need not laugh. I am trying to give the leader of the opposition the full facts as I am sure he would like to have them. If it is not suitable to other hon. members that I give them to him here I shall be glad to give them to him privately. The day after Gouzenko's visit to my secretary I was informed that the Ottawa police had requested the assistance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police about this man, and I told them then they were free to see him and to get the story from him. Then as it developed in the course of a few following days I was apprised from time to time of what information was being obtained.

Mr. BRACKEN: When was the first day?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was the day of the opening of the house, September 6, and on September 7 I was told that this same man who had tried to see them the day previous, and with respect to whom I had told them that they must not see him, had been brought to them through the instrumentality of the Ottawa police.

Mr. BRACKEN: Was that contrary to what the hon. member for Calgary West said?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think so. I gathered from the hon. member that he was under the impression that I had received this Mr. Gouzenko and had heard his story when he came from the Russian embassy. That I refused to do, and it was only when he was brought into contact with the police through the ordinary course of the police work that they were permitted to listen to his story and take notes from him.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with the speech that I had intended to deliver I should like to ask for your ruling on a point of order, and, of course, to be governed by it. I thought I would be the first speaker on the government side to follow the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and to reply to a motion of want of confidence moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). There has been injected into the debate discussion on a question which was raised on the main motion and nothing whatsoever has been said with regard to the amendment itself. What I should like to know is, am I in order to speak for more than forty minutes? I should like to know that before I begin because I had intended to review some of my experiences in Europe. If I am restricted to forty minutes I shall do it at some other time.

Mr. BRACKEN: Speaking for this party, I may say we shall offer no objection if the Minister of Agriculture requires more than forty minutes to make his reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is important. It is not a matter of consent. It is a question of the rules of the house and a matter of right. I think the Speaker ought to decide it. I believe the rule is that any member of the government replying to a motion of want of confidence has whatever length of time he wishes to speak if he is the first person to speak after the motion is made.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Justice spoke for only a little more than forty minutes, including his answer to the question which was put to him. Therefore I believe that if the Minister of Agriculture wants to answer for the government it is his privilege under standing order 37 to speak for more than forty minutes.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know whether that is your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I have no objection to the minister exceeding his time to-night, because we want to hear about this agricultural policy, but we do not want a ruling which will establish a precedent in this connection. It seems to me the rule is very clear:

> . . . such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

It seems to me the minister who speaks immediately after the motion of want of confidence has been moved is the minister replying to the motion.

Mr. GARDINER: If I may be permitted, the question I raised was in regard to a minister who was not replying at all to the motion of want of confidence. I wanted to know whether in that case I would have the right to speak for more than forty minutes. I should like to have that clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I refer you and the house, Mr. Speaker, to a ruling which will be found on pages 22 and 23 of the Journals of the House of Commons, 1941-42, in which the Speaker of the day ruled that as many as six ministers of the crown whose departments were under attack in a want of confidence motion could each reply for more than forty minutes.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I say one word with respect to this matter. First of all, let it be clear that we want the Minister of Agriculture to have all the time he wishes this evening. With respect to the decision you, sir, are about to give on the technical point raised, I suggest that the Prime Minister spoke after I did the other day, and no doubt spoke for the government in reply to that motion of want of confidence. If there is some rule that six ministers each may speak for more than forty minutes, that is another matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apart from what my hon. friend says, another motion was moved by the leader of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. COLDWELL: But was that a motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly it was a motion in the nature of a want of confidence motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Speaker has been asked for a ruling, and with the permission of the house I shall give that ruling.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just say this, Mr. Speaker. I was on my feet and sat down because you rose; I did not wish to be disrespectful to the Chair, but I would point out that if mine was a want of confidence motion then I had the right to speak for more than forty minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But you did not do so.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have been denied that privilege on other occasions in this house; the ruling of Mr. Speaker is there to confirm that statement. Consequently there can be only one want of confidence motion before the house, and I moved an amendment to it. The government cannot have it both ways.

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is right when he says that a member moving a motion of want of confidence in the government is entitled to speak for more than forty minutes. When the hon. gentleman spoke I did not ask him to resume his seat because he had spoken for more than forty minutes. I was asked by the Minister of Agriculture for a ruling as to whether he might speak for more than forty minutes. The question now before the house is the amendment and the subamendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) respectively. The Minister of Justice did not answer for the government in regard to the amendment or the subamendment, so that I believe it is the privilege of the Minister of Agriculture to answer for the government. Therefore he is entitled to speak for more than forty minutes if he wishes to do so.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will resume his seat, he knows perfectly well that the ruling of the Speaker is not debatable, so that he cannot raise the question now.

Mr. KNOWLES: The ruling is wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Agriculture has the floor.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): My desire was to have the question cleared up before I began my remarks, in order that I might govern myself accordingly; and I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the ruling you have given.

In discussing the question raised by the amendment and subamendment I desire to deal with the situation referred to in the speech from the throne, which has been commented upon by those who have been discussing this matter and particularly by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). In his remarks dealing with food he made this statement, as reported at page 27 of Hansard of March 18:

> I now come to a discussion of agriculture and food. The speech from the throne tells us that the most pressing problem demanding immediate attention is the food problem. That is a fact we have known for months—that is, everybody except the government. We heard about their new policy first in the speech from the throne.

I do not know whether that remark was intended to leave the impression it left with me, which was that the speech from the throne was referring to a condition which related more particularly to Canada. The speech from the throne had this to say:

> Of world problems demanding immediate action, the most pressing is the provision of food to those peoples facing acute shortage, and, in some regions, widespread famine. The chance of a peaceful reconstruction of the world depends on food. The shortage at the present time is very great. The problem, moreover, is not only for the next few months, but also for the next few years.

With this statement appearing in the speech from the throne I am in entire agreement, and I wish to say a word in regard to discussions in which I took part during the last session. Last fall, when we were discussing in this house whether we should have rationing of meat I made a statement which was quoted in the press from one end of Canada to the other and commented upon by quite a number of newspapers. I repeated a remark I had heard a few days previously made by a minister of the gospel in one of the churches of this city, to the effect that there was a possibility there might be as many as three hundred thousand children on the continent of Europe who would lose their lives as a result of starvation, particularly in those areas with which we in this country are concerned, unless something was done to provide them with more food than it was then apparent they were going to receive. Since making that remark I have had the privilege of visiting most of the countries I had in mind when making that statement, and I think I am in duty bound to make some report to the house in regard to what I found in that particular area and the effect upon any policies the government may be called upon to announce now in regard to foodstuffs and their distribution.

During the six or seven weeks I was on the other side of the ocean I had the privilege of travelling across Great Britain at two different points by car, and of travelling by train throughout the length of the greater part of the island known as Great Britain. I also had the privilege of covering a considerable part of France, of Belgium, of Holland and of Denmark, as well as a considerable part of Germany both by aeroplane and by automobile.

I did not do as I was warned not to do when I was in Paris. A guide who was taking me about the city said, "Do not go back to Canada and say what one other person said who was here in Paris lately, upon returning to the United States." I asked the guide what had been said, and I was told that particular person had lived at the Ritz hotel—where I myself was stopping—had gone back to this continent and had made the statement, which had appeared in the press, to the effect that conditions were no worse in Paris than they were on this continent.

With that warning I was careful not to remain all my time in the Ritz hotel. I drove out into the country districts of France and other countries, in so far as it was possible for me to do so, and visited in those country places as well. I took my meals not only in the Ritz hotel, and in other hotels similarly situated, but took some of them in country districts, in ordinary restaurants, just as anyone would walk in off a street and order a meal. On other occasions I was at farm houses when meals were being served. While I did not have meals in all those farm houses, because I was not invited in some, yet I did stand and watch people who were eating their meals in houses where I was not invited. Therefore I did gain some knowledge as to what conditions are in the areas I visited.

In addition to that, I had an opportunity to visit with men who have been placed in charge of the occupied areas in Germany, and with men who are looking after food supplies in some other sections. What I wish to report to the house is this, that each one of the men I interviewed, who had responsible positions in connection with the distribution of food, and all those with whom I came in contact, assured me that no one had died from starvation in those areas, at least since the armies moved from active battles of warfare to occupation.

I state that merely to impress upon the minds of members of the house and of the people of Canada generally the reports that were made, and the results of what I myself saw. I hope that the decision which we did reach last year, and similar decisions reached in other countries did have the effect of placing sufficient food at the disposal of those who are administering those areas, to avoid having children dying from starvation.

But having said that, I would not wish members of the House of Commons to conclude that there is no hardship, that there is no trouble on the continent of Europe in the matter of food supplies. There are very serious difficulties, as the speech from the throne indicates, and I am sure that we as a people have a desire to do everything we possibly can in order to right a condition which does exist there, and to do it as rapidly as possible.

But in order to impress further upon the minds of hon. members what I believe to be the condition there, may I say this, that one can say the worst of which he could conceive with regard to conditions in certain spots or in certain areas, more or less limited so far as their effect upon the population as a whole is concerned. For example, if one is in the centre of the city of Hamburg, where there has been great destruction, he will see smoke-stacks sticking out of basements, with smoke belching from them, indicating that there are people living under the rubble covering the basements of buildings which were blasted by bombing.

No doubt there is great hardship there, and perhaps great difficulty in getting sufficient food to those people. But on the other hand one can go into the rural districts in the different countries about which I have spoken, and sometimes even into the smaller urban communities, sometimes even into sections of cities, and find that the people who are living in those particular areas have sufficient food to ward off anything in the nature of starvation. In some places one even finds it possible to receive meals that are just as good as those received by the American who stopped only in the Ritz hotel, and who went back to America and reported that one can be just as well fed there as he could be anywhere on this continent.

Well, then, you may ask me what the great difficulties are in connection with the situation. I would say they are threefold. First, there has been great damage done to the transportation systems. And even where food is available, in certain areas it is almost impossible to have it transported to other areas where it may be in great need.

In addition to that, there is the difficulty in connection with exchange. Some of the people who are there have been supplied with funds during a time when a government which does not now exist issued currency. As a result of that, there is great difficulty in disposing of commodities for a currency which will be accepted at its face value by those who have it for distribution.

Then there is a most serious condition, one with which we are most concerned here, namely that there is not sufficient food in any event to feed all the people in those areas as they ought to be fed, even when we take into consideration the amount which under present conditions we are able to ship to them.

Those are the three outstanding difficulties, as I see them; and they are the difficulties which must be overcome before people can be properly fed. Indeed, two of them must be overcome before they can be properly fed, even if we supply the full quantity of food required in those districts.

I wish to say something at this time respecting the control conducted by the armies of occupation in those three sections of Germany at which I had the pleasure of looking for a short time, and over limited areas. I was along with officials who gave me whatever information was available in connection with the matter.

I feel that we have in the administration of the three armies of occupation, in so far as I was able to see them working, as complete and as effective an organization as can be set up for the distribution of food under the conditions existing on the continent of Europe. I say that in order to indicate that possibly we can best meet the situation which exists there by putting any food we have available for distribution in that area—so long as those armies of occupation are in charge—at the disposal of those who have been placed there to administer its distribution, rather than by placing it there in some other way.

In addition to that, I should like to say I was agreeably surprised at the provision made in camps in which people have been congregated by the occupation forces, to take care of people who came, we will say, into Berlin, ahead of the armies. They are being taken care of by those who are in charge of the administration in the certain sections of that city.

I had the privilege of going through one of those camps in which five thousand of those people were congregated, and of seeing conditions there at first hand. I need only say that the property upon which they were congregated is the barracks in which the German army in that section had been trained since possibly the time of Bismarck. The buildings are well constructed and the equipment for taking care of 5,000 people is all that one could expect in any refugee camp or any organized camp anywhere. What this reminded me of more than anything else I had ever seen was my experience in Winnipeg when we had people coming to this country from central European countries in hundreds of thousands during a twelve month period. I used to go down to the immigration hall in Winnipeg and see people who had just come off the trains seated about on the floor, on benches, on whatever equipment they may have had, on bundles of clothing or anything else they might have with them. These people were living under exactly the same kind of conditions and they looked like the same type of people. They seemed to be just about as well satisfied as you could have people who are forced away from home.

Another thing that surprised me more than anything else was that the British government, which was the government that had charge of this particular camp, was not only taking care of and clothing all these people, as well as feeding them, but had schools organized with school teachers teaching the children. I must say that the children in those schools showed by the satisfaction on their faces that they were being as well treated and as well cared for as any group of children could be under the conditions that exist when an army has moved across a country and people have moved in ahead of the army and must be taken care of until they can be redistributed back to where they came from or somewhere else.

I wanted to say these things, not only to remove from the minds of members but from the minds of people in Canada some of the ideas that we get when we listen to propaganda put on at great distances away from the scene of activity. I just wish to say, in order that I may not be misunderstood, that one could go to any of these areas one day or one week and look around, then go back three weeks later and look around and get an entirely different picture. I was in Paris on a day when there were fifteen degrees of frost, when army trucks were still moving about the streets, when buses were being overthrown at street corners in spite of the fact that the local police were trying to direct traffic. One found a condition there which gave one a certain impression. I came away from Paris feeling that I had seen a very dejected people, a people who were suffering because of need, a people who were not properly clothed, a people who required a great deal of sympathy and care from those of us outside. As a result of that experience, we cabled to this country and asked for more wheat for France. I wish to report to the house that those who were in authority here, the wheat board, saw to it immediately that more wheat was sent forward, and actually increased supplies have gone forward weekly.

I went back three weeks later. I dropped into Paris on a day that was springlike, a day when there was no frost. The troops had all gone and the city was in the hands of the civilian population. I was reminded of the Paris I had seen ten years ago in 1936, not by the number of people who were on the street but by the manner in which they were conducting themselves, by the way in which they were dressed and everything else that had to do with the conduct of the city itself. If one were in France during the time of war, if one were there within two months after the war was over, if one were there six months after the war was over the picture would be entirely different at each time. I presume if one went back six months hence it will have changed even more than it has up to the present since the end of the war.

With that background I want to discuss the policy of this government in relation to food, both in the days that have gone by and in the months that lie ahead of us, and try if I can to leave an impression, not only on this house but on the country, as to what our intentions are in following the line of policy that we are following and have been following up to the present time in relation to food production during and after the war. In doing that I should like to call attention to one or two statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). The hon. gentleman is reported on page 28 of Hansard as having said:

> It has been my business for thirty years, both in research and in practice in connection with farming, to understand that.

That is the argument in dry areas, that a certain proportion of the land should be allowed to lie fallow to conserve moisture for next year's crops. He says that he understands that from the experience he has had. He continued:

> But I know also that the only way to get extra food for hungry people is either to share what we have or to grow more. We have done splendidly in both directions, particularly in the line of production, during the last few years, but we can do more.

Then there is this statement:

> The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), according to press reports, holds the view that the acreage of wheat ought not to be increased in this emergency. As I have said, the Prime Minister has taken the same position on behalf of the government. I hold a different view. I hold the view that wheat acreage can be increased, and that it can be increased without serious risk to good farming practice and without lessening the normal acreage sown to feed grains.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

That is the opinion expressed by the leader of the opposition in this house. I refer again to his statement that for thirty years he has had experience, first as a civil servant working for the department of agriculture in one of the provinces of Canada; second, as a professor in a university of that same province; third, as the leader of the government in one of the provinces and now as the leader of the opposition in this house. In other words, that experience has been a three-way experience. Probably one might add to it the practical experience of having owned and operated farms on his own behalf.

With that statement before us I wish to examine into some of the recommendations and some of the undertakings and some of the opinions offered by the leader of the opposition in those different capacities. I have here a pamphlet which is entitled, "The Summer Fallow," and which was issued under the name of John Bracken, professor of field husbandry, university of Saskatchewan. I think it can be taken as authentic and as expressing at least the opinions which were held during the time he was educating the young farmers of Saskatchewan how to farm. This is what it says:

> Yet water in large quantities is absolutely essential to growing crops. The best "dry farmer" in the world cannot grow crops without rain. But he can grow crops in a limited rainfall if he understands and puts into practice the methods now understood of (1) storing the rainfall in the soil and (2) conserving it there for the use of crops. This is the first principle of "dry farming." In Saskatchewan we call it "summerfallowing."

I am quite sure that the leader of the opposition will still agree that that is a good definition of what we mean by summer-fallowing. I would agree with it also. He goes on to say:

> In farming practice it is not possible to store and retain in the soil all of the rain that falls in any year, but it is possible to store a large portion of it. In a foot of normal soil 2 or 3 or more inches of water can be stored and retained. At the end of the summer season the soil after a good fallow is moist to a depth of several feet, while adjoining cropped or prairie land is practically dry. (At the university in the dry year of 1914, fallowed land yielded 30¼ bushels of wheat; well cultivated fall ploughing, 16 bushels 53 pounds, while spring breaking failed to produce a crop.)

I think that that gives in as few words as possible the general experience of farmers in western Canada in dealing with a condition which is customary in that section of the country, namely, that we have from time to time drought years which we must be careful in dealing with. That statement was made while my hon. friend was a professor of the agricultural college in the province of Saskatchewan. I have here another statement which he made when he was a civil servant in the government of Saskatchewan. His other statement was in a pamphlet on summerfallowing explaining why we have summerfallowing in the drought years in western Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Would the minister give the date of that pamphlet?

Mr. GARDINER: It was in 1919.

Mr. ROSS: A long time ago.

Mr. GARDINER: Our methods of farming, I am sure the leader of the opposition will agree, are fairly consistent.

Mr. ROWE: There were not as many starving men as now. And were bonuses paid then?

Mr. GARDINER: I will give another statement by the leader of the opposition in 1916, three years further back. This statement was made when he was professor of field husbandry in the university of Saskatchewan. He said then in an article headed:

The Saskatchewan crop growers' plans in war time.

To those of us who are not in khaki but who are nevertheless anxious to do their share in bringing victory to the allies' cause the question of modifying our farm practices to meet the needs of the present crisis is one that deserves our most serious consideration.

The call has come to the Canadian farmer to increase his production because, in this way, he can be of very material service to the empire.

No one doubts the favourable effect a large crop will have on our staying powers in this war. The question is, can we get the larger crop?

Of the 10,500,000 odd acres that were cropped this year very little has received any preparation for next year's crop. Under ordinary circumstances at least 3,500,000 acres of this land should be fallowed.

It will be noted that figure is very close to the figure stated by the leader of the opposition yesterday, being the government's idea of the proportion of the land which should be summerfallowed. But now that he speaks as leader of the opposition he thinks that figure should be lowered. He went on in 1916 to ask:

Under these conditions what is to be done?

Here you had conditions where the correct thing was to summerfallow 3,500,000 out of 10,500,000 acres. Here you had a situation where the British government was appealing for more food in order that they might prosecute the war to a successful conclusion; and remember, that at that time we were assisting in feeding France, assisting in feeding part of Belgium and assisting in feeding some other countries to which we then had access but to which we had not access in this last war. He went on to say:

Under these conditions what is to be done? Shall we sow ill-prepared land and take a chance, as, fortunately, many of us did in 1915, or shall we sow only the land that can be well prepared? In other words shall we, having made a fortunate stroke, take another turn at the wheel, or shall we play safe? There can be no doubt that the latter is the better plan, not only for the nation but also for the individual.

The empire's needs must receive first consideration from the farmer as well as from the soldier. But poor farm practice will not result in satisfying the empire's needs. If we expect that the war will be concluded within from twelve to twenty months, the most patriotic among us may be led to sow all or nearly all of our land, including a portion or all of what should be fallowed. We would serve an immediate need at the expense of the future. We would take chances on our 1916 crop and run an even greater risk with the crop of the following year.

Without a reasonable amount of fallowed land in 1916, what would be our contribution to the empire's needs in 1917, providing the war continues two years or more? Where would the individual be financially? It is conceivable that the 1917 crop might be a failure. It is not only conceivable, but it is quite probable that it would be a small one—small in direct proportion to the absence of fallowed land.

That is sound policy, sound advice. It is just as sound in the year 1946 as it was in the year 1916, in fact, more so, because the land of western Canada to-day is thirty years older in cultivation than it was away back in 1916. We are in a position to-day where I believe the proper policy to follow is the policy that was indicated by the leader of the opposition during the period of the last war when similar demands were being made upon us as are being made now. They are demands for production over more than one year. But unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the people of western Canada did not take the advice of the professor of the university of Saskatchewan and, as he suggests, they may not take the advice of this government now. The reason why the farmers of Saskatchewan did not take the advice of the then adviser to farmers in western Canada as to how to farm properly was that a great many other people, not too responsible to anyone, were making statements contrary to the advice given by the most experienced agriculturists in the public service that we had in western Canada at that time. As a result, our acreages in wheat were increased, and the result was that following the war we had in western Canada a condition of which western Canada has been trying to avoid a repetition.

With those statements before us I should like now to deal with the situation that exists. The leader of the opposition in his speech yesterday said:

> To-day in western Canada nearly one-third, thirty per cent, of the cultivated land devoted to the growing of cereal crops lies fallow each year, producing nothing. Prior to 1941 the normal amount lying fallow for that purpose was about twenty-five per cent. We have increased the percentage of fallow land lying barren every year since we started paying people not to grow wheat.

My hon. friend across the way asked me a few moments ago if I would still be in favour of paying people not to grow wheat. I will answer that question as well as the suggestion. Prior to 1941—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If the minister will permit a question, does he believe that under the present system of agriculture in western Canada that the bare fallow is the best system? Is it in keeping with the more recent advice of the professor of farm management in the Saskatchewan university? The whole picture has changed in the last few years.

Mr. GARDINER: I will still abide by the opinion of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition which I quoted a few moments ago. The leader of the opposition did suggest in his speech yesterday that we return to the acreage of the period preceding the war. Let us see what the results were of having those acreages preceding the war and what the results have been of following the policy which the government has followed, namely. of encouraging people to go to a very much higher level in summer-fallowing for a period, then returning to a level which is considerably lower than that proposed by the leader of the opposition yesterday. He suggested yesterday that we might put another four million or five million acres of land into wheat this year without exceeding the crop acreage which we had in the years up to 1940. That is perfectly true. We had in the neighbourhood of 29 million acres of land in wheat in 1940; in the year preceding that, 27 million acres, and in the years immediately preceding that, the acreage were higher than the proposed acreage for this year.

What results did we obtain during that period of time? The results we obtained were reported to the December conference and I quote from the report. The average yield of wheat in the years from 1935 to 1939 was 312 million bushels. What was the result in the years following 1940 down to 1944, during the period when we were paying people to take land out of wheat and put it into summer-fallow and thus prepare their land better, as suggested by the professor of husbandry in Saskatchewan in earlier years, which advice the farmers have tried to follow under our leadership since 1940. The result was this. The average crop from 1935 to 1939 was 312 million bushels, and the average from 1940 to 1944 was 426 million bushels. Just as stated in the article by the leader of the opposition, it is possible to grow more wheat on less land if you properly summer-fallow the land. So it has proven that from 1940 to 1944, with an average of 426 million bushels a year, more wheat was produced than in the period to the practices of which he wishes us to return, when only an average of 312 million bushels was produced.

Mr. ROWE: Does rain have effect on that?

Mr. GARDINER: It has about as much effect on that as moisture has on my hon. friend.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Were those years fairly comparable? That is to say, was the rainfall just the same in the latter years as in the former?

Mr. GARDINER: I suppose no two years are comparable. One can say this, that it would be improper to suggest that any one thing had everything to do with the increase or decrease in production. It has been argued on the floor of the house and outside that summer-fallowing is not a proper policy to follow under present conditions, and I am suggesting that we did follow that policy of greatly increasing summer-fallow and we got the best results we have had in the whole history of Saskatchewan. In 1944-45 the one year between then and now, we had 436 million bushels.

In oats, from 1935 to 1939 we had 338 million bushels, and the average from 1940 to 1944 was 464 million bushels, while for the year 1944-45 it was 500 million bushels. In barley the average from 1935 to 1939 was 89 million bushels.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister mind repeating those figures for oats?

Mr. GARDINER: For oats, it was 338 million bushels in the first group of years, the average for the five-year period from 1935 to 1939 inclusive, and from 1940 to 1944 inclusive it was 464 million bushels, while production for 1944-45 was 500 million bushels. In barley, for the first period the production was 89 million bushels; for the second period, 177 million bushels, and for the year 1944-45 it was 195 million bushels. If we had had the increase only in grain production it could be argued that by that policy you do not get more food than by following the other policy, and therefore it might still be argued that we ought to go back to the same policy we followed from 1935 to 1939. But let us look at the figures.

In addition to these enormous amounts of grain, we had delivered to the market in the first period an average of 3,338,000 hogs and in the period from 1940 to 1944 we delivered 6,783,000 hogs, or more than double. In 1945 we delivered 5,900,000. Coming to cattle, the figure was 1,031,000 in the first period, 1,144,000 in the second period, and 1,720,000 in 1944. In eggs the production was 219,523,000 dozen in the first period, 287,447,000 dozen in the second period, and 395,019,000 dozen last year.

Let us now take dairy products. Let us take milk—the total milk production. There was an average of 15,282,097,000 pounds in the first period, 17,032,239,000 pounds in the second period, and 17,618,810,000 pounds in 1945. In creamery butter there were 254 million pounds in the first period, 289 million pounds in the second period, and 293 million pounds in the year 1944-45. In cheese we had 119,922,000 pounds in the first period, 168,650,000 pounds in the second period, and 184,451,829 pounds in the year 1944-45.

What I wish to call attention to is this. The government followed a certain line of policy in the first period. We did not ask the farmers to do anything in particular in the way of farming. We said, "We will try to market the products you produce, no matter what kind. We will try to do our best to take care of the surpluses you have in other directions." That was the same government that is in power now. If my hon. friend had suggested that we should have gone back to the preceding five years it would not have been the same government and the results in those preceding five years would not have been as good as from 1935 to 1939. Taking him at his word, he asked us to go back to the period in which this government was in power from 1935 to 1939, when we obtained the results I have indicated by following that policy. In 1940 we changed the policy, and I may say that when changing it I made a statement on the floor of the house which I believe hon. members will allow me to read now since it comes so close to giving almost to the bushel what has been produced that I feel like claiming some of the characteristics of a prophet in connection with it. I may say that there was no one on the opposition side of the house—and I am inclined to think there were not many on the government side—who agreed with me when I made this statement on my return from Britain in 1940. I will read it and hon. members will see what it sounds like now. I am reporting here what I had stated in Britain while I was there in October, 1940. On my return to this country in November I submitted a report in which I stated—

Mr. BRACKEN: What was that document?

Mr. GARDINER: This is Hansard. It is my speech, but it is taken out of Hansard.

Mr. BRACKEN: 1940?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, November. I said:

On the supply side, Canada could expect to produce on an average 380 million bushels of wheat a year.

She has produced around 426 million recently.

That is her average for the last fourteen years and more than her average for the last five years, including the last two crops. Her total production in five years thus would amount to 1,900 million bushels. To this should be added the 280 million bushels carried over into 1940-41 from previous years, making a total quantity of 2,180 million bushels, which it would be necessary for Canada to dispose of in the five-year period.

That was in November, 1940. We are now in the spring of 1946, or just a little beyond the end of that five-year period.

It appeared, therefore, according to the above figures that Canada would have 2,180 million bushels of wheat to sell in the five-year period, and that during the same period she probably would be able to market 2,080 million bushels of wheat, leaving a carry-over at the end of that time of only 100 million bushels.

It must be recalled that we had 280 million bushels of a carryover at the beginning of that crop year, and that we were on the upgrade in production. Most people did not believe that it was possible that we would be down to 100 million bushels of wheat by the end of the five-year period if the greater part of that period was taken up with war; but the statement was made, and I continued:

Moreover, if Canada continued to be able to sell 30 million bushels a year to those countries outside Europe—

And we can do that at the present time.

—which were not being blockaded, instead of there being a surplus of 100 million bushels at the end of the five-year period the demand for Canadian wheat would be 50 millions bushels greater than the supply.

Well, that is just about where we are. I went on to say:

I do not consider, therefore, that Canadian wheat producers need be pessimistic, but may I say again that there is nothing in these figures which should induce Canadian wheat growers to increase their acreage this year.

That was in 1941.

As a matter of fact there is very much in them upon which to ask farmers at least to go back to the acreage they had in the year previous to last year which was two million acres lower than the land sowed to grain last year.

The leader of the opposition suggested yesterday that the farmers are not prepared to accept the advice of the present government and went on to say that it was really the $4 an acre which induced them to reduce their wheat acreage and increase their summerfallow land. I do not care much which way he prefers to give the credit. Whichever way he gives the credit it comes to the government. The government offered the policy of paying $4 an acre to get land taken out of wheat and put into summerfallow. The farmer accepted the advice, and he not only took two million acres out of wheat as we suggested on this occasion, but took over six million acres out of wheat in 1941 and put a very great part of the land into summerfallow. Then in the following year, with the greatest acreage of summerfallow we have ever had in western Canada, 23 million acres or more, the farmers of western Canada reaped a crop of 560 million bushels of wheat, 500 million bushels of oats and between two and three hundred million bushels of barley. As a matter of fact the greatest crop that they have ever grown in western Canada.

That, Mr. Speaker, should be sufficient reason for believing that the wheat policy my hon. friend advocated back in 1916 was right, the policy advocated again in 1919 was just as right, and the only reason he is wrong now is that he is speaking politically instead of as an agriculturist.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is the minister speaking about the 1942 crop?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, which I think everyone admits is the best crop we have ever grown and is the year in which we had the largest acreage of summerfallow in wheat that we have ever had. That is the position which has been proven sound by the facts throughout the years in connection with agriculture on the western plains.

I submit again that I prefer to suggest to the farmers of western Canada that they accept the government's policy in connection with acreage in western Canada at the present time rather than the politically considered policy of the leader of the opposition.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

The policy which was suggested by the government is one which requires a little investigation because of the remarks made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell). In speaking to the address and in moving the amendment to the amendment which, incidentally expresses not only lack of confidence in the government but lack of confidence in the policy of the opposition because it wipes out the amendment completely, the leader of the C.C.F. party suggested that we should be planning. I submit to him that the policy to which I have already referred indicates that there has been some planning. That planning began prior to the war. The policy underlying the planning was given expression to in 1940. I submit that it was well outlined and that farmers have followed it almost to the letter in acreage from year to year, and they have got almost the identical results which we indicated they would obtain at that time if they followed that policy.

I quite agree that we ought to have planning, but I suggest to the leader of the C.C.F. party that when planning has been adopted as a part of the policy of the government, when it has been put into effect and has had the kind of results which planning during the last six years has had, the least that members of the opposition can do is to admit that there has been some success reached as a result of that planning.

In the first period from 1939 to 1943 we were following a certain line of policy which was suggested to us by the British who were expecting to obtain food from this country It had been suggested to us then that the facts were as they were stated in this house in other language by the leader of the opposition yesterday, namely, that it takes five to eight pounds of grain to produce a pound of meat, and that a pound of grain will keep an individual who is threatened with starvation alive as long as a pound of meat. Therefore the proper thing for them to do when threatened by blockade which might bring starvation is to produce cereals. The appeal made to us was that during the period when they were putting six million acres of land into cereals we might take land out of cereals and put the emphasis upon the production of meat. Therefore we took about ten million acres out of the production of cereals for human consumption and put it into summerfallow and those coarse grains and grasses that were necessary for the production of live stock products. What is the result? We reduced our wheat acreage from some twenty-nine million acres to under seventeen million acres, and we increased our production of live stock and live-stock products as well as grain in the amounts that have been suggested in the figures that I have given to this house.

That policy was carried on until the fall of 1943. Then a change was made. That change was announced in the setting of a price for grain very much higher than that which prevailed prior to the fall of 1943. The floor price of wheat was raised from ninety cents to $1.25. The price of oats was subsidized at ten cents a bushel; the price of barley was subsidized at fifteen cents a bushel, with the result that we had criticism from almost every hon. member on the other side of the house. They said that our hog production was bound to go down. Well, like my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who spoke a few moments ago, I can say that there are times when you have the facts and cannot give them to the house. There are times when you have the facts and cannot give them to the people of Canada or to the people of any particular country. We were still at war in 1943. In and following 1943 we had ministers coming here from Britain telling us that in the first and probably the second year after the war there would be greater difficulty in feeding the British people than there had been in the most difficult years of the war. They said the reason for that would be twofold; that they would be required to feed people on the continent of Europe, and that it would not be possible for them to retain in the British isles all the food their people would require unless they could get much greater production of the foods necessary to stave off starvation than they would be able to obtain under the policies followed up to that time.

As I say, in 1943 we were still at war. The further suggestion was made that the allies would be required to feed the people of the western portion of Europe, including most of the industrial areas; that the food for those sections must come largely from the continent of North America. So in 1943 we changed our attitude in the matter of production. We did not go to the conferences at that time and say, "Don't increase your wheat acreage any further." We went and offered a higher price for grain. I personally addressed twenty-five meetings in western Canada. I said, "We have been appealing to you to produce meat supplies. We are now coming to you and saying this. You can sell all the meat supplies you desire to produce between now and the end of the war and for a year or two after, at a price comparable with the price you are getting now." At the same time, however, I said, "We are giving you a price for grain which compares favourably with the price you are receiving for live stock products, and for the time being we are prepared to leave which you produce to the judgment of the farmers." We suggested that they might decide it on this basis. If a man had to have cash immediately he had better stay in live stock production. If he could afford to hold his grain for two or three years or more, then we had no objection to his going into the production of wheat.

Under that policy what happened? In two years—and the greater part of it in one year—the farmers increased their wheat acreage by over six million acres; they went back into the production of wheat to that extent. What I wish to point out to the house is that we did not wait until the end of the war; we did not wait until everyone over in Europe was shouting for more food, before we changed our policy from one of encouraging the intensive production of meat and dairy products to one of increasing the production of wheat. We started that policy in 1943, and as a result we were the one nation in the whole world to which all the other countries were coming to plead for some of the wheat we had conserved during the preceding war years. Why, at the beginning of this year we had still in our elevators some 258,000,000 bushels of wheat. In spite of the fact that we had a light crop last year because of difficult weather conditions, there is more wheat to market in 1946 than we marketed in any single year in the history of this country, prior to the last few years, since 1928. As a result, this year we are marketing to the people of the world an average of about a million bushels of wheat for each of the 365 days of the year. Of that wheat about 160,000,000 to 180,000,000 bushels are requested to feed the British people. Most of the remainder is going to those countries of Europe that are crying for more food.

I repeat that the plans which were laid down in 1940 and carried through in 1941, 1942 and 1943 resulted in the highest production of meat products and live stock products generally that we have ever had; and, in the last few years, have resulted in the highest production of cereals, including wheat for human consumption and cereals for the feeding of live stock. As a result the highest production of live stock itself that we have ever seen in the whole history of this country was produced in one year, 1944.

What is the situation, Mr. Speaker? In most of the last six years we have produced almost forty per cent more food, in tonnage, from the lands of Canada, than we have produced in any previous six-year period during the whole history of this country. In western Canada we have produced more than in any other six years. This is the land which in 1936 and 1937 I defended in this house against speakers on the opposition side who were saying we ought to move the population off it, that we could never again make this land produce as it had produced previously. In spite of all that was said during the drought period, however, in the last six years we have produced more tonnage on that land than was produced from it in any other six-year period.

What bearing has that upon the question which is before us tonight? All the exports of food products from the Dominion of Canada now have their origin directly or indirectly in that section of the country which a few years ago we were calling the drought area. All the wheat that goes out of this country comes from there. The greater part of the grain produced in other sections of the country, as, for example, Manitoba, would be consumed in this country in feed, in seed for the next year's crop, or in food for human consumption. The greater part of the wheat we have for export comes out of the area sometimes spoken of as the Palliser triangle. When we do not have a crop in that area we have very little wheat to export. When we have a crop in that area we have large quantities of wheat to export.

The same thing applies to live stock products in this country. If we produced no live stock other than what could be fed with feed grown on the farms of eastern Canada we would not produce enough live stock in this country to feed our own population. Out west we have lands on which we cannot carry live stock in any great numbers, but where we can produce grain to advantage. When we have good rains or when we summerfallow the land properly, we get a reasonable production in that area. It is almost exactly as the leader of the opposition said in his article back in 1919. If you summerfallow it you get thirty bushels to the acre. If you do not summerfallow it you get sixteen bushels to the acre. If you try to grow wheat on new breaking you will not get anything at all. That is correct; that is the experience we have had and are still having.

So we say that under this policy we not only increased our production of grain but also increased our production of live stock, not only in the area itself but by shipping the surplus feed grain to eastern Canada. We have paid the freight from Fort William to all over the east; we have given it to the eastern farmers under a ceiling price, and have asked them to feed it to live stock. Under that policy we produced more live stock and more cereals in Canada, I believe, than could have been produced under any other policy that might have been conceived.

Before closing, I wish to say a word about the wheat policy, as such. This is a matter which concerns my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) more directly than it concerns me. He has suggested, however, that I say something about it tonight, and I shall do so.

Our wheat policy has been criticized during this session. Our wheat policy has been criticized during other sessions. I have dealt with it in relation to the production of live stock products, and I think I have demonstrated that in the policy we are following we have produced the greatest possible volume of food.

I do not know whether the leader of the C.C.F. party had in mind this telegram when he spoke yesterday.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have never seen it.

Mr. GARDINER: Then I shall read it, so that my hon. friend will have full advantage of the information it contains. This telegram, under date of March 13, was addressed to me by the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan. This is what it says:

Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Ottawa, Ont.

Note meeting Combined Food Board Washington fourteenth. Growing pressure here for all out food production to meet world needs. We suggest each farmer produce to maximum consistent with good farm practice. Your reaction to above suggestion appreciated.

I. C. Nollett, Minister of Agriculture.

Well, I gave him my reactions, and I should like to put them upon Hansard. They are contained in my telegram of March 13, 1946, as follows:

Hon. I. C. Nollett, Minister of Agriculture, Regina, Sask.

Re tel Dominion Department of Agriculture acting on advice from the dominion-provincial conference has been advising farmers across Canada each December since 1939 how to produce to maximum consistent with good farm practice. Following this plan we encouraged increased live stock production until 1944. In Sept. 1943 we began encouraging wheat production by increasing advance from ninety cents to a dollar twenty-five a bushel. This was done in anticipation of the present situation and was so stated at the time. We have continued in this policy in spite of criticism of reduced hog production until wheat acreage has increased by seven million acres. We are now considering three to five year agreements with Britain which necessitate production of other farm commodities as well as wheat. We consider that following the recommendations of last December will result in maximum production consistent with good farm practice.

James G. Gardiner.

In other words, we have said that we believe that the farmer will get the maximum of production not only this year, but for the three or four years with which we are concerned tonight, and not only of wheat but of all essential food products.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since I have heard the telegrams may I say I have not seen either of them.

Mr. GARDINER: It is so nearly what my hon. friend was trying to say this afternoon that I thought probably he did see it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said it; I was not "trying" to say it.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, you said it.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister let me have a copy of that telegram.

Mr. GARDINER: It will be in Hansard tomorrow. I have not an extra copy.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like to have it tonight.

Mr. GARDINER: Then my hon. friend may have this copy when I have finished with it.

The position, then, is this, that we believe this country has done all that has been expected of it; indeed, something more than has been expected of it. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, we have had very kind messages from Great Britain. We have had very kind expressions of opinion from France. We have had very kind expressions of opinion from most of the countries. As a matter of fact, Holland and Belgium have released, for France, some of the grain they were getting from this country, because they believe that they were supplied with more than they actually needed. That was done in order to assist France.

In other words, we believe that, up to date, we have followed a right policy in asking our people to produce wheat from greater acreages during the last two years than previously. But we believe, too, that to go any farther in the matter of taking land out of summerfallow, in order that we might put more land into wheat, would be a mistake. Let me indicate why I think that. We are asking the farmers this year to put in approximately 24 million acres of wheat. This means that they must put in five million acres more than we have in summerfallowed land. In other words, they must put in all the summerfallow of last year amounting to 19,300,000 acres; and then they must put in another five million acres which have not been summerfallowed. That is land which had a crop on it last year.

Land cropped last year can be cropped again this year in certain areas. It can be done in Manitoba. It can be done in the northern part of Saskatchewan and in certain areas of Alberta. But I am sure hon. members from western Canada will agree that in our areas where we have strip farming, and in areas where we are carrying out dry farming, such a practice is neither advisable nor can it be carried out under the plan which is followed there. They summerfallow half their land—not a third, not a quarter, but half of it. Under the plan which they follow it would be impossible for them to change satisfactorily, even it it would give better results in 1946.

But I think we are all agreed that in areas of that kind better results would not be obtained. So what we are suggesting is that in certain areas they put five million acres of land, or approximately that, into wheat crop which was not summerfallowed last year. And then we say, "Try to summerfallow this year about twenty million acres, or an area similar to what you summerfallowed last year." We believe that if they do that we shall get the best results, not only in the production of cereals but in the production of live stock products; and that we shall get those results not only in western Canada, but in the eastern part of Canada as well, and not only in 1946 but throughout the three or four years referred to in the speech from the throne.

I wish to repeat what I said this afternoon, namely, that there is no intention on the part of this government, nor is there any intention on the part of the British government to ask farmers to take a lower return for these farm products including wheat at any time during the years 1946, 1947 and 1948 than they are getting by way of price to-day.

I would suggest that there is a possibility of agreements being concluded within the next two or three days in which the return by way of price—I do not necessarily mean the return by every means—will probably be higher than it has been in any of the years of war.

With that information in hand I hope the farmers of this country will follow the advice given by the dominion-provincial conference which met last fall, with all the information I have given the house before them, and produce, as we believe they can under that policy, the greatest quantity of food products it is possible to produce on the farms of Canada.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, for a number of reasons I will not follow the suggestion that has been made that at this late hour I should ask your permission to move the adjournment of the debate. One of those reasons is that I believe we should make use of all the time we possibly can to facilitate the business of the house. The suggestion has been thrown out in previous sessions as well as in this one that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne should be curtailed, although the leaders and a number of front-benchers would be able to take part in it. I am absolutely opposed to any idea like that. I believe in the time-honoured custom of having the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the budget debate provide opportunities to back-benchers to bring to the attention of parliament and the people as a whole the problems of their constituencies and those in whom they are interested.

Rather than have these two important debates curtailed, I would make the suggestion that instead of their being curtailed we could well convene earlier in the day in view of the fact that no committees are as yet sitting. Also the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne could be carried on without us all being here. To ask us later on to sit morning, noon and night when we must attend committee meetings, to ask us to rush business through in the last hours of the session is something that I have always opposed.

If I may be so bold, I should like to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) upon the speech he has just made. Regardless of whether a person agrees with him, I think he is always interesting to listen to. While his speech always sounds good when you are sitting here, when you read it next morning in Hansard you begin to wonder just what it was all about. Then, when you get out into the country and hear different versions of it you begin to wonder which speech the minister gave.

While I agree with some of the things stated by the minister; while I agree that at certain times and under certain conditions summer-fallowing is good husbandry, I must say that under the circumstances such as those in which we now find ourselves, as my hon. leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), said yesterday, we need to take some risks.

I may deal with some of these matters later on, but while there is yet time this evening I should like to deal with one part of the minister's address. With his usual ability to defend his policies of years gone by he took a considerable amount of credit to himself and to the government for that wonderful crop that we raised during the year to which he referred. Far be it from me to take away from him any little bit of credit he has coming to him; I am still old-fashioned enough to want to give to the Lord a little credit for having sent us the most wonderful weather we have had for many a long year.

May I on this occasion join with those who have preceded me in congratulating the hon. member who moved the address in reply (Mr. Viau) and the hon. member who seconded it (Mr. Winters). Both of them did credit to themselves and to the constituencies they represent by performing such a difficult task in such an able manner, especially in view of the fact that the subject material, the speech from the throne, gave them very little to work on. In my humble opinion it would have been much more appropriate and to the point to move an address congratulating His Excellency upon the high sense of duty which caused him to read a speech that displayed such a bankruptcy of ideas on the part of his ministers.

It has been my privilege to listen to quite a number of speeches of one kind and another from the throne, but never before have I heard one that displayed such callous indifference to the needs of the people, that showed such a lack of proposals to solve their problems. The greater part of the speech should be rewritten because as it is it is meaningless; it suggests nothing; it departs from the time-honoured custom of forecasting legislation. The remainder of it should be framed as the farewell message of His Excellency.

During the six years of war many members on this side of the house refrained from severe criticism of the government. Possibly we erred on the side of leniency, but we did not want to do anything that might possibly interfere with the war effort. Many times suggestions made in good faith were disregarded. During the session of last fall I for one took the stand that on the basis of certain promises the electors of this country, may I say for better or worse, had returned the government to office and therefore the government should be given an opportunity to wind up the business that had been left unfinished at the time of dissolution and to prepare their plans to fulfil their promises. But look at the speech from the throne, as barren as the minds that conceived it.

For my part the truce is over; the gloves are off. I would be unworthy of the trust placed in me by the great majority of the people I have the honour to represent were I to remain silent any longer. When I think of those who died so that the rest of us could continue to live our way of life; when I think of those who were fortunate enough to return, and when I think of the hard work and the suffering and the sacrifices made by the vast majority of them, I would be neglectful of my duty if I did not protest against the inadequacy of the government's methods of dealing with our many problems, especially in view of the fact that during the past year and more we have been urging the government to prepare for the needs of peace. But the government has been so deaf to our warnings, so determined to follow its own course, which apparently was the line of least resistance, that it now finds itself unprepared to meet the problems which confront us and which have confronted us during the past six months or more. Those problems are becoming worse at an alarming rate. Thousands of our people are drifting back to the conditions which they had to endure during the 1930's.

The capitalist system—

Mr. MacNICOL: Do not blame the capitalist system. Blame it on the government.

Mr. BURTON: The capitalist system of so-called free enterprise failed the people before the war; it failed the nation during the time of war, and it will inevitably bring disaster to the people and to the nation unless we hasten to replace it before it breaks down completely with a system of social democracy which will give us economic democracy as well as political democracy, a system that will serve the needs of the people and the nation instead of the whims and insatiable desires of the few.

I pause for a moment to refer to something which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the leader of the Social Credit party said this afternoon. He is reported in the Evening Citizen to have said, and it is headlined "Social Credit or Communism is His Thesis":

> There is no other alternative for the future; it is social credit or communism.

I am convinced that there is a middle way between those two. He went on to say:

> From now on capitalism and free enterprise must compete with communism.

I am also informed that he said that Christian democracy was synonymous with free enterprise, and if I am misquoting him I hope he will correct me. May I point out to him that there are many Christians who believe that private enterprise should not be allowed to dominate and exploit the people.

Mr. LOW: Hear, hear; I believe that.

Mr. BURTON: I could give him quotations from leaders of many religious denominations along that very line, but I shall give only one with which I am familiar:

> It is rightfully contended that certain forms of property must be reserved to the state since they carry with them the opportunity for domination too great to be left in the hands of private individuals without injury to the community at large.

Mr. IRVINE: Who said that?

Mr. BURTON: His holiness the late Pope Pius XI in Quadragesimo Anno. I draw attention to that, Mr. Speaker, because there are so many abuses and terrible things committed under the capitalistic system that those of us who know what is going on cannot as Christians continue to tolerate those conditions and the things that brought them about. I have always been anxious to give every hon. gentleman a chance to stand for the things in which he believed, but I contend that when we have conditions as grave as we have had for years under the capitalist system, when we have the suffering and the privation and the want that we have had, surely those who are trying to find a better way, a middle way, should not always be sniped at. I have said that the capitalist system has failed us in the past. Do I need to bring any proof of that? If so, I call on the million or more of those who were on relief in this country in the so-called hungry thirties. I call on those who were in the soup-kitchen lines. I call on those who were dispossessed of their life savings, and on those who were dispossessed of their homes. Do I need to bring any more proof? Then I would remind the house of the 42 per cent of our young men who in the early days of the war were rejected for military service because of physical disabilities most of which were brought on by malnutrition during those depression years.

On motion of Mr. Burton the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 20, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

WHEAT

INITIAL PAYMENT, 1946-47 PROGRAMME—PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement in connection with wheat.

The government will continue the present initial payment of $1.25 per bushel basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver for another crop year up to July 31, 1947. There will be no over-all restriction on the deliveries of wheat during 1946-47, although temporary delivery quotas will probably be used in the early part of the marketing season to distribute local elevator space as evenly as possible among the producers. Delivery permit books will be used again.

Discussions are continuing with regard to other items in the 1946-47 grain programme, and further announcements will be made as decisions are reached. These announcements will include the prices to be paid for oats, barley, flaxseed, rapeseed and sunflower seed in the western provinces and for winter wheat grown in Ontario and marketed in 1946-47.

To cover one of the points in the new food programme, a statement will also be made soon on the procedure to be followed in an effort to expedite the delivery of wheat in western Canada. This will be along the lines of encouraging immediate delivery of wheat.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. McCuaig) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) have advised me that they purpose asking questions today with regard to the payments on the participation certificates for the 1943-44 wheat crop. I have this statement ready and I am taking advantage of this opportunity to make it. I believe it will at least cover, as far as I am able to do so at this moment, the information sought by these hon. members.

The payments on the participation certificates for the 1943-44 wheat crop will be started by the Canadian wheat board in June of this year. The 1944-45 barley equalization payments will be made in the month of May. Both of these payments apply to the prairie provinces. The payments on the 1944-45 Ontario wheat equalization fund will begin in May.

While the accounting and auditing on these payments are well advanced, it is not possible at this date to announce the amount of each payment to be made. That announcement will be made just as soon as possible.

May I also take this opportunity to state that I am fully aware of the anxiety existing, particularly in certain parts of western Canada, for the earliest possible payment of these wheat participation certificates. The hon. member for Maple Creek asked if it would not be possible to select the most needy areas in western Canada for prepayment. We have discussed that suggestion with the wheat board, and have been advised that it is not possible to make payments in one district in advance of the general payment across western Canada, but that when payments are being made in June it will be possible to make the first cheques payable in those particular districts. The matter of getting out these payments is purely a physical one, a matter of staff and space.

Mr. BRACKEN: The question I sent the minister a while ago was prompted by the urgent requests of those interested in the matter. I gather from the minister that the dates he has mentioned are the earliest at which it is practicable to have the payments made. In that event I suppose we shall have to accept the situation, and I want to thank the minister for giving us this information.

VETERANS LAND ACT

PRIORITIES AND DISCOUNTS FOR FARM MACHINERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough) asked a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, as follows:

> In view of the urgency of increasing agricultural production and of the early and satisfactory reestablishment of veterans on farms, would the minister give immediate consideration to allowing veterans not coming under the Veterans Land Act, but who wish to become bona fide farmers, the same priorities and discounts for farm machinery as those who now come under the Veterans Land Act?

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has no control of farm machinery which is not purchased for the use of veterans being established under the Veterans Land Act. In the early months of 1945 arrangements were put into effect whereby a certificate of identification was provided by the Veterans Land Act administration to establish the agricultural bona fides and service with the armed forces of persons not being established under the provisions of the Veterans Land Act. The farm implement industry undertook to give preferred treatment to veterans in possession of such certificates. According to my information this undertaking has been implemented as far as available supplies and farming machinery would permit.

Discounts available to veterans being established under the Veterans Land Act derive from bulk orders placed by the director of the Veterans Land Act many months prior to delivery dates and are direct sales to the government.

Discounts to veterans not being established under the Veterans Land Act are solely at the discretion of the implement industry but it is the information of the director of the Veterans Land Act that many implement dealers have in fact granted discounts to veterans in possession of certificates issued by the Veterans Land Act administration.

According to present indications the farm tractor equipment ordered by the director for delivery in the spring of 1946 will be insufficient to meet requirements of veterans being established under the act this year. Consequently it is very unlikely that any such equipment can be released by the director for other disposition by the machinery companies.

MAPLE PRODUCTS

RATIONING AND PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked if there was any chance of the government easing the rationing of maple syrup or maple products in order that production might be increased.

The answer is that there is no intention of removing maple syrup from the ration this season. This decision is supported by recommendations for the continuance of rationing and other controls which have been received from the representatives of the maple syrup producers and processors. As in previous years, the coupon value of maple syrup has been doubled for the duration of the active producing season; in other words, until May 31 maple syrup can be procured at the rate of one gallon for two sugar-preserves coupons. The ration regulations for 1946 will leave the producers and consumers in the same position as in 1945.

There is no indication that the ration regulations have curtailed or will curtail production.

CANADIAN ARMY

POLICY IN CONNECTION WITH WEARING OF KILTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LESLIE A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence; I did not have an opportunity to give him notice. Will the minister assure the Canadian people that it is not proposed to abolish the practice of the wearing of the kilt in the Canadian army?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I realize, Mr. Speaker, that this is a question of urgent public importance. Personally I would very much regret it if the wearing of the kilt were to be abolished. The answer to my hon. friend's question is that the wearing of the kilt will continue to be autnorized for walking out purposes, but that, as in the other arms of the service, battle dress will be worn for operational duties.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment last night I was referring to how badly the capitalist system had failed us in the years prior to the war, and to the fact that eventually it would break down completely and lead the people of the nation to inevitable disaster. I also stated that we did not have to go to the extreme right or to the extreme left, but that there was a middle way. Should there be any doubt in the minds of hon. members as to the path I intend to follow, let me hasten to assure them that I have always believed in moderation in all things. With that same thought in mind, thousands of people from all parts of Canada banded themselves together under the banner of the C.C.F., which they themselves wove. Together they planned and are continuing to plan that middle way, step by step. Their ultimate goal is the common brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God.

I also said there was no hope of the capitalist system serving us properly in the future. Apparently, by its attitude, the government does not believe that. Again I could bring many witnesses to prove my case. However, time permits only the calling of one, and that, by the way is a friend of the government. I should like to quote from a pamphlet issued by the Canadian federation of agriculture, entitled "Principles of post-war reconstruction for agriculture" in which they quote Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, as having said:

> Selfish and private interests must be ruled out completely and the competitive system must be replaced with one which is based entirely upon the criterion of maximum production . . .

While I have this pamphlet in my hand I should like to continue and quote what the Canadian federation of agriculture had to say on the same page:

We do not believe that we can ever again rely on the automatic processes (of what was in the thirties erroneously termed a "free competitive" market) to establish fair economic returns and security for primary producers. Such automatic processes broke down hopelessly in the depression years, and are now almost completely discarded as incapable of the supreme test of wartime conditions.

And later on the federation has this to say:

Having failed us in these two periods it would in all probability be disastrous to risk the return to such automatic processes for the post-war period, which promises to be the third and not the least of a series of national emergencies.

During the first world war we heard the slogan repeated over and over, "Make Canada a fit place for heroes to live in." Well, Mr. Speaker, ask those who went under the old soldier settlement scheme. Ask those who stood in the soup kitchen lines. Ask those who lived in the jungles which formed the suburbs of almost every town and city from one end of Canada to the other.

What is in store for the veterans of this war? Well, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) may say that things are not yet as bad as they were after the other war. The speech from the throne had this to say:

Every effort is being made to ensure the orderly reestablishment of veterans in civil life.

To complete consideration of the "veterans charter" you will be asked to reconstitute the special committee on veterans affairs.

Well, Mr. Speaker, isn't that fine! At least it seems that way on paper. But I suggest to you that you ask the thousands of veterans who find it difficult, if not impossible, to become reestablished.

It had not been my intention to discuss veterans affairs in this debate. However, after reading that part of the speech from the throne I have just quoted, I could not help raising my voice on behalf of the veterans in my constituency, many of whom are not receiving a square deal.

Nor had it been my intention to deal with the housing problem. But here is another gem in the speech from the throne which I cannot pass by:

Special efforts are being made to expand the supply of building materials to meet the demand for permanent housing, and, meanwhile, to provide emergency shelter. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been established. Its activities are being closely coordinated with those of Wartime Housing Limited and the Veterans Land Act administration, with a view to having all matters relating to the construction of housing brought, as largely as possible, under the administration of one minister of the crown.

[Mr. Burton.]

Under one minister!—well, Mr. Speaker, that minister may be quite an umbrella, but I am certain that many of our people would rather be under a roof.

I now find it my duty to discuss a problem which is so serious, and about which so little, if anything, has been done, that the government, despite all its twisting and turning, will not be able to avoid the condemnation it so fully deserves. Let me quote one sentence from the first paragraph in the speech from the throne:

Hunger, privation and suffering, have become the lot of millions.

During the war our government, in words to this effect, kept telling the British people, "Go to it, Tommy; keep on fighting and we will see that no one starves while your fields and factories are put to other uses." We in Canada live in a country which is not only the bread-basket of the empire but also its pork barrel. Furthermore, the government kept repeating to peoples of the European continent, "Throw off the yoke of Hitlerism, and we will feed you." It told the world, time after time, that food was the greatest weapon for peace, and that we had an abundance of it. But now they tell us that hunger, privation and suffering has become the lot of millions. That brings me to the reduction programme defended last night by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. GARDINER: I did not mention any reduction programme. I indicated there has been a programme for increased food production throughout the war and that programme is continuing.

Mr. BURTON: At the same time the minister went to great pains and attempted to take great credit for what he had done in the past. I would agree that he deserves some little credit, but would suggest that there are others who deserve a lot more.

In connection with the reduction programme I think I should tell a little story—and it is a true story. For years it had been my practice every spring to buy four cans of gopher poison to be distributed so as to prevent those rodents from destroying too much of my crop. This spring, when the announcement of the reduction programme was made, I had already secured my four cans. The customary procedure is to mix a spoonful of the poison with some wheat or oats, leaving it in places where the gophers may find and eat it. That is the end of the gophers and they do not destroy any further crop. I had laid out one can of the poison, after which for some reason or other I had to go to town. While in town I ran smack up against a poster on which were these words, "Less wheat in 1941 will help win the war." This, it states, was published by the authority of the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, federal Minister of Agriculture. You know, when I returned home I simply did not have the heart to lay out those other three cans of gopher poison. For a while I rebelled at the idea of reduction; as a tiller of the soil it went against my grain to think that less of anything in the nature of food could be a blessing. Eventually however, like thousands of other farmers, I fell into line.

To-day, reading these words in the speech from the throne, that hunger, privation and suffering have become the lot of millions, the few dollars gained by reduction of wheat acreage remind me of the thirty pieces of silver. To the extent that I benefited from the minister's ill advice, just to that extent I accept my share of the responsibility. But may I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that for several years my colleagues and I endeavoured to warn the Minister of Agriculture, and the government to which he belongs, of the crisis that is now confronting us. If time permitted I could quote speeches made in the house—yes, even back to the time I sat in the Saskatchewan legislature. But our warnings went unheeded. From time to time the minister even attempted to ridicule us for our fears, and made light of our suggestions.

Let me quote further from the speech from the throne:

> Of world problems demanding immediate action, the most pressing is the provision of food to those peoples facing acute shortage and, in some regions, widespread famine.
> The chance of a peaceful reconstruction of the world depends on food. The shortage at the present time is very great. The problem, moreover, is not only for the next few months, but also for the next few years. Unless the need is met, grave disorders, endangering peace itself, must be anticipated.
> The government is seeking by all practicable means to make available for export the maximum supply of foodstuffs. Every encouragement is being given to increasing production. The gravity of the situation demands, on the part of the people of Canada, a united and whole-hearted effort.

Let me call special attention to that last sentence, and emphasize the necessity of a united and whole-hearted effort. I agree with that in full, and I can assure the government, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, and I believe on behalf of the great majority of the producers of foodstuffs, that there will be whole-hearted cooperation on their part.

The preceding paragraph in the speech from the throne states that every encouragement is being given to increasing production. That is so far from the truth that were I to repeat what most farmers have to say about it, my language would certainly not be parliamentary. Suffice it to say that instead of every encouragement being given to us to increase production, quite the contrary is the fact. So vital is this question that I should like to place on the record a resolution which was passed unanimously on the seventh of this month by the Saskatchewan legislature. It reads:

> That this legislative assembly of Saskatchewan pledge the support of the people of Saskatchewan to the hungry peoples of the world in the vital battle of bread now being fought, and request the governments of Saskatchewan and Canada, respectively, to make a special effort to increase production of foodstuffs to meet this emergency, and to encourage the utilization of the adequate farm labour supply now made available through demobilization of the armed forces, members of which are only too anxious to work in this new and important battle.

Furthermore I would add that the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture, Hon. I. C. Nollett and his department are going all out on an increased production programme. They believe in displaying some action, not just merely using words. The only action that counts at a time like this is to make it possible for the farmers to produce every pound of foodstuffs that their farms are capable of producing. Should there be any one so deaf to the cries of the hungry, permit me to read again these few lines:

> Of world problems demanding immediate action, the most pressing is the provision of food—

And again:

> Hunger, privation and suffering, have become the lot of millions.

The only worth-while action that can be taken to meet the situation is an all-out production programme, but if the farmers are to accomplish the task before them they must have more just and equitable treatment than they have had as a rule in the past. We realize also that if the farmers are to win this battle of food they must have the protection of a long-range programme. What do the farmers want in such a long-range programme? I have numbered their desires as follows, but not necessarily in order of preference.

1. An over-all agricultural policy that will give stability to the various branches of that industry in all parts of the country.

2. Adequate floor prices with a proper relationship between the different products they have to sell.

3. Prices for all farm products must bear a fair relationship between them and the cost of the things the farmers need to buy.

4. The right to negotiate from time to time, through their respective boards and organizations, the adjustment of prices for their commodities so that they will at all times receive a fair share of the national income.

To meet the needs of the present and to give to the farmers that sense of security and stability which they so urgently require, I suggest the following:

(a) The encouragement by the government of an all-out production programme to help raise the nutritional standard of the Canadian people and do our full share in helping to feed the people of Britain and war-ravaged countries in Europe.

(b) A dominion marketing act to establish commodity marketing boards under producer and consumer control, with power to regulate the assembling, transporting, grading and processing of live stock products, fruit, dairy products, poultry products, et cetera.

(c) Present ceiling prices plus any subsidies at present in effect to be the floor price on all farm products for the next ten year period, unless changing conditions warrant an increase or decrease after proper negotiations by the respective boards.

(d) Abolition of the Winnipeg grain exchange; the continuation of the Canadian wheat board, and the inclusion of coarse grains under the act.

(e) Amendment to the Income War Tax Act so that the farmer, his wife and children shall not be penalized for their long hours of toil.

(f) Prevention of regional discrimination such as the recent increase in the price of petroleum products in the west.

(g) Amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in order to make it a dominion-wide crop insurance act which will cover all types of agriculture.

I should like to deal with each of these points, but I see my time is going by. A number of my colleagues will deal at greater length with the different points I have laid down. I should like to refer, however, to the last one, the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to all parts of Canada, with regional branches giving special attention to soil conservation. In this connection I should like to quote what the president of the Canadian federation of agriculture had to say about soil conservation:

> Since the soil is the basis of all food production it is the greatest national asset we have. The security, not only of those who till the soil, but of all the people, depends upon how well it is cared for, and how widely it is used. Therefore, a programme of security for agriculture in the post-war years must, of necessity, include a long-range programme for soil conservation.
> Such a programme will be given its proper place in our national economy when it is generally recognized that money spent to save the soil should not be regarded as a subsidy to the farmer but as a national investment for present and future generations.

The problems of agriculture are of such importance that no time must be lost in solving them. The standard of living in this country depends upon the tiller of the soil. While that has been true in the past, never has so much depended on a proper solution of these problems. When hunger, privation and suffering have become the lot of millions, we realize that every effort must be made to remove the handicaps which prevent the farmers from properly fulfilling the mission of their noble calling, namely, the feeding of the human race. I have no hesitation in saying that the adoption of the proposals I have just made would be a big step forward in helping the farmers to take their proper place in our national economy. Too long have the farmers of this country been discriminated against. Too long have they been exploited. As never before they are determined to see to it that they receive a fair share of our national income, that they be allowed to take their right place in our national life.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish to join with previous speakers in expressing regret at the departure of Lord Athlone and the Princess Alice and to express my appreciation of the work that they did while here. As Minister of Munitions and Supply perhaps I saw a side of their activities that others may have overlooked. They were tireless visitors to war plants. I can say that walking through a war plant is a tiresome business. I have done it occasionally, but the governor general and his gracious consort visited almost every war plant in Canada at least once. Their visits invariably resulted in an inspiration both to the management and to the workers, and had a great deal to do with the pleasant relations that were maintained in the war plants of this country. I am sure every Canadian feels a sense of loss at their departure and we all wish them good health and happiness in the future.

I should like to say a word of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was not in the house when their speeches were made but I have read them with great interest.

To-day I wish to speak particularly with regard to the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) to the effect that reconversion had bogged down and that the labour situation in Canada to-day is similar to that of the early 1930's. It has always been a mystery to me why members of the opposition feel that, in describing the present and future situation in this country, they must invariably picture both in a gloomy light. I have listened to speeches in this house predicting wide-spread unemployment, not only after the war, but during the war. I have never heard anyone express the hope and expectation that after the war we would have reasonable employment conditions in this country.

The first two or three years of the war were occupied by parliamentary committees sitting continuously devising public works in great numbers which could be put into construction immediately after the war to take up the inevitable unemployment that would come at that time. In 1943 I ventured to make a prediction of my own. Speaking before the Canadian club in Toronto I predicted that this vast accumulation of public works would not be needed. I pointed out that every returned man would not be a construction man. I pointed out that the expansion that was taking place in industry would find means of absorbing war workers and the returned men without excessive resort to public works. I was accused by a very large portion of the press of Canada of being a super-optimist. I was called an optimist at first, and then I was promoted to super-optimist. I never was as optimistic as the present position would justify.

I have recently made a trip to the Pacific coast, the first time I have been there in more than six years. I used to live in western Canada. I lived there, and practised my profession there, for some twenty-five years. I have lived in Saskatoon, Calgary, Vancouver, Regina and for many years in Port Arthur. I have seen western Canada in good times and in bad times, and I think I know what good times look like and what bad times look like in that country. But I have never seen western Canada in the state of prosperity in which it is to-day. I tried to meet in my travels a fair cross-section of each of the communities I visited, and I came away from western Canada convinced for the first time that perhaps our efforts toward reconstruction are meeting their objective.

There is a good deal of work in reconstruction that does not meet the eye. When V-E day came there was a cut-back of about thirty-five per cent in munitions production, so that we could have a more or less gradual change-over from war to peace production in certain of our manufacturing plants. But on V-J day there was a complete cut-off of all war contracts except in the few cases where examination indicated that there would be more salvage value by completing production than in cutting it off. Before a war plant can change over to a peace-time plant, many things must happen. The surplus inventories in the plant must be moved. An adjustment must be made on the contract. There must be a cut-off and an adjustment made of the amount due the contractor and proper means found of paying the contractor. Those adjustments relate to several thousand contracts and the work involved is tremendous. I worked fairly hard during the war years, but I never worked as hard in my life as I have in the period since V-J day, and I think that is true of the staff of my department.

The termination of the contracts is handled by the contracts settlement board. It has a large staff. That staff goes into each factory, makes a rough determination of the amount due, arranges for immediate payment for a portion of it so that the contractor can have funds to start his reconversion work, and then follows that up with auditors who make the final adjustment. In the course of that adjustment the profits that have been made by the operation are studied and, if the profits seem excessive, a renegotiation is undertaken. That may seem a minor operation, but I can say to hon. members that these renegotiations to date have resulted in a recovery to the crown of some $365,000,000, of which about thirty per cent represents money that would not have been recovered through taxation in the ordinary course.

The custody of surplus materials from war plants, as well as the custody of all war materials surplus to the requirements of the armed forces, is handled by War Assets Corporation. That corporation is responsible for movement of materials out of the plants, for holding custody of government-owned machinery and equipment, and for disposing of that equipment in a way that will make the maximum contribution to the cause of reconversion. About 4,000 men are now engaged in the custody of equipment, in moving equipment out of plants and arranging for storage, and in guarding the equipment pending its sale. The total staff of War Assets Corporation, including the custodian branch, now exceeds 5,000 men and women. That staff has been built up within a very short time. The task of War Assets Corporation really began shortly before V-J day and is growing in size as each day passes. To date

War Assets Corporation has sold goods which have netted the crown over $100,000,000, a recovery for account of war expenditures. The work is just getting well under way. Sales are stepping up each month. Last month they were $17,000,000 and this month they will considerably exceed that figure.

There has been some criticism of individual transactions of War Assets Corporation. I think that was bound to be the case. To find a civilian use for a product built for war is not simple. When we consider the vast diversity of materials that passed through War Assets Corporation I think no one will be inclined to be too critical of individual transactions if it can be shown that by and large the policies of the corporation are sound and that the work is being honestly conducted. The cost of storage and handling of the material that was removed from war plants is enormous. It is greatly to the advantage of the crown to get those assets into private hands and into private use as rapidly as possible, and the activities of the corporation are governed with that thought in mind.

Rather a significant thing has happened recently. The United States government has tried several methods of disposing of war assets. About three months ago they scrapped all their disposal procedures and set up the exact machinery which we are using in Canada, stating quite frankly that they did so because they thought our machinery worked where theirs did not. Therefore the disposal agency in the United States is now the War Assets Corporation, exactly the same name and exactly the same type of organization that we are using here in Canada.

We now come to the labour situation. We must, I think, look at the labour situation from the background of six years of war, when about fifty per cent of all those receiving an income in this country obtained their income directly or indirectly from war expenditures. On June 1, 1944, which marked the peak of the war programme, there were in the armed forces 784,000 persons, and in direct war industry, 1,055,000 persons, making a total of 1,839,000 persons who derived their income from war expenditures and whose occupation would end when the war ended. As I have said, between V-E day and V-J day there was a cut-back in war contracts, and about 300,000 men and women were returned to private industry. From V-J day to the end of February discharges from the armed forces have numbered 420,000, while the decrease in the numbers employed in non-agricultural war industry has amounted to approximately 500,000. In total, close to a million people have given up their war-time occupations since V-J day. Over the same period the number of unplaced applicants registered in employment offices has risen from a low of 75,000 to a maximum of 263,000 at the end of February, a net increase of 188,000. It is therefore apparent that close to 800,000 persons have found employment, or have voluntarily withdrawn themselves from the labour market. It was only in January and February that there was some increase in the number of unplaced applicants. These are the months in which there is normally a seasonal contraction in employment in Canada. Hon. members will know that there are great numbers of people in this country who have never made it a practice to work in the winter months. Those engaged in transportation along the St. Lawrence river and the great lakes have been accustomed to work in the season of open navigation and not to work seriously in the winter months. We all know that a great many people on the prairies have been accustomed to seek the cities or the climate of British Columbia during the winter months. In the old days that movement was automatic: these people did not expect to work and did not work, and that was all there was to it. Today, for many reasons, they register as unemployed. They must do that to obtain their unemployment insurance benefits. So that seasonal unemployment today is more conspicuous than it was before the war, but it is the same type of unemployment now as then.

Discharges from the armed services in these two months stood at 57,000 in January and 65,000 in February. During January the number of unemployed increased by 45,000, and during February by 30,000. With the turn in the seasonal trend of activity, an improvement in this condition has already become evident. As between the first and last week of February the weekly rate of increase in unemployed has dropped from 10,000 to 4,000. During the first week in March the number of unplaced applicants has actually shown a decline, although this does not necessarily mean that the high point in unemployment has been passed. It does mean, however, that we have come through the most difficult period of the year with fewer unemployed than we had anticipated or had any right to anticipate.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister permit a question? I do not like to interrupt him.

Mr. HOWE: No, no.

Mr. LOCKHART: I would just like to ask him—

Mr. HOWE: The absorption of veterans and war workers has been facilitated by a steady process of reconversion. A survey of plants previously engaged in war production indicates as of March 1 that, of those faced with a reconversion problem, slightly over half had now completed the reconversion process. Of the remainder, fifty per cent expected the process to be complete in six months, and seventy-five per cent by the end of the year. Apart from reconversion work some forty-five per cent of the plants have completed or are undertaking modernization or expansion programmes. Of this group, only a small proportion—ten per cent—have already completed their programme, while around sixty per cent anticipate completion of their expansion work by the end of 1946. The foregoing would indicate that a very considerable volume of employment is still to come from reconversion and expansion which have not yet been completed.

There is, in addition, an impressive number of new establishments coming into operation to produce for the peace-time market. Numerous firms still report shortages of tools, equipment, materials and skilled labour as factors which are temporarily retarding production and employment. While increased employment in manufacturing can henceforth be anticipated with the continued progress of reconversion and the normal seasonal upswing, even greater proportional increases can be expected in construction, agriculture, transportation and some of the service trades. With the unprecedented demand for consumption and investment goods in Canada, together with the urgent food and material requirements of other countries, the number still to be discharged from the services—some 220,000 at March 1—should be readily absorbed, while steady reduction in the number unemployed can be anticipated once the spring and summer expansion gets fully under way.

So far as the present labour situation is concerned, if it is an unhealthy situation I do not think the people of this country are aware of it. Certainly in western Canada I saw no indications of unemployment; I was told that there were people unemployed; but I was told frequently that a large number of employers were short of men and unable to obtain the class of men that they required.

The shift of men back to peace-time employment is as difficult as was the mobilizing of man-power for war. Many of the skills used in war time are abolished. For example, we had over 100,000 people in aircraft production; today, I suppose, the employment in that industry numbers less than 10,000. To employ those men at equivalent wages means retraining. We are very short of men in the construction trades, and the training schools of the Department of Labour are devoting a great deal of attention to training men for that industry. A great retraining programme is going on, and only as that programme proceeds can we step up industries such as the construction industry, which has an unlimited field of activity and which must be expanded greatly to fulfil the requirements of the reconstruction period.

We have greatly expanded industrial production in Canada during the war years. The government itself spent $730 million in building new war plants during the war period. At the same time private industry spent $500 million in building plants of the same type for the same purpose. A great deal of fear was expressed that the end of the war would find empty factories. Nothing of the kind is occurring. Instead of its being said that wartime expansion is sufficient, industry is still continuing to expand.

In the fall of 1944 provision was made for the encouragement of further reconversion expansion by granting double depreciation to those who made capital expenditures of a type promising substantial industrial employment during the years 1945 and 1946. Those applications are filed for approval with the Department of Reconstruction. The result has been that to date about $270 million worth of industrial expansion has been filed for approval to be completed in the years 1945 and 1946. These projects are now under construction. The very much larger employment that will emerge when the plants are completed and in operation is before us.

For a time I was pleased with the rate of expansion. To-day I am rather alarmed by it. It seems to me that the expansion is coming too rapidly and that we shall face an insoluble problem of shortages of material as well as shortages of man-power when the programme now under way comes into full production.

The work of reconstruction is being helped in a number of ways through a number of agencies of the department. One of the most important is the agency of reconstruction councils. We have at least one council in each province. In two provinces we have two or three councils in each. It is the work of these councils to keep in touch with conditions in the provinces, to keep the department advised of requirements of materials and requirements of any kind. It is also the duty of the councils to give every assistance to those engaged in reconstruction work in the province.

I found it very interesting to visit these councils and to discuss their problems. I was particularly impressed by one activity new to Canada, namely, the service being furnished in each province by the national research council. Attached to each of the reconstruction councils is a representative of the research branch. He is a first-class man, thoroughly familiar with the work of the research organization. He is available to discuss the problems of industry, whether from large industry or small, with anyone who wishes to discuss them. If he is unable to give the help immediately he refers the matter to headquarters. If it is a piece of research, that research is undertaken. If it is information that is in the library of the council that information is furnished. I may say that I think no government service of the kind is being taken advantage of more widely than this new service. It is a sort of introduction of Canadian industry to the national research council; it is also a contact between the council and industry which will be very helpful to both.

The success of our war programme was due largely to the work of the national research council, and we are all convinced that the council can continue to offer just as important help to industry in peace time.

Mr. PROBE: May I ask the minister a question at this time?

Mr. HOWE: I have only a short time; would the hon. member mind waiting for another occasion?

Some very interesting devices are coming out of the war. The application of war inventions is just emerging as a factor in our peacetime work. One device that I think is particularly interesting is a radar set called No. 268. It was wholly of Canadian conception. The idea was worked out by a professor in the university of British Columbia. A prototype was built in the laboratories of the national research council and the equipment itself was built in Research Enterprises.

The equipment was adopted by the United Kingdom as the standard equipment for motor torpedo boats and was used in that capacity during the war. When the war ended the British admiralty adopted this device as the one most practical as an aid to navigation on ships. Today I think some two hundred of these devices have been installed in merchant ships in the United Kingdom, and we are installing the equipment on ships in Canada as rapidly as we can. We were in large production when the war ended. Fortunately we had a number of sets that had not been shipped abroad, and these are being held here and used in our merchant marine. By the aid of this device the navigator of a ship on the foggiest night can see on a screen before him the shoreline nearby, the buoys that he is passing, the obstacles ahead, other ships and floating logs, just as clearly and to the same extent as he could see them from the bridge on a bright sunny day. Already this device is changing the whole character of navigation on the west coast of British Columbia, and I believe that undoubtedly it will be standard equipment in all ships as rapidly as the device can be installed. It is also a means of harbour control. With the device erected overlooking a harbour one can find the location of ships on a foggy night just as distinctly as on a sunny day. Using the device the harbourmaster can direct the ships to their moorings as well in fog as in sunshine.

A similar device is being placed on aeroplanes, so that both marine navigation and air navigation are being made vastly safer and more flexible as a result of this one application of a war-time device to a peace-time service.

I am giving the house only a sample. Similar applications are being made all along the line. Through the help of the research council I am certain that war-time inventions will play an increasingly important part in the reconversion period.

I come now to the matter of housing. There has been some question as to the number of housing units that were completed in 1945. I have given two or three figures myself, each based on the best information I could get at the moment. But before I went to western Canada I asked the bureau of statistics to use its facilities to make a thorough count of the actual number of housing units built in 1945. This is the report I have received:

> The dominion bureau of statistics has just completed a survey to ascertain the number of dwelling units constructed in the calendar year 1945.

Mr. FLEMING: What is the date of the report?

Mr. HOWE: It came to my hand from the bureau two days ago. I doubt whether the report itself has been made public. I continue:

> The survey included 623 cities, towns, villages and incorporated rural municipalities, namely, all municipalities in the twelve "greater cities" of Canada; the remaining larger municipalities, mainly those with a population of five thousand and over; and a sample coverage of municipalities in the urban and rural groups with population less than five thousand.

From this survey it is estimated that around 44,000 dwelling units were built in 1945, of which some 39,000 were new building construction and an additional 5,000 were brought about through conversions. It is also shown that about 36 per cent of the new dwelling units are located in the twelve greater cities; a similar proportion are in other urban centres, while the remainder, some 27 per cent, are located in rural municipalities. That is the best information I have to-day, and I think it is accurate information, as to the number of housing units built in 1945.

Mr. SKEY: Were those all built by the government?

Mr. HOWE: Built by the government and every other agency.

Mr. SKEY: What percentage did the government build?

Mr. HOWE: I could give that information with a little study, but perhaps the hon. gentleman would not mind letting me finish my remarks; after all, this is not committee of the whole.

The greatest building year Canada ever had prior to the war was 1929, when the number of housing units built was 34,000; so that the year which saw our greatest war effort and which brought the end of the war, was not a failure as far as housing was concerned when, as compared with the 34,000 housing units built in 1929, we were able to find sufficient labour and material to build 44,000 units.

Perhaps I could clear up some doubts about the lumber situation. There is a wholly incorrect impression abroad that Canada is exporting far greater quantities of lumber now than before the war. For the years 1934 to 1944 the average quantity of Canadian lumber consumed in Canada was about two billion board feet, and during that period about 48 per cent of the Canadian cut was exported. In the calendar year 1945 only 41·5 per cent of Canadian production was exported, and a total of 2,860,000,000 board feet was consumed in Canada. It is expected that in 1946 the Canadian cut of lumber will reach 5,200,000,000 feet, the greatest in our history, and that well over 3,000,000,000 board feet will be retained in Canada. Surely this should be sufficient for all Canadian requirements. The export of items such as doors, millwork and flooring is totally prohibited; and although shortages of those materials continue, new sources of production are being or have been brought in, and everything possible is being done to increase production.

Some months ago building control was lifted. It was felt that, after the war ended, the difficulties of enforcement of building control would outweigh the benefits which would accrue from it. Black markets were developing, and those responsible felt that just as good results would be obtained without building control as were being obtained with it. It has now been found necessary to reestablish building control to some extent. Perhaps I should give a statement to indicate the exact extent to which controls are now being reapplied. Although good progress has been and is being made in increasing the supplies of building materials for the housing programme, many such materials are still in critically short supply. With a view to making the best possible use of available supplies a formal priorities rating has just been worked out for limited use. This has been done by the issuance of priorities office order No. PO-11, dated March 12, 1946. The new priorities rating is designed to assist in channeling the required quantities of building materials as defined in the order into government approved low cost housing projects in order that such projects may be completed as expeditiously as possible. With certain exceptions the order requires suppliers of building materials to make prior shipments of all purchase orders carrying the new priorities rating. Details of the new order, of interest to all suppliers of building materials in Canada, are now available.

Among other recent actions taken by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply to aid home building is the establishment of special procedures to assist individual veterans of world war II to obtain the remainder of building materials required to make ready for occupancy homes which are at least seventy-five per cent completed. I may say this is the first occasion on which we have been able to lay down a rigid procedure which could be followed by individual veterans building their own homes, as well as in the construction of homes for veterans under government auspices. Requests for such priority assistance may now be made to the priorities officer of the department on form PB-1046. No request for assistance should be made unless the veteran's home is at least seventy-five per cent completed, since this procedure has been set up specifically to expedite the completion of homes which have reached at least this stage of construction. We are making a special drive to finish homes now under construction by the end of April, and when we have accomplished that, the priority mentioned for veterans will be extended to veterans commencing new construction.

The number of homes that can be built to-day depends entirely upon the material that can be made available for the building of such homes; and when I mention material I am not referring to lumber alone. Perhaps lumber is the least of our problems. I am referring also to the vast list of materials that enter into the building of a home, from hardware and plumbing fixtures to wallboard and all the great array of materials that are familiar to most of us. We have been taking active steps, and have had the benefit of the assistance of a committee of the construction association itself. We asked the construction association to give us their most experienced men to make an independent examination of sources of supply and advise the department on ways and means of increasing those supplies. The reports are coming in as each branch investigation is being completed, and as those reports come in they are being acted upon. The valuable assistance of the association most deeply concerned with the enlargement of the supply is being very helpful in solving the supply problem. Supplies have improved greatly, though we are not yet out of the woods.

We expect a considerably larger house building programme for 1946 than we had for 1945, but there again I believe the number of houses to be built will be limited by the amount of building materials that can be made available. We are running into other shortages. It has been suggested that reconstruction has bogged down. If anyone had told me two or three years ago that the steel productive capacity of this country could be doubled to meet the requirements of war; that an industry which had never operated at more than sixty per cent of its then capacity, in pre-war days, six months after the end of the war would be operating at greater capacity than at any time during the war, and that in addition there would be a heavy backlog of requirements, I would not have believed it. For the last two or three days I have been sitting down with the steel controller to see what can be done.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but already he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. BRACKEN: We will offer no objection if the minister is permitted to go on.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister's statement is of such importance that I think permission should be given.

Mr. HOWE: I shall make my further remarks as brief as possible. We have doubled our production of steel in the war years. We are producing more steel to-day than we ever produced during those war years. We are operating even our stand-by equipment at full capacity, and we find it necessary to step back our export orders by months, to conform with our ability to produce steel.

In getting the work of reconstruction under way it seems to me I have had too many enthusiastic helpers. I asked for exports, and I think every producer in this country has felt I was speaking to him personally. We are in danger of attempting more than our physical resources will permit. So that, instead of encouraging further expansion we must now enter into a period of balancing our sales with our ability to produce.

Wrapped up with the problem of steel is that of coal. We have had some close calls in connection with obtaining sufficient coal during the war years. Steel production makes a very heavy demand upon coal in the form of coke. Having in mind the fact that coal controls in the United States are being abandoned, it seems to me that the problem of finding sufficient coal for Canada for the next twelve months is going to be a major problem, indeed. Let no one think that because we have been able to keep sufficient coal in our bins to meet the situation during the war years the consumer may now relax and buy his coal at any time he chooses. If it was ever necessary for the consumers to fill their bins early, that time is now.

Then, as to base metals, as hon. members know, Canada is the greatest exporter of base metals in the world. We had vastly expanded our production of base metals. To-day one of the greatest shortages in the world is that of lead. It has become almost a precious metal, and is limiting production in a great many fields.

Zinc and copper are in the same active demand which maintained during the war, with the result that our base metals mines, with the exception of nickel, are called upon for full production. Nickel is a metal which enters largely into war production and while it is also important in peace time, its use is not as great in peace time as in time of war.

The most amazing situation relates to the production of aluminum. As hon. members know, during the war we multiplied, to the extent of about twelve times, our capacity to produce aluminum. I am told that the demand for aluminum to-day is such that it will be necessary to use almost Canada's full capacity to supply the needs of Canada and of other countries for that metal.

As I said before, I was accused in 1943 of being an optimist. If I had been attempting to predict Canada's position in a period six months after the end of the war I would have been, indeed, a pessimist when confronted with to-day's situation as it now appears. And even then I could not find anyone who was as optimistic as I was in that period.

My hon. friend has criticized the removal of controls. He stated:

> The government's policy of decontrol is so slow and so lacking in skill and foresightedness that the dangers of inflation increase.

His attack seemed to centre on price controls, which he said were, in peace time, laws against production; but his general statements appeared to embrace every sphere of the government's economic policies. As I read it, the burden of his extremely general and vague comment was that the remaining government controls were in some undescribed manner restricting production.

As Minister of Reconstruction, I have a very profound interest in this charge, and I think my hon. friend should state just what controls he has in mind, and just how they are restricting production. A certain amount of vague criticism of this kind has recently come to my attention. It is not always easy to track down. Sometimes it is honest and well-intentioned, and sometimes it is based simply on the selfish desires of a few people to be rid of controls, which prevent them from taking advantage of the great majority of citizens in these continuing conditions of emergency. Unless it is specific, it is seldom helpful, and it frequently plays right into the hands of those few unprincipled characters who hope to profit by a descent into economic chaos. I am sure that this is the last thing my hon. friend would wish to encourage.

The government is removing controls just as promptly as is feasible, in the light of its responsibility to maintain orderly economic conditions, and to protect Canadians from sharp advances in living costs. Many controls have been removed, some as long ago as mid-1944. Almost all the controls administered by the former wartime industries control board have gone, and the great majority of the restrictive production controls administered by the wartime prices and trade board have been rescinded. A start has been made on price decontrol, and both price control and wage control have been made more flexible. All controls are being continuously reviewed, with a view to their relaxation and removal at the earliest feasible time.

As Minister of Reconstruction, I am particularly concerned to see that production is not impeded by unnecessary restrictions. I am not aware of the existence of the needless controls to which my hon. friend refers. Does he think that allocation of steel should be dropped in the present conditions of shortage? Does he believe that lumber allocations, which protect the Canadian supply of this material so vitally needed for housing, and which fairly apportions our exports, should be removed? Or is he intimating that rationing of meat should be eliminated, without which our desperately needed shipments to Britain and liberated Europe would be restricted, and domestic price control would be impracticable? Or is he simply objecting to price control, without which we should be in the throes of a violent inflation?

In regard to price control let me say this, because in my job of reconstruction I have fairly definite opinions about price control: It is very easy to say that price control is holding back production, without explaining how, or without paying any attention to what would happen to production if price controls were ineffective, or were dropped. It is easy enough to talk in general terms about unnecessary controls, to say that price controls are laws against production in peace time, and then to qualify these remarks by urging the government not "to engage in rash efforts of decontrol." But what does my hon. friend mean? The government is moving as promptly as it can toward the ultimate removal of price control, without engaging in "rash efforts of decontrol".

I am sure that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Ilsley) will bear me out when I tell the house that a break-down, or a removal, of price control would be rapidly followed by extreme advances in the price level, and by particularly drastic increases in the prices of the very necessities of life—food, clothing and rentals. My hon. friend criticizes the government for not controlling the prices of houses—a type of control which presents enormous difficulties, and which the government of the United Kingdom, for example, whose housing problem is even more acute than our own, has not found feasible to institute, after very careful consideration. Yet, at the same time, when he says that price controls in peace time are laws against production, he can be taken to suggest that the Canadian people should not have any protection against soaring prices, for food, for clothing, for rents.

I do not have to emphasize the obvious fact that soaring prices would cause suffering and dislocation of our economic affairs. That is clear enough. But I do wish to emphasize that soaring prices would pare down the large demand for goods and services, on the maintenance of which our objective of high production and high employment is based. The incomes, and the great accumulated savings, of the Canadian people would lose their purchasing power, and it would not be very long before the demand was insufficient to sustain the rising level of production in a number of directions. Then we should have a depression with its consequent unemployment, suffering and loss of income. To remove price control, or to ease it to the extent that it was not effective, would be simply to invite a wide boom and a severe depression. If my hon. friend imagines that the removal of price control is the way to reach and maintain a high level of employment and production, he is advancing a most unusual theory, a theory which the experience of other countries around the world, both to-day and in the past, provides no shred of evidence to support. But then he says that he would not urge rash efforts of decontrol. If that is the case, let him say just what controls are in his opinion restricting production. If he advocates their widespread removal, let him explain just how inflation and economic chaos are to be prevented.

This government is not maintaining controls because of any inherent liking for them. Not only do the continuing war imposed controls represent a heavy and difficult administrative burden, but they represent a degree of interference with economic processes which can only be justified in emergency conditions. But we are still faced with a real and urgent emergency in our economic life—the aftermath of the most destructive war in history. And while these conditions prevail the government cannot ignore its plain responsibilities to the Canadian people.

I had intended to cover one or two other subjects, but I feel I am imposing sufficiently on the time of the house. Let me say in conclusion that providentially Canada has emerged from the greatest war in history with a greatly expanded productive machine and with at least temporary prosperity. We are in the happy position of operating in an economy which is not inflated. It is an economy which allows us to produce and export and sell our products in every market of the world. I believe it is a balanced economy. I believe that a bushel of wheat will buy more goods in Canada than a bushel of wheat produced in any other country will buy goods in that country. I believe that the wages received by our workers will buy more goods in Canada than will the wages paid to workers in other countries buy goods in those countries. As I say, providence has given us a great inheritance at the end of the war. We have come out of the war with a splendid reputation. The men in our armed services and the men in our factories have brought us to the attention of the world in a way that, I think, has given us a new place among the nations of the world. We have come out of the war in splendid shape; let us not fritter away that which has been granted to us.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for a few moments, somewhat handicapped by the lack of a powerful voice because of a current malady which has struck some of us. I hope, therefore, that you, sir, and hon. members will bear with me while I make the remarks that I have to make.

This afternoon I shall deal largely with the question of external affairs, and that for two reasons. First, because of the fact that during the last ten months I have had the high privilege and honour, along with other members of the House of Commons and the public service of Canada, to represent this country at three world conferences. Second, because today the question of external affairs has reached into the homes and lives of the people of this dominion in a way that perhaps it never did in the past. The question of external affairs has assumed a position of vital importance in our whole national picture, an importance which perhaps we never thought it could assume in days gone by.

Canada has a great stake in her foreign, commonwealth and empire policy. She has a great stake in the questions of peace and war. After two great wars over 100,000 Canadian men and women lie buried in other parts of the world as a sacrifice in the battle for democracy and civilization in which this country took such a noble part.

I was a representative of Canada at San Francisco, then at the preparatory commission in London, and later as alternate delegate at the first general assembly. First, I think I should indicate to the house some of the improvements which I think might be made with respect to our Canadian representation.

One of those improvements is envisaged by the amendment which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said the day before yesterday was to be made to the Department of External Affairs Act, by which it is proposed that in the future we shall have a separate and full time minister of external affairs. This is a move in the right direction, and I heartily commend it on behalf of my party. We have been agitating and pressing for such a reform.

There was a distinct advantage in having a delegation such as we had at San Francisco, at the preparatory commission and at the general assembly, representing as it did the three main political parties in this house. But, if I may say so, I think on other occasions the Prime Minister, without affecting the character of the delegation, could also bring in the fourth party, the Social Credit party to my left. Such a move in the final analysis would create better understanding generally of world problems.

There is a decided advantage in having the various political parties represented when this country is speaking outside of Canada. There is not only the advantage of having men of various political parties as members of the delegation; there is the advantage of giving to our foreign policy, as in Great Britain and other countries, an added continuity, and creating complete understanding on the part of every individual represented. It is a step toward having, as nearly as that is humanly possible, one voice for the Canadian people when they speak outside of Canada. For that reason I want to endorse the plan which has been so fully agreed upon by all parties in the house.

There will always be some differences with respect to policy—foreign, commonwealth, empire and domestic. It would be unthinkable that delegates to international conferences representing the various political parties should always have the same views on matters that arise for discussion. As a delegate representing my own party at the three conferences I know that from time to time occasions arise on which entire agreement cannot be obtained among the delegation, but I have always tried to exercise that sense of responsibility which I think is so necessary in matters of this kind. If there are differences among the members of the delegation, and there have been, the place to discuss them is within the delegation itself, or at home, and not wash Canada's linen on any public line at San Francisco or London. That has been the position most people having a sense of responsibility would have us take.

There was for instance, in the preparatory commission a matter which did to a large extent divide our delegates. It is a question I brought up in the house before I left for London and upon which I took a stand while there. I refer to the matter of the site of the united nations headquarters. I had always felt—I may be wrong, but everybody is entitled to his view—that Canada was the one place in the world where we might have expected the headquarters of the united nations organization to be located, and before I left for London I thought I had advanced in the house many cogent and powerful reasons for that view. It was one of the points upon which the government and I failed to find agreement. In addition I did feel that the delegation ought to have taken at least a neutral position as between Europe and the western hemisphere if they could not see their way clear to giving complete support to the western part of the world. I point that out only to indicate that men sincere and anxious to do the right thing as they see it cannot always be expected to agree even in delegations representing this country, and I think the same is true of the delegations of other countries as well.

With respect to the question of leadership of the delegation itself, one of the reasons why I placed, before the house met, a resolution upon the order paper calling for a separate minister of external affairs was that I felt that it was not fair to the Prime Minister or to those leading the delegation from time to time not to have that close liaison which there naturally would be between a minister of external affairs and his officials. I want to make it clear that I am making no reflections upon anybody who acted in a leadership capacity to our delegation in London. At San Francisco, of course, the Prime Minister himself as Secretary of State for External Affairs headed the Canadian delegation, and I am not referring to San Francisco when I make these suggestions. But at the London conference at different times we had leadership from three or four ministers of the crown, and I thought it was obviously unfair to them to project them into the position of leadership when they themselves were not the ministers presiding over the departmental officials whose work they had to coordinate and supervise from time to time.

There is another aspect of the matter, and I hope that these will be taken as constructive suggestions, because from beginning to end they are meant to be such. There was the question of personal contacts with the representatives of the other countries at the conference, and in my opinion that is one of the major factors of importance at an international gathering. I think no one will agree with me there more completely than the Prime Minister himself. I am thinking more particularly at the moment of the San Francisco conference, which I attended strictly as an amateur in international affairs—and who is not an amateur considering the trends and turns that international affairs take? At the San Francisco conference there were five official languages and two working languages. Again, when the San Francisco conference opened, there was not one among that great gathering of international figures who could offer a single prayer to open the conference. Why? I understand now that it was impossible under the circumstances because so many religions were represented and the delegates worshipped so many deities. But this is the point I wanted to make. Despite the fact that so many different religions were represented, so many nations worshipping not even the same god, and despite the fact that they did not speak each other's language, the surprising fact is that they were able to reach the measure of understanding which they did achieve. This seemed to me to indicate how important it is for the average representative of a nation to try so far as he can to make his personal contacts with the representatives of other countries.

I come now to the question of leadership of the delegation itself. If we had a man who had a full-time job as minister of external affairs he would have the opportunity of making these contacts at conference after conference, of making and renewing friendships and acquaintanceships in an effort to reach understandings; and after all, world understanding often finds its basis in the personal understandings between individuals amongst the different peoples represented. It seems to me that the really fundamental factor in world understanding is not to get an understanding simply among the delegates from different nations, or among the heads of governments, or among diplomats, but rather that the fundamental thing is to get a rock-bottom understanding between the ordinary common peoples of the world. This, it seems to me, is one of the things we must develop so far as it is possible for us to do so. I leave those ideas with the house with respect to the Canadian delegation. Seeing these things as I did I thought it would not be quite fair for me not to mention them here rather than in London, for the purpose of seeing if we cannot improve the representation of this country in the days that lie ahead. Let me say that this country stands high in prestige among the nations of the world. My idea is that we should make it stand higher still.

With respect to the united nations organization itself, one cannot have been at three world conferences without having formed some opinions as to how it may be improved. As I have said on another occasion, it is impossible to think of UNO as a perfect organization; it cannot but be an imperfect organization in an imperfect world. Nevertheless we must move towards improvement. I humbly hope that we shall not find the united nations organization becoming a sort of backyard debating forum for the world, and, when any acute problems arise, having to call in the heads of three or four nations to solve them before UNO can move to greater things. That is not right. I think before such a situation can arise the united nations organization ought to take such steps as will prevent that coming about.

With this end in view, let me suggest that the general assembly, the security council, the economic and social council, the trusteeship council, and other similar bodies, should receive from the leaders of the nations the prestige which only they are in a position to give. The heads of both the little nations and the big nations should honour the meetings of UNO occasionally with their presence. In the general assembly, for some considerable time, one great country was represented only by its fourth ranking national leader. In another instance of a great power the second ranking national leader represented that country. I am not making any undue criticism in this respect. But if this country, Great Britain, the United States, Russia and other states intend to place their confidence and trust in the united nations organization, they should go the whole way in doing it. There is danger in half measures; and I fear that, unless the principal leaders of the nations, great and small, honour from time to time the united nations organization by being present, so enhancing its prestige by indicating their regard for it as the one organization for peace, it may become something less than this country hoped and determined it should be.

I have a further suggestion in this regard. At the San Francisco conference there was a generous representation of both sexes, of representative organizations and occupations. But in London—and for this Canada perhaps bears some responsibility in its own small corner—there were only three accredited women delegates I believe among the entire representation of the fifty-one nations. I believe everyone in this house will agree that, apart from those engaged in the very fighting fronts of battle, none bear a heavier brunt of war than do the women of the world, and there is no group in our society more interested than womanhood in the questions and problems of peace. I hope and believe that in the days which lie ahead that interest will be recognized in a more direct and concrete manner than it is to-day.

We have heard a good deal about world government. I was not here when eloquent speeches were made by the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr.

Coldwell) and others. I read those speeches and I agree that world government is a great ideal, but I would caution hon. members that it must be a gradual development, having in mind conditions in the world to-day. Nothing could be more hurtful to the chances of world peace than to project world government too quickly upon a world not ready for it. This does not mean for a moment that we should not keep it as a great ideal; for it is a great ideal. But before you can have a free world government you must have a free world press. Let us not move precipitately towards world government. Let us first consolidate the steps which have been taken at San Francisco, in the general assembly, and so on, but let us not regard the ideal as a solution of the problems of a world which is not yet quite ready for that step.

I come now to the question of Canada's position in world affairs. This country is in a position of vital importance, of course, both in peace and in war. Some representations have been made in the house respecting the Canadian army of occupation in Germany. With other delegates I had an opportunity of visiting that army and having Christmas dinner with the forces. I also had an opportunity of sizing up, in personal conversation with men from my own part of the country, the province of Ontario, their sentiments with regard to the army of occupation. I came to two conclusions. One was that the government had a definite responsibility towards the Canadian army of occupation which it had not discharged. It kept this force too long in the dark with respect to its policy for the occupying of Germany. Time after time one had evidence of this in the unanimity with which the men demanded to know, in their own words, "what is the score?" The army heads were unable to tell them; the government itself did not announce its policy until serious unrest had occurred among the troops occupying Germany. I am of opinion that one of the chief difficulties in this connection was the absence of any clear declaration to the army of what the government's policy was, whether the men were to be kept there two days, two months, two years, or for the duration of the peace. As I saw it, the proposition seemed obviously unfair, and I was glad that the government finally made some announcement of policy.

With the kind of army we had in Germany, with everyone, except a small percentage, wanting to get home, a difficult position was created, as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) well knows, both for officers and for men. Nevertheless it seemed to me, and this may be confirmed by those who are better informed about the situation than I am, that, while those now in the Canadian army of occupation should be brought home, there should be some force, taken perhaps from those who are here and are desirous of serving in an army of occupation, that could properly undertake this job of discharging Canada's international obligations in this connection. I leave that suggestion as one which is perhaps worthy of consideration by the minister.

In connection with our foreign affairs policy I have felt that we shall always have to base that policy on the principle that this nation is still, and I hope always will be, part and parcel of the great British commonwealth and empire. There are other considerations, but I think the one I have just mentioned must be the basic one. In addition, we have our close relationship to the United States to the south of us, a relationship which is the pattern, as is the empire, showing to the nations of the world the way to peace.

I have felt that this country cannot afford to be provocative in its relations with other nations. A sense of responsibility on the part of our public men is essential in that regard. This is no time for provocative talk, nor is it the time for this country to indulge in any kind of polished diplomacy. I like the system which was employed and which I think ushers in a new type of diplomacy, a diplomacy which had such a widespread approval in the security council in London. People said that there was plain speaking there. Of course there was plain speaking, and there was clear speaking. There was an attempt to lay the cards of nations face up on the table. I come to this conclusion: the old days of varnished talk, polished diplomacy and hush-hush relations between nations are rapidly giving way to something healthier and leading to a far more sensible understanding among the nations of the world.

Once before when I was entering this country after coming back from the continent I said—it was somewhat impromptu—and I say it again, that the international washing will dry out far more quickly when it is exposed on the clothesline outside to the winds of world opinion than it will if it is put on some clothesline down in the damp cellar where world opinion cannot get at it. I made those remarks because someone said to me, "What about the talk that went on in the security council in London?"

So far as our foreign policy is concerned we in this country must take the responsibility of recognizing that we are grown up. Our whole foreign policy must be geared with that consideration definitely in mind. We must realize that this nation now sits very close to the major powers of the world. It is all very well to say that our prestige is high. But with that prestige of course goes heavy international responsibility. In the last few months we have had some taste of our position with respect to international affairs. While the espionage matter has been dealt with fully by some of those who have spoken—I am very sorry I was not here when the Prime Minister gave his eloquent address on Monday night—I do hope that one of the lessons this country will learn is that we just cannot take everything for granted; from now on we just cannot decide that whoever makes an application for a position in the civil service or in government affairs, and particularly where secrecy or responsibilities of a public character are involved, can be taken in without being given at least some kind of test. It is all right for the government to say they have done a good job in hunting out the spies and quislings in our midst. Before the session is over I hope the government will indicate the measures they took to prevent the spies and the quislings from getting into the positions they occupied before this thing happened. I find myself pretty much in agreement with the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) when he speaks about that aspect of this particular matter. There are people who say that this is our lesson, and it is a lesson that has to be learned. I am glad that we are learning a lesson, but may I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that in the country from which I come, when these things happen and are cleaned up afterwards, they say it is not always quite good enough to lock the stable door after the horse is gone. I believe there is a responsiblity resting upon the government with respect to the people who were so chosen.

In our general movements during peace let us realize that there are many people in the world who subscribe to a certain doctrine—I am not so sure that I am not one who subscribes to the doctrine; if I do not, I come pretty close to it—that a factor in bringing about the last war was the invitation which was given by some great nations to a breach of the peace because these nations were not armed. In the days that lie ahead I hope that this nation, the British commonwealth and empire, and other nations will see to it that we do not discard all our defences; that at least we carry our own share of strength into the united nations organization, because a strong Canada and a strong commonwealth make for a stronger world.

We talk about military aggression, but there are other kinds of aggression abroad as well—ideological aggression, and aggression which has to be met by different kinds of defence. I believe that one of the great parts played by Canada in the united nations organization has to do with the economic and social council. Today we are living in a world which is only a shadow of its former self so far as size is concerned. It is a shrunken ball compared with the world of fifty years ago; it takes a person going from Ottawa to the farthest point in the world less time than it use to take our grandfathers and great-grandfathers to travel from Toronto to Ottawa. When you throw into that concentrated surface science's greatest instrument of destruction you realize that in the world of to-morrow it is not just a question whether we shall have peace or war, but a question whether we shall have peace or international suicide and mass annihilation of mankind.

That is the choice, and in that regard of course we must take our position. But the security council regulations, armed forces and all these things heavily endowed with might are only part of the picture. We have to conduct our war also not only against armed forces but against unemployment, against poverty, against disease and suffering. One of the things I liked about the work of Canada in connection with the united nations organization was the fact that we played such a prominent part in respect to the work of the economic and social council. That is an adventure, an experiment which in my opinion is a move in the right direction; because we shall have peace in this world, Mr. Speaker, when we have abolished the root causes of war. The root causes of war have to be eradicated before war itself can be stamped out. So it seems to me the proposals of the economic and social council, providing the ounce of prevention on the theory that it is worth a pound of cure, is something to which Canada may point with justifiable pride. No nation in the world had more words in the united nations charter relating to social and human welfare than did Canada. No nation has taken a stronger stand than Canada took at the various conferences. I was proud to listen to the proceedings at one of the opening meetings of the council, and to realize that Canada had been one nation that had lived up to the spirit and letter of her contract in regard to contributions to suffering humanity through the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration.

Of course people will ask, will the united nations organization bring peace? I say that of itself the united nations organization cannot bring peace; but the great nations of the world, working closely in collaboration with the organization, can do so. While the San Francisco charter showed the way to peace, the great nations of the world must show the will to peace. As one looks at the question of our future one realizes that we cannot have peace without paying the price of peace. A cheap peace could not be a lasting peace; but whatever may be the cost of peace it can never be as high or as heavy as the cost of war.

Having this in mind as we go forward in the great adventure toward lasting and permanent peace, I want to bring to the attention of the house my honest conviction in regard to the united nations organization. True, there are great hurdles to get over. True, there are many difficulties in sight. True, there are stumbling blocks which to the average person may seem almost insurmountable. But I still have an optimistic feeling with respect to the question of the united nations organization and lasting and permanent peace. The united nations organization deserves a chance to succeed. What would this world have been like had we come to the end of this war without some structure moving toward the great goal of permanent peace and lasting security?

So I conclude my remarks this afternoon by expressing my confidence that the difficulties we have been experiencing in recent times may yet be satisfactorily adjusted, and that the united nations organization will move forward to accomplish the great things for which it was intended. Before coming into the house this afternoon my eyes struck some words written by Tennyson a hundred years ago, and with this I close my remarks:

Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light;
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.
Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind.

Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife;
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.
Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the speech of His Excellency the Governor General depicts in the following terms the woeful conditions against which mankind is now struggling:

The world is full of unrest. Hunger, privation and suffering have become the lot of millions. Other millions are homeless, many of them in exile. The problems which face the statesmen of every nation are formidable indeed.

Those problems are made more difficult by the persecution of millions of human beings who are dominated by barbarism immediately after a victory won in the name of Christianity and civilization. Why should we conceal the fact that Soviet Russia has broken the most solemn pledges? She disregards treaties and brushes aside all protests. The right of those small nations which she is crushing is non-existent to her. Where and when will the Russian dictator stop? Neither Washington nor London knows. The united nations are in desperate straits and they dread the direst misfortunes. Some people show too much interest about the Spanish dictator and not enough about the Russian dictator. Will those who have fought for Christianity, civilization and the four freedoms permit Russia to spread communism all over the world? What happens in Canada? The government has brought to light the Russian espionage organization. They have appointed a royal commission which is now conducting an investigation. This investigation has resulted in the arrest of persons occupying important positions.

The government can count on the wholehearted cooperation of all real Canadians in this clean-up attempted in the interest of the security of the state. It is necessary to proclaim before the whole world that millions of human lives have not been sacrificed in vain. Peace must be proclaimed, and the united nations must at all costs safeguard the fruit of countless sacrifices. No dictatorship, no empire should stand in the way of the peace treaty so sorely needed by a troubled world. Before conciliation treaties are shattered on the formidable apparatus of imperialism or dictatorship, let the united nations exhaust all the peaceful means at their disposal and then adopt an implacable attitude towards the aggressive nations, whoever they may be. Another war would bring about a dreadful catastrophe. Man has invented the instrument of his own destruction. Let it not be said that in the twentieth century of the Christian era, humanity slipped back two thousand years into barbarism. We can and must be spared war. But can another conflict be avoided or not? The salvation or annihilation of the world depends on the alternative chosen.

Canada's contribution to the present war, which is not yet over since peace has not been proclaimed, has cost and still costs billions of dollars a year. The loan of $1,250 millions which the government has just granted England is part of our continued contribution to the war. Loan without interest until 1951, gift of over $400 millions to the United Kingdom, representing the cost of training British airmen in Canada, extravagances of all kinds, maximum exportation of our agricultural products and foodstuffs, and all this gives but a small idea of our prodigality. Is Canada such a land of plenty that she may give so much away? Our people are overburdened with taxes. After a decade of sufferings caused by unemployment they have to give away the few dollars they have earned during the fictitious prosperity brought about by the war. We would be better off by using the country's income for the achievement of a vast programme of public works. We must give work to the thousands of unemployed. The Dominion government could cooperate with the provincial governments in carrying out drainage projects, in the construction of public buildings, bridges and highways required to increase our business and industry. I am aware that several members of Parliament have been disappointed at seeing that the sessional programme did not make the slightest mention of public works. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has even asked to curtail expenses during the next fiscal year. How is it possible to lend billions of dollars to other countries when the government is reluctant to undertake a vast programme of public works? Is this sound political economy? Would it not be wiser to put order in our own house rather than spend our money in foreign lands? I am convinced we should first direct all our efforts to the rebuilding of our national economy.

Is it conceivable that in such a country as ours, people have to go without butter? Is it reasonable that wheat should be rationed in Canada as the government is preparing to do? A short time ago, I registered protests against the reduction of wheat acreages, at the time when the government was paying a bonus to farmers for reducing their production. Was I entirely wrong? Now, instead of reducing production, the Government is rationing consumption. Is not this an evidence of a poorly planned economy? It is important that production and initiative be stimulated in all fields of our economic life. Conversion of war industries to peace enterprises has been imperative for months past.

I wish to say a word also on another aspect of our legislation. Parliament is considering bills on Canadian citizenship and a national flag at a moment when our returned men are without homes in a country whose wealth in natural resources is fantastic. As for the national flag, if one is ever adopted, our veterans will see it for the first time, for it will not be the emblem which witnessed their acts of heroism. The Canadian flag was never unfurled by our fighting troops in action since we are still a nation without a distinctive flag. As long as a large group of complacent colonials consider Canada as a colony following in the wake of the Empire, I fear that colonialism will remain an obstacle to the development of a real Canadian spirit. Let us hope for the contrary, in the best interest of both the Canadians and the colonials themselves. Our returned men are proud of being Canadians. Most of them want a national emblem symbolizing the distinctive character of their country. However, in this land of theirs, they are entitled to nourishment and work which will assure them a position worthy of the sacrifices they have made. This end will not be furthered by the government through the maintenance of numberless restrictions and controls. I earnestly hope the housing problem will definitely be solved.

I wish to speak on another subject. Canada has fought to ensure the victory of Christianity, freedom, justice and right. At least these were the objects expounded by our leaders. If those were our real aims let us stop now the prosecution of defaulters and deserters. Let the government release the thousands of defaulters and deserters presently detained in camps and prisons. Punitive justice is not the best kind of justice. Punishment for punishments' sake is sterile. The sole enforcement of punitive justice is base and mean. Our lawmakers have much worthier tasks to perform.

Such raids by the military police and the R.C.M.P. debase a country whose repute had been enhanced by the victory of our arms. Let us put a stop to such prosecutions and concentrate all our efforts on the general welfare of our people and on the reconstruction of our country which has been shaken to its very foundations. Let everyone play his part in the great and essential work of reconstruction. The veteran and the discharged serviceman are entitled to employment worthy of the sacrifices which they have so courageously made. But the defaulters or the deserters who are deprived of their freedom are unable to do something useful for their country. By granting them an amnesty, the government will not tread on anyone's rights, but they will do something worth while for thousands of young Canadians urgently needed by industry, commerce and agriculture. Extreme severity is not the part of wisdom. The relentless tracking down of defaulters and deserters, besides being odious, will only result in disunity, distrust and hatred. It was not with this end in view that Canada put all her resources into the prosecution of the war. It is in a spirit of charity, justice and liberty that I request a general amnesty for defaulters and deserters.

A moment ago I expressed my views on punitive justice. It would not be necessary now to apply the law in all its rigour if so many pledges to our youth had not been broken. It would have been better to deal with them with frankness and loyalty. The desertions are largely due to the misgivings and distrust prompted by those whose first duty was to enlighten the young men. Preventive justice is much more human and efficient than punitive justice. I ask the government to take into serious consideration the mitigating circumstances in favour of defaulters and deserters.

Just a few more words. The relations between capital and labour in the United States let us foresee a world troubled by strong influences. Private enterprise cannot survive without cooperation that will ensure fair wages to the workers. A sound labour and industrial legislation is the only means of saving the nation from the economical and social disasters which hang over us. The time has come to build the relations between employers and employees on a sound basis. We must at all costs maintain and increase industry and employment. It is impossible to base our social security on the unemployment insurance fund. Family allowances are very helpful, but only serve to increase the family income. Canada's social and economical reconstruction is not solely dependent upon the government, but on the joint efforts of farmers, workers, industrialists and professional men. In a word, it is dependent upon the people themselves.

Agitators are the worst enemies of a free and prosperous nation. For over twenty years I have tirelessly denounced in this house the communist doctrine based on revolution, atheism and godlessness. I have frequently warned the government of the state of things which might arise from the subversive ideas current in the country. Last December 5th, I said in the house, and I quote:

> Europe is, to a certain extent, dominated by communism. A system which is worse than the dictatorship crushed by the united nations rules over the liberated countries in the name of justice, Christianity and right. The Atlantic charter, the Yalta resolutions, the war objectives of the allies are trampled under foot. Soviet Russia is causing its whole weight to bear on nations which it is its mission to revive and not to overrun. Religious authorities of Lithuania and the slavic states have protested against such brutal treatment.
> Let us beware lest, under cover of the critical times which Canada will experience, subversive elements might spread through the land. Having won the war would be of no avail were we to lose the peace.

As I speak, the situation is exceedingly critical. It is the duty of the government to uphold in Canada the traditions and prerogatives without which justice and liberty will be entirely submerged in a catastrophe the magnitude of which no one can possibly fathom.

Mr. E. O. BERTRAND (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in the debate on the address in reply to the speech of His Excellency the Governor General may I first extend expressions of appreciation of our population for the representation given to our country by His Excellency and the Princess Alice during their tenure of office. The example they have set to our population in the part they have played during the troublesome years through which Canada has just passed is one that we all appreciate.

I should like also to take this opportunity to congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) and the seconder, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenberg (Mr. Winters). These two hon. members on Friday last made a very good contribution to the debate. Both of them at one time were members of the Canadian armed forces and served in different capacities to defeat the common foe. One of them comes from a far eastern province and the other from the middle west, and consequently they represent a fair cross-section of our population. May I add that they also represent in this house different races in our population. From what they accomplished in the defence of our country while in the armed forces and from their participation in this debate we must surely realize that they are Canadians whom we desire to see amongst our population. Both spoke with wisdom and at times with eloquence. Their appeals for unity amongst our different populations in the provinces of Canada and between those of different creeds and races and religions were surely worth while, and I am happy on this occasion to congratulate them on their efforts on Friday last.

Before proceeding further may I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to read the first two paragraphs of the speech from the throne which His Excellency addressed to the Senate and House of Commons:

> It is just over six months since Canada emerged from six long years of war. The turmoil which has followed in the wake of war has created new problems for governments in all parts of the globe. The world is full of unrest. Hunger, privation and suffering, have become the lot of millions. Other millions are homeless, many of them in exile. The problems which face the statesmen of every nation are formidable indeed.

It is only in the light of the world situation that all our problems can be seen in true perspective. The future of our own and of every country depends upon success in the task of world reconstruction, and the establishment of an enduring peace. Many of the measures you will be called upon to consider at the present session will be concerned with this wider aspect of human affairs.

These two paragraphs are indicative of the present formidable world problems whose ramifications affect the Dominion of Canada.

We must admit that Canada is really fortunate in having as its Prime Minister at the present time the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. His experience as a leader of a country is unsurpassed amongst the allied nations, and his proverbial prudence of pronouncements and his wisdom as a statesman make it a privilege for Canada to have him as Prime Minister in the strenuous times through which we are passing. May I add that he is even more than that, as he has proven in the last year. He is a stalwart in comprehension of international affairs amongst the united nations for the welfare of all populations in the world, but principally for the welfare of those nations that stand for peace, justice and liberty. It is under his guidance that Canada has done so much for victory and to help the allied nations in the last six years. It is under the Prime Minister's guidance that Canada will continue to cooperate with the allied nations for the peace and reconstruction of the world. But while participating in these international conferences to assure everlasting peace, Canada must at the same time attend to her own domestic, social, economic and commercial problems.

What will the year 1946 bring to us? Historians of to-morrow cannot fail to note 1945 as one of the greatest of all years—the dividing line between an age that is past and the new atomic era.

Because the second world war was commenced in 1939, that year was the most momentous up to that time. In 1945 came the end of the conflict, and the return of our youth who had gone to the wars—wars at all the ends of the earth. But it was also the year of the atomic bomb on the one hand and, on the other, the birth of the united nations organization. All the events of this closing year will determine the shape of things to come in a very large degree. The problems before us, as the speech from the throne indicates are formidable indeed.

[Mr. E. O. Bertrand.]

(Translation):

And, Mr. Speaker, those tremendous problems are not wholly Canadian, their ramifications are international, and in their solution, we must take into account the rights of each country, as well as the ways, customs and aspirations of every racial group and every nation. A great deal of tolerance and charity will be required in order to adjust difficult situations to the best advantage of all concerned.

For the time being, the important thing is the preservation of world-peace, and I am firmly convinced that every country genuinely desires peace. However, the differences of opinion and the aspirations of the various countries make this problem infinitely difficult of solution.

If peace is to prevail throughout the world, it must be predicated foremost on Christian charity. Now, in my estimation, Rome is surely the greatest Christian centre in the world.

About twenty-five great countries now have a representative in Vatican City, and I feel that if Canada has been in a position to play such an important part during the war which has just ended, if she is called upon to cooperate in future in order to safeguard the peace of the world, it would be only reasonable that Canada, whose diplomatic representation is constantly increasing in various countries, should have an official diplomatic representative in the Vatican, the seat of the princes of the Church.

The reconstruction of our country is largely dependent upon its foreign trade. It has always been the aim of the Liberal party to create and maintain prosperity in our country by developing our export and import trade. In recent months, we have striven more than ever to develop our foreign trade, and it might not be out of place here to congratulate the hon. minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) for the many trade agreements which he has concluded with several countries which, until recent years, had traded with Canada on a very limited scale.

Our trade with devastated countries will surely require loans and credits and we will be called upon to approve such loans and credits to those countries that may need them. In the last few months, UNRRA has supplied large quantities of goods to the population of devastated countries now in the grip of hunger or famine, but more than such relief will be required to rebuild the various devastated countries of Europe. Canada must keep on doing its share and more than its share by increasing those credits. That is why it is stated in the speech from the throne that we will be called upon to approve a loan of $1,250 million to Britain.

We must not look only at the seemingly fabulous amount of the loan, but must also consider Canada's bounden duty to help the European countries while furthering our own trade and development.

Canada must make credits or loans available to Britain, France, Belgium and other countries, I do not see why it should not. As a matter of fact, these credits and loans would be used to purchase goods in Canada, and then our people will derive the greatest advantage from these financial arrangements.

With no wish to prejudice the interests involved in these various credits or loans, I will frankly admit, that in principle I am convinced Canada must contribute to the re-establishment of the Allied nations by granting them the credits and loans necessary to bring about their reconstruction.

The countries of Europe and Asia are at present suffering from hardship. Hunger and even famine are rampant in large and important countries. Canada can increase its present output and at the same time render service to its veterans; that is why our people must take an interest in this problem.

Canada must not be asked to produce simply from charitable motives and in order to help needy countries; it must feel vitally interested in producing more, and if we are to encourage our people to increase their output of foodstuffs, the farmer's income must be boosted.

Nevertheless, the Canadian farmer holds an important position in our national economy at this time. Let us see what has been his income in the past twenty-five years. According to the Agricultural Economist of November 1945, issued by the Department of Agriculture. This publication takes the index number 100 for 1926, when prices of farm products and the cost of living were normal. On the basis of that index number, statistics prove that all products the price of which was equivalent to 100 in 1926 have decreased to 66·7 in 1932 and gone up to 104 in July 1945. On the same basis, that is, taking the 1926 index number, 100, farm products have gone down to 48·4 in 1932 and risen to 107·8 in July 1945; field crops have gone down to 41·1 in 1932 and increased to 99·2 in July 1945; live stock products have declined to 60·7 in 1932 and increased to 122·3 in July 1945. These figures might offer a partial answer to the hon. member of the C.C.F. who stated this afternoon that if some credit can be given to the policy of the honourable the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), that credit is nevertheless not very great. Since it is fair to refer to statistics, we must admit that the Minister of Agriculture has carried to its highest level the income which farmers have had during the last twenty-five or thirty years. If this is true, the fact remains that statistics show an average income of 108·3 for the four factors I have indicated, whilst the cost of living, in July 1945 stood at 123·7 for the farmer. The goods and services used by farmers for those eight factors on the farm have stood on the average at 125·7 in July, 1945, and for eleven factors at 144·2, also in July, 1945. It means that the cost of living and the cost of farm production for those various factors, stands at an average of 130·9 for the farmer, therefore, the farmer's cost of living and production is still higher by 22·6 than the price he obtains for his products. If the farmer is to produce more, he must certainly have a higher income.

On motion of Mr. Bertrand (Prescott) the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 21, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

STATEMENT AS TO TREATMENT OF PERSONS DETAINED BY MOUNTED POLICE

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I should like to communicate to the house a report I have received from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with respect to the treatment afforded the persons who were detained at Rockcliffe for interrogation by the royal commission appointed to inquire into the so-called spy activities. It is dated March 20, 1946:

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

With reference to Mr. Coldwell's statement in the House of Commons on March 18, in respect to the persons detained in the present espionage inquiry at Rockcliffe being accommodated in rooms which were brilliantly lighted and in which the lights never were out, the following particulars are submitted for your information.

On the occasion of the detention of the individuals referred to, in view of the fact that they had to be kept incommunicado, it was necessary that each have his own personal guard so as to prevent them from conversing with other persons detained and also as a safety measure to prevent escape.

Certain of the persons detained were given accommodation individually in large rooms measuring approximately 60 feet by 22 feet, while others were placed in small rooms, approximately 10 feet by 9 feet in measurement, due to no other large rooms being available. The small rooms are those allotted to sergeants of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and are comfortable. As there is no proper cell accommodation at Rockcliffe barracks, it was necessary that police guards remain in the room with the prisoner throughout the hours of daylight and darkness; consequently, it was necessary that a section of the room be lighted at night, as the guard was not permitted to sleep. These were the normal lights installed for the rooms in question, but after the first few nights were replaced by a shaded reading lamp. Any charge that brilliant lights were installed in any of the rooms is not only untrue, but ridiculous.

All those detained were treated exactly alike in all respects, and were given exercise daily in the company of an escort.

The complaints mentioned by Mr. Coldwell, M.P., and Mr. Solon Low, M.P., are denied by two or more of those who were detained, as indicated by the attached press reports. No undue pressure or what is known as "third degree" methods were employed by the police, and there was no occasion or reason for any unauthorized treatment.

The meals served were those prepared for members of the force, under the supervision of a dietitian.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) S. T. Wood,
Commissioner.

The first clipping annexed to the report, and referred to in the report, is from the Montreal Standard of March 16, 1946:

"Third-Degree" Grilling
Denied by Spy Suspect
Special to The Standard

Ottawa, March 16—One of eight espionage suspects who had been held incommunicado for nearly a month at the R.C.M.P. barracks at nearby Rockcliffe told the Standard to-day that no third degree methods were used in questioning him.

This suspect, now at liberty on bail, refused to allow himself to be quoted by name on the advice of his lawyer. Otherwise he talked freely.

"If any coercion was used, it was of a most subtle nature," he said. "There was no physical discomfort—just adroit questioning by the mounties."

He spoke of his own experience only, but believed that his treatment was not substantially different from that accorded twelve other persons held in the police barracks. Eight of these, including the Standard's informant, were arraigned in court this week and freed on bail.

(Last week an unnamed lawyer representing one of the detainees said the Mounties were using coercion and third degree methods to extort confessions, and that his client was confined to a "stuffy little room in which a bright light was left burning continuously." R.C.M.P. Assistant Commissioner H. A. Royal Gagnon immediately denied the third degree and coercion allegations.)

"I was treated quite decently," the Standard's informant said. "Even the guards were respectful—they called me 'Sir.' We were confined one to a barrack room, and I had practically everything I wanted—my sun lamp, my pastels, all my own clothes, good food and use of the barracks recreational library.

"What I disliked most was that I wasn't allowed newspapers, was refused permission to see any visitors, even my wife, and that I was held day after day with no charge being placed against me.

"My room was a large one, usually used as a dormitory for a number of policemen attending courses at Rockcliffe. I had it all to myself, but I was never alone in it. There was always a guard with me, and at night only the lights in the half of the room in which I was sleeping were extinguished."

The constant guard and lights were believed to be precautions against any of the detainees attempting suicide. The Standard's informant said he was allowed possession of a safety razor only while shaving in the morning, and then only with a guard near. He was allowed to keep his belt and shoe laces.

"I was taken outside the building for a walk each day, but my only companion was a policeman. Occasionally, I could see other civilians through my window taking similar walks under guard. I recognized two of them, but was unable to speak to them."

"The adroit questioning" by police was conducted by Inspector Harvison of Montreal, he said. All questioning by the Royal Commission was conducted in the Justice building, to which the Standard informant was taken by police.

He protested strongly against what he described as the injustice of holding a person for weeks without allowing him to see a lawyer. He said that when he was arrested he asked his wife to engage legal counsel but that the lawyer was not allowed to see him.

It was only after the commission had finished questioning him that he was given the opportunity of calling in his lawyer, he asserted.

The other clipping is from the Ottawa Evening Citizen of March 6, 1946, but it does not purport to be a report from anyone who had been detained. It is merely a statement made by someone who had been retained as counsel for a person who had been detained. I do not think I should read it to the house as being pertinent to this question.

If I may be permitted to do so, I will table the report with the clippings annexed thereto.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, and in connection with the statement just made by the Minister of Justice, may I point out that the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police made an error in bringing my name in as having been associated with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). At no time have I made comment upon the detention of these suspects at Rockcliffe, nor have I said anything in connection with it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In fairness to the hon. member, may I say I do bel eve the commissioner made a mistake. So far as my recollection goes, the only references made were those of the hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar and Calgary West. In both instances they were merely asking for information, which I tried to secure as quickly as I could get it.

POSTAL SERVICE

RATES ON FOOD PARCELS OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the question as to a reduction in postage rates on gift parcels to the United Kingdom has been raised by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), and by members of the general public. Because this subject is one of general interest, I am making a brief statement at this time.

The present parcel post rates to the United Kingdom are fixed in agreement with that country, and are therefore not entirely under the control of the Canadian Post Office department. They consist of the actual cost of handling in Canada, conveyance by ship, and the charges which are handed over to the country of destination for delivery costs. For instance, in the case of a gift parcel for the United Kingdom weighing the permissible limit of 11 pounds, and one cubic foot in over-all size, we pay 75 cents for sea conveyance and 90 cents to the United Kingdom, leaving Canada only 40 cents to cover all handling costs here, including rail haul.

Any reduction of these rates would mean in effect a subsidy to the senders. There may well be an objection to this which I present for the consideration of the house. It is that the sending of gift parcels is a matter between individuals on the chance happening of a person overseas having a friend or relative in Canada. Government assistance should, I believe, not be granted on this narrow basis. Rather we should continue as at present to provide relief to those in need through official agencies operating for that purpose.

If the United Kingdom authorities wish to confer the benefit of reduced charges to their own people, we should be happy indeed to pass on to the Canadian mailers the reduced postage rates thus made possible. There has been no such disposition, however, on the part of the United Kingdom postal authorities. Recently when they were approached as to the possibility of accepting less than they now require for the handling of parcel post parcels, they pointed out that their charges are at an absolute minimum, and with rising costs at the present time they might even have to increase the charges which they now require.

A comparison has been made with the rate charged for soldiers' parcels. May I point out that these parcels were handled from the time of mailing to the time of delivery by the Canadian postal service and the Canadian postal corps. The conditions were, therefore, quite dissimilar to those prevailing in the case of civilian parcels.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, respecing citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens.

He said: The house will recall that on October 22 last I introduced a similar bill, and asked for first reading. My remarks, in which I set out the purpose and intention behind the bill, are found at page 1335 of Hansard.

The measure to which first reading is now sought, with some slight editorial revisions, including a definition of "domicile," is the same as that introduced last year. On that occasion the definition of "domicile" was left as interpreted in the Immigration Act.

A further provision in the bill now presented to the house is that it affords to members in the armed services the prerequisite of having spent only one year in the country, as a condition to their becoming citizens under this new legislation. So that for all practical purposes under the bill now before the house a member of the armed forces will almost automatically on application, subject to other qualifications, be eligible without going through the residence requirement for admission into Canadian citizenship.

As I stated on a previous occasion, an attempt is now made to give a new definition to Canadian citizenship and to clarify the ambiguity which follows from the Canadian Nationals Act, the Immigration Act and the Naturalization Act. The underlying purposes of the bill are really two: first, to achieve a clear and simple definition of Canadian citizenship which will remove the complexities which exist in the present legislation and, second, to provide an underlying community of status for all our people in this country that will help to bind them together as Canadians.

Mr. CHURCH: That is a nice bill for an Ontario minister to introduce at a time like this when coal and houses are needed. It will lead to wide disunity.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSING

PROGRAMME FOR VETERANS IN REGINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction, of which I gave notice a couple of hours ago. Will he please inform the house if it is the intention of Wartime Housing Limited to extend its present programme of temporary housing for veterans in Regina beyond the number of 300 units announced last year? If it is intended to go beyond this number, what is the projected allotment for Regina for 1946?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I received notice of this question and I communicated with Wartime Housing Limited and found that Wartime Housing Limited had had no communication from the city of Regina since last August. If an application comes through the official channels from the city to the department, Wartime Housing and the department will be glad to give consideration to its contents.

FATS

INQUIRY AS TO SAVING-FATS CAMPAIGN TO RELIEVE UNITED KINGDOM SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the government initiate a save-the-fat campaign as the United States has done, to help relieve the serious shortage of fats in the United Kingdom.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The question should be directed to the Minister of Agriculture, who has charge of this campaign.

Mr. BRUCE: I thought it had to do with Mr. Donald Gordon's branch.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BRUCE: Will the minister direct the question to the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

WHEAT

SPREADING OF PAYMENTS FOR DELIVERIES—INCOME TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, there is a question I wish to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) based on his statement yesterday requesting increased deliveries of wheat from the farms of western Canada. Will the minister give consideration to giving the farmer the option of spreading payments for such deliveries for income tax purposes over the years in which he may have crop failures? As the minister is not in his place, this question might serve as a notice and could possibly be answered to-morrow.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. O. BERTRAND (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last night I was speaking of the possibilities of the expansion of production in Canada, mainly that of agriculture. Having completed my remarks on that subject may I turn now to the possibilities of the expansion of Canadian industrial production to supply the domestic needs of this country and those of other countries throughout the world, and to maintain a high level of employment and national income in Canada. In order to do this we shall have to study many things, and we shall be confronted with many problems. I would not want to prevent financial resources from coming into Canada from other countries in order to open up new industries, but there is one matter I think should be called to the attention of the house. I refer to international cartels, and I should like to say a few words about this type of organization.

The Labour Gazette for November, 1945, contains an article on Canada and international cartels which is of great importance. Referring to the effects of cartels, the report states:

> Cartel arrangements which impede industrial innovations and slow down the effective development of new opportunities for investment tend to diminish the supply of goods available for human use. Attempts by cartels to protect old investments by limiting the introduction of useful new techniques and new production have a prejudicial effect on government policies to secure high employment.

And again:

> Examples of cartel arrangements affecting Canadian production, consumption, and trade are reviewed by the report. It refers to restrictive aspects of external financial control of Canadian industrial and commercial companies, and the use of patent rights by cartels to establish comprehensive systems of market control.

There is a comprehensive system of market control in Canada and throughout the world, thus balancing world trade to avoid competition. The report continues:

> The interest of Canada in the revival of world trade and in the adoption of policies of expansion transcends any such balancing of possible advantages and disadvantages.

And again:

> The report is not concerned with the legitimate use of individual patent rights, and no suggestion is made that would involve any restriction of rights conferred under the Patent Act. But cartel members frequently employ patent rights to establish a comprehensive system of market control by (a) formation of patent pools; (b) systems of cross-licensing; and (c) imposition of marketing control upon licensees. These mutual agreements for patented articles tend to spread to unpatented articles also.

Consequently destroying in large measure the possibility of individual enterprise. Cartels are surely no solution for depression, and in this regard the report continues:

> Cartelization offers no solution of the economic distress of widespread depression. Indeed, in the aggregate it probably acts to intensify the general distress, although some have contended that cartels have given the necessary minimum security to permit continued investment. Renunciation of cartels without other action is no solution. Positive expansionist measures are necessary. The cartel is a natural development of depression; and the most effective way of eliminating it is to create conditions of expanding trade which will render it unnecessary, and which will enable competition to render the cartel ineffective.

We have anti-trust policies in this country, and the report goes on to state:

> Anti-trust action is only one aspect of public policy and must be allied to the use of other legislative powers such as those relating to tariffs, patents, trade-marks, taxation, crown companies, if the problems created by industrial concentration are to be met adequately.

May I conclude by saying that if our country is to expand in order to be able to supply properly both the domestic market and the markets of many other countries of the world, the government must take the necessary steps to avoid the control of trade by cartels, and probably it will be necessary to make representations to other countries in which cartels are practising restrictive trade practices to bring about effective measures through international collaboration for checking the abuses of cartels. It is recommended by the commission that the government of Canada give its support to the establishment of an international office to deal with cartels in connection with the economic and social council of the united nations. Close study should be given to other considerations which have been tentatively put forward by officials of the United States government for the international control of cartels. That is all I shall say on the subject at the moment. But if hon. members would take the trouble to study not only the extract I have read but the whole report they would find it a mine of information for the building up of a safeguarded Canadian industry for private enterprise. I am quite sure that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will be quite ready to deal with that aspect of this important problem in connection with the development of a labour policy and the development of our country industrially.

The speech from the throne makes mention of redistribution of the representation in this House of Commons. This is always a very important measure, of the utmost importance to our whole population. Canada throughout its history, and particularly in recent years, has given proof of its broad-mindedness and attachment to every democratic principle, and I am quite sure that the redistribution bill that will be introduced here fixing the representation in this house for the next ten years will be a charter of justice that will safeguard minorities and provide adequate representation to all the provinces. In achieving such a redistribution may I suggest that minorities respectfully ask for the support of the majority of its citizens in this great task. Such a redistribution giving fair representation to all portions of Canada and to all our peoples would be a new cornerstone of justice and unity in this country.

On September last I spoke in this house and referred particularly to two things, the civil service and the income tax. May I be permitted a word with regard to the civil service? To be as brief as possible, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall quote what I said on that occasion:

> For the benefit of hon. members and of those who expect to obtain positions in the civil service, I would venture to suggest that at the earliest convenient time during this session, or during next session if this is to be a short one, a special committee should be appointed to study and review the Civil Service Act and its regulations. This is a time when many changes will have to occur in order to establish a new order in the world and there should be a clear exposition before this committee of all that is to be expected from the civil service commission under the operations of the Civil Service Act and its regulations. This would be conducive to a better understanding by all concerned.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the same reasons for appointing a special committee on the civil service still exists. I agree that last session the committee on veterans affairs made a comprehensive survey of positions giving a preference to the veterans and I can quite understand that the veterans committee will be reappointed this session to give further study to veterans' problems. Nevertheless the civil service commission is charged with the responsibility of replacing or keeping some 60,000 temporary employees, and this will necessitate from 50,000 to 60,000 new examinations. I realize that my request for a special committee for a better understanding of the work of the civil service commission is only one means of giving more information to the members of the house and the public at large, but I believe it would be helpful to all those interested. Owing to the pressure of work on the commission at the present time the committee should make its inquiry only after the civil service commission has completed the task in which it is now engaged, but I would ask for the appointment of such a parliamentary committee at the earliest opportunity.

I indicated that I was going to say a word about income tax. We were pleased to learn from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) last session that a reduction of sixteen per cent, roughly speaking, had been made in the 1945 tax. That was a simple cut in taxation. It might have been too much of a reduction in some cases and not enough in others. It was quite all right to accept that for the past year, but I feel sure that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), who within the past few weeks has predicted a further tax reduction, would not be satisfied with the reduction that was made last year, and I make an appeal again particularly for the fathers of families. At the risk of holding the house for a moment or so I should like to repeat what I said last year when asking for such a tax reduction:

> I would venture to suggest that the following exemptions on income taxes should not only be considered but granted in the coming budget. I am not so much concerned with the criticism that we have not reduced the Income War Tax Act to the degree that people expect, because, after all, the people do not expect a real reduction of taxation on a large scale at this time. But I believe we should give a chance to the married man and his family.

I am not quite so generous as the hon member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) who asked for tax exemption in his speech yesterday.

> I ask for an exemption of $1,500 for married men and for each child below eighteen years of age or who is going to college or university I ask an exemption of $400, all of these to be reduced directly from the net income of the taxpayer. These, in my opinion, would be only fair, and would go a long way to help fathers of families and married people in this country.

[Mr. E. O. Bertrand.]

It would also help to further the college education of our younger generation. I am very sorry that I cannot go so far as to suggest any further help for our bachelors in this time of stress.

I again make a plea on behalf of the family head. I hope that when the budget is brought down some alleviation of his lot will be made by way of tax reduction.

Although our country has many problems to face at the present time, some of them domestic, many having international ramifications, we all agree that Canada is fortunate in having possibilities of production which are nearly unlimited, and fortunate also in that at the present time we have at the helm a government which is a safeguard for the welfare of our people.

The returned men can count on the Minister for Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). Already we have on the statute books most advanced and generous legislation to help in reestablishment, and it is proposed that the veterans committee shall again study what should be done and establish a veterans charter for those who served so well in the last conflict.

So far as labour is concerned, there is a certain amount of unemployment, more seasonal than anything else, in this country, but we have probably less difficulty than is experienced in most countries, and our present situation in no small measure is due to the efforts of the Minister of Labour.

As to reconstruction, the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) has indicated to the house the efforts the government is making in this respect. Of course this is a subject on which criticism is easy, but it is not just so easy to find solutions. I believe that every citizen of Canada, reading the papers this morning, was proud to learn what is being done by the minister.

As regards agriculture, I have stated previously, and I want to repeat, that agriculture in this country has been brought up to its highest standard in the matter of income in these past few years.

An hon. MEMBER: At whose expense?

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): And if we ask who is responsible for this state of things, I would say credit is to be given to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who has so well administered the department during the time he has been in charge of it.

In closing I would refer again to what I said yesterday with regard to the leader of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). Canada is indeed fortunate to have at the helm at the present time the present Prime Minister—fortunate both in its domestic affairs and in its international ramifications.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be of commendation and congratulation—and they are not perfunctory, either—in respect of the excellent addresses delivered by the mover of the address, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), and the seconder, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters). These young men are of a type much needed in public life. So far as the mover is concerned, he is a personal friend of mine and a fine example of the many young men of French ancestry who have come into this parliament and who will do their part towards making this country what we hope its destiny will be.

I wish to say a few words arising out of the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Bertrand, Prescott) in connection with redistribution, because it peculiarly affects the province of Saskatchewan. The speech from the throne states that this matter is to be dealt with in the current session. Ordinarily redistribution would have been effected in 1942, but it was postponed until after the war because it was realized that the loss of population in Manitoba and Saskatchewan during the ten years following the census had been occasioned in large measure by the movement of men and women from those provinces to the coast and to eastern Canada for the purpose of working in war industries. I agree that redistribution should take place at the earliest possible day, and I agree also with the hon. member that it should provide adequate representation of all provinces; but since many of the people who left western Canada temporarily during the period of the war have now returned, I suggest that redistribution should be postponed for two or three months, within which time a census can take place in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which otherwise would lose three and four members respectively. I believe that a census taken now would indicate that there has been no decrease beyond the one-twentieth which is allowed under the constitution, and if a census were taken the representation in the two western provinces would not be decreased. In any event, even if on the present basis of representation, as determined by dividing the population of Quebec by sixty-five, it were found that the population had decreased as revealed in the 1941 census, I suggest that Saskatchewan should have eighteen members, not seventeen as at present indicated.

In view of the fact that I am the only representative of my party from the province of Saskatchewan, it becomes necessary for me to say a word in regard to agriculture and the opinions of my province in that regard. I am not going to enter into any discussions of a recriminatory nature; conditions in the world are too serious for that. A hundred million people in Europe and Asia are facing starvation. My criticism of the government is that as yet it has no plan by which the Canadian farmer can determine the contribution he should make during the next year or so towards relieving the distressing situation which prevails in other parts of the world. Call it what you will—political considerations, or political reasons actuating it; it is difficult for western farmers to understand why there is any justification for their receiving approximately 40 cents a bushel less than they would on the world market to-day if it were not for the fact that the Canadian government has seen fit to sell our wheat abroad at $1.55 per bushel. I am not here to criticize in any way the need of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I shall come to the criticism after a while. I was saying that I am not here to criticize the need of Canada to prepare for markets in Europe and elsewhere and to aid Britain during her dark days and reward her in part for what she did for us when she saved civilization. The farmer believes, properly I think, that if Canada intends to advertise, if Canada's government intends to secure markets abroad, then it should be done at the expense of the Canadian people and not at the expense of the farmers who produce the wheat.

One problem which faces the country was accentuated the other day when I visited Chatham; I refer to the necessity of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) doing something immediately to assure the necessary labour supply for the Canadian farmer.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is something you should look after. You may be on the farm yourself.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that there is never any fear of the genial Minister of Labour moving anybody around like that if the record of the past is to be any augury of what will happen in the future. When I was in Chatham I found that many of the farmers had been on sugar beet production, others on vegetable production. But these farmers, by reason of the failure of the government to face this situation and to assure them the necessary labour supplies, are unable to determine what to do this summer. While the minister says that things will be bad for some of us in the future, the farmers in the county of Kent and in the part of Ontario to which I refer, are asking that a decision be made now, not on April 1 or April 15 or later, because, notwithstanding all the unemployment in the country, it seems impossible now to secure men who will return to the farm and assist in that kind of work.

What I am about to say applies particularly to western Canada. During the war a tax of three cents a gallon was imposed on gasoline with a view to discouraging its use. This tax added to the cost of the farmers' production. Why was it not removed immediately upon the conclusion of the war? Instead of the tax being removed, permission was given to the great western oil corporations outside the city of Winnipeg to increase their prices by two cents a gallon, effective during the present months.

I represent a rural constituency. I visited farmers everywhere in that constituency during the recess and I find they are willing to work in order to meet the challenge that faces the world. But, as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said, unless they are assured that longer hours will not penalize them in income tax, the production that is asked for now will not be obtained. If the government will not consider it proper to provide a real inducement in the form of relief from income tax for the extra production, what must be done is to increase the income tax exemption to the extent of $2,000 for married persons and $1,200 for single persons. In the second place, I suggest that while a great deal of wheat has been sold at $1.55 a bushel, the farmer should be given the reasonable price of $1.80 for every bushel of wheat sold since August 1, 1945, to the end that, by means of that encouragement, the production we ask for will be forthcoming.

The farmer is most insistent that he be given assurance of a market, and that he be given equality for agriculture, to use the expression of my leader; that by means of a well organized programme he be given security in prices several years ahead. I suggest that even at this time the government should turn its attention to these two matters—first, the provision of labour, not a month or six weeks from now, but immediately; and second, that the government give some hope to the farmer and to the other citizens of Canada of some relief from high income tax through an increase in the amount of exemption.

Having dealt cursorily with these two questions I come now to the spy situation. I do not think there is any place better fitted for the discussion of this subject than the parliament of Canada, which, if it is to discharge its responsibilities, must be the bulwark of the liberties of the Canadian people. I am going to ask my hon. friends in all parts of the house to listen to the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, delivered in the House of Commons on March 19, 1918, words which I can never hope to emulate, setting forth the responsibilities of members of parliament in the determination, and in the securing and maintenance, of those rights which are dearer to no one than they are to people of British birth, dearer than life itself. Sir Wilfrid used these words:

> Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and the universal testimony of history is that unless there is eternal vigilance on the part of a strong and resolute opposition, encroachments upon freedom and abuses in office will creep in, just as surely and just as certainly as weeds and tares will invade and choke the crops of the husbandman if he is not constantly on watch. Nay, more, I think I can invoke also the testimony of the history of British institutions to show that if at any time there is on the part of some section of the opposition a relaxation in vigilance, weeds and tares at once appear in luxurious growth.

These are pertinent words, having regard to the encroachments that have taken place, during the period of the war, upon the rights of parliament:

> Nothing, sir, is more certain than that one illegality will lead to another; that, as a logical consequence, wrong will be followed by wrong.

I have no apologies to offer for the position I intend to take. I have no apology to make for not having received support from the communist party. No member on this side of the house has ever at any time received the official approval of the leader of the Labour Progressive party, nor has any member on this side of the house ever taken the position that the director of the national Liberal federation took when on June 24, 1944, Mr. Tim Buck offered cooperation to the Prime Minister. In offering that cooperation and that assistance, he was answered by Mr. McLean in these words:

> The Liberal party welcomes cooperation from everyone in Canada in putting into effect Liberal principles and policies—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No matter what the cost to the nation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER—

—because we are sure that these policies are the only real answer to the problems which face Canada and the whole world and to the problems which will face us in the future.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to note the approval. The cooperation was cooperation during the period of the elections. There was none of that cooperation with communism on this side of the house. I realize too the position of Russia to-day—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We are here, though.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I beg your pardon?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We are on this side.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh yes. There is the policy; the end justifies the means.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): At any cost to the nation.

Mr. CASSELMAN: He spoke out of turn.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is strange, Mr. Speaker, that there should be so many interruptions in connection with a proposition as to which there is such universal agreement.

I was saying that I think I realize the situation in the world to-day. Stalin spoke on February 9; Kalinin spoke on February 4; Molotov spoke on February 4. They set forth the plan; and, according to the royal commissioners, here in Canada were men and women in the civil service who put their loyalty to a foreign ideology above their loyalty to the state. Anyone who runs may read the picture in the world to-day: Great Britain to get out of Greece so that the bases in the Dardanelles will be available; the U.S.S.R. demanding Tripolitania by way of trusteeship; the U.S.S.R. to-day in Iran; the U.S.S.R. asking for bases in Eritrea; the U.S.S.R. asking for the Kars plateau. It is a picture anyone can see; and the empire is not altogether guiltless when we allowed the U.S.S.R. to secure control over the Kurile islands, joint ownership or control of the Manchurian railway, the port of Darien and the port of Port Arthur, under the agreement at Yalta. These things exist; but, these things being recognized, and that spirit of communism spreading all over the world being known, it was passing strange for the Prime Minister to say he did not believe that Marshal Stalin knew anything about what was going on in this country.

I have no sympathy, sir, with those who would undermine their country in time of war or in time of peace. They are entitled to no sympathy, but they are entitled to be tried by law and not by administrative lawlessness. And let me say this. The Minister of Justice says the safety of the state is in danger. Nowhere in the orders in council does it say that, either in October or in February. It says, "it may be inimical" and all through Canada the press has taken the stand that the responsibility must rest with the government to prove to Canada that the destruction of these inalienable rights of British subjects is justified on the ground that there is in existence in this country a situation which would undermine the state and destroy our safety. It is well, too, to remember that as yet no one has explained the appointments made by this government. No one as yet has given an explanation as to why a Doukhobor woman from the constituency of Prince Albert, with a philosophy inimical to our philosophy, should come to Ottawa and find her way into the Department of External Affairs, where she would acquire a knowledge of our secret ciphers.

I might add that never in the long history of the British commonwealth has the "safety of the state" been defined as other than existed during a period of war, rebellion or insurrection. The minister says these are dangerous men and women. The authorities did nothing from September 5, 1945, to February, 1946; then they picked up these dangerous people and kept them incommunicado for a period of time. Later these dangerous people were released on bail in trifling amounts which ordinarily would indicate the commission of no serious offence, and the probability of acquittal. If they were dangerous in January or February, are they not dangerous to-day? If they had to be kept under detention for that period, what has happened since to alter the picture? I say, Mr. Speaker—and it is not doctrinaire or a technicality—to say that these orders in council sweep aside Magna Charta, habeas corpus and the bill of rights. Some say the people of Canada are not interested in that. Sir, I do not believe the minds of liberty-loving Canadians, however much they hate communism, have become so apathetic in six years of domination by the state in a period when the political doctrines of regimentation inculcated by one party and practised by the other have been in effect. I believe the time has come for a declaration of liberties to be made by this parliament. Magna Charta is part of our birthright. Habeas corpus, the bill of rights, the petition of right, all are part of our tradition. The United States has its own bill of rights, and I think out of the events of the last few years a responsibility falls upon parliament to assure that Canadians, as well as others in the empire and the people of the United States, should have established by their legislature a bill of rights under which freedom of religion, of speech, of association and of speech, freedom from capricious arrest and freedom under the rule of the law, should be made part and parcel of the law of the country.

During the period of the war of necessity parliament became a casualty of the war. We admitted that democratic symbolism and the leisurely processes of democracy had no place having regard to the tempo of modern warfare We voluntarily abrogated the rights of parliament and the rights of the individual, but I ask the Minister of Justice to let us know his answer to this. If during the days of war he did not have the power he has under these orders in council, why was it necessary to apply to individuals in time of peace rules and regulations which were never applied in time of war? Section 21 of the defence of Canada regulations, which has been repealed by order in council, gave power to pick up aliens and enemies of the state during the period of the war. It gave the power of detention, but not the power of examination. Is this democratic symbolism? I defy the government to produce a case where during war, insurrection or rebellion when any British government acted not only to detain but to examine. As I look at what is taking place and what has taken place in recent years, this is what I am afraid of. Parliament abdicated many of its rights during the war, and to-day the government is endeavouring to perpetuate this temporary abdication. We placed our rights in pawn during the war as security for victory. To-day we are asking that those rights be restored to us and that parliament be assured of the prestige to which it is entitled by reason of our democratic development and the heritage that is ours.

This, as I see it, is the trend. From 1939 on, the government has arrogated to itself powers which ordinarily reside with parliament and the people. Indeed, during the period of the war there were the defence of Canada regulations; the present order in council goes much farther than the defence of Canada regulations did.

There has been an attitude on the part of the government denying us information. There was the philosophy of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that the executive had no responsibility to parliament, the very antithesis of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had so often reiterated in the house.

Mr. CLAXTON: The Minister of Finance did not say that.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And here is a strange thing: The minister says that on December 6, 1945, he did not remember this order in council of September, 1945 that swept aside Magna Charta and the bill of rights. He forgot it! Well, I accept his denial that he knew at the time of the existence of this order. But, sir, is it not an indication of what power will do to men, what it will do to a former president of the Canadian Bar Association, one who had stood for the safeguarding of the rights of parliament and the individual, that he should forget an order in council which did more to sweep aside the rights of individuals than has any other order in council passed in the history of Canada?

Parliament would never have passed the emergency transitional powers bill had it known about this order. But he forgot about that secret order! I wonder how many other secret orders the Minister of Justice has forgotten. How many other secret orders are there about which we know nothing to-day? I ask that question again, as I did on December 6.

Where is the rule of law? It is flouted by the government. First it is flouted by denial in many statutes and orders in council of recourse to the courts. True, most of those orders in council were connected with military needs. Why is recourse to the courts denied under certain legislation, such as that connected with the income tax and the excess profits tax, and a fundamental principle of justice, that a man may not be a judge in his own case, daily forfeited, to the detriment of business and of individuals across Canada?

Why does this government, which always asserted while in opposition that it is the custodian of the liberty of the individual, and yet denies to that individual the right of recourse to the courts—a principle of British justice since Magna Charta, which states, "To no man will we sell, to no one will we refuse or delay, right or justice."

When, in the history of the British empire, was any man ever denied counsel, except under orders in council passed by this government? Why deny counsel when an individual is brought in for examination? According to the statement read by the minister to-day there was no coercion. And, by the way, it was interesting to note that the Minister of Justice departed from his legal training to the extent of reading ex parte statements in a newspaper in order to support the answer he was gviing the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Will the hon. member allow me to make a correction? I was not defending or supporting anything. I was indicating to the house the information I got from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which I had promised to get at the request of two members of the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, imagine the Minister of Justice giving information to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as to what the commissioner had read in the Montreal Standard, and then asking parliament to accept that as an answer!

You say I overdraw the story? What did parliament do a few short months ago in connection with a bill respecting emergency powers? Under the emergency powers bill, on October 5, 1945 the government endeavoured by order in council to get power to deport and to exclude Canadian citizens, or to revoke nationality. Parliament continued to sit until December 18. It would not accept the reactionary principle that a British subject could be deported at the will of the government of the day. Parliament, as represented by hon. members in all parts of the house, took the stand that such intolerance would destroy a nation. Parliament spoke on that occasion in words which could be understood by the government. Parliament pointed out that to deport Canadian citizens was the very antithesis of the principles of democracy, one of the first of which is that minorities are entitled to protection.

What did the government do? It could not get that iniquitous piece of legislation through parliament; so, while parliament sat, on December 15, 1945, the governor in council passed an order in council to do that which parliament would not allow it to do between October 5 and December 15, 1945.

There is the picture, as I see it. I cannot cover the various other infractions and invasions of democratic rights by the executive. I come back to the orders in council themselves, and I ask this: Having regard to the seriousness of the situation, why did the government let that order in council lie dormant from September to February? If it is so dangerous to-day to have individuals connected with the U.S.S.R. in this country undermining our state—and admitting it is—what was the justification for the government's allowing a Russian officer, Major Peter Domishev, to go to Churchill on the Musk Ox expedition, and there to take pictures of our equipment which will be used in the north country in the event of war's ever coming to this land? What is the justification for it? Surely not a fear of difficulties which in the event of refusal might arise between Canada and another nation, because Canada and every other part of the empire is denied the same privilege in that country.

The only justification for these orders-in-council the government offers is that conditions are serious, and that it is done for the safety of the state. Sir, my answer to that is the answer I gave a while ago: detaining and questioning in this fashion has never been resorted to anywhere in this Empire before. I should like to know what would have happened in Great Britain, in the mother of parliaments, if the same condition had arisen. There, according to the Minister of Justice, one of the major wrongdoers, one of the alleged leaders, was not locked up for detention and examination. He was proceeded against by law and legal processes. After he had appeared in court, represented by counsel, he was denied bail, because invariably bail is denied when an individual may not appear for trial, or where it may be considered dangerous to allow him to be at large. Why was not the same practice adopted in this country? What difference was there here from the condition which prevails in Great Britain. I suggest again that I have no sympathy for these people. I know none of them and never have. But are we not travelling along the trail which during the war was used and reused with an utter lack of protest on the part of parliament? This trail is becoming a highway along which the government moves, totally regardless of parliament.

The Minister of Finance said in a speech last fall that parliament's duty was not to scrutinize everything; it was to vote supply. That is the position that the government is coming to. It has taken away the right of the individual to have access to the courts. It has widened the defence of Canada regulations to the point where you say to the individual; Not only will you be detained to protect yourself and protect the country, but while you are detained you shall be examined; Is it not passing strange that these people are detained until such time as they say something which implicates them? They are then granted the right to have counsel; they are then permitted to face their trial. They are granted opportunity of freedom once they confess. When that happens they are withdrawn from the custody of the crown, from this so-called passive internment, and again have the opportunity to be at large.

As I said before, it is the first time in history that this has happened. Again I say that I have no sympathy for communists, but the great danger in the road taken is that if this becomes a precedent it may lead to caprice and personal animosity being the guide to prosecution of those who have different political views. These orders-in-council provide the government with a means whereby it may translate suspicions into proof by surveillance and the coercion of confinement.

My friend over there says that it works, that the end justifies the means. I have taken the trouble to look up the history of habeas corpus, and the more I have gone into it the more strongly I am convinced that the great and abiding principle of British law all through the ages has been a scrupulous regard for liberty. It was so even in the darkest days. To set aside those rights is to deny the foundation of British liberty. It works. The star chamber worked. It was efficient; it got convictions. There were outstanding judges at the head of the star chamber. But as McKechnie says in his work on the Magna Charta, that writ is the principal bulwark of English liberty, and should the doubtful plea of political necessity lead men to look on its denial with apathy, the most distinguishing characteristic of our constitution will be effaced.

The orders in council provide a short-cut method, and so did the star chamber method. Maitland sums it up by saying that the star chamber probably succeeded, but it was none the less sinister. It too was composed of great jurists, but it became a court of inquiry, not a court of judges administering the law. Public opinion must be mobilized by knowledge against this practice. How apologetic the Minister of Justice was when he dealt with this matter; and I think the same thing can be said of the Prime Minister. Yes, it has been done before; parliament has been criticized before. None was more critical in the days before the war than the right hon. the Prime Minister. It may be said that to take a stand like this is not popular, but I assert that it is a member's responsibility to take a firm stand when he sees freedom being interfered with; when he sees such things as religious freedom being interfered with as it is when these Jehovah's Witnesses are still kept in alternate work; when he sees interference with the freedom of the press as was the case when certain photographers were advised that unless they delivered up their films they would be subject to arrest. When one sees that trend, when one sees bureaucracy not responsible to parliament, then the time has come when members in all parts of this house should rise and say that freedom and liberty are the concepts for which parliament must stand, that they will not permit the adoption by the executive of totalitarian methods; that British methods have worked through the ages and British methods will work to-day.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, first of all, along with many other hon. members who have already spoken, I want to congratulate the two hon. members across the floor who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Having done that, may I say that while I have taken part in many debates, I begin to feel a little nervous in taking part in this one. Since it has opened the discussion has taken us over a lot of territory. We have been chased by the police, taken into court, put into gaol, let out again on bail, taken over to Russia and also to several different parts of this country. It is therefore not without some diffidence that I rise to address the house.

I intend to speak in support of giving everybody in this country an equal opportunity, which is the first duty of government. I intend to base my submission, first, on a statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King); second, on a statement of a former prime minister of Great Britain, and, third, on a statement of a business man in the United States. We can never attain the golden age of economic life while we are in the stone age of economic thought. I believe many of us are still in that stone age, and until we get out of it there is not much hope for the common man. Speaking in New York, on December 2, 1942, to the Pilgrims of America, the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> The only path to prosperity and peace is the path of equality of cooperation and of human brotherhood. The new order must be a world order. It must be governed by a universal rule of law. It must be based on human rights and not on the rights of property, privilege or position. An end must be put to monopoly of power by any country and by any class.

That was reported in the Edmonton Bulletin of December 3, 1942. We have heard the Prime Minister tell us that we must have reform before the war is over, otherwise it will be too late. Late in December, 1940, former prime minister Churchill had this to say in London:

> When the war is won, as it surely will be, it must be one of our aims to establish a state of society where the advantages and privileges which hitherto have been enjoyed by only the few shall be far more widely shared by the men and youth of the nation as a whole.

I should like now to quote what a citizen of the United States said, Jesse F. Jones, a wealthy American who was formerly chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. He said:

These United States have been good to us. We have made money, we have nice homes, wear good clothes, have fine cars and can afford banquets like this one. We can look back fifty years when most of us started and chart the courses that followed. But we can't look ahead that far and see where we are going.

But there are some things we know about the future. One of them is that the days of making great fortunes are over. That is finished. Another is that the upper third, you and I, have got to have a more public-minded viewpoint. We must realize that the welfare and well-being of the lower third is our problem. We are as much of society as the fellow on the other side of the tracks.

Many of us are wondering whether it is possible to have equality of opportunity until a thorough job of housecleaning is done in all departments of government and all other public institutions, where infiltrations of doctrines detrimental to our democratic way of life are to be found regardless of the label under which they operate.

Having laid that down as a basis I propose to say a few words about the millions of hungry people in other parts of the world. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister make his pronouncement on Sunday night last; and right here, may I say that I followed his injunction and went to church on Sunday, as is my regular practice, and I was wondering whether the Prime Minister used his Sunday morning in preparing his pronouncement of Sunday evening, or whether he went to church himself. His Sunday night speech was very good, and I am sure the farmers all over Canada received it in the proper spirit. I think you will all realize that farmers are necessary people at certain times, particularly when you want something to eat, and when there are taxes to be paid; whether they be exacted directly or indirectly makes no difference.

Speaking of cooperation, the farmers of Canada have had a lot of it in the past in the way of flowery speeches, but this time they demand cooperation in cash, not in credit or in words.

I should like to quote two paragraphs from the speech from the throne with which I propose to deal specifically:

> Of world problems demanding immediate action, the most pressing is the provision of food to those peoples facing acute shortage, and, in some regions, widespread famine. The chance of a peaceful reconstruction of the world depends on food. The shortage at the present time is very great. The problem, moreover, is not only for the next few months, but also for the next few years. Unless the need is met, grave disorders, endangering peace itself, must be anticipated.
> The government is seeking by all practicable means to make available for export the maximum supply of foodstuffs. Every encouragement is being given to increasing production. The gravity of the situation demands, on the part of the people of Canada, a united and wholehearted effort.

These words are clear and definite. I do not think anyone can accuse the farmers in any part of Canada of sitting back during the war years and not pulling their full weight in production. I cannot speak particularly for other parts of Canada, but I do know that in western Canada tractors were working night and day at certain seasons of the year on the farm; you could see tractor lights in the fields any night you were driving along the roads. For this the farmers deserve great consideration. The result of these long hours of work, about which we did not complain, after our able-bodied men and women had been sent into the services or into the civil service here or into munitions factories, leaving at home to work the farm men and women long past the age for such work as well as the young men who were physically unfit for the armed services, was that the farmers produced on a scale higher than they had ever reached before. I am not going to give all the credit for this to the policies laid down by the present government. It will be remembered that some years ago the Kaiser used to use the phrase "Meinself—und Gott," and if we take into consideration the bounteous crops provided by Divine Providence during the war years, I think we would be hitting much closer to the mark.

Many of the farmers took the advice of the government; that is, they let it in one ear and out the other because they say that if you want to be a successful farmer you must do exactly the opposite of what the government advocates. In my own case I did not change my farming programme, and I do not intend to do so in the future, because if you are going to be a success on the farm you have to lay down your own programme, make sure it is a sound one, and then stay with it. If you are going to change according to every whim or fancy advocated by people who do not know anything about farming, you are not going to get very far beyond taking a walk down the road and letting somebody else have your farm. I do not think it would be fair to the government to deal with agricultural policy and the fate of agriculture prior to the time this government came into office. Let us take its wheat programme, starting with the 1935-36 crop.

It will be remembered that at that time we had an initial payment on our No. 1 Northern wheat at Fort William of 87½ cents a bushel, and in addition we had participation certificates on which we were supposed to realize cash when the crop was all sold. That continued for some time without prices getting any better; in fact, the price went down to 80 cents and then 70 cents a bushel, and at one time legislation was introduced to make 60 cents the initial payment on our wheat f.o.b. Fort William. The farmers of Canada did not like that. Perhaps it was done intentionally by the government so that the farmers would be thankful when the price was brought up ten cents a bushel through legislation passed in this house providing for an initial payment of 70 cents a bushel. That lasted until August 1, 1942. During this period, although we were getting a very low price for our wheat, we found that the prices of the things we had to buy were going up and up, and little attempt was made to check those increases. In addition to taking the low price, because nature was good to Canada we were compelled to deliver on a quota basis. The farmers of Canada had no particular objection to that. They knew that a lot of our grain could not be used, and on one or two occasions we were paid some storage on the farms. But to most of us it was a case of buying lumber at highly inflated prices, building granaries and storing the wheat on the farms. Some of the wheat grown in the early years of the war still remains on some farms. On August 1, 1942, we had an increase to 90 cents a bushel. That served to compensate to a very small extent for the low prices which prevailed before that time. In 1943 the price was increased to $1.25, and in 1944 the quota was removed and we were allowed to deliver all the wheat we wanted to. In 1942, as I think we all remember, drastic changes were made in the income tax programme, and as a result farmers and others were compelled to pay income tax on income, in the case of a single man, above $660, and of a married man $1,200. There were some exceptions with which I will not bother at the present time.

In 1944, when quotas were removed, many people were carrying heavy loads of debt and paying thousands of dollars in interest, and they thought to themselves, "Here is my chance to get rid of my grain and pay off my debts." As a result many of them emptied and swept out their grain bins and felt that they were getting well away. Farmers, I may say, have at all times done their best to pay their debts, and on this occasion, having been compelled to pay interest on their debts and hold low-priced grain in high-priced bins, they took advantage of this opening of the quota and the increased price. In 1944 the war was still on, and farmers did not know at that time that they would be chased and compelled to pay income tax. But a short time ago, at the time of the Christmas and New Year holidays, the farmers, at any rate around my part of the country, got some mail which was not very welcome. Letters were sent out containing income tax forms for the year 1944. Many of the farmers are still feeling pretty bad and pretty mad. Some of them stayed up at night trying to figure out their income tax. Thousands of them had not kept any track of their receipts or expenditures, and as a result they spent night after night trying to compute the tax as nearly as they could. In contrast to this, no effort was made by the government to visit the farmers in the depression years and find out what the losses were and try to compensate them or ease their interest rates, cut their debts or do other things of the kind. But after we had reaped, in 1944, one of the heaviest crops Canada ever produced, and in adidtion had delivered surpluses which had been piled up as far back as 1940, the government came along and says in effect, "The war is over, we need money; and if the farmer has no extra money perhaps he will be easier to deal with." So they demanded their pound of flesh.

This is made the worse because farmers realize that in the past there was only one period, namely between 1915 and 1919, when the farmers of this country received their proper share of the national income—that is, about 33 per cent. In the depression years many of the farmers lost their farms and their health as well. During the war years I know of some cases—perhaps there were many—in which the farmer's wife got out and worked putting up hay, harvesting, and doing other farm work, and possibly a year later found herself in hospital undergoing an operation and paying doctor bills. This is not right. Something should be done to make conditions on the farm such that the farmer's wife and daughter will not have to go out and do farm work. But the help was not obtainable and the farmer's wife and daughter got out and did it, and they are still suffering as a result. Those who held on to the farms are still, even to-day, trying to pay off their debts and to meet the load of interest which in many cases runs up to 7 and 8 per cent. Why that is I do not know, because in many cases the amount on which the interest is paid is nothing but a book entry. This should not be allowed.

Farmers also are aware of the losses they have taken on grain in the past. A few years ago, at the time the price of wheat was raised to 90 cents per bushel, I took the trouble to figure out the number of bushels which were marketed between the 1935-36 and 1942-43 crop years, on the basis of the price obtained for it, and also what the farmer should have received had the grain been sold at what has been called parity price, $1.41 per bushel. I might say that this parity is figured on the basis of farmers receiving 16·6 per cent of the national income, when they were really entitled to double that amount. According to the amount I arrived at, during that eight year period the farmers of Canada sustained on wheat alone a loss of $1,220 million. That sum would pay off a lot of farm debt and provide for homes, better equipment, better machinery and other improvements. But it has gone as a direct contribution to the life of Canada, for which the farmer has absolutely no credit.

Let me go back a few years. I am not accusing the present government with respect to these conditions; I am taking the period 1930-40. I find that the farmers during that period received a yearly average 9·4 per cent of the national income. If you include a few of the good years by taking the period 1926-40, you find that during that time the farmers received 11·3 per cent of the national income. In other words, approximately 33 per cent of the population of Canada had to be content with and get along on 11·3 per cent of the national income. If we take that wonderful year at the depth of the depression—1932—the farmers of Canada received five per cent of the national income. I think it is about time this government did something about it, and about time too that those of us here who represent agriculture and all other national interests got on our feet and made a demand, not a suggestion, that something be done about this matter right away.

In view of present taxation and price inequalities, what is the attitude of the farmer towards greater production? I have tried to point out the conditions under which farmers have worked during past years. All of you know what the present taxation programme is. The married man, including the farmer, is supposed to be allowed an exemption of $1,200. Take for instance the man who gets $1,200 out of his grain and cattle or whatever else he may sell, and in the past has undertaken to raise hogs. Probably the average small farmer will raise about sixty hogs. He takes those sixty hogs and sells them at $25 apiece, and when he comes to settle with the income tax collector he finds that he has to turn over the proceeds of the sale of twenty hogs, or one-third of his production, to satisfy the income tax demand, simply because he has worked many extra hours on production. In many cases he has had his tractor going twenty-four hours a day. And that is the thanks the farmer gets.

One of my neighbours visited me shortly before I came here and said he was worried about his income tax. He is a man I have known for over thirty years, and he has worked all that time for farm machine companies and mortgage companies. In 1944, however, like many others, he took advantage of the quota on wheat and sold all the wheat he had in his bins using practically every cent of the money to pay off mortgages and machine company debts. Now he is faced with the problem of paying income tax on that. I couple of days before I left home he said to me, "Do something about this income tax in Ottawa, because I have to mortgage my land again in order to get enough money to pay the 1944 tax." That is the way in which the tax and price system operates to-day.

Some time ago we had an announcement that our wheat would be sold for export purposes at $1.55. I strongly protested against that. I do not want anyone to get the impression that I am not in favour of Canada giving wheat, at a good price, to Britain and other starving countries, but I do object to the farmers of Canada paying for the gift of the Canadian people. It is the gift of the Canadian people and the expense should certainly be borne by the Canadian people.

We were told that our wheat for export purposes would be sold at $1.55, but to make up for that we were also told that for the next four crop years our wheat would not be sold below $1 a bushel, f.o.b. Fort William. To the farmer in my part of the country that means 75 cents a bushel at the farm, and that is not nearly the price of wheat under present conditions. This again is government policy. Perhaps the government wants to get thanks from other countries; but again, as I said before, if it wants to get the cooperation of the farmer the government must pay in cash and not in credit or in flowery speeches.

It was announced yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the initial payment on this year's crop would be $1.25 a bushel. Under present conditions I am requesting, in fact demanding, of the government that they make that initial price $1.50, with participation certificates. World conditions to-day justify that price, and if there is to be a subsidy then it is the Canadian government's job, or the job of the people of Canada. Do not however continue to have the farmer make these gifts to other countries and bear all the cost himself. We are willing to produce the goods, and it is up to the government and the people of Canada to pay us for that work. To encourage people to deliver old grain stored on the farm, make those deliveries of old grain income tax free.

With reference to the income tax, I am not for a moment satisfied that the exemption at present is adequate. I am suggesting that it be raised to not less than $2,000, and instead of the present system of computing the tax we should have one on a five-year basis. We have pointed out time after time that farming is such a risky ocupation that a period of one or two or three years is not enough. We should have at least five years on which to base our income tax.

There has been some discussion here and in other parts of the country of an agricultural programme for the coming year. In my opinion it is good business to adopt a sound programme for agriculture and stay with it. There has been some discusison in the past couple of days about summer-fallowing versus putting in every available acre. As a farmer who has made good with the help of Providence, a good wife and family and loyal farm help, I believe in the summerfallow method. We are expected to raise more grain, particularly in the next three or four years, and if we are consistently to raise more grain we should stick to the summer-fallow method. Show me the farmer who consistently sows every acre and I will show you one who will soon be going down the road without any farm on which to live.

As regards the prices of other farm products, I suggest that they all be raised to a level which will bring the farmers a proper share of the national income. After that is done, I suggest that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture as well as the Minister of Trade and Commerce go to church next Sunday and pray fervently for favourable weather, because unless we get favourable weather it makes no difference what policy is put into effect, we shall not get production.

In addition, more labour should be provided, because the farmer has been worked to death in the past six or seven years and it is about time he had some relief in that regard.

Let me read once again the following statement in the speech from the throne:

> The government is seeking by all practicable means to make available for export the maximum supply of foodstuffs. Every encouragement is being given to increasing production.

I emphasize those words, that every encouragement is being given to increasing production.

> The gravity of the situation demands, on the part of the people of Canada, a united and wholehearted effort.

[Mr. Fair.]

As I have already stated, the Prime Minister made his announcement about saving food in Canada and about greater production, and within twelve hours of that time—do not forget this—the wartime prices and trade board ordered the price of gasoline and the price of all kinds of fuel oils in western Canada increased two cents a gallon. Bearing that in mind, listen once more to these words:

> Every encouragement is being given to increasing production.

The government was not satisfied to have the people throughout Canada pay a three-cent war tax on gasoline, but in order in increase production, to induce the farmers of the west to grow more food which could be sent to Europe, they came along with another two-cent increase in the price of gasoline. We are also faced with increasing costs of other things we have to buy.

Recently there have been strikes in the United States and some in Canada. The demand was for more wages and shorter hours. What will be the ultimate result? Greater costs to the consumer; and the farmer, while he is a primary producer, is also one of the heaviest consumers in the country.

I think it is about time the government revoked Mr. Gordon's order of two cents a gallon tax on gasoline. Perhaps the Prime Minister will make a statement to-night, and no later, and also at the same time announce the removal of the three-cent war tax on gasoline. Let them take that five cents a gallon off, and if they want other sources of revenue they can page the Minister of Finance and ask him to deal with his friends, the chartered banks of Canada.

Again, we have a tariff structure which is bleeding the western provinces. If you want production, remove that protection. On many occasions I have given figures here showing that the western provinces were bled to the extent of from $25 to $30 per capita in 1931, while some of the other provinces gained to the extent of $15.15 per capita. Perhaps it is time to remove some of these injustices and do justice to some other parts of the country.

Then I believe the farmers of Canada could do very well with better homes, with electric lights, with bath tubs and washing machines; that they would like better outbuildings, perhaps machine sheds here and there to save their machinery, which at the present time is in very short supply. I do not know whether it is Liberal policy, but I heard a Liberal member say in this house that it is an extravagance for a farmer to have a bathtub. He went on to say that when he wanted a bath he had it in the wash basin. I hope that is not Liberal policy, because the average farmer, including myself, wants something much better than a wash basin in which to have a bath. We also want to enjoy our radios, cars, water systems, electric light systems and so on, so I hope in the near future the farmers will be given a chance to provide themselves with these things which are long overdue.

I have spoken principally in connection with agriculture, and now I see my time is almost up. I had intended to deal with other subjects, but in the few minutes remaining I think I can say without fear of contradiction that if you have a prosperous agriculture all other classes in Canada are prosperous also. If you have a poverty-stricken agriculture, then every other group suffers. Perhaps I should say a few words about the soldier settlers, who are also in the farming class. On other occasions I have not allowed the debate on the speech from the throne to go by without saying something about them in particular, but since we expect a delegation from the soldier settlers' association to appear before the special committee on veterans' affairs, and since we expect that committee to recommend that they be given clear title to all their land, I am not going to plead for them at the present time.

Coming back for a moment to the question of the income tax, I know something of the sufferings of some civil servants and other workers during the war years. I know some people working in the service here in Ottawa had to send home for money in order to pay their room and board, or else go hungry toward the end of the month until payday came along. So I believe the time is long past when that class should be given relief from the present income tax levies, and I am suggesting that we bring the income tax exemption up to $2,000. There are other means of getting the necessary money, without keeping in the gutter the fellow who is down. Let us find those other means. Many people are pressing for housing which is badly needed, but until these restrictions are lifted and people are given some incentive to do an honest day's work it will not be possible to provide these homes which are so urgently required.

Then when people in industry and people on the farms finish their work; when they reach an age when they may expect to enjoy some well earned leisure, I believe we should have an old age pension for all without the means test. I believe this country can provide and should pay a pension of $50 a month at the age of sixty for both men and women. These people are not going to bury that money in the ground; they are going to spend it. They have earned it during their lifetime, but up to the present it has been stolen from them through poor legislation, legalized by the various governments in different parts of the country, and I believe that should cease. Without making any comparisons, I look back to a few months ago when I disposed of a team of faithful work horses I owned. I did not use them much during the past few years, but I did give them a good pasture in summer, a good barn in winter, and good feed. Then rather than see them suffer I took them out and ended their days. I have a little poem here which seems to pretty well describe the treatment we give many of our old people. It reads:

In heathen tribes, where skulls were thick, did primal passions rage,
They had a system, sure and quick, to cure the blight of age,
If one's native youth had fled, and time had sapped his vim,
They simply popped him on the head, and that was the last of him.
But in this, our enlightened age, we're made of finer stuff,
And so we look with righteous rage on methods so crude and tough,
So when our man grows old and gray, and bent and short of breath,
We simply take his job away, and let him starve to death.

I could go on and speak of old age pensions at greater length; I am going to do so on some other occasion when I have a better opportunity, but in order that some hon. members of the house may see the necessity for total revision of our old age pension set-up and the regulations governing it, which in many cases overrule the legislation itself, I should like to refer to a case which was brought to my attention just a few months ago. It is the case of an Irishman who lived in Scotland for a time and then came to Canada, with his wife. That was eighteen and a half years ago. His wife was the widow of a veteran of the first world war. As the result of both marriages this woman had a family of twelve children. Two of her sons served in the last war; one was wounded and almost passed away, but he is back in Canada and at present is on his own. This man is seventy-two years of age and is crippled with rheumatism. He has a rented farm which for the past two years has not produced enough to pay for the work on the farm. He is not able to work himself. They have one little girl at home for whom they receive $8 per month in family allowance. That is the only support the family has with the exception of $11.75 a week which is earned by the mother, who is fifty-five years of age and who works in a hotel in a nearby town. The father and little girl get along at home during the week; on Sunday the mother goes home and does the housework, the house cleaning and the washing and so on, and goes back to the hotel Monday morning. This man has applied for old age pension, but because he has not been in Canada the full twenty years his application has been denied. I am not blaming any of the authorities; I am blaming the members of the House of Commons. It is our responsibility. Here we have in our midst a man who is not getting proper nourishment. I am not going into any further details, but this is only one of many cases I could relate.

We have too much food here; we cannot distribute it simply because man-made laws passed twenty years ago stand in the way. I wonder what is the matter with us. Are we all still in the stone age of economic thought? I am asking you, Mr. Speaker, to insist with me that these conditions must be changed so that our bounteous production may be made available to the people of Canada, and to the world after our own wants are supplied. There is a way, by which no man will be made poorer but by which the poor will be made richer. Let us adopt it.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, at least once each year since coming to parliament in 1940 I have discussed a matter of urgent national importance, namely housing. It would appear, however, that the more frequently I speak the more acute the problem becomes. It is recognized throughout the world that the quality and quantity of houses available for citizens affect most vitally the health and welfare of the people. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, speaking in Detroit on September 9, 1935, on the occasion of her being present at the opening of one of the new housing projects in that city, said:

> This district has been expensive for the city of Detroit. Taxes are 92 per cent delinquent. Sixty-eight per cent of the dwellings have been condemned for human habitation. Records show crime to be six times the average for the city, juvenile delinquecy ten times the average, and tuberculosis seven and one-half times the average.

Then, I should like to refer to another internationally known person, Sir John Boyd Orr. In his recent booklet, "Design for Britain", he states:

> A higher incidence of disease in the slums makes a higher mortality rate. In Welwyn Garden City the rate is 5·9 per thousand. In Manchester slum areas it is 17·3. . . According to this estimate we bury every year 48,000 victims of bad housing.

Then he goes on to say:

> "It cannot be an accident that boys in one-room houses should be 11·7 lb. lighter on an average than boys from four-room houses, and 4·7 inches smaller . . . girls 14 lb. lighter and 5·3 inches shorter." any of the children who survive are in a more or less chronic state of ill health. It is from these slums that a great majority of hospital patients come.

I have argued that in war and peace time it is the responsibility of the federal government to face up to this national problem. I was disturbed by the Prime Minister's observations on Monday. He did not seem to be unduly concerned about the critical housing problem all across Canada. Indeed, he boasted about our satisfactory position as he saw it. Some hon. members on this side of the house questioned his statements, following which he proceeded in all seriousness to say:

> I ask my hon. friends to mention any other country. Will they say that in Great Britain they are in a better position as far as housing is concerned? Will they say that in the United States they are in a better position? Will they say the position is better in Belgium or in Holland; in Australia or New Zealand, South Africa or anywhere else? As a matter of fact when one compares Canada with these other countries in the matter of housing we make a better showing, in relation to our numbers, than any other country at the present time.

I was shocked when I heard the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) comparing housing conditions in this country with those in Great Britain and other countries which have been overrun by war. Certainly the people of Canada have more comfortable shelter than is available to people who have been exposed to warfare for so many long years. But the Prime Minister should not take credit for the fact that we have not been exposed to warfare, and that at the present time we possibly have better shelter for all the Canadian people than would be found in some European countries.

But the government of Canada has never given the sort of leadership the people might have expected. And, so far as his reference to New Zealand was concerned, the Prime Minister was quite wrong. The latest information from that country indicates that more than 17,000 state-owned houses have been built and made available for people in lower income brackets. The population of Canada is about eight times as great as that of New Zealand. If one multiplies by eight the figure I have given, he would get 136,000 as the number which should have been built by public authorities in Canada, had we been doing a job comparable with that of New Zealand since the Labour government took office.

Instead of that, however, I find that in Canada under National Housing we have built about 27,000 and under Wartime Housing about 16,000, or a total of about 43,000. One would need to multiply that figure by three before he would have a performance equal to that of New Zealand. And there is no comparison between the quality of houses being built in Canada under Wartime Housing, and the permanent houses built in New Zealand.

But hon. members do not have to take my word for the claim that Canada is backward in the field of housing. I would refer them to the Curtis report, published under the supervision of the Prime Minister where, on the very first page, among the findings and recommendations, we read this:

> Finally, Canada has lagged behind the example of European countries, of Great Britain, and of the United States, in providing greater governmental assistance for housing as a matter of welfare and public concern. These substantial reasons put housing into the forefront of domestic post-war plans.

I notice that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has just entered the chamber. The last time I discussed housing he was kind enough to interrupt me in connection with the situation in Saskatchewan. I have now before me a report prepared by the minister's department, before there was a C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan, in which housing conditions in the rural sections of that province are described. There is mention of that constituency represented for so many years by the Prime Minister. It is indicated that in Saskatchewan 2,711 farm dwellings were examined. Of that number 37·5 per cent were classified as being in poor condition, 56·5 per cent in fair condition and only 6 per cent in good condition. In the face of those percentages I do not see why any member of the government would care to accept credit for housing conditions as they are.

Last evening a number of members of the House of Commons went to the national film board to view some films dealing with housing and community planning. In all, five were shown, two of which were produced in the United States and three in the United Kingdom. It is significant that not one film was produced in Canada. If we have a record of which the Prime Minister is proud, why have we not films showing the people of Canada just what the government has accomplished in the field of housing? Why have we not films available for distribution in the United States, the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Sweden and other countries showing the wonderful advances made by the present administration in Canada in the field of solving our housing difficulties.

I must not allow the references made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) to the subject of housing to go unnoticed. I agree with him when he states that housing is the number one national emergency. However, I was not greatly impressed with his suggestions as to how the problem should be solved. He intimated, not that the situation could have been avoided, but, as I gathered from his comments, that had he been Prime Minister of Canada, in some way or another our housing problem would be solved.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is understandable that some hon. members sitting behind the leader of the opposition feel that the housing problem could be solved, just like that—simply by marking one's ballot on election day, and by replacing one government with another holding exactly the same views.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me remind the house that the leader of the opposition for twenty years was premier of Manitoba. However, he did not say the other day that much had been done during those twenty years to improve the housing situation in that province. From the dome of the legislative buildings in Winnipeg it is possible to see some of the most disgraceful slums in Canada. I am not suggesting that slum conditions there are worse than anywhere else; but I have some pictures which disclose a pretty ugly housing condition in that city. Let the leader of the opposition tell us one thing that was undertaken to solve the housing problem of Manitoba during the term as premier. In Manitoba they have an abundance of cement and lumber, and they have a vigorous climate. They have all the factors that should result in the government on the provincial level facing up to the problem and providing some decent houses. My hon. friend suggests that the situation has grown worse, but I can show the house pictures of houses that have been occupied for some fifty years. They were occupied during the time the leader of the opposition was premier of Manitoba.

I do not wish to spend any more time in criticizing the government for what has been done. I think all hon. members will agree that this government must face up immediately to this problem and demonstrate to our people that we can do in peacetime the sort of thing we did in war time when we broke the bottle-necks that existed, when we established new records of achievement in every field of production.

I think the first thing we must recognize is that we shall have to have some plan. We shall have to work out some technique so that the federal government, the provincial government and the municipal government can participate. We have used the British North America Act to pass responsibility from one authority to another. The result is that at the moment no level of government is taking the right type of action.

Thousands of our young people fought to save their homes. They have returned, and where are those homes that they fought to save? They cannot be found in Toronto, in Winnipeg, in Ottawa or in any city of Canada. If you do not believe me go to the reading room and check the want ad section of the daily papers from coast to coast. You will find pathetic appeals by ex-service men and their wives who want living quarters. They would be satisfied with anything. Even though rewards are offered, housing is apparently not available. So that the first job is to have the federal authorities take the initiative of bringing the provinces and municipalities together to sit around a conference table and decide on a technique that will result in houses being built. We solved many complex problems during the war, and it should be possible to work out the necessary details in order to set up the administrative machinery and get action at all levels of government.

In the meantime I should like to suggest a programme which I think is feasible, a thirteen point programme. We have had many programmes containing different numbers of points offered, but I think this thirteen point programme in connection with housing should be launched immediately. My first point is that we should stop the unnecessary export of building materials. I followed with interest the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). He did not seem greatly concerned about the large export of Canadian lumber. I am sure that all Canadians are anxious that some of our lumber should go to rebuild Great Britain and war-torn Europe, but I would remind the house that that is not where the bulk of our lumber is going.

During the Christmas recess I visited California and I saw a great many houses under construction. Some of our finest Canadian lumber was being used. I am most anxious that we retain friendly trading relations with our good neighbour, but with our housing situation so acute I do not think our neighbours to the south would expect us to deny our people necessary shelter while Canadian lumber is being used for luxury building in the United States. I saw a great many houses under construction, but I do not think any of those being built would cost less than $10,000. Perhaps it is no business of ours what type of houses are being built in the United States, but surely it is a matter of concern as to how much of our lumber is being exported and how much we are retaining for ourselves. The Monetary Times in a recent number contained a statement by the timber controller, as follows:

> "No change has occurred in the quantities that will be allowed for export," explained Canada's timber controller, D. D. Rosenberry. "The only difference is that producers now may ship that portion of their lumber to the countries of their choice."

In the United States less attention is paid to price ceilings than in Canada or Great Britain, and the result is that higher bidders will take all the lumber we wish to ship and the companies shipping lumber in this country can select the country to which they wish to ship. I notice in the same article that W. J. LeClair, secretary-manager of the Canadian lumbermen's association, says:

> If control were removed—within forty-eight hours we would not have one thousand feet in this country remaining in our possesion—legally and financially speaking.

Surely it should be the concern of this government and our people that sufficient lumber should be retained here to do the job of building decent houses for our people.

My second point is that we should prohibit deferable and non-essential building and stock-pile materials for housing construction.

Third, all building supplies in short supply should be rationed, giving top priority to housing costing under $5,000 per unit. Fourth, we should expand the production of materials to meet an objective of 100,000 housing units in 1946: This would provide employment for at least 250,000 workmen and would cost approximately the same as our aircraft production programme of 1944. I realize the difficulties that would be encountered, but when we consider our performance in the field of shipbuilding, aircraft production, tank production and so on, the building of 100,000 housing units in 1946 should be play compared with the difficult assignment carried out during the war.

Fifth, we should exercise better price control of building supplies and equipment until we make sure that there is enough material for all our people. In the United States congress there is now in committee stage a bill providing for ceilings on both old and new houses. In the original bill there was provision for $600,000,000 in the form of subsidies to keep prices within the reach of people who most urgently require accommodation.

My sixth point is that crown compaines should be set up to break the bottle-necks created by monopoly industry. As the Minister of Reconstruction told us yesterday, lumber is not the greatest problem. We are short of plumbing supplies, electrical appliances, building boards and other materials. During the war the government of this country found it necessary to establish crown companies when private concerns were unable or unwilling to do the job. The building of houses is a most important job for us now, and certainly some of the crown companies should be reorganized to produce materials in short supply.

My seventh point is that we should ensure the training of workers in the needed building skills. Again we take our pattern from the war years. We trained inexperienced young men and women from farms, towns and villages in welding, rivetting and all the essential jobs in our war industries. We now have a similar challenge, and our inexperienced people should be trained in the arts of house building.

My eighth point deals with the labour problem that would arise. Naturally men in the building trades would be concerned if large numbers were to come into the building trades on a temporary basis. We should enlist the cooperation of the men in the building trades by assuring them that Canada is prepared to embark on a long-term extensive building programme. The Prime Minister referred to New Zealand. I have not forgotten the speech that the Hon. Walter Nash made when he was here during the early months of the war. Mr. Nash outlined the objectives of the Labour government of New Zealand in the field of housing and said it was their goal that every family should have a plot of land on which they could raise flowers and vegetables, that every family should have a separate housing unit and that every individual should have a room where he could close the door and say: "This is my room; this is where my books and papers will be left, and when I return they will be exactly as I left them." Such a programme has never been enunciated or accepted by any government in Canada. We certainly have done very little to see that that sort of ideal should be placed before the Canadian people. But if this government was prepared to say that Canada will use Canadian materials and Canadian working men to carry out such a programme, all the men in the building trades would be assured of full employment on a yearly basis for an indefinite period.

My ninth point is that section 9 of the National Housing Act should be amended, if necessary, to give the provinces and the municipalities the right where desired, to establish limited dividend corporations to engage in housing. It is obvious that the mortgage companies are not dealing with this problem as it should be dealt with, and where provinces or municipalities wish to deal with this emergency problem they certainly should have the right to do so.

My tenth point is that subsidies should be provided to make sure that the difference between what the worker can pay and what is economic rent should be bridged by some authority, and the federal authority is the one to make that gesture. It is recognized that a great number of people in every country do not normally receive a large enough wage or income to provide decent accommodation. I have here a little booklet entitled, "Planning the Canada of To-Morrow", written by Gordon McL. Pitts, president of the architects' association. I find that according to these 1941 statistics 10 per cent of our Canadian workers received an income under $400. If you assume that they could afford for rent 20 per cent of their income, that group should not pay more than $6.50 a month. Then 12 per cent received an income between $400 and $799, which would enable them to pay $7.30 a month in rent; 18 per cent received an income between $800 and $1,199, on which they could pay a rent of $20 a month; and 22 per cent received an income between $1,200 and $1,599, which would enable them to pay $25 a month rent. It also shows that 62 per cent of the population of Canada earned less than $1,600 a year, none of whom could afford to pay more than $25 rent and, as I have already pointed out, 10 per cent earned an income on which they should not be paying more than $6.50 a month rent.

Nathan Strauss, a pioneer in public housing in the United States writes in the "Seven Myths of Housing":

> The public housing programme is founded on the fact that, without government subsidy, decent housing cannot be put within the means of the families that live in . . . slums. This fact, distasteful as it may be to many people, is incontrovertible. History and mathematics both confirm it. To achieve the goal of rehousing those families, the rents charged can be little more than half the rents which must be charged in livable new housing erected by private enterprise.

The federal Government is the only authority financially able to provide these subsidies.

My eleventh point is that Wartime Housing should be continued. In view of the criticisms I have made of Wartime Housing in the past it might seem strange at this stage that I want to see it continued. I frankly admit that Wartime Housing constructed and made available at lower rates better housing than the people who live in these quarters would have had if Wartime Housing had not come into the picture. However, I suggest that Wartime Housing, instead of building temporary houses which will eventually become slums should build permanent houses. It is unfortunate that Wartime Housing regulations, certainly in western Canada, have insisted that basements be not allowed. But the difference in cost between temporary and permanent housing is so small that I suggest that nothing but permanent houses should be built. In Great Britain, with a very short supply of materials, it has been announced that it is government policy that permanent rather than temporary houses shall be built. This will result in fewer houses being available at the end of 1946 but on the other hand the people who are housed in them will have permanent homes and the materials will not be wasted.

My twelfth point is that the National Housing Act should be amended so that loans might be made up to the full cost of houses. I understand that at the present time it is very difficult in most cities to get houses built at the valuation; that a house which costs $7,000 is valued for lending purposes at, say $5,000. A house costing $5,000 is declared to have a rental value of $4,000, and consequently the prospective owner must advance $1,400 to secure a maximum loan of $3,600. The act should be amended so that the prospective owner should not be required to make such a large initial payment.

My thirteenth and last point under this head is a recommendation that machinery should be established so that loans might be made available to farmers and residents of towns and villages under the National Housing Act. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will probably reply that there is nothing to stop that now, but one of the returns brought down last year showed that not a single farm dwelling had been constructed in Canada under the National Housing Act.

I come to my next suggestion, which must be part of any over-all solution, namely that the provinces should be taken immediately into the confidence of the federal authority and the responsibility of each worked out, and then I suggest that the provinces should pass legislation defining the metropolitan and regional areas within the province. News items appearing in the Ottawa papers recently regarding disputes between the city of Ottawa and the township of Nepean indicate the problems that arise as we try to acquire land to solve our housing problems. The metropolitan cities in Canada or in any other country are a collection of a number of separate corporations, and if the housing problems of the people living in that area are to be solved there must be a larger unit that will have jurisdiction and authority to purchase land and plan and zone the communities.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

The idea of planning our communities is not a new one. In the days of the Romans the authorities worked out carefully prepared plans for their new communities. When they were establishing a new town they decided where the market should be, where the churches and the residences should be and what form of protection should be provided against a possible enemy. All these details were carefully worked out. But unfortunately in the building of Canada these factors have not been taken into consideration. In the building of our towns in the west, for instance, someone who owned some land and had some pull was able to get a townsite established on his section, and even though there might be good water and a good building site a mile away towns were frequently built on swamps or in the worst possible location. All this sort of thing results from the failure of the authority on the provincial level or on the national level to set up metropolitan and regional areas and plan their development. So that the job to be done by the provinces would be, as I see it, to make sure that they have their metropolitan and rural regional areas planned so that there may be an orderly development of the various communities within the province.

Other responsibilities of the province would be to set up limited dividend corporations and participate in the job of building houses, if necessary. They should allocate the dominion loans to the corporations and guarantee the repayment, and they should also provide for the building of houses in communities which have not been organized or in communities where the local commissions are failing to function.

A final word about the responsibility, on the local level of government, of the local authorities. Here is where the rank and file of the people must participate actively, in seeing that the slums are cleared, that the type of houses built are to conform with modern standards, taking into account our great resources and the type of housing we should like to have for ourselves and for our children. The local municipalities should appoint members to metropolitan or regional commissions who, with local members representing the provincial and federal authorities, would plan their areas, set priorities under the plan, buy, expropriate, hold and lease land, plan neighbourhoods, lease land for public housing, according to their over-all plan, and re-house those moved in slum clearance. It will be necessary, of course, for them to raise their share of the local funds required to carry out their programme.

In conclusion, let me summarize the responsibilities on each level of government.

Ottawa must provide enough building materials, must channel them to low-cost houses, provide funds for a large-scale housing programme, and make them available to provinces for low-cost, low-rent houses.

The provinces must promote the home building programme, co-operate with the dominion and the municipalities, set up metropolitan housing commissions, and help them plan and build neighbourhoods.

The municipalities must follow through on the local level, join the housing commissions to make them work energetically, and stimulate local interest and education for neighbourhood building.

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, during the last session of parliament, a resolution was voted in this chamber, which read in part as follows:

> Resolved, that in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that Canada possess a distinctive national flag and that a joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon a suitable design for such a flag . . .

The joint committee appointed held two meetings, on November 27 and December 4, 1945.

About fifteen hundred various flag designs were tabled before the members of the committee, who felt unable to formulate a specific recommendation in the short time at their disposal. A similar joint committee will be set up to continue the study of this important question at the present session of parliament.

Therefore the choice of a national flag for our country stands amongst the matters of major importance which will be dealt with by the members of this house in the course of the coming weeks. My intention in bringing this subject forward at this early stage of the session, and purposely before the flag joint committee resumes its work, is to give to this contentious but at the same time vital problem an entirely new approach, an approach which is not based on either English-Canadian or French-Canadian sentiment but merely upon daring logic. At the same time I am endeavouring to bring, in this important national issue, my modest but sincere contribution to national unity.

For many years there has been a growing sentiment in favour of a distinctive national flag in every part of Canada. Although a young nation, Canada finds herself to-day one of the important powers of the world. In the course of the last thirty years our country has performed great achievements from which Canadians derive a glowing national pride, and this translates itself into a distinctive Canadian spirit. This new Canadian spirit grew to unexpected proportions during these last war years, particularly amongst our service men and women. As a result, never before in our history has there been a time when Canadians were prouder of being Canadians. And anywhere in the world where a Canadian may go to-day, he is welcomed, he is greeted, and he is highly respected as soon as he identifies himself as a Canadian.

Certainly the time has come when that Canadian, proud as he is of his own land, should be given a distinctive sign by which he could easily, promptly and fully identify himself at first sight as being a Canadian. The time is now due when this country, our country, should be given a distinctive national flag by which she could distinctly identify herself from other parts of the world, a Canadian flag that would make every Canadian boy and girl live, not for the country his or her ancestors came from, one or two or three hundred years ago, but live for, work for, fight for, and be ready to die for his or her own sacred native land—Canada.

Nothing has contributed more to the rise of sectionalism in this country in the past than the lack of a national flag, in Canada and for Canada. We need a national flag, distinctly Canadian, which will recall to all Canadians that their hearts should be broad enough to love their family, their village, their province, but above all, their Canada, a national flag which will infuse into the hearts and minds of Canadians a sound sentiment of duty and responsibility toward their land, all of their land.

Had we all been true Canadians in the past; had we steadily instilled the principles of Canadianism, without hyphens, without descriptive prefixes; had we "let the dead bury their dead"; had we had a distinctive national flag, then most of the differences which tend to divide us Canadians of different racial extractions, especially in periods of national emergency, would never have arisen.

At this point, may I recall that perhaps no individuals in Canada hold more power in their hands to spread about unity throughout this country than the representatives of the Ottawa press gallery.

Speaking from the experience which I have gathered during the last session of parliament, may I add that in no other place in Canada have I found a more tangible and more sincere spirit in favour of Canadian unity than amongst our good friends of the press gallery. They can rest assured that their constant and valuable efforts in favour of bringing about a better spirit of understanding in this country are widely recognized and highly appreciated by all true Canadians.

Other apostles of Canadian unity can also be found in the editorial rooms of many of our leading Canadian dailies, weeklies or periodicals as well as in the newsrooms of our broadcasting stations. To indicate to what extent the majority of Canadians of either language are able to agree on matters of principle pertaining to the government of this country, may I give as striking examples the editorials written day after day, and week after week, by two outstanding Canadian journalists. One is English speaking, the other is French speaking. One is Mr. B. K. Sandwell, editor in chief of Saturday Night of Toronto, whose editorials are widely welcomed in the province of Quebec as much as they are in other parts of Canada. The other is Mr. Eugene L'Heureux of Quebec city, who for many years contributed regularly to five daily newspapers in the province of Quebec. Mr. L'Heureux' daily editorials reflect the sentiments and the deep thoughts of the majority of the people of the province of Quebec, yet they could be translated and published in newspapers of English expression throughout Canada, and win the approval of most English speaking Canadians, as well as Mr. Sandwell's editorials could be translated into French and published in any newspapers of French expression and be well received by Quebec readers at large. What is the reason? Both are true Canadians, and represent each in his respective sphere the sentiments of all true Canadians of either language.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Mr. Speaker, the experience of two or more races working together hand in hand to establish the foundation of a great nation is not new in history. Right at our doorstep, in our good neighbour the United States of America, we have an outstanding example. Perhaps a more striking example is that of Great Britain herself. Look at the history of Great Britain from the year 1066, when William, Duke of Normandy, won the battle of Hastings and established his Norman legions in the British isles, until 1603, when the kingdoms of Scotland and England were united after centuries of strife and war; until 1707, when the legislative union of England and Scotland was completed, and until 1801, when Ireland was admitted into the union.

To-day we in Canada are facing the same problems that Great Britain faced some three hundred years ago, when the flag question was raised in that country. Let us see how the problem was solved in the British isles to the satisfaction of the different elements which composed the United Kingdom at that time. Let us trace the experience of the British people in solving a similar problem in similar circumstances under similar conditions; and then let us ask ourselves what our national flag should be in order to symbolize Canada and at the same time help bring about unity in this country.

A flag is a symbol, which stands for the principles for which a nation stands, just as the cross, for instance, stands for Christianity. Symbols stand close to men and interpret great ideas to them. They enable the imagination to maintain a grasp on vast abstractions such as the ideas of religion, of nationality, of country, of unity. In all ages and at all times, it has been so. The deeper we go into history, the more evidence we find that man, whatever his condition, his culture, his country, has universally displayed this innate instinct of glorifying some national symbol; but before the time of the crusades we cannot find evidence of any flag that could be described at national. It was not earlier than 1277 that the cross of St. George was definitely produced by Edward I as the national symbol of England. As to Scotland, it is agreed that the Scots had adopted the cross of St. Andrew as their national emblem at an earlier period, though we find the first evidence of this in 1365, when they planned to invade England assisted by a large contingent of French.

In 1603 the two kingdoms of England and Scotland were united under the crown of James VI of Scotland, who became James I of England. The approval of the two nations to tie their fate together did not immediately lead to unity between the peoples of the two countries. National differences ran high. It is quite interesting to note that the total population of both England and Scotland at that time did not quite equal the population of Ontario and Quebec to-day. The problems of unity between the two races were of the same nature as the problems of Canadian unity we have to face to-day. The question of a flag for the new British nation was handled with all the wisdom and far-reaching national sense that we Canadians ought to display in dealing with the same problem to-day.

How was this question settled in Great Britain 340 years ago? Did James I of Scotland try to impose the Scottish cross of St. Andrew upon the English people as a compromise? No; both the Scots and the English met half way. The year 1606 saw the birth of the first union jack, made by combining the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew in one field. It was not called Great Britain's flag; it was called the king's flag. Then by a proclamation issued by King James on April 12, 1606, it was ordered that England and Scotland were to retain their respective national flags. Twenty-eight years later, on May 5, 1635, King Charles I issued a proclamation giving further instructions as to the use of the flags, as follows:

> We . . . do hereby straitly prohibite and forbid that none of our subjects, of any of our nations and kingdoms, shall from henceforth presume to carry the union flagge in the maintop, or other part of any of their ships . . . upon paine of our high displeasure, but that the same union flagge bee still reserved as an ornament proper for our owne ships and ships in our immediate service and pay, and none other.
> And likewise our further will and pleasure is, that all the other ships of our subjects of England or South Britain bearing flags, shall from henceforth carry the red crosse, commonly called St. George's cross, as of olde time hath been used; and also that all the other ships of our subjects of Scotland or North Britain shall from henceforth carry the white cross, commonly called St. Andrew's crosse.

From 1634 until the death of Charles I in 1649 it was only on a few special occasions, and as a distinct favour, that merchant ships of either England or Scotland were granted permission to use the union jack. The execution of Charles I on January 30, 1649, for a time dissolved the union between England and Scotland. Under those circumstances the union jack was dropped, each country retaining its national flag. In 1654 Scotland was reunited to England and the cross of St. Andrew was reintroduced into the British flag on May 1, 1660.

I assume these facts are sufficient evidence that in Great Britain the flag problem was not solved merely by introducing a single flag by an act of parliament. As we have seen, each of the countries which entered the union retained its own national flag, and at the same time considered the union jack as the king's flag, the king's colours which they were permitted to fly under certain conditions, regulated by the king in council.

Now, without intending to trace the origin and development of the red ensign from the days of Cromwell, may I point out that 1707, when the legislative union of England and Scotland was completed, the use of the red ensign on all ships was officially authorized by Queen Anne. From 1707 until 1801 the red ensign was regarded as the only legal ensign of Great Britain. It was the red ensign, for instance, which in 1759 was flown by Wolfe's battleships cruising on the St. Lawrence river a few weeks prior to the historic battle of the Plains of Abraham where two great races fought on a common battlefield which was to become their common land.

A painting by Francis Swaine in 1760 can be seen in the Royal Museum of Ontario. It shows one of Wolfe's ships, HMS Vanguard anchored near Percé Rock, off the coast of Gaspe, flying the red ensign. By order in council of July 9, 1864, the red ensign was made the exclusive property of the British mercantile marine. In 1892, as the Canadian merchant marine was using the same plain red ensign as was used by the merchant marine of Great Britain and as Canadian ships at sea were unable to be identified from those of Great Britain, the lords commissioners of the admiralty issued a warrant permitting the coat of arms of Canada to be inserted in the red ensign; and this new combined red ensign was by this empowered to be used on board vessels registered in the Dominion of Canada.

Finally, in 1924 the red ensign, with the Canadian coat of arms, was authorized to be flown over all premises owned or occupied by the Canadian government abroad. That is, in short, the history of the red ensign as we see it on the Peace Tower to-day. It is not a Canadian flag. It is not a land flag. It is not even a flag; it is an ensign. Further, it is a naval ensign, the naval ensign of all British ships at sea, with the exception that it bears the Canadian coat of arms. It is British, not Canadian, and it is three steps down from the union jack.

With the coat of arms of Canada it is also the authorized ensign of the Canadian merchant marine. Therefore I suggest that it is not distinctive, and that it cannot be accepted as a distinctive national flag of Canada. Besides that, the adoption of it as our national flag would result in confusion and, in addition, it would be anti-heraldic, and illogical to fly it ashore.

An outstanding citizen from Victoria, British Columbia, Mr. Robert D. MacLachlan, in a pamphlet entitled, "What is All This Talk about a Canadian Flag?" had this to say about the 1924 order in council authorizing that the red ensign be flown on Canadian government premises abroad:

> It was however the flag of a colony. The position of the jack on the flag (upper quarter next to the flag staff) denoted the sovereignty of the British parliament over the Canadian parliament which was represented on the flag by the Canadian coat of arms on the fly—a position denoting inferiority.
> In 1924 Canada was legally a colony of Great Britain so the flag was then correct and in accordance with heraldic law.

From a letter sent out to the members of the Senate and the House of Commons in October last by the Toronto assembly No. 107 of the Native Sons of Canada, I quote briefly:

In a national flag if more than one emblem is displayed the upper lefthand corner next to the staff is reserved for the emblem of the dominant state, and the lower righthand corner on the fly is reserved for the vassal or subservient state.

A national flag speaks of the authority of the parliament of the country it represents. The union jack speaks of the authority of the parliament of the United Kingdom, and its inclusion in the place of honour in a Canadian flag means that Canada is a dependency of the United Kingdom.

May I quote now again, briefly, from an editorial published in the well known Toronto weekly, Saturday Night, on October 27, 1945, entitled, "Nation and Flag":

Surely the opponents of the official recognition of a Canadian flag must see, if they will look at the matter with their brains and not with their feelings, that it is fundamentally absurd for nation A, which is so distinct from nation B, that it can be at peace when nation B is at war and at war when B is at peace to insist that its flag and the flag of B are and must ever remain identical.

A national flag is a symbol of sovereignty. The sovereignty of Canada is vested in the Canadian people, as the sovereignty of the United Kingdom is vested in the people of the kingdom. They are not the same sovereignty. They do not need the same flag.

If there are any Canadians who should be entitled to have something to say about the choice of a national flag in Canada, I assume that this house will agree with me that they are those gallant, courageous and brave young service men and women who in this last war year after year—and they were long years—thousands of miles away from their native land were doing the fighting.

In the December 10, 1945 issue of the Canadian army forces newspaper The Maple Leaf published in London, England, I read that service men speak out loudly for a truly Canadian flag. May I quote briefly:

Reported erroneously in a Canadian dispatch as having been approved by the king as the national flag of Canada, but later found to be only one of a thousand designs submitted, the controversial banner incorporated a union jack in the upper lefthand corner, a sprig of three maple leaves in the centre of a white field and three golden fleur-de-lis on a blue circle in the upper righthand corner. That the matter of Canada's flag is close to the heart of Canadians overseas is shown by the fact that more letters were received on this subject in the past two days than on any other subject or controversy over an ordinary two-week period.

Here is a short quotation from an editorial published in The Maple Leaf on this subject entitled, "Ottawa Papers Please Copy":

[Mr. Arsenault.]

Who has a better right to voice their opinion on the proposed all-Canadian flag than the men and women of Canada's fighting forces now being demobilized?

Elsewhere on this page are excerpts from letters written by all ranks of servicemen and women of the navy, army and R.C.A.F. Almost of one accord they express a well-round "No" to the proposed flag, the sketch of which appeared in the December 6 issue of The Maple Leaf. We know that the story of this particular flag is not official, but it has served to uproot a flood of opinion that cannot be ignored.

A recent Gallup poll resulted in sixty-eight per cent of the people in Canada wanting an entirely distinctive flag. And now the voice of Canadians in the United Kingdom is being heard in no uncertain terms. We believe that their ideas should carry as much weight as Canadians at home. To the committee at home in whose hands lies the final selection, we say . . . please note.

In this convincing manner the editor of The Maple Leaf supports the opinion of his correspondents on the flag issue. And I sincerely hope that every member of the house will carefully note the opinion expressed by our servicemen and women on the choice of the national flag, such as outlined in The Maple Leaf. With them I repeat:

Who has a better right to voice an opinion on the proposed all-Candian flag than the men and women of Canada's fighting forces now being demobilized?

And I will add: Who knows better than they the meaning of sacrifice for country?

At this point I wish to make a clear distinction between a national flag, an official flag and an authorized flag or ensign. Canada has an authorized ensign and an official flag. Canada has as yet no national flag. Canada has had an authorized ensign since 1892. That is the red ensign with the Canadian coat of arms in the fly which was authorized for use by merchant vessels registered in Canada. That was confirmed by the Canadian Shipping Act of 1934.

Canada has had an official flag since 1911. The union jack was officially declared to be the proper flag to be flown on land in Canada. I cannot think of any reason, historical, constitutional or otherwise why the union jack and the red ensign should not be retained in their particular places to fulfil their particular functions, one as our king's flag and the symbol of our membership in the British commonwealth of nations, the other as the ensign of our merchant ships, with perhaps a maple leaf in the lower righthand corner instead of the coat of arms of Canada.

All nations of the world at all times have used different flags for different tactical purposes. Those flags have been described as national, official or authorized flags or ensigns. Speaking before the joint committee on December 4, 1945, the Secretary of State (Mr.

Martin) declared that Great Britain at present uses over one hundred different designs of national, official or authorized flags or ensigns. Those who go to Montreal once in a while can see in the Windsor station over twenty-one designs of British flags. Prior to the last war France was using at least seven different flags which were entirely different from one another. Besides the tricolour there was the Tripoli merchant flag, the Algiers flag, the Tunis flag, the French Cochin-China flag, the kingdom of Siam ensign and the Madagascar flag.

To-day the United States of America are using at least six different flag designs. There are the stars and stripes, the President's flag, the United States union jack, the United States yacht ensign, the United States revenue flag and the Hawaiian flag. Although Hawaii is a possession of the United States, their flag has nothing at all of the stars and stripes in its design. Another example, is the island of Malta which is a British possession. They also have a national flag which has absolutely nothing in common with the union jack. As we all recall, that flag is the Maltese red cross on a white field. There are scores of other examples that could be given all along the line.

As do other leading countries of the world, Canada may use different designs of flags, either national, official or authorized, for different tactical purposes. Canadians could at this time, on behalf of unity, take advantage of these exceptional circumstances and the great interest aroused by the choice of a national flag to settle once and for all, not only this matter of the choice of a national flag for Canada but the whole question of our Canadian flag and ensigns. This should be settled by an act of this parliament of a free nation.

Since Canada is a member of the British commonwealth, united to her sister nations under the constitutional authority of the same king, I cannot very well see why anyone in this country could reasonably object to the full-sized union jack being officially recognized by this parliament as the official symbol of our partnership in the commonwealth, the finest example in history of mutual friendship between nations and one of the strongest means of maintaining peace in the world in these trying days.

Too much is involved to try to put forward any sort of narrow nationalism in the face of the distressful conditions that we find in the world to-day. Not only should we help to maintain the British commonwealth of nations, we should have a commonwealth of all the nations of the world based on the same principles of mutual friendship and collaboration. The union jack is here to stay, to stay as long as Canada is ready to share her obligations and the benefits of her privileges as part of the British commonwealth of nations. There is a great principle involved in this issue with far-reaching consequences which cannot be overlooked by anyone. As a French-speaking representative in this house from the province of Quebec may I say that Quebec will be the last province of Canada to pull down the union jack. Our religion, our language, our civil rights were guaranteed and granted to us French-speaking Canadians under the union jack. As the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) stated in the house on November 13, 1945:

> It is under the union jack that the institutions of this Canadian nation have grown and developed and have brought us to the point where now, and for a good many years now, the dominion is and has been an autonomous state subject in no phase of its domestic or its external affairs to any other authority than this Canadian parliament.

I notice that my time is just about up, but with the unanimous consent of the house I should like to finish stating my conclusions. They will take only a few more minutes. The province of Quebec also remembers, as much as any other part of Canada, those uncertain and crucial days of 1940 and 1941 when there occurred the collapse of France and of all organized armed resistance on the European continent, when the United States had not had Pearl Harbor and when Soviet Russia had not yet entered the war. Quebec realizes that we French-speaking Canadians or English-speaking Canadians would all be slaves of Germany to-day had it not been for the three crosses of Saint George, Saint Andrew and Saint Patrick which were joined together and lifted proudly by Great Britain along with the dominions against the enemies of mankind.

As evidence of this contention and without any discriminating intentions, may I say that while the red ensign, the authorized flag of our merchant navy, is flown on these parliament buildings, the union jack, the full-sized union jack still unfolds itself to the breeze on parliament hill of Quebec only a few acres away from the very spot where 187 years ago two chivalrous and gallant soldiers, Wolfe and Montcalm, sealed the fate of this country.

Canada's constitutional position to-day with respect to Great Britain is similar to the position of Scotland with respect to England from 1603 to 1707. For over one hundred years the two kingdoms of Scotland and England were united under one king but had separate parliaments. For over one hundred years, from 1603, the year of the union of the two kingdoms under one king, until 1707, the year of the legislative union of the two countries, each of these nations had their national flag but both nations used the union jack at the same time as the king's flag, the flag of their union under the same king.

To-day Canada is constitutionally an equal of Great Britain. Each country has a separate parliament but both countries are united under the same king. Each country has the same symbol of allegiance to the king, the union jack. Canada has an official flag, the union jack. Canada has an authorized ensign for her merchant marine, the red ensign. Canada now needs a national flag such as both England and Scotland had prior to the legislative union of the two countries. Therefore, I propose, as the only possible satisfactory and final settlement of the flag issue in Canada, the following, which will undoubtedly win the almost unanimous support of all true Canadians of whatever racial extraction or language:

1. That this parliament of a free, autonomous and independent nation reconfirms the union jack as Canada's king's flag and as the official symbol of our country's partnership in the British commonwealth of nations.

2. That this parliament maintains the red ensign in the functions it has filled ever since 1892 as the naval ensign of Canada's merchant marine, with possibly the coat of arms being replaced by the maple leaf.

3. That this parliament gives to the Canadian nation a national flag, which will not be an English-Canadian flag, or a French-Canadian flag, or an English and French colonial flag, but an all-Canadian national flag.

Speaking in this house on November 13, 1945, the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) declared:

> The purpose for which it is suggested there should be a distinctive national flag is to have a symbol that all Canadians can look upon as distinctively their own, not because they want to discard the union jack, but because the union jack is not distinctively their own and because they feel that their nation has now reached the stature in the family of nations that requires it to have something which can be regarded as its own.

On February 14, 1938, when the flag questiontion came up in this house, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made the following statement:

> The use of the union jack on anything that is distinctively Canadian in the United States does not help to emphasize the individuality of this country or its distinct nationality; it helps to submerge them together.

The hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), speaking in this house on the same subject on November 8, 1945, said:

> We in Canada have shared the union jack, and we shall always honour it as the symbol of much that is best and most precious in our heritage; but we have had nothing that has been peculiarly and indisputably our own, that would symbolize Canada, all of Canada and everyone in Canada. There should be something that all can see and look to with pride, as the symbol of this great nation of ours, to which affection and loyalty can attach, and which can become the sign of the unity and purpose that will make Canada great.

One final quotation. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), speaking in this house on November 8, 1945, said:

> I wish to see Canada with a distinctive flag, and in my opinion the red ensign with a coat of arms on it, which I would rather say nothing about, is not a distinctive flag. . . . The flag of the British commonwealth is the union jack, and we respect it, but I am pleased indeed to know that my hon. friends to the right are prepared to recognize that the time has come when Canada should have a flag of her own.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is a free nation, just as politically free from Great Britain as Great Britain is free from her, and certainly more economically independent from the British isles than she is from us. Therefore a national flag for Canada must not constitute the symbol of what Canada was when she stood as a colony under the supreme authority and jurisdiction of the imperial parliament, but of what she is to-day, an independent nation, a respected power amongst the nations of the world.

Like most countries Canada has a symbol which is recognized the world over as the expression of Canadian nationality. That emblem is the maple leaf. On this one thing we find the Canadian people almost unanimous, that the maple leaf must be given the position of honour in the proposed national flag if it is to be an all-Canadian flag.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house to proceed I must ask him to resume his seat as his time has expired.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak as a private member of the house and as a member of the opposition. I have consistently supported certain principles ever since I came into the house.

First I wish to congratulate the government upon writing off the $400,000,000 owed by Britain to Canada under the commonwealth air training plan, and next I congratulate the government upon advancing a loan to Britain to facilitate the exchange of exports and imports between our two countries.

I should like to say to the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Arsenault) and to the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) that had it not been for the glorious young Canadians and young men from the other dominions who stood by Britain's side when she had to go it alone at Dunkirk and afterwards at Dieppe, we might have experienced the awful horrors of war on our own Canadian soil, the concentration camps, the whip, the gestapo police, the loud speaker and savagery—and the carting away of thousands of the people of Quebec, Ontario, and the maritimes as thousands were carted away from countries ravaged by the German war machine. Now is the time for cool heads, clear thinking, and plain speaking. There is a great deal of kindness in this House of Commons. I found that out years ago when I first entered the house, but the time has come to pay tribute where it is due, to Britain for saving our shores from invasion.

Speaking of the glorious part that France played in the war of 1914-18 and of the tribulations which that country suffered and her triumphs I would remind the house that Mr. Churchill said that France will always be a great nation and ally of Britain, and we all hope that it will be restored very shortly.

I wish to congratulate the government on the appointment of that great soldier, Lord Alexander, to be governor general of this country. In the session of 1943-44, in a debate on external affairs, I proposed to the Prime Minister that after a great war we should follow what was the custom in that great land to the south of us where, following the war between the north and the south, great soldiers were elected to be president of that great country, and that similarly we should appoint a great soldier to be governor general of Canada, and in that debate I proposed that either Lieutenant-General Montgomery or Lieutenant-General Alexander be appointed the next governor general of this country. I hope there will not be any departure from that principle of a great Briton being appointed, which has been observed since confederation. Appointments from the old land act as a system of checks and balances. It is a system which harmonizes parties and eliminates party strife, and the various great men who have occupied the office have done a great deal for the welfare of our empire and of mankind.

I have referred in this house from time to time to the principles which I continue to support. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Christianity is part of the law of England, and by the Constitutional Act of 1791 it became the law of Canada. Certain principles should be supported in these debates. These are some economic truths which should be an aid: To uphold the Christian religion and resist all attacks on it. Adequate security against external aggression and safety for our seaborne trade. An armed Britain forever aided by Canada. The maintenance of internal law and order, that all men may reap what they have sown. Impartial justice administered by a judiciary free from any interference or pressure on the part of the executive, and I want to compliment the member for West Calgary (Mr. Smith) on his able address last night in the liberty of the subject. Sound finance and strict supervision of our national income and expenditure. Continuous and long-sighted development of our empire trade, without which Great Britain and her dominions will perish. The promotion of all measures which will improve the health, happiness, welfare and social conditions of the people of this country as a whole. Support of private enterprise and initiative as against state trading and the nationalization of industries. Go not with the multitude to do wrong. Always tell the truth to the people. You can ask a sacrifice of the people without fear, but to offer a bribe is dangerous. While it is not the empire's business to be the policeman of the world, it is equally not our job to be its governess. Trust the people and they will trust you.

I say to the government of the day, do not be afraid to tell the people that you have made a mistake. The Canadian people do not expect its leaders to be gods. Lastly, never legislate against human nature.

There are four cardinal principles which we in this country have forgotten, although I believe they are intimately connected with our greatest domestic problems of the present time. They are as follows: parliamentary reform, constitutional reform, cabinet reform and law reform. Twenty years ago they got law reform in England. In this matter we are twenty years behind the times. Long overdue is the consolidation of our statutes, which I have urged for a number of years, as also has the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) since he came to the house. The code was written in 1907. As the debates have shown, our laws need overhauling.

A day or two ago there was introduced into the legislature of Ontario a budget which forecasts a deficit of $21 million, and which is another evidence of the need of a new charter for the provinces. When all is said and done, such conditions were beyond the scope of the imagination of the fathers of confederation. The provinces were created, one might say, for political and not economic purposes. As I have said before, they are only a duplication of the municipal system. But if their powers and rights and privileges under section 92 of the British North America Act are taken from them by this parliament, the time must come for writing a new charter. They are here now to stay and have a function and a duty to perform in confederation, and it is not right to take their revenues away from them and then expect them to meet post-war conditions. I look upon the province of Ontario as a forgotten child of confederation. Some years ago, together with my friend Mr. McCrea, of Sherbrooke, then a very much respected government member, I asked a question which was the subject of joint returns, which showed that forty-three per cent of the cash taxes of this country are paid by Ontario, and about forty-one per cent by Quebec, so that eighty-three per cent of the cash taxes of this country are contributed by the two industrial provinces. I have always been in favour of the principle for confederation, the old Cornish battle-cry, "Each for all and all for each." I believe that principle is yet sound. I never heard before 1939 the argument that the province of Ontario is living off the west; I am sure it is not right, either in the economic sense, the historical sense, or any financial sense The time has now come when something should be done on this subject and the government must find a solution of the problem in the coming dominion-provincial conference. Ontario needs active help and at once to meet her functions.

I should like to say a word in reply to those who raised the question of providing food for Britain. It is proposed that we should have a much greater food production. I remember that in the session of 1938, three months before Munich, and again in the spring of 1939, when the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture were before the house, and I saw the war coming, and when the British Medical Association were meeting in London, I proposed that this country should establish underground food reservoirs to store our wheat, food and canned goods in the old country. At that time Canada had a preference for wheat in the mother country. Yet there were those on the prairies who contended that theirs was a free trade industry, that it was a north and south industry instead of an east and west industry to Britain and her allies. That was proven to be a fallacy. At the meeting of the British Medical Association it was shown that hard wheat could be stored scientifically and kept good for ten years over there, and not the Canadian wheat bootlegged the way it used to be along the harbours of the seaboard on the United States side. Had such war food reservoirs been established and wheat stored there, consider what the position would have been in the spring of 1940 and in 1941 when, during the great battle of the Atlantic, the mother country had only two and half weeks' supply of food. We abrogated the British preference foolishly on wheat by the United States treaty of 1938 and threw away our preference. I mention this to indicate what might have been done in view of the war, at a time when, I believe, we had half a billion bushels of wheat available a year, instead of paying an acre bonus not to sow it at all.

On this matter of food production I doubt whether the government has gone far enough. It is all very well to talk about summerfallowing and that sort of thing; the grain could be sown now and shipped next fall to the markets in Europe, where suffering is so intense. If we go into the production of coarse grains and turn them into pork it will be some time before the product will be obtained. I believe that my leader, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken), was quite right in calling the government's attention to that particular point.

I support this loan to Britain because it is founded upon a sound basis, namely on the exchange of goods and services in the form of exports and imports. It is not like the United States loan, which is simply an exchange of goods for gold or for debt. Why was that debt of Britain incurred with our great ally to the south? It was incurred to save the shores of America from invasion, and we must not forget that very little in the way of cash will be obtained from the new American loan. Moreover, when we remember that the loan is tied up with the Bretton Woods agreement, the success of which is very doubtful, tied up with the abolition or curtailment of preferences and with other conditions, I believe that the Canadian government has made a good exchange in the loan of $1,250 million. I should like to see the loan to the mother country from the United States withdrawn. Canada has the services that are needed. She has wheat, flour, manufactured goods of all sorts, canned goods and all the rest of it, and I see no reason why the other dominions, Australia and New Zealand, could not take up the balance of the loan of four billions, if we increased our loan, so as to give the mother country a chance to recover. It would help to pay the debt which, after all, America as a whole owes to the mother country for protecting our shores, because there is no doubt in the world that the mother country has saved from invasion not only the shores of Canada, but New York, Boston, and Savannah, Georgia, where the Bretton Woods people met to-day.

I have said before, and I repeat, that the United States government always speaks with two voices, the congressional voice and the voice of the President. Do not forget that the American government is not the American congress. I doubt whether congress will agree to the loan until next fall and then only on certain conditions that Britain will not be able to accept the loan.

I was in Cleveland the other day, in Buffalo and in some other cities in the United States and I found out what former members of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had been doing. Upton Close and others who think like him were before and for a year or two on the payroll of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at one time, and I remember calling the attention of the government to the fact that the C.B.C. were hiring aliens here to spread news unfavourable to this country and the empire and the cause of the allies. As a matter of fact, at that time the C.B.C. was one of the most mischievous institutions in Canada. It was sending out information which it had no right to disseminate. What did Upton Close say in Cleveland the other day? There appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer advertisements of his views for meetings, in which he said that the British empire is on crutches and is nearly at the end of its day. Similar views have been expressed by others. I have here reports of speeches made in the old country commenting on all this, but I will not take the time now to quote from them. I wish to protest against the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation being used in this mischievous way at a time when the mother country has suffered so severely. We find twenty-six thousand church and school buildings destroyed over there, while not a farmhouse, not a barn has been pulled down, as a result of the war, either in Canada or in the United States.

Surely we can pay tribute to the mother country for what it has done and not cavil about a measly loan. As a matter of fact, some of the best businessmen in the country, Liberals too, have pointed out that the loan to Britain is a splendid business proposition and should be extended. I believe it could be increased to two and a half billions over two years, and the other two billions could be taken up by New Zealand and Australia, many of whose wonderful products have been displayed from time to time at our exhibitions here.

The Canadian people are long suffering, but there is a limit to their patience. That limit has been reached. As a result of mistakes made in the war and in the reconstruction period so far, they are losing their confidence in all governments. They believe that there has been overgovernment and overtaxation in Canada, and they are losing their confidence not only in the administration but in members of parliament as well. They are becoming critical of the work that is being done in the nation's various legislatures. The worst of it is that the public are not really acquainted with the facts in any situation that confronts them. They cannot get the truth and the whole truth concerning any problem that faces the governments of Canada. No; they have been blindfolded. They have not been given the real, actual facts. We have had a control system in this country throughout the war—we still have it—which has virtually made the work of the House of Commons unnecessary. We might as well have gone home and locked up the House of Commons, for in part the nation's affairs in the war have been handed over to boards over the head of parliament, over the law courts of the country, without any public regulation whatsoever.

There is now too much soothing syrup being poured over the radio by controls and bureaucrats. There is too much of that sort of thing being dished up and served for the purpose of making Canadians happy. There is no sacrifice that Canadians will not willingly make in this time of peace and reconversion, just as there was no sacrifice during the war which they were unwilling to make. But the people should be given the facts. There is a great deal of waste in Canada to-day. I have seen in our cities and towns in various parts of the country garbage collectors picking up half loaves of bread and all that sort of thing. There is too great a waste of food and something should be done about it, and I am glad to see the government starting a conversion and saving campaign.

I do not mind saying that in my opinion the government is taking a step in the right direction, but it should have taken that step long ago. I repeat, the people of Canada want to know the truth about the conduct of public business, and not necessarily the official truth. The fact is that we did not get the official truth about the spy business. We have always had spies in this country. I have seen them in Ottawa attending sport contests and regattas before the last war—Ribbentrop, Von Papen and the like. In this house I complained at one time about one embassy in Ottawa which represented the puppet government of Premier Darlan, and another French Premier Laval, who was executed a comparatively short time ago. I asked the government in this house a question about that particular puppet Petain—Vichy government of France in Canada, but I got no satisfactory answer. They had a big house here. I often saw many people going into it though I was never invited myself. I asked, was an inspection made at a dark time of the war? Was that house ever closed up? In an order for a return I asked whether there had been any inspection of it. We had submarines coming up the St. Lawrence and there was a debate in this house, behind closed doors, on the subject. I do not know what happened because I did not attend the private meetings, but I do know that the Petain embassy in question was allowed to stay open, and the heads of it are still in Canada. You need not talk about spy business. Spies are located everywhere in this country, and other countries during and after every war. In fact, they know more than some of us do in this house.

We have seen in the city of Ottawa a large basic industry doing more to solve the unemployment problem than any other agency, the business known as the embassy cure for unemployment. They have gone on the high seas, below seas and up in the air. In fact, I saw the deputy leader of the C.C.F., the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the last day I was in the house, sitting beside the Minister of Soldiers Welfare (Mr. Mackenzie). It was at the last session, but unfortunately I had to go home at the time. It was about the 7th of December. I said to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), "You had better be careful about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. You had better give him a bodyguard when he goes to the UNO, because I understand he flew as far as Moscow, and he might have been kidnapped." I say that Ottawa is full of these ambassadors of foreign countries; here at the opening of parliament there were forty-six of them and their deputies in the house. I do not know what they are going to do in the hot weather here if they all wear uniforms, swords, epaulettes and steel spurs; but I do say we are making ourselves ridiculous with all these Canadian embassies scattered all over the world. What do these men do? Well, the Canadian envoys make speeches all over the seven seas, and it is costing a great deal of money to maintain these embassies abroad.

That is something I should like to see the Conservative party deal with. I am a Conservative, and have never been anything else. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said I was the only "true blue" left. I have always been a progressive Conservative; but with all the principles I have supported from the time I was on the Toronto city council, I do not think I need call myself a Progressive Conservative. Let the Conservative party stand firm on the ground that the state exists for the individual, not the individual for the state; that state interference with the full liberty of the subject is an evil thing per se, the encroachments of which should be most searchingly scrutinized and resisted; that no government department, except where it enjoys a monopoly, can conduct business at a profit; that the prosperity of the nation rests on the enterprise and ability of individuals in free association to conduct their affairs with a minimum of regulation and interference; that capital and labour are partners and not enemies, indispensable to one another; that bureaucracy is the enemy of both and will ruin them morally and financially if they do not restrict its inordinate increase; and, finally, that what the Conservatives seek is the welfare of the whole community, and no sectional or class advantage.

In the debate last year, on September 11, 1945, I referred to the insistent demand all over the country that there should be some declaration of policy by the government in regard to its various control bodies, but I find that little or nothing has been done. At the present time all kinds of bodies are spending money like water, over the head of parliament. As I said in this house on September 11, 1945:

> Every principle for which the British nation struggled in the old land since the 17th century has been surrendered to the political caucuses. Parliament itself, which came into being to ensure that taxes shall be voted only by those who have to pay them, has become the institution through which those who do not pay them impose them on others.
> I want to emphasize to the committee that powers of legislation older even than the right of taxpayers to determine the national expenditure have been surrendered, and if we are to continue this sort of thing the power of parliament will be gone forever. Whole spheres of activity, involving the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country, have been removed from the jurisdiction of the law and of parliament and reserved for the determination of tribunals, irresponsible, irremovable, governed by no control and subject to no appeal. . . .
> I come from a very large taxpaying city. The working class have to pay a 12 per cent sales tax, and the burden of taxation is very heavy upon them and upon business firms in the district. Some small business men have been put out of business altogether.

Let us stop feeding inflation by these huge expenditures. In Washington they propose to reduce expenditures by at least fifty per cent, while we are increasing them by leaps and bounds. We should call a halt to this sort of thing. The trouble is that we are only holding a postmortem when we come to this house. I was glad to see the new auditor general's report, because three or four years ago I had a letter from Mr. Sellar, who at one time was secretary to a very good finance minister, the late Mr. Robb. I was complaining that he had not the powers of the former auditor general, John MacDougall, who would raise questions in the back of the auditor general's report, pointing out to parliament the errors made in the name of the state. I am glad to see there has been an improvement in the last auditor general's report. We all know what happens to an individual or to a nation which goes on borrowing and does not keep its finances within bounds. It becomes bankrupt. When you continue to spend more than you make and keep on borrowing money to make up the difference, you know the result. You know, too, that a big chunk out of every dollar a working man earns and spends is used to pay taxes. There is a sales tax on almost everything he buys, so that everyone should look at the way the government is spending our dollars. In my opinion the government should begin now to live within its means. During the war of necessity we spent huge sums of money; yet now, with the war over, the government proposes to spend much more than in any pre-war year. Most thoughtful people believe that government expenditures are now far greater than they need be. They believe that the government. like a family, should live within its means that it should not spend more than it takes in and that it should not keep going deeper into debt; yet that is exactly what is happening to-day. Our government is spending millions more than it takes in, and it continues to borrow or add taxes to make up the difference. That is the sort of money handling that causes inflation. Economy in government means money in your pocketbook. If the Canadian people will act to reduce government spending and take steps to increase production, inflation will be stopped; and this is the only way in which it can be stopped. I urge this house to cut the cost of government, to eliminate all waste, all unnecessary services and postpone all expenditures than can be put off until our war bills are paid. Mr. Truman has adopted that policy, and I urge the government to start living at a level that we can afford to maintain. We shall soon see the result in the cost of everything we have to buy, food, clothing and everything else. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) had a good example the other day of what is happening. You cannot buy a shirt here, yet he saw dozens of them in the windows in Jamaica. I suppose they were sent there in exchange for some of that wonderful rum; I suppose that would be considered an exchange of goods and services.

I wish to ask this question of this House of Commons, because I see a large number of returned soldiers here to-night as members of the house. What is to be the future position of the soldiers who are returning home to Canada? The trials and troubles and evils which brought about the second war are still with us; certainly at least the economic ones are: lack of housing; lack of employment; the return to old jobs; hospitalization for themselves and their families, and so on. Look at this housing situation. It brings to mind the situation at Bethlehem, where the Son of Man had to find housing in a manger. We seem to have made no improvement at all in our housing policy since that time. This matter has come before the house in season and out of season, yet nothing has been done about it. I will tell you what is the difficulty in connection with housing. In 1935 the Bennett government at least did one thing; it appointed a committee to deal with this matter. There was a good deal of debate on a motion of mine, but that committee was appointed; it brought in a report, and the present government which came in in 1936-37, lent 89 millions of dollars for the construction of houses. I objected to the creation of a great housing department, and at that time labour and building materials were also scarce; yet under that policy the whole constituency of York West, the constituency of York South, the constituency of York East, and the northern portions of the constituency represented by the hon. member for Eglinton were built up by loans through the banks at three per cent by private enterprise. Thousands of houses were built there. Why cannot it be done now? And yet we see all these controls, so much so that our soldiers cannot get into the houses they bought on an agreement for sale, because of this infernal control system. I was in a number of houses the other day, and I know the tenants under controls were making a profit out of them. Down in one basement one could operate a building business in a residential district. Then, there was a little bit of an attic in another house about twice the size of the top of this desk with cooking stoves. That is what happens under this rent control system and irksome controls. Remove them.

I suggest that some of these housing controllers in Ottawa who sit in the swivel chair—that is the way the hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) describes them—should go up and see some of those houses in our Canadian cities. Let them go and see what is going on. Why do they not have inspectors? Let them go to those homes and find out why returned soldiers cannot go into the houses they have bought on sale agreements and check up the abuse of the control system and huge profits made by some tenants.

Why do they not remove these controls on labour and materials? They can build dozens of theatres in Toronto—dozens of moving-picture theatres. Yes, they can get lumber and building supplies for all that kind of thing. They can get plasterers, bricklayers and all the tradesmen they want for theatres. But they cannot get enough lumber and materials to build ordinar houses.

The mayor of Toronto has been complaining to Ottawa about this as have representatives from other municipalities. I am not referring to only one city, because I receive letters from all parts of Canada complaining about the same thing, the evils of rent control.

The time has now come to get at this housing problem, and do something about it. In 1938 the whole world suffered from social disorder in those countries that allowed it. Difficulties arose because of ham-stringing state control in some countries where social acts had led to great change. Let us see the cause and effect of all this. In 1938 half the world lived isolated behind controlled currency rates with no human intercourse beyond the confines of their own countries. There were state controls at home. Six years of the second world war broke down aggressive tyranny in Europe and Asia. Yet it is a fact that more of the whole world is living under state direction than when the war began. To-day two-thirds of the world are suffering from state isolation and restriction of the individual.

Some countries not touched by the war are affected by the isolation of their neighbours, with no human intercourse as yet. At the same time numerous bureaucratic officials are given visas and foreign currency to spend.

Then, a committee was appointed to look into the coal situation, and to bring about a national fuel supply. Away back in March, 1923, I first proposed a national coal supply so that all our coal might be mined under the British flag, including the maritimes, Alberta and Wales. Eventually this government adopted that suggestion, and large amounts of coal are being moved from the maritimes to the head of the lakes. The difficulty is to a great extent one of transportation. We have very heavy winters, and in view of that the time has come when something should be done to assure a steady coal supply, and not the coke now sold as coal from the United States.

We know that by a process of lease-lend British bases were given up from Newfoundland to British Guiana and at other points for the use of fifty old United States warships, on a lease of bases. Half of those warships were useless. Many of them had to be taken to dry dock during the battle of the Atlantic. Yet all those are charged against Britain. Why should those bases not be charged up to lend-lease? A lease of ninety-nine years, practically freehold, should be charged up to lend-lease; that is where it belongs, and the ninety-nine year lease cancelled. I say that because of those fifty old ships only a very few had any value. Britain's battle of the Atlantic saved millions of people in America from axis invasion.

Something should be done about this. The freedom of the air and of the seas is vital to the British empire, more vital to it than to any other country or group, for the defence of the British empire to a high degree depends upon the unmolested transport of goods and passengers from one quarter to another.

The British empire is indeed the only political unit whose existence depends entirely on air and sea-borne traffic. Its over-dependence on foreign trade increases its need for command of the air and of the seas in certain areas and of the force to maintain that command. The United States could dispense with foreign trade to a great extent, without any great sacrifice or vital threat to its existence. China and Soviet Russia are similarly placed. But the British empire, western Europe, South and Central America are dependent upon foreign trade, and therefore on freedom of the air and of the seas.

I object to all this wild talk about internationalism. And what about the giving up of British bases on the seven seas? Russia was not in the war for two years. As a matter of fact, Russia had a trade agreement with Germany. The United States was not in the war for two and a half years. Where would we have been had we to share all British bases in the seven seas at Aden, Gibraltar, the Cape, Hong Kong and Singapore? We would have had to remain neutral, too. Did you ever hear tell of such a thing? Have we heard of such a thing as giving up British bases to foreign countries? The war would have been won by Germany. Give foreign countries all the raw materials we can give. But sovereignty?—no. That is one of the matters I have discussed before.

In conclusion, I wish to say a word about our old ally, Russia. Let us not forget that she was an able ally of ours. We must remember what she did in this war. As Mr. Churchill said when he spoke at Fulton and Richmond, and again in New York, the hope of the world is that Great Britain, the United States and Russia may work together and cooperate for the good of civilization and of the world in general in peace as they did so well in war. If we can carry on in that way, it would be far better than any league of nations.

Speaking last year, I referred to the league of nations. The only league of nations which was ever successful was the British empire. If we want to have internationalism, then let us start right there.

Russia believes that she is free to do as she likes in eastern Europe. She is not playing the game with her other allies. But I would ask hon. members not to forget that during the closing years of the first world war the Russian people were in the grip of a national revolution. The result was a humiliating surrender by the Russian forces to Germany at Brest-Litovsk, a surrender which would have permanently enslaved Russia to Germany if the United States, the British empire and France had not continued the war in spite of Russia's defection from the anti-German coalition.

At the present time she is not playing the game. But it is only a battle of nerves. I do not believe there will be another war. Russia wants security on her own terms in countries she has captured and invaded, and more room to reach the sea. She will not be happy until she gets it, and she intends to hold all she has obtained and reach out for more.

It will be recalled that on December 10, 1945, there was a meeting in Moscow between Mr. Bevin, Mr. Byrnes and the Russian officials. I believe they agreed to give Russia what she wanted in Japan; yes, five times more than she lost there in war forty years ago. Those two honourable secretaries agreed to support the puppet governments of Roumania and Bulgaria. All this was agreed without the dominions knowing anything about it.

Then, further, they agreed to everything that was done at Yalta. Who was present? It was Russia, the United States and Great Britain. They practically settled the peace of the world and the peace of Europe, even before the coming peace conference. It cannot be changed at that conference.

Then, what was done at Moscow? What did Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes do? They went to work and left out France altogether, and instead of the big 5 went back to 3 again —France should have the Ruhr valley; she should have the Rhine, because twice in our generation she has been invaded. Yet, as I have said, they agreed to recognize the Soviet puppet governments in Bulgaria and Roumania. They consented to exclude France from the treaty making in eastern Europe.

As Mr. Churchill has said, they did all this to aid Russia and to remove suspicion. True, Mr. Bevin did object to the eastern situation and the Dardanelles; but that had no effect at all, because Russia is bound to have authority and to give effect to her ideology. Communism will be revived by Russia in those invaded countries; there is no doubt about it. She is going to hang on to every foot of territory in Europe acquired with her army and navy. Mr. Churchill referred, when speaking in New York the other day, to the UNO or "you know who". We are at the parting of the ways. We may believe in miracles, but I think that Mr. Churchill deserves a great deal of credit for having placed the cards on the table and telling the people the whole truth and nothing but the truth of the aims of Russia. If we had had that kind of talk before this war, there would not have been a second war.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) in his trip around the speech from the throne, but there is one item in his remarks with which I differ particularly and I feel I must say a few words about it. The hon. member criticized and tried to ridicule our ambassadors and our diplomatic service. Petty criticism of that nature made by hon. members, just as that made a year or two ago by a newspaper correspondent of the expenses of our ambassadors, is a great disservice to the country. Canada is a great country emerging on the international scene and she must have a competent diplomatic service.

I saw the evolution of our diplomatic service during the years I was in contact with its members when on many occasions I accompanied the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe to imperial or international conferences. I think we have as good a staff of men as or in some cases even better than, the big powers. We should make life in the service more comfortable and free from worry and criticism. We should pay them more generously from the rank of third secretary up to that of ambassador. I hold no brief to speak for the personnel of the Department of External Affairs, but I think it is only fair to say the good I think of them especially when they have been doing such a good job.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is more responsible than anybody else for the organization and expansion of and impetus given to our diplomatic service. This is but one of his many achievements in the international field. He can be justly proud of the men he has gathered around him to help shape our foreign policy, to carry on the work of the department and to represent our country abroad.

I should like to say a word or two of special tribute to the people with whom I was associated on the delegation to the preparatory commission of the united nations, especially those who were sent from the House of Commons, my good friends, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler). I think the best possible spirit was shown by that delegation. If any of us had political prejudices they did not show up. We made a good family together because we did not feel we were representing any party but that we represented the government and, above all, the people of Canada. I think it is only fair I should say that all those delegates as well as the experts from the Department of External Affairs deserve the congratulations of the house.

As I said a moment ago, we have in external affairs a body of men who are highly trained, who are hard working, but who are strangely unpaid. This is not said in criticism of the Prime Minister or his deputy minister, but I do want to offer a word of advice to the press and to the house that better service will be rendered to the country if the government is encouraged to lift the standard of pay of our diplomats. During the early stages of their careers when these men have to spend many years in acquiring knowledge they are greatly underpaid when compared with the returns that could be obtained in business. A young man in business may have some value, but certainly he has not the cultural achievements possessed by our officials in external affairs.

I intended to devote all my time to-night to a question that is foremost in the mind of everyone, the ways and means of building a solid foundation for a lasting peace. I do not intend to pose as an expert in international affairs, but a study of these matters was part of my earlier training, already a good number of years away, and they have been more particularly in my mind since the Prime Minister paid me the honour of asking me to be a delegate representing Canada at the meeting of the preparatory commission of the united nations in London. I wish again to thank the Prime Minister for the confidence he has shown in me and for the opportunity he gave me to come in contact with the diplomats and statesmen of the world and to study at close range and, may I say, under the appropriate surroundings the problems that may affect the reorganization of the world and the equilibrium necessary for peaceful intercourse between nations.

Canada, less than any other nation, cannot afford to remain aloof from international affairs, nor can we feel a disinterest in the shaping of world policies. It has been said during the last six months that should there be another war Canada stands the danger of being in its path, of being to a certain extent the battleground for the opposing forces. Any student of world affairs will understand the possibility of this event which would have been unthinkable a few years ago.

Entirely opposite conclusions have been drawn from that fact. Some offer the argument for our tying our fate exclusively with that of Great Britain, while others argue that we should remain untangled. A prominent historian in Montreal lately claimed that we are now in that position because:

> We have tied our military systems and our destiny to Anglo-Saxon imperialism.

I think that last view is denied by a mere look at a map. Due to the rise of our two neighbours to first place among the nations of the world we happen to be geographically in a strategic location. That has nothing to do with our commonwealth ties and can in no way justify our remaining indifferent to the fate of Britain or neglecting our friendly connections with the United States. The other view is also false because it is not so much our British connections that will help us in our predicament as the power of our neighbours to the south. We must be practical enough to realize that.

However, one way or the other the prospects do not look too good for the furniture, as the man said whose house lay in the path of a tornado.

I am mentioning here just one selfish reason why Canada of all nations must not be disinterested in the outcome of the game now being played by the big powers in order to conceal the real appetites and the real struggles that lie at the base of all the present unrest.

Above this national motive there is one that goes deeper. That is the realization that our world has to become one world or stop being a world. Therefore all states must cooperate for the betterment of international relations by the removal of sources of discord, whether they originate from overambition on the part of some states, from fear for security on the part of others, from reluctance to grant to others the privileges which one enjoys or from economic reasons or rather a lack of balance in the economies of nations.

Some will say that peace will be assured when the causes of war are removed. This may sound evident, and yet it is not a definite and broad enough solution because by the very nature of man and human institutions causes of conflict are ever present and ever resurging and can never be permanently removed. We have the evidence of it in the relations between individuals, but if social intercourse has been regulated among individuals so can it be regulated among nations. The more disturbing causes of discord can be removed by agreements and compromises, and the innumerable points of contention between smaller states or between groups within states can be ironed out by this process; yet that alone could not bring about conditions of lasting peace.

There are only two ways open to humanity at the present time to avoid chaos or extermination, and they are correlative and both essential.

The first is the establishment of world institutions for the preservation of peace supported by the will and determination of peoples who realize what would be their fate in the event of another conflict; who are ready to make the necessary sacrifices and concessions to bring about more justice and equity in the world and who are determined to submit to the higher authority of the assembled nations. It is not necessary to meditate long on events of the past or to be a psychologist to know that this is a formidable enterprise.

How can you couple world democratic institutions to the realities of power politics? If your world authority is based on parliamentary institutions, how will you determine your units of representation? If you accept as a basis the rules of the former league of nations or of the actual organization of the united nations you give in your assembly one vote to each sovereign state, and there you are forced by the realities of power politics to create a higher body, which was the council of the league and which is now the security council, which has authority for the maintenance of peace and the use of force against delinquents and on which the big powers reserve the right of veto; that is, the right to prevent their being punished, within the framework of the organization in case of delinquency on their part.

About this veto, it might be interesting to note an incident that happened during the last meeting of the security council. Upon one occasion Russia invoked the right of veto on an appeal by Syria and Lebanon. A vote ensued. Some delegate questioned the right of Russia to exercise the right of veto. On that vote France and Britain, against whom in fact the right of veto was used, voted to sustain that Russia had the right to use the veto. The big five powers were united in insisting on their respective rights to use the veto if necessary in their own interests.

Why are we forced to have a council? Because that unit of representation in the assembly is undemocratic and does not take into account the potentialities of states for the waging of war. It is undemocratic in this way, for example, that the United States, which is the first power of the world, with a population of 135 million, has one vote, while Latin-America, with a population not half that of the United States and not one-tenth its military, economic and financial strength, has twenty votes. Syria and Luxemburg with very small populations have the same vote on the assembly as the United States. The result of this system is that proportionately the vote influenced by one citizen of Syria could affect 135 citizens of the United States. On the other hand, if you have representation by population, you will have China and India able to impose their will on the world.

No matter how you devise your unit of representation, it is fraught with danger. Unless human nature could be changed there will always remain the possibility that the most powerful will have the more to say in the running of the world. Yet does that mean that no attempt is to be made at having world institutions for the preservation of peace? On the contrary, it shows the necessity of having an organization devoted to the settlement of international disputes and equipped to regulate relations among nations.

I share the view expressed by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) yesterday that, despite the cataclysm it has gone through, humanity is not yet ready for a world parliament, and it would be inadvisable at this moment to press for its organization; but, on the other hand, I also share the views of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that it is the ideal to aim at, no matter how far it may seem out of our reach.

However, we must have world institutions, and I think the ones that resulted from the conference of San Francisco, from the work of the executive committee and of the preparatory commission, are such as we may be encouraged and be assured that we have as workable instruments as may now be forged with which to work for the maintenance of peace.

We know enough of these institutions to make it unnecessary for me to enter here into details of their functions and powers. I might be permitted, however, before I come to speak of what I consider the second way open to ensure the maintenance of peace, to give a few impressions I got while at the preparatory commission.

I have returned convinced that the delegates assembled in London were aware of the importance of making a success of the new organization and that they were all anxious to cooperate in the framing of institutions within which all nations may work to preserve their security and ensure better conditions for the world to live in.

I am familiar, of course, only with the work of the preparatory commission as I was not present at the meetings of the assembly, and it is true that we were still in the elaboration stages, but that period was all the more important because then were drafted the regulations and were devised the means to put into effect the statutes enacted at San Francisco. It was constantly evident that any differences between delegates were motivated by a desire of each, according to his concepts, to ensure the security of his country and to prevent the possibility of peace being endangered by other nations. There were no sombre motives behind the objection of any country to the wording of a specific rule, but the eagerness to make sure that it would not work contrary to its purpose.

It would be wrong to assume, as certain people have insinuated, that the Soviet Union was aiming at rendering UNO inoperative when it pressed for certain amendments or objected to others. I am still convinced that it was as keen as the United Kingdom and the United States as well as Canada and any other nation to work out an instrument by which to render possible the putting into practice of the principles of the united nations charter.

The differences that exist between the Big Three and more especially between Britain and the Soviet Union, and that came into the open during the first session of the assembly and the security council, are an entirely different matter, and I will touch upon them later in my remarks. They go far deeper than the setting up of the machinery needed for the establishment of a medium of intercourse among nations.

Somebody wrote in the press at the end of the first session:

> UNO has deceived the hopes of humanity aspiring for a just and lasting peace; the result of this first experience is that union among the great powers has been compromised in London.

[Mr. Picard.]

I think this statement is neither fair nor accurate. If there is a lack of union amongst the great powers, it cannot be attributed to the faults or deficiencies of UNO. It results from their lack of confidence in one another for the solution of problems which concern their vast conflicting interests.

I think on the contrary that there now exist well organized institutions which offer the best means devised to date to force the airing in the open of problems that may affect the peace of the world, whether these problems are presented in their true light or disguised in order to influence public opinion in other nations.

UNO constitutes the most advanced medium of regulating international relations ever agreed upon by the nations of the world. It is far from perfect, but we must give it our wholehearted support because it is one of our only hopes of succeeding to avoid conflict and therefore chaos.

Before I pass to the other part of my remarks, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister on the decision which he took before San Francisco to include in delegations members of all parties. It is essential that Canada's foreign policies shall have some sort of continuity. If unanimous agreement cannot be arrived at in each party, at least some people of culture and ability and a sense of responsibility can be made aware of what is going on and can transmit to their political friends the motives and the reasons for certain decisions being arrived at. I think we may at all times, without violation of our convictions, develop a national point of view whereby Canada, like the United States and many other nations, will be able to present a united front in foreign or international affairs. One sees now in England at the foreign office a staff of men, directed by Mr. Bevin, consisting of people of varying convictions on political and social matters. I believe that Mr. Bevin has brought to the British foreign office, through his vitality, his energy, his vast intelligence, new life and new "pep" to an institution which was venerable but which, I will not say was in need of, but would welcome new blood and new life, which he surely has the personality to provide. The British delegation was of one party only, the government party. The United States had with their delegation a prominent republican lawyer who, though he has never been in politics, is an important influence in his party. I think that was a really wonderful departure, and one which will ensure harmony if the practice is maintained.

UNO, Mr. Speaker, represents the legal way, the nearest approach to the ideal way of establishing conditions conducive to a lasting peace, but it will be made workable and its success possible only if the second way to ensure the maintenance of peace in the world is resorted to.

No matter how well have been devised the organizations whose aim it is to preserve peace, peace will be secure only if and when the nations who have the potentialities to wage war are determined not to wage war. Peace, and I do not mean by that the settlement of all contentious or litigious questions between small nations, but peace that is the absence of war and the establishment of decent relations among peoples, will be possible when the big powers have ironed out their difficulties and not before. Let us not fool ourselves; the real difficulties are not those that are brought into the open. Britain and the United States are not offended at Russia's prolonged stay in Iran because it is a violation of the sovereign rights of a small country, nor is the anxiety of the Soviets for Greek democracy the reason of their protest to the council over British occupation in Greece, and the same applies to Indonesia or Syria and Lebanon. The game is a game for positions on the chessboard of Europe, and the pawns are the strategic points each one is anxious to acquire control of or not to lose the effective control of.

It is evident that the Bevin-Vishinsky duel, however it may have appeared in press reports, was not a personal fight. Both talked for mighty empires, which are, respectively, Russia the second and Britain the third power of the world, whose interests are conflicting on many points of the globe.

Ideologically the British socialists would seem to be related to the Russian communists in this, that both derive their collectivist theories from Karl Marx and Engels. However, everywhere throughout the world to-day the proponents of these two theories of social administration are strongly opposed to one another. British socialists have constantly resisted the infiltration in their ranks of communist sympathizers. Attlee, Bevin, Morrison, and before them Ramsay MacDonald and Arthur Henderson, have always opposed communism, and even more state capitalism, which would seem to be the system now in force in the Soviet Union.

This antagonism has nothing to do, however, with the present conflict. It results, according to me, from the fear and the lack of confidence in one another of two states eager to assure their security, one of which tries to capitalize on its victory to realize century-old dreams, while the other tries to prevent that in order to maintain unchallenged century-old privileges.

Let us consider objectively the situation of the three big powers.

Britain has, over a period of nearly three hundred years, built the most powerful empire since the Roman empire; it has been through its mastery of the seas the only world power up to the beginning of this war. Its security was guaranteed, first by its fleet but also by the maintenance of a divided continental Europe where no state could absolutely dominate the others. During the course of the last 150 years this security has been menaced by the Napoleonic adventure, by the German ascendancy, initiated by Bismarck and culminating in 1914 by the imperialist ambitions of Wilhelm II and finally by the nazi onslaught. On these three occasions England mobilized all its energies and succeeded in preventing invasion and, through coalition with other states, in vanquishing her enemies.

The alliance with Russia and Prussia brought about the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo; the Franco-British alliance, aided by the United States, Italy and Japan, won the first great war; the concerted efforts of Britain, the United States and Russia, assisted by all the united nations, have finally overpowered fascism and nazism.

After avoiding all these dangers, Britain succeeded, after each war except this one, in re-establishing in Europe conditions such that no state could by itself be a menace to world security for a time to come.

The establishment of coalitions or blocs of nations, in order to bring about a balance of power among the states of the continent, has been the best guarantee of Britain's security.

To-day, on the day following an Homeric fight from which she emerges much weaker and poorer, Britain sees on the continent a power stronger than herself, whose potentialities, despite its terrific losses, are not to bring quiet to the minds of British leaders.

During the course of the war, Britain accepted agreements intended to give Russia guarantees of security for the future which she judged indispensable. She accepted the Russian claims on the Baltic states and the settlement of the Polish problem. She recognized that the Russian zone of influence should include Czechoslovakia, Roumania and Bulgaria. All this was probably done with reluctance and fear, but it had to be done. This fear no doubt grew when Yugoslavia and Albania came within the Russian sphere and when the Soviet ambitions began to resemble very closely those of Tzarist Russia.

The naval power of Britain, while guarding the safety of its communication lines, was the cause of its supremacy in the world and partly accounts for its wealth. She faces today a Russia getting more powerful. While she had always relied on the balance of power in Europe, she now foresees the Soviet Union dominating continental politics and approaching the North sea; she takes note of Russia's ambitions in the Mediterranean and the middle east and realizes that she may soon have a knife in her throat. This is why she appears determined to resist with energy any future Soviet expansion.

As to the Soviet Union, let us also consider her problem objectively. Twice during the last 150 years Russia had some of her provinces invaded and owed her salvation not only to her obstinate resistance but to the help received from maritime powers. Her security depends, above all, on her western frontiers. Russia has obtained and wants to maintain a sphere of influence in the states adjoining those frontiers.

Whatever may be the objections one has to communistic doctrines, one cannot deny that her past experiences justify Russia in ensuring that she has friendly neighbours. I cannot agree with the imposition by force of any form of government in a country, but these neighbouring countries were at one time or another during the war Russia's enemies, and as a winner she uses her rights to further her security and protect her borders.

The British seem to think that Russia's claim goes farther now than a mere anxiety or eagerness for security. There is evidently for a victorious state the temptation to live its dreams. Russia lacks outlets on warm waters. Her only ports free of ice year around are Murmansk on the Arctic ocean and Vladivostock on the sea of Japan.

The control of the Dardanelles by Turkey, the control of the eastern Mediterranean and of the Red sea by Britain, as well as the zone of British influence in Greece and Turkey paralyze Russia and prevent her from having, in all security, any access to the Mediterranean.

However, the Soviet Union has now by its influence in Yugoslavia and Albania a word to say on the Adriatic, and it might take away from the British, or render unsafe, the use of the natural harbour of Kotor on the Dalmatian coast.

The Americans appear less directly concerned with the European imbroglio, but Russian power is not to reassure them. However, unless unforeseen events are precipitated, there are few points where Russian and American interests are directly in conflict at the present time. But let us not forget that the United States have also considerable oil interests in the middle east and that their interests are tied up to a point with those of Britain, and it is highly improbable that they may remain neutral if war breaks out between Britain and Russia.

I may say, though, that Churchill's speech in Fulton, according to me has done more harm to the cause of British friendship in the United States than may be realized here. I was in New York at the time and came in contact with many people sympathetic to Britain who strongly objected to Churchill's speech. The general opinion on the street was: "Why should our sons die for the safeguard of British imperialism". And yet there is friendship for Britain in the United States. That speech was not timely or helpful. However, it is evident that, in the event of war, if the United States did not join Britain it would face Russia the next day.

Soviet Russia dominating all Europe, succeeding to Great Britain in the control of the Mediterranean and the middle east and part of Asia, would be a terrific menace to the United States. The United States cannot remain aloof from the differences that crop up between Britain and the Soviets.

I cannot agree with the hon. member for Peel that Bevin and Vishinsky spoke clearly and put their cards on the table. If they did, they were double-sided cards and only one side showed. There may have been strong talk in the council and blunt answers, but I do not consider this an improvement over the polished language of old diplomacy. Calling anybody a liar is not considered acceptable in good company. I cannot find it better, far from it, when said around the green tables of diplomatic conferences.

When I say that they did not speak clearly I mean that they have spoken for the gallery. They have enunciated great principles and have built a case to influence world public opinion, but they have not shown their real game. They have spoken of the defence of minorities and of their respect for democratic principles, but they have not spoken of oil, or of tin and rubber, or of naval bases or of lines of communications.

I say and repeat that the present fights in the united nations organization are fights for position and that the real problems are debated in the secret reunions of the foreign secretaries or the discussions of their experts, and the real fight centres around the terms of the peace treaties that are being drafted.

The treaty with Italy is, according to me, one of the bones of contention, not as to what will be abstracted from Italy but as to how the partition will be done. The Italian colonies and the Dodecanese islands offer probably the most difficulty.

The region of Trieste-Fiume is disputed by Italy and Yugoslavia. I believe that Britain favours as a solution the establishment of an international free port in Trieste, in the manner of the Hanseatic ports of the middle ages, so that it may serve all central Europe. The Russians must insist on giving most of the region to Yugoslavia, their friend, or, in the event of a free zone being established in Trieste, will ask for one in Salonika, and the British will oppose it.

Italian North Africa offers more problems; the Soviets want a base in Tripolitania; they also want one in Erythrea on the Red sea, as well as one of the islands of the eastern Mediterranean. The most that Britain might be ready to concede is to internationalize Tripoli, like Tangier.

Then, there are the Dardanelles. The Russians since the days of Peter the Great have aimed to get control of them. Mr. Churchill the other day, in New York, was ever so scandalized at the idea that the Soviets want a fortress to control the straits. He thinks it is enough to give Russia assurance that the Dardanelles will be free in war as in peace, under an international authority, and assimilates the Dardanelles to the Rhine and the Danube. The Soviets assimilate the straits to three others, two of which, Gibraltar and Suez, are controlled by Britain, while the third, Panama, is controlled by the United States. Would the United States and Britain be ready to internationalize effectively these three gateways of the world? I doubt it. I am not saying this because I sympathize with communistic views, nor because I want to defend Russia, far from it, but because I want to be objective.

In conclusion, I may say the ideal way to ensure the maintenance of peace would be through a world parliament, and failing this we have in the united nations organization a workable instrument.

Second, peace will be secure if the Big Three agree to talk plainly and compose their differences and have enough confidence in one another to accept compromises and adjust world privileges to the new relative status of power amongst themselves.

In common language, the question for the big powers is, do we share the spoils equitably and then, when our positions are strong and secure, do we become virtuous and live under international law as the reformed gangster often does in national life, or do we start fighting amongst ourselves as to who gets what?

Allow me to conclude on a more idealistic note by quoting the words of Nicholas Politis, former Minister of Foreign Affairs of Greece and one of the world's most famous international jurists, written in 1924:

> We must now realize that the era of compulsory justice in international affairs has started. After so many centuries of crises that at times divided them and at times united them, modern nations have definitely adopted the ideal of justice that, since so long ago, an enlightened humanity has strived without avail to attain. Slowly, timidly, they are bringing it about. The first hurdles have been cleared, another has just been undertaken.
> The ultimate aim is still far away. There lies ahead a long road strewn with obstacles. Incessant efforts will be needed before the work can be completed.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I am breaking a rule of twenty-five years standing in my own political life. I do so because I fear that the matter I desire to discuss this evening may not be discussed later in the session, and also because I wish to take advantage of the kindly intimation by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) that he felt it was a salutary thing if his actions in matters extraordinary, such as those we shall discuss to-night, should be criticized in the House of Commons, perhaps in the view that should other occasions arise under similar circumstances the man charged with the responsibility of putting into effect legislation, procedure and methods similar to those which have been put into effect in these circumstances, might hesitate to some extent before doing so.

I am fully aware that what I shall say to-night will not be popular either in this house or, where it means the most, at home. I shall be charged on the one hand with biting the hand that fed me, and on the other hand with being the reddest of red communist. I do not think I need say to this house or to those who in all probability will follow me and accuse me of being a friend of the communists, that by education, by tradition and by the religion to which I belong I have opposed nazism, fascism and communism; and it is because I fear that there is a tinge of some of these isms in that which I propose to criticize to-night that I rise in my place on this occasion.

Following along the lines of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the lines of the excellent discourse by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), I propose to divide the matter which is being discussed into two parts, the international and the internal. Internationally I have the fullest confidence in our present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie King). I believe he will handle this matter without sabre-rattling, without war-mongering, with dignity and in the best interests of Canada. With regard to the Canadian element let me say this. I yield to no man in my hatred and contempt for those who may be found guilty of this the most heinous in the whole category of crimes. As the hon. member for Calgary West said, it is only by accident that they are not being accused of treason. They are being accused of something else; if they are found guilty will be found guilty of the lowest form of criminality, of having betrayed the secrets of their country to a foreign power; and the people of Canada will expect swift and exemplary justice to be meted out to them, as they are entitled to the greatest and swiftest measure of justice that our criminal code and out statutes provide.

I should like now to say a word with respect to the legislation itself. May I digress here to say that I freely acquit the Minister of Justice of any desire to mislead when he told the house there were no secret orders in council. I have known the Minister of Justice for twenty-five years. I have admired him as a citizen; I have admired him as a lawyer, as a man of honesty and integrity. I admired him fifteen or twenty years ago when, I think as president of the Canadian Bar Association, a citizen in no way involved in politics, he went out of his way, in an address which was often quoted in this house, to defend the liberties of the subject and to stand up for a constitutional form of government in this country.

Let us see what has happened in the way of legislation; but first perhaps I had better read the magna charta. The most important and most famous article in the magna charta is this:

> No freeman shall be arrested, imprisoned, dispossessed, outlawed, banished, or hurt in his person or property, nor will we—

Meaning the king.

> —in person or through our officers lay hands upon him save by the lawful judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. . . . We will to no one sell, deny or delay right or justice.

Let me place alongside of that the order in council, P.C. 6444 of October 6, 1945:

> 1. The acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice, if satisfied that with a view to preventing any particular person from communicating secret and confidential information to an agent of a foreign power or otherwise acting in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state it is necessary so to do, may make an order that any such person be interrogated and/or detained in such place and under such conditions as he may from time to time determine.
> 2. Any person shall, while detained by virtue of an order made under this order, be deemed in legal custody.

Those are the two documents, the magna charta and this order in council, which I think it is relevant we should compare. In his address on March 19, to be found on page 89 of Hansard, the Minister of Justice himself said:

> I told them—

I think he meant the counsel for the commission.

> —that if the order were one that was going to be made, then it would not be in that form; that I did not think in peace time it was proper that any member of the executive should have the kind of powers the order expressed; that I thought no one should be detained, even for interrogation, without there being some form of intervention of the judicial authority; that we would act only as if that were the provision, and that there would have to be a recomemndation from some organ of the judicial authority to make me feel that I should exercise those powers.

Later on, in the course of the same address the minister repeated that he acted with a great deal of reluctance and hesitancy. I have here also the report of the committee on civil liberties, of the Canadian Bar Association. I am not going to read it all, but may I read this:

> The affirmation of that right—

That is to say, the right of personal freedom.

> —has evolved some standard principles which have acquired almost sacred significance in the mind of the citizen:
> (1) The right not to be detained at the mere arbitrary will of the crown, or any government, or administrative authority;
> (2) The right not to be arrested, unless under the authority of a magistrate's warrant, issued on a complaint duly executed, and based on the ordinary law;
> (3) The right, when under suspicion, or arrest, or sentence, not to be coerced to give any information or evidence against oneself, or to testify in one's own case.

Those are the principles laid down by the committee on civil liberties of the Canadian Bar Association.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What date?

Mr. POWER: It is to be found in the minutes of proceedings of the 27th annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association held at Toronto on August 30 and 31 and September 1, 1944.

I should like to quote one more authority, which states:

Now let us come to another point, which I wish particularly to stress. I refer to the right set out in magna charta that no man shall be dispossessed of his rights without the lawful judgment of his peers under the law of the land; not the law as made by the governor in council, not the law as made by some unnamed and as yet unexisting body, but the law of the land as known to everyone. It is an essential principle of liberty and freedom that the law of the land should be known, that it should be so known that every man as he runs may read. The law should not be something which is to make its appearance in the Canada Gazette after some board or governor in council, not parliament, has passed a regulation; it is something that should appear in the statutes of the country.

That is the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, Hansard, April 19, 1934, at page 2342. And with those authoritative statements I rest my case against what would appear to be a revocation of magna charta, after 731 years of existence.

The point which I wish to make and which I consider important is that of the precedent which has been created in these cases. I am not sure about Great Britain. I am not even sure of the precedents created under the defence of Canada regulations made during the war. But I feel assured that no time in peace-time Canada have we ever had any such legislation as is contained in the order in council, parts of which I have just read.

The two hon. gentlemen who have spoken for the government in this debate, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, are men of high reputation for integrity, for broad humanity, for tolerance, for liberal-mindedness and for a great regard for the personal liberty of their fellow citizens. As will appear from what the Minister of Justice has said, they have acted with deliberation, with hesitancy and, possibly, with a great deal of reluctance. No doubt they feel that they can exercise those extraordinary powers which were conferred upon them by the order in council with discretion and with the least possible injury to their fellow men.

But may I point out that neither of these men has any guarantee of immortality. Neither is there any guarantee in our political life that the political wheel of fortune may not some day turn. And the numbers brought up on that political wheel of fortune may not always be the numbers of men in whom this country has the same faith and confidence as it has in the men who are now at the helm of affairs.

The hon. friend for Calgary West spoke about the book, "It Can't Happen Here." I think he was about to continue some discussion about that book when his attention was drawn to another point. Perhaps he was about to point out that in most totalitarian countries, or at least in the two of which we know the most, Germany and Russia, the majority of the people do not rule, or at least, did not rule. The majority of the people in Germany, we are told, were not nazis; and it has been repeated time and again here that the majority of the people in Russia do not belong to the communist party.

Nevertheless the men at the head of that party are the men who are in charge of those countries. They are in charge of the administration of justice; they are in charge of executive power. And it would appear to be from these men and from the kind of government they have that we obtain some idea of the methods which appear to have been followed in this case.

"It Can't Happen Here", but it requires no great stretch of the imagination to paint what, to some, may be an extreme case, when misguided, intolerant, wilful and fanatical men might be at the head of affairs in this country, men who might confuse the security of the state with their own political security, men who might believe that their political opponents are plotting against the security of the state because, forsooth, they are only opposing those measures which are being proposed by the heads of the state.

There have been harsh words spoken in the house and country about bankers, trust companies, cartels and monopolies. It might very well be that, through a turn of the wheel of fortune, the opponents of those who participate in monopolies and cartels might some day be in power and might believe firmly and conscientiously that the general security of the state, because of cartels with foreign nations, is seriously endangered.

Some of those very people who to-day applaud what is going on might find that they cheered to-day but they wept to-morrow. It is not without the recollection of hon. members—certainly not more than fifteen or twenty years ago—that a great American running as candidate for President of the United States was defeated because millions of his fellow citizens believed wrongly and wickedly, but perhaps sincerely, that his love of his country was vitiated by his allegiance to another country and to another ideology. Religious intolerance can bring people a long way. If religious intolerance ever came to the places of power and authority in this country I would not care to think of what might happen to those who opposed it. Precedents are dangerous things, and I regret far more than I can say that a precedent has been created in this case. These men could rely on the procedure and the approval by parliament, as parliament will approve, of the legislation and of the procedure which has been followed in this case.

I should like to have the time and perhaps the capacity to analyse something of the public attitude arising out of this event. I admit freely that in the popular mind the government is doing absolutely the right thing. I do not controvert or deny that for one moment; I only regret it. I feel that fifty years ago when we were closer to the great struggles which had taken place for human liberty or freedom it would have been more difficult for a government to proceed as this government has proceeded in this case. I wonder if the modern love of speed, efficiency, the cult of success in business, in politics, yes and in sport; the idea of winning at all costs; I wonder if that has not been so thoroughly impregnated into the thinking of our people that they are perhaps apt to forget what some of us believe to be eternal principles in their desire to see something done and done quickly.

There is the idea that we must fight fire with fire, that if these men had been in Russia perhaps it is more than likely that they would have been taken out and shot, and they should be here. We have fought a victorious war after four years. We have talked glibly of the new order which was to follow it, and it almost appears to me as though we the victors had taken on the manners and customs of the vanquished.

As to the accused themselves, I think I said I have no sympathy whatsoever for them, and I have not. But when I read the report of the members of the commission that some of these men, in admitting their guilt in giving the secrets of their country away, pleaded that they had another loyalty, a loyalty presumably, if not to another nation at least to another ideology, I wondered whether all of us are not to some extent responsible, not for these accused but for the fact that there are discordant loyalties in this country.

My hon. friend, the leader for the Social Credit party (Mr. Low), touched on the point when he said, or when I took him to say, that before we go too deeply into international affairs we should first try to become a nation on our own, we should first try to develop a nationality of our own. I am perhaps one of those who smiled in a bit of derision at what was considered to be somewhat tawdry patriotism when reference was made to 100 per cent Americans. Perhaps it would have been good for us if we had tried to develop more 100 per cent Canadians. Some great Irishman has said that if he were permitted to write the songs of a people he would not care who wrote their laws.

During the course of the war I had occasion to attend a large number of concerts, singsongs and so on in the camps of the various armed services. What songs did we hear? We heard "Annie Laurie", the "Rose of Tralee", "There'll always be an England". Did we ever hear any song about Canada? Have we ever tried to develop a Canadian spirit which would make those people stand abashed at the very thought of betraying their country? Our educational institutions are at fault. We are at fault in this house for developing loyalties, whether they be to other lands or whether they be to certain sections of our land.

Mr. POULIOT: Who forbade your bands playing "O Canada"?

Mr. POWER: Not me.

Mr. POULIOT: One of your men.

Mr. POWER: That may be, and I shall be quite willing to answer my hon. friend at some other time.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall have an opportunity to do that too.

Mr. POWER: We have not developed as we should have developed a Canadian spirit. We have not developed it in our schools or in our colleges. Until such time as we do we cannot expect and we cannot hope to have in this country the right kind of loyalty to our institutions and to our nation. When every man in this country has a loyalty to the country as boundless as are the acres of this country, when he is as much at home in Halifax as he is in Vancouver, in Quebec as he is in Toronto, when we have no such thing as sectionalism, then I believe it will be more difficult for wilful men to betray their country.

I should like to speak of one more aspect of this discussion. I wish to refer to it from the point of view of liberalism, that is liberalism in the broadest sense, in the sense in which every political leader of this house has at some time or another and probably still is a believer in liberal thought and liberal principles rather than in the narrow sense of those who sit only on one side of the house; in the sense in which the hon. member for Calgary West is a liberal. I refer to liberalism which is defined as being a struggle for liberty, personal, civil, political, physical, social, economic, domestic, national and international. It is a struggle for the rights of the people against privilege and privileged interests and classes. The great victories of liberalism during the past century have been along the lines of constitutional reform. The Liberal party believes in individual liberty and in the rights of the citizen.

Amongst all the leaders of liberalism in this country there has never been any greater than the present leader, the Prime Minister of this country. I know he shares my views of liberalism for from long association with him I know his views on these matters. I know with what hesitancy and reluctance he must have acquiesced in what has gone on. I had hoped that he would have ignored that hesitancy and reluctance and would, when pressed, have refused to allow such legislation to be placed in the records of the people of Canada. He has taken a position with which I cannot agree. I respect his decision, as I hope he will respect my view.

As for me, brought up in an atmosphere wherein a framed photograph of magna charta was on almost every wall, accompanied with a warrant for the execution of Charles I, and steeped through my reading in the traditions of the martyrs of liberty and freedom, I cannot wish to turn back the pages of history seven hundred years and repeal magna charta. I cannot by my silence appear to approve even tacitly what I believe to have been a great mistake on the part of the government. If this is to be the funeral of liberalism I do not desire to be even an honorary pall-bearer at the funeral, and I do not wish by not taking part in this debate to give silent approval to the procedure which has taken place.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, following the example of many honourable members who have spoken since the opening of this debate, I wish, with your permission, to congratulate the honourable member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) and the honourable member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) who have respectively moved and seconded the address. They have discharged a duty which was certainly not onerous and their task was pleasant to fulfil. As was evidenced by the compliments they have received, their performance has been found satisfactory by nearly all the members of this house.

When I see you, Mr. Speaker, occupying the chair of the one we are agreed to call first commoner, you can readily imagine what memories are brought back to my mind and to my heart. You surely can guess that I see you as a young schoolboy, striving industriously to develop your character in the class-room, in the recreation and study rooms of that old institution, venerable among all, the Quebec seminary.

It is because I was once a classmate of yours. I was not surprised to hear you call out, at the very beginning and with the greatest ease in the world: "Order", because even in those days, you used to shout your terrible cry of "Silence, gentlemen", with as much vehemence. You have simply adopted a different term.

We then found ourselves members of the Quebec Legislative Assembly, where we won our political spurs and where we had the pleasure and the privilege of sitting with a man whose fine sense of propriety we valued very highly. A few years later, we were sitting on the floor of the House of Commons, still followers of the same party. Then I left for a short trip and returned just in time to see you occupy the Speaker's chair. Although I don't envy your position, knowing the various duties it entails. I was highly pleased by your elevation to that high position, and I am still very glad of it. Among the members of the Legislative Assembly with whom we were sitting at that time, some have passed from the provincial to the federal arena, to the House of Commons, like yourself, the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. McDonald) and myself, and to the Senate, the Hon. Senators David, Bouchard and Nicol. Although we may at first have found it hard to become accustomed to this change—after being used to the spirit of good fellowship of the Legislative Assembly—we are now getting used to the atmosphere of the House of Commons. And now, thanks to the kind cooperation of all hon. members of this house, whatever may be the language we use, we are inclined to find the atmosphere of the House of Commons nearly as pleasant as that of the Legislative Assembly, but I am not as yet so sure of that.

I do not see the Hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier).

Mr. DECHENE: He is not at his desk, but he is in the house.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I see him now and I take the liberty of telling him briefly what the electors of the county of Portneuf expect of him at the present time.

In 1938, I believe, a certain sum had been voted for the erection of a post-office building at Donnacona; plans were drawn and he would have but to say the word for the construction of this post-office to be started next summer. The amount involved is not very high and I have no doubt that the minister's consent will be given with the kindness he usually displays when granting our electors a favor. Besides, almost at the mouth of the Portneuf River, which is navigable up to a certain point, certain protection works would be needed to prevent closing the highway which runs from Portneuf Station to Portneuf Village, uniting those two parishes. These small requests could be granted at little cost to the government and I cannot see how the hon. the minister can turn down the member for Portneuf.

Since the beginning of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I have listened most carefully to speeches made in regard to the important problem with which the government was faced, namely the very contentious matter of the discovery of a spy ring in Canada.

There is one thing that I have particularly noticed. Not a single member of this house has any sympathy for these hirelings of the Moscow embassy or for the communist doctrine. Although no one has any sympathy for them, in the matter of technicalities, details and particulars, criticism has been levelled at the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and at the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). No one has any sympathy for those spies but some feel that they have been treated too harshly.

Mr. DECHENE: It might please them if we were to decorate those people.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): However, I know that some have been arrested and released on bail, and, after all, they were spies. In England, bail was refused to Dr. May. In Canada, things are different. As I am not a lawyer, I cannot discuss matters of technicalities but I know that when a man goes into the woods or the jungle, if he possesses the instinct of self-preservation, he will have brought with him some weapon to defend himself and when a wild animal springs at him to devour him, he does not argue, he does not plead for mercy, he asks no permission but he simply shoots it to save his own life. Is it what we are doing in Canada? This is what Canada is doing.

I cannot sympathize with spies. It may be argued that they have not yet been declared guilty. That is possible. But I will not believe that the Mounted Police, of whom so much good has been said in this house, have recommended such a decision to the Right Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) unless they had proofs. That is preposterous. I repeat, we are now dealing with communists. Unfortunately, some of our leaders and politicians often lose sight of that fact. Many members of this house forget to take up the communist problem as it should be approached. We must not lose sight of the fact that the ultimate aim of communism is universal ideological revolution. Whether Stalin or others are at the helm of the Russian state, they are communists who hanker for the advent of universal revolution. They know how to go about it.

Indeed, this is not the first time I treat this subject, Mr. Speaker. Here is what I said, ten years ago:

> Providence has countenanced the existence of classes differing on the intellectual, financial and social levels. It is wishful thinking to believe that all minds are equal, all intellects similarly brilliant, all qualities universally distributed and apparent to the same degree in every individual.

I was referring to the levelling of classes, a principle very dear to Karl Marx.

> It is those who tried to bring mankind to believe that the contrary could be true who have become the promoters of the socialist doctrine, which is the first gateway to the great communist structure.

I said that ten years ago.

> Class struggles have been their first activities. The first international was founded during the first years of the second half of the 19th century, on the occasion of a world fair held in London. Heralded by Karl Marx's appeal—Workers from all countries of the world, unite!—socialist and communistic agitation began.
> To achieve its objective, the neo-messianic school to which Heine and Marx belonged strove to substitute materialism for the religious ideals of a whole race.

That is of the whole Jewish race.

> And that was done as far as possible in the silence of cells where the communistic poison flowed freely.

Ever since those days, communism has kept up its propaganda. To-day, that propaganda is better, stronger and is carried on more insidiously, and the members of that party are more important. They must undoubtedly know the truth of the words of a great Spanish prelate: "Give the unfortunate an illusion; supply hotheads with a pretext, and you will have a revolution." And upon such ground the communist ideology is active, be it in Ottawa, in the whole of Canada, or elsewhere. I must therefore protest when members, after saying that they have no sympathy for communist spies, dwell on technicalities and finally claim that the rights of individuals have been infringed, that the citizens' liberty has been curtailed. It is inconceivable! There cannot be two weights or two measures. I also said:

The years slipped by, and then came the third international which slew the czars and is trying to upset the political economy of the whole world. Their hard work is never done by their armed forces but by cells concealed under various designations which display feverish activity and an astoundingly perfected organization.

In this matter of espionage, we have seen how well they work. Thanks to one of their own, we have been warned of their intrigues and we have found out how much they had learned of our secrets relating to purely Canadian inventions. That is how they work. I wonder why we should display such unwarranted tactfulness, why we should put off action and bewail the harsh methods adopted in dealing with spies. That is my personal opinion, Mr. Speaker; I do not expect everyone to agree with me, but that is the conclusion I have reached after reading and study, after living through two wars and an intervening period which was torn by eighteen conflicts and during which the theories of advanced socialism and communism have gained a great deal of ground. Some people say that communism is not as bad as is claimed. Let us see what a communist has to say. His name is Berdiaeff. I quote from the book entitled "The Man of 1936 in Soviet Russia", by Helen Iswosky.

Berdiaeff has clearly shown, writes the author, in a recent work, the essential difference which characterizes the Marxist concept of liberty . . .

Listen to this; I quote:

To achieve liberty, he says, for a communist, means to achieve strength in a collective social movement, and transform life collectively . . . We must achieve strength and transform life in a given manner, having a fixed conception of truth and a fixed doctrine. This liberty is subject to the dictatorship of a given ideology, which cannot be changed one iota. The communistic freedom does not grant any liberty to those who refuse to accept the only doctrine, the only creed that can win salvation and deprives its enemies of all human rights.

Now listen to Boukharine. He is quoted by the same author. I ask every Christian in the house to listen to what Boukharine has to say:

It is ridiculous, says Boukharine, to think of God in the same way as devout old women. It is not man that has been created in God's image, but it is God that is created to man's image; we have no need of Him . . . Since man has fully achieved his worth, a human society, happy and creative, constitutes for us an aim in itself and does not need consecration from divine idols.

This is a communist speaking. And we should stand unafraid, in this country, of such ideas, of this ideology, whose agents are at work in our midst, trying to steal our secrets? And why should they steal them? Not to hide them somewhere else, but so that others may use them in the event of another war.

Mr. Speaker, a man by the name of Churchill recenty made in the United States a speech that was strongly criticized by Generalissimo Stalin and was even criticized across the border. Before the Second World War, Churchill had told us how strong was the nazi-fascist ideology; he had also warned the world of the magnitude of communist ideology. Over there, no one heeded his word; however, untiring in his efforts, he now sounds a further warning.

I am not criticizing his speech; I am glad he made it and I hope Canada will wake up and that the democracies, the true democracies, not those that are governed by dictators, but the real democracies, those that have gone through the great test of the war just ended, will eventually join together to achieve a second victory, a real one this time, the hardest but the most important, the victory of ideology.

A country may be vanquished in the field, but its ideologies stand forever. It is thus that nazism still subsists in Argentina and Germany, fascism is still retrenched in Spain and, as every one knows it has not been extirpated from Italy. This is evidenced by the fact that Giannini has just formed a new party, called the "total man" party by the British, the "parti de l'homme complet", by the French, and the "uomo guadun que" party by the Italians. In no more than two weeks, he has recruited over 200,000 supporters. This is proof that ideologies are never eradicated.

A while ago, a speaker stated that fire must be fought with fire. I say that to put a fire out, it must be smothered by a sufficient quantity of water. I do not concur in the communist ideology. Some may think that I am still frightened—to borrow the words of the former member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen)—at the thought of the communist bogey; not at all, it is a question of principle for me; we must at all costs avoid an imminent danger. Are we going to beat about the bush and stop at technicalities when we are dealing with espionage, on the pretense that spies might have been treated too harshly. I am of those who want the government to exercise due vigilance and who demand that these spies be punished if they are found guilty of this crime.

I am closing, Mr. Speaker. A short while ago, I heard the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) say that Canada, unlike other countries, lacked impressive songs to stir the patriotism of its people. I do not know any songs in English, but I am familiar with very many in the French language. I will mention only a few, such as "O Canada, mon pays, mes amours" (O Canada, my beloved native land), known and sung by all little French Canadians; they live in the Province of Quebec, which, for them, stands as the whole of Canada, but they may be heard as far as the Pacific Ocean. Among other songs, "O Carillon" keeps forever vivid in our minds the glorious memory of our past; "Vive la Canadienne," which has just been mentioned by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Marquis). These are songs that keep our patriotism alive and if there are no such songs in English, there is only one thing to do, namely, find a good English version of "O Canada"; it is the most beautiful and most patriotic song that can be found to reconcile the ideals of all the races that make up this country.

I am through, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to read for the benefit of all members the prayer that is said in the assembly of one of the United States, but I will do so some other time, as it is late and I do not want to delay the adjournment of the house.

I thank the honourable members for their attention. Again, may I say that I spoke for myself and that once convinced of the justice of a cause, I do not easily change my mind.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is the privilege of the hon. member to adjourn the debate if he so wishes.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): No, I have just about concluded my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. MacInnis the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 22, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

DEFENCE AND DEMOBILIZATION

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER EXPENDITURES AND DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS WAR ASSETS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for national defence and demobilization, and for other services directly connected with the war, including the disposal of surplus war assets, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy, decided by the government may be effected therein, and that notwithstanding standing order 65 the committee shall consist of twenty-five members, namely: Messrs. Benidickson, Black (Cumberland), Bradette, Cleaver, Cote (Verdun), Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval), Golding, Homuth, Isnor, Jackman, Knowles, Lalonde, Macdonnell, Marier, Marquis, McGregor, McIlraith, McLure, Michaud, Probe, Reid, Shaw, Smith (Calgary West), Stewart (Winnipeg North), Winkler, with power to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe hon. members are anxious to have the select and standing committees set up as soon as possible. Last year there was some complaint that we were lax in having some of the committees constituted at an early date, in particular the select committee on expenditures.

If I thought there would be any debate on this motion I would not press it at this time. I should imagine however the house would be glad to have the committee set up at once. If that is so, I should be pleased to have the house proceed with my motion.

The motion offered this year is in exactly the same terms as the motion passed at the last session. The personnel of the committee is, I understand, the same.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, we are agreeable to having this committee set up, and to proceeding without debate.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to say the same thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask one question: I communicated to the whips the fact that there is one change we should like to make. Apparently my communication was not received in time. The suggestion is that the name of Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia) be substituted for mine. If the change is made now it will obviate the necessity of having it made later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps hon. members would permit the motion to carry, following which a motion could be made to substitute one name for another.

Motion agreed to.

[Later:]

The house having reverted to motions:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the motion to set up a select committee to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for national defence and demobilization be amended by substituting the name of Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia) for that of Mr. Knowles.

Mr. BRACKEN: I assume there will be no objection on the part of the government to substituting other names if there is a desire to make a change.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. During the session changes are made of certain names on most of the committees. The intention is to follow the same practice.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I object to the appointment of this committee for the reasons that I gave last session. The time has gone by for a committee of this house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the motion to appoint the committee has been adopted. The motion before the house is merely to provide for a change in the personnel and is not debatable.

Motion agreed to.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say that I object to the system which has been adopted of appointing committees after the expenditures have been made. It is nothing but a post-mortem—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion to appoint the committee has already been adopted by the house. We are now on orders of the day, and if the hon. member wants to put a question, it is his privilege to do so.

PENSIONS AND REESTABLISHMENT

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENT OR SUPPLEMENTING OF EXISTING LEGISLATION

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): moved:

That a select committee be appointed: 1. To consider all legislation passed since the commencement of the war with the German reich relating to the pensions, treatment, and reestablishment of former members of His Majesty's armed forces and of other persons who have otherwise engaged in pursuits closely related to war;

2. To prepare and bring in one or more bills to clarify, amend or supplement the above legislation;

With power to send for persons, papers, and records; to print its proceedings, and to report from time to time to the house;

That the provisions of section 1, standing order 65, be waived in respect to this committee.

And that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Abbott, Adamson, Archibald, Ashby, Baker, Belzile, Benidickson, Bentley, Blair, Blanchette, Bridges, Brooks, Bruce, Claxton, Cleaver, Cockeram, Croll, Cruickshank, Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval), Dorion, Drope, Emmerson, Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), Gibson (Hamilton West), Gillis, Green, Halle, Harkness, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Herridge, Isnor, Jutras, Kidd, Langlois, Lapointe, Lennard, Marshall, Mackenzie, Macdonald (Halifax), MacNaught, Merritt, Mitchell, Moore, Mutch, Pearkes, Power, Probe, Quelch, Ross (Souris), Sinclair (Vancouver North), Skey, Tremblay, Tucker, Viau, White (Hastings-Peterborough), Whitman, Winkler, Winters, Wright.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the cooperation of the house in following the same procedure as has been followed with regard to the previous motion. This is practically the same wording that we had in the resolution of a year ago, and the personnel of the committee is the same with the exception of one or two changes which have been made by agreement.

It is intended to continue the excellent work which was done a year ago by the committee on veterans affairs. The committee will review if necessary the three measures that were passed by this house and deal with the Pensions Act, the Veterans Land Act, and the act dealing with fire fighters and supervisors that was before the veterans affairs committee a year ago. It will deal with any new suggestions that were made to the committee, such as amendments to the Soldier Settlement Act, and it will deal also with civilian personnel who are protected now by orders in council but who are not protected by statute. These and other matters which will come before the special committee on veterans affairs will I think have the general support not only of the members of the committee which functioned so excellently a year ago, but of the house generally.

Mr. BROOKS: I understand from the minister that the terms of reference are exactly the same as last year and that this committee is to consist of sixty members as the committee did last year. I stated last year that I thought it would be well to have all returned men on this committee, and I am still of that opinion. However, I am not pressing the point.

I am pleased indeed that the committee is being set up and will start to operate soon. I know that last year members of the committee found it difficult to attend the meetings while carrying out their duties in the house. We were working long hours, sometimes morning and afternoon, and toward the latter part of the session we had to sit while the house was sitting, which I think all members will agree is not a good thing.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask one question. Will the fact that this committee is sitting preclude any discussion in the house, say on matters having to do with the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Last year the Veterans Land Act was amended in the special committee and it went through this house. There were certain members, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) being one, who asked that their rights be preserved if they had any further suggestions to make.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is not my point. Are we to be precluded from discussing these matters when the committee is sitting? Questions pertaining to the Veterans Land Act may come up in the house. It is near the spring of the year, and these matters are urgent. Will the fact that the committee is sitting prevent discussion under some relevant item under consideration in the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a matter of the rules of the house. I do not know the nature of the discussion my hon. friend is referring to, but I shall be very glad to discuss it with him at any time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the minister knows the procedure and whether or not we shall be prevented from discussing these matters while the committee is sitting. There are some urgent matters having to do with war assets and the like. I have a whole volume of material from settlers, and I want to know if I am to be debarred from taking these up under some particular estimate just because the committee is sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So far as I am concerned there is no desire whatever to debar the hon. member from referring to the things he has in mind.

Motion agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT

NOVA SCOTIA—CAUSEWAY ACROSS STRAIT OF CANSO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the widespread unemployment situation in Nova Scotia can the minister give the house a statement on what progress is being made with regard to the proposed causeway across the strait of Canso? If that project can be expedited it would greatly relieve unemployment in that province.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman was good enough to send me notice of his question. I am unable to give him a complete report at this stage. When the estimates of the Department of Transport were under consideration last year I told the hon. member that there were four proposals which had been put forth by the engineers of the department. The acceptance of the different proposals will depend upon soundings or borings to be taken in the gut of Canso. Some of those borings have been taken, but not all. Because of weather conditions it has been impossible to complete the soundings, but as soon as the weather clears, perhaps early in May, it will be possible to complete them and we can then come to a conclusion as to which of the alternative suggestions should be adopted.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALLOWANCES TO UNIVERSITY STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, of which I am afraid I gave him short notice. Has the government received complaints about the insufficiency of allowances to student veterans attending university, and what action, if any, has been taken in that regard?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The parliamentary committee of 1945 recommended that consideration be given by the governor in council to increasing the rates set forth in parts 2 and 3 of the schedule of rates to the post discharge reestablishment order. The government gave consideration to the question of inadequacy of allowances to student veterans attending university, and it was found that only four students of some 25,000, have withdrawn for financial reasons. The matter is receiving consideration.

VETERANS LAND ACT—REGULATIONS FOR CERTIFICATE OF QUALIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Will he consider an immediate change in the regulations governing the Veterans Land Act which compel joint approval by the board of the veteran and his wife before issuance of a certificate of qualification under the Veterans Land Act, and discarding the present regulations which prevent a veteran with an overseas wife from taking advantage of the act without hardship and long delay?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I must say that I did not receive notice of the question. In any case it must stand as a notice.

P.E.I. CAR FERRY

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Transport. Is he prepared at this time to make a statement regarding the construction progress of the S.S. Abegweit, the new steamer for the Borden-Tormentine ferry?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I am informed by the contractors that, provided the subcontracts are maintained according to schedule and the machinery is delivered on time, it is expected that the Abegweit will be ready for delivery about the 30th of September.

Mr. McLURE: Thank you.

MAPS

OMISSION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FROM MAP OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce aware of the fact that a branch of his department published a map of Canada on which the province of Prince Edward Island is not even shown?

Mr SPEAKER: Order. It is the practice that when an hon. member puts a question, it is not to give information to the house, but to seek information from a minister.

Mr. McLURE: I asked a question.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHURCH

REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON MARCH 21

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, to refer to remarks made last night, as reported, at page 163 of Hansard, by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), who followed me in the debate on the address. It is seldom that I rise to a question of privilege, but the hon. member misquoted me last night. My reference was only to creating at a time like this more embassies and envoys all over the seven seas and dividing Britain's foreign policy when we all should act together. I never referred to the very fine staff of the Department of External Affairs, or to the head of it, the Prime Minister, who has so many talents. My references were confined to the sending of envoys abroad at a time like this to countries where we already have commercial agencies. I object to the hon. member attributing to me words I never used. I have never objected at any time to visits of members of parliament abroad, because I believe that that is money well spent.

WHEAT

SPREADING OF PAYMENTS FOR DELIVERIES—INCOME TAX

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in my absence from the house yesterday, I understand that the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) asked a question regarding the spreading of wheat payments in connection with income tax. I never intended to suggest when speaking on the subject that this announcement would be made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think it would be made by the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance. In any event, as the question involves government policy, it cannot be answered at the moment.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The house resumed from Thursday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne usually outlines the policy of the government for the session. When I heard the speech read by His Excellency at the opening of parliament my reaction was a hope that the people of Canada were not looking for very much this year, because if they were, and if there is not something more in the government's programme than there is in the speech, they certainly will be disappointed. In the speech last year it was mentioned that we were building a new world. As we did not finish that job last year I thought there might be something in the speech this year to indicate that we might be going on with that job. But there is nothing of the kind in the speech. There is no reference to the brave new world. As a matter of fact the speech gives every indication of being the work of tired men who are looking backward to the old world rather than forward to a new one.

I represent a working class constituency. I have a fairly long association with organized labour and other working class movements, so I wish to say something about the aspirations and the fears of the working people, not only of my own constituency but of Canada, as I see and understand them.

Perhaps the greatest fear to-day among the workers is that of unemployment, the fear that we may be slipping back to the days and the conditions prior to 1939—and I have a fairly good idea that other people besides the workers have this same fear.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) replied to the criticism of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) last Monday on unemployment, he brushed that criticism aside by asking this question: Though employment is not all that we would wish it to be, where is there a country better off than Canada?

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." Then the Prime Minister went on to compare conditions in Canada with those in the United Kingdom, Belgium, Holland and other parts of Europe. Such sophistry is begging the question, because conditions in Canada are not comparable with conditions in the United Kingdom or in the countries of Europe. The war destroyed the economy of almost the whole of Europe; and in the United Kingdom, if the country's economy was not destroyed by war, the whole economy was converted to war purposes. But in Canada the same war made this country greater and richer and more able to provide for the people than ever it was before. So it is sheer nonsense to compare conditions in Canada at the present time with conditions in almost any other part of the world. Perhaps the only comparable country is the republic to the south of us. The fact of the matter is that at the present time we have unemployment on a large scale. I would urge the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other members of the cabinet not to be too offhand about it, because the 263,000 who were unemployed at the date of the last report, and the others who do not know how soon they also may be unemployed, are not offhanded about it. Perhaps of itself 263,000 is not an alarming number; but it is alarming in view of the world's need and Canada's need of goods.

I am aware of the fact that unemployment is not yet acute, that there is no mass suffering such as we had in the thirties. The reason of course is that we have made some provision against it. There are the unemployment insurance benefits; there are also the savings made during the war when work was plentiful, and service pay, and the like. But these resources, however large they may be, are limited, and are a mere stop-gap. What is causing the workers worry to-day is not so much the present unemployment, although it is bad enough, but the fact that no plan is being prepared to obviate the conditions which brought about such disastrous results in the thirties. There are no plans for public welfare, and the position of the average worker is as it always has been—the harder he works the sooner he is looking for another job. Until we get away from that, and the worker has assurance of continuity of income, there will always be that worry.

The only reference in the speech from the throne to unemployment is typical of the old thinking in the new world upon which we are entering. I read from Hansard, page 1:

> The maintenance of a high level of employment and national income is a fundamental aim of government policy. Employment and income alike are bound up with the restoration and expansion of world trade. To the productive employment of vast numbers of Canadians, export markets are essential.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is old stuff. It was dinned into our ears all during the depression. I appreciate as much as anyone does the value of export trade, but export trade will not put an end to unemployment and distress in this country; it will make for unemployment unless we are prepared to make trade a two-way affair. That is, unless we are prepared to accept imports in the full measure of our exports and to distribute to our people the national income so created, foreign trade will not help us very much. I believe we shall have to approach full employment, the elimination of unemployment, in a time of peace in somewhat the same way as we proceeded during the war. We put an end to unemployment during the war, not by trying to find work or to make work for people, but by producing the needs of war. Now, with peace here, there are peace-time needs, and if we put our people to work to satisfy the needs of peace, to provide the things which our people need in their everyday life, not only shall we find work for everyone, but there will be more jobs than workers, as there were during the war.

There are other measures to which I wish to refer, but before I do so I want to say that I believe that labour in Canada deserves the appreciation of the government and of the people for the freedom from industrial strife enjoyed by this country since the end of hostilities. The smoothness with which production and services were carried on at a time when wages were falling and prices rising has been of tremendous advantage to this country. In that respect the situation here has been quite different from what it has been on the other side of the border. But organized labour will demand wage increases, and will demand them because they have become necessary. Now that the war is over and there is more civilian production, labour is entitled to a higher, not a lower, standard of living. High wages are also necessary because high wages will help to prevent another depression. In our capitalist economy depressions always come about when there is an over-supply of goods for which there is a need, but those who have the need have not the price to buy. Therefore, higher wages will help to prevent another depression.

During the war there was a ceiling on wages. I agree that it was necessary to stabilize wages, although I have always maintained in this house and outside that to the extent that a stable price structure was maintained, to that extent the burden was borne by the low-paid wage and salary earner. I suggest that the government should not wait for strikes and disputes before there is an increase in wages. The government should make it quite clear that it is in favour of increases in wages at the present time.

There will also be a demand for shorter hours. The two national labour bodies, the trades and labour congress and the Canadian congress of labour, have gone on record in favour of a forty-hour week without reduction in pay. This will mean, if it does come about, that where there is a forty-four hour week and it is reduced to forty, a ten per cent wage increase will be required, and if it is forty-eight hours reduced to forty, the necessary wage increase will be twenty per cent. There are many industries in Canada in which the work week is much higher than forty-eight hours and even fifty-six hours a week.

While we are discussing shorter hours we should not lose sight of the world's tremendous needs for production. I suggest to the Minister of Labour and the government that they should take into consideration the calling of a conference of representatives of organized labour, organized employers and the government to discuss the best means of attaining full production and full employment. Such conferences have taken place in the United Kingdom, and I believe they have been productive of much good.

I am suggesting such a conference because I believe that full production at this time is exceedingly important. I notice that the Minister of Labour in a recent speech at Renfrew said:

> We must use the same characteristic good sense which we used when our backs were to the wall, and then the Canadian people will be able to overcome any difficulties which we may face.

I agree with the minister that, united, we can overcome any of our difficulties in Canada, and I suppose almost everyone will agree with him in that. But I should be astonished if the minister finds the same attitude towards that sort of cooperation to-day as he found during the war. Indeed, the whole cry for the removal of controls is to get away from working together and back to the old system of everyone for himself and the devil take the hindmost.

Mr. MITCHELL: It has been suggested by the two labour congresses.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. That was the motive behind this demand for the removal of controls, and we still hear it. They want a restoration of freedom. I am wondering what freedom —freedom to do the other fellow before he does you? It is because we have no common objective and because we want to get back to the principles of free enterprise that we are told by these lovers of freedom that we must get rid of the bureaucrats. The people who suggest this are unconscious of the fact that the bureaucrats, if there are any, came into being to protect the community from irresponsible private bureaucrats.

An hon. MEMBER: Pirates.

Mr. MacINNIS: "Pirates" is right. The question of the removal of wage control and price control has been receiving considerable attention, particularly the matter of wage control, by organized labour. Personally I cannot at the moment see that any advantage could accrue to labour by the removal of wage control.

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sure the minister does. As regards labour, the supply to-day is greater than the demand, while other commodities are in the opposite position, the demand being greater than the supply. If we removed all the controls, prices would skyrocket and it would be very difficult to get wage increases at all. I do not see, therefore, that there is any hope in that direction. I believe, however, that labour should be allowed to negotiate for fairly substantial increases, not only because of the increased cost of living but also because of the increased amount of consumers' goods that are coming into the market. For these reasons, the low-paid workers particularly should be allowed to negotiate for substantial increases in wages.

Several hon. members have urged that the income tax exemptions should be raised to $2,000. Of course this matter is not dealt with in the speech from the throne; it falls more naturally under the budget, but it has been mentioned. I am in favour of raising the exemption on the income tax to $2,000, but I would much rather see this house take some action to ensure that every family received an income of $2,000. It is not of much use to have the exemption raised on an income one does not receive.

I shall give the house some examples of workers' wages in Canada in 1941 when the wages were frozen. In a sample of incomes gathered by the bureau of statistics from the 1941 census returns, it was found that 83·9 per cent of the wage earners of Canada received an income of less than $1,500. These people are not going to benefit very much from the exemption suggested, particularly on that part of the income which is over $1,500 or even $1,000. They will not benefit from the exemption because they do not receive the income. When you examine the various categories you find that wage earners receiving less than $500 a year numbered 1,028,800, or 35·9 per cent of the total wage earners in the country at that time. If these figures do not convince the members of this house that something should be done and done quickly to increase wages, I do not know what will convince them.

Another report to which hon. members may have seen, the Marsh report of 1941, gives the number of heads of families in certain income brackets. City workers, heads of families, earning from $500 to $1,000 a year, numbered 219,000 in 1941. Rural workers, heads of families, earning from $500 to $1,000 numbered 80,000. City workers, heads of families, earning $500 or less numbered 114,900. Rural workers, heads of families, earning $500 or less numbered 103,100. The year 1941 was a prosperous one. It was the year in which wages were frozen or stabilized, and in relation to the cost of living at this time wages are not much better, if any.

The government says that it considers it a fundamental principle to maintain a high national income. A high national income cannot be maintained unless there is a high individual income. The two must go together.

I wish to make one other observation in connection with this $2,000 exemption from income tax. When the increase in the indemnity of hon. members was before us in the previous session I pointed out that as members of parliament we had not done anything to increase the standard of living of the people of this country. I could quote figures —I have them here—to show that the amount of money being paid in wages has been continually falling since that time. Now that we have increased our own indemnities we are in duty bound not only to raise the exemption on income tax up to $2,000, but to see, as far as it lies with us, that every family receive an income of $2,000.

I should like to say a word in connection with a national labour code. The idea is not a new one to the group with which I am associated. We advocated it in our first manifesto in 1933, and we are still satisfied that it is a good thing. It is not only a good thing but an essential in harmonizing and stabilizing labour relations across the country. I am aware of the many difficulties, but I believe that P.C. 1003, faulty as it is, was a step in the right direction, that we should take advantage of its acceptance during war time, and that the government should do everything possible, even to the extent of an amendment of the British North America Act if agreement can be had to that end, to bring about conditions under which a national labour code will be part of the laws of Canada. In my opinion a labour code should set down minimum standards above which the provinces would be free to go, if they wished, but not free to go below.

I listened with much interest to the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) on Monday of this week. It was a long speech, but in my opinion the most striking feature of it was that he spoke on both sides of almost every point he raised. He reminded me of the Roman god Janus who, I believe, was supposed to be the porter of heaven and the guardian deity of the gates. And, because of that, as a gate has two sides, he is usually shown with two heads.

The leader of the opposition referred to the fact—and it is a fact—that the housing situation in Canada is a festering sore on the body politic, and a national emergency. Then he went on to say—

> During the war we met the national emergency courageously and forthrightly. Surely we shall not be less resolute in peace.

One or two pages further on in his speech he is reported in this way:

> I do not urge the government to engage in rash efforts of decontrol, but I do urge the government to prepare and make public, now that the war is over, a planned programme to relax wage controls on low-wage people and to free the productive processes of the country from the effects of those laws against production, which were made necessary in war, but which in time of peace discouraged what is most essential to the production of needed goods.

Well, I should not be a bit surprised if the government, without being over-rash, did come forward with a planned programme to relax controls, but I am fairly sure they will not have a planned programme for anything else.

The point I wish to make is this, we dealt with the national emergency courageously and forthrightly in war time, not by leaving things to people to do or not to do as they pleased, but by meeting the needs of war with all the power of the Canadian government and resources of the Canadian people. There is no other way in which we can deal with the housing emergency—no other than by meeting it with the whole power and resources of the Canadian people.

Referring to Canada's loan of $1,250 million to Great Britain, the hon. gentleman said, as reported at page 30:

From the point of view of the selfish interests of Canada, the loan is amply justified.

But on page 31 I find this:

But we might as well understand what we are doing . . . What this loan in fact means is that for five years the Canadian taxpayer will pay interest on it which, even at 2½ per cent, will be $30 million a year, and at the same rate on the extension of the 1942 interest-free loan he will pay $14 million.

I submit that if the loan is a good thing, and I agree that it is, it was proper that it should have been made. It is a good thing for Canada economically. I am convinced it it a good thing for the world and for Canada politically, and if we need to bring in humane considerations, I would say it is a good thing from the humane point of view. If we want to get a picture of the difference between what war did to Canada and what it did to Great Britain and Europe, we see it in the fact that this country can now lend $1,250 million to Great Britain, and that Great Britain needs such a loan. Nothing could show more clearly what the British people sacrificed in the war. I am in favour of going as far as possible to carry out our share of the war's costs, and I am convinced that anything we can do to help Britain now is a part of it.

A little further on the leader of the opposition referred to cartels and the control these institutions were gathering to themselves over production and other factors in our economy. I agree that cartels are gaining control of the economy of this country; but I do not agree that the government can eliminate the danger or menace of cartels by completely eliminating controls, and leaving everything to free enterprise. The purpose of every competitive organization, or every organization that is supposed to be competitive, is to eliminate competition in its own line. I imagine no living organism of any kind likes competition, because competition makes living more difficult.

Let me read from the press release issued at the time the report on cartels was made public. It will give the house an idea of what cartels are doing to our economy and to our freedom; and then let anyone tell me how we are going to overcome this power by lessening the controls we now have over the economy of the country. The press release, under the heading "Economic effects of cartels", states:

The report discloses that in the two decades between world war I and world war II restrictive trade agreements of private interests flourished and spread; and that in so doing they (a) limited production and impeded the most efficient use of world resources; (b) raised or maintained certain consumer prices; (c) restricted the import and export of certain commodities; (d) restricted the use to which certain commodities might be put; (e) nullified external trade policies in certain respects; (f) resisted technological advances in certain fields; (g) created patent pools or monopolies covering wide fields of endeavour; (h) assisted the formation of private industrial empires which tended to supplant governments in the determination of certain national commercial policies.

In view of that statement by this Canadian commission which investigated cartels, how can anyone in this house or anywhere else say that the salvation of the people of Canada lies in giving free enterprise more control and more opportunity to do this sort of thing?

At the beginning of his address the leader of the opposition made this amazing statement.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Lalonde): The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have only a little more to say, if the house will permit me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Lalonde): With unanimous consent the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. MacINNIS: He said, as reported on page 27 of Hansard:

In these days it is the duty of the modern state so to organize its economy that every individual able to work and desiring to work shall have an income from his efforts commensurate with his contribution and adequate for a reasonable standard of living.

I think we would all agree with that, but again I do not see how the state is going to do that. If the government is to assume the responsibilities suggested by the leader of the opposition, then the government must have the necessary power and control over the economy of the country to enable them to do so. I do not think it can carry out its responsibilities if it leaves the control in the hands of others. I suggest it is not fair to assert, on the one hand, that the government is responsible for the economic welfare of the individual, and to urge in the next breath that in connection with the economy of the country the productive forces be handed over to private individuals to operate them for their own profit. That is what my hon. friends to my right are advocating. I do not think even the leader of the opposition can ride two horses going in different directions.

The party with which I am associated agrees that the government has a responsibility for the social welfare of the people. At the same time we assert that the government can discharge that responsibility only when the productive forces of the country are used solely for the benefit of the people. This means planning; this means control. But it also means freedom—freedom from fear, freedom from want, and the assurance that the harder we work, the more secure we will be; not, as it is to-day, the realization that the harder we work the sooner we will be looking for another job.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that during this debate the function of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne has not been sufficiently recognized. That debate can serve a most useful function, a variety of functions, in fact. One good function which it can serve is to enable the house to elicit information from the government with reference to its programme for the session and its plans for administration which too often is not found in the speech from the throne.

In the speech from the throne which was read a week ago there are some very vague and general statements and there is a sad lack of a clearly defined legislative programme for the session. If this debate does serve the purpose of eliciting from the government some real information about the programme that it proposes to submit to parliament it will have served a very useful function indeed.

In no respect is the need of information greater than with respect to the plans for housing. As a matter of fact, the only information that the public or the members of this house have received with respect to the government's housing plans for some time now has been bits and pieces which from time to time appear in the press. It is true that the speech from the throne does give a paragraph to housing, but that statement is significantly lacking in information. It is high time that the crumbs of information which have been given to the house and the people were supplemented by some more systematic approach through parliamentary channels.

I think the time has come, in fact it came long ago, when there should be appointed by this house a standing committee on social security matters. One of the primary tasks of that committee should be to go into the proposals that have been offered with reference to housing and to obtain the information which is necessary and which the public has not been receiving. That committee should consider in detail the numerous proposals which have been made from time to time.

If one is to judge by the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in following the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), constructive speeches are not wanted by the government in this debate. I think you will go a long way in searching the records of the debates of this house before you will find on the part of any leader of the opposition a more constructive contribution than that made by my leader. I am bound to say that so far as the Prime Minister's reply was concerned the detailed and constructive observations of the leader of the opposition remain unanswered.

There are five things said in the speech from the throne with reference to housing. The first one is an amazing statement, a monstrous understatement—it is stated that the demand exceeds the supply. A most laconic statement! That is all the government has to say to the people of Canada, many thousands of whom are living to-day under conditions that at any other time would have been considered simply unthinkable. Summing up that situation the government says "Oh, well, the demand exceeds the supply."

Second, we are told that a large number of houses has been constructed since V-E day, but at this stage we still have not been told how many houses have been constructed since V-E day. Apparently the government does not know because it is not a matter of government record. They tell us that, even in the face of the lavish promises that they made to secure election in June last.

Third, we are told that some special efforts are being made to expand the supply of building materials—I shall have something to say about that later.

Fourth, it is said that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been established. That is something that we really did know. I think it should be said in passing that Mr. Mansur, president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has this advantage in starting his duties. He can look back on the previous administration of the National Housing Act and be assured that whatever he does his administration cannot be more ineffective than the administration of the act before he assumed responsibility.

Then we are told that steps are being taken at once to have some form of coordination in the activities of the government in the field of housing, placing them all under one minister. I had a good deal to say on that subject during the fall session of the house and I do not intend to repeat what I said. Coordination of the efforts of the government is long overdue. Where else in the world will you find a situation so pressingly urgent as the housing situation in Canada being handled by a government on the basis of dividing the responsibilities and power among three ministers. An anomaly like that could exist nowhere else.

Evidently, if one is to follow the speech from the throne, no legislation in the field of housing is contemplated this year by the government. In any event we have not been told of any as yet.

May I offer to the hon. members who respectively moved and seconded the address my sincere compliments. In the main they confined themselves to the non-controversial features of the speech from the throne. I offer this observation in passing: Neither of them said anything on the subject of housing. It is in no carping sense that I draw attention to that fact because I think there is a reason for it. Perhaps my respected friend, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), had in mind the description of housing conditions in his own riding which was contained in a telegram sent to the Prime Minister of Canada on October 24, 1945, by the mayor of St. Boniface. This reads:

> Family of five and family of three on the street. Controller here refuses to take action to provide necessary accommodation unless city requests buildings to be taken over at city's expense. City not in financial position to assume responsibility—weather at present severe—snowing. Immediate relief for these families must be found otherwise small children and mothers will have health impaired—general unrest in whole community. Feel unless immediate steps taken by your department to authorize your emergency controller to commandeer building and order alterations to be made to care for these emergency cases tragedy may happen and public get out of control. Returned soldiers and families very hostile regarding lack of accommodation.
> George C. MacLean, mayor.

I have referred to the constructive contribution made to this debate by my leader. There are two speeches to which I shall draw the attention of the house, that of the Prime Minister and that of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). My leader referred to housing conditions, and I think his language was very temperate when he referred to those conditions as a disgrace. They are a blot on the escutcheon of the Dominion of Canada. I suggest with all respect to these two hon. gentlemen that their contributions to the debate on the subject of housing were marked by smugness, complacency, boastfulness and an attempt to treat the whole subject in a trivial way. What we did not find in their speeches was realism. There was no courageous facing up to the problem which housing presents in Canada in its full dimensions or any indication that there would be a gearing of a great national effort to meet it. I am sorry that the Minister of Reconstruction is not in the house at the moment. I should like to say, as I have told him personally, and I believe in this I speak for all members, that we are delighted that he has returned from his vacation looking so much improved in health following the long-deferred vacation that he took between sessions, and we all hope that he will enjoy good health from it. At least his vacation has had a tonic effect upon his spirits, for if ever a man was full of optimism it was certainly the Minister of Reconstruction when he spoke in this debate two days ago. He saw everything through rose-coloured glasses, and in listening to his speech and to that of the Prime Minister two days earlier I began to wonder if I was really living in the same country as they, because the descriptions that they gave of conditions as they seemed to find them were so utterly different from the actual conditions that I have seen that I had to pinch myself to see if I was really sitting here in this month of March in the Dominion of Canada. Their descriptions were of a very different kind of Canada from what I have seen in recent months.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, let us have a frank approach to and a clear appreciation of the immensity of this housing problem, and then let us view it in the light of the government's policy to meet it. The government has not met the housing problem. It has not taken adequate measures to cope with it. I wish that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Reconstruction would come to some of the places I have seen where men and women and their families, many of them veterans who have given long years of service to their country in this war, are living in hovels, garrets or cellar basements—not just one case but in thousands.

How big is this housing problem, Mr. Speaker? It is an immense problem. It has reached enormous proportions. Mr. Storms, general manager of Housing Enterprises Limited, said in a published statement on March 14 last that there are 375,000 families in Canada who are involuntarily doubled up because of the housing shortage. Imagine—375,000 families! That means almost 2,000,000 people. He went on to say that the situation was daily becoming worse with the arrival of soldiers and their dependents from overseas. It is a problem that mounts with every boatload of soldiers coming back from overseas. In the city of Toronto the authorities, who are doing their best to cope with local conditions, estimate that one-half of the discharged ex-servicemen want housing, and the problem is growing daily. The department of welfare of the city of Toronto keeps a record of the families who apply to them for housing accommodation, and in the last three months the number of unfilled applications on hand has increased by eighteen per cent. It has gone up every week. The need is constantly growing. The situation is going to continue to grow worse if we can expect nothing more from the government than has been indicated hitherto in this debate. It would be cruel to mislead the people of Canada into thinking that with the kind of programme the government has indicated conditions can improve.

It is a bitterly cruel fact that those who are bearing the brunt of the housing shortage in Canada to-day are our veterans. After long years of separation from their wives and families, tens of thousands of them have come back to find themselves either still separated from their families or having to double up under intolerable conditions. The readjustment period will be difficult enough for many of these men without their having to face all that may be involved in domestic conditions in the present intolerable situation. As Mr. Storms pointed out, the problem is going to become increasingly acute with the arrival from overseas of the soldiers and the dependents of those who have married overseas. The hon. member who seconded the address (Mr. Winters) had this to say as reported at page 19 of Hansard:

> We do not overlook the fact that many of our soldiers are bringing war brides and families with them to Canada, and we wish to assure them of a welcome in this country.

But it will be a very sad welcome indeed that many thousands of these wives are going to receive in Canada in having to submit to the doubling up which will be necessary if they are to have a roof over their heads. There will be more of them living in cellars and garrets.

[Mr. Fleming.]

We have had intolerable conditions in other respects as well. I have already referred to the unequal burden borne by the veterans, and I should like to make mention also of the very unequal share of the burden that is being borne by people with families. Unless the government in framing its housing plans for the future takes into account the claims of people with families and puts them first after the claims of the ex-service personnel we are going to leave a crying social need unsolved.

There are other problems, too. I have personal knowledge of two cases in Montreal which were brought to my attention, and which are only typical of many others, showing the methods being practised to evade the rent control regulations. In one case the rent paid was the rent fixed by the rental authority, but the sum of $500 was exacted from the tenant for the purchase of the key. In another case an apartment had been rented furnished, but the prospective tenant was compelled to buy the furniture at an utterly exorbitant price. Astute minds have been directed to devising methods of defeating the rent control regulations.

The effect has been very unhappy indeed on the reestablishment of veterans. One reason why so many of the ex-service men have not yet found employment is that they have been kept so busy trying to find housing accommodation they have not had time or opportunity or perhaps the will to look about for needed employment. That condition is common all over Canada, and particularly in the large cities. It is retarding recovery on the employment side, the reconversion side. You will find it acute in mining communities and in logging communities. There is a great need of proper housing accommodation adjacent to the big camps in many great logging areas in this country, not only in the east but in the west, in British Columbia, on Vancouver island and elsewhere.

The suggestion has been made by someone: Oh, let the surplus people in the cities go to the farms. But so long as we have these glowingly optimistic statements from the Minister of Reconstruction about the great opportunities of employment and high wages which will be available in industry you will not find many people going back from the large cities to the rural areas from which many of them came. Conditions are so bad that in some cities there has been interference with the law; but it is a great tribute to the law-abiding character of our people that under conditions of great stress there has been so little lawlessness over present housing conditions. In some communities, however, there has been interference with sheriffs to prevent evictions of ex-service personnel. The government must take account of this situation.

What have been the activities of the government in this field? Well, we had a statement given to the press by the Minister of Reconstruction—hon. members will find it in the Ottawa Journal of February 11—which is a pretty fair sample of what happens when you get three ministers in the same administration competing for power in connection with housing matters or any others. This was the not unboastful statement which fell from the minister on that occasion; he was speaking about what the government is doing, and he said:

> Wartime Housing is the only department of government that is doing anything to get these houses built.

The only department! Well, I will accept his confession as applied to the other departments of government.

What is this great record of Wartime Housing Limited of which the Minister of Reconstruction boasts? I will give the house one experience. It is the experience that the city of Toronto had with contracts for 603 houses to be built in adjacent communities. These were to be semi-permanent houses. Unfortunately, Wartime Housing Limited decided that, of the 7,000 houses that it laid down in its 1945 programme, 6,200 were to be built without cellars, and only 800 with cellars. Under these conditions the city of Toronto had to take these houses without cellars; and what is the result? The first sod was turned on July 4, 1945, and a very optimistic statement—of course statements which come from the government or its minions are always optimistic—came from the representative of Wartime Housing Limited on that occasion. He said that 200 would be ready by the fall and 300 by Christmas. The first house was occupied on December 18, and to-day, ten months after the turning of the first sod, only 183 are completed. A fine record indeed! Wartime Housing Limited is still going on, wherever distracted municipalities apply for help, exacting harsh terms. They are still demanding a free gift of the best sites from the municipalities; they are still demanding subsidies in the form of donations of land and low taxes. In the city of Toronto the taxes they are prepared to pay do not amount to a quarter of what those properties would have to bear if they were owned by private persons. This is the kind of terms which Wartime Housing Limited is exacting.

That is not all. For instance, Toronto has expended already in appropriations, for the purpose of assisting housing, $2 million. The responsibility in this matter rests on the dominion. But here is a sample where one municipality—and I believe it stands pre-eminent in respect of the load it has had to carry, a load which the dominion government has left it to carry—has spent over $2 million in meeting not only the demands of Wartime Housing Limited for the provision of services in these 600 houses outside the city, but others as well. Wartime Housing is still going on disturbing the normal channels of distribution by its high-handed requisitioning methods.

What is the situation in respect of building materials? We have a glowing account in the throne speech of what is to be done to provide building materials, and we have this remarkable statement of the Minister of Reconstruction as quoted in the Ottawa Journal of February 11:

> We have beaten the shortage of brick, and lumber is now coming on the market in good quantities for houses.

Hon. members will remember, too, that he said in the house on the 20th of this month that perhaps lumber was the least of our problems and that, generally speaking, the situation was well in hand. I do not know what the Minister of Reconstruction means when he says that the problem of brick has been beaten, and that lumber is coming on the market in large quantities. It just does not fit the facts as the supply houses in the country know them. It does not fit the facts as they exist in Toronto and the other big cities of Canada. Talk about beating the situation in brick! One of the building materials which is in most critically short supply is brick; if there is another in the same category it is lumber; and it is not good enough to have these glowingly optimistic statements from the Minister of Reconstruction when they cannot be supported by facts. They just do not fit the facts as we members of the House of Commons know them in our respective constituencies. Not only do these shortages exist in acute form to-day; they will be felt for another two years unless a massive effort is put forth in this field. Yet in October last—I think it was the 25th—a very optimistic statement was made with regard to the production of building materials, on that occasion, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). There seems to be something contagiously optimistic among members of the government; when they come to this question they are always optimistic, regardless of the facts. I will not take time to review the glowing statement made on that occasion. But the house will recall this, that although the Minister of Reconstruction painted such an optimistic and rosy picture to us two days ago, nevertheless it is not six weeks ago that he appointed a fact-finding committee, drawn from the Canadian construction association, to ascertain the underlying causes of the shortage. The fact is that there are shortages and that these shortages will continue unless, as I say, a massive effort is put forward.

When we are approaching this problem let us realize that there must be a tremendous amount of work done to expand the capacity of the building and construction industry in Canada. Mr. H. C. Nicholls, the retiring president of the Canadian construction association, stated on January 14 of this year that the capacity of the building industry of Canada to-day is 30,000 houses per annum.

An hon. MEMBER: It was 40,000.

Mr. FLEMING: It was 30,000, according to the statement of the retiring president of the Canadian construction association; that is, the housebuilding capacity of the building industry. On that occasion representatives of the plumbing supply industry in Canada stated that that was far too optimistic an estimate, that twenty to twenty-five thousand was the maximum that their trade could possibly supply at the present time.

Mr. McILRAITH: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. FLEMING: If we are to expect larger figures of construction—

Mr. McILRAITH: Would the hon. member—

Mr. FLEMING: —it can only be on the basis of their building houses without putting plumbing in them.

Mr. McILRAITH: Would the hon. member permit a question on that?

Mr. FLEMING: I will give the hon gentleman the same answer that the minister gave in the house two days ago: when a number of members wished to ask him questions he said "No, no, no." I am sorry; I should like to answer questions, but I have not the time.

An hon. MEMBER: Deal with facts.

Mr. FLEMING: That is what I am doing.

An hon. MEMBER: That is open to doubt.

Mr. FLEMING: That is a very generous statement on the part of the hon. member. We recall where it comes from.

A word about these controls: let us have a picture of this control situation. Hon. members will recall that controls are a form of machinery set up in war-time to meet a war-time situation, to ration scarcity, and in some cases to create scarcity to prevent the expenditure of the funds of people on certain things and also to draw off labour from certain industries into war industries. That applied as much to the industries engaged in the production of building materials as to any others. The controls took such forms as these wage ceilings. There were low wage ceilings in industries engaged in the production of building materials. Price ceilings, fixed with reference to 1941 prices, were low, and it will be recalled that the restrictions went into great detail; they were very minute. Then the burden of taxation fell very heavily on industries engaged in the production of building materials. They had been depressed industries before the war and their standard profits were low. Consequently they have little or no benefit from whatever expansion in production is hoped for now. As a matter of fact, when the Minister of Reconstruction stated in this chamber last fall that the construction industries were making more money than before, he did not go on to tell us that the Minister of Finance is taking most of it away in the form of excess profits taxes.

The controls also take the form of zoning the marketing of lumber in particular areas and the application of quotas as between domestic and export markets, as well as the former multitude of permits and the multiplicity of controls, together with the vast army of controllers. That is the picture which to an unhappy extent faces industries engaged in the production of building materials in Canada. Unless there is a complete change of attitude, these industries will not be encouraged to go on and expand. If we have any hope of overcoming the housing situation to-day we must start with the expansion of production in building materials, and we shall not do that until we change our approach.

Consider the picture of controls in Canada. If the government is to maintain the same type of machinery and the same attitude it has held so far, then we shall not have an expansion in output of building materials in Canada. In the United States they believe that in order to obtain proper output of building materials they must expedite production. The time has come in Canada when we must have an expediter of production. We must put the emphasis there instead of on the rationing of scarcity.

Here is the situation which I believe most people who are in touch with this question find to-day. The manufacturer is still hobbled by a number of the restrictions I have referred to, and when the Minister of Reconstruction says, "Oh, well, picture the danger of interfering with price ceilings," he ought to go farther and inform the house that at the present time his own administration is considering the easing of these ceilings on the manufactured price of these building materials. How will they do it? They will pass the burden on to the retailer. They will juggle the ceiling prices and take it out on the retailer.

In the field of distribution, zoning restrictions are still in force. What has been the effect of some of these restrictions? In the field of export, I suggest, the house should be given something more in the way of what I might call corrective information. The Minister of Reconstruction, in his glowing account two days ago, said that there had been a great response to his request for a stimulation of exports. There certainly has been in the field of exports so far as the producers of lumber are concerned, for the good reason that there is such a handsome differential between the price fixed for exports and the domestic price under ceilings. The result has been that the best lumber has been going outside Canada.

The minister can talk about his export quotas and about holding them down, but the export quotas were not fixed on a dollar basis. They were fixed on a footage basis, and the best lumber has been going to the export market, while what the trade calls the "guts and feathers" has been left to the domestic market. The situation in that regard has been such that producers to-day can realize more—I am speaking of the big differential—for rough green clears in the export trade than for manufactured kiln-dried uppers shipped to the domestic market.

There is a big black market in Canada in connection with building materials. The Minister of Reconstruction admitted it two days ago, when he said that was one reason they did away with building controls three months ago. Black markets, he said, were developing, and they are still here. There has been an undoubted attempt on the part of certain persons to get around the ceilings. The timber controller in Toronto made a statement in Toronto this week as reported in the Globe and Mail of March 20. He said:

> Illegal bonuses, such as $100 for opening a car door, or $200 for delivery before a certain hour, have been taken by lumber black marketers in Canada as part of above-ceiling-price transactions, Timber Controller D. D. Rosenberry acknowledged yesterday.
> "We all know all their dodges—or we think we do—and we are going after them," he told the Ontario Retail Lumber Dealers' Association. "Maybe we haven't started soon enough . . ."

I think it will generally be agreed that they did not start soon enough. Then he made this statement, as quoted at the end of the newspaper item, and I offer it as a panacea for solving the problem of black markets:

> "The best method of all for stopping any black marketing," he said, "is to get so much lumber on the market the few pirates will not be able to sell theirs."

In the second place, black marketing has taken the form of selling in the wholesale trade at retail prices, calling big shipments retail, and the retail merchant, of course, is the man who is suffering—the retail merchant as well as the purchaser.

In the third place, common grades of lumber have been sold as select.

In the fourth place, we all know that in the labour market, because it was not possible for many contractors engaged in building—some of them even on government enterprises—to attract labour into their service, they have been hiring men as contractors without reference to existing wage ceilings.

Let us sum up the black market situation. If we are to have restrictions and controls, then we should have them strictly enforced.

In addition, there are vast quantities of building materials in Canada to-day held out of the market. Why? Because of the uncertainty as to what the government will do. They are hoping for higher prices.

There must be on the part of the government an enunciation now of a much clearer policy with reference to the demobilization of controls than there has been in anything that has been stated so far, because, if this is not done, these vast quantities of building materials will continue to be held off the market. It must be made clear to those who are holding these quantities off the market that they will be caught with them some time, and that can be done only if the government enunciates a longer term policy with a clearer objective than anything given us heretofore.

In the face of these facts, the leading contribution by our C.C.F. friends to the solution of the country's problem is to put more shackles on the builders and those engaged in the production of building materials.

There is another form of restriction worthy of mention. I have referred to the freezing of tenants in occupation. I mentioned this at the last session, when I called the attention of the Minister of Finance to the situation, and he promised that the matter would be given consideration, but no action has been taken. When the freezing order came into effect it was made to apply not only to existing tenancies but to those thereafter created. The result was that people would not take a chance on getting undesirable tenants into their houses, and they have not offered to rent accommodation to those who are sorely in need of it.

Let me give opinions on this subject from representatives of veterans' organizations as well as representatives of labour. In the Toronto reconstruction council on January 19 we have statements like this:

> Major Edwin Meredith of the Canadian Corps Association, advanced the suggestion because he said he was seriously alarmed about the housing situation in general and the problem of veterans' families in particular.

This has reacted against veterans, and it is for that reason that I make this plea. I quote further:

> "There would be many thousands of additional rooms made available if some assurance were given," contended Russel Harvey of the Toronto district labour council. "The greatest fear of home-owners is that they won't be able to get rid of objectionable tenants if they rent rooms that are now vacant."

Mr. Harvey is a prominent labour leader in Toronto, and a member of the Ontario labour relations board.

I do hope the government will give consideration to that suggestion.

The last form of restriction to which I have time to refer is this. At the present time veterans who are home-owners must give three months' notice to their tenants if they want to resume possession of the home they occupied at the date of enlistment. They are not in a position to qualify to give that notice until they are discharged. That ought to be changed. It means that a veteran coming out of uniform has to wait for three months before he can get into the house that he owns. Surely to goodness it should be permitted to veterans to give that notice in advance of discharge. It cannot be that much hardship to the tenant, because the tenant knows that his landlord is a man in the armed forces.

We do not ask the impossible of the government, but we want a frank facing up to this situation. In large measure we lay the responsibility for this problem at the doorstep of the government. We say (1) that the government made reckless promises to win votes, and those promises have not been fulfilled; (2) we accuse them of lack of foresight and preparation. They surely could have seen the situation which was developing. We accuse them (3) of dilly-dallying and wasting valuable time when energy and drive were needed. The start should have been made long ago. We accuse them (4) of lack of frankness with the public, glossing over the serious dimensions of the housing crisis and the utter inadequacy of their measures to meet it; (5) lack of a clear-cut policy to meet a clear-cut objective, even to the extent of confusion as between departments of government; (6) discouraging private builders in a variety of ways; (7) high-handed methods of requisitioning building materials whereby a fair distribution thereof has been prevented; (8) a wage policy which has deterred production of building materials and the construction of houses. The low wage ceiling will have to be eased. We accuse them (9) of a taxation policy which has discouraged the worker, the producer, the processor and the builder, and has restricted production; and last but by no means least, (10) a war-time man-power policy which wasted our human resources and our ability to produce.

The responsibility is that of the government. We do not ask something superhuman or impossible of them, but we do say that they have not measured up to their responsibilities. They have fallen far short of them. This is a federal responsibility. The government has taken all the necessary power unto itself. It is the same old story. When it comes to taking credit for something good they are ready to take it, but what about responsibility when things do not look so good? Well, that is a little different. We have had a fine illustration of that in this debate and in the debates of the fall session in connection with labour conditions. There we had an illustration of the difference between credit and responsibility. When the Ford strike was on we had a labour crisis in this country. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) rose in his place in this house and said that it was a provincial responsibility. But to-day—

Mr. MITCHELL: I never did anything of the kind.

Mr FLEMING: Well, it is to be found in Hansard. The Minister of Labour said that it was the responsibility of the government of Ontario. Then a solution was brought about by joint action of the two governments, and to-day the Prime Minister boasts about the condition of labour relations in Canada, but to whom does he give the credit? To the Minister of Labour. Of course, when it comes to credit there is no doubt about the government being right in the field.

The matter of employment has a direct relationship to housing. It was estimated in the Curtis report that the construction of 25,000 houses would provide 150,000 jobs per year. The responsibility of initiating policies to bring about conditions of high employment rests on the dominion; therefore they have a direct responsibility in the matter of housing. In the matter of social security —and this is a problem of social security— the responsibility certainly rests on the dominion to assist.

May I detain the house while I try to sum up what I conceive to be the needs of the situation. In the first place, there must be a frank recognition on the part of the government and of parliament that a national emergency exists. Let there be no playing politics with that. There is a national emergency in the field of housing. My leader and others have pointed that out. The President of the United States has recognized the same thing in his country. Why cannot we recognize it in ours? I speak now of the government and of parliament. When it comes to the safety of the state being involved there is no hesitation on the part of the government to take measures even to override the rule of law. Why cannot we have strong action by legal means in this field of housing? I have spoken of the need of easing wage ceilings. I have referred to the need of easing the burden of high taxation on wage-earners and the need of easing the burden of taxation on those who are engaged in production. We agree in all parts of the house that there must be complete concentration on the building of homes even if other forms of construction have to be sacrificed. In the construction of homes first preference must be given to veterans.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member's time is now exhausted. Unless he has the consent of the house he cannot continue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Continue.

Mr. FLEMING: I thank the house for its great courtesy. I promise hon. members I shall be brief. After the provision for the need of houses second place must be given to the needs of the construction industry itself, because there will have to be a big expansion of plant engaged in the production of building materials if the colossal need is to be met.

In the next place there must be a big plan. When President Truman gave instructions to Mr. Wilson Wyatt, his housing administrator, now housing expediter, to draft a plan for the United States he gave him only one instruction and it was this, "Make no little plans." That must be our approach in this country. We must go forward with a big plan. Half measures will not do; the problem is too colossal. I have not yet been able to find the 1946 programme of the government in the field of construction. If it has a 1946 programme or objective it still remains a profound secret so far as this house is concerned. We must have a goal. We shall flounder if we have not a goal. Housing Enterprises Limited has announced that its objective in 1946 is the construction of 6,000 housing units in various Canadian centres. That is rental housing. That is a drop in the bucket. Let us not delude ourselves that this will be low-rent housing. It cannot be. The cost of construction to-day is such that Housing Enterprises Limited cannot build low-rent housing as that term is properly understood. They will probably be medium-rental houses.

Let us have a proper understanding of what is involved. I am not going to go over the promises that the government and its supporters made in the last election campaign. The house will remember the promises of the 600,000 to 1,000,000 houses. Let us see the big plan. We have not heard about it in parliament. Let us have the big bold plan they advertised in the campaign. Where is it? We in this house would like to see the government's big bold plan.

The Prime Minister did not give the United States very high marks for what they are doing in the field of construction. The United States has set its objective. It was approved by the President. The original objective of 500,000 houses for 1946 has been raised to 1,200,000 houses on which construction is to be commenced before the end of this year. That will be increased before the end of 1947 to 2,700,000 houses and apartments. There is a real objective. Relatively, our need for housing in this country is greater because our climate is more severe. We must plan on a big scale.

In the next place, we must realize that the problem of housing, in certain aspects, will be with us for a long time. Of course all hon. members want to concentrate upon the emergency aspect of the problem because it is of such collosal proportions. But we must keep in mind, too, the long-range problem; and what we do to-day in an effort to cope with the emergency aspects must be related to our long-range objective.

We must not lose sight of the need in the low-rent housing field, a field which is not met by the National Housing Act as it exists to-day. The great gap in the act is in its lack of provision for those in the lower income brackets.

The Curtis report estimated that there were 300,000 sub-standard dwellings in our cities, towns and rural areas. That was the number estimated two years ago, and it is higher to-day. Because of the doubling-up the number of families living in those dwellings is substantially greater to-day than it was then. We have to tackle that problem, and try to correlate our present plan in meeting the emergency aspects with the long-range approach to a problem which will be with us for some time.

I have been critical of what I have described as smugness and complacency in statements which have fallen from the lips of members of the government during this debate. If their words are a fair indication of their approach to the problem, then this problem will not be met. If the government is simply to be boastful of what it has done; if it is to be smug and complacent in the face of a national crisis, then the problem will not be solved. If there is one thought that transcends all others to-day, it is that government should give leadership, leadership on a wide front. We shall not solve the problem either by denying its existence or belittling it, or by belittling the efforts of those who draw its true proportions to the attention of the house.

The government has not given the leadership to which the people of Canada are entitled. Had it done so, would it have been necessary for the veterans to occupy the Vancouver hotel?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne) (Translation): The year 1946 marks a troubled era in the history of the world. The war came to an end last year; still, all nations feel that peace has not yet returned. While the great powers are endeavouring to ensure it through an agreement based upon the respect of treaties and mutual confidence, the nations, great or small, are making a determined effort with a view to reestablishing their upset economy. Each country, in the turmoil of the post-war period, seeks practical solutions, works out the most diversified plans, but faces the future not without some fears that the circumstances justify.

Canada, like the other nations, must now solve internal problems which are both serious and complicated. They crop up so fast and in such numbers that the government, unable to solve them all at once, must perforce concentrate on the most pressing ones.

I recognize that such a situation is disquieting to them; besides, it is depressing for the people who, now that war is over, are anxious to enjoy peace and who, not finding it up to their expectations, voice their resentment in no uncertain terms.

Discontent is rife among the people. It is kindled less by democracy than by its occasional abuse, less by wealth than by its frequent abuse, less by our recognized laws than by their oft-neglected implementation. To our other evils, war has added excessive legislation which the people accepted as a necessary consequence of the armed conflict. To this legislation, hundreds of orders of all sorts were grafted, many of which smacked so obviously of sheer experiment, contrivance and artificiality that on the whole, they could not be favourably accepted. As a result, our democratic system is beginning to feel the repercussions of this discontent. "War is over, say the people. Then, why is such and such a policy still in effect? Why is such another preserved?" Dissatisfaction is intensified by the fact that while hostilities lasted, the praises of peace were sung far and wide and we were promised that the end of the war would bring about universal comfort and happiness. However, reality with its sad disillusions has kindled all over, but especially among the working classes a feeling of discontent which tends to become sharper. The piling up of insignificant causes inevitably brings about tremendous results. Unimportant facts, harmless if isolated, are sooner or later directed to some definite goal. Unconsciously or otherwise, they generate certain trends which, though weak at first gather more and more impetus and finally become overwhelming. Such trends are at present influencing our national life and current events are causing deep concern among the masses who are becoming impatient. Can you blame the people, driven to distraction by excessive legislation and generosity, subjected to all sorts of restrictions and witnessing the extravagant methods of capital, for still believing in happiness, and wishing for comfort, work and a home while at the same time pressing for security?

To live an honest and happy life, a minimum of comfort and well-being is needed. If that is lacking, if people are deprived of work, home, food and clothing, the door is wide open to the most dangerous abuses. Whenever a member of the national family, no longer believing in the democratic system, leans towards socialism seeing in this doctrine a remedy to all the evils he suffers at the hands of more fortunate individuals, another cell disintegrates and disappears. Since the end of the war, trends of thought—there is no need to specify—have taken shape and expanded. Unemployment has given rise to them. If we wish to insure the security of the State and maintain peace within its borders, we must put an end to the dissatisfaction caused by hardship and insufficiency, and stamp out the evils which afflict society.

Nothing is so distasteful, now that we have emerged from a war in which we have spent billions of dollars, than to see again the loathsome spectre of unemployment standing watch at the windows of thousands of homes, and to notice on the brows of thousands of people the deep lines of a worry caused by their enforced idleness. From week to week, unemployment increases and those who cannot find work comment ominously, in front of the selective service's employment offices, on the fact that "it took a war to give us jobs". The explanation will be given that transition from war to peace cannot normally take place without any impediment; that may be true, but in my opinion the real cause lies in the fact that our war effort has overstepped the limits of common sense and that, during the war, not enough thought has been given to preparations for the period that would follow. The people have been made to pay exceedingly heavy taxes; we have had an income tax applying both to capital and savings. Those taxes have cut into the capital of the citizens with a fixed income; they have cut into the capital of manufacturers who have to meet obligations incurred before the war; today, unable to obtain raw materials, they no longer have, once their taxes are paid, the funds necessary for the modernization of their plants.

In 1943, I said in the house that our war effort was sometimes almost hysterical. We have granted loans interest free and now, through generosity, we are writing them off. We have given away billions of dollars because, we were told, war required it. We have made large contributions of manpower. We have generously drawn from our natural resources. Canada has supplied food and munitions as well as men. Our war effort was bound to give rise to problems and, because we are unable to solve them properly, they are creating serious difficulties to the whole nation. We are now at peace and yet, in the name of peace, we are asking Canada to lend money and contribute to loans which will add, in capital and interest, to the already heavy burden resting on our shoulders.

During the war I objected to such generosity. When the bill covering the $1,250 million comes before the house for approval, I reserve the right to define my attitude in the light of the information given and express my full views on the matter. At this stage of our national life, when our debt has increased from $4 to $16 billion in five years, we should not become overexcited but should tackle the problem of reforming our economy.

Canada should certainly help the devastated countries of Europe, because the great principle of charity compels us to do so. We should not be mean about it. We have helped them and are still doing so with pride as well as generosity. However, before lending vast sums of money which will carry millions of dollars in interest and will be more advantageous to the borrower than to the lender, before imposing additional obligations on the Canadian taxpayer, should we not first secure employment for our people, grant more facilities for the re-establishment of veterans, reduce the income tax, suppress social evils, provide our citizens with dwellings and take measures that will enable us to obtain without difficulty the goods produced in Canada, namely: materials of all kinds, clothing, foodstuffs, butter for instance, which is so important on the worker's table or in his lunch-box?

These are the causes of dissatisfaction among the people. Mingle with them and you will be convinced. Among veterans, there is more grumbling than we think. During the war, they were presented with a rehabilitation plan; this most wonderful, most generous and most perfectly balanced plan was truly a model for other countries to copy. However, its application has become absolutely impossible in many parts of Canada. Why? Because of the incompetence and neglectfulness of district officials and of inadequte advice and direction from selective service offices; because, also, veterans have found it impossible to obtain priorities both from War Assets Corporation and the Prices Board. O-Pip, the official organ of the Canadian Legion in the Province of Quebec notes in its March issue that "reestablishment is a fiasco". And Mr. G. Henri Gonthier, the legion president in that province said recently, during an interview:

> We had a terribly hard time trying to convince our veterans not to give vent to their ill-feeling. But we have had enough. We are not asking for charity; we simply want our veterans to receive, through regular and legal channels, the help they so richly deserve.

Other groups of citizens are also dissatisfied and crave a little more justice and attention. Failure of the government to forecast, in the speech from the throne, any relief whatever from our present tax set-up has been a source of great disappointment. The people claim they are entitled to such relief, in order to meet new and accrued responsibilities. Wages have been lowered although the cost of living is just as high and has a tendency to rise. Lower taxes would offer relief to industrialists, merchants, civil servants, farmers, heads of families, as well as to our youth, who, under present conditions, cannot save for the years ahead. Let the government abolish those commissions which are now useless; let them return to civil life those hundreds of men in uniforms who have asked for their discharge and are being kept in the army willy-nilly; let all departments put into effect a policy of economy; let there be no costly or useless projects, no undue generosity, but let us rather spend a few hundred millions on public works.

Public works will be needed immediately in those cities where unemployment is more acute, in those centres which have been overpopulated through the presence of war industries. Public works will also be needed in those municipalities which, in their desire to cooperate with the government, have made enormous capital expenditures and are now financially embarrassed. The people will never understand or accept unemployment, when, during the war terrific sums were spent without haggling.

We shall have to reconvert, sell or turn over to private enterprise war plants—such as the Bouchard plant—which can still be profitably operated as private industries, unless the government be willing to take them over and produce for UNRRA. I shall have suggestions to offer later on.

The Department of National Defence will have to establish, in every military district, a regional board, to study each case of desertion on its merit and to make sure that the commanding officers of the detention camps are not wielding their powers to render more burdensome the serving of a sentence by those who have accepted it in compliance with the law of the land. On the other hand, I claim that it is unfair to keep in detention or in camps, farm labourers or skilled employees, as, for example, expert buttermakers when the scarcity of butter is so pronounced, or lumbermen, when they are so urgently needed in the bush, or again, electricians and skilled carpenters when the building trade is paralyzed. Personally, I would favour an amnesty, but if, for reason of discipline, it must not be resorted to, let us at least be decent enough to those who report for duty to consider their cases in the light of their special circumstances and eliminate those vexations which, in the past, have given rise to so much justified criticism and legitimate complaint.

The speech from the throne forecasts the immediate implementation of measures directed at maintaining employment at a high level and solving the extremely acute housing problem. These are both urgent legislations. I welcome them and so do the Canadian people who are clamouring for them. I shall support the address, as a token of my appreciation for those two pieces of legislation, but, as I said before, I shall reserve the right to vote according to my views on the bill concerning the billion and a quarter loan on which, no doubt, the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will give us full particulars.

The housing situation is critical. I believe it is in our own interest to see that our markets are supplied with sufficient building materials; then it might be justifiable to ship our surplus overseas. In this field, as in others, there is no reason why foreigners should be supplied before our own people.

Employment is the means of supplying work. A nation cannot be happy when unemployment is prevalent. Prior to 1939, the undertaking of public works was urged; however, under pretense of curtailing expenses, they were denied. Then war was declared and millions were juggled around. To wage and win the war, billions of dollars were instantly available. Could we now refuse to earmark a few hundred million dollars each year to fight unemployment through the country, applying them to the undertaking of public works that would remain an asset for Canada? To ensure peace, maintain the democratic prestige of our country, prevent our population from subscribing to subversive doctrines, attain true national security, work is the essential factor.

I shall not support the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). It evidences a lack of sincerity which is characteristic of the party he directs. I fail to understand that it now stands for economies and reductions in taxes, since, during the war years, government expenditures were never large enough in its opinion. The Conservative party does not enjoy public confidence; even under its new camouflage, it has not been successful in overcoming the sorry reputation it acquired during the first Great War. On this side of the house freedom of speech is a reality; we may frankly utter our thoughts, even if they are at variance with those of our colleagues. This makes for strength in the ranks of the Liberals. Our party is not based on egotism, coercion, blind subservience to an official platform or a "believe or die" policy; it will survive when all others have collapsed, for no other party has recognized to a fuller extent the value of individuality and freedom.

I shall not support the sub-amendment of the C.C.F. party. I rely too much on private enterprise to subscribe to a socialist doctrine which, although moderate, must still be contrary to the best interests of a country like Canada. The war years, due to the amount of work they have provided, have deprived socialism of its best opportunities. As I said before, so that this theory, with others similar to it, may have no chance of spreading, work is absolutely necessary.

Social security in all fields: food in the larder of every home, ownership of property made easy for all, hardship eliminated, social evils suppressed, maximum encouragement given to agriculture, private enterprise fostered, youth assisted and encouraged, happiness everywhere: that is the part the government should play in 1946 and in subsequent years. They have accomplished a tremendous task during the war. Why could they not do as much in peace time? Canada occupies an important place among the nations of the world. However she must continue her activities in the fields of industry, commerce, agriculture, mining, forestry, and in all other national spheres. Her future is in her own hands. The other nations, intent on solving their own problems, will not help her to reestablish herself and, in the field of business, where gratitude is frequently unknown, the nations including Great Britain will never surrender the freedom which they have always held of buying wherever they see fit. Therefore, it is Canada's duty, in the name of the elementary principle of self-preservation, not to exceed the limits of common sense. Will Canada have won the peace if within her own borders there are unemployment, dislocation and discouragement? First and above all, we must prevent the evil of unemployment. In addition, we must lighten the burden borne by the workers and others in the lower salary brackets and develop further throughout the country the program of social security which has been so successfully launched by the present government. We have reached a decisive hour when every Canadian must become a crusader in order to protect and defend the social structure against trouble-makers, against promoters of ideas which are inconsistent with our parliamentary system and our Christian traditions. That which fosters unity within a nation is the joy which everyone feels in belonging to such a nation. Social security and national security are two words which are inseparable and which are guarantees for the future. By keeping them to the fore, by uniting them, by blending them, we shall make Canada a healthy, united and powerful country.

(Text):

Mr. WILFRED LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, allow me first to compliment the government on the firm stand they have taken with regard to the fantastic espionage network which communistic Russia was in the act of establishing in this country. Some of our fellow citizens have reached a pass where they consider that their obligation toward communism must have priority over their allegiance to Canada. That is a logical consequence of the communistic propaganda in this country, a propaganda which I denounced when I introduced in this house on May 24, 1940, a bill to amend the criminal code for the purpose of outlawing all propaganda conducted by communists or nazis, who advocate an ideology opposed to our conception of democracy. That bill was rejected, but I must commend the government upon having seen the light and come to realize how justified I was in introducing that bill. Better late than never. I would suggest to the government that they should bring back that bill as soon as possible and outlaw the communist party in Canada. We are in duty bound to take action at once because to any shrewd mind it is obvious that the ambition of the dictatorship now in power at Moscow is to replace our Christian civilization by absolute atheism, and when belief in God is lacking, everything is possible in the field of international relations.

The communist party, which is the only party that exists in Russia, simply wants to spread its sphere of influence over all Europe and use its propaganda for the suppression of the two remaining bulwarks, England and Spain, which will prevent it from carrying out its dechristianization work. To reach that objective, it uses in certain countries people who are nationalist in name only and who arouse local patriotism in order to foment bloody revolutions through which it will benefit. In other countries, it uses a camouflaged communist party, as is the case in Canada. Those nationalists and communists hired by Moscow take pride in saying that they are working out the liquidation of England.

Would America, civilization and even Catholicism, stand to gain anything if the Soviet empire were to replace the British empire as a dominating influence in the old world? Sensible people will be unanimous in answering that question. The influence of the British empire in Europe is very much preferable to that of the Soviet empire, because the former respects the individual much more than does the latter and allows him a freedom which is completely lacking under Moscow rule. It will be a great mistake to hail any lessening of British influence in Europe without thinking of what will follow. What the world needs most at this time is sober thinking and realistic deeds; otherwise, our road will lead to absolute chaos.

No one more than I desires the independence of my country, but I wish to attain this object by orderly and legitimate means. Patriotism is instilled not by resorting to bloodshed but by winning over the hearts and minds of people. History shows that all those who have attained power or achieved their aims through violence have been forcibly brought down from the pinnacle on which they had ensconsed themselves.

We can reply to advocates of revolutionary communism and nationalism by striving to improve our social legislation for the benefit of the public, by firmly repressing monopolies and by passing laws which, economically speaking, will allow a better distribution of the national wealth. Now that we have accomplished a tremendous war effort, far beyond our means, sound patriotism must include a generous thought for our own citizens to whom we should grant relief from taxation as rapidly as possible to enable them readily to attain a normal social balance.

Hence I deem it my duty to protest forthwith against those periodical gifts to England, the brunt of which will be borne by the majority of our citizens. I have a great respect for the British commonwealth of nations, but as you know, sir, I have always felt that a Canadian worthy of the name, who has pledged allegiance to his country and must serve its interests first and foremost, should protect the public treasury against those who are prone to make gifts to other nations which, in many instances, are wealthier than we are.

Ireland safeguarded her own interests during the war. No one holds any grudge against her and her prestige has not declined anywhere in the world.

I respect the views of those who differ with me in regard to the meaning of the words "to serve one's country", but I deemed it my duty to vote against participation and against each billion dollar gift which, under one form or another, we have so generously made during the war. I have at the time stated the reasons for my stand and, in my opinion, those reasons still hold to-day.

From a strictly Canadian point of view, I believe that this further loan of $1,250 million, which will not bear any interest for five years, is not a good business proposition for our country, because this agreement which I have read most carefully, contains no provision compelling England to spend this money in Canada. England, whose memory is short where Canada's efforts on her behalf are concerned, does not, under this agreement, undertake to lift the restrictions she has imposed on Canadian products, not only within her own borders but all over the sterling area. England will be able to spend our Canadian dollars anywhere and in any way she sees fit in order to rebuild her pre-war economy. Whenever it suits her purpose, England can even continue to purchase wheat from the Argentine rather than from Canada, or give preferance to Denmark's bacon over our own farm produce, and experience has taught me that the dictates of her interests will be the sole guide in the matter.

In short, Canadians will not only have helped England win the war, but also assist her in her conquest of world markets. Our dollar will serve as Great Britain's ambassador. Since we export 40 per cent of our production, we shall help to impair our own markets, while ostensibly attempting to maintain England's; for, if she spends our dollars elsewhere, Great Britain will insist that the countries whose goods she purchases reciprocates with certain privileges. These will certainly not be to our advantage, and we shall recover our funds through banking transactions rather than through the sale of our goods.

It may be claimed that at the present time Great Britain has tremendous contracts in Canada and that the loan will help to pay for them. No mention is made of these contracts, however, in the terms of the agreement between Great Britain and Canada, and there is nothing to prevent England from cancelling them if she can do better business elsewhere.

The British are business men. Far from hating them, I admire them, but I sincerely wish we had, as members of the Canadian government, men with as much business sense as they possess.

Australia refused a loan to England and I fail to see why we should be an easier prey than the Australians. I much prefer, in Europe, Great Britain's influence to that of Russia, but I do not think it necessary to drain our coffers to attain that end. The loan and gifts we are making under this agreement are five times greater than the loan to Great Britain contemplated by the United States, in proportion to the respective populations of the two countries. Are we wealthier than the Americans? Are our anticipated revenues superior to those of the United States and England? I do not think so.

I beg to denounce with the greatest energy the condescension and lack of Canadian spirit evidenced by the leader of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who blamed the other nations of the commonwealth for failing to grant loans to England and who stated, as reported in Hansard of March 19, 1946:

> I think the loan should have been made to Great Britain interest free.

This stand on the part of the Social Credit party does not surprise me in the least for, during the war, they have been the most imperialistic group in the House of Commons, and they are generally known as such throughout the province of Quebec. I have as much respect for a sincere partisan of social credit as I have contempt for those who attempt to use that doctrine as a platform to teach a political creed that has nothing in common with the social credit policy expounded in this house by the leader of the party, the hon. member for Peace River.

I also strongly protest against that part of the agreement whereby we make a gift of $425 millions to Britain, and even more I am told, which is supposed to represent the amount owed us by that country for the training of her airmen in Canada.

Why, in the same agreement, do we also cancel all interests on a loan of $700 millions made to Britain in 1942?

Since the greater part of the taxes collected by the government are paid by citizens whose income is below $3,000, the cost of financing that agreement with Great Britain will be borne by the great majority of our people.

Needless to say, the attitude of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), who approves this policy but finds our rates of income tax too high, is ridiculous. Therefore the people of Canada who have been unable to borrow money from their own government at two per cent interest in order to build houses or in the way of farm credits or public works to alleviate unemployment will be paying for those gifts to Britain.

Why should we again and always pay for such unsound generosity in the hope of helping a country whose possibilities of reestablishment, with its colonial empire, India for instance, are far greater than our own, without forgetting the high level of our taxes? All the party leaders in the house have approved this transaction as good business for Canada. I take the liberty of telling them that I find this business unsound and that I will vote against the agreement when it is submitted to the house for approval..

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): I hope the hon. members who moved and seconded the motion for an address to His Excellency in reply to the speech from the throne in such an excellent manner will pardon me if I do not make any extended remarks in congratulating them. Perhaps the best compliment which they received was that accorded them in the very careful attention given to the remarks of both the mover, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) and the seconder, the distinguished-looking hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters). I hope the hon. member for St. Boniface will pardon me if I make particular reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. I was particularly interested in his remarks because they brought to the attention of this house and of the country problems affecting the eastern section of the dominion. Like the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, I propose this evening to deal with two matters affecting eastern Canada particularly, although they will have a direct bearing on the rest of our nation. I wish to come directly to a portion of the speech which I believe is of the utmost importance to the maritime provinces, namely, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. In doing so I am going to refer at once to paragraphs 6 and 7 of the speech from the throne. Paragraph 6 reads:

> The government has steadily pursued its efforts to restore former markets, to secure new markets and generally to expand peace-time exports. In pursuit of this policy, export credits, for which additional provision was made at the last session, have been extended to several of our war-time allies.

Paragraph 7, which is closely connected with the thought expressed in paragraph 6, states:

> At this session you will be asked to approve an agreement, recently concluded, for a loan to the United Kingdom which will help maintain the British market for Canadian food products and other exports. The agreement will also contribute to the steady development of trade between the two countries, the removal of trade barriers and the free use of currencies for international trade.

I believe that on these two paragraphs depends the future prosperity of our country. If these thoughts are brought into fulfilment as expressed and all sections of Canada are given an equal opportunity to prosper, I do not believe that we need to worry very much as to the terms of the dominion-provincial agreements of which we have heard so much during the past six months.

It is easy for us sitting here in the city of Ottawa, the capital of the country, to think along industrial lines. In the past six years Ontario, and perhaps Quebec have prospered to a great extent due to the increased purchasing power brought about by the industrial plants which have been established here because of the war. It is true that Ontario is known and recognized as an industrial centre, but I would not want the people of Ontario to overlook the fact that the very life of our country depends upon marketing in other lands the products of the farm, the forest, the sea and the mine. This is of paramount importance, for without active and expanding farm communities such as we have in the prairie provinces, without busy sawmills and paper mills such as we have in British Columbia, without a fishing industry such as we also have in British Columbia, in Nova Scotia and in the other maritime provinces, and an overseas market for our lead, zinc and copper operations, the manufacturing edifice of the industrial centres of Ontario and Quebec might well totter and collapse.

The report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for 1945 shows that in 1943, the last year of which we have a record, our exports to the United States amounted to 38·7 per cent; to the United Kingdom, 34·8 per cent, or a total of 73·5 per cent of all domestic exports. Thus it can be seen that Great Britain is one of our largest and best customers. On numerous occasions Great Britain has said that she must export to survive. She has made it abundantly clear that she will trade only with those who will trade with her on equal or nearly equal volume with herself. She lacked the dollars with which to buy in Canada, but as stated in paragraph 7, a loan agreement has been concluded and now awaits approval by this parliament.

Having brought Great Britain into the picture, I wish to refer to preferential tariffs within the empire which were put into effect in 1932. Some hon. members on the other side of the house may wonder why I take this occasion to bring to the attention of the house an agreement brought into effect in 1932, with which I propose to deal and about which I shall say some complimentary things. From careful questioning of persons living in the maritimes it is my considered opinion that these preferential tariffs should be continued to the greatest possible extent. I say that to the government without hesitation because I believe that the preferential tariffs such as were made in 1932 have been of real benefit to Canada and particularly to the section from which I come and have the honour to represent.

It is fully realized that pressure to have these preferential tariffs reduced or even abolished may come from certain quarters. But having regard to the time, energy and money spent during the years following 1932 to develop trade within the empire and to increase business between Canada and empire countries during that period, I urge on the government the necessity of doing everything possible to have the preferential tariffs within the empire continued. In this connection I believe I shall have the support of the prairie provinces and British Columbia, and in a broad sense all provinces.

It should not be necessary to emphasize the great advantages we have enjoyed by the establishment of many branch industrial plants in Canada following the introduction of the preferential tariff in order to enjoy the benefits of the united empire trade agreement, or the harm that may be done on the likelihood of many of them being withdrawn should the preferential tariffs be abolished.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) will be able to tell from the statistics of his department what these branch industries have been worth to Canada. I am convinced it has been a very important contribution, both in the amount of labour employed and in the various sources of revenue accruing to the government.

I would also bring to the government's attention a matter that has been the cause of a great deal of discussion in the maritime provinces, namely the terms of the West Indies trade agreements. These are such that preferential treatment cannot be given by Canada to islands or countries not mentioned in the agreement. The result is that sugar from Cuba and San Domingo had to pay full duty. This prevented the purchase of sugar from these islands by Canadian refiners, except on rare occasions when extreme world conditions forced their sugar to be sold at very low prices. Cuba became resentful, as the minister no doubt will remember, because they were large buyers of fish and potatoes in Canada. They were unable to secure favourable terms for the marketing of their sugar. The result of this was that Cuba put a practically prohibitive import duty upon table potatoes from Canada, thereby reducing the purchase in Canada to a mere 15,000 or 20,000 barrels of seed potatoes a year, as compared with a former purchase of 150,000 to 200,000 barrels of table and seed potatoes a year.

With a reciprocal trade agreement with Cuba the market for Canadian fish could be greatly increased. A large portion of their requirements have come for many years from Norway. And with the likelihood that the cost of production in Canada will be higher it will be difficult to hold the Cuban fish business we had previously.

That is why we in the maritime provinces, and particularly in Nova Scotia, think it necessary that the West Indies trade agreement be modified to allow an intermediary preference agreement to be made with other countries that can provide a desirable volume of reciprocal trade.

I think I am safe in saying that the markets of Cuba and San Domingo for fish and potatoes alone would be worth more to Canada than all the British West Indies markets combined. I commend this portion of my remarks to the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, I am pleased to see, is in his seat. I know he will give my suggestion serious thought. In fact, I am led to believe that the West Indies trade agreement is now under review, and I trust that before negotiations are definitely concluded he and his experts will give those interested in West Indies trade an opportunity of making proper representations. Or, better still, it might be wise for him to send some of his commissioners or selling agents to our end of the country so that they might become enlightened and learn some of our problems from personal contact. In this way they would be more likely to be in a position to provide remedies which would help to bring about still greater prosperity in the eastern maritime provinces.

I would also draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the fact that in dealing with Cuba the Platt amendment which, under the Spanish-American war settlement provides a twenty per cent overall preference to the United States in the Cuban market, must not be lost sight of. This may be very useful to remember if too much objection is made to a British empire preferential agreement.

An important function in connection with import-export operations is the development of port business. Perhaps the primary purpose of my remarks is to impress upon the house just how necessary it is that any and all new preferential agreements that are made, whether for full preference or intermediary preference, should contain the paramount stipulation that all goods which are to enjoy that preference must be landed ex ship, directly at the ocean or river port in Canada, as has been the requirement under the British empire trade agreements.

I feel reasonably sure that every hon. member who in any way has been connected with the shipping business, or who lives in proximity to a port doing export-import business, will realize the importance of this. The greater the number of ships using our Canadian ports, the greater the prosperity in these ports. After the adoption of the British empire trade agreement with the direct shipment clause, many lines of steamships which had not previously called at Canadian ports came to Canada in increasing numbers, as shown by the shipping records following the 1932 period. During that period scarcely a week passed that there were not two or more ships, each with from 3,000 to 7,000 tons of cargo, at Montreal, Halifax or Saint John, discharging cargo which previously had been landed at Boston or New York and conveyed by foreign railways to inland points in Canada. When far eastern trade is restored these cargoes will again flow through United States ports if the stipulation asked for is not provided. This applies also to shipments of sugar from the West Indies for Montreal, which previously moved through New York.

I realize I am not making as eloquent a speech as the majority of hon. members in the house find it within their power to deliver. However, I am placing these facts before the government in a plain and businesslike fashion. My whole argument is based upon facts, and it was for that reason that I thought it advisable to speak on this occasion, and to stick to the one subject as it is covered in the two paragraphs I have mentioned.

I have referred to far eastern trade. Some hon. members may wonder why I say it will again pass through United States ports. The plain and simple reason is that the principal offices for these lines of ships in the western hemisphere are in New York. That is the home port for both British and American-owned ships in the Pacific trade; and it is only natural that they will not add to the expense of the voyage by calling at a Canadian port unless the buyer in Canada insists that they do so. And the buyer in Canada will not so insist unless the terms of the preferential tariff require him to do so. This has been proven time and again.

The point may be raised that the ship owner will charge a higher freight rate to call at a Canadian port, and thus offset the benefit of the preference. However, on checking this point I have found that it did not happen during the period under review. There was always enough competition to get the New York or Boston rate applied to Halifax and Saint John shipments. Not only did this traffic provide a great amount of labour for stevedores and freight handlers at the port of discharge, but it moved over Canadian railways to interior points, thus providing a large and profitable traffic which will again be needed in the operation of the railways in coming years.

I mentioned a moment ago that ex ship movements meant additional labour to our waterfront workers. We have in Halifax a longshoreman's union with a membership of about 1,600 men. They are an extremely fine body of men. During the entire six years of the war not once was there the slightest sign of trouble, of a strike or anything else which would delay the shipment of supplies overseas. I know if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) were here he would agree with me when I say that a finer body of workmen could not be found throughout the entire dominion. I wish to pay a tribute to those men because of the excellent work they have done during the war period.

In addition to the 1,600 longshoremen, there are about 1,000 freight handlers and additional checkers, coopers and porters, giving a total population of around 4,000 waterfront workers. Practically all those 4,000 men are married with families, so that hon. members can see what it means to a port, particularly to Halifax, to have ships making regular calls. Ships to and from everywhere load and unload at our docks, leaving money to the extent of many millions behind in the way of stevedores' wages alone. These wages total $4,500,000 a year. There are thirty or more firms of chandlers, brokers and line agencies which do the outfitting and clearing of these ships, and this represents another large item in the total of harbour-front business.

There is another factor that enters into this export and import trade, the building and repairing of ships. In one year these activities yielded something like $14,000,000 to our port. We sincerely hope that this work will continue and be a permanent part of our port activities. Twelve transatlantic lines are now operating out of Halifax. These lines are operating freighters and combined freight and passenger ships. These companies are getting their services back to normal, one of the latest being the Swedish-American-Mexican line whose services were suspended or curtailed during the war. As war losses in shipping are made up and ocean ferrying gets back on schedule there will be 300 sailings a year out of Halifax. Every time a cargo ship of 5,000 tons is loaded and unloaded it means that about $12,500 is paid to the stevedores, checkers, porters and freight handlers.

I would not want hon. members to think I am looking at this matter purely from the point of view of Halifax. What I have said about Halifax applies equally to Saint John, Quebec and Montreal on the Atlantic, and to Vancouver, Victoria and New Westminster on the Pacific. That is why I urge that we ship through Canadian ports.

I suggest to the government that certain measures be adopted, and I direct these suggestions particularly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. First,—the British preferential trade agreement should be continued to the utmost extent. Second,—the West India trade agreement should be modified so that it will be possible to make intermediate trade agreements with other countries that can use our natural products and manufactured goods. Third,—all goods entering Canada from foreign countries under full preference or intermediate preference tariffs should be shipped directly from the country of production for discharge at a Canadian ocean or river port in order to enjoy the benefits of such preferential tariffs. Fourth, I almost feel like adding another which would be to the effect that any Canadian goods for export—I was referring to imports before—that enjoy dominion subsidy must be shipped through a Canadian port.

I should like to quote an editorial which appeared recently in the Financial Post reading as follows:

> There are few if any countries so largely dependent on a free flow of world goods as Canada. Our basic industries, agriculture, forestry, mining and fishing, must secure a huge foreign market for a great deal of their production. Normally we export over half of our wheat and bacon, ninety per cent of our newsprint, over seventy-five per cent of our minerals. On the import side, too, we lean heavily on world trade to make up deficiencies in domestic production.

I close as I began. To me paragraphs 6 and 7 of the speech from the throne are very important to the future prosperity of this our Canada, and I congratulate the government on their realization of this by including them as part of their post-war plans.

Mr. W. R. THATCHER (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne made no reference to several matters which to me appear to be of paramount importance to most Canadians. For instance, the citizens of my province will be particularly disappointed that the speech contains no proposal to commence any major irrigation projects in Saskatchewan during the current year. I raise the matter at this time, because in the constituency of Moose Jaw the shortage of water, which has plagued us for decades, has recently become dangerously acute.

As most hon. members know, the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina are located in the semi-arid section of the prairies. These two centres with a total population of approximately 80,000 people are almost entirely dependent for their water supplies on underground water and wells. For forty years, or ever since Moose Jaw became a city, the authorities have had trouble giving the people a twenty-four hour supply of water the year round. I have seen people in Moose Jaw plant lawns and gardens in the spring, only to see them die later in the year because the city authorities were forced to shut off the water or ration it.

Several years ago the federal government, realizing the gravity of the situation, sought to alleviate it by building a pumping station and reservoir near Riverhurst on the South Saskatchewan river. From there an open ditch about seventy miles long was constructed to a point near Moose Jaw. That open ditch did help the situation somewhat, and we were grateful for it, but on the whole it has proved inadequate.

Since the first of the year the water situation in Moose Jaw has been worse than at any time in the history of the city. The day I left Moose Jaw to come to Ottawa the water-mains were closed for about twelve hours. That situation prevailed during most of February and part of January. I ask hon. members to try to realize what it means to a city of 25,000 to have the water-mains shut off for part of the day. This winter, housewives were forced to fill their bathtubs the night before, if they wanted to have water to cook during the day time. Sanitary facilities could not be used while the water was cut off. Several times when I got up in the morning I could not shave because I had forgotten to put water aside the night before.

During February several of our major industries which use large quantities of water had to close down for several days at a time, and during that period hundreds of men were unemployed. Moose Jaw is the main divisional point of the Canadian Pacific railway in Saskatchewan. We had the spectacle this winter of the railroad bringing in trainloads of tank cars filled with water to keep their trains running across the prairies. On top of all this the city authorities are worried over the health aspect. When the water-mains have been closed down for ten or twelve hours and the water finally comes, it is a rusty colour and apparently filled with foreign material. I mention these facts simply to give hon. members some idea of the magnitude of the water problem that the city of Moose Jaw is facing to-day.

The city of Regina is in a somewhat similar position. It has been a little more fortunate than Moose Jaw up to the present, but to-day Regina, with its growing population, is also finding that the demand for water is exceeding the supply. An article appeared in the Regina Leader-Post of September 15 last, headed "city near limit of water supply," which reads in part:

> "Regina has pretty well reached the limit of her present water supply," J. W. D. Farrel, waterworks superintendent, said Friday.
> Deep artesian wells from which the city has been taking its water give between 5,500,000 and 6,000,000 gallons a day on the average. This summer the city could have used 7,000,000 gallons a day, if the quantity had been available.

The city of Weyburn also has experienced grave water shortages over the past few years. In other words, the future growth and industrial development of these three prairie cities is almost completely dependent on their obtaining an adequate water supply. Indeed, if new supplies of water are not obtained they may have great difficulty in maintaining their present population.

The problem of obtaining water for these cities is tied up in an integral way with obtaining a larger amount of water for the farm lands of that part of Saskatchewan. As hon. members know, our farmers in that area have fought drought conditions for many years. On the prairies water is liquid gold. Yet, despite our great need for that liquid gold, we as a people are to-day letting vast quantities pass under our noses without using it in Saskatchewan.

What is the solution? Every Canadian I think knows of the mighty rivers that have their source in the Rocky mountains and flow across the prairies into Hudson bay. But perhaps many do not realize how little we are using these rivers to-day. There is very little navigation, not a great deal of irrigation, and very little hydro-electrical development.

One of these rivers flows about eighty miles northwest of Moose Jaw. When one reads of the immense dams that have been built in so-called backward nations such as India, China, Egypt, Spain, and others, for irrigation purposes, one cannot help wondering why we have for so long neglected to water our burning plains and why our major Saskatchewan cities must be so short of water. For many years the people of Saskatchewan have urged the building of a huge dam northwest of Moose Jaw. This proposed project has been called the South Saskatchewan power and irrigation scheme. It would involve the construction of a daw near Elbow.

The project would have three main purposes: (1) The providing of an abundant supply of water for domestic and industrial use for the two largest cities in the southern part of the province, Regina and Moose Jaw; (2) the development of hydro-electric energy; (3) the irrigation of several hundred thousand acres of land in that area.

Is this scheme feasible? Permit me to quote from an address by Mr. E. L. Gray, of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration, to agricultural representatives from all parts of the province gathered in Regina on February 19 of this year. He is reported to have said:

Construction of a dam on the South Saskatchewan river near Elbow as the hub of a great power and irrigation scheme is considered feasible.

Extensive drilling and surveys by the prairie farm rehabilitation administration had located a site where a giant dam could be built at the upper reaches of the Qu'Appelle and Saskatchewan rivers near Elbow.

Mr. A. W. E. Fawkes, Moose Jaw city engineer, in 1933 recommended the construction of such a dam. In his opinion the construction of a dam about 200 feet high to impound the waters of the South Saskatchewan is quite feasible, and the stored water would be capable of irrigating somewhere in the neighbourhood of 500,000 acres. Other authorities have made similar statements.

In Alberta water resources have been harnessed to the service of the people. Huge areas which were formerly useless because of lack of water, are to-day called the gardens of the west. Certain sections of the United States have been even more successful in irrigating dry lands. There is no reason why what has been done in Alberta and the United States cannot be done in Saskatchewan.

This scheme, if proceeded with, would have seven major advantages not only for the people of Saskatchewan but for the people of Canada as a whole:

1. It would provide a permanent water supply for Regina, Moose Jaw and many smaller centres, for both domestic and industrial use.

2. It would make possible a considerable development of hydro electric power.

3. It would permit the irrigation of several hundred thousand acres of fertile farm land.

4. Its actual construction at the present time or in the near future would provide jobs for many unemployed in that district who are to-day without work.

5. The project would permit considerable industrial development such as canning factories and sugar beet factories which, in turn, would employ many returned men.

6. The project would permit the stabilization of agriculture in that area by (a) the control of moisture and (b) allowing a diversification of crops.

7. Finally, I would suggest that the project would act as an insurance throughout the area against future heavy relief costs such as we had in the depression years.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the government must favour the scheme because during the last federal election, government spokesmen stated definitely that the project would be completed. May I be permitted to quote from an advertisement which appeared in the Moose Jaw Times of Saturday, June 9 last:

The South Saskatchewan Thunder creek irrigation programme alone will undoubtedly contribute much to the prosperity of the city and surrounding district. This project will be commenced immediately men and materials are available. . . . It has been approved.

Both the men and the materials are, I believe, now available, or, if not, they soon will be available, and we ask that the government proceed in accordance with its promise.

During the past winter months the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) did some very fine work in focussing the attention of easterners on the urgent need for irrigation in western Canada. Every westerner is grateful to him for his efforts. The seriousness of this problem makes it essential that all political parties lend their support to it.

Since coming to Ottawa I have seen parliament lend or give away hundreds of millions of dollars to other nations. Surely we are not asking too much when we ask that the government spend a few million dollars on our own people and in the development of our own country. The South Saskatchewan river project would prove to be one of the finest investments that the government of Canada ever made. It would pay for itself in a relatively short period of time. I respectfully urge the government to include the scheme in this year's estimates and to proceed with its construction without delay.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): It may interest you, Mr. Speaker, and the house, when I tell you that I am in rather a unique position. If I followed the wish of the electors who sent me here I should spend half my time sitting on the other side of the house and half over here. I was sent here by Liberal and Conservative electors who preferred to elect a representative of one of the old standard parties rather than one of the new sort. One reason why I have not gone over there was that I have not been invited, and the other is that if I ever did go I do not think I would be able to come back here—

Mr. MacKINNON: You would not want to.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): —so that I think I will stay where I am. In all the years I have been in politics—and I was first elected to this house in 1921, before quite a number of hon. members were born—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WEIR: Just the lady member.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): —and in all the parliaments of which I have been a member, I believe I have had a seat on the Speaker's left, except in one parliament, in which I was fortunate, or perhaps unfortunate, enough to occupy the position, Mr. Speaker, which you do now. I tried to be neutral. Perhaps I had a more difficult task than your Honour has, for you never had to find your own Prime Minister out of order, which on one occasion I was forced to do; but that only added interest and perhaps difficulty to the position. I will say this as a former Speaker, that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) treated me when I was Speaker with the utmost courtesy and consideration, as much so as though I had been his own choice for the Speakership.

My policy as a member of parliament has been to support, regardless of party, legislation which I believed was in the best interest of Canada, and that is what I intend to continue to do.

Perhaps this is rather personal, but forty-eight years ago this month I went to Yukon with the great gold rush of that day. I did not intend to live there. Like thousands of other young men, I expected to pick up a fortune in the gold mines in a couple of years and, as they say up there, come "outside" to live. To a Yukoner anywhere but Yukon, whether it be the United States, or Canada, or South America, is "outside." However, I found out that I could get along better by letting miners do my mining than by trying myself to mine, that I was better fitted to my own profession, and I went back to it and stayed with it. In 1896, fifty years ago, Dawson City was born; and I ask hon. members who know anything about mining how many mining camps in the world have lasted over fifty years and are still going strong, which is the case in Yukon. Yukon has produced approximately $300 million in gold and millions of dollars worth of silver, lead and zinc; and I predict—and I think I know what I am talking about—that fifty years hence we shall still be producing those precious metals in Yukon.

Some people have the idea that Yukon has been just a bill of expense to Canada; but if an account were taken of the royalties paid to the government on gold mined—and mind you, the royalties first charged on gold mined in Yukon were ten per cent of the output, then reduced to five per cent, and now 2½ per cent, and that runs into money—and when one stops to think that almost everything we use in the way of food, clothing, machinery, tools and equipment of all kinds is imported, it may be realized what a market it has provided for Canada, and what a large amount of money has been paid on customs duties on imported goods. Yukon does not get much credit for that, because most of the duties are paid at the ports of Vancouver, Edmonton and Victoria, but it is Yukoners who pay the bill.

During the war, mining in Yukon, as in the whole of North America, was practically suspended. Nearly all the young men of war age joined the army, the navy and the air force and went out to do their duty. By international consent the United States army came into northern Canada and in the common cause built war projects. Fortunately the exigencies of war did not require the use in conflict of most of these projects, and they remain to-day assets of Canada. On April 3 next the responsibility of maintaining the Alaska highway will be turned over from the army of the United States to the army of Canada. I hope our government and army will never consider for one moment allowing that road to go back to bush. It is too important a highway. It is not located where the international commission, appointed three years before the war to advise their respective United States and Canadian governments, would have recommended that the road should be built, but it was put through in a rush by the United States army, with our help, and it is a wonderful asset to Canada. Without expense to us it was built with United States money and labour, and already it has made accessible in Yukon and in northern British Columbia parts of the country which formerly were almost inaccessible. Prospectors going in there to look for minerals would take about a year to get in and they would go with pack horses and canoes and pack loads on their own backs. Now they can use the road and in a few days or hours make their camp and prospect in the vicinity. That, if nothing else, is what the road is now being used for.

Among other projects which the United States undertook and completed in northern Canada through northern British Columbia was a wonderful telephone system from Prince Rupert, on the coast, to all the interior small settlements. I hope that the governments of Canada and of British Columbia will, in their wisdom, maintain those telephone lines, not turn them over to War Assets Corporation, probably to be tossed into the lap of the monopoly known as the British Columbia Telephone Company, which would likely dismantle them and take the material into larger communities and use it there, and deprive the people in the outlying settlements of this means of communication. I hope the governments will maintain these lines and operate them.

Considering the great return which Yukon has given Canada in wealth, including levies of various kinds, I feel justified in pointing out to the house, and in particular to the Ministers of Mines, of Finance, of Reconstruction, and of Public Works that Yukon to-day is suffering from lack of roads. Dawson City, the centre of that immense gold mining area, has no means of communication in winter except by plane; there is not a road into that town. The same thing is true of the centre of the wonderful silver mines, Mayo. In winter time they depend entirely on planes, and as hon. members know, the weather makes planes uncertain. In former times there were roads connecting both Dawson City and that silver camp with the coast, but they have been allowed to fall into disuse. A comparatively small amount of money would put them back into shape to use. For the immediate present I appeal to the Minister of Mines and to the cabinet to be generous even to a small degree and vote an amount of money that will put that road back in shape for trucking, not for joy riding but as a road that will carry trucks containing ore concentrates to the main artery of navigation on the Yukon river. This can be done for not more than $100,000; and what is that in these days when we are talking about and spending billions? Speaking on behalf of Yukon, I hope that we shall receive some consideration at the hands of the government.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Like the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), I will not attempt to make a speech; instead I will try to say something. I do not think any man has a right to stand up here unless he has something to say. Some great speeches have been made in this debate on all sides of the house, but I have one criticism to offer. When a man rises in his place and makes a speech and you do not see him in the house until he comes back to make another speech, then I suggest that he is not making the best contribution to the debates of the house.

Congratulations are in order, but sometimes it happens that honours do not go to the right people, because I am convinced—it is not "I think" but "I know"—that there are men and women who are unknown one hundred miles from their homes and who nevertheless are the greatest heroes and heroines in our country by reason of their public service and of their sacrifices. Let me tell the house about one man. He was a missionary in China and was forced back home because of the war. His name is Duncan McRae. He took a church near Arnprior at White Lake. He is sixty-eight years of age and soon he will be on his way back to China. I say that man is a hero, and yet he is nothing compared with his wife, who will leave her daughter and son and go back with him to the front line. That is something we are bound to admire. That man was the best athlete in Manitoba; there was no one who could touch him. I have seen him take seven firsts. He took the weights, the hurdles and the jumps. I must admit that I played a trick on him once when he was nearly beaten in the broad jump. He had put his handkerchief in the tracks of the man who preceded him, and when he turned his back I moved the handkerchief up a foot. He came tearing down and cleared the handkerchief. There was laughter and he turned to me and said, "What is the matter, Dan?" I said, "Nothing is the matter, but I should have it up another foot. I moved your handkerchief up another foot." He was an honour student and a great athlete, and yet he could give his life to the greatest calling on earth. He is a real hero.

I congratulate those, whoever they may be, who in handing out honours did not pass up a member of the clergy, when Major Foote, a Presbyterian minister, received the Victoria Cross for his heroism at Dieppe. I do not think there is anyone who has surpassed him in quiet heroism and courage. He had done everything he could and was wondering how soon he would be in kingdom come, but he survived, and as he saw his fellow soldiers being taken off to the prison camp he decided that he simply could not go back to a comfortable bed and home. He therefore joined them and went back to the prison camp with them. He served faithfully, and I congratulate the person responsible for extending to Major Foote the highest possible honour which a man can win on the battlefield.

I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on having the courage to take fifty per cent of the wheat out of the distilleries. I think that took courage, but I do not believe that there is in this house a man or woman, nor do I believe that outside this house there are men and women, who would not deny themselves their nightcap or eye-opener in order to give some hungry kid some shredded wheat and milk or no milk. I commend the Prime Minister, but I suggest that he might have done better. He might have taken it all and put it into food.

The Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) surprises me sometimes—

An hon. MEMBER: He surprises a lot of people.

Mr. McIVOR: —but he continues to be an optimist. Somebody says that one optimist is worth fifty pessimists, and after what the Minister of Reconstruction has come through during the war years I do not think there is anyone who does not admire him. There is not a man in Canada who has done a better job and he has come through these war years an optimist. There was an election thrown into the bargain and there were pessimists who said he would not get elected; but he was as sure of being elected as I was, and perhaps a little more so. He came through that and now he has a right to be an optimist.

Let me give an example of reconversion. Take Canada Car in Fort William. He assisted them in more ways than one. When the strikes came in the United States and there were labour troubles, Canada Car had to shut down. I had an opportunity of visiting the managers and controllers, and I could see those telegrams, one after another, expressing regret that, owing to the strike, material could not be forwarded. I expect to see Canada Car humming before long. I have one criticism. I thought it should have kept going, making buses up to the point where they needed spare parts, but they did not do so. However, when I saw the plant I was amazed. I was pretty well acquainted with it, and I could see those aeroplanes lined up the full length of the plant, each receiving a part and being pushed on closer to the point of success. Now there are buses, one after another, a splendid example of reconversion. I repeat, the minister has a right to be optimistic.

I also visited Steep Rock. I do not know much about it, nor does Canada know much about it, but ere long, Canada will know that we have one of the greatest hematite mines in the country, and it will be doing things.

I do not like to say anything about the spy trouble we have had in Canada because I am not a lawyer, nor have I a judicial mind, but I like to help anybody if I can, no matter what mistakes they make. If we do not make those mistakes, dear knows we may make others. If a man says he never made a mistake, then he is just lying like sam hill. I should like to take the verdict of the leader of the opposition in the upper house, a college mate of mine. He has good sound judgment even though he is a Conservative. He commends the government for their stand. He can afford to do so without speaking politically.

I wondered in my own little mind what would have happened if Germany had not attacked Russia. Russia might never have been in the war, because neither the United States nor Great Britain would have attacked her. What we ought to have to-day is patience and Christian charity, because the Russian background is altogether different from ours. I have no patience with any man who breaks his oath or lies in any way. He has no right to do so, but I was proud in this house when the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) took his seat and nobody made any fuss over him, although of course, some of us looked that way. Tolerance is one of the things we need to practise.

We think of peace, but to me peace that leaves out the Peacemaker will never give us a permanent peace. On the Sabbath day most of the members go to hear the story of the Prince of Peace—if you do not, you ought to—and yet when we come into this house and think of the economic system of our country we forget all about the Prince of Peace, because I am convinced that money and things in Canada and in the United States are in the saddle. It is the dollar yardstick.

I heard a man who came back from the San Francisco conference say that the hope of the united nations lay in social security and economics. Hon. members know whether they believe that or not; I do not. I have heard—I am using my own words now—of a premier of a province who said that the hope of the united nations lies in having a common store of supplies; and yet the Great Teacher with thundering emphasis said:

> But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.

That is from Him who knows. A man next to Him in greatness in the New Testament said:

> For other foundations can no man lay than that which is laid in Christ Jesus.

Offer social security, economics or dollars and you will go to the bow-wows sooner or later. That is not the finding of to-day; that is the finding of the history of every age since the world began.

I should like to encourage the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) just a little bit by saying that he should make sure that the Sabbath day is kept free from toil for every toiler. There are men in this house who remind me of the old commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy". Then I am reminded of a play I saw which said that if you break the ten commandments the ten commandments will break you. You cannot break the law of God and not suffer from it. I would encourage the Minister of Labour to make sure that, now the war is over, during which time so many inroads were made upon the Sabbath day, corporations will give to men their day of rest whether they use it in one way or another. I could recommend to them how to use it.

The rules of the house will be up for revision shortly. About seven years ago I circulated a petition in this house to have the acoustics improved. Hon. members are not as fortunate as I am. I have a hearing aid and I can hear far better than hon. members believe. I think the time has arrived when it will not be necessary for the Speaker to put his hand to his ear to hear somebody over yonder who has a good voice, and when our reporters can hear in any place in the house without having to move backwards and forwards. I think it is in keeping with the dignity of parliament to hear what is going on in any part of the house.

I congratulate the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) on the new bill. I took a while to read this bill and I have been surprised by it. If hon. members have not read it there is a treat in store for them. The bill has many fine things in it. An hon. member who spoke here last night said that we have no Canadian songs. I do not agree with him, but some of the Canadian songs do not altogether suit me because I was not born in Canada, but I have chosen to live here. One of our great Canadians songs starts off in this way: "O Canada, our home and native land." I looked around the other day to see if the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) was singing that and he was singing lustily. How was it his native land? Of course, there was an Irishman who said that patriotism to an Irishman is that "he is loyal to his native land whether he was born there or not." Therefore I can sing, "O Canada, our home and native land." When our national anthem is chosen or revised they should put in a better word than "native", because it shuts out pretty nearly fifty per cent of the Canadians; but this bill is going to clear up a lot of the difficulties that exist at this time.

I have been a little anxious for some time. Sometime ago I sat on the committee of health insurance. That committee, which sat for two years, heard specialists from all over the world, from New Zealand, England, and the United States, and experts from all over Canada. I am sure the Minister of Veterans Affairs will agree with me when I say that it is the best act to be found any place, but we have not it in practice. I hope that the dominion-provincial conference will make it possible for that act to come into existence.

I now come to my own pet subject, namely, labour. Some hon. members may think it is not my pet subject, but I shall never forget when I learned to dig on the farm and when I earned my way through old Manitoba college. I started out that year wheeling brick at fifteen cents an hour. I know what a man has to do who toils. I know the value of the money that he earns. It is not the amount of money that he earns but the use to which he puts it that counts. I should like to congratulate labour on the way they conducted themselves during the war and since V-E day. They have a right to be considered. I know we have had trouble at Windsor, but they tell me that it was not very serious trouble as compared with some of the troubles that have taken place in other places. To me there seems to be a cloud now appearing in the sky of labour. Great lakes seamen are looking for better working conditions. They may be looking for a raise in pay, but that is not their chief trouble. I would advise that ship owners and workers' representatives get together, thresh out their differences and avoid a strike.

There is one thing I do not like—and of course that does not make any difference—I do not like to see a corporation represented by a lawyer, when the future of toilers is at stake. I think it could be far better represented by a good minister, priest, clergyman or bishop who would understand the problems of the working man. I believe if that were done they would have their troubles straightened out more quickly. It would be better to have the heads of a corporation sit in on a meeting of that kind. I am convinced that if our present Minister of Labour, these corporation lawyers and the union leaders on the great lakes got together the trouble could be cleared away. This is just another case where I would hope that things could be settled before coming to a head.

I am not going to talk about labour without offering a plan. When you and I are at home we think things out. I had a group of men meet with me to formulate a plan and, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall give it to you now. This is a plan or policy for sharing the excess profits of industry and commerce with capital, labour and management. It states:

Whereas at this time there is grave unrest in our social structure, we are of the opinion that this matter should be studied and active steps taken to further this idea and project. We suggest that there be established by law for each industry a minimum wage for labour, a minimum salary for management and a minimum return for capital invested, and that after paying the incidental expenses of running a business or industry, and subject always to special modifications in any particular industry, the excess profits of that industry should be divided equitably among capital, labour and management in the same proportion as the minimum already specified for each of these various factors in production.

We feel that government oversight should be exercised in each instance to make sure of the equitable character of that distribution.

We believe that more and more must the working man be taken into partnership in the industry and commerce of this country in order to secure a just return for additional effort and to give that independence of outlook which a living wage gives to every conscientious worker, to fulfil that pledge of our war-time efforts, that the country be made a land fit for heroes to live in.

It is further stated that competition should only be allowed after capital has secured a proper return, management a proper salary, and labour a living wage, and that all these be taken together with a fair price for goods and services as charged to the public. We recommend that social engineers be appointed by law to study these matters and give effect to these provisions.

I was proud to hear the Minister of Labour say on one occasion last year, when a strike was being discussed, that it is necessary for capital and labour to walk the same road together. That was fine. But when the three young Hebrews were cast into the fiery furnace it was found, when someone looked in, that there were four of them there—not three. One was like unto the Son of Man.

If capital and labour take the same road together they must make sure that the spirit of the Master Workman is controlling each of them, or they will not get very far. They will have a fight before they come to the end of the road.

As I said, things are in the saddle. We are living in a civilization that glorifies prosperity. Apparently we are on the threshold of the age of the bank book, when property rights, profit making, good business and prosperity are insisting that they have the right of way, leaving the traveller like the man in the parable who fell by the wayside, beaten by robbers, stripped, wounded and half dead.

I was reading a story about a great American who gave away much of his money for a special project. He said that every dollar has three kicks in it. The first kick is when you make it. As he said, "We are Yankees, and we like to make a dollar." Then he said, "The second kick is when we are sure we have it, because we have a lust for saving. The third kick is when we give it away to help somebody in need—because my mother was Irish."

So long as we allow our young men to grow with the assumption that it is with the consent of parliament, churches and municipalities that they should have power, that they should keep it who can, and that the straight road to happiness is by way of getting all the money one can, just so long will church and state perpetuate a policy which is sinful, unsound and superficial.

If I dared address clerics outside the house I would say to them, sweat up to your jobs; practise what you preach; live out your policy, and do not try to do it alone. Then you will be able to lead Canada into a greater life and a larger liberty.

I know what the programme is. I have great pleasure sometimes—and dear knows I make many mistakes. But I was one who, without having to say anything about it, received extra pay at Christmas. I had a lot of fun in the Christmas season. I had more money to spend, and I spent it in a way I do not regret. I did not have any headache after and I do not expect to get the money back.

But the programme you and I must live, whether we are in this house or out of it, is: Feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick, go to those in gaol; put God first, and others next. If we are not prepared to do that, then let us not listen to the prayer by Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate. However, after hearing my colleague who has just taken his seat, after hearing his words which were full of inspiration I felt it my duty to speak briefly in this debate. I shall confine my remarks to those of a general character, and take pleasure at the outset to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address upon their magnificent speeches.

(Translation):

I shall not needlessly take up the time of the house but I believe that I should make a few remarks in order to discuss the merits of certain proposals contained in the speech from the throne and to offer a few suggestions to the members of the government. Therefore, my remarks will come under two separate headings. At the outset I shall say a few words on international politics and I will conclude with a few remarks of local importance.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that as the result of the last conflict, Canada has won a well-deserved place, a foremost place in the world, despite the theories of isolationists, despite the furious outcries loosed by certain nationalists of my province who were determined, at any price, to bring the ideals of my race down to the level of local and political interests. We all agree that Canada has emerged from the conflict badly shaken financially and physically. A tremendous task lies ahead; like the governments of the other countries that have suffered and that have given of their best for victory, we are faced with the task of physical, spiritual and moral reconstruction.

For some years, thanks to the far-sightedness of our leader, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), we have been sending ambassadors to different countries, thus placing our country on a level with the most important nations in the world. Mr. Speaker, if the head of our government wishes to pursue this upward course towards total independence, why should we not, as a Christian and democratic people, be represented in Rome, at the Vatican, by an official ambassador?

The speech from the throne also sets forth a policy which aims at Canada's complete freedom in the concert of nations, and the honourable the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) is sponsoring a bill by which every citizen of our country may proudly, even gloriously, claim the legitimate title of Canadian citizen. I congratulate the government on this occasion; this new gesture is but one of the numerous steps taken by the Liberal party during the past few years towards Canada's emancipation in the international sphere. Like every right-minded Canadian, I shall support this bill. It is high time that we should claim that title and that right at peace conferences and other official gatherings at which other countries are represented by envoys, delegates or ambassadors, so that our own representatives may, like those who were delegated recently, be vested with all the authority and prestige granted to the full citizens of a free state. That bill reflects credit on the government. Besides, it is consonant with the liberal tradition, and our honourable friends across the floor will have, this time at least, to be as liberal as we are.

Mr. Speaker, another matter has lately roused public opinion in my province. Some papers have expressed opinions which I repect; other citizens, taking advantage of their political prestige, have begun a series of meetings for the discussion of the proposed loan by our country of $1,250,000,000 to Great Britain. In my constituency, as elsewhere, as soon as that decision had been broadcast, the nationalist gang swung into action. Protests have come from the same political ghettos where lie in hiding those who have not yet learned, after nine years of war, that the thought, in Ottawa, could not be directed along provincial channels. Some municipal council members have at once sent me resolutions protesting against that loan of $1,250,000,000 to Great Britain, without knowing the first thing about it, without having any knowledge of the details or of the machinery involved. They would want me to commit myself to the point of stating, from my place in this house, that I oppose that loan. I shall do nothing of the kind, Mr. Speaker.

I shall value this legislation according to its merit in as much as it serves the interests of Canada and in the measure in which I sincerely believe that this loan is advantageous to my fellow-citizens and to the Canadian economy in general and that it may result in stabilizing the value of the pound sterling and restoring to world economics the equilibrium which has been jeopardized by the anomalous transactions of the war.

If I am convinced that this loan may result in giving work, in my constituency, to my farmers, to my lumbermen, to all who labour for a few dollars a day; if, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that this loan has been inspired by a true Canadian spirit as has been the case with the whole government policy in the last ten years, I will not hesitate to give it my earnest support.

This afternoon, I heard my colleague from Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) state that he would vote against this loan. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is taking a hasty decision. The bill has not yet been tabled; the authorized people are not yet in a position to supply all the details concerning it because the American congress is engaged in a debate on a similar matter; and we, as representatives of the Canadian people, must not commit ourselves officially, one way or the other. To my mind, this would prejudice our opinions before the debate in this house has been initiated.

Mr. Speaker, the economic chaos which followed the first Great War from 1929 on, was, for the most part, if we are to believe the experts of that time, attributable to the fluctuations in the value of money which resulted in an almost complete stagnation of international trade. The same economic phenomena is threatening to-day, because the English pound has fallen to the lowest level ever, because England's gold reserves have been wiped out, because Britain has been forced to recall its Canadian securities; because now, the English people, in spite of what certain nationalist groups in my province may believe, are not as wealthy as they were at the outset of the war and that Canada, due to the international stature it has grown into during the conflict, has become an indispensable cog in the proper functioning of universal economy. In a way, we have become the transmission gear of an automobile which, if it fails, causes the vehicle to stop.

In certain quarters, we are accused of trying to keep up with the Joneses, of tagging along with foreign powers in this world upheaval, and we see our Quebec nationalists, led by the Bloc Populaire—whose members are unfortunately not in the house to-night—claim that they advocate the true doctrine of nationalist charity conceived by Mr. Henri Bourassa.

Mr. POULIOT: Whom you defeated!

Mr. LALONDE: Whom we defeated. But, Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Populaire is a disgrace to real nationalist doctrine. I have no brief to defend Mr. Bourassa, but in his book entitled What Do We Owe England?, he states very plainly, on page 253 if memory serves me right, that Canada should participate in all foreign wars involving the interests of France and England, on condition that such participation be not the logical outcome of colonial bonds.

That is the nationalist doctrine advocated by our leader and by our party as well.

If we refer to the debates of 1939, we will see that we, the members of parliament of the time, declared war voluntarily without securing anyone's authorization and without being compelled to do so by colonial dependency.

What is being said in my province? People animated by unjustified anti-British feelings are saying exactly the opposite. One must not be afraid to say so, Mr. Speaker, although it may be against his political interests.

I mention that fact because the same propaganda is being disseminated in my province, inspired by false patriotic ideals, and through the influence of newspapers and meetings which have already been started some people want to go back to the former days of total colonialism.

I refuse to agree with them, Mr. Speaker, and will do so as long as I sit in this house. I have learned in the eleven years I have been in the Canadian House of Commons that we must examine the laws which are submitted for our approval from a federal and not a provincial point of view.

I reserve my decision in connection with that loan. After having earnestly studied the matter, I shall approve it if I find it acceptable; otherwise I shall reject it. To my mind, anyone who acts in good faith cannot commit himself in advance, on such an important matter without going into it as fully as possible.

(Text):

I have something to say to the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low), if he will permit me, through the Chair. As reported in Hansard of March 19, page 64, he said, in the course of a very interesting speech:

> His Excellency's speech mentioned the recently concluded agreement for a loan to Great Britain of $1,250 million. I personally was glad to see that this credit had been made available to Great Britain. As a matter of fact a similar credit should have been arranged for Great Britain last fall. I am satisfied that if the various parts of the commonwealth had risen to the occasion last autumn, they collectively could have prevented the United States from bludgeoning Great Britain into submission to the nefarious Bretton Woods agreement.

Mr. LOW: Hear, hear.

Mr. LALONDE: Do not say "hear, hear" too soon. I have something for you.

> But while I am pleased to see a huge new credit advanced, which will I feel stimulate trade between our two countries and materially contribute to employment in Canada, yet I think the loan should have been made to Great Britain interest free.

I respect his intentions and opinions, but I would suggest to him, Mr. Speaker, through the channel of the Chair, that he should go into my province and have personal contact with the leaders of his party who have been distributing, during maybe the past month, a certain newspaper which is waging a stiff fight against the loan. Do I understand that we have two Social Credit parties in this country? Unity is one of the conditions of the survival of a political movement.

Mr. LOW: Autonomy is another.

Mr. LALONDE: Not when autonomy is in flagrant contradiction of unity. You will not be there after the next election.

Mr. LOW: Perhaps.

Mr. LALONDE: I say this, in a spirit of goodwill to my hon. friend, that his group in my province is trying to be more nationalist than the Bloc Populaire. More than that, it is robing itself in a religious propaganda, is distributing pictures of the Virgin, and I think it went so far as to make propaganda with a prayer of the Social Credit party. It would be a good thing if my hon. friend the leader of the party would say something to Mr. Even, the leader of the party in Quebec, so that the whole party might be united in its doctrines throughout Canada. Otherwise we shall not know what to believe—somebody is telling us lies—for the Social Credit party in this chamber has one theory about making a loan to Great Britain and their friends outside wage a campaign against it.

Mr. LOW: I said personally.

Mr. LALONDE: But I am speaking to my hon. friend as the leader of a so-called party, not personally, and as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I am fed up with seeing so many political parties divided up into as many parcels as there are provinces in the dominion. But on our side we are all united and the Liberal party was the only national party that went into the last election. I say this in all good friendship to my hon. friend.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, that loan to England has a meaning which will have to be carefully pondered. We shall have to make sure, when examining the proposal in the light of the documents that will be communicated to us, that it is a premium against unemployment and that, if we do not make funds available to those who wish to purchase the goods that will be produced in Canada, our people will before long suffer from unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, I shall use the last few minutes at my disposal to discuss the matter of espionage which, in my province, has given rise to much criticism in some quarters. I have heard my good friend the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) wax eloquent on the subject of the magna charta. I am respectful of traditions but there is no man-made constitution in this world which does not grow obsolete with the years. At times, it has to be transformed, to be adapted to the needs of the day. I realize that the magna charta is an expression of principles, but the manner in which those principles should be applied is quite another matter.

Who are those that disregard the magna charta? It is the British themselves who have refused to release Doctor May on bail. Why hide behind the screen of legal technicalities in order to arrest those who have betrayed their country? We must bear in mind that treason is the vilest form of crime. Suppose that some of our own citizens were caught spying in Russia; do you think that they would have a chance of escaping by being allowed their freedom on bail? No, gentlemen, they would face the firing squad within 24 hours.

I commend the government for its action, and I hope that if the accused are found guilty, the punishment will fit the crime.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I wish to offer a few suggestions to my honourable friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). I know that he is cool-headed and that he will not get over-excited.

[Mr. Low.]

I live in a district which depends on three main industries for its livelihood: tourists, farming and forestry. Mr. Speaker, you have probably visited the northern hills and admired the majesty of the Laurentian scenery. By Laurentian scenery, I mean our mountains and our lakes. I am sure anyone who has been there looks upon our part of the country as a tourists' paradise.

Other federal and provincial governments have encouraged the tourist industry; that is why I urgently beg the federal government to vote large sums of money in order to encourage travel in the northern part of the province of Quebec, and in the parts of our country where such an asset may be developed. In my district, the population relies to a great extent on the tourist trade and you have no idea how prosperous it could be if the federal government would only grant certain sums of money for the construction of roads to the best fishing spots in the whole world.

The government could stimulate the tourist trade by establishing a sort of travel bureau to make more widely know the beauties of our region. As a help to tourists, maybe the government could also, at the next dominion-provincial conference, establish in Quebec some of those schools for tourists' guides, as may be found elsewhere. There is a great need for them in our province. Outsiders who visit us should be taken in hand by people able to cook fish, build a hut, handle a canoe, shoot rapids, and in short ensure to the tourists all the excitement, the thrills of that great sport.

There is another programme that could be carried out by the dominion government if unemployment were to recur. Let us not forget Mr. Speaker, that our forest industry in the province of Quebec will, within twenty-five years, be in a precarious situation, if we do not plant at once thousands of trees to replace those which have been felled by lumber companies.

I am informed that the companies are willing to co-operate closely with the government in the planting of millions of trees, so that, in some twenty-five years, a new crop may keep the lumbermen busy.

Further remarks would be warranted. However, I notice that my time is nearly up. I have drawn those matters to the attention of the house and the government in the hope that they may be of some use.

I am offering those suggestions in good faith, convinced that I have done my duty. I know that the government of our country is desirous of preventing an economic disaster such as that which followed the first great war, and that under the wise leadership of the hon. ministers of the present cabinet, I am sure that our people, despite the unavoidable dislocation of the post-war period, will soon find their normal balance and enter upon the road to progress.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

Monday March 25, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

GRAIN

INCREASE OF WHEAT DELIVERIES—1946-47 PROGRAMME FOR OATS, BARLEY AND OIL SEEDS

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement in regard to a special measure to increase wheat deliveries in western Canada and to announce the government's 1946-47 programme for oats, barley and oilseeds.

As the Prime Minister has stated, the government desires to make available the utmost quantity of food to help meet the needs of people in less fortunate parts of the world. While we have been working on a very large wheat and flour export programme during the present crop year, we hope to be able to increase shipments over the quantities originally planned. To accomplish this, it will be necessary for producers in western Canada to deliver promptly their remaining farm surpluses of wheat. Deliveries of grain have been exceptionally good this year and marketings have exceeded estimates, month by month. However, there is still a substantial quantity of wheat on farms, available for early delivery, that can be moved abroad to needy areas.

There is some wheat being held on farms in western Canada, principally due to the present levels of income tax combined with the uncertainty of yields from the new crop to be harvested in 1946. The amount of wheat so held on farms is not large in relation to the quantities which have already been shipped abroad, but if made available now would be of material help in meeting the present food situation. With this objective in mind the government has made an arrangement whereby wheat, which producers may not have intended to deliver at the present time, can be marketed and sold over the next three months, with cash settlement made at any time the producer may choose in 1946, 1947 or 1948. The arrangement will become effective on April 1, 1946, and details will be announced shortly by the Canadian wheat board. There may be a few days' delay in getting the new emergency wheat receipt forms into the hands of the elevator companies, but producers need not delay their wheat deliveries on this account. They may continue to deliver, taking storage tickets for later conversion into emergency wheat receipts. Of course those farmers who wish to deliver their wheat and take cash tickets in the usual way can proceed as in the past. There is no change in this respect. The new arrangement merely provides a means whereby producers may elect to deliver wheat between April 1 and June 30, 1946, with cash settlement taken at their option in 1946, 1947 or 1948.

Special transportation arrangements have been made to move the additional wheat forward to mills and seaboard.

I now desire to deal with the government's programme for oats and barley for 1946-47.

The 1945-46 oats programme will be continued in 1946-47. The government, through the Canadian wheat board, will guarantee a minimum price of forty-five cents per bushel for No. 2 C.W. oats, basis in store at Fort William and Port Arthur. The oats equalization fund will again operate in 1946-47, and producers will receive advance equalization payments of ten cents per bushel at the time of delivery.

In the case of barley the government will guarantee a minimum price of sixty cents per bushel for top grades basis in store at Port Arthur and Fort William. The barley equalization fund will operate in 1946-47, and advance equalization payments of fifteen cents per bushel will be made on delivery. In addition, premiums up to five cents a bushel may be paid for barley accepted as suitable for malting.

During the present crop year all barley produced and marketed in Canada was needed for our own requirement, and exports were prohibited except for small quantities sold for export prior to July 31, 1945. With exports eliminated, the government felt that producers should be protected on premiums they would have received on barley accepted for malting purposes and exported to the United States. For this reason, the advance equalization payment was increased to twenty cents per bushel for the present crop year. The producer of feeding barley received the same price as the producer of malting barley. This policy was announced to meet a feed emergency in Canada and has served a useful purpose this year. The government, however, does not desire unduly to limit exports of barley for any longer than necessary, and hopes that barley supplies in 1946-47 will be sufficiently large to permit the resumption of exports. The government must, however, reserve the right to reexamine the barley situation when the extent of 1946 production is known.

During the greater part of the war there has been an urgent demand for vegetable oils, and the government has endeavoured to encourage the production of oil seeds. At the present time there is a world-wide shortage of both fats and vegetable oils. In order to assist in meeting oil seed requirements the government proposes to increase the present guaranteed price of flaxseed from $2.75 per bushel to $3.25 per bushel, basis No. 1 C.W. flaxseed in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver, effective August 1, 1946, for the crop year 1946-47.

In announcing the new price for flaxseed the government wishes to emphasize the importance of this crop during the present crop year and to urge producers to seed a larger acreage in 1946.

The 1945-46 rapeseed programme will be continued in 1946-47. Producers will be guaranteed six cents per pound for top grades basis country shipping points.

In 1946-47 producers will be guaranteed five cents per pound for top grades of sunflower seed basis country shipping points.

In announcing the government's programme in respect of feed grains and oil seeds, I should like once again to appeal to producers in the prairie provinces for prompt delivery of their remaining supplies of surplus wheat. Up to the present time wheat producers in western Canada have exceeded all estimates for the delivery of grain. Marketings have been high throughout the present crop year. There is still a large volume of wheat to be delivered. Wheat is urgently needed in Europe and elsewhere.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister a supplementary question, to clarify what I think is an important point? On the deliveries of wheat after April 1 in 1946, 1947 and 1948, the farmer may take payment at his option. Does this mean that he must declare, in each year when he delivers the wheat, when he will exercise the option, or may he exercise the option at any time during the years mentioned?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. MacKINNON: My understanding is that the farmer exercises his option in the year in which he wishes payment.

Mr. QUELCH: Does he have to pay storage charges—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, it is occasionally my responsibility to criticize the government for certain of its acts, but when I can, I am glad to offer words of commendation. At a later time I shall take occasion to criticize the minister for the shortcomings of his statement to-day. For the moment I wish to commend both him and the government for the action they have decided to take with respect to getting marketed now a considerable proportion of the wheat that is being held by the farmers, because, as the minister has said, they do not like the present burden of the income tax, and because of the possibility of smaller crops in later years. Considering the needs of the world to-day and the wheat held back by some farmers in western Canada, this action of the government is in the right direction and I am glad to commend them for it.

Mr. BURTON: Has the minister given consideration to increasing the flow of wheat—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have permitted the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party to put questions to the minister following his statement, but I must call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the minister's statement is not debatable.

Mr. BENTLEY: Is it not possible to ask the minister a question arising out of his statement, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: The statement is not debatable, but an urgent question can be put with the permission of the minister.

(On the orders of the day):

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I ask the minister a question arising out of his statement? Suppose the farmer decides to dispose of his wheat and delivers it to the elevator, and he has not determined on the sale until 1947 or 1948. Is he subject to storage fees and expenses at the elevator between the time he delivers the wheat and the time he determines to sell it?

Mr. MacKINNON: My understanding is that the wheat so delivered will, before storage charges start to accrue, be sold for forward sale, with the storage charges being assumed by the purchaser.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So the farmer will not be subject to storage charges?

Mr. MacKINNON: He would not be subject.

Mr. BURTON: Has the minister considered increasing the flow of grain by making more railway cars available so that the farmers may have greater freedom in delivering to the elevator of their choice?

Mr. MacKINNON: A very serious situation exists in western Canada on account of the shortage of grain cars. We have a large number of them in the United States, and have some difficulty in bringing them back. We are taking steps to get them back.

Mr. WRIGHT: In cases where wheat is delivered this year and certificate accepted, will payment for that certificate be made on basis of the price of the wheat in the year in which the certificate is issued, or in the year in which the certificate is cashed?

Mr. MacKINNON: I would think the price would be based on the year in which the certificate is issued.

PRINCE RUPERT DRY DOCK

INQUIRY AS TO FUTURE USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question, of which I have given him notice as well as the reason for my putting it. What steps have been taken by the government to make use of the Prince Rupert dry dock?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): That question has already been put on the order paper by the hon. member, and I am afraid that he will have to await the reply until the question is answered. If he wants a reply now, all I can say to him is that the policy of the government will be announced in due course.

POSTAL SERVICE

TWO DELIVERIES A DAY IN URBAN RESIDENTIAL AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is he in a position to state when the twice-daily house to house mail deliveries will again be put into effect?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I cannot say exactly on what date, but the officers of my department are working on it and we hope to be able very soon to reestablish the two deliveries a day.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

ALTERNATIVE SERVICE WORK—RED CROSS SOCIETY—AGRICULTURAL LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, under the national selective service regulations, men who were called under the mobilization regulations and who were recognized as conscientious objectors by mobilization boards, were required to perform alternative service work subject to specific conditions. One of the requirements was that a portion of the conscientious objector's earnings (which was designated under contract) must be paid by the employer to the Canadian Red Cross society. Conscientious objectors in alternative service work number 10,870, and 6,749 are employed in agriculture. Contributions to the Red Cross society from the inception of the regulations to January 31, 1946, amounted to $2,248,913.84.

I do not intend, nor do I believe that the citizens of this country would agree, to relieve conscientious objectors from alternative service work until all enlisted men in the armed forces, or at least the majority of them, have been discharged.

However, in view of the urgent need for increased agricultural production, it has been decided that some relaxation of the regulations should be effected which would encourage greater effort in agricultural production and to assist in furthering the supply of available agricultural labour. Therefore, under authority vested in me under the national selective service regulations, an order has been issued providing:

(1) Every postponed conscientious objector at present engaged in agriculture, or who becomes engaged in agriculture after the date of the order shall at the conclusion of the employment period ending March 31, 1946, be relieved of further payment to the Canadian Red Cross society, provided he continues to be engaged in agriculture.

(2) Every qualified agricultural worker at present engaged in the performance of alternative service in alternative service work camps shall be granted leave of absence for work in agriculture and will not be required to contribute from his wages to the Canadian Red Cross society so long as he continues to be engaged in agriculture.

(3) No postponed conscientious objector or alternative service worker to whom the order applies may work for an employer other than the one with whom he is at present engaged, or with whom he enters employment except by first obtaining the consent of a divisional alternative service officer.

It is understood, of course, that any conscientious objector who leaves agriculture will immediately become subject to the regulations as they have applied heretofore.

Under the plan as proposed, I am confident there will be no movement of farm labour to the city in so far as conscientious objectors are concerned, but I believe there will be a definite movement of these workers from the city to the farm, as a result of this change.

DAYLIGHT SAVING

TIME AND TIME ZONES A MATTER FOR PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, numerous inquiries have been received as to whether or not it is the intention of the government to take measures for the establishment of daylight saving time throughout Canada during the summer season of 1946.

These inquiries are no doubt prompted by the fact that in 1940 an order was made under the War Measures Act providing that daylight saving should be observed in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec primarily for the purpose of conserving power in connection with the war effort of Canada. Subsequently a further order was made under the War Measures Act, on the 28th January, 1942, providing that beginning with February 9, 1942, daylight saving time should be observed throughout Canada. This order became effective at the same time as measures taken in the United States went into effect and was based upon the desirability of synchronizing the time in the time zones of both countries in relation to the production and transportation of munitions and in relation to the war effort generally.

The order under the War Measures Act providing for daylight saving time was rescinded in September 1945, effective on the 30th September of that year. At the same time the similar measures taken in the United States came to an end.

Statutes as to time and the fixing of the boundaries of the various time zones have always been enacted by the provincial legislatures and not by the dominion parliament. Under provincial legislation, various municipalities throughout the country have, by by-law, provided for daylight saving time in those municipalities during certain periods of the year.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

It seems to the government that since the subjects of time and of defining the time zones have been a matter of provincial legislation, there would not be justification this year for dominion legislation or for the making of an order under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. The matter seems peculiarly one which should be dealt with by the provinces and the municipalities.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS LAND ACT—REGULATIONS FOR CERTIFICATE OF QUALIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): On Friday last the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough) asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs the following question:

Will he consider an immediate change in the regulations governing the Veterans Land Act which compel joint approval by the board of the veteran and his wife before issuance of a certificate of qualification under the Veterans Land Act, and discarding the present regulations which prevent a veteran with an overseas wife from taking advantage of the act without hardship and long delay?

On January 28, 1946, the following instructions were issued by telegram to district superintendents by the director, Veterans Land Act:

Reference qualification veterans with wives overseas and confirming views set out recent conference please make known all regional supervisors immediately that policy laid down head office letter October tenth now modified and that veterans who by virtue of their maturity, soundness of outlook and experience in farming or stability in a job are well qualified in their own right for establishment on a farm or small holding and who have suitable proposition in view which might reasonably be purchased for backlog purposes may be set up on a rental basis and bailment agreement and supplied with essential stock and equipment provided they make necessary initial payment as evidence of their bonafides. Qualification certificate should not be issued until after arrival and satisfactory interview of wife at which time consideration can be given to establishment on regular purchase contract. Rental should be such that veteran will not suffer financially as result deferred establishment. These instructions intended to meet in a reasonable way the problem confronting veterans in securing homes in advance of arrival their dependents from overseas and also to protect the veterans rights under the act in cases of dissatisfaction.

The general run of applications are being satisfactorily handled in accordance with the foregoing.

When the veteran is a man of mature judgment and experience, the proposition he has in mind is sound and within the spirit and scope of the act, and information available in regard to the wife is such that it appears an unreasonable risk would not be taken in proceeding with establishment under the purchase contract, settlement on a permanent basis may be completed before the wife arrives.

HOUSING—RECOMMENDATION OF APPLICATIONS BY VETERANS AFFAIRS OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Arising out of the statement of the Minister of Reconstruction, and based on release No. 27, and several letters which I have received, may I ask the Minister of Reconstruction, and perhaps the Minister of Veterans Affairs, if the situation can be clarified as to the coordination between his department and that of veterans affairs. I have already received three or four letters, Mr. Speaker, pointing out that the veterans are very anxious to start the erection of houses, but they are alarmed at the instructions which require that they will first have to be recommended by other officials. Can the minister amplify these instructions so that the veteran may know whether they can proceed or how quickly they can proceed? They are in desperate need of houses.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Is my hon. friend referring to housing under the small holdings portion of the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. LOCKHART: Release No. 27, just sent out from the Minister of Reconstruction, reads—I quote the last paragraph:

> The veteran is required to certify that he will occupy the house in question, and applications will be accepted by the priorities officer only after they have been recommended by an official of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

They are all at sea as to what the procedure is.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Instructions have been sent out to all district officers in regard to the very point mentioned by my hon. friend, and the object is to ensure from the records of the Department of Veterans Affairs that the applicant is in fact a veteran and entitled to priority.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I ask one supplementary question: there will not be any undue delay?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. LOCKHART: Because there are scores ready to go ahead.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, there will be none at all.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The house resumed from Friday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate very sincerely the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) on the address, who have spoken very well, and who deserve every praise for having performed excellently that duty.

I will ask you, sir, to make a correction in the prayer that you have just read. You mentioned the governor general. We have none at the present time. The former governor has left us, and his successor has not yet arrived and has not been sworn in. We have an administrator, however, and I hope that at the next sitting you will substitute the administrator for the governor general or will add the name of the administrator until the new governor is sworn in.

I desire to offer my congratulations to the two ministers who have been appointed to the privy council at Westminster. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has received a reward for the work that he has done for Canada, for the British empire and for the countries in the sterling area, and as regards the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), I do not believe it is an honour, but rather a recognition of his excellent work in the government.

There has been some controversy in the press about decorum in the House of Commons. The journalist who wrote it, and general subscribers who wrote to their papers, are not familiar with what happens at Westminster, because once I saw a gentleman of great distinction, Mr. Anthony Eden, with his feet on the clerk's table during a sitting, and when Lord Baldwin made his last speech at Westminster, Mr. Attlee, who is also a gentleman of distinction, had his derby on his head and his feet on the table while Lord Baldwin was bent over the treasury box about a foot and a half from Mr. Attlee's feet. But that did not disturb him. Of course he was a great agriculturist.

One must not forget that disagreement is no offence and that the best way to be taken seriously by others is for a man not to take himself too seriously. When I am at home, far away in the province of Quebec, I read even the western papers, and in the Regina Leader of February 8 I saw a report of a talk given by my genial friend the member for Regina City (Mr. Probe). He said, and I thank him for it, that I was the most striking character in the House of Commons at Ottawa. He went on to say: "He is a Liberal who invariably criticizes the government", which is not always true, "but always votes with it", which is not always true. "He deliberately breaks all the rules of procedure", which is not true, "but has the faculty of obtaining all he wants for his constituency." I hope he will be right at the end of this session. Apart from all that, what my hon. friend said was correct.

I will tell my hon. friends, through the chair, that I wish to cooperate with all of them, and to be useful to them as a member of parliament, and that is why I have asked certain questions on the order paper. They are not intended to embarrass the government. There is a purpose and a motive behind these questions. The first question in my name on the order paper is intended to find out what precisely we have done for Russia. It is difficult to answer that question, because for a time Russia obtained Canadian help through Great Britain. Everything that we had to send them passed through Great Britain. However, it would be well to know it.

The questions on international policy are intended to find out where we stand now with all countries. I ask about cultural relations with Russia, and of course we have such relations—we have the ballet Russe. I am wondering however whether we have any other cultural relations with Russia.

There is another question, one that has to do with the British commonwealth air training plan. Members of parliament were not informed at first about that plan. It was only a long time afterwards that we got information, and the reason why the plan was delayed was that some English industrialists—Nuffield, the iron lung man, or someone else—had to supply aeroplane propellers, which he did not do. At any rate, no member of the house was informed about it, and we did not learn anything until much later.

There is another question, No. 48, which may seem strange because it asks whether any trainees from Australia and New Zealand were killed or lost on their way to Canada to follow the B.C.A. training and, if so, when, and who were they. I also asked:

Did the then minister of national defence for air declare to press reporters that the Hon. R. B. Hanson, K.C., M.P., and former leader of the opposition, was "Hitler's new recruit"?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I asked that because he had said that some young men from the Antipodes were coming here for training. Another question was:

Was it said because the said Mr. Hanson had just referred publicly to the partnership of any sister dominion to the said plan?

This was struck out but I would like to have it answered.

There are three problems of major importance now before the house. There is the UNO matter, and you know we must read it instead of hearing it said to realize what it is, because UNO means that no one knows about it but UNO.

As regards UNO, I always think of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt at Casablanca, as they were planning the future of the world, making a distinction between great and small countries on the basis of what was said by the kaiser during the first world war, that might is right. The idea was to give more importance to the more powerful. It is not a question of right is might; might is right.

Then there was the Atlantic charter, which was a palliative. Then the big three met at Teheran, Yalta and Potsdam, and we learned afterwards that in spite of what Woodrow Wilson had said about open diplomacy, secret promises had been made to Stalin. On March 13, 1944, I asked whether Canada had been represented at Teheran and Cairo, and the answer was "no." Then I asked another question:

If not, is Canada bound by the decisions taken at such conferences?

The answer was:

No, but obviously any conclusions relating to the conduct of the war reached by the representatives and heads of governments participating in these conferences will carry very great authority with all members of the united nations.

Afterwards we had the San Francisco conference. It started eleven months ago to-day. Then there was the conference at London, and another one is starting to-day in New York. Iran will be the No. 1 issue. At London there was a rumour that Canada was to be on the security council. Canada was not elected to that council on the understanding that we would have the secretaryship of the organization which we did not get. If we do not have anything on that, it is due precisely to the theory that might is right, that great powers have to decide the destiny of the whole world.

Let us see who is in New York to-day. The names of these gentlemen have appeared in the press. Who knows Lieutenant Colonel W. R. Hodgson of Australia? Who knows Doctor Pedro Leao Velloso of Brazil? Who knows Doctor Quo Tai-Chi of China? Who knows Mahmoud Hassan Pasha of Egypt? Who knows Ambassador Henri Bonnet of France? Who knows Foreign Minister Francisco Castillo Najera of Mexico? Who knows Eelco N. van Kleffens, of the Netherlands? Who knows Ambassador Oscar Lange of Poland?

An hon. MEMBER: Everybody.

Mr. POULIOT: I am very serious. Who knows Mr. Byrnes? Who knows Edward R. Stettinius, Junior, of the United States? And who knows Sir Alexander Cadogan of Great Britain? Who knows Andrei A. Gromyko, of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics? The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) may be the only one who knows him, but he is not in the house to-day.

At this conference Iran is the number one issue, and what is it? It is that at the end of the second world war we have not gone any farther than at the end of the first world war. In the first world war everybody was trying to get the oil wells of Iraq. At the end of the second world war the cause of trouble is precisely the oil wells of Iraq again, and the oil wells of Iran. We may hear a lot about democracy, about this and that, and future happiness and prosperity, but it is a matter of oil. Oil is the most expensive thing in the world because it has cost so many lives. The Russians are there, and they say: "We want it." The British are there, and they say: "We want it." The Americans are there also, and they also want it. The fight is around oil wells. Is it not incredible to think that the world has sunk so low as to forget all spiritual values and we are coming to the stage where we may have another war? Some people speak of it; some hon. gentlemen have mentioned it in the house during this debate. We hear a lot of people speak of it on the street, and it is just to serve either British interests, Russian interests or United States interests that we may be on the verge of a new war. It is unbelievable.

What is the use of arguing with these people? The diplomacy of Churchill and Roosevelt has failed lamentably. They had their qualities. Roosevelt was a man with a big heart. Churchill is a powerful orator, but they had several opportunities to come to some definite understanding with Stalin when they met him. Nothing was done. To-day Roosevelt has gone to a better world; Churchill is completely out of the picture because the English, the Scottish and the people of Northern Ireland no longer had confidence in his government. He has no right to speak for the United Kingdom unless he has a mandate from the present government of the United Kingdom. But I have something to ask him as the survivor of those conferences with Stalin, and it is this: When you were representing not only the interests of your own country but the interests of other countries of the world, why did you not come to some definite arrangements with the Russians so that to-day we should not be in just as bad a position as we were during the war? The war is not finished; the war is still going on, in spite of the fact that our two most powerful enemies, Germany and Japan, have been brought to capitulation. There is still some trouble in China; there is still some trouble in Europe, and there is plenty of trouble in Asia. It shows that these men who had the fate of the world in their hands were not equal to their task. It is evident, too. How is it that no one will say that, when it is the truth? I do not question their motives. Their motives were surely good, but they were not equal to the occasion.

We come now to another matter, namely, the British loan. It is incredible to think that Canada has financed the whole British empire during the war. She has financed not only the United Kingdom but also the sterling area, meaning all the countries which had British currency, the pound sterling. How was it done? It was done by increasing the national debt to an astronomical figure and by imposing upon the Canadian people the heaviest burden of taxation we have ever had—imposing it not only upon this generation but upon generations to come. And it is not finished; it is not settled. We financed them during the war. The war is over, yet we have to finance them again. And what do we get in return? We get the jumping up of members of parliament at Westminster, saying, "Good. That is very good. That is fine. Canada is a great country." What about the securities which were given by Great Britain to Canada for the special loan of $700,000,000, the finest and most profitable of securities; Canadian Pacific Railway stock, Eno's fruit salts, et cetera.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: One may laugh, but that stock brings in good revenue; and also all sorts of industrial securities. What happened? They were given as a guarantee of the loan, but through some Toronto brokers some of those securities were sent to New York via Toronto. When I suggested that the banking and commerce committee should investigate the whole matter, I was not allowed to go on. A great deal of research work in that connection could be done. Smuts, who is a great imperialist, got back all the South African stocks from London. In the same way all the Indian stocks were taken back from London to India. The same thing has been done by the United States, and now Canada is the only country in the world which is willing to impose a burden upon its taxpayers without asking anything in return.

An hon. MEMBER: They did not pledge the C.P.R. stock, did they?

Mr. POULIOT: I did not mean to mention any particular stock; I mentioned the whole thing. They should come here; we should have them. We should have possession of everything that was given by way of guarantee. Instead it goes to the United States little by little, and we shall be left with nothing. It is just as silly as when the former minister of national defence for naval services refused to accept two ships which were offered as a gift by Great Britain. He would not accept anything. Well, any hon. member can make a gift from his own pocket. It is his own money; he is free to dispose of it as he wishes, but how can the government make a gift like that without first consulting the members of parliament or, if not all members, at least those who support the party, who are the bumpers for any reaction that may result in the country?

Mr. Speaker, Canada is the moon of the British sun. When the British sun sets in glory below the horizon it is time for the moon to rise; otherwise we shall be in complete darkness. There shall be no half-breed citizenship. If this country had not reached the stage where one is not ashamed to call himself in the first place a Canadian, then we shall have no legislation conferring a hyphenated citizenship. And the question of our citizenship should be decided before that of a Canadian flag. It is only after it is decided that we shall be in a position to decide whether or not we shall have a distinctive Canadian flag. I want hon. members to think a little about questions of citizenship; to realize that Igor Gouzenko, though Russian by birth, is a good Canadian, and that the hon. member for Cartier is more of a bolshevik than a Canadian. Those who are imperialists can hardly blame the hon. member for Cartier. He does not think first of Canada; he thinks first of another country. The imperialists think first of another country; they think first of the United Kingdom, and we cannot tell them anything. If we say, "Well, that is the way it is done in Great Britain," they bow their heads in great respect and it is all right. They live in another age. They are Victorians. They are not up to date; they do not belong to modern times. I do not say this in any offensive way, but I believe we shall never be able to have good government in this country so long as we have that small group of imperialists, who are just as noisy as the Tories are in my county, where three Tories can cry as loudly as a whole parish. They say, "Let us not speak of Canada; let us not speak of Canadian citizenship; let us not speak of a Canadian flag. Let us remain colonials so that we will not deceive anyone." Then we shall have a big union jack, the biggest possible, which will be the emblem of colonialism and serfdom. Then we shall know where we are; we will make the point, as navigators say.

Hon. members will remember that last session I complained bitterly about the strike of stevedores in Great Britain which prevented the British people from having food. Now according to the newspapers there is another strike, of tugs, and again the British people will not have food. I was informed that before Christmas a shipment of turkeys was sent to Great Britain. It was not landed there because of the strike. The shipment was brought back to Canada; and when those turkeys which had made the return trip to the United Kingdom were served, they tasted of the ocean salt. If the only purpose of the loan were to feed the British people, unquestionably I would be for it. I do not know yet what I will do. But if it is to be used to carry on war in Indonesia and throughout the world, then I am against it because I want peace. I will not vote for the granting of money to Great Britain in order to encourage imperialism, because I am against it.

I am in full accord with what has been said by a very capable journalist, a member of the press gallery representing L'Action Catholique, Mr. Lorenzo Paré. He has been elected vice-president of the press gallery, and I congratulate him upon that election. My dear friend, Mr. McDougall, has been elected president of the gallery, and I want to congratulate him. Mr. Paré has written masterly and powerful articles opposing the loan on the grounds of patriotism. As he states, a man cannot have patriotism for a country other than his own. One must have patriotism for the country of his birth, the country in which he lives, the country in which he has chosen to bring up his family, the country in which he expects to be buried. Such a man is a patriot. But the man who always thinks of another country before making any decision is unquestionably wrong.

Here in Ottawa we live in an atmosphere different from that of the rest of the country. My good friend the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), has rightly said that the atmosphere of Ottawa is different from that of the rest of the country. We live under an illusion. The government is under the illusion that it governs, but government is really in the hands of men whom nobody knows. Certain men will decide just what our contribution will be to the UNO. Those who will decide that will be, among others, the representatives of the trouble-maker, Russia. They are the bosses, and we agreed to that without thinking of what was right and without thinking of spiritual values.

Then there is a third question, the arrest of a member of parliament who has been accused of being a spy for another country. This is a delicate matter to discuss, because I have consideration for all members of parliament. He is a colleague; he has been elected by the electors of his constituency. I disagree strongly with what the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) said in his most contradictory speech the other night. My friend the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) thought that it was one of the finest speeches ever delivered. It reminds me of a judge whom I once asked to let me have some of his unreported judgments to include in the Municipal Code which I published years ago. He sent me a number of these judgments and I quoted a few of them. When the book was published I sent him a copy and the next time he met me he said, "My boy, that is the finest book I have ever seen." Perhaps the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has the same reason for thinking that speech was so good.

Salus populi, suprema lex is an old Latin axiom of law—the salvation of the people and the security of the people are the supreme law. It is a fine thing to talk about the magna charta, but I do not believe that all the walls of the old Irish home of the father of the hon. member for Quebec South were papered with the magna charta. Probably there was a picture of the hon. member for Quebec South playing hockey somewhere around the place, instead of the magna charta being on all the walls of the room.

Centuries after the magna charta, history records that there was what was called the gunpowder plot in Great Britain. The purpose of that plot was to blow up the king and parliament. This conspiracy has not been forgotten; for in England at the beginning of each session Mr. Speaker inspects the cellars to make sure that there is no conspirator anywhere in the parliament buildings. That is exactly what the government has done. My only regret is that we were not informed earlier about it. The government must defend the state against any one who attacks it. The Tories may attack the Liberals; I may attack the Tories or criticize the government; that is our right. But no one in this country can be against all of us; no one in this country can be against this country. The government was right in making an investigation which has unfolded the threat of this conspiracy. It shows how careful we must be with diplomats; it shows how careful we must be in checking the relations, social or otherwise, of the civil service with outside powers.

The hon. member for Quebec South complained of the shock to his ideas of liberty. This order in council was passed by virtue of bill No. 15, which was introduced by the Minister of Justice and had its first reading on October 5, 1945. On that same day the hon. member for Quebec South spoke in connection with another matter. A copy of bill No. 15 was delivered to the hon. member, as it was to every one of us. If he thought it was so important, why did he not stay here and discuss the measure with all the power he has at his command when he wants to say something? He did not do it.

On looking at the index for Hansard of last session I find that there are only two references under the name of the hon. member for Quebec South. These are:

Royal Canadian Air Force, 836-37
War expenditures and demobilization bill, 836-37.

That is all; he just made a little speech. Then I will go further. Tim Buck was imprisoned at a time when the hon. member for Quebec South was a member of the cabinet. He did not resign. Mayor Houde was imprisoned, and the hon. member for Quebec South did not resign although Mayor Houde was a member of the Quebec legislative assembly as well as being mayor of Montreal. The hon. member shared the responsibility for that. One of our most esteemed colleagues, the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) was arrested. He was confined to gaol, accused of a crime of which he was not guilty. The member for Quebec South was then a minister, but he did not resign from the government. How, then, does he protest vigorously now against the arrest of one of our colleagues, an arrest which was a state necessity at the time?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not want to take up too much time, but there is another thing that I do not understand. I have a clipping here of December 13, 1944. It will be remembered that someone who was very close to the big powers left the plans for the invasion of Normandy in the library at the Chateau Frontenac in Quebec. The clipping is dated September 13, but naturally the incident happened the year before, and we see that a major got a decoration and a non-commissioned officer was also decorated, but no one was arrested for such grave carelessness. Action should have been taken against any general, however big and powerful he might be, to have him arrested because he was compromising the success of the plan for the invasion of Normandy, which resulted in victory over Germany. But nothing of that sort was done. It was treated as just an ordinary matter. In that case justice was not severe enough.

I gave an interview in February last to a paper which is published in my constitueney. The interview was about the atomic bomb and the Canadian loan. But I will say only this, that I am not at all surprised at the Russian conspiracy, because at the time of the padlock law I notified the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of the intrigues that were being carried on by the Russians, and told him that although some of his ministers—the present Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) was not a member of parliament at the time—were in favour of disallowing the padlock law, I opposed such a step. I told the Prime Minister that the cardinal has more influence than Tim Buck, and the Prime Minister understood that it would have been very unwise to disallow the padlock law at the time. It was left on the statute book, and there was no trouble. But I gave names to the Prime Minister, and I told him that that was the way in which Russia was handling diplomatic business. It is all right to do business with any other party provided the other party acts like a gentleman. But let us stop all aid to Russia if they will not compromise and come to terms.

There is something else that I want to say. What the leader of the Social Credit group said in this debate was right, and the confirmation of what he said about McGill can be found in the fact that Doctor Boyer has been suspended from McGill. It is not the first time that there have been seditious professors at McGill, Toronto and Queen's. One professor at Queen's has just been arrested. I remember the time when King Gordon was a professor in Toronto. I complained about him, also about the teaching that was being given to McGill students, and in the Montreal papers that same night there was a protest from Colonel Bovey, the man who makes molasses peaches that pay him well. He said I was wrong. But what happened after that? Sir Edward Beatty, who was the chancellor of McGill, took the first opportunity to go to Queen's university to give a calling down to the students of his Alma Mater. I asked him for some of his speeches to the youths and he sent me all those speeches except the one that he had delivered at Queen's after Colonel Bovey's protest.

What is happening in the case of the member for Cartier, and what is happening now in this country, should be a lesson for us. We should be very careful in our dealings with other nations. We should develop a Canadian spirit so that our people will start to think of this country before thinking of anyone else. If I disagreed with the member for Quebec South on some points, there was one on which I agreed with him and that was when he spoke of various political affiliations and putting some other country before one's own. I know that it will be very hard for some members to extirpate that obsolete feeling of inferiority that exists in some places, but every time they attempt to do it they will be satisfied that they have performed a national duty.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I had intended if His Honour the Speaker were in his seat to say at the beginning of my remarks that I was not rising to ask any questions for which I might be called to order. But to relieve your mind, sir, I will say the same to you.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Pouliot) would not expect me to follow him in his fluent remarks, and my reference as such to his speech is all that he can expect from me at the present time. If I attempted to follow him I should not have time to get my own remarks on the record.

This debate, Mr. Speaker, may be called one of the chief conventions of parliament, since it affords to a great many of us an opportunity to speak on almost any subject and to mention some of the major problems we have in our respective constituencies.

Last session, when speaking on the address, I extended due congratulations to those who in my opinion deserved them. This time I will follow the time-honoured custom, and I sincerely congratulate the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address. The mover of the address deserves special commendation, because he spoke fluently and with great eloquence in his mother tongue. I hope that he can do the same when he comes to speak in the English language; he will have a distinct advantage over most hon. members. The seconder of the address always makes a good speech. His speech on this occasion was free from any of the embarrassments which attend some of the rest of us when we speak in this chamber. I therefore congratulate both hon. members. I know full well that the leader of their party was greatly pleased with their remarks, as these gentlemen came through and kept to the straight and narrow path of liberalism.

The text before me to-day is the speech from the throne. I have read it several times. It is of great length, but it does not offer as much as I thought it would. It makes several offers of something for nothing, but has very little for the jobless citizen of Canada. It is a brief prepared by the cabinet and placed in the hands of His Excellency to be read to the House of Commons and the Senate; consequently any remarks I may make in criticism of it are not a criticism of the governor general, because this document was handed to him by his constitutional advisers.

Criticisms of this speech have to do with some of its omissions and also some of its commissions.

As I have said, the speech is lengthy, and it was prepared by the cabinet; but when I read a few days ago the speech recently made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) in his constituency of Renfrew South, I began to think that either the speech from the throne was not prepared by the cabinet, or that while it was being prepared the minister was asleep. No doubt the minister has been rapped over the wrists for his expressions with reference to taxation. He is reported as having said that there were great things coming in the speech from the throne in this respect, that there were to be large reductions in the corporation tax, personal income taxes, and taxes of all kinds. So optimistic was he on this matter that he is reported as having said that "it will be about fifty per cent reduction." That must have been a pleasing announcement for his constituents to listen to. How popular he must have been on that occasion! But in view of what the speech from the throne has to offer them, what will they say to him upon his next visit? However, when the subject of taxation comes up under the budget we shall have—perhaps I may have—an opportunity of contrasting the enthusiastic minister's speech with the realities as disclosed by the budget.

The speech from the throne allows us some latitude in our remarks. During the fall session of 1945, speaking in the debate on the speech from the throne, I said that our province had been neglected under the terms of confederation. I was pleased to find that I had proved to quite a number of ministers that we are really neglected. In fact I thought I was getting along fairly well when the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) were quite liberal in what they did for my province, and for all of which I was very thankful. But within the last few days there has come an advertising blast which has rocked us right down to the ocean. Last Friday I endeavoured to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) a question in reference to a map and pictures which appeared in the New York Times of March 17, and from which map Prince Edward Island is entirely deleted. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not have an opportunity to reply at that time, as I was called to order by Mr. Speaker and required to sit down; but to-day I am glad to report that I have in my possession—it was handed to me as I came into the house—a letter from the minister which practically answers my question. With his permission—I have already asked for it—I am going to read the letter.

Dear Mr. McLure:

My secretary notified me of your intention to ask about some map that had been published, presumably by this department, in the New York Times and that had omitted Prince Edward Island.

I purpose seeing the map to which you refer. Map publications of this department are trade routes maps; map in the hand book we publish, and our travel bureau map, all of which show Prince Edward Island in its proper place.

I can asure you that I would join you in protest against the omission from any map of Canada of Prince Edward Island, Canada's smallest province but in many ways one of its loveliest.

I am sorry that I did not have an opportunity to say on the floor of the house just what I have said now.

This is signed by the Hon. James A. MacKinnon. It is much better, and I know that he will look into this matter and not allow such omissions of our province, the cradle of confederation, from advertising by the department.

I might mention another matter with reference to this advertising. I have before me a beautiful little calendar. I have not been able to find out who put it out, who authorized it, or anything else, but it is made up of tourist scenes and tourist views throughout Canada, starting on the first page with the majestic parliament buildings, and it gives two or three views from every province except one, Prince Edward Island.

This adverse advertising, when we are all looking for tourists, when our province has been struggling year after year to better conditions and to obtain greater tourist traffic, is certainly something for us to complain about. Looking at the map I was disturbed, because I had a constituency when I came here and I did not know whether I was going to have one when I got home, if I was to judge by the map. I should not be able to sing that old song which is familiar to all hon. gentlemen, "I had a hat when I came in, and I had a hat when I went out." I did not know whether I should be able to sing that I had a constituency when I came in and that I had a constituency when I went out. The tourist industry is of such importance to us that we should like to have the very best for our share of the advertising which the travel bureau, or whoever puts out this advertising, can possibly give us.

May I now refer to one of our problems. I do so because I have some figures which I wish to put before the house. I refer now to our truck transportation problem. The handicap to Prince Edward Island and her participation in the advantages of truck transportation from and to the mainland via Borden and Tormentine are practically prohibitive to us according to the rates we are charged. I quoted these rates in detail last year, and now I will submit only the rates on a five-ton truck carrying a load from and to. I will give simply these particular rates. The rate for a five-ton truck loaded with a first class commodity, return trip with a similar load, crossing the straits, is $60.65. For second class material it would be $54.65; for a third class commodity $50.65; for a fourth class commodity $44.65. If the truck were to return empty the rates for the different classes would be from $40.65 down to $32.65. This is for a distance of 18 miles. It costs for a five-ton truck with a first class commodity $3.37 per mile to cross the straits. These rates that I have just given are based on the assumption that the truck can be transported without loading from a platform. If it is driven onto a platform there is an extra charge of $10.

Let me discuss this with reference to the authorities that have to do with it. First of all, the agreement that my province entered into was made with the Dominion of Canada, and I am going to put on record again one clause which provides that our transportation system shall be kept up to date. You will find this in the agreement:

> That the Dominion of Canada shall assume and defray all the charges for the efficient steam service, for the conveyance of mails and passengers, to be established and maintained between the island—
> Meaning Prince Edward Island.
> —and the mainland of the dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial railway and the railway system of the dominion, and such other charges as may be incident to and connected with the services which by the British North America Act of 1867 appertain to the general government and as are or may be allowed to the other provinces.

That binding term of our agreement is the one on which I base my remarks. In the fall session of 1945 I endeavoured to place this truck problem before the Minister of Transport, but it was in the hit-or-miss days when estimates were going through at the rate of millions per minute. However, on page 3685 of Hansard of December 17, 1945, I find that I asked the Minister of Transport a question. I made this statement:

> I want the Minister of Transport to set the rate himself.

The minister replied:

> The Minister of Transport cannot set the rate.
> Mr. McLure: Does the minister tell this committee that he has no authority over rates?
>
> Mr. Chevrier: I said that the miister could not set the rate.
>
> Mr. McLure: Does the minister mean by that, that the government cannot set the rate?
> Mr. Chevrier: I will explain what I mean when I answer the hon. gentleman.

Then on page 3686 of the same Hansard, the same day, the minister, replying to some remarks of mine, said, referring to myself:

> He is of the opinion that the Minister of Transport should eliminate what he calls these prohibitive rates. I say to him that the minister has no authority to do that. The rates are filed with the board of transport commissioners on automobiles and trucks carried by the Canadian National Railways on the ferry between the island and the mainland, and it would appear from the information I have at hand that anyone who wishes to complain about these rates can do so before the board. I am not prepared to disagree with the hon. gentleman upon the amount of these rates. The explanation given before the railways and shipping committee by the president of the Canadian National Railways was that in fixing the rates on the ferry regard had to be had to similar railway rates.

I should now like to refer to what the president said. We can find it at page 86 of the report of the railways and shipping committee. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) asked this question:

> Are the rates on the ferry high, and does the C.N.R. set them?

He was there referring to the Northumberland ferry. It was a very good question. Here is the reply given by the president of the Canadian National Railways:

> We do not think the rates are unusually high. Of course, everything that goes over on the ferry is in direct competition with the railway.

He does not think that a rate of $3.37 per mile for taking a truck is prohibitive or high. He then goes on to say this, which is a classic:

> We think we are generous in allowing the trucks to go on the ferry at all.

This is a ferry owned by the Dominion of Canada. The boat and equipment were built by the Dominion of Canada, and yet the subcontractor makes the statement that we ought to be pleased to be allowed to take our trucks over, even though the rate were twice as high as it is.

I have no complaints against the Canadian National Railways; they are running the service. But I do complain that the government are not doing justice to Prince Edward Island in permitting those excessive rates to be charged. I could hardly believe that the president of the Canadian National Railways would say "we think we are generous in allowing the trucks to go on the ferry at all," this man who occupied the position of president of the Canadian National Railways could not have known what the rates were when he spoke thus. I have confidence in his ability and common sense, and I am sure that if he had known of the rates which I have put on the record to-day his reply would not have been as I have stated. Instead it would be something like this: Yes, the rates are ridiculously high, and no province with a guarantee from the dominion government should stand for such treatment. I feel certain that he would have put it in still stronger terms. This year I hope to have an opportunity to appear before that committee and to give them a true picture of our transportation problem.

Let me for a moment refer to what some of the prime ministers and leaders of the different parties have said, and how they have viewed our situation. For thirty-five years we made practically no advance whatever in our transportation problem. In 1911 the province began to exert itself with regard to the fulfilment of the agreement of union. At that time Sir Robert Borden came to our province. He had made a study of our problem, and he made definite promises to us with regard to the ferry. I am proud to say that through these promises and the study he had made of them we have our present ferry system. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in the House of Commons in 1912, as reported at page 5680 of Hansard:

> Prince Edward Island has not profited by confederation. For some years past it has been losing its population by reason of its connection with Canada and going backwards instead of forward.

The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett also studied our problems and gave us a further fulfilment of our contract. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made a study of the matter, and definite promises were made by him for further fulfilment. I was unable to locate to-day his exact words, in Hansard and on the public platform, but he did give assurance of further fulfilment of our contract. To show you, Mr. Speaker, that the present Prime Minister is in accord with the view we hold that the agreement is not being lived up to, I shall quote what the Hon. Charles A. Dunning, a former Minister of Finance of the Liberal government had to say when he was seeking election in my constituency. He was not speaking without the consent of the Prime Minister. Mr. Dunning contended, as had all others, that the water separating Prince Edward Island from the mainland of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia was the king's highway, and that we were entitled to have it negotiated at the expense of the federal government. Here are his exact words:

> It is in the bond of confederation agreement and must be honoured and its obligations fulfilled.

He was elected by acclamation. Your humble servant chose not to oppose him. I am not presuming too much when I say that on that occasion Mr. Dunning was the mouthpiece of the Prime Minister. Therefore I give the Prime Minister credit for these encouraging words with reference to our problem.

We had other men come down there time after time and study our problem. For instance, the leader of my party in this house (Mr. Bracken) made a study of this problem prior to the 1945 election. He spent considerable time there, and he had practical experience with the ferry which gave him fuller knowledge of our transportation problem. In his opening campaign speech the hon. gentleman promised that if his party were elected there would be proper fulfilment of the terms of confederation with regard to our transportation; and I believe that had he been elected, this would have been done.

During the same campaign the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was in our province, no doubt in behalf of the Prime Minister who was unable to come there. I did not hear that fluent gentleman at that time, but from what I read in the newspapers he was not far behind anyone else in making promises in regard to our transportation. He is here in the chamber at the present time. I will say that I believe he was sincere, and according to what appeared in the press his statements were to the same effect as those of Mr. Dunning, when he said, "It is yours by right, because it is in the bond of agreement." I may not be quoting nearly all that was said by the hon. gentleman on that occasion, but I am sure if there was more he will say so when I am through.

In addition to the matter of automobiles and trucks we had other promises made in reference to our roads and the things that should be given to us. As well as the ferry we should have a highway to connect us with the mainland by the Tormentine-Borden route; and some day I hope we shall be given that highway under the terms of confederation. It should be a super-highway, such as all the other provinces have; it should go from Borden to Charlottetown, the shortest route to the capital city, which would save us a drive of fourteen miles. This would require the construction of one bridge, the Brighton bridge, which according to some estimates would cost nearly a million dollars. I do not know how far the Minister of Agriculture went in his remarks in reference to that subject, but I do know that at several meetings the Liberal candidates in our constituency said this bridge would be built as part of the highway. All the candidates gave the same pledge, so when the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) begins his task I hope we will have an opportunity of presenting this matter in connection with our highway.

I might mention many other things in connection with our transportation. Last session the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) dealing with this matter, said at page 3685 of Hansard for December 17, 1945:

> My hon. friend is not unmindful of the fact that already we have made commitments for improving the facilities at Tormentine and Borden. . . .
> It does not matter under whose department it is. At the moment it is under the Department of Transport, but that is aside from the question. We are spending on these facilities somewhere in the neighbourhood of $5,500,000. That is over and above the new ferry boat, which will cost between $4,500,000 and $5,000,000. That is over $11,000,000 for these facilities. So that I am sure the hon. gentleman cannot say that we are not looking with interest into the transportation problems between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

[Mr. McLure.]

I say now, as I said then, that I appreciate the interest the minister is taking in our problem, but I want to tell him now it will require another $12,000,000 to bring our transportation up to the standard guaranteed to us in our terms of agreement with the dominion government.

If time permitted, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in reference to the other ferry and its system of operation, but in conclusion may I say that for over fifty years my province has been deprived of the efficient, continuous service which was guaranteed by confederation. How therefore can any government expect us to be fully satisfied with a service operated by a subcontractor who is not interested in the terms of confederation? As I said before, when I make that statement concerning the subcontractors I do not intend to criticize them, but I do criticize the dominion government for not seeing to the fulfilment of the terms of confederation as they deal with us. Public opinion is behind us. During the past year I have noticed editorials in some of our leading newspapers, all voicing the opinion that this stretch of water must be treated as a highway, as a bridge, as part of the trans-Canada highway, with no cost to traffic other than the normal cost of moving a truck or other vehicle nine miles on the highway. Public opinion will support that; and not until we get a better service at a proper rate can we be content; nor can we be satisfied until our agreement with the dominion government has been fulfilled.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on September 24 last, six months ago, I introduced into this house a subject relating to one of the gravest problems that have arisen out of world war II, and I had earnestly hoped that there would be no necessity of bringing the matter up again this session. I refer, of course, to the tragic fate of displaced persons and their forced repatriation from western Europe to regions behind "the iron curtain which to-day divides Europe in twain," to use Mr. Churchill's dramatic description. I had hoped, too, sir, that English-speaking countries would eventually take a firm stand against this inhuman repatriation and that all persons who consider themselves stateless would be given asylum and protection in the western world until they could find permanent homes. I firmly believed also that the British and United States governments would take the right course in this matter, not only for humanitarian reasons but also because of the long-established practice of international law under which protection and asylum have always been extended to refugees in the past, and because the use of force against defenceless people is incompatible with the principles of freedom and justice to which the western allies have pledged themselves. Unfortunately, my hopes were not realized.

To my great disappointment, and to the disappointment of many Canadian citizens, including thousands of our returned men and women who are deeply concerned about the fate of their relatives now in western Europe, forced repatriation of displaced persons continues despite the assurances by the British and United States governments to the contrary. Alarming but authentic reports continue to reach Canadian citizens to the effect that United States, British and Canadian soldiers not only are permitting Soviet authorities to comb British and American zones for refugees, but are actually aiding the Soviet authorities in this man-hunt of defenceless peoples.

Contrary to the general belief that the displaced persons problem has been partly solved, the grim fact is that the problem has gradually become even more serious. This was recognized by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, that great American lady, and also by the Hon. Hector McNeil, British parliamentary under-secretary of state for foreign affairs, when they considered the displaced persons problem of sufficient importance to voice their stand on it at the recent united nations conference held in London, England, and in their stand they were supported by Premier Peter Fraser of New Zealand. A press report on Februay 9, 1946, said that "the refugee debate was the highlight of the work of the assembly committee apart from the debate on the headquarters site". The London Times of February 13 of this year described in the following words the conference proceedings of February 12:

> The assembly rose at the end of the afternoon sitting without having reached a vote. The debate was resumed at 9 p.m. with the galleries crowded and the public flowing into the press seats. It was a dramatic sitting . . . Mrs. Roosevelt went to the rostrum. She was given a great ovation, and in the course of a speech in which she pleaded eloquently for the right of the refugees to make their own choice she was repeatedly cheered. She was followed by Mr. Hector McNeil . . . with a speech which also moved the gathering. He recalled the words of the charter pledging the united nations to practice tolerance and to respect the worth of the individual. "These," he said, "are the lamps that light this assembly." If the words "tolerance" and "pity" were to be eliminated then the English tongue would no longer be the English tongue. The right of asylum had to be preserved, he remarked.

Supporting the British and American case, Premier Peter Fraser of New Zealand warned that "we must be careful that in the attending of the birth of the united nations we are not also attending the funeral of liberty and freedom." The references which I have just quoted are a fair indication of the importance that was attached at the united nations conference to the problem of displaced persons.

On January 19 and February 23 of this year, His Holiness Pope Pius XII issued two protests against forced repatriation of displaced persons and the persecution of the Ukrainian church. Following these protests, Eugene Cardinal Tisserant made two further protests on March 1 and 5, 1946, against allowing Soviet authorities to kidnap displaced persons, and against persecution of the Ukrainian church.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), now parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, spoke on this subject in this house on September 26 last, and by his impassioned appeal on behalf of the homeless displaced persons endeared himself to thousands of Canadian citizens across this country. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) made his worthy contribution on this matter on September 27 last.

The Ukrainian Canadian committee, which is the coordinating body of all non-communist Ukrainian Canadian organizations in Canada, comprising more than eighty per cent of all Canadians of Ukrainian origin, and whose first objective was more effectively to aid Canada in the winning of the war, has also made several presentations to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Canadian government on behalf of relatives of Canadians who find themselves among the displaced persons in Europe. On October 22, 1945, twenty-five members of this parliament sent a telegram to the Prime Minister of Canada while he was in London, appealing to him to make representations to the British and American foreign offices to cease forced repatriation of displaced persons to the east.

Within recent months further appeals were sent to the Prime Minister by Canadian church organizations. On January 28 of this year the chairman of the social service committee of the Baptist church of Canada urged the Prime Minister "to take a firm and Christian stand against forced repatriation of refugees." His appeal reads in part as follows:

> There are constant and disquieting reports that, in violation of international law but in alleged conformity with the dictatorial Yalta pact, the military authorities in the British and and American zones are forcing such refugees—especially Ukrainians, Poles, Latvians, Lithuanians and Esthonians—into Soviet repatriation camps for compulsory transportation . . . At a time when American, Canadian and British troops abroad are clamouring for speedy repatriation, these millions of displaced persons in western Europe dread repatriation worse than death and are committing suicide or starving in the forests in order to escape the horrors of coming under Soviet rule. These are not war criminals . . .

To hand them over to the red army and the N.K.V.D. is to murder them. He who deliberately surrenders an innocent man to his murderers is himself guilty of the felony. It would be a moral calamity of the first order if our Canadian government should share in the responsibility for these crimes.

Never before, to my knowledge, have Christian nations connived at such an atrocity on such a scale . . .

May I urge, Mr. Prime Minister, that the Canadian government should make itself the voice of the conscience of Canada, and actively try to prevent these crimes against humanity? And may I urge that Canada should bear its share of an offer of asylum to these fugitives from death?

Another appeal, bearing the date of February 22, 1946, and signed by Mr. W. A. Cameron on behalf of the sub-executive of the general board of missions of the Presbyterian church in Canada, was sent to the Prime Minister. This appeal urged that all orders authorizing forced repatriation of displaced persons be revoked. Finally I should like to mention the speeches and writings of Doctor Watson Kirkconnell of McMaster university. Doctor Kirkconnell's articles on this subject have been authoritative and instructive.

Let me mention what has been done in the United States in an effort to secure justice for the displaced persons. On November 21, 1945, Hon. Clare Booth Luce read into the congressional record important documents and extracts from letters concerning the fate of Ukrainian displaced persons, and urged the revocation of forced repatriation orders. On December 11, 1945, in an effort to prevent the displaced persons in the American zone of occupation from being repatriated by force, Senator Arthur Vanderburg and Mrs. Clare Booth Luce introduced in congress a joint resolution requesting an immediate and a thorough investigation into the whole refugee problem.

Recently, on March 7, 1946, Congressman Michael J. Bradley, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, delivered a strong address in the house of representatives in the United States capitol, against forced repatriation and political persecution of Ukrainian displaced persons.

The Ukrainian congress committee in the United States, which is also a coordinating body of all non-communist American Ukrainian organizations, comprising the large majority of Americans of Ukrainian origin, made similar requests to the President of the United States and the United States government.

Again, the writings on this subject of such outstanding men as Doctor Clarence A. Manning, a professor at Columbia university, and William Henry Chamberlin, one of the foremost journalists of this continent, are in line with the true principles of freedom and will remain a tribute to the men of learning in the United States.

But in spite of these numerous appeals, protests, requests and representations, the Soviet authorities are still being extended the privilege of combing the British and American zones of occupation in search of their victims. It is extremely painful and disappointing to learn that United States, British and Canadian soldiers are being used to assist the Soviet authorities in forcing the unfortunate displaced persons to surrender to the Soviets, even though most of them come from territories which never were a part of Tsarist Russia or the present communist empire. Some of the letters which I receive from Canadian and American soldiers describing the treatment that is meted out to large numbers of displaced persons defy the imagination. After witnessing one of these massacres in one of the displaced persons camps, an American officer said, "It just wasn't human," and "there weren't men in the barracks when I reached it—they were animals. Nothing has ever affected me like that scene."

In view of the well-organized campaign which is being carried on against these tortured people by persons with the definite purpose of diverting the sympathy of Canadian citizens and confusing the issue, I am compelled to deal with this matter for the second time in this house. On this occasion I should like to document my arguments so as to leave no doubt whatsoever in regard to the whole question. It is obvious that these people cannot speak for themselves. This fact alone, I think, justifies my discussing the problem. And because the subject is so immense I can deal with only a portion of it; I shall leave other aspects of it to other hon. members.

I should now like to call three witnesses to testify in this matter, to describe from their own knowledge the conditions in which displaced persons find themselves and indicate something of the agony which unfortunate refugees experience. I will first call on Emma Birkett to give her story to the house. In the September 6, 1945, issue of the Weekly Review, London, Emma Birkett says:

The period from October, 1939, until June, 1941 . . . (the period when Russia and Germany were on the same side) will forever remain in the memory of western Ukrainians as that of their greatest sufferings.

Executions combined with mass deportations into the depths of the Soviet Union filled the whole population with terror. Many political leaders essentially nationally-minded, were deported into Asia and soon died in exile.

To-day these people, of whom there are millions, are scattered all over Germany, Austria, France, Belgium, Holland, Poland, Roumania and the Balkans.

To-day, all Ukrainians, regardless from which part of their country they come, are in tragic position. By nature individualists and western-minded, imbued with fanatical love of personal freedom, they find themselves geographically squeezed between two totalitarian systems, both of which they feared and hated.

To-day, when the guns are quiet in Europe, the future of Ukrainians scattered across the continent is still very dark.

The problem of all these wretched people is one of the greatest magnitude. Their fate in Europe is one of the terrible consequences of this war. They do not claim any priority in getting help from the outside world. But should not their case, simply for reasons of humanity, receive more attention than until now.

I am certain that Miss Birkett's testimony requires no comment; it is a document which speaks for itself and will remain in the permanent records when the story of the agony of millions of displaced persons is written.

The second witness upon whom I wish to call to testify briefly is a United States army M.P., Harry Polche. This soldier's testimony in part is as follows:

> . . . I have been travelling through Europe and have seen many sights, but there is one in particular I want to tell you about . . . It was only recently that I was stationed in Ingolstadt, Germany. I happened to take a walk through the park, and suddenly I heard Ukrainian voices. I looked into a grove of trees and there I saw about thirty children, ranging in age from three to seven . . . and a teacher.
> They were saying a prayer in Ukrainian . . . I approached the group and introduced myself. The teacher then had the pupils recite for me and sing familiar Ukrainian songs. They sang very well with their childlike voices.
> They were all poorly dressed.
> It made me very sad to see the Ukrainian children reduced to this. I visited the barracks where they lived, and it was pitiful to see where they slept. Many people slept in a room and on straw mattresses. I do not know how they will be able to spend the cold winter . . .
> They are a homeless people . . .
> I feel sorry for these people and something should be done to help them. They need food, clothing and most of all encouragement.

The third and last witness whom I wish to call cannot now be named, for obvious reasons, but his testimony can be relied upon. The letter is dated September 11, 1945, and written from Diel, near Coblenz, Germany. He says:

> To the camp at Manheim, south of Frankfort, where there are 3,000 Ukrainians from eastern Ukraine and from Galicia, Soviet officials came there recently and demanded the surrender of Ukrainians to them. The American authorities ordered the Ukrainians to prepare themselves to leave. The Ukrainians refused to obey the order. A tug-of-war ensued. Women and children began to cry and threw themselves at the feet of the American officers. But to no avail. The American officers threatened to shoot . . . Finally one American officer ordered them once more to prepare to leave and those who refused were beaten with rubber clubs . . . The Ukrainians did not give in . . . To this the officer said: "If that is the case I will give you four days to think the matter over." What of the future no one knows.

This, Mr. Speaker, gives us some idea of what the displaced persons must go through. I need hardly say how Canadians or Americans must feel when they receive such letters, especially when persons near and dear to them are in one of these camps. Indifference on their part is unthinkable.

I know there are those who will argue that the conditions which I have described may have been true in the past, but that forced repatriation has now ceased and conditions have greatly improved. One such Associated Press dispatch, dated October 4, 1945, announced that General Eisenhower had issued an order to United States officers to stop forced repatriation of persons who did not wish to place themselves in the custody of the Soviet officers.

In the same dispatch one United States officer is quoted as having said:

> Possibly for a time some of them were pushed into trains without our asking many questions, but that's all stopped now.

That report was indeed very encouraging and was happily received by Canadian and American citizens. A few days later, however, heart-breaking reports continued to come in, to the effect that there was no marked change in the policy in regard to forced repatriation of displaced persons. In a letter dated November 21, 1945, which I personally received from a Canadian officer stationed in London, England, he said:

> With regard to the Associated Press dispatch that General Eisenhower had issued an order to cease forceful repatriation of displaced persons from the American zone, I am afraid that I cannot give you much more information than what we have received from certain territories in Germany, which is to the effect that there is no marked change in the general attitude of the authorities . . . In other words, the initiative and decisions are a matter of local commanding officers, because they, and only they, represent the military authorities and therefore they are the only semblance of law and order in their respective districts.

After receiving a number of distressing telegrams and letters, such as I have just quoted, I asked the Prime Minister a question in this matter on December 18, 1945, which is in part as follows:

> Has the government anything to say on the subject of further forceful repatriation of Ukrainians from military occupation zones to the east? They are being refused food unless they agree to go.

The Prime Minister was kind enough to give me this reply:

The subject to which the hon. member has referred is one which relates to Europe. I am not in a position to say whether the representations made are wholly correct. I would suppose in that respect that my hon. friend is in the same position as I am. I can assure him however that the government has watched this whole Ukrainian situation most carefully, and so far as it is within our power to control matters, we have sought to see that the course taken would be such as would protect their interests.

I am now in possession of a copy of the United States zone order of December 5, 1945, to which I referred when I directed the question to the Prime Minister. In brief the order says:

It is hereby announced that from 08.00 hours December 8, all food, shelter, etc., for those displaced persons who . . . are Soviet citizens are to cease forthwith. (They) are instructed to report to the Soviet camp at Stuttgart . . . Those who do not report will be seized . . . and brought to Stuttgart under armed escort . . . All local burgomasters have been informed that Soviet citizens are not to be employed and the German population must refuse them food.

I have two other copies of similar orders which I will not take time to quote, but one is a United States order dated November 27, 1945, signed by Captain Robert Wallach, and the other is a British 30th corps zone order (No. 219DP) of December 29, 1945, issued in a similar sense.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot reconcile such orders as these with the words of the president of the preparatory commission and temporary president of the general assembly of UNO which he used when addressing the united nations conference at London, England on January 9, 1946. He declared:

The San Francisco charter, which to-morrow we shall start to bring into effect, repeatedly stresses the vital importance of stimulating in the world real respect for fundamental liberties, individual rights, and dignity of man and the dictates of justice as an indispensable basis for the maintenance of peace.

I quite realize that the western allies are anxious to lighten the load which they are carrying in feeding and clothing several millions of people, but I feel that apart from humanitarian and Christian considerations we should also take into account their sacrifices for us. I should like to quote in this connection two or three sentences from an article which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of January 27, 1945, written by Edgar Snow while in Kiev. Mr. Snow said:

. . . it was not till I came here on this sobering journey into the twilight of war that I quite realized the price which Ukrainians have paid for Soviet victory. This whole titanic struggle, which some are so apt to dismiss as "the Russian Glory," has, in all truth and in many costly ways, been first of all a Ukrainian war. No fewer than 10,000,000 people, I was told . . . by a high official here, have been "lost" to the Ukraine since the beginning of the war. That figure excludes men and women mobilized for the armed forces.

If we take into consideration, therefore, the sacrifices of these people we may perhaps come to the conclusion that we, too, owe them a small debt of gratitude. I hope that Canada does not dismiss this tragedy by merely saying that it is a European problem.

I am pleased, however, that Canada has carried its share of the burden by way of contributions to UNRRA and other similar agencies. I am pleased, too, that all parties in this house have in their recent references included Canada among the powers of the world. In the farewell address to their excellencies the Governor General and Princess Alice the house unanimously agreed, as reported in Hansard of March 15, that Canada is now recognized as a foremost world power. May I read one sentence from the address:

. . . It must be a source of profound gratification to you, on your retirement, as Governor General, to realize that your years in Canada have witnessed victory over the enemies of freedom, and the emergence of Canada as a world power, with a foremost place among the united nations.

I am sure that it is a source of deep satisfaction to all hon. members that Canada has reached this position, for there is hope now that Canada, occupying the foremost position among the united nations, will have a stronger voice in the councils of nations concerning international matters.

I am pleased, also, that in the speech from the throne considerable emphasis is placed on the need of supplying of food to the starving peoples of Europe, and indeed to the world. The speech says:

The turmoil which has followed in the wake of war has created new problems for governments in all parts of the globe . . . Hunger, privation and sufferings have become the lot of millions. Other millions are homeless, many of them in exile.

Of world problems demanding immediate action, the most pressing is the provision of food to those people facing acute shortage, and, in some regions, widespread famine. Unless the need is met, grave disorders, endangering peace itself, must be anticipated.

In view of Canada's recognition of the widespread shortage of food in many countries of the world, I would also urge upon the government not to overlook the needs of displaced persons and to do all in its power to assist these people by all practicable means.

We must take into account that in time the work of UNRRA will be terminated. It is definite that UNRRA cannot feed, house and clothe millions of people indefinitely. A permanent solution of this problem must be sought, and without delay. Canadian citizens are not only now worrying about the present lot of their relatives; they are also concerned about their future.

Having outlined the grim conditions under which so many relatives of Canadian citizens find themselves, I should now like to place before the government four specific requests.

1. That the Canadian government make further representations to British and United States governments requesting the revocation of all forced repatriation orders which are applied to Ukrainian and other refugees; and, further, that in compliance with international law the right of asylum and protection be granted to all persons who consider themselves stateless, regardless of their origin or religious belief. I shall cite but one reference to international law relating to the refugee problem.

On page 238 of "The Refugee Problem" (A report of a survey), by Sir John Hope Simpson, it is stated:

> The political and juridical protection of refugees has been the subject of international agreements—such as the arrangements of 1928 for "Nansen" refugees and of 1936 for refugees coming from Germany—secured by the action of the league of nations, and the binding convention of 1933 and 1938.

Time does not allow me to quote further references in regard to this matter, but I should like to quote article 129 of the U.S.S.R. constitution of 1936. It clearly states:

> The U.S.S.R. grants the right of asylum to foreign citizens persecuted for defending the interests of the toilers or for their scientific activities or for their struggle for national liberation.

I submit that in view of the international law which, if unobserved, denies any protection to persecuted peoples and persons whatsoever, and in view of the fact that the U.S.S.R. reserved to itself this right under its own constitution, the English-speaking countries should insist that this law be observed. Surely the U.S.S.R. cannot expect us to deny, to persons who look to us for protection, the protection which they guarantee to their supporters.

2. (a) In view of the heavy load which UNRRA is carrying in the matter of feeding and clothing the people in displaced persons camps, the government should take immediate steps to making proper arrangements to make it possible for Canadian citizens to send food and clothing parcels to their relatives in the camps until such time as they are permanently resettled and are able to support themselves. In the United States, arrangements for sending mail and parcels were made as far back as November 23, 1945. This was reported in the New York Times of November 24, last. And in the New York Times of February 28 of this year, Lieutenant General William N. Haskill announced that a cooperative organization will soon have several millions of food parcels available to be sent to relatives of Americans. I should ask, too, that the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) confer with the British postal authorities in the matter of lowering of postal rates for this purpose.

(b) To give serious consideration to allowing Canadian citizens to send to their relatives in large quantities flour and perhaps other imperishable foodstuffs and to allow them also to send clothing.

(c) To make immediate arrangements for personal and direct mail service between Canada and displaced persons camps. Here, again, this has already been done in the United States as from November 23, 1945. The war is over and we owe it to our people at least to allow them to write to their relatives. It is now seven years since most of them have not had a letter from those dear to them. I need hardly emphasize the fact that people, who have gone through war and who have been living in camps for months, are most anxious to locate their relatives and to write to them.

3. The third request is that the Canadian government make proper representations to British and United States governments to rescind the following order:

HQ 30 Corps District
219/DP
29th December, 1945
British Zone

Subject—Ukrainians

To: Mil. Gov. Detachments—(enumeration follows).

1. H.M.G. do not recognize Ukrainian as a nationality, and persons coming from the Ukraine are classed as citizens of the country in which they had their residence on 1st September, 1939. No recognition can be given to any Ukrainian organization or representation as such.

2. All such persons who lived in Soviet territory are compulsorily returned to the U.S.S.R. under the terms of the Yalta agreement as soon as they are proved to be such.

3. Ukrainians of other than Soviet citizenship receive education and welfare facilities in the language appropriate to their citizenship, and for the time being it is impracticable for a variety of reasons to publish books or other literature in Ukrainian.

4. All Ukrainian organizations will be disbanded forthwith, and where they are established outside camps, the representatives will be brought into camps as normal D.P.'s. All stationery pertaining to these organizations will be confiscated.

5. Continuation of such activities is punishable under articles 26 and/or 34 of ordnance 1.

Brigadier,
Chief of Staff
30 Corps District.

Ten days after this order was issued, Prime Minister Attlee made the following statement to the united nations conference, as reported in The Times, London, of January 11, 1946:

I am glad that the charter of the united nations does not deal only with governments and states or with politics and war but the simple elemental needs of human beings whatever be their race, their colour, or their creed. In the charter we reaffirm our faith in fundamental human rights. We see the freedom of the individual in the state as an essential complement to the freedom of the state in the world community of nations. We stress, too, that social justice and the best possible standards of life for all are essential factors in promoting and maintaining the peace of the world.

I want to believe, that either the order to which I referred was issued without the knowledge of British and United States governments or they must have been tragically misled. One cannot imagine British or United States governments denying human beings the most elementary human rights of having their own welfare organizations.

4. The fourth and last request which I should like to direct to the Canadian government has to do with immigration. I should like to make an earnest appeal to the government to make provision for admission to Canada of a generous number of close relatives of Canadian citizens.

As hon. members are aware, even the United Kingdom, having suffered devastations on a colossal scale, made provision on November 13, 1945, for admission of close relatives of persons residing in Great Britain and have offered to share their meagre supplies with those who have none.

Then let me draw the attention of hon. members to an item in Time magazine, New York, of February 19, 1946, concerning Australia's immigration policy:

Australia has plans for the greatest immigration project in history. It's a drive for an eventual threefold increase in the country's population of 7,000,000. An Australian delegation has been in Europe making a survey to determine how many British, Norwegian, Swedish, Dutch, Swiss, and other emigrants can be attracted to the island continent. To deal successfully with the economic problems posed by such a mass migration, Australia has set the number to be admitted at 70,000 a year for the first few years.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

Let me now turn to the United States immigration policy as announced by President Truman on December 22, 1945:

The war has brought in its wake an appalling dislocation of populations in Europe. Many humanitarian organizations, including the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration, are doing their utmost to solve the multitude of problems arising in connection with this dislocation of hundreds of thousands of persons. Every effort is being made to return the displaced persons and refugees in the various countries of Europe to their former homes. The great difficulties is that so many of these persons have no homes to which they may return. The immensity of the problem of displaced persons and refugees is almost beyond comprehension.

. . . The United States shares the responsibility to relieve the suffering . . . everything possible should be done at once to facilitate the entrance of some of these displaced persons and refugees into the United States.

In this way we may do something to relieve human misery and set an example to the other countries of the world which are able to receive some of these war sufferers. I feel that it is essential that we do this ourselves to show our good faith in requesting other nations to open their doors for this purpose.

. . . I consider that common decency and the fundamental comradeship of all human beings require us to do what lies within our power to see that our established immigration quotas are used in order to reduce human suffering. I am taking the necessary steps to see that this is done as quickly as possible.

. . . This period of unspeakable human distress is not the time for us to close or to narrow our gates.

What is Canada's immigration policy? Here are two paragraphs from a letter from the Department of Immigration in reply to a request to allow three displaced persons to join their relatives in Canada. This letter is dated March 6, 1946.

Literally hundreds of similar applications are being received in the department from residents of Canada who are anxious to assist relatives in distressed circumstances in Europe. Practically all of the proposed immigrants are inadmissible under existing regulations and, after careful review of the whole situation, it has been decided that the entry to Canada at this time of any considerable number of aliens would not be advisable. With the return to civilian life of our servicemen and women, it is considered they are entitled to first priority in the matter of rehabilitation and establishment.

It would not be possible to offer any encouragement on behalf of your relatives above named, when we are obliged to refuse so many applications which present at least equal merit from a sympathetic standpoint. I can only express regret, therefore, at being unable to let you have a favourable reply.

I do not wish it to be understood that I am pressing the government to decide now on the general immigration policy for Canada for the next few years. I am merely appealing to the government to admit a generous number of displaced persons to Canada purely on the basis of humanitarian consideration.

I am glad that there are Canadians who take a sympathetic attitude toward the displaced persons. May I read a few sentences from a letter written by a Canadian officer:

I am a Canadian of British parentage . . . In our displaced persons camp here . . . we have two thousand Ukrainians and in the short time I have had the pleasure of associating with these people I have come to like and admire them greatly. I suppose I need not tell you of the many hardships and privations these folks have undergone in the past few years but I would like to tell you a little of what they are doing and are trying to do now. Our camp is composed completely of Ukrainians and we moved into a rather badly bombed German barracks. I have never seen such industry and ambition shown by a group of people, as these put forward in making the camp not only livable but as near to home as a military barracks can be made to be.

There are two things that prompted me to write this letter. It was part of our work to register all people living in the camp and one of the questions asked on this registration card was the person's choice of a place to settle. Many answered "Canada" and I don't mind admitting I felt very proud that my Canada was so well known among these people . . . A school was opened in the camp and I beg consideration of your sending these people dictionaries. Also considering the great interest shown in Canada any available literature would be more than welcome, especially anything to do with immigration to Canada or plans for it, and also daily newspapers for very news-starved people.

I would like it understood that I am not writing this as an officer but rather as a Canadian who would like to see a good many of these people come to Canada and help it to become the really great nation it is destined to become and for them to know the peace of mind that comes from living in a free country.

I should like to quote, in conclusion, from an article in the Ottawa Citizen of March 23, 1946, entitled "Displaced Persons 'Good Citizens' ".

That it would be a sound move on Canada's part to put in a bid for some of the "best" of the displaced persons still in Germany, is the opinion of a deputy director of the displaced persons programme in Germany, William Bagnall.

Mr. Bagnall, who arrived in Ottawa yesterday en route to his home in Calgary, after eight months in Munich with UNRRA, told the press that there were still many displaced persons in Germany.

He believed the solution to the problem of what to do with citizens who had no place to go, or couldn't return to their own land with safety, lay in the hands of the united nations.

Mr. Bagnall said it was up to each country to take its share of this displaced population. He was sure many of these people would like to go to other countries outside Europe, particularly to Canada.

Many of the displaced persons were good citizens, he claimed, who were in their present position through no fault of their own.

If Canada offers a welcome to a number of these homeless people, if she offers them freedom and homes, I am sure they will be forever grateful to the people of Canada and to this land.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): I believe it is my duty at this time to make several observations with reference to problems facing our ex-servicemen and women; but first I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both these veterans have made an able contribution to the debate, and I am glad they were privileged to serve in the capacity for which they were selected. Ex-service personnel throughout the country were signally honoured in the selection of two veterans for this important function. I believe it is also a recognition of the debt this nation owes to men and women who served her so conscientiously during six years of devastating war. However, veterans have never wanted to be a privileged group. They served Canada as a duty in her hour of trial and sacrificed in order that Canadians might pursue their way of life. They have no regrets. The most of them would gladly serve again should Canada ever be in need of their services. But to-day they are facing the problems of the return to civil life. They are entitled to a consideration of their problems. They hope for a square deal; they are anxious to obtain jobs, procure homes and become firmly established in the home community which it was their lot to defend in the greatest war in history.

That they have become accustomed to the economic security of service life has been most apparent. Adjustments to civil life which lack that economic security have not been an easy task. Satisfactory employment at adequate wages has aided that adjustment but that alone is not sufficient. Some employers, fortunately not a great many, take the attitude that the veteran must again prove his worth in order to hold his job. He has already proven his worth to his country once, and the employer should have some regard for his new status. Other employers consider they have performed a patriotic duty by accepting the veteran back in his job. Many forget, however, that he is more mature now than when he enlisted. He is often a changed man, and for him to adjust himself to the quiet life of a routine job after an exciting life in the services is not easy. Every employer should recognize this fact and be prepared to bear with the veteran until such a time as he finds his niche in civil employment. I am certain that if this is done every veteran will co-operate with his employer and give his best, as he has done before.

I am greatly disturbed by the fact that unemployment exists in the ranks of our returned personnel. Thousands are drawing unemployment insurance; other thousands are in receipt of out-of-work benefits, while many others are dissipating their savings and gratuities in forced idleness.

On the day the veteran received his discharge this government should have implemented its promise to the veteran and to the nation of "jobs for all". Veterans do not want charity. What they desire is employment with adequate wages. Private enterprise now has its chance to prove that there can be full employment under this economic system. Let the veteran have a practical demonstration, without delay, that private enterprise has the ability to provide him with work. Many a veteran is still waiting for the job he was promised while he served on the European front, on the high seas or over the hostile skies of Europe and Asia.

May I at this point draw the attention of the house to the extensive report made by the interdepartmental rehabilitation information committee of Montreal district? This survey of conditions amongst veterans in that area is a good example of what is happening everywhere in the dominion. More than four thousand veterans were interviewed on this occasion. One sixth of them were unemployed, and only one-third of those were drawing out-of-work benefits because, as they expressed it, "they were unwilling to seek charity." Fifty per cent of the veterans examined had serious housing problems, and only four per cent owned their own homes. Of those renting, only half had adequate accommodation. Of those who while in the services had expressed a desire to take vocational courses, about fifty per cent were unable to do so because of difficulties they had encountered on returning to civil life. Many had hoped to utilize service-acquired trades or skills, but few have realized their ambition. Of those employed less than half were found satisfied with the long-term prospects of their jobs.

That is not a very pleasant picture. It is one that should cause grave concern to every hon. member in this chamber.

No one needs to emphasize the fact that housing conditions throughout this country are deplorable. It is small satisfaction to the veteran to be told that people like himself are homeless in Russia and the United Kingdom. This country never suffered the ravages of war. But we are told that Canada has a housing scheme. I am afraid most of that scheme is on paper. The one thing lacking in it, but an essential part of it, is the small cottage or bungalow which it was set up to provide, the small cottage that the veteran so urgently needs to shelter his wife and children. This shortage of homes exists while stocks of materials lie idle in various parts of the country. Business blocks, hotels, factories and even theatres are being constructed while many ex-service men live in single rooms. The export of building materials continues, exports to the United States to provide luxury homes, while men who fought for the Canadian way of life go from house to house seeking shelter for their families.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that stocks of materials, whether held by government agencies or private concerns, should be immediately released for veterans' housing. We are facing a national emergency, and it must be treated as such until the needs of our own people are met. Numbers of houses located on small holdings under the Veterans Land Act stand uncompleted because of lack of finishing materials. The government should place an embargo on the export of all construction materials, except perhaps for housing in Britain, until the present situation is relieved.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just a word about land settlement. The settlement of veterans under the Veterans Land Act is anything but successful if figures released by the Department of Veterans Affairs are accurate. Under this act only some 1,800 veterans were actually established on farms in Canada by November 30, 1945, and certainly few would be settled during the winter months. Thousands of young men have been unable to procure farms under the act. Many veterans are becoming disgruntled and are either purchasing land with money borrowed at high rates of interest from private sources, or are seeking other fields of endeavour. Settlement under this act must be accelerated, or another season will slip by with veterans still standing in queues for the privilege of securing the bit of land which it has been their heart's desire to obtain.

The major reason for the slow settlement under the act is the inadequacy of the loan provided by the government for the purchase of farm land. Land prices now throughout the country are considerably inflated. In western Canada the economic farming unit is considered to be a minimum of 320 acres. At the present time it is doubtful if a half-section of land, even without buildings, can be purchased anywhere in the west for $4,800 or even $6,000, which sum may be provided under the act if no machinery is involved. Even if such land could be purchased at this figure, the veteran then would have the problem of obtaining construction materials for farm buildings.

I suggest that the loan be increased to $10,000, with an additional $3,000 allocated for farm equipment. This amount is not excessive, and would enable the veterans to settle in some of the better farming communities. It is not excessive, when one considers that the estimated cost of training a Royal Canadian Air Force pilot was $25,000. Surely Canada can afford to spend half as much to rehabilitate properly the same young man on his return to the civil occupation of his choice. Loans should be granted to veterans who desire to farm cooperatively. Veterans have been used to cooperating for their common advantage in the fighting services. They are used to comradeship, which the isolated farm unit does not always provide. The trend in farm operations everywhere is toward large, mechanized farm units. This is quite impossible for the beginner owing to the excessive cost of farm equipment, unless veterans are able to combine in a cooperative undertaking.

I question the policy of refusing permits to veterans desiring to settle in southern Saskatchewan on land generally classified by soil tests as sub-marginal. Not all the land in this area is poor. It is now recognized that a large part of that region can be profitably farmed. Much has been done in recent years by way of experimentation and improved farming methods in that area. Thousands of farmers are prospering throughout this district in southern Saskatchewan. During the war millions of tons of foodstuffs were produced there, and tens of millions of dollars were contributed by the farmers of that area to victory loans. Surely farm boys brought up in such localities would have better prospects of success on land with which they are familiar than on timber or bush lands of the north, where it appears to be the present plan to locate them.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McKAY: Mr. Speaker, I have been discussing the problems confronting veterans. I now wish to discuss briefly the matter of pensions. Many returned servicemen are dissatisfied with the handling of war pensions. A great injustice is caused veterans by the difficulty many have of proving eligibility for a pension. In no case should the onus of proving that a disability is associated with war service be upon the applicant for a war pension. If a member of the armed services was accepted as physically fit it should be assumed that he was fit unless the department of pensions can prove otherwise.

Furthermore, there should be an upward revision of the scale of pensions. A single veteran with 100 per cent disability receives no more than $75 a month, an amount totally inadequate to maintain a decent standard of living at present living costs. Why a private with complete disability should only receive $75 a month while a general requires $300 a month to live is difficult to understand, especially when one compares the service incomes of these individuals.

The government claims to be providing an adequate educational allowance for veterans attending our seats of higher learning. However, the situation of veterans at our universities with regard to maintenance allowances is becoming increasingly acute. As a result of a survey conducted by veterans associations in Saskatchewan, western Ontario and Queen's universities it was revealed that the average expenditure for a single veteran attending courses in these institutions was $90.90 a month. The maintenance grant provided by the government is $60 a month. The single veteran is therefore short $30.90 every month in meeting his normal expenses. The average expenditure for a married veteran was $123.89 a month, with a maintenance allowance from the government of $80 to offset this expenditure. Obviously a student attending a university under this plan must have a considerable amount in personal savings in order to carry on. Even so, few married veterans can continue an educational career with an average deficit of $43.89 every month, although they have some personal savings and gratuities from which to draw, and these veterans are not on the whole extravagant. According to data supplied by "Family income and expenditure in Canada 1937-38," plus the added cost of living as indicated by statistics issued in November, 1944, the average Canadian wage-earner with one child expended $135.43 a month, which is more by $5.22 than a veteran of the same marital status spent while attending the three universities surveyed. It has been suggested that veterans can obtain remunerative employment during the recess between terms and thus bolster their incomes. The probability of employment with fair wages for transient labour is becoming increasingly difficult. The expenses of a married veteran are fairly constant. He would be fortunate indeed to secure employment which would pay enough to keep him and his family, far less enable him to replenish his depleted savings.

When a student discontinues university training because his savings become exhausted his reestablishment credit will have been dissipated by absorption in educational benefits. Therefore, not only does the student lose his reestablishment credit, but the money provided by the government for his education is lost since the ends desired in the matter of rehabilitation will not have been achieved.

Several veterans associations have suggested that the maintenance grant for a single man be increased to $80 a month, with $100 monthly for married personnel; allowances for children to be arranged at service rates. I suggest to this house that this is the bare minimum and that it would be better still to continue service pay to the veteran while undergoing his training programme and until such time as he is established once again in a satisfactory civilian occupation.

I wish to appeal to the house at this time on behalf of the veterans of the first world war, particularly those who were settled under the old Soldier Settlement Act. Many of these older veterans of another war are still in debt to the treasury of this country. Is it too much to ask that this parliament cancel their indebtedness and grant these men a clear title to the land upon which they have laboured for more than a generation? This nation can well afford to be generous to these people who have contributed so much to this country. If Canada can cancel war debts of the United Kingdom, and veterans generaly commend this action, surely we can afford to cancel the few millions of dollars still outstanding against these early soldier settlers.

The lack of a business loan for veterans has caused real hardship and is one of the weaknesses of the government's rehabilitation programme. I do not believe it is too late yet to rectify this error. There should be provided for veterans business loans similar to those employed in the United States. Veterans setting up small businesses are obliged in many instances to negotiate loans with private companies at excessive rates of interest. This will definitely handicap the prospects of ultimate success of their business enterprise.

Finally, this parliament should give some thought to the plight of the many widows and dependents of men who made the supreme sacrifice. Some assistance should be provided by the government in order that these war victims might be able to provide themselves with homes.

On the way to parliament hill this morning, I was forcibly impressed by an attractive hand-painted sign over the door of a drab little home. A son was apparently about to return from overseas service. Many hon. members have seen such signs of welcome. It reads, "Welcome home, son; we are proud of you." Of course they in that little home were proud of their son. We should all be proud of such boys. But actions speak louder than words. What sort of reception does this lad often receive? He comes home to a dead-end street of unemployment where he has to beg for a job. He searches in vain to obtain shelter for his wife and family. If he is ill he frequently has to argue with the pension commissioners in order to secure an adequate pension for disabilities incurred while serving his country. Let us begin now to put into effect the words accredited during the first world war to Sir Robert Borden, "Our soldiers shall never want after fighting so gallantly." But I am sure our returning sons want action, not idle promises.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I can only hope that time will justify their optimism. I should like to endorse the speech that was made by my friend, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who leads this group, and also the speech made by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), which I think was an excellent one. But I did not wait until I reached the House of Commons before making public my ideas on espionage in Canada. I happened to be in Victoria when the news broke, and I wrote a letter to the press which has been published in various papers in this country and which I will now read:

> The existence of a "Communist Spy Ring" should surprise no one. To-day Marxian socialists, internationalists and other totalitarians occupy key positions in government, organized religion and education.
> The communist party is an organized concern with unlimited funds, directed by a permanent general staff, many of whom have been trained in Moscow in the arts of moulding the thoughts and actions of the workers.
> The communist party holds key positions in most labour unions, has infiltrated all channels of publicity. They have penetrated the teachers' federations, the theatre, all avenues of education, instruction and entertainment. That is true of every democratic country.
> The police are exposing not merely a ring of professional spies, but a nation-wide conspiracy inspired by Marxian socialists who, for years, have been undermining our Christian and democratic ways of life, thus threatening the sovereign rights and freedoms of Canada.

Only a few weeks ago the Canadian Soviet friendship council (one among the fifth column identified by the police) held mass meetings across Canada which were sponsored by the leaders of church, state and business.

For years columnists and commentators of press and radio, the "Red Network", directed by the "Hidden Hand" of world bolshevism, have been poisoning the minds of Canadians with anti-Christian, anti-democratic propaganda without let or hindrance.

I do not blame the Russian government for carrying on this espionage. I continue to quote:

It is the men entrusted with the safety and welfare of church and state, and not their underlings, who must be held responsible for the existence of "Communist Spy Rings" composed of men and women who have been systematically taught by socialists that Christianity has failed, that patriotism and loyalty are national vices, and treason a virtue.

That, I maintain, is no exaggeration of the situation in Canada to-day.

Nobody has mentioned the fact, the amazing fact to me, that we practically had to apologize before we arrested the enemies of this country. Nobody has remarked on the equally remarkable fact that, so far as we are told, no arrest of spies has been made in the United States and only one, I believe, in the United Kingdom. Are we to suppose that there are no spies in the United States? Or are we to suppose that their police arrest them and that they then disappear without anybody's knowledge? Or are we to suppose that this communist movement has become so powerful that its adherents can defy the police and government authorities? It must be one of these three things, and from what I have read in United States papers the fact is that the control exercised by these people is such that so far they have carried on with impunity.

Criticism has been made, I believe, of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the first place, coupled with the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) also the mounted police or, if you like, the police commissioner. Nobody hates tyranny more than I do, but I think those people who have criticized the steps taken by the Department of Justice and the police have failed to realize the dangers that face us. Surely everybody knows that the honest Canadian need have not the slightest fear of either the Minister of Justice or of the police or of the commissioner. To-day in Canada no honest Canadian need fear the Department of Justice, and might I add that that cuts both ways, that the Minister of Justice and the commissioner of police need fear no honest Canadian.

Let me quote two statements by two of the world's great men. The first is a very short one by his holiness the Pope, from an encyclical by Pope Pius XI on "Atheist Communism". These are his words:

No one who would save Christian civilization may collaborate with it in any undertaking whatsoever. Those who permit themselves to be deceived into lending their aid towards the triumph of communism in their own country will be the first to fall victims of their error.

Then we have this statement which was written by Winston Churchill just prior to the war. It is taken I believe from his book, "Great Contemporaries". He says:

Communism is not only a creed. It is a plan of campaign. A communist is not only the holder of certain opinions; he is the pledged adept of a well-thought-out means of enforcing them. The anatomy of discontent and revolution has been studied in every phase and aspect, and a veritable drill book prepared in a scientific spirit for subverting all existing institutions. The method of enforcement is as much a part of the communist faith as the doctrine itself. At first the time-honoured principles of liberalism and democracy are invoked to shelter the infant organism. Free speech, the right of public meeting, every form of lawful political agitation and constitutional right are paraded and asserted. Alliance is sought with every popular movement towards the left.

The creation of a mild Liberal or Socialist regime in some period of convulsion is the first milestone. But no sooner has this been created than it is to be overthrown. Woes and scarcity resulting from confusion must be exploited. Collisions, if possible attended with bloodshed, are to be arranged between the agents of the New Government and the working people. Martyrs are to be manufactured. An apologetic attitude in the rulers should be turned to profit. No faith need be, indeed may be, kept with non-communists. Every act of good will, of tolerance, of conciliation, of mercy, of magnanimity on the part of governments or statesmen is to be utilized for their ruin. Then when the time is ripe and the moment opportune, every form of lethal violence from mob revolt to private assassination must be used without stint or compunction. The citadel will be stormed under the banners of liberty and democracy; and once the apparatus of power is in the hands of the brotherhood, all opposition, all contrary opinions must be extinguished by death. Democracy is but a tool to be used and afterwards broken, liberty but a sentimental folly unworthy of the logician. The absolute rule of a self-chosen priesthood, according to the dogmas it has learnt by rote, is to be imposed upon mankind without mitigation, progressively forever. All this, set out in prosy textbooks, written also in blood in the history of several powerful nations, is the communists' faith and purpose. To be forewarned should be forearmed.

And then, to those who think that the Prime Minister took a liberty or a risk when action was started in this espionage case, there is quite a pertinent editorial in the Saturday Evening Post. It is headed, "Is it immoral to trip up a spy?"

> When the Canadians could no longer keep the well-known secret that Soviet agents had long been operating on this hemisphere, former ambassador Joe Davies rushed up to declare that Stalin had a "moral right" to spy upon America because America has the atom-bomb secret and Russia, so far as is known, hasn't... One could point out that Joe Davies, who endorsed Stalin's murders of thousands of Russians without trial, is an odd man to mention morals in this connection, particularly as it seems not to have occurred to him that, if Russia has a moral right to steal our secrets, we have a moral right to prevent her from stealing them. Furthermore, officials in this or the Canadian government have a moral duty to protect the interests and security of their country, and not use government time to think up excuses for other nations' spies.

The mention of Mr. Davies and the Moscow trials reminds me of a statement which I put on Hansard a few years ago. In July, 1943, I called attention to a letter which had been recently published in the New York Times dealing with a motion picture called "Mission to Moscow". I quoted a letter which was signed by Mr. John Dewey and Suzanne LaFollette, who were the chairman and secretary of an international commission that went to examine into the Moscow trials. In the light of what has happened since, this letter is certainly prophetic. I will read only the first and last paragraphs:

> The film "Mission to Moscow" is the first instance in our country of totalitarian propaganda for mass consumption—propaganda which falsifies history through distortion, omission or pure invention of facts, and whose effect can only be to confuse the public in its thought and its loyalty. . . . The film is anti-British, anti-congress, anti-democratic and anti-truth. It deepens that crisis in morals which is the fundamental issue in the modern world. . . . "Mission to Moscow" is a major defeat for the democratic cause. In putting out this picture the producers, far from rendering the patriotic service on which Mr. Davies compliments them, have assailed the very foundations of freedom. For truth and freedom are indivisible, as Hitler knew when he expounded his method of confusing public opinion through propaganda. The picture "Mission to Moscow" makes skilful use of the Hitler technique. To quote Matthew Low of the New Leader, "This kind of 'truth' is on the march, and God help us if nothing can stop it."

Mention has been made, I believe by the Prime Minister, quoting the judges who are investigating the activities of these alleged spies, that the accused excuse themselves for their spying on the ground that their loyalties are not inside this country, their loyalties are outside; and I say that the reason for that is very largely the propaganda which has been put over by every possible means for the past many years to confuse the people in their loyalties. I have repeatedly in this house protested against it. I can only say that I got very little support either inside or outside the house; in fact I might say that there has been great deal more sympathy shown to the spies than to those who have tried to enlighten public opinion on this dangerous situation. Three years ago this next week I called attention to a statement which was made by a well-known editor in this country, Mr. Sandwell. He said—at least he is reported to have said—at a meeting of the league of nations society in this very building, though not in this chamber:

> A supranational authority with power to settle questions of immigration, natural resources, treatment of minorities, repudiation of debts, finance, etc. To bring about Canada's acceptance of the new "authority" it would be necessary to bring all the people to a diminution of their loyalty to the crown by substituting a new loyalty to an authority wider than Canada, than the British commonwealth of nations, or all the democracies together.

When I called attention to this in this chamber and asked if that were not treason, I was greeted with either ridicule or jeers from one end of Canada to the other. I say that these few spies who have been caught in the net are not the danger; it is not these few men, misguided as they are, who constitute our danger; the danger is that these opinions are shared by, I should not like to say how many, but altogether too many Canadians in this country. Their loyalty is no longer to Canada but to something outside the country, something outside the British empire, outside democracy. It is the direct result of a lying propaganda which has been used in every possible way to confuse the loyalties and the thoughts of the Canadian people.

Now a few words about the idea of a world government, of which we have heard so much in the past few years. Both Lenin and Stalin have declared that "the prolonged existence of the Soviet republic side by side with the imperialist states is unthinkable and in the end either one or the other will be victorious, and until this happens a series of terrible conflicts between the Soviet republic and the bourgeois states is inevitable." What is the result? What has been the big idea, these past many years, if it is not the dissolution of the British empire—because there are three great powers in the world to-day. There is the British empire; there is the United States of America, and there is the U.S.S.R. How, then, is it possible or conceivable that a world government can be made up of these two contrasting ideologies? Has anyone ever read a statement by Premier Stalin or any other Russian indicating that they have any intention of surrendering one atom of their sovereignty to any world government? No. All the surrendering has been done by the others. There has been appeasement, and the idea has been to drive a wedge between different members of the British empire, destroy their strength, and then drive a wedge between them and the United States. Thus there would be only two to decide the issue.

That cuts both ways. Can one wonder that Premier Stalin and the Russians are suspicious of the rest of the world, the bourgeois states, as he calls them, or the imperialist states? Imperialism is of course another word for anti-communism. Can one wonder that they are suspicious when we are doing all we can to spread the idea of one world government? They know very well that government will never be theirs; that is, if we can prevent it. It will never be from Moscow, and is it not only natural therefore that they should think that before there can be a world government the power of Moscow will have to be eliminated? Do we not fear exactly the same thing? Is not that what it has come to? What else was the reason for Churchill's speech at Fulton? I heard the speech; Mr. Churchill was speaking beyond the shadow of a doubt, if not with the approval of the government of Great Britain, with that of the majority of the people in the old country; and beyond question he spoke with the full approval of the President of the United States.

If you sum that all up in one sentence you can say that Churchill made this statement: If we do not hang together we shall hang separately. That is where the idea of a one world government has brought us, to the verge of a third world war. That is the position we are in to-day. Had we kept to the Atlantic charter and guaranteed all countries their sovereign freedom, then no country would be afraid of any other. But that was where the tragic mistake was made. What happened when the President of the United States and Mr. Churchill stepped off their battleship? Why was that charter torn up? Who tore it up? That is something we have never been told.

One thing is certain, that no people in the world to-day wants war. The British people do not want it; the American people do not want it; the Russian people do not want it and never did want it. We have had two wars. Why are we faced with a third? Because there are people who are determined upon world power, and in order to get it there will be another war and another after that until there is only one power left on earth. That is what we face.

I would not for a moment accuse anyone—I would not name anyone—of deliberately helping that along. I am quite willing to believe that the majority of the world's people have been frightened into the conviction, by these horrible stories of atomic bombs and so forth, that they have been put into a frame of mind where they are willing to surrender everything they have, including their liberties, in order to prevent another war. But that will not prevent it. There are people, whose names perhaps will come to light, who are and have been for a long time deliberately plotting and planning just that thing.

I said that the big idea has been to eliminate the British empire, using, as an excuse Greece or Palestine or India or some other place. Always the socialist is against British action and British control. I remember a year ago last Christmas when Britain was having trouble to keep order in Greece. I was, I believe, the only member of this house who publicly made a statement endorsing the British action. For that I was abused more than these spies have been abused. I was the subject of an abusive editorial in the Citizen, for instance, because I said that very thing.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation at their national convention a year ago last Christmas or thereabouts issued a statement, which was published in the press, that they condemned British action in Greece, saying that Canadians were not dying to restore discredited governments or reactionary monarchs. When the representative of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation was over in London at the united nations organization conference he had the great pleasure of hearing Mr. Bevin call Mr. Vishinsky "a damn liar" for using those very words.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh no.

Mr. JAQUES: Yes, he did.

Mr. COLDWELL: Quite different.

Mr. JAQUES: Exactly the same.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Bevin did not say he would restore discredited monarchs or discredited governments; quite a different thing.

Mr. JAQUES: I shall not mention Palestine because I intend to make some further remarks on that country later on. Then we have the Argentine. At the peace conference in San Francisco the admission of the Argentine was opposed by I do not know how many people, but I know it was opposed by the leader of the C.C.F. party.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. JAQUES: I will tell you why, because the Argentine is not a communist government. That is the real reason.

An hon. MEMBER: Fascists.

Mr. JAQUES: We now have the proof of what I say. They have had a perfectly democratic election without bloodshed. It was in perfect order and they have elected the government they wanted. That is their business, not ours, may I say, unless we want to bring about another war. So it is with Spain. I hold no brief for Spain, but I believe that the Spanish people are perfectly capable of running their own affairs. Whatever one may say about Spain or the Spanish people, they never interfered with us during the late war. I know I have heard them accused—

Mr. COLDWELL: They tried to.

Mr. JAQUES: I have heard them accused of certain things, but when you consider the position in which the Spanish government found themselves when only the British empire stood against the might of Germany and all Europe was overrun by Hitler, do you think it was any great sin, for the Spanish government to play along with Hitler to the extent that they did in order to preserve their own people?

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.

Mr. JAQUES: They did not do anything to us.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JAQUES: Where was the C.C.F. when Britain stood alone against the might of Germany? What did the C.C.F. say? "Not a man overseas".

Mr. PROBE: At that time members of the C.C.F. were in the armed forces.

Mr. BENTLEY: Our boys were over there.

Mr. JAQUES: "Not a man overseas"; not before Russia came into it.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is a lie.

Mr. JAQUES: It is true.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must call the attention of hon. members to standing order 34, which reads as follows:

> Every member desiring to speak is to rise in his place, uncovered, and address himself to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. JAQUES: I heard the B.B.C. broadcast last night. I hope what they said is not true, and coming from the B.B.C. it may very well not be true. When I was over in England two years ago I heard that the B.B.C. was a sort of code name for Beelzebub's Brethren Calling.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what Hitler said.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, he was not far out. However, I was going to say a word on behalf of General Mihailovich, who, I am sorry to say, has been captured. I know the stories that have been told; I know the other side, too. Let me quote a statement of the British ambassador to Yugoslavia, which is good enough for me. What did he say?

> All the accusations of the partisans that Mihailovich is a fascist, collaborating with the occupational forces, are completely unfounded, and spring entirely from the efforts of the partisans to blacken Mihailovich among the Serbian population, and frustrate him when the moment comes to seize power in the country. General Mihailovich from the beginning of the struggle has loyally collaborated with the allies and no one can doubt his loyalty as an ally or as the representative in the country of the Yugoslav government.

That is the statement of the British ambassador with regard to General Mihailovich. If he has been captured I suppose he has not long to live and I should like to pay that tribute to a gallant and honourable man.

Before I resume my seat I should like to make an appeal if I may. An appeal has been made on behalf of Canadian unity. I should like to appeal to French and English, Catholic and Protestant, to unite in their loyalty to the truth. Let us be true to ourselves and we can be false to no man. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): May I commence my contribution to this debate by offering my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I must say I was surprised at some of the praise they had for the government, but perhaps that is understandable. I was also particularly interested in one reference which the mover of the motion made to the four freedoms of the Atlantic charter, and I should like to refer to it later on in this debate.

Turning to the business of the government, after listening to the speech from the throne I was reminded of my one and only meeting with Sir Robert Borden, that illustrious Canadian whose record is written in the annals of this house. It was on an occasion when Sir Robert was exchanging some money. He had reason to complain of the rate of exchange which he was receiving, just as to-day we may have reason to complain about the rate of exchange we receive when we purchase United States dollars. Sir Robert Borden said, "Well, what can I do? A corporation has no body to be kicked and no soul to be damned." After listening to the reply of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he dealt with the speech by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and when he defended the failures of the government's policies, I would venture to suggest that we can now say that "the government has no body to be kicked and no soul to be damned." I say this chiefly because of the inadequacy of the replies that have been made up to the present time. Those who were present when the leader of the opposition spoke will remember that he challenged the government on several issues. So far, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) have replied; but this house and the country still have to hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) on major policies which may be proposed by this government.

When the Prime Minister replied to the remarks of the leader of the opposition it struck me, as a young member of this house, that it was hardly right for him to say he had expected one big blast. Personally I would say he was not disappointed; but he went on to ask the leader of the opposition to confine himself to one topic, though when challenged on that subject he admitted that the leader of the opposition had a right in this debate, to discuss anything at all of interest in the country. I must say, too, that I felt it was rather inadequate for him to say, "Well, all you may say is true, but still Canada is better off than any other nation." I felt that it was a negative approach. When there was so much more that could be done I felt it would have been better had he said "We are glad to have your suggestions," or " We can do more."

Turning first to the Department of Labour, that department which is so much in the public eye in the United States of America and which hangs in some ways like the sword of Damocles over our fate in Canada in regard to reconversion, I should like to point out again to this house just what has been proposed. We suggested that a dominion-provincial labour conference be called at the earliest possible moment. The leader of the opposition drew a distinction between a labour conference to clear up a legislative difficulty created by the British North America Act and a conference such as that dealing with the taxation problems which are under discussion at the present time. He pointed out the necessity of having such a conference, the necessity of the federal government giving the provincial governments some lead in their own labour legislation so that the Provinces will be better able to deal with the problems now confronting them. He called for the relaxation of wage controls on the lower wage groups because, as every hon. member knows, the lowering of the wages of the working men, while prices have remained the same or tended on the whole to be inflated, has created a hardship and has actually lowered their standard of living. I am sure the working man would prefer to see a slight inflation in prices, a slight rise in the cost of living, and have the ceiling taken off his wages in order that he might get a better return for his efforts.

Then I come to immigration. The leader of the opposition called attention to a report No. F-4, called, "The Future Population of Canada", by one of the government's own agencies, and traced for us the growth in Canada's population as this report sees it, showing that by the year 2,000 Canada will have reached the magnificent total of some fifteen million and that thenceforth her population will decline. I would recall to the house the remark of the leader of the opposition in that connection: "I do not believe that Canada's future is limited by any such narrow horizon." Neither do I believe we are limited by an such narrow horizon, especially when I read in the Letter-Review of March 25:

> Emigration from Britain to Australia is being actively encouraged by the United Kingdom and Australian governments. There will be free passages for all service men and merchant navy personnel, assisted passages for others approved. Migrants will be given rights under social security plans, but will not receive service preference for employment for seven years. No limit is set on the number to move during the next two years.

The same review points out:

> Canada, meanwhile, has no immigration policy, and lack of a policy means exclusion.

This is only one class of immigration. What of the others? What of those Canadian girls who are engaged to men of the allied armed services, those men now prohibited from coming to Canada because of our immigration laws? What of the families of Canadian citizens who cannot leave Europe to seek the protection of their own people here, their own Canadian blood relatives who will guarantee to support them? This country needs an immigration policy, and the sooner we have one the better. We have had no reply from the Minister of Mines and Resources or from the Minister of Labour on either of these points.

One other question remains unanswered. If I recall correctly, the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) has failed to say how persons of doubtful loyalty were selected for positions of trust in the civil service and in the armed forces.

Turning from these criticisms for a moment, I should like to point out that when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke in this debate he proposed policies for agriculture, for reconversion, for full production to relieve unemployment; he seemed to me to agree with the policy we suggested in regard to the loan for Britain, on the handling of the espionage case and the cases of the civil servants who are now being held. For perhaps the first time in the history of this house the hon. gentleman agreed with the majority of the policies set forth by the leader of the opposition; and as a new member I must say I was glad to see that for once the official opposition had to bear blows from only one side, where previously we have withstood attacks from our left and from our right. This time there seems to be some measure of agreement, which I think is an indication to the government that the united opinion on this side of the house calls for more positive action to adopt the suggested policies. So I hope they will do something about the major recommendations that have been made. Our only difference with our friends to the left was on the subject of controls, and I have something I should like to say on that matter to-night. The leader of the opposition has analysed the causes of inflation. He has stated them briefly to be increased savings and shortages of goods. I think most of us will agree that these are fundamental causes. He has recommended as a relief from inflation the removal of price controls as rapidly as possible, the removal of these controls which were useful to us in war time in channeling our production effort toward the services and goods needed for the armed forces and for the prosecution of the war, but some of which in peace time operate against the laws of production. Therefore the best method of encouraging production, as well as relieving unemployment, is full-out production. We must be relieved of these controls as rapidly as it is economically possible to abolish them. As another example of the necessity of reducing controls as quickly as possible I should like to quote from a pamphlet which is issued as a reprint from the March issue of the Board of Trade Journal. I shall quote just one or two items, the first being:

Canada's urgent need to-day is to cut out controls and promote production.

Canada must choose—and should choose soon—in order to establish the standard of living she wants. We have two choices:

1—Large production and full employment; or

2.—Small output, and unemployment, due to price ceilings and wages control.

That is published as the opinion of an executive of the board of trade, a member of an industrial commission and the president of one of the largest corporations in Canada. It is men like him who should know. Another extract reads:

Unless present costs including somewhat higher wages are covered by new sale prices the result will be smaller and smaller "take-home" pay for our workers which no "rate increase" can recover.

Finally it says:

Business and private employers always provide the lion's share of employment and even in the period when governments were doing their greatest spending for relief and public works, wages provided by private employers were many times those paid out by governments. Yet, to-day present policies practically prevent industry from proceeding freely with enterprise and production which will solve unemployment problems.

Full production with its accompanying maximum employment is Canada's primary need to-day, and involves freedom from controls and a complete and immediate return to peace-time business.

It is high time that the war-time mentality of our authorities was obliterated and that the control of prices and wages was lifted.

I turn for a moment to reconstruction and housing, two pressing problems which face this country. The leader of the opposition has criticized the fact that veterans and the wage-earning groups are suffering the most from the housing shortage. He has proposed a remedy, a remedy which the government has tried in part to meet. These are the things he has recommended: coordination of government agencies; government cooperation with provincial and municipal authorities; government cooperation with private builders, and the relaxation of those controls which are holding up the production of the necessary fixtures.

The Minister of Reconstruction told us that during 1945 that a total of 44,000 houses were built in Canada, but he could not say what proportion of those had been built by the government. I am not aware of any government housing objectives for 1946, but we have some indication of the limitations of any government programme if it should be announced. We have reliable reports from the industry itself that 35,000 houses will be the maximum which can be built, and that, with the supply of fixtures being what it is, we shall be lucky to get 25,000. What we need is anywhere from 70,000 to 100,000 houses in this first year. We need the boldest action that the government can take on this most urgent problem.

It is the duty of the government within the shortest possible space of time to outline their programme and to call in the other cooperating authorities and put the strength of this nation behind the solving of the housing crisis. The Minister of Reconstruction when he answered the leader of the opposition made several references to reconversion, but he could not reply fully to one thing the leader of the opposition said. The leader of the opposition pointed out that in May, 1945, the Minister of Reconstruction had said that reconversion was fifty per cent finished in Canada. Nine months later this same minister said that Canada's reconversion job was fifty per cent done. What did the Minister of Reconstruction say in his reply? In one part of his speech he said:

> For a time I was pleased with the rate of expansion. To-day I am rather alarmed by it. It seems to me that the expansion is coming too rapidly.

Unless this country can have more positive action on the problem of housing and reconversion I suggest that the minister's three statements make strange reading.

I should like to turn now for a moment to the question of exports and the policy outlined by the Minister of Reconstruction. I am no expert in this field, but I think one thing we should keep in mind in Canada is that we should not commit the economy of this country to a policy which will make it increasingly economically vulnerable to tariff barriers and economic nationalism as practised by other countries. I mention this because I feel that in many ways the government must be aware of it. There is an article which appeared on page 29 of Time of January 28, 1946, which shows that other countries in this hemisphere are aware of the advantages of economic nationalism as have been demonstrated by the high tariff barriers of the United States and by the extremely efficient economy of the nazi state prior to the war. Here is what Time says in reporting on Latin American and South American actions:

> Most important of all, the republics set to work to make what they could no longer import. Argentines shipped fewer hides, turned them into finished leather goods themselves. Chilians proudly looked for the label "Fabricacion Chilena" on their tires, even though the rubber and cotton material still had to be shipped in. In Brazil's San Paulo alone, 300 new firms grew up during one year, to make such further import stand-bys as cotton and wool yarns, rayon, rails, leather goods, cellophane, ceramic and chemical products.
> What the advocates of economic nationalism had accomplished was not a patch on what they planned. "The Latin Americans," said the commerce department's George Wythe, author of the current and authoritative "Industry in Latin America," "have gone hog-wild for industrialization."
> Almost every country had its blueprint. One of the best was Fomento's (Chilean government planning and financing corporation), sparked by vigorous Oscar Gajardo. Fomento had already spent $110,000,000; expected to put $140,000,000 more into economic landscaping this year. Its comprehensive plan reaches from steel to oil, from cattle to fish canning.

All I wish to do is to call the attention of the government to the tendency toward economic nationalism which is evident in the Americas, and which has been practised in Europe, and to point out its dangers to us unless we so guide the economy of this country that we do not become economically vulnerable to countries which can close out our products at will.

I turn now to the speech from the throne. The mover (Mr. Viau) of the motion mentioned the Atlantic charter and the four freedoms. Just to refresh the memories of hon. members, may I say that the four freedoms are freedom from want, freedom from fear, freedom of speech and freedom of worship. The mover is a returned soldier, and as a returned airman I wish to second his remarks in bringing us back to fundamentals and his insistance that we keep our eye on the ball in what we are trying to do here. Another good soldier spoke on these fundamentals this month, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, former prime minister of Great Britain. When he spoke at Fulton, Missouri, on March 5 last he showed that he, too, had his eye on the ball and kept in mind the fundamental course which this house should follow. He spoke of the necessity to prevent war and tyranny, poverty and privation and of our need to preserve freedom of speech and freedom of thought. But he is not the only one who has spoken on the same subject. Time Magazine of February 25 last says at page 43, when it reports a clerical opinion; that:

> "Injustice, poverty, disease, and squalor are increasing and spreading. Cruelty is becoming normal, and sadism is as virulent and as contagious to the mind as typhus is to the body. . . .
> "Formerly, statesmen tried for balance of power to keep peace among nations; now some statesmen have swung to the theory that monopolies of power may be solutions to world peace. . . . It would certainly be a mighty advance if human beings could regard other human beings, not as pawns in a game, but as individuals with sacred rights to life and liberty."

Only democracy seems to offer this hope to mankind at large, the opportunity to regain their Christian concept of human dignity and worth.

The thing that challenges us here and challenges men in all governments and in all parliaments of the world is how to proceed to bring about better conditions which will offer greater hope to the peoples of this world. I would suggest that the answer is to be found in Mr. Churchill's speech on March 5 at Fulton. But first let me go back in years and call attention to the history of the British navy, a navy which helped to keep peace in the world during the century prior to 1914. It was its dominance of the sea lanes and the fact that both Britain and America sought trade, and not war. They were keeping the sea lanes open for commerce. Had Great Britain or the United States been aggressive, warlike nations, their two navies during the past century undoubtedly would have clashed, but they were both dominated by the same thought, that by keeping the sea lanes open for commerce they would produce a better livelihood for all and would raise the standard of living of all the peoples of the world. We can bring the same idea down to our own communities by showing the necessity for law enforcement. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that but for law enforcement we would to-day be barricading our homes or building walls around our industry. We might be unable to trade at all. Mr. Churchill showed a solution when he said:

> I have, however, a definite and practical proposal to make for action. Courts and magistrates cannot function without sheriffs and constables. The united nations organization must immediately begin to be equipped with an international armed force. In such a matter we can only go step by step; but we must begin now. I propose that each of the powers and states should be invited to dedicate a certain number of air squadrons to the service of the world organization. These squadrons would be trained and prepared in their own countries but would move around in rotation from one country to another. They would wear the uniform of their own countries with different badges. They would not be required to act against their own nation but in other respects they would be directed by the world organization. This might be started on a modest scale and grow as confidence grew. I wished to see this done after the first world war and trust it may be done forthwith.

As an airman I have flown over a good part of this world and I have a realization of how small it is. Mr. Willkie has given us a lead as to the size of the world to-day when he said:

> Continents and oceans are plainly only parts of a whole, seen, as I have seen them, from the air. England and America are parts. Russia and China, Egypt, Syria and Turkey, Iraq and Iran are also parts. And it is inescapable that there can be no peace for any part of the world unless the foundations of peace are made secure throughout all parts of the world.

With all the force that I have I endorse the suggestion that Mr. Churchill made that we should start law enforcement throughout the world to-day, on a small scale, not so large that any country could say it was an aggressive force. But let us have the beginning, the nucleus, just as the British navy had its beginning in policing the world and played such a part in keeping the peace and expanding the trade of all nations.

I conclude by quoting again from Mr. Churchill:

> Our supreme task and duty is to guard the homes of the common people from the horrors of another war.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my remarks are going to be short this evening. Last session in my first speech I made the remark that coming here as a newcomer and an industrial worker this institution had for me an air of unreality, and that it was operating in a vacuum. I did not know at the time whether I had made a mistake or not in so describing it, but the more I have seen of it the more I realize that my first impression was right. We dealt on an international plane with such things as atomic energy—a beautiful phrase—it was to be used for the benefit of all mankind, but since that date we have had to arrest some of our leading scientists who have been dealing with atomic energy.

In the United States a great many scientists are quitting in disgust because all the research is going into the bomb, not into peace-time uses for atomic energy. More and more the state is interfering with and hindering the development of science. We are rapidly moving into the conditions of which we accused the nazis. At one time Great Britain and Canada were so sure of themselves that they could allow all the world to come in and witness what they are doing. We knew that our modern technology could keep us far ahead of the other fellow. But now there is a different set of conditions; we are frightened of the things we are creating. One thing I notice—and we can disregard the political set-up for the moment—atomic energy developed in Russia will not upset any capital structure, but atomic energy developed in this country is apt to upset too many people's apple-carts, and they want to keep it down. I am not so much interested in the political set-up or the words of men; I am interested in the development of science and what occurs in human society as that development continues. In the United States scientists are afraid that we are heading toward a military dictatorship.

We also joined in the Bretton Woods agreement. Since that time Russia has had to go her own way and has been making bilateral agreements with all the border states. It is what is called the barter system of trading; bookkeeping is all that takes place; the great god gold does not interfere; there is no necessity of three per cent interest, for everything is settled with goods. Great Britain also signed the Bretton Woods agreement; but since then, through sheer necessity, she has been forced to enter into the same trading arrangements as Russia did, namely, to set up bilateral trade agreements throughout Europe on the bloc basis. Lord Keynes said when he was in New York that if Britain did not get the loan they would have to adopt the bloc system. In spite of the Bretton Woods agreement they still have to use it. It is a method which will yet be developed more widely on the international scale; we are not going to be tied to this great thing called gold. Mutual Aid is a system which worked perfectly well during the war in the form of lend-lease, and we shall have to return to it and do away with interest rates. I say, therefore, that in spite of the acts of men, in spite of our attempts to put humpty-dumpty back on the wall, the development of natural laws forces men in certain directions whether they like it or not.

When we were previously assembled in this house we dealt with certain internal problems of Canada. For example, we discussed veterans houses. We spent days arguing about it. The government hedged this way and that; "oh, it was a difficult problem; we were short of lumber; we were short of soil pipe", and everything else. The mayor of Vancouver went back and forth across the dominion; the dominion government sent wires back and forth about using the hotel Vancouver; it was owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway company, and these men, they thought, wanted to destroy it. There was that great god, private property. Then all of a sudden the ex-servicemen marched into the building and occupied it, and we had to recognize the act. After spending days here wasting our time, these men solved the question in a few minutes.

We also spent days in arguing the discharge system, how we should allot discharge points to the men overseas, and so on. The air force went on a sit-down strike, and according to Maclean's magazine it was this act which made the government come out with the discharge policy—not any act which was performed here, but the simple act of the men sitting down. It gives me great pride that I belonged to the air force and that I was a Joe.

Mr. MITCHELL: Was my hon. friend overseas in the air force?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I was in this country, and do not start casting aspersions because I stayed in this country.

In human society forces adjust themselves. If governing bodies do not administer laws in the interest of mankind, social forces adjust themselves just as forces do in nature. When a volcano has to blow, it blows, to relieve the pressure and adjust the equilibrium. That is what happens in human society. I have heard it stated on numberless occasions in this house that we must have laws, that we should respect them, and all that sort of thing, and lawyers here spend hours of time in expressing that point of view. Yet when a government cannot be respected because it is not administering the laws in the interest of the people, the only method open to the workers of this country is direct action. That is what it comes to, without plotting or planning just spontaneously; so do not start looking for red herrings under bushes.

I should like to deal for a moment with this spy scare. It is a very opportune thing for the government that it came at this time, because of the weakness of the speech from the throne; the resultant publicity has hidden the real issue, which is the speech itself. I look on this spy scare with a rather jaundiced look, I will frankly admit. The labour movement has had so many things happen to it; for instance, the Zinoviev letter in Britain, shortly after the first war, which put the Conservatives in power and threw labour out because they were supposed to be hooked up with a red bogey. In this country, in 1940, in Saskatchewan a man by the name of Mr. Schneider was in a concentration camp because he had sympathies with the nazis. Of course, when the federal elections came on and he was needed in the election he was released during the election to help the Liberal party, and then he went back into the concentration camp again. We also had communists running around this country sabotaging the war effort: some were thrown into gaol and some hid themselves. However, when it became politically opportune for them to come out and split the labour vote, out they came under a new name, the L.P.P., and they were legal then. Just change your name and you are legal. They served their purpose. I would say to the government, I only hope that when you release the members of this political party once again, if they do go to gaol, you do it with a little more finesse next time. This is the kind of thing that goes on in the name of law and order; how can one respect them or reconcile such acts with the ethics by which we are supposed to be guided? I listen to fine phrases expressed in this house, but I know that when an election comes on I have to have a hatchet up my back, or I am going to "get it." The duality of the thing is what gets me; you use fine phrases here, but when an election comes you will use any weapon you can lay your hands on.

I should like to speak for a moment on the economic problems facing this country. I come from a frontier area, Skeena. Twenty-five or fifty years ago a Liberal regime would have had railroads going in there; townsites would have been laid out, land booms going on, and developments of all kinds. I should like to know what has happened to the Liberals. They have grown old. Where are the Jim Hills and the Sir Henry Thorntons? They are not with us any more. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) came to Prince Rupert years ago and he could see hotels and drydocks and shops and everything else. Well, there is a big wheat elevator there; it was built before an election, and it is empty. There is a great big drydock there, run by the Canadian National Railways, and it is empty. I have been trying since last September to get a statement from the government on that situation. Good workers have been fired, scattered all over the country, forced into the cities where unemployment is acute. Also in Prince Rupert we have plenty of houses and skilled workers but no policy. The drydock is there; the men are there and the tools are there to do the job. Had the work been done, it would have relieved the housing shortage to the south and at the same time it would have built up something for the country. The poor C.N.R! I sometimes think it is like the Missouri mule, without pride of ancestry or hope of posterity.

When you approach the government they tell you to go to the C.N.R., and when you go to the C.N.R. they tell you to go to the government. I know what is behind it. That institution exists simply as a butt for the C.P.R., so that we can spend our time criticizing the C.N.R. I post a letter in Jasper to Vancouver. The letter is taken off in Kamloops, held up a couple of hours and put on the C.P.R. That is what you call efficiency under the economy of our railway system. The same thing applies to the whole north country.

We have a railway problem across the north from Winnipeg right into the Peace River. When I was young and in my prime I went and filed on a homestead in Fort St. John. Thank goodness, I had enough sense to come out or I would still have been up there and I would have been in very poor shape. Those poor people went there and lived in sod huts in the middle of a side hill or in log shanties, through the cracks of which they could look at the scenery in all directions. They put up with that condition, half frozen, believing, as had been promised, that a railway would be built to the coast. They spent a lifetime hacking out brush and there are now hundreds of homesteads completely deserted. The life work of men and women, as well as human lives, has been sacrificed, just because of an empty political promise. That is all it meant to governments, but human lives were at stake. Some day the government will have to measure up to its responsibility.

From Prince George to Prince Rupert we have what is known as the Skeena highway. Election after election you would see men with a few picks and axes up there chopping another ten yards and then they would drop it. All of a sudden Japan entered the war and started coming down the Aleutian chain, and then the government put in steam shovels, pouring in the material, with the result that the highway went through. Thank goodness, the war lasted long enough to serve that purpose. Since that time the road has been completely plugged with snow so that nobody can use it. Between Havelton and Terrace there is a stretch of twenty miles forming a C.N.R. right of way. What happens? The dominion government picks up the whole problem in connection with the highway and hands it over to the province, saying, "There it is". Well, people cannot use that stretch because it is a C.N.R. right of way. You cannot drive trucks over it. The result is that the provincial authorities throw it back to the federal government while we are sitting in the middle looking at it.

It is absolutely useless under the present set-up. This work was done as a result of the necessities of war, and it could be used, because the people need it and would like to enjoy the benefits of it. But they cannot. It is a pity there are not more of us up there. Then we could drive trucks through, and the government would see something such as happened in connection with the ex-servicemen in Vancouver. Unfortunately, there are not enough of us and I have to make an appeal here.

To-day transportation is the whole keynote of development in the west. You talk about food going to Europe. There are millions of acres there which could be settled; but two or three years from now we might have a glut on the market and prices would fall, and my hon. friends do not like that. Again, if we went into that development it might result in too much money being put into circulation and the banks would not like it. It is a tragic situation, and it seems that the human element is of no consequence.

There is something else to be considered. The government is spending more on larger navies, armies and so on, in a day of atomic warfare, buzz bombs and all the rest of it, but not enough attention is being paid to the economic side of it. We all know that we won this war because of our productive effort; we won the war because we smashed the productive effort of the enemy. Without decentralizing industry, in a period such as this—if the government believes in preparedness, as seemingly it does—we are building up a larger army, navy and air force, which is like hanging a voodoo sign outside a shack, and expecting that robbers will not enter, because buzz bombs can smash us overnight. And where would the armies be without supplies? This is national suicide. It is criminal negligence.

Not only for social use but to develop the natural resources of the north, we should run a highway from Atlin down behind the panhandle of Alaska to cover the ground-hog coal fields, where there is as good coal as can be obtained in Pennsylvania; also plenty of hydro-electric power. We want to see these things done, and I would urge the government to make the necessary effort so that we may have real freedom and social justice in this country.

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the honourable member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), who had the honour to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne, performed his task most creditably, and I take pleasure in congratulating him. I must also commend the seconder, the worthy representative of the constituency of Queens-Lunenberg (Mr. Winters) whose speech contained all the customary encomiums for the government.

The matter which now transcends all others, although it has but a relative importance and should not make parliament forget the numerous problems for which we are in duty bound to find a solution and with which it behooves us to deal at once, is the espionage matter.

The right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on whom lies responsibility for the inquiry in that matter, deserves high commendation for the course of action he has taken. I find it difficult to understand that anyone should oppose the procedure followed in that matter, which involves a clash between spies, traitors and communists on the one hand, and the authorities on the other hand, and that such an outcry should be raised against the action of the department of Justice. Because Russians, Doukhobors and Jews are involved, we hear protests against dictatorship and totalitarianism; because people in the pay of the foulest dictatorship are implicated, gentleness and kind attentions are requested for them. As was said on Friday last by the honourable member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) if Canadians had been caught in the act of doing espionage work in Russia for the benefit of Canada, a firing squad would have liquidated them at once.

I feel that the Criminal Code is not stringent enough for that kind of offence, as it does not provide for a penalty sufficiently severe for the people guilty of such a felony. They should be sentenced to life imprisonment. With that thought in mind, I ask the Minister of Justice to remain firm and pitiless in his dealings with traitors. Let him be sure of the support of all citizens who, disregarding party politics and bitterness, want, once for all, to behead the communistic monster. Besides, as was recalled this afternoon by the honourable member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), much severity was shown in the past, when at the beginning of the war the decision was taken to intern Camillien Houde, mayor of Montreal and member of the provincial legislature. They did not make that much noise nor did they go to so much trouble to secure for him a fair and just trial. A French-Canadian dared tell the truth and denounce hypocrisy and blackmail, how sacrilegious! He was promptly put behind bars and denied the right of habeas corpus, the right to consult a lawyer or the privilege to see members of his family. Houde in prison and Tim Buck free. Other times, other ways. French Canadians were then considered as saboteurs, to repeat the words used by a minister of the Crown at the time of the Arvida strike; meanwhile, the citizens of my province were asked to contribute to a fund for needy Russian children The million dollars thus collected was spent here on bolshevist propaganda. Money given to feed and clothe the destitute children of the U.S.S.R. was used on revolutionary propaganda and constituted the pay of renegades and people without a country. According to newspaper reports, Gouzenko "had been amazed to find organizations in Canada during the war, which were collecting money and food for Russia. In Russia, he had never heard of this help." We have, to say the least, lacked prudence. I hope this will be a lesson to us and that henceforth we will be on the lookout. Some aliens are as much to be feared as enemies. It might be advisable to direct to the Almighty this prayer by Louis Veuillot: "Lord, deliver me from my friends; and I will take care of my enemies". Let us be careful:

> Sovietism, wrote Father J. B. Desrosiers, of the order of St-Sulpice, doctor of theology and of philosophy, professor of moral and social sciences, of the faculty of theology of the Montreal University, is extending its influence, not only over Europe but over the rest of the world. Because it has bought against fascism and nazism, we are prone to consider it as the bulwark of democracy. However, no regime is more at variance with democracy than sovietism; of all the dictatorships, it is the most cruel. This regime, wherever it becomes established, deprives the individuals and their families of their most sacred rights, and especially of their freedom; ostensibly to increase production, it treats all the workers as if they were beasts of burden, forced to accomplish hard labour. It sacrifices the human being to the community. In order to make them supremely happy, it subjects human beings to the hardest form of slavery. They are, as it were, cudgelled into happiness and struck down when they refuse to go on.

The best defence against diffusion of communist ideas and doctrines in Canada, is fair treatment of the working people. In 1935, Father Adelard Dugré wrote the following:

> The riches of this world are a table so set that all should find a place, and sufficient food, good humour and health so as to lead a virtuous and fraternal life. What Almighty God, Father of all abhors is that some, quicker and greedier than others, should impudently pilfer the share of their comrades, who leave the table hungry and mad, looking askance at the well-fed grabbers and determined to steal their food."

Aside from this espionage question, which caused an excitement which will be short-lived, there remain all the commissions and control organizations regulating our economic life. By the looks of things, Mr. Speaker, I fear that a number of controls as well as certain war institutions may well become permanent fixtures. We must make sure that conditions do not become worse. A little butter would do no harm, as everyone will admit.

The people are complaining and not without reason, of the scarcity of clothing, the unavailability of housing accommodation and of a number of commodities indispensible to normal living; they are tired of carrying an ever increasing burden of taxes; they are averse to keeping on giving with generosity while recovering only insignificent advantages; they are opposed, and rightly so, to the new gift government intends to grant England. They believe, and I dare say they are right, that there are other and less costly means of helping Canadians. The general feeling, among taxpayers, is that we have done our share, much more than our share even, when our means are taken into account, for our dear friends overseas. The future of our children is sufficiently mortgaged as it is.

I would be remiss in my duty toward my constituents of Chicoutimi, were I to vote for the gift of a billion and a quarter to Great Britain, and I would be disgraced in the eyes of the farmers and industrial workers were I to countenance an act which is of such a nature as to increase the fiscal burden which our people already carry with such difficulty. If we undertake to tow the Empire, we shall find out that the garage is far away and that the cost of overhauling the British car is tremendous. I am opposed to the colonial-like subservience of our economy to Great Britain.

Are we wondering what to do with our millions? Let us lend part of that money to the working men so that they may build themselves suitable houses, to the farmers' sons to enable them to settle on farms, to the elderly people who are in need of a higher pensions, to the villages, cities and towns deprived of means of communication, of educational and recreational facilities. Let us cure our own ills before attempting to cure those of other nations.

Let us distribute this money among our citizens by way of loans or relief from taxation, so that they may be happier, and thus in a better position to resist the revolutionary appeals of those trouble makers and proponents of Marshal Stalin's gospel.

So long as there is in Canada a shortage of hospitals, to look after the needs of the sick, of colleges, or schools for our youth, so long as slums have not been suppressed from our towns and our rural centres, so long as there are Canadians deprived of homes, of clothing and of employment, I claim that we cannot afford to make gifts to others and that we must in the first place help our own citizens and devote our billions to more useful purposes than those which are suggested.

(Text):

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West): I should like to speak on behalf of the constituency of Essex West, which comprises chiefly the city of Windsor. I also wish to associate myself with the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne and to express my appreciation of being associated with these two hon. gentlemen in the same political party.

In recent months Windsor has gone through rather dark and troubled days. We have seen dark waters. However, I am happy to say that the darkest cloud preceding the dawn has disappeared and we are again seeing daylight. Windsor's contribution to the winning of the war is known throughout Canada. Our production of the sinews of war, tanks, trucks, automobiles, chemicals, guns and other things used in warfare is well known and contributed largely, I believe, to the overthrow of Germany. In addition, however, we have fought and won a labour war in Canada; and that war having been won, it is my opinion that now the city of Windsor is destined to become one of the leading industrial centres of the British empire.

At this point I should like to pay my humble tribute to the work of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) who has stood so loyally, so faithfully and, shall I say, so serenely behind and on top of the principles he has advocated for so many years. On behalf of the city of Windsor I wish to express to him the appreciation we feel for his efforts in our dark and troublesome days. I should like also to pay my respects to Mr. Justice Rand who, through his scholarly and learned decision in the Ford Motor dispute, has won the acclaim of people all over Canada, because, after all, that labour battle has set the pattern for all in Canada, and I think all in Canada will show their gratitude to him.

I think we have made our start toward becoming one of the greatest industrial centres of the British empire. During the last session many statements were made in this house in connection with our labour dispute; in fact on one occasion we had a motion to adjourn the house for the purpose of discussing the situation in my city. But let me say that industry has shown its faith in the city of Windsor. To-day the Ford Motor Company is building a $600,000 addition to its plant, and many other industries are constructing additions to their premises. For instance, the Packard Motor Car Company recently purchased property in Windsor on which it intends to erect a plant, and many smaller industries are coming into the city, some of which we hope will grow into large plants. In addition, the larger retail outlets of the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America have found it advantageous to purchase properties there, having in mind the erection of large retail establishments.

As I have said already, Windsor is the centre of the automobile industry of the British empire. In addition, we have some 260 industries, with scores of feeder plants supplying parts to the automobile industry. These plants employ many hundreds of men and played a great part in the winning of the war, especially as against Germany. It can also be said that we are the salt of the earth, because we are the largest producers of salt in Canada. In all probability the table salt used in British Columbia and the rock salt used in Alberta and Manitoba in connection with dairying come from my city. The chlorine for purification purposes also comes from Windsor. Caustic soda, a product of the salt industry, is used for cleansing purposes. We are the centre of the pharmaceutical industry in Canada; we have the larger pharmaceutical plants, such as Parke Davis, Sterling Products, Frederick Stearns, John Wyeth, Jamieson, and so on. Our geographical location is such that we are bounded on the north by lake St. Clair, in front by the Detroit river and on the south by lake Erie. Strange as it may seem, we are south of the city of Detroit. Essex county, comprising the constituencies of Essex East, Essex South and my own constituency of Essex West, is known as the sun parlour of Canada. We are served by water, by the busiest waterway in the world. We are served by air by both American and Canadian air lines. We have five railroads. We are also served by a tunnel from Detroit, and a bridge; and in addition we have a railroad tunnel, car ferries and so on. We have fine schools, fine churches, and we are rich in historic lore.

All these things, however, are not the reason for the greatness of this district. Our city is not made famous by its great industries, its geographical location or its fine buildings, but by the spirit of its residents in the hearts and minds of our people. I think it would best summarize the type of people we have if I were to read a reprint from the Labour Gazette of January, 1944, containing the decision of Mr. Justice Rand as arbitrator in the issue between the union and the Ford Motor Company. At page 4 of the reprint Mr. Justice Rand said:

> I have had an opportunity of sizing up the leadership of this union so far as it is represented by the committee of negotiation. The members are all of English-speaking origin and British citizenship. They have impressed me as being men of the stuff of which ordinary Canadians are made. With the exception of . . .

Then he mentions two individuals.

> . . . who are on leave of absence from General Motors at Oshawa as international representatives of the union, they are men with seniority in the Ford plant ranging from ten to eighteen years. They conducted themselves in negotiation with intelligence and reasonableness. I have no doubt their dominating interest is the job of those they represent in that industry, and that their object is to attain for those employees and their families a secure and self-respecting living, which seems to be the object of most Canadians. That aim is legitimate, whether or not attainment is possible.

As I have said, that summarizes the opinion of one who has rendered his decision in an impartial and disinterested way.

Like other Canadian municipalities, we have our choral societies, our theatre guilds, our art associations and our handicrafts guilds. We are no different from the rest of the Dominion of Canada.

Situated as we are, the tourist industry is of vital importance. Across the river in the states of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana and Illinois there is a total population, as of the 1941 census, of 23,488,755 persons, and there has been a considerable increase since that time. Figures furnished to me by the department show that the number of tourists from the United States entering Canada in 1938 through all ports was 17,084,525, of whom 3,497,814 entered through the port of Windsor. I do not intend to refer to the figures for the years 1939 through 1944, but the figures for 1945 show that 17,207,731 tourists entered through all ports and that 5,437,745, or almost one-third, entered through the port of Windsor.

We have many things to show those tourists who want to make short inroads into Canada, who want to stay for only a short period and travel only a short distance. Besides our fine buildings, there are many other things of interest. We have the Baby residence, the oldest building in the city, a building with a great historical background. Nothing has been done about this building by the dominion government, and I would urge the government to take whatever steps are necessary, in conjunction with the Essex county Historical Association, to see that some funds are appropriated for the restoration of this building as a point of interest for tourists.

In the adjoining constituency of Essex South at Amherstburg there is the Fort Malden museum. This point is just eighteen miles from Windsor, and this locality has tangible memories of such men as Tecumseh, Sir Isaac Brock and Colonel James Baby. I am glad to say that this building has ben restored and improved and is being used quite extensively. Many tourists visit it each year.

There is also the Point Pelee national park, situated on the most southerly point of the mainland of the Dominion of Canada. I do not propose to go into the details of this park at this time, but I should like to mention that through it pass literally thousands of birds migrating to the south. Strange to say, bees also migrate through here to southern climates as well as literally millions of butterflies. This subject would take considerable time to discuss, but suffice it to say that this park is unique in many other ways. The flora found there are found in no other part of Canada, and the same can be said of the wild life.

[Mr. Brown.]

I should also like to refer to the Jack Miner bird sanctuary which attracts tourists from the United States, Mexico and many parts of Europe. In 1906 Jack Miner started to band wild geese. He did not put a number on the bands of tin or metal which he placed on the birds he caught; he put on a verse of scripture. The birds were then freed and in the course of years they were found all over the eastern parts of the United States and Canada, as far north as Baffinland, Hudson bay and other northern posts and as far south as South America. Those scriptural verses which were found in all parts of this continent aroused considerable interest. Preachers in northern outposts preached sermons on the verses which had come to them out of the air. The natives of South America have been helped and have learned about the Dominion of Canada and the Jack Miner sanctuary through birds which have come to them out of the air. So it is my hope that as this bird sanctuary has brought literally thousands of tourists who have spent millions of dollars in the Dominion of Canada, nothing will be done either by this government or by any succeeding government to impede the work of this late and great man but rather that the work will continue with the support of the government of the day.

I said a moment ago that we in Windsor have an art association and a handicrafts association. These associations are of vital interest to our tourist business, and they are very practical. The practical nature of the art association can perhaps best be illustrated by the following incident, showing the effect which it has had on persons outside the Dominion of Canada who are desirous of seeing what Canada has to offer because of what they have seen done by the art association, also by the National Art Association and the National Gallery of Canada.

A short time ago a gentleman came to this city from India. He was asked what places he would like to see and his first request was to see the National Gallery. He was asked why he wanted to see it, and he said that he had just flown here from India and that at each stop he had found an interesting and beautiful painting of a Canadian scene, and at the bottom of each picture was the source, the National Gallery of Canada, Ottawa. So he wanted to see the national gallery. Probably if he did see it he was disappointed. I mention this because the National Gallery of Canada is of practical value to us in my constituency. It encourages the artists who will depict scenes in my own and neighbouring constituencies which will arouse interest outside the Dominion of Canada and make tourists want to see those scenes. Naturally they will come to my constituency and, while there, will spend valuable dollars in foreign currency.

I should like to say a word about the National Gallery of Canada, an institution with which I have only recently become acquainted. I went there the other day and here are some of the things I found. The national gallery is housed in one end of the museum building, five floors of it, if you include the basement. The space was never designed for a national gallery and is hopelessly inadequate. Most of the partitions are made of wood and beaverboard, carefully disguised with painted burlap, all that the government of the day thought it could afford after the first great war. It is not fireproof; it has not even the elementary conveniences of a public building. The storage and shipping space is even worse.

I am interested in the national gallery, not because it is in Ottawa, but because I believe this work should be centred in one building under one head from which it can disseminate its work to the benefit of my constituency, and that of course applies to every constituency in the dominion.

The staff consists of the director and a crew of fifteen, all told. Yet that small group is responsible not only for the management of the national gallery in Ottawa but for the loan and educational system that covers the dominion from coast to cost. Approximately 150,000 people visit the national gallery every year, and that is a high figure for a gallery in a city of less than 200,000 population. But the really important feature of the gallerys work is that probably over a million citizens outside Ottawa have seen national gallery travelling exhibitions and received the benefit of its other extension services during the year.

I found that the national gallery had undertaken at least four major jobs during the war and successfully accomplished all of them.

First, it maintained its programme in Ottawa throughout the conflict and extended it as a morale builder, as did the national gallery in London and other public galleries nearer the firing line.

Second, it greatly increased its quota of loan exhibitions so that other Canadian cities should benefit during the stress of war.

Third, it planned and put into operation a unique project whereby the Canadian armed forces were generously supplied with pictures for the decoration of recreation rooms, messes and rest huts. These are the pictures that were seen by the gentlemen who flew here from India. More than 30,000 prints were distributed at no cost to the taxpayer, and the British forces were eventually included in the scheme, which has made Canadian art known almost around the world. The same pictures were later made available to hospitals and also to schools and other educational institutions. I need not mention that even a great many hon. members of this house have availed themselves of the opportunity of obtaining a few of the silk screens and pictures from the national gallery for decorating their offices.

Fourth, at the request of the defence council the director of the national gallery undertook to chair a committee charged with the duty of selecting and directing Canadian artists in depicting Canada's part in the war. Under this plan a number of the foremost artists were commissioned and sent to the various fronts. Their works are now arriving and will be seen in exhibitions in increasing numbers as the work develops.

Other services included the assembling and forwarding of exhibitions of Canadian arts to the United States, South America and other countries, and the arranging of return exhibitions for Canada. A system of broadcasts to schools has been established telling the story of Canadian art to young people, using small colour reproductions issued and distributed by the gallery at a nominal price.

Looking at the gallery premises and the small staff of workers, I do not know how it is accomplished. What could be done for this country if we had a gallery building worthy of Canada and a staff of, say one-tenth the size of the staff of the film board, a staff to include field workers and lecturers, as well as administrative officials. I understand the grant to the national gallery for all purposes has been about $45,000 a year throughout the war, having been reduced from a pre-war figure of $135,000. This is no way to treat an institution with such vast potentialities for vital constructive work for Canada at home and abroad.

I am not specially interested in the national gallery as an ornament to the city of Ottawa, but I am interested in the national gallery as a centre from which the benefits of art can radiate to every part of Canada, including Essex county in Ontario. A new national gallery building with adequate storage space, shipping rooms, workshops and galleries is necessary if those of us who cannot come to Ottawa are to share in the great benefits a gallery can produce. Art centres are springing up all over this country, partly as a result of the extension work already done by the national gallery but also because of the steadily advancing educational level of the people as a whole. These centres need to be wisely fostered, and only an up-to-date national gallery and a staff with vision can do the job.

I am convinced that a great deal has already been accomplished to point the way; let the gallery be given the green light.

May I revert for a moment to the Jack Miner foundation. In addition to the advertising we get in Canada through the banding of birds, most of the more worth-while publication in the United States have given voluminous space to advertise not only the Miner bird sanctuary but Canada in general. I hold in my hand a copy of the Saturday Evening Post of March 18, 1944, which gives in colour, advertising for the Dominion of Canada which no money can buy. I have here also a publication called the Christian Advocate, which I am told has a circulation of over a million readers in the United States, and which has given advertising to Canada which money cannot buy.

I am also interested from the point of view of fostering the tourist industry, in the handicraft guild. I believe that sufficient prominence and support have not been given to this practical organization which could be said to be part of the tourist business. The handicraft guild throughout the Dominion of Canada, and in particular in my own city, is instructing many of our residents in the native crafts, in the native arts of this country such as weaving, spinning, the making of ornaments of jewellery, pottery, bookbinding, woodwork and many kindred trades. I should like to see this government devote and appropriate funds to encourage these operations. Somebody has said that a dollar brought into this country by a tourist is just as valuable as a dollar's worth of wheat going out. If we would give at least some attention to this industry, which I am told is now one of the leading industries of our country, a great service would be done not only to my own constituency but to the whole of Canada.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in the time that remains this evening I should like to address myself to what I consider to be the very great housing crisis in this country. There is a housing shortage which is a national emergency and which calls for every action which this government can take to provide a solution. If this country had been struck by a flood or an earthquake and thousands of our people had been rendered homeless, I do not think it would have taken very long or that the money would not have been forthcoming to provide sufficient homes for these distressed people. Or if on the other hand we had required more aeroplanes to beat Hitler we would certainly have produced them. We should follow the same principles and the same means of production in providing our people with decent housing accommodation.

I am reminded of 1939, prior to the war, when unemployment was rife in this country, when in my own riding of Rosedale in Toronto no fewer than 10,000 people out of a population of 65,000 were forced to accept relief, and yet a Liberal government, which was then in power, did nothing to alleviate this hardship. If one went about the riding and inquired of these people who could not find work despite their ability and willingness, one learned that in many instances they were craftsmen from the building trades—bricklayers, carpenters, plumbers, painters, decorators, et cetera—because there was virtually no housebuilding or construction going on at that time. It was commonly referred to as the key-log of the depression jam. The Liberal government at that time did not have the foresight to give these men jobs, nor did it do anything to alleviate the housing shortage. That shortage has been piling up ever since, because in 1940 we found ourselves engaged in a world war and we could not at one and the same time carry on both a munitions industry on a great scale and remedy, or even keep up with, the immediate demands for housing.

Hansard records how His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, to which I have the honour to belong, urged upon the government by every means possible to make the greatest contribution that Canada could in the line of material production. With some prodding continuously, the government did so, and the people of Canada made a great contribution both on the man-power front and on the material front. But now that we have come to the year 1946, one would think this government would have learned something from the war effort, would have learned how things which are necessary and urgent are put into motion. We find, however, that the lessons of the war, which were before the government and before all those who wished to read those lessons in books by Keynes and other authors, all those lessons which were turned to such advantage during the period from 1939 to 1945, have been promptly discarded by the government, and even though controls remain in force we find that the government is doing nothing of a constructive nature, certainly not on any worth-while scale, in connection with the deplorable housing shortage which this country faces.

It is hardly necessary to point out the need for housing. Much of the talk we hear is casual and some of it specific. We hear of advertisements such as the one that appeared in the daily papers of Toronto of a man with a three-roomed apartment to rent. He received no fewer than 500 applications. There are at the present time 5,000 applications filed with the citizen's registry of the welfare bureau in Toronto for accommodation of any kind whatsoever.

I recall the case of a major in the dental corps who was evicted. That man is willing to pay $70 a month. He has a family of four, his wife having a heart condition. He could find no accommodation, and he was obliged to go to Malton where temporary accommodation is available for a limited number.

The problem is not, as it may have been in years gone by, one of inability to pay for decent accommodation. Employment is good and so are wages. And this condition is not confined to the lower income brackets. The welfare department in Toronto reports 400 applicants willing to pay from $65 to $125 a month for any kind of accommodation, because they are desperate, and many of them are veterans of this war.

What are the stories of human suffering that lie behind these cold statistics? Yesterday, Sunday, I had occasion to visit some of these houses where conditions of overcrowding exist, and I found in one three-storey building, a large house, one room that contained one bed for three persons and another bed for two—a shocking condition in this day and age and in this Dominion of Canada. Altogether that house, admittedly a large one, contained fifty-three people, some of them veterans of the last war. It had one bath with a cold water-tap only, and some of the tenants said they did not use it because it was too dirty, while others said they did not use it because they had to cart their own hot water to it. In the house there were three toilets. This place had been condemned by the fire department. The insurance companies will not insure the possessions of the tenants, and about the place you will see six or eight large fire-extinguishers, because the place is a veritable fire hazard. There is no mail-box in the building, and the postman will not leave any mail because the children get at it and the postal authorities cannot guarantee delivery. The result is that the tenants have to go to Front street, a mile and a half away, in order to get their mail.

Such are the conditions in Toronto in this year 1946 when we are supposed to have a fairly high standard of living. In the same building there was a three and a half roomed apartment on the third floor with no bath, toilet or mail-box, the rental being $25 a month. In the basement, which was fixed up to shelter a grandmother, a mother, a daughter of seventeen and two boys of eleven and six, the rental was $18 a month.

None of these people want to live in such quarters but it is the only roof they can find to cover their heads. In my own riding I was given the address of another place, a six-roomed house, really a cottage, sixty or seventy years old, very low, the average room being ten feet by twelve feet. Three families are quartered in this small place, and altogether it houses twenty-one people, with one bathroom.

Such are the housing conditions which this government has taken so little means to rectify. One could go on endlessly with other examples—eight or ten people living in one room, mixed sexes—three semi-detached houses, thirty-nine rooms and every room containing a family. The houses are condemned by the health authorities for good and sufficient reasons. The inspectors will make their reports, but what can they do? If these Canadians are evicted their lot is even worse than before.

There has been sent to Malton to the barrack quarters 100 families, and another 114 families have been sent from Toronto to Little Norway at Toronto island. Notwithstanding the frequent visits of health inspectors and social workers, one can well imagine the physical and moral dangers if such shocking congestion continues. It will lead to the breaking up of homes, absence of family life, and other evils. And what must be the opinion of the returned soldier who comes home to his wife and two kiddies to find such conditions as I have mentioned? It is a far cry from that of the last war when we were told that there would be homes fit for heroes to live in.

In the speech from the throne there is reference to housing, and it is said that the demand exceeds the supply. Those are words which are hardly likely to bring about any solution or to lead the people of Canada to believe that the government has any real recognition of the crisis which housing presents in Canada to-day. Surely the action of the veterans in Vancouver, when they seized the hotel, would lead the government to know that the demand exceeded the supply.

There was a time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), according to the biographies which have been written about him, was a social service worker or at least was cognizant of social conditions in the country. I recall he once visited a factory where they made matches and where the sulphur fumes caused an industrial disease, and he brought about means whereby that condition was rectified. I may say to him now that there are more ways than one of losing one's health and self-respect in this country of ours.

Where to-day is the social conscience of the Liberal party? The Progressive Conservatives believe that such conditions should not be tolerated, that no stone should be left unturned to force this government to take adequate action to remedy this housing crisis. I was not active in public life during the worst days of the depression, but when I learned of the conditions that existed I wondered that the people ever stood for them, and I wonder to-day why the people of Canada, in such large numbers, stand for the housing conditions that now prevail. I am quite sure that if they had any kind of leadership many of them would not stand for conditions like that when on every hand they see people who are not only comfortably well off and well housed, but able to acquire other possessions, some of which may be fairly necessary but certainly not of the same relative importance as a decent house over one's head.

What I have said is the personal side of the problem. How many times must these conditions be multiplied to encompass the housing shortage which fails to move the government to action? The pictures I have given may not be representative of all the housing shortage in Canada. They are true of parts of Toronto and I know they are true of parts of the capital city of this country. They are probably general.

I wish to point out another aspect of this problem. Yesterday I called at a house. A veteran answered the door. He and his wife live there; the wife is expecting a child shortly. They have one room and the joint use of a kitchen. They pay $30 a month for that. In these days that sum is enough to provide that veteran and family with a house, not just a room and the joint use of a kitchen. For the most part the people are able to pay for decent accommodation, but that accommodation is not available and very little is being done to provide it for them.

As I have mentioned, there was a pre-war housing shortage. There was unemployment and there was a shortage of houses. It became worse during the war. There was no planning for the existing shortage, and perhaps for good reasons, because we could not make munitions and houses at the same time. But how the government expects to take care of a growing country and of returned soldiers whose families in the meantime had doubled up with in-laws and others, I do not know. What did the government expect to do with 800,000 men and women returning from the armed services? How were they to be housed when there was an acute shortage already?

How great is the housing crisis? In the spring of 1944 the advisory committee on housing and community planning estimated a shortage of 600,000 family units. The government made no preparation for large-scale building. It offered insufficient inducements after the war to war workers who had come from the smaller centres to the larger ones to return to their original abode. As quoted last Friday by my colleague, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), Brigadier Storms, now general manager of Housing Enterprises Limited, said in a published statement on March 14 last, that there are 375,000 families in Canada who are involuntarily doubled up because of the housing shortage. In addition to this, although there may be some duplication, the Curtis report of three years ago estimated 300,000 sub-standard dwellings in Canada, and I can point to many sub-standard dwellings in my own riding. The need is colossal; it is urgent. The housing crisis constitutes a national emergency of the first order.

Last year the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) estimated that 39,000 new dwelling units were built and 5,000 reconverted. That is an estimate, and many consider that it is substantially in excess of the actual number of houses which were provided. But even if we take it at its face value it is not enough, for it will never solve the problem which faces this country.

The economic system can be made to break the back of this housing shortage, but it will not be done by letting bad enough alone. An indignant people will not stand for it.

The government has never denied the responsibility for the housing crisis in Canada. No fewer than three agencies of the government have helped to muddle the problem, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or its antecedent; Wartime Housing, and recently the Department of Veterans Affairs. Mr. H. C. Nichols, the retiring president of the Canadian Construction Association, stated on January 14 of this year that the capacity of the building industry in Canada to-day is 30,000 houses per annum, which is hardly enough to keep up with the current wear and tear without attacking the 375,000 backlog of needed houses.

What are the possibilities of solution at the government's present rate of progress? Obviously the people of Canada will not be decently housed in the near future.

In the face of this tremendous housing shortage there were 263,000 people reported as unemployed at the end of February, 1946. It seems almost incredible that we should at one and the same time have a housing shortage of such dimensions and 263,000 people on the unemployed rolls. I should like to ask the minister how many men are being trained for the construction industry in the Department of Labour's training schools? The Minister of Reconstruction said he was alarmed at the rate of expansion of industry in Canada. May I ask, is all industry expanding and what industry is entitled to a higher priority than housing, and what expansion have we to show in that field? The Minister of Reconstruction says he is alarmed at the rate of expansion, and yet we find that housing is apparently relegated to a secondary position.

All mercantile housing, with only the most pressing exceptions, and theatre construction should be eliminated until the housing crisis is over. The house might be interested in knowing that the dwelling which I described in some detail with fifty-three people in it is to be torn down presently if a building permit is issued by the city, which it has not issued so far, and in its place is to be erected a motion-picture theatre. Certainly in this day we must have some idea of what comes first, and surely housing comes ahead of more amusement centres.

The figures given by the Minister of Reconstruction on the export of lumber only indicate that in the face of the need for domestic building more lumber should be retained at home. We are on a new domestic standard as compared with the pre-war years. In my riding one-third of the people badly need more of the necessities of life; another third need more of the good things of life, and the remaining third would not refuse a higher standard of living. With a national income now increased from three and a half billion to eight or nine billion dollars, and the price level not excessively out of line with what it was before the war, the whole question of production for export and domestic consumption should be examined. We are trying to export to the whole world not only as a measure of temporary and urgent relief, but in order to build up future trade. If we do not retain some of our exports we may find that our people will have to do without housing permanently. Instead of exporting unemployment, we are importing shortages and doing our level best to make our own people have a lower standard of living.

Take, for example, the figures for the newsprint industry, which means that more and more men are being used to cut pulp wood who could be cutting lumber, and these figures have been showing a steady expansion. Surely Canadian newsprint, which is an industry with which I am familiar and in which I am interested, was not severely dealt with during the war in comparison with that of other countries, and yet we find to-day that it is able to expand its exports and use men to cut down wood for pulp; whereas these same men could be used for producing more lumber in this country. Where is the control? Where is the direction which this government should exercise to meet the essential needs of our people?

What else should the government do to solve this crisis? I suggest and urge that they should adjust wage ceilings. Building materials were not considered a war necessity, and the wages of workers in those industries were held at virtually peace-time levels. If you look at the figures for bricklayers, for instance, you will find that they were held pretty much at their peace-time level. The result was that men in that industry left for war-time occupations, where wage rates were higher. Now that war industry is over, there is little inclination on their part to go back to the building industry, even at wage rates which are slightly higher than those in effect when they left that industry, and which are substantially below those which obtained in war industry.

Wartime Housing priorities disrupted the building industry. Small builders and private owners found that they could not get the materials they required because of the priorities which the government, under Wartime Housing placed upon the lumber and building supplies industries. There has been a shortage of building supplies not only because of the wage ceilings but because of the price ceilings. We must treat the national housing emergency as a crisis and allow a reasonable increase in wages so that more workers will be attracted into that field. More of those unemployed workers who to-day are looking for work must be taught how to engage in the building trades in order to render an essential and worthwhile service to their fellow Canadians. That was the practice we followed in connection with war industry. Peace-time occupations were frozen; wages could not be increased. But when it came to aeroplane factories, munitions factories and so on, wage levels were advanced. Workers flowed into those higher paid jobs, naturally, and we did a thoroughly commendable job when it came to munitions. Now we must use the same tactics, the same principles if we are to solve this housing crisis which is upon our doorstep at the present time.

Let me offer another suggestion into which I believe the government should look. During the war not only had we to pay higher wages to attract workers to war industries; we also found it necessary to build more war plants, and we allowed private builders the privilege of writing off the cost of those war additions over a short period of years, on the basis that after the war they would not be useful for the particular purpose for which they were built. Now I recommend that the government allow manufacturers of building supplies to create additions to their factories to meet this emergency, which may last for five years. It may last longer than that, but I do not see how it can last for less. Then the government should allow the owners of these industries to write off that excess capacity during the period of the crisis.

As an emergency measure I should like to recommend that the government grant first mortgage building loans at a rate as low at two per cent if necessary. If wages in the building industries are increased in order to get more workers, and if the cost of building supplies rise, we do not want our people and particularly our veterans to have to buy houses at inflated values. One of the greatest factors in the cost of a house is the cost of money. To-day the government is borrowing at 2¾ per cent per annum, and to meet this crisis it could well afford to lend money on first mortgage loans on new houses at a rate as low as two per cent. That would go a long way toward absorbing any additional cost brought about by the emergency measures I have suggested. Possibly the government should even consider subsidizing new construction. Buildings and houses are being subsidized in Great Britain in order to meet the acute shortage there, and our people, particularly in the low-income brackets, must be allowed to have decent shelter over their heads. If because of the wage rates in this country it should become necessary to subsidize building, then the government should do so.

Then I believe the government should withdraw from the field of actual construction and cease its interference with private builders. If the government wishes to maintain supervision, then let private industry do the building and, if necessary, purchase the complete housing units from the builders, who understand the business and can get things done.

There is not time to go into the matter of local taxation, which has made housing unprofitable for both individual owners and landlords. I shall say only this, that Wartime Housing has not proved as efficient, from the many examples which have come to our notice, as construction by private builders. The wartime prices and trade board is also one of the evils at the root of this jam we are facing to-day. That board cannot know everyone's business and how businesses are interdependent. There are shortages of furnaces, because furnaces may not be sold at high enough prices. Therefore houses cannot be completed. Or it may be a shortage of soil pipe, or of porcelain insulators, which are examples that have been brought to my notice. Wartime Housing certainly is not in as good a position to get skilled help as are private contractors, many of whom have had the same men working with them for long periods of years. Instead of wrecking industry, the government should learn how to utilize it.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Building tradesmen should be given an incentive to work holidays and overtime; but if they are to have from thirty to fifty per cent of their extra wages taken in taxation they will not work more than the straight forty-hour week. I well recall the memorable words of a C.C.F. member in regard to his constituent, who was a mixed farmer and who found that he was being taxed on the extra cream he was able to obtain by working before breakfast in the morning and milking the cows after dinner at night, and who said, "I'll not milk cows for Ilsley." So he got rid of his herd. Human nature being what it is, I say it is folly to make laws which fly in the face of increased production. There is plenty of capital for investment in buildings; and with more take-home pay not only can workers produce more, but more workers will join the building trades.

The Liberal government has become a big, cumbersome nuisance. It is preventing Canadians from using their natural ability to look after their own needs. The war with Germany has now been over for nearly ten months and the Japanese war for nearly seven months, but the controllers still want to control. If the government will only give the horse its head we can rely on Canadian workers and Canadian industry to supply our housing requirements. If there is one thing we owe our returning veterans it is decent homes for themselves and their families. That is the prime duty of any government. The people expect some government planning and some direction as long as controls remain in force. Let the government make it possible for our people, our economic system and our democracy to deliver the goods.

On motion of Mr. Dorion the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 26, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern) presented the first report of the special committee on veterans affairs and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Before the report is concurred in, sir, may I have just a word? I wish to say that the mover of this report is most helpful to his colleagues, and I wish to thank him on behalf of all the veterans he has assisted when their cases were referred to him.

Motion agreed to.

FOOD

UNDERSTANDINGS REACHED IN DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN BRITISH AND CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, last week I stated to the house that within a few days a report would be made both in this house and in the House of Commons in Great Britain with regard to the agreements reached for the supplying of food from Canada to Great Britain. That statement is being made in the British house to-day, and I am therefore making it here.

Supplies of food from Canada to the United Kingdom. Joint announcement of understandings reached in discussions between representatives of the United Kingdom and of Canada at the Ministry of Food, London, January, 1946.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce and I, with officials of our departments, visited the United Kingdom in January and had discussions with Sir Ben Smith, the United Kingdom Minister of Food, and officials of the ministry of food regarding British requirements and Canadian supplies of the major foodstuffs. The discussions took account of the recent announcement of the United Kingdom government policy in regard to home agricultural production and of the long-term prospects regarding supplies of the different foodstuffs.

2. This exchange of views has resulted in understandings being reached between the British Ministry of Food and the meat and dairy boards of the dominion Department of Agriculture on matters which are set out below and are now being put into the form of agreements to be signed on behalf of both governments.

3. Bacon and ham. The United Kingdom is prepared to purchase the maximum supplies which Canada can provide in 1946, 1947 and 1948. Canada has agreed to do its utmost to maintain these supplies at the highest possible level.

4. It was agreed that the present contract for the calendar year 1946 should be extended to cover the import of a minimum of 350 million pounds into the United Kingdom in 1947 and 400 million pounds in 1948. The contract price for the balance of 1946 and for 1947 will be raised to $25 per 100 pounds f.o.b. seaboard for grade A Wiltshires. For 1948 the price will be not less than the current contract price of $22.50, same basis, and will be subject to later review.

5. It was agreed to have further discussions before January, 1947, to consider the possibility of assessing the prospective requirements of the United Kingdom for 1949 and of negotiating a contract for that year. The new price for bacon means an increase of approximately $3 per hog in price. The order in council of 1944 established a premium of $3 on A's and $2 on B's per hog until six months after the war. The premium is to be decreased by $1 to $2 on A's and $1 on B's per hog. This will provide for a net increase of $2 per hog in price and premium combined.

6. Cheese. The present contract for the supply of 125 million pounds of cheese to the United Kingdom each year expires on 31st March, 1947. It was agreed that this should be extended to 31st March, 1948, at the same prices. The contract should cover 125 million pounds.

7. An extension of the contract to cover the season ending 31st March, 1949, has also been agreed with prices to be fixed at a later date, and to this end the United Kingdom and Canadian representatives will review the arrangements before January, 1947.

8. Evaporated milk. It was agreed that a contract at current basic prices should be concluded to cover a minimum of 600,000 cases per annum for the two seasons ending 31st March, 1947 and 1948.

9. Roller dried skim milk powder. It was agreed that the United Kingdom should purchase 3,000 tons from the 1946 production of roller dried skim milk powder.

10. Eggs. The United Kingdom desires to obtain increased quantities of Canadian shell eggs during the months from October to April inclusive, and more especially during the months from October to December inclusive. Owing to difficulties in handling supplies in the United Kingdom during the summer months Canada was requested to cease shipments of shell eggs by 1st May each year diverting the summer surplus to the production of frozen melange and/or sugar dried eggs.

11. It was agreed that the current contract which expires on December 31, 1946, should be extended to cover the supply to the United Kingdom of 1,750,000 cases of shell eggs and 5,000 tons of dried eggs in 1947 at the current basic prices for the shell eggs.

12. The United Kingdom has agreed to furnish to Canada by the autumn of 1946 (preferably by October) an indication of the requirements of eggs in shell and dried or frozen form during 1948.

13. Meat. In order to maintain the wartime carcass meat ration, the United Kingdom will require all the beef and mutton which Canada can spare in 1946 and, so far as can be foreseen at present, in 1947 and probably in 1948. It was agreed to continue discussions of the extension of the current contract to cover supplies for 1947.

14. The United Kingdom will be ready to purchase all the hog casings which Canada can provide up to 1948. Offals and tongues will also be required and these will be the subject of further discussions.

15. The United Kingdom requested an increase in the export in carcass form of meat suitable for sausage manufacture.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO ASSIST MR. SPEAKER IN REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Adamson, Gladstone, Glen, Golding, Hansell, McGarry, Jean, MacInnis, Pouliot, Smith (Calgary West) and Stirling be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the standing orders of the house with a view to simplify, accelerate and expedite its business, and to report to the house during the present session.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the close of the last session, on December 17, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) asked whether it was intended to set up at this session the committee on the orders and rules of the house. My hon. friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs, (Mr. Mackenzie), who was leading the house at the time, replied—Hansard, page 3716

It is the intention to set up that committee as soon as possible after the new session is convened.

The motion which is before the house at the moment is for the purpose of setting up that committee as soon as possible. I would not bring forward this motion at this time if it were likely to be debated. I understand, however, it is the wish of the house to have this committee established as soon as possible, and that the motion will meet with general acceptance. The personnel of the committee is, I understand, the same as that of the committee last year, with one exchange, by agreement.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FLAG

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REPORT ON SUITABLE DESIGN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that Canada possess a distinctive national flag and that a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon a suitable design for such a flag;

That Messrs. Beaudoin, Blanchette, Castleden, Emmerson, Gingues, Gladstone, Hackett, Hansell, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Herridge, LaCroix, Lafontaine, Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), MacNicol, Martin, Matthews (Brandon), McCulloch (Pictou), McIvor, Reid, Smith (Calgary West), Stanfield, Stirling, Thatcher, Warren, Zaplitny, be members of such committee on the part of this house;

That standing order 65 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records to aid in the discharge of its functions; and

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform their honours that the House of Commons has appointed this committee and to request their honours to appoint members of the Senate to act thereon with the members of the House of Commons as a joint committee of both houses.

He said: In the speech from the throne at the close of the last session, the following paragraph appeared—Hansard, page 3755:

My ministers were gratified at the approval given to the proposal that Canada should possess a distinctive national flag. At the next session, they will propose that the select committee of both houses be reconstituted in order to complete the task of considering a suitable design for a Canadian flag.

The motion I am now presenting is to implement that undertaking as given in the speech from the throne. The same remarks I made on the previous motion apply in presenting this motion. I understand that the house is likely to approve it unanimously and will not desire any debate upon it at this time.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

DATE OF REOPENING—PARTICULARS OF QUALIFICATIONS FOR CADETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Army)? It has to do with the Royal Military College at Kingston. Will the minister kindly inform the house when the Royal Military College at Kingston will be opened? How many cadets will be permitted to register in the first class? When will instructions be available as to the academic qualifications required?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KIDD: This is asked in view of the fact that so many parents and ex-cadets across Canada are most anxious to make plans for their sons who will this year reach the age when a decision is necessary.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question should be put on the order paper.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Is the Minister of Reconstruction in a position to indicate when we may expect a report from the royal commission which is inquiring into the coal industry in Canada?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I received notice of the question and communicated with Mr. Justice Carroll, chairman of the commission, whose reply is as follows:

> With reference to the inquiry from a member of the house, the commission is not in a position at this time to say just when its report will be completed.
>
> As you know, we are making a comprehensive study of all the facts pertaining to the coal industry, both in respect to the production of coal, its distribution and its utilization. Studies are being conducted by a number of experts on a variety of subjects and some of these reports have not yet been received.
>
> May I assure you that the commission and its staff are doing everything possible to expedite the early submission of the report.

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION

POLICY AS TO SALES OF EQUIPMENT TO VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction, having to do with a change of policy by War Assets Corporation with respect to sales of equipment to veterans. Will the minister be so good as to tell the house what considerations prompted this change? Is he prepared to reconsider the question with a view to reversing the policy to its former status?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): That is too complicated a question for one to answer at this time without some preparation. I have promised the chairman of the committee on veterans affairs to attend a meeting of the committee with an officer of the War Assets Corporation and discuss the policy with the committee. Perhaps that will meet the situation.

UNITED NATIONS

MEETING OF SECURITY COUNCIL—OBSERVERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. I note that the newspaper reports to-day convey the information that the first two rows of audience seats at the meeting of the united nations security council in New York yesterday were occupied by observers and companions from fifty-one united nations. I should like to ask whether, in Canada's behalf, there was an official or an unofficial observer there looking after the interests of this country and, if so, who that observer was.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall have to answer the question a little later. Had the hon. member given me notice of his question I should have been in a position to tell him who the observer is.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the Prime Minister mean to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give the answer to-day, yes, a little later, if the hon. member so desires.

Mr. POULIOT: Do you believe in it?

[Later:]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer a question that the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked at an earlier stage of the sitting. He asked who was the observer for Canada at the meeting of the security council in New York. At the time I was not sure whether Mr. Pearson, our ambassador, would be present. He hopes to be present at some of the meetings. I find, however, that he was not present yesterday, but Mr. Charles Ritchie, who is counsellor of the External Affairs Department, was present as an observer for Canada.

CIVIL AVIATION

UNITED STATES AIR BASE AT CLEARWATER LAKE, MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): In view of the fact that the Canadian government has taken over the large United States air base at Clearwater lake, Manitoba, would the Minister of Transport reconsider the announced intention to abandon this air base, since its use for commercial flying will be of vital importance to northern development?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I believe the hon. member intended to address his question to me. I received notice of it and have the following reply:

The Pas airport is not being abandoned but will be put on a reduced basis. Sufficient funds have been included in the air services estimates for 1946-47 to provide for such work as is necessary to prevent runways and buildings from deteriorating and at the same time keep the runways in reasonably good condition and fit for the anticipated civil traffic.

Meteorological services wil continue to be available. The radio range will be off the air, but equipment left intact and kept in such condition that it may be recommissioned within a short time after the necessary staff has been sent in.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The house resumed from Monday, March 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I understand that, according to a well established custom which, as it were, has become a rule of this house, the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne affords to every member an opportunity to state his views on the various problems.

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must point out to hon. members that, owing to the noise in the chamber, it is impossible to hear the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. DORION: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I suppose it was because I was speaking in French that my colleagues started to leave the chamber. I submit that it is not only my right but my duty as well, for the first time this session, to address the chair in my own language.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

(Translation): It should nevertheless be remembered that on the conclusion of this debate we shall all have to vote. We now have before us three motions. The first one on which we shall have to vote is the one moved by the honourable member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), leader of the C.C.F. party. I feel that I am not mistaken in saying that, for the first time since I have the honour to sit in this house, we have in that motion a definite and clear statement of the whole doctrine on which is based the policy of that party. The first part of the motion reads as follows:

> We respectfully submit, however, that in the opinion of this house, Your Excellency's advisers in their reliance on private enterprise have failed to propose the comprehensive national planning which the present emergency demands;

That is a blame, a condemnation not about the conduct or the policy of the government, but about the confidence which the government holds toward private enterprise. It is, as I said a few moments ago, a clear and definite statement of the whole doctrine on which that party's policy is based.

I have already had occasion, since I have become a member of this house, to support by my vote and my words many of the reforms advocated by the C.C.F. party, but when it comes to voting on such a clear-cut statement of principles, I have no hesitation in opposing such a motion, because I still have confidence in the economic system under which we are living, notwithstanding its flaws.

I realize that such a system sometimes gives rise to abuses, however, an administration which is vigilant and conscious of its responsibilities can stamp out such abuses and there is no call to eliminate or overthrow our economic system under the pretext that is not perfect. It would be equivalent to killing a man while trying to cure him. This is why I feel it to be my duty to oppose this amendment by my vote.

Then we will be called upon to vote on the motion of the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken), leader of the Progressive Conservative party. The amendment, considered independently of everything else, contains a condemnation, or rather a censure of the present government, with which I probably could agree because I think most of its grounds are well taken. For instance, in the first paragraph, the administration is blamed for having:

> Failed to meet the needs of veterans and workers by planning reconversion so as to avoid unemployment and dislocation;

When I think that unemployment has already become extensive; when I realize that in Quebec, for example, thousands of persons are unable to find jobs, I am inclined to agree with this condemnation of the government's policy.

The fourth assertion of this motion is the following:

Failed to relieve the tax burden particularly on low income groups.

As in the case of any motion, it is imperative that not only the wording itself be taken into account, but also the preamble on which the motion has been based. In the speech of the leader of the oppostiion, introducing his motion, I find that he wishes to remove the effects of the evil he mentions, while stating that he approves of the causes of this same evil. Here is a statement I quote from his speech in the house, when he was speaking about the loan we are going to grant Great Britain:

These figures total an annual payment exceeding $50 million for each of the next few years.

If we intend to reduce taxation and give work to our people, it is impossible, at the same time, to increase the tax burden by the important amount mentioned by the leader of the opposition. In view of the arguments brought out in support of the amendment of which I have just spoken, I do not believe I could logically and fairly vote for that motion.

Indeed, I am not afraid to state, at this moment, that this amendment is nothing but a motion of want of confidence; but I have no reasons to vote against the present administration, knowing, at the same time, that my vote cannot be interpreted as an approval of the whole government policy.

Mr. Speaker, a third vote will be taken on the main motion, if we are called upon to vote, because it often happens that the main motion is carried without a recorded vote. Now, rightly or wrongly, but I rather think it is wrongly, a vote in favour of the address in reply to the speech from the throne is sometimes considered as implying approval of all the bills announced in the speech from the throne. I recognize that in the one which we are now considering, there are projects that should be supported, and there are some with which I, for one, am in complete agreement, as for instance, the redistribution bill which I advocated during the session held last year, as well as the definition of Canadian citizenship. On the other hand there are other measures which I cannot support. Thus, a paragraph of the speech from the throne reads as follows:

You will also be asked to make provision for the permanent armed forces, to the composition of which much consideration has been given.

Obviously, we have not yet been informed about the consideration given to that matter. We do not know what is involved. Neither do we know how many soldiers will be included in those permanent forces, or the manner in which it is proposed to maintain them. Consequently, I cannot blindly support that paragraph in the speech from the throne.

There is another paragraph which I cannot endorse. It reads as follows:

At this session you will be asked to approve an agreement recently concluded for a loan to the United Kingdom which will help maintain the British market for Canadian food products and other exports.

Therefore, this endorses the loan we intend to grant to the United Kingdom.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not wish to discuss this matter thoroughly at the present time since it will crop up again during this session.

Mr. LALONDE: Hear! Hear!

Mr. DORION: For the time being, I shall only say that after the war years we have just gone through, our people did not expect such a policy. During the war, it was said that patience was needed and we ourselves, at times, had to explain to our constituents that they must await the end of the armed conflict for various public works which they had long been requesting, because they urgently required them. In view of the situation arising out of the loan, and the obligations it will entail and considering that no important public works are announced, it is greatly to be feared that the projects planned for the past few years will not be carried out.

When I think of the numerous villages in the Charlevoix-Saguenay constituency which are now threatened with complete annihilation by the rising tides of the sea which every year sweep away a further portion of the shore, the danger is so imminent that the next storm might literally wipe these villages off the map. These Canadians, I say, have the right to demand that the government carry out the public works projects needed to protect their property.

Considering also the inadequate means of communication on the North Shore of the St. Lawrence which make it impossible for the inhabitants of that district to live a decent life, I claim that these people are fully entitled to insist that the government spend part of the public monies on improving their communications system, rather than using that money to pay the interest on loans made by ourselves to other countries. I think of the gallant inhabitants of Ile-aux-Coudres who, living some sixty miles from Quebec City, are completely isolated from the rest of the world for approximately six months every year, because they have no wharves which could be used the year round.

About two years ago a group of citizens of Ile-aux-Coudres tried to cross the river to take a seriously ill man to the hospital, and I remember that they did their utmost in a small boat through floating ice to get him to the mainland where he could have obtained the required medical attention, but the man died because the weather prevented them from reaching the mainland before it was too late. If the people of Ile-aux-Coudres had suitable wharves they could organize a year round ferry service to the mainland.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I contend that before paying millions every year on account of the loan made to another country, our leaders should show the people that they are ready to undertake the public works which are sorely needed.

For that reason I must inform you that should a vote be called on the main motion I would have to vote against it.

There is also another matter about which nearly all those who have taken part in the present debate have spoken; I mean that matter of espionage of which I intend to say a few words.

First of all, I must say that I agree, with all those who have condemned the procedure followed in this case, in that I have deep respect for magna charta, which has been brought out with a view to proving that it had been violated by the government in acting the way it did in the arrest of the individuals whose names have now been revealed. However, Mr. Speaker, because I have deep respect and sincere admiration for the magna charta and because I want it to continue to protect our rights and liberties, I contend that the government has acted wisely.

The government acted the way it did in making the arrests precisely to prevent the sabotage of the magna charta. In my opinion the saying, "desperate ills call for desperate remedies," remains true. I am quite sure that the magna charta would have contained clauses pertaining to sabotage and treason had the possibility of such acts been forseseen at the time. Therefore, in view of the situation brought to light by the report of the commissioners, and especially by the inquest under way in Montreal, I contend that nobody should hesitate to approve the attitude of the government and particularly that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in the matter.

When, for instance, I see such items as that published in Saturday Night of March 23, and written by Willes Chitty, I wonder if one can be serious in making such statements. I shall read two sentences of that article.

(Text):

> Yet Canada tolerates, with scarce a voice raised in protest, the sweeping away with a stroke of the pen all the fruits of the struggle of the British peoples for freedom and democracy. . . .
> So, perhaps, having said all this very badly, we may sum up our indictment if as it ought to be—but never will be—laid against the war criminals at home. In our eyes, much as we despise the treason those now charged and yet to be charged with the contemptible crime of espionage, the crimes committed in the name of freedom by the bureaucrat and politician are far more heinous.

(Translation): The publication of such articles in an important and highly respectable newspaper does not constitute a frank and honest discussion of the important matter at hand. Besides, one could find to-day in our gaols hundreds of individuals who, notwithstanding the protection granted under our laws, and under the magna charta, of which so much has been said, are held in prison before they have been sentenced, even before they have been accused; everyone knows that any man who is arrested is held in jail until his arraignment before a judge, who decides whether or not to grant bail, and even when the latter is granted, it very often happens that the required amount of cash cannot be raised and handed to the cler kof the court, in which case the man must remain in prison for weeks and even months. Very often the man is acquitted because the evidence is insufficient and does not warrant a trial.

If the principle invoked to blame the government and accuse them of having transgressed the provision of the magna charta were carried to its extreme—which seems to have been the desire of some people in the past few days—such cases of detention would no longer be possible and no one could be kept in jail under circumstances such as those I have mentioned.

That is why, I believe, such an unjustified storm was raised. I was very much surprised to hear those who had no right to protest voice the strongest objections.

I remember very well that last fall, when the government presented a motion—bill 15, it was—to extend the War Measures Act, some hon. members were opposed to granting such wide powers to the government; and everyone recalls also how my motion to have the bill set aside could not be voted on for lack of support.

Is the government to be blamed if, having secured the necessary powers to enact P.C. 6444 of October 6, 1945, they invoked those very powers to act as they have done in this spy probe?

Mr. Speaker, if the government and more particularly the Minister of Justice are to be commended for the way they have dealt with this matter, we must not forget that our present difficulties are nevertheless due to neglect on the part of the government.

I cannot but recall the obvious sympathy which has existed in recent years between the liberal party and the communist party in Canada.

Mr. LALONDE: That is not so good.

Mr. DORION: I remember that after the 1935 elections, when the liberal party was returned to power, one of its first steps was to repeal section 98 of the Criminal Code. Perhaps that section did not constitute a sure means of preventing what is happening to-day but surely it was a serious obstacle to the dissemination of communistic propaganda. I remember also that in 1937-1938 the Quebec provincial government, then led by the hon. Maurice Duplessis, had the Padlock Act passed by the Legislative Assembly. How vehemently have the members of the liberal party protested against that law. It was claimed then that the Hon. Maurice Duplessis was acting like a dictator. And yet, Mr. Speaker, it was another means of preventing the dissemination of subversive and communist ideas.

Mr. LALONDE: Did it succeed in preventing it?

Mr. DORION: This marked sympathy between the liberal and communist parties became even more pronounced during the last general election. In a review published by the communist party, in July, 1944, there was an article by Fred Rose, the hon. member for Cartier, from which I quote the following:

> Ten days ago, Tim Buck, national leader of the Labor-Progressive party, submitted to the labour movement and to the country a project for the coalition of liberal, agricultural and labour forces, with a view to solving essential national problems.

And a little further:

> I have supported the speech from the throne outlining the programme of the King government for 1944. It definitely implied the adherence of Canada to the Teheran agreements, and announced a comprehensive programme of social reforms and plans for the post-war period. In regard to all major questions, that speech met practically all the requirements and immediate aims of the labour movement. It behooves the labour movement to cooperate with the liberals and with all patriotic forces in the struggle for the implementation of those plans. During the debate I advocated a union of all liberal and labour forces, to form the nucleus of national unity, to hasten the implementation of the plans submitted and to ensure their fulfilment.

Mr. LALONDE: Was this agreement approved by the liberal party?

Mr. DORION: I say to the hon. member for Labelle that I know that one day the communist party offered to cooperate with the C.C.F. party, but the latter immediately rejected the offer. I have never heard that the leaders of the liberal party had rejected such an offer of cooperation by the communist party.

Mr. MARIER: The right hon. the Prime Minister has done so.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Speaker, not only have the government displayed this measure of sympathy which I have mentioned, but through their negligence and their laisser faire attitudes, they have allowed the dissemination of communist ideas.

Mr. LALONDE: There was the Padlock Act to prevent that.

Mr. DORION: There was the Padlock Act, but if it was not applied by the Attorney General of the province, it is because, in 1939, the Liberal party was in power. It is probably the reason why the Act was not enforced.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, this laisser faire attitude was favourable to the steady dissemination of communist ideologies. I recall, for instance, that after the death of Louis Francoeur, a commentator of the C.B.C. on the French network, and a respectable man who enjoyed the esteem of his fellow-citizens, on several occasions his successors have expressed views echoing the communistic doctrine and they had thus instilled that communist poison into our homes. Although some prominent men have called the attention of the authorities to the unabated campaign of propoganda carried on by communists, the government did not deem it proper to take action.

I have here Le Droit of May 31, 1944, and I find the following on the first page:

> The Communists Are Very Active in Canada, says Mr. Kirkconnell
> Montreal, May 30 (CP).—Mr. Watson Kirkconnell, of Hamilton, Ont., stated yesterday before the annual meeting of the Royal Society of Canada, held at the University of Montreal, that "in so far as the communists in Canada are concerned, the dissolution of the Comintern has been followed by an unparalleled renewal of activity.

"Instead of calmly disbanding, he said, the Communist party, under its new name of Labor-progressive, has launched a campaign in its own country."

It is clearly demonstrated today.

A violent Marx-Lenin propaganda campaign is flooding Canada at the present time, he said.

Although the Labor-progressive party, whose national leader is Tim Buck, of Toronto, publicly professes to be on good terms with capitalism and although it dares blame the C.C.F. for its socialist tendencies, at the same time, it distributes revolutionary literature all through Canada, said Mr. Kirkconnell.

Mr. LALONDE: What about the padlock legislation of Hon. Maurice Duplessis?

Mr. DORION: There is more, Mr. Speaker. Not only has the present government allowed this propaganda, but I claim that they have even encouraged it by certain official publications. Here is one entitled Chronique ouvriere, French, and The Labour Facts, in English, and the preamble of the first number, dated February 15, 1944, states very plainly what it is all about:

Monthly information service on the part played by labour in the war effort, supplied to the Canadian labour press by the Wartime Information Board, Ottawa.

This is indeed a government organization.

All the following information may be copied or reprinted according to the needs of the various newspapers.

This first number of February 14, 1944, contains the following:

Canadian-Soviet Exchange of Labour Information

All the Canadian labour unions earnestly welcome the suggestion of the labour representatives at the national council for Canadian-Soviet friendship, who have proposed an exchange of questions and answers between the labour unions of both countries. The project has been approved by both the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Trade Congress.

And a little farther on:

Representative groups are organizing local committees in a certain number of communities. Through the national council and these local committees, the labour unions may obtain Soviet films and photos illustrating scenes of current life in the Soviet union, posters displayed in factories, books and publications on various aspects of Soviet activities.

This is quoted from a federal government official publication of February, 1944. From another issue, dated June 15, 1944, I quote the following excerpt:

USSR Workers Learn More About The Canadian War Effort

The workers of the USSR are getting a better perspective of the Canadian labour movement and the part it plays in the current war. Through the national council for Canadian-Soviet friendship, organized with the object of promoting better relations between the two countries, the Canadian labour unions are entering directly in relation with the corresponding unions in the USSR.

And again:

Besides organizing this exchange of communications between the labour movements in both countries, the national council supplies the unions of our country with authorized speakers, films, photos and literature on the Soviet union.

This again is to be found in a federal government official publication.

I therefore contend, Mr. Speaker, that the government is responsible for the situation with which we are faced nowadays; to my mind, the government, in order to satisfy the current demands of our people, will have to go further than the inquiry now in progress and will have to do more than prosecute only a few individuals. A thorough investigation into the various departments of the federal administration is imperative, since it is obvious that the ramifications of the organization brought to light recently are far more widespread than those which have been uncovered so far. The people will be satisfied with nothing less than a comprehensive investigation which will make it possible for the government to sweep away everything which smacks of communism and communistic propaganda. I am confident that after such a clean-up, and I hope the present government will perform the task thoroughly, life in our country will once again be worth living.

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, following a commendable custom, I wish to use his mother tongue, for which he no doubt holds a deep attachment, to congratulate the honourable member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) for the fluent delivery and the clearness of expression with which he has moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. LALONDE: Hear. hear.

Mr. HEON: My honourable friend has had the thoughtfulness of expressing to his compatriots from Quebec the gratitude of our western brothers for the help given to the western French radio station. There is much that could be said about that project which is so worthy, so truly Canadian, and so essential, and about the obstacles it has encountered among certain well-known elements whose true motives are easy to discern.

For the present, I shall merely emphasize that old Quebec, which ever "remembers", is not unaware of the true situation in which our French-speaking compatriots from other provinces find themselves, and that, in the words of the old ballad "It always thinks of it and never forgets". Finally, and this will be my last word on this subject, so long as our compatriots can rely on the enlightened patriotism of distinguished men, and I may mention such names as Baudoux, Yelle, d'Eschambault, Beauchemin, de Margerie, Joyal, Denis, Paimchaud, Lacerte, Bernier, Beaubien, Marcoux and many others, there will be every reason to hope and rejoice.

(Text):

I fully subscribe, Mr. Speaker, to the traditional congratulations heaped upon the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address for the able and dignified way in which they acquitted themselves of their not inconsiderable task. The leaders of the various groups in this house must also be complimented upon the distinction and ability with which they discussed, and in some cases refrained from discussing, the grave issues and problems mentioned in the speech from the throne and with which this house must of necessity be confronted during the present session.

The speech from the throne reveals a sad truth in the following excerpt:

> The turmoil which has followed in the wake of war has created new problems for governments in all parts of the globe. The world is full of unrest. Hunger, privation and suffering have become the lot of millions.

To all the peoples of occupied countries who during the war listened, often at the risk of death, at their secret radios to our pledge that if they would believe in the righteousness of our cause and help us defeat the common foe, "all the men in all the lands would live out their lives in freedom from fear and want," these enunciations of fact are far from encouraging. Yet it cannot be otherwise. For six anguished years the nations of the world have literally drenched the earth with blood, drained their resources and reserves to the last ounce, sacrificed the finest of their youth, destroyed their places of worship, their institutions of learning, their hospitals, their museums, their manufactures and their crops. The supreme cruelty lies in the fact that those least responsible for such a shameful condition in the affairs of men, the women and children of these destitute lands, will suffer the most and pay the highest price. They may well ask themselves, as we all should, if that is really what our much-vaunted Christian civilization has brought us to, twenty centuries after the Sermon on the Mount.

Shall we, as after the first world war, remain drunk with the wine of victory, return to our egoistical complacencies and forget the price paid, or shall we restore and permanently re-establish throughout a terrified world those tenets of the Christian doctrine without which an enduring peace can never be signed, much less adhered to?

The answer lies with every one of us, and on this answer will depend whether we practice—and whether the oppressed nations will believe that we practise—what we preach when we say we are the champions of Christianity and freedom; or whether we have been and are prostituting these words to achieve our own selfish ends.

The masses of Poland, the Baltic states, the Balkans, Indonesia, India, Egypt, China and Iran must not be allowed to believe that the war has been fought for the supremacy of one of five imperialisms, or for the securing of "sanitary cordons" between one great power and another, or for oil for the lamps of the Kremlin, or for battleships, nor for the privilege of making cannons instead of butter, or for the liberty of spreading anti-Christian and totalitarian ideologies, or for creating powerful fifth columns, but solely for the maintenance of moral principles, liberty and decency in every part of the world.

We have been assured that Canada has emerged from the war with its international prestige greatly enhanced, and it is apparent that through our proposed commitments we have taken a deep plunge in international affairs. I am one of those who believe in truth, simplicity and frankness in the realm of external affairs. Our policy should, in the words of the distinguished internationalist Harold Nicholson, be as follows:

> Leaders in democratic countries should by all means in their power refrain from policies which are difficult to explain openly and in detail. The public understands principles, whereas it does not understand manoeuvres: and a foreign policy based upon ascertainable and avowable principles is more likely to recommend the ordinary citizen's consent, than one based in any respect upon ingenuity and adventure.

This citation should be given a place of honour in all the foreign offices of the united nations, particularly the big three, and more particularly among the Big Three in the following order, in view of its importance to themselves and the immediate necessity of allaying growing fear and distrust in their ulterior motives: the Bear, the Lion and the Eagle.

Peter Howard, the eminent author, has admirably defined the only foreign policy which can honestly and permanently be adopted by the Big Three, if world peace is to become something more than a pipe dream:

> The great powers must educate themselves to the conception that ther duty is to serve mankind rather than dominate it.

A newspaper clipping sent to me by a friend at Harvard, whose authorship I cannot establish, puts the question brutally but thoroughly thus:

> We don't need pious, well-meant preachments which only confuse further the present confusion. We want an honest, clear-cut answer to the question: On what grounds should permissions be allowed to others which we denied to Hitler? Efficient, working agreements must be reached . . . but on what terms? And at what price? We are dead against robbery, rape and murder whether by the Wehrmacht or by others. We condemn brutal absorption of small, helpless nations by Hitler or by anyone else.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, since Wendell Willkie's "One World" has come to be, since the atomic age is with us, Canada must play its part in world affairs, a part commensurate with its immediate means and essential needs, and within the margin of its own domestic security and welfare. As much as we must, through Christian charity, our duty to humanity, and self-protection, render help to others, we also have to discharge our duties towards our fellow-Canadians. There is a limit past which a nation of 12,000,000 people, boasting a national debt of $16 billion which must continue to increase with our contemplated commitments, cannot go. We must remember that a Canada whose citizens would be saddled with a back-breaking national debt, and ever-increasing taxes, thereby becoming discontented, would be a direct liability to the United Nations, and could not therefore render the help and services which are now pledged and expected from it. As compared with our good neighbour to the south, who is one of the Big Three, and apparently the biggest of them, we have undertaken a tremendous burden of international financing and obligations: on the proposed loan to Britain we are 3·5 times more generous than the United States of America. If the great republic wants to equal our contribution in ratio of population and dollar for dollar, it should lend $12,250 million without interest. For our friends to the south of us, who love to establish world records, this is one to shoot at! ! !

Apropos of the British loan, Mr. Speaker, I must candidly admit that I have not found amongst my constituents, nor in my province, and particularly amongst the farming and lower-income groups, that degree of enthusiasm which has become evident in certain quarters. To these of my fellow citizens who are not acquainted with the intricacies of cyclical financing, international obligations, and world responsibilities, and who are mainly concerned with making both ends meet in their own little family budget after income taxes have been computed and deducted, the proposed loan is more than a question mark.

I believe that on this proposed loan, as in any other important item of the country's policy, particularly foreign policy, the government should take this House and the country into its confidence. It is not the privilege of the rank-and-file Canadian to have access to the secret files of the ministry of External Affairs or the ministry of finance, nor has he the time or the training to study the curvaceous trends of international intrigues or politics. The popular saying, "no taxation without representation" should be extended to "no taxation without explanation", so that every Canadian will know in advance what is expected of him and will then be free to determine where his true course lies.

Perhaps if Canadians were told the true situation in Great Britain, its appalling financial position, its declining world trade, and the importance of maintaining, within the European sphere, sympathy and goodwill, the answer might be quite different. Why not put the cards on the table? Marshal Stalin has, without any scruples, in his answer to Mr. Churchill's speech. Mr. Bevin has, in answer to Vishinsky's accusation. Let that be the rule the whole way through!

Personally, and I owe it to my constituents, I am awaiting the explanation of the sponsor of the British loan bill before I form a definite opinion. I want to be shown that this loan will be to the best interests of Canada and world peace, that it will help convince the majority of the nations of Europe that they must choose between democracy and another regime, and that it will provide markets for our products and furnish work and wages to Canadians. But by all means let us have the truth, the whole truth, on this measure. Canadians love truth, but they hate half truths and deliberate lies.

On this proposed loan, I should like to quote an excerpt from an article by Henry Clay in the April 1946 issue of Foreign Affairs:

> The problem is the long-term problem which will still face the United Kingdom when the transition from war to peace has been completed—the problem of establishing a balance in external relations. The proposed loan itself is likely to be exhausted before the transition is complete, but the conditions attached to it will continue to have effect. By ruling out any policy of tying exports with imports bilaterally they will deprive British exports of a certain support they enjoyed in the thirties. Taken with article eight, section four of the Bretton Woods agreement, they subject British monetary policy once more to the requirements of convertibility which will compel a prompter balancing of imports than was necessary when sterling was inconvertible.

On the whole, then, the effect of the agreement is more to postpone than to ease this long-term problem of Britain's.

In all of these international issues one very important principle must not be forgotten: Canada is not in a more advantageous but rather a less disadvantageous situation than some other countries. It is a fact that we have not been invaded, nor have we been stamped with the immediate horrors of war. This is wholly due to the grace of God, our geographical situation, the valour of our arms, and the scientific certainty that planes must sacrifice distance to bomb loads. If we had been geographically situated where Poland is, who is there in the house to say that an eagle would not have struck us in the breast and a bear in the back? Let us not lose the sense of real perspective. We are not as badly off as some other nations; that is self-evident, and thank God for it: our territory has not been riddled, nor have our women and children known the fear of a heeled and ruthless enemy knocking at the front door. Thank God for that! We are not in the humiliating and demoralizing position of having to count on the generosity of other peoples for food, clothing or credits, nor are we, through immediate exigencies and physical needs, unfortunately forced to forget national pride and international prestige. Thank God for that!

But all these situations do not make our own position one whit better than it really is. Our war veterans full and successful rehabilitation is not yet achieved, and one has only to visit, as I do, the various branches of our veterans' associations to realize that. Our housing problem remains unsolved; one has only to visit any city or town in Canada to become convinced of that. Unemployment is too high for comfort, and it is not a feature of our economy that we can truly boast of. Our industrial reconversion from war to peace lags, and one has only to enter any store to find out the discouraging shortage of consumer goods. Finally, let one glance at the income tax schedules, and he will readily grasp what our financial burdens are. It is not unfair to say, then, that although we are not as badly off as some other countries, we still have plenty to do to improve our own situation, and the Canadian people will expect us to do so immediately.

Another great issue is occupying the minds of our people through the shocking revelations of the Taschereau-Kellock commission. Personally I feel that too much wrongful publicity is being given to the affair and to those involved. There has been such an orgy of pictures of the accused, portrayed in delightful and affectionate poses with their wives, that one would almost be led to think that some of the accused have hired Hollywood press agents. There is a grave danger that the ends of justice may not be served; and those of us here in the legal profession will easily understand what I have in mind. The accused have not yet been tried, and the twelve men who will decide their fate remain to be selected. With this flood of publicity it will not be easy to select jurymen who have not formed an opinion, and the defence will have an opportunity of challenging almost everyone on the jury panel. Further, the accused have not yet been found guilty, and my years of experience as Crown prosecutor have taught me to expect the unexpected verdict from the twelve "tried and true" men. With the flowing headlines and imaginative stories that are being circulated, the accused who may be acquitted will proclaim themselves martyrs to the cause of the proletariat, whilst those who may be found guilty will loudly proclaim that they were the victims of prejudice and persecution. Some restraint is in order; once the verdict is rendered, there will be time to come to conclusions and tell the Canadian people all that should be told on this highly disturbing matter.

If I may have your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I would like to close by giving briefly my opinion on the contentious question of a Canadian flag. The various polls conducted amongst all sections of our people, and particularly our armed forces, have shown that an absolute majority deems it a matter of national pride that Canada should have a flag which it can truly call its own. The difficulty arises however in the choice of a proper, logical and true design, and the various sections of our people have expressed widely-divergent views. Some have shed abundant tears over the prospect that the union jack might be withdrawn from the design; others have championed the cause of the fleur-de-lis, but almost all have shown a particular inclination for the maple leaf.

I humbly submit that our true status within the Commonwealth suggests an honourable and satisfactory compromise. It is not the union jack which binds the peoples of the Commonwealth together, much less the fleur-de-lis. It is the allegiance to a common and revered crown which has given unity and strength through peace and war. It is our loyalty to the crown which has inspired us to take up arms and fight the good fight. Let it again be the crown that will bind all Canadians, of whatever origin they may be, together under a flag for which they will be proud to live, work and die. The most rabid nationalist and the most fervent imperialist alike will proclaim their allegiance to the king of Canada.

I am not versed in heraldics, but I feel that a flag of sober colouring with a proud and large maple leaf in the middle, in the centre of which would be imprinted a large and distinctive crown, would meet with universal respect and approval.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): A week or more ago I spoke in this house and at the conclusion of my remarks moved an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In that amendment, among other things, I criticized the agricultural policy of the government. A day or two later the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke for the government and discussed some of the suggestions I had made; and he stated the present policy of the government. In the midst of his remarks he made one statement which indicated that I was taking a different view now, being a politician, from that which I had taken some years ago when I did not suffer from the disadvantages of that classification; and he indicated further that I was correct in the earlier days but that being in my present position, I am wrong now. In view of these statements, and in view of the importance of agricultural production in these days in Canada, as well as in the world, I felt it my duty to take up some of the time of the house this afternoon to deal with this particular matter.

My amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, among other things, declared that the government had "failed to adjust their agricultural production plans to meet the altered conditions of the world's demands." In that address I said:

> The wheat acreage of western Canada can be increased by nearly four million acres by going back to the percentage of summer-fallow that was used prior to the time we started paying people not to grow wheat. We do not need to reduce the acreage that is being used for feed crops for animals.

In what I shall say this afternoon I shall deal chiefly with wheat, because under these circumstances it is of major importance in the world's food economy. I shall touch briefly on dairy products, and even more briefly say a word about the general position of agriculture in the Canadian economy.

Further on in that address I said:

> The acreage in fallow under pre-war conditions would be about fifteen or sixteen million. By going back to that amount of summer-fallow we can get three or four million acres more on which to grow wheat, which would give us thirty or forty million bushels; and in this way we will do much more to help correct famine conditions in Britain or somewhere else than will be accomplished by all the effort to save food—though I am not discouraging the government in that policy.

And I added this:

> Wheat farmers need to be allowed to get more of the world price if they are to seed three or four million acres of this land which will otherwise lie fallow this year, if they are to decrease the amount of fallow land from 19·4 million acres to about 16 million acres. All they have to do is, instead of summer-fallowing a hundred acres, to summer-fallow eighty and use the other twenty for crop.

The Minister of Agriculture has taken issue with this position. He defends the governments' policy of encouraging the summer-fallowing of some twenty million acres out of sixty or sixty-one million acres now under cultivation for cereal crops in western Canada, as contrasted with the use of a little less than sixteen millions for this purpose before the war. That is the general position.

To those not familiar with the practice of summer-fallowing, let me say that it is a practice that is developed for the conservation of moisture in farming areas with low rainfall. In western Canada last year, and for a few years previously, nearly twenty million out of approximately sixty million acres under cultivation for cereal crops in those three prairie lay fallow for the purpose of conserving moisture.

I wonder if the members of the house appreciate the extent of territory twenty million acres represents? I have here figures for the total improved farm acreage in each of the provinces of Canada. The nearly twenty million acres lying idle out there represent twenty-six times the total improved farm acreage in Prince Edward Island, twenty-four times the total improved farm acreage in Nova Scotia, sixteen times the total improved farm acreage in New Brunswick, twice the improved farm acreage of Quebec, fifty per cent more than the improved farm acreage of Ontario, twice as much as in Manitoba, over half as much as the improved total acreage in Saskatchewan, nearly as much as the total improved acreage in Alberta, and more than twenty times the total improved farm acreage in British Columbia.

I give these comparisons to show the extent of the territory which now lies idle. The question before this parliament and the Canadian people is whether it is wise to continue that proportion of land now lying idle when the world needs cereals for food, or whether it would not be wiser to reduce it to the neighbourhood of sixteen million acres; in other words, to summer-fallow four acres or a little more where we formerly summer-fallowed five.

In defending the government's position the Minister of Agriculture charged me with having one set of views on matters of agricultural policy when I was supposed to be an expert in that field, and another set of views now that I have become, to use his term, "a politician". He made clear that the views I formerly held were sound, and that the government, of which he is a member, was now following them in so far as this particular aspect of agriculture is concerned. He sought to leave with the house the impression that, being a politician, I had departed from my earlier sound views and that what I had to say now on this issue was not to be taken seriously.

I am speaking to this house to-day for two reasons. First, I want to answer the wholly unfounded charge that, as an agriculturist, I spoke one way in earlier days, and that now, being a politician, I speak another way. Second, I think it necessary in the nation's interest to expose the fallacies of some of the government's agricultural policies, particularly those with respect to wheat and dairy products. In doing this, I shall analyse the minister's address, answer his baseless charges with his own words, and show from the reports of his own department and the records of the government's bureau of statistics that his policy deserves censure and not commendation at this time, and that it should be altered to help meet the present emergency.

The minister in his address, apart from the several side issues he brought in, attempted to do three main things.

(1) He attempted to discredit the proposal I advanced that, in this time of food crisis, the summer-fallow acreage of western Canada might be safely reduced from 19,400,000 acres to about 15,800,000, and that an additional 3,600,000 acres be thus made available for seeding to wheat—an additional acreage five times the total of the improved land in the Province of Prince Edward Island. He represented this suggestion as being the view of "a politician" and that it differed from the views I held as an agriculturist in earlier days.

(2) The minister attempted to show that the increased production of farm products since 1940 was due to the government's policy of increasing the percentage of summer-fallow from about twenty-eight per cent shortly before the war to some thirty-three per cent in the years following 1940. To put it another way, he was critical of and rejected the suggestion that the acreage of bare summer-fallow in western Canada should in this emergency be reduced from the 19,400,000 acres proposed by the government to something less than 16,000,000 acres, or to be more specific, 15,800,000 acres. He saw no virtue in adding, say 3,600,000 acres that would thus be made available to the limited objective of 23,400,000 odd acres suggested by the government for wheat for this year.

(3) The minister's third main point was that the government in 1943 switched its policy from one of encouraging live stock production to one of encouraging a greater production of wheat. To use his own words:

> We did not wait until everyone over in Europe was shouting for more food before we changed our policy from one of encouraging the intensive production of meat and dairy products to one of increasing the production of wheat.

I propose to deal with these three main points the minister sought to establish. I shall deal also with several other misleading and incorrect statements he made. And I shall conclude my remarks with some general observations on the relationship of agriculture to the general economy of this country.

Let me deal first very briefly with the minister's main points. He attempted to throw discredit upon me by representing that I preached one agricultural doctrine thirty years ago and that I preach another now. In this connection I propose to show that he misquoted what I said in 1916 by omitting essential parts of what I did say. I am not saying that the minister did it deliberately; I am quite sure he would not do that. I shall show that what I said in those early years, and which the minister applauded as being sound practice for the farmers in the west, is exactly the same view I advance to-day, a view which he now says is both unwise and "political."

In connection with the minister's second main point, namely, that the government's policy of maintaining a higher than normal acreage of summer-fallow will increase the total production of wheat and other cereals, I shall show (1) that the policy of the government in this respect is not one that will increase total production but rather will decrease it; (2) that reducing the acreage of crops sown and increasing the acreage of land left summer-fallow beyond the percentage of pre-war days is a policy of decreasing production and not one of increasing production.

As for the minister's third main point, namely, that the government changed its views in 1943 from encouraging live stock production to encouraging wheat production, I shall show that the government's policies in this respect have been quite the opposite to what the minister now says they have been. I shall show that the recommendations of his own department similarly disprove his present contention.

I shall deal with the minister's comments on these matters in the order in which he referred to them in his address a few days ago. But first I wish to recall various incidents of the last few months.

First, the government held an agricultural objectives conference with the provinces in December last, at which it recommended no substantial change from the agricultural and food production policies of the preceding year.

Second, for a month or more, including February of this year, the minister visited Britain and parts of the continent; yet on his return he made no revision of the food production plans already decided upon.

Third, after waiting for many weeks for the government to come forward with a more realistic plan for meeting the emergency, I made a statement on March 8 proposing a programme of increased prices for certain agricultural commodities, particularly butter and wheat. In that statement I criticized the government for its inaction under the widespread conditions of food shortage in Britain, and famine and malnutrition in Europe and Asia.

Fourth, six days after my statement a belated announcement appeared in the speech from the throne that the government at last was taking cognizance of the situation.

Fifth, eight days after my criticism, viz. on Sunday, March 17—I see the Prime Minister smiling—and only one day before my address on the speech from the throne was to take place, the Prime Minister issued a hurried statement to the press concerning what was described as the government's plan to save more food and to export more of what we already have.

This sequence of events showed clearly the justification for the motion of censure I moved on the eighteenth instant. Then followed on the nineteenth the minister's defence to which I have referred.

I come now to the details of the minister's defence of the government in its failure to take appropriate action during this crisis. As I said, the minister's first effort was an attempt to belittle the views I expressed, by trying to show that one of them was different from a view I held and expressed thirty years ago, and again twenty-seven years ago.

In this connection he not only misinterpreted but misrepresented what I had to say. I repeat that I do not say he did it deliberately; nevertheless it had that effect. He omitted certain lines which were essential to his own understanding of the matter as well as the understanding of all those to whom he spoke or who might read his address. For instance, he read extracts from a bulletin which in 1919 while Professor of Field Husbandry at the University of Saskatchewan, I prepared for the Saskatchewan department of agriculture. The bulletin was entitled "The Summer-Fallow." It emphasized the necessity in dry areas of letting land lie idle or in "fallow" once in every two or three or four or five years, depending upon the climatic and soil conditions of the area concerned. After reading one portion of this bulletin the minister said:

> I am quite sure that the leader of the opposition will still agree that it is a good definition of what we mean by summer-fallowing. I would agree with it also.

Had he quoted other portions of that bulletin he would have obtained a clearer view of my conception of the place of summer-fallow in western Canadian agriculture. Instead, the minister proceeded to read from an article of mine prepared in 1915 and issued in 1916, entitled, "The Saskatchewan Crop Growers' Plan in War time." This article was published in "The Agricultural War Book", called "Production and Thrift," a publication issued by the dominion government in the war year 1916. The minister read three paragraphs from this article and then omitted three, one of which was essential to a proper understanding of the subject discussed. The consequence was that he not only led himself into a series of errors but completely misled this house and anyone who might read this portion of his address. The paragraph he omitted was as follows:

> We produced 10,543,796 acres of grain in 1915. We fallowed 2,043,841 acres of land and "broke" 729,553 acres of virgin prairie.

That was a total of 13,317,190 acres of land. This paragraph clearly shows that in 1915 over 13,000,000 acres of land were then in cultivation chiefly for the production of cereals. Having omitted to read this paragraph in my article the minister then proceeded to read another paragraph further on in it, as follows:

> Of the 10,500,000 odd acres that were cropped this year—

Referring to 1915.

> —very little has received any preparation for next year's crop. Under ordinary circumstances at least 3,500,000 acres of this land should be fallowed.

That is where the minister's idea of 33 per cent in fallow came from. But, Mr. Speaker, the 33 per cent of the land in crop in the year referred to was not 33 per cent of the total land in cultivation but only 26 per cent. Having omitted the pertinent paragraph I mentioned, the minister then proceeded as follows, in referring to the paragraph just quoted:

It will be noted that figure is very close to the figure stated by the leader of the opposition yesterday, being the government's idea of the proportion of the land which should be summer-fallowed.

That is in reference to the proportion of one-third. Then he continued:

But now that he speaks as leader of the opposition he thinks that figure should be lowered.

What I said thirty years ago, Mr. Speaker, was that one-third of the land in crop the previous year should be summer-fallowed, but one-third of the land in crop the previous year turns out to be only 26 per cent of the total acreage, not 33 per cent. This is where the minister's error crept in. What I said in 1916 was clear and specific. It was that of the 10,500,000 odd acres that had been in crop one year, 3,500,000 acres should be summer-fallowed the following year. That means nothing more or less than that one-third of the land in Saskatchewan that had borne a crop one year should be fallowed the next year. It does not mean that one-third of the total land under cultivation for cereals should be summer-fallowed every year, or that one-third of the land in the other prairie provinces should be summer-fallowed every year. Had the paragraph that was omitted by the minister been included in what he read it would have been apparent that there were 13,317,000 acres under cultivation and that 3,500,000 acres recommended to be summer-fallowed was not 33 per cent of that total but only 26 per cent.

From what I have said it will be clear to all that what I stated in 1916 is not different from what I said last week but, on the contrary, is almost exactly the same. I suggested in 1916, when discussing Saskatchewan conditions, not that 33 per cent of all cultivated land should be summer-fallowed but rather 33 per cent of only what had been in crop the previous year. This worked out in 1916 to be 26 per cent of the total cultivated land; and that is practically what I suggested a week ago as being desirable, having in mind the critical food situation facing the world to-day. But the government has succeeded in raising the percentage of land lying fallow in the prairie provinces from some 22 per cent in the twenties and some 28 per cent in the thirties up to 33½ per cent during the four years after it started paying people to put land into summer-fallow and not grow wheat. These high percentages in summer-fallow to-day do not arise because farmers think it is wise policy but because this government in two of those years paid farmers nearly $30,000,000. to increase summer-fallow, and because it spent another $20,000,000 to pay farmers to grow coarse grains instead of wheat. If 26 per cent only of the land were summer-fallowed instead of 33 per cent it would mean that some 15,800,000 acres only would be left uncropped rather than 19,400,000 acres, as proposed by the government. As I have said, this would leave 3,600,000 additional acres available for wheat, without in any way interfering with the government's present plans for the production of feed grains.

As hon. members will observe, this percentage of summer-fallow, 26 per cent, is exactly the same as I proposed thirty years ago in an article which the minister commended very highly. It is the same percentage that in the crisis of to-day I suggested to the government might be used now. This is the percentage of summer-fallow which would enable 3,600,000 more acres to be sown to wheat without reducing the percentage of fallow below that of the average of the fifteen pre-war years, and without reducing the acreage proposed by the government for coarse grains.

After reading further from my article of 1916 in the dominion government's "Agricultural War Book", the minister says, of what I had written:

That is sound policy, sound advice. It is just as sound in the year 1946 as it was in the year 1916, in fact, more so, because the land of western Canada to-day is thirty years older in cultivation than it was away back in 1916. We are in a position to-day where I believe the proper policy to follow is the policy that was indicated by the leader of the opposition during the period of the last war when similar demands were being made upon us as are being made now. They are demands for production over more than one year.

The minister thus commended my policy of thirty years ago. My suggestion of to-day is the same as it was then. I have never criticized farmers in some areas for fallowing half of their land. In some places in western Canada I would do it myself. I have done it on one of my farms. But under different conditions, a different rotation gives better results. All I am saying is that under these conditions of to-day we could get along with twenty per cent less summer-fallow than we have had in these recent war years. Farmers summer-fallowed more then because they were paid for two years by the government to do so. We can get an increased acreage to-day without reducing the percentage of summer-fallow below the amount the farmers themselves used before they were bonused by the government to change to another system. But the minister condemns that policy to-day because it is "political". Hon. members will know what conclusion to draw.

I come now to the second major point the Minister of Agriculture has sought to establish, namely, that by summer-fallowing 19·4 million acres out of 61 millions now under cultivation in western Canada, a larger production will be secured than if only, say, 15,800,000 acres were summer-fallowed. To put it another way, his contention is that with 41,500,000 acres in crop and 19,400,000 not in crop, (summer-fallow), there will be a greater production than if 45,100,000 acres are in crop and only 15,800,000 not in crop.

That is the problem the Canadian farmer is facing. That is the problem we face here in deciding what attitude we shall take with respect to encouraging them in their production plans.

As evidence in support of his theory, the minister referred to the average production of wheat in the years 1935 to 1939 when the percentage of land in fallow in the prairie provinces was about 28½ per cent, and compared it with the production in the years 1940 and 1944 when the average in fallow was about 32½ per cent. To use the minister's words:

The result was this—referring to wheat.

—the average crop from 1935 to 1939 was 312,000,000 bushels and the average from 1940 to 1944 was 426,000,000 bushels.

That is his argument. He says, Let us summer-fallow more than before the war; let us leave more land idle—even under these critical conditions. A little further down he said:

I am suggesting that we did follow that policy of greatly increasing summer-fallowing and we got the best results we have had in the whole history of Saskatchewan.

In other words, the minister gives all credit for this increased production to the fact that in the latter period there were over 19 million acres per year in summer-fallow and a little less than 22 millions in wheat, whereas in the earlier period there were four million acres less in summer-fallow and about three million acres more in wheat. My answer is that there is no justification whatever for accepting such a theory on the evidence given. The fact is that in the more productive period of 1940-44 there was not only slightly more fallowed land and slightly less cropped land, but there was more favourable weather, there was no major attack from wheat rust, no extensive losses from insects such as grasshoppers and cut-worms, and the varieties of wheat grown were more productive than those available in the preceding period.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Let me give some details. In the 1935-39 period the rainfall averaged 16 per cent less than in the later period. In two years, 1936 and 1937, the sum of the rainfall in the two growing seasons was an inch less than in the one growing season of 1942. One year 1937 was the driest year ever known in the history of the west. In that year I believe Saskatchewan averaged only 2½ bushels of wheat, and large areas produced nothing. Considerable areas, even under summer-fallow, produced nothing. In two years of the 1935-39 period there was a rust epidemic which reduced the production by 160,000,000 bushels; in two years there was serious damage from cut-worms and other insects—grasshoppers, wire worms and saw fly causing a reduction of over 200,000,000 bushels. In one year, 1937, in July, the temperature reached 113 degrees in the shade, an almost all-time record for the prairie region. Whenever the temperature exceeds 100 degrees in the shade for any length of time, out there it means serious consequences to the wheat crop.

In 1942, on the other hand, the yield of wheat was more than three times the yield of 1937, and two and a half times the yield of 1936.

The fault with the minister is that he takes a given position, and then seeks superficial evidence to bolster it up. In this case he gives ne credit whatever to nature. He takes it all unto himself and to the government, for no other reason than that in one period heavier yields were obtained than in another. I have never before from the lips of any responsible minister heard such a nervy attempt to take unto himself and the government all credit for the weather, and for the relative absence of unfavourable conditions.

The simple fact is that the average yield of wheat in western Canada over a period of years practically always exceeds fifty per cent of the yield of wheat sown on summer-fallow. This means that in all the wheat-growing region of Canada, outside very limited areas where the fifty-fifty plan of fallow and wheat is advisable, the total production will be increased in those rotation systems which crop two-thirds of the land each year or three-quarters of the land each year rather than in those which crop only one-half of it each year.

This does not mean that it is always less economical to follow the two-year fallow system. There are some very dry areas where this should never be departed from even in an emergency, and there are other areas where it may be more economical than any longer rotation; but the fact remains that on the average of the areas where wheat is now grown a greater total yield per farm is obtained where the land is cropped two years out of three, or three out of four, than where it is cropped only one year out of two.

All the facts of science and experimental tests go to indicate that the total production would have been considerably greater during the 1940-1944 period than it was had 25,000,000 acres a year been sown rather than the 22,000,000 that were sown.

To further bolster up his contention, the minister instances also the greater yield of oats and barley in the 1940-1944 period as compared with the 1935-1939 period. What he does not tell us here also is that the rainfall was less in the earlier period, that the acreage was less, that the damage form disease and insects was greater, and that nearly all of the oats and barley was grown, not on fallowed land, but on second, third and fourth crop land.

To climax his argument the minister says:

> If we had had the increase only in grain production it could be argued that by that policy you do not get more food than by following the other policy.

He supplements this statement by asserting that larger deliveries of hogs were made, more cattle were shipped, and more eggs and dairy products produced. Why he should advance this as an argument to bolster up his case seems incomprehensible. With 6,000,000 acres more of crop land in use in the war period, what other result could have been expected? With better pasturage from increased rains, a bigger acreage of feed crops, and the use even of wheat for live stock consumption, no other result could possibly have been expected.

The minister then follows with the ridiculous argument that this live stock production is an "addition" to these enormous amounts of grain. The obvious fact is that we do not have a double gain when we have large amounts of feed grains and a large live stock production. We can have either one or the other, but not both. Feed grains are consumed where live stock is produced. That is the price we pay for live stock. Obviously, when the acreage sown to feed grains and the acreage used for pasture and hay are all increased, the live stock must necessarily also be increased.

The minister says that by greatly increasing summer-fallow in 1940-1944, he got the best results that had ever been obtained in the whole history of Saskatchewan. The reason he gives for those good results I have shown to be erroneous.

There was another period in the history of the west when equally good acreage yields and better total results were obtained and the summer-fallow land was not then thirty-three per cent but only a little more than twenty-two per cent. It was in the period 1924-1928. In that period the seasonal rainfall was almost one-half inch less than in the 1940-1944 period. In the period, 1924-1928 wheat in the prairie provinces averaged 18·7 bushels per acre, as compared with 18·9 bushels in the 1940-1944 period. Oats yielded 31·5 bushels as compared with 33·8 bushels; barley, 26·8 bushels as compared with 26·8 bushels; rye, 16·7 bushels as compared with 13·9 bushels, and flax, 8·6 bushels as compared with 7·4 bushels. Yet in that period, 1924-1928, the area of summer-fallow was only 22½ per cent as compared with 32½ per cent in the later period. Had the lower summer-fallow percentage of the 1924-1928 period been used in the 1940-1944 period with its heavier rainfall, the total production in the later period, large as it was, would have been increased by whatever amount the five or six million extra acres would have yielded—an amount of approximately 50,000,000 bushels a year.

To conclude the discussion on this particular point, let me repeat two additional observations made by the minister. He says:

> That, Mr. Speaker, should be sufficient reason for believing that the wheat policy my hon. friend (Mr. Bracken) advocated back in 1916 was right. The policy advocated again in 1919 was just as right, and the only reason he is wrong now is that he is speaking politically instead of as an agriculturist.

I accept the compliment that I was right in 1916 and 1919, and from what I have said the house and the country both will agree that my position now is the same as then, and that the minister's policy, having changed from what he said was right, must therefore now be wrong.

His other comment was this:

> I submit again that I prefer to suggest to the farmers of western Canada that they accept the government's policy in connection with acreage in western Canada at the present time rather than the politically considered policy of the leader of the opposition.

From what I have said the house will know, and I trust the country will know, what value to place upon this gratuitous comment.

I come now to the third major point the minister attempted to make, namely, that the government switched its policy of encouraging live stock production up to 1943, and from that time on encouraged wheat production.

To quote the minister:

> That policy was carried on until the fall of 1943 and then a change was made.

A little further on he says:

So in 1943 we changed our attitude in the matter of production. We did not go to the conferences at that time and say "don't increase your wheat acreage any further".

Further on he says:

In other words, we believe that, up to date, we have followed a right policy in asking our people to produce greater quantities of wheat during the last two years than they produced previously.

Then he says:

We did not wait until everyone over in Europe was shouting for more food before we changed our policy from one of encouraging the intensive production of meat and dairy products to one of increasing the production of wheat.

That was the minister's story when he spoke to us last week. In this he assumes all virtue for such heavy production of wheat as we have had during the last three years.

I propose now to show that the record tells a wholly different story.

The dominion Department of Agriculture for several years past has held an "objectives conference" for Canadian agriculture when it attempts to plan for the following crop year. At these conferences the dominion department puts forward its views with respect to what acreages should be utilized for the production of different farm products, and what the objectives shoud be for other lines of production. Such a conference was held preceding the 1944 crop season; another was held preceding the 1945 crop season, and still another was held preceding the 1946 crop season.

Let us see what the minister had to say with respect to the production of wheat on each of these occasions. On page 4 of the departmental publication covering the objectives for 1944, there occurs this statement:

The minister stressed the need for maintaining a food tonnage output through 1944 and not only for the duration of the war but in the relief period to follow. Production of meat and other live stock products was particularly stressed, and undue optimism with respect to immediate improvement in wheat marketing prospects, the minister warned, was unwarranted.

I ask you: Does that look like encouraging wheat production, as the minister said a week ago?

On page 7 of the same publication of the minister's own department there appears this statement:

When speaking at the conference in support of the recommendation that no increase in wheat, acreage in Canada be encouraged for 1944, the dominion Minister of Agriculture cited the extent of remaining wheat surpluses and expressed the view that an average crop in 1944 on the same acreage as was planted in 1943 would provide Canada with sufficient wheat to meet the highest possible demand in the next two years.

Therefore the safest course of action would be to maintain present output of coarse grains and keep summer-fallow acreage at a high level so as to be in a position to produce more wheat if and when later required without further aggravating the present surplus position.

In these circumstances the objective for wheat in 1944 calls for 17·5 million acres, or approximately the same area sown in each province in 1943. On the basis of long-time average yields, this would result in a crop of about 280,000,000 bushels.

What happened? Was the minister encouraging wheat production then? The minister recommended 17,500,000 acres for 1944. The farmers planted 23,300,000 acres. The minister's department estimated a yield of 280,000,000 bushels for 1944. The actual production was 417,000,000 bushels. The minister did not encourage either a greater acreage or a greater production of wheat that year. The farmers nevertheless sowed nearly six million additional acres and produced 137,000,000 bushels more wheat than his department estimated for.

There is the record—the minister taking credit for increasing wheat production since 1943, and the evidence of his own statements to the contrary in each of the years then and since. There can be no other conclusion than that for such increase in acreage and in production as we have had in these last three years, the farmers of Canada and not the minister and not the government deserve the whole credit.

Turning now to the agricultural programme advanced by the minister's department for the 1945 crop season, what do we find respecting the production of wheat? On page 5 of the department's agricultural programme publication for 1945, in a foreword by the Hon. James G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, appear these statements:

The agricultural programme for Canada in 1945 again emphasizes the production of live stock and dairy products.

Further down he says:

While a continued heavy demand for live stock products means indirectly a good market for oats and barley, the outlook for wheat, on the other hand, is less certain.

And a little further down he adds:

Taking these various factors into consideration and recognizing that we have reached, or are very near, the peak of production with available acreage and man-power, it seems desirable to divert as much land and labour to the production of feed grains as the production of live stock products will require. Accordingly, the programme outlined in this report suggests that in 1945 the area devoted to wheat be 20,700,000 acres in the prairie provinces, and a total of 21,5000,000 for all of Canada. This would represent an acreage slightly less than was seeded in 1944. The remainder of the acreage devoted to grain in 1944 should go into oats and barley, leaving the area in summer-fallow approximately unchanged.

Does that look like changing his plans and encouraging wheat production?

On page 7 of the same departmental document there appears this statement:

In his opening address to conference delegates, the Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. James G. Gardiner, made particular reference to meats, dairy products and wheat.

An a little further on in the same paragraph:

Dairy production should be maintained at maximum levels but in the case of wheat, the supply is in excess of the anticipated demand for at least another crop year and no increase in production is advised.

This statement the minister's department reports him as having made with respect to last year's wheat crop. Can anyone interpret that as meaning that the minister had changed his policy and was encouraging wheat production?

The report of the "objectives conference" for the 1946 season, as well, indicates again that the government does not ask for any increase in the wheat acreage.

In 1944 the farmers did not accept his advice. They seeded 6,000,000 extra acres and produced 137,000,000 extra bushels.

In 1945 also the farmers did not accept his advice. Instead of seeding 21,500,000 acres, they seeded 23,400,000 acres.

And now in 1946 again he advocates no change in acreage for wheat even though the world is facing the greatest food shortage in the history of our time.

A week ago the minister said he was encouraging wheat production during these last three years. From what I have quoted of his attitude at the three conferences mentioned it will be clear that his attitude was quite the contrary.

I come now to the consideration of other views with respect to this matter. In referring to the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a week ago Sunday, I shall not quote my own views but those of a newspaper that is a very close and intimate friend and admirer of the government, the Winnipeg Free Press. This is what it says:

To many people in Canada, this contribution to solving the crisis will seem somewhat inadequate, the reductions in civilian supplies trifling and the general "do-nothing" directive to the farmers a counsel of selfishness.

This is from the Winnipeg Free Press of March 22. It continues:

But, admitting these things and giving them full weight, the fact of world famine remains. Wheat is what will save human life and wheat alone; and without permanently damaging our soil or the long-run prospects of our export markets, more wheat can safely be sown.

A little further on:

In the circumstances Mr. Gardiner's attack on Mr. Bracken in the House of Commons on Tuesday was unfair. Mr. Bracken had urged the use of summer-fallow. Mr. Gardiner retorted that Mr. Bracken, when he taught agricultural science in 1916 took another view, and that he was now only playing politics. What Mr. Gardiner is playing we really do not know; but we fancy that if he were living in Europe on 800 calories a day, he would be glad enough of another slice of bread.

It concludes the editorial in this way:

How can we justify our present course either to ourselves or to mankind? We have, relatively speaking, everything. We have a daily diet unsurpassed by any other nation in all the wide world. We luxuriate in food. We squander it lavishly. There is a world famine, and what do we do? We reduce the amount of grain for whisky-making by half. We cut down our flour consumption by one-tenth. We do not permit any collections of money for the purchase of food because it may cause some inconvenience somewhere or other. We ought to be ashamed.

Those are not my words; those are the words of the Winnipeg Free Press referring to the policies outlined by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture.

I come now to the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). He said:

There is some wheat being held on farms in western Canada, principally due to the present levels of income tax combined with the uncertainty of yields from the new crop to be harvested in 1946.

Then further on he says:

With this objective in mind the government has made an arrangement whereby wheat, which producers may not have intended to deliver at the present time, can be marketed and sold over the next three months, with cash settlement made at any time the producer may choose in 1946, 1947 or 1948.

That is a half-way policy. It will help to get out some of the wheat that is being held back for the reasons the minister gives, but it will not bring it all out. These farmers were concerned, not alone with their income tax on possibly heavy crops in a single year but with the price of wheat next year and the year after that. With the world price nearly $2 a bushel and this government requiring Canadian wheat to be sold at no more than $1.55 on the world market to Britain, a little more to some of the other small countries, and only $1.25 at home, I have no doubt that many of these men are expecting higher prices in the future and may be holding back wheat in order to take advantage of that. The minister may get some deliveries with his new plan but he will not get all. He can get delivery of all if he will do one of two things. Let him either increase the price—or take his controls off wheat and allow the world price—or let him tell the farmers definitely that they will not in later years be allowed any higher price than he is allowing then to receive to-day. As long as there is a prospect of their getting a higher price later they will be tempted to hold the wheat back. I suggest that the remedy is to take some of the restrictions off and let the wheat be sold at least up to $1.80, if not at the present world market price.

I wish now to refer briefly to the dairy situation, to which I also made reference the other day. About three years ago the government established subsidies for dairy products, which subsidies have remained substantially fixed ever since except for seasonal changes. The result is that gross returns to producers of dairy products have remained fixed for the past three years, with one or two minor exceptions. Yet during the period when dairy returns were relatively fixed, dairy farmers' costs have been steadily rising. In western Canada feed costs have risen some forty per cent and farm wages have gone up fifty per cent. In eastern Canada feed prices, since December, 1942, have risen eleven per cent and farm wages have risen twenty-five per cent or more. Good farm labour is difficult to hire, and the result is that dairy production all along the line is decreasing rapidly. The turn came eighteen months ago, in the prairie region, when milk production started to decline. In this area the decline has been going on for eighteen months with no sign of a let-up. In eastern Canada the decline started six months ago and is gaining momentum. All lines of dairy production are falling—cheese, butter and concentrated milk products—and at the same time that production is falling the demand is increasing.

We now have 600,000 more people in Canada than a year ago. At the end of this year there will be another 200,000 more people in Canada than at present. Yet the government sits placidly by and does not seem to realize that price determines production. There is only one way to prevent the decline in dairy production from developing into a real crisis in the next twelve months, and that is to increase the return to dairy producers now.

The government has taken upon itself the functions of the free-price market. It controls the financial returns to producers through subsidies and price ceilings. If the decline in production is to be stemmed and turned into increasing production, the dairy farmers must have higher returns. The dairy products price and subsidy schedules need immediately to be drastically revised to provide increased returns to dairy farmers. Under the present dairy products prices, farmers will not continue to milk cows under conditions of dear and scarce labour, high feed costs, and the price of dairy products out of line with beef cattle prices.

I wish to thank the house for its attention. I will not take time to summarize what I have said. Most of the points I have tried to make the members will understand and, I hope, agree with.

As for the position of agriculture generally, let me conclude with these brief words. Agriculture has never had a square deal except in war. It has never had even an approach to a square deal during the life of the present government until the last three years. It is now entering upon a period of declining production under the government's restrictive policies: price ceilings discouraging production, income tax denying wages to certain members of farm families, failure to get labour back on the farm, farmers' costs mounting, failure to keep farm prices up to mounting farm costs. In general, farmers fear a return to the conditions prior to 1943, when one-third or one-quarter of the Canadian people living on farms never got anything approaching that proportion of the nation's income.

I wish to leave on the record a statement showing the cost of things farmers buy compared with prices of Canadian farm products. It is a table of figures, perhaps the house will permit me to put it on Hansard:

Index Numbers of Cost of Things that Farmers Buy and Prices of Canadian Farm Products*

1926-29=100

	Cost of things that farmers buy	Prices of Canadian farm products	Prices of Canadian farm products (adjusted)
1935	77·4	62·9	....
1936	78·5	68·8	....
1937	83·6	86·3	....
1938	81·4	72·9	....
1939	79·5	63·7	....
1940	80·6	66·5	67·8
1941	91·3	75·6	79·4
1942	99·7	81·7	87·8
1943	104·3	95·0	101·5
1944	106·0	101·9	108·0
1945	107·3	104·4	109·6

* Index numbers from Dominion Bureau of Statistics converted to base period 1926-29=100.

 Price index of farm prices adjusted upward for agricultural price subsidies, W.A.R., P.F.I., wheat participation certificates 1940-41-42—and free freight subsidies.

Upward adjustments for each year as follows: 1940—2 per cent; 1941—5 per cent; 1942—7·5 per cent; 1943—6·8 per cent; 1944—6 per cent; 1945—5 per cent.

I should like to impress upon the house what these figures mean. They mean that except for the last three years, prices of farm products, including subsidies, have never, since before the war started as almost never in the history of the past, approached the level of the cost of things that farmers have to buy. The black line that hon. members see on the diagram I have here shows the cost of things farmers have had to buy from 1935 until the present time. The red line shows the average price of farm products. The latter was always lower until the last three years, except in one period 1937 when there was a wheat failure in the west. The price of wheat went sky-high for those days and thus brought the average farm price for that year above the price what farmers had to buy.

That is the position of agriculture in the Canadian economy. If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, it is for that reason more than any other that I find myself in the position I am in to-day. I realized that position—the inequity which agriculture had always had to bear. It is clear from this table and from the chart that during the eleven years reported, like all the years preceding, agriculture has never had a square deal until the last three years.

The provincial governments cannot correct these conditions; the dominion government can. I supported this governement for twenty years. On its agricultural and certain other policies including this very wheat price situation I differed with them, and so when the party I lead, in its platform in 1942, determined to try to get a square deal for agriculture and to start by raising the initial price of wheat from 90 cents to $1.25 I came with them.

The record for agriculture is that, except occasionally in war years, the price of things the farmers have to buy has always been away higher than the price of things the farmers have to sell. In general, farmers fear a return to conditions prior to 1943, when one-third or one-quarter of the Canadian people living on farms never got anything approaching that proportion of the nation's income.

I suggest that the government relax its price ceiling restrictions on farm products; that it remove such restrictions as limit the production of food, and, in some cases, perpetuate scarcity. Let it tell its price ceiling controllers to raise the ceiling limits on needed farm products, and let production increase to feed ourselves, to sell to the world and to help keep the hungry from starving.

In the meantime I would change the stupid policy which keeps the price of our export wheat forty or fifty cents below the world price, and either fix it at $1.80 instead of $1.55, or let the world price prevail until the shortage is corrected. I would increase at once the price of at least one dairy product, namely, butter. I would say to farmers: summer-fallow only four acres where you summer-fallowed five acres before; sow seven acres where you had planned to sow six acres, and thus make available thirty or forty million bushels of wheat, food enough to feed the whole population of Britain for at least a month.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest that the main amendment should receive the support of the house.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): It was the intention of the members of this group to try to shorten this debate. That was our intention until this afternoon. When this debate opened, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) rose in his place and informed the house that as far as he and his party were concerned they were prepared to shorten the debate and to facilitate the work of the house in order that we might get down to specific items and try to do something about the pressing problems before us. Although he made that announcement he proceeded to tell us that he himself did not intend to carry it out. At that time he occupied fully two hours of the time of the house, and even then we were prepared to go along.

Mr. TUSTIN: The hon. member's party has had the highest percentage of speakers taking part in this debate.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member's party was the first to break the arrangement.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have taken three hours.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not mind the interruptions; they do not know any better. We were quite prepared to take the vote this afternoon, but we find ourselves in this position. The leader of the opposition takes the floor again and expects the members of this house who have something to say to provide him with an audience while he goes over the country on two or three more expeditions. So far as I am concerned—

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is defending the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. COLDWELL: We shall tell you.

Mr. GILLIS: I am criticizing the man who asked the members of this house to try to facilitate the work and shorten the debate. Certainly he did not set a good example. That is why I am on my feet at this time exercising my right as a member of the house—

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not a good enough reason.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a good reason.

Mr. GRAYDON: No.

Mr. GILLIS: —and make some contribution to the debate. I am going to deal with the subject matter that I rose to discuss.

Unlike the leader of the opposition I am going to try to be as brief and explicit as possible. I am not going to try to cover the whole country, Europe and all those other matters that have been gone over. Since 1940 I have sat in this house many times listening to the debates, and I have questioned whether many of the people who have been in public office for the last twenty-five or thirty years mean anything when they rise and make a statement. In viewing them at close range, and being in close association with them and listening to their statements and their taking another course within fifteen minutes, the wonder to me is that we still have a country, because their statements do not mean very much. I am thinking of the statements made a few moments ago by the leader of the opposition. I am not an agriculturist; I have read something about agriculture. I know something about the record of public men in this country for the last twenty-five or thirty years, and I cannot reconcile the statements made by the leader of the opposition this afternoon with the fact that in 1940 he was on the platform with the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King) advocating Liberal policies and defending the very things that he condemned this afternoon. It leaves the ordinary layman in a kind of quandary. Do they mean anything? Will the statements made this afternoon hold good next year? Will the leader of the present opposition be a Liberal next year, a Conservative, a Progressive Conservative, or what tag is going to be on him? Will he stand up to the pronouncements made this afternoon? When a person makes a statement I believe he should mean it; he should follow it through. If the policies and principles announced in 1940 were good at that time I have not seen anything happen that should change them. It is exactly the same situation.

To get back to the speech from the throne, I wish to join with other hon. members in paying my tribute to the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They made an excellent presentation of a bad case. I particularly wish to compliment the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. Sitting here and listening to him making a statement, I thought it was statesmanlike, but during the course of his discussion I wondered whether I belonged to the same province or not, having in mind particularly his defence of the policies of the government in matters of rehabilitation, employment, prosperity and all the things that mean something in the everday life of the people of that province. I certainly could not accept his statement with regard to the way the policies of the government are working out at the present time.

I wish to say a few words about unemployment, because in the speech made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) he might lead the house and the country to believe that the 263,000 unemployed in this country at the present time—those are the registered unemployed; there are many not registered—were just a seasonal matter, and that most of these people would be out of work under ordinary circumstances at this season of the year. I wish to assure the minister and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg that unemployment in Nova Scotia is not a seasonal matter. It is something that has been there for many years, something that will develop into a permanent situation unless steps are taken to correct it. I should like to draw the attention of the minister and the government to a statement made by one of their own officials, as carried by the Halifax Herald within the last couple of weeks. The statement was made by Mr. Michael Dwyer, who is at present regional director of selective service for the maritime provinces. He certainly did not say that the unemployment problem in Nova Scotia is a seasonal matter. He made the startling statement that some 60,000 will be seeking jobs by June of this year. I am going to read just a short extract from the newspaper report, in order that it may be on record for the minister to read and check up with his own officials, as to the problem in that province.

Mr. Michael Dwyer, who is the maritime selective service director and former minister of mines, declared in an address to members of the Halifax Commercial Club, that 60,000 Nova Scotians will be unemployed by June of this year. This number will be without work even though all wartime factories were to be reopened and employment made available as in 1939, which was considered to be the province's top year. Mr. Dwyer also revealed an unpleasant fact when he said that an average of 15,000 young people each year leave this province in order to seek employment elsewhere.

I should like to focus the attention of the minister on this point. In 1939, when war broke out, there were thousands of young men in the mining districts and rural districts throughout Nova Scotia who never in their lives had the right to a job. They went into the services. While the war was being fought there was no expansion of industry in Nova Scotia or the maritimes generally. During the course of the war a few war plants were created, but immediately upon the cessation of hostilities those plants were closed. As I say, many of these young men who donned the uniform in 1939 and 1940 never had the right to a job; and despite all the promises made by the government that they were building a brave new world, and that these young men would come back to all the things they did not have in the thirties, everyone of these men is coming back to exactly what he left in 1939. There is nothing for them except their gratuities; to live off them as long as they can and then, when the gratuities are gone, to find themselves exactly where they started in 1939, after fighting one of the worst wars in the history of this world. So that in reality the gratuity is not something given for service rendered; it is merely an interim payment of relief until such time as they go back on the regular relief rolls. That is about the only way to classify it.

The situation in that province requires that something should be done immediately. It is not good enough for the minister to rise in his place in the house and be optimistic about the picture, depending upon something happening. Something should be done at once. There are many things that can be done. For example, there is the strait of Canso project. The facts, figures and everything have been gone into; it has been discussed in this house in season and out of season. Back in 1942 the reconstruction committee recommended it, and it should have been commenced. If that one project alone had been started a year or so ago it would have taken the edge off the unemployment problem, temporarily at least; it would have been something for two or three years, and would have given us an opportunity to look around and see what else could be done. Many public works projects could be commenced in that province. Money has been appropriated for them; the contracts have been let, but still nothing is done.

The question of materials has been raised. We are told they cannot get the materials. Why not? I have an opinion on that point, and I am going to state it. Every speech that comes from the opposition ranks here is directed to the removal of price controls and the elimination of the excess profits tax. In my opinion, the manufacturers and those who supply materials in this country to-day, whether it be lumber, shirts, socks—which you cannot buy—are on a sit-down strike, exerting pressure on the government to have these controls removed. That is my honest opinion. Go back to 1939; were not the same methods employed then? A bill was passed in this house writing in a profit limitation on war contracts. That statute was suspended by order in council, and when the Minister of Munitions and Supply was questioned as to why that had been done he told the house quite frankly that for months he had tried to let war contracts to the industrialists of this country, when our backs were to the wall and we required more materials, but he could not get them to accept war contracts until the profits limitation was removed. In my opinion, the same thing is going on to-day. In the field of housing you are not going to have houses built for the same reason. I believe the shortages in this country are artificially created. I believe the manufacturers are using the same methods they used in 1939, by withholding materials, creating unemployment, and having everyone sing the swan song with all controls, hoping for their removal and the removal of the excess profits tax. When that is done, in my opinion there will be no difficulty in getting materials in this country, and the things necessary to start our economy rolling in the right direction to supply peace-time needs. Personally I hope the government has sufficient back-bone to examine that problem realistically, because as a worker who suffered during and after the last war I know that if price controls are removed to-day and we are thrown into the hands of free enterprise as we were in the thirties, the people of this country are in for a terrific licking during the next few years.

I mention that just because someone has to face up to it, and the government must accept their share of responsibility. During the war the government planned their economy. They allocated their materials; they fixed their prices and directed the whole economy of this country for war purposes. As soon as the war ended, however, they said that free enterprise was going to do the job, so they sat back and passed it over. Now no one is carrying the ball, because the other fellows are sitting back and doing everything they can to embarrass the government, because they want to get back to the place where they can extract the savings the people built up during the war, and get the prices they want for everything. This procedure of shadow-boxing with the problem of building houses and of supplying the necessities of life is not enough. The government is not facing up to the problem.

The official opposition, in my opinion, are simply the agents of the big industrialists, and are being used as pressure groups in the house in order to force the government to relax controls, so that industry may have unrestricted opportunities in the future to exploit the people.

What do the big fellows behind the scenes think about all this? An editorial which appeared in the Labour News of December 24, 1945, would give some indication. This is the official organ of the workers' educational association, a well-informed organization. This editorial quotes from the upper strata behind the scenes and, so that we may have a better understanding of the people with whom we are dealing, I shall read what is stated here.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Where was it published?

Mr. GILLIS: In Toronto.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That explains it.

Mr. GILLIS: This is a well-informed organization, comments of which are often quoted in the house. The editorial quotes these words of William L. Kleitz, vice-president of the Guaranty Trust Company.

> I think that depressions are inevitable under the free enterprise system and that the best we can hope to do is to limit their depth and their duration.

Here is another good one, quoting the New York chamber of commerce:

> Depressions are the price we pay for freedom.

Here is another good one, quoting John W. Scoville, former chief economist for the Chrysler Corporation:

> If the people living in slums don't like them, let them move out. Some people like to live in one-room shacks. There is no solution to this problem. Certainly industry doesn't intend to attempt the impossible. . . . One of the worst of current fallacies is that everyone has the right to a job.

And another good one, quoting Walter Lippmann:

> The underlying fact is—to put it bluntly—that in reaction against the consequences of excess employment there is a patent desire in the great middle mass of the people for enough unemployment to reestablish their lost bargaining position and to restore industrial discipline. This reaction is particularly strong, of course, wherever the war has changed the relative bargaining power of negro and other racial minorities. . . . The attitude of employers . . . is in substance that they must not and need not make bad bargains now since they will be able to make better bargains later on. For a little later on, there will be more men than there are jobs, and there will also be no more price ceilings.

These are the people who want the removal of price controls. These are the people who want to have wages frozen, so that they may keep standards low and build the ranks of the unemployed to the point where there will be three men for every job. That is their basic philosophy—the philosophy of free enterprise. These are the people to whom the government is catering at the present time, and for whom it is removing controls from the very necessities of life, to a point where in Canada to-day the dollar has lost about fourteen per cent of its purchasing power—and all this since the cessation of hostilities.

So that at the present time the trend is downward. Income is of no use to anyone, if someone else is allowed to take it from him by back-door methods, or in the ways proposed by those gentlemen whose opinions I have just placed on record, and for whom the official opposition are, in my opinion, acting as a pressure group in the house, to get back the sort of thing we had in the thirties.

I should like now to say only a few words to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). On several occasions in the house he has expressed his complete belief in cooperation between labour and management, and he has expressed approval of the setting up of industrial councils, and all that sort of thing.

It is all very well for the minister to speak in that way in the house. However, I would draw to his attention a matter of some concern at the present time. The steel industry in this country for some time has been seeking an agreement. I know the plant in Sydney has been trying to renew its wage agreement for the past two years. They have been patient, and are still patient. The steel companies of Canada have taken the position that they must have an increase in the price of steel. According to last Thursday's issue of the Financial Post, a delegation from the steel companies waited on Mr. Donald Gordon, at which time Mr. Gordon informed them that there would be an increase in the price of steel, and that such increase included a provision for an adjustment of wage rates in the steel industry, for the benefit of employees of steel companies.

When he was questioned as to the extent of the increase he replied that the steel workers would go to the employers for purposes of bargaining. The position is that while representatives of the government will meet with the steel companies and will make available to them certain subsidies so as to increase prices, the steel workers' unions are not permitted to take part in these arrangements.

Money is given to the steel companies. The unions are placed in a position where they must bargain with employers, and pass through all the ramifications of war labour boards, and all that sort of thing. The position is absolutely unfair. I believe that when public funds are being used to subsidize an organization for certain purposes, all who are interested in or concerned with the arrangement should be called in for purposes of consultation.

I suggest that the Minister of Labour should consider calling together the steel workers' union, a great national organization, which embraces the whole of Canada from coast to coast. Officials of that organization should be called to meet with officials from the steel companies. They should be permitted to sit down together to find out exactly what can be done by way of cooperation to improve not only the industry but the working conditions of employees in the industry.

I leave these thoughts with the minister because I believe that, despite his expressions in the house respecting cooperation between management and labour, he has failed to follow through when dealing with these organizations. The steel situation is a glaring example of this fact.

I should like to conclude by stating that at the last session of parliament the leader of this group placed before the government six simple proposals, none of which would cost very much to apply, certainly not nearly as much money as many of the boards functioning to-day which are cluttering up and confusing further already confused issues. I suggest that the government should carefully consider these proposals, the first of which was as follows:

(1) That there be a lay-off or severance pay to provide twenty-five dollars per week for all displaced workers until they are reemployed.

That applies to war-workers and service personnel. And then:

(2) That discharged veterans be paid full pay and allowances until reinstatement in civilian life with the same minimum of twenty-five dollars a week.

The government is wasting much more money than that to-day in administrative costs. Then:

(3) That in order to maintain the purchasing power of Canadian farmers floor prices for agriculture be extended and continued.

(4) That we have legislation to protect workers' and farmers' equities in their homes and to prevent evictions and foreclosures.

Many people who accepted obligations by taking homes during the war, now find themselves unemployed. They are now faced with the possibility of losing those homes. Then:

(5) That immediate action be taken to raise wages in industries frozen at sub-standard levels.

(6) An extensive public low-rental housing programme which will provide both large-scale employment and urgently needed homes.

As I said a minute ago, if this simple programme were followed out, and if some of the money put into boards across the country to-day—boards that are tangling and twisting things, because of their red tape—were spent on this type of programme, we would have something worth while done in the country. We would have done a job which is not being done to-day.

Another thing that should be done and done immediately—and this matter comes within the purview of the Department of the Minister of Labour—is that at this session of the house the government should, in my opinion, fix for everybody in this country a basic minimum income below which no one should be permitted to work. That, I think, is fundamental. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I had to take this amount of time but you can blame it on the leader of the opposition.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to throw any bouquets at this late stage of the debate, but after reading the speech of the Tory member for Queens (Mr. McLure) I decided that I would have to make a few remarks. In congratulating the mover of the address (Mr. Viau), the hon. member for Queens praised him for his excellent French, but he did not compliment him on his English. I wish to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Queens is about as well qualified as I am to congratulate anybody on their French, and I am not qualified to do that. He did not congratulate him on his English, and I now take the opportunity of doing so for Prince Edward Island. I wish also now, since I am complimenting people, to congratulate the seconder (Mr. Winters), because, for one reason, he is a maritimer, and secondly, because he looks like my own boys, and he did an excellent job. I am not going into details.

I cannot agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in his idea of shortening up debates in this house. I do not speak much myself: I have not been in very good health lately but I am all right to-night. The leader of the opposition did not set a good example, because he read two long essays on how to shorten the debate.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Do not read yours.

Mr. GRANT: I do not intend to read mine. I have never done so.

Mr. BROOKS: You have never spoken.

Mr. GRANT: I have only a few guiding notes. The interrupter across the way reminds me of a little story. It was the time the Tories were in power here, during the last two years of the Tory regime.

Mr. TUSTIN: How about the tunnel?

Mr. GRANT: Coming up to the House of Commons, members would be asked for nickels and dimes by people who were hungry. That was in the last two hungry years of the Bennett regime.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And when your leader said, "not a five-cent piece."

Mr. GRANT: A member was coming up here one day and, on meeting one of these boys to whom he was accustomed to giving a quarter, he automatically put his hand in his pocket to get a coin, but when he got near the fellow he noticed his face was all blackened up. He said, "Are you the man I generally give a quarter to?" The man said, "yes". The member said, "What has happened to you?" The man said, "To tell you the truth, mister, I was talking when I should have been listening." And what I have to say to my hon. friend across the way is, he should be listening instead of talking.

The leader of the opposition wishes to hasten things. He is somewhat like his friend Mr. Drew; he is watching which way the wind blows, and then at an opportune moment he trims his sails accordingly. I happened to go to church on Sunday. There was a mission going on, and when the time came for the sermon and the preacher stepped into the pulpit I saw that he was a young man from my own home parish, a missionary. He got talking about this business of hastening. Everybody, he said, is hastening to do this, that and the other thing—hastening to get up, hastening to get a cup of coffee, hastening to get to work; they are hastening to catch everything and have no time for prayer, and "finally", he said, "they will be hastening to catch the hearse." I thought the remark was very apt.

Between 1935 and 1945 the Conservative party had no representative from Prince Edward Island in this house, and they appointed a man from York-Sunbury by the name of R. B. Hanson to look after the Tory interests of the island. He did so with a vengeance. He complained bitterly and continuously about the transportation, he kept it up day and night, and then, when anything would be gotten for the island—which he knew nothing at all about—he would claim that it was on account of his speeches that we got something for the island. Now the hon. member for Queens is taking Mr. Hanson's place, but I tell you one thing, sir, he can never fill Mr. Hanson's shoes, because he could not be so contemptible.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That would not be said if he were sitting in the house.

Mr. GRANT: During the last election campaign Mr. Hanson came over to speak in my constituency, and he spoke at Souris.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Which Souris?

Mr. GRANT: Prince Edward Island. I will say this, that my opponent was a gentleman, and he made, I understand, a splendid speech, but Mr. Hanson when he rose to make his speech said he could not understand the mentality of the people of Kings in voting for a man like Doctor Grant. He said that to look at him across the floor of the house was enough for anybody. And there was an old gentleman in the hall who told the candidate, "Mr. MacPhee, you made a lovely speech to-night, but your friend Mr. Hanson made a lot of votes for Doctor Grant." I did not hear anything about this at the time. I became sick two weeks before the election was over and I did not hear this story until months afterwards, because I was in the hospital.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Incommunicado.

Mr. GRANT: I was telling my wife about it, that he had said that to look at me across the floor of the house was enough for anybody. So she said, "Look, dear, don't mind the old toad; your looks are the best of you."

I wish now to come to another matter. These are pretty light matters I have to deal with to-night, because I am answering the Tory member for Queens. I come to the question of Prince Edward Island being left off the map of Canada. I understand the hon. member insinuated that it was the fault of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). But there is a history to this, and I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, why my opponent considered it a bad omen. In 1935, when R. B. Bennett held on to office to the last minute he decided to change the name of the Tory party to the Reform party. No one listened to him very much because most people intended to vote against him anyhow, no matter what he called the party. He issued a booklet about the size of that, with a blue cover on it, and on that cover there was a map of the Dominion of Canada and Prince Edward Island was not on that map. My hon. friend remembers that joke because I blazoned it all over the country, and he himself at that time was defeated most disastrously. He almost lost his deposit. That is why he thinks it is a bad omen for Prince Edward Island to be off the map. As one of the daily papers said to-day, however, it is not necessary for Prince Edward Island to be on the map. Prince Edward Island is so well and favourably known all over the world that it is not necessary for it to be on the map at all.

I have to call my hon. friend, "the Tory member for Queens" because Queens is a dual constituency and I do not know whether he or the other member is the senior member. He was here from 1930 to 1935 and was then defeated; the other member came in in 1937, and now I do not know which of them is the senior member. Therefore I shall have to call my hon. friend the Tory member for Queens. This gentleman sat in this house for five years, almost six years, under the Bennett administration and was never known to raise his voice in the interests of transportation.

Mr. McLURE: Oh, yes.

Mr. GRANT: Hold on now; I will tell you. During that time two branch railway lines in my own constituency were closed entirely, scuttled by the Bennett government, and mail routes were established over those lines, but the Tory member for Queens never objected to that. The railwaymen's pay was cut 10 per cent or more; even the poor sectionmen's pay was cut, and the pay of civil servants was cut down; but the Tory member for Queens never objected, not a bit. He crawled before the feet of Lord Bennett and it was a hard job for him because he is pretty stout, like some of his colleagues.

We know why Bennett stayed on the gold standard. I am not an expert on these matters, but it was simply to enrich his millionaire friends. Although a poor man could not borrow $25 from a bank during those five years, there were more millionaires made in Canada than during any other five years since confederation, and a million people were on relief at the end of it. Do you know, Mr. Speaker why the Tory member for Queens is always called to order? He does not know the rules of this house and he is called to order every time he opens his mouth, and why? Not because he is a Tory; not at all. Our Speakers are more favourable to Conservatives, as far as assigning rooms is concerned anyway. He was here for five years and yet he does not know the rules of the house. He did nothing during those five years—nobody did anything but Bennett—and now he comes back into the house after an absence of ten years, during which time he should have been studying the rules of the house, and he knows nothing. Those are the facts.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not run down Prince Edward Island.

Mr. GRANT: There are not many Tories in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. GRAYDON: The by-elections in the province do not show that.

Mr. GRANT: I shall have to tell another story and it will be a better one the next time. I am not through yet. I wish to point out another thing to the Tory member for Queens, and I am sorry to have to say it right here: he should thank the Liberals for the fact that he is sitting in this house to-day. Queens county is a dual constituency, or a twin constituency, but the two Liberal candidates were not twins. That is why he is sitting over there. We know all about it in the island, and I warned them about it, but as between the two Liberals it was a case of the survival of the fittest and that is the truth.

An hon. MEMBER: He is the fittest.

Mr. GRANT: I am talking about the Liberals.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member who has the floor to address himself to the Chair, and to hon. gentlemen who are interrupting I would appeal for order.

Mr. GRANT: My hon. friend the member for Queens is a friendly, nice fellow. He is all right. But he said that in the speech from the throne there was no provision for the jobless. I do not think a Tory member sitting there, who sat in this house from 1930 to 1935, should ever mention the word "jobless", and I do not see where the jobless are in our province. There are no jobless in our province. We are looking for help in our province and the hon. member knows it. There may be some young men home from the army, but are they in want? No; they are getting out-of-work benefits, which amounts to a good day's pay for them.

Mr. FRASER: They are still jobless.

Mr. GRANT: But they are not starving as they were when the Tories were in power. The people of Prince Edward Island did not starve while Bennett was in power, for this reason: They grew a good bit of stuff but they could not sell it and they had to eat it all. Prince Edward Island is God's own country. We have no Japs, no Social Credit, very few C.C.F.—

Mrs. STRUM: There will be more after a while.

Mr. GRANT:—and not too many Conservatives. Like his predecessor, R. B. Hanson, the hon. member for Queens takes credit for any grants that are made for Prince Edward Island. He says, "I made fine speeches last year and I got the whole lot." Well, the car ferry was under construction before he was ever nominated. Grants for the piers, amounting to $5 million, were all decided on before he was ever nominated to run in an election. The grants to the hospitals were decided on by the committee on hospitalization before he was nominated.

An hon. MEMBER: Which party?

Mr. GRANT: What party was in power in the last ten years? Why, the Liberal party, of course. We have been in power since 1935. All these things were ready before the hon. member ever came into the house. He also complains that we are not encouraging tourist traffic to the island. I should like to know how much he and his party encouraged tourist traffic to Prince Edward Island. Why, they did not have one piece of machinery for doing it. Since the Liberals came into power we have set up a tourist bureau. It is well equipped and under a good manager, and is advertising Prince Edward Island all over the world. That has been done only since the Liberals came into power.

Mr. FRASER: Pretty weak.

Mr. GRANT: Not too weak. The hon. member for Queens complains that they are charging freight rates on the car ferry. He quotes the dominion-provincial agreement which says there should not be freight rates. I think he wants everybody to get passes, if one can judge from the way he talks. He quotes the agreement with the Dominion of Canada, which says:

> That the Dominion of Canada shall assume and defray all the charges for the efficient steam service—

Mr. Speaker, they do not assume the freight charges; they assume the charges for the ships and the running of them for the conveyance of mails and passengers. It does not mention freight, but freight came in afterwards. There were no automobiles at that time, of course. I continue:

> . . . to be established and maintained between the island and the mainland of the dominion, winter and summer . . .

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot read very well.

Mr. GRANT: I cannot read as well as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). I continue:

> . . . thus placing the island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial railway and the railway system of the dominion, and such other charges as may be incident to and connected with the services which by the British North America Act of 1867 appertain to the general government and as are or may be allowed to the other provinces.

Does it say in this quotation, Mr. Speaker, that the dominion government is to pay the freight rates? Let me go a little further and show my hon. friend's lack of knowledge of how things are going. He quotes himself. He quotes the questions he asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), and this is one of the questions:

> I want the Minister of Transport to set the rate himself.

The minister replied that he could not do it. The hon. member for Queens should know that during the time his own party was in power the railway was operated by a board of railway commissioners. It was run by the board of transport commissioners just as it is to-day. The minister had no power, but he asked this question and he thought he was doing something. He then went on to say:

> Does the minister tell this committee that he has no authority over rates?

He should have known that the minister has no authority over rates. Why did he not know that? The minister told him that he had not, and he then asked:

> Does the minister mean by that, that the government cannot set the rates?

The minister, of course, said "no". It shows that the hon. member has had no interest in the welfare of his province or of Canada, or he would have known these things. If he did not learn between 1930 and 1935 he is too old to learn now.

He mentioned a name in this house that I have not heard a Tory member mention since I came here. He mentioned the name of R. B. Bennett. I have not heard that name mentioned by the Conservatives in this house since 1935; they are ashamed to do it. He said that Mr. R. B. Bennett made a survey of the cases and that he would do so-and-so. He then said that his leader had made a survey and that he had practical experience.

I should like to know what practical experience the leader of the opposition would have of the case. I have crossed there since I was a boy and I have no practical experience. The hon. member said that his leader would fulfil the terms of confederation—that if he had been elected he would have done it. That means that since last year he would have done the whole thing which all parties have been doing their best trying to do since confederation. Had this great man, who is now leading the opposition, got into power he would have done it in a year. If he should get in power to-morrow they would throw him out the window within twenty-four hours. We know that; his policies are not their policies.

He advocated a super highway from Borden to Charlottetown. He should be the last man to speak about highways, because the only highway built on Prince Edward Island, except one short one, was built by the Liberals. The one the Conservatives built fell to pieces. My hon. friend knows that and cannot deny it. It was no good. They did not have it properly engineered and drained, and it fell to pieces and has been a nuisance ever since. The Liberal government built hundreds of miles of highway throughout the province. What did the Tory party do for Prince Edward Island? How many potato warehouses did the Tory party build for Prince Edward Island? Not one. The Liberals built three in my constituency.

An hon. MEMBER: No wonder you got elected.

Mr. GRANT: If my hon. friend was a Liberal he would get as much as I get, but he could not get it from the Tories.

I wish to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) for what he has done. The Liberal party has built six boat harbours for the fishermen in Kings since 1935. That is more than has ever been done since confederation by all Tory parties. We are going to build two more this year. My hon. friend's speech is all baloney. What did the Tories ever build? After the Tory party was in power for five years, every wharf in my constituency was fenced off. The only wharf that was not fenced off was the one used by Hon. J. A. Macdonald, a Tory member. The remainder were all fenced off for want of repair, and had danger signs placed on them. We have since put all the wharves in good repair. They closed two branch railway lines in my constituency and my hon. friend never raised his voice against it. He now makes this famous speech at a time when the people are prosperous. The fishermen are prosperous and do not know what to do with their money. A fisherman and his son can go out and bank a thousand dollars a week. I saw it happen right in my own constituency, and under this Liberal government. When my hon. friend's party was in power the fishermen were starving and they would do nothing for them. As soon as we got into power we established the fishermen's loan board, to lend money to the fishermen to build new boats and we built fish houses for them. This has all happened since 1935. The fishermen were getting prosperous before war began.

I congratulate the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) on what he said. The Tory party are not over there for the good of the people. My private opinion is this: communism is the number one menace to Canada and Toryism is the number two menace.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered and well answered the Tory member for Queens. I have told him how he got here, and he should be thankful. I want now to say this. We all wish for peace; we hope for peace, and I for one, as perhaps one of the oldest men in the house, do not believe we are going to have any more wars. Let me conclude with the words of Robby Burns:

> For a' that, an' a' that,
> It's coming yet for a' that,
> That Man to Man, the world o'er,
> Shall brothers be for a' that.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, there is an area in southeastern Quebec which in its interests represents very fully the entire dominion. There we find a completely balanced population. There are industrial centres in which factories have grown up and where manufacturing prospers. The countryside is devoted to farming, and almost entirely to that type of farming known as dairying.

Dairying is in danger of extermination; I wish to direct a few words to the house on that subject. At this time I need not inform the house that I am opposed to controls. I am an impenitent opponent of controls; if, however, we are to have controls I ask that they be applied in such a way as to do the least damage possible. The control of butter prices is threatening the dairying industry. At the present time the ceiling price of butter is thirty-four and a fraction cents a pound. There is a bonus or subsidy of ten cents a pound, which brings the maximum price received by the producer up to forty-four and a fraction cents a pound. The farmers find that this price, when considered in conjunction with the cost of operating their farms, buying what is necessary to feed their herds and engage help when it can be found, is totally inadequate, with the result—and this is the tragedy—that the herds are being sold across the international border into the United States. There is an embargo on beef cattle; they may not be exported at the present time. This embargo, however, does not apply to dairy cattle. Within the last few months something like ten thousand head have gone across the border into the United States.

Despite the shortage of butter; despite the demand for butter, we find that there has been a marked drop in the portion of the total milk production devoted to the production of butter. In 1941 something like 52·15 per cent of the milk produced was devoted to the making of butter. But in 1945 the proportion of milk used for making butter had dropped to 46·08 per cent, and that drop has been increasingly pronounced since the beginning of this year. Therefore I am going to ask those who control prices, and determine what the farmer shall receive for his sole marketable product in that part of Canada, to lift ceiling prices under those controls sufficiently to permit the farmers to make a livelihood from the exploitation of their herds, so that they will not be forced to sell their herds, as they have been forced to do during the past couple of years and especially during the last few months, when the cost of labour and supplies essential to the manufacture of butter has greatly increased.

I may confide in you, Mr. Speaker, that if I had my way I would overnight abolish all controls affecting farm produce. I have heard it said that in that event butter might go to 75 cents a pound. Some people have said that it might even go to $1 a pound. Well, if it did, it would be one occasion when the farmer received something in the nature of equity for his continuous efforts. Within the recollection of all of us the farmer has sold his butter for 20 cents a pound and less; and if perchance he should find a short market for this commodity which would yield him a return that would make its production profitable to him, I submit that it would be an unusual experience and a very welcome one to him. The farmer resents controls. The farmer is the nearest thing we have to a representative of free enterprise; he is an extreme individualist, who depends upon his own efforts and his own enterprise in and out of season. We sometimes hear it said at election time that the farmer is the back-bone of the country. That back-bone has had to bear very many burdens of adversity and, one would almost think, of ill will from the present administration. When one sees the pernicious effect of these policies one cannot but deplore the fact that at the present time farming is subjected to these controls. If the controls on farm produce were lifted or abolished, prices of farm produce and of butter in particular, would increase and herds now being sold for export would be retained at home. We are eating the seed corn, and if we carry that story to its conclusion there are bound to follow consequences which will be prejudicial to the country at large.

At this stage in the debate I am not going to discuss other problems which, with propriety, might be debated at this time. I believe thoroughly, however, there is not an hon. member within sound of my voice representing a rural constituency—with the possible exception of those belonging to the C.C.F. party, who believe in regimentation, in controls and price fixing—who would not welcome relief from these controls on farm products.

I doubt if there is a farming constituency which does not look forward to the day when free enterprise will again be established, when the farmer will be able to sell his commodities at market prices and buy the implements he requires, without the let and approval of someone who does not understand his needs and who frequently is unsympathetic to his requests.

Mr. RENE HAMEL (Saint Maurice-Lafléche) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the last session opened in September last, the war against Japan had just ended a few weeks before and the air was still filled with the echoing joy of victory. Perhaps at that time no one would have ventured to throw a discordant note in those rejoicings. But to-day, six months after our last enemy has surrendered, this short-lived joy has given way to unemployment, with its accompanying ills, anxiety and fear.

The present session will allow the government to figure our losses and our gains of the past six years of war. Our liabilities in this catastrophe are known, at least in part. The material cost, spread among all the families in the country, amounts to approximately $7,600 or $19,000,000,000 for the country as a whole. Our losses exceed 90,000 casualties, without taking the wounded into account, that is to say more than 20 per cent of all empire casualties. Add to that the dislocation of so many homes, a stupendous increase of criminality, physical and moral sufferings breeding discontent among the people, and a deep scission between the two main racial groups in the country. Canadians have not accepted such sacrifices to be rewarded by a few medals and congratulations, the only apparent results at the moment.

Through progressive legislation we must dispel this dangerous impression. But we do not wish to delay the present debate. Let me only define our attitude on the two main problems which have been discussed since the beginning of the session.

As regards communism, we believe and always have believed that this theory is radically opposed to our religious principles, our national traditions and our philosophical conception of the human person. In order to protect the people from the menace of this so-called mystic of our time, verbal attacks will remain powerless so long as living conditions among the working classes are not in keeping with the economic possibilities of our immense and rich country, so long as drastic means are not taken to make financially possible what is physically and materially possible.

As for the financial agreements of which the approval has been announced, we cannot endorse them. This gift of more than $425,000,000, this loan bearing no interest and no guarantees of 1¼ billions of dollars seems to us untimely and unfair, at this time when the low-wage earner is overburdened with excessive taxes, when the Canadian head of a family may not borrow to build himself a home at less than 4½ per cent interest, when a large proportion of veterans are still without decent shelter. And for this last reason particularly, we shall vote against the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended speaking in this debate; however, I shall take this opportunity to make only a few remarks. First I shall speak concerning the speech from the throne, and then I shall offer a few general observations as to our economic position as I see it at the present time.

From the speech from the throne I read this:

> It is only in the light of the world situation that all our problems can be seen in true perspective. The future of our own and of every country depends upon succes in the task of world reconstruction and the establishment of an enduring peace. Many of the measures you will be called upon to consider at the present session will be concerned with this wider aspect of human affairs.

With this I agree and, I am sure, all hon. members agree. We can build social security in Canada only on the foundation of international peace, and that is the base upon which it must be built.

In my opinion to-day we must view every changing situation in this fluid world with understanding, and it is in that connection I wish to make a few remarks concerning the present espionage situation. I am sure every humanitarian deplores the necessity for the maintenance by governments of secret services. I think every decent person dislikes and hates such under-handed practice. But that is the kind of world in which we are living, and the kind of world we must hasten to change.

Regardless of what was said some days ago by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) about supranational organizations, I maintain and, I am sure many others in all parties maintain that the only way we can rid the world of suspicion, misunderstanding—and hence, espionage—is by building a united nations organization and, through it, when the time is ripe, a world government.

I was interested to read quite recently in the Vancouver Sun of the resolution passed by the annual convention of the British Columbia command of the Canadian Legion. On March 19 last, at its meeting in Vancouver, it passed a resolution to this effect. They urged that Canada take a leading part in establishing a post-war world policy and asked the dominion government to call upon the nations of the world to organize the united nations organization into a supranational government, first to establish world law; second, to maintain peace; third to administer justice in accordance with world law, and, fourth, that a world government be democratically elected by powers great and small upon an equitable basis. I think that represents a very wide section of opinion in British Columbia and shows the trend of thought in one of the most prominent sections of the Canadian Legion in Canada in, should I say, the best province in Canada.

I think this is a time in the world's history when we have to use understanding and exercise patience and tolerance. I am not here to defend everything that has been done by the Soviet Union or everything that has been done by any government, but I do ask the members of this house to consider the twenty-five years of misunderstandings that we went through after the last war and the lies and misinformation and propaganda that were given to the people in this and other countries. We have fought a hard war, and I am not underestimating the difficulties of the present situation. There are many obstacles to be overcome, but I am asking for a fair, tolerant and understanding approach to the situation.

When it comes to the subject of espionage, the headlines in the papers would make one think that the Soviet Union was the only country in the world to practise espionage. But I should like to quote what Mr. Ernest Bevin, the present minister of foreign affairs in the British government, wrote in May, 1933:

There are British spies just as there are Russian spies and German spies and French spies. There is not a nation that has a clean record in this respect. In this year's estimates you will find £180,000 for "secret service." Nobody is allowed to know how it is spent, or where it goes. Parliament may not discuss it; the auditor general may not ask about it. It is for espionage and any other dirty work which governments dare not avow.

Mr. Bevin continued:

There are civil service posts which people "in the know" know quite well to be just camouflage for men whose real job is "intelligence." But I suppose that to mention any of them would be to bring down all the terrors of the Official Secrets Act on one's head—like Compton Mackenzie.

The political correspondent of the People wrote in April 30, 1930:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has set aside £180,000 to be spent on the British secret service this year.

The secret service is divided into two main wings. There are the secret agents who work at home—under the special branch of Scotland Yard. And there are those who scour the continents of Europe and Asia, under the control of Sir Robert (now Lord) Vansittart, the cool, masterly head of the foreign office.

Connected with most of the British embassies in foreign capitals there is a woman who can be relied upon to ferret out secrets from the agents of foreign powers whenever these are needed . . .

But apart from the regular full-time members of the service, there are a number of part-time agents. These are engaged, most of their time, in their professional capacities as bankers, financiers, heads of industry, or members of the armed forces.

With regard to this whole situation I shall say nothing more, but I should like to read from a general order issued recently by a United States officer commanding to his troops as it shows balance and a realistic approach to the present situation:

Wuerzburg, Germany, March 11—(AP)—American troops in Wuerzburg were warned by their commanding officer to-day to refrain from criticizing the Soviet Union to the German people.

Order to Command

Lt. Col. Frank Ebey of Venice, Calif., issued this order to his command, the 203rd Anti-Aircraft Battalion:

It has been brought to my attention that the morale of the civilian population of Wuerzburg has been raised as a result of a speech in the United States by a British politician, relative to our ally, the Russian people.

I have heard certain military personnel express agreement with these policies in the presence of German frauleins.

This practice must stop immediately.

The Soviet government is an ally of the U.S.A., and you are individually and collectively representatives of our government. I will not tolerate any disparaging remarks against our allies to the German people. This does not violate your right of free speech among yourselves.

I do not hate the German people. My policy in regard to dancing and social gatherings should indicate that fact to you. But I can't forget that the sun will always set upon the grave of some American soldier. From Pearl Harbour and Bataan to the Elbe, your buddies are lying dead because of the nazi party and the evil machinations of Hitler and his gang. Don't let your fraulein's opinion influence you. She has been raised in an atmosphere of hatred and intolerance of all nations on earth except the master race we have just whipped.

Millions of Russian soldiers and civilians died to save our skins. Just remember that. If your propaganda causes you to hate the Russians, stop and think—they died for you, too. If you want to think again, encouraging these frauleins to think we hate Russia is a good way to get things going.

Those were the good old days, yes? Standing in half-tracks all day in the bitter cold, dirty, hungry and tired; firing off the line of departure; making river crossings and sweating out barrages. It is cold in Russia, remember that.

I am not a pinko or a red. But the Russians are our allies. They have guts, and by God I never want to fight again. Think it over. You have been warned.

I cannot overlook the statement made last evening by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) when he was referring to the Spanish government and Franco. I am quite sure that the remarks he made expressed his personal opinion and not the opinion of many members of his party. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin had this to say with regard to the Spanish government:

They did not do anything to us.

Well, this is what the governments of the United States, Great Britain and France in an official declaration, supplemented by fifteen documents out of 800 captured in Germany, accuse the Spanish fascist dictatorship of:

1. Of being part of the nazi fascist internationale plotting against the United States.

2. Of planning to seize Gibraltar, fight Britain and other allies.

3. Of fuelling nazi submarines and ships. This action resulted in the death of many United States sailors and merchant seamen.

4. Franco promised Hitler "that his fight against communism, Jewry and Freemasonry would continue."

The reason why Franco did not join in the war is also explained. He wanted too much territory, food, munitions. Hitler's generals also thought Spain's entry might be a drawback.

Again, here is the official text of Franco's reply when he was asked by the United Press of the United States what would be the form of the state under a nationalist regime in Spain. Franco said:

> It will follow the structure of the totalitarian regimes, like Italy and Germany. It will adopt corporative forms, for which most of the formulas are already found in our own country, and it will destroy the liberal institutions which have poisoned the people.

Passing on, I enjoyed very much the speech of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). His analysis of the rights of the citizen was, in my opinion, and, I am sure, in the opinion of many members of this house, a masterpiece. A great deal of what he had to say represents, I am sure, the opinion of members of all parties in this house who appreciate what a treasury of safeguards we have inherited from the past.

Before proceeding to my brief comments on the speech from the throne, I must stop to congratulate the Ottawa Citizen. I wish that there were more papers in Canada that did the fair reporting and treated serious public issues with such tolerance and understanding as the Ottawa Citizen does. I do not know the editor of that paper, but I am sure that he is a man of vision, understanding and tolerance, virtues which are very necessary for newspaper editors at this time.

I am glad to see that the government intends to increase food production. I am sure that in that purpose they have the support of all people in this country. I note that the maintenance of a high level of employment and national income is a fundamental aim of government policy. I can say this, that the development of this policy is being anxiously watched throughout Canada. I have received letters from many of my constituents who write me about the rather vague terms in which the speech from the throne is written. I think in all fairness it must be somewhat vague at this time, on account of the fact that there are no final conclusions drafted as a result of the dominion-provincial conferences; but they all say that they await anxiously the development of government policy in this respect.

I certainly approve the agreement for a loan to the United Kingdom. I consider it economically sound from every point of view and in the best interests of the Canadian people.

I am very glad to know that the veterans affairs committee is again functioning. On this point I wish to say that as far as the Department of Veterans Affairs is concerned, that is the administration of the department itself, I think they have done an excellent job to date, and that any failure which has occurred has not been the fault of the veterans affairs administration, but of government policy in some directions. I hope that the situation will rapidly improve. As far as my own riding is concerned, many veterans in the city of Nelson and surrounding districts are waiting for housing accommodation; other veterans are waiting to go on the land. I am hopeful that the rearrangements concerning the housing administration in Canada will prove beneficial and successful, because there is no question about it, arrangements in the past have been ineffective to deal with current needs.

I have something to say now on a subject to which I shall refer later at somewhat greater length; and may I remark that I am not one who occupies much of the time of the house. Labour in my constituency is still waiting for a national labour code as outlined in the Regina manifesto. The farmers of my constituency, and particularly the fruit growers, are anxious to see national marketing legislation; and the veterans are anxious to get houses, or to go on the land; certainly they want to be sure of employment.

Let me now say a few things about our general position in Canada. At home, as abroad, many people view things as either black or white. I am of the opinion that there will face us in the near future many problems upon which we can get great and general agreement. I am sure many hon. members can agree together for the defence of democracy and an extension of the basis of democracy, and that there are many other immediate matters upon which we can join together and work for. I am not one who views this question from an ultra partisan point of view. I am not one who thinks that my party is all right and everybody else all wrong. It is not a question of all black or all white, as painted by some people. Supporters of the government often state that they stand for free enterprise and that the issue at this time is free enterprise versus socialism. I am going to make these few remarks to try to bring into proper perspective the situation, as I view it, which exists at the present time and in the light of which we shall have to discuss the legislation which will be brought before this house. In my opinion it is not a question of so-called free enterprise. As a matter of fact we have not free enterprise in this country at this time; we have largely monopoly enterprise; and the issue to-day in Canada, as in many other countries, is this, on whose behalf is state capitalism in the immediate future going to function? On behalf of the few or on behalf of the many?

The post-war economic pattern from England to the Soviet borders is clear. The trend is toward nationalization of key points in the economy. In Britain the Labour party was elected on a platform whose main planks were the nationalization of the Bank of England, coal, iron and steel, electricity, gas, railways, aviation and all internal transport, with a national board to control investments. In France the parties who won three-fourths of the seats in the national assembly campaigned on a very similar programme, part of which has already been fulfilled in laws covering the Bank of France and other large financial institutions. In Czechoslovakia all four political parties compaigned for nationalization of mines, heavy industry, electric power, banks and insurance companies, and this programme is rapidly being put into effect. In the United States and in Canada the period of state capitalism has clearly arrived, despite all the claims of economists and advertising psychologists whom big business hires to put science in chains for profit. The capitalist economy has never, since the early pioneer stages, operated without state aid. In the United States and in Canada, it owes its privilege and its power to incorporation rights, the tariffs, the franchises, the subsidies and the state's promotion of foreign trade and investments.

When the second world war burst upon us the production we needed in this country was too great for our big business to handle. The state had in many instances to take over the functions of the capitalist, providing the funds and markets, building plants, securing and allocating raw materials, labour supplies and so on. The highest production records in our history, which big business now claims for so-called private enterprise, were made only with the aid and under the direction of the state.

Even in the international sphere it is clear that our miscalled free enterprise can neither function nor manage our share of the international economic arrangements so sadly needed and now, to some extent, being planned. Our proposed loan to Britain, the international monetary fund, the world bank, the social and economic council of UNO, all tell the same story, the necessity for governments to make financial arrangements and the international development of state capitalism in every form. Not all the free enterprise propaganda can conceal the fact that we are moving steadily, in both the international and the national spheres, into the period known historically as state capitalism.

The immediate cause of the European trend toward nationalization is the fact that the defeat of the nazis has left Europe in economic chaos. Industrial plants have to be rebuilt, and private capital is absolutely unable to tackle the job. Those who have gone through fascist tyranny are not in a frame of mind to rebuild the power of financiers who helped Hitler to office or profited by his system; unable to accept, let alone put into effect, complete socialization. The only way at present to relieve their distress is through limited nationalization methods, or in other words, a state capitalist economy.

I wish to make this point clear. In my opinion, in the modern industrial world the only credit base strong enough to underwrite reconstruction in the world as a whole, or in Canada, is the productive labour of all the people in all countries, under public control. The greater need in Europe has hastened this development. The same trend is in evidence in the United States and in Canada. Take, for instance, the wonderful success we have had with our rubber plant at Sarnia and other state-operated plants during the war. Look at the great development of the T.V.A. and the development of the Grand Coulee dam, the Boulder dam, and other great developments which so-called free enterprise could not undertake but which were undertaken by the state in the United States and by the state in this country, and successfully prosecuted.

The world-wide extension of industry and agriculture outlined in our international declarations and obligations is rapidly making obsolete the method of private investment financing for large-scale undertakings. In addition to the compulsion of immediate needs in Europe, there is the increasing pressure of ideas expressed by socialists and democrats everywhere. There is the insistent demand for democratic processes to be expressed in economic as well as in political control.

These are inevitable measures, because anyone who studies the situation closely can see them developing and continuing to develop. These inevitable measures and developments do not inaugurate a socialist economy, despite those who shout about not lending their money to establish socialism. What is being rapidly experienced in the western section of Europe, and will inevitably develop here, is a form of state capitalism, gradually passing from state aid and regulations to state ownership and management of banks, key industries, transportation and public utilities.

This development will modify some features of our economy. It will be a modified form of capitalism. It will substitute state controls over competition and investment for our present largely private and monopolistic controls, but capitalist income will be retained. Former owners of nationalized undertakings will be guaranteed fixed returns by the state.

This general development presents great opportunities. Historically, the final form of capitalist enterprise means that we have an opportunity of achieving a change from a capitalist to a socialist society in a peaceful and evolutionary way. The chances of success depend upon whether enough of our people are willing to join together in guiding the greatest peaceful transformation from one form of society to another in the history of mankind.

There are great dangers. If our developing state capitalism is allowed to become the economic instrument of monopoly finance capital, it will attempt to keep the economy operating by imperialistic expansion instead of serving the needs of the people by lessening profits and internal expansion.

There must be a strong demand from the people that the returns to capital in public and private enterprises be in proportion to the aid given with the risks removed by the state. For a peacful transition from capitalism to economic democracy, the following, in my opinion, are essential: First, at least ten years of peace. I am not suggesting that ten years of peace is all the peace that we shall have, but I do feel that if we can have ten years of peace we can guide intelligently the most successful evolution from capitalism to economic democracy in the history of mankind. I repeat therefore that, first, we should have at least ten years of peace. That is why, when I was campaigning, I said that the great issue before us to-day is, first, peace in the international sphere, and second, the maintenance of the democratic structure at home.

The second essential is a strong trade union movement. There is no question about it that well organized and strong trade unions are the great bulwark of democracy.

The third essential is a strong cooperative movement. Social changes are not brought about merely by written programmes, speeches and national advertising. Social changes are brought about largely on a sound and solid basis, the result of the hard work of all the people who join trade unions, cooperatives and community organizations, devoting their time and energy to the building up of democracy in the smaller spheres. These are the people who really build the fabric of democracy.

The fourth essential must be a strong farmers' movement, a strong agricultural movement. I believe it is absolutely necessary, if we are to survive this dangerous stage in our history and in the world's history, to work as far as possible for the decentralization of administration through provincial and municipal governments. I believe it is necessary for the federal administration to lay down the general policy to balance the national interests, particularly with regard to exports in the larger sphere of planning. If we are to maintain the democratic structure we must have decentralization. We have to get the administration in the hands of the people through provincial and municipal governments, credit unions, cooperatives and all such organs of the people themselves.

Finally, I think it is necessary to have a programme to provide the opportunity for this peaceful development, and in conclusion I should like to say this. Of all the parties in this house, this is the only one that has a programme which has been considered in logical relation to the development of society at home and abroad. A study of the Regina manifesto and national programme of the C.C.F. in relation to present economic developments at home and abroad will indicate that these programmes are designed to meet the needs of the Canadian people at this time. Any person who gives intelligent study to the history of the development of economies abroad and of our own economy at home under present conditions, and who reads the Regina manifesto and the national programme of the C.C.F. party, will realize that the people who drafted that manifesto and that programme did so with an understanding and appreciation of Canadian conditions, Canadian historical background and Canadian psychology, and with a full understanding of a programme that would meet the needs of our people.

Mr. DAVID GOURD (Chapleau) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, you will allow me first, in my maiden speech in this house, to congratulate you on the consistent efficiency with which you have been discharging the duties of your high office.

I also join my distinguished colleagues in congratulating the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), the mover of the Address in reply to the speech from the throne, and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters), the seconder, for the eloquent and detailed manner in which they told us what the government intend to do during the present session.

Certain important and difficult problems will be submitted to us, especially as regards the new loan which appears to embody very favourable arrangements and generous conditions for the United Kingdom. While keeping an eye on our tremendous national debt, we still realize the advantage of a further extraordinary effort on the part of Canada to control its foreign markets, for we must not forget that our country must export at least 40 per cent of its total production. We must have buyers and Great Britain is still our best customer. It is with this in mind that we must make it possible for her to buy our goods and, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the reorganization of our trade with England might result in keeping all classes of our people gainfully employed. I realize that this is the only means of preventing the disastrous unemployment situation that prevailed after the war of 1914-18.

Before speaking of the beautiful and immense northern part of the province of Quebec, I may be allowed to commend two others of my colleagues, the hon. members for Wright (Mr. Raymond) and Prescott (Mr. Bertrand), for having suggested that Canada should send a diplomatic representative to the vatican, acknowledged as the greatest centre of Christianity in the world. The cooperation of a Canadian representative would help the few other ambassadors to contribute to the realization of enduring peace under the enlightened guidance of the holy father.

I wish also to congratulate the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) for his clear, accurate, and sincere statement on the Canadian flag, which should be distinctive and acceptable to all Canadians.

Now, I come to the constituency of Chapleau, which I have the honour of representing and which is included in the Abitibi district, this large expanse of fertile land, well adapted to farming and stretching from Senneterre, in the east, to La Reine, in the west, on the Ontario boundary. In this region only a strip of land has been opened so far and settled by farmers, but it could extend to the north as far as lake Matagami, on the fiftieth and a half degree of latitude, about a hundred miles north of Amos, the county seat. In this large territory could be established a hundred farming parishes on fertile land which could supply the lumber and pulpwood so much in demand in this country. It would also contribute to the opening of mines, for mineral ores are to be found throughout the district.

The development of the north country would bring there a considerable number of people, which would relieve congestion in cities and help prevent unemployment, because the population cannot possibly be concentrated in large centres. In order to carry out the development of northern Quebec, it would also be necessary that the dominion government should come to an agreement with the provincial authorities with a view to drawing up a comprehensive plan. There should be built a railway line, starting from the Canadian National line, either from Senneterre Junction or elsewhere, and leading northwesterly to lake Matagami and northeasterly to Chibougamou, which would help the development of water powers and facilitate the erection of a paper mill at lake Matagami. I should like to emphasize the fact that much gold, copper and other ores are to be found in the Chibougamou area. To facilitate the transportation of engineers and of the numerous mining prospectors, there should be established an air line from Montreal, with airports at Val d'Or, Amos and Noranda, from which district that line would continue on to Toronto, which now has air communications with North Bay and Ottawa. The route I suggest is several hundred miles shorter.

The governments concerned should also extend a dirt road as far as James bay covering a distance of 150 to 175 miles; this would help to bring about the above mentioned developments.

I might add that the federal government should also assist the provincial government in building highways and dredging certain rivers both of which are essential factors in the development of mines bringing in revenue which contributes to the prosperity of the country. All these projects should be included in post-war planning.

I will not conclude without outlining the income that might be derived from the implementation of these projects. Here are authentic figures relating to the tiny section already developed. In 1944, we harvested in the Abitibi district $25,150 worth of wheat, $472,540 worth of oats, $31,680 worth of barley, $2,261,500 worth of hay, not to mention thousands of dollars worth of buckwheat, rye, peas, beans and mixed grain. Moreover, our crop of potatoes amounted to $587,820, which does not include the income brought in by alfalfa, turnips and corn. We have also produced 1,334,209 pounds of butter, 97,747 pounds of cheese, not to mention the thousands of dollars derived from our crop of blueberries. Moreover, we sold and shipped one hundred million feet of saw lumber as well as millions of cords of pulpwood.

Neither must I forget to mention the mining of metals such as gold, copper, etc.; gold yielded a value of $42,000,000 and copper, a value of $22,000,000, these amounts being exclusive of all other minerals.

In passing, I take the occasion of suggesting to the directors of the Canadian National Railways that it is high time to improve the railway lines which run through our district if they want to furnish travellers with suitable means of transportation as well as take care of the shipping demand arising from the various products I have just listed.

In conclusion, I beg the Hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to appoint a bilingual controller of the experimental farm located at Kapuskasing, because the majority of those whom it serves are French-Canadians.

(Text:) Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): As a rule I do not take up a great deal of the time of the house, I had not expected to speak in this debate at all. As mentioned by some other members this afternoon it was felt that we might finish the debate fairly soon, but apparently that idea became sidetracked somewhere, and I felt that I should like to offer some of my opinions while the opportunity presented itself.

I was pleased this evening to hear the little battle going on between the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Grant) and the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure). It reminded me that the island was down there. I was a little surprised when the hon. member for Kings said that a map of Canada had been published that did not have Prince Edward Island on it. It is more years than I like to think of since I lived in Nova Scotia, but even back over all those years I can remember that there was a place called Prince Edward Island, so that I do not know how anyone could have forgotten it. The hon. member also said—and I hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will take this seriously—that his constituency, which must be fairly small, actually had six fish docks built there, and that he expected to get two more. That is fine. We do not envy them their fish docks. No doubt they need them, or they would not get them. But I should like the minister to consider giving us one little bridge over the South Saskatchewan river at Saskatchewan Landing, at the same time he is building fish docks in Kings.

Before I say some things that may not be so pleasant, I should like to address one or two rather nice remarks to the house. At the outset I wish to join with those who have so eloquently said farewell to the Earl of Athlone and the Princess Alice, and to extend my best regards and those of my constituents. Our people out in Swift Current are just ordinary people, but they are warm hearted and hospitable, and on their behalf they would like me to say, in our plain way, "good-bye and good luck." While the group I am with over here looks forward to the time when we shall form a government here, which will not be long, when the British North America Act and other necessary acts will be amended so that we shall have a Canadian citizen as governor general, until that time comes, with our usual Canadian hospitality we welcome to Canada the new governor general and his gracious consort.

While I am in a welcoming mood I should like to take this opportunity of inviting all those within sound of my voice, or who may take the trouble to read my remarks, to come to Swift Current this summer on the 1st and 2nd of July. We put on a good stampede there. They will find all the men wearing whiskers, and the ladies—oh, we have lovely ladies out there—

Mr. GRAYDON: Address yourself to the Prime Minister on that.

Mr. BENTLEY: Well, yes; perhaps particularly to the Prime Minister. The ladies will be dressed as in the days of old. I know the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) will tell the house they have a better show in his city, because it lasts for a week. Our stampede lasts for only two days, but I am sure it would be equal to a week at Calgary, so that we should like to have hon. members come there if they care to do so. The new synthetic rubber from the Sarnia plant will no doubt provide the necessary tires, and gasoline, while not free, is now plentiful. So that on behalf of Swift Current I extend this invitation to all hon. members here.

I should like also to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As others have said, it always pleases those of us who are veterans of either war when a veteran is singled out for some particular honour of this kind, and these veterans really did an excellent job. I think they could be called creators. It is a long time since I took a Latin lesson, but if I remember aright the word "create" is derived from the Latin word creo, which I believe means to make out of nothing, and they did an excellent job of making a speech out of nothing, which is practically what the speech from the throne is. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, who seconded the address, is a native of my own province, and I cannot but feel that his intelligence will so guide him that when we do form the government over there, he will still be on that side of the house. I think that would be a natural evolutionary process for such a brilliant young man.

I wish also to express complete disapproval of the methods employed by the government in dealing with the investigation of Canadian men and women suspected of betraying secrets. Investigation was necessary. It would have been highly improper for a government not to have made an investigation; and if these people should be found guilty of giving away secrets or breaking their sacred word, they will have to be punished. But the practice of taking into custody men and women who have had no charges laid against them is, I believe, entirely wrong. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of our party, and with speakers from other sides of the house who have said this was a wrong thing to do. I have grown up in this country believing that, no matter what might be the imperfections in our society, at least there was one thing we could depend upon: that the process of justice which we have built up through many centuries of struggle would be kept inviolate, and that neither men nor women suspected of any crime, no matter how vicious that crime, should be held in custody unless a definite charge was brought against them. I never believed such people could be taken into custody and placed in such a position that, unless they were strong-minded persons, they might say something which would help to convict themselves. I think the government has demonstrated by this action that it has neither the ability nor the courage to safeguard the state without resorting to the practices of other governments, whom we have just spent six years of our lives defeating because they threatened to impose that sort of thing upon us. I say that this government, when faced with the task of protecting the state under democratic rules evolved through centuries of struggle, has fallen far short of the glory.

I should like to read the first paragraph of the speech from the throne:

> It is just over six months since Canada emerged from six long years of war. The turmoil which has followed in the wake of war has created new problems for governments in all parts of the globe. The world is full of unrest. Hunger, privation and suffering have become the lot of millions. Other millions are homeless, many of them in exile.

That is fine, down to that point; not very much constructive about it, but a lot of information we can get from almost any newspaper or magazine. Then the next sentence states:

> The problems which face the statesmen of every nation are formidable indeed.

In regard to Canada's contribution toward a peaceful and prosperous world, there is some truth in that statement; but in regard to our domestic problems, there should be no difficulty at all. We were not destroyed by war. We were nearly destroyed before the war by the depression, for which this government had no solution, although it was in power for four years before war broke out. In a land of abundant food, minerals and raw materials, people were hungry, cold and homeless, and those conditions would have continued under this government but for the war which, rather than the ingenuity of the government, opened for us a market which could and did consume everything we could produce. We speak of reconstruction, when in actual fact the needs of war and our ability to fill them brought about the reconstruction of our pre-war moribund economy.

I cannot associate myself with those who voice such fulsome praise for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). The great generosity, loyalty and sincerity of Canadian men and women, appealed to by the publicity committees of the national, provincial and unit war finance committees; the hours of unpaid or ill-paid work during victory loan campaigns by humble citizens, regardless of party political affiliations, had a decisive result in filling the purse of the Minister of Finance, who in turn made available to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply all the financial requirements necessary to inspire profit-hungry industry to uncork the bottle of production. The reconstruction of Canada from hard years of humiliating poverty to a nation with everyone able to work on a payroll, and some not so able to work, was made possible by war, not by wise statesmen. It was the work of farm men and women with barnyard mud on their feet, factory boys and girls with grease behind their ears, lumberjacks with callouses on their hands, miners with grime on their faces, transport workers who kept the wheels of worn-out machinery rolling, fishermen with chapped and bleeding hands, dock workers with muscles in their backs and no spare tires on the front sides of their belts, merchant seamen who faced the seas and fought the enemy, and many of whom died, servicemen and women who fought or serviced the fighters, and scientists who discovered new processes.

These are the people who won the war. Before the war our present government was utterly incapable of formulating a programme of reconstruction, and now that the war is over, they are still incapable of making use of that tremendous productive power we have built up during the war.

Then we read another paragraph in the speech from the throne, number 5 in my copy, because I have numbered them for the sake of convenience:

> The maintenance of a high level of employment and national income is a fundamental aim of government policy.

That sounds splendid—"A high national income"; but what does the government mean by a high national income? How high is up, anyway? In the early days of the war, when the government was afraid it was not going to have the support of workers who were fed up with the kind of administration we had had, everything was promised. In those days the promise was "full employment". Then, as things settled down a little bit and industry felt itself more solid in the saddle, it became "high employment". Now it is modified to suit what I suppose the government thinks will suit the people—which it does not—and it is referred to as "a high level of employment".

I wonder why these changes were made? I wonder if it could possibly be because of some of the pronouncements by business men in this country, reference to whom was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

I should like to read into the record two other pronouncements carried on the editorial page of the Western Producer of July 13, 1944. The first one is attributed to a prominent banker, and if hon. members wish to have his name they may communicate with the Western Producer. Perhaps that publication will tell them, but it did not tell me. This is the quotation:

> Full employment would be incompatible with the free enterprise system, which carries with it the right to a normal float of unemployed.

And the other gem, attributed to a big business man, says this:

> A corporation's efficiency is indicated by the number of men it can release from a job, not by the number of men hired.

Possibly that kind of thing has some influence with this government. Even if we get a high level of employment, what does the government mean by "high"? Is seventy per cent high? Is sixty-eight per cent high? Should it be seventy-two per cent; or what, in fact, is a "high level"? Seventy per cent is usually considered a pretty fair level when one is writing an examination in school. I think schoolteachers will agree with that.

So that if we get a high level of, let us say, seventy per cent of employment, then inversely the other thirty per cent would be—well, what would we call them? Possibly we could call them the low level of unemployment. I suppose they will sit around with patriotic fervour and sing about the glories of a country that gives seventy per cent of their brothers and sisters employment, but leaves them without it. If they sit around long enough they will get weak enough, of course, so that they will not be able to sing about it anymore. Maybe that is the way we shall get full employment—when that thirty per cent passes out from starvation.

The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), who is my deskmate—and incidentally the terror of the Liberal electoral machine in that constituency—dealt very ably with agriculture in his address in this debate. He, like myself and others in this group, is in constant touch with the working farmers of the west. We know their problems just as well as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) knows them. We are not political agronomists. Our contact is right with the men and women on the farms, in their homes, in their fields, in their cattle sheds and other places where they actually perform the work of production.

It was a grand battle we witnessed here this afternoon, from one side. And no doubt other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side will come back in the near future with similar ammunition. They can quote figures from now till doomsday—and undoubtedly their figures will be correct. But whether they are put in the right place so as to give a wholly true picture is a different matter. Undoubtedly there would not be much question about the number of acres or the number of bushels produced, or about those other matters which were dealt with. But I would point out that the people who raised the wheat, oats, barley, rye, flaxseed, cattle, hogs, poultry products and dairy products are not concerned with the learned battle which takes place in this House of Commons. They are concerned with policy which produces things they require, and which makes it possible for them to make their contribution in a community to people who need what they produce. They are not interested in the whole academic discussion as to who did what back in 1919, or at some other time.

If it comes to a question of who did what, I can assure hon. members that the farmers of western Canada have suffered equally under the regimes of Tory as well as Liberal administrations.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition made a statement with which I agree wholeheartedly. He said that never has western Canada—in fact, I believe he referred to agriculture in all Canada—had a square deal. That is a fact. And it does not require any long list of figures to support it.

When he was discussing this matter in this debate, the Minister of Agriculture said that he believed in planning. That is quite an admission to come from a source that champions free enterprise, when we consider that the free enterprise people of this country carried on such a round programme of condemnation of this group which had recommended that there be some kind of planning for national life.

I have never heard the Minister of Agriculture in this government, or the leader of the opposition or any of his followers deny that Mr. Trestrail and his group were friendly to them, nor have they denied that group in any way. I do not know whether they have given their actual blessing, but certainly their silence indicates that at least they have offered a covert blessing. So that when the minister said he believed in planning I felt most pleased, until he told us how his plans are to work out. He planned so well that even the most expert weather forecaster would not presume to compete with him.

Here is an example of the minister's planning. In the early thirties when the Tories were sitting on the government benches and the Liberals were on this side as the official opposition, he and his group proclaimed that there was nothing wrong with speculative marketing. There was no difference between the government and the official opposition, and there is no difference between them today, except that the government, having the load of responsibility, has had to accept the impact of logic and do a little planning. Otherwise there was no difference. They both agreed on speculative marketing. But at that time the Tory government had the load of responsibility, and they had to do something. We went through the world crash of 1929. When all the men and women and boys and girls who had a little extra money in 1929 and could speculate in wheat and options went broke and had no more wages or salaries or no more profits from their little businesses they disappeared as speculative buyers, and the result was that there was no longer any speculative market to make our open market system buoyant, as the phrase is. The government, charged with responsibility, were then forced by the impact of logic to introduce what they called their stabilization operations, and every taxpayer of this dominion, through the treasury, was put behind this plan of hypothecation for the sake of saving the speculative market through stabilization operations. I am not going to be too critical of that because at least the government did something to try to relieve the situation. But they got no credit for that from the present Minister of Agriculture or from his friends.

When the present minister became Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa in 1935 he proceeded to plan to do the things that he had said were necessary before he got that job. "Get rid of surpluses" was the cry, "and then we will get dollar wheat, and dollar wheat will pay your taxes." That was the great cry at that time—get rid of surpluses. How we would like to have ten times those surpluses in our bins at the present time, Mr. Speaker, so that we would be able to say to people in other parts of the world: Here is lots of wheat and lots of oats and lots of barley; and they would have been ready to pay more for it than some of the speculative markets did. I have bought barley at country elevators in western Canada for one and a half cents a bushel because the man who had it could not bother taking it back home with him and he said, "I might as well sell it for one and a half cents." Some barley had no quotations on it at all. You could buy good feed oats for eight cents a bushel, and the most you could get in some years for the best oats was from thirteen to seventeen cents a bushel.

An hon. MEMBER: So what?

Mr. BENTLEY: So what? We felt just as the hon. member for Fraser Valley would feel if his orchards were full of fruit and there was no market for it, and he was forced to sell at ten cents a box. We do not like to be in that position. We did not like it then. At no time have the western farmers liked to be in that position, no more than anybody else wants to see his means of livelihood drop to such a low level. But if we had those surpluses now, should we not be glad? But when the present Minister of Agriculture came into office in this government in 1935 he proceeded to get rid of surpluses, and his planning, along with associations and possibly some occult powers, and nature, helped him to get rid of the surplus.

The year 1937 came along and no wheat was raised. His cry had always been: Get rid of surpluses and the price of wheat will go up. So 1937 came, and no crop. He and nature had worked well together. Nature did not produce any rain and the Minister of Agriculture and the other farmers did not produce any crops. The surplus disappeared, and the price of wheat did go up to $1 a bushel.

In the spring of 1938 the minister and nature did better. By that time the farmers had to buy seed grain back at $1.45 a bushel. Yes, the price of wheat had gone up, but nobody can say that that was the way to bring prosperity to the farmers, to have them pay $1.45 a bushel for seed grain and receive sometimes only eighteen cents a bushel when they sold that wheat. That is the basis of the seed grain debt in Saskatchewan to-day.

But the Minister of Agriculture, like the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), is nothing if not an optimist. He believed that the future was going to do something better for him and the country. He said: We have got rid of the surplus; we have $1.45 wheat, and now what we need is a crop. Nature said, O.K., we shall have a crop, and so in 1938 nature and the minister produced us a crop, not a very good crop; it did not create a very big surplus, but it was more than the market was prepared to handle, and down went the price of wheat. Instead of being looked upon as a blessing it was looked upon as a curse, instead of nature's bounty. Down went the price again and remained that way until the farmers of western Canada had to take action themselves and come here to Ottawa and petition the government for some relief. That was long after the war had started. We believe in planning, but certainly we do not appreciate the particular type of planning that brought those results. Certainly planning is necessary. All through the years I have been associated with the kind of farmers I mentioned, not political agricultural experts such as we see in the house, but the men that actually operate the tractors, the combines and the seeders. That is the kind of man that I have worked alongside; I know what they want and what they need, and they know what they want and what they need. They have farm organizations and they believe in planning. I am not suggesting that I represent those farm organizations, so let no one here try to make capital out of that. These farm organizations are distinctly non-political, but from eighteen years of association with that kind of organization I know their story; I know something of their hopes and aspirations, and I know the kind of planning which they had hoped would be done and the kind of representations which they have made to this and other governments to have that kind of planning put into operation.

Here is a report from the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which every year issues a written report. After dealing with certain things which they would like to have had but which they failed to convince the federal government to do, they go on to say in their annual report for 1941:

> The government wheat policy to date has been a policy of inflexible opposition to the recommendations of representative farm organizations.

That report was laid before the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan wheat pool in November, 1941, over two years after the war had started, and that organization, which is completely non-political, after trying in vain to have its programme accepted by the powers that be, whether Liberal, Tory or anything else, was finally forced to report back to its members that this government's policy was a policy of inflexible opposition to the recommendations of representative farm organizations. That does not look like very smart planning, if it is planning at all, having in mind the position of the organized producer.

Then there is another plan which the minister was telling us about the other day in his speech. I do not know whether he was trying to "kid" us or himself, or whether he has a great sense of humour. He introduced his acreage reduction plan. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) showed here a poster which said in plain terms, "Grow less wheat and win the war", and it had on it, "By authority of the Minister of Agriculture." I cannot believe that the minister would permit those posters to be put up if he knew his name was on them and disapproved of their being shown.

Mr. GARDINER: I wrote it and put my name on it.

Mr. BENTLEY: Good; we have that admission. That is a wonderful start for another plan, "Grow less wheat and win the war". I am told that during the last war—I was not here at the time—there was a great drive put on under the slogan, "Grow more wheat and win the war". In this war it is, "Grow less wheat and win the war." There is a kind of stock joke in Saskatchewan—I do not know about the other provinces—which runs like this: In the year 1958 a child climbs on its daddy's knee and says, "Daddy, what did you do to help win world war No. 2?" And daddy says, "My son, I raised less wheat; I summer-fallowed."

Mr. GARDINER: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENTLEY: If you do not take my time, I will; otherwise I would suggest what Mr. Speaker always tells us to do, put it on the order paper.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend spoke of a resolution passed by the Saskatchewan wheat pool in 1941. I wonder if he would read the one which was passed at their last board meeting.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have that, but I have not time to read it to-night. We shall do so later on.

The minister said that he planned well. If he planned to reduce wheat production, why does he take credit for the fact that in 1942, following the wheat acreage reduction plan, we had the biggest crop of wheat the country ever had? Where did the plan go astray?

I have only a little time left, and there are some other things I should like to have dealt with.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENTLEY: It is all right. You will get an opportunity, and you will probably go overtime a little bit and will get the unanimous consent of the house to do so.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Go ahead.

Mr. BENTLEY: No, I will not if I can avoid doing so. I wish to mention one or two matters in connection with labour. We have, of course, in our group men who are thoroughly conversant with all labour problems, and I am not going to try to deal with those matters. But I wish to make known to the house the plight of a certain group of labour people in the west; I do not believe the same condition affects employees in the east. They are workers of the Canadian Pacific railway, and either because they wanted to strike or were inadvertently drawn into a strike away back in 1918 and 1919, they are now being laid off and retired at the age of sixty-five without the benefit of any retirement fund. I do not suppose that this government has any authority to order the C.P.R. to do anything to correct the evil. The strike happened at a time when we had a labour-hating government—which I believe was not a Liberal government—and of course a labour-hating management, or they would not have done what they did. In any event these men are in that position; and I believe that this house could, if it so desired, persuade, or instruct, or whatever this house does to the government when the house really wants something done by it, that it set up some kind of fund which would give these men the same superannuation allowances to which they would have been entitled had this condition not been applied. I suggest that this is an excellent opportunity for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to get together. The Minister of Labour could labour and produce a plan, and the Minister of Finance could exercise those marvellous qualities we are always hearing about, and finance it. Then everybody would be happy, and I believe the Canadian people generally would be glad to see these men properly taken care of. I hope the Minister of Labour will give, not only serious consideration and an investigation by some departmental employee, but actual serious departmental consideration and government official consideration in correcting the situation.

I have about exhausted my time. I am sorry I cannot see in the speech from the throne the many bright hues which have been mentioned by others. If we were a bunch of Hollywood people discussing a script that had come out, probably I would make the remark that the government had "laid an egg"; but I do not know that that would be appropriate, for an egg is an important item of food at the present time if it is fresh, and if it is not fresh there are other uses to which it may be put, notably at election times. This speech from the throne is something like what used to be done when I was a child back home on the farm. They used to find some kind of lime egg, and sometimes an old discarded white door-knob, and put it in the nest to lure the reluctant hen to come up on the nest. I think what the government has done in the speech from the throne in this. It has put the hen on a door-knob and now it hopes to hatch out a house and lot.

Mr. McMASTER: I was paired with the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Robinson). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, now that the votes have been taken on two amendments, one of which was moved by the Conservative party, and the other by the C.C.F., on behalf of the Social Credit group I wish to move another one, one that we consider to be essential to the welfare of the Canadian people.

Before doing so, however, I wish to make a few comments regarding the speech from the throne. I think hon. members of the C.C.F. party will appreciate the reason we could not support their amendment. It was for the very simple reason that we did not have a mandate from the people of Alberta to support the establishment of a socialist state.

Whilst the Conservative party may think there was nothing in their proposals that we could object to, let me point out that their proposals were absolutely hamstrung by their declared financial policy. I should like to remind the house of what that policy is, in part, as declared in the budget debate of last year by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). I refer hon. members to page 1296 of Hansard of 1945 where the hon. member said:

> So far as expenditure is concerned we must make up our minds, based upon the best estimate we can make of the national income, how much of this income can be safely taken by the state; having made up our minds on this, we must then make a heroic effort to keep our expenditure within that amount.

That declaration, Mr. Speaker, in the opinion of this group is a policy of reaction. It recalls to mind the policies of the former minister of finance, the Hon. Charles Dunning, under whose policies from 1935 to 1939 the resources of this country were systematically sabotaged as a result of curtailing expenditures in an attempt to balance the budget. It will be recalled that during those years the minister always insisted that the only money which was available to the government was the money that they could obtain from the people's pockets, and as a consequence we allowed over half a million people to remain unemployed and a million people to be on relief. So much for the Conservative policy.

What of the government's policy in this regard? I have already referred to their pre-war deflationary policy. But the house will recall the very sudden change that took place in government policy immediately after the declaration of war. It will be recalled that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated soon after the declaration of the war that no financial restrictions would be allowed to impede the government's war effort, that the only limit to our war effort would be a physical one, that of the number of men and materials that were available to execute it. That declaration received the whole-hearted endorsation of the people of Canada from one end to the other and received the whole-hearted endorsation of the members of this house.

I would also remind hon. members that when we in this group from 1935 to 1939 had also made a similar declaration, a declaration of a realistic policy, namely, that whatever was physically possible and desirable should also be made financially possible, that declaration was ridiculed not only by members on the other side but by members in other parts of the house. It was not until the fear of war struck the government that they were willing to adopt what might be called a realistic policy. Well, to-day the war is over, but once again we are reverting to pre-war policies. Surely it must be quite plain that if a realistic policy is necessary and justified in order to win the war, a realistic policy should be justified in order to win the peace. I say that for this reason. Winning the war is not the ultimate objective. Winning the war is merely the first major objective that must be captured in order that we may go on to the ultimate objective, that of winning a permanent peace, a peace that will have some permanency attached to it, and the only kind of peace that can have any permanency attached to it is one that will make it possible for peoples in all countries in the world to live in the greatest degree of freedom, free from the fear of want and aggression, free to live their lives as they choose; that freedom itself covers all other freedoms. Certainly, if that is to be the objective of the world, then Canada is in an admirable position to give leadership along these lines. But I would ask, do we find that type of leadership in the speech from the throne? I think it can very well be shown that we find therein to a very large extent a repetition of those policies that were put into force not only in this country but in all the highly industrialized nations throughout the world between the two great wars and even prior to 1914.

The speech from the throne makes it quite clear that in order to maintain full employment and a high standard of living the government depends very largely upon exports, depends very largely upon a programme of foreign investment. While it must be quite clear that exporting wealth without bringing back the equivalent in the form of imports may help to maintain a programme of full employment, it must be equally clear, on the other hand, that it will not maintain the standard of living of the people at the highest level possible because, when you ship wealth out of a country without bringing back imports to a similar amount, you are bound to reduce the standard of living to the extent that you have that unbalance.

We in this group quite agree that we have a moral obligation to make available to the areas that have been made destitute by war all the goods that we can spare. We are, for example, thoroughly behind the government's proposal for a loan to Britain. But I wish to point out that this is entirely different from a programme of foreign investment as a part of permanent government policy, for the purpose of dumping our unemployment problems on the doorstep of another nation.

On motion of Mr. Quelch the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 27, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

AID TO RUSSIA—PRESS AND RADIO REPORTS OF STATEMENT OF TIM BUCK

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I was surprised to read in last night's evening papers and to hear over the radio the following statement, attributed to Tim Buck:

> The most damning fact that has come out of the spy inquiry is the fact that Mackenzie King held out on a hard-pressed ally through the most crucial days of the war.

I confess I am entirely at a loss to know in what direction I have "held out" in any way, at any time, against any ally. With respect to the U.S.S.R. I have in my hand a copy of the Canadian mutual aid board second annual report to March 31, 1945, and I should like to give the house the information it contains on aid to Russia:

Canadian mutual aid to the Soviet Union during the fiscal year 1944-45, amounted to $97,633,000, or more than three times that of the previous fiscal year. This figure covered a wide range of war munitions, raw materials and foodstuffs.

As the red armies fought their way across Europe from the east, their supply lines became longer. This factor, coupled with demolition of railways, roads, rolling stock and vehicles by the retreating Germans, presented the Russians with a gigantic transportation problem. Canadian shipments of military vehicles and steel rails have been of assistance in meeting this problem.

Canada has provided Soviet factories during the past fiscal year with industrial equipment, as well as with large quantities of raw materials for war production.

Flour, wheat, lard and rolled oats in large amounts have been sent to the Soviet Union to maintain adequate supplies for the armed forces. During the period when the richly agricultural Ukraine was under German control, Canadian grains played a substantial part in filling the gap in food supplies.

But that is not the whole story of mutual aid to Russia. Merchant vessels and ice breakers of the Soviet Union have been serviced and repaired in Canadian Pacific coast ports. This includes revictualling, provision of sailors' clothing, deck stores, and engine room stores, refuelling and generally making the ships seaworthy.

Canada has undertaken to produce minesweepers for Russia under mutual aid, and Soviet crews are being trained in Canada to man these ships.

Mutual aid sent to the Soviet Union has been acknowledged with gratitude by Soviet workers and fighting men.

If the house would permit it, it would, I think, be valuable to have the detailed statistics placed on Hansard in connection with the statement I am making just now.

I deem it important to make this statement because in all probability the paragraph which I have read has been cabled to the U.S.S.R. and may be given considerable publicity in publications there. I hope that what I have just stated will be given like publicity in this country, in the U.S.S.R. and in other countries.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

First report of the special committee on war expenditures and economies.—Mr. Isnor.

CANADA DAY ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF WORD "CANADA" FOR WORD "DOMINION"

Mr. A. P. COTE (Matapedia-Matane) moved the first reading of bill No. 8, respecting Canada day.

Mr. GRAYDON: Explain.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): The bill is intended to repeal the Dominion Day Act and substitute therefor a Canada Day Act. The only changes are in the title and in section 2 where the word "Canada" is substituted for the word "Dominion". The purpose served and aim pursued in introducing this bill is twofold:

First, it is for the purpose of achieving a better identification of Canada outside the country.

Second, it is to create another element conducive to a greater patriotism towards Canada by Canadians all.

In replacing the word "Dominion" by the word "Canada"—and that is all that my bill is doing to the Dominion Day Act, chapter 49 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927—it surely is a clearer way of identifying our country in a shrunken world, where at least curiosity is rapidly growing for information about us.

Now, as far as we are concerned within the limits of our country, may I be permitted to suggest that it surely is not too early to give to Canadians all a common denominator for calculating their yearly achievements and a yearly holiday to celebrate the results all over Canada.

Such a holiday will certainly not put into shade the various colours of our Canadian mosaic, shining under the sun some other days in the year; but I believe the whole pattern should go on exhibition at least once a year and under a proper appellation.

Mr. CHURCH: We have had one Canada day since confederation—Dominion day July 1.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NAVIGABLE WATERS

APPROVAL OF WORKS CONSTRUCTED AS OF JUNE 1, 1938

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 9, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. FRASER: Explain.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The purpose of the bill is to amend subsection 2 of section 5 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. The section as it stands reads:

> The governor in council may approve of works constructed, or in process of construction, on the first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, subject to the provisions of section seven hereof, and such approval shall have the same effect as approval of works to be constructed.

The only change is to substitute, for the words "first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen", the words "first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-eight".

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the purpose?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This applies to section 7, which reads:

> The local authority, company or person proposing to construct any work in navigable waters, for which no sufficient sanction otherwise exists, may deposit the plans thereof and a description of the proposed site with the Minister of Public Works, and a duplicate of each in the office of the registrar of deeds for the district, county or province in which such work is proposed to be constructed, and may apply to the governor in council for approval thereof.

In the interval between 1918 and 1938 certain works were proceeded with. We have no authority to legalize them under the act as it stands, and this amendment seeks to cover such works as have no other sufficient sanction.

Mr. CHURCH: Has this bill been submitted to the Department of Justice, seeing that it involves boundary waters and interprovincial and international streams?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): All these bills do go to the law clerk of the house for preparation and are submitted to the Department of Justice in every case.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 10, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this the annual bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, this is the ordinary annual bill for the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways. It is the same as the bill introduced last year, with the exception that the figures "nineteen forty-six" have been inscribed instead of the figures

"nineteen forty-five." It seeks again the appointment of George A. Touche and Company.

Mr. CHURCH: How long have they been auditors?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time

CANADIAN ARMY

PACIFIC FORCE PAY TO RADAR TECHNICIANS AND OTHER SIGNALS PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, a copy of which I have sent to him. Is the minister yet in a position to advise the house if Pacific pay has been granted to radar technicians and other personnel of the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals who served in the Pacific theatre between July, 1944, and February, 1946?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Personnel who enlisted in the Canadian army Pacific force and who proceeded for training or as observers to the United States or to the Pacific theatre of war received special rates of pay authorized for the Canadian army Pacific force; but personnel other than those who had enlisted in the Pacific force were not entitled to and did not receive rates of pay authorized for the Canadian army Pacific force. There is no submission at present under consideration providing for the special rates of pay for personnel other than members of the Canadian army Pacific force.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUIREMENTS OF SUGAR BEET AND OTHER SPECIALIZED PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. It has to do with the need for specialized labour in western Ontario for sugar beet growing and other specialized work. What is being done, other than releasing conscientious objectors, to make available the necessary labour for the purpose I have just mentioned? Where other labour is not available is it the intention of the government to utilize prisoners of war for this purpose as was done in previous years?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I take it my hon. friend is concerned mainly with the sugar beet situation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Questions of the type of labour for the kind of work my hon. friend has in mind are under consideration at the moment. I do not know that I can add anything to that.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Just before the debate was adjourned last night I was pointing out that the speech from the throne showed that the government was depending on pre-war policies to maintain prosperity. I pointed out that whilst the policy of foreign investment might help to maintain full employment, it must on the other hand result in a reduction in the standard of living of the people.

I think we must all agree that there is nothing in the speech from the throne to inspire the people to maintain a really worth-while peace effort. I believe we all agree there is a dangerous air of complacency about it, and that attitude has already been taken in this debate by at least one minister. I have in mind especially the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). On the other hand I do not think it can be said that that air of complacency is general throughout the country. I know that because I have spoken to many people in various walks of life and from various parts of the country. Speaking in the vernacular I find that that ain't the way they see it. They are greatly perturbed by the shape of things to come. The government is placing altogether too great dependence upon the Bretton Woods agreement to make its policies a success. I deeply regret that the government sought fit to railroad that measure through the house the way they did at the end of the last session. The house will recall that we on this side of the house spent a fair amount of time discussing it and there were loud groans from the Liberal benches. Let me warn the members of the Liberal party that unless they get off the bed of Procrustes before the screws are turned, their backbones will refuse to act and they will no longer have the power to get off.

When Mr. Rasminsky, the government's financial expert, appeared before the banking and commerce committee, he said in reply to my questions that the success of the Bretton Woods agreement would depend to a very large extent upon a change of heart on the part of the creditor nations. Both Mr. Rasminsky and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told us that they thought that some of the main objections we were making with regard to the Bretton Woods agreement would be covered later by trade agreements. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand proposals for expansion of world trade and employment communicated by the United States government. I understand that these proposals are to be referred later to an international conference and that they will form the basis of a discussion.

We charged that the Bretton Woods agreement had a definite pro-creditor bias. As I have already said, Mr. Rasminsky told us that the success of that agreement would depend upon a change of heart; that the objections we had raised would be found in these proposals, and that these objections would be taken care of in the trade agreement. I have carefully studied these proposals. I have read through them many times in an endeavour to find somewhere in the agreements that change of heart referred to by Mr. Rasminsky and the Minister of Finance, and I have not been able to find it anywhere. We make exactly the same charges regarding these proposals as we did against the Bretton Woods agreement, that they have a definite pro-creditor bias.

Let me read to the house one or two sections to illustrate my charges. First I shall read subsection 1 of section A of chapter 3, and then subsection 7. In subsection 1 we find the following:

> To accord to products imported from other members treatment no less favourable than that accorded to domestic products with regard to matters affecting the internal taxation and regulation of the trade in goods.

Subsection 7:

> To refrain from governmentally financed or organized boycotts or campaigns designed to discourage, directly or indirectly, importation or consumption of products of other members.

Let us imagine this situation. A certain nation has a large unfavourable balance of trade. It may be able to balance its trade with the majority of nations, but it has a serious unbalance of trade with one large creditor nation, and that creditor nation refuses to play the game—it is, as Mr. Rasminsky says, a bad creditor. The only alternative to that debtor nation is to restrict the imports from the creditor nation in order that it may be able to bring about a balance; but under these regulations it will not have the right to do so.

Under subsection 2 of section B of chapter 3 we find the following:

> Export tariffs and preferences. Export duties should be open to negotiation in the same way as import duties. Members should undertake not to impose or maintain export duties which differentiate by reference to the destinations to which the goods are exported.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Again referring to the same nation with the unfavourable balance of trade which is largely the result of the actions of one creditor nation, surely that debtor nation should be allowed to adjust the duties on exports to that nation in order to encourage exports to that creditor nation.

I now come to subsection 2 of section C, the section which is supposed to deal with the question of unbalance of trade. It reads as follows:

> 2. Restrictions to safeguard the balance of payments. Members confronted with an adverse balance of payments should be entitled to impose quantitative import restrictions as an aid to the restoration of equilibrium in the balance of payments. This provision should be operative under conditions and procedures to be agreed upon. These conditions and procedures—
> (d) should provide for the full application of non-discrimination in the use of such restrictions after the transitional period.

There you have the case to which I have already referred. A nation wishing to place any restriction upon the imports of any one nation is obliged to place the same restriction against all imports it may bring in from other nations even though these nations may be playing the game and balancing their exports with imports. The purpose of the Bretton Woods agreement is supposed to be to help expand trade; but I would point out that unless the creditor nations are prepared to play the game—and there is no sign of it in these proposals—the result may very well be an intensification of economic nationalism.

I want to quote from a speech by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Attlee, to show that this is exactly what is already taking place in Britain; and, remember, Britain signed the Bretton Woods agreement. I hold in my hand British Hansard for January 22, 1946, and I refer to column 25. Mr. Norman Smith, who I think is Labour member for Nottingham South—

> —asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the difficulties in paying for imports, he will direct scientific research to the substitution of home-produced for imported raw materials used in British factories.

Mr. Attlee replied:

> The circumstances of war have already obliged us to do our best to substitute home-produced for imported materials within the limitations imposed by our natural resources. The government consider that these efforts should be continued both by the government and by industry, with the full support of scientific research, in such a way as will contribute effectively to the solution of our balance of payment difficulties.

So in spite of the fact that the Bretton Woods agreement has been passed, apparently Great Britain still finds it necessary to adopt a policy of economic nationalism in order to try to solve the balance of payment difficulties; and I am very much afraid we shall find that policy followed by many other European nations—as well as nations such as Australia—which have had great difficulty in balancing their payments in the past.

One may well ask what would be the consequences of the government's supine adherence to the reactionary form of laissez-faire capitalism. I should like to quote to the house the warning that has been issued by the governor of the Bank of Canada in this regard. On page 9 of the report of the bank dated February 8, 1946, the governor refers to the present situation and states:

> At present, government outlays are still comparatively high. Time is required for demobilization, and large payments of war service gratuities and reestablishment credits are in process of being made. Moreover, our exports, which reached unprecedented volume under mutual aid, are being maintained at a high level in part by government loans to assist allied countries to rebuild their damaged economies and to secure necessary foodstuffs.

That no doubt is the reason the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply sounded so optimistic when he spoke in this house, but I should like to go on and quote the warning that Mr. Graham Towers issues:

> Looking to the future, however, there is no reason for complacency. Most of our real problems of post-war adjustment are still ahead. The backlog of demand will not be large in relation to productive capacity when industry has been fully reconverted and inventories built up to normal levels. When the time lag involved in demobilization is over, government expenditures will fall rapidly. Nor will our foreign lending to finance the purchase of Canadian goods remain indefinitely at the present level. The prevailing optimism on the North American continent is dangerous if it diverts attention from the problems which have to be faced.

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the problems referred to there by Mr. Graham Towers are exactly the same problems that faced us between the two wars. They are the same problems that have always faced heavily industrialized nations. Those problems may be boiled down to this: the way in which we maintain an effective demand as against our production, the way in which we maintain home markets and export markets for the total production of our factories, farms and other industries. In the past, especially from 1935 to 1939, we emphasized the reason for that situation. Time and again we pointed out that owing to certain practices which are inherent in the capitalistic system, industry is not able to maintain an effective demand against its own production except in times of abnormal capital goods construction, such as you have in war time or in any newly developed country before it becomes industrialized. Therefore if your objective is to bring about the fullest possible development of your resources you are bound to be faced with one of two alternatives. Either you will have to export your surplus goods—that is, goods not surplus to the needs of the people but surplus to their ability to buy within the country—and refuse to accept imports in return; or on the other hand you will have to expand the purchasing power of the people to the point where they will be able to buy the total production of the country and the exports of other nations exchanged for your own.

It is evident that if your objective is merely full employment; if your objective is simply to put people to work, the first of these two solutions may be satisfactory. Undoubtedly by such means you could maintain full employment, if you could get other nations who were willing to maintain an unfavourable balance of trade and to go further and further into debt, indefinitely. What nations are willing to do that? None have shown their willingness in the past; but if that were the case then you could succeed in getting everybody in the country to work. But if the objective is not merely to put people to work but to maintain the highest possible standard of living the people desire, then I think everyone will agree that the first solution is not satisfactory, because when you export more wealth abroad than you bring back in return, you are bound to reduce the standard of living of the people to the extent of that unbalance.

Therefore it should be the responsibility of the government to maintain the purchasing power of the people at a level sufficiently high to enable the people to consume to the limit of their desires or their power to produce, whichever comes first. If that is done I do not think we shall need to worry about a lack of effective demand; we shall not need to worry about a lack of markets. We shall have the greatest market this country has ever seen, the market provided by satisfying the needs of the people of this country. I suggest that under such a policy we could very well grant old age pensions of $50 a month at the age of sixty. Remember, when that matter was discussed in this house it received the support of hon. members on all sides, and the sooner the government implements a policy of the kind the sooner the people will really believe the Prime Minister means what he says when he talks about a new social order. Similar pensions should be paid to all people who are physically incapacitated and unable to seek gainful employment. To a certain extent we recognize that principle now so far as the blind are concerned, but there are many other classes of people who are incapacitated. I have especially in mind people who suffer so severely from arthritis and many other diseases.

Then we emphasize the fact that income tax exemption should be increased to at least $2,000 for married people and $1,200 for single people. After our action in this house, last session taking care of ourselves in a very gracious way, I think the very least we can do is pass on some similar benefits to the people of Canada. I believe all hon. members will agree when I say it is evident that people across this country, from one end to the other, are feeling that way to-day. They expect that when the budget is brought down it will provide substantial reductions on income tax to be paid by people in the lower income brackets.

We believe that parity prices for primary products should be a matter of permanent government policy. When the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) spoke in this debate he placed our stand in respect to agriculture before the house. I repeat in passing, however, merely that, owing to increasing costs and the fact that to-day wheat at Chicago is selling at about $2 a bushel, the initial payment might very well be raised from $1.25 to $1.50. We are not criticizing the government for selling wheat to Great Britain at $1.55; but we do look upon that as a sacrifice which should be borne by the people of Canada as a whole. We do not believe the government has any right to ask one class of society to stand the whole sacrifice. We believe, too, that for the next four years the floor might very well be raised from $1 to $1.25.

There are many urgent projects which could be carried out. We believe the Minister of Reconstruction is making a mistake when he postpones the day when he proposes to put these projects into operation, and for that purpose keeps them on the shelf as insurance against unemployment.

There is no doubt, for instance, that as rapidly as possible irrigation projects should be proceeded with, thereby providing farms and homes for many thousands of people. This will help maintain a demand for goods and services of various kinds.

Then there is the question of housing. While we have many housing projects which, when materials are available, undoubtedly will help people in the higher income brackets, or even those in the medium brackets, to build houses,

I believe every hon. member will agree that these housing projects will not make it possible for the people in lower income brackets to obtain houses. After all, they are the ones in whom we should be specially interested. Therefore we favour a subsidized housing programme which would make it possible for all people in all walks of life to obtain decent housing.

It is very necessary that interest rates should be substantially lower. One thing that has been puzzling to people in Canada is that while we can make interest-free loans to foreign countries, and can make loans at a rate as low as two per cent, yet we have to soak our own people about 4½ per cent for our own housing programme.

One might criticize severely the making of loans to foreign countries at two per cent, while at the same time we are charging our own soldiers who helped win the war 3½ per cent on the loans they wish to obtain. Surely they should be eligible for the same rates that we charge on loans to foreign countries.

I realize these things cannot be accomplished either under the present Conservative or Liberal financial policy, without steadily expanding debt and taxation. But let me point out that you cannot tax yourself into prosperity; you cannot borrow yourself out of debt. Therefore, as the control of the issue of money can determine the volume and nature of production, and as it is a sovereign power, we urge the establishment of a national finance commission, responsible to parliament, through the Minister of Finance, for the issue and withdrawal of all moneys in accordance with the nation's requirements, and for the administration of the monetary system in response to the will of the Canadian people. We believe that in this way and in this way alone will it be possible to maintain and develop all the resources of the people of Canada at the highest possible level, and make the resulting wealth available to the people of this country, without at the same time dragging the nation down into the mire and morass of unpayable debt.

We have been told that one of the chief reasons for our magnificent war effort was that the people were inspired by the need for victory over the enemy. I am sure all will agree that in the speech from the throne there is nothing very much to inspire people. Certainly there is no inspiration in high taxation; there is no inspiration in expanding debt. Nor is there inspiration in a steadily lowered standard of living.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore):

That the following be added to the said address:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's ministers ought to have advised Your Excellency that they would introduce in the present session, such changes in Canada's financial, economic, and political organization as would ensure the immediate establishment of a revitalized Christian democracy wherein the standard of living of all Canadians would be raised to conform with the greatly expanded capacity of Canada to produce and deliver goods and services."

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when I rose to speak on the amendment to the amendment, which was disposed of last evening, because there had been some discussion prior to beginning my observations I neglected to pay my respects to the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address in reply. Therefore I take this opportunity to join with other hon. members who have extended their congratulations to those hon. members upon the able manner in which they presented the motion to the house.

I had not intended at that time to say anything further about agriculture in this debate. However I am sure hon. members will agree that, in view of the statements made yesterday afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) something should be said as soon as possible.

I rise to address myself to this new motion of want of confidence which has been moved by the Social Credit section of the house. First I should like to express my appreciation to hon. members in that group for the support they have given to the main matter of contention in connection with agricultural policy in Canada. In doing so perhaps I may be permitted to call attention to the fact that probably the one group in the house more dominated than any other by farm representation is the Social Credit group. Most of them are practical farmers from that section of the country we have been discussing when we have spoken about summer-fallowing and other systems of agriculture in an area which has had great difficulty in maintaining its population at a proper standard of living. For that reason I appreciate deeply the remarks which have been made, and the support which has come from that section of the house for the summer-fallow policy.

In the discussion which has taken place up to the present time I have reason to be satisfied with the position I took very early in my political experience. It was, Mr. Speaker, that never at any time would I criticize lengthy discussions in a deliberative assembly on any question which might come before such an assembly. As a matter of fact I have always thought it was a mistake to take away from private members, in a house of commons particularly, or in any deliberative body convened for the purpose of discussing public questions—and particularly when such body is composed of elected representatives—their right to express themselves freely before we pass upon public questions in order that we may learn the point of view of people coming from different sections of such a far-flung country.

So throughout the thirty-two years in which I have been in deliberative assemblies, conscientiously I have carried out the decision I reached not to criticize people for discussing at great length subjects which might come before a deliberative body such as the House of Commons. I was never more pleased at having reached that decision a long time ago and having maintained it than I was when I listened yesterday to the leader of the opposition.

In the first speech that he delivered in the house this session he called the attention of new members particularly to the fact that this was his second session in the House of Commons; that during his first session he had sat and listened and had taken in all the different activities of members in this house, and, basing his decision upon his experience of over twenty years in another place and his one year's experience in this place, he felt called upon to give some advice to all of us. He stated that he did not intend on his first appearance before the house and in giving that advice to be brief in the remarks he proposed to make. He then proceeded to give us an address lasting somewhat in the neighbourhood of two and a half hours.

I take no exception to his doing that. It was his right; it was his privilege. We expected, of course, that that privilege would be utilized on one occasion, but probably not extended to another so soon. But yesterday we had the privilege of listening again to him for an hour and a quarter. On this occasion he was attempting to answer some of the remarks I made in a speech of about an hour's duration which I delivered a week ago. In his speech he raised three different questions.

The first was as to whether or not I had deliberately misrepresented him in any of the remarks I made in my speech of a week ago. He paid me the compliment of saying that he did not think I had done it deliberately, but that likely it was because I had not given full consideration to the matter. I want to say that everything I did a week ago I did deliberately, and I did it believing I had in my possession all the facts. An examination of the figures which were used both then and which I will use to-day bear out the position which I took a week ago.

When we were discussing this matter a week ago I read to this house the definition of summer-fallow which was given by the leader of the opposition when he was teaching agriculture in the agricultural college of the province of Saskatchewan, and said that I agreed with it. That definition was to the effect that land which is kept out of crop, not growing any crop, not growing anything so far as you can prevent it from growing anything in one year in order to store up moisture for the next, is what is generally known in western Canada as fallowed land.

Back in 1915 and 1916 and periods earlier than that, fallowed land was composed almost equally of two different classifications of land. The first was land that had never grown anything but prairie grass. That land we broke up in the latter part of May or the early part of June. We were accustomed to calling it "breaking". That land was kept from growing prairie grass or anything else for the first season after it was broken up, and then in the succeeding year it was put into crop. Usually the first year after it was broken up from prairie it was seeded to wheat. Then in the second year it was what we called backsetted and was again seeded to wheat. We put it into wheat for two years, believing that new prairie would grow wheat for two succeeding years after it was broken up. Then, under our practice of farming, usually in the third year we summer-fallowed it, kept it from growing anthing for another year in order to store up moisture.

Those are the lands that I was speaking of when I was speaking a week ago; those are the lands that the leader of the opposition was speaking of yesterday. If you take into consideration the classified lands which were broken up in 1915 along with the lands which were summer-fallowed, all the lands not producing anything for one season in order that they may produce more abundantly the next, then the figure which should have been used by me a week ago if I had used any figure at all, and I did not, was 32 per cent and not 26 per cent or 30 per cent. In other words, the policy supported in 1916 involved keeping fallow 32 per cent of the area to be cropped the following year.

Another point is raised in connection with the discussion. It is suggested that when the statement was made a week ago the leader of the opposition was dealing with a proposal which he made to reduce summer-fallowed acreage this year down to 26 per cent. That is not the fact. The fact of the matter is that the leader of the opposition did what he suggests that I do on occasion. He suggested in his speech that on occasion I take a certain position and then try to bolster it up with any information that I can find lying about. I submit to this house that is exactly what he did yesterday.

What did he do? He took certain figures which he had compiled from somewhere or other showing that we have 61,000,000 acres of cultivated land in western Canada at the present time. We have 65,000,000 acres. He first took the figure of 10,500,000 acres and then he added a figure covering breaking and summer-fallow and figured out that 3,500,000 acres was 26 per cent of that particular figure of 13,300,000 acres. He then estimated that if 19,300,000 were reduced to 15,800,000, that would provide 26 per cent of our present acreage, stated to be 61,000,000 acres. Then he started from the 15,800,000 figure and figured everything else in his speech on the basis of 26 per cent.

The mistake in that kind of reasoning is that the present acreage is not 61,000,000 acres but 65,000,000 acres. Then there is the further fact that when the leader of the opposition was speaking a week ago the figure which he used was 15,000,000 and not 15,800,000. He said that the summer-fallowed acreage of western Canada should be reduced from the 19,300,000 acres that we are proposing the farmers might have this year, down to 16,000,000 or 15,000,000. He then suggested that that would save some three or four million acres with which to produce some 30,000,000 bushels of wheat.

I submit that when the figures are righted to check the position which was taken a week ago, the figure of 65,000,000 acres, the summer-fallowed acreage of 15,000,000 acres is not 26 per cent but 23 per cent. The proposals which were made the other day were to the effect that we should reduce the summer-fallowed acreage, which now stands at between 29 and 30 per cent down to a level of 23 per cent, and that by doing that we could produce more wheat with which to supply those who are in need at this present time.

I submit these figures in order to indicate that I have nothing to withdraw with regard to what I said a week ago. The position I took a week ago was to the effect that back in 1915 and 1916 the present leader of the opposition, as professor of agriculture in the agricultural college of Saskatchewan, was teaching our young farmers that over a considerable part of our province we ought to have 50 per cent of our land summer-fallowed; over another very considerable part of it we ought to have 33⅓ per cent; over another much smaller part of it we ought to have 20 or 25 per cent, and that the average should be around one-third.

I know he took that position because I was in the house in Saskatchewan as a member in 1914. I was in the house in 1915 and in 1916. During some of those years the leader of the opposition was working for the government of Saskatchewan as a civil servant in the department of agriculture, and during others he was in the university in the province of Saskatchewan. I think hon. members will agree that I knew the grand old man who was Minister of Agriculture in Saskatchewan at that time—Hon. W. R. Motherwell—about as well as anyone in Canada could have known him. I know what his views were on the question; and I know that no man could have worked for him as a promoter of proper agricultural methods in Saskatchewan and not have been in agreement that we ought to have at least 33⅓ per cent of the lands of that province summer-fallowed each year in order to make provision for a succeeding crop. So that in so far as that particular position is concerned I have no hesitation in making the statement that was the intention of the leader of the opposition when he was teaching the subject at that time, and that everyone in western Canada believed that was the position taken in his articles.

But if I had any doubt about it I do not have to go very far for an answer. Since this discussion came on I had sent to me the opinion of Mr. D. G. Mackay, of Indian Head, Saskatchewan. One only needs to mention the name of Mackay to recall Doctor Mackay, the father of D. G. Mackay, who was the first superintendent of the experimental farm at Indian Head, and one only needs to mention that name to anyone coming from western Canada to recall the fact that Doctor Mackay was the originator of the idea of summer-fallowing, that he was the first one to advocate that policy in western Canada, that the reason he was given his position as head of the experimental farm at Indian Head when it was set up was that he had established on his own land the fact that in a dry country you can grow crops by summer-fallowing that could not be grown in years of drought unless you did summer-fallow. He started out to teach that idea to the people of western Canada, and one of his students was the present leader of the opposition. I did not give the leader of the opposition credit for having established this particular policy in western Canada; I simply said that he was teaching the subject. Prior to the time he began to teach it he had his experiences on an Ontario farm, where summer-fallowing is an entirely different matter. When he came to western Canada to work on the staff of Hon. W. R. Motherwell, who was a bosom friend of Doctor Mackay—the two men together had preached this doctrine for years throughout the length and breadth of western Canada—it went without saying that he was employed to teach the idea which had been instilled into the minds of all good farmers by the two best advocates of the policy that we ever had. So that the present leader of the opposition was then under instructions from men who believed in this policy, and he did what a good civil servant does, he went out to teach the policy, as the figures which I have indicated bear out.

D. G. Mackay has something to say about this. He is looked to by grain marketing authorities throughout the world for information; and this particular information which I have in my hand, and which was sent to me during these discussion, is noted as having been sent to Broomhall. It states this:

> A large proportion of the 1945 wheat crop in Saskatchewan was due almost entirely to the practice of "30 per cent crop, 50 per cent fallow," by the majority of farmers on the lighter lands; and on the heavier soils, to the plan of summer-fallowing at least one-third of the cultivated acreage each year.

It goes on to say:

> Despite the well recognized fact that in dry seasons wheat is a safer proposition than either of the coarse grains, anything that will tend toward a reduction of the oat and/or barley crops—thereby necessitating a further reduction in the live stock population—or in a decrease in the acreage to be summer-fallowed in the areas that for two years have suffered severe drought, must be regarded with very considerable misgiving.

That is the advice given to the people who are passing out information to grain markets all over the world, advice that they can rely upon. And what is the proposed policy he is referring to?

> In recommending an increase of over 30 per cent in the wheat acreage for 1946, the . . . government of Saskatchewan, backed by the wheat pool, seems to have completely lost sight of the fact that one-half the province has been, and is, suffering from drought conditions, that a large proportion of the other half will commence the next crop season with reserves of moisture more or less depleted, and that there will be little or no carryover of feed grain.

Those who are going to buy wheat all over the world are looking to this organization for advices on what to expect from the crops this year. This man who gives them advice says that if the policy which is being proposed before this house by the leader of the opposition is followed, they can look upon their desire to have more wheat with great misgivings; and everyone in western Canada who knows anything about the policies of farmers in western Canada knows that to be true. That statement was made on February 14, 1946.

In making a further report, on March 11, 1946, he says:

> Deliveries of commercial feed grains in the current season to date—oats 73. barley 56.—might appear to indicate that at least 2 million each of oats and barley acreages could be changed over to wheat without seriously affecting the live stock situation in the three provinces. This however is not a sound basis for even a partial solution of the problems of increasing the acreage for the production of feed . . .
>
> This, then, would appear to leave lands intended for summer-fallow as the cultivation that must necessarily be changed over if a serious attempt be made to meet, even partially, the requirements of the stricken countries. Acreage changes of 3 to 10 million have been suggested, and under the latter an increase of 160 million bushels of export wheat has been mentioned as a possibility.
> Under existing moisture conditions in the plains areas the production of 160 million bushels of wheat from 10 million acres of second and third crop lands would seem to be merely a pipe dream, but the effect of the reduction of 3 to 10 million acres in the summer-fallow acreages for the crop of 1947 would be far from that—it would indicate the probalility of the smallest wheat crop in many years.

That, Mr. Speaker, is not the opinion of a man who is a politician, it is the opinion of a man who is still a scientific agriculturist, who has been bred in the ideas of summer-fallowing in western Canada, and who I believe knows the position as well as anyone in Canada can know it. Certainly some people think he does, when an organization such as this relies for its information upon him, and he sends that information out as an indication of what we can expect from the people of this country if we follow some of the advices which are given to us from time to time.

I think that pretty well deals with the first point mentioned by the leader of the opposition. I still maintain that the proper system to follow in this country is not to have even the 23,300,000 acres which we had consented to ask farmers to seed this year, but the proper policy to follow in this country is, 21,500,000 acres in wheat, 21,500,000 acres in summer-fallow each year, and the other 21,500,000 acres in either grass or coarse grains for the feeding of live stock in order that we may keep up our supplies of other feeds as well as wheat.

That is about as plainly as, I think, I can state the position in relation to it, and I hope that the leader of the opposition, who is not here this afternoon to receive the answer I am giving to what he said yesterday, will examine the figures again. I may tell him that I am making this speech now because it gives him an opportunity of replying to it if he desires to do so. If I had waited, as I might have done, until the main motion—because I had not spoken on the main motion—he would not have had the right to speak again. But since I am speaking on this amendment and he has not spoken on it he still has the right to speak on it. Well, all I would say to him is this. I think he has depended too much upon the group of young men whom he hired out of the agricultural college of Saskatchewan—very capable young fellows—and from other agricultural activities throughout Canada, and whom he placed in charge of his propaganda office and of his organization.

These men up to that time were scientific agriculturists giving advice to the people of the country upon the basis of scientific experience; and I would suggest to him, when he takes a week of the time of officials of the department and of the statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the purpose of compiling information necessary to the making of a speech, he should get someone in one of these departments to write his speech for him, and not be reading a speech provided by men hired out of the departments who have become politicians.

In the discussions yesterday the leader of the opposition stated the second major point was this, that the minister said the establishment of a certain percentage of summer-fallowing will produce better results than by summer-fallowing less. It will be noted, when that appears in Hansard to-morrow, that I have not used the figures which were used by the leader of the opposition in making the statement.

These figures, as I stated a moment ago, were based upon figures which were not properly interpreted and which were not given full expression to in the statements read to the house yesterday—and I am not blaming the leader of the opposition for that. I do not think he wrote the speech, and therefore I would say again that I believe with him that the rules of this house and fortunately that which states one shall not read a speech ought to be enforced. That rule is put there for a purpose, that purpose being that no one outside this house and not elected by the people may make a speech in the house through some elected member.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that apply to everyone? Does it apply to the government?

Mr. GARDINER: It applies to me anyway. When anyone is making a speech in this house which is being read, it does not necessarily follow that someone else wrote it—

Mr. GRAYDON: That is an insult to the Prime Minister.

Mr. GARDINER: —though there is a possibility that someone else wrote it. My hon. friend says that is an insult to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has proven himself on many occasions in this house capable of delivering his own speech, either read or spoken.

An hon. MEMBER: So has the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do not worry about the Prime Minister.

Mr. FRASER: He will have lots of worries.

Mr. GRAYDON: It should apply to everyone if it applies to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not intend to quote again figures which were not correct.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): All out of step but my son John.

Mr. GARDINER: Another suggestion has been made; it is that I was wrong in maintaining that we had kept the crop up through summer-fallow—kept the total yield up through summer-fallow—and in order to answer that, the leader of the opposition dwells upon a suggestion that, because in a certain season I had said that the acreage ought to be so-and-so, and in another season I said it should not be any more, I was not advocating greater production of wheat.

The fact is that the leader of the opposition thinks you can get more wheat by merely increasing the acreage. I do not believe that. I have been attempting to demonstrate to the house, every time I have spoken on the question, that the one way to get a higher quantity of production in the west is to summer-fallow one-third of the land on an average, and over a very considerable part of the area one-half of the land. If we do that we can get a much higher production of wheat and feed and live stock and dairy products and all other farm products in that country, and as a matter of fact all dairy and live stock products produced in other parts of Canada, because in no other part of Canada do they produce enough feed grain to feed all the live stock they can maintain on their pastures and by other means on their land. Therefore we must produce feed grain that is to be utilized, and elsewhere increase these productions right across the country.

In dealing with this matter, the leader of the opposition became eloquent, maintaining that I did not give sufficient credit to Providence or to someone else. I might say this, I would far rather be guilty of not giving credit to the Lord than be guilty of blaming our difficulties upon Him, and that is exactly what the leader of the opposition did. He said it was the drought and grasshoppers, the sawfly and the cutworms—these were the things which caused the difficulties from 1935 to 1939; and because I did not mention them, I gave all credit to the government for the summer-fallow policy which I maintained had increased production from 1941 to 1944.

The fact is that I did not choose that period at all; the leader of the opposition chose that period. In his speech a week ago he challenged me as Minister of Agriculture to ask the people of Saskatchewan and of western Canada in general to go back to the acreages in the period immediately prior to the war, and I took him at his word and compared the two periods. I simply stated that we had this production in the one five-year period, not only of grain, but of live stock and dairy products and everything else that goes on the market; that we had another production in the other period, and that the production in the second period when we were encouraging summer-fallow was much higher than in the preceding period. And now he says to me that in making that statement I have said it was better than at any other time.

Probably I am a little guilty of having said that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Just a weeny bit.

Mr. GARDINER: I certainly said that one year of the period, 1942, had produced more than any other year in our experience, but I am quite prepared to accept the criticism; for where did he go in order to check up on that statement? He went back to the years prior to 1929, in the twenties. I would call his attention to one fact in that connection.

We were told in this house that certain things have happened because of certain policies which this government had. We were told that we had certain support because of certain things we did, while there was lack of support because of things we did not do. Then he goes back to the twenties to find a period he thinks was better than this period during the war, although he does give us credit for having had the best period of all in the last three years.

What does that bring us to? It brings us to this fact. We have had changes of government from time to time in this country. The government under the leadership of the present Prime Minister came into power in 1922—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: 1921.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, December, 1921, and continued in power down to 1930. In that period what happened? Agriculture rose from one experience to another, from an experience which it had had in the years following the first world war to the early thirties. It rose from one position to another until the only period that the leader of the opposition can take us back to in order to find better conditions than those prevailing at the present time, according to his story, is the twenties following the last war. That brings us down to about the time that a previous leader of his party whose policies he would like us to follow was in office. No one would suggest we return to the early thirties. What about the period following that to which he advised us to go the other day?

In speaking of the last three years of the war period he did not emphasize this; the highest heights to which we as a farming population ever rose prior to the last five years were in 1928. The total gross cash income of the farmers was $1,060,000,000 The average for the total cash farm returns in this country for the last three years has been $1,600,000,000, and in one of those years, 1944, it was $1,800,000,000. In other words, if one takes the three-year period during the twenties and compares it with the last three-year period it will be found that we are from $600 to $700 million higher on an average than we were in the preceding period.

If the policies of the government have led us to the present position in the last three years, what about the next three? Yesterday I had the privilege of bringing down in this house the agreements which have been arrived at between this government and the British government. They showed on a firm basis for this crop year, the next crop year and the following crop year, price levels and other returns for farm products equal to those we have had during the last three years. I have showed in this policy that we have not only laid down for a three-year period, which is admitted by the leader of the opposition himself, a programme which will assure as good returns, but also for at least another three years which will assure as high returns as have already produced a record.

That brings me to the suggestion that I did not take into consideration pests such as wireworms, cutworms, grasshoppers and some other things.

Mr. GRAYDON: And the C.C.F.

Mr. GARDINER: I am beginning to wonder whether the C.C.F. is as much a pest as my hon. friends directly opposite. I hold in my hand a map which shows the areas that are infested from time to time by grasshoppers. It is the same area that we speak of as the Palliser triangle. Then I have another map which shows the same thing for wireworm.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you make it up?

Mr. GARDINER: No; some of the people who gave my hon. friend some of his information made it. Then I have one with regard to the sawfly which shows the same area. Then I have another one that shows the sawfly in 1938, and it gives the same area. Then I have another one that shows the sawfly in 1942 and it covers the same area. I could go on throughout all the years that we have had experience with the different kinds of pests and indicate that they thrive in the drought area known as the Palliser triangle in western Canada. Then I hold in my hand the advice which is given to the farmers from time to time by the scientists in relation to this particular problem. Here is what they say with regard to grasshoppers:

> Careful planning is essential to best control. This is particularly important in the areas of open plains, where widespread infestations of the lesser migratory grasshopper are likely to be found. The work should be so timed that summer-fallows will be completed before the grasshoppers migrate from the stubble to adjacent crops.

Note that the grasshopper's eggs are laid in the stubble. They are there in the fall of the year. It is pointed out that the summer-fallowing should be done sufficiently early to destroy as many of these pests as possible before they can move out of that stubble land on to the land that is growing a crop. The scientists say, "Take care of your summer-fallow, but do it early, and that in itself will assist you in treating grasshoppers." The article goes on:

> As much as possible of the infested stubble land and recently abandoned land, which may be heavily infested, should be summer-fallowed and worked in a manner that will destroy the grasshoppers or their eggs and prevent migration. In severely infested areas it is folly to "stubble-in" any crop.

In other words, they are emphasizing cultivation and more, particularly claiming summer-fallowing as a means of contesting grasshoppers.

I now come to another of the pests mentioned, the stem sawfly. We are told much the same thing. This statement is made:

Any type of farming practice or rotation in which wheat is seeded on land containing infested stubble or adjoining such land tends to increase the abundance of the sawfly. Infestations in large field units, which are summer-fallowed in alternate years, are usually found to be confined to the margins.

In other words, the only places where you have the sawfly in a well summer-fallowed field are where the sawfly comes in out of the areas immediately roundabout. Therefore summer-fallowing is a means of dealing with all these infestations. I do not need to say to men from western Canada who have had experience in farming that in so far as the cutworm is concerned that is more particularly true. The cutworm comes from an insect. It lives on top of the ground. Naturally the grub goes into the ground when conditions are suitable, and they are suitable to it only when there is not much moisture in the land. When the land is properly summer-fallowed and maintained there is less likelihood of cutworm being prevalent than if that process is not carried out.

I go into this in some detail to show that not all the pests are of the insect variety. These people who are going around the country telling us that we ought to have less summer-fallow in the area when the experts tell us that we have already had two drought years are, I think, greater pests than all the army worms, wire worms, cutworms and grasshoppers that we have ever had. We ought to get rid of some of these.

Since listening to the discussion and looking at the statistics that were placed on Hansard yesterday, I have come to the conclusion that scientists when they get out of their element and into politics giving information are just about as dangerous as any pests we have ever had. We have had some experience with that kind of thing. Scientists have their noses glued to a task. They are working at it. Their minds are upon the accomplishment of it, and while they are working at these tasks they do some wonderful things for all of us. But when a man who has been studying matters of that kind during the early part of his life and instructing the youth how to carry out those ideas and then in some way or other gets shoved into something else in which he has had no previous experience and tries to instruct the people he gets into trouble. I believe the leader of the opposition is the one man in this country at this time who demonstrates that to a greater degree than anyone else. He has been shoved over into that position. I do not know that he desired it. I am going to deal with that in a few moments. He has been utilized in a certain way and I shall deal with that in a few moments. In the meantime all I wish to say is that we have had some difficulties as a result of scientists taking over other responsibilities and trying to give us advice in other fields. Some scientists are in the organization offices of the Progressive Conservative party and some are in that leadership going around the country talking to our people on the ground that because at one time they were considered to be experts in agriculture, therefore every farmer should follow them. I am not greatly worried about that. It is pretty well known what the intention was when these leaders took over; it was fairly clearly stated to us yesterday. The intention, of course, was to appeal to the agriculturists of Canada, and more particularly to the agriculturists of western Canada to support a certain party. Well, if anyone benefited from that appeal it was not the Progressive Conservative party; probably it was our C.C.F. friends. The appeal made to the farmers of western Canada under the present leadership did not return more Conservatives to this house from western Canada. Two very able men at whom I used to look across the way, coming from the province of Saskatchewan, are not in their seats this parliament. True, these leaders succeeded in removing quite a number from this side of the house, but after all they did not accomplish very much toward the objective they had in mind in establishing one set of principles as against another set of principles. I would suggest that when we go to the country again we place our principles squarely before the people and rest our case upon those principles. Then I think we shall get much better results than by simply trying to encourage men who were scientists and experts in certain lines of activity to go out and tell our people that more can be accomplished by following some particular individual than by following sound scientific practice.

The third point which was raised was to the effect that the government had claimed to have switched its policy, which up to 1943 had been to encourage the production of live stock; that from that time on we encouraged the production of wheat, but that we had not done so. In dealing with this matter yesterday the leader of the opposition read from the reports of the dominion-provincial conference which has been held each December since 1939, to substantiate the position he took, and said that according to those reports I had not advocated an increased wheat acreage during the last three years. Then he went on to quote from a newspaper in western Canada which he said was a supporter of the government. Of course we like to get support from any quarter, and to the extent that this newspaper supports the government we appreciate it.

An hon. MEMBER: You will need it.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I have not needed it as much as some people, so far. I have here some of the opinions expressed by this same newspaper just a year ago, and I should like to place one or two of them on Hansard in order that we may understand just what the position is from time to time. I have here a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of March 23, 1945, just about a year ago. The first sentence is:

> The supply of foodstuffs during the coming year has become a matter of urgent concern to the governments of the united nations. The prospective deficiency in the supplies of meat is the main cause for anxiety.

Then further:

> The first matter to be examined in this connection is the recently announced policy regarding wheat. The government has decided to increase substantially the returns which western farmers will receive from wheat . . .
> This policy is bound to have important repercussions on the nature of agricultural production in the prairie provinces. It is widely expected that the increase in the returns from wheat, coming on top of the shortage of labour and the growing strain on the agricultural population, will result in a further expansion in wheat acreage at the expense of animal feed stuffs and live stock production. It is clear that such a development would be directly contrary to the real needs of the situation.

That was just about a year ago, that this paper was saying that to encourage wheat production in Canada in order to take care of the food situation that was developing would be a mistake. I could go on and read some two or three more issues of the same newspaper along the same lines. I think I shall read only one portion from the issue of April 11, 1945:

> When Canadians think of food relief for Europe they think, too often, of wheat. We have great wheat surpluses, but wheat is not the answer. It cannot be ground quickly into flour in Europe because of the war-damaged mills and power shortages. Every flour mill in Canada is working to capacity, so there is little chance of our increasing our flour supplies.

Having read those three statements from the editorial page of the Winnipeg Free Press, I do not think I need go farther than to say that even newspapers sometimes change their minds. A year ago they were advocating a policy entirely different from that which was read to this house yesterday in order to indicate that the statements I made a week ago were not based upon the facts, were not based upon the experience of farmers, and were not in the best interests either of the farmers or of the people who were depending upon us for food. Yet within twelve months the same newspaper was arguing that we ought to have been doing what I maintained last week we were doing

I may say I had some controversy with the newspaper at that time. The suggestion was made that we had raised the prices of grain and that by doing so we were going to deplete our live stock because we had not raised the prices of live stock sufficiently. They went on to suggest that we had not increased the price of bacon at all after having increased the price of grain. I wrote them to point out that we had increased the price of bacon after raising the price of grain, and that we did consider there was a pretty fair balance, as a result of which we believed the farmers would make their own choice. It is true I did not come out and say, "Seed a greater acreage." A great many people were saying that, and it was being said by some from whom I was quite sure it would be just as acceptable to the farmers of western Canada as any advice I could give in a matter of this kind. So that what I said the other day was this, that in 1943 the government had announced an increased price for wheat, and increased prices for oats and barley, and by those increased prices had encouraged the production of grains as against live stock; and that we had done so advisedly. As I stated a week ago, I went across this country and addressed twenty-five audiences in the part of the country concerned, indicating that we were not asking the farmers any longer to keep down the production of wheat, that we were desirous of having them make the decision on the basis of their own needs. If they required cash immediately they could produce live stock and sell it upon a market which was available at all times. If they did not require cash immediately it was quite safe to produce wheat, and store it in bins against the time when we would require it. I believe the farmers acted upon the suggestions which were made over that area which is pictured in the maps I exhibited a few moments ago. We had great increases in wheat acreage, greater than we desired. So that on every occasion that I spoke to the farmers with regard to this matter I said that 23,000,000 acres was too high, that it should be brought down to 21,500,000 acres as soon as possible. Last year for the first time we told them to maintain it at 23,300,000 acres for this one year; then we could again size up the situation in Europe and tell whether it would be essential to do the same thing in the years ahead. We were two years in advance of either the Free Press or anyone other than the government in encouraging increased acreage.

I think I have fully covered the position I took the other day. I have repeated that the policy of the government is one of having one-third of the land in the three prairie provinces summer-fallowed, one-third in wheat and one-third to provide feed grains and fodder for live stock; and on that basis we shall produce more food than we shall in any other way. We did agree to continuing this year with an acreage of 23,000,000 acres, which is 2,000,000 acres higher than our judgment suggests in normal times.

In order that I may not be misunderstood with regard to this, and in order that this house may know that the Free Press is fully informed with regard to it, may I point out that I have here an editorial which was written on the 19th day of this month. The other one, which was read yesterday, was written on the 22nd. My telegram is dated the 23rd, in reply to the first editorial. In that editorial it was stated that the government did not seem to be very firmly convinced as to what way the farmers ought to go, and that we were not giving the kind of leadership that ought to be given. It was stated that some others, including provincial governments and grain concerns, were giving definite leadership, and that they agreed in that leadership to the effect that we should have increased acreages in wheat.

I sent this telegram on March 23 to the editor:

> Have just read your editorial headed "Greater cultivation needed", in which you refer to leadership and uncertainty.
>
> There has been no uncertainty since last December as to the wishes of the federal Department of Agriculture or the government of Canada. The advice of this department to the western farmers is that they do not take any land out of summer-fallow or feed grains this year and sow it to wheat.
>
> This advice is based upon every experience we ever had in western Canada to get increased food production immediate or long time.
>
> If the Free Press on its own responsibility wishes to advise otherwise they are of course free to do so without it costing them anything as are some others referred to. It has been the dominion treasury and the farmers that have had to pay the costs of poor farming practice coupled with drought in the west over the past twenty years.
> The only direction some desire to recognize as leadership is their own. We are not leading in the direction you appear to wish to go but we are leading in the opposite direction.

I wanted to make that as clear as I possibly could make it. I hope it has been published. I say that because it cost this government and others $217 million in the last drought period to take care of those who during the years immediately after the last war followed a policy similar to that being advocated now. Those of us who had experience with that situation, have no desire to return to it—even if the government were prepared to pay the money.

Mr. MacNICOL: What was the length of time over which the government had to give $217 million?

Mr. GARDINER: From 1930 down to 1939, probably. It included the last two terms of government. That is an enormous sum of money. And those of us who are entrusted with the care of the money in the treasury of the country feel that we have some responsibility. If others persuade farmers to go in another direction, and the farmers go along and suffer as a result of it, then so far as I am concerned, following the experience I have had in the last twenty years, I want to be on record everywhere possible as having said that the only policy to ensure us against drought and the only policy to ensure us against pests is a summer-fallow policy which puts one-third of our land under summer-fallow.

Had it not been for the closing observations of the leader of the opposition I would have had nothing further to say. However, he did say something further, which requires some comment. I do not know why the leader of the opposition thought he had to make some explanation about his becoming leader of the Progressive Conservative party. Most people do not require to make explanations after having made moves of that kind.

No, most people are well understood by all, and particularly people who rise to the height of becoming leaders of great political parties. Everyone knows they are the leaders of those parties. Everyone knows they are leaders because they have always—or at least for a very long time—been members of those parties. They have fought for them, worked for them, led others into them, and so have gained leadership. They require to make no explanations whatsoever.

For instance, we understand why the hon. member who sits at the far corner of the house is leader of the Social Credit group. We understand why the hon. member who leads the C.C.F. party is leader of that group. We understand why the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is leader of this group. No one needs to explain it.

But why the leader of the opposition should have thought it necessary yesterday to explain why he had become leader of the Progressive Conservative party—other than is disclosed by the record—I do not know.

He says, "I supported this government for twenty years." Well, this government has been in power for 15 of the last 20 years. One of those periods—a period of five years—was at about the centre of that time and his party was in power. I do not know just what the leader of the opposition means by his statement. Maybe he means that he was supporting whichever federal government was here. In any event his statement is that he supported this government for twenty years.

Let us look at the record. The record shows that in 1922 there was an election in Manitoba. Who won it? The U.F.M. won it; the present leader of the opposition did not even run in it. In that election the following representation was returned:

Progressives	1
U.F.M.	27
Labour	6
Liberals	7
Conservatives	6
Independent	8

There were 28 in that house who were not members of the U.F.M. and 27 who were. Something had to be done about that. A government was formed with the support of other than those who had been elected with the U.F.M. group and under the leadership of Mr. Bracken.

In 1927 there was the same kind of election, with the same kind of results—with the exception that the leader of the opposition was then leading the party in Manitoba. However, it was led under another name, namely that of the Progressives. That was the name used, although there had been only one Progressive in the previous house. That election returned the following representation:

Progressives	29
Conservatives	15
Liberal	7
Independent	1

That takes us through two terms in the twenty years, and I am quite sure that not even the leader of the opposition would say that in that kind of leadership he was supporting either the party now sitting directly opposite me, or the party which now has been charged with forming a government in Canada.

This brings us to 1932, at which time there was another election. But let me recall that this party was not in office at Ottawa in 1932. In that year the campaign was conducted under the name Liberal-Progressive party, with the present leader of the opposition in this chamber acting as leader of that party. At that time there were elected:

Liberal Progressives	38
Conservatives	10
Labour	5
Independent	2

In 1936 there was another election, with the same name and leader heading the government. At that time this party was in office at Ottawa, although we had been here for only a few months. The result of that provincial election was as follows:

Liberal Progressives	23
Conservatives	16
C.C.F.	7
Social Credit	5
Independent	2
Communist	1

Then we come to the election of 1941, under the name "Coalition." Why? It was done in that way because, in order to carry on in the previous period, with only twenty-three elected under his leadership, he had to obtain the support of the Conservative party. The result was a coalition, in which the Conservative party took part.

I leave it to the judgment of the house and country as to when the hon. member changed over, first to support this government, and later not to support it; or, to put it more clearly, this party. When was it? Those figures suggested the answer. I submit it was not in 1942; I submit it was not in 1943; I submit it had nothing to do with the ninety cent price of wheat and the $1.25 that he was advocating, as he said yesterday. If it had, this government, within a few months after he became leader, made the initial price of wheat $1.25 a bushel. If that was all that was involved in his crossing over from one group to another, it is nearly time he was coming back again, if he would be received. I have no doubt that anyone who has changed so often, so many times, so easily and with so little provocation, could change again if he found it necessary to do so. But those of us who got our convictions fairly young in life and who have tried to hold them, tried to maintain them—

Mr. JACKMAN: Stopped thinking.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says "stopped thinking". They may do that in his party, but they do not in this. Those of us who started early and kept right at the job of trying to convince the people of Canada that our policies are best for the country do not need to go around explaining our position. We do not need to try to convince the people that we have taken a certain position for the first time. We have been taking the position which we take to-day with regard to farm policy and other matters for a very considerable period of time. That is the position we took during the period from 1921 down to 1929, which was the best period for agriculture that this country had experienced down to that time. Just as my hon. friends opposite in the short period of five years demonstrated that their policy was the worst possible policy for agriculture. So have we, since 1935, been working at the job with the same set of principles, with the same views with regard to agricultural methods and practices, demonstrated to the people of western Canada as well as to those of eastern Canada that we have arrived at the point where agriculture has passed the heights it rose to under the previous Liberal government. Even the leader of the opposition says that in the last three years agriculture has been in the best position it has ever been in, even back in the twenties. But he goes on to say even more than that; he says, "What we are worried about is the future." The only thing if he is concerned for agriculture that he needs to be worried about is whether anyone will ever put him in office.

This government with the policies which have been in effect during the last ten years, developed to fuller completion in the last five or six years and which are guaranteed by the agreements which were read yesterday by me and which will be submitted on grain later by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and by the further arrangements that will eventually be brought down will satisfy even some of the criticisms that have been made in this house. Some people may be sorry before it is all finished that they made the criticism they did. They may find that some of the things they proposed are not only already arranged for but are in position to be brought down in sufficient time to take care of what they are worrying about in connection with farm production and the condition of the farmer in the immediate future.

Therefore I say that in voting on this motion of want of confidence that is now proposed, the thing for this house to do, first, is to vote down the amendment in order that we may get on to the main motion and, then, vote the main motion through in order that this government may get on with the job of further improving agricultural conditions in this country.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I had not anticipated speaking again in this debate, but since the opportunity has arisen, and, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has quite properly stated to the house, this debate affords an opportunity to discuss some matters that are before the country, and there may be a danger of some misunderstanding as to where we stand in this controversy regarding price ceilings and the production of food, I felt that I should like to say something further this afternoon.

Before I proceed may I say that I was greatly interested this afternoon in hearing the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rise on a question of privilege and read into the record a short statement by Tim Buck. I presume that the marriage of convenience which seemed to have been consummated before the elections has now been very happily dissolved.

As I said a moment ago, I am rising to say something about the discussion on the removal of price ceilings. The other evening the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) urged the removal of price ceilings in the building trades. He complained about the difficulties of the builders in obtaining labour because of insufficient wages, and in obtaining materials because of insufficient prices. I listened last night to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) who stated that in his opinion butter should be seventy-five cents a pound, or, indeed, perhaps even a dollar a pound. I believe that some adjustments must be made in the prices of farm commodities, but let me say to these gentlemen at once that if prices are allowed to take flight, then we are in for a severe trimming of the consuming population of this country. Inevitably the prices of all the things the farmer has to buy will rise, but the prices of the things he has to sell will trail the prices of the things he has to buy. The worker will find himself chasing prices upward and wages never catching up with them. Then when we get to the peak, as we found after the last war, there will be the collapse and inevitable suffering by the working people and farmers of this country.

May I say that the demands we have been listening to in this house from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and from some of his followers are strangely like those that are now being heard in the United States, where the former isolationists in the senate and house of representatives, and the newspapers which supported the isolationists in that country, are demanding the removal of price ceilings and the elimination of controls. I venture to say there is no desire on the part of those in Canada who are really behind this move to benefit either the worker or the farmer. In reality it is engendered by powerful business and financial interests in this country who want to puncture the price ceiling and get rid of controls in order that they may have a Roman holiday.

Mr. GRAYDON: You could not believe that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I may say this, that the past record of these same big business people, as was noted yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), fully confirms the opinion I have just expressed.

I want to place before the house exactly where we stand in this controversy. We have always urged, because we believe in it, economic and social planning of an intelligent sort. We believe that our economy should be intelligently directed in the interests of the Canadian people. And may I say to the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), who objected to voting for our subamendment last evening on the ground that his group had not a mandate for the establishment of a socialist state, that that amendment did not ask for a socialist state but asked for the institution of intelligent national planning. At the moment there is a need for such planning. If ever there was a need of intelligent planning of our economic life and of our production of food, it is now, when starvation faces millions of people from one end of the world to the other; and this can be met, it seems to me, by encouraging the production of food and of other materials. In order to encourage that production, the people who work and produce must be guaranteed, not only now but in the days to come, the reward of an adequate and rising standard of living. That means, of course, that the prices of consumer goods and of farm commodities must bear a direct relationship with one another.

Floor prices and minimum wages are essential, but in considering floor prices and minimum wages let us remember that if we are to have floor prices, minimum wages and adequate standards, we cannot allow speculation of the type that will shoot prices high in one period and depress them in another. Under present conditions, ceiling prices and fair wages are essential, and in order to arrive at both fair prices and fair wages we require a national plan under which negotiations to set these fair wages and proper prices would be conducted by the representatives of agriculture, of labour, and of industry. That is what we mean when we talk about a national planning authority. A mad scramble for higher prices and higher wages obtained by strikes and by pressure groups will sooner or later cause economic and social chaos.

Mr. TUSTIN: Does the hon. member think the farmer is getting a fair price NOW?

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. COLDWELL: The farmer wants a fair, reasonable and stabilized price for his butter, his eggs, his wheat, his hogs and other products; and I told my hon. friend how that might be arrived at—if he had listened to me—in the very last statement I made before the one I am making now.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member did not answer his question.

Mr. COLDWELL: I answered his question. I said that in order to achieve a fair price, that price must be based on negotiation among all those interested. I am not one of those who guesses, as the hon. member for Stanstead did, that the farmer might get a dollar a pound for his butter, or guesses, like somebody else, that he might get $3 a bushel for his wheat. The only manner in which prices can be found to be reasonable, fair and stable is by intelligent examination and by negotiation among the parties concerned. That is the manner in which I would answer the particular question.

I do not believe that the farming population of this country desire to take advantage of the widespread starvation which exists throughout the world to-day. I was reading only this morning an account of the recent by-elections in Great Britain, and I was greatly struck by the attitude of the British people who to-day are enduring a greater austerity programme than they endured even in the days of the war. One of their constituencies, the Heywood and Radcliffe division, up to 1935 was regarded as an entirely safe Conservative seat. In the general election last summer the Labour party won the seat by a small majority. In the by-election that was held last month the Labour party won that constituency again, by a slightly reduced majority; and when the result was made known the successful candidate, Flight-Lieutenant Greenwood, summed up the whole matter in a single sentence. This is what he said:

> I have won this election because the people of this division were not prepared to sell their birthright of two thousand years of Christian principles for a packet of dried eggs.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, a packet of dried eggs —or the lack of it—is a symbol of the austerity programme in Great Britain. And I do not believe that the farmers of this country are prepared to forgo the teachings of two thousand years of Christianity and try to wring the last cent out of a starving world.

I am rising this afternoon because I find that lately, in the Winnipeg Free Press and some other papers, we have been bracketed with the Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a compliment to you.

Mr. COLDWELL: No. If it is a compliment it is a very left-handed one.

Mr. GRAYDON: Think of us.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am rising because I want to make it very clear that we are not joining them in the propaganda to get rid of all price controls including the controls on the prices of farm produce. In order to show that I am not saying this only this afternoon I should like to refer to the speech I made in this house on March 18. At that time—and I do it again this afternoon, in spite of what the Minister of Agriculture has said—I criticized the government because I believed that they were failing to take a risk this year in increasing the production of cereals, which I believe is warranted. The house will remember I expressed the opinion that if we did increase wheat acreage beyond a certain level, we were incurring some risk. But I believe that that risk is warranted this year; and about that may I add at once that there may be an honest difference of opinion. I went on to say this, Hansard, page 57:

> Uncertainty wtih regard to prices of farm products is already causing a serious decline in some products. Agriculture needs the assurance of floor prices which will be reviewed from time to time and be set in relation to the cost of production and the sacrifices farmers made or are making to the maintenance of price ceilings. I wish to say at once that we cannot subscribe to the propaganda that farm prices should be allowed to find their own levels by open market trading. True, levels of some farm products, notably wheat, would reach a high level now; but inevitably the day would come when they would become equally low. Consequently we believe the farmer desires, not high prices at one period and low prices at another, but some stability in price levels.
> The farmer, like the industrial worker, wants fair, stabilized returns so that he may maintain a decent standard of living every day of every year.

The Minister of Agriculture pointed out that many of my hon. friends who sit in the Social Credit group are from farm constituencies, representing a farm population to whom this problem is of vital interest. Let me say to him that around me in this party are men who in the main, with only three or four exceptions, represent farming areas.

Mr. GARDINER: My distinction was different from that. I said that the Social Credit group, I thought, had the largest proportion of men who are actually farmers, men living on the farm.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not sure about that. I have not checked it up, but I doubt whether even that is true. In any event, however, it is correct to say that the two parties sitting to your far left, Mr. Speaker, do represent largely the wheat-growing area of this country; consequently this matter is of vital interest to us. It is true that the farmers during these war years, in spite of improved prices, have not received either the returns for their labour or the recognition which they deserve of their contribution to the maintenance of price ceilings.

I have stated on a number of occasions in this house that the assessment for income tax, for example, which has been mentioned several times in the debate, is wrong so far as farm families are concerned. Some allowance should have been made long ago for the farmer's wife and the farmer's family. These wives and families have contributed a great deal, in their long hours of labour on the farm, to the building up of farm incomes, and some recognition should have been given to them long ago. I hope that when the new budget comes down their remuneration, if you like to call it that, will be considered a legitimate part of farm expenses.

I wish to say something about the wheat policy of the government, and I shall deal with wheat for the reasons I gave a few moments ago. The policy of the C.C.F. prior to and during the early part of the war was a pretty continuous demand for increased prices for wheat in order to give the farmer a return which would enable him to hire the necessary labour, buy the necessary machinery, and attain a reasonable standard of living; and as long as wheat prices remained at 60 cents, 70 cents, 90 cents and $1 a bushel we fought for increased prices for wheat, and fought continuously.

Farmers organizations want stabilized prices, and I am glad that the Minister of Agriculture was able yesterday to place before the house the outline of the agreement that has been reached with Great Britain. I had hoped that some such agreement might be reached, and now we have before us an agreement which does guarantee certain prices to farmers this year and the two succeeding years. I have not examined all the details of the agreement. Some of these prices may be out of line, too low. If so, then I agree with the member for Acadia that if the farmers are asked to take any price that is too low, they should not be penalized on that account but the difference should be made up by all the people of Canada. It should not fall on farmers alone.

Farmers organizations, as I have already said, continue, as they continued in those years, to demand adequate and stabilized prices. Our position now is this, that the act establishing a floor price of $1 a bushel ought to be amended and at least $1.25 substituted as the floor. I should prefer to see an amendment made, not on the basis of $1.25 but on the basis of a thorough discussion with the farm organizations concerned, and by negotiation and by intelligent appraisal, to find out what the floor price really ought to be at this time. Perhaps it might be nearer $1.55. When this floor price is set it should take into consideration the average cost of production, and some consideration should be given to the contribution that agriculture made during the course of the war.

I want to make this abundantly clear, as I said a short time ago, because of articles that have appeared in the press linking us in some degree with the propaganda of the Progressive Conservatives, and incidentally with the private grain trade of the country. The C.C.F., in common with western organizations, including, may I say, some western Liberal organizations, have always condemned reliance on open market trading as a method of fixing prices. We have consistently urged and we urge now the abolition completely of the Winnipeg grain exchange. Why keep it in existence, particularly when these new agreements are before the house? We have condemned the grain exchange and that method of marketing because of fluctuating prices, high at some period and inevitably low at another.

We believe in a democratic and intelligently planned economy in which prices would bear some relationship to each other. I think we can be proud of what Canada did during the war in the provision of food, when we came to the fore in the supplying of all kinds of commodities to the united nations through mutual aid. Our principal contribution even then was of great quantities of wheat.

My hon. friend the member for Swift Current last night outlined part of the history of the wheat problem. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) announced on September 28, 1943, that all the Canadian visible wheat had been taken over by the wheat board in order that we might carry out commitments we had then made under mutual aid, and the wheat board became the only marketing agency. It was at that time, I believe—in fact I know—that the initial price of $1.25 a bushel was set, an increase incidentally which pleased us, because it was 35 cents a bushel more than had been prevailing up to that time; and subsequently the government purchased from the wheat board for mutual aid the wheat it needed, which I believe at that time amounted to 150 or 160 million bushels, at a price of $1.43 a bushel or thereabouts.

Mr. GARDINER: $1.46.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought it was $1.43. Then came an interesting development which caused a great deal of discussion throughout western Canada. There was a shortage of United States bought wheat from us, about wheat in the United States. We had built up surpluses, and thank heaven we did. The United States took 200 million bushels, and at $1.46 a bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: It started at $1.25 and gradually went up to $1.46.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. I want to draw attention to this, because we are told that the United States price was the true price. About two weeks ago I listened to the able and genial gentleman who is the economic adviser of the Searle Grain company, Major Strange, speaking over the radio. He was arguing about what the true price of wheat was. He argued that in the United States it was arrived at on an open market, but as a matter of fact at that time the price of wheat we sold in the United States was based on the United States price, which was determined in relation to something they called parity and I understood was kept under a ceiling price the United States had established. Therefore the Canadian farmer obtained what was in effect the United States parity price together with the premium in exchange on United States funds, less, of course, the cost of the freight and handling charges to the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: And the duty.

Mr. COLDWELL: And of course the duty of forty-two cents a bushel. The line elevator companies, the western pools and the farmers all seemed satisfied with the results that were being obtained in that way. In the autumn of 1945 the position changed in the United States. The United States had reaped a good cereal crop and did not need to import from Canada. It became the only other exporter of wheat in any large quantity for the use of the starving world; in fact we in North America were the only sources of supply.

During the last few months there has been much discussion in the papers, in farm organizations across the country, and, as we have noted, in this house, as to the reasons why our wheat price in Canada should be lower than the wheat price in the United States. Let us not forget this, that after Japan was defeated last August mutual aid suddenly came to an end, as did lend-lease in the United States. When that occurred I suppose it was necessary for the governments to get together and negotiate a price for Canadian wheat. I suppose that is how the $1.55 was arrived at What was actually done was to maintain the $1.55 that had been in effect for some time. When I speak of this $1.55 price I have it in mind that I understood from the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he spoke that that price might not necessarily be what I might call the long-term price; that there is room for variation in that figure. If $1.55 is not a fair price after the method of arriving at it has been properly discussed with the producer organizations and the government, then the price can be varied and brought into line with what it should be.

In discussing this price and opposing the propaganda for uncontrolled prices for farm products, I wish to make it clear that the position I take is that we approve price controls, but without more facts than we have at our disposal at this time we are not committing ourselves to-day as to whether $1.55 is the right and proper price or not.

I said that I listened to Major Strange a little while ago and when I heard him arguing about these prices I thought of the days when the grain exchange was really functioning, when following the last war we had a price of over $2.73 a bushel for our wheat at Fort William. One year later, if I remember correctly, the price had dropped to just above $1. That was between 1920 and 1921. What we are anxious about is that this does not happen again. As I have said before, the producer of foods is not interested in a high price now and a low price hereafter. If we try now to gouge from the world the last cent for our wheat and other Canadian products, the world will do exactly what it did after the high prices following the last war. The countries of the world will endeavour to bring about their own self-sufficiency; they will endeavour to free themselves from the prices that we have exacted, and then our position will be exactly the same as it was when prices fell to low levels following the period I have mentioned. I have here the average cash prices for wheat. In September, 1920, the price was $2.73½. One year later, in November, 1921, the average price had fallen to $1.10 a bushel.

The C.C.F. stands for what? A policy of marketing boards, a policy of intelligent price levels. We demand stable and adequate prices, set by negotiations for a period of years, and varied by taking into consideration the cost of living and production from time to time. May I add that what I have just said is really a repetition of what the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) said earlier in this debate when he was placing before the house substantially our point of view on agricultural matters. It seems to me that this is the intelligent policy for this house and the country to pursue at the present time.

May I repeat, to take advantage of shortages and of starvation now in order to obtain high prices, when incidentally wheat producers have very largely disposed of the last crop and of their reserves, would in my opinion be a suicidal policy benefiting no one. When supplies are adequate it would result in a similar disaster to that which occurred between 1920 and 1921. National planning, in which the stability of farm prices is the fundamental consideration, must be based not on speculation but upon the stability of purchasing power of the farming population.

In conclusion may I say that I believe it would be in the interests of this country and of our wheat producers in particular if we could establish under the leadership of the united nations organization a method by which we should be able to guarantee quantities and prices both to the producer and to the consumer, on a world-wide scale, and that Canada should take part in such an organization and indeed help promote it. If I may say so, the social and economic council of the united nations organization in some of its phraseology clearly visualized such a plan. When I was present at San Francisco and on the committee which established the social and economic council, this was both formally and informally discussed by the delegates.

What we need, in the words of Henry Wallace, is an ever-normal granary not only for our own country but for the whole world. There is no reason why a series of good crops should be regarded as a disaster. A series of good crops surely ought to be an inestimable blessing to this country and to the world. My mind goes back to the bible, to the story of Joseph; to the story of Pharaoh's dream of the fat kine and the lean kine, the seven fat years and the seven lean years. Often in the old book you can find a parable or a story that is applicable even in these most modern days. Joseph planned in Egypt. Joseph built granaries in the seven fat years, and, as we are told in the bible, there was corn in Egypt during the seven lean years. In my opinion that is what the world must do in future—plan so that there may be foodstuffs in the event of widespread disaster such as we have at the present time; and I am not thinking only of the disaster of war. We have been told authoritatively, and I saw this repeated in London, in the U.N.O. records I have read, that even in peace time two out of every three living human beings in the world have never known what it was day by day to be guaranteed a full stomach. There is something wrong with a world of that description.

To the extent that this house, this country and this government are prepared to plan our production, to see that our producers and workers obtain adequate returns for their production and their labour and are in a position to build up reserves against evil times, to that extent the programme will be supported by the party which I represent.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of speaking to this amendment, though as one of the oldest farmers in this house I am greatly tempted to spend some time in a discussion of farming. However, my object in making these few remarks is to reply to a statement which was made yesterday by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) at page 286 of Hansard who, in referring to my speech of the day before, said:

> I am quite sure that the remarks he made expressed his personal opinion and not the opinion of many members of his party.

I think most hon. members are aware that the members of the social credit party are not strictly party-bound, that we do preserve a very wide latitude in the expression of opinions by members of this group. In reference to the remarks I made the day before yesterday, to which the hon. member for Kootenay West referred, I should like to say that the ideas I expressed are my own; that I did not consult any of my colleagues, and that as far as I know they are mine and nobody else's. My only purpose in saying what I did was to do what little I could do to preserve the peace of the world, and I believe that the best way to preserve peace is to restore as far as possible the truth about international relations, which were so largely destroyed as a consequence of war propaganda.

In this connection may I remind the house of an incident which took place in Great Britain in 1944. In that year Mr. Voigt, editor of Nineteenth Century, one of the solid, old established, respectable political magazines in Great Britain, accused the BBC of falsifying a Yugoslav royal proclamation by inserting forged words favourable to Tito. When a member brought up this charge in the British House of Commons Mr. Brendan Bracken, then minister of information, denied the charge and slandered Mr. Voigt. Anthony Eden, who was absent from the house at the time, at a later sitting admitted that Mr. Voigt had spoken the truth. The News-Chronicle, a daily newspaper in Great Britain, repeated the slander and was sued by Mr. Voigt. In awarding damages of £1,000 against the News-Chronicle the judge said:

> Mr. Voigt comes out of this matter with his character completely and finally vindicated. The fact is he is a critic, an honest and a fearless critic.

I hope to qualify as an honest and fearless critic, and I am well content to leave the verdict to the passage of time.

Mr. BRIDGES: I was paired with the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce): Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. GARDINER: I was paired with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

On motion of Mrs. Strum (Qu'Appelle) the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

63260—21½

Thursday, March 28, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNITED NATIONS

MEETING OF SECURITY COUNCIL—REPORT FROM OBSERVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that we have a Canadian observer at the meeting of the security council in New York, I should be very glad, and I think the house would be pleased as well, if the Prime Minister could impart to us such information as may be proper from the report of that observer covering the present situation, which appears so grave, at the New York conclave.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): All I can say to my hon. friend is that I understand that at three o'clock this afternoon there was to be a secret session of the security council at which matters of procedure would be considered. Apart from that, I have no knowledge of any other actions about to be taken.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it there has been a report from the Canadian observer on the situation to date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon, friend that I have an official report, whether from the Canadian observer or from our embassy, I cannot say. The report I give on my responsibility as the minister responsible speaking in this house.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

DISSEMINATION IN RUSSIA OF CANADIAN VIEWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In his address to the house dealing with the matter of espionage, the Prime Minister expressed the hope that the views of Canada might be disseminated to the people of Russia. Has he any knowledge as to whether this has been done?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have no knowledge of what, if anything, has been done.

WAR ASSETS

FACILITIES OF PACIFIC COAST COMMUNICATIONS SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): May I direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction? Can the facilities of the Pacific coast communications system, recently declared surplus to requirements by the armed forces, now be made available for use by the general public?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): War Assets are now dealing with the property in question. It will take some time before arrangements can be made to place the services under civilian ownership or to operate them under civilian control. Until then, it will not be possible to throw the facilities open to public use. The services are not willing to open the service to the public, and as long as they are operating the facilities, nothing can be done.

FISH

MANITOBA AND SASKATCHEWAN—PLANE TRANSPORT TO RAILHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, notice of which has already been given. On account of bad weather conditions this winter in northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan, the fishermen in this area have been left with approximately five hundred tons of good quality fish which cannot be transported by tractor because of the early spring thaw. The secretary of the trades and labour council at Flin Flon, Manitoba—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question should be short and to the point. Any lengthy question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. MOORE: The question is as follows, Mr. Speaker: In view of the announced food shortage would the minister consider providing a transport plane to freight this product to the nearest railhead—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already asked the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I point out that this is a matter of food spoiling and is therefore of some considerable urgency.

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): I received notice of the question, and no doubt it is a matter of urgency. In reply I would say that since the administration of the fisheries of Manitoba and Saskatchewan is entirely in the hands of the governments of those provinces, I immediately referred to the appropriate provincial ministers, Hon. J. S. McDiarmid, Minister of Mines and Natural Resources of Manitoba, and Hon. J. L. Phelps, Minister of Natural Resources and Industrial Development of Saskatchewan, representations which reached me Tuesday morning with regard to difficulties in the transportation of fish to railhead at Flin Flon. I presume the matter is receiving the attention of these ministers. I have not received any information from them.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fernand Viau for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): I hope that no one will consider that my silence up to this point has been consent to all the sins of the government, whether they be sins of omission or of commission. I hope also that my constituents will not have expected me to insist on the prerogative of ladies first, and to assume that I must have been absent from the house or I would have spoken before this. I believe that democracy is for women too, and agreed to forgo my privilege of speaking in the interests of expediting the business of the house in the hope that we would take the vote on Tuesday, as we had agreed.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that Tuesday afternoon as the crash of broken agreements filled this chamber and I listened to the academic and statistical denials of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and yesterday to the reply of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) I could not help thinking that if we had more women members in the House of Commons we might pay closer attention to our knitting and do less verbal embroidery.

In regard to the preliminaries at this late hour, and referring to the speech from the throne, I would say, greetings to the new governor general in his appointment to office, felicitations to the departing, and congratulations to the mover (Mr. Viau) and the seconder (Mr. Winters) of the address.

The greatest weakness in the speech from the throne was the neglect of the domestic field. I can understand the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) surveying with satisfaction this strapping adolescent, the Dominion of Canada. It is the same feeling a parent gets when one day he looks at his teen-age offspring. The child may or may not even slightly resemble the parents. He or she may be bigger, huskier, lustier, have new appetites and needs, and have acquired new tastes. The offspring is bursting at the seams. The kid grew up in spite of its parents. To-day Canada is in that interesting and crucial stage. During the war we grew in stature. Whether we developed much in wisdom remains to be seen. Our course now will indicate our maturity as a nation. We are now at the fork in the road. Two courses are open to us. We can shed governmental responsibility as quickly as possible and let powerful economic groups plan our national economy, or we can continue as a government to take the not-so-easy, not-so-free-of-blame path of governmental responsibility for the state of our economic life.

We must decide now as a matter of policy for what ends we shall use the powers of government. Shall the everyday lives and homes of the millions of people in Canada be our first concern, or shall we use the authority in the machinery of government to interfere with our economy only in order to preserve the power and profits of the few?

To what end shall mankind dedicate his heritage and the work of his lifetime? To what uses shall we apply science, law, engineering, power and the new chemistry? In the international field we are building the united nations organization on a functional basis. We have set up special organizations to deal with food and agriculture, with monetary arrangements, with security, with cultural and social problems. We have begun to learn as a nation that it is useless to talk of peace and freedom and security and leave undone the things we ought to have done to remove international friction and injustice. Sometimes it is easier to undertake an international problem than it is to tackle the job at home.

The pleasant and complacent picture of Canada as outlined by the speech from the throne reminds me of the man who had recently acquired wealth and prominence and decided to have a family tree. He hired an expert and everything was lovely until they ran into a relative who had died in the electric chair. The social climber was alarmed, but the professional purveyor of respectability said, "We could put it this way: we can say his untimely death was a matter of deep and widespread public concern. He occupied a chair of applied electricity in a well-known public institution, and it could be said that he literally died in harness."

Whether you look at housing, veterans affairs, labour, marketing, food supply, education, pensions or health, Canada has a great unsatisfied need and stands in very great peril of losing the gains of expansion made under the stimulus of war.

I want to make my criticisms and comments in the light of the needs of the home and family. In a few weeks we shall all be sending flowers, telegrams and cards by the bushel assuring the mothers of our country that they are the most valuable, most beloved and most revered and cherished people of all time. It is a noble sentiment which many people gladly and genuinely express; but do we carry through when it comes to proving that we really believe it? Everyone in this house agrees that the very heart of the nation is the home. The home is the keystone, if you will, the source of our civilization, the core of our very lives, and the thing above all else sacred. Does anyone in this house dare stand up and assert that we have safeguarded the homes of our country in this or in any other session?

Take the wives and children of the men who died in defence of their homes, not in this last war but in the previous war of 1914-18. We have many widows of these men still without pension. They have just finished a convention, still pleading with a reluctant government to grant them pensions that will enable them to live in decency. These women have reared their children. Many of them are getting on in years. We took their husbands and with them their source of income. Now they have reached the time of life when they are unemployable. Many of them gave not only their husbands, but their sons and daughters in the struggle just ended. Now they have no guarantee either of homes or of bread.

Take the widows of the veterans of the war just ended. The treatment of the women and children who gave their breadwinner in this war is an example of the value we place on the home and family. A widow of a hero of this war gets $60 a month for herself and $15 for her child. How far will this go in building up a permanent home? How far will it go in paying rent, buying milk and oranges and shoes?

Or take the wife of a wounded veteran. A man who has suffered the loss of a limb, a man permanently disabled, must endure seeing his wife and family live in the kind of quarters that can be had for very little. Perhaps his wife goes out cleaning, or takes in washing.

Take the family of the wage earner. According to the bureau of statistics, in 1941 wage-earners earning less than $500 a year numbered 1,028,800 or 35·9 per cent of the total wage earners in the country. City workers, heads of families, earning from $500 to $1,000 a year, numbered 219,000. Rural workers, heads of families, earning from $500 to $1,000, numbered 80,000. City workers heads of families, earning $500 or less, numbered 114,900. Rural workers heads of families, earning $500 or less, numbered 103,100. What happens to families who have so little to spend? Where will they live? The family receive notice that the house they have been renting has been sold. The wife tramps the streets in desperation looking for a house or rooms. Nobody wants children—that is, nobody but the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton). He got a bonus for them. This is a good thing, but it does not find a house that a mother can afford to rent in an area safe for children to live in; and so only the old, dilapidated, crowded, unsanitary and yes, often condemned quarters are available for these, the little children, and their much lauded parent, their mothers.

Take the wives of veterans and their children who are trying to complete a course at university. How far will $92 go in paying rent, buying food, shoes and milk? What strains are put on the marriage of these young veterans making the difficult adjustment to home, family and class-room. How can these young men do the necessary home-work in one room cluttered up with baby, play pen, washing, cooking, bottles and all the indispensable hardware that goes with an infant? How can the veteran be free of worry and put his whole mind on his classes when every month he must take from his gratuity to make up the deficiency in his government grant for education? How can the young wife stand the double strain of protecting her child from her husband and her husband from her child?

What about the wives of farmers? Although their contribution is so vital to the success of a farm that no married veteran under the Veterans' Land Act is permitted to take advantage of the act without having his wife duly inspected and labelled as a fit help-meet, in her husband's income tax returns the farmer's wife gets no recognition for her labour. In passing I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). Will the minister require of an unmarried veteran passed by the board that in the case of his marriage his prospective wife shall be duly interviewed, inspected and certified before such marriage shall take place; and in case the wife is rejected, what happens then? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to inspect wives already acquired, we must also inspect wives in prospect.

All wives of farmers, old and young, inexperienced, and seasoned by exposure to long years of unremitting toil, have no guarantee of income. They too are vulnerable in regard to low family income, bad housing, insecurity, debt, inadequate health care and lack of facilities for the education of their children. These affronts to human dignity are universal in our economy.

Surely there is no one in this house who would not gladly subscribe to the principle that every Canadian family should have a home fit for little children to grow up in; that the birthright of every child is enough good food, enough good clothing, and adequate shelter, a safe place to play, fresh air, enough space and light and heat for health. We put our seal of approval on this when we passed the Family Allowances Act last year. Now we must extend the areas of family protection by applying to our national economy those techniques that will result in good homes, happy families, healthful surroundings in town, city and country; and for your consideration I commend again the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the following points:

(1) That there be a lay-off or severance pay to provide twenty-five dollars per week for all displaced workers until they are reemployed.

(2) That discharged veterans be paid full pay and allowances until reinstatement in civilian life with the same minimum of twenty-five dollars a week.

(3) That in order to maintain the purchasing power of Canadian farmers floor prices for agriculture be extended and continued.

(4) That we have legislation to protect workers' and farmers' equities in their homes and to prevent evictions and foreclosures.

(5) That immediate action be taken to raise wages in industries frozen at sub-standard levels.

(6) An extensive public low-rental housing programme which will provide both large-scale employment and urgently-needed homes.

(7) Old age pensions at sixty.

Again I wish to press for the simple practical, urgently needed plan of action, so often advocated by our group, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. When you have implemented these proposals, the mothers and the grandmothers of this country will rise up and call you blessed and you will have a few more planks of the C.C.F. platform.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion two days ago to draw to the attention of the house some of the perils which attend dairying in south-eastern Quebec. At that time I was unaware that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his colleague had succeeded while in Britain in negotiating contracts for cheese for an additional year, thus ensuring to Canada a certain market for this commodity until the end of March, 1948. The price is 20 cents a pound. That may mean, if my understanding of the situation be correct, as much as 25 cents a pound to the producer, less factory and hauling costs which I am eliminating for the moment because I am doing the same thing when I come to speak of butter. The price to be paid at the factory is 20 cents. Now this is supplemented or may be supplemented by a quality bonus of one per cent if the cheese achieve a test of 93 per cent, including a flavour test of 40 per cent; or if the cheese is better still, it may achieve a quality bonus of two cents a pound, if it be 94 per cent perfect, including a flavour test of 41 per cent. So it is possible in this way to add two cents a pound to the price the maker will receive for it. In one of the provinces at least there is a bonus of two cents per pound payable to the manufacturer of cheese, and there is also a federal bonus of 20 cents per hundred pounds on milk devoted to the manufacturing of cheese. So it is possible that the cheese producer receive, less factory and hauling charges, 25 cents per pound for his product.

A hundred pounds of three and one-half per cent milk—that is, 100 pounds of milk containing 3½ pounds of butter fat—converted into cheese produces about 9½ pounds of cheese. If an average price of 23 cents per pound be taken it will be seen that 100 pounds of milk in this way will yield a return of $2.18 plus.

Let us take the same quantity and quality of milk, and see what happens when it is converted into butter. The ceiling price of butter is about 34 cents a pound. A bonus of 10 cents a pound of butter fat is added by the government and paid to the farmer. If one multiplies 44 cents, which is the selling price of butter, by 3½ pounds, one finds that the yield is $1.54. And if my mathematical calculations are correct they show that the man who makes cheese gets 64 cents per hundred pounds more for his milk than the man who makes butter.

I understand there is some reason behind the desire of the minister to secure for Canada the cheese market in Great Britain.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): Would the hon. member permit a correction?

Mr. HACKETT: I should be very happy to.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): He has omitted the cost of manufacturing of the 9½ pounds of cheese in 100 pounds of milk, at the rate of 2½ cents, which would be subtracted from the price received by the producer. This does not apply to butter. Furthermore, the hon. member has not referred to the value of skim milk in the feeding of young cattle and poultry, which amounts to about 40 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. HACKETT: I am very grateful to the hon. member for his observations. However I think the Chair will admit the hon. member did not ask a question. I concede readily that the feeding value of skim milk is greater than that of whey, and that calves or pigs fed on whey would not fatten for the market. As against that however there is the labour charge for separating the milk and washing the machine; all those dreary hours of drudgery that are completely eliminated when the whole milk, as it comes from the cow, is sold to the cheese factory.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): It is the same thing if one takes milk to the cheese factory.

Mr. HACKETT: My hon. friend has not asked a question; I submit with great deference that the additional labour the butter producer has to put into his product offsets added value that may be found in buttermilk when compared with whey.

To pursue further my earlier observations: I said it was easy to understand why the minister should seek to retain a high and ranking place for Canadian cheese in the British market. Our butter making is not considered a success in Great Britain; whether our butter be good or bad is beside the issue. We do not make the kind of butter that is liked in England. We do not make butter which competes successfully in the English market with Irish butter, Danish butter, or with that commodity about which we heard so much in other times and places—New Zealand butter. On the other hand Canadian cheese is so highly esteemed in Great Britain that they call it English Stilton. It is consumed in large quantities, and undoubtedly if that market could be secured for us in perpetuity, and without rivalry, it would be beneficial to the Canadian producer.

I submit, however, that that market must not be secured at the cost of an injustice and of permanent damage to the dairy industry as a whole, and to the dairy industry of Southeastern Quebec in particular. Canadians are a butter-eating people; the eating of butter is a life habit. I do not believe it is a habit from which they can be easily weaned. To-day it is practically impossible to buy butter. We find that the reserves stand at roughly 9 million pounds, whereas a year ago they were 20 million, two years ago about the same figure, and for the last five years at this time of year they have shown an average of about 18 million pounds plus.

I speak only of creamery butter, of course. To-day our reserves in creameries, storage and transit are barely 9 million pounds, or less than half of what they were a year ago, or what they have been on the average in the last five years. I point this out to show that there is a scarcity.

I wish to put on record the following table to show the number of dairy cattle exported to the United States in the past ten years:

1944	35,149
1943	42,267
1942	24,619
1941	22,228
1940	15,014
1939	13,000
1938	12,194
1937	13,542
1936	13,492

Those are the numbers of dairy cattle exported to the United States under a system of price fixing, controls and inadequate returns to the makers of butter, and during the four year period which preceded the war. The number exported has increased over threefold during the period of controls. The number exported to the United States this year up to March 31 is nearly double the number that was exported during the same period last year.

I want to open a parenthesis here, because one can never talk about a matter of this kind without being charged with being actuated by political considerations. I want to say that despite what has happened there was an increase of 7·2 per cent last year in the production of butter in the province of Quebec, while there was a reduction of 3·4 per cent in the production of cheese. There is a reason for the trend. As I said a few minutes ago, the province of Ontario has paid a bonus of two cents per pound on all cheese manufactured in the province. The province of Quebec also paid a bonus on cheese. It has now ceased to pay that bonus. I cannot say whether the bonus was effective throughout the year 1945; it may have been paid until the end of the year, but it was known that the bonus on cheese was to be withdrawn, and there was an effort made by the farmers to get away from cheese production. This may explain the increase in butter production that has taken place in Quebec.

More butter is produced in Quebec than in any other province in the dominion. Quebec is essentially a butter-producing province. Quebec hopes, and I trust not entirely in vain, that we are approaching an era when prices will cease to be fixed, when these controls will be released and when competition and orderly and unrestricted marketing will again be the vogue. The farmers of Quebec hope that the excellence of their product will bring them a decent return for their efforts.

Having stated these facts I wish to suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and to the government that the ceiling price of butter be increased. I need not tell the minister that I believe that price-fixing of commodities has ceased to be useful. I believe it is baneful at the present time and I believe the Canadian farmer, particularly the Canadian dairyman, would be better off if he were freed from all restrictions and were able to enter a market in which he could buy and sell without restriction. But those ideal conditions do not yet obtain, and I am suggesting to the minister and to the government that the necessary changes be made in these ceiling prices to give the butter producer a fair return for his effort. At the present time the producer of butter is not receiving an equitable return for his product as compared with the producer of cheese. The producer of butter is not receiving a price which enables him to hire people to work for him.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why do you not pay wages in Quebec?

Mr. HACKETT: We are able to carry on our dairying industry in Quebec because our families are closely knit together and because the people there are not ashamed to work.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: For nothing.

Mr. HACKETT: The wife and daughter and the son of the household are proud and willing to go into the barnyard to help the father milk the cows and do the other chores incidental to farm life.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They do that in all parts of Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: I ask the minister to take these facts into consideration and to raise the price of butter, not just four cents as was suggested in one of the papers this morning. Twenty-cent cheese means sixty-cent butter. There is no reason why that price should not be paid pending the removal of ceiling prices.

I speak for an area the population of which is fifty per cent engaged in farming and fifty per cent engaged in industry. In other words, one-half the population of these eastern counties of which I speak are makers of butter while the other half are consumers of butter. I believe the purchasers realize that the farmer should have a fair return for his commodity. They realize, moreover, that if he does not get a fair return, butter will become still more scarce. Butter is becoming scarce by reason of the dissipation and sale and export of the herds. Laudable as may be the minister's desire to win and keep the cheese market of Great Britain, I suggest that he should not do that by depriving the Canadian people of butter. They will have butter, and if it cannot be made in this country, they will import it.

I noticed this morning that in another place an hon. gentleman whose political faith is identical with that of the government in power—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, no, it is not.

Mr. HACKETT: —and who is not unfriendly to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), brought in a bill under the heading "Dairy Industry" and told his house that he was seeking to amend the Dairy Industry Act whereby certain portions of that act which prohibited the manufacture, importation and sale of oleomargarine in Canada would be repealed. Now if it is government policy to force Canadians to eat oleomargarine—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who said it was?

Mr. GRAYDON: Keep quiet, Sir Oleo.

Mr. HACKETT: —that it may export cheese to Britain, I fear that the government will have to amend its policy or it will find itself with abundant leisure to think of other things. The Canadian people have a taste for butter.

Mr. GARDINER: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine has never been discussed by the government at any time to my knowledge within the ten years that I have been in the government. The present law was passed I think in 1922 and has remained that way ever since. It was brought in by the then Liberal government.

Mr. HACKETT: My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has made a statement but it is just possible that he is not entirely aware of all that is taking place within his party. The fact remains that there has been introduced by an outstanding member of his party in the upper house a bill to repeal those portions of the Dairy Industry Act which make it illegal to import oleomargarine into Canada at a time when there is the greatest scarcity of butter that this country has ever known, and if that bill is not introduced for the purpose of substituting oleomargarine for butter, then I do not understand that twice two makes four.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure that my hon. friend does not want to have a misrepresentation go out.

Mr. HACKETT: If my hon. friend wishes to ask a question I am willing to answer, but I have heard a number of interruptions and—

Mr. GARDINER: If I may ask my hon. friend a question, does he know that the Prime Minister announced this morning to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that the question had never been discussed by the government, and that the introduction of the measure referred to in the senate has nothing to do with government policy?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT: I was not aware of that, and I think it is unfortunate that—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I must ask hon. members to keep order. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has the floor, and hon. members have no right to interrupt him unless he permits a question to be asked. I hope that he will be given attention and will not be interrupted while he is speaking.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is touching a sensitive spot. That is why he is interrupted.

Mr. HACKETT: When hon. gentlemen on the other side become restless and begin to find their seats uncomfortable it is perhaps because they are being told things which remind them of past errors of policy and of the retribution, swift and inexorable, which followed.

The purpose of my remarks is to ask the Minister of Agriculture to raise the ceiling price of butter so that the owners of herds can continue to make butter and that they may have from the proceeds of the sale of that butter money sufficient to buy the feed that is necessary to exploit their herds, money sufficient to clothe their children properly and send them to school, money sufficient to enable them to keep their herds instead of selling them, as they have been forced to do and are doing at an alarming rate.

The market in Britain is a good market, and I commend the minister for trying to secure it for Canada. But he can secure it only if he proceeds fairly, and he cannot be unfair to a considerable element of the agricultural population and hope to bring a benefit to the rest of Canada. If he destroys the butter-making element he will weaken the very industry that he is seeking to strengthen. If he permits the butter maker of Quebec to be squeezed out of existence, and forty cents a pound butter is doing it, he is following a policy which is dangerous not only to the largest single element in our country, the farming element, but to the country as a whole.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I wish to say a few words. It had not been my intention earlier in this debate to take part in it but rather to leave what I had to say to another occasion.

An hon. MEMBER: Leave it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I heard somebody say "Leave it". The leaders of all the parties agreed to do that very thing, but every party except the Social Credit party broke that agreement, and some to a greater degree than others. I think the greatest betrayal of that agreement was by the Conservative party, but the Liberals shared in it, and now I see they are applauding themselves. But that is not the point of my argument this afternoon. I want to deal with several matters, and I am glad the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) is in his seat, because later I shall address some remarks particularly to him.

First of all I wish to warn the house of the gradually increasing number of unemployed throughout Canada. Particularly is this so in the part of the country I come from, the west. Just before I left Calgary the unemployment register roll in that city was well nigh the 5,000 mark—and this represented people who were registered as unemployed, not counting the vast numbers of unemployed of whom there was no record. The same is true of Edmonton and of all the other cities in the west; in fact there are thousands of unemployed throughout the country, and this at a time when Canada's government is boasting that it is doing so much in an all-out production effort.

It is only a matter of months now since we had everyone employed. True, they were wearing uniforms, but the government promised them that no time would be lost in converting from war-time to peace-time production. I saw in the papers not long ago that the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) had stated it would be only a few weeks until we would be again short of man-power. I fancy he will have to do a good deal of miraculous work and planning if he expects to be able to take up the great lag in unemployment which is increasing so rapidly across Canada.

Not only is this true among the civilian workers in war production plants who have been laid off and are now finding it impossible to get any jobs, but it is true of the veterans themselves. Many veterans in Calgary have come to me appealing for jobs, but I do not know where there are any jobs to be got. We cannot find them.

Mr. SINNOTT: There are lots of farm jobs.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, but some of you farmers, not all I am glad to say, hardly pay help sufficient to maintain what might be called a decent standard of living.

Mr. SINNOTT: You cannot get men at $100 a month to-day.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not know many who would refuse $100 a month. But that does not solve the problem of the increasing number of unemployed, and it was the hon. gentleman's party who went about the country hanging up great yellow posters—yes, they were yellow—on every telephone pole saying, "Jobs for all", and they were going to maintain the standard of pay which prevailed during the war years. The responsibility rests upon the Liberal party and other parties who advocated jobs for all. Let me tell the hon. member that it was the Social Credit party alone who told the people definitely, although it was not a popular thing to say at election time, that we knew there would not be jobs for all under the present set-up. There is no guessing about this. The facts are there; they speak for themselves. I have the posters upstairs in my desk.

One other thing which I think should be called to the attention of the government is the ever-increasing burden of taxes and the cost of living. We members in the house—and I make no apology for this, nor did I apologize for it anywhere in my constituency—voted ourselves an increase of $2,000. When I was asked about it in my constituency I made no bones about it at all. I told the people that I was one of those who did vote for the increase. It has been our policy as Social Crediters, ever since we have been in the house, to do everything possible to increase the standard of living of every Canadian. We have persistently and consistently throughout the years fought for increased living standards for all, and when we ourselves had the opportunity to give ourselves an increase—and some of us really needed it—we voted for it. It behooves every member of the house, therefore, to see to it, and at this session is the opportune time, that other people in Canada, especially those in the low income brackets, have some relief from the present tremendous taxation.

I suggest, and it has been suggested by other members of our party as well as members in other parts of the house, that the income tax exemption be $2,000 for married persons and $1,200 for single. That would be a step in the right direction.

The government seems to have forgotten that agricultural workers are the backbone of industry in this country. During the war years, however, the farmers have not shared in the profits which other industries have enjoyed. Indeed, they shared very little in increased prices until quite recently, and now the government comes along, when there is a chance for agriculture to participate in some small measure in any advantages there may be, and deliberately increases the cost of production by adding another cost in the price of gasoline. The farmers in my constituency are greatly perturbed by the increased cost of gasoline and white products generally, because, without any question, that raises the cost of production for the farmer. When they look across the border and see that the farmer there can purchase machinery at prices considerably less than those charged for the same machinery in Canada, made by the same companies and distributed by their agents in this country; when they see that our people have to pay twice the price, our farmers do not feel well about it. One cannot wonder at their uneasiness.

It has been suggested by the members of this party and by others that the government remove that three per cent war tax on gasoline. That would bring the price down for the benefit not only of farmers in the west but of the people generally throughout Canada. It would be a step in the right direction. I have here a resolution which I should like to put on the record because I know that many other members have received similar resolutions. It will give the house and the people of eastern Canada some idea of what the farmers of the west have to contend with in the way of increased costs of production. A copy of this resolution was sent to the Prime Minister:

Whereas there is to be an increase of two cents a gallon on the price of gasoline, effective March 18, 1946, and

Whereas this action on the part of the federal government will affect the farmers of Alberta in their cost of production and also the cost in all other services rendered by business to the farmer throughout the country, which will ultimately result in a further increased cost to the primary producer, and

Whereas we do believe the remedy could be effected in the removal of the federal tax of three cents.

Therefore the Langdon, Alberta, farmers union and the Langdon United Farmers of Alberta at a recent meeting held

Resolved that a fact-finding board be set up by federal and provincial governments to investigate into records of all oil producers, manufacturers and distributors of white products to determine whether any increase in price is justified at this time.

I think there is a great deal of merit in that resolution. A fact-finding board should be set up, in the form of a commission, to find out whether it is necessary to have increased prices in gasoline. The meeting referred to in the resolution was no small affair. There were delegates from all parts of the district. There were over 92 persons present, and the resolution represents not the feeling of a local community but the feeling of quite a large area. And the same feeling prevails generally throughout Canada.

I stated a little while ago that I should have a few words to say to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. May I say that the minister has been very considerate in regard to conditions affecting the returned man. He has done about as good a job as any Liberal could do; in fact he is about as good a Liberal as there is.

I wish to refer to the general housing situation. Quite a few members have spoken about housing, but not from the point of view to which I wish to address myself. It has been pointed out that the housing situation is becoming desperate across the country. We all know that. When Wartime Housing first started two or three years ago I spoke on this question because I visited Wartime Housing in Hull, and afterwards I spoke in the house with regard to things I had actually seen. Under Wartime Housing, houses were built in Hull which were a shame and a disgrace and a waste of public money. On that occasion I pointed out to the house that I had seen several houses in Hull the outside walls of which were falling away from the foundation. You could stick your hand between the inside partition in the house and the outside wall. I pointed that out because I had actually seen it in many houses in that city. The floors had warped to such an extent that you could not get in through the kitchen door from the outside. The door could not be opened. There was hardly a door in the whole house that could be properly opened and closed.

An hon. MEMBER: Ontario lumber.

Mr. JOHNSTON: No, Quebec results and Liberal policy.

An hon. MEMBER: Warped.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They were a little warped —I mean the houses.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the policy.

Mr. JOHNSTON: This is not new to the government because they have been fully informed in regard to it. One would think, sir, that having heard about these things the government would have at least sent out a competent and responsible inspector to see if the statements were correct, and immediately stopped any such practices. But this was not done.

It has been admitted by the government that under the national housing scheme 27,000 houses have been built and under Wartime Housing, 16,000. These houses have been completed and are occupied. As I said last year, I have no great complaint to make about the national housing scheme. I have carefully watched construction from the laying of the foundations to the time the families moved in. I have visited the homes after the families moved in, and I must say that under the national housing scheme the government has done a fairly good job. The material is satisfactory, the workmanship has been well done, and the people are satisfied. But that was done by private contractors, and the individual was allowed free choice of his own contractor. He was permitted to get the design that he required and to go ahead with his house. The government did not assist him with any gifts; it was merely a loan which the recipient had to repay at a rate of interest.

Under the two plans the government has built 43,000 houses. We have no indication of how many veterans' houses have been built. At the appropriate time the Minister of Veterans Affairs may tell us how many veterans' houses have been built.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Twenty-seven hundred.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Last year the department announced that some fifty new homes would be ready for occupancy a few months ago in Calgary. When I left I believe eighteen were occupied. The minister knows that the veterans in Calgary are decidedly dissatisfied with the conditions of affairs there; he knows it because he has been informed. An organization of veterans was formed in Calgary and the different members of parliament invited to attend meetings. Meetings have been held regularly and I have attended all of them. On different occasions the government inspector has been there. We have gone over the problem thoroughly and I am sure that the minister must have been informed by his own representatives of the condition of affairs. If he has not, it is time he removed some of his officials. May I say that he should start in with some of the inspectors, as I shall indicate as I go along.

These houses are costing the veterans a considerable amount of money. When you compare their cost with the cost of the national housing scheme there is not a great deal of difference. I have one house particularly in mind which cost a veteran $5,400, and also a national housing house, just a few blocks away, which cost $6,000. The basement alone of the national housing house is worth the whole of the veteran's house. The veteran's house is going to fall apart in six months. If a good windstorm comes up it will not be there at all; it will look as if an atomic bomb hit it. Five thousand dollars odd is a large sum of money for the type of house the veteran is getting. The houses are valued at too high a figure. The sum of $4,000 is the maximum that should have been paid by the veteran for the house to which I have referred. I can point to dozens of houses that have been privately built in Calgary under the same conditions—better houses by far, and they have not cost $5,400. But I shall refer to that a little later.

To-day I want to take the members of the house and the minister on a visit to these veterans' homes. I am going to confine my visit to Calgary, because I know it is typical of all veterans' houses throughout Canada; I cannot see why it would be different. First of all, let us look at the basements of these veterans' houses. As I said at the beginning, I have watched these houses from the time the basement was dug until the families moved in. Some of the veterans have been in them for three months. I want to be fair; there may be an explanation for this, but out of the eighteen houses that are occupied by veterans in Calgary there may be one or two in which the cement floors and walls have not cracked; in every other case the walls and floors are cracking. The federal government inspector who should inspect these buildings told me that they had put in five bags of cement to the yard in the walls and six bags of cement in the floor. It was a four inch floor. I wish to address these remarks to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker. Either the inspector is lying or the veterans have taken a bad trimming in the amount of cement that was put into the walls, because no cement wall eight inches thick and no cement floor four inches thick that has five or six bags of cement to the yard, and the proper proportions of sand and gravel, would ever crack in the manner in which these walls and floors have cracked. The walls and floors are the very foundation upon which the whole house is being built. I know enough about cement work to know that there is some funny work somewhere. I say to the minister, through you, sir, that somebody is doing some dirty work somewhere, and when this dirty work is passed on to these veterans it is about time something was done about it.

Let us start with the cement floor. Remember, all these buildings have been inspected and accepted by the federal government inspector. Where his eyes were when he did that, I do not know; they were not in his head. As to the plumbing in the basement, one can go along and take hold of a water pipe and shake it all over. The pipes were not even fastened properly to the joists in the building. In many cases they were leaking. Instead of using galvanized pipe, as I presume the specifications called for, in connecting up the hot water tank, they used ordinary gas pipe. I have not seen the specifications; that may be permissible, but I doubt it very much.

The drain in the basement floor was an inch to an inch and a half above the cement. That meant that when the wife went to do the washing, and drained the washing machine, a great puddle of water lay on the floor which could not be drained out. Had the inspector been there and been doing the job for which he was paid—and paid well, I suppose—he would have tripped over the thing and probably wakened himself up. I do not think he was ever there; he could not have been, to permit such a thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would my hon. friend be kind enough to tell me exactly where this house is?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes; I will do that later.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I should like to know, because I want to follow it up.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, I will do that.

I mentioned to the government last year the material which was going into the veterans' houses. We are still in the basement of this house. I pointed out to the minister that 2 by 8 spruce joists were used, and that they would not hold up under conditions as we have them in the west. Nor will they hold up under conditions as you have them in the east. Right over in Hull you have had evidence of that, when houses, built practically of the same material, went to pieces. I pointed this out to the government, but nothing was done.

A beam runs across through the basement to carry the middle weight of the house. When the joists are laid they are supposed to be long enough to double over the beam; everybody knows that. But in some of these houses the joists do not even reach the beam; they are spliced in, and the weight comes entirely on the nails. You cannot expect a house so constructed to stand, and it will not stand. As I pointed out to the minister last year, the spruce joists fastened together with one or two spikes where they come across on the beam are coming apart. The result is that the floor above is sagging; it could not be otherwise. The bridgings down in the basement holding the joists were 1 by 2 strips of spruce nailed with 2-inch nails. I told the government that they would not hold up, that as soon as these narrow strips dried out you could pull the nails out with your fingers; and that is exactly what is happening. There is hardly one of these small bridgings which you cannot pull off with one or two fingers; the joists are twisted, and the house is going to be twisted as well. If this happens after they have been occupied for only two or three months, what is going to happen when the heat strikes them at 110 degrees in the shade?

Mr. MacNICOL: Have these houses passed inspection?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, they have all been passed by the government inspector. I shall refer to that government inspector a little later.

I have not seen the specifications of these houses. I think there are different specifications for each house. But the city by-law definitely prohibits the use of anything less than a 2 by 2 for bridging, yet the government has put in 1 by 2 spruce.

Let me now take you up to the first floor of one of these houses. Incidentally, in walking up to the first floor one of the men fell through the stairs. He did not trip, either. I should like to give the minister a picture of these houses that our veterans have to live in; and may I tell him that their wives are not very well satisfied when for twenty-four hours a day they have to live in these places. Imagine a wife who is doing her washing and drains the washing machine and finds the basement floor filled with water, which will not run off. It is not a very pleasant situation to be in.

We are now on the first floor, the main floor. As hon. members know, these walls are 4 by 8 sheets of plaster board. Plaster board is something like gyproc lap, but in larger sheets, and if you use small headed nails in putting on the plaster boards they will not hold. Some of these nails have small heads, others have larger heads, but the type of head used was the small-headed nail, the very poorest one which could be chosen, with the result that the boards are loose on the walls and in a great many cases have to be gone over and renailed. I never, Mr. Speaker, saw such a miserably poor job of workmanship. It is possible to have a nicely finished room by using plaster board, and I have seen houses in which it has been used, where the joints have been properly cemented before the tape was put over, and sanded down, and after painting the joint is completely invisible. But in these houses you could look clear across the place and see the joint as clearly as you could see the wall, right through the paint. All across the ceiling you can see these joints running clear across. Imagine the wife of a veteran who is entertaining her friends in the evening, with these big strips of tape running across the wall. One finds that throughout the house. It is faulty workmanship, not faulty material in this case. The joists in the basement were faulty material, and the government was responsible for them; what I am speaking of now is a matter of faulty workmanship. But the government is responsible, because it should know the contractor to whom it let the contracts for these buildings, and the inspector who passed them.

Where the walls come to the corner it is usual in all well-built houses to have a metal bead running down the corner. In these houses instead of having metal bead they have a 2 by 2 spruce on the edges of the partition. The 2 by 2—I am speaking now generally of the finish—was never sanded off when it was painted; it was furry before it was put up, and when it is painted in that condition you cannot remedy it without sandpapering all the paint off. There was no attempt to finish up the cheap material used in the corners in this building instead of metal beads.

The doors are not properly hung. Hardly a door is properly hung. On one occasion when they came to repair these buildings they put pasteboard behind the hinges to even things up around the door, but the gap is still there. It was faulty workmanship, but still the inspector passed it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is this the same house?

Mr. JOHNSTON: No. I have visited several.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How many?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I would say I have visited half a dozen of the eighteen, but those who were at these meetings told me that conditions were almost the same in all these houses.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. SINNOTT: I think you would make a good inspector.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I could do better than that; there is no question about it. Even the hon. member himself could, I think. He has a fine house, I understand.

Now let us go to the flooring. The floor was supposed to be No. 1 edge grain flooring. Edge grain flooring has no knots in it. This is not No. 1 edge grain fir flooring, yet the veteran is paying for it. I remember one house in particular when the inspector was present and the man who owned this house was complaining about the knots in the floor right in the front part of the room. He said he did not know how that could be; and one of the other fellows said, "Well, if you recall, when you inspected the house it was covered with paper." I said to the inspector, "Did you not raise this paper when you went in to inspect the building for the government?"—and he said he had not. How can a government inspector go through a house and inspect floors that are covered with paper—even looking at them? That is something no woman wants in her front room—knots all over the floor. The veteran was paying for No. 1 material, but he did not get it.

Let us go upstairs—but be careful of your head, because you will have it bumped. That is the government's fault, the architect's fault. I am not a tall man, but I know the minister would have to get down on his knees to go up there.

Mr. GRAYDON: It would do him no harm.

Mr. JOHNSTON: No, it would not. He should get down and pray for these poor veterans who have got such a fleecing. Now, that is the architect's fault. I do not blame the contractor for it, because I imagine it was that way in his specifications.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who was the contractor? I do not know where the house was.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If you want me to name it—Bennett and White.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where is the house?

Mr. JOHNSTON: In Calgary.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Calgary is a big place.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is a fine place; you ought to come out there. Now, that was the main staircase going upstairs. One has to duck his dead as he goes up. That is not a very satisfactory state of affairs, as the minister will no doubt agree. However, I shall not prolong this phase of the matter.

I want to say something about windows. Here I am not blaming the contractor so much as I am the government. When the windows were put into these houses they were fitted for sash cords and weights, and ploughed out for that purpose. But when those windows were installed, no sash cords or weights were put in, nor was there provision made for it. The windows were already ploughed, and as a result when the wind blows it goes right up both sides of the window and simply blows out the curtains. As anyone knows, with the wind blowing in like that, and blowing the curtains, it is not a very satisfactory state of affairs.

I am skipping over quite a bit of the detail, because my time is limited. I do wish to speak about heating. It will be understood that as I go along I am picking out the major items. If I were to deal with all the minor items it would take a very long time.

The heating is a gravity system. When it comes to the first floor, the registers are in the wall. That is the proper place for them. But the cold air vents are on the floor, and they are placed out about ten inches from the wall. They are oblong in shape, about ten inches wide and about sixteen inches long, fitting in between the joists. There are wooden slats across them, and those slats are about one-quarter inch by 1¼ inches, and sixteen inches long. There they are, sitting I was about to say, almost in the middle of the floor, ten inches from the wall; and if a person came in there and put his chair in that part of the room it would go right down through the floor. Besides, it is a regular dirt trap. One cannot put chairs in the vicinity, because someone would fall through it—a very unsatisfactory condition. The wooden grills should have been put in the wall.

When one goes upstairs he finds that the hot-air vents are placed in the floors. These are just metal grates, not fastened down in any way. All the dirt falls down into them. The children could very easily throw articles in there—in fact they could even get in themselves. The hot-air vents should have been in the wall. It would have cost practically no more to put them in the proper place than to stick them out in the middle of the room, as they are now. These are conditions which should be rectified.

I did a little estimating on this house, which cost $5,400, and I do not think I am far out. I have estimated the plumbing at $400.

Mr. GRAYDON: How many rooms?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Five or six; I am not just sure which. An ordinary plumbing job for such a house would cost about $475, but I think the government would get it for a little less than that, and for that reason I cut it down to $400. The city works section would cost about $400, and the lumber about $1,600. I have made that figure a maximum, because I do not think it should cost more than that for the type of house in question. That would make a total of $2,400, and to this should be added the carpentry work as the remaining cost item, approximately $3,000 for the carpentry work on those houses. I say a contractor has no right to receive $3,000 for building a house of that kind. It is entirely too much money; $2,000 would be enough. And for that he should do a good job.

Someone will say, "Oh, well; they have to pay high wages." They are not paying high wages. When it comes to the matter of having skilled workers to build a house, I say one does not have to have all skilled workers. All one needs to build a house, and to build it properly, is to have one or two good carpenters. The rest can be nail drivers. In this way one can build a first-class house, in first-class condition. There is no scarcity of labour in that regard.

Mr. TUSTIN: Had the house a basement?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, this house had a basement. Another complaint I have is that these contractors are getting approximately $3,000 for the carpenter work, and the government supplies the material; then they sublet contracts for laying floors, putting on lath, etc.

When I refer to floors there is something further I should add. I have been skipping along so fast that I have been leaving out important details. In laying the upstairs floors they laid the spruce lumber groove to groove and tongue to tongue—and that was passed by a government inspector. In the kitchen they put down first-class battleship linoleum over the spruce floors. Of course the spruce shrunk, and the linoleum drew in, with the result that there is a quarter of an inch space down the middle of the kitchen. Adjustments have had to be made in these things. In fact they sent a carpenter up there at extra expense to the government, because the contractor got extra for this.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was the inspector one of those dollar-a-year men, or how was he paid for inspecting?

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. member will have to ask the minister that question. I do not think he is working for a dollar a year. I think he is a Liberal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. member know that?

Mr. GRAYDON: It sounds like it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think it is a wrong practice to permit the contractor to sublet his contracts for laying floors, putting on plaster board, or putting on this or that. He sublets for shingling, for flooring, and for this or that.

This procedure of building veterans' houses or war-time houses on a mass production basis is wrong. We give a contract for 300 or 400 houses to one man, and then he starts to build the houses on a mass scale, subletting this and subletting that. Why not let them out to private contractors who will do the job under proper and decent conditions? Why should not a man have some say about the house he is to live in, or have some supervision over its construction, especially when he has to pay for it? Surely he should have something to say about it.

What are we going to do to rectify these unsatisfactory conditions? My estimate is—and I do not think I am far wrong—that it will cost from $500 to $1,000 more to condition these houses so that they will be at all passable, and so that veterans can live in them. I believe, as I have said, that it will cost the government from $500 to $1,000 more to put these houses into such condition that they can be lived in. And even when that much has been spent, still we shall not have proper houses, because as soon as the heat strikes in the summer the damage will continue. The men who have bought these houses should be permitted to have new ones. I do not think they should be asked to live in these places. The government should immediately stop building houses with spruce. Of course they contend that there is a shortage of material, but I would rather have one good house built than two poor ones, and I would rather have one veteran satisfied with his home than have two dissatisfied. I do not think we would be so short of material if we stopped shipping out the best of our materials to other countries. Let us keep some here to build houses for these men whom just a few short months ago we were calling great heroes, whom just a few short months ago we were meeting with bands, for whom just a few short months ago we had signs up in the stations, "Welcome home, boys." Then we give them one of these houses. That is not good enough.

The government should do everything possible to remedy these conditions, and I am sure the minister will, now that the matter has been brought to his attention. Proper precautions should be taken. These veterans should not be told, and I know they would not be told by the minister, what was told to the chairman of this committee by a government representative: The chairman of this committee was told, "You can either take it or get out." I said to them, "Don't be afraid of his kicking you out, because I know the Minister of Veterans Affairs will not stand for anything like that." Maybe I was speaking out of turn, but I do not think so.

That is not the way to talk to these men. All they want is satisfaction. They want something for the money they are paying, because they feel that they have earned their gratuities. They feel that they have some right to fair treatment. I hope the minister will take this matter under advisement and have an immediate check made of these things. Efforts should be made to see that these men are satisfied and that they have houses to which their wives and families will not be ashamed to bring their friends.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In order to carry out the request made by my hon. friend, will he kindly tell me the exact location of the house in question?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I have not the exact address, but I will give it to the minister.

Mr. TUCKER: What did the veteran pay for the house?

Mr. JOHNSTON: $5,400.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is plenty.

Mr. JOHNSTON: These conditions are not applicable to just one house. I know of another man, and I am not going to tell you his politics although I think the minister would be pleased if I did. Before this man felt he could move in he spent over $250 out of his own pocket to finish the house. He did a fairly good job, but they dare not put a piano in the house because the floor now looks like a camel's back.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is that the same house?

Mr. JOHNSTON: No, it is a different one.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In the same location?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, it is the same location, up on North Hill, where veterans' houses are being built in Calgary.

Mr. TUCKER: Is the hon. member sure that those houses were built under the land act administration?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Oh, yes. Mr. Finlater is one of the inspectors and Mr. Turner is the other. Bennett and White were the contractors.

Mr. HARKNESS: That is the small holdings development?

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is right, out at North Hill.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have refrained from taking part in this debate because I was one of the lesser lights who went to the continent this year and I was waiting until the greater lights had had their say. I was greatly taken with what I saw there. I was interested in what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had to say the other day. He finished his remarks with these words, which will be found on page 97 of Hansard:

> One found a condition there which gave one a certain impression. I came away from Paris feeling that I had seen a very dejected people, a people who were suffering because of need, a people who were not properly clothed, a people who required a great deal of sympathy and care from those of us outside.

I had intended to demonstrate the benefits I had derived from my visit to France by speaking in French, but there are so few of my French-speaking friends here this afternoon that I am just going to stick to my own doric. No person can understand or realize what the French people have gone through. Perhaps those members on both sides of the house who fought over the Normandy beaches, up through Falaise, Caen, Amiens and right on through know what it is like because they were through the worst of it. We must remember that when we were not in France, the Germans were. These people were bombed incessantly. If the Germans were not bombing them, we were. This put us in a rather awkward position. We would meet people who had lost legs and arms and naturally we would say, "How did you lose your leg?" or "How did you lose your arm?" A man might reply, "Well, one of your airmen came over one night."

I want hon. members to realize that these people have suffered as no other nation has suffered. England and Scotland also suffered, but they are taking it right on the chin. Hon. members have no idea of how they are taking it. I went to my native city and they said, "We were not damaged at all," but in two nights Jerry destroyed 4,500 homes. Still they said they were not damaged. Then we hear members in this House of Commons say that we should not lend them money to help them get back on their feet or reinstate themselves. Those hon. members just do not understand because they have not had an opportunity to see like the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and other hon. members. We saw the terrible conditions that exist.

In Paris I saw people line up at seven o'clock in the morning to try to get food. This was not in front of the Ritz either. I stayed at the Ritz to see what it was like.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where did you get all the money?

Mr. BRYCE: I travelled with a Conservative. I saw those poor people standing in line waiting with their coupons for bread. They would wait until ten or half-past ten o'clock and then they would be told, "No bread to-day." We never had anything like that. The nearest they got to us was the St. Lawrence river. We should be ready to go down on our knees and thank these people for what they saved us from. Our boys and girls went there and did their part, but we folk at home never knew what was going on.

When you speak to the British people they will tell you that they have plenty of food, that they never wanted for anything at all. I have in my hand a book entitled, "Dainty Dishes for the Queen." This contains 160 recipes for dishes made out of oatmeal and potatoes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is good Scotch food.

Mr. BRYCE: I know we have big men like the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) who have been raised on meal and potatoes, but believe me that gets pretty monotonous, and that is what is going on in the old country to-day. I make this plea to everyone who has friends in the old country: Send them a parcel, for they will appreciate it. I had the pleasure, with other members of this house, of seeing people over there receive parcels from Canada, and they were just like kids around a Christmas tree. They were so pleased to get something different from what they usually had. We were in places in France where, when we got up in the morning, we could get no breakfast and had to drive to the next town before we could get anything to eat. That is a deplorable state of affairs. When we did get a good meal and asked how that came about, the answer was that the food was procured in the black market.

France is up against a problem which no other country in the world faces to-day. For the last five or six years French boys in their teens, from fifteen up to twenty, have been trained in the underground movement to believe that they were heroes if they killed a German or disrupted the then government service. Now they have a government of their own, but they do not yet realize that it is their own government. That is a problem which France is up against and which you do not find in Britain because there the people realize what government means. I hope that everybody will support this loan to Great Britain to help the mother country get back to a good healthy condition.

I always take great pleasure in handing out bouquets to the government. When I was in England I saw a boatload of Canadian bacon. We farmers have always heard here that our bacon was not as good as Denmark's, but I saw our Canadian bacon over there, and it is the finest bacon that is reaching England to-day. There is nothing to beat it. I saw also Danish bacon, United States bacon and Australian bacon. The Canadian bacon that I saw was "A" bacon; there were no seconds or thirds, nothing but "A". Of course I have always maintained that that is what it is when it gets there. Our bacon was first-class bacon; they like our bacon, and I should like to see the government do everything possible to maintain that market.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) is quoted in the press and in Hansard as saying that butter should be $1 a pound. I never got $1 a pound; I have got seventy-five cents, but then I had to pay $25 for a bag of sugar. But with sugar at eight or nine cents a pound and butter at fifty cents a pound I think I would be better off than with butter at $1 a pound and sugar at twenty-five cents a pound.

I agree with the hon. member for Stanstead that while the price of milk averages throughout the dominion $3 per hundredweight, the man who is producing cream is making only about $1.62, if it is 3·5 milk. There is something wrong there. You cannot get a man to produce butter fat if he can get a market for his fluid milk. That is a matter which the government must straighten out. The greatest difficulty is this. Right across this dominion you will find that the milk producers have been organized in every city and have fought for their rights, but the cream shipper has been away off in some isolated spot, never subject to sanitary regulations or anything else, and he has had to take just what the creamery could give him. I know we are very short of butter, and to relieve that shortage I make this suggestion to the government, either to the Minister of Finance or to the Minister of Agriculture, that cream cheques for some time forward be free of income tax. I think that would help get considerably more butter produced. I want to make myself clear on that. My suggestion is that cream cheques should not be subject to income tax. That would start a lot of people milking cows again who have stopped doing so now.

Now a word as to speculation and the grain exchange. I remember when we had the last wheat board in 1919, I remember that in 1920 we had the same agitation that we have to-day. It was the demonstration of collective marketing by the operation of the Canadian wheat board in 1919-20 which brought home to every western grain grower that the futures system was not essential to the successful marketing of wheat, when all farmers received the average price for their wheat regardless of the time they delivered it. There has always been a strong sentiment among the wheat producers of western Canada against the futures system, which in their opinion, determines by public gambling the price of the grain they have to sell. They consider that, as stated by a Canadian economist:

> Aside from the demoralization inseparable from widespread gambling, price instability is in itself an evil. It means that wider margins are necessary to offset possible losses not fully covered by "hedges" in the trade. It also means that farming as a business has less stability. Unless an expert seller, the individual farmer is likely to sell without consideration when prices are low. Some farmers will get high prices and some low but the risk of farming is increased.

It was the handling of the 1919-20 wheat crop by the Canadian wheat board, coupled with the drastic decline in the price of wheat on the futures market upon the termination of the board's operations which brought about an insistent demand on the part of all those directly interested in western agriculture for the reestablishment of the wheat board. That is happening again to-day. We have men clamouring: If we had an open market we would get a better price. We had $2.73½ in 1920, and they said that if we had an open market we could get $3. Do not let us be fooled again. The cash closing price of wheat on August 18, 1920, the first day the Winnipeg futures market was reopened, was $2.73½ a bushel basis 1 northern Fort William. By November 18, the cash price had declined by sixty-six cents to $2.07½ a bushel. On November 18, 1921, the cash price was $1.11⅝ a bushel, showing a drop of 95⅞ cents in one year. On March 18, 1922, by which time practically all the 1921 crop was out of the farmers' hands, the price had returned to $1.43¾ a bushel. Again, by October 18, 1922, the peak month for farmer deliveries, the price was again down to $1.02¼ a bushel. On April 18, 1923, when once again little or no wheat was in farmers' hands, the price was again up to $1.22 a bushel, but at the peak of delivery on October 18, 1923, was back to 95⅞ cents. I am sure hon. members can recall that.

So great was the agitation carried on both by individual farmers and by farmers' organizations generally, that a new political party known as the "Progressives", which had as one of its main planks the establishment of the wheat board, almost wiped out the other two parties in the three prairie provinces in the 1921 dominion general election.

There are in Canada to-day people who are clamouring for an open market. I repeat what I have said before: God forbid that the market be open again for speculative purposes. It would mean the most deplorable state of affairs that we have ever known to exist in Canada.

I congratulate this Liberal government on having set up the wheat board and I appeal to them to keep it. Speculating on the market is out of date. It came with the horse and buggy long ago, and if the farmer had stayed with the horse and buggy he would still be cutting with a reaper. But he has moved on continuously. He got a tractor and a binder and to-day he has a combine. Speculation in grain is the same as it was when it started.

I was born in a Liberal home; I was raised in a Liberal home and I thought a lot of Liberals in my young days. I studied Gladstone, Lloyd George and even our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). But when this Liberal government allow people to gamble in rye, when the farmer gets 90 cents and the man who has to make bread with it has to pay $2.50, then I say that my hon. friends have forgotten all the Liberalism that was ever taught them.

May I quote from the Prime Minister as reported in Hansard at page 2498 of the session of 1933:

> Most of the social legislation on the statute books of the different countries throughout the world to-day is the result of great Liberal battles, great battles in which the particular interest has been subordinated to the general interest, great battles to give first place to the well-being of the many, rather than to the privileges of the few.

Again I quote from page 2501:

> I submit that human need, social justice and the common good have been the constant aims of Liberalism with respect to the distribution of wealth.

How can any man with a creed like that allow gambling in rye to go on? I cannot make sense of it. I have admired the things he has written in his fight for the common man, but here we find that the government in 1919 and 1920, needing a wheat board, established one, and another one later on, maintaining it through the war, taking over oats, barley and flax; and yet they left rye out of it. They left these gamblers to go on in rye.

Mr. MacINNIS: Coming through the rye.

Mr. BRYCE: The argument put up by these gentlemen who speculate in futures is the future market. I have the figures here, showing that on December 7, 1945, there were visible in Canada 1,442,000 bushels, and on February 1, 1946, there were 1,458,000 bushels, or 16,000 bushels more on the futures market. We are told that when there is less the price should go up and when there is more the price should go down. But here the price jumped from $1.81½ to $2.29⅛. This Liberal government sends representatives to a food conference with the idea of feeding the world, and it will pay a farmer ninety cents or $1 for his rye and then allow these fellows to gamble in the commodity, while the poor man who has to turn it into bread pays $2.60 a bushel for it. One wonders how people can do such things. If it is good for wheat, oats and barley to be under the control of the wheat board, then the same arguments apply to rye.

I do not know whether I have made that argument strong enough, but I feel that this is one of the greatest injustices the government has done to the common man, because the man who produces rye produces it in the poorest ground. Up in the interlake country where there is nothing but sand they will grow rye, and some of the most underpaid people in the world eat rye bread to-day; yet the government will allow these privileged few to gamble in the produce of the farmer. There is no place in the modern world for gambling in food.

I have some other things I wish to discuss but perhaps I have said enough for the present. However, I will say this to the government. We need live stock legislation to protect the farmer, just as we need a wheat board. You can call it anything you like. I am not fussy about the name. When I made the proposal before, I called it a board of live stock commissioners, and it was suggested that it might not be legal. Well, the members of this government have enough brains to get over such technicalities, if they want to use those brains. I hope they will use them and give us a live stock marketing board to protect the farmer, because he will need that protection.

There have been great changes over the last thirty years. We no longer market our produce in a haphazard way. If you want quality and you establish grades, then I submit that the farmers should be given some say in the fixing of those grades. It is absolutely necessary that they should have representation on any board. I am not suggesting that the packer is not also entitled to representation on it, as well as the consumer and all others concerned. But let everyone be represented on the board.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): In the first place I congratulate the two hon. members who have just spoken; and I will remind the latter that the late King George once admonished the Prince of Wales because he had been speculating in grain. The teachings of the king were to the same effect as the speech of my hon. friend, that there should be no speculation in grain and especially in rye because it is a kind of grain that is just as good to drink as to eat.

We need some reform in this country; we need reform in a broad spirit; but all those who desire to obtain reform must realize in advance that they will get no place, to use slang language, unless they have the determination to suffer slander, insult and abuse for the good cause. That was my experience. Yesterday I received a clipping of a dirty sheet that is published at noontime in Montreal. I shall read it in a moment, but before I read it I shall make a correction in Hansard. At page 220 I am reported as having said, speaking of Colonel Bovey:

The man who makes molasses peaches . . .

I never said that. I did not say that he had received pay as one of the 140 who make preserved peaches, but I said that he was making molasses speeches, sticky speeches for his own benefit. That is what I said and afterwards I complained of McGill university being a red house. By the same mail I received a clipping from the Gazette of March 19 with the picture of Tim Buck addressing the students of McGill, and the gentleman wrote me a very fine letter which I will send to my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low) who stated a few truths that were denied by Principal James.

By the same mail I received an editorial of that dirty sheet. I shall read one paragraph. I have some other excerpts from newspapers which I shall read later on:

Montreal, Wednesday, March 27, 1946.

Something has been added to the "hotbed of communism" charges levelled at McGill by Solon Low—endorsation from the lips of J. F. Pouliot, M.P.

Most Canadians are familiar with Mr. Pouliot's near perfect record for inaugurating and supporting groundless accusations, designed to increase disunity and embarrass governments and institutions.

Only that; that is all I have to say about that remark. I will not say it is inspired by anyone, but I prescribe a triple dose of castor oil to the writer of this editorial and a similar one to Colonel Bovey. That is my potion.

I shall draw the attention of the members of the house to the fact that one thing has been said for the public good by the leader of the Social Credit group and I have repeated it in asking for some reform. Instead of securing any reform, we get abuse from a paper which is inspired by the very man of whom we complain, because they give the wrong information to us; that is all. My hon. friend was the victim of some abuse and so was I. I am far from suffering from the mania of persecution; but I wish to point out that nothing will be accomplished unless all members of parliament have the triple armour of steel around their breasts to defy all the iniquitous persons whom we may meet on the way to reform.

That is my first point, and I have other incidents. There is a young man who lived for a time in the Saguenay district, lake St. John. He was the public relations officer of a big company. He gave false news and led the cabinet and a minister into error. That man never corrected himself. He is now in the eastern townships in charge of a paper. When I received very great honour he wrote this article which appeared in the Sherbrooke Record of February 4, 1946:

In many quarters Mr. Pouliot is regarded as rather irresponsible and as something of a firebrand.

Afterwards he said that apparently it was right, but there was some insult and innuendo in his article. It was the old story, that one cannot complain of any parasite, profiteer, pirate, highway robber or thief without having bad motives. One must have bad motives, no manners at all. What has happened? Of course, I never belonged to the army, but I was described in my constituency last December as a friend of the draftees and the soldiers alike, friend of both. They gave me a dinner and presented me with a brand new car, which is something that is appreciated, because it is the only county where it has been done. It has been done for my provincial mate. Before that, it was done only for one other member of parliament, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who had a big square automobile in the old days. It is something that touched me very deeply.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would touch anybody.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. I hope that the constituents of my hon. friend give him the finest limousine because he deserves it.

I come now to the Victoria Cross. I am interested in the recipients of this medal and when I spoke about the McGill students I mentioned that. Your Honour did something for one of the winners which is merited, but it is not enough. However, Your Honour did more for him than anyone else had done. The press took it up and it was reported in the papers of Victoria. I received word from another hero in British Columbia who had received the Victoria Cross from the hands of our king during the first war. By the way, he was the first officer of the Canadian army to receive the Victoria Cross, and he passed above the heads of everybody in British Columbia, above the heads of all members of parliament, even those who had a very fine war record, even above the head of the legion, to send an S.O.S. to Jean François Pouliot in lower Quebec. I consider it a very great honour and, to be just and fair, I will say that the minister is doing his best to fix up this case, with the assistance of his most valuable parliamentary assistant. It is something which touches one, that a hero of the last war, who has been abandoned by all, goes far away, thousands of miles from his district, to get in touch with one who is ready to fight for him. I took up his case, and at the same time that the newspapers said that apparently it was worthy of consideration, they said of me, "In many quarters Mr. Pouliot is regarded as rather irresponsible and as something of a firebrand." Those who are afraid to be called names by such a nonentity will obtain no reform; and I tell my colleagues, for whom I have great respect, that if they want any reform in this country they have only one thing to do, namely, not to be afraid to say what they believe is right and what they believe is for a good purpose.

There is something else; and I come to the crucial point. Last year hon. gentlemen who listened to me will remember how difficult it was to unearth the amount of money which was earned by the firm of Borden and Company in Toronto. How many times did I rise in the house to ask for that information? I was told that everything that was earned by the firm was returned to the government in a mood of sacrifice and generosity on the altar of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: You believed that, of course?

Mr. POULIOT: I did not believe it at all, and that is why I asked the question. I asked for copies of the cheques which had been sent for the amounts of moneys received. It was no insult; it was a matter of fact, that the man who was there in the department was looking after his own interests. What did the Globe and Mail say about the member for Temiscouata? I cannot complain very much about the Globe and Mail; I have much more respect for it than for the Sherbrooke Record and for the other dirty sheet which is published in Montreal. I have had great respect for the Globe and Mail since the days of Harry Anderson, who was a dear friend of mine.

Mr. MacNICOL: He was a very fine man.

Mr. POULIOT: Certainly. My hon. friend knows I had the honour of being amongst Mr. Anderson's friends; and when his picture was unveiled for the press gallery I was one of the very few members who, along with the then Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), were invited there. I appreciated that very much. I had and I still have very good friends in the province of Ontario. But what I say about the Globe and Mail is what Poujoulat, a great French author, said of Cardinal Richelieu:

Le cardinal m'a fait trop de bien pour que j'en dise du mal; le cardinal m'a fait trop de mal pour que j'en dise du bien.

That is, "The cardinal has done too much good to me for me to speak badly of him, and he has done too much evil for me to say anything good about him." But I will say something nevertheless; and I will read what has been written about me in the Toronto Globe and Mail to humiliate me. That was the purpose, but it was not realized, because I have the skin of a crocodile. Nevertheless the purpose was to humiliate me, to abuse me, to treat me with insult, to make me suffer humiliation. Here it is:

A malicious attack.

Imagine; a man who is malicious, a man who wants to do harm to someone! I am astonished that the title was not "a blasphemous attack". It should have been, because down there they still believe in the golden calf. There are some in Toronto, as there are in Montreal and other places.

Mr. Jean Francois Pouliot staged in the House of Commons on Wednesday another of his many deplorable performances as a public mischiefmaker.

That is inoffensive!

Some time ago he tried to tarnish the reputation of Mr. Henry Borden, K.C., by suggesting that, as legal adviser for the Department of Munitions and Supply during the war years, Mr. Borden had used his position for the advantage of his private law practice.

What an abomination!

Munitions Minister Howe, under whom Mr. Borden served, came to his defence with a categorical denial of Mr. Pouliot's defamatory charges.

You see, I am there portrayed as slinging mud at such a distinguished and sane person as Henry Borden. Mark you, there is nothing infamous in a man looking after his office when he has a very fat job in the government, giving him the opportunity to send cases to his law partner.

If Mr. Borden's reputation needed any public defence, the minister's sweeping refutation at that time should have sufficed to end the matter.

Well, now, Pouliot was a liar because he had dared to say that Borden had taken advantage of his big position as controller of the controllers to encourage his law office. What an abomination! What a scandal! It takes a man who has no honour to defame someone like that in the minds of fellow citizens. There is the conclusion of the paragraph I have read.

Well, now, I have been as stubborn as a donkey. I wanted to get the information; I thank the minister for having given it to me, and I thank his parliamentary assistant, one of the hon. members for Ottawa (Mr. McIlraith), for having helped me to secure it. I now have the information. The question is obvious: did Borden send more to his office in the matter of fees, et cetera, than was returned to the government? That is Pouliot's statement; is it true or not? I have the figures. I will not read them in detail; I do not want to take too much of the time of the house. But here it is:

Professional fees were paid to the law firm of Borden, Elliott, Sankey and Kelley or Borden, Elliott, Kelley, Palmer and Sankey as follows:

From 1941 to 1945, $77,429.75. That is the amount which has been earned by that firm. If the answer which was made to me had been true, the amount returned to the exchequer should have been $77,429.75. But it was a little different:

None of the above amounts paid to this firm included any charge whatsoever for the time and service rendered by Mr. Borden to the department or any government-owned company while Mr. Borden was in any way associated with the department. Of these amounts the following were returned to the department as voluntary contributions representing all profit.

And then are set out the amounts for the three years 1941, 1942 and 1943. This was tabled on March 21, and therefore it must include all that was sent. The amount returned was $21,048, and therefore they enjoyed $56,407.75. For this reason I say Pouliot was right, and his charges were not defamatory. I did not write to the Globe and Mail. But I put a question before the house, so that the house knows that when Pouliot asks a question, if he does not know all the details he at least has good reason for asking that question, and knows something about it.

I have too much respect for the house, including my colleagues, to make any false statements to it or to them respecting matters of fact. Of course I may err when I express an opinion, but when I state a fact I can always prove it. If someone wants information I will answer, and will tell my source of information, so that the house may know about it in a definite way.

My first conclusion is that one who has not been affected by the atmosphere of Ottawa will not be affected to any considerable extent by the unfair criticism of some of the local newspapers which are controlled by interests which always cater to bureaucracy. One must make his own judgments. One must not take for granted that everything said to him is true, and that because something is said by Mr. So-and-so it must be right. Therefore I tell my colleagues, whom I respect, that if they want to continue their war against bureaucracy, and to bring back responsible government in Canada, they are sure to be abused and to be slandered; they are sure to be minimized in the eyes of their electors.

I am not alone in that category. I remember well the insults that were heaped upon us at the time of the sittings of the civil service committee. My hon. friends were on that committee serving with me. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) served on it, and did excellent work, as did the other members. It gives me pleasure to offer them praise for what they did.

That is my first observation. Then I have another point I would ask hon. members to keep in mind. While I have the deepest respect for returned men and while I am always ready to help them, and want to have the help of the minister and his assistant—because apparently they are two of the very few good men in the department—yet we must not lose our sense of proportion. Because a man has done excellent work during the war, it does not necessarily follow that he must be considered infallible in anything he does afterwards, in any field of action.

For instance, it was ridiculous to consider as infallible two former defence ministers, simply because each had a fine war record. It was silly to do that. But I could not contradict either Power or Ralston because both had fine war records. It is true; I concede it;

I admit it. But that is no reason why one should not find any fault in the managing of their departments. Those who believed them infallible were simply credulous, and behaving like children. I have too much respect for members of parliament to let them fall into such credulity, which is childish.

I have one thing further to say, and I shall have finished. It is to repeat in another form what I said when I was sitting on the opposite side of the house, at a time when I suggested we should have a union opposition, composed of all liberal-minded members of parliament. That was a time when the clean-up which has been made in the three defence departments had not been completed, and I felt it was time to do something about it.

We are here to do something; we are not here just to make speeches. We are here to reform the government of the dominion, so that we can do something beneficial for the common people. I give credit to all hon. members that they intend to do something for the country. We will do it together, if we remove obstacles to progress.

If we are to deal effectively with bureaucracy, with fairness and with equity, keeping in mind at the same time the usefulness of civil servants to the state—and this is not being done by the commission now making an investigation—and if we want to make a clean-up of the civil service, then we must first of all make a clean-up in all political parties, so that liberal-minded men may act together, whether they be Liberals, Conservatives by name, Social Crediters, or in the C.C.F. group. That is not important.

We are reaching a time when there will be a great cleavage in Canada between people who are thinking about the future of the country. There will be those who have a Canadian spirit and who think of Canada before any other country; and on the other side there will be those who think of any other country before Canada. Let us put them under the same roof and in the same corner.

What shall we do? In the first place the two old parties shall get rid of the control of international finance. I have mentioned something about Mr. Borden. He may be a good lawyer, and I have not attacked his reputation as such. I said, too, that he had collected funds for his party—perhaps for both major parties—when he was working as controller. I find nothing scandalous in that. People become scandalized over things which ought not to affect them in that way.

But he is now the adviser to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). He is the man who was with Ralston, and who belongs to the Dunning-Ralston group in Montreal, the international finance promoters and agents. He is not the kind of man who should be adviser to the leader of a great political party—and just on account of that fact.

He was controller of controllers here in Ottawa, a position he should never have had, but he did have it, because of the influence of Ralston, who was sitting with him at Barclay's.

Who is the chairman of the National Liberal Federation? It is Gordon Fogo, a former law partner of Ralston, who was assistant to Borden in the Department of Munitions and Supply, holding the position of acting controller of controllers. I want to get rid of them. I want to clean out the party of all these rascals and pirates. I want the Canadian people to know where we are. The party should have a definite policy. If our policy is to be a Canadian policy, let it be a Canadian policy throughout Canada. If it is to be an imperialistic policy, let us make it an imperialistic policy also in Quebec, so that the people of Quebec will not be deceived when the election comes around. That is enough for to-day, but it will be continued at some other time.

Mr. W. D. WYLIE (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate at this late date I find myself in the same position as many hon. members who have spoken during the past two days. I had not intended to take part in this debate, but since our rules were more or less broken on Tuesday I decided that I might just as well get into the debate with the rest of the speakers from the different parties.

No reference was made in the speech from the throne to several matters of paramount importance to Canada, and in particular to western Canada. We have listened to many important speeches during this debate and have heard many important issues discussed, but I wish to touch upon two matters which, in my opinion, are most important to the people of my riding, to southern Alberta and to Canada as a whole. It is not that I think the other matters are not important; I certainly think they are important and I may take an opportunity of discussing them at some later date in the session.

I am confining my remarks mainly to two issues, irrigation and the trans-Canada highway. Those issues affect the future development, prosperity and economic welfare of southern Alberta in particular and of Canada as a whole. I wish to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) for the interest he has taken in the irrigation of western Canada and in particular for the meeting which he held in Medicine Hat in January. My only regret is that I was unable to be at that meeting. I was in the hospital at the time, but from all reports I have heard that meeting was certainly one of the best meetings they ever held in Medicine Hat. There is no one better qualified to discuss irrigation than the hon. member for Davenport. I am sure he knows every coulee and where every dam should be put in connection with either the St. Mary's-Milk river project or the Redcliff-Ronalane project.

The residents of the drought area are fully aware of the fact that irrigation is the only solution of our crop-failure-due-to-drought problems, and that is the reason why more extensive efforts to obtain irrigation have been made during the past year than ever before. It might be well to enumerate for the information of the house some of the support which has been given to this effort during the past year. I shall mention only a few of the organizations that have supported this matter, but I believe they should be mentioned. These are:

South Alberta Water Conservation Council
Alberta Board of Trade and Agriculture
Medicine Hat City Council
Medicine Hat Branch of the Canadian Legion
Medicine Hat Chamber of Commerce
Medicine Tat Trades and Labour Council
Redcliff public meeting
Bow Island Board of Trade
Executive of the U.F.A. and Farmers' Union
Lethbridge Board of Trade

Various clubs in Medicine Hat as well as other organizations and individuals have given their support to these irrigation projects. I should like to read one paragraph from a resolution which was passed by the Medicine Hat trades and labour council, because this will give the house an idea of just how the residents of that area are looking at this project. They said:

> We have given billions to Britain and other European countries, 750 million to the Export Credit Act, 750 million to Bretton Woods. Increased the capital of the T.C.A. from 5 million to 25 million. Now surely we can give to our own people enough to give them the horn of plenty, that they deserve.

I wish to state right away that the Medicine Hat trades and labour council do not object to the money we have given to the people of Britain. Those people have given much more than we in this country have given, as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) has just said in his most interesting speech. Simply because it is mentioned in their resolution does not mean that they are opposed to the idea. They believe that when we can do that for other countries there is no reason why we cannot do something for our own people. That is why they say that in their resolution. Irrigation is the formula for an all-out Canadian prosperity. The east is dependent upon the west for its prosperity. It is in the interests of the dominion as a whole to place the prairies on a sound financial footing.

The projects most urgently needed could be undertaken first. As other areas are brought into greater and more suitable productiveness, the drain upon the government for drought relief would be lessened. The gains at first may be small, but as the areas under the ditch are increased the field of prosperity will be steadily enlarged and the need for assistance correspondingly lowered.

The St. Mary's-Milk river and Redcliff-Ronalave projects can be described as an urgent need owing to deficient rainfall in that area and the feasibility of both projects. The provision of work when needed is important but this should not be the primary objective. The main purpose of water conservation and irrigation in southern Alberta is to rehabilitate the farming industry in that area. That is why such strong protests were made when it was suggested that both projects be placed in the category of an employment stop-gap. It is true, however, that the construction of irrigation works provides jobs, which is an added reason for the early completion of both projects, in view of the prevailing unemployment situation.

Mr. Speaker, the year 1945, like so many in the past, was another drought year. The devastating effects were extensive and far-reaching. This, following two years of drought, which were almost as serious, brings severe hardships to many farmers, and hundreds of farmers find themselves in the same position as they were in, in 1937, in having to dispose of their cattle herds. While stock prices were good, the majority of cattle were sold as feeders, which of course meant a loss to the farmers. Many cattle in that area have died this winter on account of the feed shortage. Feed was hard to get and had to be hauled long distances, mainly from the irrigation districts of Brooks and the Taber-Lethbridge area. The development of the projects mentioned would change this situation materially. The placing of the available water on these lands is the finest type of crop insurance against drought. For a long time we in the south have known that we have the natural garden climate of western Canada. This area can be made into one of the great producing areas of this continent. All that is required is to make water available when and where it is needed. Experience has proven that we cannot depend upon natural rainfall to provide sufficient moisture for the growing crops. There is, however, sufficient water running to useless and inexcusable waste down the South Saskatchewan river to irrigate almost a million acres of the best land in Alberta, and still have plenty of water for various projects in Saskatchewan, also water for Moose Jaw, which the hon. member for that city mentioned in his able speech last week.

With reference to the St. Mary's-Milk river project, international waters are involved and Canada has long neglected to make beneficial use of its share, while the United States of America has built reservoir facilities to store practically the whole flow. Unless we make a more combined effort to use our rightful share, the United States might claim this on the basis of prior use. We must remember that every drop of water which runs to the sea without rendering a commercial return is a public waste.

I have an illustrated pamphlet prepared by the eastern irrigation district at Brooks, of which E. W. Brunsden is general manager. I am sure most hon. members received this pamphlet. It is interesting and shows what can be accomplished by turning water on the soil.

On the first page it shows a lovely field of sugar beets and says, "This proven irrigation project has everything a food processor seeks." Then it shows part of the irrigation works, the Bassano dam, also the Brooks aqueduct, with two miles of continuous concrete conduit. It also shows the flume at Lathom, a fifteen-foot semi-circular wood stave, half a mile long, and various other pictures of interest. It gives the hours of sunshine. I do not think it is necessary for me to describe the pamphlet in detail because I am sure most hon. members have received a copy. It is a well known fact, of course, that under our present system of dry land farming out there we get too much sunshine and not enough rainfall. It also shows the long frost-free period, which of course is beneficial to irrigation. The southern part of the province has the longest frost-free period in the west, due no doubt to the Chinooks that we get in that part. The productivity of the soil in that area is also shown, not only in the Brooks area but in the south. It also tells about the specialized crops that may be produced to get away from wheat farming. It says this about specialized crops:

> The farmers of the eastern irrigation district are not one-crop farmers. They long have practised diversification. Potatoes, alfalfa and sweet clover for hay and seed; sugar beets, radish, beetroot, mustard and peas for seed are among the crops successfully grown over periods of years in addition to all of the cereal and coarse grains and flax.

It also mentions the high quality of the live stock of all types produced in that district. This is a natural result in an irrigation district where there is an abundance of feed.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the house rises may I ask the hon. member to write to the publisher of the pamphlet to which he has just referred and ask that a copy be sent to each member of the house. I did not get a copy, and the hon. member to my left and the hon. member in front of me did not receive a copy. It would do no harm and might do a lot of good.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WYLIE: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was dealing with an illustrated pamphlet showing what can be grown in the district of southern Alberta under irrigation. There are a few more points in this pamphlet which I wish to touch upon, such as types of food processing plants. For example, they have vegetable canning, and I understand they are getting a new factory this year which will mean a great deal to that district. There are small fruit canning and quick-freeze plants, to which farmers can take their fruit, have it quickly frozen and take it out as they wish, using it as fresh fruit. There are also pickle packing establishments for cucumbers, cauliflower, onions and so on, and there are also meat processing plants. They have not a sugar beet factory at the present time but have high hopes of securing one in the near future. There is a move on now whereby, by next fall, they expect to have a plant.

The farmers of that area are so convinced of this that they went out and raised $600,000 in a matter of a few days to assist in building this factory, and they hope that the same results will not befall this undertaking that happened to the last factory which they planned on building.

There are also dairy products and poultry packing plants. That all goes with irrigation. Then, last but not least, this pamphlet shows the wonderful homes of the farmers in that area. There are twelve hundred farm families at present in the area and their homes would be a credit to any district. In my travels around this part of Canada I have found very few homes that compare with those in the irrigation district. By that I do not mean that the homes in the west are as large as they are here. They are more of the cottage type. But they are all painted and have lovely lawns, with beautiful shrubs surrounding the farms, so that they are a credit to the district.

The last page shows a picture of the Bassano dam, which would be of interest to many members of the house. I am sorry that all members have not received that pamphlet. I was under the impression that they had all received it until the contrary was called to my attention by the hon. member for Davenport.

In "Alberta's eastern irrigation district, where water works wonders," the charge for water is approximately $1.60 to $1.75 per irrigable acre, so that the cost is not so high considering what the farmers produce.

The pamphlet goes on to show what is raised on the irrigated land, giving the number of bushels per acre and other information. I hope that more of these pamphlets will be circulated in the near future.

Going from the irrigation district to the drought area, which comprises most of my riding, you run into an entirely different situation. You pass into an area where during the last three years the average yield of wheat has been less than four bushels to the acre. The Minister of Agriculture can very easily verify this by reference to the amounts paid to the farmers through the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Not only that; there are farmers who have stock that is in poor shape for the reason that no feed has been grown. The homes are not so good—that is, the majority of the homes—as in the irrigation district. They lack trees around the buildings and also windbreaks, and that would mean a great deal in southern Alberta as well as in southern Saskatchewan, where we have plenty of Chinook winds. It would tend to break the wind not only in the summer but also in the winter.

In passing, I wish to make a few remarks regarding the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That act has helped, of course, the majority of the farmers in this area. If it had not been for the act they would have found themselves very much the same as in 1937, back on relief, not only as regards direct relief but in the matter of agricultural advances as well. However, many changes are necessary in the act, and I hope we shall have an opportunity, before the session ends, to discuss some of the important revisions that should be made.

The question of farm products prices has been dealt with thoroughly by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and I do not think it is necessary for me to go over that again. The prosperity of Medicine Hat depends entirely on this irrigation system. There are many businesses waiting until the irrigation system is developed and, after all, we cannot blame the businessmen, because we have had promises of irrigation for twenty-five or thirty years and not very much has been done.

I was talking to a garage man the other day and he was interested in irrigation projects. He said to me, "If I were sure of irrigation being developed in this area I would increase my establishment; I would build a garage twice this size." That is only one example of conditions in Medicine Hat at the present time. During the war we had No. 34 S.F.T.S. and the prisoner of war camp also brought many residents into the city so that conditions were improved somewhat. Now, however, these are both being closed. As a matter of fact, one has been closed and the closing of the other will soon follow. When that happens Medicine Hat will revert to what it was before the war.

We hope that what the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) mentioned is correct, that we can expect a fifty per cent reduction in our taxes this year. We shall wait and see with interest. I agree with the leader of this party who, in his able speech, suggested that the personal income tax schedule should be revised and the income of married couples be made exempt up to $2,000 and of single persons up to $1,200. That is long past due, and we hope that the Minister of National Revenue meant what he said when he said that we would have a reduction of fifty per cent in our taxes.

The seriousness of the drought problem is well known to all Canadians, and during the last election campaign every political party promised its full support to irrigation. That is the one thing upon which we were and still are united. However, it remains for the party in power to show action in this respect and fulfil the election promises. We appreciate the steps already taken by the government in making a start on the St. Mary's-Milk river project, but let us go forward with all the power at our command to develop the irrigation projects.

I have another subject of paramount importance not only to the people of southern Alberta but to the people of Canada as a whole, namely, the trans-Canada highway. Canada requires an adequate highway system built around a hard surface trans-Canada highway equal to any one of the many excellent transcontinental highways in the United States. Otherwise Canada stands to lose her fair share of the tourist trade. This matter has received a great deal of attention by many of the citizens and organizations in and around Medicine Hat. We feel that adequate highways connecting one part of Canada with another are as essential in this day and age as railroads were in the early days of the west.

The dominion government recognized its responsibility in the building of railroads. Extension grants have been made to railways ever since confederation and many lines were built by government funds, because we were told our national economy required it.

During the war the dominion government expended large sums of money in the development of airports. The dominion government has never committed itself to a programme of highway construction; the only effort made by the government has been in the form of relief projects to create employment. I contend that roads, as public works and essential means of communication, should not be relegated to the status of relief projects. Neither railroads nor airports have been constructed in this manner, and roads are just as essential to-day to the welfare and economic development of Canada as are railroads or airports.

In Alberta we have some very good highways that are so located that they will make very fine feeder lines to connect with the trans-Canada. No. 1 highway is not in the best of shape at present, no doubt owing to the fact that the provincial government is waiting to see what developments are going to be made by the dominion government. Past experience has taught us that many provincial governments are not financially able to reconstruct highways of such high standards through sparsely populated areas, and if we depend on the provinces to build such a highway system it is not likely that it will ever be completed.

The demand for good roads from the populated areas is so great that every province is kept busy trying to satisfy the urgent demand made upon it. It is also apparent that no uniform type of highway will be constructed across Canada if the matter is left entirely in the hands of the individual provinces. Briefly, I might mention why the dominion government should take an active interest in the development of an adequate highway system. It would foster and encourage communication between the several provinces of our dominion with a view to developing a national spirit. It would attract United States tourists and thus enable us to capitalize on the favourable advertising we have received during the past six years. Tourist traffic from the United States affects the pocketbook of every Canadian citizen. One of the finest exports we have to offer the United States is our scenery, our hunting and our fishing. It could be worth hundreds of millions of dollars to Canada. Prior to the war the tourist business had been developed into one of our largest industries, and it can be developed into our largest industry, out of which every man, woman and child in this country will receive some benefit either directly or indirectly.

In his speech the other night the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) mentioned the tourist traffic and said this:

> Situated as we are, the tourist industry is of vital importance.

It is just as important to us in the west. Then he went on to show the number of tourists who had entered through the port of Windsor. In 1945 almost five and a half millions of United States tourists entered through the port of Windsor. That means a lot to the economy of any country.

Large sums have been spent in laying out across our dominion one of the finest systems of national parks in the world; but in most instances there are no adequate highways upon which motorists may reach them, and there is definitely no system connecting these parks. One would almost think they were created only for the people living in the immediate vicinity. Our national parks compare favourably with, and some surpass, all other parks in North America. In addition, people will seek cooler places to spend vacations during hot weather if they have good highways over which to drive. We have been assured by experts on tourist travel from the United States that the tourist traffic is governed entirely by the type of roads supplied by Canada. People naturally drive north to reach a cooler climate during the summer months, and if our roads are comparable with those south of the United States boundary they would continue on to Canada and spend their vacations here. Tourist traffic from the United States is so important to our national economy that our highway system should become a national project.

Of all the peoples of the world the citizens of the United States are the most travel-minded, and the opportunity presented to Canadians should be fostered and assisted in every way possible by the Dominion government. The proposals involve a change of policy in so far as the dominion government is concerned, but the matter is of such vital importance to our national welfare that I believe all the pressure possible should be brought to bear to ensure our so-called progressive country being provided with an adequate highway system which will be not only a credit to Canada but a great national asset enriching every citizen.

In closing, may I say that in the past we have always been told that the reason why the irrigation projects had not been completed is lack of money; but surely in view of the hundreds of millions of dollars given and lent, also credits to other nations, it should not be asking too much to ask the government to spend a few million dollars on our own people to develop our own country. Abundant production and the successful distribution of goods constitute our greatest assurance against any inflation policy.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I realize, Mr. Speaker, that this debate has gone on for quite a while, and that hon. members are getting a bit impatient. However, may I point out that from the province of Manitoba, which has seventeen members in this house, only four have so far spoken, and one of those four has taken more time than the other three put together. So that I do not think we are taking a disproportionate share of the time of this house.

The fact of the matter is that I would not have risen to speak at all had I felt that the speech from the throne had covered all the subjects in which I was interested. But to my mind it was disappointing. It failed to face up to such things as full production, full employment, and housing; it failed also to make any provision for better old age pensions at a lower age, and for relief in the lower income brackets from income tax. Because of these failures I feel it is my duty to point out what, in my opinion, should be done to remedy these defects.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the speech from the throne was disappointing. But this was not surprising. After all, we have to realize that it comes from a government which believes in private enterprise and it is a private enterprise speech from the throne. I was at a loss to understand why hon. members to my right made any objection at all to this type of speech from the throne; in fact I was amazed at the attack made upon it by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in his first speech on the address, because I believe—my hon. friends will correct me if I am wrong—they are supposed to be the champions of private enterprise in this house. They set themselves up to be so. I would point out that if ever there was a private enterprise speech from the throne, this is it, and they should be happy about it. But they are not happy about it. Why? Because I believe they realize, as the rest of us do, that the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne will not face up to the situation as it is, and I think they realize also, although they may not be ready to admit it, that it will not be long before the people of this country will have to make a choice between two types of economic system. They will have to choose between the private enterprise economy of scarcity, which operates for private profit, and the public enterprise economy of abundance, operating for the public benefit. When the time comes for that choice I believe there will be more reason for the official opposition to feel unhappy. But in the meantime we are going to operate under a private enterprise system. The government feels it has a mandate to carry on under that system for its present term of office and is going to attempt to make it work. That being so, I wish to make some suggestions this evening which I think will be of some assistance to the government in bringing about some changes which are necessary at this time.

At the very beginning of the session the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The question asked what the Minister of Agriculture is prepared to do in order to remove the obstacles which are preventing full production in the field of agriculture. In reply the minister stated that he was not aware of any obstacles in the way of full production. If he is not aware of any obstacles I think it is my duty as a member of this house to point out what, in my opinion, are some of the obstacles which should be removed, because I feel there are some.

In the first place we have heard a great deal, through the press and otherwise, of a falling off of hog and dairy production. We heard a lot about it to-day from an hon. member to my right. In order to put it in statistical form, I have here a statement from the cooperative live stock producers of Dauphin. It will be remembered that last year I put some figures on record from the same organization. They point out that in 1944 from that shipping point 7,302 hogs were shipped, while in 1945 from the same shipping point only 4,085 hogs were shipped, which represents a drop at this one point of 3,217 hogs, or a percentage of loss of 44·05. I believe that the same story could be told right across western Canada, and I would not be surprised if there is not a similar record as far as eastern Canada is concerned. The story of the falling off of dairy production has been told in this house, and I will not repeat it, but I should like to make a suggestion. The minister may say, "All right; hog production is falling off, and dairy production is falling off; what are you going to do about it? How are you going to make the farmers produce more hogs, milk more cows, produce more butter, and so on?" I say, human nature being what it is, there must be some motive for everything we do. We do things because we feel impelled through some motive to do them. In order to provide a motive for greater production, something must be done to make that production pay, to make the farmer feel it is worth his time and labour to produce that type of product.

One obstacle which, I believe, needs to be removed is the unfair system of income tax to which the farmer has been subjected. I do not know how many farmers with whom I have talked in the last few months have told me the same story. It is that they have gone out of hog production and the production of dairy produce to a great extent because this is the type of work which they have to do before breakfast and after supper, and instead of being paid, as is usual elsewhere, time and a half for overtime, they get docked so much more income tax. So that I make this practical suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture, or to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley); they can fight it out between themselves. For every hog which is produced and marketed through the regular channels of trade the farmer should receive $5 off his income tax. That would provide a motive to keep up hog production. It would also defeat the black market. I have before me several clippings, including one from the Lethbridge Herald, and another from the Western Producer. I shall not take the time of the house to read them, except the headlines, from which hon. members can pretty well conclude what they are about. The first is entitled, "Where the bacon goes", and it goes on to point out that it is not going through regular channels; the other is headed, "Black marketers invade the prairies", and it goes on to show why a black market is developing. These are the statements of these papers. They are not mine. I do not know to what extent they are true. But to my mind there is danger, if the price remains too low, if the income tax is not adjusted, that much of the bacon and other pork products will not go through the regular channels of trade and will not reach the people we want it to reach.

I may also incidentally point out, in case the treasury board is worrying about the financial end of it, that to knock off $5 per hog from the farmers' income tax would not cost the treasury any money, or, if it did, it would be very little. The reason for that is that the government at the present time is not collecting income tax on hogs which are not being produced and therefore it cannot lose any money on them. As I have pointed out, at the one shipping point of Dauphin there was a drop of 3,217 hogs between 1944 and 1945. That means 3,217 hogs on which the government will not get any income tax, because they were not produced and not shipped. So that by knocking off so much income tax as regards each hog you are not going to lose money.

I wish also to endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) that the cream cheque should also be exempt from income tax. I do not need to repeat what I said, that milk and cream production is the type of work which is done before breakfast and after supper. It is not congenial work, as I have good reason to know. Therefore some adjustment should be made to provide greater reward for that type of production.

We come now to grain production. A great deal has been said by the leader of the opposition about the nutritional value of bread as compared with meat. I would agree with him that bread has a high nutritional value, and that possibly per pound it has more value than meat. But there is an old saying that man does not live by bread alone. I believe that anyone who knows anything about nutrition will agree with me that you cannot feed people on bread alone and expect them to be healthy. There are lacking in bread certain things which can be found in meat—fats of all kinds, pork products and bacon products. Therefore we must have a certain percentage of meat and pork products on the market if we are going to keep the people of this country and of European countries, including Great Britain, in good health.

I would say, therefore, it is just as important to have hogs and dairy production on the market as it is to have grain. This does not mean that we do not need more wheat. After reading the speeches of the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Agriculture I was struck by their length, and by the great number of figures and statistics contained in them. I came to the conclusion that they were dangerous speeches, and for this reason, that if the farmers in the west attempted to follow the instruction contained therein, we would be in great danger of not having any wheat production in the next year, because by the time the farmers went through that mass of statistics the time for seeding would be over.

I cannot see the value of the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Agriculture engaging in a verbal duel in the House of Commons, and taking up three or four hours' time in doing so—not that I am complaining about that at all. But I cannot see the value of their telling the farmer what he shall do in connection with seeding because, after all, in the last analysis, the farmer is going to make his own decision as to how much grain he will sow. I have lived among farmers and have done some farming in my lifetime, and I have yet to know a farmer who goes to Hansard to find what the Minister of Agriculture had to say, before he pulls out his seed drill in the springtime.

Every farmer has to develop his own farming practice and his own farming unit. He has to put in the acreage which will fit in with his plans. Whatever the Minister of Agriculture may say, and no matter how the leader of the opposition may contradict the minister, these circumstances will not make any difference so far as making a decision as to how many acres of wheat are to be sown is concerned.

But I know what will make a difference. If we want to have greater wheat production or grain production of any kind, then I submit that there is only one way in which we can get that greater production. Apart altogether from the weather, we must provide a price which will establish a motive for the farmers to produce grain. I do not know exactly what the price policy of the leader of the opposition is, although he did speak twice in the debate. Unfortunately, however, in his second speech he usually contradicts what he says in his first one. But it seems to me that he advocates a price of $1.80; and so that hon. members will not think I am making it up, I shall quote from Hansard. At page 275 we find these words of the leader of the opposition:

> In the meantime I would change the stupid policy which keeps the price of our export wheat 40 or 50 cents below the world price, and either fix it at $1.80 instead of $1.55, or let the world price prevail until the shortage is corrected.

Let me point out that the leader of the opposition has described as a stupid policy one which keeps the price of wheat 40 or 50 cents below the world price. If one adds 40 or 50 cents to $1.55 he finds that it brings the price up to $1.95 or $2.05. Yet the leader of the opposition advocates $1.80, which is still below the world price, and is therefore still a stupid policy.

Mr. FRASER: That is only your say so.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Well, I am reading it from Hansard. Even though the farmer is interested in the ceiling price or the highest price that he can get for his wheat—and that is undeniable—I believe that through bitter experience he has learned that it is far more important for him to know the lowest guaranteed price he may expect to get. He has seen times when wheat jumped up to $2 a bushel, and other times when it has fallen to 20 cents. So that the farmer wants to know, first, the guaranteed price the government is willing to give for the next four or five or more years.

I believe, if we want to get greater grain production, we might use a simple formula, namely that of letting the present ceiling price become the floor price. Under those conditions the farmers will produce grain for the next four or five years—that is, if they are sure that they are not going to produce at a low price.

It is far more important to have a guaranteed price of $1.55 as a floor than to let the wheat price go up to $1.80 or $2, and put the farmer back into a speculative market, and take a chance on it again.

Another obstacle that can be removed from production is the matter of gasoline prices. Early in this session I took occasion to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) whether he would reconsider the order which has been made permitting an increase of two cents a gallon on the price of gasoline. His answer was that the matter has been given consideration, and that he was not prepared to make any further promise.

I know the farmers are dissatisfied with that price increase. I do not think I can find better words to emphasize that dissatisfaction than to read a letter, a copy of which was signed by over a hundred farmers in my constituency, and sent to me. This is addressed to the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, and says:

> Sir:
> As a farmer trying to help feed a hungry world I wish to vigorously protest against the proposed advance in the price of gasoline, as it is another brake on the wheels of industry and a deterrent to agricultural production. If we are to avoid the hazards of inflation it seems to me that the government should be the last to countenanace the proposed advance of the oil corporations who have made huge profits all through the war years, and are well able to stand on their own feet in the transition to normal times.
>
> The farmer of western Canada has been asked to bolster international good will by selling his wheat greatly below world prices. Bacon and other products over a bargain counter.
> The Canadian consumer is getting his flour greatly below world wheat value and the eastern feeder of live stock is being subsidized at the western farmer's expense.

If I have anything left over in a good year the income tax agent is on hand to attach the money that I have been trying for years to get to improve my humble home and surroundings, the remodeling of which is long past due. Now the government wants me to help out the poor oil baron. This is about the last straw. Have the legislators forgotten the recent kick in the pants they received when they tried to raise the tariff on certain steel products. The western farmer has not.

The sit-down strike is in progress and will soon reach disastrous proportions if something is not done and done quickly.

The Minister of Finance did not lay before the house an accounting of why it is necessary to permit oil companies to raise their prices. He did mention a subsidy, and made it appear as if the western provinces were the only ones receiving subsidies. As a matter of fact, in the last year the government spent over $103 million in subsidies; and I state, therefore, that $3,500,000 to western farmers does not loom up quite so large in comparison.

I wish to mention another obstacle which should be removed in connection with implements for war veterans. There is a certain class of war veteran who is not able to obtain the farm implements which he needs because he cannot take advantage of the provisions of the land act. I refer to the veteran who, instead of buying land under the act, has bought it with his own money or has had land given to him, perhaps by his father. Under the act he is not eligible for a grant with which to buy farm equipment and therefore is under a handicap. I hope this situation will be remedied.

I should like to point out to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act does not operate to the advantage of all farmers. I mentioned last year the matter I have in mind and hoped there would be some change made, but apparently nothing has yet been done. I have a letter which I received to-day from the deputy minister of agriculture in connection with an area in my constituency which was damaged by hail. One sentence in that letter reads:

Township 29-20-W1, R.M. of Mossey river, was found by the board of review to have an average wheat yield of 8·3 bushels per acre; therefore, the board of review declared the township ineligible.

There have been many areas damaged by hail where the wheat crop averaged over eight bushels per acre, and therefore the particular township would not be eligible for prairie farm assistance. I would point out to the minister that it is almost impossible to find an area damaged by hail where there will be a large, wide belt of damage. This act may be suitable for relieving drought conditions, but it certainly does not work in the case of hail damage. I believe some provision should be made to provide for relief on an individual basis, say from section to section rather than from township to township. Then the individual farmer whose crops had been damaged by hail would not have to depend upon his neighbour's crops being damaged in order to obtain assistance from the government. It would almost appear that if there had been a little more hail in this particular township the farmers would have been better off, because then the average yield would have been .3 bushels per acre less and they would have then been eligible for prairie farm assistance.

I should like to touch briefly upon the matter of industrial production. This subject has been covered by other hon. members, but I wish to say that the government is going to have to do some tall explaining to the people of this country. At the present time there are over a quarter of a million unemployed. There is also a great shortage of consumer goods; houses are needed at a time when materials for building those houses exist in Canada. I would not be saying this if I did not feel that the government had promised the people of this country full employment. As was pointed out the other day by an hon. member, before the election took place we saw large signs nailed up on fences and telephone posts saying, "Jobs for all" in letters about six feet high.

I refrained from saying anything about this during the last session because I felt the government should be given a breathing spell after the war in order to readjust industry and put things in order. But in my opinion they have had sufficient time to get the wheels of industry turning. If they are not able to provide full employment when there is such a shortage of goods of all kinds, when there is such a need all over the world for the products that we can produce, what prospect is there for full employment, let us say five years from now?

I feel a little apprehensive about the whole matter because I am afraid we are back on that downhill run that we took in 1930. Unless the government can figure out some way to make private industry provide jobs for all, then I think the only alternative is to plan for full employment and full production under public enterprise as was done during the war.

In conclusion, I wish to touch upon a question that was brought up in this house during last session and again at this session. I hope this is not a controversial matter because it does not enter into party politics. I refer to the displaced persons and refugees in Europe. As a member nation of UNO we have a responsibility to discharge. As a member of the British commonwealth of nations we have a tradition to live up to. The responsibility that we have as a member nation of the united nations is clearly set out in the charter of the united nations. I intend to quote directly from that charter in order that I may have for the plea I intend to make a basis that is authentic. One of the objectives set out in the preamble is:

> To reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small.

I agree heartily with that. Then in article 1, section 2, these words appear:

> To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples.

Again I am glad to agree with that. Then in section 3 of the same article there are these words:

> To achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character.

These quotations appear in the charter of the united nations which has been endorsed by this house and which has received, I believe, the whole-hearted support of every hon. member. It is upon these three quotations that I wish to base my plea. I do not intend to go over this question of displaced persons and refugees because it has been fully explained in this house. I only want to point out that there are a great many of these unfortunate people in Europe who have to turn to someone for moral and material assistance. I do not know to whom they can better turn than to a member of the united nations. I do not think we will back up on the position we took when we endorsed the united nations charter, when we undertook to extend democratic and human rights, the rights of freedom and liberty to all the peoples of the earth.

While UNRRA is doing a splendid job in Europe, it has certain limitations as far as displaced persons and refugees are concerned. The provisions governing UNRRA state plainly that it is to deal with constituted nations. That is, the organization is set up in such a way that all nations contribute what they can, and then those who need assistance receive that assistance through the regular channels of their governments. But we must realize that there are perhaps several million people in Europe to-day who cannot truthfully say that they have a nation, who because of their political or religious beliefs or for some other reason find themselves not only homeless but nationless. UNRRA is limited in what it can do for those people. It is true that the Red Cross has come in to fill the gap and has done a wonderful job, a job which will be remembered for generations to come, but that organization also has its limitations; it cannot do all that it would like to do.

As I said, we have a responsibility as a member nation of the united nations. We also have a tradition to uphold as a member of the British commonwealth of nations. The tradition that has been built up in the British commonwealth of nations, especially in Great Britain, the mother of the commonwealth, is one which will go down in history, not only for generations but for centuries to come. One of the reasons for the greatness of Great Britain and the British commonwealth of nations has been and remains that spirit of tolerance, that insistence on the other fellow's rights as well as your own, and a readiness to help out people who have become political or religious refugees. I think, if we accept the premise that all peoples on this earth have a right to believe as they please, to think what they like and say what they like, then we cannot but agree that the greatness of a nation is measured by the degree of tolerance and the degree of freedom and the lack of discrimination that it shows among all its peoples. I believe that Great Britain occupies the place in world history and in the minds of the peoples of the world that she does to-day chiefly because of this one quality, which has been her greatest quality, the spirit of tolerance and the spirit of freedom which it has been willing to extend to all people. As a member of the British commonwealth of nations, Canada, I believe, can take a lead in this matter.

I have said once before, and I repeat, that we should take our share of refugees into this country if we can possibly do so. I wish to make it very clear, as I have on other occasions, that I am not at all interested and have no wish to drag into this discussion any political implications. If we are going to help the people of Europe in a moral or material way I believe that we shall help them best by allowing them to settle their own political differences among themselves, because by the very nature of things we are too far removed to understand all the intricacies of their political differences. So that I say I am not looking at this question at all from a political angle but purely from a humanitarian point of view as one who voted for the adoption of the united nations charter.

I believe that we can help by accepting into this country our share of refugees. I know there is a hesitancy on the part of the government to do this, perhaps for two reasons. There is the fear that it may have political repercussions because all types of opinions have been expressed on this matter, and there is also hesitancy because of the unemployment situation in this country. I have letters on file from the immigration department in which they express doubt whether it would be good policy to bring in people when our own employment situation is not of the best.

But I wish to make a concrete proposal to the government, in which I believe there will be no political implications and which will involve no danger of putting anyone in this country out of a job. The suggestion is not original with me; it was made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum). It is this, that we bring to this country, let us say to start with, 10,000 children of displaced persons and refugees, who from the very nature of things are the most innocent and most unfortunate victims of the war and its aftermath. Let people in this country who are willing and in a position to do so, take these children into their homes and bring them up as young Canadians. Let them stay here at least for a while. There may be some who after staying here for a number of years may apply for permission to remain permanently, and I have no doubt that will be true of the great majority. There may be others who, for personal reasons, or sentimental attachments, may wish, after staying here for a number of years, to go back to Europe. Both of these groups will be of great help to this country. Those who stay here will have been brought up in the spirit of Canadianism, and will have grown up under our laws and will be perhaps the most grateful type of Canadian that we can have, because they will realize that we have come to their help when they needed it most. Those who go back would also be a great help to us, because they will be ambassadors of good will of the very best type. Can one imagine any better people to go back to Europe, perhaps to those dark spots where the light of freedom and democracy has not yet penetrated, than young people who have grown up in this country and learned something of the ways of tolerance and freedom in a democracy and of the things we hold dear in this country? Back in Europe they can preach the gospel of friendship to Canada. I cannot imagine any better kind of advertising or any better ambassadors of good will that we could have. It would be far better than sending out Canadians who have grown up into adult life in this country, not knowing European ways and not being able to compare or contrast conditions in the two countries. Therefore I make the suggestion that we allow near relatives or close friends in this country, who are in a financial position to do so, to bring in children of displaced persons or refugees and give them a home and an education and a Canadian upbringing, something that will be for the benefit both of this country and the continent of Europe.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a word. I do not intend to continue the discussion that has taken place in this debate. I have not spoken on the motion and am therefore entitled to speak at this time. All I wish to say, however, is a word to hon. members concerning the motion that is now before the house; a word in relation thereto which has an immediate bearing on the evolution of our parliamentary practice.

The motion that is now before the house is:

> That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada: May it please Your Excellency:
> We His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

Hon. members will see that the motion is simply a word of thanks to His Excellency for the speech which His Excellency addressed to both houses in opening the present session of parliament, nothing more and nothing less. It is identical in style and words with the address which over many years has been employed at Westminster.

I do not know what hon. gentlemen opposite are laughing at; I am simply stating something that is wholly obvious. Amendments have been presented to this address on three occasions in the course of the debate, each expressing a certain want of confidence in the government. All three have been rejected. The house has discussed those amendments to the address and all of them have been rejected. There remains now only the motion which is a word of thanks to the governor general for his courtesy in presenting the house with a speech which would enable it to open its proceedings—a word of thanks for that particular courtesy expressed in the form of an address, this being the appropriate manner in which to approach the sovereign or his representative.

The custom in the British house has been to adopt the address without any division. The earlier practice was to adopt the address without any previous amendment, being moved. The custom of adopting the address without amendment has altered of recent years and amendments have from time to time been presented. But the parliamentary practice, generally, has been to adopt the address, without any division for both houses to adopt it unanimously.

I wish to quote to the house certain authorities in support of the statement I have just made. I have here "On Parliamentary Government in England," by Alpheus Todd, volume II, second edition. At page 363 hon. members will find the following:

> It has now become a well-established rule, to regard the speech from the throne. and the address in reply thereto, as reciprocal acts of courtesy between the crown and the houses of parliament, and the address itself as the unanimous and respectful expression of the deference with which the house should receive the first communication of the session from the sovereign, and as pledging the house to nothing, save the serious consideration of the matters referred to therein.

> Accordingly, it has gradually become the practice to refrain from moving an amendment to the address in answer to the royal speech, "unless some great political objects were in view, and likely to be attained"; or, unless some assertion were made in the address to which the opposition found it impossible to assent.

That has reference to the amendment to the address. But, as I have just said, the old custom of not even having an amendment to the address moved has altered in the course of the years and amendments have from time to time been brought forward. Once one or more amendments have been brought forward and rejected, the house comes to have only the original motion before it, which motion is in the nature of a reciprocal courtesy, a word of thanks to the representative of the King—that is to say, in this country—or in Great Britain to the King himself.

I refer now to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, third edition, at page 191:

> It is felt that the questions mentioned in the speech can be more conveniently discussed when the house is in full possession of all the information necessary to the consideration of any important subject. Sometimes, however, the house may be called upon to express its opinions at length, and to vote on an amendment to the address, which involves the fate of the government of the day. But under ordinary circumstances the desire is to pass the address with as little delay as possible, and to confine the debate to a general review of the policy of the government, without taking up those specific subjects on which the necessary information is not yet before the house. It is felt desirable, whenever practicable, to allow the address to pass without a division and "be in point of fact the unanimous and respectful expression of the deference with which the houses receive the first communication of the session" from the sovereign or her representativve.

I come now to a much more recent authority, namely, Campion, well recognized authority in the United Kingdom. The volume from which I am about to quote is entitled, "An Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons." I must first quote from page vii of the preface:

> This book was projected merely as a manual of first-aid for new members, but with the friendly connivance and encouragement of my publisher its scope has been considerably enlarged. It now aims at presenting a complete account of the procedure of the House of Commons, on a scale midway between the official Manual of Procedure and May's Parliamentary Practice, with fuller explanations and illustrations than the former and in a shorter and more readily accessible shape than the latter.

On page 83 of this volume will be found a section which deals with the King's speech, "Debate upon the Address in answer to the King's Speech." I should like to quote from that paragraph:

> The address in answer to the king's speech is moved and seconded by two members selected by the Prime Minister, one a representative of a borough,—

That is in England, of course.

> —the other of a county, constituency . . .
> Formerly the address was framed to follow the king's speech paragraph by paragraph, but it is now moved in the form of a short expression of thanks. The debate, which follows, normally falls into two parts: (1) a general debate upon the policy of the government as outlined in the speech, and (2) debate on the amendments moved by the opposition, advocating alternative policies, usually expressed in the form of regret for the omission from the speech of the policies advocated. Some five days are by agreement usually devoted to this debate. At its conclusion the address is voted and ordered to be presented to His Majesty "by such members of the house as are of His Majesty's privy council, or of His Majesty's household."

I have looked through several other authorities and cannot find any which take issue with the statement that it is correct parliamentary practice for the house to approve unanimously the motion to thank the sovereign or his representative for having at the beginning of a session come to meet the members of the two houses, to open their proceedings by a speech from the throne.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Does he then regard the passage of the address, without division, as an expression of confidence in the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Most certainly not.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the whole point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to make that clear. Nor does the passage of the address without division commit any member to anything expressed in the address. An amendment affords an opportunity to take exception to what appears or does not appear in the speech from the throne and to the government's policy, but when amendments which have been proposed are rejected and there is nothing left but the simple expression of thanks to His Majesty or His Majesty's representative for having come to parliament and opened its proceedings, it certainly places the Commons in an anomalous position vis-a-vis the crown to refuse to thank His Majesty or His Majesty's representative for that act of courtesy.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe the general impression here is that voting approval of the address is voting confidence in the government and its policies. That is the general impression in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was my reason for intervening in the debate at this stage. As leader of the house I have a responsibility to the house in matters of this kind and for that reason I speak at the present time. I should regret to see in this parliament, in the evolution of our parliamentary practice, any course that would depart, either in the letter or in the spirit, from what is obviously the right course of procedure to be followed in relations between members of the House of Commons and the sovereign or his representative. Consequently, I have brought this matter to the attention of the house tonight. Probably I must hold myself in part responsible for what has happened where there has been a departure from this practice. Between 1935 and 1940 there were no divisions on the motion in reply to the speech from the throne, the address each year was carried unanimously. Between 1940 and 1945 there were divisions. The record discloses that the house divided on the motion, or rather, that the motion was passed "on division". I believe that arose because a certain number of members on those occasions rose in their places or called "on division", and the Speaker was obliged to record a division. I am perfectly sure that the hon. members, in so doing, did not realize that what in fact they were doing was to request that the representative of the crown be not thanked for having come to open formally the proceedings of parliament.

So far as the British house is concerned, I have looked through the records of the last ten years, and I find that while there have been amendments to this address, which were debated and rejected, no division has been recorded on the motion to thank the crown. There have been some occasions, both in England and also in earlier years in this parliament, on which there have been divisions, but that has been for some exceptional reason.

It is for hon. members to take whatever course they wish. I do not desire to limit the house in the course it may wish to take on the motion now to be put by His Honour the Speaker, but I believe that the correct practice is that, now all amendments have been rejected and disposed of, the house should unanimously agree to thank His Excellency for the speech which he addressed to both houses in opening the present session. May I make it clear that, this being done, it will be understood, and must be understood, that the house is not thereby giving any vote of confidence in the government. The confidence which the government enjoys has been shown on the three motions in the nature of amendments that have already been before the house, debated, and rejected.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes. So far as this motion is concerned, however, it is an act of courtesy in relation entirely to the sovereign or rather to his representative in Canada, and not an expression one way or the other of the confidence which hon. members may or may not have in the government.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The right hon. gentleman has studied the question. Perhaps he will tell the chamber what was the practice and what actually happened during the time he had the honour of leading the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I had the honour of leading the opposition between 1931 and 1935 some members did, I recall, rise on one occasion and there was a recorded division. I have already said that I am prepared to share responsibility for an error in procedure that has developed in that way. But now that I see the correct procedure as clearly as I do, I feel it my duty to bring it to the attention of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. GRAYDON: On division.

Main motion (Mr. Viau) agreed to on division.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The first business after the address has been agreed to is for this house to order that the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General. This additional formal courtesy helps to bear out what I have been saying. I therefore move:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of the house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Standing order 57 reads as follows:

The house will appoint the committees of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's speech.

The committee of supply controls the public expenditure by considering the grants of money that will be required by the government for the services of the year, upon the estimates of expenditure presented by the ministers of the crown.

The committee of ways and means provides the public income raised by the imposition of taxation, and votes the resolutions which authorize the issue out of the consolidated fund of the sums required to meet the grants voted by the committee of supply.

In accordance with standing order 57 I move:

That this house will on Friday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will on Friday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1946-47

A message from His Excellency the Administrator transmitting estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947, was presented by Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

That the message of His Excellency the Administrator, together with the estimates presented this day, be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are all the proposed expenditures in one estimate this time?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. ILSLEY: They are divided into two parts, but they are in the one book.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1946

A message from His Excellency the Administrator transmitting supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1946, was presented by Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before we proceed with this matter may I ask the Minister of Finance whether the supplementary estimates will be available to the members?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are available now.

Mr. GRAYDON: If we are to deal with them to-morrow we should be in possession of them so that we can peruse them as we so desire.

Mr. ILSLEY: They will be available right away.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WAR MEASURES ACT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the War Measures Act been amended in whole or in part by order in council since September 5, 1939?

2. If so, when, in what orders in council and in what particulars?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

INOME TAX—FARMERS—INSPECTORS

Mr. THATCHER:

How many government income tax inspectors have been operating in each province since January 1, 1946, checking farmers' income tax returns?

Mr. McCANN: There are 19 income tax inspectors operating in Canada, in charge of as many districts. Their assessing staff may be checking farmers' returns for the part of the day, week, month or year, or longer period, and also during the same periods may be checking returns of individuals engaged in various kinds of activities. Actually, any firm information on the question is not available.

AIR TRAINING PLAN

Mr. POWER:

With reference to article 7, of the financial agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom to be submitted to the parliament of Canada for ratification,—

1. What was the total cost in money of the British commonwealth air training plan, from its inception on December 17, 1939, to its termination on March 31, 1945?

2. If, as and when article 7, above-mentioned, has been approved, what will have been the contribution in money to the total cost made by each of the partners to the agreement (a) United Kingdom; (b) Australia; (c) New Zealand; (d) Canada?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. $1,757,367,389.86.

2. (a) $54,206,318.22; (b) $92,766,680.00, less $27,585,611.77 mutual aid, $65,181,068.23; (c) $48,440,280.55, less $414,887.08 mutual aid, $48,025,393.47; (d) $1,589,954,609.94.

Note: In addition to the amount shown in (a) above, the United Kingdom contributed aircraft and equipment as follows:

Plan I—
Equipment furnished directly	$ 87,365,032 22
Equipment furnished indirectly through lend-lease account	3,000,000 00
Total	$ 90,365,032 22
Plan II—
Equipment furnished directly	$ 74,895,755 67
Equipment furnished indirectly through lend-lease account	243,030,799 72
Aero-gas and oil furnished indirectly through lend-lease account	37,469,562 94
Total	$355,396,118 33

Mr. POWER:

With reference to article 7, of the financial agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom to be submitted to the parliament of Canada for ratification,—

1. At the beginning of negotiations was the amount claimed by the government of Canada as owed by the government of the United Kingdom with respect to the British commonwealth air training plan greater than the $425,000,000 which it is now agreed to cancel? If so, what was the claim submitted to the conference by the government of Canada?

2. What were the counter-claims, if any, of the government of the United Kingdom which brought about the reduction to $425,000,000?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. None.

2. Answered by No. 1.

Mr. POULIOT:

With reference to the British commonwealth air training plan—1. Did Australia and New Zealand become partners to that plan, and, if so, when?

2. Were all members of parliament notified about it before November 23, 1944?

3. If so, when, where, and by whom?

4. If not, why?

5. Were any trainees from Australia and New Zealand killed or lost on their way to Canada to follow the B.C.A. training, and, if so, when, and who were they?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. (a) Yes; (b) December 17, 1939.

2. Yes.

3. (a) May 20, 1940; (b) House of Commons, Ottawa; (c) Prime Minister of Canada (House of Commons Debates No. 3, Monday, May 20, 1940).

4. N.A.

5. There is no record in this department, the office of the Australian high commissioner or the office of the New Zealand high commissioner of any trainees from Australia and New Zealand killed or lost on their way to Canada to follow the B.C.A.T.P. For further confirmation or otherwise the matter would have to be referred to the air force records office in the respective countries.

BUTTER STORAGE AND SUPPLY, MONTREAL AREA

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was the quantity of butter in storage in Montreal on March 1, 1946?

2. What is the quantity of butter now in storage in the city and district of Montreal?

3. What steps have been taken by the government to assure an adequate supply of butter to the above-mentioned area?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. 2,632,693 lbs.

2. 1,407,616 lbs. (March 15) Montreal city only; figures for Montreal district not available.

3. Reserve stocks of butter in Montreal during the first half of March were relatively higher than in any other large Canadian city. The Wartime Prices and Trade Board are endeavouring to see that the butter supply is equitably distributed throughout Canada.

CANADIAN TROOPS IN JAMAICA

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many Canadian troops are in Jamaica?

2. Were they at or near Kingston, Jamaica, on or about February 20, 1946?

3. Were they held in readiness to intervene in the public utility workers' strike on or about the above date?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. One officer and one other rank.

2. Yes.

3. On 19th February, a wire was received from the officer commanding the Brockville Rifles stating that one company had been ordered to "stand to" as a mobile reserve and that certain technical personnel had been ordered to "stand to" to operate water works and sewage disposal.

On 20th February, special instructions were wired to the officer commanding the Brockville Rifles that Canadian troops could only be used to protect life and property but that there was no objection to assisting in the technical maintenance of public utilities.

In accordance with garrison orders, one rifle company with three carriers was held in readiness as a mobile reserve to aid in the prevention of loss of life and destruction of property and 30 driver mechanics were standing by as operators of public utilities if so required.

Neither of these detachments was used but on 25th February, 1946, one platoon (unarmed) took over third line fire fighting duties at the central fire station to help relieve volunteer firemen who had been on duty for 10 days.

LOANS AND GIFTS TO GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. THATCHER:

1. What is the total dollar value of the loans which Canada has made to Great Britain since September, 1939?

2. What is the total dollar value of the outright gifts which Canada has given to Britain since September, 1939?

3. What is the total of (a) loans, (b) gifts, made by Canada to other nations since September, 1939?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. $700,000,000 under the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, which had been reduced by repayments to $561,279,709.22 on the date the question was asked and which has been further reduced to $538,564,403.57 by a subsequent payment.

2. $1,000,000,000 under the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942.

$2,043,100,000 under War Appropriation (Mutual Aid) Acts according to the accounts as of February 28, 1946.

3. (a) Loans under the Export Credits Insurance Act

	Authorized	Advanced	Balance outstanding March 15, 1946

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics	160,100,000 00
Under War Appropriation Acts
Gift of wheat to Greece	12,633,331 00

Advances to the United Kingdom under Section 3 of the War Appropriation Acts were included in the claims of Canada against the United Kingdom which were offset by claims of the United Kingdom against Canada and the balance of which is to be settled by the payment of $150,000,000 by the United Kingdom to Canada under agreement signed March 6, 1946.

The indebtedness of the United Kingdom to Canada under the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan agreements, the disposition of which is covered by article 7 of the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, was carried in the accounts of Canada as an advance under section 3 of the War Appropriation Acts.

CANADIAN GOODS SUPPLIED TO INDIA STATE RAILWAYS

Mr. POWER:

With reference to the agreement on settlement of war claims between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom to be submitted to the parliament of Canada for ratification,—

1. What is the amount involved under article 3 F, of the said proposed agreement?

2. By what financial process does a debt due to the government of Canada for goods manufactured in Canada and supplied to the India State railways become a potential claim of the United Kingdom against the government of India?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. $48,772,566.27—less any reduction that may result from the renegotiation of the contracts concerned.

2. By the United Kingdom government making payment in full on behalf of the government of India with the agreement of the government of India.

HOUSING—QUEENSWAY SURVEY, EAST OF BURLINGTON

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many types of construction and what kind of houses are being built at the Queensway survey, east of Burlington, under the Veterans' Land Act?

2. What is the cost of construction for each type of house?

3. What is the actual cost to a veteran of each type of house, including water and sewers?

4. What terms are given the veteran?

5. What is the complete cost per unit to the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. All these houses are of frame construction. There are eight different floor plans, three of which are single storey bungalows and five, storey and a half. The houses are of permanent construction, each having full concrete basement, rock wool insulation, hot air heating and fully modern plumbing.

2. Final figures will not be available until the whole project is completed. Construction is being carried out on a cost plus fixed fee of $225 per house. Ninety-three homes are being erected, of which only forty-eight are close to completion. Several months will elapse before the balance are completed. On the basis of those which are close to completion it is estimated that costs of construction will be as follows:

House	Water and sewage	Land	Total
Bungalows—
$ 5,648	$ 334	$ 531	$ 6,513
5,187	334	531	6,052
4,956	334	531	5,821
Storey and a half—
6,067	334	531	6,932
6,018	334	531	6,883
5,829	334	531	6,694
5,698	334	531	6,563
5,991	334	531	6,856

3. The terms of sale to a veteran are set by the formula contained in Section 9, the Veterans' Land Act, which, applied to the estimated costs set out in answer to question 2 above, would be a down payment of 10 per cent of the cost up to $6,000, plus cost in excess of $6,000, and a contract for two-thirds of the cost up to $6,000.

4. Up to twenty-five years with interest at 3½ per cent on the amortization plan.

5. Answered by No. 2 above.

VETERANS LAND ACT—REGINA DISTRICT

Mr. McKAY:

1. What is the number of applications made by the veterans of this war for settlement under the Veterans Land Act in the Regina regional district for (a) small holdings; (b) farm lands?

2. How many of these applications have been (a) rejected; (b) approved?

3. Of the applications approved, how many cases have been actually settled on (a) small holdings; (b) farm lands as of December 31, 1945?

4. Have any applications been approved from areas in southern Saskatchewan known as submarginal?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. Statistical records do not divide applications for qualification into types of establishment proposed by veterans. Total number of applications for qualification up to February 28, 1946, for Regina region: 2,374.

2. (a) Small holdings, None; full time farming, 145. (b) Small holdings, 106; full time farming, 773; Provincial land settlement, 142.

3. Number of applications for financial assistance approved at December 31, 1945; (a) 16; (b) 93.

4. Applications covering the purchase of lands in the drought area of southern Saskatchewan have been approved where veterans have farmed in particular district and know the hazards.

PRINCE RUPERT DRY DOCK

Mr. ARCHIBALD:

What steps have been taken by the government to make use of the Prince Rupert dry dock?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

The Prince Rupert dry dock is owned and operated by the Canadian National Railways. During the war it was used in connection with war-time ship construction. It has now reverted to its original purpose as a facility for the maintenance and repair of vessels.

ROAD BETWEEN ATLIN AND ALASKA HIGHWAY

Mr. ARCHIBALD:

What has been done by the Dominion government to further the completion of the highway between Atlin and Alaska highway?

Mr. GLEN:

Part of this proposed highway is in the province of British Columbia and part is in the Yukon territory. Reconnaissance of the area through which this highway would pass has been made by engineers of the Department of Mines and Resources and there has been an exchange of correspondence between the Department of Mines and Resources and the province of British Columbia in regard to its construction. It is the intention to have a location survey made of the proposed road as soon as possible.

CANADIAN DECLARATION OF WAR—PRESENT RELATIONS WITH FORMER ENEMY COUNTRIES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did Canada declare war on countries other than Germany, Italy and Japan? If so, when and why?

2. How many troops did Canada send to each of such other countries, and on what dates?

3. Since the declarations of war of Canada on such other countries, did Canada renew her (a) political; (b) economic; (c) cultural relations with each of those countries? If so (a) when; (b) how; (c) why?

4. What are our present (a) political; (b) economic; (c) cultural relations with each of those countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes, against Finland, Hungary and Roumania on December 7, 1941, because these countries had declared war on our allies and were actively supporting our enemies.

2. None.

3. No.

4. Relations with those countries are governed by the provisions of the respective terms of surrender.

RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

Mr. POULIOT:

1. During the last thirty years, how many times did Canada break and renew her (a) political; (b) economic; (c) cultural relations with Russia?

2. In each case, on what dates was each class of the above-mentioned relations of Canada with Russia (a) broken; (b) renewed, and (1) when; (2) why; (3) how?

3. Has Canada ever renewed, either directly or indirectly, her economic relations with Russia before renewing her political relations with that country?

4. If so, when and how?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. (a) Canada granted de facto recognition to the U.S.S.R. on July 3, 1922, by adhering to the Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement of 1921. De jure recognition was extended on March 24, 1924. The Russian trade delegation established in Canada early in 1924 remained until May 28, 1927, when the Soviet official agent advised the Canadian government that he had been recalled to the U.S.S.R. Soviet representation in Canada was not resumed until October 21, 1942, when, following an agreement between Canada and the U.S.S.R. to exchange diplomatic representation, the first minister of the U.S.S.R. to Canada presented his letters of credence at Ottawa.

(b) On May 30, 1927, immediately after the departure of the Soviet trade delegation in Canada, the Canadian government advised the Soviet authorities that while it regarded the notes exchanged in 1922 as no longer having effect, it was prepared to provide for the continuance of ordinary trade facilities between Canada and the U.S.S.R. In 1931, by P.C. 463 of February 27, importation into Canada from the U.S.S.R. of certain enumerated commodities was prohibited. This was followed on April 18 by a Soviet order of embargo against all Canadian products. In the summer of 1936 the Canadian government made arrangements for a visit to the U.S.S.R. by the Minster of Trade and Commerce; as a result of his conversations with Soviet officials, arrangements were made to reopen trade facilities between the two countries and on September 10, 1936, P.C. 463 of February 27, 1931, was revoked by P.C. 2354; the Soviet embargo on Canadian goods was lifted at the same time.

(c) No official information.

RELATIONS WITH ITALY

Mr. POULIOT:

When, how and why were the political relations of Canada with Italy resumed since Canada declared war on that country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

On January 22, 1946, in announcing the early arrival of an Italian representative in Ottawa, I recalled that on September 27, 1944, the President of the United States of America and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom had stated that direct relations between their countries and Italy would be resumed. Following this announcement Italian representatives were received in London, Washington, Moscow and other united nations capitals; Canada also agreed to receive a representative of the Italian government in Ottawa, with the personal rank of consul-general. Canada has no diplomatic representative in Italy.

REGISTRATION OF WOMEN

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What was the cost of the registration of women?
2. On what date did it take place and for what reason?
3. What was the age of the said women?
4. How many of them registered in each province?
5. On what date was it decided to discontinue such registration and for what reason?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Casual staff (40 cents per hour to work in connection with registration)	$42,520 51
Fees paid to postmasters (Each postmaster was paid 10 cents per person registered. Where no local office existed registrants registered at post offices. This figure includes postage)	10,847 93
A special form used for this registration	1,466 91
Total cost	$54,835 35

Note: This does not include salaries of regular staff in the employment office.

2. The registration took place from September 14 to September 19, 1942, for the purpose of establishing an inventory of womanpower.

3. The age group 20 to 24 inclusive.

4. Maritimes, 30,014; Quebec, 59,040; Ontario, 77,385; Prairie, 73,786; Pacific, 18,358; total, 285,583.

Note: The figures were compiled by regions, not provinces.

5. This was designed as a "spot" registration only. It was not planned on a current basis nor was any subsequent one or any in other age groups necessary.

RELATIONS WITH GERMANY AND JAPAN

Mr. POULIOT:

What are, at present the political relations of Canada with (a) Germany, and (b) Japan?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. (a) Canada is in a state of war with Germany and therefore any relations Canada has with Germany are governed by the terms of surrender. Germany is for the purposes of occupation under the control of the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and France. Occupational control is vested in the allied control commission in Berlin. At the invitation of the allied control commission, Canada has established a Canadian Military Mission in Germany under Lieutenant-General Maurice Pope, as this house was informed by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs on Wednesday, October 24, 1945.

(b) Canada is in a state of war with Japan and therefore any relations Canada has with Japan are governed by the terms of surrender. While Canada has no diplomatic representative in Tokyo, Mr. L. B. Pearson, the Canadian ambassador to the United States, is Canadian representative on the far eastern commission, which has its seat in Washington.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What have been the (a) political; (b) economic; (c) cultural relations of Canada with France since 1939?
2. Have they been (a) broken; (b) renewed?
3. If so (a) when; (b) why; (c) how?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. (a) On November 9, 1942, Canada ceased to recognize a de jure government of France and diplomatic relations were accordingly terminated. The French committee of national liberation was recognized by the Canadian government on August 27, 1943, and Major-General G. P. Vanier was appointed Canadian representative in Algiers. Following joint recognition of the French administration on October 23, 1944, by the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Canada, General Vanier was accredited as Canadian ambassador to the provisional government of France.

(b) The application of commercial agreements between Canada and France was of course suspended during the enemy occupation of that country.

(c) No official information.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. MERRITT:

1. How many applications for admission to Canada as immigrants have been received by the Department of Mines and Resources since the termination of hostilities in Europe and up to the 1st March, 1946, classifying them by nationalities?

2. How many persons have been admitted to Canada as immigrants during the said period, classifying them by nationalities?

3. How many persons have been refused admission on application, other than for cause in the particular case, during the said period?

4. (a) In the case of those mentioned in question 3, was any indication given them, that at some future date their applications would be reconsidered? (b) If so, what was the nature of such indication?

Mr. GLEN:

1. Information not available. No statistical record is kept of applications filed for the admission of immigrants.

2. 14,367 immigrants were admitted to Canada from June 1, 1945, to January 31, 1946. Their classification by nationality is as follows: Belgian, 10; British, 8,552; Cuban, 1; Czecho-Slovakian, 46; Danish, 10; Esthonian, 5; Finnish, 2; French, 22; German, 753; Greek, 8; Hungarian, 28; Icelandic, 6; Italian, 12; Jugo-Slavian, 13; Latvian, 1; Mexican, 18; Netherlands, 12; Norwegian, 67; Polish, 557; Portuguese, 1; Roumanian, 12; Russian, 6; South American, 1; Spanish, 4; Swedish, 4; Swiss, 8; Turkish, 2; U.S. Citizen, 4,206.

The majority of immigrants recorded above as of continental European nationalities were refugees granted entry to Canada as non-immigrants during the war and subsequently given permanent status. The figures for February, 1946, are not yet available.

3. Answered by number 1.

4. Only in cases where circumstances indicate some further consideration might be warranted at a later date are applicants so informed.

RADIO BROADCASTING—RAYMOND ARTHUR DAVIES

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Is Raymond Arthur Davies in the employ of the C.B.C.? If so, in what capacity and at what remuneration?

2. Did he at any time act as news commentator from Moscow for the C.B.C., and was this news broadcast over the C.B.C. in its news roundup?

3. If so, for what period and how much did the C.B.C. pay him for this service?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. McCANN:

These are matters relating to the broadcasting service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for which the Corporation is responsible and regarding which it is not subject to government control. Such questions can be taken up very appropriately in a parliamentary committee on broadcasting.

The corporation has advised:

1. Raymond Arthur Davies is not and has not been in the employ of the CBC.

2. He went to Russia as a free lance reporter. He cabled despatches to the CBC and some were used in News Roundup.

3. His dispatches were received between January 20 and October 28, 1944, and between March 25 and September 30, 1945. He was paid at usual rates for such work.

PENITENTIARIES—BORSTAL INSTITUTION

Mr. McKAY:

What steps have been taken by the government to call a conference of dominion-provincial officials for the purpose of establishing a Borstal institution in the dominion as recommended by the Royal Commission of 1938 investigating the penal system?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

Steps are being taken to appoint a commissioner, as authorized by section 4A of the Penitentiary Act 1939, as enacted by Section 2 of Chapter 28 of the statutes of 1945, second session, who will consult provincial officials, as indicated in Hansard of December 12, 1945, at pages 3347 and 3348.

WAR ASSETS—SALES TO SPAIN

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Have surplus war assets been sold to the government of Spain or to any organization, corporation or person in Spain?

2. If so, what is the nature, quantity and value of the goods sold.

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No.

2. Answered by 1.

SASKATCHEWAN LANDING TRAFFIC BRIDGE

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. Has the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply received a definite offer of assistance for the building of a traffic bridge on the South Saskatchewan river at or near Saskatchewan Landing?

2. If so, what was the offer, and has it been considered?

3. What steps, if any, have been taken by the government to implement the construction of this bridge?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Last December, a request for assistance was received from the Saskatchewan government.

2. The federal government was requested to bear fifty per cent of the cost of construction. Consideration of assistance has been deferred pending satisfactory settlement of financial arrangements between the dominion and the provinces, now before the dominion-provincial conference.

3. Answered by 2.

INTERNMENT OF W. F. KUGLER

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. Was one W. F. Kugler, of Leader, Saskatchewan, interned during the war period?
2. If so, for what reason or reasons?
3. What was the date of his apprehension?
4. When was he released?
5. Were any conditions attached to his release? If so, what were those conditions?
6. Have any reports been made on the activities of the said W. F. Kugler since his release from internment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.

2. To prevent him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the State.

3. 4th September, 1939.

4. 17th November, 1944.

5. Yes.

Conditions of release:

"1. That he do not return to his former home at Leader, Saskatchewan, or its environs;

2. That he report once a month to the R.C.M. Police, or, if there be no officer of that Force within a reasonable distance, to such conveniently located person as the R.C.M. Police may designate;

3. That he do not change his place of residence without first reporting to the R.C.M. Police or to such person as they may designate.

4. That he do not journey from the city or other place in which he may be living without first reporting the details and purpose of his proposed trip to the R.C.M. Police, and that, if so required by the said R.C.M. Police, he report at his destination or destinations to such police as the R.C.M. Police may designate;

5. That, short of joining the armed services and working in munitions plants, he do everything reasonably possible to assist in Canada's war effort, and that he do or say nothing that might in any way detract from the war effort of Canada or its allies, or that might in any way assist or encourage any enemy of Canada or its allies;

6. That he obey all laws and regulations, including those relating to national selective service, and have nothing to do with any forbidden club or organization;

7. That he sign an undertaking to abide by all of the above conditions."

6. No.

JAPANESE REPARATIONS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Has the governent of Canada collected from or will it collect from Japan, expenses incurred by said government because of Japan's war on and against the allied nations?
2. Will said government collect from Japan expenses incurred by it in repatriating Canadian civilians taken prisoner and kept in concentration camps by Japan until rescued by the armies of the allied nations?
3. Pending such collection from Japan, is the government of Canada demanding from Canadian civilians so rescued and repatriated payment of the expense of repatriating them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. (a) No; (b) No international agreement has yet been reached on the subject of reparations payable by Japan.

2. Answered by 1.

3. Yes.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—NORTH VANCOUVER

2. What is the total accommodation of these two staff houses?
3. How much of this accommodation was vacant on March 1, 1946?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. (a) This land was leased from the municipality of North Vancouver at $10.00 per year; (b) $67,250.83; (c) $11,998.96.

2. 163 beds.

3. 63 beds.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—PATRICIA BAY-SEA ISLAND FARES

Mr. PEARKES:

1. Has any change in the fare on T.C.A. planes, operating between Patricia bay and Sea island, Vancouver, been authorized during the past twelve months?
2. If so, what was the nature of the changes made, and for what reason were these fares altered?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes.

2. On August 1, 1945, Trans-Canada Air Lines licence which authorized the transport of through traffic to Victoria was amended to authorize the company to carry local traffic between Vancouver and Victoria. Effective August 7, 1945, the fare of $3 one way and $5.40 for the round trip was established by T.C.A. for such local traffic. Air transport board Order No. 2 directed that these fares be increased to $5 one way and $10 round trip. The increase became effective January 1, 1946.

This action by the air transport board was taken as a result of a complaint made by Canadian Pacific Air Lines that the T.C.A. fares of $3 one way and $5.40 return were not just and reasonable.

The facts as found by the air transport board were as follows:

Prior to August 1945 C.P.A.L. and its predecessors had been, for a considerable period, the air carriers authorized to provide the local service between Victoria and Vancouver and they had in the past and still did carry the bulk of the traffic.

A most careful scrutiny by the board and its economic experts established beyond question that the rate of $5 one way, which was the rate being charged by Canadian Pacific Air Lines, did little more than barely cover the actual cost of operation as a local service and that C.P.A.L. was conducting its said operation on a sound and economic basis.

On the other hand, T.C.A. was operating a trunk line service on a basis of only two trips daily each way, in regard to which the local service between Vancouver and Victoria was merely incidental. In effect, the number of seats available on T.C.A. for the local service was entirely dependent on the number reserved for through traffic. In the event that all seats were utilized by T.C.A. for through traffic, there would be none for local traffic. It was, therefore, obvious that the considerations which applied to T.C.A. rates were substantially different from those which governed the operations of C.P.A.L. Having regard to all the circumstances, it appeared to be clearly unsound to permit T.C.A. who could not carry all the traffic, or even any of it, if all its seats were occupied by through passengers, to operate on the basis of a rate which was substantially below the actual cost of operation of the purely local service in question. Had T.C.A. been able to handle all the traffic that offered, different considerations would have applied.

Section 5 (1) of the air transport board regulations respecting commercial air services provides that air carriers must furnish transportation upon reasonable request and must provide safe and adequate service, equipment and facilities. Quite obviously, to provide a service which complies with all these requirements, it is essential that the air carrier receive a reasonable rate of remuneration. It would have been unreasonable and unfair to require C.P.A.L. to reduce its rates, with the possible result that the service would have been discontinued. As the communities served were primarily dependent upon that company for the local air services in question, the board found that the complaint of C.P.A.L. was justified and under the authority contained in its regulations the board ordered the change in rate hereinbefore referred to.

WILD LIFE

PROVISION FOR APRIL 10 AS JACK MINER NATIONAL WILD LIFE DAY

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport) moved the second reading of bill No. 2, respecting the Jack Miner National Wild Life Day.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I feel very humble in moving second reading of a bill which has to do with the perpetuation of the memory of a great Canadian, one who was recognized everywhere as the pioneer conservator of wild life not only in Canada but throughout America, and as the greatest naturalist on this continent.

A few days ago I read an article in a magazine which classed the late Jack Miner, who was a great pioneer, with other great pioneers, other men who blazed name and fame across the skies. His name appeared alongside names of men like Sir Henry Bessemer, who invented a process in connection with the production of steel, one which revolutionized steel production throughout the world. Then there was Luther Burbank, who was a great horticulturist. In the list was Louis Pasteur whose name is known throughout the world, and who has been recognized as a great French scientist. There was Graham Bell, who invented the telephone; Thomas A. Edison; Doctor Grenfell; Doctor Banting; Lord Kelvin; Remington, who invented the typewriter; the Wright brothers, who invented the aeroplane; Ford, who was the pioneer in low-priced motor cars, and Jack Miner himself.

This lists twelve great men; and as a Canadian I am proud that, through his great work, Jack Miner earned the right to have his name alongside the names of those other great pioneers. So many have spoken to me in support of the bill that I know I shall not have to speak at length at this time. On the other hand, so many have asked questions respecting its significance that I feel I should answer those questions as they have come to me.

Some have asked how the bill came to be introduced—who it was who suggested it. Well, this is the second bill I have introduced in this connection. The first was introduced in 1941. In the previous autumn I had been at Kingsville, upon which occasion I saw large buses—I do not remember how many—carrying signs along their sides indicating that they had been chartered by the board of education of the city of Detroit. Kingsville is a beautiful town, situated in one of the finest counties in all America.

Mr. MARTIN: The best county.

Mr. MacNICOL: One of the finest, not only in Canada, but in America. It is situated in a perfect garden country, a fact which must be known to all who have been there. These buses turned at the main corner of the town of Kingsville for the purpose of going north for a distance of a mile or so to the sanctuary created by the late Jack Miner.

One of the men standing at the corner was Mr. Arthur Allen who, on several occasions, had proposed to the Kingsville council that they take steps to set apart a day. He had suggested that they should choose April 10, Jack Miner's birthday, as a day on which not only the children from Detroit, but those from all other parts of Ontario and the United States might visit the sanctuary. That is the origin of the bill. The idea was suggested to me while I was there, with the result that in the following year I introduced a bill. However, on account of the war, it was suggested to me that any action in connection with the bill might be deferred until after the war. I was glad to comply with the suggestion; I am always happy to cooperate if I can.

I know there is nothing I can add to either the name or the fame of Jack Miner. All the great men in America have done that; they have left nothing for anyone else to add. Therefore I shall not try.

I have been asked what states have wild life days. Perhaps I should explain that I have received literature from the United States. A tremendous amount of it has come to my desk, from all sorts of organizations. That to which I shall direct the attention of the house is the literature which reached me from that great American organization known as the National Wild Life Federation in the United States. From that literature I learn that it was the late President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, a very great friend of our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who originated the idea in that country. I might say, in passing, that it is a blessing the President and our Prime Minister were such good friends during those days of struggle through which we have passed. I believe that our Prime Minister's influence with the President was most helpful in those negotiations which took place between the United States and the British empire.

It was in 1938 that the late President set apart the first day of spring as wild life day in the United States. They set apart the week of March 21—and had I known that when I drafted this bill, instead of mentioning a single day I would have inserted the words "the week of April 10". Some people have asked, "How are you going to hold to April 10, when it might fall on a Saturday or Sunday, and in that way would not be effective in the schools?" I note that in some of the states this difficulty has been overcome by setting apart a week or a month and, if this bill is accepted, the necessary change could be made in this direction by way of amendment.

In the United States they have what is known as national wild life week. This is the statement made by the National Wild Life Federation:

> National wild life week, originally proclaimed by President Roosevelt in 1938 as a period in which Americans should give thoughtful consideration to wild life, its restoration and preservation, will begin this year on March 21, the first day of spring, the National Wild Life Federation has announced.
> Sponsored by the federation, wild life week is featured by many kinds of educational activities carried on by various organizations, groups and agencies affiliated with the federation. In addition there will be lectures, radio talks, newspaper stories, school programmes, etc., throughout the country, devoted to an intelligent approach to conservation of soil, water, fields and forests as well as wild life.

I am assured by the Miner foundation that they, and the organizations with which they are closely associated in Canada and whose work in connection with wild life conservation they sponsor, will supply all the literature required, and I have no doubt that they will carry out this undertaking.

Most of the southern states in the United States have adopted wild life weeks. They have followed the federal government's programme and have selected the week of March 21. In the south the season is much more advanced; in fact the geese and ducks all left for the north early in March. A little different programme is followed in the northern states, and I shall refer to Ohio as an example. Arbour day, which as I remember is on a Friday, in April, is selected and the week in which that day falls is set aside as wild life week. I should like to read two or three paragraphs from a proclamation which was issued by the state of Ohio in 1943. These read:

> Whereas, for the past four years, the entire month of April has been set aside as conservation month in Ohio, thus kindling anew the interest of our citizens in all phases of conservation, and

Whereas, the teaching of conservation in the schools of Ohio has been commended in a joint programme of the state department of education and the Ohio division of conservation.

And further down:

Now, therefore, I, John W. Bricker, governor of the state of Ohio, do hereby appoint and designate the week of April 12 to 16 as conservation week in the schools of Ohio and Friday, April 16, as arbour and bird day and ask a general observance by all citizens of the state of the entire month of April as conservation month.

I understand that the state of Michigan takes arbour day as the pivotal day in their wild life conservation week. I shall not take time to give details of what that state does, but it is along the lines of what I have just read. There is nothing new in a wild life day or a wild life week, because as far as I know it is general throughout the states of the United States. Therefore I feel the time has come when Canada should do the same.

The United States does not have an outstanding conservationist or wild life advocate like the late Jack Miner was, and it seems to me that April 10, which is the anniversary of the birthday of this great wild life conservationist and this great naturalist, would be a fitting day to include in a wild life week, or to be set aside as a wild life day as the bill provides. There are many days in Canada that are fairly generally observed. There is a day for tuberculosis; there is apple day which is the Boy Scout day and which is a national day throughout Canada; there is fire prevention week and so on. All of these are good, and to set aside April 10 as a wild life conservation day would be a new thing in Canada and would place us in the same position as the United States. The bill says a day, but it can be amended, to week of April 10.

During this period speeches could be delivered over the radio and all those interested could spread far and wide the benefits which would accrue to this country from conservation along almost any lines, and, in this particular case, wild life conservation.

It has been suggested to me that perhaps we would be interfering with the educational systems of the provinces. The provinces are supreme in educational matters and the federal government cannot interfere. I do not feel that there would be any interference because there would be no compulsion upon any provincial department of education to follow the provisions of this bill. I presume they would do just the same as is done in the various states in the United States. The departments of education in all the provinces are thoroughly alive to the great value of conservation in all lines, and, in this case, the conservation of wild life. I do not fear any difficulty in that regard, although it is not for me to say.

I was a very close friend of the late Jack Miner. I often visited his sanctuary, and it is a little difficult for me to speak because I think of his lovely blue eyes and his lovely face which showed by its lines his love, not only for wild life but for humanity. Quite often when I was there children would come, and I used to stand back and watch the faces of the kiddies when they looked at Jack Miner. He was an institution to them and busloads of children would come to see him. They would show him their bird houses and he would pat this one on the head and that one on the back. I can see their lovely eyes and their lovely countenances looking at his.

He was a great conservator; he devoted his whole life to conservation. The hon. members from Essex county know this quite well. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), who previously represented an Essex constituency in the provincial house, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) are all familiar with the work of this great pioneer, perhaps more so than other members in the house. I like to think of a pioneer being a man who blazes the way, who is not just a follower; a man who steps out and puts his name before the world. That is what Jack Miner did, and everything he did was done for Canada.

I have received many communications and I think I should refer to one or two. One was from the London Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. I often heard Jack Miner say, "If I can teach a child to make an outdoor birdcage, I have made a conservator of wild life." That was a great thought; that was his life, as opposed to useless destruction. Wild life means so much to this country besides sport; it can contribute so much in the way of food, and its preservation is of the utmost importance. I also had a very warm letter from Colonel E. S. Wigle, one of the oldest residents and a member of one of the pioneer families in that part of Ontario. He warmly approves the bill.

I also had a letter from a leading departmental store in Windsor, the C. H. Smith departmental store. Although I am not familiar with the store itself, I understand it is a very large store. I believe the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) told me it was the largest store in Windsor. They are going to use their big show-windows, I am informed, to present to passers-by a demonstration of the value of wild life conservation. I think it is fine for a great merchant to use the show-windows of his store to interest people in wild life conservation. It is an indication that people are thinking of more than merely profit.

I also had a letter from the Chrysler Corporation, of Detroit, Michigan; everyone knows who they are; also one from Doctor Perkins Bull, a great conservator himself. If I may digress for a moment, Doctor Bull has gathered together, in my opinion, the greatest collection of early pioneer farm equipment used in Canada that I have ever seen anywhere. He has it housed in a museum which is part of a school at Brampton, where there must be at least one-quarter of a million dollars worth of material. I appreciate his letter very much, coming from a pioneer himself.

I also received one from the Ottawa Humane Society and one from the National Parks Association of Canada, from which I quote this paragraph:

> Canada is so far behind the United States in practical wild life conservation that it could almost be said that we have not even made a start officially.

I think the Department of Mines and Resources has made a start and I wish to compliment the department on the distance it has gone in that regard. I am looking for great things along that line from the new Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), because he comes from a province where there is much to be accomplished in conservation of wild life and summers in a very great park in Manitoba, Riding Mountain park, in which there is much wild life protected. So that I look for a lot from him in the development of wild life conservation.

I quote another paragraph from the same letter:

> The National Parks Association have a bulletin awaiting its turn at the printer's stressing the Americans' effort and many of this 5,000 edition should be in the mail before April 10.

The National Parks Association of Canada deserves unstinted credit and praise for going to the trouble of getting out and printing this bulletin. It is encouraging when you know that so many people are interested in promoting wild life conservation. Jack Miner was the pioneer in that field. There have been many others since and there were others during his time who have done a lot in that direction. I am looking at my friend the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), whose name I deliberately picked out as seconder of the bill because he is more familiar than many others are with the conservation of the Canada goose. He himself I believe has quite a sanctuary near Cochrane and when I go out that way again I will visit him. When the geese leave Virginia and the Carolinas and Texas and Louisiana they fly north and cover six hundred miles the first day and then come down to rest. I believe it is the third day before they get to the sanctuary. I have seen 50,000 geese at Jack Miner's sanctuary at Kingsville, and all through the years, Mr. Speaker, the Miner sanctuary has fed those geese. It takes many thousands of bushels of No. 1 corn yearly to feed them. I have watched his men on many occasions distributing the corn when the geese have gone out to the lake. The sanctuary covers a very large area, about four hundred acres altogether, but where the birds go is about twenty-five to thirty acres, ponds included, and the corn is distributed all around these. It is most interesting to watch them. I was thinking this afternoon, when I was told that this bill might come up, of the many occasions on which I have gone with Jack Miner to the little house he had amongst the trees. You had to reach it by a ladder and peep out through a peephole at the geese. They are bright and intelligent birds. Jack used to say they were the wisest of all wild life; in fact he did not call them wild. In order not to frighten the geese there were pieces of coloured glass hanging in the peep-hole in front of the people through which you could get a good look at them without their seeing you. I do not like to think when I go back there that I shall not have the pleasure of the company of that great pioneer.

I had another letter from the department of street railways, Detroit. I value this letter because that is a great organization. They have written me approving the bill. I also received a letter from the Canadian Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Montreal, in which they warmly approve the bill. I quote this one paragraph from their letter:

> In the matter pertaining to the Bill representing "National Bird Day"—

That is not the right name:

> —I am pleased to state that our society appreciates the opportunity of concurring with you in your noble effort and may we hope that a favourable reception will be given your efforts.

I have another letter from a Windsor firm, Abbey Gray Limited, a motor car company, warmly approving the bill, and a very strong letter from the Essex county tourist association, signed by H. J. Lassaline, secretary-treasurer. I had the pleasure of meeting him at the Jack Miner sanctuary.

I have a clipping from the Globe and Mail, which quotes from the Calgary Herald, and I will read very briefly from it:

Following this war there will be a great increase in the numbers of hunters and fishermen. Millions of young men who have learned the thrill of outdoor living will join the ranks of those older sportsmen who are already devotees of the rugged life. Pressure on wild life resources will be terrific. The result will be the virtual exhaustion of our game, unless game management can solve the problems of providing annual crops of game animals, birds and fish in sufficient amount to satisfy the demands of this army of sportsmen.

That is the purpose of the bill, that all sorts of sportsmen's organizations should do in Canada as similar bodies do in the United States. At their dinners or banquets in the week of April 10, in Canada, they should have speakers who will tell their members, and through their members the public, of the great value of wild life conservation all along the line. If we do that we shall preserve for right use the wild life in Canada.

Perhaps I might quote another paragraph of the letter from the National Parks Association. I ought to have quoted this before. This has reference to the United States:

As you know, they have 178 water fowl refuges totalling 3,415,542 acres supported by the sale in 1945 of 1,750,352 one-dollar duck stamps to hunters and a few postage stamp collectors.

Since that time another 500,000 acres have been added to their wild fowl refuges. I do not know whether we have a tabulation of wild fowl refuges, but they now have 4,000,000 acres; and taking all their wild life, big game and wild fowl, they have altogether 13,600,000 acres. Speakers at various organizations should emphasize the necessity of Canada preserving some swamps and so forth. When the geese leave the Miner sanctuary I believe it takes them two days to get to the riding represented by the hon. member for Cochrane, and they go in thousands near the shores of James Bay, remaining there a week or ten days or more before flying to their nesting grounds in Baffin Land, Ungava and the Arctic islands. That is why I have referred to the hon. member for Cochrane as a conservationist. He is thoroughly familiar with the value of conservation.

I wish to say a word further with reference to Jack Miner. Among other titles, he had earned that of the great missionary of the air. He was the pioneer tagger of wild fowl. Others are now doing the same thing, and all credit to them, but he was the pioneer. That is the point I wish to emphasize above all others, and that is why so many honours have come to him. While I am on this point, let me give due credit to my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, who alone must have conferred upon Jack Miner the O.B.E. of which he was so justly proud. I have never seen anyone in my life so thrilled at receiving a title as Jack was when he received the O.B.E., and I may tell the Prime Minister that if at any time he visits the sanctuary he will find above the big fireplace in the living room three pictures, one of Edison, one of Henry Ford and one of our Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The big three.

Mr. MacNICOL: He counted all three among his warmest friends and he respected each of them in the highest way. Jack Miner told me that it was in 1904 that he conceived the idea of wild life conservation. He had been a hunter in that part of Essex where, in those days, there was much wild life apart altogether from geese, because there were fur-bearing animals. He was an expert marksman and no one could beat him. When he pulled the trigger, whatever he fired at sank to rise no more. One of his ideas was that in the schools, or wherever the question of wild life was discussed, teachers should instruct sportsmen and children, if they ever became hunters, to make sure that when they fired they hit the animal in the right place, and if they were not sure about it, it would be better for them to go and retrieve any wounded bird or animal than to pass on and shoot ten more. He was altogether opposed to wanton destruction.

It took about five years, he told me, before he got together enough wild geese. I have forgotten how he obtained the first one, but I suppose it may be assumed that the first one was wounded and became a decoy. It was not killed but was made a decoy, and from that commencement in 1904, until 1909, he accumulated a considerable start in wild life conservation in the sanctuary. In that year he conceived the idea of banding them.

There are two types of bands. In the United States the band has a number on it, and I am familiar with it. It gives all the information necessary to enable biologists at Washington to keep a complete record of migratory wild life, their habits, where they go, when they return and so on. Jack Miner's band does the same thing. In fact, it was Jack Miner who went to Washington to show the United States department how he did it, and on various occasions that department sent its officials to Canada to watch him banding the birds so as to learn exactly what he did.

In 1909 he began putting Biblical verses on the bands. I have told this before but it will do no harm to repeat it now. When I was in northern Manitoba in Moose Lake, a few years ago, late one evening an Indian came in with a goose. There were no white men there but myself and one or two others who were with me. This Indian had shot a goose. I had a gripful of oranges, chocolates and so on to give to the Indian children, because I am very fond of Indian children. They were gathered round me when the Indian came with this Jack Miner band. I cannot quote him exactly, but the information he gave me was, "Jack Miner, him great man". He had the goose that he had shot and he said, "Jack Miner, him send food for tummy", and on the band there was a verse that said, "He careth for thee", "Food for the soul". The Jack Miner band is peculiar in that regard. No other country I know of has anything on its band except the number to be reported to the biological department.

From that time until his death Jack Miner banded 75,000 ducks and geese, and that is a lot of ducks and geese. If you go there you will find baskets full of bands. Thousands of bands have been returned. With these he has been able to advise our own government and the United States government about the migratory habits of wild life. That is one of the reasons why he was pronounced the great pioneer conservationist and naturalist of Canada and all America.

Knowing that all of us have to pass from this mortal scene sooner or later and that he had three fine sons, before he died Jack Miner legally set up the Jack Miner foundation to which all funds are contributed. If and when the sons pass on, the Prime Minister of Canada, whoever he may be at that time, the President of the United States, whoever he may be at that time, and the treasurer of the fund who, I believe, is a great banker in Detroit, will select the manager of the foundation. That will perpetuate the foundation; but I keep saying to myself that, if we pass this bill, it will go a long way to support those three young men, Jack's sons, in the great job which they are doing and to which they have devoted their lives. They get nothing out of it; they contribute everything to it. There they have a sanctuary, the like of which can be found nowhere else.

On numerous occasions Mr. Manly Miner, eldest and manager, has been offered a large salary to go to the United States and establish a sanctuary on lines similar to the one established in Canada. These three young men are following in the footsteps of their distinguished father. So long as they live, this country will be proud of their work and what they are doing to maintain the traditions of their father and to keep the Jack Miner sanctuary and the Jack Miner name as a great conservationist of wild life before the world. They are working for Canada, their home and their father's home, to keep it in the forefront of wild life conservation.

If the children in the schools and the members of clubs were told the value of bird houses and so forth in the conservation and protection of wild life and not to shoot uselessly to kill, but to shoot straight, it would be of great help to Canada in providing protection for wild life and sport for the hunters. At the sanctuary I have seen geese rise in the evening and fly to lake Erie. They are protected as they fly over the first 200 acres of land, but when they cross the Miner sanctuary they are peppered at by thousands of Detroit hunters and others. Occasionally the hunters get one. Many times in the past I have heard Jack Miner say that they like to shoot; that if one or two did get a bird they are satisfied. Think of what these sportsmen mean to Canada. Think of the tourist traffic that that brings into Canada. He was always thinking of Canada and of wild life conservation.

I am happy to have this bill supported by a great friend of Jack Miner, and himself no mean wild life conservationist, the hon. member for Cochrane.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Before proceeding with my remarks I wish first of all to compliment the hon. member on presenting this bill for discussion in the house at this time. I realize now that he has fully implemented the purpose of the bill. By saying that, I mean that he has focused the attention of the Canadian people on the great lifework of the late lamented Jack Miner, and the meaning of his actions as a conservationist. I often visited his place, and I was greatly honoured by his friendship. I found that I had it naturally and spontaneously the very first time that I visited him when I told him of the wild duck and geese that had been feeding for a number of years in one of my lakes located in northern Ontario. That was the best way to reach his heart.

On several occasions it has been well said that he was a natural naturalist. It was true that he had no technical knowledge of these matters so far as a university education was concerned, but I believe that he was the greatest real naturalist that Canada has ever produced.

A few weeks ago there was a radio quiz in which it was asked who had been Canada's greatest naturalist, and it was unanimously stated through every section of the country that it was the late Jack Miner. To use his own language, he used to say that he was not so much interested in the number of spots on a woodpecker's tail as in saving the species from extermination. He was more than a naturalist; he was also a conservationist, and if there is one lesson the Canadian people must of necessity learn it is more and more the policy of conservation.

I come from a section of the country where there is the finest treasure house known not only in Canada but also throughout the world. But we are doing the same as the pioneer civilization did in old upper and lower Canada; we are wasting to a great extent the natural resources and its wild life; we are wasting some of the wonderful gifts that have been given by a bountiful Providence, and in Jack Miner there is an example to be followed by every section of Canada.

I make this statement deliberately. I repeat that the presentation of this bill was properly timed, but at the same time a lesson must be understood by every Canadian citizen. In my own section we have slaughtered the wild fowl there; we have slaughtered our fur animals; we have slaughtered our fine game animals. We are going farther than that; we are polluting those big streams that are carrying their water into the great basin of the Hudson and James bays. Many of these big rivers like the Temiskaming, the Missanabi and the Abitibi, just to name a few that carry millions of gallons of water each hour, and to-day they are polluted. Where we had an enormous quantity of fine fish life there is practically no such life at present. The Canadian people must see that that water is again purified, is again returned to its natural state, so that the fish life can be restored once more as it was forty and fifty years ago, for the glory of God, and the welfare of our section and of our Canadian people.

I have seen the same thing happen with our wild life. It is true that neither the deer nor the moose were as plentiful as the bisons were on the western prairies and through the central states of United States. But we had them there by the thousands. These fine wild animals of our Canadian forests are decreasing too rapidly, and something must be done through education primarily, so as to preserve them from destruction. It is almost impossible to have conservation and all the things that Jack Miner stood for purely by legal statute. It must come primarily from the men and women of this country; it must be in their hearts in their actions if we want to preserve our wild life and our natural resources.

[Mr. Bradette.]

I may be out of order, but I should like to say a few words as to what we are doing at the present time to our natural forest resources in northern Ontario. We are doing exactly as was done in old Quebec and in the older sections of Ontario and the maritime provinces. How many people from this country and outside Canada after traversing every section of our country, and more particularly the four older provinces, are puzzled as to why some land was ever opened to cultivation, why it was allowed to be completely denuded of the great trees covering the land in those days, those great sylvan temples, where nature bloomed in its full glory. I well remember a place, for instance, like Sturgeon Falls, thirty-five years ago, when it was stated at the time of the inauguration of a fine big newsprint mill that there were enough forest resources in that area to enable the mill to function for at least two thousand years; yet after thirty years of that industry which meant so much to that section of the country it had to close its doors. Why? Because there had practically been wasted or extravagantly exploited most of the fine forest which had been given to people who were absolutely entitled to its exploitation but not to its destruction. I hope that governments, whatever they happen to be, whether at Queen's park or Ottawa or in any of the provinces, will realize what is involved in this unlimited, radical and unwarranted denuding of our forest reserves. I can speak with knowledge of my own section of the country. When, in 1909, I squatted on my lot the district was entirely forest; to-day, in very many sections, most of the farmers have to buy coal to supply their fuel requirements, the forest having entirely disappeared. There again something was wrong; there was not enough of this spirit of Jack Miner, the spirit of conservation and of preservation.

I wish to be brief in my remarks because I know that the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) desires to say a few words about this important matter.

Mr. MARTIN: All hon. members do.

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes, all hon. members, because they are so vitally interested. Jack Miner did not belong to any particular section of Canada. To-day Jack Miner belongs to every section of this country; yes, every section of the world. The hon. mmeber who presented this bill spoke eloquently upon what our American cousins are doing at the present time in providing these sanctuaries which allow wild fowl to winter there. At the same time we must realize we have fine areas in the northern country where it is impossible for the white man and most Indians to have access to the wild fowl during the summer months, so that the lessons of conservation should be heeded by both countries. But I have seen, in some of our own lakes, during the summer months, where there are hundreds of ducks and signs all over stating that they are not to be molested, but to be left alone, that if people have a ·22 rifle or a little gun they will not hesitate to shoot the ducks out of season or any wild game that they may meet. It is past my comprehension why such ideas are still in the minds of our people. I well remember that many of the homes of the rural district of old historic Charlevoix county, in my youth there were thousands of birds' eggs emptied and strung around on strings. One would see hundreds in every home. Thank heaven we do not see that any more to-day, because we realize that in doing so we are harming our own country; we are destroying the laws of nature. I have also seen in my youth that when attempts were made to plant some trees, the youngsters particularly saw to it that they were utterly destroyed in no time. A fine old schoolteacher we had, when one year the municipality decided to plant two thousand trees, gave one hundred to the children of our school, to look after them and see that they were properly protected. To-day those trees are a monument to the boys and girls who looked after them, a living thing, something for all to see and enjoy.

This is part of the message which Jack Miner has given to us Canadians. The hon. member who presented the bill brought to the attention of the house and of the Canadian people the wonderful work Jack Miner has accomplished. We realize that the late Jack Miner does not want a monument of granite or marble or bronze to commemorate his great work and memory, but he wants every Canadian to realize fully the import of his life work, the message that his own actions carried. As has been so well said by the previous speaker, it was a task to which he gave his life. What he undertook to do was, at great personal sacrifices, to educate in these matters the citizens of our country; and now he is ably succeeded in this great task by his three fine sons. I know that if he could hear this discussion he would be proud and pleased to realize that in our national Canadian forum we find it possible to tell the Canadian people, as well as ourselves, to continue his fine work and to be real Jack Miners in the matter of the conservation and preservation of our natural resources, that in the work of nature in its wild bird and wild animal life we see the handiwork of God, and to be true to his ideals is the greatest recognition that he ever aspired to receive as a reward.

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation to other hon. members for having permitted me to speak at this time. I have to catch my train in a few minutes, and I am grateful for their courtesy.

I desire to speak on this subject on behalf of the Essex and county tourist association, which has offices in Windsor, Ontario. It so happens that the Jack Miner farm and sanctuary are about twenty miles south of Windsor, and we are very much interested in this subject, owing to the fact that in 1945 over 17,000,000 tourists entered the country, over 5,000,000 of whom came to the city of Windsor. Many of these people went to see the Jack Miner sanctuary.

As the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) has just said, Jack Miner is not a person whose fame is confined to any locality. He began his conservation procedure through the banding of birds, not with a number but with a verse of scripture. Jack Miner over a period of years has given much to us, and I think it is only fitting that we should commemorate him by passing this bill. I am very happy to state that not only will I support this bill but that I am sure that a great majority of the constituents I represent are very much in favour of it.

Jack Miner gave to us of his time. His farm was open several days a week and he spent his time in showing and explaining the various things he was doing. I recall distinctly visiting his farm, catching robins or some other birds, and he always permitted the visitor to take a bird and let it fly off into the air after a band had been put upon the leg. And he gave not only of his time, but of his money. During his lifetime his own funds were used in starting this sanctuary and keeping it in operation. He gave also of his knowledge. Jack Miner lectured through the United States and Canada, and, I believe, in some European cities, telling of the work he was doing.

My earliest recollection is, as a very small schoolboy at Petrolia, Ontario, a distance of some 120 miles from Jack Miner's sanctuary, having Jack Miner come to visit us, tell us something of his work and show his pictures, mostly slides—for in those days there were not many moving pictures—and imparting to us the knowledge he had obtained over a period of years.

More important, he gave of his love. Jack Miner not only loved the birds, but he loved man. Through the work he did in spreading the Christian principles he loved, he has not only helped animals but brought healing; he has brought love to people throughout not only North America, but the great part of South America.

This has the effect of bringing tourists, especially at certain seasons of the year, to our constituency. They pass through the constituency of Essex South, a distance of twenty miles, to the sanctuary. At certain seasons of the year one may see literally thousands of birds in the air. On many occasions on lake Erie I have seen and heard thousands of geese out on the lake. And when I say "thousands", I mean literally tens of thousands of geese out on the waters, probably beyond the vision of the eye.

Then, too, there have been literally tens of thousands of ducks and, even more interesting, great numbers of white swans. And when I refer to white swans, I mean white swans by the thousands, who have reached that point in their migration to the south, coming through by Point Pelee, and across to the Jack Miner sanctuary. At seasons of the year there will be literally thousands of those birds at the sanctuary.

I am sure my colleague the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) will join with me in extending, on behalf of the city of Windsor, and the Essex county tourist association, a hearty invitation to come and see this beautiful and educational sight at the season of the year when the birds are migrating.

I hesitate mentioning such mundane things as money in this discussion, but speaking from a purely mercenary point of view I must point out that the tourists who come to the Jack Miner sanctuary bring with them and spend good, hard Canadian dollars, and the currency of other countries. Those dollars find their way into our retail stores and our manufacturing organizations. They help to purchase the cars, in the manufacture of which we are chiefly interested. In view of the fact that they will create work, they bring dollars and cents not only to the city of Windsor and to the county of Essex, but to all Canada. I say this because the automobile industry buys its materials from all parts of Canada. Recognition of this sanctuary will help not only my constituency but every constituency in Canada.

For these reasons I am happy to support the bill.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support the bill because of a promise I made to the late Jack Miner, who gave us a week at our camp at lake Minaki. At the close of that camp, when he described the value of wild life in Canada, we promised we would support him in his endeavour.

I should like to mention one text from which he spoke at that camp, where he referred to the description of a sport who went out to shoot for the love of shooting. When he left the spoils in front of his tent door he went to sleep for two or three days, and he cooked not that which he took in sport.

In support of that text, I would say that no man has a right to go out and shoot wild life for the sake of fun. When we treat wild life as Jack Miner treated it, it will cease to be wild and become tame. There is one organization in Canada, of which I was an officer, namely, the Boy Scouts, who will welcome this bill with enthusiasm. I am sure the leaders, in particular, will be pleased to note its introduction.

May I commend the mover and the seconder for their foresight.

Mr. S. M. CLARK (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is needless for anyone in the house even to attempt to "sell" Jack Miner either to hon. members or to the people of Canada. He did that job much better than anyone else could do it.

I rise to support the bill proposed by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), and I do so for one reason. The late Mr. Miner gave inspiration to this generation in connection with the conservation of wild life, an inspiration that has meant much to Canada. This is one way in which we can ensure that that inspiration is carried forward to the coming generation.

If some hon. members have not visited the sanctuary, I suggest their doing so at the earliest opportunity. I do not think anyone could adequately describe the scene when those clouds of wild fowl come in from the lake, or from the north at different seasons of the year. That sanctuary is being ably cared for by the Miner family. I would hope that for the sake of the younger generation it might be possible for the government to adopt the bill. Certainly I would support it heartily, as it is proposed by the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the bill, and perhaps I may do so more particularly because I am from a part of Canada other than that in which Jack Miner's life work was done.

I think all people across Canada owe Jack Miner a debt of gratitude for the manner in which he indicated to the people of Canada and of the world what bird sanctuaries could really do for wild life in our countries. When we look back over the years and realize that on this North American continent a century ago there were birds and beasts which are now extinct—and I have in mind particularly the migrating pigeon—we realize the importance of his work. Even before coming to this country I had read stories about the flocks of wild pigeons which flew down along the New England states to an extent that they obscured the sun. To-day there is not one specimen of the North American wild pigeon in existence. It is gone.

I look back to my own province of Saskatchewan and to the plains of western Canada. During my thirty-six years in the west I have seen that country almost depleted of the typical bird of the prairie land—the prairie chick. It almost disappeared. I remember the wanton slaughter of the prairie chick, and I remember, too, the slaughter of the ducks in the early days.

Slaughter, for the mere sake of slaughter, is, I believe, something which we should deprecate strongly and, where possible, punish effectively, because, as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) said a minute ago, any man who kills for the joy of killing is really not a good citizen of any country, anywhere. So that I am pleased to rise in my place in support of this bill.

I had the privilege some fifteen or sixteen years ago of spending a few days in Leamington, Ontario, which is in Essex county. When I was there I visited the bird sanctuary of Jack Miner with my, as they were then, young children. I remember how much interested they were in what Mr. Miner was doing. It was an education and inspiration to them.

It may be said that we have a number of days set aside now for various purposes and that perhaps we have a sufficiency of them. I happen to be a Protestant in religion and I belong to a church which commemorates some of the saints' days. I think of the lessons that those days bring back when one sees them recorded either on a calendar or in a prayer book. I think it is useful for boys and girls who are growing up, and for the older generation too, to remember exactly what some lives have meant to the world in which we are living to-day.

In the same way Jack Miner has given something to this country, to this continent and, indeed, to the world, because Jack Miner's birds have been found in every part of the world from time to time. I remember reading a few years ago how one of the birds he had banded had been picked up in Australia, another one in Africa, and so on. Each one was banded in Canada and carried the message of Canada across the world, giving, as it were, a challenge to other countries and other peoples to do what we were doing, to try to preserve wild life which is so beneficial to the human race.

I remember years ago reading a story about how a certain district—I have even forgotten where it was—seemed to be plagued with birds. The birds were killed, but when the birds were gone the insects came. Then the people who had killed the birds looked around to find other birds to kill the insects that were plaguing the vegetation in the neighbourhood. The birds and other specimens of wild life which we should preserve in this country are useful to the community and to society.

In spite of all that may be said about having too many days to commemorate this or that, I think this is a day that might be set aside. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) does not intend it to be a holiday; it is intended as a day when through the press, the radio and, as the hon. member for Fort William has suggested, through the Boy Scouts organizations and other organizations of that kind, the life and work of this great citizen of Canada may be commemorated for generations.

I am glad to see that the government is placing in the estimates something a little more tangible than this bill indicates. I should like to see this amount made substantial enough that the work could be carried on or even expanded across Canada. In every province and region of this country we should have a preserve for wild life. I know there are others who wish to speak to-night, so that I shall close by saying again that I support this bill.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the house will expect that as one of the three members from Essex county I should join with the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) in the tributes that have been paid to a great citizen of Canada and a citizen of the county of Essex. Jack Miner was not only a great Canadian, he was one of those Canadians who became a citizen of the world. Because of his great love of bird life and wild life his name was perhaps known better in most countries of the world than almost any other Canadian. Few Canadians, apart from men like the Prime Minister (Mr.

Mackenzie King) and others, are as well known in our neighbouring country, the United States.

In paying a tribute to the hon. member who has introduced this bill, I should like to pay a tribute also to another hon. member who through the years has silently and vigorously fought to preserve in government places the name of Jack Miner. I refer to the hon. member for Essex South, in whose riding the Miner sanctuary is to be found. Jack Miner was a great friend of the hon. member for Essex South, as well as being one of his neighbours.

I myself had a contact with Jack Miner which went over a number of years. I knew him well and my family summered not very far from where this sanctuary is. I wish to pay a tribute to-night as well as to express a word of thanks for what the name of Jack Miner has meant, not only to the citizens I represent but to the family of which I have the honour to be the male parent. My children speak of Jack Miner, as do the children of Essex county, with a pride and gratitude that I am sure would gladden the heart of any hon. member.

I remember having the privilege on one occasion of visiting the home of a great bird lover in England, Sir Edward Grey. When he found out that I had come from Canada he asked me if I knew Jack Miner. As the house will recall, Sir Edward Grey and Theodore Roosevelt, great bird lovers themselves, found in the work of Jack Miner a great satisfaction which came to them in the evening of their very busy lives.

Essex county is proud of Jack Miner. Essex county, as the hon. member for Davenport has said, is one of the great counties of Canada. With great respect I would suggest that it is the greatest county in Canada. The tributes which have been paid to-night to one of her great citizens are tributes, not only to Jack Miner but to that county itself. I know the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) would have liked to join in these tributes to-night but for the fact that he had to leave the chamber. Jack Miner by his efforts has written the name of Canada in the skies of the world, and by the tributes we have paid him to-night we have written his name in the history books of our great country.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to-night to rise and support the bill proposed by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). All my life I have been a sportsman of one kind or another; I am very fond of fishing and of shooting. I knew Jack Miner for a great many years. I have visited his sanctuary and have fed his ducks when they came around me. One thing he taught me and the youth and people of this country was that sportsmanship did not mean hogging everything; namely, shooting for the sake of shooting or fishing for the sake of fishing. Jack Miner has taught many people that the Christian religion far transcends any form of greed. He has taught the youth of this country the love of the outdoors; he has taught them how to be temperate in all things that they do.

I venture to say that Jack Miner had more to do than anybody else in the formation of Ducks Unlimited in the northwest territory, the organization which has had so much to do with the increase of the duck population in Canada. He taught people that the great thing was to play the game for the sake of the game and not just for the sake of winning. Thousands of people have been taught that lesson by Jack Miner.

There is another thing. Jack Miner has, I believe, been more responsible than any other man for plotting the flight of wild life between the north and the south.

I shall not take up any more time, except again to congratulate my hon. friend upon bringing forward this bill, because we all know what a great asset Jack Miner was to Canada. He was not only a great Canadian but an internationalist as well.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there is little left for me to say except that I believe that if this house passes this bill it will be a fitting recognition by the members of the work of a great Canadian in this country. I believe also that the introduction of a Jack Miner day throughout Canada and its observance will focus the attention of Canadians from coast to coast upon the constant necessity of exercising great care in the conservation of our wild life. I wish to commend the hon. member for Davenport, (Mr. MacNicol) upon introducing this bill and to assure you, sir, and him through you, that I will give it my support.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, just before the minister rises to close the debate, may I at this late hour, without taking the risk of talking out the bill, simply say that we regard it as vital and that the Progressive Conservative party identifies itself with the moving of the second reading by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and wholeheartedly supports the proposal he has made.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, since it is almost eleven o'clock I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just say you will adopt it and we will get it through now.

Mr. GLEN: If the house will permit me to go on after eleven o'clock I shall be glad to proceed now.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, March 29, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

TABLING OF THIRD INTERIM REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps the house will allow me to table immediately copies in English of the third interim report of the royal commission established under order in council P.C. 411 of February 5, 1946. It is expected that copies of the report in French will be available for tabling shortly.

I may inform the house that appropriate action is being taken in accordance with the report in respect of such persons as are designated therein.

(On the orders of the day):

Mr. GRAYDON: I believe the tabling of the royal commission's third interim report is a matter of sufficient public interest to warrant some further elucidation from the Prime Minister. I take it that the report contains certain names of persons who have been apprehended or who will be charged later as a result of the report. It would be of interest to the house if the names of those persons, and the charges against them, were made public now rather than at the time of publication of the report itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend asking for the names of those named in the report I have just tabled?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can give them to the house. The names are: Eric Adams, Israel Halperin, Durnford Smith, J. S. Benning, and Squadron Leader F. W. Poland. That is the list.

Motion agreed to.

MILITIA ACT

PROVISION FOR PERMANENT FORCE—EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONNEL IN DEMOBILIZATION

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Militia Act whereby provision will be made for a permanent force of officers and men in number as may be authorized by the governor in council, and for the employment during the period of demobilization of such members of the military forces as may be deemed necessary for the orderly carrying out of such demobilization.

He said: His Excellency the Administrator, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

The bill to be founded upon the resolution will contain only two sections. One will amend section 22 of the Militia Act, to remove the present limitation of 10,000 placed upon the permanent force, and authorizing such number as may be authorized from time to time by the governor in council. The second section will amend section 63 of the act by adding a subsection to provide that members of the militia who are now on active service within the terms of the Militia Act, and who continue to be employed for a time in demobilization, may continue to receive the present rates of pay and allowances, including dependents' allowance, though they cease to be on active service within the terms of the Militia Act; and will be subject otherwise to the same provisions as though they were on active service, except for matters of discipline.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when the house adjourns on Wednesday, April 17, it stand adjourned until Wednesday, April 24, 1946.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In looking at this motion one thing about it strikes me; that is, that we are to close on a half day and meet again on a half day. It seems to me the house would be pretty well depleted if we closed on one half day and opened on another. Perhaps it would have been better to close on Tuesday and resume the following Tuesday or to close on Thursday and resume the following Thursday, or the following Tuesday, as the case may be. The two half days would seem to make it inadvisable to pass the motion as it is now worded, and I bring that matter to the attention of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought that in drafting the resolution in these terms I should be meeting the convenience of the house. If, however, hon. members would prefer to have the house adjourn on Tuesday, April 16, and stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 23, I should be quite prepared to alter the motion accordingly.

Mr. MacNICOL: The trouble is we have bought our railway tickets for the other dates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I really think it would be wiser to hold to the original motion. As a matter of fact it is a half day, but we can arrange the business of the house accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

LOAN TO UNITED KINGDOM

APPROVAL OF FINANCIAL AGREEMENT SIGNED MARCH 6, 1946

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to come into force in whole or in part on proclamation for the purpose of approving the financial agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom signed on March 6, 1946, and of granting authority, (a) to advance to the government of the United Kingdom before December 31, 1951, amounts not exceeding in the aggregate one thousand two hundred and fifty million dollars ($1,250,000,000); (b) to continue until January 1, 1951, the interest-free provision of the loan to the government of the United Kingdom under The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942; (c) to cancel the amount owing by the government of the United Kingdom to the government of Canada with respect to the British Commonwealth air training plan being the sum of four hundred and twenty-five million dollars ($425,000,000); (d) to borrow for the purpose of paragraph (a) under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, sums not exceeding one thousand two hundred and fifty million dollars ($1,250,000,000); and (e) to carry out the other provisions of the said agreement.

He said: His Excellency the Administrator, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. LaCROIX: On division.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STATEMENT AS TO INTERNATIONAL CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): With regard to the statement issued at Washington last evening that uranium and other material used in the production of atomic power, together with the scientific development of atomic energy, may be placed under international control and the manufacture of atomic bombs discontinued, I should like to ask if Canada gave prior consent to this statement being issued, which I think is a fairly satisfactory announcement if it means what it says.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was kind enough to send me notice of his question.

I understand the statement to which my hon. friend refers is a report which was presented to the Secretary of State of the United States, for his consideration, by an advisory committee on atomic energy. The proposals in this report, to judge from the summary which has appeared in the press, are of great interest and importance. So far as I am aware they have not been adopted as the policy of the government of the United States, and the Canadian government was not consulted by the committee which prepared the report. Until the full text of the report has been received and studied in Ottawa, it would be inappropriate for me to say anything more about the proposals contained in it.

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPLICATION FOR TRANSFER OF MOOSE JAW STATION TO CROWN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction concerning a matter which I believe still remains under his jurisdiction. Has a decision been reached with regard to the application made on January 28, 1946, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the transfer of radio station CHAB, Moose Jaw, to a crown company established by the province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The application referred to was duly received, and involves an important matter of government policy. It is now receiving the attention of the government, but no decision has been arrived at.

Mr. COLDWELL: May we expect an early decision?

Mr. HOWE: I hope so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUESTION AS TO SETTING UP OF SENIOR ADVISORY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister considered the setting up of a senior advisory council for defence, similar to the one set up recently by the President of the United States?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): The minister will consider anything. However, I have not had notice of the question; I shall take the matter into consideration.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

CANADIAN ARMY

RATES OF PAY FOR PERMANENT FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. At the last session he promised that before March 31 he would announce the rates of pay for members of the permanent force. Is he in a position to do that to-day?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I thank my hon. friend for his question, and would say that a statement was issued to the press to-day. A special committee set up to inquire into rates of pay has completed its report. It has been under consideration by treasury board. It was found necessary to refer the matter back to the committee for clarification in certain respects. and it may be a few days before the report is available in its final form. I therefore can state, as I have in the press statement issued to-day, that it may not be possible for me to make that announcement before April 15. I should hope it might be sooner, but I have given myself just that little extra time.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $273,197,945.73, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947, and $3,333,333.33 being an additional one-sixth of certain items of the said estimates, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty on account for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947.

He said: In this resolution the government is asking for an amount equal to one-sixth of the estimates. It would be impossible of course for the estimates as a whole to be voted within two months. Meantime moneys will be required to meet obligations of the government, and it was thought reasonable to ask for two months' supply.

I am afraid that the seasonal character of some of these commitments makes it improbable that one-sixth will be sufficient for two months. However, I have never asked for more than that, and I am not asking for more to-day.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is the usual resolution offered at this stage of the session. It provides for the financing of the government service for the period prior to the passing of the supply bill. If my memory serves me correctly, in previous sessions the amount granted to the government by way of interim supply has been an amount for two months, unless circumstances arose requiring a different procedure. In this case the official opposition is prepared to allow the government one-sixth of the total estimates for the fiscal year 1946-47.

I should like, however, to make the reservation which is always made by those in the opposition under similar circumstances; that is to require from the minister and from the government an undertaking in clear terms that by consenting to the passing of this interim supply we are in no way consenting to the general estimates being passed without criticism of government policy in connection with the expenditures proposed. We should like to have a clear statement from the minister so that our position may be preserved and we may be assured that by making these grants we shall not be prevented from having a full and thorough and untramelled criticism of the estimates. With that reservation, this party is prepared to accelerate and facilitate the business of the house by providing the funds necessary for the public service for this interim period.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have pleasure in giving the assurance that is given every year when interim supply is applied for. The voting of this interim supply does not prejudice the right that every member of the house has of opposing or criticizing any item in the estimates. It is not an admission that all the items of the estimates are justified or anything of the kind.

Mr. COLDWELL: With that assurance we agree to it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How soon does the minister expect to bring down the budget?

Mr. ILSLEY: The date of the bringing down of the budget will be announced in due course. I am not in position to announce the date as yet. I should say with regard to the one-sixth that is being asked for that there are two items for which an additional one-sixth is being requested.

Mr. GRAYDON: A third is being requested?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: What are the items?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is to provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, $10,000,000. Then item 611 is to provide recoverable advances for working capital, et cetera, $10,000,000. It might be necessary to use more than one-sixth of those items in the early part of the year.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the number of the first item?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a Department of Finance item which will be found on page 67 of the estimates. It will be understood that we are moving from one system to another. The system prevailing for the present fiscal year was to have main estimates for non-war purposes, plus a large vote for war demobilization and reconversion purposes. That system was completely flexible. But we have taken away all flexibility, with the exception of this item of $10,000,000. I am afraid that other contingencies we could not foresee will arise and it may be found that this item is too small. At any rate it is certainly small enough. This item is for only $10,000,000 and hon. members will remember that previously these items amounted to something like $3 billion and they could be applied to any purpose. This is the only item that could be applied to any purpose. The item reads:

> To provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses; for supplementing any of the appropriations in the demobilization and reconversion estimates; and for the temporary provision of recoverable advances for working capital purposes and for the re-advancing of any such advances repaid.

We cannot say that this item will be spent evenly over the next twelve months of the fiscal year. It may not be spent until the end, and it may be necessary to spend it nearly all at the beginning, but we must have a little more leeway than one-sixth.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister is asking the house to go farther than the house is prepared to go. We are giving the government two months supply, or one-sixth. If at the end of that two months' period it is found that the $10,000,000 has been spent or that the proportion which we are now voting, that is one-sixth, has been spent, then the government can come back to the house and seek further interim supply, and parliament can decide whether or not the request should be granted.

It does seem to me that this is the thin end of the wedge. The government is asking for something that I have never seen in my ten years of parliament. I have never seen interim supply of one-third granted to any government. I suggest to the minister that he leave the matter as we originally agreed, which is the agreement normally made by the parties in the house to facilitate government business, that is, allow one-sixth of the estimates. I may point out to the minister that there has been a good deal of argument and a great deal of debate as to whether we should allow to the government even one-sixth, having regard to the circumstances. I have argued on many occasions that even in war time perhaps only one-twelfth should be granted. We have been asked to agree to one-sixth, but in connection with one or two items the government seeks to increase that to a third. If it were a question of holding up the government on their expenditures it would be a different thing, but that is not involved. All it means is that it may be a little more inconvenient for the government, and that it provides perhaps another opportunity for the opposition to raise some questions on matters of public importance when these items are brought in again because the house is now in session.

The house will be in session for the next two months. If the government find that this appropriation is not enough to cover the exigencies of the circumstances, they can then come back and ask for more. I think on reflection the minister will not wish to change what has been a regularized practice, the voting of one-sixth to cover all items. Personally I am not satisfied that we should go any further, because the next time—I am not suggesting that this is the sin of any government in particular—they may want more. When you give a government an inch, they want a mile. In this case we do not want to give them that inch.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Like the opposition.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are some oppositions that look like governments and I take that compliment as being well meant. I think on reflection the minister will understand that I am not attempting to place a stumbling block in his way. But I do not want to set a precedent which in the days to come we might have to overcome. The time to stop it is before it begins.

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree with what the acting leader of the opposition has said. Unless the Minister of Finance can advance some better reason than that which he has given, I do not think the vote should be increased. If the house were not sitting I could understand that we might be justified in doing what he suggests. The minister may have in his mind some very urgent reasons why we should do it, but unless he can give some reasons more urgent than the ones we have heard already I shall be in agreement with the acting leader of the opposition in saying that we should stick to the one-sixth.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to spend too much time over this. I spoke to the leader of the opposition and told him that I would want more than one-sixth of two items, and I understood it would be all right. I made the mistake in not speaking to my hon. friend who has made such a powerful speech. I want to assure him that this is not something extraordinary. Nearly every year there are some items on which we ask for more than we are asking for generally. I have been held up several times just on that point. I have sought a twelfth or a sixth, as the case may be, and then there were certain supply items on which I would want more. It is all right, though. I may have to come back in a month's time—

Mr. GRAYDON: That will do you no harm.

Mr. ILSLEY: Except that it will mean another afternoon and evening taken up.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think it is the proper thing to do.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is to save time that I am asking for one-sixth instead of one-twelfth. As I said before, we have two $10,000,000 items here that are elastic. Last year the whole three billion dollars was elastic. But now we are moving from one system to another, which the house wanted us to do, and it would make it safer if we could have a little more than one-sixth of these two items to work on. It would obviate the necessity of coming back earlier than we otherwise would have to do. But it is just as the committee says.

Mr. GRAYDON: It would perhaps remove the minister's difficulties and ours if these two particular items were taken up early in committee of supply and adopted after due debate. This would obviate the necessity of asking for interim supply again so far as these particular items are concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: You would have to have a bill based on those two items.

Mr. HOWE: I am particularly interested in the second item No. 611.

May I point out that its purpose is to provide recoverable advances for working capital purposes. There are several enterprises that would be without sufficient working capital if we do not provide these recoverable advances. I suppose we could go to the chartered banks and make arrangements, but certainly we cannot operate without working capital.

Mr. GRAYDON: But you could come back to the house and get it.

Mr. HOWE: Working capital is something that we need right away.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is so, these estimates have been wrongly compiled. Here are two ministers who say that they expect to use all this money now. Surely this is a twelve-months year, and surely the minister has some idea of what he requires. If he is asking for only one-third of this particular item, how does he know that that will be enough? There is no guarantee in connection with it that I can see. If he wants to come back in two or three months' time and submits that he has used the money, parliament will grant him more. but I do not think we should give him a blank cheque.

Mr. COLDWELL: I take it that this is a case of using money in a revolving fund, and if that is so the minister has put an entirely different complexion upon the item. If what the Minister of Reconstruction says is correct and I believe it is, I think the Minister of Finance is making a mistake in asking for only one-third. I think we should deal with these two particular items on an entirely different basis from the ordinary estimates, and, instead of authorizing only a relatively small proportion, vote the whole ten million dollars.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other item, No. 505, also provides, for recoverable advances, but it is not limited to that. It provides also for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses. We think it reasonable to ask for a little more latitude on these two items because we are moving from one system to another and we do not want these arguments too often. I do not think the house wants to see us back within two months asking for interim supply. I doubt if this will last for two months. We would have asked for more of these recoverable advances if we had dared, but we are asking for only one-third, which will give us more latitude than one-sixth. No precedent is being set here. Let me make myself clear. Very often parliament is asked to grant one-twelfth or one-sixth, and sometimes a greater proportion is asked because of the seasonal character of the demands under certain items. Money may have to be spent early in the summer for some purpose, and so you pick out two or three items and in that way get quite a proportion of your expenditure by way of interim supply. But here we are asking for one-sixth of everything except of these two items, where we want more leeway.

Mr. COLDWELL: The second item, No. 611, is of an entirely different nature from the other item.

Mr. HOWE: It is not an expenditure because the money is to be returned.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it is not an expenditure.

Mr. STIRLING: Would one of the ministers explain the recoverable advances a little further? Am I to understand that the money so recovered passes into consolidated revenue and consequently is tied up and cannot be used for further expenditures? Is that the difficulty?

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty is that we require working capital. We have several businesses operated by crown companies—Polymer Corporation, for instance—which require working capital, temporary funds perhaps for inventory and purposes of the kind. This working capital is being advanced in the form of recoverable advances.

Previously the advances were made from the war appropriation. We have advanced at different times between two and three hundred million dollars, which has all been recovered except for a comparatively small sum. These items are not expenditures. They are simply accountable advances. Without them it would be necessary to operate through the banks.

Mr. FRASER: The Minister of Finance said that it was not setting a precedent to ask for special items to go through, but I do not think that we have done it in the last five or six years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. FRASER: When?

Mr. ILSLEY: We will send out and get the books. We have done it within the last two or three years; we have done it nearly every year.

Mr. FRASER: I do not remember any such item going through last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I agree with the Minister of Finance on one point, that perhaps there is no necessity of having a lengthy debate over this matter, and I simply want to state that the official opposition is not prepared to give consent to granting more than what we originally agreed to do, which I understand was one-sixth of the estimates; then if the government wants to come back for more we shall receive them with respect and with such leniency as the situation warrants. We are not holding anything up. We are just making our position clear, and I do not think anybody could ask us to do less than that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have to accept that, of course. It will mean that I shall have to come back earlier than I otherwise would, but I cannot help it. I ask that the resolution be amended accordingly, by striking out the words "and $3,333,333.33, being an additional one-sixth of certain items of the said estimates".

Mr. COLDWELL: What we are interested in is a thorough discussion of the expenditures which the government makes. The two items are not on the same footing. The first, No. 505, is an expenditure, and I agree with the leader of the opposition that we might limit that to one-sixth. The government is engaged in very important business operations. The minister mentioned the Polymer plant, and that organization and others like it come to this house and ask for what is in effect working capital, a revolving fund. It seems to me that this second item, which is not an expenditure if it is recoverable capital, is on a different footing, and we may be in effect making it very difficult for the minister to reconvert in some instances and carry on the important business operations involved in some of the institutions under his direction. I think the resolution might distinguish between the two, and we might treat each separately, dealing with 505, and then considering the other, 611, on an entirely different basis. I should be prepared to do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thank my hon. friend, but 505 also provides for recoverable advances. It foes further, I will admit, and provides for expenditures and recoverable advances. But they should both be treated in the same way. However, I am in the hands of the hon. member for Peel in this matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am glad you are in my hands. We had better pass it with the amendment.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The resolution will now read:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $273,197,945.73, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty on account for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MacINNIS: By how much is the amount asked for reduced by the amendment that has been made?

Mr. ILSLEY: By $3,333,333.33.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not get an answer to my question. We are voting money now for carrying on the business of Canada and every business man in the country has a real interest in knowing just how soon the budget is coming down and what it will mean when it does come down. I should like to have an answer to my question as to how soon it is coming down and what it will be all about. Will it be next September or December?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will announce the date of the budget as soon as I am able to do so, and I shall have to leave the announcement of its contents until the day I bring it down.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is precedent for that.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Chairman, we cannot hear what is going on. This conversational tone between the minister and members directly opposite him is all very well, but we do not know what is taking place. We are not clairvoyant, the minister is not clairvoyant, and we do not know what he is talking about.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947, the sum of $273,197,945.73 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 11, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1947.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On the preamble:

Mr. GRAYDON: It would be helpful if we had the bill.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the preamble carry?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Where is the bill?

Preamble agreed to.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I object to the title passing until we know what is in the bill.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This act may be cited as the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1946.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3:

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the section that has been deleted. Renumber section 4; make it section 3.

New section 3 and section 4 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Before the bill is read a third time I should like to say a word in connection with it. We have passed a bill giving the government authority to expend a certain sum of money. We had some debate on whether or not we would allow the government to have that privilege. I doubt whether there is a member in this chamber who knows exactly what is in the bill just passed—I am certain that I do not. I doubt whether there is anyone who knows anything about it except the Clerk. He directed the chairman and the chairman read the sections in a tone of voice that could not be heard more than a few seats from where he was sitting. We should be more businesslike in putting these bills through the house if we are going to put as much emphasis on what we are to give the government authority to do as was indicated when the resolution was before us. As a matter of fact anything could have gone into the bill and I doubt whether any hon. member would have been any the wiser.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. BENTLEY: On division; I do not know what it is all about.

Mr. SPEAKER: On division.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

648. Departmental administration — further amount required, $14,795.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister tell us what this is all about?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a word to say. I did not get an answer as to when the budget was to be brought down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Hon. members may laugh, but there are a lot of business men in this country who are not laughing. They want to know what is going on. What I want to know is when the budget is coming down. The business men of Canada want to know what they are going to have to provide for. Has the government any idea of what it is going to do, or is it still wandering along in the same foggy nebulous atmosphere? We want to know what is going to happen. Are we to have the budget early or not? How can business men carry on if they do not know what is to happen? How can you go on with your work if you are uncertain about what is to happen in the future? Unless a business man knows what is coming in regard to taxes, how is he to continue to carry on? We gave money to the government a little while ago; we are going to give it some more in a few months. As representatives of the people, before we vote this money we want to be assured that our rights will not be taken away from us so far as taxation is concerned.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat. I have a question to ask about an item which I understood was to be in the supplementary estimates. It has to do with a grant to the Canadian Seed Growers Association. I have had some correspondence with farmers in my riding who were under the impression that an item of $6,100 was to be brought down in the supplementary estimates last fall, but for some reason or other it was overlooked. It was thought it would be included in the supplementary estimates before the end of the year. I have a letter which indicates that the association is entirely dependent on a grant from the dominion government. In 1928 the grant was $13,000. The number of varieties serviced was thirty-three. In 1932 the grant was raised to $18,900 and serviced 79 varieties and 1,400 individuals. On the same grant the management is endeavouring to furnish service to 295 varieties grown by 3,102 individuals.

Here the department is voting some additional money; in the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1947, I understand there is a new item of $5,000 for the Canadian Hunter, Saddle and Light Horse Improvement Society. I have no special quarrel with those who are interested in saddle and hunting horse development, but it would appear to me that money expended in promoting the work of the seed growers throughout the country would be much more usefully spent. I wonder if whoever is acting for the Minister of Agriculture can give some information as to whether this amount of $6,100 might be provided for the association next year.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Minister of Agriculture is not here, but that increased grant is not provided for in the present fiscal year. It is, however, provided for in the coming year; that is, there is an additional $6,100 in the main estimates for the coming year, as I think the hon. gentleman will find if he looks at those estimates. This now is up to a fairly substantial amount. There was an application during the present fiscal year for that grant, which was denied last fall and again when these supplementary estimates were being prepared.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The item will be included for the coming year?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is there.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How about making some provision for the expenses they have incurred in the past on the understanding that these funds would be made available?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not provided for, and they could not have had any firm understanding. Perhaps they had an understanding from the Department of Agriculture that it would be recommended, but many grants are recommended that never find their way into these estimates.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Marketing service—

650. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses, under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $31,846.31.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the Minister of Finance explain the difference between a subsidy and a grant under the Cold Storage Act? We are accustomed to see the grants every year, but I do not understand what a subsidy is under that act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Subsidies are provided for, and I think under the name of subsidies, in the Cold Storage Act. The part of this item which relates to subsidies relates to those statutory subsidies paid under the act. There are cases which cannot quite qualify under the terms of the act, and frequently in those cases grants are made by specific items in the estimates. It is for that reason that the two terms are used, subsidies and grants. I may say that grants are never paid except on the same scale as the subsidies; there is the most complete uniformity of treatment of enterprises, whether they get grants or subsidies. In some cases they get subsidies and in other cases they get grants.

Mr. STIRLING: Year after year in these estimates, and the explanations which are given, we see a list such as we have here; and they are under the head of grants. Under the Cold Storage Act, if my memory serves me right, fifteen per cent is paid the first year and other proportions in subsequent years. Year after year they come under the head of grants.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: If that is the normal way in which these amounts are paid, then in my opinion a subsidy must be something quite different. It looks as if it went back to the earlier days, when subsidies were paid.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. If my hon. friend followed me I think he will find that I stated the case with complete accuracy. If he will look at page 6 of the details of the supplementary estimates he will find, under the heading "Marketing Service":

Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act and grants.

Subsidies

Owen Sound Cold Storage Limited, Owen Sound, Ontario, $5,363.37.

That is a subsidy.

Mr. STIRLING: But the grants are ones that appear year after year.

Mr. ILSLEY: But there are subsidies which are payable under the act, and grants; and it is the grants, as I have always understood the matter, which are frequently paid when the enterprise cannot qualify under the Cold Storage Act. Perhaps it was started before the plans were approved.

Marketing Service—

651. Fruit, vegetable and maple products and honey—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not rising to oppose this item, which is fairly substantial, but can the minister give the house any idea why such an amount was required for temporary services?

Mr. ILSLEY: The item for temporary assistance amounts to $35,000. The explanation for that item is as follows. A carry-over of $6,837.51 of 1944-45 salaries paid out of the 1946-47 appropriation; unusually heavy shipments of potatoes from the maritimes and Quebec from April to June, 1945, necessitating the retention of inspectors in this area for longer than usual periods; pear psylla investigations in British Columbia; the establishment of a maturity inspection service on all fruits entering British Columbia shipping warehouses, and the return of a number of inspectors from military service, all resulted in the amount provided for temporary salaries proving insufficient.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

652. Passport office—administration—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question in connection with this item. I recall that I asked him a question last session, when I first came down, and it is still unanswered. I hope the right hon. gentleman may find this one a little less controversial. It has to do with the granting of permits for travel to the United Kingdom. I think all hon. members are in receipt of numerous inquiries from people as to why they cannot be allowed to go there. Can the right hon. gentleman tell us whether there is any possibility of relaxation shortly in the restrictions on travel to the United Kingdom, or what is the present position?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend doubtless knows, the question is largely one of transportation and of priorities in regard to certain classes that are necessarily given first consideration. From day to day the restrictions are being somewhat relaxed, but it has not been possible to remove them all thus far.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the item carries I do not think it is out of place to say a word by way of compliment to the passport office for the way it carried on during very trying times in the last few years. I doubt if any other office in the public service was so crushed with overwork as was the passport office. I had a great many contacts with that office, and always experienced the utmost civility. While sometimes I may have thought they were a little slow, when I would go down and see the enormous amount of work they had to do I knew I was being impatient in making an effort to rush them. I want to congratulate the Prime Minister on the way this particular branch of his department carried on during very trying times.

Mr. FRASER: I understand that during past years the salaries paid to those employed in the passport office have been about as poor as those in any department of the government, if not poorer. Employees in the passport office are trained until they become efficient, and when they reach that stage they find jobs in some other departments, and obtain transfers. These changes of personnel in the passport office have made matters extremely difficult for those in charge. Is there any possibility of offering them some incentive to stay in the passport office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There have been times when the passport office has been heavily pressed, and also times when other branches of the government service have been even more pressed to obtain the necessary assistance to carry on the work during the war. There was a time when matters eased up to some extent, so far as passports were concerned, with the result that some transfers were made from the passport office to other branches of the public service.

I agree with my hon. friend that salaries which have been paid for certain classes of work in the public service, and particularly in the passport office, have not been—well, to say the least, anything out of the way. However, the whole question of salaries is one that will have to be gone into more completely than has thus far been possible. This is being done at the present time by the government. It is related to the whole matter of the regulation of wages, during the period of the war, and in the present transition period. I believe the reason some salaries have not been changed lies in the relationship between salaries in the civil service and salaries in industry. However, the whole matter will come up for further review, now that the period of the war is over.

Mr. FRASER: Just one further point about the passport office. It certainly is a dismal looking place. One goes up those back stairs

—I have been up and down many times. I have always received good service, but I realize that they are working under difficulties. Some change should be made, so far as their office space is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very glad the hon. member has raised this point. I wish the passport office were the only dismal place in the service. As hon. members know, practically all departments of government are overcrowded, and lacking adequate space. However, we hope that when we ask for some additional sums to construct necessary public buildings we may have the support of hon. members opposite.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Peterborough West in what he has said respecting the passport office. They have functioned well during these years, and deserve the commendation of hon. members.

Mr. COLDWELL: What progress has been made in connection with the exchange of views regarding passage across the border between our two countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A committee of our officials has been meeting with officials of the United States. I cannot say, however, just what the present status of their negotiations is.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the negotiations are proceeding, are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, they are.

Mr. FRASER: Women proceeding to Great Britain have to have exit permits, on which they must state that they are going to reside in Great Britain either permanently, or for at least one or two years. However, in the event of something happening in Canada before the expiration of that time, those persons have to apply in Great Britain to the high commissioner for transportation back to Canada. On such occasions they are treated not as Canadians, but rather as immigrants, and must take their chances on the quota. What is the present situation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Regulations respecting admission to Great Britain are made by the British government, not by this government, but we require at present an exit permit before women are permitted to leave Canada. Persons coming to Canada fall under the general regulations. I am unable to say whether or not persons such as those described by the hon. member are covered by them. I should not think, however, that there have been any special requirements, other than those having general application.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. FRASER: A Canadian woman may visit Great Britain to see relatives she may not have seen for ten years. While there, however, a close relative may die here in Canada, requiring her return. She has to apply for permission to come back to Canada, but upon her return is not treated as a Canadian. She is treated as an immigrant.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say offhand what the immigration regulations are. The minister might help on that point, but I shall try to secure the information for the hon. member.

Mr. REID: I believe the passport office is the only important office in Ottawa in which the chief has not a telephone of his own. When one telephones the chief of the passport division he must wait for some time until that official is hunted down and brought to the telephone. I should hope that the chief of a branch as important as the passport branch should at least have a telephone of his own.

External Affairs—

654. To provide for expenses of the Canadian delegation to Bermuda for discussions with delegates from the United Kingdom and Newfoundland on civil aviation, $1,500.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why is this item not included in the supplementary estimates for the Department of Transport, or some department other than External Affairs? It seems to me it might more properly belong at some other point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is an amount spent in connection with a delegation visiting another part of the world. The Department of External Affairs has had general supervision over all delegations which have been travelling. I should think this would be the most appropriate place to have the item.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will it be the policy of the government to charge to the Department of External Affairs the cost of all delegations visiting international conferences? It seems to me that this is a most exceptional circumstance, and that the estimate should be included among those of the Department of Transport Is it to be the policy of the government that all moneys spent abroad for the attendance of members of this government, or of its appointees, at international conferences, shall be charged to the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe each case will have to be considered on its merits or attendant circumstances. In some cases, expenses will be charged to a particular department of government, and in other cases it might be more appropriate to charge them against the Department of External Affairs.

Canada's contributions to the maintenance of external organizations—

656. Contribution towards the operational expenses of the intergovernmental committee on refugees for the year 1945—further amount required, $215,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I rise to support the item, because I believe the work of the organization is excellent. This is the first opportunity at this session I have had to speak about refugees, and on this occasion I shall be brief.

A few days ago a gentleman got in touch with me about his brother who is in Sweden. That brother is the last living relative of the family in Europe; all the rest are dead. Other members of the family are in Canada. I might point out that the person about whom I am speaking is of Jewish origin and, as the committee knows, no race in the world's history has endured the calamity endured by the Jewish race during the war. Is there to be any loosening of the regulations so that that brother, or others in similar positions—and undoubtedly there are numbers of them—may reunite with his family?

I have another case of a girl who is now in Munich who happens to be the only living relative of another family I have in mind. I was wondering if we could not open up our hearts as Christians should and allow that girl, and others like her, to come here to join her family. I know of many of these people, and I am sure all hon. members have similar knowledge. I have a great deal of sympathy for them in view of what they have gone through and what those here with single relatives still living in Europe are suffering in mind.

Yesterday I had lunch with a doctor and he told me he was going to inspect a Jewish hospital. He was loud in his praise of what the Jews in Canada have done for medicine. If these last living refugee relatives in Europe of families in Canada are permitted to come in they may bring something with them to help to build up this country. They will bring intelligence and ability and all those things that go to make a nation. Could the Prime Minister tell us if there will be any loosening up of the regulations?

Mr. COLDWELL: Could not the government consider adopting the policy which was recently adopted by Great Britain? Displaced persons or refugees who are relatives of persons living in Great Britain are permitted to enter upon request being made and certain assurances being given by those persons in Great Britain. It seems to me that if the British people with their many problems can open their hearts in this way, a country like Canada with its sparse population can give refuge at least to persons in the situation just referred to by the hon. member for Davenport.

I also have knowledge of cases of this description. From time to time I have brought them to the attention of the department of immigration, and I must say that the officers of the department have always given the most courteous consideration to those cases. However, it is difficult to get a decision favourable in all respects even though many representations have been made over a considerable length of time. Yesterday the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) brought a phase of this matter to the attention of the house, that having to do with refugee children. I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but we are most anxious to see our country give refuge to those who have suffered, regardless of race or religion, particularly when they are relatives of persons in Canada who can offer them a home and a new beginning in life.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rose originally to make an observation in connection with the intergovernmental committee on refugees. The present refugees commission was the subject of a great deal of controversy at the united nations preparatory commission and again at the general assembly. At that time discussion was had as to the advisability of setting up such a commission for the purpose of taking over the work of the old league of nations, and that would seem to be envisaged by this item having to do with the intergovernmental committee on refugees.

Perhaps the Prime Minister may desire to get further information in connection with the question I intend to ask, but I should like to know if he has any knowledge as to whether or not this is the last grant that will be made to this committee and if from now on this work will be covered by our contribution to the united nations organization. There must be some time when the work of the intergovernmental committee will cease and the work of the new refugees commission will commence under the economic and social council of the united nations. As I said a moment ago, the Prime Minister may want to reinforce his information from departmental sources, but it would be interesting to know just when the one ends and the other starts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had anticipated that the committee would ask for an explanation of this item and I can give the departmental view on the matter. The intergovernmental committee on refugees, of which Canada is a member, was organized in 1938 with the primary object of facilitating the emigration from Germany and Austria of persons who were victims of nazi persecution. The scope of the committee's work is defined in article 2 of the rules for the constitution of the committee:

> The mandate of the committee extends to all persons wherever they may be, who, as a result of events in Europe have had to leave or may have to leave their countries of residence because of the danger to their lives or liberties on account of their race, religion, or political beliefs.

The outbreak of war and consequent military operations drastically limited the activities of the committee, yet vastly increased the problems for which it had been created. By the summer of 1945 the United Kingdom government, in particular, came to the conclusion that the intergovernmental committee, even as reconstituted in 1943, was inadequate to deal with the tremendous problem of refugees and that the establishment of new international machinery was imperative.

At the recent meeting of the united nations in London, therefore, the United Kingdom government urged that the refugee problem should be referred to the economic and social council for "thorough examination in all its aspects". This resolution was adopted by the general assembly on February 12, 1946.

On February 20 the economic and social council established a committee to examine the problem of refugees and displaced persons "of all categories" and to make a report thereon to the council at its second session, in May of this year. This committee was to be known as the committee on refugees and displaced persons and was to consist of one representative from each of twenty member nations, including Canada. On March 2 the Canadian government was advised that the first meeting of this committee would be held in London on April 8. Mr. J. G. Turgeon, as representative, and Mr. R. G. Riddell, as alternate, have been appointed to represent Canada at this meeting.

In establishing this new committee on February 20, the economic and social council decided that the director of the intergovernmental committee on refugees should be invited to sit with the new committee in a consultative capacity. Pending the establishment of new machinery for dealing with the refugee problem by this committee, the intergovernmental committee will carry on with its functions.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Then, in regard to the moneys which are required, on September 17 last it was approved that a contribution of £11,368 be made to the intergovernmental committee on refugees as Canada's share in the operational expenses of that organization for 1944. It was subsequently decided that Canada should not be asked for a contribution for 1944, but that our share of the 1944 budget should be included in a contribution for 1945.

The operating expenses of the intergovernmental committee on refugees for 1945 have been estimated as £1,100,000, and the Canadian representative at the plenary session of the committee has suggested that we base our contribution on this estimate. On the assumption that we should meet the same proportion of the operational expenses as we do of administrative expenditures for this organization, our contribution on this account for the year 1945 would be £48,263, or $214,770.35 Canadian. An amount of $215,000 was submitted. This amount may be compared with a contribution of £350,000 which is made by France.

As my hon. friend is aware, the whole matter is in the state of transition at the moment. I cannot say to him any more than that the new organization is being formed to take over the work of the old one. In regard to what the hon. member for Davenport has said, I would tell him, as he is aware, that the whole question of refugees is about the most difficult problem with which any administration is faced at the present time. So far as Canada is concerned, the one pressing feature is the question of transportation and what is involved there, as well as the number of cases which, so far as Canada is concerned, must be carefully examined in relation to the existing situation. We have at the present time a committee of the cabinet specially charged with going into the whole matter of the position of refugees but up to the present time we have not been able to admit any large number. Transportation difficulties, as I have said, would of themselves prevent that, but as the situation in the world changes we hope to take a more liberal attitude than it has been possible to take in the past.

Canada's Contribution to the maintenance of external organizations—

657. Contribution to the united nations organization working capital fund to provide working capital for the operations of the organization pending assessment and collection of regular contributions, $1,205,302.50.

Mr. FRASER: This is just to meet the requirements pending assessment? It will come off our regular contribution later?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The item makes it clear. It is a contribution to the united nations organization working capital fund to provide working capital for the operations of the organization pending assessment and collection of regular contributions. Once the regular contributions are agreed upon, this item of course will be dropped.

Mr. FRASER: It will be taken off?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can the Prime Minister inform the committee what is the likely amount which Canada will be obliged to contribute next year, for instance, toward the finances of the united nations organization?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That also is a question that I expected might be asked and I have the information.

Under the working capital fund arrangement adopted at the first session of UNO Canada's contribution (advance) will be 4·362 per cent of the $25,000,000 (U.S.) total or $1,090,500 (U.S.)

Basis of allocation.—The basis of allocation of contributions to the working capital fund is the average between the scales for the first and second financial years of the food and agricultural organization. This basis was adopted as a pure matter of convenience, and is well and thoroughly understood to constitute no precedent for the regular UNO allocation of expenses amongst members. The latter will be determined by the general assembly of UNO at the session in September following report of a ten-member committee on contributions. The factors to be taken into account with reference to the regular allocation will include national income and per capita income.

Working capital fund.—The working capital fund was fixed at $25,000,000 (U.S.), notwithstanding that the provisional budget was eventually cut to $21,500,000 (U.S.). The purpose of the working capital fund at this stage is to finance the expenditures included in the provisional budget, that is, expenses of the preparatory commission and of the first meeting of the assembly up to January 31, 1946, and expenses of the united nations organization for the year 1946. These were estimated at $21,500,000 under the provisional budget, which will be superseded at the next session of the assembly in September by the first regular annual budget, which may be more or less than the provisional figure of $21,500,000. The excess of the working capital fund total over the provisional estimate figure was considered desirable to allow for possible delays in working capital fund advances on the part of some members. While, as noted hereunder, 1946 contributions will also be called in 1946 following approval of the 1946 regular budget in September, the amount of these contributions which will be received before the end of the calendar year is problematical.

Advances to the working capital fund are just that—advances, and will stand as credits to the respective members. Presentation of regular estimates to the next session will be followed by calls for contributions to finance the 1946 appropriations. Under the resolutions adopted the assembly will decide at the September session the amount at which the working capital fund will be established on a permanent basis. However, the only adjustments contemplated against 1946 contributions to the regular budget are those involved in readjustment of working capital fund advances into line with the regular scale of contributions adopted at that time. Estimates for 1947 will be approved at the same session (September 1946) and contributions will be assessed in accordance with the regular scale, payable, however, only after January 1, 1947. Any reduction of the level of the permanent working capital fund might operate at that stage as a set-off against 1947 contributions.

Capital expenditures.—It might be that if a capital construction programme involving purchase of lands and construction of buildings is inaugurated in late 1946 or in 1947, any major adjustments in working capital fund advances would operate against assessments for capital expenditure, and would not effect any appreciable reduction in contributions for current account expenditures. According to very tentative estimates such capital expenditures for land and buildings might reach some $40,000,000 over a three-year period. The actual plans are very undecided at the moment. Consideration was given at one stage to financing the capital items by a loan from one of the international financial agencies, the plan being that properties in the prospective 45-acre site would remain with former owners or others on a rental basis until required to assist with amortization of the loan.

On the credit side Canada will qualify for substantial book credit on the UNO books consequent upon transfer of the league's material assets to UNO slated for August 1, 1946. It must be appreciated, however, that the amount of transferable or usable credit involved in this transaction will be limited to something less than the book credit. In the first place book credits will be established in respect not only of a few but of several of the UNO members, (i.e. internal adjustments between UNO members will be limited) and the credits will be covered off not by cash available for expenditure but by material assets assessable against all members, including Canada.

Mr. BROOKS: Do we pay the expenses of our own delegates to meetings of united nations organization, or are they paid out of the general fund raised by assessing each member nation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For expenses in general, the situation varies. I know of some cases where representatives of Canada have gone to the United Kingdom and the United Kingdom has not only requested but insisted that she should meet the expenses of the delegates. On the other hand the expenses of our delegates to the united nations organization have been met by the government of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does that mean that in addition to this contribution for which Canada will be assessed, we also pay the cost of sending our delegates to the united nations meetings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, we will pay the cost of sending our own delegation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the Prime Minister give us some idea of what that would be?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I could not, at the moment.

Item agreed to.

FINANCE

658. Bank inspection (inspector general of banks' office)—further amount required, $75,000.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is to pay the cost of the increased work in examining the records of banks and keeping closely in touch with the banks.

Mr. FRASER: This amount of $75,000 is quite a jump from last year's estimate of $27,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, a lot of special work is being done in connection with examining the books and records of the banks.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. FRASER: Is that on account of the banks having to pass on to you information re interest? Has that any anything to do with it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not with regard to interest. A new inspector general of banks was appointed within the last year, and it was found that the banks were keeping their books in different ways, that their practices were not uniform, so that the new inspector general instituted a thorough examination of the books and records of the banks mainly for the purpose of getting their accounting practices uniform so that we could compare the information we get about one bank with the information we get about another.

Mr. FRASER: This $75,000 will be the same next year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I doubt it.

Mr. FRASER: Will it be reduced?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not anticipate that this particular work will have to go on very long. As a matter of fact, a good deal of the work is being done by what are known as shareholders auditors who are reporting to the inspector general and working under his direction. That is not necessarily permanent and I do not think it will be.

Item agreed to.

General—

660. To provide for the expenses of the comptroller of the treasury's office—further amount required, $190,000.

Mr. PROBE: Does the auditor general's department come under the comptroller of the treasury's office?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The auditor general does not. He is an officer of parliament, appointed by parliament, and reports to parliament through the Minister of Finance, but he is not an officer of the Department of Finance.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is pretty nearly the same thing. What is the difference between the government appointing him and parliament appointing him?

Mr. PROBE: Does the comptroller of the treasury exercise any control over cheques issued by the government of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. PROBE: Assuming that a cheque has been issued on the basis of a request from a department, the comptroller of the treasury is responsible to the auditor general?

Mr. ILSLEY: The comptroller of the treasury is responsible to the Minister of Finance. He is an officer of the Department of Finance and he does not report to the auditor general. The auditor general exercises an independent position by virtue of the fact that he is an officer of parliament, and he reviews such practices and operations of the comptroller of the treasury as he wishes to do.

Mr. PROBE: In the auditor general's report, at the end of the public accounts for the year 1945, I see quite a number of items that are queried. Does the comptroller of the treasury take steps to recover improper payments or anything of the sort when they are drawn to his attention?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what my hon. friend means by improper payments. If payments are legally recoverable, of course we would. I do not know whether it is the comptroller of the treasury or myself, but somebody goes right after them at once. I think the criticisms of the auditor general are criticisms, not of illegal expenditures—I do not think there are any illegal expenditures—but rather of the advisability of expenditures.

Mr. PROBE: It might have been better to say inadvisable or unauthorized expenditures.

Mr. ILSLEY: What the auditor general states in his report is naturally of much concern to the government. We do not want to be criticized by the auditor general more than we can help, but sometimes the opinion of the auditor general differs from that of the government as to what is advisable.

Mr. PROBE: Does the minister as Minister of Finance, when a financial matter is called to his attention, follow it through and get the action that is suggested? I wish to call attention particularly to an expenditure which has been given some publicity in the press and which appears on page 41 of the auditor general's report, section 157. I quote:

> Mr. Justice G. B. O'Connor of Edmonton is chairman of the Wartime Labour Relations Board, and Mr. Justice M. B. Archibald of Halifax is chairman of the National War Labour Board. Ottawa is headquarters of the boards. Order in Council P.C. 80/5000 of June 29, 1944, accepts the following submission by the Minister of Labour:
> The undersigned has the honour to refer to orders in council P.C. 1895 and 1896 of March 16, 1944, appointing Mr. Justice G. B. O'Connor, Chairman of the Wartime Labour Relations Board and to P.C. 1986 and 1987 appointing Mr. Justice M. B. Archibald, Chairman of the National War Labour Board;
>
> And to report that while authority has been granted to pay the travelling and living expenses of the chairmen above referred to while absent from their places of residence, the undersigned arranged with Messrs. Justice O'Connor and Archibald that Mrs. O'Connor and Mrs. Archibald's necessary living and travelling expenses while absent from their places of residence, while accompanying their husbands in the discharge of their duties, would be paid by the department;
>
> The undersigned, therefore, begs to recommend that authority be granted to pay the necessary living and travelling expenses of Mrs. O'Connor and Mrs. Archibald while away from their homes accompanying their husbands while they are discharging their duties as chairmen of the boards to which they have been appointed.
>
> The order in council is silent as to the authority relied on for the making. Attention is drawn to the provision for payment of expenses of Mesdames O'Connor and Archibald, as it is an exception from practice. In the fiscal year $8,658.33 was paid to Judge O'Connor and $6,150.01 to Judge Archibald by way of travelling and living expenses. These sums include claims paid with respect to travel and living expenses of Mrs. O'Connor and Mrs. Archibald when travelling from home to Ottawa, at Ottawa, and when travelling with their husbands to various points in Canada.

The point I wish to make is this. Does the comptroller of the treasury investigate any criticisms such as the one made here?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The comptroller of the treasury could not do anything in these cases except to comply with the order in council or the treasury board minute authorizing payment of these judges on that basis. The comptroller of the treasury would simply look at the order in council or the treasury minute and follow that. The criticism of the auditor general is not a criticism of the comptroller of the treasury but of the government in that case for making that arrangement for these two judges. I remember the expenditure well, and I recall the sequence of events. One of the departments of government made that arrangement with one of these judges. They had to make that arrangement in order to get him to come. As the auditor general says, it is out of line with the general practice, but, after all, there was authority to pay the judges—

Mr. PROBE: I am not querying the payment of the judges.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but there was authority to pay them. Ordinarily, in time of peace, there is no authority to pay judges, but there was under the War Measures Act such authority to pay them for doing special war services. It did not seem to make very much difference whether a judge was paid 50 per cent more per diem for himself—or thereabouts—or whether his wife's expenses were paid. That arrangement was made in one case, and in another it was exactly similar. At a certain stage the treasury board made up its mind that this type of remuneration should not be extended but should be cut out, and therefore when other cases started to come before us, where a similar arrangement was recommended by a department, we sent them back and said, "Either pay them more per day or do something, but do not pay the wife's expenses." There are two or three judges—I do not know whether it is confined to these, but there are two or three in exactly comparable circumstances, who were paid on that basis. There have been many other judges in respect of whom a similar matter came up when the treasury board decided not to extend the practice. We did many exceptional things under stress of circumstances in time of war. Sometimes one tries desperately to get some man to take hold of something or another the next day and he attaches importance to some peculiar arrangement like that. After all, it does not make much difference financially which method is followed. I agree with the auditor general that it is an unusual practice and one which should not be extended.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is amazing that a person in Judge Archibald's position, who every day turned down requests for increased wages by people who were barely getting enough on which to exist, insisting on his own travelling expenses; that he would not undertake a position of this kind when the nation needed a person to do this work, unless he received his expenses. I am not at all convinced that Judge Archibald was just the man to do it. As a matter of fact, the consensus of the two large labour bodies is that if the national war labour board is to continue with Judge Archibald as chairman it might as well be abolished. Every day he turned down requests for increased wages, and yet he made it a condition of his serving the government that his wife should receive her expenses while she was here, and that he should receive his. It is an astounding state of affairs.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know Judge Archibald well; I have high respect for the quality of the service that he has rendered. I am not now talking about his decisions as head of the national war labour board, although I have no criticism of the decisions of Judge Archibald. During the war he put in a great deal of hard work and I certainly do not think that he has been overpaid in any particular.

Mr. MacINNIS: Neither were the workers whose requests for increased wages he turned down.

Mr. ILSLEY: Here again I do not think the hon. member's criticism should be directed to Mr. Justice Archibald or to the national war labour board. If it is valid criticism it should be directed to the persons who are responsible for framing the order, namely, the government. The national war labour board had to carry out the order. I do not want to take all the burdens and attract all the blame, but I not not think it is just to attack boards and officials who are administering orders in council. If there is anything wrong it is in the order in council itself. We think the orders in council were all right. We thought they were necessary as part of our anti-inflation policy. The national war labour board tried its best to carry out these orders according to the letter, spirit and intent. At any rate I do not think it shoud be criticized for what is in the orders in council.

Item agreed to.

FISHERIES

Department of Fisheries—

661. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing, and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 8 and 19, 1942—further amount required, $100,361.34.

Mr. McLURE: Year after year this committee goes on voting money and I do not believe one-half of the members in the committee know what it is for. This is money voted to a partnership which is doing business, and have possibilities of doing a large business running anywhere from $6,000,000 to $25,000,000 annually. Canada is a one-fifth partner in this two-partner business. Can the minister tell us what Canada's net profit was in last year's business? There must be a record. If there is no net profit, why should we continue voting hundreds of thousands of dollars annually without knowing whether this business is on a paying basis. The item says that this amount is to provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing, and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins. Should we not have a breakdown of these different items? To whom are they paid? Are they all paid direct to the company or to the different companies that do the manufacturing and disposing of the skins? We were practically promised the information during last session. I should like to hear from the minister in regard to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have a small amount of information with reference to this item. Its purpose is to provide for a book-keeping entry. It had been the practice where fur seal skins were processed and dyed and then sold in the United States, for the department to receive the net proceeds with a statement showing the gross proceeds and expenses.

The treasury officers have ruled that the expenditures should really be shown as such in the record. The amount shown herein covers expenses on skins sold in the United States in 1944 and 1945. The gross revenue was $242,537.53 or a net gain to Canada of $142,176.19.

Mr. McLURE: I take it the minister has given us a full report for 1945. On how many skins was that based? I understand that the take-off was very large last year and that this year it will be much larger, because a larger amount is being asked for, for this business. Out of a business of over $7 or $8 million worth of raw material taken from the ocean it is strange that there should be a profit of only $142.000 to the one-fifth partner. There is something radically wrong with that amount of net profit. If the minister had given $1,142,000 as the net profit I should say he would be nearer to being correct. In the interest of Canada I think this is one item that should be revenue producing. I believe that we should look into it more carefully. We sit here in the committee and pass items for hundreds of thousands of dollars and we do not know whether it is of benefit to us; yet it is the taxpayers' money that we are voting away. I shall not be satisfied until I see a break-down of items similar to this one, and this one in particular, showing whether the business is properly conducted by the authorities who are handling it and that we as the one-fifth partner in it are getting our rightful share of the profits.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall take careful account of the hon. member's remarks and convey them to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, who is unavoidably absent to-day. I shall see that the information the hon. member has asked for is obtained as soon as possible.

Mr. McLURE: May the item be allowed to stand?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; this is a further supplementary estimate. If items are to be allowed to stand we might as well let them all stand, because the whole purpose of going ahead now is to pass them.

Mr. McLURE: Continue with the remainder.

Mr. PEARKES: This item refers to skins of the fur seals which are slaughtered on the islands of the Bering sea. Are they transported by Canadian or United States boats? Is all the processing done in the United States? Is it not possible for us to transport our share of the skins from the islands in Canadian boats? Could not the processing be done in part in Canada instead of its all being done in Chicago?
