Mr. MACKENZIE: As my hon. friend indicated, for many years an arrangement existed with the United States government whereby the Canadian share of fur seal skins accruing to Canada under treaty provisions, from the take at the Pribilof islands, was processed and marketed with the United States government skins. Consequently, instead of receiving fifteen per cent of skins in kind, the Canadian government received the equivalent of fifteen per cent of the net proceeds.

Mr. McLURE: Twenty per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Fifteen per cent; this information comes from an official of the department. Under this arrangement no appropriation was necessary for expenses of processing. marketing and so on, of the skins, because all such expenses were taken care of by the United States government prior to division of the net proceeds.

Since 1933 Canada has been taking the annual share of skins in kind, and they have, with the exception of some skins during recent war years, all been sent to London for processing. Appropriations have been made available annually to provide processing and marketing costs. For 1945-46 the appropriation is $300,000.

As above indicated, arrangements were made during several of the war years for part of the Canadian share of skins to be processed and marketed along with United States government skins and that Canada should receive the net proceeds. The treasury officer has ruled, notwithstanding that all expenses were handled by the United States government and that no accounts therefor have been received, there should be cognizance of them when the net proceeds come to hand. Expenses covering sales made in 1944 and 1945 amount to $100,361.34. The appropriation for the present year will be fully expended on current year accounts. The gross revenue for the sales of seal skins covered by the request herein was $242,537.53. During the present fiscal year to date, the gross revenue is $626,987.30.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was that $242,000 to Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, gross revenue; less expenses giving a net profit of $142,176.19.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to have this item stand over in order to get a little more information.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McLURE: We ought to know what our one-fifth share of the raw material amounts to; that is, the number of skins. In some years 100,000 skins are taken; I think last year something like 80,000 skins were obtained. Canada was supposed to get one-fifth of those as her proportion; and from the report we had last season part of those skins were processed in the United States and a small part in Great Britain. There is no processing plant for them in Canada; consequently they have to be processed elsewhere. When the ceiling was removed from these skins last season the selling price went up by more than fifty per cent, and I understand that those sold on the United States market averaged something like $72 gross per skin. Well, with a total of 75,000 or 80,000 skins, how does it come that we have such a small net profit?

Item agreed to.

LEGISLATION

House of Commons—

663. Estimates of the sergeant at arms—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Again I am going to bring to the attention of the house a matter I have brought up on several occasions; that is, the case of the protective, cleaning and messenger staffs of this house. The basic wage of these employees is $4 a day in each category, though I should think that according to responsibility and the worth of the work done there might well be a distinction as between these three groups sufficiently great to merit some differentiation in the basic wage. I would go further and say that for the parliament of Canada to be employing men at $4 a day is rather absurd. Last year I urged the government to review the wages paid. At that time His Honour the Speaker said that the matter would be taken into consideration, and that if it should be possible to do something in order to be fair to these men it would be done with pleasure. I should like to know what has been done between last December and the present time in order to be fair to the employees of this house. Furthermore, the day this house rose last December I pointed out that ex-service men were to be laid off just before Christmas by a government which was supposed to be keenly desirous of aiding returned men. I said that it was callous and heartless. The Minister of Veterans Affairs got rather wrathy and said that the case of these men had been brought to his attention and that he had taken action instead of talking about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Those words of the Minister of Veterans Affairs were full of sound and fury but signified very little, because the action the government took was similar to its inaction in other respects. Fourteen ex-service men were laid off from their employment in this house last December. Their average service overseas was almost four and a half years. Seven were married; seven were single. The government promised it would do its best to look after these men, but it did not do so. Three of the fourteen obtained employment; I do not know what happened to the other eleven until they came back to the house. That is no way to look after the employees of this House of Commons, and I should like to know what is going to happen to these employees during the Easter recess. Are we to lay them off again in the same callous way, men who have given four and a half years of their lives to fighting for us? What plan does the government have for these men when this house prorogues later in the year? I think we are entitled to know now just what plans the government has in mind in order to see that employees of this house are given satisfactory employment when the house is not in session.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member. He and all other hon. members may be sure that the officers of the House of Commons are doing everything possible to be agreeable to the employees; and the Speaker of the House of Commons, in dealing with the employees, never forgets that he is the representative of members on both sides of the house. Whenever we have to take on a new employee the first question asked is, "Are you a returned soldier?" We do not take on any new employee who is not a veteran. No one likes to dismiss employees who have given good service. The Speaker of the house and the officials feel the same way; we do not like to dismiss anyone, veteran or not, who has served for many years. Unfortunately, however, some of our employees have advanced in years, and it has been suggested throughout Canada that on reaching a certain age men should withdraw from employment in order to provide work for younger men, veterans and so on.

In regard to the wages paid, particularly to the constables. I am informed that the salaries paid in the House of Commons are as good as, if not better than, those paid in the different departments of the government. I should not like to resume my seat without seeking to impress upon hon. members that their Speaker is doing everything possible to give the house the best possible service at the lowest possible cost, at the same time remembering that veterans should have the first opportunity to get jobs in this house.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to inform Your Honour that there has never been any complaint, at any time, as to the nature of the service. I think we are all agreed that the service we get from the employees of this house is excellent. To some extent I accept the assurance of Mr. Speaker, but I wish to remind the government that assurances of employment do not fill babies' milk bottles, and I should like to know from the Minister of Veterans Affairs specifically what plans he has in view to give work to these ex-service men who are to be laid off from the service of this house when it prorogues, or during the Easter recess.

Mr. McILRAITH: I might add something on this subject which would be helpful to hon. members. It seems to me there is a little misapprehension about the pay being received. The actual pay of the cleaning staff in the House of Commons now works out at about $138 a month. The way it is computed is by taking $4 a day for each day of the week, for the year round, if they are on a yearly basis, or during the whole of the session if they are on a sessional basis, plus a bonus. It works out at a more substantial item than would be indicated in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

There is one further point which in my view should be drawn to the attention of hon. members, namely, that it has been the practice, when there have been short recesses, such as we have at Easter, that these employees are kept on. They are not laid off for that short time.

One other point which ought fairly to be presented to hon. members is that it has been the practice that when sessional employees are hired, particular care has been taken to point out to them that they are hired only as sessional employees. I have not heard of any misunderstanding having arisen on the part of an employee, as far as that point is concerned.

I offer these observations in the hope that they may serve to give a better understanding of the problem.

Mrs. STRUM: In this connection I should like to refer to the pay received by people working in the restaurant. Last year I served on a subcommittee on wages, of the committee dealing with the restaurant service. I tried hard to bring about an increase in the pay of the lower-salaried people. I found there were great numbers of people whom hon. members using the restaurant do not see and who, as a result, do not receive tips. There are those who wash the dishes and the girls who carry the trays. All these have been receiving less than $2 a day or $50 a month. They get some meals, it is true. But anyone who goes out and looks for a room in Ottawa these days knows one cannot begin to pay rent and buy clothing for that amount.

We have no right to expect the parents of these girls to subsidize the government of Canada. It is no excuse to say that they live at home, and that the old man pays the rent. We have no right to chisel on the parents of those girls, nor have we any right to take them on and force them to accept such low wages.

Some of the attitudes I discovered respecting this matter of wage scales came as a great surprise to me. I tried hard to get a $10 raise for those who were receiving only $50. I find that if one is getting $200 it is an insult to offer an increase of anything less than $25. However, if one is getting only $50 a month, he should be satisfied to get only $5 a month more. I say that $5 on $50 as compared with $25 on $200 does not make sense to me.

We must remember that these people, who are valuable to us, are providing an essential service. If you and I do not eat, we cannot work. Food is a basic essential, and those who are engaged in handling it are important. We should be more concerned with the lower-paid employees in the government service. People should not be expected to go through a ten-year period of service, during which time they have had to meet rising living costs, and to get no adjustment in their wages. I would hope, therefore, that this appropriation is broad enough to give increased pay to these lower-paid workers.

Mr. GLEN: I should like to reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North. During my term as Speaker of the House of Commons we had occasion to revise the salaries of the constables in the house. A committee was appointed, and we saw the civil service commission. The Clerk of the House and I dealt with the commission in the discussions respecting the salaries of the constables. I believe this was done in answer to a request by the then leader of the opposition, the present hon. member for Peel.

We gave increases to the staff, and I believe they were satisfied that they were being properly dealt with. However, many of the constables had left for service overseas, and their positions were being retained for them by some who were serving only on a temporary basis.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North has made a striking attack upon the administration of the house, and I suggest he must substantiate his charge by giving more particulars than he has done. I am sure the board of internal economy, as well as the officers of the house, including His Honour the Speaker, will be only too glad to rectify any errors which might have been made. I suggest, however, that the hon. member ought to give more detail.

Then, speaking to what has been said by the lady member of the house in connection with those who serve in the restaurant, let me say this. In the first place, they are asked to take the position, and at that time they are told definitely what the remuneration will be. I heard no complaints during my five years in office from any of the services in the house with regard to their remuneration—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): They are scared.

Mr. GLEN: --and it is true that some meals are included while they serve here. I suggest that these complaints which have been made should be the matter of inquiry by the committee on the restaurant. They have been dealing with this matter, and they will deal with it in a way which will ensure justice being done to every person in the employ of the house. I am sure the committee on the restaurant would be very glad to listen to any complaints made.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am going to answer the minister, and in doing so I shall repeat the charge made last December, as it appears at page 3748 of Hansard:

> I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Labour to the fact that there are several messengers on this staff, men who were in the army for four or five years and who served overseas, who are going to be out of work when this house rises; and as far as I know no provision is being made by the government for their employment.

Mark you, that was just before Christmas.

> That is a heartless and callous way to treat these men.

What the hon. member for Ottawa West said is correct. They do get $138 a month. But I do not know to whom that would appear to be a large sum.

Mr. McILRAITH: That is a minimum.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): That minimum is to permanent help.

Mr. McILRAITH: No, it is to temporary help.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Temporary, too. But there are 157 employees, thirty-three of whom are permanent. We are giving people $138 a month as income, when the average wage-earner in that group is probably unemployed for many weeks. His average income falls far below $138 a month. I wish to repeat that there are only thirty-three permanent employees out of a total of 157, and they get a minimum of $138 a month.

Mr. GLEN: Has the hon. member the names?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I got this list from His Honour the Speaker. I can secure them from His Honour.

Mr. PROBE: May I, in as kindly a way as possible, draw to the attention of the committee the fact that this figure of $138 a month does not apply right across the board.

I have before me the Labour Gazette for February, which discusses the case of an employee in one of the departments at Ottawa. It may or may not deal with a member of the protective staff, or anything of that sort. This deals with the claim of a widower, aged sixty-eight years, who was employed as a messenger by one of the government departments at a salary of $89.12 a month, for a period of about a year and a half. These are the facts relating to his claim:

> The claimant is a military pensioner in receipt of a pension of $77.53 per month. On November 14, 1944, the claimant was advised that he could not receive a salary from the dominion government and at the same time draw his military pension. He was also advised that his pension would be reduced to the extent of his salary. The claimant therefore resigned voluntarily on November 14, 1944, and made application for benefit.

He was refused immediate treatment by the unemployment insurance commission, but he ultimately got it. It appears that if this man had elected to work in private industry he would have been entitled to continue to receive his pension in full as well as his salary. Had he remained with the government, in effect he would have been working for $11.59 a month.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The item we are considering is that dealing with the estimates of the Sergeant-at-Arms and hon. members should confine their remarks to that item.

Mr. PROBE: This might well be an employee of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That is the item we are dealing with.

Mr. PROBE: I think this case should be investigated by the house. If he is an employee of the Sergeant-at-Arms then I am bringing it up in the proper place. No employee of the government or of anyone else should have to work for $11.59 a month. I think it is scandalous.

Mrs. STRUM: In reply to the minister I just wish to say that the people to whom I refer are employees who get less than $2 a day. They are not in a position to take tips and they have no agency through which they can channel complaints. They have no labour union to make representations on their behalf. Anyone working for less than $50 a month must be pretty much afraid of losing his job or else he would not be working for that. If these employees had a union then they would have available the proper mechanism through which to make representations. There is only one place in this Dominion of Canada where government employees have a proper trade union, and that is the province from which I come.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question relating to the statement just made by the hon. member for Regina City. He claims that an ex-serviceman of this war employed—

Mr. PROBE: I did not say of this war.

Mr. GILLIS: Is he a war veteran?

Mr. PROBE: He is a military pensioner.

Mr. GILLIS: He was drawing a pension, but in 1944 he was told that he would have to relinquish either the pension or the job. Is that not a contravention of the Pension Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have not the details of the case before me. What was the total amount of the pension?

Mr. PROBE: It was $77.53 a month. The case is No. CU-B43 of June 27, 1945; that is the unemployment insurance commission investigation number.

Mr. GILLIS: I consider that a flagrant violation of the Pension Act and I suggest that the Minister of Veterans Affairs should look into it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is why I got the number.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us get the record straight in connection with this case. The hon. member does not even know the facts except what are set out in the Labour Gazette.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They are supposed to be right.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just listen a moment. I am trying to be helpful. There are 2,300,000 people who come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. To pick one case out of the blue and expect an answer from the minister is not, if I may put it in that way, being quite fair. I understand that is the decision of a board of referees made up of a representative of the employer, a representative of labour and an impartial chairman. I think my hon. friend should have secured all the facts before he raised the matter in this chamber, and he should have given the Minister of Veterans Affairs an opportunity of looking into the case, or given me that opportunity if it comes under my jurisdiction. I think that is the best way to clean up those cases. What we all want is to be just to the people under our jurisdiction. There is no politics about it.

Mr. PROBE: This was brought to the attention of the minister.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We are dealing with the estimates of the Sergeant-at-Arms and I do not think this discussion is relevant.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have just one word to say and that is I regret very much that the jurisdiction under this roof is so scattered. For instance, the reporters who take down my speeches come under the civil service commission; they are not under Mr. Speaker. The elevator men are not under the Sergeant-at-Arms; they are under the Department of Public Works. When we want to do something for them we have to go all around. This is not the fault of the Minister of Public Works because it is a situation which has existed for a long time. I think all men who do this kind of work should be under the Sergeant-at-Arms.

In this building there is a veteran of the first war who had a bullet enter his cheek and go out through his neck. He lost four ribs; he has a wooden leg, and he suffers from cancer of the stomach. He is operating an elevator in the building. I think that is most inhuman and the department of pensions should give this man a full pension. He is only getting $15 a month and it is very hard for him to open the doors of the elevator. I take another elevator in order to give him a chance.

These things should not happen. I do not blame any minister; I do not blame Mr. Speaker; I do not blame the Sergeant-at-Arms, but I do blame the heartless bureaucrats in the Department of Veterans Affairs who do not look after their own men and who force civilians to come and fight for them. It is a shame. I brought this matter to the attention of the most able parliamentary assistant to the minister. He took the matter up with those concerned a few days ago, but it has not yet been settled. I want the minister concerned, whoever he is—I do not know; I cannot run after all the ministers at the same time—to see that this man is given a chance. He should be sent home with enough money on which to live until he feels better.

There is another man who works on the first floor of this building and who has won the Victoria Cross. That man should have some sort of honorary post, a soft job which carries a decent salary. He should be a doorman or messenger in uniform so that he could wear his decorations. He is a modest and humble man. One of the former members for Ottawa looked after him and I had to do the same. I have assured him that he has the sympathy of the whole house. While the position he now holds may not be humiliating in itself, it is not a position worthy of a man who has won the highest military distinction.

An hon. MEMBER: Maybe he was not a brigadier.

Mr. POULIOT: He is much better than the brigadiers we have in M.D. No. 5.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Earlier in the afternoon we decided that we would try to close at six o'clock and it is now about twenty minutes to six. May I suggest that there is not a subject in these supplementary estimates which could not be discussed when the main estimates are before the committee. Perhaps it could be understood that in speaking to the remaining items we will confine ourselves as closely as possible to the item with a view to getting through all items by six o'clock, or if we do not, to sit on until we do finish.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

668. Miscellaneous maintenance and adjustments (war of 1914-18)—further amount required, $800.

Mr. PEARKES: May we have an explanation how grants to McGill to cover the years from 1942 to 1945 have anything to do with the war of 1914-18?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is the annual grant of $200 to McGill for maintenance of the Canadian army museum. The curator of the museum died in September, 1940, and through an oversight the government was not billed for the $200 grant from 1942 to 1945. The amount was voted each year, but under our system of parliamentary appropriations it lapsed at the end of the year. The situation was brought to the attention of the government by McGill early this year and this $800 covers the grant for the years I mentioned.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to place before the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence a suggestion which is really a repetition of a suggestion made last year; that there should be set up a standing committee of the house on the defence forces. We are moving into a new era in the defence of this country and the defence problems are largely new. The policy is to raise a larger body of men for each of the three services than has ever been raised before. I think there will be some difficulty in raising the required number and it would be of great help if we had a standing committe of this house before whom the chiefs of staff could come and where the defence estimates could be discussed in a thorough manner. Not only would that be more efficient, but it would result in getting the members of the house back of the defence forces to a far greater degree than hitherto, and through them be of help in getting the Canadian people as a whole behind our forces. I can see nothing but good from such a move. In the United States, as the Prime Minister knows, they have in the house of representatives and also in the senate a committee on naval affairs and a committee on military affairs, and I suggest that a committee of that kind should be set up right away in this house. I think it would be of great benefit.

Mr. COLDWELL: We supported the suggestion last year and we do so again this year.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I assured my hon. friend last year that his suggestion would receive sympathetic consideration, but I pointed out that the time was too short to do anything about it last session. But I did promise consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the suggestion of my hon. friend is a very good one and, as the Minister of National Defence has just said, it is one that he is prepared to consider sympathetically. But once again the house will have to ask itself how many committees it can stand. We are enlarging the number and it will have a bearing on the attendance in the house. I think my hon. friend's suggestion of that particular committee is a very good one.

Mr. COLDWELL: There might be a reorganization of the committees. Some of them never sit at all.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE

670. Post offices, including salaries and other expenses of headquarters and staff post offices and supplies and equipment for revenue post offices—further amount required, $1,234,720.

Mr. BURTON: I do not wish to delay the passing of this item, but there is something I wish to say that I could not say on the regular estimates. It will be recalled that it was only a few months ago that we passed estimates for all the departments, and I would have thought that a department like the Post Office would have been able to get much closer to its requirements than it evidently did. This supplementary vote is for $1,234,720. This seems to show that they did not use good business judgment in preparing their estimates, and I would suggest that when their estimates come up they try to get a little closer to their requirements for the year.

Mr. MacKINNON: The Postmaster General is unavoidably absent this afternoon, but one of his senior officials got in touch with me and furnished me with a very good explanation of the point just raised by the hon. member. I would suggest, however, that the explanation be deferred until the main estimates are before the committee.

Item agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS

Chief engineer's branch—

676. Dredging—British Columbia and Yukon —further amount required, $62,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What does this mean? I see that there is also an item for new construction. Does that mean a new dredge?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We have purchased from War Assets Corporation "gate vessel No. 5" for use as living quarters in connection with the double shift for dredge No. 305.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Buy another and put on three shifts.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I move:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, the sum of $4,938,873.32 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 12, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1946.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIVATE MEMBERS' RESOLUTIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I move that the house do now adjourn. My hon. friend who is leading the opposition will probably ask about the order of business on Monday. Monday is private members' day, and the order will be private bills, senate amendments to public bills, questions. notices of motions, public bills and orders, government notices of motions, government orders.

If the house will allow me a few minutes, I should like to say a word about private members' day. I do so in the expectation that what I am about to suggest may be taken exception to by some hon. members. I would call the attention of hon. members to the desire, already strongly expressed, that we should proceed rapidly with the business of the house so as not to have the session prolonged unduly. If hon. members will look through last year's proceedings they will find that one of the reasons why the business was so considerably delayed was the length of time taken in the discussion of private members' resolutions; a length of time wholly out of proportion to the importance of the resolutions in relation to government business. The British house has found it impossible to get through important public business and at the same time have any private members' resolutions.

I have before me the British Hansard of last session, and at page 133 of August 16, 1945, I find the following resolution:

The Lord President of the Council (Mr. Herbert Morrison): I beg to move,

"That during the present session:

(1) Government business shall have precedence at every sitting;

(2) The following provisions shall have effect as respects public bills:

(a) no bills other than government bills shall be introduced;

The parliament in Great Britain found it necessary to adopt that course in a post-war period because of the growing importance of public measures as distinguished from private members' resolutions and bills. I am told that it has been found necessary to follow the same course this year. An appeal has been made to, and accepted by the house that, the importance of public measures being so great, they should be considered to the exclusion of other matters.

This house has set up a committee for the revision of the rules. It is perhaps not for me to suggest how the rules should be revised, and hon. members may take strong exception to what I am going to suggest, but I should hope that the question might be considered whether some arrangement could not be made either to bring on private members' resolutions near the end of the session rather than at the beginning, or to fix a limit of time to be devoted to any single resolution. I should think that private members might introduce their respective resolutions, have one or two speeches made upon them, and then allow the house to proceed with the consideration of other motions. To take up three or four days in discussing a private member's resolution does seem to me to be a waste of time when time is very precious in view of the urgency of public matters.

I throw out that thought at the moment because it is something in which we are all interested. I do not wish to take away any rights from private members, but I think that the nature of public business in parliament to-day is such that if the government has important measures that should be proceeded with expeditiously, and is prepared to proceed with those measures, some way ought to be found of giving public business priority.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): If I may suggest it to the Prime Minister, in the British house the private member has an opportunity, limited no doubt, but an opportunity nevertheless, during the first hour of each session, from 2.15 to 3.15 p.m. of seeking information orally from the government across the floor of the house. I realize that it begins with written questions, but the supplementary debate that takes place afterwards gives the private member a wide opportunity to discuss a variety of issues which normally are present in the private member's mind, and in regard to which he can seek information from the government.

I intend at another stage of the proceedings to make some reference to this question having relation to the setting up of a committee on rules, because it seems to me that we are gradually departing from this practice in this house. I am not suggesting that anyone in particular is responsible for it, but I think the house ought to give consideration in the committee on rules to providing some system whereby private members may be enabled to make oral inquiries of the government on a much wider range of subjects, urgent and otherwise, than are permitted in the discretion of the Speaker at the present time. One day in the British house I noticed that eighty-two questions were asked and answered and supplementary questions were asked at the same time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yesterday we answered about sixty.

Mr. GRAYDON: They were not answered in the way in which they are answered in Britain, and that is my point. In addition to questions being permitted for a whole hour in Britain, there are hundreds of questions in the same position as the questions to which the Prime Minister has just referred, questions which do not reach the House of Commons at all in the ordinary verbal debate.

I suggest that more latitude should be given because I feel the restrictions at the moment are far too pressing with respect to those seeking information from the government. I do not wish to reflect upon Mr. Speaker who is courteous to us all, but I feel that we ought to have wider latitude on questions. Far too many questions are ruled out on the ground that they are not urgent, that there has not been notice given and that they are too long. I believe these are bases which will not always commend themselves to the members of the house. Now that the rules of the house are to be revised, I suggest that with reference to questions wider latitude be given, and I make that suggestion to the rules committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say one word? I think our rules need a thorough revision. In addition to what the hon. member for Peel has just said, the British house has the custom of giving notice of a question which may be raised for discussion at adjournment; therefore they are able to debate it in some manner.

I am in agreement that private members' days, as we have them in the rules, involve a greater amount of time than is warranted under the circumstances under which we meet here; nevertheless we feel the private members have so few opportunities in the house to discuss problems that are pressing to their constituents and to themselves, that we are loath to relinquish any of the rights of private members.

In this house there has been the custom of introducing two or three departments and going into supply thereon, and then have a number of departments go into supply at the end of the session. They could be spaced during the session to give private members an opportunity of raising certain matters that they think would be helpful. The point I have in mind is that if we are to conduct the business of this country as it must be conducted, with all the variety of business we have here, the rules must be revised. There is no question about that in my mind. I hope that the committee now set up will revise the rules.

It is perfectly true that in the British house the government plays a much greater part in deciding what shall be done in the house than does the government of this country; nevertheless the members there, as was said by the hon. member for Peel, have two wonderful opportunities, one at the question period and the other at the adjournment.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

Monday, April 1, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

REVOCATION OF P.C. 6444—REFERENCE TO THE PUBLIC SERVICE—CASE OF MRS. EMMA WOIKIN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to table a copy of order in council P.C. 1262 of April 1, 1946, which is to-day, approved by the Administrator, revoking order in council P.C. 6444 of October 6, 1945, for the interrogation and, for that purpose, detention of certain persons; also a copy of a letter to the Minister of Justice from counsel to the commissioners, advising the Minister of Justice that it will not be necessary to request further orders under P.C. 6444. As this order is a matter of special interest to the house I might read it so that it will appear in Hansard:

At the Government House at Ottawa, Canada, the 1st day of April, 1946.

Present, His Excellency the Administrator in Council.

Whereas the Prime Minister reports that the interrogation of the several persons detained pursuant to orders under the order in council made on October 6, 1945, P.C. 6444, under the authority conferred by parliament by the War Measures Act, as being persons suspected of communicating information to agents of a foreign power, has now been completed and that counsel for the commissioners inquiring into the matter pursuant to the Inquires Act have now advised the Minister of Justice that it will not be necessary to request further orders for detention and interrogation under the said order in council;

Therefore His Excellency the Administrator in Council on the recommendation of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister, is pleased to revoke the said order in council P.C. 6444, and it is hereby revoked accordingly.

(Signed) A. D. P. Heeney,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

The letter to the Minister of Justice is dated Justice Building, Ottawa, March 29, 1946, and is as follows:

Dear Sir,

Following our discussions of to-day with regard to the probability of requests for further orders under the provisions of P.C. 6444, as indicated in our letter to you of February 23, 1946, we confirm that, particularly in view of the various prosecutions now pending, and that in such proceedings much evidence, documentary as well as oral, is necessarily being made public, we have advised you that it will not be necessary to request further orders under P.C. 6444.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) E. K. Williams,
G. Fauteux,
D. W. Mundell,

The letter is addressed to the Minister of Justice at Ottawa.

I should like to make one statement to the house on this matter which I am sure hon. members will be pleased to have. It is in reference to an impression respecting the civil service of Canada to which the espionage inquiry may have given rise, but which is quite erroneous and which I feel, in justice to the honour, integrity and good name of the public service of Canada, should be speedily eliminated.

Of the persons whose detention under P.C. 6444 the commission felt it necessary to recommend, and on whom the royal commission has to date reported adversely, not one has been a regular permanent member of the Canadian civil service. All twelve were persons either appointed during the war to temporary positions in the civil service, or temporarily commissioned in the armed forces. I need not remind the house that during the years of war the Canadian people provided hundreds of thousands of men and women for our armed forces, also provided manpower for greatly expanded production in industry and in agriculture, and at the same time personnel for the expanded war-time needs of government administration and public service. During these years the filling of war-time needs was stretched to the limit. In these circumstances, temporary appointments may occasionally have been made to some branches of the public servcie on a basis of qualifications less rigid than is customary in selecting personnel for permanent positions in peace time. This would not be surprising. So far, however, as I have been able to ascertain, there is no evidence to date of any carlessness in this matter, among those who were charged with making appointments. In administration and in research, as in production and on the battlefields, Canada's wartime record stands second to none.

I should like to add a word about one of the persons named in a report by the royal commission of inquiry, in reply to a particular question raised in this house.

On Thursday, March 21, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), enquired as to how Mrs. Emma Woikin, who is at present under arrest in connection with the current investigation, came to be in the cypher section of the Department of External Affairs.

Mrs. Woikin was employed by the civil service commission, after examination, in precisely the same way as are other stenographic and clerical personnel who join the government service. I want this to be clearly understood, since the hon. member referred to the fact that Mrs. Woikin is from the constituency of Prince Albert, and it is possible that some persons who do not understand the procedure in these matters might be led by the question to believe that patronage or favour of some sort was involved.

In 1943 the commission was encountering some difficulty in supplying the need for stenographers and typists to meet the war needs of various departments, and travelling examiners were sent throughout the country to recruit suitable persons wherever they could be found available. At one of the examinations held by the civil service examiner in the prairie provinces, Mrs. Emma Woikin of Blaine Lake was a candidate, and was found suitable for work as a typist grade 1.

The usual references were required of Mrs. Woikin and the normal investigation of her background was conducted. The information was that she was born in Canada, came of a good family and the report on her was favourable. As a result, Mrs. Woikin was appointed a typist grade 1 in the passport office of the Department of External Affairs on September 10, 1943.

At the time of Mrs. Woikin's appointment the pressure upon the passport office was severe. However, later in the year it grew less, and five stenographers and typists were released for use elsewhere in the department.

Mrs. Woikin's work and record were good, and she was assigned to the cypher section as a typist.

So far as present information discloses, the associations and influences that led Mrs. Woikin to become involved in the network occurred after, and not before, her employment. The possibility of this has to be recognized as one of the limitations upon the protection afforded by any investigation that may be conducted as a prerequisite to employment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If the Prime Minister will allow a question arising out of the order in council that he has placed before the house revoking P.C. 6444, may I say first that I think the people of Canada will appreciate the revocation of that order and the restoration to this country of the due processes of law. Does this new order in council mean that the commission will not continue to sit, or will it continue with open sittings, and will the ordinary processes of law now be followed? Is the Prime Minister in position to say whether or not, upon the evidence that has been taken before the commission to date, further prosecutions will be instituted, and whether any that are instituted will follow the ordinary course of law in the courts of the country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope I may be able to recall all the questions my hon. friend has asked. First, the commission will continue to sit. The commissioners have not concluded their work, and I understand they will be issuing another report, possibly in a week or a fortnight. Other persons will be heard before the commission, but I am unable to say whether the commission will sit in camera or in public. The inquiries act under which the commission is carrying on the inquiry allows the commission discretion in the matter of sitting in camera or in public; it is for the commissioners themselves to decide on that point. As to what further prosecutions may take place, I am unable to say. That will depend upon what further investigations there may be, and also, I assume, upon the opinion of the legal authorities as to what further information, if any, should be laid.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Are any other persons now held on orders issued under that order in council, or have they all been disposed of?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are no other persons held under that order. Those who were so held have all been examined.

INQUIRY AS TO THIRD INTERIM REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether it is the intention of the government to distribute copies of the third interim report of the royal commission on the espionage affair? We have received copies of the first two interim reports, but not the third.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yes. I gave instructions at the time the report was handed to me to have copies printed. I shall make inquiries as to why they have not been distributed, if they have already been printed.

HOUSING

RESTRICTION OF USE OF BUILDING MATERIALS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table copy of order in council P.C. 1184, of March 27, 1946, passed under the powers of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, the Department of Reconstruction Act, 1944, and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply Act, 1945.

The order in council provides a method of restricting the use of building materials for purposes that may be inconsistent with Canada's paramount requirement for an adequate supply of materials for housing. I have previously stated that the number of houses that are to be built during the year 1946 will in all probability be limited by available supplies of building materials. While sources of building materials have been enlarged, the demands for housing, together with the enormous expansion in other types of building, are likely to absorb materials faster than they can be produced.

Steps have already been taken to make the best possible use of available supplies. I have previously called the attention of the house to priority officer order No. P.O. 11, which requires the supplier to fill orders for government housing projects and for houses of individual veterans whose houses are 75 per cent completed. This order will later be enlarged to give priority to all housing for veterans, whether built by the government or by the individual veteran. Nevertheless, priority orders cannot be filled unless the supplies are in the hands of local dealers.

The special committee of the Canadian Construction Association that has been studying the building supply situation has recommended that steps be taken to restrict certain types of building during the period in which acute shortages will prevail. Certain municipalities and a large number of organizations, including veterans' organizations, have recommended that all types of construction other than housing be prohibited or controlled.

During the war years, the Department of Munitions and Supply maintained a rigid control of construction for the purpose of providing material for the war. During that period our citizens accepted this control as necessary for the successful prosecution of the war and its regulations were observed. However, after the end of the war, construction control regulations were no longer observed to the same degree. It was recognized by the department that it was impossible to judge from Ottawa the essentiality of different projects and the local conditions which necessarily must govern each decision. For these reasons, construction control was abolished on December 5, 1945.

In considering ways and means of giving effect to the recommendations for reestablishing the building control, we must again face the problem of a method by which due weight can be given to local conditions in deciding what buildings are to be authorized and what buildings are to be prohibited in different localities. The housing problem is not one that normally lies within the jurisdiction of the federal government. The intervention of the federal government in this field was brought about by war conditions. In this transitional period it seems desirable, wherever possible to arrange that the authority which normally exercises jurisdiction in the field of housing shall exercise the additional powers necessary by reason of the housing emergency.

In the matter of prohibiting the construction of buildings where deferment of the project will cause no serious hardships to the public, there is the added advantage that the decision can be made most effectively by the municipality. As hon. members know, a building permit must be obtained from the municipality before any building can be erected within its borders. The most appropriate time and place effectively to curtail unnecessary building is prior to the issuance of the building permit. The authority that issues the building permit is in the best position to determine whether the permit should be issued or deferred, having regard to the possibility of shortages of housing in the area, and having regard to employment conditions in the area.

The order in council therefore provides that—

> . . . every municipal body and every officer, employee or agent thereof having authority in relation to building permits shall, in the exercise thereof during the current calendar year, have power

(a) to refuse to issue a permit for the erection, alteration or repair of any building or structure; and

(b) to revoke, cancel or suspend any permit which may have been issued for the erection, alteration or repair of any building or structure.

The order in council further provides that—

Where, in any place, a permit from a municipal body or any officer, employee or agent thereof is required by law for the erection, alteration or repair of any building or structure, no person shall erect, alter or repair any building or structure in such place unless such permit shall have been issued therefor and is in full force and effect.

Effective means have been instituted to bring about a fair distribution of building material in all parts of Canada. Steps will be taken to maintain the same equitable distribution. It will then be the duty of each municipality to determine whether its quota of material should properly be used for housing, for industrial projects or otherwise. Should the municipality decide to use its building materials to build motion picture theatres or other places of amusement, that municipality can hardly complain if a shortage develops in materials for construction of houses. I feel certain that every municipality will be impressed with the necessity to provide adequate housing for its population, even if this involves deferring projects that would otherwise be desirable. Therefore I am confident that the right to control issuance of building permits will provide an effective means of building control.

There is still a need for low-rental housing for veterans and, therefore, Wartime Housing Limited is prepared to consider applications for veterans' houses for rent, provided they are received from the municipalities not later than June 1st. I suggest that each municipality should arrive at an early decision as to whether or not wartime houses are desirable under the standard conditions that govern such construction. During 1945 the Wartime Housing building programme was not undertaken until July, and, in the case of certain municipalities, not until late in the autumn, with the result that practically all the building extended over the winter months. It is to avoid this that the deadline of June 1st has been established for applications during 1946.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the Minister of Reconstruction permit a question arising out of the statement he has read. He indicates that an attempt will be made to effect an equitable distribution of building materials among the municipalities. Will he indicate to the house the basis upon which that distribution will be made? Will it be on the basis of population, or are steps being taken to ascertain the needs of the particular municipalities?

Mr. HOWE: The pattern of distribution for the past two or three years will be taken as the pattern for the following year; that is the shortage of building materials in the locality will govern the distribution in 1946.

EXIT PERMITS

CONDITIONS AFFECTING TRAVEL TO GREAT BRITAIN AND RETURN TO CANADA

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): On Friday last the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked the following question of the Prime Minister, as reported on page 394 of Hansard:

Women proceeding to Great Britain have to have exit permits, on which they must state that they are going to reside in Great Britain either permanently, or for at least one or two years. However, in the event of something happening in Canada before the expiration of that time, those persons have to apply in Great Britain to the high commissioner for transportation back to Canada. On such occasions they are treated not as Canadians, but rather as immigrants, and must take their chances on the quota. What is the present situation?

The regulations provide that all women and children under the age of sixteen years proceeding to destinations outside the western hemisphere must have exit permits as a condition of departure from Canada. The issuance of permits is restricted to certain classes, as provided by P.C. 1841. Women and children proceeding overseas for permanent residence come within these classes. All applicants are required to state the purpose for which they desire to leave Canada.

Persons other than those of Canadian birth who have not become aliens, upon leaving Canada for permanent residence abroad, relinquish Canadian domicile, and any who may subsequently apply for readmission to Canada must be dealt with as immigrants as required by the provisions of the Immigration Act. As immigrants are not entitled to priority rating for steamship accommodation, there is no possibility of such persons securing passage to Canada for many months owing to the acute shortage of westbound transatlantic passenger space.

For some time steamship companies required all passengers to sign a statement to the effect that they—the passengers—understood return transportation would not be available for two years; this was later reduced to one year. No doubt the purpose of this procedure was to impress upon travellers the fact that there was no possibility of an early return to Canada.

The only difficulty in the way of a person who had secured an exit permit and had gone to England or the United Kingdom temporarily and wished to come back earlier would be simply the lack of transportation accommodation. There would be no loss of his status as a Canadian citizen.

Mr. FRASER: That applies also to a person on whose exit permit it is indicated that he is staying over there for a year or two years?

Mr. GLEN: The immigration regulations apply only to those who desire permanent residence abroad, in which case if they desire to come back they come back as immigrants, such as the hon. member has in mind. But the person who wishes to go over for humanitarian reasons, say to see relatives in the United Kingdom who are seriously ill, and obtains an exit permit, is entitled to return to this country. The difficulty is that there is no steamship accommodation available for them and they may have to wait some time before they can get it.

Mr. FRASER: They have no priority?

Mr. GLEN: No priority.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was not a similar motion passed on Friday last, as reported at page 384 of Hansard? Is this a different matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That motion was to appoint the members of the committee. This motion is to acquaint Their Honours with the fact that the committee has been appointed, and with the names of its members.

Mr. COLDWELL: Two bites at a cherry.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

WAR ASSETS—COMMISSION ON SALES OR EXCHANGES

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What persons or companies, if any, have been paid or allowed commission by Surplus War Assets Corporation on sales or exchange of goods by that corporation?

2. What is the amount of commission to each person or company?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, this question refers to a matter that is before the War Assets Corporation. I would have no objection to answering it if I knew how to distinguish between commissions, price spreads, and various other rewards. My hon. friend will appreciate that War Assets Corporation deals on a wholesale basis, and that it is difficult to distinguish commissions from price spreads. I would refer him to Campion, page 130, who has a ruling on this point, as follows:

> The following are out of order as raising matters for dealing with which the rules provide a more convenient method, viz.—
> Questions reflecting on the conduct of certain persons whose conduct may only be challenged on a substantive motion;
> Suggesting amendments to bills, or asking for information which should be moved for as a return—

I call particular attention to this:

> —or dealing with matters before a parliamentary committee.

I ask that this question be dropped. The same applies to three subsequent questions, Nos. 54, 62 and 65, all of which are difficult to answer and all of which refer to matters that are being dealt with by a parliamentary committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has evidently been reading another kind of literature lately.

Mr. COLDWELL: What was the authority quoted?

Mr. HOWE: It is Campion's "An Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons".

Mr. GRAYDON: Just an introduction.

Mr. HOWE: I am assured that G. F. M. Campion is one of the leading authorities.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have we not rules of our own in this house? If we are going to hunt all over the shop to find various authorities we can find one to support anything. This would seem to make the rules of parliament like the bible, subject to individual interpretation.

Mr. HOWE: I am glad to refer my hon. friend to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, citations 664 and 665, which cover the same point.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I placed this question on the order paper last October or November and it was not answered last session although I was promised an answer right up to the last day of the session. It simply asks:

> What persons or companies, if any, have been paid or allowed commission by surplus War Assets Corporation on sales or exchange of goods by that corporation?

I understand that commissions have been granted, and whether you call them commissions or price spreads I think the house is entitled to know what commissions have been granted to these companies on the sale or exchange of goods through War Assets Corporation. The minister says that the matter came before the parliamentary committee last year. I withdrew my question last year because the matter was supposed to be gone into by the committee, but nothing was done about it. The committee met only eight times, and we were unable to get the information. I want this question to stand. I do not intend to withdraw it unless ordered to do so by the house.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend I think is a member of the committee, and it meets tomorrow.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. HOWE: It is a perfectly proper question to go before the committee. The officers are there to furnish answers to questions asked. If my hon. friend does not want to distinguish between commissions and price spreads, if we include both, it would run into several hundred transactions and it might not be possible for our people to sort out all the transactions where either commission or price spreads were allowed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that sales were made by War Assets to companies and commissions allowed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The answer given by the minister is not debatable.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to debate the minister's answer, but have I not the right to find out why a perfectly reasonable question like No. 65, to which none of the statements made by the minister apply should be dropped? The question reads—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is the rule and practice in this house that an answer given by a minister to a question is not debatable, but if hon. members wish to amend the standing orders of the house, that is their privilege. So far as the two other questions mentioned by the minister are concerned, the hon. member can ask for an explanation when we reach them. Question dropped.

NATIONAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION CONVERSION PLAN

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Is the National Housing Administration conversion plan being extended in Canada?

2. If not, when did the extension cease, and why?

3. How many homes were converted in Canada under this plan to December 1, 1945?

4. How many in the area of Hamilton, Ontario, and at what street addresses?

5. What has been the cost of conversion of such houses in the Hamilton area?

6. How many inspectors, janitors and other persons are or have been employed in connection with the operation of this plan in the Hamilton area?

7. Who are they, and what amount is being or has been paid to each of them in salary and expenses?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1 and 2. The Home Conversion Plan is still in effect but few conversions are taking place because of the lack of availability of large houses suitable for conversion.

3. Conversions completed as at December 1, 1945, were 246, providing 1964 housing units. Houses in the process of being converted on that date were 14, providing 144 housing units.

AIR TRAINING PLAN

Mr. POWER:

1. From the date of the closing of the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan, namely, March 31, 1945, to date, how much was expended by Canada on behalf of the United Kingdom for the training of R.A.F. air personnel?

2. Was an agreement outside of the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan, and apart from the said plan, entered into during the year 1945, whereby after the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan had been wound up, namely, on March 31, 1945, United Kingdom personnel were to be trained in Canada on a contract basis, at a price per capita?

3. Will the amount due by the United Kingdom under the contract mentioned in No. 2 above be cancelled through the operation of Article 7 of the Financial Agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom?

4. How much money was expended by Canada under the terms of this contract: (a) in keeping open schools, units and establishments on full, partial, or shadow basis which otherwise would have been closed as a consequence of the termination of the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan; (b) in retaining in the service personnel who otherwise would have been demobilized; (c) for any other purposes connected with this contract; (d) in actual training of R.A.F. personnel?

5. How much money was paid to Canada by the government of the United Kingdom in liquidation of debt arising out of this contract?

Mr. HOWE:

1. During 1945-46-fiscal year, officers of RCAF Headquarters assessed the capitation charges under the provisions of article 17 of the agreement dated 5 July, 1945, referred to in Question 2. The capitation fees so assessed amounted to $17,240,407.25 and it is considered that this represents the amount expended by Canada on behalf of the United Kingdom for the training of RAF and RN air personnel, since the agreement included both classifications.

2. Yes.

3. No. Under the terms of the agreement noted in question 2 above, the United Kingdom was allowed to discharge this debt by the amount of contributions of equipment, etc., and in fact contributed $18,772,647.85 made up as follows:

Equipment furnished directly ..	$10,855,243 55
Equipment furnished indirectly through Lend-Lease Act	5,917,404 30
Cash paid for RAF and RN pay	2,000,000 00
	$18,772,647.85

As the amount expended by Canada on behalf of the United Kingdom for the training of RAF and RN personnel amounted to $17,240,407.25 (Answer 1) the United Kingdom became entitled to a net credit in the amount of $1,532,240.60 concerning the Third Air Training Plan and Canada will not be called upon to reimburse the United Kingdom for this amount under the terms of articles 1 and 7 of the agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom on the settlement of war claims.

4. See answer 1 above.

5. $2,000,000.

Advances to the United Kingdom under section 3 of the War Appropriation Acts were included in the claims of Canada against the United Kingdom which were offset by claims of the United Kingdom against Canada and the balance of which is to be settled by the payment of $150,000,000 by the United Kingdom to Canada under agreement signed March 6, 1946. The indebtedness of the United Kingdom to Canada under the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan Agreements, the disposition of which is covered by Article 7 of the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, was carried in the accounts of Canada as an advance under section 3 of the War Appropriation Acts.

Temporary advances under section 3 of the War Appropriation Acts do not normally have any specific maturity date and are normally payable on demand when the necessary documents are ready for presentation and payment. When it is known that the country benefiting from the advance will not wish to pay it off until some later date, for example, following an agreement on the long-term credit, they are requested to agree to the payment of interest except in those cases where the advances made by Canada are offset by arrears of payments owing by Canada to the other country in question. The rate of interest requested by Canada is an appropriate short-term rate where the advance is to be repaid in cash and the rate applicable under a long-term credit agreement, where the advance is to be repaid out of a credit provided by Canada. In accordance with this policy agreement has been reached with the government of France for the payment of interest on the advances made to France at the rate of 3 per cent per annum and the government of the U.S.S.R. has been requested to pay interest on the advances made to it, the rate depending on whether the advances are to be paid in cash or from the proceeds of the credit.

*RHEUMATIC DISEASES — RESEARCH

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. Does the government carry on constant and extensive research and experimentation with a view to finding a cure or cures for the various rheumatic diseases, particularly arthritis?

2. If not, does the government make financial contributions to voluntary medical or other organizations devoted to such work?

3. To what organizations and in what amounts?

4. What is the government doing, specifically, to (a) find ways of eradicating arthritis; (b) assist others to find ways; (c) to help people who suffer from arthritis?

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. Speaker, since many hon. members are receiving and sending me form letters urging the government to make a contribution to the Canadian Rheumatic Diseases Association, it might be of interest if I answer the questions orally and make a brief statement on this subject.

The answers to questions 1 and 2 are in the negative, and the answer to question 3 follows from the answer to question 2.

Question 4 is covered below.

As hon. members know, matters of health and welfare are primarily the concern of the provinces, and it is considered that research into medical conditions in Canada can best be conducted by hospitals and other institutions actively operating in these fields.

The national research council through its associate committee on medical research does, however, make grants-in-aid for the promotion of medical research. Projects approved by the committee must be carried out under competent direction in unversities or hospitals and medical schools where adequate facilities for such studies are available.

When the associate committee on medical research of the national research council was set up in 1938, rheumatism and arthritis were recognized as being among the diseases to be studied. Due to the intervention of the war active steps could not be taken in these fields.

The committee is, however, prepared to give consideration to applications for assistance in any project that gives promise of adding to knowledge regarding the cause, methods of prevention or treatment of arthritis in the same way it does to other medical research projects. No such application is pending at the present time.

With regard to the question of financial contributions to voluntary organizations, I should say that in November, 1945, the Department of National Health and Welfare asked the Dominion Council of Health for advice as to whether or not a grant should be made to the Canadian Rheumatic Diseases Association. The Dominion Council of Health consists of the deputy ministers of health of the dominion and provincial governments and others, and its purpose is to advise the dominion government on health matters. The council found that the association's activities had been largely suspended during the war and that the association had not yet established a programme of activities or secured sufficiently wide support to justify a grant at that time.

As part of its programme of health and social security measures, the dominion government's proposals to the dominion-provincial conference include assistance for complete medical, hospital and nursing service which, if carried out, would provide for the active treatment of rheumatism and arthritis.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister if he has offhand the information as to the number of sufferers from arthritis in the dominion? I heard within the last week that the number was very high.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think some of the representations which have been circulated to hon. members suggest that the total number of people who have been crippled from arthritis or rheumatism totals 600,000. My information is that the figure is not anything like that. There may be 600,000 people who suffer in some degree or other from arthritis and rheumatism, the number of people who are actually crippled is very much less than that. When a motion concerning arthritis, which is on the order paper comes before the house I shall be glad to give full information on it.

Mr. COLDWELL: May consideration not be given to establishing a research medical division which would look into all these chronic diseases? There are many persons suffering from them in Canada; and it seems to me that isolated provinces trying to do this work are not nearly as effective as one central organization dealing with all these chronic diseases, including sclerosis.

Mr. CLAXTON: There is an associate medical committee of the national research council which has been established since 1938 expressly for that purpose, among others.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not get the minister's answer as to who the persons might be who sought assistance; that was in the part of his statement referring to consideration to applications for assistance. Who does the applying?

Mr. CLAXTON: Workers who would be wanting to undertake research work in arthritis or rheumatism ordinarily, doctors and professors at hospitals and medical teaching institutions.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In other words it is just individuals; there are no organizations that may do this. The reason I am interested is that I have this thing myself, and I have forty-seven letters from people about it, so I would like to know. I am not going to apply, though.

Mr. BENTLEY: As I asked the question, I should like to ask for a little more information.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENTLEY: Others have been asking questions on this matter, and I just want to get a little more information.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENTLEY: Thank you very much.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member cannot ask any further question.

2. If so, when was this training first initiated and on whose authority?

3. (a) What methods are used; (b) how long does the training continue in each case; (c) by whom were these methods prepared; (d) are insulin injections given stutterers at Scarboro Hall? If so, in what amounts and for how long a period?

4. Since this project was initiated (a) how many stutterers have enrolled to date; (b) how many have been discharged as corrected; (c) what is the average length of time required for the course of training?

5. What are the names and salaries of the persons employed in the training of stutterers, and for what period of time has each of these people been employed?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. Yes.

2. October, 1944; under the authority of the Department of Veterans Affairs Act.

3. (a) Speech training classes; (b) duration varies according to the nature and length of standing of the condition, of which the speech defect is one of the signs; (c) by the medical service of the Department of Veterans Affairs which follows accepted methods of treatment; (d) not directly for stuttering, although in some cases stutterers have received insulin injections in the course of treatment of their general condition. The amounts given and the duration of such treatment vary according to the nature of the condition being treated.

4. (a) Forty-eight cases with functional speech defects, in which are included stutterers, have been treated by speech therapy since October, 1944; (b) forty have improved to the point where speech therapy was discontinued; (c) in functional cases, six weeks.

5. Miss Margaret Christie McCurdy is the speech therapist and cerebral re-educationalist. Monthly salary: $175 plus $6.51 cost of living bonus. Employed by the Department at Ste. Annes Hospital, Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Que., on April 3, 1945; transferred to Christie St. Hospital, Toronto, on September 14, 1945.

INCOME TAX—CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. JAENICKE:

1. Have any income tax payers refused to file their income tax returns or to pay income tax on the grounds that there is no constitutional power in the dominion government to collect income tax or that the act is ultra vires the dominion parliament?

2. If there have been any such refusals as mentioned in paragraph 1, how many in each province?

3. Has any action been taken or is any action contemplated against such persons referred to in questions number 1 or number 2 hereof?

4. If any such action has been taken what was the form of such action, and what was the result?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.

2. Taxpayers refusing to file returns or pay tax on consitutional grounds have not been segregated from those who refused or neglected to comply with the Income War Tax Act for other reasons.

3. Actions are continually instituted against persons who fail to file the required returns under the provisions of sections 41 and 79 of of the Income War Tax Act and proceedings to obtain payment of the tax are continually taken under part IX of the Income War Tax Act against those who refuse or neglect to pay their tax.

4. Actions taken as described in 3 above have never been successfully defended on constitutional grounds.

INCOME TAX—$2,500 AND UNDER

Mr. DORION:

What amount was received by the government, during the last five fiscal years, from taxes on incomes of $2,500 and less?

Mr. McCANN: Statistics of taxes received by fiscal years are not maintained by income levels of the individual taxpayers. Statistical estimates projected on the basis of assessments levied provide the following information for the undernoted five calendar years.

Calendar year	Estimated total tax payable by individuals having incomes of $2,500 or less
1945	$248,000,000

Mr. MITCHELL: The following steps have been taken by the federal Department of Labour in cooperation with the Ontario Department of Agriculture, under the joint Dominion-Provincial farm labour programme:

2. Local meetings, including those attended by managers of local employment offices, provincial agricultural officials and chairmen of county agricultural committees, to discuss local measures to meet labour requirements in sugar beet and other areas of Southwestern Ontario.

4. The possibilities of retaining a number of prisoners of war for seasonal work on Canadian farms are under review with other interested authorities.

Mr. HOWE: The remarks I made on the first question apply to this one. I would ask that it be dropped.

Mr. FRASER: I do not think this question should be dropped. We should get information about War Assets Corporation. It is employing over five thousand persons and we ought to be able to find out something about it. This has been a hush-hush matter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER: —right from the beginning. No one can find out about it and we should have some information.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can ask for the information before the committee.

Mr. FRASER: Will you please let me know, Mr. Speaker, when a private member can go before a committee and ask these questions?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to resume his seat. He knows that he should not question the Speaker from the floor of the house. Dropped.

2. (a) What other offers were received for such plant and equipment in each case?

[Mr. Fraser.]

(b) What other efforts were made to interest similar or comparable industries to purchase or acquire the said buildings in each case?

9. (a) Where will Turbo Research company be located?

(b) On what operations will it be engaged?

10. (a) Has the government of the United Kingdom placed any orders for radar equipment since V-J day with Research Enterprises Limited?

(b) Has the government of the United Kingdom intimated a willingness to place such orders, if suitable financing can be arranged?

Mr. HOWE: My previous remarks apply to this question, which, among other things, asks what the government's intentions are with reference to Research Enterprises Limited, thus referring to current transactions as well as to those that have been completed. I would ask that this question be dropped and the information obtained before the committee.

Mr. FLEMING: May I point out that half of these questions do not relate to the disposal of assets, and for that reason I could not obtain the information before the committee since the questions would be outside the scope of reference to the committee. This is the only place I can obtain the information I seek.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege, on what ground does Your Honour say that the question is dropped without the consent of the member who asks it? After all, it is a matter for the house to decide, surely. In three or four instances this afternoon Your Honour has declared a question dropped, and so far as I know the suggestion has come from the government benches and not from the member who asked the question. Either the member must drop it of his own free will or the house itself must decide whether it should be dropped or not.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not dropped by the member; it is dropped by the Chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has to be dropped by the member.

Mr. POULIOT: It is dropped by the Chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not enough.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that it has always been the practice, when the government refuses to answer a question, to declare the question dropped. Moreover, this matter has been discussed by the house on previous occasions; and it has been pointed out that the members who have asked questions which have been dropped will have an opportunity to submit those questions to the committee with a view to having them answered. I think the minister is entitled to ask that the question be dropped.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I rise again, Your Honour, with great deference, to suggest that if there is disagreement in the house over the question whether or not this particular interrogation should be dropped, then it should be submitted to the house for approval or disapproval. I submit that Your Honour cannot simply say that it is dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. gentleman that there is no division on questions, but only on motions. May I assure the house that it is very disagreeable sometimes for the Speaker to refuse what a member may regard as a privilege, but the Speaker has no choice; he must do as the practice of the house dictates or as the standing orders require.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is also very disagreeable to the interrogator.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will consult Beauchesne and May he will find it clearly indicated that it is the privilege of ministers to refuse to answer questions, either on the ground of public interest or for the reason that members may have their questions answered in the committees that are appointed by the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, what the citation is, so that we may look it up?

Mr. SPEAKER: Beauchesne, 307.

Mr. FLEMING: May I respectfully point out, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has not yet refused to answer the question. All he did was to make a statement in which he argued that the question should not be answered, and asked that it be dropped. He has not yet refused to answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The fact that the minister asks that the question be dropped is, I think, an indication that he does not wish to answer it.

Mr. GRAYDON: The position is clear if that is the case.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

*WAR ASSETS—CANADA-UNITED STATES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Was any arrangement and/or agreement made between the government of Canada and the government of the United States providing that surplus war material shall not be exported from Canada to the United States and from the United States to Canada?

2. If so, what was the nature of the arrangement or agreement?

3. If such an arrangement and/or agreement has been entered into, have any instructions been given to Canadian customs officers to refuse entry of United States surplus war materials?

4. If not, why not?

Mr. HOWE: I propose to answer this question orally. There is an arrangement between disposal agencies in the United States and in Canada. It is not an arrangement between governments but simply a working arrangement between disposal agencies. I may say that there is the same arrangement between the disposal agencies of Canada and the United Kingdom, namely that the disposal agency in one country will not offer goods in the other country. There is no prohibition against bringing goods across the border, if they are bought in the United States from the United States disposal agency, provided there is no law of the land which prevents them from being brought into Canada.

I think that answers questions 1 and 2. It also answers questions 3 and 4, since in the circumstances there is no occasion to notify customs officers.

Mr. FRASER: Can the minister now go back and answer the question I asked?

CHEESE EXPORTS

*EDWARDS PROPERTY ON OTTAWA RIVER

Mr. FLEMING:

1. For what purpose is the crown acquiring the property of Mr. Gordon C. Edwards of Ottawa, located at a point overlooking the Ottawa river and Governor's bay?

2. When is it intended to be put to the purpose for which the crown is acquiring it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to part 1 of this question, the property is being acquired in pusuance of the government's policy of securing title to valuable properties on the banks of the Ottawa river in order to preserve them for special purposes and particularly to prevent their acquisition for undesirable uses. The hon. member may be interested to know that just prior to the last war the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, then Prime Minister, arranged for the acquisition of properties along the west side of Wellington Street for some distance beyond Bank, and between Wellington street and the river. He regarded those properties as valuable for future use for governmental purposes. They have since become the site of Confederation building, the Justice building and other departmental buildings in that vicinity.

The second part of the question is:

When is it intended to be put to the purpose for which the crown is acquiring it?

The answer is, at an appropriate time, depending on circumstances. Perhaps my hon. friend does not know, and I might inform him that in the meantime the property continues to be occupied by Mr. Edwards.

My purpose in answering this question orally, Mr. Speaker, is to direct attention to the wisdom of the policy of acquiring certain properties in the interests of the crown. In this connection I should like to draw attention to the emphasis that the fire in Hull on Friday night last has given to the desirability of careful and proper use of land in and about the national capital. That fire endangered the whole city of Hull. It partly destroyed the interprovincial bridge. There are oil tanks on adjacent property. If the fire had spread to them they might have exploded, and the wind could easily have carried the flames to the houses of parliament and other government buildings on this side of the Ottawa river.

The significance of Friday night's conflagration should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. Some years ago a fire on the opposite side of the river destroyed much of the city of Hull and seriously menaced this city of Ottawa. If plans for a capital worthy of Canada are to go forward successfully, there must be both a restraint on the use of property by firms and individuals, and a directed effort by the government to hold desirable properties for their best use in accordance with a general plan for the capital and district.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what the United States government does along the Potomac.

NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. FAIR:

1. What was the gross national debt of Canada at the end of each of the fiscal years: 1942-43, 1943-44, 1944-45, 1945-46?
2. What is the amount of (a) accrued interest; (b) other related commissions and charges, at the end of each of the above years?
3. What percentage of the total national revenue of each of the above years was required to pay the interest, commissions and charges above?
4. What provision has been made to satisfy the above indebtedness?
5. If present monetary policy is continued, can our national debt ever be repaid? If so, how long will it take?

1944	12,359,123,230 16
1946	Not yet available.

2. While the question asks "what is the amount of (a) accrued interest; (b) other related commissions and charges, at the end of each of the above years", the question is answered on the basis of the annual expenditures during the years in question.

Question 3 indicates that the questioner desired the annual expenditures rather than the amount due and unpaid at the fiscal year-end.

4. The Dominion of Canada has always paid the full face amount of the principal of and interest on every direct obligation issued by it, all promptly when due in the lawful currency of the country where payable at the time of payment thereof.

In the budget speech delivered in the House of Commons on February 25, 1937, the Minister of Finance, in referring to an issue of perpetual bonds, stated "it was intended as the initial step in a program which is designed to provide for the consolidation and simplification of our public debt structure. Another purpose which we had in mind was to facilitate the setting up as soon as the condition of our national finances make it practicable, of a general sinking fund to provide for the gradual amortization of our long term debt on scientific lines."

During the war period and for some years before the dominion government has been operating at a deficit and it has not been possible to provide for the paying off of indebtedness out of revenue. However, the government plans in this respect will be made known at the appropriate time.

EVIDENCE AT TRIAL OF KURT MEYER

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of the transcript of the evidence taken by the court on the trial of S.S. General Kurt Meyer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not rise to oppose this motion, but I want to point out to the house that ordinarily court martial proceedings are not producible before parliament. There have been a number of cases in which that question has come up and the request has always been refused. I appreciate that this is an exceptional case, in that the person tried was not a Canadian subject, and therefore I am prepared to allow the motion to pass, but on the understanding that this is not a precedent but a special case.

There is one further point. We have only one copy of this evidence here in Canada. It is very lengthy, covering four large volumes. The task of copying it would be rather long and expensive, so perhaps my hon. friend and I could arrange for him to take communication of it at some convenient place, so that we may not have to produce in the house the only copy we have. If he insists on the evidence being copied, of course that can be done, but I think we can arrive at some satisfactory arrangement for him to take communication of it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So far as the copying is concerned, there is no necessity for that. In regard to the other point raised by the minister, while it is true that according to decisions rendered in the past, court martial evidence is not producible in the house, I should like to point out that this was not a court martial. This was a body set up as an international court by order in council under the provisions of the War Measures Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried subject to the remarks of the minister.

COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE ON KURT MEYER

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters, papers, memos of telephone conversations and other documents which passed between Lieutenant General Chris Vokes and any officer or officers of the trial, tribunal, and/or any senior staff officers of the Canadian Army, and/or legal officers of the Department of Justice and the Department of External Affairs, touching on the commutation of the sentence passed on S.S. General Kurt Meyer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry to have to oppose this motion, on the well-known grounds that communications between junior officers and senior officers or between departmental officials are privileged, and that it is not in the public interest to produce them in parliament. I have raised the same point on other occasions, as my hon. friend well knows. I shall be pleased to make a statement on this matter at the appropriate time, and to answer any questions. I may say here that there were no communications with any minister of the crown or any government officials in Ottawa relating to this matter. Their advice was neither sought nor given, but I must take the stand that the various documents referred to—letters, papers, memos of telephone conversations and the like if there are any, between General Vokes and the other officers of the tribunal, or senior staff officers at headquarters in London—are privileged communications and not producible in parliament, such production being not in the public interest.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

*PRIME MINISTER'S SPECIAL PREROGATIVES

Mr. DESMOND:

For a copy of all orders in council prescribing the special prerogatives of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion is for a copy of all orders in council prescribing the special prerogatives of the Prime Minister. I may say there is nothing unusual about this particular order. It is one that was first adopted by Sir Charles Tupper when he came into office. It has been part of the normal procedure as each new administration came into office to enact similar orders. I have here the various orders that have been passed. The first by Sir Charles Tupper was passed on May 1, 1896. Then there was one by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on July 13, 1896, one by Sir Robert Borden, on October 10, 1911, and another by Sir Robert Borden when he was head of the Union government. Then there is one by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, approved on July 19, 1920, and one by Mr. Bennett, approved on August 7, 1930. Then there is one by myself, approved on October 25, 1935.

I seem to have overlooked passing a similar order between 1921 and 1926. Mr. Meighen also overlooked his opportunity from June to September of 1926. Again I recommended no order from 1926 to 1930. I am told that the clerk of the privy council has assumed that where a prime minister has been in office on a previous occasion, and is returned and continues in office, the old order still has force.

The only variation in the orders passed by myself and by my predecessors since the time of Sir Charles Tupper has been that in the original recommendation of Sir Charles the railway committee was included in the list of appointments designated as the prerogative of the Prime Minister in section 4 of the first two orders in council. This committee was deleted for obvious reasons from the list of appointments, under P.C. 2437 of October 10, 1911, and from subsequent orders in council.

Then in the case of the last two orders in council, namely P.C. 1930 of 1930 and P.C. 3374 of 1935, the original wording of section 3 has been slightly altered to read "recommendations affecting the discipline of the department of another minister" instead of "the discipline of another department".

That is the extent of the changes made. I have been told to be sure to inform the house that this list does not include all the prerogatives of the Prime Minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the list being tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am tabling all the orders.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

PEACE RIVER DISTRICT

RAILWAY OUTLET TO PACIFIC COAST

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the building of a railway outlet from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say that the resolution which I now rise to discuss is not worded as forcefully and as specifically as I should like it to be. But for certain restrictions imposed upon me by the rules of the house I should have the resolution read: "That this parliament endorse the building of the Peace River outlet, forthwith." However, members know full well that private members are not permitted to offer motions which might involve the expenditure of public moneys. I do not see why such motions should not be made by private members. We represent the people who are taxed; we should have some say in how much they are taxed, and how their taxes are to be expended. However, I shall not stop now to discuss amendments to the rules of the house. I merely say in passing that we are compelled by the limitations of the rules to restrict our expressions in matters of this kind. So that the resolution can only ask that the government give consideration to the building of the line, as desired.

I wish to express the hope that hon. members will not talk the resolution out. It is a practice sometimes indulged in. I should like in that connection to say that a long-deferred hope has saddened the hearts of the people in the area which will be directly affected by the proposed railway. I am asking that the house pass the resolution, and thus give them at least some basis for encouragement. But if we cannot see our way clear to pass the resolution, I think it would be better to face it squarely and fairly and vote it down, thereby putting out the ignis fatuus, that dazzling, sparkling, phosphorescent light of political promises which, in the past, has been leading the people toward futility. It would be better for us to put out forever these tantalizing, false beacon-lights which mark the road to nowhere.

The proposal which I would ask the government to consider, and which I would ask hon. members to authorize the government to consider, is to build a railroad line to connect the Pacific Great Eastern with the Northern Alberta railroad, which would incorporate both lines into the Canadian National railway system, and would connect the two branch lines mentioned.

The Northern Alberta Railway, runs from Edmonton to Dawson Creek, at which point it ends in a blind alley. This section of the road is now managed jointly by the two great railway companies in Canada, the Canadian National railway and the Canadian Pacific railway.

My information is that the joint management has not proven very satisfactory. The rolling stock seems to have got into bad repair, while the roadbed itself has been rather badly neglected. It would appear that each of the companies is endeavouring to skim off as much cream as possible, without feeding the cow any hay or chop.

The Pacific Great Eastern section of this line is managed by the government of British Columbia. As hon. members may know, it begins at the town of Squamish, thence running north or north easterly to the town of Quesnel, there meeting with its blind alley. As hon. members will recognize, this road begins at a considerable distance from the main port on the Pacific coast, and ends long before it taps the resources of the north-eastern and central territories, toward which its eastern end hopefully points. My suggestion is that the government consider taking over the Pacific Great Eastern and building a line through from Squamish to Vancouver to join with the Canadian National railway, and that at Quesnel they extend it north to Prince George and then east to connect with the Northern Alberta railway. That would involve the building of about 350 miles of new road.

I believe there has been some talk of inviting private corporations to take over the Pacific Great Eastern and build the road through to the Peace river. I think I am safe in saying that this idea is generally opposed by the people. As late as the early part of last March I had the privilege of meeting the board of trade of the town of Lillooet, and that body passed a resolution to the effect that they would rather have the Pacific Great Eastern remain in the hands of the provincial government and be operated as it is now being operated than have it turned over to a private corporation.

There is a fear among the people of private corporations building railroads because they usually ask for large concessions of the public domain, in the form of either land grants or timber or minerals or power or some other natural resources. The feeling seems to be that the resources which can stimulate a private corporation to build a road, which resources belong to the people themselves, might very well be used by the people to build their own railroad so that they may own it and also control the resources which it will tap. For that reason we believe that the Canadian National Railways should build this line. We feel that the logical and efficient thing to do is to take over both these branch lines and incorporate them in the Canadian National system and then build the line necessary to join the two.

I intend to spend the next few minutes in dealing with the extent of the territory to be served by the proposed line and to indicate something of the natural wealth which might be tapped or exploited thereby. Last year during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I spent some time in dealing with the resources of the Cariboo and Peace River districts. The building of such a railroad as I am suggesting would be of great benefit, not only to British Columbia but to the nation as a whole. Such an undertaking has far more than local importance; it is indeed of national importance.

In particular, however, this line would serve a vast and rich territory which is now very poorly served with transportation or which has no rail transportation at all. The territories which would be directly affected by the building of a Peace River outlet would be, first, the whole territory known as the riding of the Cariboo. This area is roughly about the size of the United Kingdom. It has, as I shall show subsequently, a great variety of valuable resources.

The next territory which would be directly served is the constituency of Peace River which is represented, as hon. members know, by the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low). He is unavoidably absent to-day from the house, but I believe he intended to support this resolution. That territory also is nearly as large as the United Kingdom.

Then there is a third territory which should not be overlooked when the building of a Peace River outlet is being considered. I refer to the Northwest Territories from the boundaries of British Columbia to the boundaries of Alaska. Such a railroad as I am suggesting would be a gateway to that great territory to the north. I believe hon. members are fairly well aware of the abundant natural resources within these territories.

On many occasions this resolution, or one similar to it, has been discussed in this parliament. Seldom has it been discussed without the mover having a good deal to say about the extent of the natural wealth of the country concerned. I imagine than hon. members who have not been there have a good idea of how extensive the natural wealth is.

I should like to summarize some of the things I presented to the house at the last session of parliament. First, let me say something about agriculture. The Peace River and the Peace River block, which is that section of the Peace River within the boundaries of British Columbia, as well as other parts of the Cariboo contain a vast extent of the finest agricultural land in the world. I may say that the agricultural production is extensive enough to warrant the building of this railroad and to guarantee sufficient revenue to make it pay. I believe that the late Sir Henry Thornton is on record as promising to build this line when the Peace River district was able to export 10,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. That 10,000,000 bushels is now away above 20,000,000, and it is not mere idle talk to say that the present production could easily be doubled in the near future were farmers encouraged to the extent of being provided with proper transportation facilities.

Then I want to say a word about ranching in the Cariboo riding. Out in the Chilcotin we have some of the greatest ranching on the North American continent. I believe these ranches have almost reached the limit of their producing capacity unless they can secure supplies of fairly cheap cattle feed from the prairies. If they can receive such shipments on a reasonable basis they could raise more and better cattle than they are now producing.

As a matter of fact the people of British Columbia require for their own use a great deal of agricultural products which could be supplied from the Peace River and the Peace River block. From 1940 to 1943 British Columbia imported $100,000,000 worth of farm products. The Peace River could have supplied probably all of what British Columbia required. It is quite possible that a large portion of that $100,000,000 worth came from the Peace River country, but hon. members may be surprised to learn that before British Columbia can use the products of its own province they have to be exported into another province and then redirected to Vancouver. Some farmers in the Peace River block have to haul their products from one hundred to two hundred miles before they reach a railhead, and then they have to ship them four hundred miles to Edmonton, so that such produce travels from eight to twelve hundred miles and still will be no nearer to Vancouver than they were at the point of shipment. The result is that it costs about seventeen cents to ship a bushel of wheat from the Peace River district to Vancouver, whereas if this line were built the wheat could be laid down in Vancouver at eight cents a bushel.

Farmers have to haul their feed grain from far distant points to the railway at Dawson Creek or to some other point along the line and then send it to Vancouver, where it is transshipped and reloaded an the Pacific Great Eastern and hauled another three hundred to four hundred miles to Williams Lake and then reshipped another hundred and seventy-five miles in to the Chilcotin in order to bring feed to the ranchers in that area, whereas if it were shipped by means of the railway I suggest directly from the Peace River block to the Cariboo, it would be a very short haul indeed and a downhill run all the way, and there would be no difficulty in the ranchers there purchasing what they require to augment their feed supplies.

This Cariboo country is also rich in furs and rich in timber, not only timber which is manufactured into lumber but timbers which may be used for producing newsprint, wall-board and building paper. There are also numerous stands of timber which could very well be used in the plastic industries. We have been given to understand that there are great possibilities in the future for the plastic industry, and there is an abundance of the resources required in such an industry in northern British Columbia.

Next I want to spend a moment or two on the mineral resources. I shall not spend much time on gold because I imagine most people know that there are fine gold mines in the Cariboo riding in full production. Nor shall I spend much time on some of the other minerals which seem to be more attractive from the point of view of moneymaking. I would rather mention the great coal deposit at Hudson Hope. There is nothing on this continent to compare in extent and quality, with the possible exception of the coal deposit in west Virginia, with that great coal deposit at Hudson Hope. The brochure which was prepared by the government of British Columbia points out that this coal is superior to Pennsylvania coal. Much of this coal could be shipped direct to our ports on the Pacific coast if we had the means of transportation, and it could be used not only in our locomotives but in our shipping and in our furnaces. At the present time British Columbia has to import a good deal of the coal used for these purposes. The development of our coal resources in this area would very probably lead to the establishment of secondary industries of great value. I was reading a speech made by Mr. J. Corsbie, M.L.A. in the provincial legislature of British Columbia about two weeks ago, in which he gives what I believe to be a conservative estimate of the possibilities of a ton of coal. He says that a ton of coal will yield 800 feet of gas, ten gallons of gasoline, twenty pounds of ammonia sulphate, thirty gallons of crude oil tar, three gallons of creosote oil, one gallon of lubricating oil, ten pounds of grease, and 1,500 pounds of coke; and even that does not exhaust all the possible by-products of a ton of coal. The British Columbia government informs us that there are three billion tons of coal packed in there in that area near Hudson Hope. The only way you can get it out is by a wheel-barrow.

I also wish to mention in passing the great wealth of hydro-electric power that we have in the ridings of Peace River and Cariboo. The Peace river canyon alone has tremendous possibilities. The government has estimated that sufficient power could be developed in the canyon alone to meet all the light, heat and power needs of a city of one million people, and that is probably more people than we have in the entire province of British Columbia. Then there is also the Fraser river and other rivers which could produce an immense volume of power.

I should also mention that Cariboo riding is a mecca for tourists. There is no more beautiful scenery in the world, and fishing and hunting are superb in the Cariboo.

In the southern end of the riding horticulture is beginning to be developed extensively. They can grow fruit and vegetables in great abundance, but until recently they did not do so because they would grow it only to rot in the fields. Last year, however, a canning industry was established at Lillooet, and it has greatly stimulated the growth of fruit and vegetables.

While I am emphasizing the great national wealth of the territories which would be benefited by a Peace River outlet, I do not desire to base my argument for the building of the road entirely on this ground. I think any forward-looking government and parliament would give careful consideration to these great resources and would be planning the best way to develop them in the interests of the nation as a whole. But even if that were not done I wish to make this point, that the Peace River outlet should be built because of the developments that have already taken place in that area. There is already a sufficient development to warrant the building of the Peace River outlet. It is necessary to enable the farmers in that territory to market their produce direct in the coast ports as well as in the interior. It is necessary for them to have this line in order to facilitate the marketing of fruit from the southern part of British Columbia, in the Peace river and on the prairies. It is necessary equally to have this means of transportation in order that they may be able to supply feed grain to the ranchers, dairymen and chicken farmers of southern and interior British Columbia. This line which I am suggesting should be built would make the Pacific Great Eastern, the Northern Alberta and the Canadian National from Jasper to Prince Rupert pay dividends. It would also bring about cheaper transportation for farmers' grain that has to be exported, particularly to the orient, and it would justify the building of the grain elevator at Prince Rupert. My information is that, while that elevator was built at a very considerable cost of public money, it has never been used to any extent, certainly far from being used to its fullest capacity; and it is simply monstrous that the grain which is grown in the Peace River district cannot be directly unloaded in the elevator at Prince Rupert so as to stimulate not only the railway itself but serve the community which grows wheat so extensively in the Peace River country and provide the shipping so badly needed at the city of Prince Rupert.

I desire to urge this undertaking on the government as part of its post-war rehabilitation pragramme. As far as I understand the government's programme as it has been announced by the spokesmen for the administration, the government anticipates that there will be need of extensive public investments in the immediate future; for while the government is apparently committed to entrusting the future of our economy to the gentle and tender care of private enterprise, it does not seem to have a very great deal of confidence in private enterprise; it anticipates that private enterprise will fall down; and if the government does not do something about the matter there will be another depression, perhaps as bad as that which preceded the war. So that the government has told us that when private enterprise has done its best to give full employment and maintain full production the government will undertake to make very considerable public investments with a view to increasing purchasing power and thus stimulate private enterprise to scramble for greater profits and thereby employ the population. That, I believe, is a fair statement of the government's position.

The expenditures which might be made in connection with the Peace River outlet would do much of what the government intends to do in the event of unemployment becoming rampant. I do not know when it is rampant; whether it is rampant when we have 250,000 unemployed, or 300,000 or 450,000 unemployed. So far as I am concerned it has all the rampancy that it ought to have now. But such an investment would, as I say, not only stimulate private industry but at the same time leave a considerable asset on the credit side of the exchequer and provide a much needed public service to the people concerned. I believe that such public investment will very soon become necessary; and, frankly, I believe that the only possible hope of the people of the Peace River and the Cariboo securing this line is through the implementing of the government's policy of post-war rehabilitation. For that reason I would like very much to have, in the course of this debate, the assurance, either of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, or of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), who will probably speak for the government on this resolution. or through some spokesman, that the Peace River outlet will have a priority on the programme of the government in its post-war reconstruction work.

By way of an example I should like to invite the attention of the government and of the house to what is taking place in Great Britain along similar lines at the present time. In this connection I would mention the case of Middlesborough, which I found referred to in an interesting article in the last issue of the Reader's Digest. There will be found the story of how the government of Middlesborough hired architects, geographers, designers and sociologists to make a complete analysis of living conditions within the city borders. To assist them they found ready cooperation on the part of the chamber of commerce, industrialists, housewives, teachers, doctors, trades unions, shop-keepers, and indeed all groups within the community; all were ready to cooperate, and together they fearlessly and realistically analysed the situation of the city. This self-inventory became the basis of a plan to rebuild the entire city of Middlesborough, and to rebuild it in a period of thirty years, taking three definite stages to complete the plan. The city government was and is responsible for carrying out the plan, but the British nation has an interest in Middlesborough, and because of that interest we found present at this analysis four ministers of the national government. They were there to support the local community with the financial resources of the state in carrying out the plans upon which the community itself had decided. There were there the minister of education, the minister of health, the minister of transport, and the minister of town and county planning. They were there to give leadership and advice and to supervise the carrying out of the plan in accordance with national standards. The government of Britain was behind the Middlesborough city plan in order to provide the required financial aid. Thus the authority, the advice and the funds of the nation entered into partnership with the initiative and the enterprise of all elements in the community.

In using this case as an example I do not mean to imply that our government is less competent to undertake great and costly projects than the government of Great Britain. This government's record during the war period in its production of war material and supplies is a noble one, and should be sufficient answer to anyone who might have any doubt that the government of this country was less competent than governments in other countries. I for one do not question the government's ability to do the job, but I am questioning its willingness to try. I find that the British government is on the job supporting the plans of each local community, so far as rehabilitation is concerned, by putting behind those plans the financial resources of the nation.

The city of Middlesborough is a comparatively small affair when one thinks of the vast territory and the wealth of which I have spoken, within the Cariboo and the great Peace River country and the Northwest Territories. That area of the Peace River and the Cariboo is about twice the size of the United Kingdom, and I feel safe in saying that the natural resources of the Cariboo and the Peace River is greater than that of the entire British Isles. Surely with such an attractive proposal the government of Canada will not be loath to support the plans that have been made for twenty years by the people of the Peace River and the Cariboo, by advancing the necessary capital to build their means of transportation.

I do not hesitate to say that this district of which I am speaking is rich enough in natural resources to employ gainfully every returned soldier in Canada, if the government were sufficiently interested to give leadership and to finance whatever projects might be required to develop those natural resources. What then is to be the answer of this parliament and of the government to the plea of the people of the Cariboo and of the Peace River, which plea I now bring before this house.

I have just said that in the case of Middlesborough the government representatives were there on the job to stimulate every spark of initiative in the community, to stimulate this free enterprise of which we hear so much. I would point out to the government that there are hundreds of communities in the territory of which I have been speaking who would gladly respond to any appeal which the government might make in this regard, and no one can possibly estimate what can result when it is possible to inspire a whole community to exercise its rights and powers of free enterprise, and its initiative.

The people of the Cariboo and of the Peace River decided more than twenty years ago, after a careful analysis of their economic position, what was the first step to be taken in developing their country and making it possible for them to earn a living on the farms of that land, and they came to the government and are still coming with their plea that this step be taken. To-day they are still the forgotten people.

That area was settled very largely on the strength of promises that were made to build this railway, and I think it is only fair to say that the party in power to-day was not the only party that made those promises. Every leader of the major parties of the country is on record, committed to the hilt to build this railroad. I pointed out last year that the Prime Minister himself, speaking in Edmonton in 1924, unequivocally pledged himself to build a road as soon as humanly possible. I do not know what the Prime Minister thinks is humanly possible, but that was a long time ago, and surely it is approximating human possibility by now.

Other leaders, such as the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Lord Bennett, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), and, I believe, the leaders of the other parties in this house, have pledged themselves to support the building of the Peace River outlet. I suggest, therefore, that this house and the government as well have a moral obligation to the people of the Peace River and the Cariboo. I do not know to what extent a moral obligation is going to count in this parliament, but I think it ought to count. I am suggesting that we make it count, because it is the obligation of each one of us.

Those people went in there more than a quarter of a century ago on the strength of promises that a railroad would be built to take out their produce and convey it to market. They are still there, isolated within a vast territory filled with immeasurable wealth, and they are knocking on the door to be let out. This government and parliament alone hold the key that can open that door, and that key is transportation which will enable those people to find a market for their produce to the extent that their developments increase settlements, and to develop the natural resources to which I have already referred.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I am very glad to support this resolution both on my own behalf and on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party. There can be no doubt in the mind of any hon. member who knows the situation that the Peace River district is severely handicapped by lack of a railway outlet to the Pacific coast. Further, as the member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) has said, that condition has existed over a period of almost thirty years.

There is no other area in Canada of like size that has been so unfortunate. The situation really is and has been a great tragedy. The people there moved in after the last war, and many of them have held on continuously until this time in the expectation that there would be a rail outlet to the Pacific coast. Many of the original settlers have died; others have been forced to give up their farms, quite a few have moved down to the Pacific coast. Right through the picture they have shown great courage and strength of character. Now that the war is over the time has come for this parliament to go to the aid of the people of the Peace River district. They should have a rail outlet to the Pacific coast at Prince Rupert, and also at Vancouver and New Westminster.

Another tragedy has been the failure to develop the country along the Canadian National line from Jasper to Prince Rupert, in the centre of the province of British Columbia. Much of that land is fertile, yet the people there have had to struggle along with inadequate railway service. Just a few weeks ago I believe their service was again reduced. They have had handicap after handicap, and they too deserve some help from this parliament.

I know the government of British Columbia is only too anxious to cooperate in getting an outlet to the Pacific coast. The provincial government has a railroad which runs from Squamish on Howe Sound up to Quesnel, and is prepared to complete it into Prince George where it could connect with a line from the Peace River district. The whole province of British Columbia is behind the plan of opening up the Peace River district to the Pacific coast.

In the summer of 1944 the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) toured that country from Prince Rupert to Prince George, down to Quesnel, and then flew into the Peace River country. As he left the province he made a statement which among other things dealt with this Peace River outlet. He said:

> The development of British Columbia's rich north country must be one of our first projects in the post-war era. I have already stated that as a means towards that end, the Progressive Conservative party is committed to securing the connection by rail of the Peace River country with the ports of Prince Rupert, Vancouver and New Westminster. This project is essential, not only to the areas affected and the Pacific ports, but to the future development and utilization of the great resources of this section of Canada.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I sometimes think we are very much out of date in our attitude toward the building of railways. As a people we were badly bitten twenty odd years ago when we got too much railway mileage for our population. It is quite true that we got into trouble then and that a great deal of money was lost. Through the war years we found that much of that mileage was very useful, and that the money was not all wasted. But a belief has grown up in Canada that we must be very careful about building any more railways; that it is almost a sin to mention another line of railway which should be built in this far-flung country. That, I think, is dead wrong. In that view we are out of date, far behind the times. The country cannot stand still. Canada is developing all the time; new settlements are growing up, new resources are being found, and they must be served by railways. This Peace River district should have top priority in getting a new railway line. Let us as Canadians change our thinking a bit and be prepared to build railways where they are needed.

In conclusion I should like to leave one other thought with the house. We must think of northern Canada. This country cannot attain its destiny unless the northern part of Canada is developed. At the present time nearly all settlement in Canada is within one or two hundred miles of the boundary between the United States and Canada; we have not settled in depth at all. To do that we must go north. Look at what Russia has been able to do in Siberia; yet Canada has dragged behind. We must turn our attention to northern Canada; and I do not think there is any finer place to begin than by constructing this rail outlet from the Peace River district to the Pacific coast.

Mr. McIVOR: If I may ask the hon. member a question, are there any highways there on which big trucks can transport goods?

Mr. GREEN: At the present time the British Columbia government is completing a highway into the Peace River district from the Prince Rupert line of the Canadian National.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In rising to speak to the motion now before the house, Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that it is not my intention to delay the house very long. I realize, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine), that very often over a long period of years the resolutions of private members have been talked out, and I for one would like to see this matter come to a vote to-day. Hence my remarks will be brief.

I am rising to support the motion. I think it was in 1931 that, as a new member of the house, I first listened to similar arguments being presented by the then member; and if my memory serves me aright he was told by the then Minister of Railways that the time was not ripe for the construction of this railway. That argument is used very often when a government wants to turn down something or someone is against it; they use the stock phrase that this is not the time to put such a proposal into effect. I want to say to hon. members of the house that in many provinces agricultural land is limited, and that is so in British Columbia. It is true that our province covers a large area, but actually the amount of good agricultural land is not as great as the area of the province would seem to indicate. I think it can be said without fear of successful contradiction that if at the inception the railways in British Columbia had gone right through that district, rather than down through the Fraser, we would have had a greater population in that province than we have to-day.

Just in passing may I offer one word of criticism in regard to the offer of the provincial government to returned men of a million acres of land in that country. I have said before, and I repeat, that if the provincial government would take off the strings and make that land available to all returned men, no matter from what province they come, there would not be any great difficulty in obtaining settlers in that district. This is first-class land; as the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) says, there is certainly good land up there. But I think the hon. member for Cariboo overlooked one thing in his argument; and he will realize that as an old member of the house I listened to these arguments advanced year after year before the war. My information is that a great deal of the wheat grown in that part of British Columbia matures a little too late to go out through the lakes, so the only outlet is through the Pacific coast ports. If therefore for no other reason than that, an outlet should be developed to permit the wheat to get out as speedily as possible.

When one considers the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been spent in the east, one sometimes wonders why those of us who come from British Columbia, and sometimes those coming from the prairie provinces as well, have to put up such a terrible fight for what we obtain. We see proposals advanced now to develop the St. Lawrence river, on which hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent; and to do what? To open up an inlet right up to the city of Toronto. Those of us who come from British Columbia should serve notice on the government right now—or on any government—that we in the west had better have a little more consideration before they start spending many more millions of dollars in the central provinces.

I have no desire to delay the passage of this resolution; as I say, it is my hope that it may come to a vote. Let me assure the hon. member for Cariboo and other hon. members that the resolution has my hearty support.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, as was indicated by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine), my colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who is the leader of this group, is keenly interested in the resolution. Had he not been unavoidably absent I am sure that on behalf of this group he would have been pleased to support the motion. However, inasmuch as the constituency of Jasper-Edson, which it is my privilege to represent, is the neighbouring constituency of Peace River, my leader has asked me to say a few words on his behalf in support of the resolution.

It has already been intimated by those who have spoken that for the last twenty-five years at least the Peace River outlet has been promised by the leaders of political parties. It would seem now that the time has long since come when that promise should be kept.

I do not believe it is necessary for me to add to the statistics already presented by the hon. member for Cariboo. What he has put on the record is adequate, and anything I might add would be superfluous. There are however a few general thoughts which have not been expressed, and to which I should like to give utterance.

It seems that in the discussion of matters of this kind we cannot get away from the fundamentals of economics. I noticed that on several occasions, before reaching the conclusion of his address, the hon. member for Cariboo related this resolution to those economic principles in which he contends he believes. I think it appropriate therefore to say a few words in that connection.

I am not sure that I agree altogether with all the reasons offered by the hon. member as to why the people of the Peace River area should be permitted this outlet. I consider that the purpose of the outlet, which might take the form of a railway or a highway, is primarily that of serving the people of the community. The Peace River outlet, as indicated, certainly would reduce the cost of shipping goods in and out of the area in question. That being so, surely there can be no reason why the project should not be carried out.

The hon. member for Cariboo stated that if this project, and others in close proximity to it, were undertaken, probably all the unemployed veterans in Canada could be put to work. I share with the hon. member, and with all others of like mind, the desire to see ex-servicemen receive the highest possible income at the earliest possible time. I cannot agree however that the construction of this or any other railroad or highway should be carried on for the express purpose of putting people to work.

Mr. IRVINE: I agree with that.

Mr. KUHL: If we are interested only in seeing that people are employed, then in the event of the carrying out of this project, rather than using the most modern machinery and equipment for the building of railroads and highways we should see to it that the work is done by the use of picks, shovels and wheelbarrows. If this were done there would be plenty of work for large numbers of people for a long time to come. So I cannot agree that out purpose in any way should be that of putting people to work on the project; the project should be the purpose, whether it requires a hundred or a thousand men.

I cannot anticipate what reply the minister is going to make to the arguments presented. I trust and hope however that we shall not be confronted with the statement that there are not sufficient funds to carry out this and other public works. I believe we have heard sufficient arguments, both in and out of the house, to establish for all time the fact that if we can finance a war there is no reason why we cannot finance any project for peace. The only argument I would consider as reasonable from the minister would be that at this time, or for a few years in the future, we may have a greater need for materials and manpower than we have for the building of this route. Otherwise I cannot think of any logical reason why the project should not be undertaken immediately. Surely the minister would not be logical and consistent if he were to plead a lack of funds, or that we must have the funds for other purposes.

Turning to what has been said by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid),

I can see no reason why there should be any competition between eastern and western Canada with respect to services of one kind or another. Whatever is physically possible in any part of Canada can be made financially possible. There is no reason why the east as well as the west cannot have all the facilities they desire. I trust therefore that the minister will not argue that to accede to the request which has been made would not be financially possible.

In conclusion I would repeat my opening statement, that we of this group heartily support the resolution.

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to raise my voice in support of the resolution offered by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine).

Strange as it may sound to Your Honour, this is the first occasion I have addressed the house since Your Honour has occupied the position of Speaker. I remember well only a few months ago when you, sir, and I sat in an obscure part of the chamber, trying to listen to the debates which at times reached us only as a faint echo. Since that time you have ascended the throne of the mighty I have not had an opportunity as yet to address you in your dignified position as Speaker of this house. Personally, I have remained within a seat or two of the seat I now occupy, and I believe that is as far as I can hope to get in this house.

I rise because the motion so ably proposed by the hon. member for Cariboo forms part of a programme and plan which I have often advocated in this house. I shall not delay the house to-day in going over that plan. I know how difficult it is for hon. members from the maritimes and the central provinces to understand fully what we are asking for. This is a vast country extending as it does from the forty-ninth parallel to the Arctic ocean.

I was pleased that the hon. member referred to the northwest in asking support for his motion. Athabaska is the gateway to this great north country. The building of an outlet to the Pacific ocean would prove a tremendous boon to the Peace River country and also to the northern parts of the western provinces. Not only would it prove a boon for the farmers in shipping their cattle, grain and dairy products, it would also be a great boon to our fishing industry and would help to bring about the further development of the oil and tar sands resources in the northern part of Athabaska and in the Northwest Territories.

Reference has been made to the Peace river. How pleasing it is to hear the word "peace" used in this house. How pleasing it is that hon. members are able to talk about peace instead of having almost all their time taken up with rumours of dissatisfaction, of riots, of rebellions, and all the signs of war that are appearing throughout this yet so sickly world. Those of us who know the great value of the Peace River district sometimes regret that it would be so easy to bring the instruments of war into that country. No Canadian has really enjoyed the feelings of peace, contentment and good will until he has stood on the shores of our great northern rivers, the Athabaska or the Peace, and communed with nature and thanked Providence for having so generously given of his greatness to this great north land.

The other day I read an extremely interesting article in the Saturday Evening Post by a United States engineer with the army of occupation. He told how Germany was cut off from sources of oil and gasoline, how she could get only a smattering of supplies from Roumania. But he described how, despite the bombardment by the allies, she continued to manufacture high-octane gasoline, superior to anything that we had, from coal. On reading that article I was reminded of the great coal resources of the west.

The hon. member referred to the tremendous area of coal in the Fort St. John area, but he could not speak too strongly of the possibilities of development there. That is only one small part of the vast coal resources of western Canada. Our resources of gas and oil are not increasing greatly and the day may not be too far distant when they will be greatly diminished. As I said once when I was trying to get the government to take action in the development of the tar sands in northern Alberta, the possession of oil is necessary if any nation is to be strong in war or in peace.

Oil was responsible for the breaking down of many of the negotiations after the last war. It was also responsible for the failure of many of the peace conferences after the last war. I need not repeat that to-day it is responsible for the disagreement in the UNO meeting now being held in the United States. Because of these vast resources known to be still available we do not need to worry. We know what has been done in Germany and we know that we have billions and billions of tons of coal available in western Canada. If we can properly develop our natural resources by carrying out the necessary research work Canada will stand in front of every nation in the world for having provided the necessary work for her people.

Every time you settle one thousand new settlers in western Canada on land such as is yet available in British Columbia and in northern Saskatchewan and Alberta you ensure employment for ten thousand men and women in the factories of eastern and central Canada. There is no doubt about that. Just the other day I heard someone on the streets of Ottawa say that the west wants everything. All we want is to do our share in looking after the welfare of the workers of this country. We want to do our share in the reconstruction work that will be necessary. We want to contribute to the employment of men and women in the factories of eastern and central Canada.

These gaps in the line must be filled in, and I intend to refer to this matter in a later debate in this house. I hold in my hand a brief which I am proud to say was prepared by my son who was recently discharged from the army but who is now practising law in Alberta. This brief is presented on behalf of the people from St. Walburg in Saskatchewan to my own town of Bonnyville. If this route is completed new highway transportation will be provided for the northern parts of the western provinces. I do not want to keep the house too long, but I should like to show hon. members something of the possibilities.

In 1923 when I was a member of the Alberta provincial house I called upon the man who is now president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. At that time he was a vice-president stationed in Winnipeg. I was fortunate to get an immediate audience and he gave me an immediate and clear and straight answer to a question I asked. I asked, "Are you interested in the construction of branch lines and railroads in northeastern Alberta and northwestern Saskatchewan?" He said, "No, we are not. We had plans and surveys made in the past but we have abandoned them. We consider that that country is now part of the Canadian National railway territory and that it is up to them to develop it." May I claim credit for having told the gentleman then that he was making a mistake, that I, for one, was convinced of the tremendous possibilities of that north country where crops can be produced every year and which does not depend on one type of production alone, but where we have a diversity of resources and of production. Inside of five years the Canadian Pacific Railway Company came to this house and asked for a charter renewal or for a new charter to build lines in the northern part of the western provinces.

A few years later, in 1929 or 1930, I read in Hansard recently that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had joined with the Canadian National Railways in the purchase of the Northern Alberta railway, then known as the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway and the Alberta Great Waterways. They purchased these roads and they are to-day part of the Northern Alberta railway. So that we now have these two great railways joint owners of hundreds of miles of line in that territory. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has obtained running rights from near Meadow Lake on the Canadian National Railways on which construction began in 1929 at Loon Lake in Saskatchewan, a line which I am asking them to complete now that the war is over. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has running rights for fifty-five miles over the Canadian National railway, from a point at or near Loon Lake in the constituency of Athabaska to Cold Lake. The Canadian Pacific survey extends in an easterly direction and somewhat to the north running right through the riding of Athabaska and joining there with the Northern Alberta railway at Lac La Biche, and with the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway somewhere in the vicinity of Lesser Slave lake, forming a great new highway of communication in the northern part of the province, indicating not only the advisability but the necessity of building this western outlet which we are advocating to-day in this house.

I have been pleased with the tone of this debate, and I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) upon the able manner in which he has presented his argument in favour of the building of this outlet. I have spent the best years of my life, if I may speak humbly about myself, in the service of my country, and now that I am getting old I hope that God will lend to me enough years of life to enable me to see the completion of this great project and to hear the engines whistling their way clear all the way from Winnipeg and Saskatoon, or Hudson bay, because we have the choice of routes, right through to Prince Albert, through my country and through the Peace River country, that wonderful, beautiful country, and then on into the province of British Columbia to the sea.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to say how much I appreciated the speech of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene). I was interested in his dealing with Peace, that wonderful river and that wonderful aim. But it seems that the word "Peace" is best described by Charlie McCarthy who four Sundays ago said that peace was now raging all over the world. I think that is the kind of peace we now have.

I was also glad that my hon. friend had discovered a lot of oil up in that country. If he has, he is the only one who knows anything about it, and I think he must have kept silent about it because the large oil companies, which are so often accused of saying that there is tremendous exploration going on there, do not yet seem to have discovered oil, although I hope that they will ultimately discover very large deposits there. The government of British Columbia, of course, must wake up. They are going to develop these resources on their own but they do not care to spend any money in doing so, and so their oil, I think, will remain where nature put it, in that great storehouse below, if it is down there at all.

I rise for one purpose and it is this, to say that we in Alberta of the political persuasion of which I am, are most heartily in favour of this resolution. We are not newly converted to it by any means. I attended a convention in Alberta in January of this year; we there affirmed a resolution that we had passed at the convention the year before, and it was right along this line.

May I also say something with respect to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I know, Mr. Speaker, that one cannot refer to what has been said in a previous debate, but I have received from some organization in the maritime provinces literature dealing with what they call the maritime railway question. All that this resolution asks is that this government give consideration to the building of this railway. Why should we not in this parliament adopt a new outlook; in short, do our duty in the maritimes, do it in the northern part of Alberta, in Saskatchewan and in British Columbia, and so help to make this the Dominion of Canada rather than the sectionalized business that it seems to be at the present time

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I rise also to support this resolution. I think it might be pointed out that although all the members who have spoken in favour of it come from the west, we all speak as Canadians and not as westerners, and the reason we speak as we do is because we know naturally better than the people in the eastern part of Canada what are our problems.

I have just three points and they are very short. First, it seems to me perfectly obvious, from what we have heard already in the telling arguments that have been advanced, that the non-completion of this railway outlet is a matter of expense alone. That is the only reason in the world why it has not been done. I was particularly interested in the only part of the remarks of the mover of the resolution (Mr. Irvine), with which I disagreed. He took some time to explain the great preference of the people of British Columbia for a government-owned railway over one owned by private enterprise. So far as I am concerned I do not care who builds the railway just so long as it is built. I think it is very likely that the people of that area feel as I do about it. But that question hardly arises. I do not believe there is any private enterprise that is particularly anxious to build that road now. They would not want to spend a large sum of money in the construction of a road which would not be a profitable operation at the present time.

If the government should consider that the expense of this construction is an insuperable obstacle, I wish to point out that this is not an isolated demand on the part of British Columbia and Alberta members for the building of an uneconomical railway purely for their sectional interests. I suggest to the responsible ministers that this is, rather, one part and perhaps one small part of a very great programme of public development, and particularly of development of communications, which we can embark on now that we have secured peace. We can make these developments into profitable operations either for private enterprise or for the government—if only we are prepared to face the obvious facts and link such developments, this one and many others over Canada, with a programme of large-scale immigration into this country. If we have the additional people who will settle in such an area, all questions of whether or not the expense is at present too great, or whether the traffic or the people in the Peace River could support a railway, disappear, just as they disappeared in the early days of railway building and colonization.

I should like to refer, too, to what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) said about the provincial government of British Columbia having set aside a million acres for soldier settlement and having put a string on it that the settlers must be British Columbia returned men. I agree with the hon. member that that string should be removed, but I would still be fearful that veterans would not take up those million acres in any great numbers unless they were sure that a very large additional number of people were going into the area. I have not yet been there; I am going. I am told it is very fine indeed, that the yield of the crops is very great. But according to a professor at the university of British Columbia there are many people in that general area who have not a cash income of more than $400 a year.

When one takes into consideration the enormous demand for foodstuffs, and the tremendous wealth and great productivity of the country, that condition can only arise because of the lack of proper transportation facilities. I am very sure that, whereas returned veterans are now going on to the land in and around Vancouver and other cities, were they assured of a proper outlet for their commodities this great area of which we are speaking would be quickly filled up.

My final point, Mr. Speaker, is this. All great cities start as distributing centres for the produce of the countryside. Then they increase, and so long as they have veins and arteries reaching out into the hinterland they thrive and prosper. But so soon as the development of the great natural resources of the hinterland of our country ceases, those cities will fail to increase, and if they fail to increase they will probably diminish in size and cease to prosper. Nothing can stand still; it must go ahead or it must go back. Here is one of the missing arteries into the great port and city of Vancouver.

I suggest that Toronto started as a centre of agricultural marketing and as the years went by it developed, burst into a great industrial city and contemporaneously into the greatest mining centre in North America. That city is growing now, and depends for its prosperity upon the rich mining areas of the north which are being opened up, and upon western Canada itself. Likewise we have Winnipeg, which again is a great city, but which has not achieved the same position of diversification as has Toronto. Winnipeg, I think, may be described without offence to anyone as a grain city. That is its lifeblood; that is why it exists. In Vancouver we have a similar situation. Vancouver is a great port, but at the present moment it is chiefly dependent for its existence and expansion on the logging industry. It is a great lumber city, but if it is to reach the stage of diversification which has been attained by the older and larger cities of Canada, it, too, must have the same opportunity for outlets as have those other cities. In the past years of war there has been a great influx of people into Vancouver. At least 60,000 of the 90,000 who came to British Columbia during the war years came to that city. We must now not only be a logging city and a port but develop a secondary industry and must become an industrial centre and a mining centre as well. We cannot do that unless our hinterland is developed. That one should have to go 1,500 miles around by Edmonton to get into the Peace River country is most ridiculous, and one which will not improve the balance of population in British Columbia. If that balance is not improved the progress of Canada itself will be held back.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker. For the reasons I have given I consider that this project can and should be undertaken, in the interest not only of the west but of the whole of Canada.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): If I may say a word in support of this resolution, I do not think this debate should be confined wholly to hon. members who come from British Columbia and from Alberta, because it is a matter of national concern. After all, when one considers that the province of Alberta and this part of British Columbia which has been particularly described this afternoon contain, I believe, the very richest part of Canada, with probably the most sparse population, a country which has a hinterland of this description with a sparse population cannot be expected indefinitely to be able to hold such a country selfishly for its own ends. I believe the time has come when we should have a comprehensive national programme to develop the whole of the Canadian north country.

The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine), who introduced this resolution this afternoon, is not supporting this proposal for the first time. I remember how the former member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), who was a member of the old U.F.A. group of which my hon. friend was also a member, used periodically to introduce a resolution here regarding a Peace River outlet.

I am very glad to rise, not only on behalf of myself but on behalf of those associated with me in this party, to support this resolution. In doing so, I submit this to the house. Transportation, after all, ought not to be considered wholly as a matter of profit and loss. We do not consider highways in that light, and if we want to develop the country we must have transportation that is fast and that will carry the heavy loads which are necessary to maintain production in an area such as the Peace River and the Cariboo. My mind goes back to a period before the war, and I hope that we also learned a lesson during the war, when there were people in the house and across the country who were constantly urging that certain railway lines be pulled up, that certain branches be discontinued, and that even the railways connecting east and west might be served over one line of steel.

All of us during the war realized how valuable those rails were to the country. Sometimes I think the Canadian Pacfiic Railway Company would probably be glad indeed if the double track which was removed between White River and another point on that railway, the name of which I have forgotten, had been left instead of being pulled up at the behest of those who were opposed to continuing two transcontinental lines. I am glad to hear my hon. friends to the right, the Progressive Conservative party, supporting expanding railway transportation in this country. That should make it pretty well unanimous in this house. In view of the need for the railway, the desirability of opening up the vast territory, the very rich country of northern Alberta and of the Cariboo area of British Columbia, and of the entire Peace River block, I hope that the resolution will receive the support of the house. More than that, I hope that the government will pay attention to the resolution and carry out the wishes of parliament and ensure the building of this badly needed outlet to the sea without unnecessary delay.

If, as has been already said, they consider it a matter of profit and loss immediately, it may be some years before the project is undertaken; but, after all, when we consider the history of western Canada and the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, we remember that there were people who predicted that it would not pay for the axle grease when it went through uninhabited country. We realize what the building of that road meant to the prairie country. I believe the logical railway, because of the location of its main and Prince Rupert lines, and in view of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Cariboo, is the Canadian National. But let us bear in mind, when we discuss the building of new roads by the Canadian National Railways, that if we are to impose upon the Canadian National Railways the building of a road which may not be immediately profitable, then this House of Commons should remember that fact in future days when the balance sheets of that railway system are placed before parliament. We should not impose upon the Canadian National Railways an obligation and then criticize it because it cannot make the venture pay. This parliament was too prone to do that in pre-war days. Before I sit down may I say once more that I hope the resolution will receive the hearty support of the house.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, normally at this late time one would be justified in asking the permission of the house to call it six o'clock, but in view of the expressed desire to have the debate conclude and the vote taken I propose to carry on for the few minutes that remain before we rise, and I would ask the indulgence of the house to continue at eight o'clock if I have not concluded.

The reason I rise to support the resolution is my belief that I can add, in the few brief minutes at my disposal, one or two arguments to those adduced by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine). With due respect, I hope that the minister will give consideration to those arguments and let the house have a reasoned statement as to whether or not he proposes to carry out the spirit of the resolution and, if not, why not.

It is not necessary for me to add anything to what the hon. member for Cariboo said with reference to the resources of that great country which would be served by the railway that he is advocating. Their main resources are grain, millions of bushels potentially, and coal, millions of tons, as he has pointed out. I need hardly add that grain, certainly wheat especially, is one of the main requirements of the world at this time and it is very probable that coal will rank closely behind grain.

These resources are not developed to their full extent because there are no adequate outlets for that area. Without adequate outlets resources cannot find their way to the market, and without adequate transportation facilities people will not go in. There is no free access in or out of the area. Before one can expect any country to develop it is certainly necessary to provide it with a proper transportation system and a proper outlet. After all, that is the whole history of Canada. Canada itself did not develop until someone took his courage in his hands and constructed a railway over what was virtual waste.

Following the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, Canada along the southern border underwent a great and remarkable expansion. Following the construction of the Canadian National, or what is now the Canadian National, we witnessed an almost equally remarkable expansion in the north central part of the dominion. It is only reasonable, therefore, to assume that the same expansion would follow were we now to build this railway into the further northern part of the two provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF PARKDALE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

150 Balmoral Avenue,
Toronto, Ontario,
March 30, 1946.

To the Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.
Honourable Sir:

I, Herbert Alexander Bruce, member of the House of Commons for Parkdale, declare my intention to resign my seat as such member, and hereby resign my said seat.

Dated at Toronto this 30th day of March, 1946.

Herbert A. Bruce.

Witness:
Olive E. Donnelly
Betty L. Stewart

I shall issue my warrant to-morrow for a new writ for an election in the electoral district of Parkdale.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Parkdale, whose letter you have just read, wrote me also and asked if I would be good enough to read his letter to his associates in the House of Commons. With your permission and with the indulgence of the house I trust I may be permitted to do so now. It is as follows:

John Bracken, Esq., M.P.,
Leader of the Opposition,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Bracken,

It will not be a surprise to you that by concurrent mail I am tendering my resignation to the Speaker, for you knew of my determination not to be a candidate in the last election until I yielded to your urgent request and that of my executive committee. Having accomplished what was requested of me under the special circumstances existing at that time, I think it is now clear for the very same reason that I should not continue longer to sit in the House of Commons.

May I recall that I only consented to be a candidate in 1940 when it was impressed upon me that this provided an opportunity to render actual war service because of the absence of so many of our younger men in the armed forces. The war was still continuing at the time of the general election last year and the same arguments were presented. Now, however, the situation has changed because the war has not only ended but we are nearing the completion of demobilization and the reason which impelled me to contest the last two elections and to occupy my seat in the House of Commons no longer remains. I am therefore happy to step aside and give place to some younger man, preferably a veteran, whose experience during the war will give him special qualifications for further service to his country in the difficult years of peace which lie ahead.

May I assure you that I have found parliamentary life and its diversified concerns with matters of outstanding importance to national and international well-being, both satisfying and on occasions exciting. I am grateful for the widened horizons it has offered to me and for the many new friendships it has brought on all sides of the house.

With warmest regards to you and every member of our party in the house and all good wishes for your future success.

I am,
Yours faithfully,
Herbert A. Bruce.

I do not know what the usual procedure is on an occasion like this, but perhaps the house would permit me to say a brief word of comment with respect to a matter which comes very close to me personally. I have known Doctor Bruce for three years, have worked with him intimately for over a year, and have always found him to be a loyal associate, a courageous public servant, a man who took his duties seriously and one who represented his constituency as faithfully as he knew how. As he resigns his place among us I wish to add that he will take away with him the best wishes, certainly of all his associates in this party and, I think I can say on an occasion like this, the best wishes of all members in all parties in the house. I am happy to have this opportunity of paying a word of tribute to a man who was not young when he came here, but who early in the war entered parliament out of a sense of public duty when large numbers of younger men were required for service in the armed forces.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in wishing the Hon. Doctor Bruce, who, I regret to learn, has left this company of statesmen, a very happy and prosperous future. He had a distinguished career; he was a most distinguished physician and surgeon. He served with great dignity in representing His Majesty as lieutenant governor of the province of Ontario. He paid most assiduous attention to his duties in this house, and made valuable contributions to our discussions and debates. So from the opposite side of this aisle I would join with the leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition in wishing happy years to our friend Doctor Bruce.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, though on the same side of the aisle but further away we also would like to associate ourselves with the leader of the house in regretting the resignation of Doctor Bruce from the House of Commons. I knew of Doctor Bruce by repute for many years before he came here. I was aware of his great interest in matters of public concern in his own province. I had an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with him here, and I am sure we of this group will associate ourselves with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and those on the government side in wishing him a long and happy life, in whatever he may undertake.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, from this corner of the house we wish to join with other hon. members who have already spoken in wishing Doctor Bruce a happy retirement from the house. I have been able to count him among my friends, and the hon. members in this corner have appreciated his contribution to the public life of Canada.

PEACE RIVER DISTRICT

RAILWAY OUTLET TO PACIFIC COAST

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Irvine:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the building of a railway outlet from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had just completed dealing in a general way with some of the resources of the area we are discussing, namely the Peace River area, and the desirability of developing these resources. I shall endeavour to conclude my remarks certainly within ten minutes and, if possible, within five, to leave the floor for discussion on the part of those other hon. members who wish to add their weight to what has been said.

Something has been said about driving spikes on the railway. I regret that my spike cannot be more in the nature of a golden spike. Possibly the minister will drive what we might call the golden spike in this railroad. Mine, however, will be a more workmanlike spike because, from now on, for the next few minutes, I intend to address myself to a few facts which I believe will give some practical support to the resolution. When I refer to my spike being more workmanlike, I must explain that it will be more workmanlike in appearance only. It may be that the minister's spike which would forge the last link would be the golden spike, and of great value.

The area in question has been described. We have heard about its resources, and we have also had some description of the present service afforded that area. Hon. members will recall that practically the only rail communication is from one side of the Peace river via the Northern Alberta railways to Edmonton. Then we have the main line of the Canadian National Railways, the shortest route to the sea, being a line direct from Edmonton to Prince Rupert, and another line from Edmonton to Vancouver.

As hon. members will recall, it means an extra haul of from 1,000 to 1,500 miles to get to the water, because it has to go first to the east, to Edmonton, and then come back the same distance west. That line of the Canadian National Railways to Prince Rupert goes through Prince George, which is in the constituency of Cariboo, the constituency from which the hon. member who has offered the resolution comes.

Some seventy-five miles south of Prince George is the town of Quesnel, which is the northern terminal of the Pacific Great Eastern railway. That railway runs from Quesnel southwesterly to Squamish on the coast north of Vancouver. So that we have a gap of approximately seventy miles between Prince George and Quesnel. That gap, it should be noted, was at one time graded. There has been a right of way put through there, but the rails were never laid.

If, then, we can get a railway from Quesnel to Prince George there would be a junction with the Canadian National Railways line to Prince Rupert. Thus we have the line from Edmonton to Squamish, which is practically from Edmonton direct to Vancouver, serving not only the Peace River, but also that other area of north central British Columbia, which at present has hardly any outlet, namely the Prince George-Quesnel district.

It is further significant to note that as the line runs down from Quesnel to Squamish, at one point on its length, in the vicinity of Pavilion and Clinton, there is a gap of only some forty miles between it and the main line of the Canadian National Railways to Vancouver. So that if we were to build a railway first from Prince George to the Peace River, that would be the first requisite. The hon. member for Cariboo has emphasized the importance of that, and I feel I need say no more on the subject. Then we have only a seventy-five mile gap from Quesnel to Prince George, and a forty mile gap from Pavilion or Clinton to Lytton, or the main line of the Canadian National Railways in the vicinity of Ashcroft or Savona. We have a complete hook-up giving direct access from the port of Vancouver to the very heart of the Peace River district.

Briefly, the advantages of such a set-up would be, first, that the Peace River would have its outlet to the great port of Vancouver.

An outlet would then exist for grain which, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has remarked, cannot find its way out through the lakes, because of the late maturity of the grain in that district. Therefore it must find its way through a Pacific port. It has that direct outlet.

In addition, grain from the Peace River country would have ready access to the rest of the interior of British Columbia, particularly the Cariboo and Kamloops ranching district which, at the present time, has to import its feed grain for winter purposes. Some of that comes from the Peace River, and it must go east to Edmonton, and then all the way back, covering that extra thousand miles.

So that we would have a two-fold advantage in the outlet. First, there is the outlet to the port, and, second, the outlet to feed the ranch animals of the interior of British Columbia. In addition to that, you would have a road crossing the main line of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific railway in the vicinity of Ashcroft and Savona —that is the east and west line—you would have the north-south line from the Okanagan, and from the interior part of Washington and Oregon, up through Kamloops and along the main line to Savona, joined by the new construction to the Pacific Great Eastern, and so right up to the Peace River.

So that you have there, with those two short branches only needed to be constructed, a whole new network of communication serving the lower part of central British Columbia and Alberta, and serving the northern part of Alberta and British Columbia in the Peace River.

So much for specific benefits which would accrue from the adoption by the house and government of the policy outlined in the resolution. I have suggested the Canadian National Railways, not because I believe this matter should be decided on a basis of public ownership as against private ownership, but simply because that railway happens to be there already. It has a line running through Prince George. Then on the north side of the river running down to Vancouver, the first line you would strike would be the Canadian National. Therefore it seems logical to use it.

I suggest that this be done now, because I understand that surveys have been made. It is said that the surveys show that the line would not be profitable in the immediate future. Nevertheless, as I have said, history has shown that the construction of railways in this country has always preceded development.

There is in existence, I believe, a report of a recent survey conducted as to the future of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway system. The dominion government was represented on that survey. I have not seen the report. It may be that there are arguments in it which could be used to refute the present suggestion. Nevertheless I take the risk of advocating this policy now, although I have not read the report. I do that because if we have faith in the country we must be willing to take a certain amount of risk to build railways which inevitably must lead to a development of a vast and hitherto undeveloped part of the country. No doubt hon. members can think of many dangers and obstacles which would be encountered if this construction were undertaken. But I think I am safe in arriving at this conclusion: that there have been dangers and obstacles in the way of every development which has been carried on in this country and perhaps no more so than in connection with the Canadian Pacific railway. We admit that there are obstacles and dangers, but we say that our resource, our industry and our courage should be no less than those of the fathers of confederation who united this country by means of a great railway system.

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, the first point I wish to make is that of need. Does this country or this district need this railway? I think that has been amply proved by those speakers who have already spoken in favour of this resolution. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that as far back as 1910 settlers went into this area. In 1918 the government of the day put out a lot of propaganda to coax people to go into the district, and a lot of people did go in. Promises were made to these people by different governments in the past and by different members of government. I think it is high time something was done to fufil the promises that were made to these people.

There are certain principles involved. The history of our railways is not something that many of us are very proud of. As I said, promises have been made by members of different governments and by different governments. Railways have been started and left half finished. Sometimes they were started at one end and sometimes they were started at two ends. As one hon. member said last session, sometimes they are started in the middle and do not get anywhere at either end. Last year we had a debate urging the completion of the gap remaining in our railway system. The promises which were made to these people should be carried out.

As to its being a good business proposition, it has been amply shown that there is an empire in this territory. A few years ago I met a number of people who had prospected through it and they told me that they had found a mine that was practically solid copper. The only way they could get any of that copper to the railroad was by making sleighs which were pulled down the mountainside by hand, after which the ore was loaded on pack horses and packed twenty miles to the railroad. That sort of development is too slow; it is too much out of date.

Someone mentioned during the course of the debate that opportunity should be provided for young people with initiative, that people with the pioneering spirit should be given every advantage that would be derived from living in this particular area. I am satisfied that if the railroad were put through a great many young people with pioneering spirit, a great many returned men who are looking for an opportunity to establish themselves, would find opportunity there.

It is quite possible that there may be an economic recession in the near future. We have found in the past that when there is government expenditure on the opening up of a new empire or a new territory an opportunity is given to those who have stored up capital to put that capital into circulation and thus stave off a possible recession.

I see the minister has been in his seat all during this debate and I see also that he has a file on his desk. I am hoping that before eleven o'clock he will give us some inkling of what the government is thinking about in this connection, and so I shall not take up any more time.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I have received a number of communications from Peace River, Grimshaw, Berwyn and other towns on the north side of the Peace river. On a former occasion when a similar matter was before the house I received communications from Grande Prairie, Dawson Creek and other towns on the south side of the river. Therefore I feel compelled to say a few words, but I shall be brief.

I have traversed both sides of the river, east and west and north and south. This is one part of Canada that has been—I was going to say shamefully, but that is not the right word—not very satisfactorily treated by the railroads. I am not blaming the railroads. I have in mind one of the pioneers of the area, a man who went in by wagon from Edmonton to the town of Peace River. I imagine he has been there for about forty or more years, perhaps as many as fifty years, and all that time he has been advocating the building and later the extension of the railways running into that part of the country. I refer to Page Rideout who has perhaps done more to obtain a Pacific outlet than anyone else that I know of. At much personal expense he has travelled all over the area and has delivered addresses in practically all the towns in British Columbia and Alberta that have been mentioned in the course of this debate. I think of other prominent business men who have been associated with him, such as Mr. Henry Jerry, Mr. J. D. Levesque, Mr. Pierre Gauvreau, Mr. J. B. Early and others. All of them were pioneers. They, along with the boards of trade of their respective towns, have been ardent advocates of the extension of these railways.

When I commenced my remarks I said that I did not think this area had been treated very satisfactorily by the railways. For instance, the railway running north from the fine city of Edmonton, after travelling perhaps four hundred miles, reaches McLennan, where there is a junction or fork. One line of railroad then runs north to Peace River. That is a real town, and in my opinion some day it will be a city. It is a splendid town, with fine prospects. The railway crosses the river there over a big steel bridge and runs along the north side of the river, finally ending at what is called Hines Creek, and there it ends, as one might say, up in the air. It is a splendid territory as far as Fort St. John and beyond that for one hundred miles in every direction. The whole area, as one hon. member has said has been denied adequate transportation ever since the pioneers went in there. I was talking to one pioneer in the town of Grimshaw, and he told me that he had gone in to Notikewin, north of Grimshaw thirty-seven years ago and that at that time the map he looked at when he was choosing his lot showed a railway running up to that part of the country. It is too bad what those pioneers have had to endure in transporting their grain and other products to market. The railway should have gone west as far as Fort St. John or beyond on the north side of the river years and years ago.

Turning to the south side of the river you see something, Your Honour, that is almost incredible so far as railways are concerned. The railway runs west from McLennan junction to Spirit River, and there it originally ended up in the air, so to speak. If you go there now on the train, the train takes you as far as Spirit River, and then it backs east a mile or more to Rycroft, where it turns directly south and runs well on to a hundred miles to the fine town of Grande Prairie, which some day will be a city. At Grande Prairie it turns and runs to the northwest, ending at Dawson Creek. I never saw such a jumble of railways in my life. They do not seem to go anywhere but run all over the lot. From Spirit River to Pouce Coupe a route was constructed many years ago but the rails were never laid.

The whole area should be given an outlet to the sea. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to where the outlet should be. Some have mentioned Prince Rupert and others, Vancouver. They are both splendid outlets.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Squamish?

Mr. MacNICOL: I said an outlet to the sea. We have enough of these inland outlets already. I think my hon. friend, the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) described the situation very well. I was not referring in any derogatory way to the town my hon. friend who interrupted mentioned, but I like to see a railway run to a destination where it will connect up with some other line, and I hope that at another session some of the British Columbia members will bring in a resolution to project these railways in British Columbia on northward. I often wonder why a road has not been run right through the Rocky mountains' trough. I do not know why it could not go right through there. It could go at least as far as I went because a railway can go as far as I can walk. I do not see why a railway could not go through there. maybe up to White Horse. I may be exaggerating a little as to distance because I did not walk that far, but certainly as far as I went up there a railway can go. The whole area wants railway connections and, as one hon. member has said, the railways should precede the opening up of a country. It is full of magnificent resources, minerals of every description in vast quantities. The mover of the resolution (Mr. Irvine) spoke of the great coal deposit at Hudson Hope. I have a piece of coal from Hudson Hope either in my desk or in my room. It is a wonderful deposit of coal, and that deposit has this great advantage, that you could take coal out of that mine and transport it down the Peace river itself. But that is a waterways question, not a railway question.

I wish to pay tribute to those pioneers who have endured everything in the Peace River country, in Alberta and in Britaish Columbia. They have endured things that no pioneers should be asked to endure. And what have they now? The railways end just where they did forty years ago. But settlement has gone away beyond the railways. The last time I went for forty miles north of Fort St. John. I saw a very good settlement. As it is to-day, these people have to come down the Alaska highway and then down to Dawson Creek before they can get their produce to a railway.

I support this resolution strongly. I would have supported it from my own observations, but I have also had numerous letters from people up there who know I am familiar with what they are up against.

Even after you leave Peace River, the railroad should be extended east. I know that if my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party, (Mr. Low), who unfortunately is out of town to-day, were here he would be advocating the extension of the railway east from the town of Peace River to Athabaska Landing. For how long have we not heard of the hopes of Athabaska Landing. There is another case where the railroad ends in the air. It ends at the town of Athabaska. That line should be extended east from Peace river to Athabaska Landing, then on to Lac la Biche, past Meadow Lake and on to Prince Albert. The hon. member for Athabaska has repeatedly asked for an extension of the railway from Frenchman Butte to connect up a forty-mile gap. My hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), if he wants to go from Prince Albert to Edmonton, has to do as I did, take that whole long route down to Saskatoon, where he transfers and takes the main line to Edmonton. The line should go straight through, as the hon. member for Athabaska has urged on many occasions.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Where is Prince Albert?

Mr. MacINNIS: Ask the Prime Minister.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had been expecting my hon. friend the member for Fraser Valley to rise in his place long ago and support this resolution. I shall not answer his question because I think too much of him and he may rise and support this resolution yet. All the railroads in that part of the country, in British Columbia and Alberta, end, as one might say, in the woods, except the one that runs to Prince Rupert.

I hope that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) will accept this resolution. There is no reason why he cannot accept it because all it asks for is consideration of this project. But I want him to do more than consider it. I want him as Minister of Transport to build some of these lines so that the people of this great area, where there are now many thousands of people — there are 10,000 farmers north of the Peace river and there are thousands of fine farms south of the river;

I do not know of any area that is better than the area from Grande Prairie up to Dawson Creek—will have an outlet.

I support this resolution as an easterner, as no other easterner has yet spoken in favour of it. I know from long years in business that we can make the area prosperous by having those railways completed, which will mean more money for the farmers all round about, and the opening up of the area. This in turn will mean a lot more orders down east. I am one of those who believe that we all live together; if the west prospers the east prospers; and if this area opens up, and the farmers there get at least fair play—which they have not had—they will be able to buy more. How can they buy when they cannot get what they are entitled to? There is no better buyer than the farmer; he will send in his orders when he has the means. In that way the east will participate in the profits which will accrue from carrying out my hon. friend's suggestion. I have heard it on many previous occasions. I am not sure if he brought in this motion before, but I give him credit for his action. Mr. Kennedy brought up the matter when he represented Peace River; and Mr. Fraser, when he represented Cariboo.

This house should unanimously carry this resolution and strengthen the minister's hands to present a strong case to the railway board. For forty years the long-suffering pioneers have endured these conditions; they have carted their grain and produce over all sorts of roads; indeed it is only lately that they have had half-decent roads. In saying that, I am not finding any fault with those responsible for the roads; they did not get the support to which they were entitled, so they could not construct the roads which should have been available for the pioneers. Now let us support these people by giving them an outlet to the Pacific ocean.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): In rising to speak to this resolution I should first like to say that in the last few moments my faith in one of my idols has been rudely shaken. Since coming to the house we here have been proud of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). He is one who periodically has gone out into the west, after each session, and has returned to tell the story of what the west needs. We have heard him tell us here in the house of the long journeys he has taken, to the Great Slave lake, the Great Bear lake, to Aklavik and across the Peace river, and we have all marvelled at his geographical knowledge and been amazed at the way in which he has been able to recall the locations of all these places. But when the hon. member tells me that the railway terminates at Squamish and that it is in the interior of British Columbia and not on the coast, my faith in him is rudely shaken. Perhaps his knowledge of the north country, too, is not as good as in the past we thought it was.

I should also like to speak of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). As the house knows, I take a keen interest in the progress of the young member, and I wish to congratulate him. This morning's press carried the announcement that he had been elected national president of the Young Progressive Conservative Association. I was surprised to learn that there were enough young people sufficiently benighted to form a Young Progressive Conservative Association.

Mr. HOMUTH: You will be surprised again.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Apparently reaction dies hard in Ontario, but since it must be that such an association shall exist, I know of no one better fitted to lead it than my young friend the hon. member for Kamloops.

To-night is one of those refreshing occasions to members from British Columbia when British Columbia questions are discussed in this house, and we see in every part of the chamber British Columbia members rise to speak with no trace of political partisanship.

Mr. FULTON: What were you doing a moment ago?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You are not a British Columbia problem yet: you are rapidly becoming one. We see the C.C.F. hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) rise and put forward a resolution advocating a railway to the Pacific coast, and this is supported by Liberal and Conservative members from British Columbia, all wishing to represent that province in a non-partisan way, but in a provincial way. The reason is very easy to find. We are only three thousand miles from the capital, but in spirit we are ten thousand miles away. There are only sixteen of us here to bring to the attention of the house the problems of British Columbia, and only by being united do we find that we get any attention at all. No matter what government has been in power here, the programme seems to be, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) says, millions for the St. Lawrence, tariff protection for Ontario, great grain subsidies for the prairies, and airy promises for British Columbia. For this reason we have tried to speak of British Columbia problems as British Columbia members, and not as Conservatives or Liberals. However, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) did introduce a slight political note when he mentioned that an outlet from the Peace River to the Pacific was a policy of the Conservative party. He went farther; he mentioned that one who at that time was his leader, now the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), last year toured British Columbia and visited Ominica and the Peace River.

Mr. GREEN: 1944.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): At that time, when he was not in the house but going around the country making political speeches; and he said, at the conclusion of this great hegira to British Columbia, that if elected he would promise an outlet to the Pacific coast, so that the people of the Peace River could move their coal and lead and other products to open water. It might be expected that a people so sorely pressed would leap at this promise and show their appreciation of it by returning Conservative members in the ridings affected.

An hon. MEMBER: I thought you did not talk politics on this resolution.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): But we find that in these ridings—the Cariboo, Skeena and Vancouver North—not only were not the Tories elected but they lost their deposits. Why? Not because the people of the Peace River were stupid, but because they were smart, and they had heard these promises before. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, where they had heard them. It was at the time, I believe, that the Liberal-Conservative party, as it was then called, had a convention at Winnipeg, and on June 9, 1930, gave their pledges to the nation. Pledge No. 5 was, amongst other railway construction, the construction of a Pacific outlet for the Peace River; and they were elected. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition had little hope of being elected, so that he need not have been quite so careful. The hon. member for Davenport, who is now putting pressure on the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to carry this work through, sat here, having given that pledge, in 1930, with R. B. Bennett as Prime Minister.

Mr. MacNICOL: And I have supported it every session since then.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): And what was done?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not a minister. If I were the minister I would put the railway through.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): So that is why I say that the people of Peace River, the Cariboo and Vancouver North, have shown very good sense in not paying much attention to the leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Get a new needle; that record is worn out.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): And the interesting thing is that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) played the same record to-night.

Mr. HOMUTH: Are you for it or against it?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I am for it, and I am going to say why I am for it. I know the Ominica and the Ingonika country, and I understand the need of railroad facilities to get heavy materials out of there. Passengers can fly out. The hon. member for Davenport can fly out and can get his grip when he leaves it behind.

Mr. MacNICOL: I did not catch what the hon. member said. I like to use the railroad when I can.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): But heavy material still requires railway transportation; the wheat of the Peace River, the lead and silver of Ominica and the groundhog country can only move by railway. The hon. member for Kamloops gave a full description of the actual possible railway outlets, and there is no need for us to repeat that, but simply to support what the people of the Peace River and all of us from British Columbia believe should be undertaken by voting immediately for this resolution.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I am in the happy position of not being of a controversial nature, and I am not a Rhodes scholar. I really do not know much about the Peace River. So far as I know, there are only two men in Canada who have a complete knowledge of everything, and mightily have they proclaimed that knowledge, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and Mr. B. K. Sandwell, of Toronto Saturday Night. If there is anything you are not sure of, ask them; they know everything. At last we in the west are actually getting somewhere. Ontario and Toronto—Toronto particularly—are beginning to see the light.

Mr. FULTON: They repealed prohibition the other day.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There are two answers to that and George Drew will find the next time that a Liberal government will be back in power. I am more unfortunate than my roommate. Not only can I congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops on his appointment to the exalted position he holds as leader of a party of two, but I may say that he has already invited me to dinner with refreshments.

I said I would not take up much time and I do not intend to. This is the first time in my life that I am appearing in an unofficial capacity to accept a resolution on behalf of the government. Why my hon. friends the Conservatives should be wasting so much time in trying to talk out the resolution I really do not know. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), in his own style, said more in three minutes this afternoon than all the other speakers have said in four hours. I will say what I have to say in a minute and a half. Next to myself, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the member for Calgary West are probably the two best speakers in this house. I say to my hon. friends, therefore: For goodness sake, keep quiet and let us allow the Minister of Transport to speak and endorse what we have been asking.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I will not take up much time. I am going to emulate the other speakers in that regard. I had intended to begin by saying that there seems to be a Chinook blowing through the building, everyone was getting on so well. However, since the last two speakers have spoken, Mr. Speaker, you will realize why I have the disposition I have. In British Columbia politics are real.

I should like to bring out one point that has not been brought out to-day and that is trade with the orient. That will develop in the future to far greater proportions than the trade which has been going on for so long from the Atlantic seaboard. It is just beginning to be developed. China is developing into a united nation and is becoming industrialized, and we in British Columbia want to be in the position where we shall have heavy industry so that we can capitalize on that. If heavy industry develops in British Columbia it will develop in the heart of the country, through Prince George, on through the ground-hog region and over toward the east. That is where the minerals are. That is where the coal is. In that section of the country there will some day be cities to correspond with Pittsburgh, Akron and so on.

Vancouver will make a nice tourist attraction, I admit, but we shall have industry there. All we have to do is to have a lead and transportation will solve the problem. Capital will flow there if the transportation is there, because the trade will soon develop.

At Prince Rupert we have a port that handled more material during the war than Vancouver did. It has the facilities which the Americans put there during the war and those facilities are second to none. As I said the other evening, it had such facilities put in as the elevator, which has not been used, and so on, and we are in a number one position to handle any trade that develops at Prince Rupert. This railway will be our lifeblood if it can be put in. The government will come to depend upon it and we are looking to the government for that lead. We do not want to be disappointed as we have been in the past.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): In a few words I wish to support the resolution, speaking as a member from British Columbia. I cannot add anything to what has already been said in describing the necessity for the project. This necessity was well stated this afternoon by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) and others, but I must say that I do not quite agree with the approach of the hon. and gallant member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt). The argument he put forward in connection with the necessity for this railroad extension seemed to me to imply that it was for the advancement and building up of Vancouver.

Personally I think that is a wrong approach to the situation. I always rise to the bait, so to speak, when I hear people glorifying cities and size, and now I am making a countryman's protest. I think the railway should be built. just as other services should be provided, for the building up of smaller districts and not for the purpose of making cities larger. The object should be to decentralize our economy.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard also suggested that Vancouver was one of the leading mining cities in Canada. So far as I know, all mining that has been done in Vancouver has been done on paper. These facilities, railways and roads. are necessary to decentralize our economy and build up the small communities that are the strength and the bright spots in our present democracy.

Take British Columbia. You do not go to Vancouver to see democracy at its best, but to Nelson, Penticton, Kelowna, Kamloops and Chilliwack. We must emphasize the development of these backwoods districts, this hinterland, and not build railways with the idea of simply making larger the cities that are already oversize.

There are on the order paper five resolutions dealing with essential developments in Canada to-day. Personally, I think this is absolutely unnecesssary. This method of approach is entirely obsolete. Why are we following such a method? We have to do so at present because no other approach is possible for members of the opposition. We are doing so because the government has failed to bring down a plan for reconstruction covering Canada as a whole. Instead of private members rising to support a railway here, a road there, a bridge here and a wateway there, the government, in my opinion, should have produced an over-all plan. a five-year plan if you like, for reconstruction throughout Canada, having in view the necessities of all sections, and then we would discuss it as a Canadian project and not as so many provincial or community understakings. Then we would have railways and roads proposed for British Columbia, irrigation projects for the prairie provinces, waterways for possibly Ontario and Quebec, and coastal facilities for the maritimes.

I trust that this policy of bits and bobs will soon be done away with and that we shall stream-line our procedure for the future, bringing in a plan covering a period of years to take care of the economic necessities of the country as a whole.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in order that the members from British Columbia may be unanimous in their endorsation of the resolution moved by the hon member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine), I should like to voice my support for his proposal, and also to congratulate him on the able manner in which he presented the facts of the case. I sincerely trust the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is not going to be too well informed, so that he may be able to change our minds on the subject.

There is, it appears to me, one very important matter which has not been brought out to-day, a matter which the minister, who is from the east, may not appreciate. It is that I was going to say most but I will say many of the intelligent people of Canada are moving to the Pacific coast, and we in British Columbia are not able to support these people in our large urban areas, so that we must develop our outlying country, our hinterland. If we in British Columbia are to take care of the population which is going to crowd into that province, we shall have to open up our backwoods, where our great natural wealth lies. So that I would ask the minister to give this matter serious consideration and to do everything he possibly can to forward this project.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is really a matter of some concern to a minister of the crown when everyone in the house is of the same mind in regard to a project of such importance. I make that statement deliberately, because as a rule the house is in disagreement on matters that are brought forward. As I note the temper of the house in regard to this resolution, I recall the statement made by a former member of this house some years ago, that when the house agrees upon an important project, generally the house is wrong.

Whether or not that be so, it is not my intention this evening to oppose the resolution. Before I go on to discuss it I think I should congratulate the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) on the manner in which he brought the resolution forward. I think he deserves the commendation of hon. members generally for the fair way in which he presented the matter. I think, too, I should add a word of commendation to those who have joined in the debate. It is always pleasing when a subject is discussed in such a non-partisan way, and I think what I have said applies to all who have taken part in this discussion.

In saying what I have to say on this subject this evening I should like the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution to understand that I am not opposing it. I feel sympathetic toward him and toward the plight in which the people in the Peace River block find themselves but at the moment I am simply discussing the resolution, pointing out some of the objections and some of the difficulties that lie in the way. That there are some objections and difficulties is beyond question, though with many things said by the hon. gentleman I find myself in complete agreement. With others I find that I must disagree, and with those I shall deal at greater length a little later on.

A great deal has been said this evening about the matter of cost. Whether or not hon. gentlemen like it, whether we have in mind a private railway or a public railway, the cost factor must enter into the picture. I make that general statement now, and will come back to it a little later on. The problem which has been discussed this evening, that of providing an outlet from the Peace River block to the Pacific seaboard, is not new; it has been discussed in this house for many years. It has been the subject of discussion among agriculturists, ranchers, mining engineers, railway engineers, government officials and the like for more than a quarter of a century. During all that time the complaint has been that people living in the Peace River block have to back-track or back-haul some five hundred miles before they can reroute their products to the relatively near ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert. That back-haul is necessary because a chain of mountains intervenes between the seaboard and the Peace River area. The existing railway facilities in the area consist of the Northern Alberta railways, owned and operated jointly by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The distance from railhead at Dawson Creek, British Columbia, to Edmonton, Alberta, is some 500 miles; and the farmers, ranchers and others complain with some degree of equity and justice that they have to reroute their products back in the direction of Edmonton before they can go on to the closer ports on the Pacific coast.

On going over the debates of the house, I find that almost every year from 1922 to 1933 a resolution similar to that before the house this evening was placed on the order paper and debated exhaustively. This evening the hon. member for Cariboo has brought forward the arguments which militate in favour of the construction of this railway. In doing so, however, he has raised a very important point, which must come to the attention of the house sooner or later. It is that the policy in reference to the construction of new lines, branch lines or the extension of lines must receive consideration by parliament at some time or another; and in that respect I have to remind the house of the statement made the other evening by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). The minister dealt extensively with economic conditions in Canada at the moment. One of the things he said was that if at the beginning of the war he had been told that steel production in Canada would have doubled during the war years, he would not have believed it. Then he said that not only had it doubled but that in the last six months steel production has been in short supply and that there is a back-log of requirements which makes the position very difficult. In view of the statement of the minister that steel is in short supply, of necessity one must have that in mind in dealing with the "immediate consideration" referred to in the resolution.

Then the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply went on to refer to the housing situation, and to say how vital a problem housing is in Canada at the present time. Everyone in this house knows that steel will be in great demand in connection with the construction of commercial buildings and housing generally. Then there is the all-important point of cost. Hon. members in their discussion this afternoon seemed to put that to one side, and say that the time had come when railways of this kind could be built regardless of cost. I say to the house this, that I have before me at the present time some twenty applications from bodies all across Canada demanding the construction of railway lines. The people who have put forward these requests think them reasonable, and all think they should be built without delay. Some of those lines would be unprofitable, by any stretch of the imagination; others would not even begin to pay operating costs, and still others would not pay operating costs until they had been in existence or in operation for many years. Some, too, might well be profitable.

Therefore I say to the hon. member that the question of cost, notwithstanding what has been said in the house, is not the all-important factor, but it is certainly a factor which must be taken into consideration. Whether a railway costs $1 million or $100 million is a matter in which certainly the Minister of Finance would be interested because, particularly during the debate on the speech from the throne at this session, there has been an all-out demand for the retrenchment of expenditures. On Friday of last week the Minister of Finance was able to bring down estimates in which he showed a substantial reduction in expenditures.

I must remind the house that we cannot have the expenditures, and at the same time have the reduction in taxation. There is in the house a demand for a reduction in taxation. I believe there are on the order paper resolutions to that effect. I believe there is, too, on the order paper a resolution to the effect that exemption from taxation should be increased in the case of single men, and in the case of married men as well.

The point I wish to make is this. In a matter of this kind cost is a factor which unquestionably must be taken into consideration. Then, again, when the general question is considered, namely that in which I have just been engaged —the short supply of steel, the extreme necessity for housing, the question of curtailing expenditures and reducing taxes—it may well be that the building of railways will have to await a betterment in the position of those three items.

I note that one hon. member said this should be considered as a great post-war project. Perhaps that is somewhat in contradiction of the resolution, which demands immediate consideration. Having made those general observations, I should like now to address myself to the subject matter of the resolution in particular.

Again I say to him this, I am not opposing his resolution; I am discussing it, and pointing to some of the difficulties which lie in the way. The difficulties as I see them are three in number. They are physiographic, economic and financial.

Four routes have been discussed as possible solutions to the Peace River area. They are, first the Aggie-Obed outlet, which was mentioned in one of the reports of the commission. Next is the Monkman pass route; the third is Pine pass route, and the fourth is the Peace River route. Any one of these routes would provide an outlet from the territory under discussion; and any one of them would, I take it, meet with the approval of hon. members, although I note that some preference has been indicated in favour of one or other of the four routes.

Since 1925 a number of surveys have been made by the government in connection with these various routes. In these surveys the government has sought to obtain from engineers, who are experts in the matter, who know their business, and who have given the matter some study, various opinions respecting the four routes.

I am informed that five such surveys were made, over the course of the years, and I should like to deal with those surveys as briefly as possible. The first of them was made in 1925, jointly by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The report was tabled in the house in 1927. That report went fully into the cost, the economics, the facilities, the transportation, and the branch lines which would be required if any one of these branch routes was proceeded with by the government.

The economic studies of the engineers in this report indicated that the best possible route at that time was the Aggie-Obed route, because it was the shortest, and because also is connected the line of the Northern Alberta railroad with the Canadian National Railways at Obed.

Another question, too, was considered in the report, namely as to whether Vancouver or Prince Rupert should be the objective of the western outlet. It was considered that the former port would attract most of the business for many years to come, certainly for such a period as would make it unnecessary to consider any other alternative. The engineers estimated that the minimum cost of the Aggie-Obed route would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $13 million. They estimated further that the maximum cost would be over $80 million.

The report went on to say, too, that when the traffic out of the Peace River district had reached the amount of over $1,080,000 tons, there should be considered the possibility or the practicability of building the outlet.

I should like to put on record the conclusions of the report. I now quote from the report on various proposed railway routes for a western outlet to the Pacific from the Peace River district, by a joint board of engineers of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway Company, dated 1926 and 1927:

> We may therefore briefly sum up the results of our studies in the following conclusions:
> (1) The route via Obed is the best western outlet to the Pacific, that is from the national standpoint or from the standpoint of the Canadian National Railways. It may not be the best from the standpoint of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it implies using part of the Canadian National Railways lines.
> (2) The immediate minimum outlay will be $13,336,000.
> (3) To fully develop the section we have considered will require a minimum outlay of over $80, million, and this does not include any betterments on existing roadways.
> (4) There is no hope even with the existing freight rate of about 39 cents per 100 pounds, for the line to pay even operating expenses on the immediate traffic, or on a traffic many times the present traffic.
> (5) There seems little hope of the line ever being self-supporting at rates even 50 per cent higher than the present ton-mile freight rate on grain to Fort William for similar distance.
> (6) It would be more economical to handle the business, regardless of the rate received, over the existing lines until the traffic was many times the present.

So much for the joint report of 1925. The next report was that of 1929-30. This was made at the instance of the British Columbia government in cooperation with the railway. The report is not in the Department of Transport; I have not seen it and therefore I am unable to discuss it.

The third report, made in 1931, was made by the engineers of the Canadian Pacific railway at a cost of $250,000 to that railway. It did not agree with the report of 1925 which had recommended the Aggie-Obed route; it rather favoured the Peace river route. The report then went on to say that in the opinion of the engineers, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company favoured a northern route, the Peace River pass.

When that report was brought to the attention of the then Minister of Railways and Canals he tried to get the two railways to agree on a route. He brought them into his office, but all he was able to get the railways to agree upon at that time was that neither of the railways should build the outlet but that the government of Canada should foot the bill. I do not know what the position of the railways would be to-day with reference to that point, but I have no reason to believe that it would be any different in 1946 from what it was in 1931.

The fourth report, made in 1932, was made jointly by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and is known as the Crysdale report. It again went into the various routes, and again this joint report recommended the Aggie-Obed route as being the best outlet to the Pacific coast. That report differs very little from any of those I have discussed up to the moment. I should like to summarize the report by reading the concluding remarks which I think are very much to the point. I am quoting from the Peace River outlet report by the committee of railway engineers appointed to consider the matter in 1931:

At the time the 1925 report was made, local interests were mainly concerned in obtaining a western outlet to cheapen their freight cost to the Pacific, and supply further railway mileage in the district. Since that time, a reduction of freight rates has been accorded them, now substantially equalling rates which would obtain if a western outlet were in use.

I pause here a moment because I think the hon. member for Cariboo by his statement would lead the house to believe—at least I gathered his meaning to be such—that the people living in the Peace River area were in a difficult position because they had to pay higher rates on account of the five hundred miles over which they had to back-haul their products before they could again be rerouted to the Pacific coast. I understood him to say that for that reason the freight rate was higher than it would normally be, but I am informed that such is not the case. Certainly that is not the conclusion I have just referred to. In order to make sure that I was not misinformed I got from the officers of the Canadian National Railways a statement on that point.

I am informed that in 1926 the railways voluntarily applied for preferential rates on wheat and wheat products moving from the Peace River area to the Pacific coast. Those rates were put into effect and have been maintained ever since. They were so favourable that the establishment of the Crowsnest pass rates in 1928 had no effect on the preferential rates. For example, a movement from Grande Prairie to Vancouver under the rates existing prior to 1926 would carry a rate of forty-one cents a hundred pounds. The preferential rate was twenty-eight cents a hundred pounds. If the Obed cut-off were provided, shippers in the Peace river area would get a benefit of only about two cents a hundred pound. I now come back to the conclusion of the report of 1932, which is:

Thus, if not all, have the main requirements of the local interest been met. As the development of the district is from time to time pushed beyond reasonable road haulage distance from the existing lines of railways, local interest will demand further railway mileage. In our opinion this can be, as and when necessary, readily met by further branch-line construction.

In view of the above, our conclusions are:

1. No western outlet is justified for the present, as the existing railway furnishes the most economical route. It will take many times the present traffic to justify another railway outlet.

2. The Obed route for a western outlet is the most favourable from a railway economic standpoint, considering the present phase of the railway situation.

3. We recommend that the matter of a final route be decided when the question is a practical one, believing that by the time the volume of traffic has reached a point where the western outlet is justified, general and possible local conditions may have materially changed. When the decision is imperative, the whole situation should be reviewed, in order to appraise all the contributing factors, including the potential traffic which may accrue from the lands beyond the definite areas included in this report.

I point to this fact because I want to come back to it in a moment. It is concluded here that when the question of building a route becomes practicable, it should receive the attention of the railway. On the files of the department are two letters concerning this report which I think might interest the house. One of these letters was written by Sir Henry Thornton, then president of Canadian National Railways. The other was written by Sir Edward Beatty, who at that time was president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Notwithstanding the report of the joint engineers recommending the Aggie-Obed route, Sir Henry Thornton wrote to the then Minister of Railways and Canals indicating that he favoured the Obed outlet above everything else but that he did not regard that outlet as a western route. He regarded it rather as a southern outlet, the grades being better than through the Monkman pass and construction being much less costly.

Sir Edward Beatty, on the other hand, endorsed the general conclusion of the joint report with but one exception, that exception relating to the Obed route. He favoured the Peace river route because he believed that the Peace River outlet must be justified on its own permanent value. He stated that while the Obed route was the cheaper of the two from the point of view of construction costs, it could not be considered a proper solution of the question because in his estimation the Peace river route, tapping as it did northern resources, was the better of the two.

Mr. GREEN: In what year were those two letters written?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have them in my office. Speaking from memory they were written shortly after the Crysdale report.

That brings me to the point I mentioned a moment ago: Is the question of building an outlet from the Peace River block to the Pacific coast a practical one to-day? Is that not the question which, above all else, would interest the house? Is the project a practical one from the point of view of cost, from the point of view of population, from the point of view of traffic and from several other points of view? I am sure the house would not want the government to undertake a project of this kind if it were convinced that it was not a practical one from those points of view. That is the question which must be considered in the light of the reports, and I should like to deal with it for two or three minutes before I go on to the final report, which was brought down this year and which, I have to say, does not differ a great deal from the reports of 1925, 1931 and 1932.

The question of whether or not the line is practical is one which should engage the attention of the house before a project of this kind is advanced any further.

The house will remember that the joint report of 1925 estimated that when the traffic on the road amounted to 1,080,000 tons it would be economical to build the Aggie-Obed outlet. The figures which I have before me at the moment, and which I should like to give to the house, indicate that with the exception of the war years the traffic over the route for the past ten years has been nowhere near 1,000,000 tons.

I have before me a statement prepared by the Department of Transport on the Northern Alberta Railways. It has to do with the total tonnage carried over these railways from 1932 to 1945 inclusive. In 1932 the total freight tonnage carried over the Northern Alberta Railways amounted to 525,000 tons; 1935, 451,000 tons; 1939, 533,000 tons; 1941, 721,000 tons; 1943, 1,307,000 tons; 1944, 1,345,000 tons; 1945, 959,000 tons. That is the total traffic carried over the Northern Alberta Railways. How much of that traffic comes from the Peace River area I am not able to say, but we all know that a great deal of the traffic over the Northern Alberta Railways goes to Waterways and on to the Mackenzie river district. It is estimated, although I have no manner of proving this statement, by the officers of the Department of Transport that there would have emanated from the Peace River block some 250,000 tons of freight going over the Northern Alberta Railways. If that is the case, we are far from the 1,080,000 tons mentioned in the report of 1925.

While on that subject, may I take one minute of the time of the house to give the operating surplus or deficit of the Northern Alberta Railways for the period from 1932 to 1945. In each year the operating deficit was $1,000,000 or more, with the exception of 1942 and 1943, when the surplus was $1·3 million and $2·5 million. I mention that because it is a factor which must be taken into consideration. The house knows that the operating deficit on the Hudson Bay railway each year amounts to almost half a million dollars and sometimes more than that. Over and above that, there is the cost of the capital construction, which amounts to from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000. If the interest thereon were added to the operating deficit on the Hudson Bay railway it would make a total deficit, operating and construction, of about $1,500,000 a year.

The point I make is that if on the Northern Alberta Railways there has been a yearly deficit of almost $1,000,000, what then would be the deficit on the Peace River outlet if it were built?

I now come to the fifth report. It is known as the province of British Columbia report of the committee on resources and railways, 1945. Early in 1945 the government of British Columbia advised this government that it intended to set up a joint committee with the Canadian National Railways to study railway locations and railway lines in northern British Columbia, and it asked this government to appoint members to that committee. The government consented to send two delegates, one representing the Department of Transport and one the Canadian National Railways and it gave these two delegates certain instructions. That committee met on several occasions and finally made its report, which I have before me at the moment. The conclusions of this report are not a great deal different from those of the previous reports, but there are a number of interesting things in this report to which I think the house would like to have me refer not only because they rave a close bearing on the whole subject-matter of the hon. member's resolution but also because they look at the matter from perhaps a little different aspect. They consider the problem from the point of view of the Pacific Great Eastern. I do not know what the views of the two great provinces interested in this project are in this respect, but I would take it that Alberta would be far more interested in developing the Northern Alberta Railways onward from Hines Creek and Dawson Creek, and across to Hudson Hope and Finlay Forks, than in extending the P.G.E. from either Squamish to Vancouver or from Quesnel to Prince George.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the railway is extended from Dawson Creek, where would it pass the Peace? At Hudson Hope? There is a splendid position at Hudson Hope.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; I intend to deal with that more fully in a moment.

I go on to the report of 1945, and I see in it a number of things which I think cannot do other than commend themselves to the attention of the house. One of the conclusions we find in it is that it is essential to the proper development of a pioneer country that rail and highway facilities be coordinated. That is extremely important. Railway engineers, I think, are coming to the conclusion that it is far cheaper to coordinate rail and highway facilities than to build railways or even to extend branch lines.

Then this report approves the Peace River outlet. It agrees that the Peace River route is strategically and fundamentally the route by which the northern resources of this great country can be tapped; and here, when it refers to the great natural resources in northern British Columbia and northern Alberta, I cannot but find myself in agreement with my hon. friend; I agree with everything he said in that statement. I myself was amazed to see what immense wealth there is in that great country. It is a potential reservoir of natural resources. There is practically everything there. There are forests and fisheries; there is agriculture; there is mineral wealth of all kinds; there is gold, silver, lead, zinc, uranium.

Mr. MacNICOL: Coal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is coal in large quantities. My hon. friend has referred to the coal deposits—and so has the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol)—the centre of which is at Hudson Hope; and someone, I believe, has compared it with the deposits of the whole of the North American continent. I believe that statements of that kind are verified in this report. There can be no doubt about the immense natural wealth of that country. The climate, too, is extremely favourable. It is said in this report that the natives and people living there are able to have gardens and grow vegetables and even berries at certain seasons of the year, which would indicate that the territory can be easily inhabited. But the report states, too, that the extension from Prince George north to Hudson Hope will not improve the balance sheet of the Pacific Great Eastern as a whole until the density of traffic has reached 1,000,000 tons; and here we have in 1945 a report which agrees almost in its entirety with that of 1925, twenty years previously; namely, it lays stress on the fact that until the density of traffic has reached 1,000,000 tons it will not improve the balance sheet of the P.G.E. to build the railway.

With reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Davenport that railway construction should always precede development, there are many engineers and railway economists who disagree with that statement and who say that the railway must be built after development has taken place. I am not contradicting the hon. gentleman, but I point to the statement in the report.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Canadian Pacific railway went ahead of immigration.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; railways have gone ahead under certain circumstances, but what I am saying to the hon. member is that the statement cannot be accepted generally because some railway engineers believe there are two sides to the question. Here is what the report says. The report evades that question, but it raises this point:

> The committee does not consider it within their terms of reference to state whether the extension should follow development or precede it ,but whatever is decided, the need of population in the area is the problem which should receive first consideration.

That is the point which I should like to bring to the attention of the house. All through this report the question of population is the one which is emphasized, the density of traffic; and the report goes on to say that you can have all the railway facilities in the world, but unless you have the traffic you cannot have a profitable and successful railway enterprise. That truly is the point which should, I think, be brought to the attention of the house. Again, it is said:

> To obtain the full development of the resources of the country to be served by the railway directly and by its tributary highway facilities, it is necessary that the country be settled by a sufficient number of the right type of people to furnish traffic to the railway . . .
> Adequately to extend the present Pacific Great Eastern to make it pay and to justify expansion of the present railway it is necessary that people move into the country and develop its natural resources.

And again:

It must be borne in mind that facilities do not make traffic, inhabitants make traffic. There must be people to furnish goods and to provide the need for transportation. Given the people willing to pioneer, this country will support a great number in comfort.

The report concludes by saying:

The initial capital construction expenditure (of the P.G.E.) would be in the neighbourhood of $20,000,000 and there would be additonal money needed for equipment. With the present foreseeable traffic immediately available there would result an annual payment of about $1,000,000 on account of this extension. This deficit, in a decreasing amount, would persist until the traffic volume reached approximately 1,000,000 tons a year.

I should like to conclude my remarks on the 1945 British Columbia report by reading the five conclusions:

1. Keep the present Pacific Great Eastern railway where it is for the benefit of the country it serves. Coordinate bus, truck and railway services now.

2. With the present amount of traffic in sight extension will not improve the financial balance sheet of the Pacific Great Eastern railway. A million tons a year of available railway freight would alter this conclusion.

3. Increase the rate of settlement of the country and the rate of development of the natural resources.

4. When justified build to Hudson Hope, a future junction of lines beyond north and south of Peace river. The southern connection with Vancouver should be altered as business warrants.

5. Complete and revise the railway location surveys before construction.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister whether a copy of this report could be distributed to each member of the house?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should think I have not the authority to distribute the report to the house. My understanding is that it was tabled in the legislature, and I would think there would be no difficulty in obtaining it from there. If my hon. friend wants to see it I have no objection, but I do not think this house should table a report made to another legislature. I have not given the matter any thought, but that is how it strikes me at the moment.

I think the most important feature of this report is the recommendation to coordinate rail and highway facilities. The house may find, as time goes on, that the railway engineers will feel that rather than build lines at tremendous costs it would be much better to coordinate the existing facilities in rail and highway in order to meet requirements.

If the house will bear with me for a few moments longer I will say a word or two on the question of coordination. The out-of-line or back-haul which is occasioned, would be a great deal less extensive by coordination as I have indicated than by the building of a new line, and that could be done by branch lines extending westerly, aided by highway transportation, which would be capable of the development of all the natural resources of the Peace River area up to and including Hudson Hope, much more cheaply than by any other means.

With regard to the question which the hon. member for Davenport put to me, the extension of the line from Dawson Creek to Hudson Hope, thereby tapping the great coal fields of that area, that would require the construction of approximately 150 miles of line, costing probably $14 million. The construction of a through route from Hines Creek through Fort St. John on to Hudson Hope is impracticable, but a line extending seventy-five miles from Hines Creek is feasible and might cost $4,500,000. It is doubtful whether such considerable sums of money should be spent at the present time, particularly when a cheaper means of meeting all reasonable transportation requirements is available by coordination of rail and highway facilities.

Mr. MacNICOL: If and when the railway is constructed from Dawson Creek northwest to opposite Hudson Hope on the north side of the river, the great deposits of coal being on the north side, there will be a bridge across there and there is an excellent position for a bridge. The river is very narrow where the bridge site is, and many years ago plans were got out for it, so that the railway could go northwest from Dawson Creek, across the river at Hudson Hope direct to the coal mines. I do not like to interrupt the minister because he is doing splendidly and I must congratulate him, but I would ask him to answer the question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This coordination provides for building both north and south of the Peace river by extension of a line from Hines creek on and the extension of the line from Dawson Creek on and crossing the bridge over the Peace river to reach Fort St. John.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is it suggested that the railway would run north from Dawson Creek, that is directly north, using the new United States bridge across the river? I understood the minister to say that the road would run northwest from Dawson Creek toward Hudson Hope and join the other railway if it were projected from Hines Creek toward Hudson Hope.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I hope the hon. gentleman does not get the impression that I am suggesting that that be done. I am discussing the coordination of the two and how it could be brought about, and I wish to discuss it in a moment with particular reference to the resolution because I think that is a matter which deserves consideration in that regard.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do I understand the minister to say that the government's view is that rail and truck traffic should be coordinated?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, I did not say that. I said that certain railway economists held that view. That is not the government's view. It may or may not be.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister said it was the most important thing in the report.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, in this report, but this report is not the government's report. This is the report of the province of British Columbia in conjunction with the railways.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask what the government's view is, if that is not being impertinent?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is what the resolution seeks. I will answer that before I sit down.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Before the minister sits down he might speak of the coordination of rail and air traffic.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, but I did not get the question.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister might also deal with the coordination of rail and air traffic. There seems to be rather a difference.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am dealing with one resolution that has to do with the building of a rail outlet and not an air outlet from the Peace River block, and I must address my remarks exclusively to that question. The coordination I have referred to, as applied to the resolution of the hon. member for Cariboo, would work perhaps something like this. A highway service based at Dawson Creek as railhead, not exceeding 100 miles in length of run, would serve agricultural development in the Fort St. John area lying to the west of the Beaton river. This would make use of the Alaska highway and bridge over the Peace river to reach Fort St. John. A similar service operating from railhead at Hines creek, approximately 100 miles, would develop the rest of the territory north of the Peace, and advantage might also be taken of the provincial highway toward Grimshaw to develop the country in that direction. If highway operations are to be conducted with an eye to economy, it would be necessary to operate with heavy trucks and trailers, and this would of necessity confine the service to main highways having adequate gravel surfac. Depots might be established along the main highways at intervals of approximately twenty miles. The railway would not attempt to render transportation service except to and from such depots.

Service via the highway could, however, be expected to develop to build a country forty miles in width and twenty miles on either side of the highway. Such service would need to be developed cooperatively with the province, which would undertake to maintain the highway in fit condition for operation and to protect the railway from unfair competition, although as regards the latter, extension of railhead would in itself largely preclude such competition.

On the other hand, the railway company would be prepared to pay standard licence fees for its motor vehicles and gasoline taxes. Highway services such as I have envisaged them would, of course, be operated at a loss, notwithstanding what has been said, and the economic advantage to which I have referred springs from the fact that the loss incurred in the highway service is less than the loss which would be incurred in railway services due in the latter case to fixed expenses.

It follows from this that the answer to the Peace River problem might well be in the coordination of highway and railway facilities. I have dealt with the coordination of highway and railway facilities because of what is contained in this report of 1945. As I said a moment ago, it is the feeling of some railway economists who have gone into this question of the extension of the P.G.E. that such should be the policy for the future. It would remain to study the question to find out whether that policy is or is not a good one.

That brings me to the conclusion of my remarks. To sum up what I have said, the matter immediately before us is a resolution which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the building of a railway outlet from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast.

I started by saying that I was not opposing the resolution, I was simply discussing it. I have pointed to some of the difficulties in the way. I have said they are three in number, physiographic, economic and financial, and I have referred also to the immediate difficulty having regard to the short supply of steel. As the resolution is worded, I can see no objecting to accepting it, and I now inform the house that I will ask the government to give immediate consideration to this project.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have been very much gratified with the tone of the debate, which has been referred to already by the minister, and it has been a pleasure to note the general unanimity of opinion with respect to the whole question. I also appreciate very much the fact that the minister has been kind enough to accept the resolution, which as he said means that the government will give consideration to the problem. That having been done, I desire to extend the thanks of the people I represent for the consideration the minister has given their plea, which has been presented through me.

As the minister proceeded with his remarks I made a few notes. I do not know that I shall try to go over them all, because it would take too much time; and I am afraid the order in which I have them here would not correspond with their sequence in the minister's remarks. He discussed the subject dispassionately and fairly, and there is no great objection I would wish to take to what he said, certainly none at all to the attitude he adopted. But there are one or two matters upon which I should like to comment.

In the first place the minister said something as to the practicability of the construction of the road. I hope the minister has not prejudged the issue before it is considered by the government. I do not suggest that the minister said it was impractical, but there seemed some little doubt in his mind about it. In the first place, of course, I submit that it his business to be careful about everything he says on an issue as big as this, and that he and his colleagues must give consideration to every phase of the problem which is contained in the proposal. But I would suggest to the minister that if there is doubt as to the practicability of building the line, in my mind there is no doubt at all as to the impracticability of not building it, and I think that is of major importance at the moment.

The main questions the minister raised were: costs, the population and the traffic. The population and the traffic are practically the one question. As to costs, I do not think anyone really suggested that costs were something that could be entirely left out of consideration. Most of us realize that costs are very important matters in anything we attempt, and I do not think anyone would suggest that we should plunge into a great undertaking without carefully counting the cost. But in regard to financing the undertaking, I hope the government will not find any difficulty there if from other points of view, and especially the economic point of view, they should find its advisable to proceed with the project. It may appear to be a very big task to build this railway, but it is not such a task compared with what this government faced in 1939, the task of preparing this country for war and for the production of the materials that were necessary for the defence of this nation. That was a task which might well have staggered them. Supposing the cost of this project should go to $100,000,000; in view of the admitted wealth of the area and the possibility of developing that wealth and using it in the national economy, surely that is not a staggering sum when we consider what may be expected from its expenditure.

Then as to the population, I would not be surprised if the population were to get less and less from now on, instead of more and more, if the line is not built. I hazard this opinion, that it is foolish for any country to permit people to go into the backwoods without a means of transportation; and I think—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do not talk yourself out of this. We are all with you.

Mr. IRVINE: No, I am not going to do so. I am not blaming the government for having done that; as a matter of fact it has not been the general policy of this country to allow people to migrate to certain sections without building railroads to them. But certainly it is unreasonable to expect a great railway traffic when there is no railway over which the traffic can move. I think that is a reasonable thing to say; and I believe the minister will agree that if that line were built and the transportation facilities were adequate, not only would the population speedily increase, but the production of each farm unit would also increase greatly, and thus increase the traffic. May I point out to the minister that the report he gave concerning the Northern Alberta Railways very largely dealt with the years of the great depression, when practically every railroad line in Canada showed a deficit. The two years of the war period showed a marked increase in traffic, while the others, naturally, were down.

I know the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) is a very wise man, and he has given me a hint which perhaps I had better take. As I have said, I greatly appreciate the minister's attitude, but before I sit down I wish to say a word in explanation to the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl). I just want to point out that when the hon.

gentleman reads my speech and his own in Hansard I think he will see that he misunderstood my point. I did not suggest that the construction of this railroad should be undertaken in order to provide employment. My suggestion was that construction of the railroad would enable us to tap the great resources of a vast territory; that new industries might well be expected to arise as a consequence, and that thereby we would be able to develop industries to meet the needs of the people, at the same time, if you like, providing employment as an incidental to the production of those goods. I wish to make it clear to my hon. friend that I have never been so foolish as to suggest a policy by which people would be provided with work merely for the pleasure of looking at them working. No one I know of has ever advocated an economic policy of that sort. Let us assume that all modern equipment is used, that we have been able even to harness atomic power, and that we have reduced the necessity of human labour to the ultimate. Still it is possible that we shall have to work for an hour or so each day. That would be full employment, under a definite set of circumstances; and that is all we mean by full employment.

Therefore I hope that with this explanation my hon. friend and I will not appear to be as far apart as one might have thought while listening to his remarks.

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ALLOWANCES TO PERSONS SUFFERING INJURY, ACCIDENT OR CONGENITAL INFIRMITY.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of including in their social security programme a system of allowances to every person, without any income or means of support, who, by reason of an injury, accident or congenital infirmity, is at a disadvantage in seeking or obtaining employment, or incapable of providing for his subsistence, and whose age prevents him from benefiting by the social security legislation now in force.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution barely needs comment. Therefore my remarks will be very short because, furthermore, I should like to know the opinion of the house on this question.

The problem of social security is becoming more important than ever in a world upset by war. In this respect, Canada has accomplished an effort which deserves mentioning. Family allowances are now permitting large families with low income to face the heavy charges imposed upon them by a higher cost of living. Indigent mothers, blind and old age people are drawing from various government grants which alleviate their sufferings and allow them an improvement in their uprooted life. Allowances and pensions afford veterans an opportunity to rebuild their civil life on a better basis, and secure them a living if, physically speaking, they have left part of themselves in this conflict. The labourer temporarily out of work may rely on unemployment insurance benefits, a social law which, however, in order to keep up with new conditions and new circumstances, should undergo several amendments.

Family allowances are stopped at the age of sixteen; old age pensions start at seventy. May I say that the age for these latter pensions should be lowered as soon as possible to sixty-five years. The 54-year difference between the ages of sixteen and seventy represents more than the average human life. In my opinion, a certain section of the people, especially included within these age limits, was left unprovided for; that is, the invalid and cripple. This group includes the victims of infantile paralysis, the victims of all kinds of accidents who do not fall under the benefits of any provincial accident insurance act, persons suffering from congenital deformity and other sick people who cannot be cured.

If they, or their famly, are wealthy, these invalids can obtain all the necessary treatments in peaceful surroundings which will thus alleviate the burden of their misfortune. If they have no money or if they are paupers, they fall under public charity. No municipal by-law will provide any help for them; no provincial law can give them any grant, and I could not discover any federal statute which could give them assistance of any kind. No one will hire any invalid person; they are not accepted on the labour market. In this age of mechanization, the machine, which does not stop, supersedes the human being who, in order to follow it, must have strong arms, strong legs and powerful eyesight. Invalid and crippled persons are set aside for reasons of security and production. In the meantime, the cripple or invalid, out of work or occasionally employed in some casual job, cannot earn his living; if he has a wife and children, his fate is simply tragic. Then he must resort to public charity, to welfare associations, and even beg from door to door; besides his misfortune he must beg and undergo the brutal obligation of living desperate days with no hope of improvement. From week to week, under the heavy yoke he has to bear, he will become discouraged, if not filled with despair. Misfortune will poison some persons, but misery will kill him.

Crippled and invalid persons deserve their share under the sun. They have a right to happiness to the same extent as any one of us. The conditions of modern living, which are improved by scientific inventions, gives everyone a minimum of comfort. In order to win the war, we had to spend billions; can we refuse setting aside a few hundred thousand dollars to rid us of poverty? At present we are spending millions to help the destitute populations of the old world; by an elementary sense of charity, should we not also think of those living near us who are victims of hazard, who are the outcasts of happiness?

In Great Britain, it is intended to enact—if it has not already been enacted—legislation providing for the employment of crippled and invalid persons. All employers with twenty employees or more, must hire a number of invalids equal to two per cent of their total effective. This is the disabled persons employment act. I do not know the opinion of the government over this legislation, and even less its immediate or future intentions toward invalid or crippled persons. But I sincerely believe that, during the present session, this unfortunate section of our society should be provided for. Would it not be right for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) to study this problem, to give a statement concerning these indigent persons, and then to recommend a suitable system of allowances, paid by the federal government, or subsidized both by the federal and provincial authorities? The social security programme cannot be complete if indigent invalids and crippled persons are left to their unfortunate fate.

Everyone endorses a programme of social security for children, for the family, for indigent mothers, for the aged and blind persons and for veterans and disabled soldiers. Everyone will also endorse a movement to extend to cripples and invalids the total sympathy of the nation if special legislation to that effect is presented. Their existence on a lounge chair is restricted to the horizon of their window. They live in darkness, without life or company, in a state of perpetual restlessness toward the future, constant dejection, sleepless nights and continuous disappointment. A person who has never suffered cannot understand the darkness which is cast upon the life of a hapless person affected with infirmity, want and very often poverty. Let us brighten their existence by giving them some means of living. Let us assure them that if they are ignored locally the whole nation is not indifferent to their fate and will not reject them from our national life. Spreading joy means spreading peace. To abolish social misery means strengthening the security of the nation.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) who has just introduced this resolution. I think it is worthy of the support of the house and the government. I believe the proposal that he has made to-night will before many years have passed—I was going to say I hoped before many months had passed—be given full effect.

I often think of people who are in the condition he has described, that of disability. I think of what persons with disabilities which perhaps have extended over a long period of years have to endure. That is something that those of us who enjoy good health can scarcely realize. It is all very well in the home where there is a regular income to have one who is permanently handicapped, but I often think that in homes where the income is low or where there is virtually no income the misery cannot be estimated, not only of the individual who is permanently incapacitated but of those who have to care for and see the suffering of the one afflicted.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) was speaking this afternoon I thought how much we could do if we would to alleviate these chronic and, as my hon. friend has stated, congenital diseases which afflict so many persons. I know something of it myself. I wish to say that as far as the party to which I belong is concerned, for thirteen years we have urged that the aged should be cared for and that the blind should be given adequate pensions to enable them to live decently and enjoy life to the extent that they can under the circumstances from which they suffer. We have urged the same consideration for persons who suffer from arthritis and from many other diseases that are incurable, like disseminated sclerosis. I only wish that this house could see its way clear to give every sufferer who cannot earn his or her daily bread and is wholly or partly dependent on others the necessary assistance so that they may be enabled to receive the care that they should receive.

I do not want to delay the house, nor do I want to interfere with others who would like to speak to this motion before eleven o'clock. I wish again to congratulate the hon. member who introduced this resolution. I am perfectly sure that it is deserving of support. I hope we shall all assist in bringing about a condition of society in which those who cannot earn their daily bread or those who are shut in and suffering may be recognized as the responsibility of the whole community. When we have achieved that I believe we shall have established the foundation of a society which may not only profess but actually become in the true sense Christian.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I had not expected that this resolution would be discussed at once. I would have considered it preferable to have an opportunity of making some preparation in order to submit more adequately to this house the few arguments I have to offer. First, I wish to congratulate the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand). He gives expression to an urgent appeal from those among the population who suffer perhaps more than any others.

We now have social laws which help children, prevent them from suffering, and ensure them food and a proper education. We have social laws whereby a helping hand is extended to old people who, after having spent the better part of their life in caring for their families and developing their country, are entitled to some compensation from the nation they have so long served. But there is one class of people who are still in a worse plight than others; I refer to those in their thirties, forties or fifties who, through some disability, are unable to earn a living. In our rural districts, I have often met some of those poor people who have aged beyond their years, and are unable to earn enough to support their wives and children, but are too proud to request any help from public organizations or municipalities or to accept any assistance from neighbours who would be in a position to help them. Those are the people who are most in need of the government's assistance.

To my mind, in keeping with the principle which made it possible for the government to pass the Old Age Pension Act, those who reach that stage prematurely, who, at fifty are as incapacitated as others are at seventy, should be entitled to state assistance.

I am happy to concur in the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Terrebonne. Twenty-five or fifty years ago, beggars could be seen everywhere in the street. Many of us as youngsters delighted in listening to some vagabond's life-story or to the tales he could tell. Nowadays, society has forged ahead and individual hardship is less frequent. Federated charities are active in our cities. This federation was inaugurated to carry on the work of essential charities and to help various associations which could not, unaided, achieve their aim.

Charity can be organized. It is not socialism but social legislation enacted in order to rectify certain anomalies and cure certain ills of our society. It is neither state paternalism for state control of individual or social groups but a remedy designed to alleviate some of our ills.

I represent a constituency whose population lives rather well and even very well, in some centres. But it has not been altogether spared. I have seen with my own eyes the head of a family dragging himself to work every day; this man should not have worked but his pride urged him to go and eke out a living for his wife and child, who, although she is sixteen, is herself incapable of working. Mr. Speaker, those who have witnessed, in their own constituency or elsewhere, such cases as I have just mentioned, know that they are common to every parish, every county, every province.

In the county of Terrebonne, the citizens have urged their member to have the Old Age Pensions Act amended by parliament, for the benefit of cripples and invalids; the same request has been made in my constituency and, no doubt in others throughout the country, the same appeal has been voiced.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think this measure would impose too heavy a burden on the budget of the Minister of National Health At the present time, old age pensions amount to a sizeable figure. The crippled are very much less numerous that the old people; in fact, they constitute but an insignificant proportion of our population. Those unfortunate people are not themselves in a position to present their request, but we are by fairness and charity bound to take their interests at heart in this house.

It might be argued that the setting up of an organization for the administration of an act dealing with the invalids and the crippled would present tremendous difficulties. I would venture a suggestion in this regard. Some may think that, were we to include invalids under the old age pension act, a certain number of so-called invalids might, by playing on sentiments, obtain a certificate entitling them to benefits to which they would have no right. There is a very easy means of preventing any such fraud. Let the Department of National Health set up a medical board, with members appointed by the government, to examine every applicant claiming to be an invalid or a cripple.

Those who are really incapacitated, who are now abandoned without any government assistance, who could hardly obtain relief from municipalities or corporations, might thus be helped and assisted. Under our provincial laws, a man is not bound to help his brother. He should perhaps consider it a natural obligation, because Christianity teaches to help and to love one another. But we know that this is often forgotten, as well in mutual as in Christian love. Well, when a man has in his house one or two of his crippled brothers. he must, under Christian law, receive them and assist them, but he is not bound to do so under civil law and these disabled or incapacitated individuals are completely abandoned. Then the municipalities should offer them relief, but in many cases it is difficult to secure.

Finally. may I point out that our government has lent a helping hand to the underprivileged, protected our children and provided them with proper means of development, helping them to grow and become stronger while giving full play to their particular talents; it has also assisted the elderly, bringing a bit of happiness and comfort to them in their old age in recognition of the devoted service they rendered their country by raising a sound and strong family. I should now like to express the hope and wish that this same government will, in the near future, take the necessary steps to relieve our invalids who are unable to earn their livelihood.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, as I sat here to-night and heard the eloquent and beautiful expressions with which the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) presented his case, I was unable to refrain from thinking of the vast difference which has come over the house during the last ten years. It is ten years since the members of the Social Credit group were trying to get the members of this house to listen to the idea that there should be distributed among the people purchasing power. I suppose every hon. member remembers that at that time it was a common sneer that we were advocating twenty-five dollars a month. We have all heard the hon. member for Terrebonne to-night advocate more than twenty-five dollars a month for all those who, from one cause or another, have been rendered unable to gain access to the means of life. Of course the members of the Social Credit group will endorse heartily and enthusiastically all that the hon. member for Terrebonne has said.

May I draw the attention of the house to one or two further considerations which naturally arise? The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has only just now been telling us about the need for being careful about money. The hon. member for Terrebonne is not worrying about money, and I submit Mr. Speaker, that this house must find the means of obtaining the money for the achievement of the objectives which this house finds desirable. We are living in an age of superabundance. There is no doubt whatever that we can produce all the food and clothing and shelter in this country which are necessary to provide every one of the unfortunates whom the hon. member has in mind with all he can possibly use—not a mere pittance, but an abundant life. It is equally obvious that we can produce enough to accomplish the other objectives which this house has in mind —the building of railways which will be outlets of the Peace River area, the development of other projects which will be necessary in order to make this nation strong and happy. We must find a means of turning these goods, this real wealth, into financial wealth. I would suggest that all hon. members quite earnestly set about trying to find out what that method is. With that I will close my remarks at the present time.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words in support of the motion of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand), to tell him that his motion was due to be discussed some day, the sooner the better, and that as a medical man it is to me a pleasure and a satisfaction to give to those who are incapacitated by congenital infirmity work such as they would want to do.

I do not find, as the hon. member who has spoken before me suggests, that the chamber has changed at all. What we were discussing was not social credit, we were favouring assistance to those who could not earn their living and, as the motion of the hon. member for Terrebonne states, are without any income or means of support. If I understand well the social credit theory, its supporters want to give a bonus to everyone, incapacitated or not. That is the distinction between the social credit theory and the theory of the hon. member for Terrebonne, and that is why I am supporting the motion. As a medical man I have been very close, closer than those of any other profession, to the infirm. In my province we have hospitals and hospices to help crippled people, but even though we have these establishments I believe, with a law passed by the government adding to the social security programme, we could help the hospitals in taking care of the infirm and the crippled.

That is all I have to say at this time, but I wish again to congratulate the hon. member for Terrebonne and all those who have spoken in favour of this motion.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I just rise to congratulate the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) upon sponsoring this resolution and to express my hearty support of it. Some years ago, in the province of British Columbia, through regulations enacted under the jurisdiction of the social welfare department, all people coming within the scope of this resolution were cared for, on a somewhat limited basis; and then two years ago, pending legislation by the federal government, those regulations were put into statutory form under the social assistance act. So that now, in British Columbia, by law, all people coming within the scope of this resolution are cared for in a limited manner; that is, they receive, on the whole, slightly less than those who receive old age pensions, and in British Columbia, as I think all hon. members know, $30 a month is paid to old age pensioners. While that assistance is limited and insufficient, I can speak from personal experience of what it has meant to hundreds of people in the interior of British Columbia. Even that limited assistance has changed life for them in many respects. I wish to express my support of this resolution, and I trust that all hon. members will support it and that when it is passed it will result in the federal government assuming its responsibility in this respect, and including proposals of this kind in a national security scheme which will make it possible for these people to live a happy and decent life.

Mr. P. E. COTE (Verdun): I wish to join with the hon. members who have congratulated the mover of this resolution. It certainly shows on his part an intention to alleviate the difficulties of those who have to compete on the labour market when handicapped by injury, accident or congenital infirmity. I am all for the help which can and should be given to that class of our Canadian population. I am just wondering what legislation in the form of concrete proposals this house could initiate without preliminary consultation with the authorities that have the prime responsibility of looking after these matters; I mean the provincial authorities. I do not know if the matter has already been the subject of any discussion at the interprovincial conference which will be resumed later on in the month, but I think this angle should have been discussed by the mover.

In the second place, I respectfully submit that before resorting to allowances and financial help to the disabled of such a category as is entitled to be covered by this resolution, all other means of rehabilitation should be resorted to. I would have preferred seeing this matter discussed under that angle. I would be a much more enthusiastic supporter of a motion which would find ways and means of rehabilitating disabled and injured persons as, for instance, the Department of Veterans Affairs does so well with the veterans of this and the other great war. Citizens of this country have a right to expect something more than charity from the government of this country. Most of them have had an active period in their life; they have contributed to the development of our economic and social life, and they are entitled to a concrete and useful help in order to reduce their disabled condition. For those disabled persons covered by this resolution who are still of an age where they can be trained in some way and rehabilitated for the labour market, I would rather suggest some ways and means of helping them to attain that end, and I would be inclined to support such a resolution as this only when I have been convinced that there was absolutely no other way of rectifying this unusual situation than by granting allowances or financial aid.

I hope that this matter will come up again for discussion in the house and that every angle of the situation will be discussed before any decision is taken. Nevertheless I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Terrebonne on having afforded the house an opportunity of discussing such an important question as help for a class of citizens who certainly cannot be left in distress and who need the assistance of the responsible authorities in the country.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) on the manner in which he has introduced this resolution. I remember when the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) were before the house during the last session the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) discussed the matter rather fully, and I believe the minister said he would give sympathetic consideration to the proposals and suggestions made at that time.

As has been well pointed out by one of the speakers, it is not so serious a matter where there is a steady income, but where there is a cripple or someone who comes under any of the various headings that have been so well set forth by the hon. member, and where there are financial difficulties coupled with such incapacity, the situation is quite different.

Dealing with some of the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I would point out that there is at least one organization, and there may be more, already doing a splendid job, though it is more or less on a charitable basis. They solicit financial contributions from the public, and the last contribution I was called upon to make before coming to attend this session was solicited by such a committee. They operate two or three hospitals in the country to take care of and endeavour to train younger people, but it is most difficult for these people who find themselves in straitened circumstances financially to have to depend on such charity. If the department has not some concrete suggestion to take care of such people, as suggested by another speaker, it might well, after a thorough investigation, give some assistance to worthy institutions which are now trying on their own to assist the unfortunate who find themselves in such difficult circumstances.

If the minister will recollect the case brought forward by the hon. member for Lake Centre and other members as well when his estimates were before the house at the last session, he will recall that he said he would give the matter sympathetic consideration. I simply wished to say a few words in support of the resolution.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): I rise to support the motion and I am happy to see that it includes various categories. I hope it also includes those people who are suffering from arthritis and rheumatism. There are many crippling and disabling diseases that are painful. While I realize that many persons could benefit from training, I would point out that there are many others who are so incapacitated physically that it is impossible for them to use both hands, or in some other way they are incapable of engaging in any useful trade.

I hope that when the government institutes such an allowance or pension it will not wait, as in the case of pensions for the blind, until the recipient is forty years of age. It is a great mistake to leave a person to charity or chance until he or she attains that age. A pension for any of the purposes contemplated by this resolution should start where the family allowance leaves off, and we should supplement the allowance with training or some other service which would enable the individual, as far as it is humanly possible, to attain some degree of accomplishment and human satisfaction. A great many people are handicapped and their lives unduly stunted because we have failed to make any financial provision or to give them training of any kind to develop them. I hope that the government will see fit to include such persons along with the categories set out in the dominion-provincial proposals, under which they propose to take care of certain specific diseases or disabilities. I hope also that any plans which the government has in mind will at once proceed to take care of those people who are part of our society and for whom society must take the responsibility.

On motion of Mrs. Strum the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 2, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION ON ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement with respect to Canadian representation on the united nations atomic energy commission.

It will be recalled that on January 25 of the present year the general assembly of the united nations, meeting in London, provided for the establishment of a commission to deal with the urgent and important problems raised by the discovery of atomic energy and other related matters.

It was also provided in the resolution adopted by the assembly that the commission should be composed of one representative from each of those states represented on the security council, and Canada when this country was not a member of the security council. Each national representative on the commission was to have such assistance as might be desired.

The secretary general of the united nations has now asked the government of Canada to appoint a representative to this important commission and an order in council has accordingly been passed appointing General the Honourable Andrew G. L. McNaughton, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., as Canadian representative.

General McNaughton will be assisted by an advisory panel consisting of appropriate officials of the Departments of Reconstruction and Supply, External Affairs, and National Defence, and including the president of the national research council. The membership of the panel will be flexible according to the nature of the questions coming before it for consideration, and provision has been made for adding persons with special knowledge to this group of advisers as and when it may be deemed desirable.

POSTAL SERVICE

TWO DELIVERIES A DAY IN URBAN RESIDENTIAL AREAS—COMMERCIAL SHIPMENTS BY PARCEL POST

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in connection with two deliveries service by letter carriers in residential districts throughout the dominion, may I say that instructions are being issued at once for the employment of additional men from Monday next, and to give them one week's training. The reestablishment of two deliveries service in residential districts will therefore become effective on April 15, two weeks from to-day.

I am glad to say that arrangements have been completed under which, effective immediately, the parcel post service from Canada to certain countries has now been extended to include commercial parcels.

Commercial parcels for such countries weighing up to twenty pounds where that weight limit applies, and prepaid accordingly, will be accepted for onward transmission.

Gift parcels weighing over eleven pounds may also be forwarded under the same conditions to countries other than the United Kingdom. The eleven pound weight limit still applies for gift parcels to the United Kingdom in accordance with the regulations of the British postal authorities which have not yet been modified.

Full instructions have already been issued to the postal service in order that this extension may be made available to Canadian business firms without delay. I wish to give a list of the countries where commercial parcels may be made:

Extension of gift parcel post service to include commercial shipments

Belgium, British North Borneo (7 lb. limit of weight); Brunei (7 lb. limit of weight); China (except Manchuria and provinces of Shansi, Suiyan and Chahar (11 lb. limit of weight); Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Finland, France, Guam (15 lb. limit of weight); Hong Kong, Luxembourg, Malay States (Federated and unfederated); Netherlands, Norway, Philippines (11 lb. limit of weight); Poland, Sarawak (7 lb. limit of weight); Straits Settlements, Sweden, Switzerland, Yugoslavia (11 lb. limit of weight).

PRICE CONTROL

DEVELOPMENTS IN PRICE CEILING POLICY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement regarding recent developments in price ceiling policy.

During the past few days, as hon. members no doubt will have noticed, the wartime prices and trade board has authorized a number of important price adjustments. Ceiling prices for iron and steel and for various consumer articles made from iron and steel have been increased. Producers of lumber will be permitted to charge higher prices, although wholesalers' and retailers' ceilings remain unchanged. Butter and pork prices have been raised. Price increases have been permitted for various pulp and paper products other than newsprint. In the course of the next three or four months small increases will take place in the retail prices of clothing and furnishings consequent upon the government's decision to eliminate subsidies on imports of raw cotton and wool.

Taken in conjunction with the decision made at the beginning of February to suspend price ceilings on a list of some 300 items and with the relaxation of rigid price controls on many imported goods, these recent steps may be regarded by some as implying that price control is breaking down, or at least that the basic policy of the government has been changed.

I am therefore taking this opportunity of making it plain that such is not the case. These adjustments are part and parcel of a carefully planned programme which has been developing gradually since V-E day, and which, in its broad outlines, has been explained to the house and to the public on several occasions during the past twelve months. These measures do not mean that the government's anti-inflation policy as administered by the prices board is beginning to falter. They do not mean that we contemplate an early lifting of our price control system, nor must they be taken to imply that any serious increase in the cost of living is impending. On the contrary, they indicate that the government is prepared to maintain control over the movement of prices during this difficult and highly dangerous transition period.

I need hardly say that the danger of inflation is still very great. Many commodities are still in short supply, e.g., food, textiles and building materials—all highly essential. Purchasing power and consumer demands exceed their war-time levels. In this situation it would be unthinkable to allow prices to find their own level. But that does not mean, of course, that the administration of price control should not change. The system which served Canada so well in war must now be adapted, and is being adapted, to meet the special circumstances of the transition period.

Our system of price control has always permitted price adjustments in cases of genuine necessity. The special significance of the adjustments recently announced arises from the fact that they cover a wider area of Canadian industry than has so far been affected. I believe, however, that this will be recognized as the sensible approach to the problem. It would be folly to pretend that the government could continue to administer the same more or less inflexible system of price ceilings that was appropriate to the uncertain days of 1942 and 1943. Here and there the line has to bend if it is not to break.

The declared aim of the government's price policy for the transition period is to give a reasonable degree of stability to living costs while creating conditions favorable to a high level of employment and production. In practice this means that where the wartime prices and trade board is satisfied that production is capable of expanding on the basis of basic period selling prices, then basic period prices will continue as the legal maxima. On the other hand, where it can be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the prices board that present ceiling prices are prejudicially affecting production and employment, adjustments are made. But except for commodities in quite ample supply, or relatively unimportant, price ceilings are not suspended.

As the house will realize, it is easy to state general principles such as these but more difficult to put them into practice. The prices board is literally in a continuous fight to prevent price increases from being extended any further than is absolutely necessary. The increases in prices, to which I referred earlier, provide examples of the policy in practice. In the case of iron and steel, the support of the price structure formerly given by war production has disappeared. Consequently, wartime increases in costs must now be reflected in selling prices of the basic iron and steel products. The wartime accumulation of cost increases, particularly wage increases, is also the basic factor behind the increase in the producer's price of soft-wood lumber, and in pulp and paper prices.

Another factor behind certain recent price increases stems from the decision which the government reached some time ago to reduce or eliminate subsidy payments. While subsidies played a vital part in checking the forces of inflation during the war, they are not desirable as a permanent feature of the price structure, and should be removed as expeditiously as possible. Certain subsidies were paid to offset temporary wartime cost increases and are more or less self-liquidating. The subsidies formerly paid on imports of petroleum are a good example of what I mean. On the other hand, it looks as if the wartime increase in the cost of imported cotton and wool, for example, is more or less permanent. In view of this, the board has largely withdrawn from the payment of subsidies on wool imports in recent months, and has reduced the amount of subsidy paid on cotton imports. At the same time, the prices board has authorized certain price increases that will be necessary to compensate for the higher price of wool and cotton as the various products move from the mills and converters, through to the garment manufacturers and down to the final consumer. The price increases authorized have been carefully worked out in relation to seasonal production, and in relation to inventories and other such factors, and the board is confident that the increase of consumer prices will be kept to the bare minimum necessary to offset subsidies. In other words, basic period or 1941 price ceilings in this particular industry, as in other industries where adjustments are necessary, will cease to be the rule, but the system of legal maximum price ceilings remains intact.

The recent increases in the prices of butter and pork products require very little explanation. In the case of butter, an additional incentive is needed if even a restricted consumer ration is to be met. In the case of bacon, the United Kingdom, realizing that hog numbers were declining seriously, agreed to raise contract prices immediately, and the domestic price was simply adjusted to the new level.

I am confident that the policy we have been following is capable of meeting the realities of this period of adjustment. It will undoubtedly mean a modest increase in the cost of living. But it will enable us to preserve the economic advantages we have gained from nearly five years of self-discipline on the economic front, and will protect consumers and producers alike from the economic and social dislocation which would surely develop if present inflationary pressures were given free rein.

In conclusion I wish to reiterate that the government has no intention of putting into effect what some political and other groups are advocating, namely, the removal, wholly or substantially, of price control.

We believe that price control and the maintenance of ceilings have the support of the Canadian people and we do not intend at this stage of the fight to flout their opinion or destroy the results of nearly five years of determined effort to prevent inflation.

I would like to appeal to this house and to the Canadian people for continued support of measures which we are satisfied are necessary if economic stability is to be maintained, if the real value of our currency and our bonds is to be protected, and if the bankruptcy and unemployment resulting from a price boom followed by a price collapse are to be avoided.

Mrs. STRUM: I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance on his statement, regarding the price of butter. Did I understand the minister to say that this arises out of a withdrawal of the subsidy to the producers of butter fat?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I did not say that. The subsidies are not withdrawn.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

ORDER IN COUNCIL CREATING CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table order in council P.C. 1218 of March 29, 1946, which authorizes the creation of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. I would like to make a brief statement to explain some of the main functions of this corporation.

In view of the many transactions which require immediate attention, it has been necessary to bring the corporation into being by means of order in council. Legislation will be presented at this session to enable the corporation to operate on a continuing basis for a period.

For some time it has been clear that there are many transactions in international trade which cannot be handled entirely by private enterprise and the work of the corporation is intended to supplement the activities of business organization rather than to interfere with them.

The Canadian Commercial Corporation will, firstly, take over the various functions of making purchases in this country for foreign governments and the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration that have hitherto been performed by the Canadian Export Board. The value of such purchases made to date by the Canadian Export Board exceeds $417,000,000.

Secondly, the Canadian Commercial Corporation will assist private enterprise in obtaining essential supplies from ex-enemy territories. Supplies from such territories cannot be obtained at present through ordinary commercial channels.

Thirdly, this corporation provides the machinery which could be used in the future to purchase commodities such as sugar, tea, oils and fats which are under international allocation or foreign government control and may continue to be so for some time to come.

It is impossible at the moment to enumerate in full detail all the functions that will be discharged by the corporation. The three main purposes that I have outlined are only an indication of the work to be performed. New tasks may devolve upon the corporation, as its work proceeds, in the light of its developing experience and the needs of Canadian business.

The creation of the Canadian Commercial Corporation enables the government to provide facilities to Canadian business that will match those being offered to British and American traders through the operations of the United Kingdom Commercial Corporation and the United States Commercial Corporation.

The executive officer who will be charged with the primary responsibility for directing the activities of the corporation will be its director and general manager, Mr. W. D. Low, who assumes these new duties after having been chairman of the Canadian Export Board, and prior to that, executive assistant to the deputy minister of the Department of Munitions and Supply, where he had supervision over the purchasing branches. He is on loan from the purchasing department in Montreal of the Canadian National Railways.

The president of the new corporation is Mr. M. W. Mackenzie, deputy minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and its directors are: Mr. H. B. McKinnon, president, Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation; Mr. David Sim, deputy minister, Department of National Revenue (customs and excise); Mr. V. W. Scully, deputy minister, Department of Reconstruction and Supply; Mr. D. B. Finn, deputy minister, Department of Fisheries; Mr. L. P. St. Amour, assistant deputy governor, Bank of Canada, and Mr. W. D. Low.

The corporation will be capitalized at $10,000.000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR PARKDALE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word about the resignation of the hon. member for Parkdale, Mr. Bruce, which was announced to the house last night, and the reference made by Your Honour to the fact that you are issuing a writ to-day for a new election.

What I am about to say is said solely with the intention of bringing to the attention of hon. members of the house what I believe to be the spirit if not the letter of the parliamentary law with respect to a member of parliament relinquishing his seat in the House of Commons. Do not let it be assumed for one moment that I take any exception to the hon. member for Parkdale having resigned his seat, or that I am criticizing his action in so doing. Such is not the case. I believe there is a certain responsibility upon myself as the leader of the house to draw the attention of the house to what is quite evidently, according to the authorities, the spirit of the parliamentary law with respect to resignations of members of the House of Commons.

The House of Commons Act does not set forth any reason for a member's resignation. Section 6 says, "Any member of the House of Commons may resign his seat" either by giving notice in his place in the house or by addressing a written declaration of his intention to resign attested by two witnesses. Nevertheless it may I think be truly said that a member is elected to serve during the life of a parliament. Unless there are grave reasons compelling him to return to private life, or he receives some appointment under the crown he is, I believe, in duty bound to keep the mandate he has received from his constituents. Sir Erskine May says in his thirteenth edition, at page 45:

> It is a settled principle of parliamentary law that a member after he is duly chosen, cannot relinquish his seat.

This restriction can be evaded in the United Kingdom by a member accepting an office under the crown, usually the Chiltern Hundreds, an office which is merely nominal though assuming the form of a place of profit. The evasion takes place only when there are grave or very special reasons for it. It would not be acceptable if a member wished to resign when he becomes weary of political life or feels that parliamentary work interferes with his personal affairs.

Redlich, Procedure of the House of Commons, volume 2, at page 99, says:

> It is well known that English parliamentary law recognizes no power on the part of a member to relinquish his seat.

Bourinot, fourth edition, at page 157, says:

> It was formerly a principle of parliamentary law that a member after he is duly chosen cannot relinquish his seat.

There can be no doubt that the hon. member for Parkdale had the right to resign without giving any reason for taking that step, but he has taken a course which may establish a dangerous precedent. The House of Commons Act, in prescribing the way in which a member may resign, cannot have intended to make resignation easy, and applicable on the slightest provocation. The cause of it, it would appear, should be prompted by public rather than personal interest.

Mr. POULIOT: Is he making room for Arthur Meighen?

Mr. CASSELMAN: You will find out in time.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Arising out of the statement of the Prime Minister with respect to the resignation of the hon. member for Parkdale, I did not understand the Prime Minister's intention or purpose or what he desired in making a statement of the kind. I gathered that it was in some sense a criticism of the hon. member for tendering his resignation. If it was, I would like to ask him this question: What criticism did he offer the hon. member for Glengarry for resigning when the Prime Minister was without a seat in this house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was very careful to say that I was not taking exception to the resignation of the hon. member for Parkdale.

Some hon. MEMBERS Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members may laugh; perhaps their hearing is not as good as that of hon. members in other parts of the house; but they will find, if they look at Hansard, that is exactly what I said. Perhaps the error I have made, if I have made any, is being a little too conservative in seeking to preserve what I believe to be good traditions in the matter of parliamentary law and procedure. I feel it part of my duty to bring to the attention of the house any matters which affect developments in parliamentary law and procedure, and I was proceeding on that line to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: Answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer it. I think I was very careful to say that there had to be some important reason why a member should resign—not only important, but a public reason. That would apply to the hon. member for Glengarry. I am very happy to say that my hon. friend immediately opposite is one of those who were courteous enough to say at the time that he thought it would be a pity if I were not allowed to be returned to the House of Commons.

LEON BLUM

MISSION TO WASHINGTON—VISIT TO OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? I have noted that Mr. Leon Blum, former premier of France and a distinguished French statesman is on a special mission to Washington. Is there any possibility of Mr. Blum coming to Ottawa, and has the government extended an invitation to him?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that the government has already expressed to Mr. Blum its pleasure at the prospect of his visiting Ottawa during the course of his stay in Washington. I learned only this morning that it is possible that Mr. Blum may be in Ottawa before the end of the present week. I think I may say on behalf of this country that we shall welcome a visit from Mr. Blum at this time.

[Mr. Bracken.]

CANADIAN ARMY

INQUIRY AS TO POSTING TO WINNIPEG OF LORD STRATHCONA HORSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LESLIE A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can he give the assurance that the Lord Strathcona Horse, a regiment which has had an historic association with the city of Winnipeg ever since the South African war, will continue and maintain its peacetime establishment—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? Is there a possibility that a squadron of the Lord Strathcona Horse will be posted to the city of Winnipeg?

Hon DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Answering the hon. members for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) and Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), I may say that anything is possible. I am aware of the historic significance which this great regiment has for the city of Winnipeg, and that will be taken into account when considering where the permanent headquarters of the regiment are to be located.

INQUIRY AS TO ALLEGED DESERTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It has to do with a Canadian by the name of McCloy who served in the United States army about the beginning of the war and then left that army, allegedly by desertion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let Mr. Speaker keep order. He does not need your help.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I should hear the question first.

An hon. MEMBER: Ask a question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I necessarily must say what the facts are before I can put the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This man then joined the Canadian army, in 1939.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must request the hon. member to ask his question. Under the rules of the house his question should be brief and to the point.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: After being discharged in 1945 from the Canadian army he lived in Winnipeg, and was taken into custody—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should put his question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of deference, I cannot place the question before the minister unless the background is available.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am very sorry; I want to be generous, but the hon. member should not make a speech; he must put his question for the minister to reply to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My question now is, this man has been arrested under—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat and put his question on the order paper.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, the minister a moment ago—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have asked the hon. member to resume his seat and put the question on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, surely we have gone the limit to-day with respect to restricting an hon. member who desires to ask a question. Let us be fair to all parts of the house. We had to listen to-day to what I think was a great extension of the rules of the house when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) ended up his statement with a political speech.

Mr. ABBOTT: You did not like it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I admit that it is a touchy spot with you too, and I do not blame you for objecting to the question, but surely the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has the right to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe it is desirable, for the decorum and dignity of this house, that the ruling of the Speaker should not be discussed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask a direct question?

Mr. GRAYDON: Order. There is a question of privilege before the house. Privilege comes first.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a minute. You cannot go on all day.

Mr. GRAYDON: Privilege comes first.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Before the orders of the day are called I wish to ask a question of great urgency to a native-born Canadian who is about to be deported to the United States under an order in council making an offence retroactive. Will the Minister of Justice look into the case which I brought to his attention, that of a man from Winnipeg, in order to assure that this Canadian will not be deported under an order in council that makes retroactive—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled on that question. It should be put on the order paper.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The man will be in the United States.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask the Minister of Justice a very simple question? Will he not delay the deportation of a man named McCloy under order in council P.C. 6577 until the house has had an opportunity to discuss the matter?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I do not think any hon. member of this house need feel any anxiety about the case of this brave Canadian veteran McCloy. The facts are not as had been stated to the hon. member for Lake Centre. This man was not in any sense a recent deserter, or alleged to be a recent deserter, from the American army. He had enlisted years ago in the American army and the allegation was that in 1927 he had become a deserter or had become absent without leave and remained absent without leave from that time until 1946. In 1939 he enlisted in the Canadian army and served overseas until the month of August, 1945.

As is well known to members of the house, since the order No. 6577 was tabled here, shortly after it was made, there was a reciprocal arrangement between Canada and the United States for the speedy return of deserters or soldiers absent without leave, but the spirit of that order was to deal with recent cases.

As soon as this case was brought to the attention of any one of the departments—the question is addressed to me, but the order in council was made with the concurrence of five different ministers—it was immediately taken up with the American embassy here, and it was pointed out to them that it had never been intended that this order would apply to a case of that kind and arrangements are being discussed for the purpose of having it cleared up. In the meantime Mr. McCloy has been released on bail, and it is understood that his bail will be extended indefinitely until the matter is finally settled. If necessary there will be either a withdrawal or a modification of this arrangement, because neither side ever intended it to apply to a case such as this one.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How simple that all was!

ATOMIC ENERGY

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT OPERATION CROSSROAD, BIKINI ATOLL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Will the Prime Minister tell the house how many Canadian senators and members of parliament will be sent to represent Canada's interest at the forthcoming Operation Crossroad at Bikini Atoll?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Order my foot; that is a question.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend sent me notice of his question. I shall regard it as a notice and seek to give him a reply to-morrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEGOTIATIONS FOR WAGE INCREASES FOR STEEL WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour whether the Department of Labour has received a request from the united steelworkers union asking the government to convene a joint conference of the steel manufacturers and the representatives of the steel workers union to discuss the matter of wage increases?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend sent me notice of the question but I did not get to my office until just prior to the opening of the house. I have had a number of communications from the organization referred to; and if he will let the matter stand until to-morrow I will give him an answer.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

REGIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD FOR QUEBEC—PAUL EMILE MARQUETTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I have a question for the Minister of Labour of which I sent him notice yesterday. Was Paul Emile Marquette of Montreal appointed to the regional war labour board on recommendation of the Canadian Congress of Labour? Has the minister been requested by the Canadian Congress of Labour to remove Mr. Marquette from this position? If so, what action has been taken in the matter?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see any urgency in this question; it should be put on the order paper.

Mr. COLDWELL: I disagree.

LAY-OFFS IN C.N.R. AUTOMOTIVE DEPARTMENT, WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Is it the fact that several hundred employees, many of them ex-servicemen, are to be laid off in the automotive department of the Canadian National Railways in Winnipeg?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman sent me a notice of his question yesterday. I asked the officers of my department to ascertain from the Canadian National Railways what the position was. I received the report this morning and it reads:

> The Canadian National Railways management advises that the net earnings position of the railway has precipitated necessity of reduction of certain staffs and it seems inevitable that there will be certain lay-offs in the Winnipeg area at an early date, probably some during April. The management has as yet no advice as to the number of employees that will be laid off or as to what classifications will be affected. That depends entirely on the result of the analysis that is now being made as to where reductions would be indicated.

PEACE CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity of Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the house and the Prime Minister know, a tentative date has been mentioned publicly for the convening of the peace conference at Paris as of May of this year. Can the Prime Minister give us information as to whether that tentative date still stands, or whether it is being advanced or brought back according to the exigencies of the situation?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish I could answer the question. Up to the present, however, there has not been a definite date fixed for the conference which it was expected would be held in Paris early in May. I am rather hoping that before the present week is out it will be possible for the powers immediately concerned to inform the different governments of the exact date.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Without the least intention of infringing upon the extra-territorial privilege of the hon. member for Peel in asking questions, may I ask the government whether someone has been designated to attend the funeral of the league of nations at Geneva?

RADIO BROADCASTING

"SOLDIER'S WIFE" — REQUEST FOR DISCONTINUANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of the answer to a question on page 424 of yesterday's Hansard showing that the cost of the wartime prices and trade board broadcast "Soldier's Wife" is at the rate of $230,000 a year. Will the Minister of Finance direct the immediate discontinuance of this broadcast?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will take the hon. gentleman's request into consideration.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REDUCTION OF PENSION ON APPOINTMENT TO POSITION IN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): On March 29 I was asked a question by the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) with reference to a point raised by the member for Regina City in regard to a pensioner whose pension was reduced because he had been appointed to a position under the crown. I looked up the case in question and I find it is under the Militia Pensions Act and has no relation to the Department of Veterans Affairs or to service pensions. My hon. friend asked whether this was a violation of the Pension Act. It is not.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING MINISTERIAL HEAD

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 6, to amend the Department of External Affairs Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, as I explained at the time of its introduction, is to repeal section (3) of the Department of External Affairs Act, which was enacted in 1912 by the administration of Sir Robert Borden, and which provides that—

> The member of the King's Privy Council for Canada holding the recognized position of First Minister shall be the Secretary of State for External Affairs . . .

As it stands the section constitutes a statutory requirement that the Secretary of State for External Affairs can be no one but the Prime Minister. The present bill would remove this limitation and make it possible for some other person to occupy the position. The result of the present bill will be to place the Department of External Affairs in precisely the same position as the other departments of government in respect of which there is no requirement that any particular person must occupy the position of minister. That is all there is to the present bill.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to say to the Prime Minister that some years ago in the House of Commons a very eminent counsel who sat in this chamber for a good many years was asked to what he attributed his great success in the courts of Canada. His answer was that it was probably attributable to the fact that when he had the judge supporting his case in court he never tried to argue with the judge. There does seem to be an analogy to that in the matter now before us, because to-day we have the government with us in respect to a change in the legislation dealing with external affairs.

While perhaps we should not deny to the Prime Minister the immediate fatherhood of this measure may I say that its ancestry, as I think the right hon. gentleman will agree, goes much beyond the party now in power. Almost continuously and consistently since 1943 this official opposition has made an appeal, and in many instances an urgent appeal, for legislation such as that now introduced. The appeal was made in 1943, again in 1944 and in 1945, and again at the beginning of this session. I think hon. members will recall, and by reference will see, that there is now on the order paper a resolution proposed by myself having in view the purpose which this legislation now purports to effect. I might read the salient terms of the resolution, which go I believe a considerable distance in indicating the need for the change at this time.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope my hon. friend will not be too technical. If he is, I may decide to argue the point. However, I have not yet started to read the resolution, nor have I done more than suggest that I was going to give some salient points of it. Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear what I said. In the resolution I indicated that the Department of External Affairs had grown in size and importance to the point where a full-time minister was both vital and essential in the national interest.

In addition it will be recognized by every hon. member in this house that Canada's responsibility abroad has increased to the point where external affairs has become one of the major businesses of government and one of the principal concerns of parliament.

I shall not repeat what I said in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne when I dealt with this point, other than to say that it is a matter of vital necessity that a minister who has had the advantage of a close liaison or connection, knitting-in or meshing, with the men under him in the Department of External Affairs, should represent Canada at international gatherings. As I pointed out in my address at that time, without any reflection upon those who had represented Canada in a leading capacity at various international gatherings I was afraid that as time went on we should witness an extraordinary situation—that of the Prime Minister, because of his numerous and onerous duties in the domestic field, finding it impossible to attend all the international gatherings and having to substitute some other minister of the crown who may not always be conversant with the many moves that are taking place in the international field. We should then find ourselves with a delegation led by someone who perhaps while at the conference would have to learn many of the lessons on external affairs. This was one of the reasons which prompted me to place on the order paper for consideration in due course the resolution to which I have referred.

I wish to say to the Prime Minister that so far as our party is concerned we are prepared to accept and give support to the second reading of a bill which will enable this government to appoint someone as full-time minister of external affairs. Most hon. members will realize, particularly those who have gone to international conferences, that there is scarcely any nation in the world which is not led either by the head of the state, the prime minister, or the minister of foreign affairs. Australia, which is not as large a country as Canada, has had for some considerable time its own foreign minister, who in the conclaves of the world has done an exceedingly effective job on behalf of his country. Such nations as Denmark, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Belgium, and the Netherlands, to say nothing of many smaller countries, are represented at international conferences by their prime ministers, the ministers of external affairs or foreign ministers. No nation of Canada's size and importance can go longer without a full-time minister of external affairs.

I have only this criticism to offer. I think the government might properly have brought in this bill a year ago. After all, many pieces of legislation which contemplated the peacetime reconstruction era were brought in at the last session. We can no longer take the risk of going without this measure. We should have in harness at this very moment a minister of external affairs. The fact that on two occasions at least the Prime Minister has said that he will not run in another general election is an additional reason why this matter should be taken care of.

Mr. McIVOR: The Prime Minister is capable of changing his mind.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suggest to my hon. friend that he let the Prime Minister himself change his mind rather than doing it for him here. If the undertaking of the Prime Minister remains, it means at the outside that he will occupy his present position no longer than two or three more years. That is an additional reason why the Department of External Affairs should have a full-time head at the earliest possible moment. In the early days of the war there may have been good reasons why the Prime Minister should remain the head of that department, and that was one of the reasons why I and other hon. members did not press the matter at that time. But as the war went on and peace became a certainty, the reasons which may have weighed against the appointment of a full-time minister lost most of their strength and importance.

When the Prime Minister rises to speak on the second reading of the bill, or when we are in committee, there are two or three questions that he should make a note of and answer for the information of the house. If this legislation passes I should like to know how long we shall have to wait before the full-time minister is appointed. It is one thing to put a measure on the statute book and another thing to carry its terms out. When the Prime Minister is in a generous frame of mind for giving information he might tell the house also who the new appointee will be.

I hesitate to move an amendment to the second reading of the bill, particularly when it has to do with only a technical change, but when we are in committee the Prime Minister might give consideration to a suggestion I am about to make. For this I am indebted to the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) who is an indefatigable searcher for technical knowledge and general information, and who is most industrious in all matters of this kind; I want to give him full credit for the suggestion which I now offer the house. He has pointed out that those who have been advising the Prime Minister in relation to the amendment of the statute have left the legislation in an odd position. By this measure we seek to repeal a section of The Department of External Affairs Act, to which royal assent was given on April 1, 1912. The section for which repeal is sought reads in this way:

> The member of the King's Privy Council for Canada holding the recognized position of First Minister shall be the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and in this act he is hereafter referred to as "the Minister."

I should like to discuss two points in this connection. First, as one looks through the various pieces of legislation which have been passed, not only in earlier days, but in more recent times, one finds language which I suggest is preferable to that now left as a residue in the act before us. It would seem to me that through this measure we shall have abolished the office without substituting anything in its place, and unless a new amendment is offered in substitution for the one now before us, we shall have left the matter hanging in the air.

If one refers to older statutes dealing with the Department of Justice, the Department of Finance, or the Department of Agriculture, he will find that the legislation was clear and unequivocal in that it first appointed the minister, and secondly, it detailed the duties the minister must discharge in the department over which he should have supervision.

The legislation which set up the Department of Reconstruction is perhaps the most recent in this class, and one of the last with which parliament has dealt. The act is found in the statutes of 1944-45; and in section 3 of chapter 18 one finds this:

> There shall be a department of the government of Canada which shall be called the Department of Reconstruction over which the Minister of Reconstruction for the time being appointed by the governor general by commission under the great seal shall preside, and the minister shall have the administration and direction of the department.

Then it goes on to speak about the deputy minister and various other officials. I suggest that in the committee stage consideration will have to be given to inserting, in the place of the section for which repeal is sought, something which is more operative than that contained in the bill.

In addition I must point out that the bill contains language which, I suggest, is incapable of being incorporated into a statute in any coherent fashion. As the act now stands there is reference in it to "the minister". I suggest that if we repeal section 3 we shall have no reference to the identity of the minister in the legislation. Those who are expert in the technical drafting of legislation will readily agree that drafting changes are needed in this instance before we can accept the measure now brought down.

I was interested in the Prime Minister's statement to the effect that the act now being repealed was passed in 1912. I find that the ministry of external affairs was first set up in Canada in 1909; before that time matters with which it has since dealt were handled in various departments. I have read with much interest the debates of 1909, in which the public men of that day pointed out that the growing importance of external affairs, and the amount of work then falling under that heading, by virtue of Canada's increased prestige and her position in the world, warranted the setting up of a separate department. I could not help thinking that if those older statesmen could now look in on this chamber and note the great increase in business and work of the Department of External Affairs, they might have added greater emphasis to what they said at that time.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the prime minister of that day, had this to say in the debate:

> All governments have found it necessary to have a department—

Previously there was none.

> —whose only business shall be to deal with relations with foreign countries, and in our judgment Canada has reached a period in her history when we should follow the example of other countries in that respect, as, for example, the commonwealth of Australia.

This would indicate that through the years the commonwealth of Australia has given a lead in external affairs, and that it had set up its department before Canada did. At a later time it followed the course which so many nations had followed, that of appointing a separate full-time minister before we got around to it in Canada.

I would impress upon the Prime Minister those two points I have mentioned in connection with draftsmanship. I believe that upon reflection he will agree the house could not let the measure pass in its present form.

The official opposition takes the position that this measure represents a step in the right direction. Indeed we feel highly honoured that a notice of motion standing on the order paper in the name of an hon. member in this party has been accepted in principle by the government. May I commend the Prime Minister upon this belated departure in policy. I do suggest that if he were to follow more of the suggestions coming from this side of the house he, the country and parliament would be the better for it.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the proposal now before the house. We are not recent converts to this point of view. My predecessor, the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, who was leader of this movement from its inception in 1933, used to offer the suggestion from time to time in the house that we needed a separate and full-time minister of external affairs.

We have always believed that Canada had grown to a stature, even during the years which intervened between the two wars, that entitled her to representation by a full-time minister. In saying this, let it be understood that I am not detracting in any way from the services rendered by the Prime Minister in that department. Let me make that perfectly clear.

I do believe however that the duties of the office of Prime Minister and those of the Secretary of State for External Affairs are to-day so onerous that no one individual, no matter how capable, can properly discharge them. In our opinion, therefore, the appointment of a full-time minister is long overdue. The very fact that we appointed last session and are reappointing this session a committee on external affairs makes it necessary that we have a minister who can devote his whole attention to the department and can sit with the committee. In the years I have been in the house—and before, because I read Hansard assiduously before I came—I have considered it tragic that so little attention has been given by Parliament to the affairs of this department.

I noted before the war that usually the estimates of the Department of External Affairs came pretty well toward the end of the session. Occasionally by agreement among the parties in the house a day was set aside when an item might be discussed, but with the exception of a handful of people in parliament there were few who between the two wars really took the interest in external affairs which that dpartment of government warranted.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Whatever may have been Canada's position among the nations before the present war, I think we are all agreed that in every respect she has now attained the stature of full nationhood. We have the obligations that come with nationhood. We have in Ottawa the representatives of many governments of the world, in the persons of ambassadors and ministers, and we in turn are represented in many other countries. There was a time when perhaps a British ambassador or a British consul might represent Canada, but that is no longer true. While we have the closest association, and must maintain it, with the British commonwealth of nations, we must never forget that we are a nation in our own right. As we have discovered in these international conferences, the component parts of the British commonwealth of nations do not speak with a single voice. If that needed to be demonstrated it was evident at San Francisco, it was evident at London, and at the recent meeting of the security council it was demonstrated anew by the action of the representative of Australia.

I have felt for a long time, years indeed, that we should have a full time minister in charge of this department. Canada has been particularly fortunate, and the Prime Minister as minister of external affairs has been particularly fortunate, in the type of personnel that has been gathered together in the Department of External Affairs. Nothing impressed me more deeply than the capability and the breadth of vision of the advisers who accompanied us to San Francisco. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who was present at the meetings of the united nations organization and the assembly in London, came back with exactly the same report, that Canada's external affairs officials and advisers compared favourably with those of any other country in the world. I am glad to have this opportunity of paying this tribute to them.

Our status as a nation makes us independent, yet we are associated with the British commonwealth of nations by many ties which I hope will be continued throughout the years. Canada is a nation in her own right. She speaks at interntional conferences as a nation independent of the United States, independent of Great Britain—speaks always as Canada. I believe the time has come when we should assume all the obligations of that position. We should have responsible to this house a minister of external affairs who will be prepared from time to time to meet the external affairs committee of this house in order that we as a parliament may understand more completely the international obligations of Canada and be more fully aware of the policies that are being followed.

In a statement which he made to the house this afternoon the Prime Minister referred to the fact that while Canada is not to be a member of the security council, she is to become a member of the commission dealing with atomic power, because of the importance of Canada's contribution in regard to that great and in some respects terrifying, in other respects encouraging, discovery, with the implications of which the world now has to deal.

I am speaking not only for myself but for those associated with me in my party. As I have said, for many years we have put forward resolutions urging the members of parliament to provide for the appointment of a minister of external affairs, and we are glad to see that that is to be done.

With regard to the point made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) at the conclusion of his remarks, that is a matter which I hope the Prime Minister will deal with at the proper time and in the proper place. I do not think we can properly discuss the clauses of the bill on the motion for second reading.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the measure before the house meets with the unqualified approval of the members of the Social Credit group. We entertain very much the same ideas as have already been expressed by the leaders of the two other opposition groups in the house. To emphasize the truth of what was said by each of those leaders, it is only necessary to point out that we are faced with problems the like of which have never before impressed themselves upon the minds of men.

In addition to our need to maintain the most harmonious and cooperative relations with the sister states of the great British empire and commonwealth; in addition to our need to have the most cordial fellowship with the United States; in addition to our need to extend the hand of good fellowship and good neighbourliness to all nations of the world who are kindly disposed—in addition to all these we have certain special problems that face us in this age.

The first, which should be impressed on all of us in all countries, is the need of developing a technique of distribution among nations. Very little is said about this matter, which is one of the greatest causes for anxiety that I see on the horizon to-day. The cause of the present troubles in the world is fundamentally the inability to distribute the goods of the world from nation to nation. That was fundamentally the cause of the last war and of the first world war as well. Instead of our talking about that cause and trying to remedy it, it seems to me that the nations of the world and the members of this house are talking about everything else. In the existence of that cause there is occasion for alarm.

It seems to me that the Department of External Affairs of Canada will have to study this whole matter of international distribution with the utmost care and formulate a solution very different from anything the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has ever mentioned in all his public utterances outside or inside this house. In order to emphasize that fact I should like to point out one thing which has developed during the war.

We have built at Sarnia a great rubber plant at a cost, I understand, of $51,000,000. The result of that splendid experiment and achievement is that we now are independent of all the world with respect to rubber. But in developing our own rubber supply we have put out of employment 100,000 people in the various countries that used to supply us with rubber. The question must arise in the mind of every thoughtful man: what is going to happen to those 100,000 people? Undoubtedly we were sound in developing our rubber supply, and it may easily be argued that we have no responsibility whatsoever for the welfare of those 100,000 people. But in this age, when we might be plunged into a war because of the unhappiness of certain peoples, we must assume a measure of responsibility for the welfare of those people. The nations of the world are developing towards economic nationalism, as has been pointed out two or three times already in debates in this house; and the more nearly they develop towards that state of affairs the more serious this problem becomes. There are nations—Canada and the United States, for instance—so fortunately situated in the extent and great variety of their resources as to be able in large measure to support themselves, but there are other nations whose resources are so meagre, and so one-sided, shall I say, that they cannot be self-sustaining. This state of affairs, alone, which is an exceedingly serious one, could occupy the Department of External Affairs pretty well night and day for enough years at least to enable them to reach a solution of the problem, which they can suggest to our fellow nations as they meet them.

There is another matter which requires special care at this time. During the Bretton Woods debate I pointed out that commercial rivalries and commercial warfare are far more dangerous than they have ever been in the whole previous history of the world. I have no desire to offend anyone, but let me mention frankly one nation, our great, friendly respected and honoured neighbour, the United States. Because of her tremendous resources and wealth and her vast productive potential, the United States is capable of penetrating the markets of almost any nation in the world and displacing the products of the industries of those nations, throwing their people into the ranks of the unemployed and generally wrecking their economy. If the people of the United States so desired, having upset the trade balance between themselves and any other nation in the world, with the exception of Russia perhaps, they could acquire the fixed assets of that nation and virtually render it impossible for her to conduct a free and independent life. Somehow or other the nations of the world must discover a means of offsetting the great danger of economic warfare. I am quite disheartened sometimes when I reflect on how few members of this house ever give any attention whatsoever to this important matter. Yet it is one of the major causes of war, and always has been. It was one of the major causes of the last war.

Another serious problem which bulks large upon the horizon is the need for safeguarding national sovereignty. To me there is a situation in our house which is quite fantastic. May I illustrate it by what happened within the last few minutes. The member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking of our being independent of Britain, and I believe it was the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who broke out with applause for that statement and said "hear, hear."

Mr. POULIOT: Independent of Britain and the United States—hear, hear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad that the hon. member is so outspoken that everyone will know that I am not misrepresenting him. I can sympathize with the hon. member for Temiscouata, but let me draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that last fall we met together in this house and accepted the united nations organization, under which apparently we give up more of the sovereignty of Canada to an external body than was ever taken from us by Great Britain in perhaps the last seventy-five years, and that external body was an organization under the control virtually of the United States. Anyone who faces the facts cannot gainsay that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I am afraid the hon. member is getting rather far afield from the bill before the house, which is to amend chapter 65 of the revised statutes of Canada. I think the discussion should be confined to the bill before the house and should not extend to a discussion of trade and commerce and the united nations organization.

Mr. POULIOT: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in defence of the argument made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), I submit that the minister of external affairs will be bound by the policy of the government and by the policy of other organizations. There is a question now of abandoning part of our sovereignty and giving it to another organization called the UNO. Therefore it seems to me that the hon. member, the former leader of the Social Credit group, although I disagree entirely with him, is perfectly within his right as a member of parliament in discussing the question whether or not we should abandon our sovereignty to Great Britain, the United States and other nations comprising the UNO. I am for freedom of speech.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but may I point out that I am simply developing the reasons why we need a highly technical, highly skilled and highly specialized body of men in charge of the external affairs of this nation. That is obvious, is it not? I am not colliding with the speaker's ruling at all, because I shall say nothing more on that point. But certainly to argue that what I was saying had nothing to do with this bill is to adopt a line of reasoning which I find it impossible to follow.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must again point out that the matter of Canada's trade and consular appointments is in no way related to this bill. They come under a different department entirely. This bill is to amend an existing statute.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And the reason for amending that statute must be found in the burden which is placed on the Department of External Affairs; consequently anything which tends to show how that burden has increased of late years must unquestionably be in order. I am not challenging your ruling, Mr. Speaker. You will take the responsibility for my desisting along this line, but I will contend before any group of people in the future that I am perfectly in order in discussing the very matters that ought to be in the minds of all the members of the house when considering the Department of External Affairs.

There is one more matter which indicates how important it is that we have a full-time minister of external affairs. We need a greater understanding to-day of the fundamental causes of international discord than I believe has ever been had by any nation in the past. We realize that the problems of Palestine, for example, may on very short notice plunge this nation into a war which might endanger our national existence. We have to be kept fully informed upon all matters pertaining to problems of the kind, and we have to have men in our external affairs department who are not burdened with any other matters except these, in order that they may have the mature judgment and the utmost of diplomatic skill to enable Canada to play her part in guaranteeing not only her own security and safety but the security and safety of the rest of mankind.

For these four reasons which I have brought forward I believe we are completely justified in accepting the bill with enthusiasm and without any form of reservation.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): There is an aspect of this bill which I suggest hon. members thus far have overlooked. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has said that the bill has been encouraged by a resolution of his which is on the order paper. Perhaps he forgets that last year, and earlier than that, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did indicate his intention at some future date of bringing in the measure now before the house.

I do not rise at this time to take issue with the bill, but to point out what I think is a very important consideration arising out of its implications. The present Prime Minister of Canada has been minister of external affairs since 1921.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While the government was in office.

Mr. MARTIN: While the government was in office, excluding the years 1930 to 1935. Since 1921, this country has emerged as one of the leading middle powers of the world. A former prime minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, during the first world war, under whom both Canada and the Department of External Affairs entered a new phase, occupied at that important period in the history of the world not only the post of prime minister but that of minister of external affairs. From 1921 to 1930 and from 1930 to the present time, Canada has developed from the position of a self-governing dominion to the full status of an equal and powerful nation among all the other nations of the commonwealth and nations of the world.

One would of course be exaggerating to attribute that remarkable development of our national life as a member in the family of states solely to one man; that I do not propose to do. But the undoubted fact is that the experience, the devotion and the far-sightedness of the present Prime Minister of Canada have made him, as no other man in this country now is, equipped at this particularly difficult period in history to be not only Prime Minister of Canada but to act in the capacity—I trust, for some time to come as minister of external affairs. Reference has been made to the fact by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who graciously acknowledged the great record of achievement of the present leader of the house as Prime Minister and minister of external affairs, that we have in the Department of External Affairs one of the best manned departments in the government of Canada. As he said, at the international gatherings which he has attended and at the four which I have attended, the members of that department hold their own with any corresponding group from any other country. That did not arise simply by chance; it arose because of the determination of the minister in charge of that particular department to see to it that it was manned by the best men and women we could get from Canada into that particular branch of the public service. I believe that in discussing this measure the least we can do, not only on this but as well on the other side of the house, regardless of our political affiliations, is to acknowledge what Canada owes to the present Prime Minister in his capacity of Secretary of State for External Affairs.

It is said that the time has come, not only that we should have a separate minister but that the nomination of that minister should be made forthwith. I would respectfully point out that at the present time the Minister of External Affairs in South Africa is the Right Hon. Jan Smuts, the Prime Minister of that country. The Right Hon. Peter Fraser, as Prime Minister of New Zealand, still represents his country at important international gatherings such as that at San Francisco and at the first general assembly in London of the united nations. In Australia it is true that Mr. Evatt has assumed for the first time the post of minister of external affairs without that post being attached to the office of prime minister. But it is to be noted that within five years Australia has had no less than three different prime ministers, one of whom was quite ill; one on his own admission did not expect to be able to hold the post of prime minister very long, and it may be presumed that in that great country there were special reasons for creating, during one of the critical periods of the war, a separate minister of external affairs. But I would point out to the hon. member for Peel and he will recall that in London, Australia was represented, very ably, by two subsequently appointed resident ministers of the crown, neither of whom holds the portfolio of minister of external affairs in Australia, in the persons of Mr. Makins, a cabinet minister of that commonwealth, and of Mr. Beasley, now the resident minister high commissioner in the United Kingdom.

Mr. GRAYDON: In order to keep the record straight, my hon. friend will agree with me, I think, that there were special domestic conditions in Australia which prevented the foreign minister from attending.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not know what the alleged domestic conditions were. I am simply meeting the argument of my hon. friend by pointing to the fact that Australia was not represented by her prime minister. I do not say this by way of a criticism; presumably Australia had her own reasons, but she was not represented by her minister of external affairs.

But the big and cogent argument with respect to this particular matter is this. The house should not forget that one of the vital issues which in the last federal election we on this side laid before the people of the country was that the present Prime Minister as leader of the Liberal party should be returned because he was the one man in Canada best able to represent us during the period of his prime ministership at current important international conferences. That was one of the main issues in the election.

Mr. SKEY: Not in my riding.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend says, not in his riding, but his riding does not represent the whole of this country. The fact is that we on this side of the house represent for the time being, and perhaps for a longer time than many hon. members believe, the majority of the people of this country. The people decided that, following the most difficult period in the history of the world, following a war involving the most fantastic experiences which man has known in his history, this country wanted to be represented at international gatherings, not by the only man available but by the best man available—the present Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. MERRITT: I should like to ask the minister if he is suggesting that the Prime Minister is the only possible man in the whole of Canada who can satisfactorily represent the country at these gatherings.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. MARTIN: I have just said that the Prime Minister is not the only man available, but he is the best man available.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not questioning the truth of what the minister is saying, but I would ask Your Honour if you can tell in what respect the words the hon. gentleman is uttering now have anything to do with this bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would say the minister is definitely in order. The purpose of the bill is to make it possible to separate the office of Prime Minister and that of Secretary of State for External Affairs, so the remarks are in order.

Mr. POULIOT: He is in order because he speaks of the present incumbent of the post.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I cannot see how it has anything to do with the passing of this bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order; I have given my ruling.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And I am questioning it.

Mr. MARTIN: There is another aspect, Mr. Speaker, which I think the house and the country will not overlook at this time, because this matter is one of tremendous importance. During the war important conferences were held at Quebec and, recently, at Washington. Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt conferred on extremely important matters affecting not only the welfare of the united nations but that of the post-war world. On two occasions these conferences were held at Quebec. The Prime Minister, representing Canada, participated in many of these discussions. To-day he is perhaps the only living man at the head of a government who has had constant contact with these two great world leaders, one of whom is no longer living and the other no longer in power. The Prime Minister of Canada is the only contact of continuity, from one point of view, with respect to many of the matters discussed and decided at those important meetings. More important still was the recent conference at Washington with respect to the important scientific discovery of atomic energy. The present Prime Minister of Canada, conferring as he did with Mr. Truman, the President of the United States, and Mr. Attlee, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, in the light of his discussions at Quebec and in the light of his great experience during the war, being the sole survivor of that trio, undoubtedly was able to contribute immeasurably to the important discussions on atomic energy. And I do not think I am being indiscreet when I say I am sure the present Prime Minister of Great Britain would be the first to acknowledge, as he has said in my presence on two occasions within the past three months, when he said: "It is fortunate for the world that at this time we have at the head of certain governments men of the experience and prestige of the present Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of South Africa."

So at this time I rise not only in respect of a matter that has to do with the welfare of our country and the pursuit of its foreign policy, but to pay tribute to a distinguished member of this house, a great prime minister in war and a great prime minister in peace, and one of the most experienced and mature minds, in the field of international relations, to be found in any country in the world at the present time.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) has spoken very well about the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but I regret to say that in some respects he has stolen my speech. I always listen to him with great pleasure, as I do to the other hon. members who have spoken. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) spoke as a jurist who might be sitting on an international court somewhere in Europe. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke as a good Canadian, and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) made a delightful speech in his own way.

Of course opinions are free. This bill is very short, but it covers a very wide field. It covers the whole external policy of Canada. The question is not so much that of changing the incumbent of the post, though the Prime Minister knows what personal regard and admiration I have for him. The question is whether or not Canada will be what it has been described as being among the nations of the world. We hear the finest speeches about the role of Canada, about Canada being a great nation. I agree with that, but I always disagree with the sordid idea of making Canada in the first place a small nation and afterward making Canada a middle nation or middle power, adding "power" to "middle" to deceive the universe about the real role of Canada. Canada has been minimized by the three big powers who want to control the destinies of the world, but who are unable, unqualified and incompetent to do so. They are only troublemakers who come to secret arrangements on other things, arrangements which they are ashamed to publicize. They are incompetent to stop the evil menace they have started.

Here we are with Canada being described as one of the great nations of the world. I agree that Canada should be a great nation, that it should be considered as such and should be invited to participate when decisions are made. Canada was not elected to the security council; we had to take it for granted that what was decided by the representatives of the three big nations was good for us. "Take that cure; it is good for you, my boy. Take your medicine; it is good for you. Take that spanking; it is good for you. That is good for you. Pay for us; it is good for you. Give to us; it is good for you." We have to receive the prescription for our external policy from other nations, and here we come to the abandonment of part of sovereignity, which means that the Canadian people, those living within this country, will have no complete freedom and no liberty if our country has none. I regret that a gentleman with the intelligence of the former leader of the Social Credit group should deny freedom of speech to the point of being surprised when a member of parliament says he wants this country to be free from England as well as free from the United States.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Surely the hon. member is misrepresenting what I said. I did not deny any freedom of speech; I was denied freedom of speech.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend should not be angry. Hansard speaks for itself, and we will read it to-morrow.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Lethbridge said he did not intend to say—

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not say it; it is not a question of intention.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: —I am sure his statement will be accepted by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: I quite agree with you, sir, that he did not say it, but he did it, which is worse.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is not right at all; I did not deny the hon. member freedom of speech.

Mr. POULIOT: I am glad to have so converted my hon. friend that he agrees with me now, but I must qualify what I have said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order; I understand—

Mr. POULIOT: I have accepted everything the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member for Temiscouata accepts the statement which was recently made by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. POULIOT: Every bit of it. I must qualify what I have said regarding the independence of this country. I do not mean that this country must be independent of the people of Great Britain and of the United States, not at all. What I wish to qualify in my former statement is that in my humble view Canada should be independent of all those who are the official representatives of any other country, France, England, The Netherlands, China and so forth, to make her own decisions regarding our external policy, regarding the relations of Canada with other nations. That is why I find that I cannot subscribe to the united nations organization. Perhaps I am ahead of my time; but when we see the trouble that is existing throughout the world to-day and when we read column after column and page after page of the papers telling us of the intrigues that have been taking place in New York and in all other places where there have been UNO conferences, are we to be governed by those people whom we do not know? I asked the question the other day. If I were in the United States I would favour Governor Dewey of the state of New York and I would vote Republican. If I were in England I would be very much embarrassed to decide between the two main parties, now that the Liberal party is dead in England. In Russia I would not be at liberty to express any opinion. It is these three big countries that rule the world now. It is the labour government in England; it is the democratic party in the United States and it is the government of Soviet Russia joined together. Sometimes they do not agree among themselves in sharing the spoils but they dictate as to what we shall do. I am against it. I believe in the sovereignty of Canada, in the complete and full sovereignty of Canada, just as much as I believe in the freedom and liberty of the Canadian citizen, if one man is ever to be so named officially. I believe in liberty, and I cannot conceive how citizens of any country could be free when the country itself is under the yoke of other nations. This I cannot subscribe to.

We have representatives throughout the world. Here in Canada we are young; we are childish, we are naive; we are credulous; we talk of diplomats. They are just commercial agents. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said it last year or the year before. The high commissioner for Great Britain is only a commercial agent; so are our high commissioners. They come under the Secretary of State for External Affairs. They should be under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have high regard for our high commissioners, especially for one of them whom I know very well. He is a former judge, my old friend, Mr. Justice Davis, high commissioner for Canada in Australia. What has he to do except looking after commercial interests over there? I admit that on certain occasions the high commissioner for Canada to Great Britain has something else to do. He is known as the go-between between the dominion government and His Majesty's government in England. That is a particular case, but all the others are there precisely to promote trade. They are there as consuls de luxe, a little above consuls general.

I said that we are naive. I take the Parliamentary Guide and I look at it. For a long time we had no ambassadors in this country. We had one high commissioner, but no others. We had several consuls. Well, these consuls were given official precedence as follows:

> Ambassadors, foreign ministers and foreign consuls general accredited to Canada, though not provided for in the table of precedence, are given a courtesy precedence, the ambassadors and ministers following immediately after the lieutenant governors of the provinces, and the consuls general immediately after the prime ministers of the provinces. The high commissioner and other representatives of the British commonwealth have been granted precedence immediately after the moderator of the Presbyterian church in Canada.

Sir, the gallery has been cleared of members' friends and relations to make place for the so-called diplomats. There is no one in the gallery facing the chair and very few people in the gallery to your left. These galleries were held in petto for the so-called diplomats and they do not even come to hear the discussions on a bill of this importance. It would have been beneficial to listen not to my remarks, but to those which have been made so ably by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the former leader of the opposition and the other hon gentlemen who have spoken; but the so-called diplomats shine by their absence to-day.

What is the present position of Canada with regard to trade, for instance? As high commissioners' duty is only to look after trade and as they come under the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it is incumbent upon them to be completely independent of the official representatives of any other country, including Great Britain, the United States, and the part of the world to which they are assigned to perform their duty. Their duty is not to promote English trade, United States trade or Chinese trade; their duty is to promote Canadian trade and they should be independent of all these agencies. They should not be under the tutelage of the ambassadors of the United Kingdom, they should be independent of the high commissioners, independent of the consuls of Great Britain. Why? Because if there is the least difficulty respecting trade they must not look after the interests of any other country; they must look first after the interests of Canada. That is my point of view with regard to the usefulness of high commissioners and consuls general. — I think there is only one in the United States at the present time — and all the commercial attaches that we have throughout the world. What can we expect with regard to trade if these gentlemen have to give obedience to any English gentleman who is there, have to report to him or have to seek his advice?

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was perfectly right when he said that we should have a Canadian policy applied to trade. I remember distinctly when a well-known imperialist who was the former member for York-Sunbury, Mr. Hanson, and a former leader of the opposition in this house was sitting here and I said to him that perhaps it was not the time for Canada to be politically independent of the United Kingdom. I said that during the war, but I also said on the same occasion that Canada should be economically independent of Great Britain. I said that if the time ever came to choose between the interest of Great Britain and any other country, France as well as any other, on the one hand and that of Canada on the other, our choice should unquestionably be Canada. I will choose Canada and I shall try to help my fellow-Canadians. That is the byword that should be given to all the men who come under the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Our only hope, our only life-preserver to prevent Canada from falling into bankruptcy is a resumption of our pre-war trade with all the nations of the world, not by way of gift, not by the Santa Claus policy, but by actually receiving payments for what we sell them. That is my point of view; I may be wrong. But I believe that in the event of any discussion, or in the event of a division of opinion, all the men under the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or under the Minister of Trade and Commerce — all those who represent Canadian interests overseas must be one to defend and promote Canadian interests and trade, as well as any other matters.

We hear some say the Prime Minister is a great man. I believe so. I believe his name will be written in golden letters in the annals of Canada as a man who wanted his country to be one of the greatest in the world, a man who has acquired world-wide fame, one of the most able conciliators to be found in diplomatic circles.

I agree with all that. And that is precisely why I was so much disappointed and my heart was so full of sorrow when I thought of the Big Three who were meeting together, and talking so psst, psst, psst—but who did not invite the Prime Minister of Canada, so as to have the benefit of his wisdom and vision and perhaps save the situation.

The right hon. gentleman has the prestige of a quarter of a century or more as Prime Minister of Canada. He has the knowledge of the past, and the knowledge of great men of the past. He knows that, although it may be a matter of regret to all, when he thinks he has performed his duty, he may retire.

But now he is opening the way for the creation of another department. Everybody is enthusiastic for it. Well, I know there are some able men in the cabinet, men for whom I have deep respect. But that is not enough. If we want Canada to be respected through and through by the other nations of the world, then the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs must be considered by the government of this country as the most important in the interests of Canada. The man who will be in charge of that department must have enough prestige to have influence within the cabinet, and to impose Canadian views upon his colleagues when they are about to jump the fence because of sentimentality.

If the Prime Minister made a success of his term as Secretary of State for External Affairs it was precisely because he was Prime Minister of Canada. Without his learning, without his sagacity, without his shrewdness, or his experience, and had he not had the prestige of Prime Minister of a country I consider the greatest in the world, he would not have succeeded half as well.

Therefore we must be cautious. It is not a matter of the Prime Minister's letting anyone get into his shoes as Secretary of State for External Affairs—although I know there are some able ministers. The point is that the next Secretary of State for External Affairs in Canada shall at the same time be the Prime Minister, in spite of this legislation, so that he may control the destinies of this country throughout the world. It will be a hard fight. It will no longer be a matter of conciliation. Rather it will be one of facing interests that are ready to do anything to control the trade of the world, the riches of the world, the natural resources of the world. The Secretary of State for External Affairs will have to watch all those racketeers in international finance who want to control all we have in this country, and all there is in the world. A man will need the highest of all qualities in order to defend our birthright and to protect our interests. He shall not be governed by sentimentality; rather he shall be governed by a word which has been deprecated—he shall be governed by patriotism. For a time everyone would raise his shoulders when patriotism was mentioned, when it was called nationalism. Now the word has changed; it is called isolationism. Am I an isolationist if I want my country to prosper, if I want my country to be the greatest in the world? I am not an isolationist. I am a patriot, and I want Canada to be what she is described to be.

Otherwise let us speak no more about the greatness of Canada. Let us say that we are a colony, but we have no reason to be impressed by our creditors from other nations who come here, look at us from the galleries and say, "Those are the people who make the gifts; how silly they look!" I do not say that they use that expression, but we read that in their eyes.

Let us not be concerned about them. Let us have that dignity that is required of all those who are at the helm of all nations. Let us think of the present time and of the future; let us not be impressed by anyone from outside. Let us think first of the citizens of our own country. Let us think first of our country—and that does not mean that we are unwilling to deal with any other nation. But when we do so, it will be done in the interests of Canada and for the protection of our fellow citizens.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house is to amend the Department of External Affairs Act, which was passed in 1927. The amendment is not as simple as it looks, because there are many principles involved.

While I would speak with great respect about the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and about the hard work he and his officials have done in the department, and while I have respect for his wide experience, I would offer some constructive objections to the proposed policy.

While I cannot speak with authority respecting the policy of this party, and would speak only as a private member, might I say that our policy has been consistent. Notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, the hope of the world is that France and Great Britain will work together.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I do not wish to discuss external affairs at this time, and shall be content only to speak concerning the principle involved in the bill. It must be remembered that the policy of the mother country is to restore France to the great nation she has always been in the past. I hope our friends from Quebec will not forget that.

Speaking back in 1938, and paying tribute to what the Prime Minister had done, I said:

> Under our constitutional practice, however, as the Prime Minister is aware, seeing that he has had a great deal of experience in diplomatic affairs, it is the duty of parliament to inquire into estimates such as those we have before us to-day.

I pointed out that on the government of the day rests the responsibility for the conduct of external affairs, and not on the opposition. We as an opposition should not act as life-preservers for the government because on the government of the day as long as they are the government of the day is the onus and responsibility for the conduct of Canada's external affairs. We are spending on this Department of External Affairs now a total of four and one-third million dollars.

The question arises as to the cause and effect of the proposed amendment. The external affairs policy to-day is totally different from what it was in 1927 when this statute which it is now proposed to amend was passed. After all is said and done, external affairs, as a great textbook writer, Walter Lippmann, said, should be largely a matter of what one might call a chartered accountant's policy by which you strike a balance sheet of assets and liabilities and decide as a country what commitments you have to meet and what you will be able to do with them in the event of war. That is a very good definition.

As I see it, the foreign policy of this country should be based on two principles. It will be remembered that when the proposal to appoint parliamentary assistants was up a couple of years ago I stated that I did not believe in the principle, although I understand it has worked out very well in some departments. I know the Prime Minister has a heavy load to carry in this particular department, and at that time it was suggested that a parliamentary assistant should fill this office instead of a minister of the crown. That policy was adopted with regard to other departments.

I do not think it is in the interest of responsible government that representatives of the opposition parties should be sent abroad on external affairs missions to represent the government. I am not objecting merely to spending money and I always believe it is a good thing for members of parliament to travel. The principle was adopted of sending these deputations abroad a few years ago to the league. First, I think the Secretary of State was a delegate once and now it is continued on foreign affairs. The government of the day must accept responsibility alone for foreign affairs.

There are a great many people in this country who are becoming alarmed at the way our foreign affairs are being conducted. They are comparing the principles which were laid down by the government and by others before this war with those being laid down to-day. In 1938 I suggested to the Prime Minister of the day that he should avail himself of the facilities of the radio, and I believe he did that a little later on. On March 24, 1938, I proposed that to the Prime Minister and, as I say, that practice was carried out during the war. If that had been done in connection with external affairs I do not think there would be the criticism there has been. I suggest to the Prime Minister that there should be an empire conference of the dominions on cooperation and coordination if this amendment is passed. This has been suggested for many years and it is the only way of settling these problems. That should be done instead of sending abroad these deputations to which I have referred. There should be a meeting of the dominions to lay down a common, after the war, empire policy. As has been said by President Poincaire of France, we are the hardest country in the world with which to make a treaty, as Britain always spoke with so many divergent views.

I object to the amendment because the Department of External Affairs of to-day is not the same as the department that was set up under the act of 1927. It has been expanded, and we are assuming responsibility which it was never intended the department should take under responsible government. I have looked into this matter for a long time. We are a country of only 10,500,000 people and we are spending $4,300,000 on this particular department. When I see the deviations which have been made from the statute of 1927 in our foreign policy I become alarmed and many thoughtful people are becoming alarmed over what is going to happen to our policy.

In conclusion, I wish to say that a great many thoughtful people believe that this work could be carried out by a parliamentary assistant. Are we to have a foreign minister like the old country? I have referred to the fact that all Britain's foreign ministers were trained men, and also their permanent officials on diplomacy, such as Spring-Rice and Lindsay at Washington. If the Prime Minister wants this particular bill to pass, all very well and good, but I suggest that the province of Ontario should receive some consideration for such a new minister, especially the Toronto district, which has not had a cabinet minister since the present government came into office, and even long before that.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word before second reading is given. First of all, may I say that my reason for introducing this bill has been to further not only the wishes of many hon. gentlemen opposite but my own wishes as well. I think I have made it clear from time to time that I was not over-anxious to carry the extra burdens of the Department of External Affairs in addition to those of the Prime Minister. I certainly would not be carrying both portfolios at the present time if it were not that the questions which are uppermost in this and other countries to-day are for the most part international questions which call for as much in the way of experience and knowledge as it is possible for one to command, and also for the fact that the two departments, the department of the Prime Minister and that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been so interlocked for the past thirty or forty years that the separation of those two departments at a given moment is not something that can be very readily brought about.

Let me say a word first in regard to the latter point. I know that hon. gentlemen are anxious to know why it is, being desirous of being relieved of certain burdens, one has not found it possible to find that relief up to the present time. In that connection I have to explain the position of the Prime Minister when he comes into office as contrasted with that of other ministers of the crown. As hon. gentlemen know, when a minister other than the Prime Minister assumes a portfolio he goes into a department of state which is already thoroughly organized and has been organized for years past. His department has a deputy head; it has a secretary; it has its various branches; it has its staff of civil servants who know all the aspects of the work of the department and who possess the accumulated knowledge and information of which the department has become the repository over many years.

When the Prime Minister assumes offices he enters what to all intents and purposes is an all but completely empty office. If he is fortunate enough to have had them, he takes with him one or two secretaries who have served him in his capacity as leader of the opposition if he comes into office after having been the leader of the opposition. Otherwise he has no officers whatever in his department until he has had an opportunity to organize the Prime Minister's office. He has no deputy head; he has no secretary of his department as such; he has no leading officials as such. There may be a few stenographers and typists and possibly a few members of the service who have had to do with the filing of communications. He has to ask himself immediately whether those particular officials who have been serving political opponents are the ones whom he wishes to have continue in the office with him having regard to all the intimate affairs of government with which the Prime Minister finds he is confronted. I am happy to say that I have found that it was not necessary to change these members of the service to any extent, and one of the reasons is that they have been so few in number.

The one criticism of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) with regard to this present step was that it was not taken two or three years ago. If the measure is to be criticized for coming so late, my criticism would be that it did not come many years ago, and in particular that it did not come at the time when his leader, the then Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, was prime minister of Canada and also secretary of state for external affairs. I am wholly right, I believe, when I say that when Lord Bennett became prime minister he had previously entertained the view that it would be desirable to separate the two offices, but he had been in office for only a very short time before he expressed quite frankly the view that it would not be wise to separate the two offices. He found that the Department of External Affairs was in many important particulars concerned with the work that the Prime Minister's office would have to undertake in connection with very many of the questions that came up, and throughout the five years that he was in office he continued to hold the two positions. If those positions had been separated during the term of Mr. Bennett's prime ministership of this country it would have meant that we would have had a separate minister of external affairs in 1935. I mention 1935 as a significant date because in the years immediately following, as all hon. members know, the question of foreign relations became a matter of grave concern not only for a secretary of state for external affairs but very much a matter of deep concern to the prime minister. Those were the years when we were approaching the possibility of war in Europe, and it fell to my lot to have the administration of both positions at that time. I should have found it perilous and indeed impossible to have separated those two positions at that particular time, and had they been separated I am sure I am quite right when I say that once we came to the period of the war, it would have been almost imperative for the Prime Minister to hold the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs as well as the office of Prime Minister. There would otherwise have been duplication of the work all the way through with resulting confusion. Through the period of the war the work of the two departments became necessarily more intertwined than ever. May I say to hon. members of the house that so far as the Prime Minister's office to-day is concerned nearly all the officials on whom he relies in the Prime Minister's office have been seconded to that office from the Department of External Affairs. It has been necessary to have experienced officials. Experienced officials, with like qualifications, were not to be found in any other department of government or outside the government service. More than that, let me say in passing, there can be no better field of training for the officials of the Department of External Affairs than the Prime Minister's office. I think it is very desirable, when these departments are separated, as I hope they will be before very long, that some members of the Department of External Affairs should continue to serve in the Prime Minister's office and to obtain, while there, all the knowledge they possibly can on questions that are all-important in government. It is the best school of training for the young men and women who are to be entrusted with the larger responsibility, of later filling great positions and representing our country in other lands.

And so it is that if these offices were separated immediately a good deal of care would have to be exercised in untwining the threads that have formed so complete a strand uniting the two offices. If it were not for that difficulty I can assure hon. members that the severance would have been made some considerable time before this. As an illustration of how much this is the case I might mention that at the present time, so far as the Prime Minister's office is concerned, all the accounting of that office and practically all its business administration is managed from the Department of External Affairs and has been so managed since 1912.

I would remind hon. members that when the act creating the Department of External Affairs was introduced by Sir Robert Borden in 1912, it provided:

The member of the King's Privy Council for Canada holding the recognized position of First Minister shall be the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and in this act he is hereunder referred to as "the minister."

Sir Robert Borden did not insert that clause without having very strong and good reasons at the time for so doing, and as I have pointed out, Lord Bennett, when he was prime minister, allowed that clause to remain in the act, having the very best of reasons for feeling it was essential that the Department of External Affairs should be so closely united with the Prime Minister's office. As I have just said, I have found, particularly through the years of war, and, indeed, in no less degree since, that it was imperative that the Prime Minister should have the closest possible contact with the officials of the external affairs department, thus bringing him in immediate touch, as he only could come in immediate touch, with those who were representing Canada in all the different countries in which we have missions, and also all who were representing Canada at important international gatherings.

I pause for a moment to refer hon. members to the estimates as they have been presented to this house for the present year. Hon. members will see in a moment to what an extent much of the business that would otherwise have to be separately provided for in the Prime Minister's estimates is to-day provided for in the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. In this year's estimates for 1946-47 there is provided for the Prime Minister's office a total of $78,073, and for the Department of External Affairs, $2,436,325. That speaks for itself of the extent to which these two departments have become interlocked, and that over a period of thirty-four years. I want the house to understand this very clearly because some people may think that I am desirous of holding on to more in the way of administration than in fact I desire to do. A main reason, I wish to repeat, why a complete division of the two departments had not been made before this is that it will involve, when finally made, a very considerable readjustment of what will have to be provided in connection with the Prime Minister's office and also changes of importance in the Department of External Affairs as well.

I appreciate the solicitude of hon. gentlemen opposite for my health and strength and all the rest of it that on occasions they have been kind enough to express. But I take all that with a grain of salt. I must say, I ask myself, just why do they want me out of this office? If I were not of some value to the country as head of the Department of External Affairs, I am certain they would be glad to see me stay there, and they would not be asking me to retire as quickly as possible. As I say, I question a little what some of them, at least, may have in mind, but I agree with them that as soon as matters can be properly arranged with due regard to the public interest, it is desirable that the two departments should be separated.

But I come then to the question of whether at this particular moment it is best to make that change. The first step is being taken now. It is a wholly necessary step in that we are removing what up to this time has been at the instance of parliament a bar to anyone other than the Prime Minister holding that office. I am hopeful that very shortly another step may be taken, though I cannot at the moment say just how soon. That, I know, is the main question in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, how soon are we going to get this man out of that particular position? I wish I could satisfy my hon. friend, the member for Peel on that, but he will just have to wait and see in regard to that, as to much else. May I remind my hon. friend, when he undertakes to tell me what should be done in the Department of External Affairs, that I have had experience in that department which runs nearly to twenty years. Such experience as he has had in international affairs has resulted, I think, from my own act in appointing him as a delegate to the United Nations conference on international organization at San Francisco, also a member of the Canadian delegation to the preparatory commission of the united nations, and still later as an alternate delegate of the first session of the general assembly of the united nations. I am glad to see that he has profited somewhat by that experience. But let me tell him that twenty years experience with international affairs is worth a great deal more than one year, or a few months, and that if he had had a little wider experience I think he might have been somewhat more cautious in suggesting that the changes he proposes should be made at this particular moment.

I ask myself this question: with what countries has Canada very important relations at the present time? First of all there are our relations with the United Kingdom and other parts of the British commonwealth; there are our relations with the United States, with France, with China, and with Russia. This house knows that the problems we have in all these relationships have not grown up in the last few days, or weeks, or years; they have come into being over the years, and with respect to them, wide knowledge and information is a very great asset in reaching highly important decisions. The movement of international affairs is so rapid in these days that unless one has some of the direct knowledge of the background out of which these situations have sprung it would be next to impossible with respect to many of them to make with any sense of security the decisions which are essential if the proper steps are to be taken. I shall give but one example of what I mean. I ask the house this question: supposing I were to resign to-morrow the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs, what would the reaction be in Russia to that resignation? Would it be represented that I still commanded the confidence of the parliament and people of Canada in international affairs, or would it be represented that, having taken the position which I have taken in the interests of this country, this House of Commons and the people of Canada hold a very different view with respect to the manner in which I have discharged my responsibilities? That is something which has not occurred to my hon. friend. But I tell him that considerations of the kind in international relations are vital in reaching decisions as to what particular moment it is best for changes to be made.

Reference has been made, very kindly, on the part of my colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to what it may mean at some international gatherings at this time to have the experience of such a person — such a great leader—as Jan Smuts, who holds the position of Minister of External Affairs as well as Prime Minister and whose influence at these gatherings arises out of the great part which he has taken in international affairs over the years. It is not for me to say whether or not a new minister of external affairs coming into office to-morrow would be able, in the critical situations which have to be dealt with at some of the international gatherings which are to take place this year, to render, perhaps, the same service to Canada as one who has known at first hand the international situation as it has grown up over the years. As has been referred to this afternoon I have had —and I am very proud of it, and I believe it is an asset of national value—a very close and intimate association with both Mr. Churchill when he was Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and with the late President Roosevelt of the United States. Very few men living to-day know what was in the minds of these men when certain decisions were made, as well as I do myself; and of some of these decisions, may I say, I think I have of those who are in office to-day, an almost exclusive knowledge. I say this in no boasting spirit but I know the value of authority in some things when one is speaking at international gatherings, and I know also the value of personal acquaintance and friendship with leading men in different parts of the world, and of having had what grows out of such an intimate association in years like those of the recent past.

I want to say this to my hon. friends opposite: I am prepared to accept from them as much in the way of advice as they may wish to tender and to consider it very carefully. But there is one group of gentlemen to whose advice and counsel and opinion I must give even more attention than to theirs, and that is, the colleagues who sit with me in the government, and the hon. members who through many years have been my loyal supporters in this House of Commons. When it comes to the matter of the responsibility of government for foreign affairs in times like the present one's colleagues have to be consulted, their views taken into consideration and their wishes considered as well as one's own. I have not found among my colleagues thus far a desire that I should give up this particular post at this particular time, nor have I found that wish among members of my party.

After all, it is our responsibility to govern. Having been sent here for that purpose, having been sent here, as the Secretary of State, without possibility of any contradiction, said, by the Canadian people because they believed that this particular government was best qualified to deal with external affairs at a time which was very critical in the world, that responsibility is something which in fact I have to recognize in my obligation to the people of Canada.

I say these things that hon. members may realize that it is not all just as easy to bring about a change as they themselves may think. I am anxious to lighten the load in as many directions as I can. Thank God, I have around me ministers who are taking more of it from my shoulders day by day. It might appear that I am carrying a great deal of the load. I have to take the responsibility for what is said and done, but if hon. members will notice how matters related to external affairs have been dealt with in considerable part by one minister after the other they will realize that the burden of the Department of External Affairs is not wholly on the shoulders of any one man, but is shared by a large part of the ministry.

That I say simply to clear up what my hon. friend seems most concerned about, namely as to when I am to get out of this particular position. May I say what I have in mind is that I know hon. members are very anxious to discuss external affairs at an early stage of the session; also that they are anxious to have the estimates of the Department of External Affairs referred at any stage to the committee on external affairs. I had thought that if it suited the convenience of the house I might try to bring forward the debate on external affairs within another fortnight, and as soon as the house had passed an item, refer the estimates at once to a committee, where they might be gone into thoroughly. But I must say to my hon. friend that I do not think it would be in his interests, in the interests of this house or in the interests of this country for me to attempt within the next few weeks to have one of my colleagues appointed as Secretary of State for External Affairs and put upon his shoulders the responsibility of conducting the first discussion and the main discussion we shall have on external affairs. I must take that responsibility myself. I hope it may be the last time I shall have to assume it.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. GRAYDON: In speaking on second reading I believe I made mention of the draftsmanship of this clause. Has the Prime Minister given consideration to that? If I may say so, I think it is important.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been giving consideration to it. There may be some technical advantage in further amending the act respecting the Department of External Affairs, but I really think what is now proposed is quite sufficient, for the reason that the original bill itself provided for a Secretary of State for External Affairs. Section 2 of that bill is as follows:

> There shall be a department of the government of Canada to be called the Department of External Affairs, over which the Secretary of State for External Affairs shall preside.

That makes provision for a secretary of state to preside over a Department of External Affairs. Then the Salaries Act provides:

> These salaries of the following ministers, members of the King's privy council for Canada, shall be as follows, that is to say:
> The Secretary of State for External Affairs, $10,000.

So that $10,000 is voted for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the act defines him as a minister. It seems to me, therefore, that all that is necessary to meet the situation to which my hon. friend has referred is fully covered. The act makes provision for the department; it makes provision for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be at the head of the department; another act defines him as a minister; and wherever the word "minister" is referred to in this act the minister would be the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I might just ask a question, because I heard this comment, I understand that the salary provision becomes operative only if a separate minister is appointed for the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right. The salary has been there for the last two years. I made the suggestion that it should be included a couple of years ago, hoping someone other than myself would get it; it will be there when a new minister is appointed.

Mr. FULTON: With due respect to what the right hon. Prime Minister has said I might point out one further matter. That is, while I appreciate his statement, it is normal in an act setting up a department to provide for the appointment of a minister who shall preside over that department; and as the act would now stand no such provision is made. So that I would ask, for instance, under what authority would the Secretary of State for External Affairs be appointed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The act says:

> There shall be a department of the government of Canada to be called the Department of External Affairs, over which the Secretary of State for External Affairs shall preside.

I am afraid I do not quite catch my hon. friend's objection. Does he feel that this is not enough?

Mr. FULTON: It is a matter of statutory form, if you wish. I am merely pointing out that the clause says, "over which the secretary of state shall preside," but still we have no provision for the appointment of a Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is normal to provide that the minister shall be appointed under the great seal, and shall hold office, and so on, and I merely point out that there is this exception. It is a small matter, but we have asked if the Prime Minister would be willing to introduce an amendment. I should think that in order to bring this act into conformity with other acts setting up departments he might well consent to that request.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I might have gone meticulously into this matter were it not that the act respecting the Department of External Affairs needs very considerable overhauling, and I should hope that would be one of the first steps to be taken once there is a separation of the two departments. The officers of the Department of External Affairs have drawn my attention to the fact that they feel it would be preferable to wait until we revised the entire act rather than attempt to make any unnecessary changes at this time.

I drafted a section after the hon. member for Peel spoke. I do not know whether this might meet the situation. It is that section 2, which I have just read, be amended by the insertion of the words "a minister of the crown to be known as" after the words "over which" in line 3, and the words "and hereafter referred to as the minister" after the words "external affairs" in line 3. The section would then read:

There shall be a department of the government of Canada to be called the Department of External Affairs, over which a minister of the crown to be known as the Secretary of State for External Affairs and hereafter referred to as "the minister" shall preside.

If that is acceptable to my hon. friends opposite I would be happy to have it moved.

Mr. McIVOR: If the Prime Minister still occupies the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs there will be no extra expense. If a new minister is appointed the only extra expense will be his salary?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no; there will be much more extra expense. As I have said, the minute the office of Prime Minister is separated from the office of external affairs, there will have to be an enlargement to a considerable extent of the machinery in that office. For example, to-day there is no accounting branch in the office of the Prime Minister; all that is done in the Department of External Affairs. There is no provision for a staff for the Prime Minister. The staff of the Prime Minister for the most part are members of the Department of External Affairs who are seconded to the Prime Minister's office. There are other changes which do not come to mind at the moment but which are far-reaching. If there had been time to work out that division quickly within the last few months I would have been only too happy to do so, but I think it will take some short time to have it properly worked out.

Mr. McIVOR: I asked that question because some of us are asking for a reduction in the income tax on salaries of married folk and an exemption of $2,000. If we are putting it on one way and trying to take it off another it does not seem logical.

Mr. GRAYDON: In connection with the proposed amendment may I say to the Prime Minister that it does not quite meet what we had in mind. It is perhaps not as strong as we should like to have it, but it does meet the point in that it does provide for a minister of the crown. Second, it does make a reference to the minister, and is applicable to the remaining parts of the sections, which is, I think, rather difficult from the draftsman's point of view.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I beg leave to move that Section 2 of the Department of External Affairs Act shall be amended by the insertion of the words "a minister of the crown to be known as" after the words "over which" in line 3 and the words "and hereafter referred to as the minister" after the words "external affairs" in line 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 1 agreed to.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens.

He said: Since I propose to make a fairly extended statement may I now ask the indulgence of the house to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

WILD LIFE

PROVISION FOR APRIL 10 AS JACK MINER NATIONAL WILD LIFE DAY

The house resumed from Thursday, March 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacNicol for the second reading of bill No. 2, respecting the Jack Miner National Wild Life Day.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the second reading of bill No. 2, respecting Jack Miner national wild life day, has created an incident which is not only unusual but, I think, unique in the annals of this house. We are asked to commemorate the life of a citizen, and with it to identify him with his life's work.

The speeches which have so far been heard are a worthy tribute to one who, in his lifetime, became known far and wide, and especially on this continent, for his great and valuable contribution to the knowledge of wild bird life. He began his life's work under circumstances very adverse, and sometimes under the sneering comment of his contemporaries which might have daunted a lesser man, but which only served to prove the indomitable spirit of this remarkable man.

It was given to few men, as it was given to Jack Miner, to receive in his lifetime the acclaim not only of those on this continent, but of those of many foreign lands. He exhibited the truth of that old and true saying, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business; he shall stand before kings."

Jack Miner in his life did stand among kings—kings of industry, political life and of every field of activity known to our civilization. But, above all, he stood a peer among his fellowmen—the common man. With it all he exhibited a robust Christianity which endeared him to those who believe in humanity and the eternal verities.

Full of years and his task showing promise of a prominence which his family are now endeavouring to consolidate, Jack Miner passed on, leaving his heritage to his immediate family, who are carrying on as he desired and as he would wish.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has told the house that there is a foundation called the Jack Miner foundation, which is carried on by the members of his family, and which is subject to the scrutiny of any who may wish to investigate. The hon. member for Davenport, because of his respect and admiration for Jack Miner, has brought this bill before the house. He was privileged to call Jack Miner his friend, and by this bill he has shown his desire to perpetuate that friendship and admiration in the form of the bill we are now discussing.

It is evident from the expressions from all sides of the house that the hon. member for Davenport has considerable support; and I am sure that as a recognition of the merits of Jack Miner, that support is universal on every side of the house. I should like to add that what I shall now say is not in opposition to or in any way to detract from the eminence of this great Canadian and great Christian gentleman. However, I should like the house to consider some angles of the bill which come to my mind.

The house will recall that last session I indicated, when my estimates were before the committee, and when the sum of $2,500 was being asked as a grant to the Jack Miner foundation, that I had received many letters from hon. members on all sides of the house asking that the grant be restored to the amount at which it had formerly stood, namely $5,000. I stated at that time that when making up my estimates again I would endeavour to place the amount at $5,000, as before. I am now happy to say that I have been able to do so, and that hon. members will find in the estimates that the grant for the Jack Miner foundation is restored to its original sum of $5,000.

I am sure the house will agree that that estimate should pass, without discussion. Sometimes I think of the story of the old Quaker who was accosted by a friend who, in turn, was commiserating the condition of another friend. The old Quaker said, "Well, show us your sympathy", and he pulled out a pound note, saying, "There is the extent of my sympathy."

Perhaps the expression of the house in the grant of $5,000 is that form of expression which will be duly appreciated by those who will receive it. It may be that this bill, which is unusual and the first of its kind, would raise questions in the minds of hon. members as to the precedent about to be created. I do not know where we should stop, whether we should commemorate the life of any citizen in Canada in any field of activity. Shall we do so in the political field? If so, I can well understand that some hon. members might wish to commemorate the life of Sir John A. Macdonald, the father of Confederation, and whom, now that the partisan politics with which he was connected have passed away, we now view only as a great Canadian. If there were a suggestion to commemorate his life I am sure there are many Liberals on this side of the house who would recognize in Sir John A Macdonald not only a Conservative leader, but a leader of the Canadian people. I should imagine any suggestion of the kind I have mentioned would receive the acclaim of the country.

Then we might have a day set apart to commemorate the life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, because, as hon. members will recall, he came into office as Prime Minister at a time when unity within the country was very much needed. We had not passed far from colonial days and he was faced with a task which might have daunted any lesser man. I think any fair-minded Canadian will agree, however, that the efforts made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, while he was Prime Minister of this country, tended to consolidate the nation to a point where he could visualize a united Canada. I am sure that Conservatives or others throughout the country would recognize his worth as they recognize the worth of Sir John A.

Macdonald. They were leaders of Canada, and it might be fitting, in some minds, to have a day commemorating their memory.

Then, while we are still in the political field, there is Sir Robert Borden. Sir Robert Borden did noble work during the last war, as every one will recognize. But in my judgment he did still greater work when he became one of the proponents of the Statute of Westminster which consolidated Canada as an autonomous nation. These men in the political field have passed away, and I can understand that in the days to come there may be a day set aside to commemorate their memory.

I would expect also that many would like to set a day aside to commemorate the present leader of the House of Commons and Prime Minister of Canada. I know the day will come when party strife has left the minds of men and they will look only to the great events and achievements of his life and recognize fully, as with these others that I have mentioned, that he is one of the leaders of Canada, one of the makers of Canada. It may be that in the days to come there may also be set apart a day for Mackenzie King.

Leaving the political field, I have in mind one outstanding citizen of this country who has also passed away, namely, Doctor Saunders, the man who brought into being Marquis wheat. I know of no greater contribution that any citizen of this country could make than that of Doctor Saunders who brought into being our Marquis wheat. That wheat revolutionized farming in western Canada; it gave stability to the economy of our country. Only recently there has been evolved another wheat with qualities even greater than wheats that preceded it and they all stemmed from that product which he evolved, namely, Marquis wheat. If one is to consider a field of endeavour such as that of Doctor Saunders, one covering the whole of Canada, one having an effect upon all our lives, then it should be proper that he also should have a day of commemoration set apart such as is now being asked for in this bill for Jack Miner.

I have another great Canadian in mind, Doctor Banting, that great physician who evolved insulin. The effects of insulin are not only national, they are international. He devoted his life to the work of evolving that great medicine. In the pursuance of his profession and in an effort to assist in the war effort he lost his life on the shores of Newfoundland. One might also say that a day should be set aside to commemorate Doctor Banting because he was a benefactor of all mankind and was a citizen of Canada.

[Mr. Glen.]

Recently I had an invitation to address the prospectors' and developers' association in Toronto. About one thousand men and women were gathered together there. I was asked to give these prospectors and developers an address, but before doing so I met the president of the association, Mrs. Viola McMillan, and she asked me to speak about and further, if necessary, the setting up of a miners' day in Canada. I felt then as I feel now that an innovation of that kind should not come from me. I thought that while it was a proper thing to have a miners' day for Canada in order that the people of this country may have an opportunity to gather in all the information they can about the development of our land, that suggestion should not come from me. The world looks upon Canada as the last great mining field on this continent and these people feel that something should be done to propagate and to extend their activities.

I felt that it was not something that I could give official sanction to, however I might feel as an individual. However, they had decided already that they were going to have a miners' day. They proposed to take the initiative and do the spade work to bring it into being. They set up a fund and many of those present contributed. I was impressed by a most colorful character who was there, whom many hon. members know, Jack Hammil, who there and then gave his cheque for $500 to help carry on an educational programme among these prospectors and developers and also throughout the provinces. These people will lay the foundation whereby miners' day might become identified with that industry and create interest in it which would be of value to the industry.

I notice that the explanatory notes to the bill state:

> The purpose of this bill is to create public interest in the wild life of Canada and educate Canadians in the value thereof by setting aside a day when school teachers can stress in schools bird life, humane education, conservation, a day to judge bird-house contests . . .

The word "education" is brought into this, and it struck me that this bill should not be brought before this House of Commons at this time. My feeling is that the timing is not good. If there is a desire throughout Canada to have such a day, then it seems to me there ought to be some preparatory work done before such a bill is presented here. After all, we represent the dominion; we do not represent the provinces as provinces. The matter of education is wholly within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, and it might seem somewhat impertinent for the House of Commons to distinguish a day which would be related to the educational systems of the provinces when, indeed, they might be desirous of commemorating some of their own citizens. I would not be surprised if some of the provinces might desire that one or more of their eminent men should be commemorated in a form which this bill suggests.

At all events, my feeling is that this matter should not be brought before the House of Commons at this time. Communication should be entered into with the provinces to see what their viewpoint is. We are dealing with the provinces in the dominion-provincial conference, and it seems to me that we should not bring before them something which we propose to merge into their educational system and curricula without at least giving them an opportunity to say whether or not they desire it.

I did not wish to speak at any length upon this bill. I wish to make a suggestion to my hon. friend the member for Davenport, and I do so with some degree of timidity. He has proposed this bill with a desire to commemorate his friend and the friend of many in this house. During the discussion on this bill many hon. members have acclaimed the work of Jack Miner and of the foundation which now exists. I think the hon. member has done his duty, and he should now consider whether or not this is the proper time to bring a bill such as this before the house without some effort being made to find out the reaction of the provinces toward such a bill.

With the high regard that I have for the hon. member for Davenport I do not like to appear as being opposed to anything he may wish, but I would suggest to him that some communication should be had with the provinces and their points of view obtained. If, later on, the consensus is that the life of any citizen should be commemorated in this unique manner, then it might be brought before the house again. If the hon. member desires I shall be glad to assist him in obtaining expressions from the provinces of their points of view with regard to the bill.

I am hoping the hon. member will take this suggestion as a helpful one. I know he would wish to have, not only the acclaim of this House of Commons but the acclaim of all the provincial legislatures in Canada for the work done by Jack Miner. When that day comes, then he could again introduce a bill which would give effect to that desire.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to see the hon. member's bill killed by the minister in this way. I would suggest to the minister that during the recess this bill should go either to the committee on natural resources, mines and all that or be considered by the select committee considering Indian affairs, or taken up in the recess with the provinces and municipalities.

There is a principle to consider in connection with this bill. Our countryside is perhaps one of the most beautiful in the world, and yet I have heard many tourists complain of its reckless destruction, and anything which the government can do to prevent this destruction will help to preserve a natural asset for years to come. Our roads are also another great asset, although it is true that more people have been killed on the great roads, at level crossings and elsewhere, than were killed in the great war. Roads help to open up a country. The great lake Muskoka district is a beautiful one; yet it, like others, is being wiped out by the wilful destruction of the countryside. Nothing has contributed more to the education of the people than the motor car.

There is some merit to this bill which is sponsored by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who always adds a great deal of light to any discussion in which he takes part.

The Hamilton-Dundas highway runs through one of the most beautiful market-garden districts in Ontario; yet I never saw such destruction of the countryside, the wild flowers, the birds, in my life, and many visiting people have expressed the same view. I hope that the minister will consider these suggestions and that during the recess some of the officials will take up this question with the provinces and municipalities and get some action.

We remember Cowper in "The Task" when he speaks of the beauty of the old English countryside and says:

> I would not enter on my list of friends
> (Though graced with polish'd manners and fine sense, > Yet wanting sensibility), the man
> Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm.

And again he attacks the pleasures of the chase:

> Detested sport that feeds on another's pain.

He describes the need of care of the countryside and the bird life of England.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for his remarks and for his suggestion that I withdraw the bill now and allow the government to confer with the provinces in connection with the matter he mentioned, namely, the educational matter, and then I can reintroduce a similar bill next year. I do not know why I should refuse to accept his suggestion, but before doing so I should like to express my warm appreciation of the addresses of all hon. members who have spoken in favour of the bill. All of them have been unanimously in favour of it, including the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown), the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and in particular perhaps, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), and I know that had the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) been here before the minister spoke, he, too, would have supported the bill. I quite realize that after the minister has spoken the government supporters have to take back what they said and support the minister. I do not blame them for that because it is likely that I would do so myself if I were over there. In order to have government in this country it is the duty of party followers to be loyal, and I have never objected to that.

I am sure that what has been said in this debate will be helpful to the foundation. I am concerned that Canada recognize the great achievement of the late Jack Miner. The minister has mentioned a number of other distinguished naturalists and all that he has said of them is true. But their achievements were quite different from those of Jack Miner in this regard, that his life was associated with the service he performed through children, and the main purpose of a bill such as this would be to educate the children. I am sure that teachers would welcome an hour or more on a Friday afternoon to teach children the importance of conservation of wild life. The bill was never intended to establish a holiday or anything like that but was patterned after the bills in the United States where many states have wild life day, and there is also a national wild life day. But no other country has had such a character as the late Jack Miner to hang a bill on, so to speak. What other conservationist did work at all comparable with that done by Jack Miner? None that I know of, though all the men mentioned by the minister were great men.

I do not think I need say any more. I shall withdraw the bill and next year reintroduce another bill on the understanding, as the minister indicated, that in the meantime the government will inquire from the provinces if they have any objection. I do not see why they should have. I am sure they would welcome his inquiries. I cannot conceive of any province not desiring to teach children to conserve wild life. Think of all the insectivorous birds and what a wonderful job they do for Canada and any other country, but how many children know their names or indeed anything about them? Not many. I remember, as a boy going to school, reading a poem by the late Lord Tennyson, the first verse of which ran something like this:

> I come from haunts of coot and hern,
> I make a sudden sally,
> And sparkle out among the fern,
> To bicker down a valley.

I remember that as a child one of the first things I wanted to know was, what was a hern? There are two spellings for it, "hern" and "heron"; the poet uses "hern", which may be poetic licence. I wanted to know what a heron was and what a coot was. This kind of thing is educational. I cannot conceive of any educational body not being intensely interested in the opportunity to allow children to be instructed in wild life conservation, to know something about waterfowl, to understand the habits of geese and ducks. It is an interesting study and should be welcomed by boards of education. In the United States the national wild life association of Washington sends out large quantities of literature which are very popular with boards of education throughout the country.

As I said the other day, the Jack Miner foundation is one in which this country will have a part after the present members of the family pass on, because new managers are to be named by the Prime Minister of Canada, the President of the United States, and the treasurer of the foundation. So that we are part of it. The foundation had planned, if the bill had passed, to follow the plan of the national wild life association in the United States. That is all to the good. It would be better here if our national wild life association were not a government association. I do not believe that a government could do as well as the wild life association does in the United States or as the foundation could do here, because of the intense interest of those associated with it to make it a great success and to inculcate the principles of conservation in the minds of youth. I have had letters from various bodies, including sportsmen's and tourists' associations wanting to cooperate. That is all to the good.

However, there is not much use in my prolonging the matter any further at the moment. I accept the minister's undertaking to consult the provinces, and I withdraw the bill. I hope next year it will receive the unanimous support of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) shall have leave to withdraw his bill?

Bill withdrawn.

RAILWAY ACT

POWER TO PROHIBIT SOUND SIGNALS AT CROSSINGS IN OR NEAR CITIES AND TOWNS

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel) moved the second reading of bill No. 3, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the consent and the direction of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) to proceed with the motion for the second reading of bill No. 3, and I desire at this time to make some observations relative to the legislation proposed. I do so with some pleasure because it is a matter to which both the hon. member for York West and myself have during the past year given close study and careful attention. His constituency and mine adjoin, and in so far as the train whistling problem is concerned which is involved in this amendment to the Railway Act, both of us find our constituents in the same unfortunate and embarrassing dilemma. I should like in the unavoidable absence of the hon. member for York West to pay tribute to the industrious way in which he has pursued the matter in the interests of his constituents, and which has reflected upon my constituents in a very favourable way as well.

The question involved is an amendment to the Railway Act. The notes on the bill itself are, of course, partly explanatory of the purposes and intent and purport of the bill. Roughly speaking, larger places—cities, for instance, and towns—have the right, where railways pass through their midst, to pass a by-law prohibiting the blowing of train whistles within the boundary limits of those municipalities. So far so good. The difficulty which now is arising in many suburban parts is that these suburbs have grown up and their population has increased so that, while they may still only qualify as townships and villages, the frequency of train whistling, with the ever-increasing population, has presented an embarrassing nuisance problem to the residents. I know best, perhaps, the problem of the Lake Shore area between Toronto and Hamilton, because part of that area is in the constituency of Peel which I have the honour to represent. Take, for instance, the township of Etobicoke, very close to the city of Toronto; the township of York, the village of Long Branch, the township of Toronto and the village of Port Credit, and so on. All along that line of railway are found to-day heavily populated areas, and still some of those municipalities have not the right under the Railway Act to regulate the whistling nuisance which is caused by the tremendous number of trains going to and fro each day.

I take the liberty of detaining the house for a moment to indicate the extent of the problem and how serious it is to the residents. A man named George S. Warner, of the township of Etobicoke, in the constituency represented by the hon. member for York West, took the trouble last fall, by staying awake until the early hours of the morning and making a survey, to ascertain the extent of the nuisance. I shall not go over all the details which appear in a report over his signature, but he speaks of one situation near his own home. He says:

> There are six level crossings in my area in less than one mile in a closely congested area of approximately 9,000 people. From 7 in the evening until 7 in the morning thirty trains blow four shrieking blasts for each crossing.

Or, as he refers to it, a "terrible total of 700 sleep-disturbing whistles every night." In connection with that, the medical officer of health for that township and the principal of the large collegiate there, as well as many others who are interested in the matter, have asked the hon. member for York West to bring this matter to the attention of the house. One of the newspapers in my own riding, the Port Credit Weekly, conducted a campaign last fall against the whistling nuisance in the Port Credit area. I have here on my desk only a few of the many hundreds of ballots or coupons which were sent to me, indicating that no small amount of interest has been taken in this problem in that area.

The hon. member for York West and I went to the board of transport commissioners for some relief from our problem. Last fall I received from the board a long report indicating that many people in my constituency had been interviewed and the problem had been gone into very fully, but there seemed to be what on the farm we used to speak of as a nigger in the woodpile, and in this legislation we are trying to get the nigger out of the woodpile; that is the purpose of the amendment. I think the need of this amendment will become apparent when I read a paragraph of the report of the board of transport commissioners. This is what the secretary of that board said in a letter to me:

Mr. W. K. Rogers, assistant superintendent, Canadian National Railways, stated that train movements per twenty-four hours were as high as 134. On a basis of four blasts for each crossing, of which there are two in the village of Port Credit, this would total 1,072 per day or 53 per hour.

He goes on to say that on two particular days the train movements totalled 91 and 96, but these were admittedly light days. Then this is the point I wish to bring particularly to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). The report from the secretary of the board goes on:

It must appear fairly obvious from the above, that the complaints on file are well founded. It was pointed out to them that theirs was a problem that would be difficult to solve, inasmuch as the railways were but carrying out the requirements of the law, which law makes no provision for a township or a village taking advantage of section 308 of the Railway Act.

So that both the hon. member for York West and myself, in following this avenue of approach in an attempt to solve this problem, found ourselves up against a stone wall in the act as it stands at present, particularly section 308. At this point, if I may, I should like to indicate to the minister just what section 308 of the Railway Act actually says. This is the section, without any proposed amendment:

When any train is approaching a highway crossing at rail level the engine whistle shall be sounded at least eighty rods before reaching such crossing, and the bell shall be rung continuously from the time of the sounding of the whistle until the engine has crossed such highway.

2. Where a municipal by-law—

This is the further point involved.

—of a city or town prohibits such sounding of the whistle or such ringing of the bell in respect of any such crossing or crossings within the limits of such city or town, such by-law shall, if approved by an order of the board, to the extent of such prohibition relieve the company and its employees from the duty imposed by this section.

Therefore the purport and intent of the amendment moved by the hon. member for York West is to enlarge the jurisdiction and power of municipalities which do not qualify as either cities or towns but are known as villages or townships, with large populations in suburban areas, or close by or contiguous to large centres of population, giving them the same privilege and power given to a town or city to pass a by-law in the hope that upon submission to the board of transport commissioners it may receive approval and result in having the train whistling abated.

I do not wish to go on too long with this matter, because it seems to me this is a very simple, yet a very important and urgent sort of amendment. But I should like to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that what is suggested in this legislation must, I think, be regarded as a move toward the abatement of this nuisance within the limits of public safety. And public safety is paramount. I think that must be said, because, after all, the railways to-day, no matter how much they may cooperate in an attempt to abate the nuisance on their own, by virtue of this section of the Railway Act still find that if they do not blow the whistle or ring the bell they may be in a serious position in case of accident.

I should like to deal with one further point before I sit down. Of course I believe this bill goes a long way toward solving an important problem; but in these congested areas I think the time is coming and in many instances has already arrived when the whole question of grade separation must be dealt with intelligently and effectively. I know that in some of the very instances cited the ultimate solution of the problem may well be grade separation. So that I would suggest to the minister that when this bill is given second reading and sent to the apropriate committee, some consideration might be given to some changes in the phraseology of the bill itself so that it will not be restricted in its scope only to municipalities which immediately adjoin large cities or populated areas which at present have power to pass by-laws of the kind to which I have just referred. I am anxious that this important point be considered by the committee. I hope I may have an opportunity to appear before that committee, even though I may not be a member of it, because I should like to see the township of Toronto and the village of Port Credit, in which I am particularly interested, given an opportunity of coming within any amended legislation. Therefore I hope that will be made clear in the bill when it finally emerges from the committee stage.

I ask for the support and sympathy of the house in connection with this power which, it seems to me, should be given to municipalities which find themselves in such an embarrassing and awkward position as I have just outlined. I also commend this amendment to the Minister of Transport, whose courtesy is so well known in matters of this kind and who, as time goes on, I am quite sure will feel as I do with respect to the merits of the bill.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does not the hon. member think everything would be solved if we adopted the rule they have in the United States? They eliminate whistling altogether, but they have a rule which says, "Stop, look and listen," rather than "Look and listen" as we have it in Canada. Then we would save thousands of lives every year; then your little children could sleep with their heads pillowed on their hands, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, it is not only in the townships that this nuisance of whistles and bells has been created; it applies equally in the cities and towns. As far as I can see, the only solution of this problem is the electrification of all railways in the Toronto district within a radius of thirty miles of the city. Surely that could be done, with the large amounts the two railway companies are receiving to-day. After all, the Canadian National made most of its money in the province of Ontario, and I think the time has come when the steam railways should do something about the electrification of their systems in the vicinity of Toronto, as they have done in the Montreal area.

The Railway Act provides for equality of treatment. I support the principle of the bill because I know something about it. Under section 275 of the Railway Act the board of transport commissioners is required of its own volition to go out and see these things. As the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said about another department, they should not be just a commission sitting in swivel chairs. They are supposed to go out into the highways and byways and see what is going on and carry on an inspection.

There have been a large number of complaints along the lake-shore road and the Dundas highway and in other parts of the constituency of York West. I remember the time when the city of Toronto bought up all the light, power and electric railway franchises in the two counties of York and Ontario in order to transport the people by cheap fares.

Another section of the Railway Act which has to do with commutation tickets has been violated. Oakville and Brampton have them. That section has not been carried out. In my opinion the board of railway commissioners are empowered to act. They hear applications with regard to these whistle matters, and they do not do anything about it. The board of railway commissioners does not function in the way it should and in the way it did when the late Mr. Justice Mabee was appointed chairman of the commission. As I see it, something has to be done about the electrification of railways in the Toronto district. Take the Don valley in the constituency which I represent and also in that of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman). When I first bought a house in North Rosedale and lived there for eighteen years the ringing of bells, the sounding of whistles and the shunting all day and night were something that one could hardly imagine. I never heard anything like it in my life. It went on all night long. Complaints were made to the railway commission and applications were made by the township and city, but nothing was done about the matter. The only solution of this problem that I see is for the board of railway commissioners to act on its own volition. It has the power under the Railway Act. Why do they have to wait for an application to be made by a private citizen or a municipality? They have certain functions to perform. In New York state they are compelled to act. If our board of railway commissioners fulfilled their functions we would not have matters like this coming before the house. The Canadian National Railways should do something about the Toronto district. They have plenty of money to build a tunnel in Montreal costing $25 million. Surely they could afford to electrify their system and use the new diesel type of engines they have. There is no reason why something should not be done. I urge that this bill be passed because there is a great deal of force in it.

I call the attention of the house to the last three lines in the bill. I remember an accident a few years ago which happened on the Brown's line, I think it was, near the home of Monsignor O'Leary on Brown's line below Dundas street. In that accident three or four schoolteachers were crossing a railway crossing in a car. There was a good view for half a mile, nothing but farm lands around. The whistle was blowing, but they did not see the train and three or four people lost their lives. The house will note that the last three lines of this bill relieve the company from any liability or penalty under the section in case of an accident. Therefore an individual will have no action for damages if a person is killed on a level crossing in this district. If that should happen the railway company can plead not guilty by statute. If a person were injured he would have no action for damages in a civil court. Let us not, when we are considering this bill, forget the huge loss of life that takes place at these level crossings in Canada.

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): The only changes I can see in this railway bill is that it gives the townships and villages the same rights as a city or town to pass a by-law with respect to whistling and ringing of railway bells in their communities. In the town in which I live two main lines, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, run through it. On these two main lines seventy trains travel up and down every day, and there are five level crossings in the town. There are no automatic signals on at any of these crossings. We are in this position. If we appeal to the board of railways commissioners to have the whistling stopped and it is granted and there is a fatal accident the town council is blamed for passing such a by-law. In the town of Port Hope there is a hospital a short distance from these two tracks and the Trinity college school, which is a boarding school. Both institutions are greatly disturbed. I have had several letters from residents of this town asking that something be done to have the blowing of the whistles stopped in the town. If the town passes a by-law to stop the whistling and someone is killed the council is blamed. If we do not do this, then we have to put up with the whistling nuisance. Therefore we are between the devil and the deep blue sea.

In the last few years we have had nine deaths at these crossings. Although I am in favour of having the nuisance done away with by applying to the board of transport commissioners, yet I feel the government should take steps to instal automatic signals on every level crossing in the country. I understand that this can be done by applying to the board. But the municipality must stand the greater part of the cost of installing these signals. As the house knows, the only income available to the municipalities is the tax they levy on small properties and the dog tax, yet they are asked to bear the greater cost of installing these signals. The nuisance is so great that one man said to me, with seventy trains passing through this town every night, whistling and blowing four times each, by the time he jumped out of bed seventy times and back in again, it got on his nerves to such an extent that he did not get any sleep. If the installation of a signal will save a human life, surely it should be done. I ask the government to consider bearing a greater share of the cost of installing these automatic signals, and that they be installed on every level crossing in the country.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): In moving second reading of this bill may I state at the outset I believe this measure parallels the development of Canada as a nation. The bill arises from the fact of pride, common pride, in the achievements of our country, based upon the great exploits of our people. I would suggest that it symbolizes our aspirations as a nation for the future. When I spoke to the house on first reading last October I concluded with these words—and I beg the indulgence of the house to repeat them to-night:

> For the national unity of Canada and for the future and greatness of this country it is felt to be of the utmost importance that all of us, new Canadians or old, have a consciousness of a common purpose and common interests as Canadians; that all of us be able to say with pride and say with meaning: "I am a Canadian citizen."

That, sir, in a general way, sets out the main objective of the bill. But the bill seeks to do more than that. As I shall endeavour to show, it seeks to avoid many complexities and confusions which arise from existing legislation. For some time now, indeed for many years, it has been felt in the country and in the house that the time has arrived when ambiguities arising out of the Naturalization Act—both the act before 1914, and the one of 1914—the Canadian Nationals Act, and the Immigration Act, should be treated in such a way as to provide an unambiguous definition of the status of Canadian citizenship.

It may be of interest to note that in 1931 the then Secretary of State, the Hon. C. H. Cahan, felt exactly as I do with regard to the necessity of removing the anomalies in existing legislation. He felt, as I feel, that the time had come when Canada, having matured into full nationhood, should give her people the right of being able to designate themselves Canadian citizens. In these words he expressed his views:

> I think we have reached the stage in the policy of our national life that we should seriously consider the foundations for its future development. For sixty-four years we have had a very satisfactory material development. We have been promoting great national works, grafting out new provinces, providing organized governments for the great Northwest Territories and I think we have succeeded far beyond the expectations of the fathers of confederation in the material and commercial development of Canada. In connection with that development, however, if we are to assume the status of a nation within the British commonwealth, we must also assume very serious duties and responsibilities. Among the responsibilities resting upon the parliament of Canada is that of framing a clear definition of "Canadian nationals" for whom the government and parliament are responsible, whether they are resident in the dominion or temporarily resident outside of our territorial jurisdiction. So long as they retain the status of Canadian national, they should, in my opinion, be treated as such and as holding a status within the dominion equal to that which any others individually enjoy.

That was the view of a diligent secretary of state, who sought to put before the parliament of that day, not in the details of the present bill, but following its main principle, the measure to which I am now asking the house to give second reading. That bill was proceeded with to the stage of second reading, but for some reason or another not made fully known at the time, the then secretary of state advised the house that he was not proceeding with the bill. But that his convictions had not been disturbed, in spite of the decision not to proceed, is noted in the observations he made later in this house in 1937, when he used these words:

> I repeat that sometimes I fear we have more of the colonial spirit of inferiority than even our fathers and grandfathers had and certainly the time has come in the history of this dominion when, if we seek to ascertain who are Canadians and who are Canadian nationals, we should be able to find it in some substantive enactment outside of the Immigration Act, the real purpose and intent of which is to exclude certain classes of people from obtaining domicile in Canada. Why we should be compelled to look to that act for a definition of who are Canadians, who are Canadian nationals, I cannot understand. I think it is a discreditable condition in which we find ourselves to-day.

So, Mr. Speaker, I say it is a discreditable position in which we find ourselves as a nation among the nations of the world to-day not to be able clearly to address one another with the full sanction of the law and for all purposes as citizens of our own country.

Under this bill we are seeking to establish clearly a basic and definite Canadian citizenship which will be the fundamental status upon which the rights and privileges of Canadians will depend. We hope at the same time to remove a great many anomalies and difficulties which exist under present legislation, as I have noted, and which have not only been irksome and troublesome to the country and its people, but occasioned real hardship to persons who have had the misfortune to be caught in them.

Under the present Canadian Nationals Act, which was passed in 1921, on introduction by the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty, the purpose was to meet certain commitments this country had made as a member of the league of nations, and also to permit our taking advantage of possible nomination to membership in the International Court of Justice. That was the only purpose—the very limited purpose of the Canadian Nationals Act—so that we could say, for the purposes of that act, having in mind its immediate objective, that there was such a thing as a Canadian national.

But the definition of Canadian citizenship in that act was a definition by reference. The only unrelated and existing definition of Canadian citizenship is to be found in the Immigration Act. The Canadian Nationals Act defines a Canadian citizen as one who comes within the meaning of the definition of the Immigration Act.

There are few countries in the world who define their citizenship within the clauses of an immigration act. Even the definition within the Immigration Act is a limited one. It is a definition of citizenship only for the purposes of that act, namely for the purposes of immigration.

The Naturalization Act, passed in this house in 1914, which sought to provide for the application of extra-territorial powers to give to naturalized British subjects in Canada the right to have that designation not only in Canada but throughout the world, followed earlier acts which came into being shortly after 1867. But because of the difficulties, the great injustices, the natural pride and urge of every Canadian, the time has come, and I think unmistakenly, if I can judge by reactions of public opinion throughout this country since the introduction of the bill, when not only those on whose shoulders rested the primary responsibility of representing Canada on the fields of battle during the late war, but all Canadians generally, proud of their country, have reached the stage where, in the form of a legal enactment, they want an undoubted right to be able to call themselves Canadian citizens, the right to be able to say when they cross the border that they are citizens of Canada, the right to be given a passport on which the words "Canadian citizen" will appear. They want the right, in other words, which is recognized by every country, and every government in every country with respect to its own people.

I would point out that under the present legislation, the three acts I have mentioned, the wife of a Canadian citizen, or a person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of his birth, would be entitled to receive a Canadian passport, even if it was perfectly clear that the applicant did not possess Canadian citizenship under the Immigration Act. There is also the problem of the prohibited immigrant to Canada.

The curious picture is thus presented of a person who cannot enter Canada under the Immigration Act being entitled to receive a Canadian passport which requests assistance and protection for him in foreign countries. This is but one of many like instances that could be recited of the confusion which now exists and which by this bill we have made an honest and complete attempt to remedy.

Generally speaking, by this bill we are seeking to make the status of Canadian citizenship the paramount national status of persons who are Canadians. I find in the administration of my department considerable difficulty in connection with administering certain acts such as the Copyright Act and the Patent Act, largely because of the indefiniteness and, in many instances, the absolute lack of a legal basis for determining nationality, or citizenship as I prefer to call it.

Further, in other departments of government there is great difficulty of administration in connection with matters arising out of the treaty of Versailles and out of the early reparations treaty. I suspect that if this bill is not made law we shall have difficulty in dealing with some subsequent reparations agreement that will arise as a result of the war from which we have just emerged.

Considering the question of convenience and the recognition of our status as a growing nation, I submit that I need not labour the great need, urgency and desirability of having this measure passed. As I said, other departments of government are interested in the matter. For instance, the Department of External Affairs has a vital interest in the determination of status because it is concerned with the issuing of passports and with the diplomatic protection of Canadians and Canadian interests abroad. I am told that this is made exceedingly difficult by reason of the lack of any national status test. Neither the Canadian Nationals Act nor the Naturalization Act nor the Immigration Act afford any satisfactory way out as far as this matter is concerned.

Then, again, that department is concerned with the maintenance of understandings which exist with other members of the British commonwealth concerning nationality questions and with general international problems and arrangements concerning the protection of Canadians and Canadian interests in enemy and enemy occupied countries. The present legislation does not furnish any adequate test of personal status for this purpose. That department is also concerned with the definition and position of Canadians and Canadian interests in treaty negotiations; with the problems of deportation, both coming and going; with the problems that arise out of naturalization and the requirements of the revocation of naturalization certificates; with the need of establishment by proper legislation of a status which would determine the right of a person to regard himself as a Canadian and of documentary evidence which would enable an individual to claim such a position.

This measure in its present form will meet the difficulties I have enumerated in the case of the Department of External Affairs, as well as meet some of the problems that I have mentioned in the administration of the Department of the Secretary of State. When the bill is passed it will mean that a Canadian citizen will be entitled as a Canadian citizen to receive a Canadian passport, to enter Canada, to be deported to Canada under circumstances in which deportation is required under existing principles of international law, to receive diplomatic protection, to enjoy full political and economic rights within Canada and to own a Canadian ship or part of a ship.

Hon. members may find it rather unusual that these six enumerated benefits, among others, will follow from the passage of this bill. The fact is that there are constant administrative difficulties with regard to these six minimum requirements of nationality in the department of immigration, the Department of External Affairs and the Department of the Secretary of State.

The measure before the house is not without its complications. I may say frankly that the bill in its present form represents a great deal of effort and study on the part of the officials of four departments of government, the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Justice, the Department of Immigration and the Department of the Secretary of State.

My colleague, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), authorizes me to say that when this measure becomes law it will be followed by an amendment to the Immigration Act which will remove from section 2 of that act the only real definition, although for a limited purpose, of Canadian citizenship that is to be found. As I said at the outset, it will be remembered that the definition of a Canadian national in the Canadian Nationals Act is a definition by reference.

This measure is one that has behind it no political purpose. I think it is one that will commend itself to the consideration of all hon. members. When we come to the committee stage I shall welcome any suggestions which may be made to improve the draftsmanship, if that be found possible, or even the content of the bill in order to make the measure as nearly efficient as it is humanly possible to make it.

One thing we hope to do, following the passage of this measure, is to provide a more effective and impressive ceremony of admission into the Canadian family. Our citizenship is made up not only of people born in this country and of people who acquired domicile as British subjects under the Immigration Act, but of many thousands of new Canadians living in all parts of our country who have come from other lands and who have made a notable contribution to the development of Canada. There are people who came from many parts of central Europe and who are now living and working as Canadians on our farms and in our factories. Many of those people came here without being able to speak the two languages of the country and without being accustomed to its traditions. Most of them have rendered notable service to Canada. We should not lose the opportunity of impressing ourselves and reminding them that just as we are glad to welcome them to our shores, now that they are here they should enjoy with us the full measure of partnership in the Canadian community.

There will be others who will come after this bill has passed and who in the years ahead will add to our numbers and share our traditions and aspirations. Many hon. members have expressed themselves on this subject, notably the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). We are convinced of the desirability of emulating the form of ceremony which characterizes the admission of persons into United States citizenship. An attempt is made to impress upon potential United States citizens the nature of the undertaking as well as to indicate the opportunities and the privileges and the responsibilities of a United States citizen.

It may be that in Canada for some reason or another ceremonies of admission here and there in the country have been a little more perfunctory than we would have liked to have them, and it is our determination under the statutory provisions of this bill to frame regulations that will make these ceremonies more than an ordinary procedure, and one of a memorable character.

Many hon. members belong to service clubs, and the ritual of attendance and admission into these clubs oftentimes is so impressive as to place in the candidate's mind an indelible impression of the nature of the obligation assumed. But there is no finer club in the world so far as we are concerned than the club that I would characterize as the Canadian family. We should want, therefore, to impress upon new Canadians whom we shall welcome and want to share in our national endeavours that they are joining no mean society but a society that will give them freedom and an opportunity perhaps that they have not had in other lands, and at the same time to point out to them the nature of the obligation undertaken and tell them something of the kind of country and the kind of general political basis of the Canadian society itself.

I have endeavoured since becoming Secretary of State to perfect the machinery of these ceremonies to the extent that time and the law allowed. I have gone myself to a number of these ceremonies. I went a few months ago to the city of Toronto, where perhaps these ceremonies are performed in as fitting a manner as one will find in any part of the country. There His Honour Judge Parker, the senior county court judge, who for a number of years has taken a great interest in these matters, has had ceremonies which I know have made a deep impression upon every new Canadian who has obtained Canadian naturalization in that city and through the avenue of that particular judge. I have gone to these ceremonies and to others, not because my personal presence is of any account but because as minister of the crown, speaking in the name of the government and the people of Canada, I have found it useful to invite and to welcome these new Canadians to our national family. I believe that if we pursue this approach to the matter we shall do a great deal to make these new Canadians more valuable citizens who will the more readily appreciate the great opportunity which under our law we hope we shall be able to give them.

I wish to pay a tribute to-night to such organizations as the Daughters of the Empire, to Canadian and service clubs, to Mr. Justice Dysart of Winnipeg, to His Honour Judge Gordon of Windsor, men and organizations who have in a very special manner contributed greatly to the kind of work which I think will be found to be a very valuable ancillary feature to the bill now before the house.

In the new Citizenship branch, which has been transferred to the Secretary of State from the Minister of National War Services, an opportunity is given of dealing effectively and more fully not only with foreign language newspapers but with new Canadian groups. We hope to be able to use, as I shall show when we come to a detailed discussion of the bill, this new Citizenship branch as a means of furthering the kind of suggestions which were made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and others when speaking in this house two or three years ago.

The bill is not in its essence a difficult one, even though some of the clauses may require more than ordinary attention. It will be of assistance to non. members to note that out of the 47 sections of the bill 18 are virtually reenactments of existing sections and 17 are new. What we are dealing with is really a comprehensive revision of the Naturalization Act done in such a way as to produce a status of Canadian citizenship that will be sufficiently inclusive to serve as a basic definition for immigration and for all general purposes and that will eliminate the need for subordinate definitions.

Hon. members will have observed from an examination of the bill that it is divided into seven parts, in addition to three preliminary sections and two concluding schedules. The three preliminary sections form what is really an interpretative portion containing the definitions necessary for the proper drafting of the substantive parts.

It has been a long-standing source of irritation to many Canadians to be told on occasion, in reply to a question as to their national status, that there is no such thing as a Canadian and that some other national status has to be declared. In this bill we now provide that so far as any questions coming within the competence of the Canadian government are concerned the answer "Canadian citizen" in reply to an inquiry as to national status shall be sufficient. So far as national status is concerned the description "Canadian citizen" will hereafter be sufficient.

Part I of the bill deals with natural-born Canadian citizens. The first section of this part attempts to set forth that persons now in being are immediately to have the status of Canadian citizens as of right of birth. The people who will be natural-born Canadian citizens are of two classes, those who are born in Canada or on a Canadian ship, and those who were born to Canadian parents outside Canada before the passing of the act, except of course for such of these persons as may have become aliens before the act comes into effect. There are refinements in the bill, but on a broad generalization those are the categories of people now in being who will be natural-born Canadian citizens immediately.

The second thing done in part I is to define what persons born after the act comes into force shall be natural-born Canadian citizens. In general, the provisions here for persons born before the act are similar to those to which I have referred and do not differ greatly from the definitions of a natural-born British subject that are now contained in the Naturalization Act. The principal difference is this, that in future all Canadian children born abroad will have to be registered within two years either at a diplomatic, consular or trade commissioner's office or in Ottawa. Hitherto registrations have not been necessary in all cases of children born abroad who have acquired the status provided for in existing legislation. There is, I believe, good reason for this. There is a slightly greater strictness in the new bill. Hereafter Canadian children born abroad will as Canadian citizens have the right of entry into Canada. They have never had this before. In giving this important right it is felt necessary to have some record and some form of evidence that will serve for immigration purposes. Children born in Canada will in all cases have birth certificates. In a parallel manner we are requiring the registration of children born abroad, in order that there may be a basic record to establish their rights as Canadian citizens.

Apart from registration there is nothing that is essentially new or different in part 1. The relevant provisions concerning foundlings and children born after the death of their father fill in gaps that exist in existing legislation.

Part II of the bill deals with the second broad division of Canadian citizens, those who were not born to citizenship but acquire it at a later stage. There are two cases to provide for: the people who are to be Canadian citizens at once because of action taken before the passage of this act; and those who may become Canadian citizens hereafter. Provision is made to cover persons other than natural-born Canadian citizens who are to be Canadian citizens immediately upon the coming into force of the act. This section I will frankly state has been a particularly difficult one to draft. It was revised repeatedly in successive drafts of the bill. The present section is somewhat altered from the form in which it was presented in the bill introduced in this house last October by way of first reading. I think the section now says what we wanted it to say. The broad intention is to provide that the people who have been naturalized in Canada hitherto, non-Canadian British subjects who have resided in Canada for five years or more, and non-Canadian women who married Canadians and have come to live in Canada, shall become Canadian citizens immediately. This matter has been thought over and discussed carefully, and I think the definitions will cover all those who should be Canadian citizens at once, and no others.

The second portion of part II provides for future acquisition of Canadian citizenship through naturalization. The qualifications for future naturalization are almost exactly the same as those now in force, except that only one year of residence, rather than five, will be required of persons who served out of Canada in our armed forces during time of war. Actually, because the time that a man has served in the armed forces of Canada is to be taken as a period of residence in Canada, this will mean that men in the armed forces will in fact not have to spend any prior time in Canada before being admitted into Canadian citizenship, on the theory that if a man is prepared to fight for this country there should be no hesitation in granting him what we can grant by way of labelling him a citizen of this country.

Although it is not set forth in the Naturalization Act, but only in the regulations, we have since 1943, required "a declaration of intention" to become naturalized to be made before actual naturalization is applied for. This declaration has to be made at least one year and not more than five years before naturalization takes place. As the house will recall, essentially the same requirement is made in the United States. In future, under the bill now before the house, such declaration will be necessary for aliens who wish to become naturalized in Canada, but not for the wives or husbands of Canadians or from non-Canadian British subjects. With regard to the other naturalization requirements, a certain relaxation is provided in that twenty years' residence may substitute for a knowledge of French or English.

I will frankly say to the house at this stage why that provision was put in there. It came to my attention not very long ago that a man who had lived in this country, in the province of Saskatchewan, for thirty-two years had for reasons best known to himself not been able to acquire the slightest kind of proficiency in either of the two official languages of this country, and under the act the judge was precluded from granting him the right to receive a certificate of naturalization. It later developed that this particular person had sent two sons to fight in the armed forces of Canada; one of these sons had won the Distinguished Flying Cross and the other gave his life for Canada. I felt, and I hope the house will agree with me, that that kind of person is entitled to Canadian citizenship. This provision will enable the naturalization of many people, especially in western Canada, who have proved to be good citizen material but who have not for one reason or another learned to speak French or English.

On the other hand, there is a slightly greater strictness in the new qualifications in the bill in requiring a knowledge "of the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship." Coming into the Canadian family is, of course, a great honour, but it entails certain obligations; and we hope in an objective manner, without trying to coerce, merely to lay before these new Canadian citizens the recognized facts of the Canadian scene, to lay before them through properly prepared material, prepared perhaps by non-governmental organizations who have the sanction of educational authorities, historians and so on, facts which will inform them not only of the opportunities and the privileges which they will acquire as future Canadian citizens, but of the obligations, for we cannot emphasize too much that along with privileges go obligations in citizenship. As one reads the report of the judges who sit on these applications for naturalization, one of the salutary things to note is that in so many instances, in fact the vast majority, there seems to be a recognition of the duties which these new citizens have to acquire. I attended recently a ceremony in Toronto when thirty-two persons were admitted into Canadian "citizenship" under the existing legislation, and I use the word "citizenship" here in quotation marks because it is not a correct statement of the legal situation. One of these new citizens wrote to me afterwards stating that he wanted to do something to show his appreciation of the kind of country to which he had been admitted. Both his mother and his father, though civilians, had been slaughtered by the nazis. He had come to this country in 1933, had returned in 1935 for two years, and came back at the end of that time. He was so impressed with the opportunities of this country that he wanted to tell the government and the people of his appreciation; and what could he do? I told him that it would be very difficult for me to suggest, other than that I trusted he would live up to the obligations entailed in being a good citizen of this country. I am pleased to state that that man showed his appreciation of the work of Judge Parker and the attempts that were being made by the naturalization branch, by giving to one of our universities, only Saturday last, the sum of $35,000 to be used by a particular university in encouraging and disseminating desirable information about Canadian life and the great opportunities which this country affords.

With regard to the other naturalization requirements, as I say, the relaxation consists in giving a knowledge of these responsibilities as well as these privileges. Apart from these minor points the general naturalization requirements remain unchanged.

There are, however, two points affecting particular categories of people I should like to deal with now. Heretofore British subjects became Canadian citizens for purposes of the Immigration Act only after five years' residence. The residence period remains unchanged, in the new bill, but for the purposes of evidence, to provide a prima facie proof of citizenship, papers will hereafter be supplied, and this, I think, will be an advantage. It will mean that once they are in possession of their papers there will be no further doubt as to their right of entry into Canada, their right to Canadian diplomatic protection, and their right to the general privileges of citizenship in Canada.

The second group of people affected by the change in this part are future non-Canadian wives of Canadian citizens. Hitherto the general principle has been that a woman marrying a British subject thereby became a British subject. There are some advantages in this method of approach, but it is a formula based on the old idea that a married woman lost her legal personality in that of her husband. Married women have been hitherto classed as persons "under a disability" for purposes of naturalization in all British countries. However, married women have been removed from the disabled class in this bill and have been given control of their national status. In keeping with this, it has been necessary to delete the old provisions for automatic change of national status upon marriage. If women are to have control of their national status there must be nothing automatic about it; it must be a matter of discretion. Nevertheless, while that as a principle is desirable, it is undesirable that non-Canadian women who marry Canadians should have to wait five years before acquiring Canadian citizenship. To meet the point it has been provided that women who marry Canadians may become citizens after only one year's residence. This, I think, will impose no hardship on anyone, yet will establish the principle of full control of national status by married women.

The only other portion of part II of the bill to which I think I need refer at this time is the provision with regard to the rehearing of naturalization proceedings in certain cases. Under the Naturalization Act now in force it is open to the Secretary of State at his absolute discretion to grant or refuse a certificate of naturalization even though the court may have approved the case and decided that a certificate should be granted. I feel, however, that this is too wide a discretion for the minister to exercise. Consequently, the specific provision for discretion has been deleted, and instead provision has been made for rehearing in cases where it seems doubtful whether the applicant properly should be given a certificate of naturalization, or where there appears to have been some omission in the hearing; and the decision of the court on the rehearing will be final.

Part III of the bill deals with the loss of Canadian citizenship. In general, there are now and will be in future two types of loss of citizenship: loss by any citizen after the acquisition of a foreign nationality, and loss of the citizenship of naturalized persons under prescribed conditions. The provisions with regard to loss upon the acquisition of a foreign nationality have not been substantially changed from those now in effect. The principal change is that in future Canadian women will not automatically lose Canadian citizenship upon marrying an alien and acqiring his nationality. In accordance with the general principle of giving women an equal position they will be allowed a discretion as to whether or not they wish to give up their Canadian citizenship.

With regard to the remainder of this part, in my statement of October 22 I referred to the new provisions for automatic loss of citizenship by naturalized persons who stay abroad for six years or more and do not protect their citizenship. As I mentioned at that time, this provision does not apply to naturalized persons who have served in the armed forces of Canada. In addition, the six years do not run during absence as a representative of the Canadian government or a Canadian firm, or for other specified purposes.

The provisions for revocation of certificates of citizenship are virtually unchanged from those now in effect. The remainder of this part of the bill consists of ancillary provisions which, while new in form in some cases, bring in no new principles.

I come now to part IV of the bill, which deals with the rights and obligations of naturalized Canadian citizens, and represents no change from the present situation. Sections 26 and 28 are complementary and provide for the continuation of the common status of British subjects that has always prevailed through the commonwealth. Another provision provides that Canadian citizens are British subjects, while another provision provides that subjects or citizens of another part of the commonwealth, who are considered to be British subjects under the law of that part, shall be recognized as British subjects in Canada. In effect, what these provisions do is precisely what has been done hitherto in a slightly different manner under the Naturalization Act, to perpetuate the common status, although for Canadian purposes the basic national status is to be that of Canadian citizen.

Parts V and VI of the bill need little reference, as they involve no change of any consequence from existing legislation. Part V deals with the status of aliens precisely as it has always been dealt with, and part VI deals with matters of procedure and evidence.

In part VII there are a number of general provisions. One section concerns the power to make regulations to carry out the purposes of the act, and is virtually an unaltered reenactment of an old section in the present Naturalization Act. One of the sections in the new bill, as I have already mentioned, preserves the status that anyone has already acquired under existing legislation. This is really a form of insurance to make certain that no one who has now any rights or status in Canada will suffer by the coming into force of this act. It is provided that the act is to come into force "upon a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council." The reason for this is that the new act will operate successfully only with some correlated amendments in the Immigration Act, and when these have been made the act will be proclaimed.

The bill concludes with two schedules, one giving a list of countries for the purposes of the interpretation section and the other the form of the "oath of allegiance." Both schedules are in the present Naturalization Act but in a slightly different form. Hitherto the first schedule has been a "list of dominions." It was drawn up in 1914 and never changed. We have now brought this list up to date in point of time and constitutional theory by referring rather to "countries in the British commonwealth." As far as the second schedule is concerned a change is made by adding to the oath of allegiance the following words:

> . . . and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

When it is Canadian status that is being given to a new citizen upon naturalization it would be absurd, it is submitted, to have in the oath no reference whatever to Canada. I think the additions to the oath are highly desirable in every particular.

This summary, Mr. Speaker, I think may be of some assistance in explaining what the bill seeks to do. I believe the bill, complicated and necessarily so in regard to some of its provisions, does meet as far as may be humanly possible the hundreds of different situations that arise out of the status of citizenship; out of the acquisition of nationality by birth, by blood relationship or by any one of the many combinations which may create, in one form or another, the legal status of nationality, here as well as in other countries.

The main purposes of the bill, however, apart altogether from these necessary mechanical details, is seen in the important part Canada has taken as a nation among the nations of the world, an important part far beyond what the numbers of her population alone would merit. We have, in two wars, borne our full and serious responsibilities for the preservation of peace and civilization. In two wars, our fighting men have brought glory to Canada. Now with half the world in ruins, with starvation and chaos besetting the countries of Europe that were once the seat of power and influence, the responsibilities of this country are greater than ever before. For a young nation, Canada has done great things and Canadians have derived a growing national pride from what Canada has accomplished. We feel that we have great things in common; that we can afford to hold our heads high and be proud of the fact that we are Canadians. And it is time we know what a Canadian is.

Some may say that this is an invitation to nationalism. a regression to that selfish introversion that has brought war and chaos to the world. I do not agree for a moment. It is not consciousness of community and of national bonds that is dangerous, but the perversion and exaggeration of that consciousness. There has been too little, not too much, national pride in this country. We are part of a great commonwealth that has been an example to the world. We hope for much from the new united nations organization, in which we will play our full and active part. Our gaze is turning more and more outward, and in carrying out our responsibilities in the new world we shall be better fitted to do our part if we have an essential feeling of internal unity and oneness. That is why, sir, I think it is important to give greater emphasis to the fact that we are all Canadians.

In the best sense, the Canadian citizenship bill is an act of faith in ourselves and in our country. Recently the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to the respect Canada has achieved in the eyes of other nations, and in the debate this afternoon this was further emphasized. But the respect of others, no matter how great, means little unless we have respect for ourselves and for our nationhood.

I feel that this bill is an important one, and that it represents a great step forward. If there is one thing from which we in Canada have suffered, to the detriment of this magnificent country, it is from a feeling of divisiveness—lack of that fervent and urgent unity that can make a people work together as a great community with conviction that the welfare of all is the goal of their effort. It is not enough to be a good "Bluenose" or a good Ontarian or a good Albertan. Sectional differences and sectional interests must be overcome if we are to do our best for Canada. The only way this can be done is through encouraging a feeling of legitimate Canadianism. No matter where we come from or what our origins, French, English, Scandinavian, Scottish, Ukrainian, Irish or whatever else, one thing at least we can all be, and that is Canadians.

Citizenship means more than the right to vote; more than the right to hold and transfer property; more than the right to move freely under the protection of the state: citizenship is the right to full partnership in the fortunes and in the future of this nation.

With this bill we are linking our past with our future. We are saying to history and to our posterity: Here is the definition of Canadianism. Here is the common status in Canada, a common stake in the welfare of the country, a common Canadian citizenship.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister a question? Is it the intention that the bill be sent to a committee of the house? I believe that was the intention last fall.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman is quite correct; that was the intention last year. The reason for the decision to proceed before a committee last year was to facilitate the passage of the bill because of the shortness of the session; but at the moment it is not the intention to proceed to committee.

Mr. FLEMING: May I ask the minister a further question? Would the minister be kind enough to indicate whether the provisions of the bill are intended to have any relation to the franchise?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not know whether I am in order in answering.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MARTIN: I prefer to deal with that when we come to the sections of the bill. We are now dealing only with the principle of the bill.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): With much, if not all, that has been said by the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) I am in agreement, particularly where he said that this measure symbolizes our aspirations as a nation.

As I conceive it, this measure translates into the days of peace the unity of our nation in war. During two wars men without regard to racial origin served this nation as Canadians. Now the opportunity and the privilege is to be given to them in peace to serve their nation in the years to come as Canadians.

The minister has gone at some considerable length into the questions of domicile, citizenship and naturalization, matters most difficult of concept and interpretation. I realize that this bill goes a long way to resolve many of the difficulties that prevail in these subjects; nevertheless I am sure that in the committee stage all of us will be able to contribute some suggestions that may result in beneficial improvements of the bill.

This is one measure where political considerations fade and where we as Canadians can view it free and untrammeled. With the bill the official opposition is in agreement. Indeed in one of the first utterances of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), after he was chosen as the leader of this party, in Kingston at a memorial service to the memory of Sir John A. Macdonald in 1943 he called upon the people of Canada to establish in this country a citizenship free from racial origin and unhyphenated. He called upon the people to carry out the dream of founders and builders of confederation that all may be privileged to call ourselves Canadians.

This bill achieves a lifelong dream of mine. Ever since my earliest days I have advocated the necessity for a change in the attitude in the law and of officialdom toward Canadians. One criticism that I voiced on the first occasion that I ever spoke in this chamber was that the bureau of statistics in insisting on the census being taken by racial origin was denying that citizenship which Canadians had the right to ask for, and which our friends and kinsmen across the line have established for many years.

I realize that there has been a Canadian nationality, in an abstract sort of way, for many years, under the acts referred to by the minister. But that citizenship has been denied, in effect when in each succeeding census paternal racial origin has been required of our citizens.

This is an important piece of legislation and will give to Canadians a new vista of their responsibilities and privileges as citizens. But legislation of itself can never build a united citizenship. If there is one thing on this occasion that we should do, when we pass this bill and make it the law of the country, it is to determine that individually, henceforth, we owe ourselves the compulsion, regardless of our racial origin, of understanding each other's point of view. We must dedicate our determination to encourage and develop in this country mutual trust and mutual tolerance. Above all, we must restrain the undermining of our Canadian confederation through encouraging or developing a dislike of Canadians of other racial origins, for Canada's destiny and Canada's future can and will never be achieved on the basis of racial prejudice.

The minister has said that Canada has served civilization well in two wars. But the prophetic dreams of nationhood, the vision of Macdonald and Cartier, remain as yet to be completed. Legislation of itself will not complete it. Canada must develop, now that we achieve this citizenship, unity out of diversity —a diversity based on non-homogeneous peoples of many religions, peoples of clashing economic differences based on distances, and jurisdictional differences as between federal and provincial authorities. The great challenge to our generation is to fuse these clashing differences, and to build for that unity which, beginning with the dreams of the fathers of confederation, has been cemented by a common sacrifice in two wars.

I repeat that in my opinion one of the most destructive features that has prevented the creation of an unhyphenated nation has been the census requirements, carrying forth from generation to generation racial origin, and not service and citizenship as a basis of registration.

I remember well discussing this matter in the house on August 11, 1944, upon which occasion the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave the promise to the people of Canada that at the earliest possible occasion he would bring in a measure to assure an unhyphenated Canadian citizenship. Instead of repeating the arguments I then used, may I with the indulgence of the house repeat the words I then uttered. We were then in the midst of a war.

The minister has mentioned an example of sacrifice and service to our country on the part of one of alien origin. As he uttered those words my thoughts went back to an occasion in 1942 when, while visiting a town in southern Saskatchewan, a man came up to me and asked me whether because his son was serving as an air gunner he was being discriminated against because he, the father, came from Germany a matter of twenty years before. I told him that such was not the fact. Proud he was of the service of that son. Two weeks later the boy received the Distinguished Flying Medal; later on he was commissioned. Throughout Saskatchewan to-day, in the homes of families the parents of which came from continental Europe, are to be found young men who were honoured in the service with decorations, young men proud of their citizenship and, what is even more important, prepared to fight for that citizenship which had been gained only a few years before.

The words I uttered on that occasion were these:

> As one reads the casualty lists each day one is impressed with the fact that without regard to racial origin Canadians are living and dying for their country and their empire. Yet when these young Canadians return to this country, what do they come back to? They come back to a Canada which insists that they shall not designate themselves as Canadians, but shall prefix their paternal national origin, regardless of the number of generations their families have been in this country.

Then a little later on:

> As I have said before, no one thinks of Mr. Roosevelt as a Dutch-American. No one thinks of General Eisenhower as a German-American. No one thinks of Mayor LaGuardia of New York as an Italian-American. They are great Americans. We perpetuate this thing every ten years in our census, the excuse being that it is necessary to have the information as to ethnic groups.

And I concluded with these words:

> Those who serve in the Canadian armed forces are proud of the "Canada" on their shoulder straps, and without regard to hyphenated considerations. While they serve they are Canadians. I ask the Prime Minister to round out this great programme which he has placed before the house in the last few days for the benefit and rehabilitation of our men who serve by making the necessary amendments which will once for all and without regard to origin enable men and women of this country to call themselves Canadians, and by so doing unite this country as never before.

The Prime Minister followed me on that occasion, with these words, which to-day have been translated into the bill now before the house:

> I wish to conclude by referring to what my hon. friend said about hoping that we might, in some way, find it possible to have the citizens of this whole nation bound together as Canadians and so recognized and recorded in all government records and registrations. He said that, without regard to racial origin, Canadians are living and dying for their country, and that, above everything else, we should see particularly as respects those brave men who have been fighting overseas, that upon their return they should be all classed as Canadians. He hoped that, irrespective of racial origin, they would be recognized as Canadians without having to put any prefixes before their names. May I say to my hon. friend that in that I am in entire and wholehearted agreement with him. I cannot express too strongly the feeling I have that some of these practices which have been carried on by the census branch for statistical purposes, or possibly for ethnological purposes—I believe that is the way it is described—might be done away with. I would be happy to join with my hon. friend and with any others in seeking to do my part to see absolute recognition, or recognition made in an absolute way of men and women who were born in this country, and those who have become Canadian citizens being regarded as Canadians first, foremost and all the time.

I cannot understand the idea behind the census that blood counts should loom so large in determining Canadian citizenship. When the statistics were collected they were inaccurate. As a matter of fact, the manner in which nationality was determined is set forth in the instructions issued for the last census. These are contained in a pamphlet, a page of which I have before me, and are as follows:

> As a general rule a person's racial origin is to be traced through his father, e.g., if a person's father is English and his mother French, the racial origin shall be entered as English, while a person whose father is French and whose mother is English, shall be entered as French.

On the basis of that the ethnological argument disappears of itself. In the United States the idea that racial origin is important was done away with many years ago. Under the census regulations of that country the only persons who are required to register on the basis of racial origin are those who are naturalized, the only separation in the registration being that those of the negro, Indian, Chinese and Japanese races are required so to register.

This bill is an important step forward. In my opinion it will do more to join this dominion together in unity in the days of peace than any other measure that has come before this parliament. But within the last few days something has happened that I think should be brought to the attention of the house because it indicates that even now the rights of Canadian citizens are not being respected as they should be. I referred this afternoon to order in council P.C. 6577, passed on October 23, 1945. The preamble to that order in council reads:

> And whereas it is therefore deemed necessary, by reason of the war, for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada that provision as hereinafter set forth be made for the arrest and deportation of persons in Canada suspected of being deserters from the United States forces or of being absent from the United States forces without leave.

This order in council passed in October, 1945, provides that any person suspected may be arrested without warrant. It provides that any person arrested who does not sign a release permitting his deportation to the United States shall be brought before an immigration board and the question determined as to whether or not he is a deserter from the United States army. As far as that order in council is concerned, if the purpose were to assure a mutual exchange of deserters as between the countries, I would not argue against it, in so far as it affects American citizens. But what I do object to is this: Whereas under the extradition law of this country no Canadian can be deported for an offence committed beyond Canada, except certain designated offences, this order in council is passed and provision is made whereby a native-born Canadian or a Canadian citizen may be deported to another nation at the request of that nation. That is a denial of the rights of Canadian citizenship.

What has happened in the last few days in Winnipeg? A Canadian by the name of McCloy went to the United States in 1929 and joined the United States army. Later on, he went absent without leave and was sentenced subsequently to two years' imprisonment. He escaped after a period of six months and came back to Canada in September, 1939. He joined the Canadian army and went overseas and served until August, 1945, when he received an honourable discharge.

On March 26, 1946, this man was arrested, put in gaol and later granted bail. When I endeavoured to ask a question about this matter of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon he did not give me very much assistance in having it answered. This was a matter of great moment to a Canadian citizen. The minister glossed it over as being unimportant. The man came up to-day before the immigration board in Winnipeg. I am informed that the evidence against him consisted of a letter from Mr. Hoover of the F.B.I. in Washington and another letter from another official in Washington. The man went on the stand in his own defence, and after he gave his evidence the commissioner said that he had received instructions that the matter was to be held in abeyance for the time being.

This order in council was passed after the war by this government when it realized that it could not get through an extradition treaty that it had dangled before this house last session. That order in council denies to Canadians the right to be tried in their own country and not in any other country or at the direction of any other country. Furthermore, it made retroactive on October 23, 1945, an offence that was not extraditable until the order in council in question was passed. Is this another order in council that somehow found its way into the mill without being properly examined?

I suggest to the minister that the order in council be amended so that it will not cover Canadian citizens and make them deportable for military offences. This is but another example of orders in council passed by the government that would never be passed by this parliament, an order in council denying to Canadian citizens their rights and depriving them of the privileges incident to Canadian citizenship, the privileges which were so eloquently stated by the Secretary of State.

This order in council cannot be glossed over with suave phraseology. I ask the minister, and I know Canadians in all parts of this country would ask the minister also if they had the opportunity, to change it, to alter it and to revoke it so that it will not make Canadian citizens subject to deportation for trial in any other country except under legislation passed by this parliament.

I pass on to another phase. The minister dealt somewhat briefly with section 10. Section 10 provides, among other things, that a British subject coming to Canada from the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Ireland or Newfoundland cannot become a Canadian citizen unless he files notice of intention with the court and unless he comes before the court in the same way as any other person coming from any other country would be required to do. I ask the minister to explain why at this time when we in all parts of the empire are desirous in the interest of our own security to bind still closer the various parts of the empire together, should a British subject coming into Canada and properly entering this country under our immigration law be required to go through the same formalities as persons coming from other parts of the world?

I ask, too, this question: Is it not a dangerous principle to adopt at this time? Is it not one which may well strike at the unity of British citizenship everywhere within this empire?

These are questions which I think the minister should have answered. But he went over that section very quickly and indicated that there was a very small change made. There is a very important change made because for the first time in our history we are requiring a British citizen, under a common king and with a common loyalty, coming to this country to have to go through the same formalities as those coming from foreign countries.

Having established the basis of Canadian citizenship and having given a new unity to this country, I suggest that citizenship, if it is to mean what our citizenship does mean, requires that at this time—I referred to this incidentally the other day—we should consider the adoption by Canada of a Bill of Rights. There have been recent infringements upon citizenship by this government which have been a denial of the heritage that is ours. But Canadian democracy means something when public opinion speaks. The order in council P.C. 6444 of October 5 last has passed into history only because of the force of public opinion in this country, for when the people realized what its provisions meant to them individually, the government found itself forced to revoke that order in council.

I may be asked, why do we need a Bill of Rights? The British North America Act contains no personal safeguards against unwise or discriminatory legislation that might be passed by federal governments. It vests in the Minister of Justice or in the government the power to annul provincial encroachments on our rights, but it contains nothing to prevent the government of this country by order in council from doing things which deny to Canadians the rights that flow from the achievement of Canadian and British citizenship. Some may ask me why the British North America Act does not contain such a Bill of Rights. I do not know. But I believe this, that when the fathers of confederation drafted that act the theory of personal liberty was so embedded in English common law that the fathers of confederation did not believe that further safeguards of individual liberty were necessary.

The United States of America had no Bill of Rights in its original constitution, but it found it necessary to establish a Bill of Rights in order to prevent infringements upon its citizenship which, with too great regularity in recent months, in continuation of what was taking place during the war, have characterized this government under order in council.

In the United States, federal and provincial legislatures under their Bill of Rights were forbidden to interfere with certain basic rights common to all citizens, regardless of race, religion or colour. Freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures was guaranteed. In the Bill of Rights of the United States it is provided that no person may be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law.

The order in council P.C. 6577, and the order in council of October 5, 1945, P.C. 6444, which I believe will always be remembered as the forgotten order in council, interfere with the fundamental rights of citizenship which were referred to by the Secretary of State.

Is it not time that in this country as in Great Britain these rights shall not be interfered with except under a law passed by the parliament of Canada?

When I think of the abrogation of habeas corpus in recent months I find upon an examination of British constitutional development that only nine times in British history was it interfered with in Britain, and then only by statute or under powers contained in a statute to abrogate habeas corpus. We grant the greatest privilege to an individual, that of Canadian citizenship, conveying as it does as well the right of British citizenship. We have gone a step forward. We are making a great advance under this bill. Now let us go one step farther and assure to generations yet to come and assure to our people who will become Canadian citizens that they shall not be denied at any time in the future by order in council those rights that ordinarily are incident to our citizenship.

My time has almost elapsed, but I should like to say this too. In the development of a Canadian nationality everything should be done by the government to encourage and develop Canadian literature and drama and art. The minister has taken a great interest in his department of state. His officials and the officials of other departments worked hard in the drafting of this bill which in every section reveals careful application and much study. I believe that his department might well be utilized as a department for the purpose of widening still further our Canadian citizenship. I believe that his department should establish scholarships available to worthy students to encourage the study of Canadian literature, drama and art, to the end that we should have not only a citizenship but a distinctive Canadian art and a distinctive Canadian culture. What would the development of a department like that mean? It would stimulate and support artistic endeavours and assure that Canadian writers, musicians, painters and others would have the support which only the state can give. It would assure that Canadians would extend their cultural heritage for the benefit of Canadians of this and future generations; for we must not forget that one of the most trying problems in this country to-day is that having given our young Canadians an opportunity of securing a wide education, when they have finished that education, too often by reason of the greater monetary attractions of the United States the cultural development which they should have left in our country is lost to us because there is no department of government to encourage and stimulate their endeavours and to assist them.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

For 140 years my ancestors on both sides have made this country their home. For 140 years they and other Canadians have been denied true citizenship. They have been denied the use of those proud words which the minister used: "I am a Canadian." All my life I have hoped for this day. I believe it means much to this country and to our future. Canada to me means more than the ownership of acres; it means a citizenship which maintains in this part of North America the highest heritage of British peoples everywhere in the world. It means to Canadians, without regard to racial origin, freedom and tolerance and liberty. It is because it means those things to me, sir, that from time to time during the period of the war and since, I have been critical of the invasions and encroachments on our rights and on these principles of citizenship which constitute the heritage of British peoples.

To-day in this world two ideologies face one another. If ever there was a time when we should assert and practise what our citizenship means, it is now. The minister has given the lead in that regard in the establishment of schools to the end that citizenship will be taught, and also in the ceremonies which hereafter will be established in order to imbue the minds of those who come to our country with what that citizenship will mean to them. But, believing in freedom, I think we give a poor lead to these people when we endeavour to justify the adoption, in times of peace, of totalitarianism in order to oppose totalitarianism. It is our duty and responsibility as Canadian citizens to maintain those principles and traditions which mean so much to us and to guard against infringement of the great principles of freedom; for, sir, the hallmarks of liberty can be erased as a result of the acts of a zealous person who is misdirected, no less than by one who destroys those principles with evil intent. We will give a great citizenship to Canadians hereafter. We will give them freedom—that we promise—in this country. Let us not deny freedom by executive action on the part of the state, for in doing that we destroy all for which our citizenship stands.

The pages of history tell their story. They tell the story that freedom, like capital, cannot be overdrawn, nor can freedom be preserved while it is being destroyed piecemeal fashion.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, as the minister so eloquently stated, is to give further expression to the progress which Canadians have made on the road toward sovereignty. It has been a gradual progress and evolution; and in laying this bill before parliament the government, I know, is giving way to the desire of the majority of the Canadian people to establish a distinctly Canadian citizenship.

Canadian citizenship is a fact to-day, and it is but proper that we give a legal status to that fact. If this condition is true; if a majority of Canadians are anxious to put upon this Canadian citizenship this stamp of legal approval, and if all these eloquent words which the minister has told us are true, I think he should have put a preamble to this bill which would give the development of our sovereignty and express pride in the progress we have made and that we are now ready to put this legal status of Canadian citizenship on the people.

While I am in full agreement with this measure, which I believe was actuated by the government upon the principles stated by the minister this evening, I have grave doubts as to the legality of parts of this legislation. I say that in all seriousness and in all friendliness towards the minister.

To make my argument clear, I should like to trace briefly the development and the history of naturalization and sovereignty. Prior to 1914, as the minister stated, we had a Naturalization Act under which aliens were made British subjects within Canada only. The adoption by the parliament of Canada of this legislation prior to 1914 was undoubtedly an act of sovereignty on our part. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said at the imperial conference in 1911:

> The power of naturalization is one of the incident powers of sovereignty and one of the most important attributes of sovereignty.

However, while this old law was an act of sovereignty, we were at that time by no means as sovereign as we are to-day. The old naturalization law was not of much use to a naturalized citizen when he travelled beyond the boundaries of this country, because then he lost his British citizenship and he was a man with no country at all. When I said that we were then not as sovereign as we are now, I may point out that at that time we had no embassies, no legations, no high commissioners and no consulates to which a Canadian might apply for protection in case he got into difficulty in some foreign country. It was no doubt owing to this state of affairs that in 1914 the British parliament passed an act concerning British naturalization and the status of aliens. This act deals with the naturalization of aliens, and it was provided in part II of the act that it might be adopted by any legislature of a British possession or dominion, and, if so, then a certificate of naturalization granted by such a dominion should have the same effect as a certificate granted under this act. This meant that if we adopted the Biritish act any persons who were naturalized would be recognized as British subjects all over the world. Pursuant to this British act we passed our own Naturalization Act in 1914; that is the law which is at present in force, and part II of our act is identical with part II of the British naturalization act. However, this enactment of 1914 was no advancement in sovereignty over the old act. It was not passed in consequence of the powers which we possessed under section 91 of the British North America Act, but by virtue of the British statute already referred to, and the British statute gave it legal effect and force.

I have already said that we adopted verbatim, with only minor necessary changes, part II of the British act. We therefore became entitled to issue certificates of naturalization to aliens as British subjects, who were supposed to be recognized as such all over the world; and I presume that was the case. It seems to me that now under this new legislation we want to have a Canadian citizenship, which I endorse and which is quite proper and natural, and at the same time we also wish to legislate as to British nationality. I maintain that we cannot do so, at least not as the present act is worded. If the present bill becomes law we repeal the present Naturalization Act; that is provided in the last or second last section of the bill. By repealing the present act we would also lose our power to pass any legislation as to who shall be a British subject, because we would also repeal the applicability of the British act.

On the strength of this argument I would say that section 26, which says that a Canadian is a British subject, is beyond the powers of this parliament to legislate. I have no personal objection to this section; I rather like it, but I simply doubt the legality of it. Perhaps it was necessary for some reason unknown, but I submit sincerely that only the British parliament can legislate as to who is a British subject. However, I think I have a way out, and I suggest as an alternative to section 26 the following.

Mr. MARTIN: I am very much interested in the argument of the hon. member but at this stage the rules of the house provide for a discussion of the principle of the bill only. When we come to deal with the sections I am sure the suggestion of the hon. member will be of great interest to the house as it certainly will be of great interest to me, but at the beginning I think it would be well to establish clearly in this general debate the desirability of maintaining the rules of the house, which at this stage call for a discussion of the principle of the bill only.

Mr. JAENICKE: The minister dealt with these sections, and surely I can deal with them in the same way.

Mr. MARTIN: With great respect, all I did was deal with the principle of the bill and certain provisions of the bill. I did not discuss the sections.

Mr. JAENICKE: This portion of my remarks is very short.

Mr. MARTIN: I think we shall find that the debate will be more helpful and efficient if we observe the rules. The important suggestion the hon. member is making now, which interests me greatly, I think could be dealt with more effectively if he would make it when we come to discuss the particular sections. I am sure he will find this is the best way to deal with the matter because it will give his suggestion a much better opportunity for consideration.

Mr. JAENICKE: I would suggest—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member for Kindersley to Beauchesne, third edition, paragraph 656, at page 228:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure. On the motion for second reading it is out of order to discuss the clauses of the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I respectfully submit to Your Honour the hon. member for Kindersley is discussing the principle of citizenship, the principle of this bill. His argument, as I understand it, is that a certain part of this bill is ultra vires of the power of this parliament, namely to decide who shall be a British citizen, which is the right of the British parliament. Since this includes a principle of Canadian citizenship I submit that the hon. member has the right to proceed with what he is saying.

Mr. GREEN: May I add, Mr. Speaker, that all the members of the opposition are very much concerned about any ruling of this type being made. In order to review the principle of the bill it is necessary to refer to what is contained in certain sections. That is exactly what the minister himself did. Surely if he could do that we should have the same privilege. If we are to be restricted as the minister suggests it will be impossible effectively to debate the principle of this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not call the hon. member to order. Since he was a new member last session I just wished to draw his attention to the fact that in the House of Commons it is the practice on second reading to discuss only the principle of a bill.

Mr. JAENICKE: Well, instead of suggesting an amendment, as I tried to do, I shall put it in this way. I mentioned that section 26 in my opinion is beyond the powers of this parliament because we have no right to say who is a British subject. But we can say this, that a Canadian citizen is a subject of His Majesty as sovereign of Canada, and I think that would be the proper way to put this section. I believe such a section would be quite legal and ought to satisfy all persons, while at the same time it is a true statement of the status of a Canadian citizen. It is still debatable just how far we have progressed on the road to sovereignty, but there is no doubt that we have advanced far enough to say who shall be a Canadian citizen. According to the statute of Westminster the dominion has full power to make laws having extra-territorial operation, and since the passing of that statute we have exerted our power extra-territorially. We can now take our nationals anywhere and they will receive protection. There is also no question but that Canada, especially during the last ten years, has been recognized as a sovereign state. The debate this afternoon and the remarks of the minister this evening bear this out. If for no other reason than that, we should assert our right to create Canadian citizens, and in so doing we can assert and emphasize our British connection in a natural and quite legal manner. I think the suggestion I have made as to section 26 should meet the objections of those who have an extreme desire for sovereignty, as well as of those who hold the British connection dear to their hearts.

For these reasons, of course, the act would have to be amended in a great many other places. For instance, it would seem to me that section 22 is beyond the powers of this parliament, in that it presumes to revoke a certificate granted in another country within the British commonwealth, even though this is done with the concurrence of the government of that country. Likewise section 28 is not only ultra vires but is unnecessary, because other nations of the British Commonwealth are sovereign states, just as we are, and we recognize the status of the nationals of sovereign states by the amity of nations.

I do not wish it to be understood from my arguments that I am against the sentiments contained in these sections. I am all in favour of them, but both sections presume some authority which we do not possess. It is up to the British parliament alone to say who is a British subject. I think the way the act is framed it might entail some serious consequences to a naturalized Canadian if he wants to assert his British nationality.

In view of the fact that the house wishes to go into committee of supply, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Jaenicke the debate was adjourned.

PRIVILEGE

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT—EMMA WOIKIN—PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF SENATOR HORNER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I rise to a question of privilege. It has reference to a statement which is alleged to have been made by Senator Ralph Horner and which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Journal of April 2. The article is headed, "Western senator recommended Emma Woikin," and the first paragraph reads:

> Mrs. Emma Woikin, one of the twelve temporary civil servants charged as a suspect in the investigation of the Russian spy network, was recommended for a government job by Senator Ralph Horner.
> "Yes," the Progressive Conservative senator from Blaine Lake, Saskatchewan, to-day told the Evening Journal, "I recommended Emma Woikin—but for the char service—not as a cipher clerk in the code room of the external affairs department."
> The senator, a big, bluff and frankly-spoken man, has been "a little annoyed" at the way things have worked out.

The paragraph to which I wish to refer to particularly is as follows:

> "The only reason Emma Woikin found her way into a stenographic position, first at the passport office and then in the cipher division of external affairs," said the senator, "was because her father and brothers year after year have voted Liberal for Mr. Mackenzie King."

I asked the under-secretary of state for external affairs if he would give me a statement as to how Mrs. Woikin came to be employed in the Department of External Affairs, and I have the following from Mr. Robertson:

> Due to the pressure of work in the passport office in the autumn of 1943, the Department of External Affairs, on September 8, 1943, requisitioned the civil service commission for three additonal clerks grade 2 and two typists grade 2. At the same time, treasury board was requested to establish temporary positions to take care of the new appointees. On September 10, 1943, Mrs. Emma Woikin, who was classified as a typist, grade 1, was assigned by the civil service commission to one of the new temporary posts as no grade 2 typist was then available.

That is the official statement on the matter. I might add that until I heard the name of Mrs. Woikin mentioned in connection with the investigation now proceeding I had no knowledge of there being any person of that name, either in Prince Albert constituency or in the public service of Canada. Unlike Senator Horner I neither recommended Mrs. Woikin for a government job nor was I requested by her or by anyone to make a recommendation on her behalf. I know nothing whatever about her appointment; it was entirely a civil service matter and procedure.

PRESS REPORTS REFERRING TO SPEECH OF MR. KNOWLES ON MARCH 19

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege which has to do with a newspaper report making reference to a speech which I made in this House of Commons on March 19. The report appeared in yesterday's Winnipeg daily newspapers; as a matter of fact it is exactly the same in both the Free Press and the Tribune. It reports a political meeting held on Monday night at which Mr. David Graham charged, on the basis of the speech which I made on March 19, that when I was in Moscow recently I failed to present the Canadian viewpoint to the Russian people whom I met, and that I failed to assure them that they need have no fear of our western democracies. It is stated also that I had urged friendship for their spy activities and that my advocacy of understanding was a one-way proposition.

I rise to this question of privilege because it is statements of this kind that make it difficult to establish the type of relationship which we all want between this country and the Soviet Union, and also because the facts are the very opposite of the statements made by Mr. Graham. Not only did I in my speech urge various efforts such as the publishing in Moscow of a Canadian paper in Russian so as to interpret Canadian ways to these people, but when I was there I made the same kind of appeal I am now making here. I am now seeking to persuade the Canadian people to understand the Russians. Similarly when I was in Moscow I went to a great deal of effort to try to get the people with whom I was in conversation to understand our ways and to realize that what we really want is friendship. I shall continue my effort to achieve understanding and friendship on a mutual basis.

Mr. POULIOT: If you had not been to Moscow you would not have risen to-day.

TRAVEL ABROAD

ABOLITION OF EXIT PERMITS—CONDITIONS AFFECTING PASSPORT CONTROL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table order in council P.C. 1272, April 2, 1946, revoking order in council P.C. 1841 of March 10, 1942, as amended, concerning the issuance of exit permits to women, and children under the age of sixteen years, proceeding to destinations outside the western hemisphere.

I should like to say something about the order in council which I have just tabled. It removes a form of travel restriction which has been in existence since March 10, 1942. Under the regulation that was introduced at that time, and which has been amended on several occasions since, the movement of women, and children under the age of sixteen, to destinations outside the western hemisphere has been limited by the necessity of their securing an exit permit before being permitted to leave Canada. As I mentioned on Friday last, the government is anxious to relax war-time controls wherever possible, and in view of the gradual improvement in travel conditions it has been decided to abolish the requirement of an exit permit immediately.

The result of the present order in council is that, subject to the existing rules of passport control exercised by the Department of External Affairs, women and children residing in Canada are free to make their own travel arrangements without first obtaining an exit permit from the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources.

I wish, however, to emphasize that, although the improvement on general travel conditions has made it possible to remove the exit permit restrictions, this step should not be taken as an indication that the strain on transportation facilities to Europe and the far east has ceased to exist. Moreover, as the Minister of Mines and Resources mentioned in his statement on Monday last, there are severe difficulties in connection with travel from Europe to this country, and these necessarily affect any plans for travel from Canada that involve a later return trip back to Canada. The transportation of Canadian servicemen and their dependents from the United Kingdom and the continent to this country is being granted the highest priority in the allocation of west-bound shipping space. This movement will require a very large percentage of available passenger accommodation for many months to come, and the government desires to warn persons intending to travel to the United Kingdom and Europe during 1946 that no assurance can be given of return transportation until the needs of the repatriation programme have been filled. It is further pointed out that a very large waiting list has developed in the United Kingdom of persons who are not at present eligible for westbound shipping passage. These applicants, which number in the thousands, will be accommodated first, and temporary visitors to the United Kingdom and the continent will of course be required to take their places on the waiting list. As far as can be foreseen, this will unfortunately involve very long delays.

So far as passport control is concerned, I have already mentioned that certain types of administrative control on passport endorsements are being exercised by the Department of External Affairs. These have been necessitated by the limited housing, food and transportation facilities in Europe and the far east, and by the desire of the government to restrict non-essential movement from Canada to the countries where conditions are particularly serious as a result of the war. The past few months have been marked by a gradual improvement in these conditions, and I am able to state that the question of passport control is at present under review.

ATOMIC ENERGY

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT OPERATION CROSSROAD, BIKINI ATOLL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) made mention of a question of which he had sent me notice and which I said I would reply to to-day. With the permission of the house I will now read the question and give the reply. His question was:

In view of the fact that Canada is one of the three partners in the development of atomic energy, and that the United States has made provision for 120 senators and congressmen to attend Operation Crossroad at Bikini Atoll, will the Prime Minister tell the house how many Canadian senators and members of parliament will be sent to represent Canada's interest?

The answer is: I understand that the United States government had invited a small congressional committee of less than ten senators and congressmen to attend the operation which it was proposed to have held at Bikini Atoll. As the hon. member knows, this operation has been postponed sine die. The operation was to be entirely sponsored by the United States government, and invitations were therefore issued by them. We had received an indication that some Canadian observers would be welcome. It has not been decided who would be selected for this mission.

4. What will be the strength of any permanent personnel held at Vernon to maintain and supervise this camp?

Mr. ABBOTT: Order for return.

Mr. STIRLING: May I demur at the answer suggested by the Minister of National Defence with regard to this question. It refers only to one department. The answers, I should have thought, would have been quite short and simple enough to find their place in Hansard, instead of an answer being delayed until a return is brought down.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, I said "order for return" because there was a question as to how many would be disposed of through War Assets Corporation, but it seems to me there are two departments involved.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister knows that; he knows what will be described as surplus, and not until then can another department come in.

Mr. ABBOTT: But I do not know how many will be disposed of through War Assets Corporation. That is determined by the crown assets allocation committee. We declare them surplus in the army, and they may be disposed of by War Assets Corporation, or they may be disposed of by some other department. There are, I think, two departments involved.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could they be disposed of through any other department than War Assets Corporation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. War Assets Corporation is a separate corporation. They might go to the Department of Health and Welfare, for instance. That would not be determined by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. GRAYDON: For disposal?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, for use by other government departments.

IMMIGRATION

PLANNED IN RELATION TO ABSORPTIVE CAPACITY, ECONOMIC NEED AND DEVELOPMENT POSSIBILITIES

Mr. W. R. THATCHER (Moose Jaw) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of instituting a reasonable immigration programme, planned in accordance with Canada's absorptive capacity, its economic needs and possibilities of development.

He said: In introducing this resolution on immigration, I do so with the knowledge that perhaps no single issue in Canada to-day is fraught with so much emotional thinking and prejudice.

Notwithstanding this, the fact remains that to-day thousands of Europeans are knocking at Canada's door, eager to make new homes in this country. These people are not cast-offs or failures; many are the best their respective countries have to offer. Among them are men who fought long and gallantly for the allied cause during the recent war. This parliament must decide, and decide soon, whether it is in the national interest to admit into Canada a number of these people, or whether it is in the national interest to maintain our present immigration laws.

Whatever the view of hon. members may be, there is no denying the fact that immigration has been the life-history of this nation. There are few Canadians who do not trace back their ancestry to at least one nation of the old world. In this very House of Commons thirty-four members originally were European immigrants.

You will note that the resolution before the house is framed in a very general way. It asks the government to consider "the advisability of instituting a reasonable immigration programme." I hope that that wording will not give offence to hon. members on either side of the house.

Suppose we look for a moment at Canada's present immigration policy. Very few realize how extremely restrictive that policy is. Dating back to 1930, it is based largely on the economic fears and errors of the great depression. The policy was founded on the hopelessness and lack of faith in the country's future which was prevalent during the nineteen thirties. All immigrants other than British and American subjects, with a few minor exceptions, are virtually excluded. In the five year period 1940 to 1944 an average of less than 10,000 immigrants were allowed to enter Canada annually.

In my opinion there are three main weaknesses in our present immigration policy. First it is based on racial discrimination and outworn prejudices. The law sets up several preferred and non-preferred groups. Britons and Americans are included in the preferred category, and also in the select group are the citizens of such nations as France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, the Scandinavian countries, and one or two others. The law places in the non-preferred category those who come from Poland, the Ukraine, Austria, Czechoslovakia and a few other countries. In a final category are placed those who come from Turkey, Roumania, Greece, Italy and those who are of Jewish nationality. Those people can get into the country only by special permit. It seems strange that during the recent war, at the very time Canadians were being urged to enlist to help in eradicating racial intolerance abroad, our own nation was practising similar intolerance at home in selecting its immigrants. Surely it is more sensible to pick out immigrants for their skills, for their trades, for their physical backgrounds, than to take them for their race. For instance, it is quite conceivable that a central European, a hardy sturdy peasant born on the soil or, say a Finlander, an experienced logger, would make a better immigrant that a slum dweller from some city in England. I believe, therefore, that the first weakness of our immigration policy is that our immigrants are picked primarily for their race.

In the second place, it is very difficult to justify our present immigration policy on purely humanitarian grounds. The war in Europe resulted in millions of people being uprooted and scattered far and wide. Many of them cannot return to their old homes, and most of them are living in abject poverty. There is widespread lack of shelter and clothing. Food is so scarce that thousands of them are dying of malnutrition. Confiscation of property has been fairly general throughout many European countries. Certainly racial and religious prejudices prevail at every hand. Hundreds of thousands of orphans are homeless in Europe.

Will you permit me, Mr. Speaker, to quote from a letter written by W. Wanka, a Sudeten German who emigrated to Canada in 1939:

> In 1939 Canada opened her gates to 1,000 Sudetans. They settled on the land and found happiness in this great country. The mere fact that we are here to-day has kept many of our friends and relatives still in Europe from succumbing to black despair during the misery of the past months. The hopes of many thousands of anti-nazi Sudetens are centred upon us. Hardly a letter reaches us in which we are not asked to voice their plight, and to ask Canada anew for homes for them.

Many of those who are suffering to-day are former allies. The vast majority of these refugees were active opponents or victims of the fascist countries. The condition of these people, which is beyond description, pleads for them. Canada, in the interests of justice and humanity, cannot indefinitely ignore that plea.

In the third place, I believe that our immigration policy is contrary to the interests of the nation as a whole. No thoughtful person can travel across Canada without a feeling that there is an immense area whose economic resources have not yet been properly exploited. The general process of settlement has been neither complete nor satisfactory. A moderate, well-planned immigration policy would have numerous advantages for Canadians generally. In the first place, the larger population, by increasing the home market, would aid the economic stabilization of our economy. To-day, to a considerable degree, the prosperity of Canada is dependent upon our foreign export markets. If these foreign markets are good, generally speaking Canada is prosperous. If these foreign markets are bad, usually the opposite is true.

In other words, the economic well-being of Canada to-day is dependent to a large degree on conditions over which we have no control. This is particularly true of our agriculture.

The largest proportion of our wheat, hogs, cattle and other products are, I believe, shipped overseas. However, it is also true of our manufacturing industries. During the war our manufacturing capacity, I am told, was increased by thirty to forty per cent. If in the future we are to avoid idle factories and unemployment, if this greater plant capacity is to be fully utilized, we must do one of two things: either we must find a greater export market, or we must increase our home market. Immigration would permit Canada to increase her home market, thus curtailing our dependence on unstable foreign markets.

In the second place, immigration would ease the tax burden of Canadians. It was believed at one time that Canada would have a population several times its present twelve million people. Our provincial government buildings, with their large staffs and very large overhead, were set up with that thought in mind. Our railroad development also has had as its objective the serving of a population several times as large as twelve million. Additional people are needed to carry the heavy financial load which we have taken up. Our taxation burden could be eased by spreading it over a larger number of people.

In the third place, under certain circumstances it is probable that immigration would actually increase employment in Canada. All immigrants need new homes, furniture and other necessities of life. If they are going on a farm they need farm machinery, equipment and tools. Manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers and labourers would all benefit by this new business.

A further direct reaction would be to increase railway freight and railway passenger traffic, and I think it is quite probable that the railroads would have to take on additional employees if we had an immigration policy. Moreover, where the immigrant is one who is likely to invest capital, or who has some special and needed skill, he is likely to enhance the employment of Canadians. For instance, I am particularly mindful of a Czech refugee who moved to Saskatoon around 1938. He left Czechoslovakia just ahead of Hitler's occupation of that country. He had been a butcher in Poland. When he reached Saskatoon he found an empty factory building, where he proceeded to set himself up in the meat-packing business. To-day that refugee employs about 600 men and women. The immigrant, unless he comes to some unproductive employment, creates additional work for the people already in the community and adds to the general wealth of that community.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

In the fourth place, immigrants bring to the nation new aptitudes, new skills and new scientific knowledge. Let us not forget that in centuries past the Flemish weavers, the Huguenots, and others brought new skills and a new outlook to Great Britain and helped to a considerable degree to make the empire industrially what she is to-day. Canada should benefit similarly from the gradual enrichment that comes from fresh streams of newcomers. For example, it is a well known fact that during the latter years of the recent war, immigrant scientists in the United States played a tremendous part in helping to split the atom and in making the atomic bomb. Who can say how the course of history would have been affected had the United States refused to accept those immigrants at that time? I have heard it said—it may be incorrect but I have heard the statement made—that some of these very scientists who went to the United States tried to get into Canada and could not do so because of our immigration laws. I suggest therefore that immigration will bring new skills and new aptitudes to the country which will prove very valuable to us.

Finally, I believe that Canada needs a larger population for purely defensive reasons. In this land-hungry world, twelve million people cannot hold half a continent indefinitely. I believe our poorly filled dominion is a danger to peace. We are asking for trouble if we refuse to take elementary precautions to increase our population in proportion to the nation's absorptive capacity. If we steadily refuse to take steps to populate our country, we may find in the future that some other nation will step in and do it for us.

In the past, most opposition to immigration has come from organized labour. This feeling was based largely on the premise that immigrants would deprive Canadians of work. Conceivably this view might be justified if there were only a limited and defined amount of work in the country, which could be divided among the people. However, most labour leaders have now accepted the belief that immigration by itself produces new wealth, creates demands for manufactured goods and services, and acts generally as an aid to trade, business, and employment.

Many immigrants bring capital and business experience with them, and become employers of labour rather than employees. There are also some immigrants who are willing to take jobs for which enough native applicants cannot be found. These classes certainly do not "take away jobs from Canadians." Moreover, a large number of immigrants are not wage earners and hence are not competitors. Among these are people too old to work, women who remain housewives, and young children.

The economic and social maladjustments to which our attention is drawn by the immigration issue are for the most part problems which are fundamental to our present society, whether or not immigration is involved. For instance, in the United States the problems associated with poverty, illiteracy and so forth are nowhere more apparent than in the south-eastern cotton belt, a region where there has been the least immigration in past years.

It is interesting to note that at its 1944 convention the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada passed the following resolution:

Be it resolved that Canada's Immigration Act be revised to make it possible for Canada to do her share in granting refuge to her full quota of refugees.

Be it further resolved that a policy of accepting immigrants into this country be proceeded with as long as such policy in no way adversely affects living standards or the welfare of our present Canadian population.

The Canadian Congress of Labour passed a similar resolution at its convention in 1944, which reads as follows:

Be it resolved that the C.C.L. in convention assembled request the dominion government to institute a concrete plan of immigration during the post-war period, without any danger of displacement of present labour.

In passing, it is interesting to note the steps that other nations have taken recently with regard to immigration. Crowded England has admitted some two hundred thousand refugees during and since the war. The United States has admitted thousands, and plans to bring in many more. Australia recently announced plans to absorb seventy thousand adults and seventeen thousand children a year. France is actively encouraging immigration. Canada, one of the most lightly populated areas in the world, appears to lag behind.

In conclusion may I say that I am not advocating a policy of wide-open immigration, nor would I support such a proposal. Rather I am asking the government to enunciate a moderate, well-planned immigration policy based on Canada's absorptive capacity and her moral responsibilities to the united nations organization.

It seems to me that the programme should be a flexible one, taking into consideration from year to year the labour needs of the nation. Moreover, I believe that immigrants should be picked not on a basis of race, but for their skills and for their physical backgrounds. Above all else, the policy must in no way be allowed to affect adversely the welfare of our present population. To-day the lives and liberties of millions throughout the world are in danger. Canada, in keeping with her traditions, must bear a share of this great human problem. A great opportunity for our nation is at hand. I do not think that we should delay in taking advantage of it.

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): May I join with the hon. member who has just spoken on this question and say that he has presented the problem not only fairly but capably. I, too, do not advocate an open-door policy, but I do advocate immigration. I have here a few figures which I think would be interesting to the house. There are few people who know that the area of Canada is three and a half million square miles or fifty per cent larger than continental Europe, which is 2,116,000 square miles in area. While Europe supports four hundred million people we have approximately twelve million people. It might also be interesting to note that the unoccupied agricultural land of Canada amounts to 293,000 square miles, or 80.000 square miles more than the area occupied at the present time. As I have just said, the population of Canada is approximately twelve millions with a distribution of 3·7 inhabitants per square mile as compared with Belgium with 802 inhabitants per square mile.

Most hon. members have read the report recently issued by the dominion bureau of statistics. This report, based on present trends, states that the population of Canada is likely to reach fifteen millions in 1990. The planning and development of Canada from confederation on were based on continually expanding population. Since the first world war it has become evident that the trends have been other than what were expected. There were three reasons for that. The first was the heavy emigration to the United States; the second was the smaller Canadian families, and the third was the sharp decline in immigration from Europe. The first two factors were outside the scope of the government because they were governed by social and economic forces; but the third factor was the result of a positive act carried out by the government. The door was closed. It is more important to-day than it has ever been to examine the problem and survey present conditions on both sides of the door.

I have a few more statistics which I should like to give to the house. At confederation the population of this country was 2,700,000. Then came the Sifton immigration policy from 1896 to 1911, and it brought 3,000,000 immigrants into Canada. In 1906 the number was 211,653; in 1907, 272,409; in 1910, 286,839, and in 1911, 33,288. From 1911 to 1930 we averaged 100,000 annually, but there were two high years. In 1912 we brought in 375,756, and in 1913, 400,870. In one year we brought in only 41,000. In 1931 we brought in 27,500, and in 1935, 11,000. During other years immigration was negligible.

Canada must take cognizance of its changed economy. We have become a great industrial country, but can we afford to neglect our agricultural classes? To-day the farmers are begging for labour. We cannot constantly rely upon German prisoners of war and conscientious objectors to pull us out of the hole.

An hon. MEMBER: And the Japanese.

Mr. CROLL: An hon. member says, "and the Japanese". We are dependent upon our export trade for a third of our economy, not only upon our exports of wheat and other natural products, but upon our exports of manufactured products. While we are not competing with other countries that have a lower standard of living, we must have more people in this country in order to be more productive. We are the people who are alleged to have the "know how" industrially, but what we lack at the present time is population.

Let us look for a minute at our side of the door. The years since confederation have brought us to the point where we are the third industrial nation of the world. The United States with 140,000,000 people is first; Great Britain with 46,000,000 is second. We have huge railway and communication systems, much more than adequate for our needs at the present time. Our shipping tonnage is the third largest in the world, and in the precambrian shield we have still untapped an incalculable reservoir of wealth. We are a strong creditor nation, and we help feed the world. In addition, next to the United States our standard of living is the highest in all the world.

Then we have to look at the other side of the door. Let us consider only Europe, which has been the traditional source of our immigration. There are four hundred million people over there existing under conditions of unparalleled misery. Europe has been reduced to poverty and famine; her cities are in ruins; her industries are smashed; her transportation is shattered and her communications are disrupted. Even the soil has been injured to some extent by mine fields and shell fire. Her people are anxious to start life anew; they are clamouring to get in, and at the present time we have made-to-order immigrants in orphans and children who are at an age at which we can influence them to become the kind of Canadians we want. Both these adults and children would, in my opinion, make ideal citizens, and we must ask ourselves whether we can afford to miss this opportunity, whether we can afford to let Australia and New Zealand "beat the gun", as my hon. friend has said. Already they are subsidizing, to some extent, immigration from Britain. All we need do is to assure the people of Britain that the doors will be opened within a reasonable time, and they will wait to get into this country.

Canada's immigration policy since 1914 can well be called a dog in the manger policy. Here we are inhabiting a country whose area is the third largest in the world, and we have a population about the size of that of Afghanistan. We have here what is potentially one of the richest countries in all the world; yet we have only scratched the surface of our wealth. Not only have we done nothing about the whole matter, but we have not permitted people to come here and help us give this country a fair opportunity. Paradoxically enough, we have invited foreign capital into this country, upon which capital we are paying tribute. But here are people who ask nothing but an opportunity; yet for the time being the doors are shut. One of the reasons is that over a period of time we have failed to formulate a long-term immigration policy. Always when the question has been raised there have been surface reasons why the matter should be deferred. In the twenties someone found excuses for doing nothing. In the thirties we were quite helpless about doing a great deal, and to-day we find a different set of reasons. Though the reasons may vary a little, the principle always seems to be the same. In effect it is that on this blank day of blank we will deal with the problem of immigration, but since it is an involved problem we will do nothing at all about it for the present. Consequently for almost thirty years we have allowed surface reasons to remain in the path of our own interests and in the interests of common humanity. The truth is that if we are looking for reasons for dodging the problem we can find them, but we must ask if they are fair to ourselves and fair to the rest of the world.

At the present time, for instance, we say to ourselves that immigration is out of the question because of the need to repatriate and rehabilitate Canadian servicemen and their dependents, or because of the world-wide shortage of transportation, or because immigrants are needed to rebuild war-torn Europe, or because we have not in Europe an organization prepared to deal with them. It would be futile if not foolish to argue that these considerations are without merit; but it would be equally futile and foolish to say that because of these considerations we should do nothing at all about the matter. All of us in this house agree that Canadian soldiers and their wives should be brought home and rehabilitated first; and no one proposes that the thirty thousand persons in Britain and the twenty-five thousand in the Netherlands who have already indicated their desire to come to Canada should be brought here to replace those who are no longer here. The fact that immigration may be impracticable to-day is no reason for dodging the responsibility of making definite plans for to-morrow; and to-morrow is almost here.

What are some of the reasons that are given? One of the fears is that one's job will be in jeopardy if workers are given a stake in Canada. The second fear is that business will be ruined by letting in competitors. How these elements can interfere with an intelligent immigration policy is beyond me! Surely it can be shown that Canada is still in its infancy and that its potentialities are unlimited. How can we convince these people that there is enough here for all of us, yes, even much more than we can possibly anticipate? Canada is in the position the United States was in when it had only twelve million people, and I think most hon. members will agree that it would have been a tragedy for the United States to stop at twelve million people. That country has made a great contribution to the world. We must calculate our absorptive capacity, as the previous speaker said, and in the light of that lay down a policy and stick to it. We might well point out to the man who is afraid of losing his business or his job that it is fallacious to think that the immigrant in any way interferes with either his business or his job, except to do it good. If Canadian industry were exhausted; if the Canadian labour market were exhausted, then something might be said on behalf of those people who fear, but surely it is not necessary to labour the point that Canada has not yet reached the limit of her expansion in industry or agriculture. According to a report issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, refugees who have been permitted in from Europe have established over one hundred new industries in Canada, ranging from ceramics to diamond cutting. Not only do immigrants create business; they help it. As for the fear of the agriculturist, I need only recall that in the ten years between 1921 and 1931 some 437,000 Canadians moved from rural to urban centres, and have not yet been replaced. To-day we note an ever-growing shortage of labour in the heavy industries: construction, mining, road building, logging, all industries whose workers traditionally have been recruited from the immigrant class. If native-born Canadians are not entering these fields we must look elsewhere for the necessary man-power. If in this house we can formulate a sane yet generous immigration policy we shall be giving the most direct assistance to the victims of this war.

I wish I could adequately tell hon. members exactly how the people of Europe feel. To have observed them was in itself a saddening experience, but what one remembers most about them is not that they are habitually cold, habitually hungry and habitually ill-clad, but that they do not seem to have any hope. Before them they see at the best an existence sustained by endless work and at the worst a repetition of the same bloody pattern of their generation. I have here a cutting from the Montreal Star of Thursday, March 14, which reads:

> Vatican City, March 14—Pope Pius told a group of United States citizens in private audience yesterday that immigration could "help solve Europe's saddest problem." The group included Ugo Carusi, United States commissioner of immigration.
> "The question of immigration is one in which your countrymen have had large experience and competency," he said. "For centuries the shores of America have offered generous hospitality and haven to peoples of other lands."
> The Pope said it was "not surprising, however, that changing circumstances brought about certain restrictions on immigration."

From the point of view of common humanity it seems to me that we should be doing more than we are doing at the present time. We are sending our surplus foodstuffs and our second-hand clothing, but I think that is the easiest thing we can do. The way of humanity would be for Canadians to share their heritage with some of the people of Europe, remembering that it is not ours as of right. Humanity calls upon us to share our good fortune with those people who are not ungrateful, who are not unappreciative. We shall find that they are among our most loyal and zealous citizens, remembering that they came from lands of misery and oppression.

I do not think we can formulate a policy without taking these matters into consideration. If we cannot give them immediate haven we can at least hold out hope. That is the path of humanity. If we are interested in ourselves, then let us examine the situation from the point of view of self-interest. Industry needs more people to-day in order to be more productive. Industry needs also a domestic market. Transportation and communications are available for all the people that we can bring in, in the foreseeable future.

Workers are needed for the heavy industries, the construction industry, the mining industry and the logging industry. We need domestics in this country, and we need them badly. Agriculture is begging for labour. They need these people and they must have them very soon. Economists tell us that we need people not only to provide a domestic market but for our foreign markets. We cannot expect to export without doing some importing as well.

In so far as the man on the street is concerned, he is more than anxious to share the heavy burden of taxation with anybody at all. He knows that we need population. He does not know just how many people we need or where they should be placed; that is a matter for the government. It can give some direction in that regard. There are such people as we need and that we can absorb. They are available in countries with progressive economies and with domestic ideas. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I must ask the government: What are we waiting for? Last session I pointed to the problem. This session I warn of the danger unless we attack the problem. I hope it will not be necessary for me to condemn the government at any time because they have not dealt with the problem.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I begin by reading the resolution, because I think the mere reading of it will convince everyone that it is acceptable in its present form:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability—

Those are the words.

—of instituting a reasonable immigration programme, planned in accordance with Canada's absorptive capacity, its economic needs and possibilities of development.

I compliment the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) upon being able to read so well and to absorb what he reads, because it may be news to some hon. members that in December, 1942, a political party held a convention in the city of Winnipeg. I am quite sure that those papers circulate as far as the benighted place in which my hon. friend lives.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not a benighted place.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is not a benighted place? All right; we will let it go at that. I was merely trying to me humorous. This is what they said:

Canada is destined to be one of the world's great nations provided we vigorously develop our vast natural resources.

[Mr. Croll.]

In considering any immigration policy we will first make sure that our own people, including primarily those in our armed forces and war industries have jobs.

We favour a long-term policy of immigration to:

Assure development of our vast natural resources and create employment.

Increase home consumption of our own products and thus make us more self-supporting and less dependent on the hazards of foreign markets.

Immigration must be selective. Preference must be given to those whose background, training and love of freedom best fit them for citizenship in Canada.

I do not read that as covering everything from A to Z in connection with this problem. The difficulty with that resolution of my own party is that it is open to the same criticism as are the remarks of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) and of the mover of the resolution. It deals in generalities. It expresses hope, and I will be frank and say that I am not in position to improve very much upon what has been said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, by the hon. member for Spadina, and by this resolution.

Let us be practical about this thing. Consideration, yes; and I have no doubt that when the minister stands up he will tell us that they are giving it active consideration. But let me say this. Those of us who speak of the broad policy of immigration must be completely forgetful of our housing conditions. Anyone who suggests that at this moment we should bring into this country any number of persons is surely forgetful of the fact that at the moment we are unable to house our own people, particularly those who have returned to us from service in the Canadian forces.

But that is not an argument against the real wording of the resolution—"consideration." We have heard to-day from the hon. member for Spadina, whom I regard as the second best speaker in this house. I am not pointing to myself, because I really do not know who takes first place. I remember so well the hon. member discussing this matter last year, but, with respect, he said largely the same thing, although he clothed it in different and more beautiful language.

There is no doubt about the fact that a home market is the best market, but what is a home market that does not earn its living and cannot pay for the things which are produced? I know I am playing right into the hands of my hon. friends over here for a moment, but if they will follow me long enough they will find that the trail has turned and that they are still on the by-road which they have been on for a long, long time.

We have had immigration in days gone by. The hon. member for Spadina has told us of the many untilled acres that we have. We had a debate in this house the other day about untilled acres in the northern part of Alberta and British Columbia—I see the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) back there; but why are they not tilled? Because even now, with the world crying for food, we cannot till them effectively, on account of lack of transportation. This thing cannot be regarded all by itself; it must fit itself into the great puzzle—and I use that word advisedly—of our economy. I should get applause for that word from the planners to my left. After all, it is something which has been built up through changing circumstances through the lifetime of everybody in this house.

What happened under our last policy of bringing farmers into this country? They must serve on a farm for six months. How many of them are there to-day? Not five per cent of the people we brought in under that policy. I have no statistics to prove it, but in areas with which I am familiar I am perfectly certain that that percentage is correct. Why will they not stay on the farms? For the reason advanced the other day in another building in which I was: that farming has not been profitable. You men in this House of Commons who come from farms and who have sons coming back from this war are having difficulty in maintaining them there. Why? It is easy to say that the farmer in Canada has been better off in the past five years than he has ever been before. Certainly he has; there is no question about it. But the sons are not staying there because farming is not profitable.

I am going to pose a question for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who I see has just come into the chamber; and I flatter myself it is because somebody told him I was speaking. If one looks over the history of Canada, and those of us who have been in this country for any length of time know this, it will be realized that the hard work has been done by the immigrant. The mines, the work in the brickyards, the labour on the farm, the bush labour—all that has been done by the immigrant. It is true that he grew up, got himself some cash, and as his intelligence merited or warranted he went on and did many other things. My own grandparents came to this country on the same basis. Now we have the German prisoners of war, to whom the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) referred, and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank)—if it was not he, it should have been—helped him out by talking about the Japs; and we have also the conscientious objectors. In spite of all that we are going to have some difficulty in finding the men to do the hard work. I think the Minister of Labour, before he is through will be rather badly off to produce the men. We have already heard something in this house about beets—

Mr. MITCHELL: It is the same all over the world—in the United States, Britain and Australia, for example.

Mr. SMITH: (Calgary West): I am sorry the minister told me that, because having listened to him in this House of Commons, and having listened to the Prime Minister flattering him the other day, I thought we would be infinitely better off in that respect than those other countries. But that is the position. Do not think that I am blaming the men who went into the army or into industry and through study and apprenticeship and so on became skilled in certain trades. People do not go back in this world. Those who talk about the standard of living, and there are some foolish enough to do it, say that we have to tighten our belts. I believe in thrift; of course I do, but no body of people and no nation ever achieved a certain standard of living and then went back without a revolution. Let us just think that one over.

And so it is up to us here who ostensibly at least—and I use the word ostensibly advisedly—are supposed to give guidance and direction to business and government, to start with that as a foundation, that people never go back unless there is very serious trouble.

I know the procrastinator. It is easy to abuse him. It is easy to say to him: You are all wrong; open the doors, let the flood come in, and let nature or something else take its course. I for one, and I think I speak on behalf of those who are with me, certainly believe in selective immigration, but while we have any large measure of unemployment, and while our housing situation is as it exists to-day, I think it would be extreme folly to open our doors to immigration. We hear that Australia is going to treble its population of 7,000,000 within ten years, and that New Zealand, by going after this thing, is getting the cream of the crop. But the cream of the crop only shows in the testing. I think there will be plenty of people left who will want to come to this country when we have got over this period of crisis—because it is a period of crisis both in jobs and housing. I have no lack of faith in our future. I do not believe the estimates of our population as given by our leader the other day from some statistical brochure of the government. I think those estimates are low. I think we can develop. It is true to say that we have only scratched the surface as yet—and it is the precambrian shield, not the Laurentian, Mr. Spadina. I know that there are many things under the ground. We who live in a favoured part of Canada know a little bit about oil. We know that it does not stop at the international boundary, that it does not stop two miles underground. We know that we hav greatness before us. We know that we have splendid transportation systems. Years ago we claimed that we had too many. When I was going to school—perhaps I had better not go back that far—we were building the Grand Trunk Pacific, a great part of which has since been abandoned. But we have the structure—let us not deny it—the skéleton to which we can add the flesh. We have before us the greatest future of any country in the world. But let us not put a cancer in the side of that growing body now by destroying the faith of those who have come back in our determination to fulfil our promises to them.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who moved this resolution (Mr. Thatcher) has presented his case with great ability and with a high sense of humanity. He referred to the distress and poverty among the peoples of Europe, and he was perfectly right in recalling to this house the extreme distress that exists in Europe to-day. Nevertheless I regret to have to oppose this resolution, for reasons which I shall explain to the house shortly, in my mother tongue.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, the resolution moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of instituting a reasonable immigration programme, planned in accordance with Canada's absorptive capacity, its economic needs and possibilities of development.

Experience shows that a reasonable immigration programme cannot possibly be carried out. I do not question the sincerity of the mover of this resolution. But I believe that the time is ill-chosen even for its consideration. It is not when returned men are looking for employment and shelter that any thought should be given to opening the door to immigration, even on a moderate scale. When more than 200,000 people are unemployed, our duty is to solve that distressing problem rather than make it worse through immigration, however moderate it might be. There is no room for immigrants in Canada. Our sole duty is to put our own house in order. It would be inconceivable that we should do otherwise; we would thus disregard our responsibilities. Let us at least show some fairness to those who are in search of a job or a house. When our soldiers are still policing Germany, is it proper that the government should be asked to admit foreigners to this country? The most elementary justice demands that we bring our men back, up to the last one, before even thinking about immigration. Canada has first to ensure security for its own citizens. We are not in a position to absorb even a very small flow of immigrants. We must first restore our economic and social life. All our strength must be devoted to this worthy object. The economic needs of our country forbid all immigration. The reestablishment of social order is of greater import than any kind of immigration. The return to civilian life of our thousands of young men who have served in our armed forces must be undertaken with method, fairness and justice. Those whose careers have been interrupted or jeopardized by the war are entitled to assistance and protection by the government.

I now come to the third part of the resolution moved by the hon. member:

> Canada's possibilities of development.

Our country is rich in natural resources. Part of them have not yet been developed. We do not need immigrants for that task. Our people are more than equal to it. The transition from the state of war to normal peacetime activities is a slow process. We are not short of experts and technicians for developing our resources. The conversion of our war industries into civilian industries would, alone, bring a solution for years to come to the problem of the development of our resources. We have the required manpower. How many heads of families and young men are receiving unemployment insurance benefits rather than the fruit of their labour which would ennoble their lives? Why should we allow immigrants to compete with our own citizens in the quest of jobs? This would be a disastrous policy. At a time when we must suppress subversive ideas and crime, which are frequently the result of idleness, I would not think of supporting any immigration policy. Let us find jobs for our own citizens first of all. That should be our chief consideration when thinking of an immigration policy. I am as much opposed to immigration as I am in favour of Canadian citizenship.

(Text):

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): In rising to support this motion, may I do as my colleague did, so there may be no misunderstanding, and read the resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of instituting a reasonable immigration programme, planned in accordance with Canada's absorptive capacity, its economic needs and possibilities of development.

First of all may I say that to some extent I agree with my colleague who spoke on this subject a few minutes ago. While we should certainly give consideration to this matter it would not be advisable to bring in these people at this time, when we have not housing for those of our own kith and kin, and while we have the unemployment situation which now exists. May I go a step farther than he went, and say that I do not think we should have that condition prevailing to the extent that it prevails to-day. It should have been planned against. I could take some time in setting forth an argument to prove that housing is Canada's number one problem. However, I do not want to take the time at this particular moment. The same might be said of unemployment.

I do want to take some issue with the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) in his argument that we should have more agriculturists from Europe. In my opinion agriculture has suffered more than any other activity in Canada from lopsided development. May I say before going further on that point that at the time of confederation the then prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, predicted that Canada would have a population of twenty-five million people during the quarter of a century following confederation. We all know what has happened. Mention has been made of a pamphlet put out quite recently by a government department which indicates that now they are hoping only for a population of some fifteen million at the end of this century, fifty years hence. Certainly these are two very different views, one expressed by the government of the day following confederation; the other by the government of the present day. For the life of me I cannot conceive of a government, with conditions as we now find them throughout the world, putting out a pamphlet of the kind at this time, in view of our present position and prospects. I do not believe there is any other nation whose undeveloped resources and whose developed and potential electrical power compare with those of Canada. Therefore we cannot lightly neglect the matter of immigration. We must give serious thought and planning to it. True, the Sirois commission points out that from the period of 1896 to 1913, under a very vigorous immigration policy by the government of the day, assisted by land companies and railway companies, a tremendous expansion took place in territories of Canada. Settlement took place without discrimination. The territories settled grew from about 10,000,000 acres to some 70,000,000 acres in that period. And the settlement was chiefly along agricultural lines.

I have argued many times that immigration should be on a selective basis. I have said that our development has been lopsided. I think in view of that experience we should be very careful and should encourage people who are tradesmen to come to this country now. I have pointed out the opportunities we have for development here; and in view of what has been said by the hon. member for Spadina may I make a brief reference to another article:

> Statistics prove that for the year 1937 the family of the average industrial employee consumed agricultural products to the extent of $409.35 annually. These figures for to-day would be considerably higher. On this basis, if we had five million heads of families employed in industry there would be an immediate home market in Canada for our present agricultural production.
> I am one who thinks that in a country such as Canada, with our vast undeveloped natural resources, our very cheap electrical power and the possibility for further development of cheap electrical power, we must have, during the generation following the end of the war just terminated a much greater development of peace-time industry. This would create employment for all our ex-service men and for every able-bodied Canadian willing to work. It would also necessitate an immigration policy on a selective basis for industrial development.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This is part of a speech I made in 1943, and the article from which these figures were taken appears in the Labour Gazette of that date. To those who think we should not have immigration, I would point out that it is on this selective basis that industry should be developed. It would enhance the opportunities for employment of those young people whom we are putting through our universities. I have raised this point before in connection with estimates. I have pointed out that our scientists and research workers are not paid salaries commensurate with those paid in other countries. While we had the immigration policy that was in force some years ago, our young people, born, brought up and educated in Canada, were leaving us to go to the country to the south of us because they could receive higher remuneration there.

I am satisfied that we can correct this condition on a proper selective basis, and I think it is our duty to be planning immediately instead of having a haphazard immigration policy which will admit everyone who is willing to come into the country. This country must be settled more rapidly than we are settling it to-day. It is most inhuman that we should retain these great undeveloped resources without sharing them with other people, especially when, if we did share them, we would be creating a better standard of employment and a better standard of living for our own kith and kin and those who will become citizens with us in the future. The importance of the resolution will become increasingly apparent as time goes on.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): I am very much in favour of the resolution. Before going into my reasons for favouring it I wish to say a word about the speech of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I do not often disagree with the hon. member. I do not disagree with him now, but it did seem to me that the manner in which he made his remarks certainly left the impression—it left the impression in my mind at any rate—that since we could not have immigration now, it was not of the importance which I for one attach to it, to have now a discussion of the matter with a view to arriving at a satisfactory plan for immigration.

To my way of thinking, now that the war is over and our liberty is secure, now that we can turn our eyes inwards towards the development of this great country, there is not a single thing which is more important to the economy of Canada or to full employment than that we should have a definite policy of mass immigration.

I want to put my remarks in the strongest possible terms, because I read the other day a short pamphlet on immigration which amused me very much. Probably most members received it. It pointed out that the first objectors to immigration into Canada were the Indians, and they objected because they were afraid that one more buck would be killed by the immigrant and there would not be enough meat to go around the few thousand Indians who then inhabited the country. The article goes on to point out that there is no possible opposition to a programme of immigration except from people of the "if" and "but" school. There is no one who will get up and say, "I am opposed to immigration". That would be a ridiculous thing.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): I am opposed to mass immigration.

Mr. MERRITT: I must retract what I said. There are people who are prepared to advocate a ridiculous thing. I make no bones about where I stand. I stand for mass immigration, and I mean by mass, a very great number of people, not less than 200,000 a year over a very long period.

While I entirely agree with the member for Calgary West that it would be impossible to start immigration in the year 1946, in view of the necessity for repatriating the rest of the troops and getting a housing programme going; while I agree that it would be folly to bring people into the country if we are to continue the present type of muddling over housing, instead of getting after the housing problem and providing a housing policy that will take care as well of immigrants who do come into this country, I am perfectly satisfied that the plans must be laid now.

Let me give an illustration. All hon. members will recall the events in 1942 preceding the Battle of El Alamein. There was criticism of the Churchill government over equipment available for the troops in the preceding Gazala defeat. Mr. Churchill, speaking on that subject, pointed out that the troops which had fought at El Alamein and saved Egypt were not troops sent out by the government after the defeat in the desert. They were troops sent out before that action, with the intention of going ahead to Bengazi and Tripolitania, which was eventually done. Churchill pointed out to the house that you cannot start these great movements and bring them to completion in a moment. You must make your plans long in advance. I believe he mentioned that the time taken to transport a division from Great Britain around the cape to the middle east was six months after the executive order to proceed had been received, and the plans which the government had to lay for the campaign in the western desert were taken more than six months and sometimes as long as a year before the event about which we read in the papers. Surely the same thing exactly applies to this great problem of immigration. I shall come back to that.

For a moment I wish to turn to the reason why I say we need immigration in large numbers. The hon. member who moved the resolution was a little faint-hearted. He said that immigration would probably create more employment. I am quite satisfied that it is the one way to full employment, to increasing production which can come only from an increase in the man-power of this nation.

To the north of us we have a great new frontier and, thank goodness, we are becoming conscious of it. It is the last frontier in the world. A few days ago we had a debate on the Peace River railway, the Pacific Great Eastern. From what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) said on that occasion it was obvious to me that such a railway cannot be built economically with the present population in that area. There is only one way to have that railway built, and everybody knows that we need it. That is to bring into the area a population which will support the railway. That applies right across the country.

If hon. members would like to know one way to full employment, I believe I can help them. As I came east for this session I stopped off in the mining town of Geraldton in northern Ontario. I found it a pleasant little town of twenty-five hundred people. It contained two-storey buildings and every possible modern facility. It might be of passing interest to remark that very few people in the town were over forty years of age. The town exists because of four producing mines in the immediate vicinity. These people are there because of the discovery and development of these mines. I should like to have the reaction of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to the existence of this town. I am quite sure that if these 2,500 people were in Toronto, Winnipeg, or one of the other big centres in Canada, these ministers would be much more worried than they are to-day over employment. When I was in Geraldton I was shown pictures of the town as it existed twelve years ago. All that existed was one building. Now there is a town which compares favourably with the majority of the towns in my own province, and is greater in population than many.

The other day I suggested that it is the existence of such towns as Geraldton and others that makes it possible for the industrial and financial developments which we have in our big cities. I am convinced that no other thing makes this possible.

At the moment there is tremendous activity in the mining area of Red Lake. In the course of years we shall find the same thing happening there as happened in Geraldton. This is an area which has mines in an indefinite state of development. One can get into the area at the moment only by air. I venture to prophesy that in ten years' time there will be in that area many more than 2,500 people earning a good living for themselves and, incidentally, supporting the earnings of many people in our great industrial areas.

I come now to a second reason for an immediate programme of immigration. The reason, of course, is that in the country we should have a stable internal market upon which we may rely. I wish to make two broad generalizations in regard to this matter. I deliberately make them broad and general because this is an important broad policy which is being advocated and we should not get down to questions as to whether or not we can put two men here or three men there. It is customary to say that in Canada three out of every eight people depend on the export trade. That is advanced as an argument to keep up our export trade. I quite agree with it and often use the same figures myself. But at this time I wish to reverse the figures and say that in Canada five out of eight of our people depend for their livelihood on home trade. While we are doing a great deal for the export trade to look after the wants of three of the eight, granting $2 billion in export credits, I believe we should be doing something at the same time to care for the five, the greater number. We are spending $2 billion in export credits in order that people in foreign and empire countries may buy our consumer goods. I am all in favour of that, but we should also be considering the expenditure of considerable sums of money on the development in Canada of the capital goods necessary for a greater production of wealth.

I do not wish to become involved in a discussion on export trade, but at the moment we are worried about bilateralism in trade; we are worried about how we can import from Great Britain the amount of goods to balance the exports we make to her. If we do not reach some sound agreement, or if the Bretton Woods fund does not function in the way we all hope, then we have little chance of getting back any large part of the moneys that we are advancing to France, the Netherlands, the Netherlands Indies, Russia and other countries. We should spend some of our money in the development of our public facilities, which are our capital goods.

It is necessary to bring in people for three main purposes; first, for the full use of our transport system; second, for the full use of our government facilities, and third, and perhaps most important, so that we may spread taxation and thereby reduce the per capita taxation in the country.

No matter how economically we behave—and, goodness knows, this government is not behaving economically—there is no real hope of greatly reducing the per capita taxation unless we increase the number of people who are paying taxes in this country, and increase them substantially indeed. Any hon. member who has travelled across the continent on either of the great railway systems will have a vivid picture of the International Limited line along the north shore of lake Ontario and the railway line across the continent. In the one case it will be found that there is a sizable city of twenty thousand people or so every fifty miles for several hundred miles on that line. If one leaves Vancouver to come east he will find that he has to travel three hundred miles before he comes to Kamloops. I do not dare to brave the criticism of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) by trying to say how many people live there, but I know it is less than ten thousand. In all those three hundred miles one finds not towns, hardly villages, just settlements of several hundred people clustered around the railway station. That is no way to get freight costs down and lessen the cost of distribution of our produce in the country. If you want to talk about taxation, look at the civil service here in Ottawa. The civil service of Canada and of the provinces is very much greater in numbers, I understand, than the civil service of Great Britain, a country with four times as many people. We have to bear the cost of that civil service, of course, because of our tremendous distances, but there is no reason in the world—

Mr. CLAXTON: Has the hon. gentleman any figures on which to base that statement? It seems very surprising.

Mr. MERRITT: I have no figures, and I may be wrong, but for the purposes of my argument I will agree that the numbers are equal.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are wrong even in that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have you the figures over there?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have the figures for the labour department, 55,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: You may be wrong, too.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am right.

Mr. MERRITT: I am perfectly happy to leave it in this way, that whatever may be the comparison between our civil service and that of any other country, we have far too many civil servants in comparison with our total population.

I now want to come to another point, which to me is very important. We want a policy of immigration so that we may remove from the economy of this country the greatest of all tariff barriers, the embargo on human beings. I put it in that way because I think it is a vivid way of putting it. We have now an actual embargo, with very few exceptions, on the import of human beings into this country. I was most amused at the tremendous tempest in a teapot raised last session by some hon. members opposite and by the Winnipeg Free Press over the imposition of a twenty per cent duty on diesel engines. Of all the ridiculous things, Mr. Speaker, to raise such a row about, when the same government at the present time maintains practically an embargo on immigration!

Finally, of course, as other hon. members have mentioned, the questions of world peace and national defence also come into the picture. I need not go into these matters at length, because both have ben covered by the hon. member who introduced the resolution and by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). But I believe that to enable the people of Europe to have a decent, economic standard of living and so contribute toward world peace we must relieve them of part of their surplus population. The question of national defence speaks for itself. I feel sure that we shall have introduced into the house this session estimates for our armed forces based upon the decision that has been made as to their size. No doubt this will be all we can afford, but I believe every hon. member will be forced to agree they will be entirely inadequate for any kind of defence of the country. The only way we can get the money and the man-power to provide a suitable form of national defence is by increasing our population.

I now want to come to a point which explains the only difference between myself and the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) who, I see, is back in the house. The Australians say they want twenty million people, and their plan calls for seventy thousand the first year and one hundred thousand a year thereafter. For some months now they have had a committee working in the United Kingdom and on the continent—I believe headed by a cabinet minister—laying their plans and indicating their desire to accept large numbers of immigrants. Australia has given the green light to immigration. What have we done? We have done nothing so far. The other day I deliberately placed a question on the order paper to find that out. I asked how many applications had been received for immigration to Canada, and I was told that no record of applicants existed. I wish to refer to a press clipping in that connection, which appeared in January of this year in the Vancouver Province. In it a returned soldier who was connected with the Maple Leaf, the Canadian army newspaper, is quoted as having said:

Canada has done a great job of promotion over there . . . Among Belgians particularly, and among Dutch and French, there is a great desire to come to Canada. The Canadian consular office in Brussels is besieged by citizens who regard Canada as a sort of "promised land."

All servicemen met many people in Europe whom they would consider suitable to come to this country, but how in the world are we to keep those people from going to Australia or some other country unless we at least tell them now, "You have the green light, and as soon as we can make arrangements for you we will bring you in." That is what Australia did. In the pamphlet dealing with the Australian programme it is clearly stated that Australia proposes to look after the reestablishment of her veterans and her housing problem before she brings her scheme into large-scale operation, but the pamphlet also states, "But, nevertheless, all plans are being laid now." That is what I ask from this government; not that they start flooding the country this month with mass immigration, but rather that they indicate to prospective immigrants that they are going to adopt such a policy and, second, that they lay their plans and announce them as soon as possible in order that these prospective immigrants may have a choice between Australia, New Zealand and Canada and may not be forced to go to the antipodes. The government of Australia is also arranging assisted passages for veterans, and giving preference to families with young children, who they think will be the most suitable type of immigrants. I say that is right, because the greatest wealth an immigrant can bring with him is not cash in his pockets but rather his character, education and occupational skill.

When I come to the question of ccupational skill I wish to point out that all the great movements of immigration into this country in past years have been in periods of great prosperity; and in my view that prosperity has been brought about by this immigration. Why do people want to come to Canada? It is because here they have a greater hope for freedom than in their native countries, and also because they hope to be able to get capital assets in their new home. Our previous mass immigration movements have relied upon homestead lands and railway lands to give the immigrants that capital, and have relied also upon railway construction. In this new era we still have vast acreages of land available for immigrants, provided that we conduct irrigation schemes, and we still have some railways to develop. However, the public capital facilities most needed now are power projects, irrigation schemes and things of that kind, as well as housing; and it is my view that the government should coordinate a mass immigration programme with the provision of these capital requirements, in order to allow the immigrants to catch on in the country. Comparatively speaking, it would not cost the government a very great sum of money to do that. There can be no doubt that private business would respond to the challenge and would respond to the promise that their markets would be continuously extended in the very near future.

We have in this country a great need for the development of communications and for the development of housing. I have seen an estimate that this country needs at the present time 700,000 housing units. Of course, if we brought in more people, more housing units would be required. As I have mentioned, we need irrigation and water and power supply. I have here a pamphlet of the Canadian construction association stating that the post-war projected works will total over three billion dollars.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the motion before the house deals with immigration.

Mr. MERRITT: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, if I am straying from the subject matter of the motion. What possible hope have we of expending vast sums like that, made up partly of public money and partly of private money, if we are not going to share the benefits of those works and the costs of those works among an expanding and quickly expanding population?

I close my remarks by reiterating one important point. The decision as to whether mass immigration into this country is to be permitted cannot be left to the time when we propose to allow immigrants to start coming in. A decision must be made, now, for two reasons. One is so that the people whom we propose to attract here will know they have a chance of coming and will not make other arrangements. Second, this policy should be decided and announced now so that people in this country, not only in the government but in private walks of life may know the kind of economy we may expect in the post-war years and be able to make plans and gear their businesses to the type of economy that has been decided upon by the government. I hope that we shall have no "if" or "but" opposers of immigration and that a plan will be announced with all the necessary safeguards within the next few months.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, whether mass immigration is a wise policy or opposition to mass immigration is ridiculous cannot be decided as lightly as the hon. member (Mr. Merritt) has just done. Peopling a country is not like packing sardines into a tin. The question of immigration and the possibilities of our country providing a decent standard of living for a much larger population has been a matter of great concern to economists who have failed to be in agreement with one another on the matter and who have not tried to dispose of the matter as lightly as has the hon. gentleman.

I think it was quite appropriate that the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) should bring in this resolution. I may not be in agreement with all those on this side, but I think within the life of this parliament, if not during the life of this session, this country should determine its immigration policy. It is highly necessary that we know where we stand on the question. People outside Canada should know what to expect from this country.

The immigration laws have been too elastic and, if I may say so, the administration of those laws has been more or less of a hodge-podge during the last thirty years. Fortunately, the branch has been under able ministers, and under every government there have been conscientious civil servants carrying on this work, to whom I am pleased to pay a compliment, both to those who have retired as well as to those who are still in office. But the fact remains that for the last twenty-five or thirty years Canada has had no definite immigration policy and has had also very unsatisfactory immigration laws.

I do not intend to discuss all the details of the problems of immigration, but I should like to touch upon two questions that have been mentioned by some of the previous speakers. First, it has been said that Canada is empty, that Canada needs a much larger population if we are to dispose of our surpluses or of our production, whether in agricultural fields or in industry. That brings up the argument for mass immigration which has been so ably presented by the hon. member who has just spoken but with whom I cannot agree.

There is another school of thought which contends that we should have an open door for anyone who comes from the British isles and a door kept only partly open for those who do not come from the British isles. I am opposed to that line of thinking and I intend to say a few words about it. There is another school of thought which opposes all immigration, and again I am opposed to that. It seems that I am against everything. But the fact of the matter is, I think a happy medium could be found in the form of functional immigration, and I shall say a few words about this before I close my remarks.

Dealing with the argument of those who say that this country is empty, I think it would be interesting to note what studies have been made in the past by economists and others who have dealt with this problem. I believe statistics were quoted last session to show that Canada could have a population of 100,000,000 people or at least 80,000,000. I have tried to find some information on this matter, and I remembered having been in Hamilton in 1943 when I heard Professor Dawson of McGill university discussing this question. As I could not remember all his argument I got hold of the text of his lecture. I find that people are far from agreeing with one another as to our possible maximum population. Those who have looked into this matter seriously put their estimates much lower than those who estimate between 80,000,000 and 100,000,000. I should like to quote from Professor Dawson's work because I think he is much more eminently versed than I and many other hon. members are in this matter. Speaking on May 24, 1943, as president of the Canadian political science association, Professor Dawson said:

> In recent years we have heard much about the so-called overpopulated and underpopulated countres. The crudest form in which notions of this kind are presented is in terms of number of people per square mile of land surface. By this device Canada's 2½ per square mile seems to demonstrate obvious underpopulation as compared with England's 390, forgetting that this 390 involves resources not only at home but also abroad.

It must be remembered that the population of the British isles does not thrive only upon the exploitation of the land. It exists mainly through trade and commerce. This is one argument that will be brought up in a short time when the question of the British loan is before us, which loan I will approve. I say that now in order to reassure some of my hon. friends. The argument will be advanced that Britain must import from the outside considerable materials which she in turn manufactures into finished products. British shipping thereby profits by hauling these products, and considerable capital is also made by the manufacture or treatment of these goods while in the country before they are exported to other countries as finished products. I might use the following as an example: if my hon. friend the member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) succeeds in his negotiations, and I am told that they are about completed, we shall be able to manufacture in Canada some rayon or celanese. Formerly a pulp made out of British Columbia wood was sent to Britain and there converted into rayon or celanese and then brought back to Canada and sold at a considerable profit. It was just a small item in the list of raw materials processed in Great Britain, but from now on, because of the ability and initiative of the hon. member for Beauce, a factory is being organized in the city of Quebec to treat and manufacture the pulp and make the finished product here.

But I am getting away from my first argument, that Britain can support a population much greater than ours because of its highly industrialized areas and by importing goods from all parts of the world and manufacturing them in Britain into finished products, thereby giving work to a very much larger population than its own resources alone would permit.

Those who base Canada's possible population on her area, on the surface of land, fail to take into account the actual conditions within the country. We seem to be on safer ground when we follow Professor Dawson and take the arable land surface as a base for presenting population densities.

I have often said that instead of having a nice red map of Canada in our school books we should show, in white, what parts of this country are covered with ice and snow and are not occupied and cannot be lived in except perhaps by a musk-ox expedition. Then we should show, in a light colour, perhaps in pink, —I did not say rose—the areas which can be inhabited part of the year, and finally show in a stronger shade those parts where there is arable land.

But to come back to Professor Dawson, if we figure out our population according to the arable land surface, we see that Canada is not so vacant because we have 121 people per square mile of arable land, which is vastly different from the figures that are used by some people who say that we could have a population equal to that of the United States, if not larger. Professor Dawson says:

> The arable land index should be supplemented by indices of available minerals, and closely allied items.

And so on. Nevertheless that would not warrant Canada in having such a large population as some people advocate. Professor Dawson says:

> In supporting this point of view—
> The point of view that Canada is an empty country.
> —the great mass of Canadians believe that Canada is a country of boundless resources, meagrely developed and offering great opportunities for population expansion, not only by way of natural increase at home but by immigration from abroad. Our school books have built this picture into our minds. Publicists keep inflating this conception throughout our adult years.

I might in passing remind the hon. gentleman who just spoke that with sound economic conditions within the country in past years we would not have needed immigration to have a population as large as Canada has to-day. Canada could have reached her present size of population, given sound economic conditions, without immigration, just by the natural increase in population if it had not suffered from emigration. Without the policy of forced immigration which was started forty or fifty years ago, given good economic conditions, and no emigration, Canada would have been able to reach her present population by natural increase alone, and therefore I gather that the main point that we should have under consideration is that of having a government in this country that will give to Canada as good administration as we have had in the last ten years—that is the political note in this, Mr. Speaker. Let us give the people decent standards of living which will prevent them from drifting over the boundary into the United States. By doing that we shall have, through the natural increase in population, as large a population by 1980 as Canada can sustain with a standard of living comparable to that of the United States.

Economically and geographically Canada and the United States are so vastly different that we cannot compare them simply by surface area. But we must take into account also the climate and those innumerable other factors which economists consider before arriving at their conclusions. It is all very well to speak of mass immigration, but we must also consider the productivity of which the country is capable, what parts of the country are climatically habitable, and what parts of the country we can develop with a chance of providing a decent living for our people. We have to consider so much more than is taken into account by those who simply look at the map and our surface area and say that we need a vast population to provide markets for our products. But first of all, people must have productive and remunerative work. They must have land which they can till or industries where they can be employed. Let us agree that Canada needs a larger population than she now has. But we do not need mass immigration, as some hon. gentlemen on the other side are advocating. Far from it.

Professor Dawson in his conclusions is quite conservative. Others are a little more optimistic. Professor Dawson says:

> The shock of disillusionment enters Canadian minds when someone points out that in terms of its population possibilities Canada, like Australia, is a relatively small country and not as big as the United States. The Canadian shield and other non-arable mountainous areas comprise most of Canada. The remaining land surface is roughly 1,000,000 square miles, of which approximately 550,000 square miles is available for potential agricultural settlement, much of it very problematical. Less than one-half of this is now occupied. These latter figures give a clue to Canada's size in terms of potential settlement.

As I said before, one must not simply look at the map, because these other factors have to be taken into consideration. Professor Dawson goes on:

> The pressure of the forces of nature against the settlement process in Canada is further indicated by the fact that we have been able to absorb only a portion of those available.
> For the past two decades the prairie region has become an area of emigration rather than immigration. There will be some further expansion in farm acreage, but this will take place more slowly and with greater difficulty.

Now, for my friends of the prairies, Professor Dawson has this advice:

> This expansion will offer a limited opportunity even for those who live on the prairies.

The development is not illimitable. There are limits to the development of the prairies, and those who have made a thorough study of the question have realized it. Professor Waines, in his study called "Prairie Population Possibilities," which has been published under the auspices of the Rowell-Sirois commission, has this to say:

> The material presented in this review affords no basis for the belief that the presently unexploited resources of the prairie provinces are capable of supporting large additions to the present population. Assuming a continuance of present factors it appears that the prairie provinces will not find it easy in the early future to support their own natural increase, and that any attempt to enhance the population by assisted immigration or land settlement schemes will probably merely accentuate to that degree the present emigration.

That is not my statement; it is from a professor who was considered versed enough or enlightened enough on such questions to be called by the Rowell-Sirois commission to prepare a study for their consideration on that matter. To go back to Professor Dawson, I might add this statement of his:

> In terms of our climate, resources and competitive location, the evidence points against any marked expansion of occupational opportunities.

[Mr. Picard.]

Which is another thing to be considered.

> Indeed we may be pushed to the limit to give chances for livelihood to our present population as augmented by natural increase.

I have considered this question objectively, as has been my habit through life, to try to find out the facts. I had no preconceived ideas. I do not get them from any newspaper, whether in my city or province or elsewhere. I just want to try to have an opinion of my own on the question. I have tried to find the arguments on both sides. When I was with the late Mr. Lapointe I was fortunate in that he received a great deal of information on immigration from all kinds of immigration societies, and I retained it for my own use when the files were disposed of. Some expressed very eloquently the belief that we should be the second British empire, the heart of the British empire, and bring all the British isles over here—which might be easy to do geographically but not so practical ethnically. My mind has been much more satisfied on this question by the studies of Professor Dawson, as well as those of Professor Forsey, from which I shall quote in a moment. Frankly, I believe that no hon. member should approach this question with a biased mind. There are some, in my province and elsewhere, who say that we do not want anybody; that we are satisfied to be alone: there are others who say, let us open the doors to our friends on condition they are of our own racial stock. My opinion is different, and I shall give it as I conclude my remarks. But I beg every hon. member, when he considers this question, whether he is now inclined to one side or the other, to open his mind to arguments from the other side, and then to try to find where lies the happy medium for our country. I do not think the solution is to be found in mass immigration; I do not think it is to be found through the closed door. There is bound to be a happy medium.

Professor Dawson is more conservative than anybody else. He has devoted many years, he says, to incidental studies of the question; that is, he has not spent many years in an exclusive study of it but has given quite a lengthy period of time throughout his life to incidental studies of the matter, and he comes to a conclusion which, to me, seems a bit pessimistic, that Canada could give a standard of living comparable to that of the United States to a population of only eighteen million people. As I say, I think that may be pessimistic, although the man is much better versed in economy than I can be. Professor Forsey is inclined to go to a limit of thirty million; yet he himself admits that that may be stretching the possibilities of the country. He says that it cannot be foreseen, that it depends on the development of economic trends throughout the world, and on many other factors on which the figures cannot be available, and on problems of which he cannot foresee the solution, but he thinks the most optimistic appraisal could reach that figure. That might be put into the possession of those who, when they go back to Britain, and sit on commissions to investigate conditions in Canada, come to conclusions somewhat like that Australian professor who used to say that we could have on our eastern shores about one hundred million people, or, including the eastern shores of the United States and Canada, about 130,000,000 in that part alone. Such fantastic figures cannot be supported by anybody. The most conservative figure is 18,000,000. The most optimistic implies, as Professor Forsey says, the possibility of extending our arable lands farther to the north, climatic changes, and improvements in the possibilities of inhabiting cold climates, as have been attempted in Siberia and certain parts of Russia. But taking all these things into account, and trying to be fair to those who believe that Canada can maintain a huge population, he concludes that we cannot reach a figure higher than I have mentioned. As Professor Forsey says:

> It is not a question of how many human beings can squash into a particular territory, nor even of how much that territory can physically be made to produce, cost what it may, it is a question of costs and markets.

It is not a question of sending people there and saying, we will put them there even if it means a loss; we must have people in that part of the country. If we want to have in Canada a sound economy we must make sure that the people who are located anywhere will produce at a marked advantage to the economy of the country in general. Professor Forsey says:

> We might, for example, divide the nine million acres of unoccupied "agricultural" land in the northwest territories into 56,250 farms of 160 acres each, and we might succeed in growing a crop on them. But how much would it cost? And where could we sell it, and at what price? Of the already occupied farm land in Canada only about 38·5 per cent is actually in use.

That refers to the amount which is occupied. Maybe only half of the potential arable land is occupied, but even where it may be usable from a climatic point of view, much of the land does not lend itself to cultivation with profit, because the geographic conditions are such that the land cannot be profitably operated. It is not worth while to cultivate it because, says Professor Forsey:

> . . . the produce costs too much to grow; because markets are too restricted or too far away, or both; because of European and American tariffs, quotas and embargoes.

It is admitted by everybody that the farmer can no longer live directly off his land except at an exceedingly low standard of living. On the pre-depression standards of western Canada, says Professor Dawson, he had to buy two-thirds of his living necessities. No civilized man could be expected to obtain all his wants out of the products of nature.

These are the aspects of the argument which have convinced me that geographically Canada cannot accept a vast immigration scheme, having regard to its natural growth, as we have seen it in the past. As I said before, had there been no emigration from Canada, and no forced immigration, our population to-day would be exactly what it is. Let us give the country a sound economical administration and we shall retain the people we have without being under the necessity of bringing in 200,000 a year, as someone suggested.

There is another point. Some people say that we should throw our doors open to immigration from the British isles. I have no prejudice at all against anyone from the British isles. I have visited Great Britain quite often and have been well received there, and I have admired the qualities of the British people, not only as empire builders but in many other ways. Although I am of French descent, I do not mind saying that on one occasion a scene I witnessed brought tears to my eyes. I see some of my hon. friends smiling, but that was my reaction to the union jack. I was cruising on the Adriatic and our ship was supposed to enter the Bay of Kotor in Jugoslavia. We were told that we had to be up by 5.30 a.m., and though that was not in keeping with my habits, I did get up. As the sun was dispersing the mists of the morning we saw sombre masses on the water not very far from our cruise ship, and we heard a bugle call. Presently a flag was hoisted and it was the union jack. The whole Mediterranean fleet was at anchor in that vast bay. I was surrounded by Americans, and, though it may sound queer to some hon. gentlemen, I did have a feeling of pride at the thought that I was a British subject.

I take people exactly as I find them for what they are, and when it comes to immigration I consider them from the point of view of what they can give the country. I cannot believe that opening our doors wide to anyone who is British is necessarily the best thing for Canada, and in the few minutes left to me I shall illustrate my view on this point. In my opinion we should consider immigration in relation to certain groups which I shall enumerate.

The first group, comprising people who are educated and who at the same time have money, will prefer to stay at home. Those who have established businesses and business connections will normally remain in their own country rather than come to Canada. We might have some people from other European countries who, having suffered as they have done, are willing to take whatever capital they have left and come here and buy land, or establish a business in Canada. Anyone in Britain who is well off will not, however, come to Canada merely for the sake of helping us.

The second group will comprise those people who have a little capital and who desire to emigrate. Such people will do as they did before the war. They will go to India, if they are still welcome there, or they will go to Burma, where cheap labour costs have in the past produced substantial profits. Those people, having a little money, will invest it where it will bring them the greatest financial returns and they will not come here simply to increase the population of Canada or to provide more profits here. People in the British isles who have capital and who are willing to come could be the preferred ones; I grant even that to you, but we should not exclude people from other countries who also have capital and who are willing to invest it here. But there should be no hide-and-seek capital as there was at one time to circumvent our immigration laws. At that time someone would deposit $1,000 in a bank in Canada in the name of So-and-so, some prospective immigrant, who would come into the country, and after that capital had remained in the bank for a few months, it was transferred back to the society overseas and deposited again in the name of someone else, another immigrant, to enable that person to come into the country. That applied, of course, to non-British because the same condition was not demanded of people from the British isles. But that practice was carried on extensively.

I would be willing to give priority but not exclusivity to people from the British isles who wish to bring in their capital and settle here, but I do not believe that many would come. I believe that they would rather stay at home. I do not blame them; they have a beautiful country and naturally they prefer to stay there.

[Mr. Picard.]

In the third group there are those people who have had a fairly good education but who are not technicians or specialists. They are not people who have business connections. They prefer England, but they are willing to make sacrifices in order to go to some other country, provided that conditions are acceptable. I met one such person on the train not long ago. He said to me, "You should hold out some inducement to us. We are somebody and we should be sure of having jobs when we come here, instead of being left at the caprice, at the mercy of someone in Canada. We are somebody, and the moment we come in we should be given special treatment."

Well, in my opinion they are no better than the people our universities turn out from Halifax to Vancouver. They are not specialists, but ordinary, well-educated people, and we have many such people in Canada who are quite capable of filling the jobs that are available. We should not throw our doors open to those people. They are no better than our people because they come from the British isles. I have said to such people, "The Canadian Pacific Railway company, the Canadian National and many large corporations, and even the civil service of Canada have given you enough preference in the past, but that should not be extended indefinitely except in the case of experts and technicians."

We have to develop the country, but at the same time we must see that our people have a decent standard of living. The people we need are experts and technicians, not simply clerks. Those we can find in our own schools. This person with whom I had the conversation on the train also said to me, "In order to induce us to face the rigours of your climate and to adapt ourselves to your way of life you should give us some special consideration." I do not agree with this. In Ontario, in Quebec and in the west there are many young men from our schools who are quite capable of managing our companies or of being clerks. We do not need to get such people from outside.

The fourth group comprises skilled labourers of whom there is a scarcity. We have a scarcity of certain technicians. I am in favour of bringing in such people either from the British isles or from the continent, because we need leather chemists, glass experts, textile experts and so on. We should open our doors to them without too many restrictions. It would be for the good of the country.

I would not close the door to anyone who could be useful and help to make Canada a greater country. Far from it. This group of people, whether from the British isles or from the continent, should be allowed to come in. I do not mind having them come from the British isles if they qualify.

The fifth group is that of unskilled labourers, unemployed persons or persons who were on the dole before they went into the army in England. They are not adaptable to Canada and they are not the people we need—at any rate until our conditions are sufficiently stabilized and we know that we can go through the after-war period without a depression and without any lowering of our productive capacity. We must make sure that we can provide work for our own population and maintain our own standard of living. If this is not assured, we must not extend our facilities to others.

I am opposed to mass immigration of this type of people. Let me illustrate this with an incident that was related to me by a former minister of the crown who is now sitting on a commission. He told me he had a large farm in the west. At the time we had opened our doors to unemployed miners from Wales or elsewhere who had not worked for a long time. They came on his farm and he said to me: "We were asking our people to get up early and work all day, to eat as much as they could. We had wagons on the farm with beans and everything they wanted to eat. They could eat ten times a day, but they had to work from sunup to sundown." He said, "After a day or two these people said, 'What about union hours?'" They did not want to work from sunup to sundown. They were not used to that. They were fed up with the condition and he was fed up with them, and most of these people drifted back to Winnipeg and other cities, and finally clogged the labour market. Some of them were not much of an asset to the country and many of them had to be repatriated overseas. I do not think that type of people can be of much use to Canada at the moment. I am still amazed if that is what is proposed by some people.

We have now come to the point where conclusions should be arrived at. If Canada had functional immigration, that is immigration of people who would become an asset to the country, it would be all to the good. We cannot foresee how future generations may turn out. They may turn out to be bad citizens, but we can at least make sure that the first generation which comes in will be useful.

I would welcome to Canada, as I indicated in my remarks, first the people with capital who wish to buy land or to establish a business in Canada. We need the type of people who can provide capital, and they should be welcomed regardless of the part of the world from which they come. The second class is specialists. We need them. There the advice of experts in economy and in the labour movement could be obtained. We should determine that and have quotas. Specialists, technicians, scientists, physicians, engineers and highly-trained people should be welcomed to Canada. We have need for them in many fields of endeavour. Skilled labourers may be a great asset to the country.

I would limit the people who come in just because they have a relative in the country. At the moment I believe the law is that wives and unmarried children under eighteen years of age joining family heads already established in Canada may be admitted. That is all right, and I agree with it, but I think in the past the policy has been to extend it to the seventh cousin on both sides. That permits a lot of people to come in because one man is already in Canada. Many of these people may not be of the same high standard as the one who has already arrived in Canada. I looked up the regulations as they existed a few years ago and they would appear to be all right. It mentioned wives and unmarried children, father and mother. I would even include brothers and sisters if they can qualify. They should be given preferred treatment, but it should not extend to the seventh cousin as has been done in the past.

Formerly farmers bringing capital sufficient to establish them on the land were admitted, but we should demand guarantees from these people. There should not be a transfer of money from one person to another and the land held nominally in the name of So-and-so to permit them to get in, and then the land sold within three months with the result that Joe ends up in Winnipeg, Montreal or some other city and the land passes to the association and another man enters on that land. We must have some security to make sure that the man who comes to settle on the land intends to settle on the land and does not want to enter another business in Montreal, Vancouver or Winnipeg.

I am against both extremes in this matter, whether they come from my province or my party or elsewhere, or from any particular group which says, "let us not open the door; let us keep it closed; it is dangerous to Canada." We need new people in limited number provided that they can be useful. I am against mass immigration of people without taking into consideration the service that they may render to the country. I am in favour of some immigration, not because they will eat our food, but because they can produce something without taking the place of some of our workers, because they can occupy land which can be cultivated; not just to bring them in for the sake of packing sardines in a tin. Let us allow these people to come in who may be an asset to Canada, and let us keep the others out whatever their racial origin may be.

I think this was an opportune time for the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) to bring this problem to the attention of the government and of the house. We must have the courage to face this matter within the life of this parliament. I am not in a hurry as other hon. members may be and say that it must be done this year. Because of the opinions I have expressed I do not believe there is any hurry about it. Within a reasonable time we must have the courage to face the situation and to formulate an immigration policy so that the population may know where it stands as far as the expansion of the country is concerned and that people in other lands may know what they can expect from us. This problem should be tackled within a reasonable time. Let us do it within the life of this parliament.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): I wish to take about two or three minutes of the time of the house to discuss this question. In my six months in the House of Commons I have already spoken three times on this subject. I feel that there has been enough said to-day and on other occasions thoroughly to convince the members of the house that immigration is one of Canada's most pressing problems at the present time. I can see only three possible solutions for the government to take. The first is to do nothing as has been done over the past few years. The second is to announce a quota which will permit people from other countries to come to Canada. I say that because lack of knowledge of what the government intends to do is causing real hardship in the country, read hardship amongst those Canadians who are interested in bringing their relatives and loved ones here. As I see it, the third solution is immediately to set up a committee on this problem, study the various aspects of it and bring down a report this session, if possible.

I was one of those who curtailed his remarks last session because I understood that a committee had been promised and would be set up this session. So far, we have had no announcement from the minister on this subject. In fairness to hon. members, who like me, understood that there would be a committee this session, the government should make some announcement on this subject.

[Mr. Picard.]

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): When we review the history of immigration before, during and after the war as set out in the splendid bluebook of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) it will be found that something should be done first of all for Great Britain. What Great Britain suffered in the war and is suffering to-day is something that should be considered, particularly with regard to those who wish to come to this country. I urge on the government that we should have a forward, courageous immigration policy adapted to Canada's circumstances. I do not mean by this that we should interfere with the employment of our own people who have been overseas, and others, but the time has come for a forward policy on immigration to let the empire know what our policy is for the three main problems of empire trade, defence and immigration within the empire, especially the latter.

After all the British people have suffered, surely we should take some steps along the lines taken by New Zealand and Australia on assisted passages for them and come at once to some agreement with them in connection with immigration adapted to our circumstances. I believe some consideration should also be given to some of those French soldiers who were on the side of the allies during the war. However, until such time as conditions improve, I believe immigration from the continent of Europe should be largely restricted for a short period of time, though in my opinion we should have in the first primary class assisted passages and other forms of assisted immigration from the British isles, though not to interfere with absorption in employment for our own soldiers and citizens.

I believe those are the three cardinal principles that should be laid down. I do not want to see the unrestricted emigration we had after the last war and between the two wars, when nearly 1,250,000 unemployed people left Canada for the United States because they could not find employment here. Those figures were given in a return tabled in the house, and they included many thousands of Canadian soldiers who had fought for their country at the hazard of their lives. Where did they go? They went mainly to the United States, owing to conditions here resulting from the trade and other policies of the government.

In conclusion, I urge upon the minister that we should decide something right away. This is a very important question. First comes migration within the empire. What is to be done to help those who assisted us during the war? I believe British immigration should come first; then migration within the empire; in the next place we have a large number coming from the United States who must be considered. Then the continent of Europe, with priority for our allies there, must be considered. In my opinion we should not bring refugees here from Europe only to become a charge on the municipalities, as happened after the last war. Let us carefully consider this matter and send them aid. I was the head of a municipality at that time, and I can tell you that refugees were brought from all parts of the world, with the result that some of them became a charge on the taxpayers of our cities and towns and on real estate. I have great sympathy for the refugees and their suffering, but I believe there are conditions within our own empire which should receive prior consideration. So that I think the time has come when the government should not be afraid to tell the people of Canada and the people of the empire what their policy is, and adopt a forward policy like those of Australia and New Zealand, for if we do not come to some agreement in connection with immigration all these people will go to Australia and New Zealand. Many people in Britain desiring to come to Canada are key men who are badly needed in various skilled industries in this dominion. I am sure many industries will be very glad to get people of this kind, many of whom they cannot get in this country, and so aid reconversion and production. Therefore I urge upon the minister that some definite action should be taken almost immediately, and a government plan announced at once, so that the house and the country may know what it is.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this resolution may I say that the discussion to-day has been particularly gratifying to me because I believe I was the first to raise the question of our immigration policy in this parliament. No doubt this matter has been discussed on previous occasions, but I brought it up in the house last September, and again a little later on. The expressions of opinion we have heard from all sides to-day have been very helpful. Whatever may be the ultimate fate of the resolution, I believe the discussion will show that all parties in this house are interested in this most important question, and it will give the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) an opportunity to place before the house his opinions and whatever plans may be ready.

I believe the question of immigration can be divided into two main categories. First there is the long-range policy, which has been particularly discussed up to the present, and then the immediate policy.

On motion of Mr. Zaplitny the debate was adjourned.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Charles H. Larose, Esquire, Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Administrator desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the deputy of His Excellency the Administrator had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name royal assent to the following bills:

Bill No. 11, an act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1947.

Bill No. 12, an act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1946.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

Thursday, April 4, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA EMPLOYEES—CONCILIATION BOARD

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last I promised a reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) as to whether a request had been received from the united steelworkers union to convene a joint conference of the steel manufacturers and representatives of the steelworkers union to discuss the matter of wage increases. I think the best answer would be for me to refer my hon. friend to Hansard of September 12, 1945, page 111, where my colleague the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) answered a similar question put by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

I feel that I should, however, state that negotiations are going on in respect to employees of the Steel Company of Canada of Hamilton. At the suggestion of the Minister of Labour for Ontario, Hon. Charles Daley, a conciliation officer was appointed and reported that a conciliation board should be constituted.

The board has been established, the members being His Honour Judge M. A. Millar, Mr. J. S. D. Tory, K.C. and Mr. J. E. McGuire.

I have not as yet received a report from the conciliation board. However, I have every expectancy that a solution will be found.

Of course, the conciliation board will not be dealing with the question of wages. The employees are asking for increases and will, of course, apply through the regional board for Ontario, and, if dissatisfied with the decision, may appeal to the national board.

I am informed the situation is that the application is under consideration by the regional board at Toronto.

I should mention that negotiations are going on in connection with an application for an increase in wages of certain employees of the steel mill at Sydney. In this case a decision of the Nova Scotia regional war labour board has been appealed to the national board and a hearing is scheduled to take place in a few days.

Under the regulations those doing the collective bargaining for the employees in the various steel plants are as far as I am aware conducting their business through the boards established for this purpose in the regular way, and I am very hopeful that a mutually satisfactory settlement of all differences will be reached.

While I am answering the question of the hon. member for Vancouver East on this subject, I deprecate "strike talk". Every once in a while I read in the papers or hear on the radio that someone, and I often wonder who the someone is, is predicting a strike. In my judgment it would be much better if the predictions were all to the effect that a settlement was going to take place. Indeed it might not be out of place, Mr. Speaker, to mention that out of 3,478 cases which have been before the national and regional labour relations boards, strikes have only taken place in eight cases which in my judgment is a very good record, and I compliment both labour and management for this record.

JUDGES ACT

JUDGES NOT TO ACT AS COMMISSIONERS OR ARBITRATORS—TO BE BOUND BY DECISION OF COURT OF FINAL APPEAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 13, to amend the Judges Act.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The proposed bill amends what is known as the Judges Act, chapter 105 of the revised statutes of 1927. The amendment consists of two sections. Section 1 provides that judges appointed by the parliament of Canada are not to act as commissioners or arbitrators on any commission or inquiry. The frequency of recent years with which judges are drafted for all kinds of such work impairs the efficient administration of justice and sometimes causes congestion in the law courts, and, as they are largely only fact-finding commissions when appointed, they duplicate the efficient powers and functions of parliament, of the committees thereof, and of the many outside boards of recent innnovation in war work. This causes delays; and they are slowly building up a system of judicial commission government in Canada.

The second section deals with judges to be bound by decisions of the courts of final appeal—the privy council or any other court of final appeal; the decisions of such courts are authoritative. The legal maxim or doctrine known as stare decisis is adopted in this amendment, and this bill will be law for all Canada, notwithstanding the provisions of any law, statute, usage, custom, or doctrine of law to the contrary. Decided cases which lay down a rule of law are authoritative and must be followed. Decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council, as the court of last resort, will be binding on all Canadian courts.

Motion agreed and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK—APPLICATIONS FOR LOANS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many applications, by provinces (a) have been made; (b) have been granted, for loans under the Industrial Development Bank?
2. What is the total amount, by provinces, of loans so granted?

Mr. MAYHEW: 1 and 2: The Industrial Development Bank is not a branch of the dominion government but a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Section 29 (1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that "The bank shall, within twenty-one days following the end of each calendar month, make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance in such form as he may prescribe, a statement of its assets and liabilities at the close of business on the last day of the preceding month." This statement as at February 28, 1946, appeared in the Canada Gazette of March 23, 1946, and showed loans and investments (excluding dominion government securities) at $1,794,472.07.

In addition, section 29 (2) provides that "The bank shall make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance at least once in its fiscal year or more frequently if so directed by the minister, in such form as he may prescribe, a classification of loans and investments and of the loans guaranteed by it." This return, tabled in the House of Commons on December 6, 1945, showed that on September 30, 1945, there were 80 authorized credits on the books of the bank totalling $3,198,050, of which $871,752 was outstanding as shown by the balance sheet.

The classification of loans and investments by provinces at September 30, 1945, was shown by this return as follows:

	Authorized	Outstanding
Prince Edward Island	$	$ .....
Nova Scotia	115,000	.....
New Brunswick	200,000	66,064
Quebec	1,052,500	459,912
Ontario	1,192,550	212,189
Manitoba	335,000	105,000
Saskatchewan	30,000	17,100
Alberta	135,500	.....
British Columbia and Territories	137,500	11,487
	$ 3,198,050	$ 871,752

WAR ASSETS—COMMODITIES SOLD FOR FOREIGN ACCOUNTS

Mr. PROBE:

1. What surplus commodities have been sold by War Assets Corporation or other agencies to or for foreign accounts since V-E day and what unit amounts of each have been disposed of to each country involved and at what sale price?

2. Where paid for other than by cash, what amounts are now owing to Canada by each country involved?

3. What firms or individuals, if any, have received or will receive commissions on the sales mentioned in question (1) and to what amounts each?

Mr. HOWE: This question comes in the class of those which can be more conveniently and more fully answered in the committee which is dealing with War Assets Corporation. The hon. member who asked the question is a member of that committee, and the officers will be in attendance there who can give first-hand answers to the questions asked. In addition I would point out that we have large contracts being negotiated with two or three countries, and it would be very difficult indeed to bring down a reply at this particular time. I hope the question can be dropped.

Question dropped.

SALES TAX—CALEDONIA FARMS LIMITED

Mr. PROBE:

1. Has the Caledonia Farms Limited made restitution of the $40,000 sales tax deficiencies claimed by the Department of National Revenue following the companies breach of the Special War Revenue Act?

2. If not, what was the settlement arrived at with respect to the unpaid sales tax?

Mr. McCANN:

1. The case tried on February 3, 1944, was not instituted by the excise division of the Department of National Revenue, but apparently by wartime prices and trade board.

An assessment for sales tax amounting to $41,808.76 against Caledonia Farms Limited was made in October, 1944.

The company was adjudged bankrupt on January 26, 1945, and a claim filed with the trustee on February 10, 1945, for the outstanding indebtedness. No dividend has yet been paid by the trustee.

2. No settlement was arrived at with respect to the unpaid sales tax.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—FILMS WITHHELD FROM DISTRIBUTION IN PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. DORION:

1. From November 1, 1929 to August 1, 1944, were any films produced by the National Film Board banned in the province of Quebec for the reason they constituted communist propaganda?

2. If so, how many?

Mr. CLAXTON: 1 and 2. No, but, out of the five or six hundred films in the French and English languages issued by the national film board in Quebec since the board was established in 1939, one film was withheld from distribution in Quebec at the request of Quebec authorities. Neither this nor any film had any communistic propaganda but objection was taken to this film because of the picture presented of the Russian revolution. The film showed the fighting achievements of Russia at a time when Canadians were glad Russia was fighting on the same side we were on, and it was a definite function of the national film board to show what all our allies were doing. As the first function of the board under its act is to produce films "designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and the problems of Canadians in other parts," a very large number of films has been made about Quebec and its people and these have been distributed throughout Canada and in many parts of the world. Among many of the finest films produced are "Alexis Tremblay, Habitant," "Pays de Quebec," "Pays de mon Coeur," "Chercheurs de la Mer," "Vallee des Dynamos," and "Sept Peintres de Quebec." Even now films are being prepared to show the beauties and resources of the eastern townships and the Saguenay.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ALLOWANCE OF SURCHARGE TO MANUFACTURERS' PRICE

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many manufacturers, if any, have been allowed to add a surcharge to the sale of their products?
2. To what products do these surcharges apply?
3. What was the date on which permission was granted to add each of these surcharges?
4. What was the amount of the surcharge in each case?

HOUSING

REFERENCE TO 53 CANADIANS OCCUPYING ONE HOUSE IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction if he is prepared to supply housing accommodation to the fifty-three Canadians in Toronto, living in one house equipped with one bath, who are now threatened with eviction if the house is condemned, which matter I brought to his attention in a speech in this house on Monday, March 25.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The question should more properly be asked of the Minister of Finance, who operates emergency shelter.

Mr. JACKMAN: I address the question, then, to the Minister of Finance. There are fifty-three people living in one house in Toronto, which house is about to be condemned, and there is no place for these people to live. I mentioned this matter on March 25 in the house, and have had no answer.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the speech made by my hon. friend on March 25, but I will bring the case to the attention of the emergency housing authorities.

Mr. ROWE: Or the Minister of Reconstruction.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

CLOSING DATE FOR ENTRANCE APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Will the Minister of National Defence announce the closing date for applications for entrance to the Royal Military College? My question is prompted by to-day's press release giving similar information about Royal Roads.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I did not receive notice of the question. The whole matter of the future of the Royal Military College is now under consideration and I hope to be able to make a statement in that regard in the very near future.

POSTAL SERVICE

PARCELS TO NORWAY AND OTHER OVERSEAS COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): May I ask the postmaster general a question? I am informed that it takes five months to send a parcel from British Columbia to Norway and it costs a small fortune. Is there any likelihood of quicker transit and a cheaper rate in the near future for parcels dispatched to foreign countries?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I shall have to look into the question as regards Norway. I know that we are sending parcels there to-day but I do not know exactly what time it takes. I shall give an answer within a few days.

AIR FORCE

BUILDINGS AT FOOT OF YONGE STREET, TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): May I ask a question of the Minister of National Defence for Air? In a Toronto newspaper there appeared a report that air force buildings at the foot of Yonge street—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The rules forbid the reading of quotations from newspapers in asking questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister whether air force buildings at the foot of Yonge street, which have formerly been a storage depot, are to be wrecked, or whether they will be used in helping the housing crisis now facing my own city.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): When any buildings are no longer required by the air force they are turned over to the war assets allocation committee, and if not required by other government departments they are then turned over to War Assets Corporation, which makes the decision regarding the disposition of such buildings.

Mr. JACKMAN: I would ask the minister to apply that very general principle to the specific case which I have given him? May I have an answer?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that the minister is not obliged to answer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPRESENTATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Arising out of a Canadian press dispatch in the Hamilton Spectator—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McLURE: May I ask the Secretary of State this question: Is it the intention of the Secretary of State to reduce the representation of Prince Edward Island in the House of Commons from four to two members?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question is not one that should be asked on the orders of the day.

CANADIAN ARMY

INQUIRY INTO ADMINISTRATION OF FORCES IN THE NETHERLANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence: Will the minister advise the house if and when the report of the committee of inquiry, headed by Lieutenant General Price Montague, into the administration of Canadian forces in the Netherlands will be tabled?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): These reports are never tabled in the House of Commons and therefore this one will follow the rule.

CANADA DAY

SUBSTITUTION OF WORD "CANADA" FOR WORD "DOMINION"

Mr. A. P. COTE (Matapedia-Matane) moved the second reading of bill No. 8, an act respecting Canada day.

He said: In proposing the second reading of the bill I shall not venture upon any remarks which will give rise to a protracted debate. When Dominion day was established by law as a national holiday our country was, for all practical purposes, and I have reference particularly to the 49th parallel as well as the whole expanse of the ocean, regarded as a possession or as a colony or as a plantation of the British crown, at least according to some constitutional and legal authorities, among which is a unanimous judgment of the Court of King's Bench delivered by Lord Chief Justice Mansfield in 1774.

But since by the statute of Westminster in 1931, which statute constituted a new charter for the nations comprising the six kingdoms, Canada has achieved a new status, from the constitutional point of view the most important event since confederation. And quoting Dr. Maurice Ollivier in his book entitled "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty":

> The statute of Westminster was therefore the confirmation of the Balfour declaration at the imperial conference of 1926 to the effect that the dominions had now become "autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another, in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations."

Therefore the appellation which may have been considered appropriate before 1931 cannot any longer be used to designate properly either our country or the day devoted to its national holiday. Furthermore, "dominion" is surely not an identification which is proper to make Canada known in its true perspective, or in any way at all either to Americans or to other peoples of the world. May I quote here my best authority, our distinguished Prime Minister:

> Incidentally, may I say that the time has come to cease speaking of "the dominions" as if they were some peculiar half-fledged type of community, and all alike in their interests and views. Such a usage leads to confusion at best, and to alibis and misrepresentation at worst. South Africa is South Africa, New Zealand is New Zealand, Australia is Australia and Canada is Canada.

Replacing the word "Dominion" by the word Canada, as far as our national holiday is concerned, will at least provide Canadians travelling outside of our country with an answer when quizzed about our national holiday—that there is a Canada day and it is on July 1, and on no other day; because for so many strangers Dominion day may as well mean New Zealand day.

The time has come, I firmly believe, our valiant men of the three armed forces having put Canada in the limelight all over the world during the conflict which has just ended, when the name of Canada should be kept in the ears and in the eyes of mankind, and at least of Canadians. Because, for a great many loyal new Canadians and perhaps for a greater number of our older citizens and their posterity, Dominion day means no more than an ordinary bank holiday. Surely it is not too early to try to give the idea to all Canadians that on July 1 they commemorate their national holiday in a true Canadian way, and that their citizenship is being given a significance on that day. I believe that Canada day bears out that message better than Dominion day.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Bill No. 8 proposes to amend a general act regarding public holidays which has been in force since confederation. In the first meeting at Charlottetown of the fathers of confederation they were unanimous in agreeing that the proposed confederation be called the "Dominion of Canada". From time immemorial we have been a dominion. We are part and parcel of the British empire. There is no reason why this bill should be introduced at this time. If the bill passes, all the history books will have to be changed. Moreover the bill is ultra vires of this parliament, because the original provinces came into confederation on a definite bargain. Speaking at Kingston in 1844, Sir John A. Macdonald said that it has always been the policy of Canada that as a dominion we are part and parcel of the British empire. Long may it continue. Had it not been for that fact we would have had the awful horror of war on our own soil. As I pointed out the other night, not only in Ontario but in Quebec and the maritime provinces we owe it to confederation that that did not happen.

I see no reason for this bill at this session of parliament. There are many bills being proposed with regard to a change in status, autonomy and sovereignty. A large body of public opinion in this country is very much alarmed at what this parliament is doing in that regard. I believe a large body of public opinion in all the provinces is against this bill. We have good history books in Quebec and in all the provinces. Confederation was brought about with the cooperation of the French people of Canada. Sir John A. Macdonald, Cartier and all the others, Liberals and Conservatives alike, made confederation possible. We have got on very well together. Like Your Honour, I have always believed in confederation and the doctrine of the old Cornish battle cry, "Each for all and all for each". What is good for one province is good for all.

The words "Dominion of Canada" were wisely selected after a great deal of consultation and thought. While we are part and parcel of the British Empire the ties are invisible under our status of autonomy and sovereignty. A million men went from the dominion in the first great war. One hundred and thirty thousand died on the field of battle. We shall always remember France, where several thousand of my own citizens are buried until the resurrection morning. I plead with hon. members from Quebec to pay tribute where tribute is due—to Britain for saving our shores from invasion. I see no reason why we should bring up such matters as this at the present time. There are more important economic matters to be decided by this parliament so that a lead can be given to the health, peace and prosperity of all our citizens. We are wasting our time on a lot of secondary matters for political purposes that could very properly be left over until the more important matters affecting the poorer classes of citizens in all the provinces, namely, housing, health matters, fuel, clothing, food, employment, and so on, have been dealt with.

I am prepared to move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), that the bill be not now read a second time but that it be read this day six months hence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Church moves, seconded by Mr. Ross (St. Paul's):

That bill No. 8, respecting Canada day, be not now read a second time but this day six months hence.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). At the present time I see no reason why we should repeal the Dominion Day Act. We are the Dominion of Canada, and Dominion day signifies something; it signifies the bringing together of all the provinces of Canada in one great country, the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understood Your Honour had put the motion and that it was voted down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The debate is continuing.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house has before it a bill proposed by the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote). I read the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

Mr. IRVINE: Is the six months' hoist debatable?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): For seventy-five years we have had Dominion day. All our history springs from the joining together of all the provinces of Canada, one by one, and that is the day which we celebrate. We celebrate the bringing together under Macdonald and Cartier of the two great races of this country. I see no reason why this controversy should be injected into our national life. Many people will take sides on this matter. All of our children know Dominion day; they have been brought up to know what it means. Our history books show what it means. To me Dominion day means that we have a great nation. I have much pleasure in seconding the motion.

Mr. J. E. SMITH (York North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote), who introduced this bill. We in Ontario have known the hon. gentleman for many years as an advocate of real, virile Canadianism and a true friend of Canadian unity. I also appreciate the views of hon. members from the city of Toronto, and give them credit for sincerity in their attitude toward this question. However, I do take issue with them when they state that this is not an important matter.

I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to rise in support of this bill, because I sincerely believe that by its adoption we can make a real contribution to Canadian national life. To-day we look out on a troubled world, a world bleeding and suffering after six long years of war. Here in our own country we have problems so perplexing and of such magnitude that sometimes I confess to a feeling of discouragement. I submit that in dealing with our national problems and in facing up to the problems of the world we must get down to a consideration of fundamentals. One great need in Canada to-day is for a patriotic siprit of determination to win the peace, comparable to the splendid spirit of patriotic determination shown by the people of Canada in the winning of the war. During the war years the Canadian people met every challenge with which they were faced during the most trying period in Canadian history. It did not matter whether the challenge was in connection with men for our armed services, whether is was in connection with money for victory loans, for the Red Cross, for munitions and supply, for food or for whatever cause it may have been; the challenge was successfully met, no matter what the sacrifice. That was the spirit in which we made our splendid contribution toward the winning of the war, and I submit that is the sort of spirit we need to win the peace.

During the long, trying years of conflict we spoke freely and hopefully of the new era which was to come after the war. The men in our fighting forces on the far-flung battle lines throughout the world were encouraged and buoyed up by the belief that they were fighting for a new world, a new era which they, their comrades and their loved ones at home would enjoy. They looked forward to that new day which would come when the forces of evil, as represented by our enemies, would be destroyed. Those enemies have been destroyed, and now we must face up to the fact that the post-war era of which we spoke so much is here. Many of the boys who fought our battles have returned; more are returning, and there are still more to come. But as we welcome them back to our communities; as we talk with them about their reconversion problems and the difficulties they face in reestablishing themselves in civilian life, we cannot help being impressed by the sincerity of their concern for our national future. And I think if we are completely honest we must admit that as we talk with them they tell us the truth when they say that so far they see more signs of the old era than of the new.

It is true that our government has made a valiant reconversion effort in the face of most difficult world conditions. It is true that this effort has been successful to such an extent that with pride and truth we can declare that we in Canada are better off than people anywhere else in the world. But this is not enough. We are still far short of the ideal of a better life and that new era which we pictured during the years of war. In attaining that ideal we must not be hampered by an unwillingness on the part of our people to make sacrifices for peace comparable to the sacrifices they were willing to make for war. I regret to have to confess that I can see signs of a tapering off of our national willingness to make sacrifices to overcome the problems of peace. It is indeed sad, if it be true, that we in Canada need the threat of falling bombs to inspire our best national endeavour; but unfortunately there is evidence that this is so. In plain language, what we need is a substitute for falling bombs to inspire the best efforts of our people.

I do not suggest that by the simple adoption of this measure designating our national holiday as Canada day we can perform a national miracle, but in all sincerity I do submit that the taking of this step at this time can be made the basis of a crusade for a revitalized national spirit which can contribute a great deal to the future well-being of Canada. Thanks to the sacrifice of our people, the name "Canada" to-day stands high throughout the world. In this, the greatest conflict of all ages, our fighting men went into battle bearing on their armour the name "Canada". The bill the house is now asked to approve simply provides that our national holiday shall bear that same glorious name, "Canada". It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, most fitting, following the measure passed by this house decreeing that Canada should have its own distinctive national flag, and following the bill so ably and eloquently introduced the other day by the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) providing a new status of Canadian citizenship, that this house should follow through now and adopt this bill designating our national holiday as Canada day.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it did my heart good to hear a good Presbyterian from the city of Toronto support this bill. When the word "Dominion" came into existence I do not think it had the approval of one of the greatest Canadians to have adorned the history of this country; I refer to Sir John A. Macdonald. I quote from the Encyclopedia of Canada:

> Dominion, the term adopted in 1867 to describe the status of Canada in the British empire, and now used to describe also the status of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Newfoundland. The story is told that the adoption of the term was due to a suggestion of Sir Leonard Tilley (q.v.) When the delegates from Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, were discussing in London, in December, 1866, the details of the British North America Act, some difference of opinion arose as to the proper term to be used to describe the new federation. Sir John Macdonald, the leading Canadian delegate, was in favour of styling it "the Kingdom of Canada"; but Lord Derby, the British foreign minister, was afraid that the word "Kingdom" would wound the tender susceptibilities of the people of the great republic to the south of Canada. The Canadians, on the other hand, were firm in rejecting the term "colony." The night of this debate, Sir Leonard Tilley, who was in the habit of reading a chapter of the bible before retiring to rest, stumbled on the verse in the seventy-second Psalm which runs, "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth." The next morning he suggested that the new federation should be called "the Dominion of Canada."

To me the name Canada has music in it. To me it represents the greatest country on earth. If there are any here who have made Canada their home, but who think that old England, Scotland or Ireland are superior to Canada, then I wonder why they left there. Ireland to me was a tender spot on this earth, but I left it and came to Canada because I thought it gave the greatest possible opportunity to the young man, greater than any other country on earth. We had lots of opportunity.

To me the name of Canada is emblazoned across the world, and stands out as the country that is going to lead in a great many things. We cannot be too careful in changes we make, but some of us are not as conservative as we were forty years ago. I believe we should pass this legislation, and have our children sing of Canada—not only of the Dominion of Canada. Therefore I support the bill.

Mr. CHURCH: There is the British North America Act, first.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that this does not develop into an issue which will divide the house along party lines. I should like to make some practical observations, and would state first that all the good things which have been said about Canada have come to pass at a time when we have paid tribute and reverence to the name "Dominion of Canada." So it is difficult for me to see where there would be any advantage in a change of this kind.

I listened to the hon. member for York North (Mr. Smith) say that he has noticed a tapering off in our enthusiasm. I have not been able to see that among my people. I know North York pretty well too, because there I cut my political teeth, and I am pretty well satisfied that the people in North York are not lacking in their enthusiasm.

I think the hon. member who introduced the bill did not consider the matter fully. I challenge him or any other member in the house to name any country in the world which calls its national day by its title. I have not heard of any other country—and of course I may be wrong. But at the moment there come to my mind names of such countries as the United States, Mexico, Russia and France. I believe the title we already have, that of the Dominion of Canada, is all right.

Replying to the hon. member who introduced the bill, may I say I am not so much concerned about what strangers may think of us. After all, we have our own lives to live. They will come to know us from our contributions, as they have in the past, and from the contributions we shall make in the future. I am inclined therefore to support the view offered by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) in his amendment, when he points out that there are items far more important to be discussed and determined than the mere changing of a name, and especially a name which has been used and enjoyed since we became the Dominion of Canada.

Dominion day is well known to Canadians generally, and to those who have any regard for us. I hope there will be others who will feel as I do—not in any partisan sense, but in the belief that we are well designated now, and that our national day should remain Dominion day.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended speaking on this bill, but I do so because I have a sentimental reason for saying a few words. My good friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), mentioned that it was Sir Leonard Tilley who first recommended that our country be called the Dominion of Canada. Sir Leonard Tilley came from my native province of New Brunswick, and was born in the village of Gagetown, which happened to be my own birthplace, and my own home.

Mr. MacNICOL: Two great men from the same town.

Mr. BROOKS: I thank my hon. friend. But I do not see any good reason why the name should be changed. Had there been no Dominion day in 1867, I wonder if there would be a Canada to-day. It was because those great men of that time, men from all parts of Canada, including Macdonald, Cartier, Tilley and others, got together and decided that we would unite our provinces to form a dominion.

Dominion day is a part of our history. Is it good in any country, particularly in a young country, to discard all our relations or connection with the past, and keep grasping at something new? I happened to be a school teacher in my early days, and I recall that Dominion day was always set aside as a holiday. Generations of children have grown up in this country and have been taught that Dominion day is the day on which these men decided upon the confederation of our country.

That is what it means to us to-day. There is nothing belittling about Dominion day, as I see it; is a matter of history. It is linked with the birth of our country. I listened to the eloquent appeal of the hon. member for Fort William, who says that he thinks more of Canada than he does of England, Ireland or Scotland. I cannot see why it is necessary for any hon. member, no matter who he may be, to rise and say that he thinks more of Canada than he does of England, Ireland, Scotland, France or any other country. Is the hon. member implying that there are any others in the house who think more of those countries than they do of Canada? I do not believe there is a member here who does. If anyone rises in the house to say anything about the British empire, then immediately he is branded as an imperialist, and as one who thinks more of other lands than he does of his own.

There is no land dearer to me than my own Canada. But I do not have to stand up in the house and shout it from the rooftop, nor do I have to have it published in the newspapers.

We love Canada: Canada is our country. But we do not want to break our link with the past, or to dim the traditions of other years. And I say we are fast doing it.

One other hon. member said that we have perplexing problems. True, we have. And I would ask that hon. member how many jobs it will give returned soldiers if the name of Dominion day is changed to Canada day. How many houses is it going to build for the thousands of men who are coming back to this country to change the name of Dominion day to Canada day? It is absolute nonsense to suggest that it will do anything of the kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The motion before the house is for the second reading of bill No. 8, an act respecting Canada day.

Mr. BROOKS: Mr. Speaker, I claim the same right as the hon. member who spoke a moment ago and who suggested that our great perplexing problems could be solved by changing the name of Dominion day to Canada day. I shall say no more. Canada is steeped in the traditions of the past, and if we are to sever all the links with our past history, Canada will never be the great nation we all hope she will become.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this bill seems to be engendering a good deal of heat. I cannot understand why it should, or why there should apparently be conflict between one side and the other.

What I have been asking myself is whether the bill is in order. When confederation was established, four provinces entered into it; the British North America Act records their names and states that they became united into one dominion forming the Dominion of Canada. Those provinces were Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. Would it not be necessary to have the consent, first, of the province of Ontario and of these other provinces before we could pass a bill such as this? I know you would not easily get the consent of Ontario; it may come some time, but I do not think Ontario would jump hastily and accept this change holus-bolus without careful consideration. I do not know that the province of Quebec would. The province of Quebec played an important part in forming confederation; in fact, confederation could not have been formed if Quebec had not consented to it. Has the province of Nova Scotia consented to this bill? Has the province of New Brunswick consented to it? I am just wondering, Mr. Speaker, if the bill is in order and whether it would have any effect if we did pass it without the consent of the provinces having first been obtained. I should think that one of the ministers, perhaps the Secretary of State, under whose department this matter comes, would be able to tell us whether the provinces have been consulted and whether they approve this change in the name of the country of which they agreed to form a part. If they have not been consulted, perhaps the hon. member should withdraw his bill.

I want to say a word about the hon. member. I compliment him on his ability. I have been greatly pleased since this present parliament assembled to note how many splendid bright and capable young men we have in it representing the province of Quebec. I know of no other parliament since I came here in 1930 in which there have been so many able young men from the province of Quebec, and that is all to the good. They are doing well for their province, and will continue to do well. And so I do not want my hon. friend to think that in opposing his bill I am in any way finding fault with his proposal, but I still ask myself how can we pass this bill if the provinces have not first been consulted. If the bill moved be given its second and third reading to-day, the legislature of Ontario is now in sesion, and would it not be reasonable to expect that some member of the Ontario legislature would ask the govern- of this province if they had consented to changing the name from the Dominion of Canada to Canada—because the British North America Act, Mr. Speaker, all the way through, refers to the Dominion of Canada.

When Manitoba came into confederation it was as a province of the Dominion of Canada, and the same is true of British Columbia. Those two provinces, and later Saskatchewan and Alberta, but particularly Manitoba and British Columbia, which entered confederation quite early, all entered the Dominion of Canada. Have they been consulted? Have their legislatures approved the changing of the name of the country of which they became a part?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This does not change the name of the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. We are going to change the name "Dominion day" to "Canada day". The Dominion of Canada is the name that I have known every since my childhood. When the first of July was celebrated in the small town in which I was raised it was always celebrated as Dominion day, and so Dominion day has become a part of me. I would have to change my whole fifty odd years—I am not going to say how many, Mr. Speaker, but will say fifty or fifty odd years, of my life's thinking to celebrate Canada day instead of Dominion Day.

I yield to no one in my love for Canada. I am of the fourth generation here. My hon. friend the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is perhaps of the seventh or eighth or tenth generation. I cannot go back that far, but I am of the fourth generation, and I love Canada.

I really cannot understand why my hon. friend the member for Matapedia-Matane brought in this bill, and further I cannot understand how it comes before this house if the Secretary of State or whoever draws up these bills did not first consult the provinces which originally entered confederation, to find out whether they wished to make this change from Dominion day to Canada day. It is a matter of importance, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, although I have a very warm regard for the capable young man who introduced this bill, I must say that I cannot vote for it.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I have a very friendly feeling for the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who has always been most cooperative in this house, but coming from Manitoba as I do I must say I feel that we are a part of Canada. We are no longer in the days of 1867, when confederation was formed. I think we should be progressive. A year or so ago the Conservative party in this country progressed by adding the word "Progressive" to its name. I think we should progress, too, by making this change from Dominion day to Canada day and letting the outside world know that we have something. There is no harm in letting the outside world know that there is such a place as Canada, and there is no harm in letting the western part of the dominion know that we are a part of Canada. Coming from the western part of this dominion I shall give whole-hearted support to this bill.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would not have risen to speak on this bill had not the hon. member for York North (Mr. Smith) said that it was a great bill, and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) said that there was no harm in letting the world know that there is such a place as Canada. If the idea of a great bill is to change the name Dominion day to Canada day, and if by that change we are going to let the whole world know that there is such a place as Canada, one must think very little of Canada; for ever since confederation we have been known as the Dominion of Canada. Dominion day to me represents the accomplishments of a great people, in a great country under great leadership, who formed this dominion in the year 1867, and the word "unity" has always been the keynote in the celebration of Dominion day. Dominion day has been taught, to me at least, to represent the day on which the people of Canada celebrate the union which made Canada, the accomplishment of the great men who achieved its unity. For an hon. member to stand up and say it is a great bill which does away with the word "dominion", a word which appears in every one of our statutes, marking the significance of Canada as a dominion—because the word "dominion" means unity, cooperation, amity and friendship on the part of us all—makes me wonder what is in the minds of those who want to change the name. What is wrong with the word "dominion"? Certainly "Canada" is a great name. Certainly Canadians are proud of Canada. But surely before we become proud of Canada we must be proud of the union which made Canada, of the idea of a dominion in and of Canada.

I do not like to hear hon. members say that those who do not wish to abolish the word "dominion" are not progressive. I do not like to hear them say that those who do not wish to supersede "Dominion day" by "Canada day" think any less of their country than others do. I do not believe there is anybody in the country who does not feel that "Canada" and "dominion" are two different thoughts, both to be held with reverence, with esteem, with love, and with pride. But I do not think we should be "little" about it, either. When I see the hon. member for York North (Mr. Smith), that old historic riding, that community which has done so much for Canadian history, which has been so loyal to the Canadian union and to the Dominion of Canada, get up and suggest, at least by inference, that the word "dominion" implies something inferior, something sinister, something undesirable, something unprogressive, I believe other hon. members should rise with pride and insist that we stick to the word "dominion", show our pride in the word, show our reverence for Dominion day as a day symbolizing unity, confederation and friendship. If you want a Canada day, surely you can pick another day. If you want to tell the world that Canada is a great nation, do so, but without changing the thought which commemorates reverence, friendship, and the historic things which Dominion day represents.

I heartily support the amendment and would oppose changing the word "dominion", because it means much to the people of Canada; it has a significance which we would lose if we changed the name.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) I would refer him to the British North America Act, section 3:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen ,by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being more than six months after the passing of this act, the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall form and be one dominion under the name of Canada; and on and after that day those three provinces shall form and be one dominion under that name accordingly.

Also section 5:

> Canada shall be divided into four provinces, named Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick.

Those four provinces were Canada. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) asked, what is wrong with the word "dominion"? When we refer to the dominion we refer to a member of the British commonwealth of nations, but not particularly to one country; the idea implies a plural; it includes such dominions as Australia and South Africa as well as Canada. But if we have the name "Canada" it will refer to our own country, our beloved country, and will not be a name which applies to other countries. I support the motion.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Before the question is put I desire to say just a few words, and in the course of my remarks it is my desire to ask permission to move the adjournment of the debate, but not at this precise moment. That motion is one that I am sure, when I do put it, I shall not need to write out and present to you, Mr. Speaker, the difficulty which occurred in the case of another lawyer's handwriting when he wrote "second" and it looked like "third." Probably if I were to write it you would have as much difficulty in reading my writing as you do in reading that of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). But it will not be necessary.

A few remarks have been made to which I will advert for a moment. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) remarked that this debate seemed to be engendering a great deal of heat. I agree. And he said it did not seem to be necessary that that should be so; and with this, too, I agree. For my part I believe I have had and have now as much pride in this country as has any person in the house. I do not suppose I am pre-eminent in that respect; I think all of us look upon ourselves first, last and all the time as Canadians. I have not found it difficult to develop that pride in my country because it was called the "Dominion" of Canada. I do not think there is quite as much importance in this name as some have said. Nevertheless I agree with the bill; I agree that it would be better to make the change, as the bill sets forth. I think the word "Canada" is a more appropriate one for our national holiday than the word "Dominion."

Some people have spoken as if the word "dominion" suggested that some person else had dominion over us. It never had that meaning for me. I have never felt that "Dominion of Canada" carried the idea of some people remote from here exercising dominance over us. I do not know whether it is because of the story of how the word came to be chosen that I have been free from that idea. My recollection of the story as it was told to me is that one of the founders of confederation, in considering what would be a suitable name for our country, either was praying or was thinking of God, and the words came into his mind. "He shall have dominion from sea to sea"; and thereupon he took that as an inspiration and brought the word into the conclave, and so "Dominion" came to be adopted. As I recollect it, some such story as that is the basis of the choice of the word "Dominion". I do not know whether that is the particular kind of dominion which some would like to escape by discarding the word. I do not fancy that it is.

The truth of the matter is that we should not confuse the word "dominion" with dominance, and there is no dominance of any person or any power to be considered as a concept in connection with that word. At the same time, I do not think that some of the expressions that have been used this afternoon are apt. The member for Broadview spoke of our having been a dominion from time immemorial. That, it is self-evident, is not so. We have not been a dominion from time immemorial, nor have we been a dominion during most of the existence of organized society on this northern half of the continent. We have been a dominion because that was the name decided upon in 1867. That is all there is to it. It looked like a suitable name at the time, and it served well enough over the years. We have developed much pride in our country in the use of that name, but it does not carry the idea of autonomy which is the fact respecting Canada at the present time. It would be better, I submit, that we should try to keep our terms in accord with the facts of our situation. We are an autonomous country, all our partners in the British empire agree with that, and it would be well in the use of all expressions to convey the idea which does express the truth of the matter. For that reason I submit that we would be wise to change the name. There is no thought, nor need there be any thought, that in making the change there is any attack upon the British connections or any disrespect for the crown, or any flying in the face of tradition or anything of that sort. It simply appears to me that we would be nearer to the truth if we used the expression "Canada" in naming the day which is our birthday.

I revert to what I said at the beginning about there being some heat in the debate. I submit that we would probably be well advised to wait a few days and come back to the question rather than settle it now, and for that reason I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion negatived.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my inclination is to support the motion, but I do not think there is any occasion for undue haste at this time. We have before us a bill respecting Canadian citizenship, and we have established a committee for the purpose of recommending a distinctive national flag for Canada. I think we can well afford to give time, through the press and on the radio, to consideration of this matter. Therefore I respectfully move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. Manross). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. RINFRET: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): It should like to say a word now. Apparently I have lost some of my new-found friends from Ontario, or from Toronto, but at least I had the satisfaction of uniting those hon. members from Toronto with my good friends from Quebec. My batting average was not bad; I maintained four and a half of the cabinet with me although I lost my roommate.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You might have had them all with you if you had an order in council.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When I need any help from Souris I will let the hon. member know. I had thought of making a sub-amendment to declare April 1st Souris day.

I wish to make myself clear on this question. I was not born in Canada, but I am particularly proud of being a Canadian, and I have no objection to the name being changed to "Canada".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a minute. But I do think there is a little too much haste. For that reason I was prepared to support the motion for a six month's adjournment, so that we could give the matter a little further thought. In particular, whether some hon. members realize it or not, in any legislation affecting my riding I am interested in the reactions of my riding. I make no bones about it; I should like to have a little more time for thought. The only recruit I really picked up from the Conservative party—and I wish to make this point perfectly clear for the record so that there will be no suggestion of bribery or otherwise—is the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), with whom my wife and I are having dinner to-night, but that was arranged long ago.

As I say, I should have liked to have time to give this matter more consideration, and I think we should have been supported in our move for an adjournment. May I point out to my hon. friends who are sponsoring this measure that I cannot see how they would have lost by an adjournment which would have given us further time for discussion. Particularly I cannot see that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), which constituency I understand is in the suburbs of Toronto, would have lost anything.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not out of order. A man tells me that I am out of order; let me tell him that I do not need any assistance and he does not need to tell me that I am out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order. We are not now considering the adjournment of the debate; that question has been settled.

The house divided on the motion Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I was paired with the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Coyle). Had I not been paired, I would have voted for the motion.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On the short title.

Mr. CHURCH: I doubt whether this bill is within the power of this parliament because it is contrary to the British North America Act, and the terms and principles on which the four provinces came into confederation, and if the word "Dominion" is changed, the change must have the approval of the provinces. There is no power to change it. The history books prove that, and we have the confederation debates and records. It was unanimous at confederation to name the country the Dominion of Canada.

We had a scene this afternoon unparalleled since I have been a member of this house. The members of the cabinet were divided. If the government followed the practice in the old country it would resign, because a government in the old country resigned at one time when it was defeated on a private member's bill or a motion at one stage of it.

Where is this going to land us? Where does Canada stand when one considers the motions we have had on the order paper in the past few months and the debates that have gone on? What was said regarding the future of this dominion by members of the government from the province of Quebec who are absent from the house to-day? Either we are a dominion or we are not. If not, we are outside the British empire. We were a dominion at confederation when the four provinces came together. There was none of this bickering during the two wars. I referred to that earlier in the afternoon, and I shall not repeat what I said. I do not think the people of any of the provinces believe in altering the terms and conditions which were agreed to by the four original provinces at confederation. Those terms cannot be changed without the consent of the legislatures of the various provinces. This is a political bill, first, last and always. Either we are in the British empire or we are not. We do not wish to be like Eire. We are a dominion within the four corners of the British North America Act. If we do not wish to be a dominion we should say so. I am surprised at my hon. friends of the C.C.F. and the attitude they took on this bill this afternoon. There is a large body of public opinion which is alarmed and surprised that this parliament finds time to devote to all these matters which are frivolous and secondary. I voiced their opinion this afternoon. We have not time to attend to the primary matters which are facing this country to-day. There are some people without houses, employment, coal, food and clothing. These matters should be primary and not secondary. That relates to all the provinces.

I have always been one of those who believe in the principles of confederation, of equality and each for all and all for each. I do not know who drafted this bill. Whoever drafted it has forgotten the act of confederation which constituted this country and the intention of the four provinces. The change cannot be made without a vote of the provinces. Hon. members can talk all they like about this, but we are still part and parcel of the British empire. We ought to be thankful for that, especially those who come from the eastern provinces. Britain, save for the dominions, stood alone for two and a half years. The people of Quebec have always been loyal and faithful to the British crown. They showed it in the revolutionary war of 1783 and have always shown it. I have a great deal of respect for Quebec and for France, where so many of the old soldiers of the city from which I come lie buried. They were quite ready to fight for that great country. France will always be a glorious nation. Mr. Churchill said that and I have said it in this house on many occasions. It is the hope of the world that France should be restored as a great nation which she has always been in the past. At a time when economic and social conditions are so critical in this country I object to debates of this kind, more especially when our people are suffering from the after effects of the war. It is inconceivable that we should waste time on bills of this description.

I think the afternoon was well spent, however, because the people in the mother country are wondering where Canada stands at the present time. Is she willing to help the mother country, where so many thousands of churches and public buildings, destroyed during the war, need to be restored? Are we to sit here as a parliament and not observe the handwriting on the wall? Are we not going to listen to those who are clamouring for us to deal with the great economic problems, to start production, to bring about adequate reconversion of industry, instead of wasting our time on things like this?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to say a word to account for the manner in which I have voted up to the present. I quite agree with the previous speaker that this procedure is unconstitutional. In spite of the fact that we have taken all afternoon to debate this matter, I do not believe the proposed change will be made. I think when we come to deal with the proper authorities the holiday will still be observed as Dominion day. Those who feel we have to change the name in order to advertise Canada to the world certainly cannot know what has been going on during the past few years. I can assure them that anyone who has been in the midst of what has been going on since the fall of 1939 will readily realize that the young men and women of our three armed services have certainly advertised this dominion in no uncertain terms in all parts of the world.

I repeat that in my opinion this procedure is quite unconstitutional; therefore I do not believe this parliament should take time to debate a matter of this kind when, if we are really concerned about changing the name, we might easily adopt the proper procedure.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Which is what?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): First of all, I think the British North America Act probably will have to be changed.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not a legal man, and I am not going into that question; but, as an hon. member said a few moments ago, at least we want time to consult our constituents. I am satisfied that if the people of this nation take the performance this afternoon seriously their reaction will come as a rude shock to many people here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am just as entitled to my opinion as any other member of this house. It may be that I am not able to judge properly the feelings of my constituents back home, but I am prepared to endeavour to do so, and am prepared to stand by their decision with no regrets whatever. I am one of those who believe this has been quite a political gesture this afternoon. I do not believe the name will be changed, but I wanted to make these remarks in order to explain the stand I have taken to-day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am very much in accord with what has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. For some reason or another an attempt has been made to rush this bill through, and I think the people of this country as a whole should be given an opportunity to decide, by their reaction, whether or not it should become law. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West, that the Chairman do now leave the chair and that the committee do now rise.

Motion negatived: yeas, 31; nays, 75.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. GREEN: I am certain that this bill is of a great deal of importance in the life of Canada, perhaps more so than some hon. members realize.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is right.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GREEN: I have the right to be heard, and I do not propose to be heckled.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GREEN: This bill is important because it shows a trend which I think must be faced by the Canadian people and which I am sure will be faced. Taken by itself it may not mean a great deal whether our national holiday is known as Dominion day or Canada day, but we must take into consideration the circumstances under which this bill comes before the house. Here we have it brought in with many signs of a desire for haste, a great urge to put it through.

Mr. LALONDE: No; you cannot say that.

Mr. GREEN: You can make your own speech. There were clear evidences this afternoon that the cabinet did not know what to do about the matter, that the cabinet were divided. No opportunity has been given to Canadians, certainly none to the people of my province of British Columbia, to consider this bill, and no request for this change has come from that province. I doubt whether any request for a change has come from any province in Canada. It must be taken, too, with the different statements that have been made in this house. To those of us who sit here it is only too obvious that an attempt is being made at this time to take actions which, while I know those sponsoring them believe they are in the best interests of Canada, at the same time may have a serious effect on Canada if we look at the broader picture. We have just gone through a terrible war. At one stage of that war civilization was only saved by the British empire, and—

An hon. MEMBER: "Only"?

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Canadians?

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Americans?

Mr. GREEN: —because the empire stood together for a whole year, when nobody else was fighting the Germans and Italians but the British people of the world, and gallant little Greece.

An hon. MEMBER: What about France?

Mr. GREEN: We have won this war, and it was a close shave; everyone in the house admits that. Since that time we have been faced with attempts only too obvious to break up the British empire from without—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GREEN: I said, "from without." It is just as plain as can be that there is an attempt by certain other nations to squeeze the empire out. If the empire should be squeezed out, if it should be broken up, then indeed that would be a tragic day for Canada as well as for other nations of the empire.

This is no time to be doing things that will weaken the empire, because the future of Canada depends upon the empire's being strong. I doubt very much whether my good friends who are cheering and shouting, and who are so keen to have this bill rushed through have ever had in mind the possibility that action of this type of necessity weakens the empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, you may not agree with me, but—

An hon. MEMBER: We don't.

Mr. GREEN: —surely in a British parliament a member who has been duly elected has a right to be heard, and not to be heckled.

An hon. MEMBER: We have been elected too.

An hon. MEMBER: We are listening.

Mr. GREEN: You are not listening with any measure of comfort. You are interrupting, which you have no right to do.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I remind all hon. members that an hon. member who is speaking must not be interrupted or questioned without his consent. May I also remind hon. members that when speaking they must address the Chair.

Mr. GREEN: For these reasons I suggest that we be very careful before we rush into a thing of this type.

I have listened to a great deal of talk in this and in the last session about colonially-minded Canadians. The challenge has been hurled across this floor on different occasions that those of us who believe in a strong empire are colonially-minded, that we are colonials. Let me suggest this to the house, that the shoe might be on the other foot, and that it might be those Canadians who refuse to recognize the value of the empire to Canada who are colonially-minded, and who have not got over the old colonial days which passed away many years ago.

It does not do for members who talk in that way to get the idea that they are the only Canadians in the world. Let them remember that there are many of the rest of us who are just as good Canadians as they are, and who come from a long line of Canadian settlers. Let them remember that we are just as good Canadians as any others in the country, just as much interested in the welfare of Canada, just as much determined that no other nation shall come first in our minds, whether that nation happens to be within the empire or outside it.

We are just as much in earnest about this question as any other people in Canada. I think it should be recognized by all Canadians, no matter of what origin, that those who sit in the House of Commons, no matter what side they may be on or what their beliefs may be, are all good Canadians, and are all working for the benefit of Canada.

Therefore I suggest that some hon. members be just a little careful in throwing out those charges, when they say, "Oh, you are only colonials; you are not good Canadians; you are Englishmen first"—or Australian—"and Canadians second." Those charges are not correct.

Since I have been a member in the house there has been much talk about unity. It seems the suggestion is always made that the English-speaking people in the country must be very careful or they will upset unity, that they will bring about disunity in Canada. Charges are always coming in that direction. Well, if this sort of thing is carried on much further, the shoe will be on the other foot. English-speaking people in Canada are going to think they are being attacked.

An hon. MEMBER: Who made those charges?

Mr. GREEN: My hon. friend can read Hansard. I say they are going to think they are being attacked. If that should come about—and, fortunately, it has not yet—but if it should come about, and if it should develop that one great group is set up against the other great group, then there never will be unity in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Imagination!

Mr. GREEN: There never will be unity in Canada, I say, if that should happen, and our troubles will become greater and greater; we shall never build a nation in this country if that should come to pass.

For that reason I make my appeal to all hon. members in the house—and I have friends in all the parties, friends of many years standing. I would appeal to them not to keep pressing through measures of this type which can only make trouble. Yes, they can only make trouble, and especially when the attempt is made, as it was made to-day, to rush this thing through.

Mr. CLEAVER: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GREEN: No.

Mr. CLEAVER: Why didn't you vote against it, then?

Mr. GREEN: An attempt is being made to rush this thing through. I wish the people I represent could have sat in the galleries here to-day to see just what has happened, because it is impossible to convey it in words. That sort of thing is bad for Canada. It will make all kinds of trouble in Canada, and I would—

An hon. MEMBER: You are making it.

Mr. GREEN: —appeal to hon. members not to rush to put a measure of this type through the house.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CASE: Mr. Chairman, during the dinner recess I have had an opportunity of considering this bill further and I feel that there are some observations still to be made.

Throughout our whole history our thoughts and sentiments have been associated with Dominion day, and not with anything of any semblance to Canada day. I made a challenge to this house this afternoon when the Speaker was in the chair to name any country which calls its national day after the name of the country. In the United States, for instance, their national day is called "Independence day," and the same holds good with respect to every other country which celebrates a national day. Dominion day has been associated with the birth of this nation ever since 1867, to designate that we were a dominion within the great commonwealth of British nations.

The word "dominion" means something to a Britisher. After all, you cannot have your cake and eat it. Either we are a part of a great empire or we are just an individual nation. I prefer to associate myself, as I believe the majority of the members of this house do who think seriously on this matter, with the broadest application of the word "dominion."

A few days ago I had a commander in the navy visit me and he made this remark. I mention this in relation to what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver South. This navy commander said, "If I lived a thousand years and spoke or lectured every night I could not begin to tell of the great contribution made by the British people in those trying days of the war when Britain stood alone."

During my limited experience in public life, confined largely to municipal affairs where government had its beginning, I have never imputed improper motives to my fellow man. I have nothing but the highest regard for the hon. member who introduced this bill and for those who are supporting it, because I believe that they are imbued with a sense of loyalty to Canada and that they, too, have in their breasts deep affection for and a sense of loyalty to that one great nation in the world which stood between us and tyranny in the darkest days of the war. I do not believe that they would want to see any weakening of the ties which bind the empire together as a great world power, although I regret to say that there is a tendency in this critical hour to weaken those ties. But in unity there is strength, and the greatest strength we enjoy to-day is our association with the British commonwealth of nations. This great empire stands for something which Britishers and freedom-loving people throughout the world cherish. I could not find words to express adequately what the British empire has stood for and what it has meant in human relations throughout the world, but I am thinking of one thing in particular at the moment, and that is freedom. Unfortunately, never having been denied our freedom, we sometimes do not value our freedom highly enough; but if we were to travel throughout central Europe and talk with the thousands there who were deprived of their freedom and became a subjugated race, it would readily be appreciated what a great heritage of freedom is ours to enjoy. When the Prime Minister of this country, quite properly in my opinion, took a definite and determined stand with respect to espionage in this country, I wonder just what our position might have been had we been a small individual nation unprotected by our position in the empire. What answer might we have received from a great power at that time if we had been just a small nation standing alone? But because we knew that we enjoyed the protection and the support of one of the greatest empires the world has ever known we were able to make our voice heard, and even though criticism was heaped upon the Prime Minister of this country, Canadians generally I think gloried in the courageous stand he took. By that I am not implying any approval of the methods adopted. I am not a legal man and I am not going to argue legal points, but I say that in the main public opinion admired the Prime Minister for championing the nation's cause because the security of individual Canadians was at stake.

The other night the Minister of Mines and Resources, in reply to the hon. member for Davenport, who had a bill before the house to introduce a Jack Miner day, said in effect that it was a matter which involved the provinces because it touched upon education. He thought there should be a reference made to the provinces before the house should give its assent to that bill.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member should not go farther into a debate which is completed.

Mr. CASE: But it has a direct reference to what I wish to say.

The CHAIRMAN: That debate has been concluded and the hon. member should not refer to it now.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is talking about a principle by which we should be guided in this debate.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member who is speaking must not refer to a previous debate on the same subject during the present session.

Mr. CASE: Mr. Chairman, you handicap me in what I intended to say, because, if that was important then, this is far more important now. When the provinces of Canada joined in confederation there was designated a day termed "Dominion day", "Dominion of Canada day", or any other like expression you wish to apply to it. Surely the provinces have now the right to determine whether this house should write upon the statute books of this country the substitution for "Dominion day" of the term "Canada day".

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? It is not correct to say that in 1867 Dominion day was designated as such. In 1867 the reference was to "Canada", but in 1879 a resolution was introduced in the upper house urging that July 1 be made "Dominion day". That resolution was subsequently dealt with in this house on motion of a private member.

I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me the chance to make the observation that in 1867, July 1 was not designated as "Dominion day", but simply referred to in sections 3 and 5 of the British North America Act as "Canada".

Mr. CASE: I accept my hon. friend's explanation. I believe that it lends strength to my argument, for it indicates that in 1867 they were not in a position to determine a suitable day or a suitable designation for a day; but after some years had elapsed, they in their wisdom—and after all they were the makers of Canada and of confederation—determined that it should be called "Dominion day". I am glad to have the hon. member's explanation, but as far as I am concerned any sentiments I have with respect to Canada's national day are directly associated with Dominion day. I consider that the mover of this resolution would have had a great deal more support in this house if he had sought to have the day termed "Confederation day" rather than "Canada day". If we adopt and pass this bill we shall be the only country in the world which uses our national name to designate our national day. I leave that thought with the committee. The world is in a formative, unstable state. What we may do now in this direction may tend to weaken the strength we need in these trying times. I do not want to be misunderstood. I believe my Canadian friends of French descent from Quebec will give me credit for speaking from my heart, just as I believe they have spoken from theirs. Canada as part of the empire has played a great part; I cannot agree in in any way with the hon. member for York North that an act of this kind would make it any greater. Canada's history is written in the contribution she has made to world affairs. Her sacrifices have been made under the terms of an act and are commemorated by a day which we are now seeking to change. I hope someone will see fit to amend this proposal so as to change "Canada day" to "Confederation day", as being something which better describes the purpose we have in view. I do not want to be bigoted in my views. I believe we have in this house a sense of common loyalty; we have all sworn allegiance to the same crown; we believe in British institutions, British laws and British justice. We are therefore not very far apart. I suggest that the title proposed in a wrong one and will be misunderstood, and this thought I leave with the Chairman and members of the committee.

Mr. PINARD: I did not intend to participate in this debate, but I think it is my privilege to try to correct an impression which was made by the remarks of some hon. members this afternoon. I do not for a moment question their sincerity. I do not for a moment doubt their good faith in their argument. But it seems to me that these remarks follow the same policy which has been adopted by members of the Progressive Conservative party, who always claim, whenever we try to enact legislation which has for its purpose to develop or better emancipate Canada, that we are trying to destroy our British connection. They have always followed that policy. Whenever any change was suggested or contemplated in the relations of Canada to Great Britain, those who are interested in having things remain as they are insist that we are trying to put an end to confederation. This has been said about practically every constitutional change since the conquest of Canada. In 1927, when the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then leader of the Conservative opposition, opposed the appointment of a Canadian minister to Washington, he did so on this very ground. His actual words were:

It is the last great adventure in our relation to the British empire. It is but the determining of separation; it is but the end of our connection with the British empire.

And, Mr. Chairman, when Mr. Bennett came into office in 1931 he appointed his own brother-in-law, Mr. Herridge, as minister at Washington. Mr. Herridge served his term, and I do not believe it is the opinion of my hon. friends that any material change was made in our relations with Great Britain.

It was also suggested this afternoon that before the adoption of the British North America Act there was an agreement by which this country was to be called the "Dominion of Canada". I do not believe that this assertion is true. In order to substantiate my opinion I wish to refer first to a book entitled "The Constitution of Canada", by Kennedy, on page 314 of which the author states:

When the conference resumed after the holidays Lord Monck, the governor general, and Lord Carnarvon, the colonial secretary, attended its meetings accompanied by Sir Frederic Rogers, afterwards Lord Blachford, the permanent under-secretary. Attempts were at once begun to draft a bill. With the final resolutione before them, at least six drafts were drawn up. The seventh and last printed in imperial form was dated for revision February 9, 1867, and was the outcome of consultation between the imperial representatives and the members of the conference. Perhaps the most interesting fact about these drafts is that at first the name of the new federation was left to the decision of the queen. Later it appeared as "the kingdom of Canada," and in the final draft as "one dominion under the name of Canada." Macdonald was "the ruling genius" with power in "management and adroitness." There can be little doubt with his strong bias in favour of a legislative union that he desired to form an auxiliary kingdom out of the colonies, and he deplored in later life the lack of insight which rejected the title. He fought hard for its retention, but it was withdrawn at the instance of Lord Stanley, the minister for foreign affairs, who feared that "it would wound the sensibilities of the Yankees." It was appropriate that the name of Canada should be chosen in preference to the fantastic titles suggested by the press, but history does not relate from what source or for what reasons the word "dominion" was added.

May I now quote from one who, together with Sir George Etienne Cartier, may well be considered the founder of confederation. I refer to none other than Sir John A. Macdonald. I wish to quote from a book entitled "Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald," by Sir Joseph Pope. At page 450 there appears the following:

The declaration of all the B.N.A. provinces that they desired as one dominion to remain a portion of the empire, showed what wise government and generous treatment would do, and should have been marked as an epoch in the history of England. This would probably have been the case, had Lord Carnarvon, who, as colonial minister, had sat at the cradle of the new dominion, remained in office. His ill-omened resignation was followed by the appointment of the late Duke of Buckingham, who had as his adviser the then governor general, Lord Monck—both good men certainly, but quite unable, from the constitution of their minds, to rise to the occasion. The union was treated by them much as if the B.N.A. Act were a private bill uniting two or three English parishes. Had a different course been pursued—for instance had united Canada been declared to be an auxiliary kingdom, as it was in the Canadian draft of the bill, I feel sure (almost) that the Australian colonies would, ere this, have been applying to be placed in the same rank as the kingdom of Canada.

I should like to quote the postscript:

On reading the above over I see that it will convey the impression that the change of title from kingdom to dominion was caused by the Duke of Buckingham. This is not so. It was made at the instance of Lord Derby, then foreign minister, who feared the first name would wound the sensibilities of the Yankees. I mentioned this incident in our history to Lord Beaconsfield at Hughenden in 1879, who said, "I was not aware of the circumstance, but it is so like Derby—a very good fellow, but who lives in a region of perpetual funk."

Mr. COLDWELL: Who wrote that?

Mr. PINARD: That was written by Sir John A. Macdonald and addressed to Lord Knutsford on July 18, 1889, and it is reported in Sir Joseph Pope's "Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald."

I submit, therefore, that it is not right, in fact it is definitely wrong, to assume that the title "Dominion of Canada" came into being as a matter of agreement. That is not the fact. The name "Dominion of Canada" came into existence as the circumstances which I have stated indicate.

There is another aspect to this matter, and I mention this in answer to the argument which was advanced this afternoon and which has been repeated to-night by the same hon. member, namely, that no other nation has adopted as its holiday a day bearing its name. I do not think that is the purpose of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to attempt to clarify an ambiguity which has existed for a considerable time. When Dominion day is celebrated and the first of July is taken as the day of celebration it is apt to lead any one to think that the first of July might as well be the holiday of any other dominion forming a part of the British commonwealth of nations. When in the future any other country may become a dominion and form part as an associate of the British family, this argument will again, I suggest, be advanced and we shall again be caught with the same ambiguity. It will then be considered that "dominion day" may be the holiday of any other dominion forming a part of the British commonwealth of nations.

Personally, it was with pride that I voted in favour of the second reading of the bill. It is with joy that I wish this country of mine, Canada, to have as its national day a day which, like the fourth of July in the United States or the fourteenth of July in France, will be known the world over as the holiday of our own country.

It is with confidence in the future of Canada that everyone in this country, all of us who in the near future will, I hope, become Canadian citizens by virtue of the new citizenship bill which has been introduced, should approve this all-Canadian and most progressive legislation.

Mr. McMASTER: I did not intend to take part in this debate because I have been here only one session before and, in my short experience of bills introduced by private members, any such measure has been talked out. I did not know at the time that the government would rally so vigorously and enthusiastically to the support of this particular bill and therefore I did not take part in the debate prior to the time the vote was taken. Since the dinner recess I have made some investigation to find out when Dominion day was originally instituted, and I find that it was on May 15, 1879. On that date an act of parliament was passed which first introduced Dominion day. I should like to quote from the preamble:

> Whereas it was on the first day of July that the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick became one dominion under the name of Canada; and
> Whereas Rupert's land and the northwestern territory and the province of British Columbia became part of the dominion in the month of July, and Prince Edward Island became part of the dominion on the first day of July; and
> Whereas it is expedient that such important events should be commemorated:
> Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows.

Then appears what we find in the present bill. I find that in the old debates there was not one dissenting voice. The matter was brought forward in the house, and Mr. David Mills, a resident of western Ontario, made this remark:

> Dominion day was, he believed, universally kept as a holiday, at least, it was in western Canada, but it was not kept under the authority of any act of parliament.

I suggest that this act, which has been in force for sixty-seven years and under which Canada has made great advances, should not be changed and that no change should be made in the name of this particular holiday.

Mr. COLDWELL: I find it very difficult indeed to understand why so much heat is generated over a proposal of this description. Surely we have come to the day when, setting aside all prejudices, we ought to be prepared to recognize this country as Canada. I look back over the years and I find that in 1867 the proclamation which proclaimed the union of the various provinces of this dominion into one great confederation referred to our country as Canada. I find that when Sir Robert Borden, the erstwhile leader of my friends to the right, signed the treaty of Versailles in 1919, he did not sign it in the name of the Dominion of Canada but in the name of Canada. The various agreements that we have made over the last number of years have been made in the name of Canada. Surely the men and women who went overseas in this war did not carry on their arms any insignia of colonialism; they carried on their arms the name of Canada. For the life of me I cannot understand why there are hon. gentlemen who rise in this house and still desire to cling to the name "Dominion", when dominion has a connotation altogether different from that which is the connotation of the word "Canada" to-day. Canada is a nation. Canada has grown to nationhood in the last seventy or eighty years. Canada has earned a place in the comity of nations and deserves to be recognized as such. It seems strange to me that nearly every other country in the world, including the United Kingdom, recognizes this country as a nation as Canada. Yet we have people in our own country who refuse to recognize it. I cannot understand it.

I came to this country as an immigrant from Great Britain thirty-six years ago. No one can say that I have no love for the country which gave me birth; but this is the country in which I have found my life, in which my children were born. I want to see Canada assume that spirit and place of nationhood which is rightly hers. I cannot understand my hon. friends who continually cling to the outmoded connotations of colonialism.

A few moments ago a quotation was given from the writings of Sir John A. Macdonald. May I requote it? Sir John A. Macdonald was writing to Lord Knutsford on July 18, 1889. He went on to explain why it was the name of the kingdom of Canada was not accepted, as my hon. friend has placed on the record already. In the postscript which I should like to place on the record anew we find these words:

> On reading the above over I see that it will convey the impression that the change of title from "kingdom" to "dominion" was caused by the Duke of Buckingham. This is not so. It was made at the instance of Lord Derby, then foreign minister, who feared the first name would wound the sensibilities of the Yankees.

My hon. friends who are objecting to the use of the name "Canada" are apparently still carrying on the tradition that we must not wound the sensibilities of the Yankees. As far as I am concerned, I do not mind wounding the sensibilities of the Yankees or of anybody as long as this country may assume its proper place among the nations of the world.

I continue with the quotation:

> I mentioned this incident in our history to Lord Beaconsfield at Hughenden in 1879, who said, "I was not aware of the circumstance, but it is so like Derby—a very good fellow, but who lives in a region of perpetual funk."

I rather suspect that there are politicians in this house who live in a region of perpetual funk because they are afraid to assume the name of Canada.

As far as I and those who are associated with me in this party are concerned, while we want to retain the very closest friendship with the people of the United Kingdom and the people of the British commonwealth of nations, we nevertheless want to see to it that this country of ours, Canada, shall be known throughout the world as Canada and not as the Dominion of Canada with a colonial connotation. Therefore I support this bill; I want to se it go through.

There is no incompatibility between assuming a stature that one ought to assume on account of the long history of this country, not the history of recent days in connection with the war but the history of this country ever since confederation. In this country we have been trying to build a nation. Persons from all over the civilized world have come to this country from time to time. Our boys who fought overseas were proud to bear the name of Canada. I hope that at this session this parliament will see to it that we place Canada among the nations of the world. This is not an unhealthy form of nationalism. We are proud of our families. Our families are a part of the community, and we are proud of the community. Our communities are a part of our nation; we are proud of our nation, and our nation can be proud of being part of the great world in which we live.

The men and women who served Canada in this war ought, in my opinion, to have had the opportunity of carrying the name of Canada and her flag across the world. I hope that this house will adopt this bill in order that the boys and girls now attending our schools, the men and women now celebrating the first of July, may celebrate it not as emerging from colonial status but as an indication that Canada has become a nation among the nations of the world. Let us pass this bill and teach our boys and girls, the men and women who have come or who are coming into this country from all over the world, that the first of July is the day on which we are proud to call our country "Canada."

Mr. HARKNESS: I am one of those of whom the hon. gentleman spoke a few moments ago. I was proud to carry the name of Canada on my shoulder overseas, but I do not think that enters into this discussion in the slightest. Not one of us is afraid to assume the name of Canada; as a matter of fact overseas we were all proud to do so, but in my opinion that is not the question before us. I measure this bill by only one yardstick: will it increase the feeling and spirit of unity in our country? In my opinion it will not, and as a result I am opposed to it. As a matter of fact I think it will have exactly the opposite effect; it will tend to destroy some of the unity which exists at the present time. I should like to urge all hon. members to use that same yardstick in considering this bill and in coming to their decision upon it.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—When 1st of July is a Sunday.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I rise to speak for only two or three minutes in the very fervent hope that I may be able to debunk something which has just been said by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. No one denies; no one will ever deny—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member for Waterloo South is not here, but I see that the quackers down in the far corner opposite are still with us. No one among us, I am sure, will ever say anything against pride of country as we have it in this Dominion of Canada. It is very easy to build up a straw man and then knock him down. The leader of the C.C.F. party is adept at many things, but in that he achieves the absolute tops among us all; I will give him first prize in that sort of business. But what does this amount to? We have used the words "Dominion day" since 1879, as someone told me a moment ago. I give my word of honour that it was news to me, because I was not born then. But this is the position. We have used it and we have never heard a suggestion anywhere, until now, that it should be changed. Now in this House of Commons for the first time, as far as any public discussion, or discussion in newspapers, magazine articles or anything of that kind goes, we hear this suggestion.

Mr. POULIOT: There must always be a beginning.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member says there must be a beginning. There is an end of the beginning and a beginning of the end; that also is worth while contemplating. So that I put it in this simple way. As far as I am concerned I do not see any great difference in the use of the word "Canada" and the use of the word "Dominion."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With respect, Mr. Chairman, through you may I say that I am going to take care of the problem of hon. gentlemen opposite right now. My answer is this. We have got along pretty well with this day and this name for a great many years. What is the reason for changing it now? Somebody says, because we have reached the stature of nationhood. The Statute of Westminister did nothing more and nothing less than declare an existing state of facts. That has been the growth of this empire, this commonwealth.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is that not what the bill is doing, declaring a state of fact?

Mr. GRAYDON: Just twisting the government's tail; that is all it is doing.

Mr. SINNOTT: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes, indeed.

Mr. SINNOTT: What was the reason for the Conservative party of that time changing its name at the last convention?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am glad I have aroused at least this much enthusiasm and amusement, but may I answer the hon. member in this way. Our changes of name have not been any more than his changes of affiliation.

Mr. SINNOTT: May I ask the hon. member another question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Calgary West has the floor.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With respect to the hon. member's further question I am going to adopt the attitude of the government and suggest that he put it on the order paper so that I may get along with what I have to say.

I am going to make this very, very plain. The first time I said anything in this house I said something I meant and felt very deeply. I then said that, aside from economic problems and that sort of thing, I thought the greatest problem we had and the mission we had was to do something about unity in this country; that is, unity between the two major races. I have not changed one bit since then. I am now going to make this suggestion, which has already been made, and then I am going to make an admission for myself. I am seeking time in this matter. Someone may say, "Then why did you vote against the motion to adjourn the debate?" I did. I think I was wrong. I think this country should have more time to consider this measure. I am now going to help out the government. They are now in this position. A number of ministers, perhaps the ablest—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And private members.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will admit that the ablest private member is the one who spoke just now.

I have come clean; I have admitted I was wrong in a vote I cast, and I conclude my remarks by saying this. We have had some heat displayed here. I think the house will agree that I am not exhibiting anything of that kind. When I get mad at somebody it is going to be over something quite worth while. An hon. member over there from Quebec sent me a note this afternoon which might have generated heat had I not known the great sense of humour he possesses. My position can be put in a sentence. Would it not be better to wait a minute? I told the house I was going to help out the government. Their position is this. They will have to kill this bill in the senate; that is the spot they are in. There is no other place they can go, and I am trying to help them. I am merely suggesting that we cool off a little bit, and let reason rather than emotion govern.

Mr. MAYHEW: Mr. Chairman, I did vote against the first amendment which asked for a six months hoist of the bill, because in my opinion that was one means not only of killing it but of smothering it to death, and of preventing any discussion of this important matter. I thought it was not becoming of anyone to make a motion of that kind which would mean that we would not have a chance at least to consider the bill before us.

Then, when we came to the amendment to adjourn the debate, I voted for it. I did so for the very reason that that would give us time to discuss the bill, but not kill it. It could be referred back to the house later in the session, and we could then either kill the bill or adopt it, as we saw fit.

When it came, then, to voting for the motion itself, I voted against it, because it was doing the very thing that the first amendment did; that is, it was crowding something upon us which we had not had time to consider. Because it was crowding, and because I felt that they were pushing it on us, I for one put out my neck and said that I would not support it. I am not at all sorry that I took that position.

But I do resent it when the leader of the C.C.F. tries to maintain that anyone who voted against that bill was voting against Canada itself. I take second place to no one when it comes to a matter of loyalty for Canada, or pride in this country. But I did think it was too important a question to be settled in an afternoon in this house.

To my mind Dominion day has meant to me the birth of Canada, the birth of our nation. For that reason I have always taken it seriously. But this debate is going to do one thing, because in my opinion it is good for Canada. That day, Dominion day, was nothing more to us than another holiday. It was a civic holiday, but one which Canadians did not use. They did not emphasize that we were celebrating the union of two great nations into one country called "Canada". We just went off on picnics here and there. Nothing was organized, and there was no effort to bring it to the attention of young Canadians that that is Canada's day. Whether it should be called "Canada day", or whether it should be called "Confederation day", or whether it should remain "Dominion day", I am not certain. Because of that uncertainty I should have liked to have a little more time to consider the matter. I suggest that those who have pressed the bill upon us at this time have made a mistake in doing so.

I do not think for one moment that it will make one particle of difference in the loyalty of Canada, one part against the other. It is not going to affect us at all. Those who talk along that line are talking foolishly. We shall still remain Canadians—and if as small a thing as that will send them away saying something or doing something that is not Canadian or is not in favour of the British commonwealth of nations, then I think they have gone altogether too far.

I have said even more than I intended to say, but I hope I have put myself on record.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, I will not take up much time of the house. However, I wish to say this to my good friends in all parties in the house that the British people—and I speak, of course, in the broadest sense, because we have taken all the finest people from the world into the family of this dominion—are fully represented in Canada. The British people hold an umbrella of freedom. Yes, always remember that they hold that umbrella of freedom.

Before we pass a measure of this kind, basic principle of democracy is to go and talk the matter over with your own people. I am for Canadian citizenship. I talked it over with my people, and they elected me. I am for a Canadian flag. I talked it over with my people, and they elected me.

I have no objection to this bill, but I think we must go back and talk it over with our people. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar this evening spoke about this Canada. I think Canada is what it is to-day because men were prepared to sacrifice their lives, if necessary, so that freedom, the British commonwealth and Canada might live. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is an Englishman, like myself.

An hon. MEMBER: I hope not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a minute; let us be fair about this. My mind goes back to 1939, when his party, there, said to his own flesh and blood, "Cash on the barrel".

Mr. COLDWELL: Nothing of the kind. I invite the minister to prove that statement. It is absolutely false.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will put it in this way, if I may put it in the language of the street, so that they may understand it. I have a vivid recollection of the statement that we should send goods and munitions of war to the people of Great Britain—

Mr. COLDWELL: Absolutely false.

Mr. MITCHELL: —and not any men.

Mr. COLDWELL: Absolutely false. That is not correct. Never cash on the barrel head. The minister knows he is falsifying the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, that is what I call cash on the barrel. Let me say to my hon. friend that I came in late. He made an impassioned speech this evening, and I did not hear all of it. But let me say this to him, that nations and civilization are not built by people who sit on the fence.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what you have been doing for years, so far as labour conditions are concerned—no bigger fence-sitter in Canada. What about Ford?

An hon. MEMBER: What about steel?

Mr. MITCHELL: Don't get down in the gutter.

Mr. COLDWELL: You asked for it, and you will get it.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind hon. members that they cannot make a row. The speaker has the floor, unless the hon. member who is speaking gives consent.

Mr. GILLIS: On a point of order, is the minister discussing the present bill, or is he discussing the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

An hon. MEMBER: Both.

Mr. COLDWELL: I don't mind which he does.

Mr. GILLIS: If you are going to allow that kind of latitude, you will get plenty of it. And that is giving you a tip.

Mr. ROWE: You have often contributed to it yourself.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say—and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is a personal friend of mine—that when we have been discussing this particular question he brings in the Ford strike. May I say to my hon. friend that I received a unanimous resolution from the workers at Ford for the contribution I made to the settlement of that strike.

I want now to get back to my previous point, and say that the British commonwealth of nations was built or developed, and evolved the greatest science of government in history, as we understand it, upon a basis of free institutions and the right to express one's opinion, notwithstanding the fact that ninety-nine per cent of the people may disagree with you. I believe that we should take time on this thing, that we should go back to our people and—

Mr. PROBE: But don't ride the fence.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my prairie chicken will keep quiet for a moment—

Mr. PROBE: I am not an overstuffed bantam rooster anyway.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should have said "prairie statesman." I am quite prepared to go back to my people and discuss with them whether they are in favour of making this change, just the same as I did on the flag question and other legislation that has come before the house. I just wanted to say these few words to put myself on record.

Mr. CHURCH: The dominions should hang together or they will hang separately.

Bill reported, on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Other hon. MEMBERS: Next sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I refer your Honour to standing order 77, which reads:

> All amendments made in committee are reported by the chairman to the house, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Next sitting.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, the rules clearly make it possible to have the third reading of this bill now, but after what has been said by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Mayhew) and others here to-night I wonder whether the government wishes to press for third reading now or whether it would not be better left over for a later day to give hon. members time to cool off. I respectfully make that suggestion to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In reply to the hon. leader of the opposition, may I point out that this is not a government measure. I was merely pointing out to His Honour that under standing order 77 it is quite competent for the house to take third reading of this bill forthwith.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the bill shall now be read a third time? Those in favour will please say, yea; those against will please say, nay. In my opinion the yeas have it. Call in the members.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I not be heard on a point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have put the question to the house. It was not for the Speaker to decide whether the bill should be read a third time now or not. I put the question to the house and I asked those who were in favour of the bill being read a third time to say yea, and those who were against to say nay, and I gave my opinion that the yeas had it. That having been said by me, more than five members rose, and according to the rules of the house I had only one thing to do, namely, to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to call in the members. The hon. member knows perfectly well that that is established practice in this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Am I to be denied the right to speak even on a point of order?

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not going to sit down for any one over there, but I will sit down for the Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. members on both sides to be quiet and preserve the dignity and decorum we should have in this house. The hon. member will recall that last session, after the members had been called in, a member rose on a point of order and I gave the ruling that when the members had been called in no member should rise on a point of order. I have already asked the Sergeant-at-Arms to call in the members so that we may proceed to take the vote.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. FRASER: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Members having been called in, no point of order could be raised now.

Mr. FRASER: This is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was paired with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been moved by Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane), seconded by Mr. Smith (North York), that the bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I have in my hand a large book. I am not familiar with every page of it, but I find on page 239 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, the following:

> 715. It is occasionally the custom to pass bills through their different stages at one and the same sitting. That course, however, is never taken except in cases of extreme urgency, and with the general assent of the house. (Speaker Brand, 1880). It is for the house to declare whether there is such urgency as to require the rapid passage of a measure; and whenever the sense of the house is to take more than one stage on the same day, the Speaker has permitted it to be done.

I am suggesting, sir, that you follow that and defer the third reading of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: On the point of order raised by my hon. friend—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member will permit me, no hon. member may raise a point of order now that the bill has already been read the third time. The question was put to the house for the second reading of the bill and the motion carried, and for the third reading, which motion also was carried, and the house had many opportunities to act in accordance with the hon. gentleman's suggestion. The house has already determined, however, that the bill be read a third time. The hon. member for Matapedia-Matane now moves, seconded by Mr. Smith of North York, that the bill be now passed and that the title be as on the order paper. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ALLOWANCES TO PERSONS SUFFERING INJURY, ACCIDENT OR CONGENITAL INFIRMITY.

The house resumed from Monday, April 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bertrand (Terrebonne):

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of including in their social security programme a system of allowances to every person, without any income or means of support, who, by reason of any injury, accident or congenital infirmity, is at a disadvantage in seeking or obtaining employment, or incapable of providing for his subsistence, and whose age prevents him from benefiting by the social security legislation now in force.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in the face of the exhibition of ultra-patriotism which we have had to-day, I feel almost impelled to declare my ancestry. While that has nothing to do with the present motion, we have had such a marvellous display of ninety-nine and forty-four one-hundredths per cent pure Canadianism that I think I should let you know that my father was born on the first of July and my grandfather was a United Empire Loyalist.

The members of this house have now an opportunity to prove whether or not they are really good Canadians. Perhaps it is well to refer to the motion in order to establish the terms of reference, because I do not wish to explore the entire field of Canadian history or the entire territory included in the British empire. I wish to stick to the resolution, which declares:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of including in their social security programme a system of allowances to every person, without any income or means of support, who, by reason of any injury, accident or congenital infirmity, is at a disadvantage in seeking or obtaining employment, or incapable of providing for his subsistence, and whose age prevents him from benefiting by the social security legislation now in force.

I submit that the test of a good citizen is not being able to brag about the number of square miles which happen to comprise our boundaries, or in the figures we establish in the field of trade, or on the goals that we have set in the fields of production. In Canada we have great natural beauty, great resources of power, great resources for the production of food; but I must insist that the test of Canada is in the field of her humanity. If in Canada we have people who are crippled and have no means of livelihood, people who must spend lives of pain, desperation and frustration, people who must depend on chance and charity, it is the greater shame in the face of our great wealth, and we have every reason to blush that we have delayed so long the passage of a bill of this kind.

If, through accident, through injury, if as a result of illness, or because of birth we have people who are handicapped they will need at least four things. They will need an allowance to pay for rent, clothing and food. In addition to that, perhaps they will need drugs and appliances. They should have medical care and a chance to take advantage of the kind of education which might be to their benefit. We should generously endow research institutes—and that is where we fall down—that would try to discover the reasons for their infirmities and alleviate their sufferings. I hope that we shall deal with this bill; I hope that all hon. members will prove that they are really good Canadians by voting for it.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I rise to support this resolution and to compliment the hon. member who introduced it. He has touched on a matter that has been too long overlooked. I hope that the government will accept the resolution and bring in legislation to implement it.

In my riding in Toronto I have come across many cases that are outside the pale of receiving assistance from any organization or source of which I know to-day. I have in mind a man who worked in a foundry in Toronto. Above him were large glass windows. In the course of time he caught a cold which settled in his lungs. In a foundry there is much heat —not the kind we had here this afternoon— and a good deal of draught. As I say, it settled on his lungs and he became quite ill. He went to the hospital. He applied to the workmen's compensation board for compensation and received compensation for some time. In my experience I have had a good deal to do with many men of that type. Many of them may work in factories. I myself was engaged in the foundry business for some time.

The workmen's compensation board was organized to take care of men injured in plants. I am happy to say that I was one of those, together with organizations and industries with which I was associated, who supported the Ontario government when they introduced the workmen's compensation act. But it does not cover everything. After the man to whom I referred was released from the hospital he received compensation for some time, but ultimately the board's doctors declared him perfectly fit to go back to his work. In the course of time he became incapable of working because his lungs were affected. I did my best to have the compensation board take up his case again, but was unsuccessful. This is the type of case that this resolution would cover. Here was a man who was unable to work at anything to give him a livelihood. His wife took in sewing and after the greatest of effort was apparently able to eke out an existence. This resolution would cover a case of that kind, because among other things it says:

. . . without any income or means of support, who, by reason of any injury, accident or congenital infirmity . . .

I have another case in mind where a man riding to work on a motorcycle had the misfortune to be struck by a street-car and was very seriously injured with the result that he became badly crippled. Of course, a workman cannot fight a street-car company for long. In this particular case the workman was not awarded any compensation by the street-car company or by any other body. He became a charge on his friends, and while still a young man was outside any possible support from any source that I could find out for him. If a bill were founded on this resolution such a man, being unable to work or to take care of himself, would be looked after.

The resolution also refers to congenital infirmity. I know of one or two cases which are only examples of a multitude that would come under a bill founded on this resolution. I know of a young woman who had a pronounced curvature of the spine. She went through a business college and graduated as a stenographer. She applied for a position and could not get one. The fact that she had a pronounced curvature of the spine prevented her from obtaining a position. After a considerable effort and writing many letters to friends of mine who were employers, and appealing to their humanity, I obtained a position for her. But there are multitudes like her who cannot obtain positions because of deformities that are no fault of theirs. This young lady was penalized by being apparently unemployable or being in such a condition that employers would not take her on, perhaps because other members of the staff did not want to have her among them. I know a good deal about offices and there are some offices like that. A class of people like that who could not get employment would be taken care of by a bill founded on this resolution.

I know of another young woman who is about eighteen years of age. She was born a pronounced cripple. She was so crippled that her legs were thrown under her and her arms were also deformed to a certain extent. She got along by throwing herself forward on the floor in a sitting position, one leg after the other. I endeavoured to persuade everyone I knew who might be able to do so to give her something to do, because she had a very happy disposition and wanted to do anything she was capable of doing, but I could get no work for her. Finally a society in Toronto, I believe it was the crippled children's society, took up her case and got her something to do at home; I do not know what kind of work it was. But for that society, which is doing splendid work among crippled children, that girl would have no means whatever of taking care of herself. I presume any bill founded upon this resolution would take care of a case of that kind.

Certainly crippled children, children born that way, had nothing whatever to do with their condition, and in my judgment it is the duty of the state to base upon this resolution a bill which will give these people something on which they may live. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) may have something in mind along that line; perhaps he has been working on something. If so, no doubt when he speaks he will tell us what are his plans and what is the programme. Many others are not old enough to qualify for old age pensions; there must be quite a large number of people in that age group who have no income whatever, and perhaps the bill would help take care of them.

I rose merely for the purpose of placing myself solidly behind any programme of social security for those who are referred to in the resolution. If the government will bring in a bill under which these people will be given at least an opportunity to live, not on their friends but on the state, I will support it.

Mr. W. G. BLAIR (Lanark): I should like to support this resolution, Mr. Speaker, but as it is now worded I cannot do so. I would not want any hon. member to think I am complaining about the resolution on a mere technicality; I have no doubt as to what the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) had in mind, but as it is now worded the resolution does not carry out that meaning. You will notice that it says, "without any income". In other words, a man in receipt of only $5 a month, far too little to provide him with the necessities of life, would not be eligible under this measure. Then it goes on to speak of "congenital infirmity". That means a disease or disability existing from birth. If this resolution is adopted in its present form we shall exclude people with heart disease, people with arthritis, people with tuberculosis, people who have suffered strokes and are paralysed, and many other persons who are incapable of earning a livelihood.

As I say, I should like to support this resolution, and I would suggest to the hon. member that he redraft or amend it. Instead of the word "any" as to income, I would suggest the word "sufficient"; instead of the word "congenital" I would substitute the word "physical". That would do away with those two objections. It would not exclude the man in receipt of a very small income. It would not exclude all those other people in the welfare group this resolution is intended to help. If the hon. member for Terrebonne will make those substitutions, by amendment or otherwise, I shall be glad to support the resolution because I think it fulfils a need that has existed for a long time.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I rise to support this resolution because I believe that the degree of civilization reached by society may be measured by the extent to which each citizen regards himself as his brother's keeper. I believe that this resolution takes a step in that direction; therefore I am in favour of it. Whatever technical difficulties may arise in interpreting who shall come under its provisions, can I think, be easily straightened out when the bill is brought down. This resolution suggests a general policy; as and when the bill comes down it will contain the details.

I wish to support the resolution also because some provinces, including Manitoba, are not as fortunate as the province referred to the other evening by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), when he said that in British Columbia there was some limited form of assistance to crippled or disabled people. I should like to place on record a sentence or two from a letter I received from the director of public welfare of Manitoba, to indicate that unfortunately in our province we have no legislation whatever to cover disability cases from the time the family allowance ceases until the old age pension begins. In reply to an inquiry of mine dated February 6, 1946, I received this reply, from which I shall read just a sentence:

> In Manitoba there is no provincial programme to provide financial aid for children just because of their crippled condition.

Further in the same letter I find this:

> In the second place because of existing legislation the care of crippled adults is a municipal responsibility . . .

In other words, there is no legislation whatever in Manitoba to look after either crippled children or adults. As an example of some of the unfortunate people that we run across all too often, I should like to quote a few words from a letter which was written to me by a person in Ste. Rose du Lac, which commences with these words:

> Being completely disabled through sickness, and sixty-six years old, would you kindly give me a hand toward getting my old age pension?

We all get letters of this kind, and it is not easy to sit down and explain to these people that because they are only sixty odd years of age they are not eligible for pension, regardless of the fact that they are crippled or disabled.

For the reasons I have mentioned I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Terrebonne on having brought forward this resolution. I hope that not only will the house pass the resolution but that a bill will be brought down under which provision will be made for looking after this class of people.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I rise to say that I am absolutely with the hon. member who brought in this resolution. I believe it has merit, but I agree with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) that the wording should be changed. I know of a family in my own riding that has not had one cent from any municipality; yet the entire family is absolutely crippled. The father has been a cripple since birth. The mother is crippled; her mother is the same way, and their child is also crippled. The only way they can get any money, except by working in their back kitchen, is through relief and they are too proud to ask for that. The father has to be carried around, because he cannot walk. The mother is able to hobble around on crutches, and the grandmother is the same way. They have a small income, through their own efforts, by working on woodwork in their own home. If this bill were changed so that it would increase their small income, one which is not sufficient—they make only a few hundred dollars a year—it would help a great deal.

In many instances parents who have children crippled from birth are ashamed of them, and of their infirmity. By accident about five years ago I stumbled on a case of a girl twenty-three years of age who had never been away from her own home, and who was unable even to feed herself. The family would not let her be seen by outsiders, because they were ashamed of her. Even her next-door neighbour did not know she was in the home.

To-day, thanks to the Hon. Percy Vivian, who was minister of health of Ontario, that girl is in an institution. But the family kept her and looked after her for years.

Only a few weeks ago I received a letter from a woman sixty-two years of age who has been crippled all her life, and who has been kept by her sister ever since the father died some twenty-six or twenty-seven years ago. This woman is too young to receive an ald age pension, and the relief she might get from the municipality is so small that it could not possibly keep her.

I hope sincerely that hon. members on the government side of the house will see to it that this bill carries.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish in a few words to express my support of the resolution now before us. I would draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that this is not a bill, that it is a resolution which had to be phrased in general terms so that it could be brought before the house.

Anyone reading the resolution will understand, I am sure, what the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) had in mind. He had in mind that Canada should have a social security programme. A social security programme is a programme for the social welfare or security of people who, for any reason, are not able to provide for themselves. I believe we have come to a stage in our civilization when the representatives of the people, and the people who elected those representatives, should be ashamed of seeing any member of the community who, because of any condition whatsoever, mental, physical, or otherwise, is not able to provide for himself, being allowed to suffer for lack of the good things of life which we can provide in such abundance.

I too hope, as the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) has said, that hon. members on the government side of the house, and the ministers in particular, will accept this resolution. In doing so, there is something that those of us on this side of the house should keep in mind. A social security programme cannot be put into operation unless we are prepared to spend part of the revenue of the country on that programme. If we do that, then we must add to the taxes paid by our people. That will mean increasing expenditures. So that if we are going to ask, as we do, that the government accept this suggestion, we must not criticize it for making the necessary expenditures required.

Mr. FRASER: But they could cut out some of their extravagances. They spend over $660 a day on the broadcast "Soldier's Wife".

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not saying that they cannot. However, I have noticed in my years of public life that everyone is in favour of instituting economies, provided that the operation does not begin with him or her, as the case may be.

The matter of looking after the unfortunate among us is not a matter of money. It is a matter of organizing the man-power of the country, our material resources and our machinery of production in order that we may produce the things those people need: food, clothing, shelter, education, medical attention and those other things which we all need. That may be expressed in terms of money, it may be measured in that way, but it must be provided in real goods and services.

The question is not: Can we afford the money? Rather it is: Can we produce the goods and services required? I am convinced we can, and in any event we should not say we cannot until we have put every unemployed man and woman to work producing wealth.

I, too add my congratulations to the many which have been tendered the hon. member for Terrebonne for introducing the resolution. I hope the government will accept its broad general principle, and use every endeavour to put it into legislative form.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this discussion has followed the introduction of a motion by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) which, like a good many other motions, may be the first step in a measure of social reform. I should like to add my word of congratulation to him for bringing this forward, and speaking to it in the eloquent and moderate way in which he spoke.

It is within the experience of all hon. members that if we look back over the years we shall find that practically every measure of social reform has been introduced, in the first instance, in consequence of a private member's resolution. This has led to its being ventilated, developed, explored, considered and ultimately introduced in the form of legislation. In that connection I think of the motion of the then hon. member for Compton, Mr. Letellier de St. Just who, back in 1929, offered a motion in favour of family allowances. That was considered very forward-looking at the time, and it was some years before family allowances were introduced.

It is one of the means whereby, as I say, these matters receive attention and ultimately incorporation into the legislative structure of the country. The subject of the motion, namely, assistance for people who are incapacitated by injury, accident, or congenital infirmity from earning their livings, is one which I think has the sympathy of every hon. member. All of us would like to see something more done for these people. All of us have at heart the interests which the hon. member for Terrebonne has so eloquently advanced.

There is a tendency nowadays, as we all know, for all of us to look to the state to meet conditions which people have previously met from their own savings or with the assistance of their families or through private agencies and municipalities. There are many reasons for that development which I do not need to go into now, but it is a manifestation of modern civilization which is seen not only in our country but in all highly industrialized countries.

This debate has shown how strong that feeling is in this field. Every speaker has pleaded the causes of the class of people intended to be covered by this motion, but the debate has been singularly free from detailed suggestions as to what kind of measure should be brought down, exactly who should be covered, how the cost should be met and every kind of encumbering detail. It is a motion designed, and properly so, to bring the matter before the attention of the house and, through the house, of the country.

From my examination of this subject, there would appear to be two distinct classes of people whom this motion might seek to cover. First, there are those who, being gainfully employed, are in consequence of accident or disease prevented from carrying on with their usual occupation. That class is covered in some countries by what are called "sickness benefits." Those benefits are usually payable on a contributory basis, as in the United Kingdom, where since 1911 they have had sickness benefits as part of their system of health insurance. Those benefits are similar to the benefits payable under our system of unemployment insurance. They are payable in consideration of a contribution by the beneficiary, and they are payable in consequence of his being unemployed through sickness, just as unemployment insurance benefits are payable through his being unemployed through there not being work.

There is a second class of people who may be covered by this motion, namely, those who are unable to work at all, those who are totally and permanently incapacitated. They rather approximate to a class to whom we now pay benefits, namely, the blind.

These two sets of benefits might be combined under the same measure, but ordinarily in measures for social security in other countries they are not; they are dealt with in separate categories; the first category of sickness benefits being assimilated to unemployment insurance, and the second class of invalidity benefits being assimilated to benefits payable to the blind.

There are a good many other questions which this motion raises. Would the protection offered by the kind of measure proposed extend only to the gainfully employed or to those insured under a system of unemployment insurance? Would it cover the self-employed? Would it cover the unemployables, the people who ordinarily cannot secure work at all? Would it extend to those partly as well as to those totally disabled and to those temporarily as well as to those permanently disabled? All these are questions which have to be considered when dealing with a matter of this kind, and the provisions of the laws in force in the countries which have these measures, notably the United Kingdom since 1911, Australia since 1945, and New Zealand since 1938, as well as Sweden, differ materially from each other.

Then, too, looking at the motion itself, we see that the idea of a means test is introduced in the words "without any income or means of support", qualifying the class of people who might be beneficiaries. It is added that these people would be "at a disadvantage in seeking or attaining employment, or incapable of providing for his subsistence." So that the motion as it stands seems to contemplate a system of benefits which would be payable on a means test basis, probably without contribution, and primarily intended to benefit those who are unemployable.

In considering this kind of measure, as we have done in the department and as the government has done for a good many years, we have to consider the order of priority in which we introduce social security measures. It is not possible in any country to introduce a complete system of social security measures all at once. No country has ever done that, and from my own experience in the Department of National Health and Welfare I can say that it would be exceedingly difficult to create the administrative machinery to deal with a dozen different measures of social security all at once. Further, a good deal of development of public opinion is required to secure the necessary support for any such measure and also to secure the willingness to pay the cost of that measure.

The order of priority of social security measures is put by different experts in different terms. The report of Doctor L. C. Marsh on "Social Security for Canada" which was prepared for the advisory committee on reconstruction deals at page 115 with the order of priorities of social legislation, and there Doctor Marsh gives this as the desirable order:

1. Unemployment insurance
2. Health insurance
3. The disability-old-age-survivors group of insurances
4. Children's allowances
5. Sickness cash benefit
6. Funeral benefits

President Truman of the United States, in his great message to congress of November 19, 1945, put forward proposals for various measures: first, construction of hospitals and related facilities; second, expansion of public health, maternal and child health services; third, medical education and research; fourth, prepayment of medical costs; and fifth, protection against loss of wages from sickness and disability. In this last connection President Truman says:

> Therefore, as a fifth element of a comprehensive health programme, the workers of the nation and their families should be protected against loss of earnings because of illness. A comprehensive health programme must include the payment of benefits to replace at least part of the earnings that are lost during the period of sickness and long-term disability. This protection can be readily and conveniently provided through expansion of our present social insurance system with appropriate adjustment of premiums.
> Insurance against loss of wages from sickness and disability deals with cash benefits rather than with services. It has to be coordinated with the other cash benefits under existing social insurance systems. Such coordination should be effected when other social security measures are reexamined. I shall bring this subject again to the attention of the congress in a separate message on social security.

There the President puts provision for protection against loss of wages from sickness and disability in the fifth and last group of measures, one in respect of which he is going to put forward some proposal at some subsequent date. Consequently his allotment of priorities on social security legislation is not out of line with that of Doctor Marsh; that is, sickness benefits and invalidity benefits are to be well down the scale, in fact at the end of the scale in so far as health measures are concerned. There is a very good reason for that, and that is that in our attack on the problem of ill health—and there is an attack going on all over the front, with a fine combination of agencies, federal, provincial, municipal and private—we make our first aim the prevention of illness and the cause of disability through disease and accident. In accordance with that, the federal government in its proposals to the provinces has put before them suggestions for a very wide measure of grants to the provinces on various terms which will be found in the green book containing the proposals of the federal government.

Second comes the question of treatment. If we cannot prevent disease and incapacity due to disease or accident, let us try to cure it; let us try to treat it. So that we put forward in our proposals a comprehensive suggestion for a nation-wide system of health insurance which, if adopted, would provide for complete hospital, medical and nursing services for every man, woman and child in every part of Canada in which the plan was adopted.

The third step should be that of rehabilitation. There is a large group of people who have been incapacitated by accident or disease, but who could be rehabilitated by vocational training, by special efforts on the part of employers and national selective service to see that they secure jobs which give them opportunities to use the capacities they have. In that field great work has been done in Canada by the Department of Veterans Affairs with regard to our returned men of both wars and also by the Department of Labour through national selective service. That work has been and is being extended in local communities by provinces, by municipalities and by private agencies.

It is only in the fourth place on this single item of health measures that we come to the desirable measures which the hon. member for Terrebonne has suggested, namely, sickness benefits or invalidity benefits.

So that this comes some way down the list, and that is for another reason that it has been generally found that these are administratively about the most difficult to introduce. There are various reasons for that. One is, of course, and I do not think it is making any unfair comment on human nature to suggest, that during a time of high employment there is a much greater tendency for everyone to use his capacities in a useful fashion than during a time of relatively low employment, when there is a great tendency for people to discover reasons which prevent them from working. It has been found in the United States, in Canada, in every country which has had to administer various measures like workmen's compensation acts administered by the provinces, that there is a clear relationship between the economic status of the country at any moment and the claims in respect of disability or incapacity. In a report "Issues in Social Security—a report to the committee of ways and means of the house of representatives by the committee's social security technical staff", which was transmitted on January 17, 1946, and which has just been published, it was said:

> There is no royal road to a scheme of disability benefits that is not beset with substantial obstacles.

That is, I think, the experience of every country which has tried to introduce it. One of the reasons why it has generally been considered desirable that health insurance should precede sickness benefits is that only when you have a nation-wide system of health services providing the whole population with an opportunity to secure medical treatment and, if necessary, hospitalization for any condition they may be suffering from, can you properly deal with the class of people who do not respond to treatment and who remain incapacitated through sickness or other cause.

Therefore I suggest that in the introduction of social measures there is a definite order of priorities which has been recognized by other countries and which we ourselves are recognizing in the measures that we have introduced in Canada.

In that connection I might remind the house that in recent years we have made a good deal of progress with regard to social security measures on the part of the federal government. In 1927 old age pensions were introduced on a fifty-fifty basis at rates which have been subsequently increased and which now are contributed to the extent of 75 per cent by the federal government. Further, we pay pensions to the blind at the same rates from the age of forty, and the dominions proposals to the dominion-provincial conference again include a measure for a substantial increase in the benefits to the blind. We would hope, if the provinces concur, to cooperate with them in extending the age down to twenty-one and also in further defining the means test; also making provisions for the treatment of blind people at government expense so as to enable them to restore themselves to gainful livelihood and also relieve the state from the burden of making payments to them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand the minister to say that the age would be lowered to twenty-one?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, that is the proposal. As hon. members know, in 1941 we introduced unemployment insurance, despite a good deal of objection to that at the time. It was thought that we should not take that step during the war. We obtained the consent of the provinces to an amendment to the constitution and introduced unemployment insurance, and in consequence of doing that at the time we have not only succeded in getting the system to work, and covering a great proportion of our population; but also built up a fund of $350,000,000 available to meet the demands on that fund.

In 1944 we introduced family allowances and they became effective from July 1, 1945. As hon. members know, allowances are now paid under the act regularly each month by cheques to the 1,386,000 parents having 3,300,000 children under sixteen years of age on whose behalf the payments are made.

These are very substantial, even amazing advances for a country to make, and to make during the war.

I should now like to call the attention of hon. members to another element that must be considered; the cost of any social security measure. We have no estimate of what the cost of any kind of sickness benefits, such as might be provided under the hon. member's motion, would be in Canada. We have tried to make estimates, but as far as I can make out there is no basis for arriving at reliable estimates except to see what the cost has been in countries which have already introduced such measures, and to make some rough and ready calculations. A guess might be that a measure such as this, which would provide for benefits of something like $5 a week to those entitled to claim, by reason of inability to work, because of sickness or some continuing incapacity, might total as much as $100,000,000 a year. That is an estimate made by trying to adapt to Canadian conditions figures which seem to have been the experience in other countries.

One could change that figure up and down materially by very slight changes in the law which would increase the class of people covered, and we could also increase it by an easy administration, or we could easily reduce the figure by changes in the opposite direction.

I do not know whether hon. members realize how much we are spending on social welfare at the present time. In February, 1946, if I may quote figures given by the Minister of Labour to-day at a meeting with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada—they are for February, 1946—the benefits paid those who are out of work were $5,903,000, and under family allowances, $19,690,000. The dominion's share of old age pensions, plus benefits for veterans of world war I and benefits for veterans of world war II, adds another $42,382,000. Then we have amounts paid under the War Services Grants Act as gratuity allowances, and post-discharge re-establishment and rehabilitation benefits totalling $6,222,000. There was also paid during February to dependents of men in the armed forces a total of $8,000,000.

These measures alone in February, 1946, provide a grand total of approximately $89,000,000, nearly all of which went into homes of those who constitute in the main the wage-earners of Canada. That is a payment at the rate of $1,000,000,000 a year. If we add to that the payments which would be required under the proposed health insurance grants, health insurance and old age pensions as put before the provinces, and add in what the provinces pay for their social security legislation, I think we shall be paying more per capita to the Canadian people than is paid in any other country in the world under any system of social security. In other words, we have a big programme under way, and while that does not represent the end of the road, it does represent a substantial instalment in social security for the Canadian people.

I should also say this. If these measures are to be added to the budgetary burden of the dominion the cost can be met, according to the view of this government, only by taxation or by borrowing. We believe that the Canadian economy can be used by the Canadian people to keep virtually everyone in Canada gainfully employed. We also believe that on the basis of that full employment we can have a gross national production approximating that which we have had during the last year, and on the basis of that we can carry the load we have set ourselves. But if we add substantially to this load and keep taxes at a very high level, then there will be a steady decrease in initiative, in the willingness of people to take risks and to work, which cannot avoid having a disastrous effect on the value of our money and on our ability to maintain the kind of economy we want.

Therefore, while all these measures are desirable and we should all like to see them enacted, we must also see, if we are to remain a responsible people and keep the value of our money what it is; if we are to retain the confidence of our own people and that of other peoples, that we do not make promises we cannot keep or assume a load we cannot carry. That requires a high degree of responsibility on the part of every member of this house.

So far I have discussed the question without reference to the constitutional position because I am one of those who believe that if a thing is desirable, then there should be some means whereby the dominion and the provinces can work out an arrangement to enable its being carried out. Nevertheless we must recognize that we are working under a federal constitution, under which certain responsibilities are placed upon the federal government and certain responsibilities upon the provincial governments. Clearly the responsibility for health and welfare matters, for the relief of unemployables and for the kind of thing about which we are now talking, rests primarily with the provinces.

If an arrangement is to be worked out whereby some part of that responsibility is to be carried by the dominion, then it requires alterations in the financial arrangements between the two which may be far-reaching. I do not wish to say anything more about that except to say that these matters of health and welfare, the health proposals of the dominion, the proposals for old age pensions and for assistance to the unemployed are before the provinces in the proposals put forward by the dominion government. The dominion and the provinces are going to meet again on April 25, and we hope that a satisfactory arrangement will be worked out for the welfare of all the Canadian people. But we must recognize that these are matters of great concern to the provinces and that we could not proceed with a system of sickness and invalidity benefits such as might be envisaged within the terms of this motion except through the cooperation of, and after arrangement with, the provinces. It is one field in which it would not be possible for the federal government to work out any satisfactory disposition by itself. It must be done by cooperation. My own belief is that in these matters of dominion-provincial relations we should always work through cooperation as far as we can.

Therefore there is also the constitutional question to be considered. However, when I have said that I do not wish to suggest for a second that because we have a federal constitution we should stop working toward the steady improvement of the welfare of all the people of Canada. It just means that we have to take the federal constitution into account, and by cooperation with the provinces, by seeking their collaboration, try to work out arrangements whereby we can do the things that the people of Canada want done. Consequently I cannot hold out any hope to my hon. friend that the government will accept his suggestion in the sense that we shall bring in legislation this year to implement it. But I should like to tell him and the house that the Department of National Health and Welfare is watching with keen interest social security developments in every part of the world. We have our own correspondents in other countries. We take every opportunity of exchanging views with people when they are travelling from one country to another. I should like to announce in this connection, for the first time I believe, that we have asked the director of social security of Australia, Mr. F. H. Rowe, to pay a visit to Canada so that we can discuss common problems together. We hope that it will be possible for him to come. I have also asked Sir Wilson Jameson, director of health services of the United Kingdom, to visit Canada in May. At that time I hope it may be possible for hon. members to have an opportunity of hearing him discuss such questions. When Mr. Attlee was here I took the opportunity of discussing similar problems with him. I have just been on a visit to the United States where I discussed common problems with United States public health service officials and with officers of various government agencies as well as officers of the Rockefeller foundation. Our officials are constantly in touch with the people who have to deal with these matters in other countries. There are a great number of conferences, including the international labour organizations, in which such matters are under consideration.

Therefore I can assure hon. members that this, amongst other social security measures, is receiving constant consideration. Consequently it is without the least difficulty that I accept the resolution and say that we shall continue the consideration it urges, not with the thought of any immediate action this year, but with the thought that some such measure as this must in time be worked out for the welfare of the Canadian people.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I gave my place to the minister who made a most interesting speech, but I rise now to congratulate very warmly the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) upon having put this resolution on the order paper. It was time that it should come. There is something most unusual and most incredible, namely, that the only people who suffer from any infirmity and who are too poor to pay for their care and their cure are precisely those whose intelligence is normal, who are not lunatics. A lunatic is sent to an asylum whether he has the means to pay for his board or not. When he has not it is the municipality or the province that pays for him, or both. But when a person who suffers from any infirmity, has some trouble with an arm or a leg, but has a sane and sound mind, then he or she becomes a derelict. He cannot get help.

We hear about security programmes. In our age it is accepted; it is a good thing, and I congratulate the minister on his good speech. But in this very matter that the hon. member for Terrebonne has brought to light there is a gap. There is a gap into which fall those who are precisely the neediest. Around Christmas everybody sees the big advertisements that are published in the New York Times, especially in the Sunday edition: "The Neediest Cases". All the cases that I have in mind, the poor people, young children without hands and other cases like that, pitiful cases, would be helped precisely if the suggestion of my hon. friend were accepted. The question is not to bring in an expert from Australia and another expert from Great Britain, Sir So-and-so. I do not care for these people. The question is to look after the boy who has no hands, to come to his help. It is not a matter that can wait until the end of the world. What is the use of bringing in these soft brains from all over the world when the boys are suffering here? It is the story of the good Samaritan. Everyone was passing by; no one was paying attention to the poor man lying in the street. They were saying very nice things, but they were passing by. The thing to do is give help to all these children.

Of course, some things are done by the province; some things are done by Ottawa, but if there is a chaotic condition in the relations between Ottawa and the provinces it is on account of the Rowell-Sirois commission that has caused so much trouble in connection with dominion-provincial finances. It is a complete mess. It is precisely on account of that mess that these children and older people suffer, because it is impossible to come to their help. Apparently no one should speak of that chaotic condition which was brought about by that commission and all the experts who were there. We have to put order into things; and if Ottawa cannot do it, Ottawa has only to transfer some of the taxation to the provinces and they will do it. What is the duty of Ottawa, and what is the duty of the provinces? Is there anyone in this chamber who can answer that question? We may be told that it will come about by agreement. Some years ago, before the Sirois report, everything went well; but since that report was presented it has become the reason for postponing the assistance which is due at once to these needy cases.

I do not say that in any spirit of acrimony. I have no feeling of that kind; but when I think of the procession of poor people who come to my office, as they come to the office and the house of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand), of our lady colleague the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum), of the good doctor the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), of my good friend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), of the minister himself and all those who have spoken, I believe it is time to do something, and not wait. Do the firemen wait until the house is burned before coming with their pump, their hose and all the rest of it? Some of these crippled children have the care they require because their parents can pay for it, but orphans or the children of poor families, settlers and so on, need some help. Let us give it to them. It will not require such an enormous amount of money; and this is not a new proposition. It is a case of adjusting matters so that there will be no gap in the security system.

Naturally I have no objection to the dominion and provincial governments discussing the matter at the earliest possible moment, but they should not wait too long before deciding it. It should be decided this spring, so that people may not suffer longer than is necessary. In the province of Quebec we have allowances for needy mothers who have young children, and it is paid in spite of the fact that they also receive the family allowance.

In Quebec, as elsewhere, the blind receive a pension at an earlier age. There are old age pensions. Those who suffer from mental disability are sent to places where they are cared for properly. But I cannot say how much I have been touched by my hon. friend who has done something that so many of us would have done had he not been the first. It is because we see that the operation of the social security programme is not working as it should that we cannot do otherwise than approve and support this resolution.

There may be some flaws in it, of course, though I find none, but such flaws are of no importance in the drafting of the resolution. It is not this resolution that will be the law. This is an expression of opinion which will be the will of the House of Commons as soon as it is adopted; and I am sure no one in this house will discuss one word or another if, as a result, those who suffer will be deprived of help. Hon. members have had enough experience with what goes on in families which have been afflicted in this way to consider the spirit of the resolution and not argue about matters of detail. I also warmly congratulate all hon. members, including the minister, who have spoken so well.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I wish to raise my voice, for the first time this session, in support of this resolution. During the earlier hours this evening we were dealing with matters which were characterized as of great importance; but when a good many people across Canada read their newspapers, or read copies of Hansard, they will come to the conclusion that a good deal of it has been the making of a mountain out of a molehill, the creation of a tempest in a teapot. I noticed that while the question of changing the name of our national birthday was being discussed, practically all the seats on both sides of the house were filled; that was supposed to be a very important piece of business. Now, however, when we are dealing with something having to do with the happiness and well-being of thousands of our people, where are the members of parliament?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Where is all the excitement?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Yes; where is all the excitement? I suppose they will say, well, we could not vote for this thing until we had measured public opinion. I am not a bit afraid of what public opinion will say to those of us who are sitting in the house now, endeavouring to support this motion.

There is only a very little time left this evening, but I should like to refer to the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton), who said he doubted very much whether the government would do anything in this matter this session, and who introduced the question of cost, speaking of comparable costs in Canada and in other countries for measures of social security along this particular line. Surely we are not going to raise again in this house that old bogey, where is the money to come from? In this copy of the order paper which I hold in my hand I see we are to make a loan to the United Kingdom of $1,250 million. Then on the last page I see where we are to cancel entirely the sum of $425,000,000 which was owing in connection with the commonwealth air training scheme. Not one word would I say against either of these measures. But if we can be so generous with Canada's money in giving it and lending it in the millions of dollars, it ill-becomes us to speak about cost when it comes to alleviating the misery, pain and suffering of thousands of people in this dominion.

Therefore I hope we may introduce a little more humanity into this house, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) said a while ago. The measure of our Canadianism is not just how much we wave the flag or how excited we get over changing the name of a day, but how we stand behind a measure of this kind which means so much in the way of human happiness and human well-being. I wish most heartily to support the resolution.

Mr. L. PHILLIPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise after listening to the able presentation made by the minister. I think, however, that I will reflect the sentiments of the house when I say that the country at large owes him a debt for what he has done up to now to build in Canada a social security system. His argument as to the load which this bill would place upon the shoulders of the taxpayers of the country must be seriously considered. But the people concerned by this resolution are in such special circumstances that I believe I might perhaps be permitted to say a few words on their behalf.

We do not ask for these people a relief measure, because we want them to be treated in a way different from the treatment received by normal persons. We want them to live like normal beings, but they cannot earn their own living. It is not a question of their not having the initiative. It is not a question of their not being willing to work or wanting to retire from work too early in life. It is a question of their not being able to work because of their disability. For that reason I suggest there is an element of urgency. There is the same element in connection with the old age pensioners. Whatever I might wish to say generally on the question of social security I shall reserve for the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

But, just the same, I suggest that something should be done for those people who suffer from permanent disability. The burden of disability, in general, is heavier than that created by old age. Yet by a Liberal government, we have had placed on the statutes of Canada an act which permits our giving to the aged people the relief to which they are entitled after a life of work. But I think people who are disabled are under a worse handicap than are old people. The aged people have lost their ability to earn, but if they are not sick they are not necessarily a burden in many other ways. However, disabled people, in addition to their inability to earn, require nursing care. They need medical assistance—and all that costs money.

It is the duty of the state to look after those people, even ahead of the old people. In this connection I should like to quote just one sentence from an article by Oswald Stein, chief of the social insurance section of the international labour office. This is what he says:

> Permanent or prolonged invalidity occurring before the pensionable age is equivalent to premature old age, and most of the arguments for security in old age apply here too.

I suggest they more than apply because, as I said before, they are under a worse handicap than are the aged people. Social insurance is applicable to the disabled as well as to the aged, and it is feasible under the same scheme.

Relief can be given through social insurance, or through non-contributory social security schemes giving insurance benefits for disabled people. At the moment we have disability policies, but they are available only to those who can pay for them. Those who work in professions or trades, and who are in a position to pay for insurance against disability, permanent or otherwise, can have it. The insurance companies provide such policies in the course of their business. They are available for those who have steady employment, those who are in trade unions or in some fields of endeavour where such schemes are provided. It is included in most retirement schemes of large corporations, and large companies which provide benefits in case of disability.

In the United States a study has been made by the social security board, and I hold in my hand an article by the chairman of the board, Mr. A. J. Altmeyer, which is published in the Social Security Bulletin for March, 1941. In this Mr. Altmeyer tells about the benefits derived in the United States by people who are working for one or another of the large corporations.

Mr. BURTON: May I remind the hon. member that the time is nearly up, and we should like to have a vote upon it.

Mr. PICARD: If I reach eleven o'clock can I not adjourn the debate so that I may carry on at some other time? Surely it is my privilege to adjourn the debate and carry on some other time.

Mr. BURTON: I just wanted to remind the hon. member that the time is slipping by.

Mr. PICARD: Does the hon. member mean that he would like to have a vote on the motion to-night? He might have a vote to-morrow. I must say to him that I have not usually abused the right to speak in the House of Commons. Last session I was most silent—and have reproached myself for that. Here is something that is of interest to the people in my constituency. I am in agreement with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum), whom I congratulate upon her able speech. I am in agreement with most people who have spoken in the debate, and I thought I might be permitted to give my views with respect to it.

If to-morrow we do not go ahead with this we shall go on with the next order; it might be the railway bill or something. I believe there is as much urgency that we give our views with respect to disabled people as there is that we give them respecting other matters.

The time of the house has not been wasted on this side, most of the time. I do not blame hon. members for doing what they do, but I wish they would extend to me the same privilege, the privilege of speaking, even if we reach one minute to eleven o'clock.

I could not understand my hon. friend's remarks. If by the debate stopping at eleven o'clock it would prevent anyone from talking on this, or would have the effect of killing the bill, it might be different. But if I adjourn the debate, and speak some other day, then other hon. members on the other side of the house will have the same privilege.

Mr. KNOWLES: But it goes to the bottom of the list.

Mr. PICARD: It being 20 seconds to 11 o'clock, I shall move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Picard the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 5, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN "OTTAWA MORNING JOURNAL"

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I rise to what I believe is a question of privilege, and I hope that my point is well taken.

In the Ottawa Journal of this morning there appears an editorial headed as follows:

Mr. Speaker misunderstands the House of Commons.

In this ill-advised and ill-mannered editorial the anonymous writer—and incidentally I have no more respect than I should for those who have not the courage to sign the gems of wisdom which come out of their pens—criticizes your conduct, Mr. Speaker, in the following terms:

It seemed to show also that Mr. Speaker Fauteux either doesn't understand the spirit of the House of Commons rules or imagines that his duty as Speaker is to protect the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. MICHAUD: He concludes his editorial with these words:

It is worse than pitiful when the Speaker tries to make it even worse than it is—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I will ask the hon. member to state his question of privilege.

Mr. MICHAUD: I say that these words are a reflection on the Speaker of this house—an unwarranted attack, Mr. Speaker, on yourself. I feel that they should be withdrawn, and I would ask the writer of this article, if he is a gentleman, to withdraw his remarks.

PRESS REPORT AS TO DIVORCE PROCEDURE—P.E.I. DIVORCE COURTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I rise to a question of privilege affecting at the same time this house and the province of Prince Edward Island. I have under my hand a clipping of an editorial which appears in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, April 3, entitled "Degradation of Parliament" and discussing divorce actions before this house. I would read one sentence. The editorial states:

Most of these (divorce) applications come from Quebec and Prince Edward Island—provinces without divorce courts.

I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that since last year, 1945, Prince Edward Island has had its own divorce courts, and that my province is not encumbering either the House of Commons or the Senate of Canada with divorce cases.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Second, third and fourth reports of special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

WAR EXPENDITURES

Mr. G. B. ISNOR (Halifax) moved that the second report of the special committee on war expenditures and economies, presented on April 3, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL AVIATION

ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Reconstruction, or perhaps the Minister of Transport. I gave notice of it to the Minister of Reconstruction. It has to do with the establishment in Montreal of the international civil aviation organization. The question is prompted by some criticism of Canada and of the government because of the delay in securing suitable accommodation for that organization. Will the minister advise what steps if any the government has taken to aid in the establishment of this organization in that city?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I would point out to my hon. friend that the difficulty in obtaining office space in any city is always with us in times like these. PICAO was housed originally in Dominion Square building in quarters that were adequate at the time, but since then the requirements have expanded. Their expanded requirements were met in the first stage by making available one half floor in the Sun Life building, and recently further steps were taken to make available eleven thousand feet of floor space on another floor of the Sun Life building, which will be in possession of PICAO by April 10. My advice therefore is that the requirement for office space is fully met at the present time.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister is not concerned about the possibility of losing the organization's headquarters in Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: I am very much concerned about it, but I believe that in the circumstances the members of PICAO recognize that the government of Canada is doing its best. I do not believe there is any complaint from the members at the moment regarding the arrangements that will obtain after April 10.

BUTTER

QUESTION AS TO APPLICATION OF PRICE INCREASE TO DAIRY BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, and if he is not here, possibly the Minister of Agriculture can answer it. Did the recent increase in the ceiling price of butter apply to dairy butter as well as to creamery butter, and if not, why?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): My understanding is that it does not, but that decision was made by the prices and trade board and I would not care to give the reasons.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALLOTMENT OF BUILDING MATERIALS—HOSPITALS—SUNNYBROOK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Can the Minister of Reconstruction advise the house whether building materials allotted to projects such as veterans hospitals will be considered as a part of the total allotment to a municipality, or whether such allotments of materials will be separate from the municipal allotment?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Projects such as veterans hospitals, which have the highest priority in the obtaining of materials, are not considered a part of the allotment to the municipalities. Supplies for projects of that type are furnished ex quota.

Mr. SKEY: Arising out of my question to the Minister of Reconstruction I would ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs whether he can say when Sunnybrook hospital will be completed, equipped and staffed.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I cannot make a statement with any definiteness, but I can assure my hon. friend that, in conjunction with various other departments of government, we are doing everything we can to expedite the completion of the hospital in question.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUESTION AS TO USE OF GERMAN PRISONERS OF WAR AT WHITECOURT, ALTA.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, notice of which I have already sent him. Does the government contemplate permitting the use of German prisoners of war in the sawmills at Whitecourt, Alberta?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Prisoners of war will not be used at Whitecourt, Alberta. At present there are thirty prisoners of war there, and they will be transferred on April 30 to another place.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin for the second reading of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): When the house rose on Tuesday night I had discussed the phases of the bill which deal with British citizenship and upon which I maintain this parliament has no power to legislate, because we have repealed the applicability of the British Naturalization Act which previously gave us the power to make British subjects in this country.

I now have a few words of praise for the minister in connection with the section which deals with the qualifications of an applicant for naturalization. I am pleased that he has inserted paragraph (f) in section 10, which requires an applicant to have an adequate knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship. I commend the minister particularly for the insertion of sections 37 and 38. Section 37 provides that:

> The minister, with the approval of the governor in council, shall take such measures as to him may appear fitting to provide facilities to enable applicants for certificates of citizenship to receive instruction in the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship.

Section 38 gives the judge who hears the application authority to impress upon the applicants, by appropriate ceremonies, the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship. I warmly approve these provisions of the bill, which will make for better citizenship and will impress the candidate for citizenship at the time he is received into the great family of the Canadian nation.

For a few moments I should like to deal with the sections of the bill which deal with the loss of Canadian citizenship. In that connection I have some criticisms to offer. If we take all this care which we now intend to take—and it is a far cry from the time that we made citizens prior to 1914 in western Canada at least—we should get a better citizenship. We should accept our citizens for better or for worse. There should be no discrimination so far as the loss of citizenship is concerned. Section 20 of the bill provides that if a naturalized Canadian citizen has left this country and resided outside of Canada for a period of at least six years he shall, with certain qualifications and exceptions, lose his certificate of naturalization in Canada. This refers only to a naturalized Canadian citizen. I am somewhat in favour of that. If a person leaves this country and has no connection with it at all, it should be presumed that he does not care to belong to this family any longer; but I suggest that we make this absence from Canada without reasonable and proper cause to be a presumption that he never intended to reside permanently in Canada, which would mean that he did not make a bona fide application at the time he filed his application, and that it could be revoked for fraud. I mentioned a moment ago that I thought we should take our citizens for better or for worse. There is only one ground upon which the naturalization certificate should be revoked, namely, fraud. I consider a certificate of naturalization to be in the nature of a contract. The applicant for naturalization makes an offer to the government, and when the government issues the certificate of naturalization, it accepts that offer. These are the essential ingredients of a contract. If the contract has been induced by fraud or misrepresentation, it can be vitiated and repudiated. For the same reason a certificate of naturalization should be repudiated or cancelled. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these are the only grounds upon which we should revoke a naturalization certificate.

As I have already said, the absence from Canada without proper cause should be a presumption that the individual did not mean what he said when he made the application and said that he wanted to reside permanently in Canada. It will give the applicant a chance, under the provisions of section 21, to have a hearing and to state his case before the tribunal prescribed in that section, and still preserve his nationality or his Canadian citizenship if he has good grounds to offer.

Section 21 also deals with revocation. Paragraph (a) states—

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I regret having to do this, because the hon. gentleman is making a helpful and constructive speech, but if I do not take this attitude now I shall be accused, when other members proceed to discuss particular sections, of not having objected to the course now being pursued by the hon. gentleman. I am following the hon. gentleman's speech with close interest, but he is now discussing particular sections and that is certainly contrary to the rules of the house. We are now debating the principle of the bill. There will be ample opportunity when we are in committee for the hon. gentleman to make what I know are suggestions which he has carefully considered and which may help the house materially in considering the provisions of the bill as they now stand.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say a word on the point of order? It is true that the hon. gentleman, in discussing the principle of the bill, has referred to certain sections. In all probability that is questionable under our rules; nevertheless I feel that in making these references he is really dealing with the principle underlying the bill itself; hence, in the circumstances the references should be excused. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman can do exactly what he is doing by simply refraining from mentioning the particular section he is discussing, and saying that the bill provides so-and-so.

Mr. JAENICKE: I am sorry if I have offended against the rules, and I shall govern myself accordingly.

Mr. GREEN: On the point of order, as I said the other day, it will be impossible for us to debate this bill in a proper way on second reading if we are not allowed to refer to some of the sections. The minister himself did that throughout his speech the other day. He told us what one part meant and what another part meant. This is a complicated and important bill. Last year it was the intention to send it to a committee of the house where it could be carefully studied. That course is not to be followed this year. I suggest to the minister that it would be to his own interests, and certainly in the best interests of the house, if in our speeches we were allowed to say what we thought was wrong with some of these sections or indicate ways in which they could be improved.

If that is done, then there will be an opportunity to give consideration to the suggestions before the bill is passed through the committee stages. It will then be too late to make the necessary amendments.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before you give your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read from the report of the speech of the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) which he made on the evening of April 2, to show that he was guilty of the very offence that he now charges against the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke). At page 508 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> I come now to part IV of the bill which deals with the rights and obligations of naturalized Canadian citizens, and represents no change from the present situation. Sections 26 and 28 are complementary and provide for the continuation of the common status of British subjects that has always prevailed through the commonwealth.

The minister's whole speech is along the same line, and that is nothing more or less than what the hon. member for Kindersley is now doing.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before you give your ruling, sir, may I add just one word? With the principle of what the minister has said I personally am in entire agreement, but I am not in agreement with its strict application in this instance. What is the principle of this bill? If there is just one principle I think every hon. member in this parliament is in favour of it; and if we follow that logic through to its conclusion there is no purpose at all in this debate. With all deference I suggest to Your Honour that the hon. member who has the floor should not be held too strictly to the rules which have been mentioned.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that some hon. gentlemen have suggested that, since this bill is very important, it should be discussed clause by clause. Hon. members will understand that even if the bill is an important one, we have standing orders in this house which must be followed. As my hon. friend knows, in Beauchesne's third edition at page 228 it is stated that on the motion for second reading it is out of order to discuss the clauses of the bill. I understand that the hon. member who has the floor may refer to the various clauses, but I do not think he has the right on the motion for second reading to discuss the bill clause by clause. He should not forget that after second reading is given the house will go into committee of the whole, when he and all other hon. members will have the right to discuss every clause in the bill.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. JAENICKE: I shall try not to offend against the rules. However, I think I can say that I disagree with the portion of the bill which proposes to take away the certificate of naturalization of a citizen who is guilty of communicating with the enemy, as stated in the bill, or of committing similar acts; in other words, who is a traitor. Why should not a natural-born Canadian lose his citizenship for the same reason, I should like to know? That is one point I wish to raise. In addition, we have adequate provisions in the criminal code for dealing with traitors. I am in favour of the inclusion of this or a similar section in the bill, but I maintain that it should cover all Canadian citizens, whether naturalized or native-born.

The same remark would apply to another section which deals with disloyalty and disaffection toward His Majesty. I would make the same argument in that respect. Then a naturalized citizen is liable to loss of his Canadian citizenship if within a period of five years after he becomes a citizen he is convicted of an offence and sentenced to imprisonment for more than one year. As I said before, I object to that because I think we are now providing for good citizens by making the qualifications higher, and we should take them for better or for worse. In addition I maintain that this will not make for the good administration of justice. A prisoner, a naturalized Canadian citizen, is before the court accused of a crime, and is found guilty. He has been naturalized for less than five years. The facts relating to this man's personal circumstances, his family and so on, are brought before the judge, who because of this provision might be inclined to give him a lesser penalty than otherwise he would receive. So, Mr. Speaker, I do not think this section is good for the administration of justice in this country.

I should like to make just one other point, and it is this. The act provides that if a certificate is issued the naturalized Canadian shall be entitled to all the rights, powers and privileges and subject to the same obligations and responsibilities as a native-born Canadian. It is singular that the word "political" has been left out. If you look at the old act prior to 1914 you will find that the certificate of a naturalized Canadian provided that he was entitled to all the political and other rights, powers and privileges. The act at present in force also provides that a naturalized citizen is entitled to all the political and other rights, powers and privileges. If you look at the British act you find that naturalization confers all the political and other rights, powers and privileges, and it is rather ominous to me to see that the word "political" has been left out here. Remembering the days of 1917 I urge that we restore the word "political" and leave the law in that respect as it is now.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the discussion on this bill respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and the status of aliens I should like first of all to congratulate the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) on the masterful address he delivered on this subject last Tuesday. I should like also to commend the Minister for bringing this important measure before the house. May I also express a word of appreciation to the under secretary of state, the chief of the naturalization branch, and the other officials who assisted in the preparation of the proposed legislation.

Before proceeding with a discussion of the bill may I say in behalf of the Social Credit members in this house that we are in favour of the bill and intend to support it. In spite of the fact that in our opinion, two or three sections of the bill could be improved, Social Credit members consider the bill to be good. Moreover, they feel that this bill is long overdue, and therefore we welcome its introduction at this time.

Speaking now for myself, I should like to take advantage of this opportunity not only to comment on the principle of the bill but also to express my views on several other aspects of the proposed measure.

As its long title indicates bill No. 7 covers a wide field. It has, as the minister pointed out, two main objectives: first, to achieve a clear and simple definition of Canadian citizenship by removing the complexities which are found in the old legislation, and, second, to provide a common status or, better still, a common denominator for all our people, the purpose of which is to draw our citizens closer together and thus bring about true unity in Canada.

I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members will agree that those two objectives are highly desirable. When this measure becomes law, Canadian citizens, natural-born or naturalized, will have the right to call themselves Canadians. This does not mean, however, that until the introduction of this bill, we were not regarded as Canadians. The fact is that we were called Canadians. But for official purposes we had to declare that we were British subjects, and also designate our "nationality" by stating the country in which we were born. Quite often some of our citizens had to change from time to time what was regarded as their nationality in order to comply with the change in control of the country in which they were born. The status of our citizens therefore was confusing and lacked permanency. The proposed bill aims to correct this.

Another important improvement in the act is in regard to loss by naturalized Canadians of citizenship through absence from the country for more than one year. It was possible of course to extend this leave by appearing at the British embassy at the end of each year, but such leave could not be extended beyond the limit of five years. To students, for example, whose funds are usually limited, and who had to travel long distances to the nearest British embassy, the old procedure was a financial burden. Under the new act, a naturalized Canadian will not lose his citizenship unless his absence exceeds at least six years.

A further change in the proposed act has to do with the procedure of acquiring Canadian citizenship. With this change in the procedure to make the ceremony more impressive and instructive, new Canadian citizens will feel a greater consciousness of and pride in becoming citizens of this great country.

Further, provision is made for the first time that an applicant for citizenship who has not an adequate knowledge of one of the official languages may be granted Canadian citizenship, provided that he has resided continuously in Canada for more than twenty years. I might point out that according to the 1941 census ninety-nine per cent of Canadians do speak one or both of the official languages. This particular provision, however, to which I have referred, applies mainly to a small section of population in the northern parts of the three prairie provinces. In this section of our country there settled some of our pioneers. In the early pioneer days there were no schools in these districts, and therefore no facilities for learning the English language. Their first task was to build houses, roads, schools, churches, and community halls, as well as to clear the land for productive purposes. To this section of our population we owe much for their generous contribution to the development of the vast sections of the Canadian west. Virtually with bare hands they cleared the land, and out of the wilderness they made the land blossom with wheat, barley, and rye. Despite their not having acquired an adequate knowledge of the English language, they have earned their place in this country by their industry and devotion to Canada, and by their sons' sacrifices in world war II. I am personally very happy that at long last the Secretary of State has recognized the contribution made to Canada by these people, and by this act will give them an opportunity to apply for and be granted the status of Canadian citizen.

I should now like to deal with one or two criticisms of the bill. My chief criticism is that the bill carries over from the old legislation the distinction between Canadian-born citizens and naturalized Canadians. The section on revocation makes certain reservations regarding naturalized Canadians. In his speech the minister did point out that certain safeguards are necessary. In my opinion, however, this section should be limited to one clause, namely, the one covering treason and betrayal of the country. All other distinctions, in my opinion, should be removed.

I maintain that nothing positive can be accomplished by having two sets of laws in Canada, one for Canadian-born citizens and the other for naturalized Canadians. It is my view that when a person is granted Canadians citizenship, he should have not only equal responsibilities but also equal privileges. Our laws should be the same for both Canadian-born and naturalized citizens. Should a person be guilty of an offence, he should be brought before our courts of justice and dealt with as an individual. Therefore the revocation section in this bill and our immigration laws do make a distinction and are not applied equally to all our citizens. A naturalized Canadian, even under this bill, will lose his citizenship if he stays away for more than six years, but the same does not apply to Canadian-born citizens.

I should like to cite, Mr. Speaker, another instance of this undesirable distinction. May I refer to the defence of Canada regulations and point to the distinction which was drawn in our statute books between Canadian-born citizens and naturalized Canadians. At the beginning of the war the regulations known as the defence of Canada regulations were passed under the War Measures Act. Section 26 of this act as originally framed provided for the registration of enemy aliens. Later section 26(b) was enacted by an order in council which brought under this clause persons who were naturalized after September 1, 1922, who were born in territories which were under the sovereignty or control of enemy countries on the dates on which Canada declared war on these countries.

Order in council P.C. 6150 of November 2, 1940, contains this paragraph:

> That in view of the fact that certain persons who were not required to register under the original regulations were under the impression that they were not affected by the subsequent regulations due to the fact that they were naturalized, some of them have been guilty of the offence of failing to register.

Such discriminatory measures, Mr. Speaker, are undesirable and harmful. We should not hold a Canadian responsible for the acts or the attitude of the country from which he originally came.

If we are to achieve the objectives which the minister outlined, we must eliminate distrust and suspicion from our midst. Moreover, legislation should not be placed in our statute books which perpetuates distinction and discrimination. We must do our utmost to make our naturalized Canadians feel that they are a part of our nation, if we are to have a truly strong and united country.

The task of building and strengthening our nation is a great one. I should like to quote a passage from a book entitled "Emily Murphy, Crusader", by Byrne Hope Sanders. It would be well for us to listen to what Emily Murphy, a great Canadian woman, had to say on Canadian nationhood:

> This task of making real Canadians out of all who live in Canada cannot be accomplished by coercive measures, nor by approaching these people in a superior, patronizing attitude, but by persuading them that Canada is their friend; —that we are willing to guide and counsel them in their perplexity relating to laws, language, and customs.
> Many of these people come to this dominion with a rich and varied handicraft, with a wealth of literary and artistic knowledge, a reverence for sacred things, for established order; with well-formed habits of thrift, and with a fine old world courtesy. We would be well advised to benefit by their gifts and acquirements even as we would expect they would benefit by ours. What we have to teach them in citizenship, language and laws, can only be done by a sympathetic respect for their pride, and a wise patience.

In its farewell address to the governor general and Princess Alice, this house unanimously endorsed an expression of gratitude to their excellencies for their services to Canada during the past six years. The address contained the following passage:

> It must be a source of profound gratitude to you, on your retirement as governor general to realize that your years in Canada have witnessed victory over the enemies of freedom, and the emergence of Canada as a world power, with a foremost place among the united nations.

I am sure that it is a source of deep satisfaction to all Canadians to know that Canada has reached the position of a "foremost power among the united nations." The granting of the new status of Canadian citizenship will be in keeping with this stature and will be a source of pride to Canadians. When bill No. 7 becomes law and is placed on our statute books, all Canadians, regardless of origin, will be able to meet on common ground. There will then be a real unity in all matters that challenge our common interests.

While it must be admitted that certain changes and adjustments of a constitutional or legal nature must still be made, the chief obstacle in the way of the realization of our full nationhood lies, in the main, in the cultural and economic spheres. Although we have drawn upon Great Britain for most of what we possess in the way of culture, traditions, history, institutions, our way of life, and centuries of experience in practical statecraft, we nevertheless have now arrived at the stage where we must begin to develop our own distinctive character.

Let me say this, however, that while Canadian nationhood is being crystallized, it will in no way lessen our ties with the British commonwealth; rather it will strengthen our position, as an equal member nation, within the British family of nations.

Mr. EDOUARD RINFRET (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, in introducing bill No. 20 last session, the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) indicated that it was in reality a comprehensive amendment of the Naturalization Act, no more than a definition, a clarification of what existing statutes indicate Canadian nationality or citizenship to be.

Bill No. 7, which is essentially identical, is a substitute for the Naturalization Act. It replaces the Canadian Nationals Act; it improves the Immigration Act, without altering it to any great extent. It was away back in 1914 that the words "British subject" were defined by chapter 44. In 1921 the words "Canadian national" were defined by chapter 4, and in 1910 the words "Canadian citizen" were defined by chapter 27. These definitions, we are told, were unrelated, sometimes contradictory, and created difficulties of all kinds which it is sought to eliminate by the passing of the present bill.

I have no quarrel with the bill, inasmuch as its declared sole purpose is merely to group together in a composite consolidation and to prune down and sort out articles which were previously scattered in three different laws, and for that reason I shall vote in favour of the bill.

I shall also support the bill because, although it does not go as far as, in my opinion, it might have gone, it is nevertheless a step in the right direction and will, I hope, be followed in the very near future by a further clarification and recognition. It has the merit of introducing, although incompletely and inadequately, a new significance, a meaning hitherto non-existent, to the words "Canadian citizen" and of providing a medium whereby residents of the same country will be able to designate themselves legally. It will dispel the confusion which actually exists in the naturalization law, and will give to the inhabitants of this our country a necessary and long-awaited identity. However, this common appellation cannot alone and by itself promote true Canadianism or a real national status. In any event, I do not wish my vote to be interpreted as a reaffirmation of the principles enunciated in article 26, because I believe that this theory is antiquated, and, if I may so express myself, progressively conservative.

I do regret that the opportunity has not been seized of completely doing away with the definitions of old and dusty statutes and of incorporating in the Canadian citizenship act the present-day concept of the majority of Canadians from ocean to ocean, that of Canadian subjects. Tags of 1910, 1914 or 1921 do not befit Canadians of 1946. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that I have mentioned "Canadian subject" and not "Canadian citizen". We are told by specialists that a citizen is the inhabitant of a republic, whereas a subject is the inhabitant of a kingdom. Gladstone Murray wrote that Canadians were incurably royalists, and that "loyalty to the old country" had been replaced here in Canada by "loyalty to the crown." That is so, and may be more so amongst my Quebec compatriots than amongst others. One has only to recall the enthusiastic welcome of the French-speaking element of our population to Their Majesties in 1939 to admit with Mr. Murray that it was more rapturous than, and certainly as sincere as, that of their English-speaking fellow citizens. If these affirmations are true, as they are, would it not be preferable to use the term "subject" instead of the term "citizen", and would not this appellation better suit and express the aspirations of Canadians?

Here I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am incapable of understanding how the citizen of one country may at the same time be the subject of the king of another country. Is it not true that by the adoption of the statute of Westminster in 1931, Canada has become an independent kingdom, in personal union with the United Kingdom? As Maurice Ollivier has so delicately expressed it in his remarkable book. "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty":

> The United Kingdom and Canada are to be considered as "separate kingdoms in personal union under the same king."

Is it not true, further, that a British subject is a subject of the king of Great Britain? How then, can a Canadian citizen—to wit, a citizen of an independent sovereign state, Canada—be a British subject and owe allegiance to the king of a distinct sovereign state, Great Britain? The situation in 1946 is not the same as that of 1921. The aspirations have changed. What we need is the mentality of a common ideal, not merely a name. Should not attention have been given to the fact that the three statutes which the present bill seeks to replace were enacted at a time when internationally Canada was still in its infancy, long before the statute of Westminster established unequivocally the sovereignty of our country, at a time when Canada was represented in other countries principally by English diplomats, and when we did not have our own ambassadors and ministers?

Canada has grown since 1910, 1914 and 1921. Canada is now a nation and has been recognized as such for at least twenty years by our co-members of the British commonwealth of nations, including Great Britain. The imperial conference of 1923 declared each dominion "free to negotiate and ratify its own treaties". That of 1926 agreed that each and all constituent members of the commonwealth were autonomous communities, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to the other in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated. If Great Britain agreed that Canada was autonomous, equal, not subordinate, and united by the crown, why should some Canadians of English descent insist that it is not? If Great Britain has agreed that the crown is as much Canadian, Australian, Irish, as it is British, why should some so-called Canadians insist that it is not? Why should some so-called Canadians be more British than the king of Britain? The other nations of the world have long since recognized Canada's sovereignty. The few remaining restrictions on Canada's complete independence are, citing Clokie in his "Canadian Government and Politics", "relating to her connection with Great Britain and are relics of the time when Canada was a subordinate portion of the British empire." It is no longer a subordinate portion, and the relics should disappear.

There was a time also when Canada was a French colony: that was 185 years ago. In this short period Canada has progressed rapidly. It passed through what has been termed the first charter of Canadian liberty, the Quebec Act of 1774, through the Constitutional Act of 1791, through the Union Act of 1840, the confederation, and numerous imperial conferences. To-day, save for the fact that there is officially no Canadian king, that the British North American Act may not be amended except by the British parliament, and that appeals may still be lodged to the privy council in London, Canada is free to conduct its internal or external affairs in whatever fashion it considers best for its own private interests. Even these three restrictions are not deterring obstacles to Canada's complete and unrestricted independence, because Canada can of its own volition modify them and make them disappear.

One of our late ministers—I think it was that truly great Canadian, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe—at the beginning of the last war drew the attention of the House of Commons to the difference existing between His Majesty George VI, king of Ireland, who had not declared war upon Germany, and His Majesty George VI, King of Canada, who had. Numerous are those who since that day have expressed similar views dealing with the separate entity of our sovereign. His Majesty the King, whatever may be his other titles, is in the affairs of Canada advised solely and completely by his Canadian ministers through the governor general or his administrator, and very definitely he could, and does, upon their counsel, decide differently from the king of Great Britain. I say, therefore, that even if in name he does not exist, in fact there is a king of Canada. I submit that when reference is made to the crown in any statute of Canada or in any imperial statute dealing with Canada, it is to this authority, to His Majesty George VI, who rules over Canada irrespective of his affiliations with other countries of the same commonwealth. I suggest that it is the essence of the statute of Westminster that Canada be united to Britain through the crown, and not to the crown through Britain.

Concerning the amendments to the British North America Act, I do not believe that it would be exaggerated to claim that if both provincial and federal Canadian authorities were to apply to the British parliament and unanimously ask to be relieved of the obligation of submitting future amendments to London, and to be given such powers, these would be immediately forthcoming. The main obstacle is our lack of cooperation; there is no unanimity amongst ourselves.

As for appeals to the privy council, the question whether Canada has the power to abolish them is not even being discussed any more. The present difficulty is to know which jurisdiction, federal or provincial, has authority to act.

I am therefore justified in saying that Canada is a sovereign state, a world power; that it proved it magnificently and unquestionably during the last war, and that externally it has universally been recognized as such for a long time. It is a pity therefore that internally, in the minds of its own inhabitants, Canada should be denied its own independence. It is regrettable that there should be one man in Canada, that there should be one representative in this house, who should belittle his country and lack the necessary confidence in it to pronounce it sovereign and give it the necessary attributes to make it such.

In a recent editorial, Saturday Night of Toronto recognized the following principle: it is a good one to apply:

It would be far better to admit frankly that we have a Canadian citizenship, which is not the citizenship of the British empire or of the United Kingdom; that we admit to this citizenship those whom we wish to and exclude all of those whom we don't, and that we regard the whole question as our business and our business alone. We should then, it may be hoped, begin to attach some importance to this Canadian citizenship and to desire to have it respected not only by other nations, but by our own lesser authorities.

This desire for respect should dictate our action. We are unfortunately lacking in it.

There need be no doubt—

Suggests Clokie in the book already cited—

—that the people of Canada generally possess the feeling of separateness from the rest of the world. They are conscious of being distinct from, though in varying degrees akin to the peoples of the British isles, France and the United States of America. This separateness is the product of political separation. Canada is a term of political geography and Canadian nationalism is derived from political concepts. There is neither common language, religion, race nor prospect of establishing these.

He goes on:

The preliminary difficulty with Canadian nationalism lies in the attempt to create a nation without being able to establish homogeneity.

Do the people of Canada think of themselves as a distinct people? It is hard to answer. There exist, definitely, British sentiments in some of the English-speaking Canadians, separatism in the mind of some French-speaking Canadians—cultural and economic Americanization to which all Canada but especially English-speaking Canada is exposed. The Canadian nation is not indestructible as the Swiss. Its continued existence has been largely experimental and its future depends chiefly on the capacity to tolerate marked dissimilarities and yet cultivate mutual interests and loyalties.

Why is it impossible for us to imitate Brazil, whose inhabitants, Zweig tells us in his famous book, "Bresil, Terre d'Avenir":

—rival each other in one ambition—that of erasing all particularism and of becoming, as completely and as rapidly as possible, true Brazilians—melted in a new nation. This systematic fusion, of national or racial closed groups, closed primarily to combat each other, has considerably facilitated the creation of a national and united conscience and it is astonishing to see how much the second generation already feels Brazilian.

In praising the Brazilian fusion, I am not forgetful, Mr. Speaker, of the opinion expressed by Sir George Etienne Cartier in presenting the confederation act. He said then that the fusion of the races in Canada into one was an impossibility, and that there was no power on earth capable of making us lose our language and be renegades to our faith. What was true in 1867 is truer to-day; I am glad to note that Cartier was right and that our French language and our Catholic faith are to-day stronger than they were in his days. Roman Catholics constitute 43·34 per cent of our Canadian population, and Canadians of French descent represent the biggest individual source of our "inhabitants," having contributed 30·27 per cent thereof in contrast to 25·80 per cent of English, 12·20 per cent of Scotch descent, 11·02 per cent of Irish origin.

There are, however, factors other than race and religion whereby all groups could be melted together and be brought much closer one to the other. One of these factors is our Canadian history, which should and could be written and taught in such a way as to make all Canadians devoted to Canada, proud of their country. The various elements of the Canadian population should not be made foes of one another at an age when they are unable fully to appreciate by themselves the consequences of their regrettably hostile acts or thoughts towards each other.

Everything should be studied and a plan laid down that would have the result of producing closeness of patriotic ideas, thoughts and purposes. There are other countries where languages and religions are dissimilar and yet where patriotism is not different. Why is it impossible for Canada to imitate Switzerland, where men of three very different and distinct origins and mentalities have melted themselves together to create a new and independent state, a concrete and distinctive entity?

Everybody knows, as Edwin Muller expressed it, that:

The Swiss have no racial unity, no common language; they differ in religion and culture; they are German, French and Italian. But they have one thing in common—democracy. The German-Swiss dairy farmer of Appenzell may not speak the same language as the French-Swiss factory worker of Geneva, yet they understand each other. The cantons remain separate and individual, but under their motto, "One for all and all for one." they have formed a nation whose unity has withstood the most violent strains.

World war I was a severe test for this union of free men. In 1914 the German-speaking Swiss felt themselves close to Germany, had shared its literature and culture. The French cantons were ardently pro-French and pro-ally. When it came to the test, the loyalty of German-Swiss and French-Swiss to their union was more binding than any other loyalties. Came world war II, and Switzerland was soon an island in a sea of triumphant nazism. But this time there were no divided sympathies. All Switzerland was anti-nazi, the German Swiss probably the most anti. The nazis then endeavoured by all imaginable means to promote "the pure race" complex. Hitler and his henchmen were making every effort, throughout the world and especially in Switzerland, to group all German-blooded populations. The German Swiss remained faithful to their own country; the Italian Swiss refused to answer the call of their fascist cousins, and the French Swiss forgot that he was French and remained a Swiss. Altogether, as one, they were neutral and ready to fight any enemy of Switzerland that dared lay a foot on its territory, whether that foe might be German, Italian or French. This is what I call true citizenship.

Why cannot Canada operate in the same way? Why cannot Canadians be Canadians —as Swiss are Swiss or as Brazilians are Brazilians? Differences of religion, race, language, are not worse here than they are, or were, over there, or in Spain, Greece, Italy, Poland, Russia, France, or Great Britain.

We have heard a great deal, Mr. Speaker, about a "bifocal" army and the harm this army is supposed to have caused to the unity of the country. This harm is infinitesimal compared to that caused by the bifocal mentality of certain self-styled Canadians. Bifocal mentality—there is the reason for our incapacity to create a really distinctive nation. Some residents of Canada are Canadians only in part. Primarily, they are British, French, German, Italian, Scottish, Irish. Nothing apparently can take away the hyphen between their country of origin and their country of residence. They are, and apparently must remain, British-Canadian, French-Canadian, et cetera. Canada for some is a transient place which will be left behind as soon as fortune has been made therein. Whether it be London, Paris, Berlin, Rome, or any other place, numerous are those whose minds wander through the streets of a foreign city which they consider the ideal place in which to spend a quiet and well earned old age. They are Canadians in name; in soul they are English, French, German, et cetera.

The bill now before the house will not alter this fact. What we need is a law which will change this bifocal mentality, which will create patriotism, non-existent at the present time. It is fine to have a Canadian flag or a Canadian anthem, but I am not of those who think that these external signs will do much to promote patriotism. Patriotism has to come first and to be exteriorized by a flag or an anthem. They have a meaning, inasmuch as they have a soul. Without patriotism, a flag is a meaningless piece of cloth, and an anthem is an empty song. Not that I disapprove, Mr. Speaker, of the resolution presented to create a distinctive flag. I do most heartily approve of it, because there are in Canada, and they form the majority, true Canadians who have no other country than Canada, who have Canadian souls. For them, the flag will be the symbol and the anthem will be the call of their nation. And for them, I hope, both the flag and the anthem will be wholly, exclusively and conclusively Canadian.

I do not wish to throw discredit upon, or to be disrespectful of, any culture having contributed to the education of a single Canadian. I admire the Anglo-Saxon culture; it has many good points. I am proud of the French and Latin cultures; they also have many excellent qualities. But, I say, let us extract from the English and French characteristics and from any other culture, whatever is good in them, to achieve a distinctive, Canadian mentality—remembering, Mr. Speaker, that in order to form one big Canadian family we must include not only the French, the English, but all other nationalities which together represented, in 1941, twenty per cent of our population.

It is good sometimes to look at population statistics and to learn the lessons that flow therefrom. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians of other than British stock represent a majority in our country. It is well worth noting that whereas in 1871 the composite percentage of the French-English groups was ninety-two per cent of the total population, in 1941, it represented only eighty per cent. It is clear from these figures that more and more we must think in terms of other than French and English elements and take into consideration the demands, ideologies, antecedents and history of the other increasing twenty per cent and not restrict ourselves to British heritage, as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested in his speech of April 2, page 514 of Hansard, where he said:

> Canada to me means . . . a citizenship which maintains in this part of North America the highest heritage of British peoples every where in the world.

We must include everybody. In the same line of thinking, it is well to consider that whereas in 1871 only 2·64 per cent of our population was foreign born; in 1941 it was 8·82 per cent, more than three times as much.

These figures will be sufficient to show that it is important and urgent that something be done to promote true Canadianism, to absorb this influx and to transform it in terms of Canadian culture. The post-war period will bring with it thousands and millions of demands for settlement in Canada; let us not be found sleeping, and let us not be found wanting. These immigrants must be made to be Canadians both in name and in soul; they must be made to recognize that this is their sole country, and that by asking to be made part of it they become real Canadians.

I am at ease, Mr. Speaker, in talking about true Canadians, because I feel that I am a true Canadian. The majority of the population of the province of Quebec feel that we are the true settlers of this country. Is not this complete attachment to the soil true patriotism? The people of Quebec refer to themselves as "Canayens" and to representatives of other groups as "les Anglais". And mind you, Mr. Speaker, there is a justification for such an attitude. Their ancestors felt, and they to-day feel, that this country is theirs. If we look back at history, at the text of the capitulation of Quebec, we note a marked distinction between the terms used to qualify the inhabitants of the country and the French garrison. The difference is still more marked in the text of the capitulation of Montreal, which differentiates between the French, the Canadians and the Acadians. The Canadians, ancestors of practically all our Quebecers of to-day, who had been at that time established in Canada for three, four or five generations, some who had settled there over one hundred years previously, felt really at home here in Canada. They were referred to by the representatives of both the British and French crown as "the Canadians."

The descendants of these Canadians of 1760 —they total some 3,500,000 to-day—are scattered all over Canada. They have remained truly Canadians and, to this day, they still are and feel Canadians. They could have returned to France had they so desired, but they preferred staying here, because they had no other country, no other home than that of America. These Canadians in 1946 figure that they, or at least their ancestors, have made a positive act of Canadianism, and they fail to see how and when the British subjects of English descent residing in Canada have done the same.

Under the statutes as they are, Mr. Speaker, is it not true that a British subject, born in any part of the British commonwealth, is not obliged to do anything in order to possess the plenitude of Canadian rights? He does not have to make a formal act of acceptance of Canadianism in the same manner as all other immigrants have to do. He does not have to take an oath of allegiance to our king, because the oath he has given to his king is deemed sufficient. Now, I may appear to repeat myself, but my king and the British king are not legally the same; they are not the same entity. And this the statute of Westminster implicitly recognizes. I have as much respect for and submission to my king as the inhabitant of Great Britain has for his; and I insist that, upon coming to my country, upon settling in the territory of my king, everyone should take an oath of allegiance to the king of Canada, and forego his submission to the king of Great Britain.

This may seem drastic, Mr. Speaker, but is it not the procedure that immigrants from all countries are asked to follow? They must renounce their former allegiance if they are to be made subjects of my king. Now, if Canada is a distinct nation, a different state, would it not be logical to say that to act differently, to allow anybody to owe allegiance to another but its king, constitutes an act of disrespect or disloyalty to the head of the country, to the king who rules Canada, to George VI, King of Canada?

The British commonwealth has been variously defined. I like the definition given by Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia university: "A federal relationship which consists in loyalty and devotion to a person who is the symbol of unity." The symbol of unity for the commonwealth is His Majesty the King, George VI, to whom loyalty and devotion are due. He represents the trait d'union between the various nations of the British family. He is a multi-entity, who, in his various capacities, advised by his different governments, reaches his multitudinous subjects of "divers appellations." But I say, Mr. Speaker, that as far as Canada is concerned we must look to only one symbol, to the king of Canada.

This affirmation is not to be interpreted as a cry for secession or separatism, because it is not. I do not wish Canada to cut away from the British commonwealth of nations, because I believe that it is in the real interest of Canada and of the other sister nations to continue in this association. But I want to emphasize that our present citizenship status does not correspond to the importance Canada has assumed in world affairs, that our projected bifacial citizenship only tends to prevent Canada from developing, by accepting the dictates of other than its own people. I wish Canada to grow as a nation. Why should this frighten the proponents of the commonwealth? In my opinion, as in that of the Winnipeg Tribune, loyalty to Canada does not mean Canadian isolationism, or any loosening of the real bonds which bind Canada to the British commonwealth. On the contrary, the better our citizens become as Canadians, the better member of the commonwealth Canada will be. If the individual Canadian's sense of partisanship in the Canadian community is dull and nebulous, his sense of sharing in the commonwealth will be, by that much, the more tenuous. The stronger Canada becomes, the stronger the commonwealth will find itself. Far from weakening the empire, as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has suggested, a stronger and more united Canada will strengthen the commonwealth.

Mr. GREEN: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, I am sure quite unintenionally, has misinterpreted what I said last evening. I am all for a stronger Canada and a stronger empire.

Mr. RINFRET: I am glad to hear that, because I am for it too.

Mr. GREEN: And for a more united Canada.

Mr. RINFRET: We are both in accord, then. I have already referred to the absence of formal acts of Canadianism performed by British-born coming to Canada. I cannot help but think, Mr. Speaker, that the different treatment accorded to these as against the other immigrants has something to do with the lack of complete Canadian unity, and this, in my opinion, is a complete answer to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the question. In the United States of America all immigrants, without exception, have to take out papers in order to become American citizens. All are treated alike, and when they do have their papers they all feel that they are Americans; they are proud to be called Americans and to be Americans without any hyphens. Here in Canada it is different; only certain of the immigrants are obliged by law to apply for citizenship, and when the naturalization certificates are issued to them the petitioners are made citizens of another country or, according to another prevailing view, not of a country in particular but of a group of independent states. Would it not be more decisive, if we wish them to become true Canadians, to make them Canadians, and to give them a true Canadian status?

There are, of course, fanatics who will gasp at these various propositions of mine. I am not concerned, because those fanatics are not Canadians; they are anything but Canadians. We have some in the province of Quebec, who will not see further than their provincial noses. They are the separatists, the nationalists. The result of the last election shows the extent of their weight in the voter's mind. I know them well; their provincial leader is the representative of part of my constituency of Outremont in the legislature of Quebec. I visited that portion of my county and I vehemently attacked the narrow point of view of those partisans of a parochial nationalism. I am against all narrow and petty nationalism, Mr. Speaker, whatever its origin. In the last campaign I insisted upon telling all my electors of Outremont that I despised short-sighted nationalism, and, in order to be certain that interested parties would understand, I condemned French nationalism in the French section, English or Irish nationalism in the English and Irish section, and Jewish nationalism in the Jewish community. I told them that my nationalism was not a regional one. In my manifesto I made one single request; a really Canadian vote and the opportunity of assuring the Prime Minister of the country of the true Canadian feeling of the electors of Outremont. This mandate I have received by an overwhelming majority, and this mandate I am carrying out to-day.

There exists, Mr. Speaker, outside of my province another peculiar, narrow nationalism. Its difference from that of my province resides in the fact that it is the exact opposite, which does not make it more Canadian. The proponents of this narrow view are convinced that they are expressing the view of the majority of the people of Canada, which makes it more dangerous. The sooner these gentlemen realize that they have not a monopoly of patriotism, that they make a radical mistake about the meaning of the word Canadianism, and that they represent only extremists, the better it will be for the country. They are presumably the descendants of some British subjects coming from New England, not from Britain, whom Governor Murray, in January, 1764, tagged the "most inveterate fanatics"; like their forefathers, they would seem to—> think themselves superior in rank and fortune to the soldier and the Canadians, as they are pleased to deem the first, voluntary, and the other, "born slaves."

These were Murray's own words, in January, 1764, when referring to merchants who had then resorted to this country. Let there be no mistake. They are not superior, and Canadians are not slaves.

I have mentioned two groups of extremists; both of them refuse to recognize the fact that Canada is and must remain a bilingual and bicultural country. However, as far as recognizing the bilingual principle, one portion of the population has contributed to a much greater extent to the fulfilment of our goal. Of the total of 1,474,000 who could speak both French and English in 1941, some 1,152,713 were of French origin, whereas only 216,385 were of British Isles races. Percentage-wise, it is 78 per cent of total in the first instance, and only 14 per cent in the other. Figured in percentage of the respective groups, it shows that 33 per cent or one-third of the French descent population were bilingual in 1941, whereas only 3·7 per cent of the British Isles descendants could speak both French and English.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. RINFRET: My purpose in bringing these figures to the attention of the house is to emphasize the effort made by the French-speaking population to understand its English-speaking compatriots and the lack of cooperation given in the other direction. Unilinguism, whether it comes from recognized French or English-speaking portions of the country, will not help union and understanding between the two big races.

Mr. Herbert Lank, vice-president of Canadian Industries Limited, born in Great Britain, recently delivered an address in French before the annual congress of the association of the commercial science graduates of the school of higher studies of the university of Montreal. He said:

(Translation):

I like your language and I am proud to be able to speak it. My knowledge of French, however limited it may be, has opened for me the door to your culture and your civilization, which are unfortunately beyond the reach of all too many English-speaking people, while your knowledge of English makes it easier for you to become acquainted with our culture and our civilization. Let us use our respective languages, which are priceless instruments for the purpose of carrying out beneficial exchanges, since the only result can be, on both sides, a higher civilization and culture.

(Text):

I agree with Mr. Lank, and, with him, I regret that the desire to interchange studies of cultures and civilization has been unfortunately one-sided, with the French element providing most endeavours and the English-speaking practically none.

I have referred to extremists or fanatics. Naturally they are the most prolific in articles and speeches. They speak the loudest, and they are given the most space in certain newspapers and elsewhere. Care should be exercised to prevent utterances unimportant and insignificant in one part of the country from being given undue publicity and thereby being exaggerated, or given credence to, in other parts of the country.

Fortunately for Canada, between the two poles of extreme thoughts that I have indicated lie the big majority of my fellow countrymen, those who have only one country, bounded by the Atlantic on one side and by the Pacific on the other; those who wish to make of Canada, of the whole of Canada, a true, a strong nation. They must unite to fight reactionary groups.

Leaving the anti-Canadians, pro any other country, whichever it might be, to their bifocal mentality, let those in favour of Canada—as a country—as a nation, as a sovereign state, not only wish for the realization of their ambition, but do something about it.

Let us follow the example set by l'Abbe Maheux, and teach to all Canadians that Canada, in its entirety, is a real entity, a glorious reality, an object worth while cherishing. We must convince them that their hearts are sufficiently big to contain the love of their family, of their town, of their religion, of their province, and above all, of the whole of Canada.

We must teach to all Canadians that their country, as a matter of fact and reality, is a bicultural, bilingual one, that, in order for one section of the country to understand the other it is necessary to learn both languages and cultures. We must teach a common history of Canada, as a means of avoiding errors and horrors of the past, and as an inspiration for the accomplishment of what is advantageous to the homeland.

Finally, we must teach to all Canadians, a patriotism and a civism that will give one a proper sense of his responsibilities towards his country, whereby he will have more respect for his duty than for his privileges.

With these purposes in mind, the naturalization or citizenship act should be amended in such a way as to make us the Canadian subjects of His Majesty George VI, instead of maintaining directly or indirectly the anomalous and paradoxical appellation of Canadian-British subjects.

The election act should also be changed to grant voting rights only to, and restrict eligibility to, Canadian subjects. This would guarantee that no foreign-minded individual would sit in the House of Commons.

What I claim for Canada is a national synthesis, the preservation of the immeasurable wealth that could be accumulated by the contact of the many races and inherited from the various national cultures belong to Canada's people.

I want Canada for Canadians and Canadians for Canada. With the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, "I desire to see the largest possible measure of the same ability to unite different religious groups in the support of a single national policy."

I would regret a continued lack of collaboration on the part of certain elements of the population, because in the words of Gabriel Jaray—

(Translation):

A divided Canada, instead of making the weight of her power felt in the sphere of world affairs and playing therein the part of an arbitrator, will find it difficult to maintain true independence, drawn along as she will be to one side or the other by outside pressures and internal oscillations.

(Text):

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat belongs to a family which has had a distinguished career in Canada. For many years his uncle was secretary of state, but I believe he would never have introduced a bill such as that now before the house.

The motion for second reading affords an opportunity to discuss the principle of legislation, and when a bill is read a second time it is assumed that the principle has been adopted. When we are considering the principle of the bill we must keep in mind, too, as we do when reading a statute, the marginal notes, the headings, the schedules, all of which are part of the bill.

I do not like to disagree with the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin). He is an old friend of mine, and any successes he has had have always brought pleasure to me. But I can tell him this, that when he was in the old country, had he but hearkened to what is going on over there he would have known that this is the wrong time to introduce a bill of this kind into the House of Commons in Canada.

In my view this measure, if it becomes law, will give the judges a headache; it is nothing but a Tower of Babel bill. Who is asking for it? I believe it has been asked for by only a few people, almost all of whom are from one province. In my view this measure represents a notice to the mother country that we do not want any more of them over here, that we have a "to let" sign out, so far as they are concerned.

We will not read much about this measure in the press or hear much about it over the radio, because for many weeks the newspapers, with the exception of one or two, have been putting the soft pedal on it. However the people of Canada will wake up to-morrow night and find out what it is all about. From the time of confederation, right down to to-day we have had no complaints about citizenship. Our men went overseas, and many thousands of our citizens have fallen on the field of battle. Why did they go—large numbers of them from Canada, and many from my own city? They went because they believed our citizenship was good enough for them. If it was, it should be good enough for those of us who stayed at home.

Again I ask: Who is asking for this bill? I have tried to find out in Toronto, and in the county of York. But I can find no one who has asked for it. This is not the time for it. If Mr. Churchill were to come here as a citizen, and also Mr. deValera, Mr. Churchill would be treated just the same as Mr. deValera, although the latter was an active supporter of Germany in the last war. But if they came to Canada, they would be treated exactly alike, and could not become Canadian citizens for five years.

This is to be known as the citizenship bill, and I must point out at once that it invades the jurisdiction of the provinces. I suggest there should be a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada under the Supreme Court Act to find out whether parliament has power to enact a measure of this kind on citizenship. I believe that it has not, and that it is ultra viries of the dominion. This will be one of the most unfortunate measures ever brought before the House of Commons and will create more disunity in Canada than we have seen since confederation.

As I say, this bill should be referred to the supreme court to find out if this parliament has power to enact such a citizenship bill as this. After all, the provinces have been created, and under section 92 of the British North America Act citizenship is, under property and civil rights, largely a matter for the provinces. True it is that certain features of this bill such as naturalization and the status of aliens are federal matters, but undoubtedly there are certain clauses of this bill which, in my opinion, are not within the powers of this parliament.

I believe that this bill is going to lead to a lot of disunity in this country. It is based on the statute of Westminster, which changed the status, autonomy and sovereignty of this dominion. This bill is based on that empire-wrecking statute. We can never hope for empire unity so long as bills like this are passed. Empire unity is not being considered at all in this bill. Now is the time when we should be devoting all our energies to solving the great problems before us, such as trade, defence, and immigration within the empire.

This bill puts the cart before the horse. We should first decide what we are going to do about immigration from Britain, the United States and Europe. Are we to treat the British-born from the British isles the same as some people on the continent of Europe, many of whom supported the axis powers in the last war? I say no, that charity begins at home, within the empire first. It is appalling to me the time that has been devoted this session to a lot of secondary matters like the one we had before the house yesterday, and this bill again to-day. We shall have still more of them as the session goes on, and it is because certain promises were made to the electorate in certain parts of the country. We should rather be discussing primary matters like fuel, housing, clothing and reconversion of industry.

I am speaking just as a private member, although I believe on this bill I express the views of a large body of the citizens not only of Ontario but throughout the country. I have always argued for the principle for confederation, namely, the old Cornish battle-cry, "each for all and all for each", and what should be for the good of one province should be for the good of all.

According to the census returns that were tabled recently, the British-born in this country are down about 42½ per cent. I have always been an admirer of the glorious French nation, which did so much in the first world war. France has been a great nation and it will rise to greatness again. The two great races in this country were originally the only ones in this country. Then the government decided on a policy of broadening out and brought in others. I am not opposed to the best type of settlers coming in here from other countries, even selective immigration from Europe. Between the two wars Canada was the weak link in the chain of the dominions. We kept step with South Africa and Eire, instead of keeping step with New Zealand and Australia. New Zealand and Australia proposed an empire conference and empire cabinet, a citizenship bill and a meeting of the dominions and wanted to deal with citizenship, trade, defence, migration, nationality and status of aliens. But what was the answer of Canada? The answer was: We have no commitments; parliament will decide.

As far as I am concerned I am opposed to the principle of this bill. Canada was the weak spot in the British empire between the two wars through its policy of isolation and separatism and drift. This bill, in my opinion, indicates a great lack of appreciation of the value of our British citizenship. The other day I was talking to one of our most prominent citizens of Toronto, a man who gives as much to charity as any other citizen, if not more. He is a man of foreign birth and he said to me, "I am utterly opposed to this citizenship bill." I believe that most of the people who come from Europe will be opposed to this bill. They value too much British citizenship. Why? You remember the sinking of the Athenia on the third day after the war began. This British ship was sunk and 136 Canadians lost their lives. What was the good of our policy of isolation and separatism? It was ten days later before this parliament declared war. We might have known that when Britain is at war Canada is also at war. When the Athenia was sunk what good would it have been for a man to be able to produce a card showing that he was a Canadian citizen? We had no Canadian army, navy or air force at that time to protect ourselves.

I am a Canadian and a British subject. They are both the same. That is what the minister forgets and what the cabinet forgets in framing this bill.

Mr. KNIGHT: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CHURCH: I would rather the hon. member take up his own time.

Mr. KNIGHT: It is just a question.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. member cannot interrupt without my consent. He will have plenty of opportunity to discuss this matter.

Mr. KNIGHT: I can only ask the hon. member if he will permit a question.

Mr. CHURCH: I am only stating my own views and speak what I believe to be the truth. The hon. gentleman can state his views later. I am not complaining about his views. He can have his views as far as I am concerned, and I do not care what his views are.

I am speaking as a Canadian born in this country. I am a Canadian, but I also am a British subject. They are both the same and always have been. The minister must surely be the greatest discoverer since Jacques Cartier and John and Sebastien Cabot because he has discovery that a Canadian citizen is a British subject. A Canadian citizen has always been a British subject.

Who is asking for this bill? We do not know. If the government put the bill through they will live to regret it. It may satisfy some people in the country, but I would point out that we all owe allegiance to one sovereign and one empire. British citizenship is the greatest thing in the world.

Just look at this bill. It says that a person born in Hamilton or St. Catharines of Canadian parents is a British citizen. Everyone knows that without being told. We have all been Canadians and British subjects, ever since the treaty of Paris. This bill should be sent to the archives—earth to earth, dust to dust and ashes to ashes, in the sure and certain hope that it will never be resurrected. It can only cause the widest division amongst the people of this country when unity is what is wanted at this time. We were Canadians before. We were Canadians and British in the war of 1783, when our splendid citizens from Quebec did so much, in the war of 1812, the Northwest rebellion, the South African war, and the two other wars in our generation.

The bill provides that a British subject not previously resident in Canada will have to live in Canada for five years before becoming a Canadian. Aliens who fought against us in this war are treated the same as those men of other dominions who served in the forces with us; before they will be eligible to become Canadian citizens they must live here five years. The bill requires a British subject not formerly resident here to go through the same formalities as an alien to become a Canadian subject.

This is, in my opinion, one of the most untimely, un-needed, mischievous bills introduced into this parliament for a long time. It is separatism in excelsis. It will cause widespread disunity and resentment. It is a glorification of one class at the expense of another, something which should never be allowed to happen; it is political first, last and all the time. Why is it put forward at a time like this? In my opinion—and I have read a number of speeches made throughout Canada during the last election—it grows out of the last two elections; it is just window-dressing, there is a whole lot of shadow-boxing in it, and it is of the nature of vote-hunting propaganda. It is strange that some of those outside this house who are supporting this bill seem to favour a republic in Canada similar to what South Africa and Eire want.

[Mr. Church.]

In my opinion this bill should not have been introduced at the present time. Section 25 speaks of a Canadian citizen as a British subject. Who ever said he was not? I am surprised that any minister from Ontario would introduce such a measure into the house. The bill states that people born in Canada or people from Great Britain already in Canada shall be known as Canadians. I never knew that to be questioned before. I am a Canadian and also a British subject; they are both the same, and we need no bill like this to make them so. To be able to say, "I am a British subject," means something, because if you were a British subject on the seas and produced a British passport, it guaranteed a safe journey to your journey's end. British supremacy on the seas saved the world in four centuries—those of Philip of Spain, Louis XIV, Napoleon, and twice in our genration against Germany. Are we to lose all this now for the sake of a meaningless bill?

When St. Paul was before the centurion he said to him, "I am a Roman citizen." The episode is told in the book of Acts, chapters 22 to 24. He was then sent to the chief captain, and also to the high priest; afterwards he was brought before the security council, or the council of state, as they called it in those days. When they heard him they took him into the great hall, and when he appealed to Cæsar they sent him over to Rome. In those days to say, "I am a Roman citizen," meant something. I say these things in no spirit of exclusiveness. I know a large number of the foreign-born in Toronto, and they are among our best and most distinguished citizens; I am anxious that they shall have fair treatment in connection with all our future policies; for I recognize, while I am a member of the house, no racial or religious considerations; such things are out of place in the House of Commons.

A grave warning has been issued in relation to the principles of a bill of this kind. It is contained in an address by the ex-Prime Minister of Canada, Viscount Bennett, and will be found, I believe, in the library. It was delivered by Viscount Bennett to the Royal Society of Arts on June 3, 1942. In a foreword prepared by Mr. Patrick Donner, one of the leading and ablest members of the British House of Commons, it is stated that Viscount Bennett gave > . . . a grave warning that the problem of finding machinery to secure a common foreign policy for the British empire is still unsolved . . . He begins with a very full statement of the constituent parts of the empire—dominions, colonies, protectorates, mandated territories, et cetera; goes on to trace the development of dominion status and gives the history of the imperial conference. He emphasizes the large number of subsidiary empire conferences on such matters as copyright, patents, forestry, education, cables and wireless communication, and so forth, but comes back to the inadequacy of the means for securing a common foreign policy. Speaking of the ten years prior to 1942, he observes:

"True, there have been consultation and discussion on foreign policy, but such policy has been the policy of the United Kingdom, and while generally speaking the dominions have been advised and consulted, circumstances made it almost impossible for them to do other than agree."

The foreword continues:

Lord Bennett argues that nothing in the Statute of Westminster alters the law made clear in the case of Williams v. Howarth (reported 1905) that there is only one king ruling over the empire and not a separate king for each dominion. He accordingly makes it clear that in his view the neutrality of Eire is unconstitutional and would otherwise potentially imply "an obviously impossible and ridiculous situation." He asks pertinently: "Can the legations of warring enemies of the British commonwealth of nations be legally or honourably maintained within the territory of that commonwealth?"

The case cited by Viscount Bennett is relevant to the matters now under discussion.

This bill is going to cause a lot of trouble. I repeat, British subjects coming from other parts of the empire, including the mother country, are to be treated as though they were outsiders and aliens; and the impression has gone abroad in the empire, and, indeed, in France as well, that the people who supplied our two great racial stocks are not wanted here, and that if they try to get in they will have to line up at immigration offices and take their chance and reside here for a long time before they can become citizens or are allowed to vote.

The first schedule to the bill, may I point out, refers to some countries which are not in the British empire at the present time. In one, Eire, a republic has been set up, one of the so-called dominions. In the schedule it is called "Ireland"; it is not that at all. The schedule speaks of "the United Kingdom". It should be "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland", and "Eire" should be substituted for Ireland, for Eire is not a dominion; it has already set up a republic.

I do not know that I need say anything further. I have received a number of protests against this bill. I tell you this, regarding citizenship of the empire, that unless the dominions hang together they are going to hang separately, because none of them is capable of "going it alone", either in respect of citizenship or any other matter, and Canada will have little to say at the peace table. I believe in what Mr. Churchill said at Fulton, Missouri:

Let no man underrate the abiding power of the British empire and commonwealth. Because you see forty-six millions on our island harassed about their food supply, or because we have difficulty restarting our industries and export trade after six years of passionate war effort, do not suppose that we shall not come through these dark years of privation as we have come through the glorious years of agony, or that half a century from now you will not see seventy or eighty millions of Britons spread about the world and united in defence of our traditions, our way of life and of the world causes you and we espouse.

I quote also from Lieutenant-General Montgomery:

We must maintain a strong and united British empire. The empire has great responsibilities. Much of the world looks to us to give a lead in solving the many problems that lie ahead. We must give that lead, and we must shoulder these responsibilities. To do this we must always be strong so that never again can the tyrant consider that he can safely twist the lion's tail. No tyrant can ignore a strong British empire which stands for freedom and justice.

In conclusion, let me say simply this. I have been in this house for a great many years and during all that time I have tried to speak what I believe to be the truth temperately and moderately. I am opposed to this bill. It is not needed at present. While I have great respect for my hon. friends to the left, I suggest that there are three views, the right view, your own view and we must consider and respect the other fellow's views, and I have always tried to follow that principle. One must be interested not only in his own ideas but in the views of others, and must endeavour to find what the right views are. I believe I have expressed the views of a very large number of the Canadian people regarding this bill. Even if we wanted this bill, this is the wrong time to introduce it, because it will cause disunity and will satisfy no one. It is meaningless and it will cost hundreds of thousands of dollars to enforce it. Elaborate machinery will have to be set up and already our judges are overburdened with work, with divorce cases and other litigation. Now we are going to pass an act requiring every citizen to register before he can be regarded as a citizen. In my opinion it will lead to endless confusion and before long the government will regret that it ever had anything to do with it.

Mr. ROCH PINARD (Chambly-Rouville): The bill which we have to study and examine is one which, in my opinion, will engage the attention not only of this country, not only of neighbouring countries such as the United States, but of all other countries to which we are bound by ties either political, diplomatic or commercial. We are considering a bill which is extremely important. Indeed, I would call it a halting place in the life of the Canadian nation.

I wish to comment briefly on the bill and to refer to some of the principles involved. Then it would be useful, I think, to analyse the effects of the bill on our country and on our relations with other nations. This I shall try to do, and then I shall attempt to draw certain conclusions or lessons from the bill, having regard to the future of Canada.

The history and the origin of the bill are particularly interesting. Since it is legislation dealing with Canadian citizenship it will be necessary, if we are to study it properly, to look at its sources and for that purpose to go back to the birth of the country. That, however, I do not intend to do. It would not be of any benefit whatever in the purely practical study which I wish to undertake.

To give a rapid summary of the matter I would say this. During the French regime there obviously was no law on Canadian citizenship. Canada was then a French colony; all French people who came to settle and establish themselves here were French citizens and remained such, and their children born in Canada remained French subjects. When this country was conquered by Great Britain it became simply a colony of the British crown and did not constitute a separate country. It formed a single British territory, part of which became later the United States of America, with the exception of one portion, Louisiana, which remained French until 1803 when it was sold to the United States by the French.

In 1783 the United States of America was formed and in 1812 the frontiers between the United States and Canada were fixed by special treaty. During all that period our country enacted no law relating to Canadian nationality, the initiative being left entirely to the mother country, and it is only in 1814 that one can find traces of the first Canadian legislation relating to nationality. However, those first laws enacted by Canada had only local scope and influence. In 1867 Canada became a dominion by virtue of the British North America Act and retained for a long time all basic laws of the mother country, which it took care to approve systematically

In 1881 our country promulgated a really important law which could then clearly be distinguished from those enacted by the imperial parliament. That was the Naturalization Act, 23 and 24, George V, chapter 49. But it was soon discovered that this new legislation providing for local naturalization was creating serious inconveniences not only in Canada but in the other dominions. At the imperial conferences of 1907 and 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier brought these difficulties to the attention of the other dominions and suggested the adoption of a uniform law on imperial naturalization. The principle was accepted by all parties and the new law was enacted at the same time by Canada and Great Britain. As a matter of fact, it was adopted first by Canada and it was adopted just a few months later by Great Britain.

In our statutes this law is known as "An act respecting British nationality, naturalization and aliens," and it is in substance the same as the British law, which is called "an act to consolidate and amend enactments relating to British nationality and the status of aliens." This British law is chapter 17 of the private and general acts of Great Britain. All the other dominions accepted and adopted the same legislation, but they did so only many years after the first world war. As a matter of fact, Ireland never adopted such legislation. Ireland enacted its own constitution in 1935. Before this date, in 1914, Canada promulgated in 1910, for the first time, a law mentioning the words "Canadian citizenship." It is the act respecting immigration. That special law, frequently amended, has become chapter 93 of our revised statutes, and one can still find in it the same definition of "Canadian citizen" as in the previous law which I have mentioned, the law of 1910.

This law on immigration is still in force to-day. I stated a moment ago that in 1914 our country was the first among all the nations of the commonwealth, including Great Britain, to adopt the imperial law of naturalization, which was later ratified by all the other dominions of the commonwealth, except Ireland. Then, until 1921, there was no important legislation affecting nationality or citizenship in Canada enacted by our parliament. In 1921 our country enacted the Canadian Nationals Act, which is to be repealed by the present bill.

This act was adopted, as mentioned by the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin), on the occasion of the selection of judges to represent Canada at the permanent court of international justice. It seemed to be necessary, and I think rightly so, to distinguish those judges from those who were appointed by Great Britain and those who were appointed by the other dominions. I submit that it was the first time a real distinction was ever made by our parliament between the subjects of Great Britain, the other dominions and those of Canada. Until then there was only one British subject. By that new legislation, the Canadian Nationals Act, a British subject who is at the same time called a Canadian national, is created. The question then arose whether that new legislation did not have the effect of provoking the creation of a double nationality for all the nationals of the dominions of the British commonwealth, for I must add that all the other dominions adopted a law similar to that of the Canadian Nationals Act. As I said, the question arose as to whether or not this did not have the effect of provoking double nationality.

This interesting legal question was studied very carefully and was dealt with by many authorities on constitutional law. It was dealt with and capably discussed by my former legal partner, Mr. Chateauguay Perrault, in his book "Nationality", published in 1939. This book was published after Mr. Perrault obtained a doctorate of law from the university of Montreal based on a thesis he had written. I had the great pleasure of attending the event. In this book Mr. Perrault ably discussed these questions, and he came to the conclusion that this unusual legislation cannot effect a division of nationality, but is, as he calls it, rather the qualification of a new nationality. In other words, the Canadian person of 1921 when this Canadian Nationals Act was adopted was not acquiring a second nationality; he was only adding a new quality to his nationality as a British subject by becoming a British subject of Canadian national denomination. Such was not the case with the people of the Irish Free State because they never adopted the imperial naturalization act. One might think that as far as Ireland is concerned they actually acquired a double nationality, at least so far as the British commonwealth is concerned.

From 1921 until the present time Canada has not adopted any other law affecting nationality, except in 1937 when special legislation was enacted to prevent Canadians from enrolling in the Spanish war. In that act respecting foreign enlistment, chapter 32, I George VI, 1937, a distinction was made between a British subject and a Canadian national. Such in short is the history of this legislation and the sources of bill No. 7, which I shall now study briefly.

The bill is entitled, "An act respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens", and is to be known as the Canadian Citizenship Act. One immediately realizes, Mr. Speaker, that Canada breaks the unity of legislation on nationality in the British commonwealth, and that our country is swerving away from the beaten path to proclaim its own independence, citizenship amongst other things. Until now in the whole British commonwealth the legislation was uniform, for everywhere the imperial law of 1914 had been adopted except in the Irish Free State. It is my humble opinion that so far as that particular country is concerned Ireland can be no longer considered a dominion, because in 1934 it adopted its own constitution by which it declared that Ireland is a sovereign, independent and democratic state.

Mr. MARTIN: It was 1935.

Mr. PINARD: Yes. It is a fait accompli. As far as international law is concerned, a situation of fact soon becomes a situation of law. I think it would be interesting to follow in the future the development of that country from the constitutional point of view.

It is now Canada's policy to proclaim its own distinct nationality and citizenship. I said a moment ago that Canada was breaking the unity of legislation in the British commonwealth. It does so first my repealing the Naturalization Act of 1914 by a special section of the bill, and, second, by setting aside the Canadian Nationals Act. There is another section of the bill which is important, and the principle which it contains is categorical. A Canadian citizen is a British subject; but a British subject is not necessarily a Canadian citizen. On this point I must say I was very much impressed with the argument of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), an argument which he succeeded in expounding clearly in spite of numerous interruptions. The hon. member has voiced the opinion that the special provision of the bill which enacts that a Canadlan citizen is a British subject is ultra vires, because in our legislation we have no right to say who is a British subject. I concur in his conclusions that this special section should be changed, and I intended to offer the very same suggestion but for some other reason. I do not intend to discuss whether that special legislation is beyond the powers of this parliament or not, although I might say that if such a contention were true it could be said also of numerous other provisions of the bill. Moreover, the British subject was defined by parliament in the Naturalization Act, and such a definition would also have been ultra vires if, as my hon. friend contends, it is up to the British parliament alone to say who is a British subject.

My reason for voicing objections to the special section which provides that a Canadian citizen is a British subject is different, although it may be qualified as also originating from a legalistic mind. But when it comes to the drafting of legislation I submit that it is not being legalistic to ask from our government that the legislation under study be prepared in accordance with our constitutional rights. That is what my hon. friend contended. As far as I am concerned I do not believe that my reasons for opposing that special legislation will likewise be considered legalistic.

Mr. MARTIN: You mean the special section?

Mr. PINARD: Yes, that special provision. After examining the present measure very carefully I have noted—and that is why I must concur in the conclusion that this provision should be changed—that the Naturalization Act being repealed, there is no more definition in our statutes of a British subject, no other definition having ever been given other than the one contained in paragraph (j) of section 2 of that act. There is then every reason to conclude, if in our statutes we have no definition at all of a British subject, that this section of the present bill has no practical sense whatever. For these reasons and remembering also the suggestion which was made by the Secretary of State who has asked us to make suggestions for the drafting of this legislation, and also because I wish that my participation in this debate be somewhat constructive, I concur in the opinion. I wish to make a suggestion that has, in my view, the effect of giving a more precise and practical sense to that disposition of the present bill which provides that a Canadian citizen is a British subject.

Since this bill has for its purpose the affirmation of our sovereignty; since this legislation seems to be intended to proclaim better our identity in the British commonwealth of nations, as Canada wishes to distinguish its entity from that of the other countries of the British group, there is a very simple way to attain that aim, by simply modifying this ambiguous disposition contained in the bill.

It is useless to say that a Canadian citizen is a British subject, since nowhere in our statutes is there a definition of a British subject. I might be told that anyone knows what a British subject is, that a British subject is a subject of His Majesty the King. But, Mr. Speaker, we must also keep in mind the rights we have acquired as a result of the imperial conferences and the statute of Westminster. I hope we would not wish to enact legislation which would be retrogressive simply because it lacked the necessary clarity. We know the aim of the government is precisely to distinguish a Canadian subject of His Majesty from any other subject of His Majesty. We know also that the purpose of this legislation is to inform the rest of the world of our sovereignty as a nation of free individuals. Finally we know that through this bill the government desires to give us a name and to define clearly, once and for all, our national status. Therefore, why should we not eliminate all ambiguities; why not clarify that section of the bill which would seek to achieve precisely that aim? By declaring that a Canadian citizen is a British subject the present bill is contradictory, in my opinion, to the status which we have thus far acquired as a nation. I am absolutely convinced that no one in this house will deny that His Majesty the King is the king of Canada. I am further convinced that no one in this country will contend that it is not to His Majesty the King of Canada that we owe our allegiance. I therefore suggest with the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) to the Secretary of State, who has moved the second reading of the bill, that the ambiguous sections of this legislation be clarified, and accordingly I would recommend that it be declared in the bill that a Canadian citizen is a subject of His Majesty the King of Canada.

Some time ago I was discussing the consequences of the Canadian Nationals Act of 1921 in relation to the Naturalization Act of 1914 in so far as duality of nationality is concerned. With the adoption of the present bill I believe there can be no question of a double nationality for the Canadian people. Up to the present we have been British subjects and nationals of the Dominion of Canada; now we become Canadian citizens. We remain with only one nationality, but at least this time it will be ours, the Canadian nationality.

The other sections of the bill are proof that such a nationality will not be granted to anybody simply upon request, since the conditions necessary to acquire it are strict and onerous; and I think that is well. Even the British subjects of Great Britain and the other dominions will have to submit themselves to these requirements, and that is only fair and just. I shall not undertake to discuss the conditions or the offences provided in the bill which will lead to loss of Canadian citizenship. Such prescriptions are contained in the major part of the bill; they are clear and concise, and cannot bring any confusion. In my opinion, that is the economy of this legislation which, as I said a moment ago, constitutes an important step in the life of the Canadian nation.

I wish now to define briefly the consequences and results of this important legislation. There is not the slightest doubt that by asking this house to adopt this bill the government continues, with the same constancy and spirit, its progressive march forward; that it is following with the same resolution the very same policy in this country that it followed also at the imperial conferences. The opinions expressed at the imperial conferences, and the legislation following them, clearly established that the Canadian government, at least when it was represented by the party to which I belong, has always endeavoured to work with wisdom and prudence but also with firm determination toward the emancipation and independence of our great nation. Liberty and independence are two of the privileges dearest to peoples and individuals, and they also constitute basic qualities which are indispensable to the influence of a nation. Since the beginning of its already long history our country has been twice under the tutorship of two great nations which were leading the world because of their greatness and power. The descendents of those two great races still constitute a mighty portion of the actual population of the Canadian nation. Little by little, while it has grown stronger and more vigorous, our country has freed itself from those tutorships which paralysed its efforts and great enterprises.

Canada did not break away with violence from the tutorship of Great Britain; it simply left that protection as the fruit falls from the branch when it is ripened. This right to sovereignty was gained by Canada gradually, and it has just been consecrated by the effort our country has put forth to safeguard that civilization to which it wanted to belong and which it wanted to protect and defend. That right Canada may affirm with pride in the sacrifice of all those Canadians who fought; it may proclaim it with honour on the graves of those of her sons who died to defend it.

I am proud that our government has done so much to prove not only to Canadians themselves but to the world at large that today our country is sufficiently great and powerful to take care of its own national destinies. By asking our people to adopt this bill Canada is going forward with vision and certainty toward its progress and greatness. Thanks to the Canadian government, a new citizen is born in the world. That citizen is now very well known and regarded. That citizen is inferior to no other because of the greatness of his origins and the pureness of his blood. That citizen is already great, and has proved to be noble and generous. He will be received everywhere in the world, when he shows his new credentials and passport, with great admiration and respect. I heard the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) say it has meant a great deal to say that we are British subjects, but I still maintain that it is also a great thing to be able to say that we are Canadian citizens. The hon. member also said that St. Paul one day declared, "I am a Roman citizen." I do not want to get in wrong with the hon. gentleman, but I would remind him that what St. Paul said was, "Civis Romanus sum."

Mr. MARTIN: Was it Paul or St. Paul?

Mr. PINARD: I think they are both accepted as St. Paul. How many Canadians, Mr. Speaker, dreamed of that memorable day when we would acquire our Canadian citizenship; and that day has finally come, thanks to this government. The proclamation of our nationality is a definite and peremptory affirmation of our complete autonomy.

But, Mr. Speaker, to such a proclamation gerat privileges are attached, of which the greatest undoubtedly is that of allowing our country to enter international councils as a distinct and free entity. To those great privileges are attached serious and important corresponding tasks whose consequences cannot be ignored either by those who govern or by the people at large. Since the government has decided to create Canadian nationality and citizenship, it is to be hoped that it will always realize the value and price of such a title and privilege and impress it upon others who may wish to acquire it. Those who govern this country should always be very careful and upon their guard not to award too generously and without the necessary discretion and discernment such a privilege, which is the greatest any country can offer. To-day this warning becomes of greater significance, in view of recent events which caused the creation of a royal commission to investigate the activities of certain agents who are charged with having given secret information to a foreign power. Many of those were people who were admitted to Canada and who were not British subjects by origin. In the near future a great number of persons will be knocking at our doors asking the right to come in, the right to live with us and the right to acquire our nationality. It is the duty of this government to be cautious and circumspect, and even parsimonious, in awarding this precious privilege.

The example of certain European countries must be our guide. I could recall the errors of France who was too generous and too hospitable, who was receiving with open arms all those who were asking for refuge and assistance and who was giving them the right of citizenship without always going through the necessary investigations and inquiries.

Since our government knows the value of the title it confers in giving Canadian citizenship, it should always be assured and convinced that the person asking for it deserves such a privilege and that he will become a real Canadian valuable to the country and to the community at large.

The Department of Justice in the United States has understood the importance of that question and it decided some time ago to launch a campaign of national education on American citizenship. In a pamphlet published by that department in 1943, entitled, "Introduction to citizenship education," I find these important remarks which should be a warning to all Canadians:

> And so, in the United States of America, it must be good-bye to the old, easy days when the assimilation of those who came to us was scarcely even recognized as a problem. Not that we shall seek to make it hard to become an American citizen. God forbid that we should ever place needless formalities or raise artificial barriers before men who love our way of life and seek to share it fully! But safety for our nation in a dangerous world and safety for the alien within our borders demand alike a humane, liberal, carefully thought-through approach to the problem. In free America we dare not cut any man off from the goals of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" merely because he lacks certain "papers"; but just as surely, we dare not permit any man to endanger our free America.

I come now to the chief point of this speech, to the very reason why I decided to participate in this debate. I ask our government to form and appoint a special committee to study the problems resulting from our new nationality and from the creation and establishment of Canadian citizenship. Such a committee would have a definite aim and a clear purpose.

It would accept the great task of defining for the general benefit of the whole nation, and also for all strangers who will happen to acquire our nationality, the privileges and rights, the obligations and responsibilities; in other words, it would clearly determine the fundamentals of Canadian citizenship. Every Canadian who loves his country and who wishes to see it grow and prosper, would be glad to have a clear, national definition of Canada's ideals and aspirations.

I desire to add that such a committee formed by a group of Canadians of good will could do a useful and practical job. That would be to summarize, with its report in a special book, the conclusions arrived at; such a book would state in brief the principles of Canadian citizenship and would become the code of Canadian citizenship.

I strongly urge my government to take that great and patriotic initiative for the best interests of our country. After all, it seems to me that it is the task of this parliament clearly to define for the future, and in the light of the national situation, the rights and obligations of the newly-born Canadian citizen.

It is obvious now that to-day the people of Canada understand all the advantages and privileges to be derived by living in this fair land of Canada according to a single Canadian ideal. In proclaiming in Canada, in the parliament of the nation, the existence of the Canadian citizen, the government is giving to all the inhabitants of this country wherever they come from or of whatever race, creed or religion, solemn and precious advice. It is asking each and everyone of us not to think any more in narrow and provincial terms; it is demanding that we all elevate our minds and thoughts, and be glorified in acquiring the rights of a citizen; it is asking all Canadians to abandon any restricted and purely racial ideals; it is urging everyone of us to be nothing but real Canadians.

From a book entitled, "For education in a sovereign country," published in 1945 in Ottawa and written by Reverend Father George Simard, I wish to read these few lines:

> By examining that question carefully, everything in our country is settled as depending upon 1760, and narrow forms of nationalism are confronting each other since 150 years without the Canadians having yet succeeded in discovering a real formula in which we could find harmony if not a real Canadian peace.
> "Things will remain the same as long as the two major races of our nation will not accept to consider Canada, the whole of Canada and nothing else but Canada, as their only country, even if they must keep and maintain certain ties with the European countries from which they originated.

I believe that our government ought to engage immediately and in a practical way in a campaign of national unity to fortify the national structure of our people.

We would be very much in error to ask strangers to come and live with us; we would be very unwise to receive them and ask them to become Canadian citizens if we do not wish to possess the qualities and accept the conditions which must be attached to the title and characteristics of our nationality. We could not grant to anybody a right of Canadian citizenship of which we would not know and accept ourselves the real and definite meaning.

I wish to close, Mr. Speaker, with a note of national pride. All Canadians will be happy, I am sure, to put on for good the glorious uniform of the free peoples which the government is offering everyone. All will be proud to become in the eyes of the whole world Canadian citizens. I am particularly fortunate in the beginning of my parliamentary life to participate in the adoption of such memorable legislation. I shall draw from that occasion the lessons which impose themselves upon all Canadians. I am proud and happy of this new title of Canadian citizen which our government is awarding me and all the others in my province and my country.

I hope—and this has been said so often that it is a hope which seems sometimes to be completely lost—that the time of our unfortunate national quarrels is definitely ended and that it will be forever forgotten. On the ashes of that painful past, Canada is rising with new power and greatness.

After more than three centuries of toil, effort and struggle, our country wishes now to break, one after another, all her ties, to proclaim her faith and confidence in herself and in her future. Other legislation, such as that for the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag, will confirm this new profession of national faith, and I shall be proud to give it my entire support.

Canada left many years ago the humiliating valley of colonialism; she has marched slowly but with firm determination in the thorny path of the conquest of her liberties. With the help of all her people, she has now reached the gates of the City.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply pleased to congratulate the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) who has delivered a splendid speech, based on a real Canadian spirit.

(Translation): In introducing this bill, the government takes another step towards the independence of Canada. As soon as Canadian citizenship has been proclaimed, we shall have covered a further stage in the achievement of an ideal shared by those who believe that Canada is a nation. Canadian citizenship symbolizes the nation's spirit. Whoever is ashamed of being a citizen of his own country does not deserve the protection of its laws. The bill now before us should have been introduced at the very time when confederation came into being. We are in honour bound to create at last a Canadian mentality and a Canadian citizenship. We should not let the last traces of a narrow colonialism hinder the development of such mentality and citizenship. It must become known everywhere that Canada has reached her maturity. In this country as well as abroad, Canadians must proudly bear their own name and no other. We must personify Canada. No one can glory in personifying a country that is not his own. The refusal to bear its name would be unfair and disloyal to our country. Is there a true-hearted and honourable man who would deny his compatriots and himself the dignity which Canadian citizenship implies. No one but people with a subservient mind can ignore a sacred patriotism achieved through sacrifices, the loyalty and the spirit of justice and freedom of the men who have been the builders of this country.

The material, moral, social and spiritual personification of a Canadian motherland will never enter the hearts or minds of colonials, because the feelings they harbour are for another land than Canada. Let us respect and honour the motherland by respecting and honouring ourselves. Let us pass this measure which transcends individual selfishness, because it embodies the freedom and the glory of the motherland and her sons. The time has come to give a name suggesting the motherland to every man, woman and child in Canada. There is no freedom and no glory in concealing her origin and her true name, whether at home or abroad. Canadian citizenship will prevent many acts of treason. It will give to the weak the courage of remaining loyal and honest to their country. Let us sever the last links which carry with them the humiliation of bearing a name that is not our own. Let us hold up our heads and assume again our name and our rank as a nation, We are now a mature nation. We should do nothing that could depreciate and dishonour the nation. We have no right to deny our compatriots and ourselves a name which belongs to us and illustrates the nationality of every one among us. What Canadian citizen would want to be called a pariah or a man without a country, here or anywhere in the world? If such a man exists, I say that he does not deserve to live in this country, or to enjoy the privileges that belong to a Canadian citizen. Is it because favours have been showered on him? Is it because he has enjoyed all the privileges and prerogatives of this country's citizens that he would be ashamed of being a Canadian? I say that such a man is a constant danger to the motherland because his attitude borders on treason. Is there not something tragic in the state of mind of people of that ilk? We do not belong to a civilization lost in some wilderness. We do not want to follow any longer in the wake of the empire. We want to be and remain our own selves. That is the lofty ideal of a whole nation. Nothing humiliates and debases a people as much as the restriction of its freedom. Let us proclaim before the whole world that Canada is a mature nation and that her people are proud of their distinct nationality which will be consecrated by this measure that I heartily support.

I have had an opportunity of hearing sound arguments on this bill. Some members of this house would like the last trace of the expression "British subject" eliminated from the bill. I agree with them, but I think it is my bounden duty to Canada and to our fellow-citizens to support the principle of this measure which consecrates Canadian citizenship. In spite of its flaws, this bill evidences a progress which we should acknowledge loyally and without any reservation. Some say a measure supplementing this bill will become necessary as a matter of course. The principle that underlies it is excellent and I should not be justified in opposing it. I am in duty bound to help the evolution of our new prerogatives. I shall do so most willingly, with the conviction that in a country like ours nothing must be left undone when her freedom and sovereignty are at stake.

If I am not mistaken the week which will soon end is the week of national pride. That is why this bill should be passed unanimously. The rights of the citizen will at last be recognized and respected in Canada. Canadian citizenship ought to remove the differences which divide us in this country. Let us confidently hope that those convictions which are at variance with our own will be dissipated by the much nobler and higher ideal of a Canadian nationality and a Canadian motherland. Even in the sphere of politics, the differences which have separated and divided us should vanish before the freedom and sovereignty which are proclaimed in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Cross over to this side.

Mr. LACOMBE: We have fought for freedom and justice. We have no right to shirk the duty of giving more freedom and justice to Canadian citizens. That is the purpose of the measure which we are asked to support. I shall do so without effort, in the name of the national unity and harmony which I would like to see forever entrenched in this country. I hope no one will protest in the name of colonialism. All true Canadians are looking forward to-day to a revival of an internal peace based on a Canadian nationality and a Canadian flag. We are used to hearing the partisans of colonialism voice their protests when the issue at stake is our right to self-government. At a time when Canada must restore its economic and social life, we must advance determinedly along the path of political and national evolution. Let us not sacrifice on the altar of imperialism, the fruits of many years' suffering.

I believe the time has come to restore in every Canadian citizen the dignity of his rank both in our country and outside, so that he may no longer depend, directly or indirectly, on a foreign power. This bill does not satisfy me entirely, but it nevertheless embodies a principle which is essential to our Canadian nationality. Because of that principle, I have decided to vote in favour of the bill. I do not want my fellow-citizens to retrogress; such a disgrace could be used by our worst enemies to their own advantage. On the contrary, I want them to be respected everywhere. Canadian citizenship is the synthesis of individual political rights.

I positively state that it is up to the legislator to develop in this country a truly national spirit, if Canada is to attain real greatness. The administration is discharging an imperious duty to Canadians and Canada, in giving our citizens a national status. Henceforth the Canadian citizen will have his distinctive characteristics. His national status will now be recognized both at home and abroad.

I conclude my remarks by quoting section 3 of the Canadian Citizenship Act:

> Where, under any act of the parliament of Canada or an order or a regulation made under such act, a person is required to state or declare his national status, any person who is a Canadian citizen under this act may state or declare himself to be a Canadian citizen and his statement or declaration to that effect shall be a good and sufficient compliance with such requirement.

The short title of this act is a proof of the evolution of Canadian nationality. I support this bill, hoping that time, which improves and humanizes legislations, will evolve in the case of the measure under consideration, the amendments that will render it perfectly acceptable. I prefer being a Canadian citizen to mourning the loss of my nationality. I have taken an oath of allegiance to the King of Canada. I am faithful and loyal to His Majesty, and I am proud to serve him in Canada as a Canadian citizen.

Some object to section 26 of the Act which reads as follows: "A Canadian citizen is a British subject".

Does this mean that I should reject this bill just because it contains that clause? I say no. It is true that I should like to see the last vestige of dependence disappear in the matter of Canadian citizenship, but I am justified in supporting the bill as a whole in view of the principle essential to the Canadian nationality which it establishes.

The ACTING SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I shall complete my remarks in a couple of minutes.

Mr. PINARD: Go ahead.

Mr. LACOMBE: Further, I shall not adopt an uncompromising attitude and condemn everything worth while which this bill contains merely in order to undertake a dissertation on the advisability or otherwise of section 26. After all, it is better to seek the good in everything, than to constantly complain about possible defects.

Yesterday was Canada's day. To-day is Canadian citizenship day. To-morrow will be national flag's day. How well these measures supplement one another and tighten the bonds between the present and a past marked by greatness and valour! Notwithstanding the presumptuous protests of a small number of colonial-minded persons who would withhold from their country the right to grow in stature, let us unfurl our sails towards a future in which Canada will be recognized and respected as one of the great nations of the world. Despite the ultra-loyalists and imperialists who prefer tutorship to full nationhood, bondage to liberty, despite the deplorable colonialism shown by those who refuse to join in Canada's march of progress towards independence and sovereignty, let us continue with unflinching courage the struggle from which our Canadian citizens will emerge victorious, having attained dignity, individuality and citizenship.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT

POWER TO PROHIBIT SOUND SIGNALS AT CROSSINGS IN OR NEAR CITIES AND TOWNS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Adamson for the second reading of bill No. 3, to amend the Railway Act.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I listened the other evening with keen interest to the debate on the second reading of bill No. 8, to amend the Railway Act, as brought forward in this house by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) on behalf of the sponsor, who was unavoidably absent.

The bill raises an important point, and I think I can sum up pretty well everything I have to say by stating that there are a number of things to be said in favour of it As framed, it meets the situation referred to by the hon. member for Peel. On the other hand, there are two objections to the bill, and, having these in mind, I think it behooves the house to send the bill to a committee. Before making a motion to that effect, however, there are several facts which I should like to bring out.

The condition referred to by the hon. member for Peel as existing in the city of Toronto and the neighbourhood contiguous thereto is one of which I have been aware for some time. There can be no doubt that in that locality a great deal of annoyance exists among the citizens living outside the city of Toronto in consequence of the ringing of bells and the blowing of locomotive whistles. Complaints have been made to the board of transport commissioners and the Department of Transport from time to time, and I agree with the hon. member for Peel that the situation is certainly not an enviable one, particularly when the health, quiet and peace of mind of residents are concerned, seeing that, as the hon. gentleman stated, some 700 whistles are blown during the course of one day. With the residents there can be nothing but understanding and sympathy.

As I have pointed out, however, there are fundamental and technical objections to this bill, and those objections I should like to draw to the attention of the house to-night.

Section 308 of the Railway Act is that section which was put in for the purpose of protecting the public from accidents, and it reads:

> When any train is approaching a highway crossing at rail level the engine whistle shall be sounded at least eighty rods before reaching such crossing and the bell shall be rung continuously from the time of the sounding of the whistle until the engine has crossed such highway.

There is a definite and clear obligation, placed in the statute, on the part of the railways. That section is the foundation of all actions in damages arising out of accidents or deaths at level crossings. Apart from that statute, there may be, and I believe there is, a common law liability on the part of the railway if the crossing is not properly protected.

Subsection 2 of this section 308 provides a breakdown and takes away from that basic action which lies against the railway, when it states:

> Where a municipal by-law of a city or town prohibits such sounding of the whistle or such ringing of the bell in respect of any such crossing or crossings within the limits of such city or town, such by-law shall, if approved by an order of the board, to the extent of such prohibition, relieve the company and its employees from the duty imposed by this section.

In other words, if the municipality of a city or town by by-law prohibits the sounding of the whistle or the ringing of the bell, and the board approves that by-law, then the company shall be relieved of the obligation. The company shall not be relieved of liability, however, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) intimated the other night in his remarks. It will be relieved only of liability to blow the whistle and ring the bell.

What the bill purports to do is to cut down still further that statutory obligation on the part of the railway by extending the prohibition to townships and villages contiguous to or near such city or town; and if all the municipalities which are villages and townships and in which there are these level crossings were to pass by-laws of the kind referred to in this bill, then there would be no reason whatever for the existence of section 308. It would have been practically all nullified by these amendments.

I say that by way of a general statement because I believe that parliament will want to see that the rights of the public are protected so far as level crossings are concerned.

In cities and towns where under existing provisions the sounding of a whistle may be prohibited, the speed of trains is restricted both by the provisions of the statute and by the actual necessities of train operation. The speed of motor cars is also restricted as a rule to thirty miles an hour or less. In the open country trains travel at faster rates of speed, sixty and sometimes eighty miles an hour, and in the open country motor cars also travel at faster rates.

In these circumstances the general adoption of the prohibition for which the bill provides, even in only those portions of municipalities adjacent to cities and towns, would increase enormously the risk of accident to those using the highways and add considerably to the dangers of train operation, because a collision between a locomotive and an automobile usually results in death or, at any rate, serious injury to the occupants of the motor car and sometimes also in injury to the train crew and the passengers when the brakes are applied quickly in an emergency. I make that statement simply to point this out to the house. While the bill seeks to rectify a situation which should be corrected, still in doing that in municipalities contiguous to cities it may create a set of circumstances elsewhere and defeat the very purpose of the bill.

There were one or two things said the other evening by two hon. members who took part in the debate to which I wish to refer. The hon. member for Broadview seemed to complain about the board of transport commissioners generally; he felt they were not performing their duty in cases such as this. I should like to say to him that the obligations of the board of transport commissioners are set out in the Railway Act. It is their duty to enforce the sections of the act as they are brought to their attention. If the hon. gentleman would take the time to look at the annual report of the board of transport commissioners for 1945, which was tabled in this house a few days ago, he would see for himself the scope, work, and operation of that board.

Dealing particularly with the complaint of the hon. gentleman, let me say that the report of the engineering department of the board of transport commissioners indicates that 420 inspections covering the whole dominion were made in 1945. These inspections covered opening of railways for the carriage of traffic; highway crossings; signal protection on highway crossings; bridges; subways; interlocking spans; drainage; private crossings; railway lines in connection with maintenance; signals on swing bridges; fencing; improved view at crossings; investigation and inspection in connection with accidents on railway lines and at highway crossings; automatic block signals; less than a standard clearance and many inspections in connection with projects to provide post-war work.

The hon. gentleman said that he was in favour of this bill, and yet toward the end of his remarks he at least led me to believe that he was strongly opposed to anything which might tend to create accidents at crossings. That is the very thing which this house should guard against. It should not do anything which, while it may help a group which is deserving of help, may on the other hand tend to affect the great mass of the public by taking away from them certain rights which they already have under the statute.

The hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson) made certain references to automatic signals. He was of the opinion that the government should take steps to instal automatic signals at every level crossing in the country. That is a large order, because the protection referred to by the hon. member would be in addition to that which is already granted under the act. The total number of railway crossings in Canada is 33,396. Of this number only approximately 3,020 are protected by grade separations or some form of automatic protection such as gates, wig-wags and bells or flashing lights and bells. It is therefore clear to the house that the magnitude of the task becomes apparent.

For many years it has been the practice of the board of transport commissioners in administering the act, where protective devices are directed to be installed, to set aside at places or points where the junction between the highway and the railway is dangerous, forty per cent of the cost of the construction of a device for protection. As a rule, the remainder is made up by an assessment against the railway and the municipality having jurisdiction over the highway. There is no set rule as to the amount which should be assessed against one or the other. That may depend upon the amount of traffic. For instance, if the highway is responsible for the increased traffic it may well be that the board of transport commissioners will assess a greater proportion against the highway than against the railway. On the other hand, if it is the railway which is responsible for the increased traffic the board would act accordingly.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister permit a question? I am going to agree with everything he says by the time he gets through, but I wonder whether he is quite accurate in his last statement. Let us take a highway in the precincts of a town that grew after the Canadian Pacific railway was built. If the municipality crosses the railway and wants a separation of grade the municipality must bear all the costs—if my memory serves me aright, and it may not—and vice versa. That is my memory unless the rule has been changed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is certainly not my understanding.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I may be wrong, but I doubt it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am referring now not only to grade separation but to any sort of protection which may have to be set up in order to protect the public against accidents. As the practice exists to-day the board of transport commissioners pay forty per cent. That is the maximum amount they are allowed to pay under the act and under the railway grade crossing fund toward the actual cost of the construction of the protection. The board has no authority to make a grant toward the cost of maintenance or operation. The remainder of the cost is divided between the municipality and the railway. I am informed that that is the practice of the board.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does the minister include subways in that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; that comes under a different category.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): After all, a change of grade is a matter of a subway.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I make that general statement because I thought the house would be interested in it in view of the statement made by the hon. member for Durham.

I do not think the house believes that the board of transport commissioners or even parliament should pass legislation under which parliament would provide all the funds for the protection of all crossings in Canada.

To sum up what I have said, I repeat that the condition which this bill seeks to rectify is a meritorious one; it is one which deserves consideration. On the other hand, there are technical objections to the bill because the words "township", "village", "town" and "city" do not include all the municipalities across this country. There are other words used in other provinces which would not be covered by those four words, so that which might meet this situation contiguous to the city of Toronto would not meet it in other parts of the country. Under the circumstances, therefore, I think the proper thing is to refer this bill to the railway committee and to invite before that committee representatives of the railway association of Canada, of the railways and any others who want to give evidence. If that is done the merits of the bill will be carefully considered. I therefore move—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I think it would be better to have a second reading, and when the bill is read the second time—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I propose to have submitted to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines the subject-matter of the bill; and I now move, seconded by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell):

That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The city of Toronto has put millions of dollars unnecessarily into grade separation along the waterfront. If this bill goes to the railway committee, will the Canadian National Railways bring forward any plans for the electrification of its lines within a radius of fifteen miles of the city? I acted for the city when we settled the viaduct case. The Canadian Pacific got a right of way many years ago, before my time, all the way down to the Don river for $600 a year, and the Canadian National is in the same position. In my opinion we shall never get rid of this nuisance until we electrify the system for a distance of fifteen miles around the city. Toronto spent millions of dollars on harbour improvements, and in the viaduct case we agreed to pay one-third of the cost, although in other cities the railways paid the entire cost. The approach to the city runs for twelve miles along the city-owned waterfront, and with the cheap light and power we have to-day it would not be a very great matter to bring about this electrification. The only cost would be the engines and the power, and that is the only way this nuisance will be overcome. I should like to ask the minister whether has any plan in that connection.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would say to the hon. gentleman that this bill has nothing to do with the electrification of railways entering the city of Toronto or elsewhere. It has to do with the abatement of a nuisance contiguous to the city of Toronto. Therefore the Canadian National Railways would not be subject to examination on the point he has raised. I would say, however, that if the hon. gentleman wants to deal with that question when the committee on railways and shipping is set up, he will have an opportunity to examine the president of the Canadian National Railways and his officials on the point.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I want a few minutes of your time on this.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rise to a point of order. Is a motion to refer debatable? I do not think it is, under the rules of this house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): This is an amendment; it is not a motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The motion before the house is an amendment to the original motion, and the amendment is debatable because the original motion itself was debatable.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then I gather, sir, that I may proceed. I wish to assure my hon. friend that I am going to be helpful and not critical.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Calgary West is now speaking to the amendment.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not objecting; I merely want to see the rules observed, and in my opinion this is not in order.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want them to be observed, too, but I also want you to be happy.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I say that I think we shall all be happier if hon. members will kindly address the Chair.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I seem to be getting into difficulty. With great respect, sir, I have been thrown out by many chairmen; but I appreciate what you say and I will address the Chair.

I speak on this matter with a bit of experience. In order that you, sir, and the house may discount what I am going to say first, I should state that in some thirty years I have acted for both railways in the area in which I live, so that leaves it wide open for anybody to say, Well, his remarks do not amount to anything because no doubt he is prejudiced on that particular side. Perhaps I had better complete the story. The chairman of the transportation board is a distant relative of mine by marriage, so that I have said everything against myself that I possibly can say at this moment.

I have a suggestion to offer. We know all about level crossing accidents. I know they cost the railways a great deal of money; the railways do not carry insurance of that kind but absorb the loss themselves, and I think that lets them out. But what I have in mind is the great loss of life that we have at level crossings. It is true that many times persons in motor cars have not been struck by an engine but have driven into the side of a train. If, sir, you will permit me to divorce myself from the financial aspect of this matter it seems to me that the important point in a measure of this kind is the saving of life. It is true that we used to have two longs and two shorts blown at a crossing. The transport commission, for some reason best known to itself, changed that to three longs and one short, which must be blown eighty yards from the crossing; and the bell must be kept ringing constantly. You get into a lawsuit of this kind and I know, from the railway point of view, no one ever hears the bell ringing or the whistle blowing; in fact everyone in the area about which the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) was speaking would swear that the bell was never rung and the whistle never blown. Why is that? Because they become accustomed to these things, in the same way that we become accustomed to street-cars going by our doors if we happen to live on a car line; we are not awakened because we can become accustomed to certain noises. Some people even like the sound of cats and dogs howling around the back fence, though I have not got that far yet.

I am glad this bill is being referred to a committee, and my thought is this. I quite realize that it is impossible to have power put in to handle 33,000 swinging signs at level crossings. That is really a tremendous undertaking. Certainly in our branch lines, which have not the block system of signals, it would require complete electrical equipment in order to do that.

Really, I am not speaking about saving the railways any money; but the answer to the problem, it seems to me, is that we should adopt the rule which is in force in the United States, namely the rule of "stop, look and listen". One will see many signs in Canada which say, "Look and listen"—in compliance with our law. But persons always say they looked and listened, but they did not hear the bell or the whistle.

How far have we gone with that, aside from the Railway Act? I believe in most of the provinces, certainly in the one from which I come, there is provision in the respective motor vehicles acts whereby all school buses, and all passenger carrying vehicles for hire, by law must stop at railway tracks. That, as I say, is the law in the province from which I come; I know it is true in Saskatchewan, and I believe it is in British Columbia.

Mr. REID: It is.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am told it is true in Ontario. Indeed, I should like even to give evidence before the committee, although I have never been hit by a railway train. People who have been hit rarely give evidence, because they are not there to give it.

It seems to me that the bill raised a question with which the committee might well deal, and therefore I am very much in favour of the amendment moved by the minister. I hope, however, he will not regard this bill as one having to do with localized areas. Rather I should hope the committee would regard it as one having to do with the saving of hundreds of human lives every year in Canada. I am reasonably sure that if that broad rule were adopted it would, in effect, save seventy-five per cent of lives which now are uselessly and foolishly lost as a result of collisions between motor vehicles and railway trains.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as one who is thoroughly familiar with the area to which the bill refers, namely that including the entrances to the city of Toronto, I rise in support of it.

However, before saying what I intend to say I should like to express my appreciation of the manner in which the minister always handles matters which come under his control, when he refers to them in the house. Evidently he gives these matters careful thought, and apparently inquires fully into all the background material. May I compliment him upon his handling of matters of this kind.

Having said that, I would invite him, between now and the time his estimates are discussed, to give consideration and study toward the improvement of matters such as those dealt with in the bill. Large numbers of trains pass hourly through the west of Toronto area; I believe one hon. member gave the exact number. Not only do accidents occur through collisions between motor vehicles and trains, but in addition the smoke nuisance has reached tremendous proportions. Closely associated with the high rate of accidents is the smoke nuisance.

I would ask the minister to give thorough study to the whole problem of railway entrances into large cities, and I would direct his attention particularly to the city of Toronto, and the possibility of electrification of railway lines in that area. In the Toronto area we have ample electrical power. The Ontario hydro electric commission could supply all the electricity required to electrify the rail entrances to that city, and if such development were carried out the smoke nuisance which now obtains all along the front area would be eliminated. If that electrification were carried out, with the consequent reduction in noise which is now endured, that lower section of Toronto would become a great residential centre. At the present time development is more or less at a standstill because of the smoke nuisance.

While the bill does not mention either smoke nuisance or electrification, I have taken the liberty of discussing these subjects because of the keen interest shown by the minister in matters which come to his attention.

If the house decides to send this bill to the committee on railways I believe it would be dealt with properly. I know what the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) is up against. In all those thickly settled municipalities west of Toronto the noise nuisance and the injuries resulting from smoke have caused considerable annoyance.

I should appreciate it if the minister would study these problems connected with railway entrances into cities and the electrification of equipment. This is being done in England. We know that throughout England engines are now being electrified. The last time I was in London wires and cables were being laid for the electrification of the entrances to that great city. Whether it has been completed or not, I cannot say; but I plan going to England shortly, and I shall make my own inquiries—I like to do that, anyway.

I for one, would be glad to support any effort the minister may make to carry out the whole programme touched upon by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) who, on all occasions, goes deeply into matters coming under his purview. May I extend my compliments to him, too, on the keen interest he takes in everything with which he associates himself. It is evident from his observations that he has had wide experience in these matters, and I know he would be glad to assist the minister in any survey that might be made in connection with electrification of entrances to cities, the elimination of smoke nuisances, and any other matters connected with rapid transit systems running into and out of the large cities.

Amendment (Mr. Chevrier) agreed to, and bill referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Martin for the second reading of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) made his speech on the second reading of this bill I thought he became a little expansive. I had a vision of his bringing into the world the first of a new species of manhood—the Canadian. Then he became the wise man coming bearing a rich gift to the Canadian people—the right to call themselves Canadians. After listening this afternoon to the speeches of the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) and the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard), I can understand that to them this bill does perhaps give them for the first time the right to call themselves Canadians. I give them credit for being sincere in their remarks and I must admit that theirs was an outlook I had not realized existed.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

For me, and I am sure for many other members of the house, there has never been any question of my right to call myself a Canadian. Those of us who served in the last war were more proud of the word "Canada" which we bore on our shoulder-straps than of any other fact about our service. I think throughout the whole of our lives we shall have that feeling of pride in being Canadians. No one, either ally or foe, ever dared to question the fact that we were Canadians. I have even quarrelled with the poor census taker on different occasions when he tried to compel me to give the racial origin of my father. I have insisted that I was a Canadian and have been registered as such. I think that is the general attitude of the majority of the Canadian people and for them this bill only does away with certain complexities and removes certain anomalies. As such it is a bill which I am glad to support. The Secretary of State himself said that was the case when he spoke on October 22 of last year on the first reading of a similar bill. He said, as reported on page 1335 of Hansard of that year:

> It should not be concluded from this that the bill in reality makes any sweeping change or that there has not previously been any such thing as Canadian nationality.

When speaking in the debate this year his words were much the same. He said, and I quote from page 502 of Hansard:

> As I shall endeavour to show, it seeks to avoid many complexities and confusions which arise from existing legislation.

In considering this bill we should come down from the emotional heights on which we have been travelling during the earlier hours of the debate and consider the bill in a more realistic way. After all, it is an important and complicated bill and it merits the most careful consideration of every member of the house. I regret greatly that the government has decided not to send it to the external affairs committee, as planned last session. I think also a great mistake is being made in not bringing down the amendments to the Immigration Act so that—

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot bring down the amendments to the Immigration Act. As I said in my speech on the second reading, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) will bring down any amendments which will be made pursuant to this bill.

Mr. GREEN: It is a great mistake not to bring down the amendments to the Immigration Act now so that we can consider the two bills together and get the whole picture rather than passing the citizenship bill now and then having to deal with the immigration bill some weeks or months hence.

Mr. MARTIN: The only amendment to the Immigration Act would be to section 2, and that is covered in this bill.

Mr. GREEN: If that is the only amendment, then there is all the more reason why it should be brought down without delay.

Mr. MARTIN: There will be no delay.

Mr. GREEN: There are certain features of this bill which I should like to discuss this evening, the first being part I which deals with natural-born Canadian citizens. They are given very broad rights and perhaps that is the proper thing to do, but it seems to me that there has not been sufficient thought given to the question of what is to be done with the natural-born Canadian who has transferred his loyalty to another country. We are granting extensive rights to natural-born Canadians and yet there are natural-born Canadians who do not deserve those rights. As far as I can see, there are not adequate provisions in the bill to deal with a man of that type.

There were Japanese born in Canada who went back to Japan before the war and served in the Japanese forces. For instance, there was a Canadian-born Japanese who was the chief torturer of our own troops in Hong Kong. The way this bill reads now, that man would have the right to claim that he is a natural-born Canadian and is entitled to everything that goes to a citizen of that class. There should be some test. The bill merely says that if a person born in Canada has become an alien, then he is no longer entitled to the rights of a natural-born Canadian. But there is no definition of how he becomes an alien. The government might well consider putting in a provision to the effect that if such a man has shown himself to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty, then he should lose the rights of a natural-born Canadian. The same criticism applies in the case of people born after the bill comes into effect. The government should consider ways and means of preventing a man who is not loyal to this country from having the rights of a natural-born Canadian.

Mr. MARTIN: That is provided for in the bill.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think it is adequately covered by the bill.

I come now to the Canadian citizen who is not a natural-born Canadian; this is covered by part II of the bill. The thing that worries me is the treatment meted out to citizens of the other nations of the commonwealth. I look at the British commonwealth as a partnership of independent and equal nations, and, by the way, the greatest partnership of all time. Those of you who are in a partnership know that you cannot kick your partners around; it pays to treat them a little better than you treat people on the outside, otherwise the partnership will dissolve sooner or later.

This afternoon the hon. member for Outremont and the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville both said that they believed in the British empire; both believed in Canada continuing as a nation in the commonwealth, so that there is no disagreement between them and myself on that score; but let us see how we are treating our partners under this part II of the bill.

In the first place, the man who has come from Australia to British Columbia during the last four years is not to be considered a Canadian citizen; he must have been here for five years, otherwise when this bill is passed he must go through the naturalization court. Of course the Immigration Act provides that anyone coming to Canada does not acquire domicile for purposes of that act until he or she has been here for five years, and it is from that act that this five-year term has come. But I think the government, considering that the provision I am criticizing deals with our partners, might very well have said that any Australian or New Zealander or Scotsman or Englishman or Irishman or Welshman who is legally entered in Canada, that is, has been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence, at the time this bill comes into effect, shall be considered a Canadian citizen. Let us not be cheap about this business. Let us say that anyone who has come here from Australia, for example and is permanently settled here shall be a Canadian citizen upon the passing of this act.

The key section of the bill is No. 10, which has to do with naturalization. I say it is the key section of the whole bill, and it changes our law. Under the present law, when we naturalize a person he becomes a British subject; it is in effect a commonwealth citizenship. That has been the case in Canada for many years, just as it has been the case in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. Now, if this bill is not changed the only advantage a British subject will have is that he will not have to take a declaration of intention to become a citizen. That is the only advantage he will have over a person from another nation, say from Russia or from China. He must wait here in Canada five years. That will mean sooner or later that he will not be able to vote for five years.

Mr. MARTIN: Not necessarily.

Mr. GREEN: It is true that at the present time he can vote as a British subject after one year, but the minister himself said the other day in his speech, as reported in Hansard at page 503, that this Canadian citizenship will be the fundamental status upon which the rights and privileges of Canadians will depend. and it is only a question of time until the franchise will be based on Canadian citizenship. That means that a man coming here from Australia will not be able to vote for five years, whereas for years now he has been able to vote after having been here for one year. It means that he will have to appear in naturalization court beside the man from Russia and the man from China—the first time that has ever been done in Canada. I believe the first time it has ever been done in the British empire. He will have to take the oath of allegiance, and—

Mr. MARTIN: No, he will not. There will be no oath of allegiance in that case. He has taken it. He is a subject of the king.

Mr. GREEN: He will have to get people to vouch for him. He will be subject to investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In effect, this change takes away most of the value of commonwealth citizenship in Canada. Yet at the same time this bill seeks, in section 26, to retain for a Canadian citizen the rights of a British subject outside Canada. In other words, we are taking away these rights from the Australian but we are trying to keep them for the Canadian who goes to Australia.

I should like to place one thought before my good friends the hon. members for Outremont and Chambly-Rouville who spoke this afternoon. They are not in their seats this evening but many of their friends are here. They seem to place absolutely no value on commonwealth citizenship, and that is where their thinking goes wrong. Why is it not far better for us to have our rights as Canadian citizens and also to have our rights as citizens of the commonwealth? Surely two rights are better than one. They do not interfere with each other, and the citizenship in the commonwealth is of great value. I know, sir, if they think that over they will agree with me. It is not that anybody puts commonwealth citizenship ahead of Canadian citizenship at all, but it is a case of the two citizenships, the two rights being better than one. If they and their friends can agree with me on that I can see no reason why we should not have a united Canada in the years that lie ahead. In any event I suggest to the government that this provision be altered so as to put some real value on commonwealth citizenship. Do not cut away the rights of a citizen of the British commonwealth as you have done in this bill. There are good reasons for giving the citizens of a commonwealth nation a better place than the man who comes here from Russia or from China.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. GREEN: The commonwealth citizen comes here having the same allegiance as we have, allegiance to the same crown. He comes here with the same traditions; we have common traditions. He comes here understanding our system of justice, having had the same type of government, having the same democratic outlook as we have here in Canada.

These other nations, I repeat, are our partners. Let us remember that. Let us not hit at our best friends. Have the English, Scots, Irish, Welsh, Australians, New Zealanders and South Africans who have been here in Canada with us through the years shown that such a drastic change is necessary? These provisions are a direct reflection on them and on the part they have played in building up this nation. It is significant that the minister did not even refer to this drastic change when introducing this bill last session, when introducing it this session, or when speaking on it on second reading of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: I did, on both occasions.

Mr. GREEN: I will let hon. members judge for themselves.

Mr. MARTIN: Well, look at Hansard.

Mr. GREEN: Let them read Hansard and they will see that this drastic change was not explained by the minister on any one of these three occasions.

Mr. MARTIN: On both occasions. Look at Hansard.

Mr. GREEN: Then, as to the part dealing with procedure and evidence, we all agree that it is wise to provide instruction in the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship to those who are applying for that citizenship, and that those rights and responsibilities should be impressed by the court that hears the applicant. This is a move in the right direction. I have been advocating it for years; so has the Secretary of State, and neither of us has ever been able to understand why such provisions were not put into our laws years ago, just as they were put into the law of the United States. I repeat, it is a move in the right direction; and yet it is, oh, so strange, to find in section 10, subsection 1, paragraph (e) that now for the first time in Canada the applicant for citizenship need not speak either of our official languages. He need not speak either French or English.

Mr. MARTIN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. I am sure he does not wish to misstate the situation. This is an important measure. It does not state what the section says; it says, after twenty years.

Mr. GREEN: Yet under this bill—

Mr. MARTIN: Is that not right?

Mr. GREEN: Just wait a minute.

Mr. MARTIN: You wish to be fair now.

Mr. GREEN: I will read the provision and hon. members can judge for themselves:

(e) he has an adequate knowledge of either the English or the French language, or, if he has not such an adequate knowledge, he has resided continuously in Canada for more than twenty years.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: That has arisen, I believe, because of the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act and the mothers' allowance acts in the different provinces. There are deserving persons who have been unable to qualify for old age pension or mother's allowance because they were not naturalized, and they could not be naturalized because they could not speak French or English, although the actual requirements are very slender so far as language is concerned. Those hon. members who have been in a naturalization court will realize how little of either language the applicant must know in order to pass the test. I suggest to the government that to meet those hard cases the Old Age Pensions Act should be changed rather than the Naturalization Act. I do not think it is sound to make the change in the Naturalization Act. Take the situation in my own province of British Columbia. This provision means that a Japanese who cannot speak English can qualify for citizenship if he has been in the country twenty years. The same is true of a Doukhobor, and in both cases they have lived largely in colonies where many of them have not learned to speak either of our languages.

Perhaps there is some reason for making that provision for those old people who are now living in Canada, although as I read the act it is not restricted to older people, and would apply equally to a young man of twenty-one. If he has been twenty years in the country he is entitled to apply for citizenship although he may not be able to speak English or French.

It is not so bad for those people who are already here, but this provision as it stands applies also to persons coming here in the future. A person coming here next year can wait twenty years and then apply for citizenship without having learned one of the official languages. It certainly is contrary to the whole spirit and intent of the bill, and being of a suspicious nature in political matters, I regard it as a change to get the government votes.

An hon. MEMBER: Get them what?

Mr. GREEN: To get the government votes. You know what votes are.

Then to come to general suggestions about the bill; I suggest to the minister that it might be well to provide in the regulations for some welcoming ceremony, and it might even be wise to include in that ceremony our own young Canadians who have become twenty-one. Let them all go in together, all enter our citizenship together.

Mr. MARTIN: That will be covered by the regulations.

Mr. GREEN: Let the naturalized and the natural-born Canadian who reaches the age of twenty-one go in together. Then the naturalization court judges should be given wider discretion. Let them see the reports that are made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police before they hear the application. I suggest also that the naturalization court should be given a little money so that it can function.

Mr. MARTIN: Hear, hear. You will help me when that comes up.

Mr. GREEN: At the present time it is just an orphan in the provincial courts. At present no provision is made for transcripts of evidence; there is no provision for stenographers and very little provision for clerks. It is done on the cheap and that is not good enough when the job is that of making new Canadian citizens. It might be worth while to advertise for complaints against applicants. That is done in the United Kingdom. I believe it would be very much worth while to put immigration, the nationalities branch and naturalization all under one department so that they would deal with the citizen coming to Canada, acquainting him with our laws and customs and making him welcome, and then naturalizing him. That work should all be under one department rather than spread out under different departments of government. Those are suggestions I have to make with regard to the bill.

In the time that remains to me I should like to say a few words about another problem having to do with citizenship and naturalization, and that is the Japanese problem. I am asking for a statement from the government on the effect of this citizenship bill on the government's policy with respect to Japanese in Canada. The bill is being cited as a means of retaining all the Japanese in Canada. The Japanese problem is directly involved with this bill and we do not want to have any misunderstanding about the effect the bill will have on the problem.

Last December the government announced a policy which was in effect that Japanese nationals who had asked to be sent back to Japan and had waived their rights to citizenship should be sent back; also that Japanese nationals who had been interned should be sent back; that naturalized Japanese who had not revoked their request for repatriation before the 1st of September, 1945, should go and Canadian-born Japanese who did not revoke their request for repatriation prior to a deportation order being issued; they are still able to revoke that request, right up to this very date.

Another branch of the policy was that a loyalty commission would be set up to check over Japanese nationals and those naturalized who had not asked to be sent back; if any were found disloyal they were to be repatriated.

There are to-day in Canada, or at least there were on February 28 of this year, a little over a month ago, 413 Japanese still interned. I saw some of them on my way east two weeks ago in the old German prisoner of war camp near Schreiber. There were 413 at the end of February, of whom 203 were born in Canada, 39 naturalized, 168 Japanese nationals and 3 United States citizens. The total number of Japanese in Canada as of December 31 who had asked to be repatriated was 10,380. They had also asked to have their rights as Canadian citizens waived. The request, of course, was made by the father and in some cases by the mother, but this figure also includes the children.

It is significant that over half of this 10,380 have not changed their minds even to this day. I have the figures here from the Department of Labour of requests for revocation received up to December 31. These figures show that 4,720 requested revocation of the application to be sent back; therefore, over five thousand still want to get back to Japan. Yet we have our C.C.F. friends here and a few pinks across the country, the editor of Saturday Night, the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press and the editor of the Toronto Star putting on a great pressure campaign to have all these Japanese kept in Canada whether they want to go back or not. These people are more Japanese than the Japanese themselves. That is the strange part of it.

Government policy was brought down by order in council last December. At once there was a hue and cry that the Japanese must not be repatriated. The government permitted a case to be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada. The decision was handed down some weeks ago. This decision in effect said that the orders in council were valid. There was only one defect, namely, that in one of the groups the wives and children could not be sent back. Since then there have been delegations to the cabinet. All the pressure has been in favour of keeping the Japanese here. I would suggest to the government that they do not pay much attention to pressure campaigns of that type. As members of parliament we know just what these campaigns mean, how easily they are organized and how few people make how much noise.

We want to know whether the government is now preparing to drop this last policy on the Japanese question. If the government weakens and the Japanese now in British Columbia are allowed to stay, there will be over 14,000 there. Three-fifths of the Japanese are still in British Columbia. I have the figures here. As of February 28, 1946, 14,692 were still in British Columbia despite all the attempts of the government to get them to disperse across Canada, out of a total of 24,157. Most of those now east of the Rockies would come back to the coast. Take, for example, the 3,000 Japanese relocated in Alberta by the Department of Labour. They were put there under an agreement with the province that after the war, if the province wished it, they would be taken away again. On February 4, Premier Manning of Alberta is quoted as saying:

> We want them moved as soon as the agreement terminates at the statutory end of the war period.

That has been his stand throughout.

If the government caves in on its policy the net result will be that the Japanese problem in Canada will be back just where it was in 1941, namely, in British Columbia's lap; and in forty or fifty years there will be forty or fifty thousand Japanese on the coast, again in contact with Japanese merchant ships, going back and forth to Japan, again under domination of the Japanese consul, still worshipping the Japanese emperor and still a menace.

I cannot point out to the house how serious the situation may well be. Take the fishing industry on our coast. Many years ago it was necessary to cut down the number of licences given to the Japanese. When war broke out they had to be taken off the sea. Every Japanese boat had to be called in because the government did not know who could be trusted. Other fishermen have come in. White fishermen and Indians have replaced the Japanese. There are more fish being caught now than ever before, and if the Japanese come back into the fishing industry on the British Columbia coast I believe there will be bloodshed there; the situation is just that serious.

We intend to hold the government to its policy. We ask also that the whole of British Columbia be made a protective zone permanently as a defence measure. That is the policy advocated by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). I hope he has not changed his mind since the announcement he made just a little over a year ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not one bit.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would the hon. member permit a question for information purposes? Is that the policy of the Conservative party? If so, he may get some recruits over there. I should like to know if it is the official policy.

Mr. GREEN: I am surprised that the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has taken so long to get over to this side because that has been the policy for a long time. That is the policy on which we fought the campaign in British Columbia. Certainly there is no reason why those who have never revoked their request to go back to Japan should not be sent there without delay. If the government is not satisfied with the orders in council enabling the policy to be carried out let it bring a measure before parliament and see how the members stand on this question. The main reason why there was trouble in the Supreme Court of Canada was that this policy was carried out under order in council. The difficulty can be met by parliament enacting a measure. Last fall the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said that the government intended to carry out this policy even though there was a change in the national emergency powers bill. I hold in my hand Hansard of December 5, 1945, and in the translation from the French edition the following appears in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond). This is what the Minister of Justice said:

I shall tell him quite frankly that what was requested in the bill introduced on November 23 implied things that are not asked for at this time, but which we have not forgone and will request from parliament through other measures.

Parliament can empower the government to act on this question. We will support the government. I am confident that the Social Credit party will support them because of the stand they have taken throughout. The C.C.F. will not.

An hon. MEMBER: We all know that.

Mr. MacINNIS: We will support Canadians.

Mr. GREEN: But they and their pink friends are not yet running Canada. This Japanese problem is a practical question. It must be dealt with in a practical way. The real genius of the governments of the British nations has been that questions are dealt with realistically, not by theorizing at which my friends of the C.C.F. are so good.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think he has exhausted his subject as well.

Mr. GREEN: Nor by being righteous at the expense of someone else like the editors of those newspapers, and many of the people who are opposing the people of British Columbia on this question. This citizenship bill must not be used as an excuse for the government to abandon its Japanese policy. British Columbia would never forgive or forget such action.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make some comments on this bill before the motion for second reading is carried. What are the purposes of the bill, as explained by the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) when he introduced similar legislation on October 22 last and when he introduced this bill on Tuesday of this week? I think I can sum up those purposes as follows. First, it is to give a clearer definition of Canadian citizenship; second, to give to Canada one of the symbols of nationhood, and, third, to promote national unity in Canada.

Having in mind those three purposes, let us examine the bill and see if it corresponds to those enunciated aims. In reading over the bill, I fail to see any substantial change from the legislation we already have on our statute books. The change is more superficial than real. It has a promising title but it gives nothing more than we already have. After all, what counts is not so much the label on the box but what the box contains. As a matter of fact, as the minister said, already we have a Canadian nationality derived from the Canadian Nationals Act, passed in 1921. Let me quote the words of the minister as reported in Hansard of October 22, 1945, at page 1335:

> It should not be concluded from this that the bill in reality makes any sweeping change or that there has not previously been any such thing as Canadian nationality. Despite what one often hears to the contrary, there has been a Canadian nationality . . .

I wanted to make this point clear at the beginning of my argument. It is now proposed by this bill to substitute the words "Canadian citizen" for "Canadian national". I do not see the difference; Canadian national or Canadian citizen means the same thing. Is there any difference? If there is any difference, Canadian national means perhaps more. Then what about the proposed definition of "Canadian citizen" as compared with the existing definition of "Canadian national". In the Canadian National Act, 1921, we have the following definition of a "Canadian national":

> Any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act.

Then the Immigration Act gives the definition of a Canadian citizen as follows:

> "Canadian citizen" means
> (i) a person born in Canada who has not become an alien;
> (ii) a British subject who has Canadian domicile; or
> (iii) a person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile.

Section 2 of this bill defines a Canadian citizen as follows:

> "Canadian citizen" means a person who is a Canadian citizen under this act.

Then parts I and II of the bill enumerate the qualifications required to be a natural-born Canadian citizen and a Canadian citizen other than natural-born; but to find the exact meaning of "Canadian citizen" one must read also parts III and IV of the bill. There will be found, among others, section 26, which says without any ambiguity that a Canadian citizen is a British subject. If both definitions amount to the same thing, nothing is added by the bill to clarify the ambiguity which the minister intends to remove. If they are not the same thing we have more confusion than ever, having two definitions of a "Canadian citizen", one in the Immigration Act and this new one, in addition to all the confusion arising out of the interlocking of Canadian citizenship with British nationality, a subject with which I intend to deal.

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. gentleman will permit a question, did I understand him to say that when this bill is passed the definition of citizenship will continue to be found in the Immigration Act?

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I do not know.

Mr. MARTIN: I can tell him it will not.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): The minister has already said that he intends to bring in an amendment, but for the time being we are dealing with this bill. It is the only bill before parliament, and we must deal with it and with the Immigration Act as it is, as long as it is not amended.

Mr. MARTIN: We can do only one thing at a time.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Consequently I fail to see that this bill as it is now will achieve the first purpose enunciated by the minister, and I venture to say that it is rather a consolidation of the Naturalization Act and the Canadian Nationals Act under the new title.

I now come to the main purpose of the bill, which is to give Canada one of the symbols of nationhood. Everyone who is proud of his country, who believes, as has been repeated time and again, that Canada is a sovereign country, was delighted to hear that at last Canadians were to have a citizenship distinct from that of any other country, a real Canadian citizenship, recorded in the statute books. Unfortunately we are yet far from the realization of that; and the minister took pains to explain that there was a change and at the same time there was no change in our statute. At this stage I do not intend to go into the details of the measure. I shall have another opportunity to do so, but what I wish to emphasize to-night is this. While the bill is supposed to be for the purpose of clearly defining Canadian citizenship or national status in this country, and to avoid confusion, it offers a Canadian citizenship completely mixed up with British nationality, when the two should be considered as entirely different. Take section 26, which says:

> A Canadian citizen is a British subject.

If a Canadian citizen is a British subject, as stated in the bill, he has a dual nationality which is inadmissible in principle. Then where is the symbol of nationhood, which was referred to so eloquently by the Secretary of State? Canada is a nation, a sovereign nation. The United Kingdom is another sovereign nation. Both are equal in status. Citizenship means membership in a sovereign nation. When a man chooses to become the subject of a country by naturalization he automatically ceases to be a subject of the nation to which he belonged before naturalization. In acquiring a new nationality, he loses the one he had. Nobody will contest this. A Canadian citizen cannot be at the same time a British subject, because there cannot be dual or multiple citizenship or nationality. An individual cannot be a member of two nations at once. It is inadmissible and a well settled principle. Let me refer to one authority in the matter, namely Cleveland on "American citizenship." Here is what he says:

> Dual nationality irreconcilable
> Owing to the fact that every independent, politically organized, national group has always reserved the right of determining its own membership, conflicts of law have developed and in these conflicts the question of dual nationality has been raised. That such a thing as dual national citizenship must not and cannot possibly exist is quite a well-settled principle now. Morse says, "That any one should be a member of two nations at once is inadmissible in principle . . . An individual cannot be at one and the same time a citizen of two states; and as a general proposition an individual can have only one allegiance . . . The fact is, any doctrine which recognizes a double citizenship or nationality attempts to perpetuate a political hybrid, which is as abnormal and monstrous as its prototype in the natural world." This principle is an old one, first applied in the ancient city republics as we read from Cicero. "According to our civil law no one can be a citizen of two cities at the same time; a man cannot be a citizen of this city who has dedicated himself to another city." It would seem absurd on the face of it, for, as Woodburn says, how can the allegiance and service of a particular individual be claimed by more than one country? "As a man cannot serve two masters, so two nations may not claim a citizen's allegiance . . .
> It is certain that a 'double allegiance' cannot be tolerated in America. Subjects of European nations who come to this country, take the oath of allegiance to America and become naturalized citizens, cannot be allowed to acknowledge allegiance to any European nation. Such 'hyphenated citizens' would be dangerous in any country. Loyalty to America is expected of all."

The fact of being a citizen of a country involves rights and duties. As a man cannot serve two masters, so two nations may not claim a citizen's allegiance. What is the full meaning of section 26? It means that an individual cannot be a Canadian subject without being a British subject. This creates a dual nationality.

By this bill, the quality of Canadian citizenship is reserved to those who are willing to become British subjects with all the consequences of being subjects of another nation, with the obligations, duties and so on derived from it. If a newcomer—a Pole, Swiss, Ukrainian, Chinese, Frenchman, Belgian—chooses Canada as his new country to live in he cannot become a Canadian subject without accepting to become a British subject with all its consequent obligations. This is the meaning of section 26, and the Secretary of State when he spoke on October 22, admitted the fact. I quote his words as they appear in Hansard at page 1336:

> A person who is hereafter born a Canadian citizen will thereby also be a British subject. An alien who comes to Canada and is naturalized as a Canadian citizen will similarly become a British subject.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, gives as much importance to British nationality as it does to Canadian nationality. It submerges it in British nationality. An effect of double patriotism or double loyalty has been shown in the espionage investigation now in progress. The report of the royal commission refers to the fact that some of those accused have stated that they have a patriotism higher than their patriotism to Canada. The report of the commission says:

> In a case of this nature where evidence has revealed the existence of on organization, constituting at least a threat to the safety and interests of the state, as evidenced by the fact that some witnesses, holding strategic positions have made the significant statement under oath, that they had a loyalty which took priority over the loyalty owed by them to their own country, and for that reason they acted as they did, and would unquestionably have continued so to act, had they not been detected, we are of opinion that should these persons be allowed communication with outsiders or between themselves until their activities have been fully investigated, some of the basic purposes of this inquiry would be entirely defeated.

Can one find a better example of the consequences of having double loyalty? A British subject must serve the interests of Great Britain first, and a Canadian citizen must serve the interest of Canada first.

On October 12, 1937, at the Ritz-Carlton hotel in Montreal, on the occasion of the annual dinner of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, the late Lord Tweedsmuir, then Governor General of Canada, made the following declaration:

> Canada is a sovereign nation, and cannot take her attitude to the world docilely from Britain, or from the United States, or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British commonwealth of nations but to Canada, and Canada's king, and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

What the Governor General of Canada said was not the promulgation of a new idea. It was entirely in accord with the spirit and the letter of the statute of Westminster proclaimed in 1931.

It is the duty of a citizen of a country to promote the interest of his country first. His patriotism cannot be divided. In Canada the duty of a Canadian citizen is to promote the interest of Canada. But if a Canadian citizen is at the same time the subject of another country, he will have to promote the interest of both countries, and if those interests are in opposite ways, in what position would he be? That is why dual nationality cannot exist.

I come now to the third purpose; that is to say, to promote national unity. On October 22, the minister concluded his statement by saying:

> New Canadians should all be made to feel that they, like the rest of us, are Canadians, citizens of a great country . . . For the national unity of Canada, and for the future and greatness of this country, it is felt to be of utmost importance that all of us, new Canadians or old, have a consciousness of a common purpose and common interests as Canadians; that all of us be able to say with pride and say with meaning: "I am a Canadian citizen."

I agree entirely with that statement, but I ask the minister how he can create that spirit with this bill which means that a Canadian must serve two masters, that he must have a dual nationality with all the consequences. You will find that nowhere else. You will not find in the nationality act of any sovereign country such a provision as appears in section 26 of this bill which provides that a citizen of a country is the subject of another country.

I have here the Irish nationality and citizenship act—

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit me to observe that this bill does not provide that anyone shall be a subject of any country but this country. Under this bill we would not be a subject of the government of Great Britain. Being a British subject does not imply that at all.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): A moment ago I quoted the exact words of the minister when he spoke on October 22 last. He said that the moment a man became a Canadian citizen he became a British subject. He would then assume British nationality and would have to obey the laws of Great Britain because he is a British subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN: It does not mean that at all.

[Mr. M. Raymond.]

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I have here the Irish nationality and citizenship act of 1935. An Irish citizen is an Irish citizen or a naturalized Irish, and no more. The same applies to the American, the Mexican, the Swiss and the Belgian citizen. The population of Switzerland is composed of the people of three races, French, Italian and German. You do not call a Swiss a German citizen or a French citizen or an Italian citizen, you call him a Swiss citizen. An American is called an American; he is not called a German subject or an Italian subject or the subject of any other country.

Mr. MARTIN: Nor is a Canadian.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): He is referred to as an American and as a subject of America. How can we be proud of being a citizen of a country when we declare that we are only a particular type of citizen of another country? If we want to promote national unity in this country we must have one nationality, which is Canadian nationality, and not a dual or double nationality. There must be the one loyalty to our country and not a loyalty toward any other country.

What we are doing by this bill is to design, not a Canadian citizen but one type of British subject which will be called a Canadian citizen, like the citizens of Papua are one type of British subject. Unfortunately some are more British than Canadian and this bill as it is now framed would contribute to maintain the ambiguity and disunity.

In conclusion, I say that if this bill becomes law we shall not have a definition of Canadian citizenship that will be any more clear than the one we had before. We shall not have that symbol of nationhood which is lacking in Canada at the present time, as was stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he spoke in Winnipeg last May. Worse than that, we shall be taking a step backward. This bill adds little if anything to what we had already on our statute books and constitutes a renunciation of our sovereignty.

We are now in the year 1946. Since 1931 we have been recognized as a sovereign nation, equal in status with the United Kingdom. Before that date we did not have the powers which we now have. The Immigration Act of 1910, the Naturalization Act of 1914 and the Canadian Nationals Act of 1921 were passed before 1931, at a time when we practically had the status of a colony or the equivalent thereof and when we certainly had not the powers of an autonomous state. As a matter of fact our Naturalization Act of 1914 was passed to concur with the British Nationality Act of 1914. According to the statute of Westminster we were granted the power to repeal any existing act passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom in so far as the same was part of our laws, and also the power to make laws having extraterritorial operation.

Subsequently to the statute of Westminster the parliament of Ireland in 1935, exercising the powers of a sovereign state granted by the statute of Westminster, enacted the Irish nationality and citizenship act which is a real citizenship act. Under that act an Irish citizen is not called a British subject; he is a subject of Ireland. Section 33 of that act says:

> The British nationality and status of aliens act, 1914, and the British nationality and status of aliens act, 1918, if and so far as they respectively are or ever were in force in Saorstat Eireann, are hereby repealed.

Ireland exercised its power as a sovereign state, but what are we doing in Canada?

Mr. KNIGHT: Are you distinguishing between Ireland and Eire, which is the Irish Free State? If not, I think your argument would be much clearer if you would. Are you including the six Ulster counties in your statement?

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I am quoting from the statute of Ireland. On one side that is printed in Gaelic and on the other side it is printed in English. On the English side, instead of using the word "Ireland" they say "Saorstat Eireann".

Mr. KNIGHT: The south of Ireland would like to call themselves Ireland, but they have not yet reached that stage.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): They belong to the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. KNIGHT: Eire?

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Yes. What are we doing here in Canada? Under the smoke-screen of the title of this bill, "Canadian citizenship", which sounds very well, we are simply reenacting in other terms the same laws of colonial spirit which were already on our statute books. There is no sweeping change, as the minister said the other day, What was not objectionable in 1910 or 1915 or 1921, when we were not a sovereign nation, is now objectionable since the passage of the statute of Westminster in 1931 when we were officially recognized as a sovereign nation.

This bill, which recognizes that we have no distinct nationality, that we are purely and simply a particular class of British subject called a Canadian citizen, is the negation of our sovereignty; it is a renunciation of our sovereignty; it is a step backward. If we are worthy of being a nation we should be satisfied only with a nationality of our own, not one mixed with that of any other country. Far from being a symbol of nationhood, this bill as it now reads is a symbol of colonialism. I hope the Secretary of State will modify it. All we want is a real Canadian citizenship, a distinctive citizenship, not a mere shadow of Canadian citizenship. We are and we want to be purely and simply Canadian subjects. We want to inscribe in our statutes an act which will assure any suitable man coming into Canada that he will enjoy all the privileges of a Canadian citizen and that he will assume no other obligations than those which are due to his new country, Canada.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I think it is perfectly true to say that we have in the bill now before the house a measure which is generally acceptable to all parties in the house. There are certain aspects of this bill which I shall not hesitate to criticize, but I could not proceed without joining at the outset with my hon. friends in all parts of the chamber who welcome this occasion when the achievement of the status of citizenship by the Canadian people has finally been recognized.

I do not wish to detain the house unnecessarily, so at the outset I shall define the purpose of my remarks. What I have to say can be dealt with under three heads: first, the attributes of citizenship itself; second, citizenship in Canada with relation to the larger idea involved in the words "British subject"; and, third, the possible expansions and protection of citizenship in Canada.

With respect to the first of these, that is the attributes of citizenship, as I say, we have here a bill which finally recognizes the status of Canadian citizenship. At the same time it prescribes who may become citizens, and how, and what qualifications they must possess. This brings up the question of whether or not certain classes or groups of people should ever be barred from or admitted as groups to citizenship; and it is this problem which I propose to deal with first. There is such a group whose fate remains to be decided in Canada to-day. I refer to the Japanese in Canada. This problem has been raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), and no truer words were ever uttered than when he said that the problem must be settled before this bill becomes law. If the bill becomes law before the Japanese problem is settled it means that these people, having resided in Canada for more than five years, can make application to become citizens. Many of them have resided here for twenty, twenty-five, thirty and more years without becoming Canadian citizens. Consequently I feel we cannot allow this bill to afford an excuse by the government, as the hon. member for Vancouver South said, to yield to that pressure which is being applied to it by, I submit with all respect, uninformed and unenlightened groups in the country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A very small minority, too.

Mr. FULTON: The Japanese in Canada fall into two main groups, those born in Japan and entering Canada subsequently, and those born in Canada itself. The first group is further subdivided into those naturalized after their entry into Canada and those who have not yet been naturalized. It is the first group, that is those born in Japan and subsequently entering Canada, with which I propose to deal mainly this evening. It was mainly with this group that the orders in council passed last December dealt. Those orders in council have been reviewed by the hon. member for Vancouver South. They provide that Japanese nationals who had made application would be repatriated to Japan. That was the announced policy of the government on December 15. I might point out to the house here a matter which I think should receive explanation. That is that, of those who applied to go back, some 5,000 have not yet revoked their decision and the order for their deportation was not ruled invalid by the supreme court. I am very much interested in knowing why those 5,000 have not been already sent, and I should like particularly to hear that they have been sent before this bill becomes law.

The authorities for the orders in council themselves are contained actually in the War Measures Act and, since the first of this year, in the Emergency Powers Act. Most of the criticisms directed against the government for its policy are that this deportation is proposed to be carried out under order in council. It is represented to us that such a procedure is a horrible state of affairs; that to deprive people of their citizenship—that is the way it is put—by order in council, is a hideous crime. I submit to hon. members that this is not a true picture. Most of the people affected are not citizens of Canada; that is the first thing. They are not being deprived of their citizenship by order in council. I would be among the first to object to such a step. The second thing is that there exist on the statute books of this country many authorities, much legislation, giving authority to revoke naturalization by order in council. It is not a new thing dreamed up by somebody to deal with a new situation. There are on the statute books of this country to-day precedents for that sort of thing existing for many years.

I should like to refer to the Naturalization Act, chapter 138 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, which has been under discussion in connection with this bill. Section 9, summarized, reads as follows: The governor general shall by order revoke a certificate of naturalization in any case in which he is on the report of the minister satisfied that the person to whom the certificate was granted remains, according to the law of a state at war with His Majesty, a subject of that state. I cite that because we know for a fact that many of the Japanese who came to this country and had children born in this country registered those births at the Japanese consulate. The Japanese government made it compulsory for them to do so up to the year 1924; after that time it was optional with them to register their births at the Japanese consulate. We have heard a good deal here to-night about "dual nationality" and "dual citizenship"; but I submit to hon. members that there is a clear case where, the birth having been registered at the Japanese consulate, the child was a subject of Japan and therefore a subject of a state at war with His Majesty; and then, according to this statute, there exists all the authority which any minister could want for passing an order revoking naturalization and issuing an order for deportation.

In the same act we find section 10:

> Where a certificate of naturalization is revoked the governor in council may upon the recommendation of the minister by order direct that the wife and minor children, or any of them, of the person whose certificate is revoked shall cease to be British subjects, and any such person shall thereupon become an alien.

A great to-do is made, in these papers which have been referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South, as to the terrible thing which is being done to the wives and children of these people. I cite that section to show that there is authority on the statute books of this country for taking that action. I think hon. members and the people generally should bear this in mind also when dealing with this matter, that the weight of evidence is to the effect that many of the Japanese evicted by these orders of deportation were certainly not subjects or citizens, nor were they loyal Canadians. That being the case, there is nothing horrible, new or deceitful in passing these orders in council. As I say, I feel that the reason it is important to point this matter out is, to some extent, to combat the wave of hysteria and ill-considered agitation which is sweeping the country against these orders in council.

However, the orders have been questioned, and perhaps the method adopted need not have been followed. The Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) could have passed an order revoking the naturalization of every individual. There is a statute giving authority for such a procedure. But although the method has been criticized, presumably the government's attitude and policy are still the same. The policy has not been revoked, certainly not in such a manner as to be known to the people. That policy was announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and by my good friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who comes from British Columbia and who, in fact, is vitally concerned to see that the policy is carried out since his resignation is at stake, and I am not too sure about those vacancies in the senate. We are here in a most unusual role to-night—to offer assistance, even to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Labour, and to help them to carry out the policy. If they feel, however, that the matter is sub judice, that they cannot carry it out under the order in council, then I say that they should introduce a measure into this house. As a matter of fact, I feel that this house is the place where the whole question should be discussed and not only in Mr. Sandwell's paper, or by delegations appearing before the Prime Minister. It should be discussed in this house.

In this respect, as has been said before, I suggest that there are two things to which a member must give heed. First, he has to say what he feels to be right, and, second, he has to try to interpret what he thinks his constituents wish. Sometimes there may be a conflict between the two. If that conflict arises, then it is the member's duty still to say what he thinks to be right. At the next election he will be tried by his constituents. If they do not agree, well, we live in a democracy and that is the verdict of democracy. That is the correct way to go about the matter.

In this case, however, I find no such conflict. I believe that for certain reasons, namely, because the Japanese are not assimilable and by their actions they have shown that they were not loyal Canadian subjects, as evidenced by registration of births at the Japanese consulate, and many other actions which they perpetrated after the war broke out with Japan, as well as for a number of reasons which have been summarized in this house before, they should be sent away, and I believe that my constituents feel the same way. They do not like them and they do not want them. The people of British Columbia do not want to have them, and we are willing to present our case to the House of Commons, have the matter discussed here and have an act passed in this highest court of the land, higher than the Supreme Court of Canada, so that if it is the verdict of the Canadian people that our case is justified, the Japanese can be deported.

I felt it important to deal with that question because it involves a matter which is vital to the ideal of Canadian citizenship.

I should like next to deal with the question of Canadian citizenship as it affects all Canadians, and particularly as it is connected with the question of citizenship within the empire. I listened carefully to the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret), and as I followed what he said it occurred to me that he—and very probably the same is true of a good many of those whom I may call his compatriots on the other side of the house—is proceeding under a misconception of what is involved in the words "British subject". It seems to me that the hon. member by his attitude showed that he felt that the words "British subject" mean that a person who is a British subject owes allegiance to the country, Great Britain. That is to say, that he is in some respects and in some manner a subject of England. That is what I thought was in the hon. member's mind, and it was that which, I believed, caused him to oppose and to criticize bitterly section 26 which states that a Canadian citizen is a British subject. He said in so many words as I recall them, that a Canadian citizen should owe allegiance to the empire through the crown and not owe allegiance to the crown through Great Britain. Those, I believe, were substantially the words he used in one passage. To my mind, that proves conclusively that the hon. gentleman feels that being a British subject, as the words are used in this act, means being a subject of Great Britain.

Let us analyse what is involved in being a British subject. I submit that it means nothing more or less than being a citizen of the British empire. A citizen of the British empire may be a citizen of Australia, or New Zealand, or Canada, or South Africa, or the United Kingdom. We are all citizens of the empire, citizens of the commonwealth, and we are all equal. If hon. members have anything to say I should be glad if they would speak up.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: What about India?

Mr. FULTON: India is not a member of the British commonwealth.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: A subject race.

Mr. FULTON: I am referring to the commonwealth. Being citizens of the British commonwealth, we do, all of us, owe that allegiance to the crown which even the hon. member for Outremont was prepared to concede. But in my mind that does not detract, nor in the minds of any of the hon. gentlemen in the group immediately to your left, Mr. Speaker, does that detract from our status, our qualities as Canadian citizens. It simply means that we have all the advantages of citizenship in a larger and more widespread world organization as well. We are citizens of Canada, subjects of His Majesty, and we are citizens of the British commonwealth.

To substantiate my argument I should like briefly to outline the status of British subject as it was instituted in the act of 1914. In 1914, as the outcome of an imperial conference, an act was passed in the British House of Commons defining the status of British subject and defining also the status of aliens and, to some extent, outlining the procedure by which an alien could become naturalized and become a British subject. It was therein provided that if a certain part of the act was adopted in member countries of the commonwealth, then those countries had the right to create British subjects, and that a British subject created in any one of those countries would be a British subject in every one of the other countries. In other words, we had what was the first step toward a world citizenship. I believe it is illuminating to look briefly at the relevant statutes to find the situation in other parts of the empire, and it is significant to note that no other part of the empire is doing what Canada is seeking to do by this bill. I shall come in a moment to my first main criticism of the bill, that although the bill seeks to retain the status of British subject for a Canadian citizen and that is good, yet in section 10 the world connotation of the status is swept aside because it is provided that a British subject would have to be naturalized all over again in Canada. That is not the case in any other part of the empire . One might say, "Once a British subject, always a British subject." If he is created a British subject in Canada he can go to Australia and become a citizen without becoming naturalized, because he is a British subject.

Let me refer to New Zealand. In the debates in 1928 when the principle to which I have referred, "Once a British subject, always a British subject", was being adopted in that country, the Right Hon. Sir. Francis Bell, on moving second reading of the bill adopting the Act of 1914, said, as reported at page 937 of the New Zealand Parliamentary Debates:

[Mr. Archibald.]

The main point that we insisted upon was this: that a foreigner—

Mark this, a foreigner, not necessarily a natural-born British subject but even a foreigner—

—who had acquired the right of British citizenship acquired the right of entry of his name on the electoral roll, his residence in New Zealand for a year qualified him for this. We deny it to no British subject.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They keep it white.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They do not have any Japanese.

Mr. FULTON: They keep it white, apparently, but it is done under their immigration act. They restrict immigrants, but I understand they granted the status of British subject to Samoans who are not white.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They have no C.C.F. either.

Mr. FULTON: That makes it a lot easier for them. I continue with the quotation. At page 938 he said:

I never denied at any time the attraction of the adoption of the principle of a Britannic citizenship—the right to say, "I am a citizen of the British empire."

That is how New Zealand looks at the matter. As I said, I examined the statutes of Australia, and I could find there no provision similar to that which is sought to be introduced into Canada by this bill, namely, that a British subject coming from any other part of the empire would have to be naturalized all over again.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit me to correct him or to make my point? I am sure he will. A non-Canadian British subject coming to Canada does not in any circumstance lose his status as a British subject; this bill does not interfere with the status at all of British subjects, under such circumstances.

Mr. FULTON: I cannot accept that for a moment, Mr. Speaker. What are we interested in? We are interested in citizenship. We want everybody who comes to Canada to be a citizen.

Mr. PROBE: No, you do not.

Mr. FULTON: I want every suitable person who comes to Canada to be a citizen. Before a person coming into Canada under this bill can become a citizen he has to go through a naturalization process, no matter what his status.

Mr. MARTIN: That does not mean he loses his status as a British subject.

Mr. FULTON: What value is his status as a British subject if he has to go through naturalization to become a Canadian citizen? I shall deal further with this point as I go along, because I wish to deal with it at some length. This concept of being a British subject is, in my view, as I have said, the only approach that we have yet had to the idea of a world citizenship, a common citizenship throughout the world. Up to the present time it is to be found only in the British empire.

In support of my general thesis I should like to cite the present Prime Minister in a statement made in 1920 when he was leader of the opposition. On March 16, 1920, one of the peace treaties came up for ratification. There was submitted by the Borden government to the house at that time a resolution advocating ratification of this treaty by Canada. Among the reasons submitted was that Canada had achieved national status and that her signature as a nation was required to this treaty. On that occasion the then leader of the opposition took over an hour to deal with the question of Canada's status as a nation and to show that this was not a thing that was achieved overnight by the then administration but had been a growth ever since 1867, just as we have said that this status of Canadian citizenship is not a thing achieved overnight, but has been a growth ever since 1867. It is something which must be preserved and fostered and should not be allowed to be detracted from by diminishing our status as world citizens. This is what the leader of the opposition said at that time as reported at page 473 of Hansard:

> We believe . . . that it is possible for the British empire to become, as regards the league of nations, a league within a league, if you like, for the preservation of freedom amongst the different nations of the world. That position will be maintained by the attitude of conference and cooperation.

Mr. BRACKEN: Who was the leader of the opposition at that time?

Mr. FULTON: The leader of the opposition at that time was the right hon. gentleman who is Prime Minister at the present time.

What I have in mind is that to-day we hear a great deal about the necessity for the concept of world citizenship. As I have said, the only approach we have so far in this world to-day is this common citizenship which we have in the British empire. I repeat that under section 10 the common citizenship which we have is rendered valueless in so far as it concerns a British subject coming from any part of the empire into Canada. I realize that the minister disagrees with me. Perhaps we cannot reach agreement on that point. I leave it to the hon. mmbers and to the country to decide.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit me? I am sorry to have to interrupt, but this is an important matter. I know the hon. gentleman is trying to give it his best study, but I would not want it to go out that if a non-Canadian British subject comes into this country and does not take advantage of section 10 he thereby ceases to be a British subject. Once he comes into this country as a British subject he remains a British subject, whether or not he takes out citizenship in this country. Surely that is the fact.

Mr. FULTON: I suppose it cannot be denied that this bill does not contain any provision revoking the status of a non-Canadian British subject coming into this country, saying that he shall cease to be a British subject. But, after all, the thing which this bill is directed toward is the establishment and clarification of the status of Canadian citizenship. In doing that it says that any person coming into this country who wants to become a Canadian citizen must be naturalized. It makes no exception in the case of a British subject. Therefore a British subject who wishes to become a Canadian citizen must be naturalized.

The minister has not yet said, in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), whether it is intended to make the franchise hinge on becoming a Canadian citizen. I submit it is quite proper and would be quite proper, and I think it is inherent in the minister's remarks, for him to say that the status of citizenship will from now on determine all our civil rights, and that a person must be a Canadian citizen. Although the minister has not said that, all his colleagues behind him who have so far spoken on this said that everybody must become Canadian citizens.

Mr. MARTIN: You must not put into my mouth words I did not say. This is a difficult matter, and one should not overgeneralize. I made no such remark. When we come to deal with the section I shall deal with the question the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) put to me the other day, but which the Speaker, relying on the rules of the house, precluded me from answering.

Mr. FULTON: I admit that the minister has not yet said it, and I ask him to do me the courtesy of not accusing me of putting words into his mouth, when I was careful not to do that; I said the minister had not yet said it.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sorry; I would not be discourteous to anybody.

Mr. FULTON: To get on with my point, it is this. At present we have an empire citizenship. A Canadian citizen who is a British subject can go to any other part of the empire and become a citizen of that part by virtue of the fact that he is a British subject. By this bill we in Canada are seeking at one stroke to cut away that world-wide aspect of the status of a British subject, because a British subject who comes here is no longer automatically a citizen. He is not and cannot be a citizen until he becomes naturalized.

Mr. MARTIN: He is not now a citizen automatically and this has been the law for twenty-five years. Under the existing act a non-Canadian British subject—

Mr. FULTON: I do not wish to be discourteous, but at the moment it is obvious that the minister and I cannot agree on this point.

Mr. MARTIN: May I say—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member has given me permission to say this, Mr. Speaker. Under the present law the non-Canadian British subject must reside in Canada for five years before becoming a citizen under the Immigration Act. That has been the law of the land for over twenty-five years, in this and practically every dominion of the commonwealth—before he can acquire domicile under the Canadian Immigration Act, which is the only existing definition of citizenship in this country.

Mr. FULTON: I do not mind allowing the minister to ask a question, but when he proceeds to make a speech and to quote the Immigration Act when I am referring to the electoral act and the right to vote and the right to be a citizen, then I must say I cannot allow the minister to go on any longer. I am talking about the essence of citizenship; I cannot be any clearer than that, and I submit that it will be denied to a British subject when this bill becomes law. At one stroke, by one arrant gesture of isolationism, Canada is throwing aside and cutting down the one approach that has yet been made to a world citizenship.

An hon. MEMBER: Beating a dead horse!

Mr. FULTON: I am not beating the C.C.F. yet; then I would be beating a dead horse.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The third subject to which I wish to address myself briefly to-night is the question of the enlargement or expansion of Canadian citizenship. Here I should like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who first brought this subject to my attention at least and who, I think, has taken the lead in bringing it to the attention of this house and of the country generally. He has brought to the attention of the house in a most forceful manner all through the years he has been here the dangerous threats to our citizenship and to our liberty which are inherent in the present trend of government. Speaking in this house on this bill a day or two ago he said he felt that the minister should proceed further. He has now introduced a bill which seeks to clarify the status of Canadian citizenship, and the hon. member felt the minister should go further and that he or some member of the government should introduce a bill of rights which would safeguard forever the privileges which are ours when we acquire Canadian citizenship.

I submit that the time has come when this country does need a bill of rights. I do not want to labour the point, but we have heard a great deal about a forgotten order in council. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) rose in their places and told us that an order in council had been passed. We heard them describe their reluctance to accept that order in council, which infringed upon the rights of Canadians, and we heard them say that after it had been passed they forgot it. Some journalist—this is not an original expression with me—permitted himself to wonder—and I just say I share his amazement, since these two powerful individuals were so opposed to the passage of that order in council—just who it was got around them and persuaded them to pass it. Perhaps, this journalist said, it was the office boy. Well, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is time we had a bill of rights which would safeguard us against the malevolent influences of office boys, if that is the way this country is run.

On the general subject, we have heard a great deal about citizenship. It is a magnificent concept and one which I submit is worth safeguarding. Human experience shows that we are apt to forget the lessons of the struggle for liberty; that liberty rests so easily on the shoulders of the people, is so welcome, so acceptable, that the necessity for constant watchfulness to preserve it is easily forgotten. Therefore it seems that we should take every precaution to make sure that we can wear safely and lightly that mantle of liberty, that cloak which is ours by virtue of our citizenship. We should safeguard it by introducing a bill of rights.

Finally, I wish to leave this thought with the house. I should have liked to conclude my remarks with a few words in French, but I did not actually expect to speak this evening, and I do not yet trust myself to speak in French to this distinguished chamber without first preparing my remarks. But I should like in closing to leave this thought with the house, that the first and perhaps still the greatest Canadian was the man who united Canada in confederation, 1867. The next great Canadian will be the man who truly reunites Canada at any time in the future.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Much that has been said on this subject has been very interesting to me, and some of it practically fascinating, but it is perhaps unfortunate that whenever an important measure of this kind comes before this house the discussion seems to overflow into all sorts of by-paths and side-lines which really have nothing to do with the measure. I would not want to interfere with anyone's right to express an opinion, nor would I take any exception to opinions expressed, but I respectfully submit that much of the discussion we heard to-night was not on the bill; it was not even on the beam.

I do not believe there is anything sinister or omnious about this bill. It has not been sprung upon us suddenly, as last night some hon. gentleman said another measure was sprung on us. This bill was introduced in very much the same form last year, and hon. members have had an opportunity of studying it and carefully considering its implications ever since last fall. I do not always agree with the government; more often than not I disagree. This time I think the minister is to be complimented on the work he has done. I believe this bill is something the people of this country have wanted. I have no hesitation in expressing my approval of it, and I think the same can be said of all hon. members of our group, because it happens that a Canadian citizenship was one of the things we included in our party platform. Therefore we feel that we have a mandate from the people who sent us here, to support such a measure. But even if there were not I would still feel it is the general opinion of the people of Canada that there is no harm at the present time—and certainly there are great possibilities of good—in having on the statute books something which will give us officially an opportunity to call ourselves Canadians in every respect. I do not see anything there to quarrel about.

There may be details that will have to be changed. I believe that the hon. member who sits in front of me has some amendments which he will propose when we get into committee. But we are now speaking to the principle of the bill, and I believe that principle is one which is acceptable to all sides of the house.

I do not think we should engage in histrionics or emotional outbursts in respect of measures which require as much cooperation and unity as we say this one does. I want particularly to compliment the officials who drew up the bill, and also the minister, upon having included in it a provision for instruction and education in citizenship. I believe that if these provisions are carried out properly and if sufficient money is appropriated to make it possible to do this work, with a view to impressing upon those who are becoming naturalized just what privileges and rights are involved and, what is more important, the responsibilities which go with citizenship, that will be money and time well spent.

This is something which has been needed for a long time. I also suggest to the minister and the house that in future it might be wise to provide all immigrants with a pamphlet setting out in an understandable form the status of aliens. They must understand their position, and a pamphlet of that kind would help keep them out of trouble, and help them to appreciate the advantages, responsibilities and privileges of citizenship. It would help them along that road from the status of alien to that of citizen, step by step. The immigrant would be able to compare his position upon entry into the country with that far more advantageous position he can ocupy if he makes an effort toward improving his position.

I would also suggest that in future we make greater use of our facilities for adult education. I am referring particularly to rural and semi-rural areas, where most of the immigration finds its way. I can say from experience that in those areas there are many schoolteachers who would be only too happy to provide evening classes for immigrant children and adults so that they might have the first elements and rudiments of democracy, citizenship, and the Canadian way of life.

I have had some practical experience in that respect. I taught in a district where there was a group of immigrants, and during a couple of winters I conducted classes in which adult education was taught. I can assure the house that not only was it advantageous to them, but it was a great education to me to have an opportunity to interpret to them the Canadian way of life. In that way I got a better appreciation of it myself.

In concluding, let me say that if we are to reach that stage of unity which all seem so anxious to attain, I believe we shall do it best and most effectively by emphasizing in the house those things we have in common, rather than those which seem to divide us. It is for that reason that I was not very happy while the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was speaking this evening. I should not like to say anything that would offend him, because I have great admiration for his ability. I felt, however, that during part of his speech he was getting into territory that did not bring any advantage to this discussion or to the political group with which he is affiliated.

In particular, he attempted to make a case against people who have resided in this country for twenty years or more, who have been granted citizenship or naturalization without having to have a knowledge of English or French. I would be the last to suggest that they should not be motivated toward learning either of the two official languages; or, still better, both of them. But with respect, may I submit to him, that there are people in Canada, some of whom I know personally, who have contributed a great deal to the development of this country, but who have had no opportunity to learn either of the official languages.

For instance, I know a lady—and now she is fairly old—who sent six of her sons to the last war. Most of them did not come back. She does not know how to speak either English or French. Would the hon. member for Vancouver South say that she is not entitled to vote, after that sacrifice and that contribution to Canada? Her case could be multiplied by the hundreds, probably by the thousands, and I suggest that before we take a narrow or intolerant view, we should take careful thought, lest we offend far more people than we have dreamed of.

I am not accusing the hon. member; I am simply pointing out that if we want unity and cooperation we must be prepared to go at least half way.

On motion of Mr. Fleming the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

EXCHANGE OF NOTES

UNITED STATES-CANADA—AGREEMENT RESPECTING DEFENCE FACILITIES AND EQUIPMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table an exchange of notes between the United States of America and Canada constituting an agreement on the subject of war surpluses and related matters. In relation thereto I should like to make the following statement.

Both the United States government and our own have found it advantageous to simplify the procedure followed hitherto in disposing of defence facilities and equipment provided in Canada by the United States. They have therefore agreed that Canada shall pay the United States $12,000,000 (U.S.) in return for which there is transferred to the Canadian government a long list of defence facilities and equipment, the original cost of which was approximately $59,000,000 (U.S.).

These installations and materials include items related to the Alaska highway and the northwest staging route, to weather stations in northeastern Canada, movable property reported to War Assets Corporation under an earlier agreement, but not sold, and certain naval and air equipment which had been provided by the United States to the United Kingdom under lend-lease and which, when returned to United States account, remained in Canada. The price paid is a reasonable one, in view of the usefulness of many of these installations and materials to the armed forces and other agencies of government, and the agreement is regarded by both governments as a satisfactory settlement of a property disposal problem which otherwise might have been long drawn out and complicated.

There is an additional aspect of the exchange of notes which is important.

In order to provide equipment necessary for the training programmes of the Canadian armed forces, the United States government will endeavour to make available, surplus military type equipment up to a maximum value of $7,000,000 (U.S.). The agreement calls for negotiation between the two governments as to quantities and prices and will enable the Canadian armed forces to obtain much of the training equipment that they will require at figures considerably less than would be the case if orders had to be placed with manufacturers for new equipment.

Mr. BRACKEN: In connection with this adjustment, I understood the Prime Minister to say that there were included therein certain items relating to the Alaska highway. I was under the impression that that matter had been closed some time previously. Perhaps the Prime Minister would clear up the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Items related to the Alaska highway" are the words I used: "These installations and materials include items related to the Alaska highway and the northwest staging route." I cannot give my hon. friend further particulars at the moment. I will look into his question and if there is additional information I will give it later.

[Later:]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just been informed by the Minister of Justice that what is referred to as matters related to the Alaska highway is in the nature of building equipment and the like. The highway was to be turned over to the Canadian system of highways but the Americans were to have the right to take away building equipment and other materials they have been using.

Mr. MAYHEW:

By voluntary arrangement between the chartered banks and the Minister of Finance, the banks have agreed that their holdings of dominion government domestic bonds (including guaranteed issues) will not average more than 90 per cent of the amount of their Canadian savings deposits (i. e., their notice deposits other than balances of corporations).
2. No.

2. No information (not yet declared surplus.)
3. Federal government departments, provincial government departments and municipalities including educational institutions, in this order, will be given an opportunity to purchase these buildings. When these priority applications have been met the remaining buildings will be advertised for sale by tender.

REGIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD FOR QUEBEC—PAUL EMILE MARQUETTE

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Was Paul Emile Marquette of Montreal recommended for appointment to the Regional War Labour Board by the Canadian Congress of Labour?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

2. Has the Canadian Congress of Labour requested the removal of Mr. Marquette from this position? If so, what action has been taken?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

2. Yes. In February last the Canadian congress of labour requested that Mr. Marquette be removed from the Quebec regional war labour board.

On March 5, 1946, an official communication was received by the department from the Canadian congress of labour nominating Mr. T. Prezeau to replace Mr. Marquette.

On March 8 a unanimous resolution, which had been passed by the Quebec regional war labour board on February 26, was received from the board to the effect: "that Mr. Marquette should be maintained in office as a member of the regional war labour board, first, because of the lengthy experience he has had in dealing with matters pertaining to the control of wages—besides that which he has acquired since he is with the board—also because of the fairness and impartiality he has always displayed in the judgment of the applications which up to now have been presented to the board".

On March 12 the department notified the Quebec regional board that the Canadian congress of labour urged that Mr. Marquette be replaced.

The Quebec board was organized by agreement between the government of the province of Quebec and the dominion government. The necessity, therefore, for consultation between the parties in this matter will be appreciated.

On April 2 the names of Messrs. T. Prezeau, J. E. Corbeil and J. M. Bedard were submitted to the department by the congress for consideration.

On the same date, April 2, these three names were telegraphed to Honourable Antonio Barrette, Minister of Labour for Quebec, requesting that he indicate his choice.

On April 3 the regional war labour board for Quebec wrote the department repeating its recommendation of February 26 that Mr. Marquette be retained on the board for the reason that "his integrity and experience have proved to be most valuable to the regional board".

On April 3 Honourable Mr. Barrette wrote the department suggesting the appointment of Mr. J. M. Bedard to the Quebec regional war labour board.

On April 8 the dominion Minister of Labour had a telephone conversation with the Quebec Minister of Labour and the latter made it clear that he wished to have Mr. J. M. Bedard appointed a member of the Quebec regional war labour board in place of Mr. Marquette.

Steps are therefore being taken to revoke the order in council appointing Mr. Marquette a member of the board and to recommend to the cabinet council that Mr. Bedard be named as his successor.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WAR ASSETS—MATERIALS FOR VOCATIONAL TRAINING AND EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. FRASER:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents in the possession of the Department of Reconstruction and the War Assets Corporation relative to the gift or sale to educational bodies in Canada for vocational training and educational instruction, of any machine tools, equipment, motion picture projectors, typewriters, hand tools and other material.

Mr. McILRAITH: The information sought to be produced by this motion as it stands is of such length that it would require several filing cabinets to hold it. I have discussed the matter with the mover and he has agreed to place a question on the order paper which will, I believe, give him the information that he desires. I ask that the motion be dropped.

Mr. FRASER: I will drop the motion and put a question on the order paper in a different way, Mr. Speaker, with your permission.

Motion dropped.

CANADIAN FORCES—WITHDRAWAL OF OCCUPATIONAL FORCES FROM GERMANY

Mr. PEARKES:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Prime Minister and/or the Minister of External Affairs of Canada with the Prime Minister and/or the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs or any other member of the cabinet of Great Britain, relative to the withdrawal of the Canadian army occupational forces from Germany.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Correspondence of this kind is, according to long standing precedent, privileged. I would ask the hon. member not to press for it, because it would not be possible to meet his wishes at present.

Mr. PEARKES: Statements have been made in the British House of Commons which would indicate that the agreement to withdraw these troops was of a unilateral character and against the wishes of the authorities in Great Britain. There is a good deal of feeling about this in the country. If the Prime Minister is unable to produce all the papers, perhaps he could produce sufficient to clear up the matter, or he may be prepared to make a statement with regard to the reasons behind the withdrawal of this force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt the matter will come up when the Minister of Defence is dealing with his estimates or at some other appropriate moment. I know the minister will be only too ready to make a statement at that time.

Motion dropped.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

AVAILABILITY TO ALL PERSONS OF CERTAIN RESIDENCE OR BIRTH QUALIFICATIONS

On the order:

Mr. Castleden—the following proposed resolution:—That, in the opinion of this house, it is in the best interests of Canada to establish a distinctive Canadian citizenship, which shall be available to all persons of certain residence or birth qualifications within the dominion.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Stand.

Mr. MARTIN: This matter should hardly be allowed to stand. It is now before the house in the form of a bill. Under the rules of the house I believe this motion should be dropped.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Speaking of the procedure in that regard, I might say that last year I had practically an identical motion on the order paper and I dropped it because a bill having to do with the matter was introduced in the house. But the bill received only first reading and was then dropped from the order paper. I prefer to have this motion stand until the bill is passed.

Mr. COLDWELL: Stand until then.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The rules of the house are quite clear in this matter.

Motion dropped.

WATER CONSERVATION

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO QUESTIONS AFFECTING SASKATCHEWAN RIVER WATERSHED

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of introducing legislation during this session to set up a permanent interprovincial board or commission on which the three prairie provinces and the dominion would have equal representation under the chairmanship of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or some other qualified person, to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the matters referred to in the resolution are of such tremendous importance to the three western provinces as well as to all of Canada, that I hope out of this debate much good will result to the country generally. The whole economy of the western provinces is threatened by the presence of areas which may be described as arid or semi-arid, or, better still perhaps, as desert and semi-desert; and unless immediate steps are taken to reclaim these areas the consequences to the western provinces will be disastrous. I hope those who take part in the debate may bring home to the people of the three prairie provinces a keen conception of the situation as it exists to-day; and I hope proper emphasis will be given to the lowering of the water plane of the three western provinces. which is one of the main causes of these arid areas. I trust that the business men and financial interests of eastern Canada will take an active part in trying to reclaim these areas, because as a former eastern business man I am convinced that unless these desert and semi-desert areas of the west are reclaimed, the eastern companies will have great difficulty in maintaining their present position, let alone bringing about any expansion.

I should like to give just two examples of what is resulting from our failure to reclaim these areas. I believe the census is taken in the western provinces about every five years, whereas the census for all Canada is taken every ten years. Between the taking of the census of 1935 and the time war broke out in 1939, the population of the great central province of Saskatchewan dropped by some forty thousand persons. In my opinion that was a major disaster to Canada. Then in January last, on my way west, in a report issued either by the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Trade and Commerce, I saw an announcement that in 1945, notwithstanding the fact that the farmers received substantial prices for what they had to sell, the returns to the farmers of the three prairie provinces were $186,000,000 less than those of 1944. That is another problem of major proportions, because if additional crops to the value of $186,000,000 had been produced the difference would have more than paid for the programme I have in view in this connection. I hope every hon. member of the house will take note of those two striking figures; a loss of population of 40,000 souls in Saskatchewan alone from 1935 to 1939, and a loss through drought, principally in Saskatchewan, of $186,000,000 in 1945 as compared with 1944. In my judgment these are staggering figures.

The only antidote for arid or semi-arid areas, or desert and semi-desert conditions, is water. Nothing else can reclaim such areas. A few days ago in an engineering article I read that deserts do not stand still, that they can be reclaimed by water but that if water is not applied, they march on. This article went on to say that what had been the great city of Timbuktu in north Africa is threatened with destruction by the continuing march of the Sahara desert toward the south west, and that already it has been partly destroyed. So our objective should be not only to reclaim but to try to arrest any expansion of these desert conditions.

Now may I say just a word about the resolution. It divides itself into four parts. I must confess that it could have been much better worded, but I suppose the ministry will have no difficulty in accepting the first division, namely that immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of introducing legislation during this session. As a matter of fact I am very happy to say that the estimates for this year contain the sum of $10,000,000 for this work, which is a substantial start toward reclamation. I believe that $10,000,000 can be divided up among several projects, and I shall deal with that later.

The second division has to do with the setting up of an interprovincial-federal board. Recently when I was in the west I discussed this whole problem with every engineer with whom I came in contact—city engineers, government engineers, and general engineers. At that time I had in mind that we might have in Canada something similar to the Tennessee Valley Authority in the United States, with which I am very well acquainted. What they have done is revolutionary in regard to expanding the economy of the seven states through which the Tennessee river flows. At the time I thought we would have to set up some such authority here. However, I must confess that I am quite pleased with what the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has done, and I have great confidence in the director of that organization, Hon. George Spence. However, the P.F.R.A. legislation, which I believe was enacted in 1935, does not take in the whole of the area. It does not include northwestern Alberta or northeastern Manitoba, both of which would come under any project of the magnitude of that I have in view. However, I have no doubt the government can expand the control of P.F.R.A., and if they should so decide, well and good.

The next division of the resolution pertains to the participation of the provinces. The states do not participate in the T.V.A. set-up; the United States government has financed the whole undertaking.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you can do anything to bring about a little better order. We cannot hear the hon. member at all down here; others are speaking almost as loudly as he is.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had in view the participation of the provinces in suggesting a separate board. I cannot conceive of works of this magnitude being carried on without the consent and perhaps assistance of the three western provinces, and I can see no reason why they should not participate and why their participation would not be helpful. Of course I am not going to tell the minister what he should do; he will use his own judgment in that regard. I merely point out in my resolution that to include the provinces in these works in my judgment would be beneficial.

In my reference to the chairmanship of the proposed board I had in mind one whose decisions would inspire the utmost confidence throughout the country. I have suggested a judge of the supreme court, but I have noted a good deal of opposition to the appointment of judges to boards. If the government decided that the chief engineer in the department, the chief engineer under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, or the director thereof, in whom, as I said a minute ago, I have great confidence, would be suitable, I should have no quarrel with that decision. When I suggest the appointment of a judge I am not offering something which could not be altered.

The provinces are already acting. Each of the three western provinces has sent engineers —I am not sure whether they have sent their chief engineers, but information to this effect appeared in the press. Those engineers, meeting in Regina, have formed themselves into a small board. They cannot act, of course, because the Saskatchewan is a navigable river. I am sure however that their participation in the matter of western rehabilitation and conservation could not be other than helpful.

In the latter part of the resolution I refer to the conservation of water and the utilization of the eastern watershed in the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river. I shall proceed from that point, because it is with that matter I wish to deal particularly.

I have made as careful a survey as was within my power, both by foot and on horseback, of a considerable portion of the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains. I learned—I was going to say with horror, because what I saw affected me in that way—about great acreages of fine timberland which had been burned. I learned that for years a minimum of 30,000 acres each year have been destroyed by fire. In consultation with engineers in the west I learned, and I have reason to believe what I was told, that the destruction of 30,000 acres a year in the foothills of the Rocky mountains, timber which had retarded the run-off of the snows and water in the spring so that it was retained in a manner which permitted its flowing down the river more evenly, had a disastrous effect on the glaciers.

I have not sufficient technical knowledge about these matters to check on that information, but I was told by two outstanding engineers that the great forest fires on the slopes of the Rocky mountains, through the process of hurling soot on the glaciers, retarded the accumulation of those glaciers, with the result that they have shrunk to a considerable degree. I can see nothing but disaster to the west if those glaciers shrink appreciably. Of course it would take a long time to bring this about—perhaps not in our time—but I do urge it is our duty, to the extent of our ability, to protect the generations which will follow us. One of the protections we could afford would be the preservation of the watershed of the Saskatchewan river, through the protection of the glaciers. A step in that direction would mean the restoration of vast areas of foothill forests which have been destroyed by fire, and every effort made to prevent future fires in the foothills of the Rocky mountains would be worth while.

As to the conservation of water, might I point out that I have been up and down all the important parts of the river, from its mouth to its source in the mountains. I travelled up as far as I could go, to view the Columbia glacier. In company with engineers I have seen many splendid sites for reservoirs. P.F.R.A. has issued some instructive maps and excellent reports which indicate that on the source rivers of the Saskatchewan there are about thirty-six splendid sites for reservoirs, some of which are large. I have in mind two which I inspected, one called the Whirlpool and the other the Gap. The Gap was located not far from Nordegg in Alberta, and the Whirlpool also in Alberta but much closer to the Banff-Jasper highway. Both these sites are large, each one capable of conserving about 380,000 acre feet of water. That is a lot of water, Your Honour. If one adds to those two the other thirty-four reservoir sites, he might well be convinced that we have ample opportunity in the source rivers of the Saskatchewan for this type of work. I have in mind rivers like the Castle, Old Man, Waterton, St. Mary's, High, Bow, Brazeau, Clearwater and Mistaya. One reaches all those rivers when making a survey.

So far as I can estimate all those reservoir sites on the head waters are sufficient to store approximately 10 million acre feet of water. That, too, is a lot of water.

In addition, along the main river there are many excellent sites. As hon. members are aware, the main river has two great branches, the North Saskatchewan and the South Saskatchewan. In consultation with engineers, and after inspecting as thoroughly as is possible by a layman—that is, outside of digging down below the water line—I can say that the site near the Riverhurst area, if it were developed by the construction of a dam 175 feet high, would back the river up 100 miles. And I am satisfied the average width of water at the top water level would be not less than three-quarters of a mile. One can figure by taking the top 50 feet of that reach that he would have available 2,500,000 acre feet of storage. I have seen other excellent sites, just as good as the one at Riverhurst. If one were to limit himself to only four such sites—and there are many more—he would have another ten million acre feet of storage. In other words, from what I have seen of the river and its source branches, there are reservoir sites capable of conserving twenty million acre feet of water.

When I think of the priceless necessity for water in western Canada, and think that almost every drop runs to the sea without giving any advantage to those great provinces —with the exception, of course, of what is done in southwestern Alberta—I feel that we are confronted with nothing short of a tragedy. I am not blaming anyone for this. I know the country has a big load to carry, and that it cannot go ahead faster than it can secure the money for purposes of development. But let me point out—and I shall develop this later on—that these projects are self-liquidating and in reality cost the country nothing.

For instance, let us consider what has been done in recent years in India. One often thinks of India as a backward country. It is far from that. Within the last few years in the province of Sind a very great irrigation work has been created. Water is stored behind the Sarda dam, and the main canals running from that point are 4,177 miles in length. Just try to imagine any canal in this country to equal that. Then let us ask ourselves how we compare with India. We will remember that in our childhood we read, times without number, about the tremendous loss of life in the Punjab, and the province of Sind, because of drought. In the province of Sind, behind the Lloyd dam, they have backed up sufficient water to irrigate five and a half million acres. In the Punjab they have their great irrigation works which irrigate millions of acres of land. They have worked on the basis, and rightfully so, that these are self-liquidating projects which will pay for themselves and which will save millions of lives in that country. When I think of what I have observed in the west and what the people in the western provinces have come through, my heart bleeds. I am going to stay with this business as long as I am in public life. I am going to advocate the completion of these projects which will restore that western country.

When the house rose in December I was planning several trips. One was to Arizona to make a further study of the great Roosevelt dam and the Salt river irrigation works associated with it. Any one who has been in Arizona will have observed the vast transformation that has taken place in that formerly cactus-ridden state because of these irrigation works. The magnificent city of Phoenix has grown up where formerly nothing but cactus grew. It is a beautiful city of about 150,000 people. Just fancy the returns to the United States from the production in that area, from sales tax and income tax from a city like Phoenix. It is a self-liquidating project which will not cost the country anything.

I was considering going to the west, although I was a little afraid of the winter—but I should not have been afraid, because I learned afterward that the winters there are delightful. I like the winters in the west and I am planning to go there again in the winter time. The fact was that I had never seen the Saskatchewan river in the winter. I have seen it at other times of the year, when it was in flood and when it was in half-flood. I realize that the Saskatchewan river is not comparable to many other large rivers because its water resources are comparably not as large. But the Almighty has provided enough water to take care of any of the requirements of the three western provinces.

I have seen that river when it was flowing at not less than 100,000 cubic feet per second and when it was flowing at the rate of about 10,000 cubic feet per second. I am referring to the river east of the junction of the two main rivers, the North Saskatchewan, and South Saskatchewan. But I had not seen it in the winter time so I visited the river at several points during the winter season, this year. I spent some time examining it at Saskatoon and at Medicine Hat in particular, and I am satisfied that at neither point was the South Saskatchewan flowing at more than 1,500 cubic feet per second, with a maximum of 2,000 cubic feet per second. There is a vast difference between 100,000 cubic feet per second and 2,000 cubic feet per second.

Someone will ask: Where has the water gone to? It has gone down to the sea without having done much good to the parched prairies, which if they are given sufficient water will grow anything. There is no better land in the world. In some places it is a little alkaline, but the vast proportion of it contains the necessary chemicals to produce crops of all kinds in abundance, provided it gets the water. It is part of my purpose to try to see that it does get that water.

In referring to the flow of the Saskatchewan river I dug up some old tables. I find that in 1915 at Edmonton, during high water, in June that river was flowing 186,600 cubic feet per second, which is a vast volume of water. In that same month the South Saskatchewan was flowing at the rate of 86,000 cubic feet per second at Saskatoon. The low flow of the North Saskatchewan in that year was 700 cubic feet per second, with the South Saskatchewan down to about the same amount.

Our duty is to conserve that water and use it for the irrigation of crops in the west.

In addition to the two other journeys I have referred to, I was considering going to the old country to make a survey into business. I have been there many times, because business is my middle name. I knew that we were considering granting $750,000,000 to help create business over there. I voted for that, and I was in agreement with it. I look upon it as an investment, as an insurance. But I said to myself: That is all very fine, but why should we not spend a few hundred millions in the west to create a home market that would be within our own boundaries? If we could build up the production of farmers, they would make something and be in position to buy from the manufacturers of Canada.

One morning on the way to the house, I believe the second day after the house prorogued, I happened to look at the monument which has been erected just southeast of the east block to the memory of Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and there flashed through my mind what he said when he opened the Saint Andrews locks on the Red River on July 14, 1910. He addressed a great concourse of people, and I can picture him—a handsome man, with a noble countenance and a fine head of hair. Remembering what he had said I reflected that at the time, he did not see the 2,000 people who were in front of him; he was looking away beyond them, beyond that great body of water which is one of our most splendid lakes—lake Winnipeg. Few people have any conception of its size. It is about 9,400 square miles in area, almost one-third larger than lake Ontario and only a few hundred square miles smaller than lake Erie. It is next to Great Slave and Great Bear lakes, purely Canadian lakes. I could see him looking down that great lake and saying: This is only the first step in a great vision of transportation right up to the foot of the Rocky mountains. I am not quoting his exact words. He told those people he could see ships coming down 900 miles from Edmonton to that great lake and then right up to the city of Winnipeg. Later I read that he had had the vision to predict something with which I heartily agree and which I hope some day will be carried out. He said that he could see the same boats going up the Winnipeg river to the lake of the Woods along Rainy river, across Rainy lake and then by some means or other to Port Arthur and Fort William.

From 1910 up to the present time all that has been done to carry out that great vision of the then prime minister of this country was a little bit of work done, I believe by Hon. Robert Rogers in 1913. In cooperation with the city of Prince Albert a lock was built in the Prince Albert dam at a point twenty-six miles down the river from the city. That is all that has been done to conserve those waters in the great west. My hon. leader, when premier of Manitoba, projected a grand scheme of damming the Saskatchewan at the east end of Cedar lake and then taking the water through lake Winnipegosis, thence on through lake Manitoba, through lake St. Martin and then drop into lake Winnipeg, one hundred miles south of Grand Rapids. That project has this wonderful advantage, that at the point of the drop into lake Winnipeg, 500,000 horse-power could be developed. If the Manitoba government wished to sell that power to anyone who would complete the project, there are plenty of financiers who would say: We will complete it if you will allow us the power. But I believe that large blocks of power like that should belong to the government.

These suggestions have been made in past years, and now we must have action. What I am trying to do now is to encourage the minister, who this year has put into the estimates a vote of $10,000,000. I should like to see a similar vote put in the estimates for each of the next nine years; make it a ten-year programme of spending $10,000,000 a year, or $100,000,000 in the ten years. I do not say that I want to see the minister there that long, sir, but whoever the minister might happen to be would carry out any plans instituted now. Such a ten-year programme would enable us to complete this project for the conservation of water and the construction of irrigation works. That amount would not, of course, create power to the extent that it could be created, nor permit of the canalization of the two branches of the river. That would take much more money, but it is one which should be carried out. Perhaps that will be a project for the future.

We have some fine examples of what can be done. What did the late great president of the United States, President Roosevelt, do in 1933? From his boyhood he had heard of the possibilities of conservation of the waters of the Tennessee river, just as the western members must have heard from their boyhood of plans to conserve western waters which have never been carried out. The conservation of the waters of the Tennessee river was first projected in 1807. After President Roosevelt took office he said, in 1933, that that was long enough to wait, and he went ahead, and in twelve years had revolutionized the economy of seven states. He canalized that great river. built nine large dams on the main river, as well as many other dams, and to-day they have a navigable route from Paducah at the mouth of the river right up to Knoxville, 650 miles away. Last year that river transported 150,000,000 ton-miles of freight. What has been accomplished down there is stupendous. They produced from that river the greatest single aggregation of power, not in any one place, but from any one river that is to be found the world over, developing from three and a half million to four million horsepower. What that has done to restore the economy of all the cities in that river valley is something the whole world can be proud of. We can do the same thing in the Saskatchewan river valley. When I think of what those people out there in our westren country have endured I am almost ashamed that in the past I did not take the part that I am taking now. I am not going to let up now; I am going to keep at it until I see this thing finished—the restoration of the economy of the west. I know it can be done—and all these projects are self-liquidating.

I have made a careful survey of irrigation in many states, covering many thousands of miles. If any one goes out to the west and crosses the international boundary line into the United States and goes through Montana, Idaho, the valley of California, Arizona, Utah, and part of Oregon, what will you see? You will see the marvellous transformation that has been brought about in the last fifteen years. They reclaimed 3,000,000 acres of land from the dried-out desert, so dry that it would not even grow cactus, and you never saw such bountiful production as you can see there to-day. In Idaho they have land producing 750 bags of potatoes to the acre and 1,000 bags of onions, and all the other crops are in proportion. We can do the same thing in Alberta and Saskatchewan if only we give our land water; and we can give it water, because the Saskatchewan river, if conserved, will provide all the water that the west can use in all the projects that we have in mind, and will provide irrigation, power, navigation and anything else that will help to make that country grow.

Let me show you how the people in the east will profit from the carrying out of this project—because I cannot separate it from the east. The east must come forward, its business men, its bankers and financial men because the east will receive just as much in the way of returns, Mr. Speaker, as will the western farmers. The western states, from those 3,000,000 acres of reclaimed land, produced $400,000,000 of products for the states themselves, and in addition vast sums of money were obtained through processing those products and sending them to the east. Every year there went to the east $200,000,000 worth of orders for manufactured products. That is how the east will benefit if we reclaim these 3,000,000 acres in our Canadian west, and so the eastern manufacturer and the eastern banker will get their return just the same as the western farmer. We want unity in Canada, which we all love, and there is nothing that would do so much to bring about unity in this country as carrying out this project. I often used to sit in this house and listen to the western members advocating such projects in past years. None of them are here to-day, except perhaps the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine). They advocated them then, and I did not seem to know enough to understand it. But I understand now, sir, from much travel in the west. I know what the reclamation of that land would mean, what magnificent returns there would be all along the line, what a bountiful thing it would be for all of Canada, and not merely for western economy. This whole project has been a football long enough. I have read everything that I could on it—from Dan to Beersheba, I was going to say, but that would hardly be appropriate.

Mr. COLDWELL: From Genesis to Revelations.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, and I find that back in 1804 the XY company, a fur company, which had branches in the west long before there was any settlement at all, wrote to their principals that the west would never come into its own until water from the South Saskatchewan river was sent over the dried-out parts of the prairies. The father of the late General McDonald, of the pension board until his death a few years ago, was a Hudson's Bay factor at what was then Fort Ellice, at the junction of the Assiniboine and Qu'Appelle rivers. Away back in 1854 he recommended such a project, and from that day to this all that I have been able to read of engineers' reports has recommended the same thing. In heaven's name when are we going to carry out some of these things?

I know that the minister is having a survey made on the South Saskatchewan river to find a place to build a dam, and I give him credit for it. Of course you have to have something solid on which to build a dam. I presume that the minister has not yet received a report from his engineers that they have found a solid place somewhere near Riverhurst. But they will find it, and if they do not find it they can build dams as was done on the Tennessee, with bases half a mile wide and with the regular core that the engineers use. I understand that dam sites have been found at two other places. I have here a core taken from the bottom of the St. Mary's river, and I am glad to say that I have had word lately that they are now about ready to call for tenders for the building of that dam. The building of a dam on the St. Mary's would mean the reclamation of 300,000 acres south of the Saskatchewan river. I have also a core obtained from the Red Deer. Near Buffalo lake a great dam could be built, which would mean the reclamation of 500,000 acres between Buffalo lake and Stettler on the north and Hanna and Youngstown and Acadia on the south. There is no reason why a project could not be undertaken immediately across the Bow river to reclaim all that area of Redcliff, Ronalane and Medicine Hat.

This winter I made an examination of that district, even in the midst of the snow, and that would mean another 300,000 acres. From Saskatoon west to Rosetown, and further down to Kindersley, there is an area of another 1,000,000 acres waiting to be reclaimed, if we can get the dam site on the South Saskatchewan river; and there are 1,000,000 acres east of the South Saskatchewan river as far as Estevan.

Here is a programme which the minister, I submit, ought to carry out to the full. I am prepared to encourage him with all the strength I have. I would support him in this effort to put through a $10,000,000 vote this year, and I would suggest that he come back next year, if he is still minister, and ask for another ten millions, and another the year after that. As long as he is minister he should ask for ten millions every year until we get the whole project completed so that we may reclaim the dried-out areas in the prairie provinces and restore the economy of the people there, and give them that chance to which they are entitled. They were put there on lands by the government—not by this government particularly, but by all governments—and they have been trying to eke out an existence on land that does not always produce a crop.

I should like to read a few words written by that distinguished man, Mr. R. O. Sweezey, with regard to the western projects and their importance. If I might be allowed to put it on Hansard without reading it, it would save time.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has the unanimous consent of the house, there is no objection.

Mr. GLEN: Agreed.

Mr. MacNICOL: With the consent of the house I will hand it to Hansard:

There is an area of some thirty million acres of farm land comprised within the southern parts of the three prairie provinces which is subject to such adverse conditions, caused by lack of moisture, that when sown to wheat the chances are proven to be about four to one against the farmer reaping better than one-half the crop that his labour and the quality of his land would entitle him to. Frequently he loses an entire year through complete crop failure. With wheat he has an occasional bit of luck, but it is rarely more than a bit, and, because of the arid conditions, experience shows that wheat is the only product that may in a measure survive a season's distressful drought. Too often, though, the failure has been complete, and so the mental anguish and human distress has been piling up to the breaking point. At one time the ground water level was higher, and it often sufficed to bring a crop to maturity. But the gradual lowering of the ground water level since the first breaking of the sod is responsible for the growing severity that has led to what now constitutes an utterly intolerable situation.

The problem is now a national one, and bids fair to be calamitous unless responsibility and leadership is assumed by someone for the purpose of applying the obvious remedies of simple engineering practice. Unfortunately, however, economists, financial experts and political scientists have not been keeping pace with the progress of engineering and science. So, when a large, though simple, project of this nature looms up, it is usually procrastinated to its doom.

Saving the losses from one or two years would easily provide all the means for remedial works to permanently cure the evil. From a financial viewpoint it would be the most profitable project ever attempted in this country. As a self-liquidating enterprise it merits the most attentive study of statesmen. Private capital is ready and willing to assume responsibility for rescuing the western prairies from their heart-breaking losses.

There is one other item that I would refer to, Mr. Speaker, and it is of such vital and transcendant importance that I would hesitate to omit it. I refer to the water supply of Moose Jaw and Regina, two beautiful cities. I have here some clippings from the Regina Leader Post and the Times of Moose Jaw. I will read only one item, though I could quote extensively to the same effect, because there are a number of items of the same purport. Under date March 5, 1946 there appeared the following item:

At noon yesterday there were three feet ten inches of water in the reservoir representing 190,000 gallons.

That is only one out of many items indicating the same thing. Now I say, Mr. Speaker, that we in this House of Commons, all of us without exception, stand condemned unless we do our utmost to give to the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina the means of defence against fire. We all saw recently what happened across the river here in Hull, when that woodpile was burning. It contained only 16,000 cords of pulpwood, and yet what a flame it made. How much water do you think was required to put it out? Yesterday I was talking to the chief engineer of the Hull fire department, Mr. Lanctot, and I wish to congratulate him and all his captains and the men serving under him on the wonderful job they did in saving the paper mill over there. I did not believe it was possible; but to do it they had to pour 62,000,000 gallons of water on that fire.

What would happen in Moose Jaw to-day with less than a million and a half gallons and Regina with less than five million gallons per day? They have no water to spare. Their plight would be tragic. We will stand in the light of public condemnation unless we make every effort to see that this dam is built on the south Saskatchewan river in order to provide the people of those cities with the water they so badly need. I hate to think what would happen if a fire one-tenth the size of the Hull fire started at the west end of Moose Jaw or the west end of Regina, with a wind blowing from the west. What do you think would happen to those two fine cities?

As a member of this house I would hold myself condemned unless I raised my voice and did my part to encourage the minister and to support him in any measure that is required to speed up the construction of the dam on the South Saskatchewan river near Riverhurst. The work should be proceeded with as rapidly as possible so as to provide the people of those two prairie cities with an ample water supply, apart from irrigation.

When I was in Moose Jaw I visited different factories, and I was greatly interested in one that was operated by a man from Czechoslovakia, I believe. In that factory they were making glucose from wheat, and that is something that the west is just built for. The gentleman who was with me was from the waterworks department of Moose Jaw and he told the proprietor that he would have to cut down on his use of water. The proprietor assured him that as it was he could not get enough water to fill the orders he had. When I heard that, I felt that I too would be condemned if I did not bring this matter up in the house. Those people have an opportunity to run ten factories instead of one, producing something that Canada needs. Their product is shipped east, and my good friend who represents London tells me that he buys a good deal of it himself. I want to do everything I can to stir up this house and the west, as well as the financial and business men of the east, so that we may all get behind the government and help the minister to carry through a project which will conserve water all along the Saskatchewan river, to reforest the foothills of the rockies, and to assist the Alberta government in preventing further fires. I would feel like reproaching myself if I did not speak as I am doing this afternoon.

I am going to put a map in each member's post office box. It is a composite map which I drew myself. In this connection I should like to say a word about Major Duncan Stuart, K.C., a wonderful old man who is well known to my hon. friend the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I take off my hat to him, because I found his map helpful. The same can be said of his articles on irrigation. In these articles he points out, as I have pointed out, that the whole programme is self-liquidating. Although it might cost $200 millions to complete the whole job in reality it would not cost the country a single dollar, because every dollar would be returned in crops alone apart from power. Then later on there would be taxes coming in. This is a permanent programme. It is not a programme where we put money in and never get it back. It is not that kind of programme; it is a Canada programme, a Canadian market programme, a self-liquidating programme giving thousands and thousands of jobs. Moreover it will create forty thousand new farms and provide orders for the equipment for those new farms. There will be about eighty irrigated acres to the farm.

One only has to go into southern Alberta, where we have a little irrigation, to see the wonderful results that can be obtained. I think of the fine city of Lethbridge, which went over the top in the three last victory loans, first in all Canada. Why? Because round about they have about 600,000 acres of irrigated land, taking in Taber, Cardston and Raymond and many other fine villages and towns. There is nothing that will give the same returns as a programme of this kind, and in the long run it will not cost the country a dollar.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The resolution which is being discussed will be replied to by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) in so far as the government is concerned, as it relates to work which has been previously suggested in his department. But there were some remarks made with regard to Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act work about which I should like to say a few words before leaving the house to meet a delegation.

The suggestion has been made that something ought to be done to locate the dam site on the South Saskatchewan river. If hon. members will examine the estimates they will find that there is an item there which makes it possible for P.F.R.A. to take funds which are being provided by the reconstruction department—there is a ten million dollar vote—sufficient funds to do all the survey and engineering work necessary for the promotion of the Red Deer river diversion, the irrigation work in the vicinity of Medicine Hat, the location of the dam site on the South Saskatchewan river, and any other survey work necessary to the determination of the areas that can be irrigated. All of that is now provided for in the estimates, and engineering investigations will be made or continued during the coming summer.

Much of the information necessary to the doing of this work has been in our records for some considerable time. It is now seven or eight years since we started making these investigations, and most of the important engineering work associated with it has already been done. What we are really doing at the present time is having that work checked by an efficient engineer who has been recommended to the department by the Department of Reconstruction. He is a gentleman by the name of Ferguson, who is now operating in the west. He has examined into the engineering work done by P.F.R.A. in connection with the St. Mary dam. My information is that he has reported favourably on that work, and has few recommendations to make of changes that might be made in the work actually done by our engineers. But it is thought important to have all the work done up to date on these other projects checked over by this same engineer, and then if possible to have further work done during this summer.

I do not know whether it will be possible to do any actual construction work so far as the last three named projects are concerned, but there is $750,000 in the estimates in relation to the St. Mary dam. That amount may be voted this year with which to proceed with the construction work there.

The main part of the work which is being undertaken at present is the tunnelling from one dam to another. I understand there are three dams in the project, and there has to be a tunnel associated with each of them. Contracts are being called for that work.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand the tunnel is to let the river run by where they are building the main dam.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; that tunnelling is now being done, or the contract is now being let for that work to be done, and there is money in the estimates for carrying it out. I just wanted to draw attention to these facts in order that the discussion might proceed with that in mind.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I am glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) say that some work has been going on for the last seven or eight years. I think that is true, but I rose particularly to support the resolution of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). Had I been drawing the resolution I might have drawn it in slightly different terms, but its intent is such that I think every hon. member of the house can support it. I and those associated with me—and I have no doubt that I am speaking now for others who come from western Canada—are very pleased that the hon. member for Davenport, representing as he does a city constituency in eastern Canada, has felt it incumbent upon himself to bring this matter up in the house at this time.

As the hon. member said in the course of his remarks, the question has been discussed in the house on many occasions in the past, but without a great deal of success. We understand, of course, that action in these matters, involving, as they do in the final analysis, probably several hundred million dollars, takes some time, particularly when it appears that only one area of the country is interested. But the hon. member placed another complexion upon it this afternoon; he has shown clearly that to undertake work of this kind is in the interest not only of the prairie provinces but of the whole economy of Canada, and that upon the prosperity of that great area which we call the prairies depends in no small measure the prosperity of the great industrial centres of all of Canada.

I was interested when the hon. member told us about the various projects that he has visited in the United States, because over the last twenty years I myself have had the privilege of seeing many of them. In 1938, driving back from Los Angeles to Ottawa in the autumn of the year, I stayed in a little town called Needles in Arizona. I was told that there were twenty-seven motorboats in that little town—twenty-seven motorboats in the middle of the desert. The nearest water, except for the dried out Colorado river, was some 130 or 140 miles away. I was told that when the dam 120 or 130 miles south of the little town of Needles, Arizona, was completed, there would be a lake extending all the way to this town, which would be a little port and the motorboats could then be used. The same thing occurred in Montana. I visited Fort Peck before the dam was completed in Montana. I was told that a lake would be made on the Missouri river which would have a shoreline—I am speaking from memory now—of 1,628 miles. From that scheme, which was mainly a power and flood control project, there could be irrigated a great deal of land.

I have seen the developments in the state of Washington, where they proposed to use the water from Coulee dam so that it would flow once more through the Dry Falls and irrigate an area which was, when I saw it, nothing but an arid, barren desert with a little sage bush on it. I remember being told that 200,000 families would be established in that area in the state of Washington. One could mention the other great projects in the United States and elsewhere across the world; and when I think of the water which flows down the two Saskatchewans, which runs down the Red Deer river into the South Saskatchewan and into other rivers flowing south into Montana, I realize what we could do with that fertile land in the southern part of the prairie provinces if only we had that inch of water in June and that inch of water in July that would ensure always something of a crop over the irrigated area.

In 1938 I had the privilege of introducing into this house a resolution which was supported by the hon. member for Davenport. While it was debated, it was more or less brushed off. The expense was too great; the undertaking was too large, and after all, the rains would come again. I moved the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should place before parliament at an early date plans, or proposals, for a comprehensive and authoritative survey of water conservation, irrigation possibilities, and other feasible projects for the permanent rehabilitation of the drought-stricken area of western Canada and its people.

Those of us who lived in that area then knew that the resolution placed before the house the need of the people at that time. It was a drought-stricken area. In 1938 the prairies were just emerging from the worst period in their history since the first settlement of the southern plains. I remember that in preparing to speak on the resolution I went into the library and gathered together everything I could find about the prairies in the days gone by. I remember reading the report of Captain Palliser, who made his trip through southern Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1858. I quoted from that report in 1938; I do not propose to quote from it now, but I recall that he spoke of the desolated plains and the desert cactus which grew in what is now southwestern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta, after he had left what he described as—and these are his exact words—"the creek where the bones lie." I have no doubt that "the creek where the bones lie" was the site of the city in which my hon. friend from Calgary west (Mr. Smith) was born, and in which I had the privilege of living for a good many years; that is, Regina, the capital of Saskatchewan. At that time Captain Palliser, as those of you who have read the report will remember, described all the country which lay west and south of the Qu'Appelle valley and the South Saskatchewan river as an arid plain where nothing grew. He spoke of a place he named The Elbow, where he met a band of Indians who warned him that if he was going in a southwesterly direction he had better take not only food for himself but fodder for the horses and even sticks with which to make fires, because he would find nothing in that country either to eat or to burn.

We saw something of that in the thirties. Not one of us who lived in western Canada during that period will ever forget the misery of those ten years; the days when we drove over the prairies and could not see the radiator caps on our automobiles because of dust; when in the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw we drove with our headlights full on day after day in order that we might see in the darkness caused by the blowing of the topsoil of that rich prairie land. It is true, of course, that a remarkable comeback has been made in the last six or seven years. We had hoped this would occur, and it has occurred. But we know from the historic past that these prolonged droughts in western Canada are periodic. It is proved by history. If you cut down the trees and look at the rings, they tell the story of the periodic dry and wet years during the time of their growth, which is perhaps a hundred years or more in the case of the elm trees that grow in some of our valleys. We know that country is subject to periodic and devastating drought. What it has meant to the men and women of those plains no financial balance sheet can ever tell; the misery, the dread, the piling up of debt, the women living alone in prairie homes who day after day heard the winds blow and saw the dust sweeping by the house, with nothing growing on the land year after year. Many of them, and it cannot be wondered at, even lost their reason as a result of the conditions under which they lived. And in this country, east and west, we spent millions and millions of dollars in relief. I am not going to complain, because the people of eastern Canada came to the rescue of the people who lived on the plains. They sent us carloads of vegetables, of food and of clothing, and this parliament appropriated millions of dollars for the relief of man and beast. And when it was all over, after the low level of relief upon which people were compelled to live, what had Canada to show for what had been done? Nothing but a people who still hoped that the rains might come and the land might once again be productive.

As the hon. member for Davenport has said, the cause of the drought in western Canada can be explained in only one way, the lack of moisture in the soil. Yet when that lack of moisture was clearly before us and the rains were scant or came not at all, millions and millions of gallons of water were flowing through those plains in the various rivers, which might have been utilized to relieve at least in part the tragic conditions with which we were confronted. And let us remember that in a period of drought the dry soil blows, and wind erosion is added to the disastrous consequences of the lack of moisture. I remember a constituent of mine writing to me in 1937; I have the letter in my office even now. He lived quite close to the South Saskatchewan river, near Saskatchewan Landing, just north of Swift Current. He said, "I have been sitting to-day on the bank of the Saskatchewan. All the valley up from the Landing, through Kyle and Tuberose right up to Elrose and Rosetown, is a scene of devastation; nothing grows. Yet to-day I see the Saskatchewan river in flood." That was in July, the flood period. He went on to say, "The river is lower than it sometimes is at this period, yet millions of gallons of water are going by which might be used to relieve the drought on the farms of this locality."

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Like the hon. member for Davenport, at that time I discussed irrigation with the best engineers I knew. I went carefully over the contour maps of the dried out area, and as a layman I would say that widespread irrigation does not present insuperable difficulties, particularly on the northern side of the Missouri-Coteau divide, which of course is in part the southern side or Canadian base of the Palliser triangle. As we have been told this afternoon, the problem is the conservation of waters in the rivers which flow together and form the South Saskatchewan river—that is, the Red Deer and the other tributaries—and the impounding of that water in a series of dams in the deep river valleys or in the mountains. I believe, as my hon. friend says, that the impounding of water near Riverhurst and the utilization of that water by the building of channels along natural lines of flow, as the contour maps indicate, would carry water down to Moose Jaw and Regina—yes, and even beyond Moose Jaw and Regina, down to the Souris river near Weyburn and into the Souris river valley right through Estevan and beyond. The contour maps clearly indicate that this is not an insoluble problem; it can be done. I believe the physical difficulties can be overcome. Of course, as my hon. friend has said, a by-product of an irrigation project of this description would be the generating of comparatively cheap power, which could be used for the rural electrification so badly needed in the western provinces, where there is so little of it.

Many people conceive of irrigation channels as long straight cuts, like a chess-board. But that is not what irrigation might be. As I suggest, it might follow the natural channels and contour. There are depressions running north and south, east and west, through which water might be channelled. While I appreciate what the Minister of Agriculture and the government have done in connection with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act—and if I may say so, as a westerner, I believe one of the best projects ever undertaken by a government in Canada was that which is called the P.F.R.A. project—still, they have not been extensive enough. There are still a good many coulees, still a good many valleys, which could be dammed to conserve the spring run-off. They would carry not only the water from the rivers, but the run-offs from the land after the winter snows have melted. For instance, we had a large quantity of snow in the prairie provinces this winter. This spring, when the snow melted, it ran down the coulees, found the channels, and away it went to the rivers and out to the sea. Those coulees might be dammed and the water conserved so that at least farms in the neighbourhood would have hay and be able to grow vegetables. In the event of a dry season they would at least have something upon which they could rely for food, both for man and for beast.

I have been told by engineers that with proper conservation in the mountains, and with appropriate dams placed at intervals on the South Saskatchewan from where the Red Deer joins it in Alberta, to a point south of Saskatoon, sufficient water could be impounded to give needed moisture to a very large area of central and southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta. I say of course that I have been told this. I do not profess to be an expert in irrigation or in engineering. Every man to his own trade. But I believe that a thorough investigation by those who are competent to make an appraisal would indicate that a great deal can be done in this regard.

I have always been in favour of a really authoritative and comprehensive survey of these irrigation possibilities. I have heard the objection raised that a project of this description would cost hundreds of millions of dollars. I noticed that this afternoon the hon. member for Davenport mentioned $100 million. Well, what is $100 million, after all? We spent more than $100 million on the very low relief levels upon which we maintained people in western Canada during those eight or nine years of terrible drought. We spent more than that. The highest estimate I have heard for damming the rivers in the mountains and for making the necessary channels to convey the water here and there, to build conservation dams and undertake a comprehensive irrigation project for the whole of the southern prairie provinces is $400 million. Yes, $400 million is a lot of money. But let me point out that it is less than we spent in one month for the prosecution of the war.

That large amount of money was only one month's war expenditures—and I am purposely citing the largest figure I have heard mentioned, because I do not think that amount of money would have to be expended. Let me emphasize the fact that to ensure life and opportunity in a vast area of this country an amount less than one month's war expenditures might be required. When we realize that this expenditure would make a great country permanently productive and give possibilities of increased prosperity, not only to the people who inhabit that country but to the whole of the Dominion of Canada, we can see that the amount involved is relatively small. As I have already said, during the years of drought, when the rains failed to come to us in western Canada, we spent from a quarter to a half that amount in unproductive relief.

Inevitably, from the history of the country as we know it, droughts will come again, and they may even be more prolonged than the one we experienced between 1930 and 1940. The Indians who have inhabited the plains throughout the years talk about lakes being dried up, although they are not now dried up. In the constituency of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is a body of water known as Long Lake. Long ago I was told by the Indians that seventy or eighty years ago, when they were children, Long Lake was so dry that they could drive across it in a wagon. Consequently we know that there can be even more prolonged droughts than those which we have experienced.

The hon. member for Davenport has mentioned what irrigation has brought to one part of the prairies. Those of us who have seen the irrigation in southern Alberta, around Lethbridge, realize the truth of the statement that is has done much for that country. One day a year ago last July I was in Medicine Hat. It was a hot day, and very dry. A friend of mine was to drive me to Lethbridge. We drove from Medicine Hat across a scorched plain, where the oats and wheat, standing five or six inches high, and headed out, were dry and dead. Then, all of a sudden, the wind being from the west, we could smell the odour of vegetation; and when we arrived at Taber, Alberta, the limit of the irrigation project, we passed into a country which was a veritable paradise. The corn was standing high and green, the grain waving in the wind, acres and acres of sugar beets—land that was a picture not only of beauty but of productivity. And all this because there was water: water which the other parts of the prairies with exactly the same kind of soil—just as productive, if given the opportunity, but without that one essential—did not have. And when we got to where there was water, brought in by the cunning and ingenuity of man, we saw how productive that soil really could be.

We do not need to go to the Sudan; we do not need to go to India; we do not need to go to the places that have been mentioned—Arizona, Montana, or Washington; we do not need to go to any of those places to see what water does for what would otherwise be an arid area. All we have to do is to take a drive into southern Alberta during a hot dry summer, and we can see in our own country how prairie land has been transformed under irrigation.

This party to which I belong has always urged these irrigation projects, both provincially and federally. As my hon. friend has said, navigable waters are under the control of the federal authorities. As my hon. friend said also, the people who settled in these areas were settled there by the authority of the parliament of Canada. As far as southwestern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta are concerned, I can remember that there was strong opposition from persons who were living in those areas and who knew that without irrigation people who went in there to settle would be doomed to disappointment in the days to come. Sir Frederick Haultain, the head of the territorial government of the northwest territories until the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were formed, warned against the possibilities of drought. Many others, including myself, did not accept the reasons given by the ranchers in the Medicine Hat area for opposing the settlement of that land. We were under the impression that the ranchers were a little selfish, that they were trying to keep the land from settlement in order to retain their ranching leases. But time has proved that they were right and we were wrong, that the settlement of that country was ill-advised from the point of view of agriculture.

It is true there was a good crop in that area in 1915 and another in 1942, with a few fair crops in between. But without irrigation, much of that Medicine Hat and Swift Current country, as well as other parts of the country between there and Moose Jaw and Regina and to the south, cannot be made productive year after year. Ways and means must first be found of getting moisture to the land. As I said, we have always been in favour of it. In February, 1938, I moved a resolution in this house, and at the same time the C.C.F. group in the legislature at Regina moved the following resolution:

That this assembly respectifully request the federal government to set aside an appropriation of at least $50,000,000 this year, to be used in investigation and completion of feasible water conservation, irrigation and other projects, directed towards the permanent rehabilitation of the drought area of this province.

That was not a partisan resolution. None of these resolutions were partisan. At that time the government in power in Saskatchewan was a Liberal government. While they did not approve the amount suggested in the resolution, and amended it, the amended resolution which called for a study of irrigation projects in that part of Canada was passed unanimously. The matter transcends the needs of the various provinces. It is the responsibility of all Canada. It is a work of importance to the whole of our country.

I do not want to prolong the discussion, because many hon. members who come from other parts of the prairie land as well as other parts of Canada will wish to participate in the debate. A few days ago we were discussing immigration. Whatever we may think of immigration, whether we believe in wholesale immigration, as some do and as I do not, whether we believe in planned immigration, by which people would be brought in and settled where they should be settled under proper conditions, where they can be given the opportunities they should be given; whether we believe that they should not be brought in in indigestible numbers, the fact remains that there is room for many thousands of people in this country. I cannot think of any part of Canada which offers greater possibility of better homes, better climate and better living conditions than the prairie land, provided a certain amount of stability is assured in the production of crops. Give the prairie land moisture, and the prairie land will produce crops.

The other day I looked up the debates of 1938 and I found that at that time some took the view that if we irrigated we would increase our production so tremendously that we would not be able to find markets. We already had surpluses on our hands, in spite of the drought years through which we had been passing. All I can say is that it is a strange world where there is starvation or near starvation on almost every hand and yet the production of foodstuffs is discouraged.

I referred the other evening to the privilege I had had of being on the social economic council at San Francisco, when the nations of the world obligated themselves to see to it that as far as possible everybody every day in the year should have an opportunity of eating a decent meal. There ought never to be a fear of overproduction in our country. We do have great crops, and perhaps sometimes we cannot find immediate export markets, but any surplus should be regarded as a reserve against the time when crops may fail.

I speak not only for myself but those in this party with whom I am associated when I say that we are in favour of a comprehensive investigation into the possibilities, not merely of a series of small irrigation projects but of a comprehensive irrigation project to make the prairie land productive year after year and to guarantee to the people who live there the opportunity of producing from their labours year after year, indeed an opportunity for this country to become more prosperous than it has been in the past.

We support the idea behind the resolution of the hon. member for Davenport. We are grateful that he has introduced this resolution. He sits for an eastern constituency, and perhaps is thus able to render greater service to the area we are discussing than those of us can who have been introducing such resolutions in the past, for he can have no selfish interest in the matter.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) on the campaign he has consistently waged in this country in the interests of water conservation and irrigation in western Canada. The work he has done in the past and the work he is doing to-day is greatly appreciated by all the people in western Canada. I am sure all the people in the west will appreciate the importance of the resolution he has submitted to this house, which reads in part:

> . . . to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river.

Forest fires and logging operations have caused a great deal of devastation on this watershed. The task of conserving this watershed in the past has been largely the responsibility of Alberta, but of course it is too large a job for any one province. It is a large job; it is a costly job. The whole dominion is vitally interested in seeing that this work is carried out efficiently, because the waters from the watershed flow not merely through Alberta but down through Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and these provinces will need every drop of water that can be conserved in those rivers for irrigation, stock watering, power development and human consumption in the future.

Again, eastern Canada has a direct interest in that work being carried out because, when the west prospers, eastern Canada benefits by an expansion of markets and sales in the west. In this house we have heard a great deal about the St. Mary's river project, the development at Medicine Hat, and certain developments from rivers in Saskatchewan—all worth-while projects; but we have not heard very much about the utilization of waters from this watershed in the east central part of Alberta, and I should like to speak of this for a few moments.

I think most members of the house remember that great engineer by the name of William Pearce and his great scheme for that area, mainly for the purposes of stock watering. Under that project it would have been possible to water between 17,000,000 and 18,000,000 acres. I do not mean by that irrigation, but it would have brought water to pasture lands of that acreage. In 1922-23, government engineers made a survey based upon the William Pearce project and as a result of this survey a scheme was developed known as the North Saskatchewan irrigation project, which would have irrigated approximately 1,000,000 acres in Saskatchewan and 500,000 acres in Alberta. The cost would have been around $100,000,000. The essential difference between the William Pearce project and the North Saskatchewan project was that the William Pearce scheme was a stock watering project, while the North Saskatchewan was an irrigation project. The mechanics of the two were very similar. They both proposed to divert water from the North Saskatchewan river and the Clearwater river down Raven river into the Red Deer river and to place a dam about fifty feet high below the junction with the Red Deer. Then it would have been possible to divert water by gravity from that dam through a canal 146 miles long to Sullivan lake, which would have provided a storage of 1,500,000 acre feet. From Sullivan lake it would have been possible to irrigate 500,000 acres, and water would also have been carried by a gravity canal and by natural waterways, namely, Sounding creek and Eyehill creek to Tramping lake in Saskatchewan, and from Tramping lake 1,000,000 acres could have been irrigated. However, that project was by many people considered impracticable, mainly because there would have been a heavy seepage of water and heavy evaporation from Sullivan lake to Tramping lake because of the sandy nature of the soil.

Another thing that weighed against the project was its actual size. It was a large one costing $100,000,000. During the war that did not sound very much, but in those days it appeared to be an astronomical figure, and unfortunately there is a tendency now in some places to revert to those pre-war ideas on questions of expenditure.

Many additional surveys have been made since that time. A number of surveys were made from 1938 to 1940 by P.F.R.A. engineers, and I pay tribute to the fine work they have done in conducting these surveys and surveys for smaller projects. The surveys made from 1938 to 1940 were surveys with a view to providing not merely for irrigation but for power development purposes. The cost of irrigation would have been considerably higher under those projects because it was proposed to pump the water instead of having it moved by gravity. They also proposed to obtain power from the Calgary Power Company at a time when they were pumping water heavily and to make the power available to the Calgary Power Company in winter time.

As a result of all these surveys and the promises made, particularly at election time, it was only natural that the people in that area became very much interested in irrigation, and a great deal of pressure has been exerted from time to time on the government to start work on one of these projects. The people in that area are hoping that the government will finally decide which project would be of greatest advantage to the people and start construction thereon immediately. However, a good deal of opposition developed to the idea of diverting water from the North Saskatchewan and the Clearwater rivers into the Red Deer river, because it was felt that the water might be needed lower down the river in Saskatchewan, and therefore new surveys were made of a project which would irrigate a limited number of acres in Alberta, utilizing the waters of the Red Deer river alone, instead of diverting the water from the North Saskatchewan river.

A brief outline of the new scheme known as the Red Deer diversion project, which was referred to by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon, is as follows: It is proposed to place a dam on the Red Deer river just above the content bridge and build up the water to a height of 150 feet. That dam would be approximately thirty miles east of the town of Red Deer. Then by gravity canal the water would be carried to Hamilton lake, which is at a lower level than Sullivan lake, a distance of from sixty-five to seventy miles. At Hamilton lake it would be possible to provide a maximum storage of 380,000 acre feet, and additional storage could be provided in a number of lakes surrounding Hamilton lake, one of them being Kirkpatrick lake. From these reservoirs it is proposed to irrigate about half a million acres. Actually in that area there are over 900,000 acres that could be irrigated, but the waters from the Red Deer river will only be sufficient to irrigate half a million acres. If, later on, it was possible to use waters from the North Saskatchewan river, using 2,000 cubic feet per second, it would be possible to irrigate another 400,000 acres. But that is not included in the scheme. The Red Deer river diversion provides only for the irrigation of half a million acres, using the waters of the Red Deer river alone. Under this scheme 1,200 miles of waterways could be re-watered, and on the basis that range lands benefit for a distance of three miles from live water, 8,000,000 acres of pasture land would be available under this scheme.

Some of the main advantages of the Red Deer river diversion scheme over other schemes are as follows. In the first place it is the most northerly scheme of its size to be found anywhere in the world, and for that reason there would be less evaporation than there would be on other projects farther south; also the water is carried by gravity, which costs considerably less than pumping the water. Perhaps one of the most important factors in this scheme is that substantial services have already been established in that area, and therefore it would be better to go ahead with it than with projects in some new district where there are no such services. We have in that area two railways, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, running east and west, and with branch lines running north and south; we have two main highways running east and west, and two highways running north and south; substantial telephone service has also been established, and there are five hospitals in that area. The question of population throughout that area is a tragic one, and in that connection I should like to read from a report tabled in this house on September 10 of last year from P.F.R.A., which has this to say regarding the Red Deer river diversion scheme.

It will provide settlement, permanent homes and means of livelihood for 7,500 families in a section of western Canada from which over 90 per cent of the original settlers were forced by drought; it resettles an area now practically depopulated; the area will support between 30,000 and 40,000 people. It will provide irrigation for approximately 500,000 acres of land suitable for irrigation. This land is not now in production and is largely publicly-owned. It will rehabilitate 24 urban communities now practically depopulated from the years of drought.

Then regarding labour requirements:

Estimated labour requirements: The actual construction of the works will employ 1,500 men steadily for eighteen months. This does not include indirect labour required in the preparation of materials, cement, lumber, equipment and miscellaneous supplies, nor that required in servicing the purchasing power of these men and their families.

The area to which I have referred lies within a square of approximately 7,000 square miles. It is bounded on the south by the Red Deer river, on the east by the Saskatchewan boundary, on the north by a line running east and west through the town of Castor, south of township 38, and on the west by a line running north and south through the town of Hanna in range 14. This area was settled chiefly between the years 1909 and 1918. Settlement at that time was encouraged by colonization companies, railway companies and certain government officials, and that encouragement was given in spite of the fact that the government had been warned time and again by prominent engineers that that land was not suitable for settlement.

For instance, reference has been made to Captain Palliser, who, in 1860, warned that a certain area within the so-called Palliser triangle was not suitable for settlement. It is true that a great deal of the land in that triangle has proved satisfactory, but on the other hand the record of the land lying in the south central part of the triangle fully substantiates the warnings issued by Captain Palliser at that time. That includes the area to which I am referring to-day.

In addition to Palliser, we had warnings from a number of men such as Doctor Hector, Professor John Macoun and Professor James Mavor. Warnings were issued from time to time by various engineers and surveyors who had been working through that area from 1870 on until the time of settlement in 1909.

The consequences of settlement in that area have been extremely tragic, as shown in the report from which I have just quoted, when it says that over ninety per cent of the population had to move out owing to drought. The effects of droughts were not as devastating in the earlier days of settlement because in the first place there were fairly heavy rains in 1915 and 1916, and unfortunately the crops grown during those two years encouraged more people to come in. Moreover, there was plenty of range land. The land had not been fenced and the farmers were able to run their stock on the open range instead of confining it to half-section areas such as they may have obtained from the dominion government. In addition to that, there was an almost unlimited amount of work available for the farmers, who could work on their land for a certain length of time and then go and work on the construction of branch railway lines that were being constructed at that time through those areas.

However, conditions changed rapidly. Continued drought and soil drifting made it impossible for many farmers to continue to farm their land, because as soon as they started to cultivate it the dry winds began to blow the land away. As soon as farmers fenced their farms off in half-section lots they found that, owing to the dryness of the land, it took over forty acres of pasture to feed one head of stock. Of course a man with 320 acres cannot carry many head of stock if the land can pasture only one head to forty acres. Eight head of stock would not provide a living for any man, so that these farmers could not make a living out of live stock when they had only 320 acres of dry land to pasture them on.

The situation that developed in that area is graphically illustrated in a report on the rehabilitation of the drought areas of Alberta, issued in 1935 by the Department of Agriculture. This shows what happened in that area during those years:

With the coming of the railways, settlement poured into the short grass plains. From 1911 onward, the rancher who had previously occupied this area was progressively crowded out, and by 1920 settlement was almost complete. Bumper crops and high prices in 1915 and 1916, had removed the last remaining misgivings on the part of those who were afraid of the short grass plains. Roads, telephones, schools, churches and social services of all kinds were demanded and provided—the whole superstructure, literally built on stalks of gold and wheat, in a foundation of shifting sand. Then came 1917, 1918, 1921 and 1922—drought, discouragement and despair—the covered wagon and the settler on the move again like wild geese in the spring going north. Another lease of life, good crops in 1926, 1927 and 1928—then drought again, followed by wholesale abandonment—40 per cent, 50 per cent, 60 per cent, and 80 per cent in some districts. The burden of taxation necessary to maintain necessary services bearing heavier and heavier on the settlers who remained. Finally it became difficult to operate schools, to maintain roads. Telephone lines were abandoned by the hundreds of miles. Life became more primitive and intolerable through lack of natural community life. Such is the history of the greater portion of Palliser's triangle—one of the greatest mistakes that national policy ever made.

As a consequence of so many farmers leaving that area, the rest of the farmers who remained were able to make a better living because they had more land upon which to run their stock, though I would again point out that when it takes forty acres to pasture one head of stock a man would need to have from 2,000 to 3,000 acres to carry fifty or sixty head of stock if he wanted to make a decent living. As pointed out in that report, the history of the whole area has been a tragic one. People came to the district in their youth full of ambition and hope for the future, some with a small amount of capital, although, generally speaking, they did not bring much capital with them. They slaved and toiled for many years. They cleared the rocks away and broke the sod, only to see the land blow away in dust storms and the soil drifted up under the fences; and as they fenced their pastures and the grass was eaten down to the ground, the stock began to eat right down into the roots. The result was that even pasture land, never cultivated, started to drift, a thing which it is hard to imagine in areas where moisture is more abundant. Having fought these conditions for a number of years, as the report points out, over 90 per cent of these settlers moved out. They left the area, having lost in many cases their health, their ambition and whatever capital they may have had. Although a drive through that area to-day reveals a tragic picture, it is not as tragic as it would have been about ten years ago because then one would have seen many abandoned homesteads with windows boarded up, whereas to-day most of them have been torn down or taken away. The only evidence that at one time that land had been settled is furnished by the spectacle of rocks that have been cleared from the land and piled in rows, north and south and east and west, representing many long years of toil on the part of these farmers, who eventually had to move owing to the extreme drought.

I should like again to say how much the farmers who stayed in that area have been helped under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act gave them a kind of drought relief and made it possible for them to exist. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act made it possible for them to store up water for their stock in dug-outs. Unfortunately, in that area the run-off from snow is so uncertain that in many years these dug-outs dry up and the farmers are not able to use the pasture that the dug-out is supposed to water. The construction of the Red Deer diversion scheme would change the whole picture. The pastures would be provided with water on a permanent basis. To a great extent irrigation would provide insurance against crop failure, and the farmers would be able to increase the size of their herds knowing full well that they would have the water to water them and the feed from the irrigated land to feed them in times of dry years.

The cost of getting the water from the Red Deer river to Hamilton lake would be $6,700,000. It would probably cost a similar amount to get the water from Hamilton lake on to the land. That work would be done by the provincial governments, the municipalities, and the federal government working together; but the cost of getting the water from the Red Deer to Hamilton lake should be borne by the federal government as a national undertaking because it is of direct benefit to the whole of the dominion of Canada. The financial cost of constructing this project would be small as compared with the losses incurred in the area since settlement. In the past, millions of dollars have been lost in that area, partly as a result of the heavy expenditures for drought relief, partly as a result of the loss of revenue due to crop failure and partly, of course, as a result of the loss of markets in so far as eastern Canada is concerned.

This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said that moneys will be made available for a number of these projects from vote No. 606 of $10,000,000. He included the Red Deer scheme, but he made it clear that this money is not for the purpose of starting construction on the projects but rather for cost of engineers' work in checking these surveys. I hope that it will be possible for the federal government actually to start construction work on this and other projects in western Canada at the earliest possible date. I know it is felt that the government should not start projects of this kind until unemployment increases. On the other hand, if the work could be carried out now, by the time the slump arrives, which most people fear may come in two or three years from now—and of which they were warned by the governor of the Bank of Canada—and if those projects were completed we would have available land for around thirty thousand people. These people would be on a self-sustaining basis. If, on the other hand, we wait until the slump comes along we can provide employment on this scheme for around 1,500 men. But if the job was completed we would have additional homesteads for around thirty thousand people. I do not think any time should be lost in starting to carry out the project at an early date.

This is just one example of the utilization of the waters from the watershed of the Saskatchewan river. I am strongly in favour, and this group strongly favours the conservation and utilization of the watersheds of the Rocky mountains as suggested by the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): At the commencement may I pay my tribute to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) for the interest that he has taken over the years in western development. He is one of those members of parliament who have contributed much to the welfare of this country. To-day, after several years of advocating the necessity of irrigation and power development in western Canada, many who previously scoffed at the necessity of such works being undertaken are giving support to the ideas that have been his for all those years.

In the constituency of Lake Centre the attitude of the large majority of the people is one of high commendation and appreciation for the work and activities of the hon. member for Davenport.

May I first of all deal with the motion itself? The motion provides for a request to the government to take into immediate consideration the advisability of introducing legislation to set up a permanent interprovincial board or commission on which the three prairie provinces and the dominion would have equal representation. In other words, this resolution requests the government to set up a board or commission under the chairmanship of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or some other qualified person, to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed, and particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river.

I am one of those who support this resolution because of the necessity of something being done as provided for in the resolution, but at the same time I maintain the stand I have taken at all times, that judges ought not to serve on royal commissions. I am sure that this resolution will receive the support of members on all sides of the house. In point of fact, if this resolution were carried into effect it would implement the recommendations of the advisory committee on reconstruction, which made its final report on September 24, 1943, the report in question being one by a subcommittee on the conservation and development of natural resources. This subcommittee was set up to study the natural resources of Canada, particularly water and power, with a view to providing employment after the cessation of hostilities, and also for the purpose of recommending long-term policies necessary to safeguard these resources. The main resources which have to be safeguarded are the resources of water with a view to conserving moisture, developing power and assuring irrigation. I am going to refer to some portions of this report so that the minister in replying may be able to give to the house and to the country some information as to the extent to which the recommendations have been implemented.

On page 6 of the report the recommendation is made that:

> An early decision should be reached as to the sharing of costs as between federal and provincial authorities in implementing the policies herein recommended, or such as may be adopted. This can only be done by conference between the authorities concerned. The longer-term programmes of conservation, of research, and of surveys may be considered to be properly the responsibility of the federal government.

I should like the minister to advise the house and the country to what extent this recommendation has been carried into effect, and in particular what decisions have been arrived at as to the sharing of costs as between federal and provincial authorities.

With reference to the resolution in question, I find the following recommendations with respect to water and power resources an page 15 of the report:

> A. The provision of immediate post-war employment.
> B. A long-term, or continuous policy, to assist to assist in the use and control of water on the basis of sound conservation.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to the fact that over a long period of years western Canada, and in particular Saskatchewan and southern Alberta, has been subject to recurrent droughts. He mentioned the Palliser expedition. I had an opportunity of discussing that expedition on a number of occasions with John Moberley of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, who died some years ago at the age of almost one hundred years. He was the water boy and last survivor of the Palliser expedition. He particularly emphasized that during that expedition their greatest fear was not death from starvation but from lack of water. He told me that on one occasion Palliser had stated that this area never would be settled. That was also the view of the then leaders of the Roman Catholic church and in particular of the archbishop, Tache, who in 1867 after crossing this area expressed the belief that it would never be suitable for agriculture. The report to which I am referring deals with this situation. At page 16 it says:

In the great plains region of western Canada, and in central British Columbia, many areas have insufficient precipitation for the successful pursuit of agriculture. Irrigation in these areas is necessary, and the conservation, control and distribution of both surface and underground water supplies is of vital importance. The use of the rivers of the great plains region in Canada raises both interprovincial and international problems.

After setting out the necessity for water storage and irrigation projects in the drought areas being proceeded with under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act it indicates what should be followed in the matter of a long-term policy:

The continuation and systematic extension of basic water resources investigations by the dominion water and power bureau in collaboration with the provinces . . .

Then on page 18 it recommends what the hon. member for Davenport has included in this resolution, namely the setting up of a permanent board or commission. This is the recommendation:

The setting up of a western provinces water board to include representatives of the dominion and the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba for the purpose of advising the respective governments on the most equitable and advantageous use of the limited water supplies in the great plains region of Canada.

Therefore, sir, I am sure that from all parts of this house will come support for this resolution in its present form. It asks for no expenditure of money at this time, but it does ask for immediate consideration of a problem that will be recurrent in the years to come, namely the problem of drought. It asks that necessary measures be taken to ensure that never again shall we in Saskatchewan and Alberta pass through the conditions so ably and vividly described this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, conditions which could have been avoided if parliaments, realizing that recurrent droughts do take place in western Canada, had carried out a system of public works of irrigation to the end that, instead of the devastation that prevailed between 1930 and 1939, there would have been a degree of production which would have done away with the necessity of providing money for direct and indirect relief in those provinces.

I realize that something has been done; but too little has been done. This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) referred to the fact that some portion of the $10,000,000 which is to be voted may be used for this purpose; in other words, that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration may use some portion of this vote to carry out survey and engineering works. These works are to be undertaken for three purposes; first, to secure and assure employment; second, in the larger field, to protect western Canada from the effects of recurrent droughts, and, finally, to assure the development of power and irrigation projects. I am particularly interested in what has been done because of the fact that, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, in the centre of my constituency is the largest lake in central Saskatchewan. It was a navigable lake which was utilized for the transportation of wheat from central, eastern and middle western Saskatchewan down its entire length and ultimately on to the C.P.R. main line, thence to the markets of eastern Canada. Today that lake is in grave danger of drying up. Between April, 1944, and October, 1945, its depth decreased by two feet. Its shore areas are becoming infested with weeds. This lake is worth preserving as a reservoir for conserving and distributing moisture, through irrigation, along the Qu'Appelle valley. It is worth preserving for the production of fish. It is worth preserving as the finest sanctuary for wild bird life to be found anywhere in central Saskatchewan. Finally, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggests, it is worth preserving as a playground, having on its shores some of the largest resorts in Saskatchewan.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And the finest duck shooting in the west.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Apparently all my hon. friends know how really important this lake is and how necessary it is that something be done for its preservation.

Mr. STIRLING: What is its name?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is called Long lake. Last year and the year before I brought to the attention of the house and the country the necessity of doing something. Some mention was made by the hon. member for Davenport of one of the schemes for the irrigation of central Saskatchewan and the supplying of water from the Saskatchewan river for the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina by way of Elbow, thereby permitting through the necessary development the transfer of millions of gallons of water down through Beaver lake and thence into the Qu'Appelle valley, thereby ensuring the preservation of this lake by maintaining a reasonable level throughout the year. Speaking on this matter last year, I emphasized the necessity of public works being undertaken which would be self-liquidating. I am going to refer to that in a moment, because I was very much impressed with what was said in that regard by the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution. I pointed out that as far as this lake was concerned there was no place in Saskatchewan where the expenditure of money would pay greater dividends in enjoyment, in the preservation of an agricultural area, in the conservation of bird life and the development of irrigation by the diversion of the surplus waters of the South Saskatchewan river.

There are those who say that to-day is not the time for public works or expenditures. There are others who say that we should wait a little longer. I brought these matters up last November when the estimates of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) were before the committee, and he quite frankly stated that the matter was not within his jurisdiction, but that it came within that of the Minister of Agriculture, being a matter which could be dealt with under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

I do not want to see the expenditure of large sums of money for public works unless the works undertaken are to be reasonably self-liquidating. I have before me two alternative plans for irrigation in Saskatchewan. According to the consulting engineer under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, both these plans, one involving the expenditure of $28 million and the other of $39 million, would be self-liquidating. One must keep this fact in mind, aside altogether from the further fact that these developments would serve areas which year by year would yield crops where, in the past, from year to year during the draught periods the same areas yielded nothing but drought, grasshoppers and all manner of difficulties. And, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has pointed out, the debt piled up from year to year.

These projects are necessary in the interests of the survival of Saskatchewan. They will ensure employment to-day. I am not one who from time to time comes before the government and, while preaching the necessity for retrenchment, at the same time asks for large expenditures which would not be self-liquidating or beneficial. I believe a reduction in taxation must come immediately if industry in this country is to provide the jobs so necessary for our returning men, and for those who have been discharged in recent months from munitions factories and other war industry in general.

I was much disturbed the other day upon reading the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in this connection. He placed before the country a most dangerous doctrine in a speech he delivered in answer to a conference which met here, namely, the delegation from the Canadian and Catholic Federation of Labour, protesting against the loan being made to Great Britain. He stated that it had taken him a whole month to understand the necessity for this loan. Then, as reported in the press, he said:

> If the loan was not granted the Canadian government might be forced into the position of having to cut off family allowance payments, which now total between $200 million and $250 million annually, and it might also have to default in the payment of interest on victory bonds.

If those statements were made—and they have not been denied by the minister—they represent the expression of a dangerous viewpoint at a time like this.

I am not one who wants to add to the clamour for works which will not be self-liquidating. But if that statement be true, and if the minister meant what he said, then the financial position of this country is very serious. Those who are answerable for it are the members of the government who, in recent years, have gone out of their way to secure the support of the country by making promises for expenditures far beyond those which should have been made, having regard to present conditions. I am not referring to war expenditures, either, not in any sense of the word.

Is it not strange that one minister says we are in a terrible condition, when only the other day the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) said at a banquet in his honour that conditions were so fine in Canada he expected income taxation would be cut by 50 per cent at this session?

Mr. CHEVRIER: He said expenditures, not taxation.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): He did not say taxation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not hear what the interruptions were—they came from so many sources.

Mr. CLAXTON: They were all the same.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, for once the cabinet is in agreement—if they were all the same. I would not ask the government to make these expenditures unless they would be self-liquidating, unless they would bring benefit by way of extra and assured crop production. Therefore I have no hesitation in asking not only that the committee be set up, as requested in the resolution, but that immediately the government proceed with the necessary work to make sure that millions of acres of Saskatchewan and Alberta will be irrigated, thereby ensuring more employment and greater production, and a return to prosperity which, through drought and other conditions, will periodically be denied in years to come.

I believe that, to be justified, expenditures to-day must assure an increase in economic production. We hear talk about the necessity of retrenchment and we have the Minister of Justice making a statement such as I have quoted. Yet we have such unnecessary expenditures as some $5 million on propaganda agencies; and another of the estimates to come before the house will be for a sum of $300,000 to renew the national registration, something which is totally unnecessary in peace time, justifiable as it was in time of war.

I should like to see set up the committee recommended by the advisory board on reconstruction. Let them take evidence on projects which will be self-liquidating, which will assure greater production, and maintain economic unity in western Canada and elsewhere. Then let them proceed with construction, thereby insuring immediate employment and prosperity in that western country.

I shall not speak longer at this time, more than to say that I support the resolution because I believe it is necessary. I am one who has never seen that division between east and west about which we hear so much.

In concluding, I should like again to pay tribute to the hon. member for Davenport, who represents a constituency in eastern Canada. By his work he has riveted the eyes of eastern Canada on the needs of the west; he has thereby assured the realization by eastern industry of the necessity for prosperity on the prairies.

For the future of our western country I feel that hon. members on all sides of the house could do no better than support the resolution; and if recommendations are made by the committee, the government should carry those recommendations into effect.

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): I, too, rise with other hon. members to support the resolution. I believe I speak under a great handicap this afternoon, because I follow front-benchers from most of the parties. However, I believe back-benchers have come into their own at this session.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) who was responsible for the better lighting facilities that have been provided so that the back-benchers are much better seen than even members of the cabinet. I think that is all to the good.

I am glad an eastern member saw fit to introduce this resolution. If we have learned anything in the past few years it is that the prosperity of any one section of Canada depends upon the prosperity of the rest of the country. If by providing proper irrigation facilities for the prairie area we can increase its prosperity, that prosperity will not remain confined but will overflow to all parts of Canada.

The prairie area is the proper place for irrigation to begin because the rainfall there is less than twelve inches annually. The soil is inherently productive and it responds readily to the application of water. There are recurring periods of drought in the area. If there is one thing that irrigation can do it is to increase the supplies of grain and fodder so that in years of drought there will be sufficient reserves in the area to maintain foundation numbers of live stock and help to maintain the annual marketings of live stock products.

When we were going through the depression years of the thirties many people began to wonder whether the area enclosed by the Palliser triangle should have been settled or not. But after having seen the production that has come out of that area in the last few years I think any doubts there may have been have been erased. The great agricultural production that we have seen in the last five or six years has been due in no small part to the production that came from the area. It contributed much to the supplying of food that was used to sustain Britain and the allied armies so that we were able to bring the war to a successful conclusion.

However, we should not be lulled into false optimism by the good crops that have been obtained in the last five or six years. We should not forget the times that we saw in the thirties. I should like to read a quotation from Doctor George Britnell, head of the economic department of the university of Saskatchewan. Speaking of a trip made through that province in 1934, he said:

> We entered Saskatchewan at Antler, and from there to Stoughton, a distance of more than fifty miles, we passed through a landscape of almost incredible desolation. The land was as lifeless as ashes, and for miles there was scarcely a growing thing to be seen. Gaunt cattle and horses, with little save their skins to cover their bones, stalked about the denuded acres weakly seeking to crop the French weed, which with malign persistence seemed to be maintaining some sickly growth.

I do not think the importance of the drought in those areas should be overemphasized. There have been recurring periods of drought in the prairie area, but those periods have occurred only infrequently. From 1838 to 1848 there was a period of drought when the prairie grass burned and the native live stock had to leave the area. From 1885 to 1895 was another period of severe drought when the settlers had to get out of the area. From 1929 to 1938 was another period of drought.

We thus see that on the average every fifty years there are ten years in which the crop yield is less than average. All the hardship and misery that we saw during the thirties cannot be laid at the door of lack of moisture. In 1937 there was an almost complete failure. In 1929, 1931, 1933, 1934 and 1936 the crops averaged about half of normal. In 1930 and 1932 there were crops near average. The years 1935 and 1938 were years of poor yield, but the poor yield was due, not to lack of moisture, but rather to a rust epidemic. Much of the misery during the thirties was caused, not by lack of crops, but by lack of prices. If we are to maintain prosperity in that area we must attack the problem from two angles. We must make certain that production can be maintained, and when production is maintained we must make certain that decent prices are paid the producers.

When we observe that drought occurs rather infrequently I think we should realize that the solution is to make certain that there are reserves of feed and grain so that we can maintain the live stock, and so that the acres on which the crop has failed can be sown again and marketings throughout the years maintained at something close to normal.

After the first session of this parliament I travelled through the ranching area in my constituency in the middle of winter. The ranchers had a poor crop of hay last year but they had expected a customarily mild winter. However, the winter was quite severe. Snow that fell last fall remained all winter, and large numbers of live stock which had been put on the land for winter grazing died because of a lack of feed. There was from one to two feet of snow and the live stock were not able to get sufficient feed to keep alive.

I do not think anyone needs to be told how important meat production is. The production of foodstuffs will always be important. Throughout the years we should maintain sufficient reserves of feed that live stock will not be lost through starvation. When an irrigation programme is undertaken the production from that land should be set aside to as great an extent as possible in the form of reserves, in feed banks, so that the farmers surrounding that irrigation project will have a reserve of feed which will go a long way to maintaining prosperity for them for all time. Irrigation would mean continuous marketing from that area.

It would mean that never again would we see people facing hardship and misery; that never again would we see live stock starving and staggering; that never again would we see valuable animals sold for canners and cutters because there was not sufficient feed to put flesh on their bones; that never again would we see feed for live stock shipped in from the east, which, to say the least, is an expensive procedure.

I notice that the resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of introducing legislation during this session to set up a permanent interprovincial board . . .

Then it goes on to say that the purpose of the board would be:

> . . . to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river.

I consider that the resolution is worded in much too timid and feeble language. If it would have been within the rules of the house to word it much more strongly, I believe the mover would have been quite willing to do that. What we need at this time is to urge the government to get on with a comprehensive programme of irrigation. Too long has this house been considering the advisability of undertaking measures that are essential to the well-being of our people. For the last ten years surveys have been made under the P.F.R.A.; those surveys show without a question of doubt that large irrigation projects are feasible, and I believe that the government should take the word of their own officials and proceed with an adequate programme.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking in the house this afternoon, said that the St. Mary's river project was one on which work would be done immediately and that the amount allocated to this project would be three-quarters of a million dollars. At that rate, as the project according to the officials requires some $13,700,000 to complete, it will take at least eighteen years to complete it. Surely that is a little too slow.

This year the vote for the P.F.R.A. is $3,000,000; last year it was $2,000,000. I am sure that members on all sides of the house will be glad to see that the vote has been increased. In 1935, when the act was first implemented, the appropriation was three-quarters of a million dollars. In 1938-39 the appropriation was stepped up to $3,500,000. But now, in the first year of peace, at a time when there are a quarter of a million unemployed in Canada and no immediate hope of their being employed, surely half a million dollars less than the appropriation for 1938-39 is just not good enough.

Mr. George Spence, an official of the P.F.R.A., estimates that irrigation projects totalling some $111,000,000 could be undertaken. In that estimate wage rates are calculated at forty cents an hour. Surely, when surveys are being made by government officials, the rate of wages should not be as low as forty cents an hour. The government should not be niggardly in the sums of money it appropriates to be paid for the hard labour of working people. If the wage rate were increased, perhaps the project would cost $135,000,000.

I notice by the auditor general's report of last year that some $1,180,000 was spent by P.F.R.A. for water development, and of that amount $525,000 was spent on buildings and land. I suggest to the government that all the buildings and all the lands in the world will not irrigate a single acre of land. At the rate the government is proceeding with its irrigation programme it would take well over a hundred years to complete those projects which its officials say are feasible.

It is estimated that 3,000,000 acres of land be placed under irrigation. In terms of production that might mean an additional 75,000,000 bushels of wheat, or an additional 6,000,000 hogs, or an additional 10,000,000 tons of feed annually. I would suggest that the government is more concerned with the dangers it sees in what it might term overproduction than with supplying jobs and with ensuring the prosperity of the people of Canada.

I have before me this evening's Ottawa Journal and I notice that an UNRRA official, Mr. Sidney Rittenberg, says that famine is so critical, particularly in Honan province that,

> . . . children look like old men, with shrunken, emaciated bodies and swollen stomachs.
> The countryside looks as if it had been shaved clean. All grass, weeds, foliage and bark from trees have been grabbed for food.
> Seven million persons are reported starving in Honan province alone.

Surely it would have been a great boon to the people of Canada and to the people who are starving in so many nations of the world today if during the 1930's the then governments had been far-sighted enough to have planned and implemented an adequate irrigation project. Then we might have had 75,000,000 bushels of wheat which might have kept alive another ten to twenty million souls. Surely in the future we should keep that experience in mind. I do not think there is ever a danger of overproduction so long as there is one undernourished person in Canada, or for that matter one undernourished person anywhere in the world.

Our veterans at this time are looking for land. If they take up land under the Veterans Land Act they will get $4,800 worth of land, which in almost every case would be dry-farming land. That amount of money in the dry area will not buy more than 160 acres of land, and only mediocre land. But had three million acres of land been irrigated, it would provide 30,000 veterans with 100 acres of irrigated land apiece. It would provide irrigated farms for almost all the veterans who are looking for land in western Canada under the Veterans Land Act. Surely the government should take that into consideration and develop irrigation as a means of rehabilitating the veterans.

In conclusion, I suggest it is time that the government got away from taking into consideration or thinking over the advisability of an irrigation programme. Certainly the reports of all government officials show that a large irrigation programme is feasible, and if the government would enter into a long-term plan for agriculture, a plan for increasing production, which can come from irrigated lands, we would make certain that all the farmers of all western Canada would all the time have sufficient feed and grain to maintain their farming operations.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the resolution which has been proposed by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), may I congratulate him not only on having brought forward this important motion but on the excellent work he has done in this direction over a long period of years. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of introducing legislation during this session to set up a permanent interprovincial board or commisison on which the three prairie provinces and the dominion would have equal representation under the chairmanship of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or some other qualified person, to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river.

I am sure that hon. members in all parts of the house will agree with the principle of the resolution, which asks that a careful investigation be made into this subject. As was pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the reconstruction committee gave long study to the whole question during the session of 1943. At that time they considered the matter in connection with the problems of reconstruction and made a recommendation in the report which they submitted following their investigation. I would join with the hon. member in requesting the minister, when he replies, to tell us what has been done with respect to that recommendation and whether any arrangements have been negotiated between the federal authorities on the one hand, and, on the other, the various provinces concerned.

I was born and brought up within the Palliser triangle and I have farmed there for the past twenty-five years. I also had the privilege of serving on the advisory committee under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act for a number of years before coming to this house, and I have witnessed great changes in scientific agriculture, in methods of tillage and cultivation, in soil conservation and the development of rust-resisting cereals, improvement in the production of live stock, and many other similar questions; but certainly the most important of all these matters has been water development and conservation.

You cannot produce foodstuffs of any kind in this country without water; water is the most essential element in any production of foodstuffs. The reclamation possibilities, under proper development and conservation of water, are immense, a fact which has been pretty well proven by the efforts that have been made under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Those who have been administering that legislation since its inception in 1935 can substantiate this.

Possibly there has not been accomplished under the board quite as much as many of us would have liked to see, but one thing that has been achieved is this: They have established what can be done as a result of the conservation of water. As was pointed out this afternoon, when we realize what quantities of water are wasted every spring from the various streams and rivers, we realize how much can be accomplished by the proper control of these streams for the promotion of agricultural production throughout the year.

May I refer to a pamphlet entitled, "P.F.R.A. and their Record of Achievement", which was issued in 1943. From 1935 to 1943 a great deal was accomplished; but since then, owing to the war effort, the achievements have been more or less nullified. At page 55 of the pamphlet reference is made to the work accomplished under P.F.R.A. From the inauguration of the programme in 1935 to March 31, 1943, the water development work that has been accomplished has included the maintenance of water supply to take care of 50,000 acres of irrigated land and existing projects; repairs have been carried out, and so on. It lists the number carried out, and states that the amount spent up to that date for water development and conservation alone was $2,124,722. Much more than that was spent in connection with community pastures, reforestation, regrassing and other matters of that kind.

This afternoon I listened to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) telling about the difficulties which the people of the three prairie provinces passed through in the early thirties. I experienced all the conditions as he portrayed them. Southern Saskatchewan suffered more severely than any other part of those provinces as a result of the drought at that time. One could drive for days and not see any vegetation whatever. There was no water to be seen anywhere, and one marvelled how the women and children on those farms existed at all during that period. The corner I lived in, in southwestern Manitoba, was on the fringe of that area.

When we remember what those people had produced in years prior to that period and contrast it with their privations during those years, I do not think anyone would object to a survey, and even to a considerable expenditure of money, for the purpose of finding out what can be made possible through proper water conservation, so as to conserve the run-off from the large rivers coming from the mountains. Someone mentioned a lake this afternoon. I remember driving along lake Johnstone, south of Moose Jaw, during those dry years. The lake was perfectly dry, not a drop of water being at the bottom.

On all hands people boast of our great agricultural production during the war years, and I do not think it would have been possible had it not been for what had been accomplished in the prairie provinces under P.F.R.A. Development and conservation made it possible for many people to maintain live stock, to produce dairy products, to cultivate fine vegetable gardens for themselves where previously in average years they had been unable to do anything of the sort.

It is difficult to estimate in dollars and cents how much extra we were able to produce for the war effort, as far as foodstuffs are concerned, as a result of the work done by that board throughout the prairies. I remember reading in the fall of 1943, in a magazine called Canadian Business, an article pointing out the trend that had been observed in western Canada. The writer of that article stated that in the early twenties seventy per cent of the farmers' income was from wheat and cereal products and that position had been reversed so that less than forty per cent of their income was now obtained from that source.

I maintain that the greatest part of the change-over was made possible by the efforts of those operating under P.F.R.A. in large areas of those three provinces in connection with the development of water, regrassing, and community pastures. We were simply experimenting and the expenditure was not large—a very few million dollars, as had been pointed out. If such results could be obtained there, I am sure that our potentialities along those lines are still considerable.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated this afternoon that, apart from the vote this year of $3,000,000, an amount of $10,000,000 was to be made available through the Department of Reconstruction for survey work along these lines. The other day I read an article, under the date of April 5, by Doctor Archibald, director of experimental farms in Canada. He, along with the deputy minister of agriculture, Doctor Barton, had more to do with directing the efforts of the prairie farm rehabilitation work in the prairie provinces than anybody else. In his address at Guelph the other day he referred to the fact that $110 million were to be spent on some project in the prairie provinces in the near future. I am not sure what it is. That is quite a large sum of money the department is to spend.

I support this resolution wholeheartedly. While we have accomplished this fine piece of work in the prairie provinces, it is practically nothing when compared with what our neighbours to the south have done. This afternoon the hon. member for Davenport, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and others told of the magnificent achievements with respect to water conservation and irrigation in certain parts of the United States. That has been done. In to-day's Christian Science Monitor, a Boston paper, I noticed a full page devoted to this type of work. The heading is "Flood wall at Kansas City paces vast drive to tame Missouri river." It goes on to point out that the sum of $7 billion has been set aside for this work, and that $1,500 million is to be spent on the Missouri river. It will affect some ten states and bring about irrigation and improvement of agricultural productivity in the states concerned. If they can do that in the United States surely it should be an example to this country as to what we must do in the interests of our own people, and more especially in the interests of world food production.

Throughout history the majority of the people of the world have been undernourished. To-day we hear much of world government and international agreements. If this is to become a fact, then we in this country have great possibilities and responsibilities to produce much more food than we have ever done in the past. Therefore I think this resolution is most timely and we would be neglecting our duty if all quarters of the house did not support it. We should see that a thorough investigation is carried out. Like the hon. members who spoke this afternoon, I believe that at this time all large expenditures of public money should be self-liquidating. It is a matter of surveying. I am satisfied that it would be self-liquidating. A few million dollars is a lot of money, but in comparison with government expenditures to-day very little has been spent on P.F.R.A. It has returned many times the amount to the citizens of western Canada and to this nation as a whole. I am pleased to have the opportunity of endorsing this resolution which, I am sure, will be accepted in all corners of the house.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Just to prove that there is nothing political in this matter, I rise as a representative of our party in Alberta to support my old friend who knows every rock in the Mackenzie river and every blade of grass grown out there. I hold in my hand a clipping from the East Central Irrigation Association which quotes Herbert Hoover, one-time president of the United States, as saying that every drop of water that runs to the sea without rendering a commercial return is a public waste. Perhaps we can all agree that Mr. Hoover has at last said something that is really worth while.

We shall be told something about the expenditure of money, and I have no doubt of the position of those of us who criticize the government for overexpenditures and then in the next breath urge them to spend something more. I appreciate that position to the fullest, but I may be permitted to criticize and to doubt the wisdom of the way in which they spend other people's money. It has got abroad in this country, through the various information agencies which rude people occasionally suggest are propaganda agencies, that there is a feeling that they may be tainted just a little bit with the government's idea and that they might assist them in remaining where they are.

I, of course, know nothing about that. I am quite sure the ministers would not consciously do that, but perhaps some of the chaps who work for them know where their bread is buttered and occasionally they may slip into political propaganda. That is gentle criticism.

On the large question of sectionalism which has so often been raised, I wish to say that in a portion of western Canada we are seeking to have this government, in conjunction with the provincial governments, undertake a large project. Therefore I immediately say to my hon. friends who come from Ontario and Quebec that what we are seeking is a few canals. We want these canals to carry water in order that we may raise food. You have your canals here to carry bottoms. Ontario did not pay for them. Quebec is not going to pay for the St. Lawrence waterways. The point I am anxious to make, whether I succeed or not, is that because of the geographic location of an enterprise it cannot just immediately be said that it was done to help one province or two provinces or one area. In my judgment, what my old and hon. friend—and when I say "old" I mean I have known him a long time—the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) said was well put. If improvements were brought about out in that country this would spread. Take the little Lethbridge Northern. I see the hon. gentleman writing at his desk who knows much more about it than I do. But what has happened there? They have a wonderful show going; they have sugar refineries and, in the last few years a canning factory. I do not care where hon. members live, they cannot buy canned vegetables that will even compare with those that are canned right now in Lethbridge. All that is the result of irrigating some land and making it productive.

I do not know how many hon. members have visited the town of Brooks. I am quite sure many of us do not even know that it exists. I give the house my word for this, there are no finer homes, there are no more healthy or contented people throughout Canada than those who live in that irrigated area. What strikes one so forcibly is this. You go about three miles south of Brooks, turn right and then you strike the main canal which comes from the dam at Bassano. There you have on one side of the road gardens blooming like the rose. Another fifteen miles away you come to the area of Scandia and Rainier, a small area. There is not enough grass growing there on fifty acres to support a sheep, let alone a cow or steer that someone mentioned a moment ago.

What are these lands that we are seeking to do something with? Take an area out there where we have some land that is most unusual. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie) is not in his seat at the moment; perhaps he knew I was going to say all these things; but it got so dry out there at one time some years ago that after the farmers had sold their fence posts in order to get the last dollar they could, the city council of Medicine Hat got a rainmaker by the name of Hatfield. He built a thing that looked like an oil derrick, although it was not so high. Up there he lit a fire and brewed some kind of witch's stew; I do not know what it was. He was paid on the basis of an inch and a half of rain or nothing. He lit this pot—I think he was just cooking himself a cup of coffee or something of the kind—but in any event they had a wonderful rain. Those hon. members who read Time magazine will know that Hatfield is still going. Down in San Diego a short time ago, when they had that young world's fair and the country was dry, they hired him and he guaranteed two inches of rain. They got seven inches and everybody in San Diego was flooded out. Then they had to pay him again to get it to stop. Of course he had nothing to do with it, but I tell that story for this reason. When people are driven to such straits that they will hire a charmer to try to induce a little bit of rain, conditions are serious. I have lived in that section of the country for a long time, and am familiar with the constituency of Acadia, from whose hon. member we heard this afternoon. I used to go there to shoot partridge.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That was a pleasure trip.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It was. Incidentally I may tell my farmer friends that partridge live on weed seeds; they do not eat your grain. But matters got so bad there that even the weeds would not grow and there were no partridge; that is why I stopped going to the hon. member's constituency. I was there quite often, however, and I did see this more than once. I would see a man and his wife and kids driving out behind a team, the harness held together with hay wire. If they were lucky, in the back end of the wagon they had a cow tied. They used a hay-rack because they could put on it all their kitchen stuff and bits of furniture; and they were going to some other place. Why? Because of lack of moisture.

I am anxious that one scheme be undertaken, and we have heard that a beginning is to be made in connection with the Red Deer river development. I do not think the hon. member for Davenport occupied all the time of the engineers when he was in western Canada recently; perhaps it would be better to say that they occupied all his time, but in any event these same men tell me that from that development, which includes a 150-foot dam, we can get enough power to electrify all the farms in that part of the country. Let us be practical; let us see where our money is going. We gave out relief in large sums in that area, and as someone has so well said we got nothing from it except a number of angry people. I am quite sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would appreciate that if he were here, because he gave them all this dough; then everybody voted against him and threw out his outfit, so that it is difficult to buy votes in that way. I like the direct method; $2, and nobody says anything about it.

In any event, we have spent all this money and we have received nothing from it. With respect, sir, I say that in that arid land when they have rain they raise wonderful crops. I have seen them grow sixty bushels of wheat to the acre around Medicine Hat, and I am not using a bit of imagination. The land is tremendously fertile if only it can get some moisture. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) put it, it needs just that other inch. I think he is wrong; I have a record of the moisture every year from 1933 to 1946. And I believe we need more than another inch; certainly that is so in a bad year.

What happens when you get an irrigation system out there? Practically no wheat is grown at Brooks to-day. It becomes a specialized business; seed crops, peas, beans, small fruits and that sort of thing. I mean it is not going to increase the thing of which we have most, and I agree that there should be no difficulty about that. It becomes a specialized show. We will not interfere with your markets here, because we cannot ship these products that far. No matter how good we are, we just cannot overcome the north shore of lake Superior. I see the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) is here; probably he is going to tell me more about coal before this session is finished, but he knows there are transportation difficulties. In all seriousness, I say that we in this house should regard this as a national problem, as it is. The Ontario canals were national problems. All we want is canals. We will use them for a different purpose; but will anyone tell me that we in the west got any benefit from the canals in eastern Canada? Of course we did not, but we did not complain; we figured it was in the interests of the country that this should be done. So that all we are asking is a few canals which will generally add to the wealth of Canada, as I am quite sure the little bits of ditches here in the east have done.

Now a word as to money. I do not know anything about money; that is, about cost, and in that respect I like the terms of the resolution, which asks that a complete examination of the picture should be made.

I cannot sit down without giving the house a history of irrigation in our province. The Canadian Pacific railway had both the eastern irrigation scheme and the western scheme, coming from the Bow river. They spent millions of dollars and then gave it all away; houses, horses, machinery, ditches—one conduit over two miles long, just east of the town of Brooks—land and everything else including $450,000 as working capital. They gave it all away in order to get out of it. Why? Their irrigation fee was 50 cents an acre. They have some good men in that district. They took hold of the thing, raised the fee to $1 an acre, and then got tough. As everyone knows, nobody will pay the government or the Canadian Pacific railway anything if they can possibly avoid doing so. That just seems to be true throughout the length and breadth of this country; and nobody paid the C.P.R. So that they found themselves supporting this thing with tremendous losses every year. I believe the district took it over about five or six years ago. Their ditches are clean; their roads are good, and instead of working capital of $450,000 to-day they have working capital of well over $1,000,000. That shows what can be done if the people who are there take an interest in the picture.

At the session before last of the Alberta legislature a similar group took over the western district, which is immediately east of Calgary, in around Strathmore and Gleichen. The C.P.R. gave them the same amount of money. They could not give them the land, because they did not own it any longer, but even in one short year they are making a success of that business. The Lethbridge Northern, as hon. members know, is a government-supported affair, and it seems to me that when we have operation by governments or railroads we get into trouble. But if we can have local management of these things they can be made successful and, as my hon. friend has told us, they can become self-liquidating propositions. Why, in the eastern irrigation district they grow fruit; they grow anything there.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, having talked about four times longer than I intended to, I am still in favour of the resolution.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, having spent many years in the west, in both Manitoba and Saskatchewan, I would have no trouble whatever in occupying forty minutes in describing the good derived from plenty of moisture over certain parts of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. However, I do not think I am intruding when I say that moisture is no more necessary for growing crops than is good food and lots of milk for growing boys.

Therefore I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of congratulating Your Honour on providing a free meal for our page boys once each sitting day in addition to a drink of good wholesome milk at 4.30 in the afternoon. This is most commendable; and if Your Honour continues doing this sort of thing for our page boys, it will be a fine bonus for them. On behalf of those for whom I might speak may I commend Mr. Speaker's action, and his treatment of these page boys, who are the best boys in Canada to-day.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this resolution I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) to whom all westerners owe a great deal. All of us appreciate his efforts to educate the public of Canada to the very great need for irrigation in western Canada.

I particularly wish to thank the hon. member for the map indicating the Saskatchewan river power, navigation and irrigation rehabilitation scheme which he has proposed.

A large part of the constituency of Weyburn, which I have the good fortune to represent, is embraced in this project, for it includes the Soo line district, as well as the Regina plains and Arcola line areas. In this region are located the Souris river, Long and Wascana creeks; and may I say that this is one of the most productive areas in the whole of Saskatchewan.

Most western people are interested in irrigation, for the greatest natural hazards in the southern portions of Saskatchewan and Alberta are the fairly frequent and all too regular cycles of drought. According to records, droughts occurred during the periods 1838-48, 1885-95 and 1929-38. It appears that drought is widespread in the prairie provinces every thirty years or so and extends over a decade with a varying degree of intensity. The worst year which the western agriculturist has experienced was 1937. That year half the population of Saskatchewan was forced to accept government relief and the whole situation savoured of a national calamity. On that occasion the federal authorities came to the aid of provincial governments in the west, and kind-hearted folk from all parts of Canada dispatched trainloads of food and clothing to aid the stricken people of the plains.

On that occasion live stock were slaughtered by the thousands because of lack of water and the scarcity of fodder with which to feed them.

Fine herds of cattle were marketed for $8 and $10 a head. Other thousands were transported east and west of the prairies where fodder was available. Trainloads of grain and other fodder were shipped to the west at great expense to the public to keep alive the relatively few remaining animals the people were permitted to retain on the farm. I believe this catastrophe could have been averted had a programme of water conservation been embarked upon years ago. A programme embracing the construction of small dams, dug-outs, and small irrigation projects would have provided water for live stock and the much needed fodder for their sustenance.

Such a scheme, together with larger irrigation projects as envisaged by the resolution before the house, while incurring the initial outlay of considerable sums of money would lend stability to western agriculture and create a prosperous farming population, so necessary to the prosperity of the whole national economy.

Everyone agrees that irrigation on a large scale requires detailed planning in engineering and an exhaustive study of the economic aspects involved. I believe, if this is done, that irrigation of the western prairies will be found to be economically sound and a profitable investment.

Anyone who has inspected the 500,000 acres of irrigated land in Alberta will recognize the great material advantages accruing from such development.

Irrigated land supports from nine to ten times as many people there as do the dry farming areas surrounding those projects.

There are 4,500 prosperous farmers in the district, making for a steadying influence on Alberta's economy. Over a ten-year period the average wheat production exceeded dry area yield by almost twelve bushels an acre. If we assume that this whole irrigated area produced nothing but wheat that would mean almost $7 million worth of new wealth for Alberta every year. But other crops are produced in this region, all of which produce more per acre than wheat. For instance, eleven per cent of the sugar production of Canada comes from sugar beets produced in this area.

Irrigation is necessary for the economic stabilization of the western provinces. In order to achieve a well-balanced and stable economy there must be diversification of industry.

The whole matter of irrigation must be approached from the national viewpoint, since Canadian prosperity and well-being are impossible while a large area of the prairies is subject to the wide fluctuations of income caused by repeated crop failures induced by drought. A stabilized western economy would create a steady market for eastern manufactured commodities. The establishment of secondary industries for the processing of primary products from the farm would create more wealth in the west and for Canada. They would employ many workers who must of necessity consume primary products and the goods from Canadian factories. Without irrigation and its attendant hydro development many such industries could not be established.

In closing, may I enumerate some of the major benefits that would result from western irrigation:

(1) It would permit a greater range of diversified crop production and an increase in live stock population.

(2) It would tend to stabilize crop production and would ensure against total crop failure.

(3) Stability of farm tenure would be established with a higher standard of living.

(4) A broad, sound base for industrial development would be set up.

(5) Electric power for industry and rural electrification would be created.

(6) There would be established a source of stable revenue for the municipal, provincial and federal governments of the country.

I shall support the resolution.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house moved by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of introducing legislation during this session to set up a permanent interprovincial board or commission on which the three prairie provinces and the dominion would have equal representation under the chairmanship of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or some other qualified person, to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river.

[Mr. McKay.]

The contents of this resolution have been discussed many times in this house, always under the auspices of the hon. gentleman. He has now, I think, gained for the proposal he has announced in this house during many years support which I am sure must be gratifying to him, and I congratulate him upon the method and determination with which he has continued his fight for water for the prairie provinces, although, being an eastern member, he is not so politically identified with those particular provinces. I like to think of him as a very close friend, not as a member of a constituency but as a citizen of Canada, knowing that in what he now proposes in his motion that is now before the house he is dealing with a matter that will have an effect upon the economic life of all Canada and not upon any particular constituency.

In this proposal he is asking for the setting up of a commission, and I should like to deal with the history of the transactions that have taken place since the natural resources were transferred to the province of Alberta in 1930. I was asked a question in the house by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and also by another hon. member as to what the government had done in the light of the reports that had come from the committee. The hon. member for Davenport divided his motion into two parts.

In the first instance, he spoke of the conservation of water and dealt more particularly with conditions in Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) also followed the same line as far as Alberta was concerned. In the second place, the hon. member for Davenport dealt with it from the point of view of the watershed on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. There are two different proposals, both related to each other but both similar, although easily distinguished.

With regard to the first of these, I may say that the rivers of the prairie provinces are interprovincial or international in character. Every important stream in those provinces is shared by another province, by the northwest territories or by the states that are immediately over the border. From the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains the main sources of water flow easterly across the three provinces and northerly to the northwest territories, and the boundaries of those political divisions bear no relation to the physical characteristics of the areas which they include.

Prior to 1930 all these waters were administered by the dominion, which greatly simplified all questions of use and control. From the first settlements on the prairie up to that date a large number of water rights were granted by the Department of the Interior with an almost complete absence of litigation between interests claiming conflicting rights, and no questions arose as between one province and another. Since the transfer of the natural resources, four jurisdictions—the dominion and the three provinces—administer these same waters. While up to the present no serious difficulties have arisen, minor questions having been settled in an amicable manner, it does not follow that the need for planning and apportionment has lessened by the lapse of time. The contrary is true.

Following the transfer of the natural resources there came a long period of depression when there was no incentive for new undertakings. This was partly overcome by the activities of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration. It is interesting and, I am sure, gratifying to all members of the house to hear the praise that has been lavished upon the work of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration. I am sure that will encourage them to carry on even in a larger degree than they have done hitherto.

Changed conditions are favourable for new developments, many of which have been planned and some have already been authorized. Never before have the use and conservation of the prairie water supply been so needed. I doubt if there are two things more needed in the Dominion of Canada than, first, water, and then, oil. This department has been endeavouring as best it can with all the facilities and resources at its command to find both.

This department is satisfied that a board or authority of some kind is necessary to assist and advise in the administration of all interprovincial waters and that the dominion is entitled to representation on such a board as the administrator of the northwest territories, as being responsible for international boundary waters and by reason of its operations under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Action to set up a board representative of the three prairie provinces and the dominion which would examine and report upon the most effective use or control of waters common to two or more of the parties was begun as soon as the agreement for the transfer from the dominion to the provinces of resources, including water resources, was completed in 1930. It was intended that this agreement, which was drawn and which was submitted to the provinces, should become effective about the same time as the transfer agreements. For this purpose negotiations were entered into with the provincial premiers and a draft agreement to establish a western provinces water board was prepared by this department. That was accepted by the provinces and signed by the three premiers under date of the 24th October, 1930. For some reason there were some clauses in it which seemed to operate unfairly against the dominion, and Justice, at that time being consulted, were not in favour of the agreement as drawn.

It was not until 1937 that the province of Manitoba began to make inquiries with regard to the rehabilitation plans for the western drought areas which called for taking water from interprovincial streams, such as the South Saskatchewan river, and which it was feared might affect future power developments within the province. Consideration was sought for the establishment of such a board to anticipate the problems which might arise and thereby avoid possible disputes relating to interprovincial streams.

The then minister, the Hon. Mr. Crerar, replied on April 16, 1937, that he was in favour of such a board; and that it would prove of very great value for the purpose intended. He said that he was in favour of carrying on the negotiations with respect to the formation of the board and that he would be glad to communicate with the other provinces in due course. A few days later he wrote to the ministers in charge of water resources in Alberta and Saskatchewan suggesting that the agreement of 1930 be brought up to date—I am speaking of 1937 now—and the objectives of the board and the proposed method of operations be discussed between the responsible technical officers.

Hon. Mr. Kerr, the natural resources minister of Saskatchewan, immediately replied as favouring the board and referred to the recent amendment to the water rights act, 1931, which authorized him as minister to enter into agreements with the other provinces and the dominion for the establishment of a board to control the use of interprovincial waters. The other ministers stated that they were prepared to give the proposal careful consideration.

A new agreement was drawn, prepared by this department and submitted to the three provincial ministers concerned. The new draft proposed an arrangement much simpler than the previous one. Instead of an agreement between governments, it was to be an agreement between the ministers responsible for the administration of water resources in the four areas, and was to be advisory only. I have the substance of the agreement here, but I do not think I need trouble the house with the terms of it except to say that the rights of the dominion were protected. The powers of the advisory board were set out clearly and in detail.

The basic principle underlying the formation of the board was that it would be a technical board consisting of the officers responsible for the detailed administration of water resources in each of the jurisdictions affected and reporting to the ministers in executive control of these resources.

The new draft was accepted by Mr. Kerr for Saskatchewan on June 30, 1937, and by Mr. McDiarmid for Manitoba on October 8 of the same year, but the Alberta minister declined to take action, although pressed to do so by the Alberta director of water resources.

The matter was again brought to the attention of the Alberta minister, now the Hon. Mr. MacMillan, by the acting deputy minister of this department on August 11, 1941. Mr. MacMillan replied on January 2, 1942, to the effect that his province did not see the need of such a board on the grounds that Saskatchewan was the only province that could be affected by rights granted by Alberta and that so far the authorities in Saskatchewan had not intimated that they wished to discuss any questions. There was a further exchange of letters shortly after, but Mr. MacMillan remained unconvinced.

There was no further action at that time, but the approaching end of the war brought a renewed interest throughout the west in large-scale projects for irrigation and power. During 1944, boards of trade at Saskatoon, Prince Albert and Perdue in Saskatchewan, and Drumheller and Craigmile in Alberta passed resolutions asking the Department of Mines and Resources to set up a water board for the prairie provinces:

> . . . whose duty it would be, among others, to assemble all the available stream flow data of western rivers and establish such new stations as may be required to get a complete record of the river discharge throughout the whole western drainage area, and to determine the most feasible and economical water power and irrigation projects that would make the best use of all the available drainage water, with the object of advising the various governments concerned of the possibilities of the area.

The establishment of such a board has also been endorsed by the dominion subcommittee on agriculture and combined resources set up in connection with the reconstruction programme of the dominion-provincial conference.

In consequence of these large-scale irrigation and other projects proposed as a post-war measure of rehabilitation, the department again wrote to Mr. MacMillan on June 13, 1944, suggesting that if, in view of this changed situation, Mr. MacMillan was agreeable to having a board constituted under section 64 of the Alberta Water Resources Act, which provides appropriate authority, the minister would be glad to review the matter with the responsible ministers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba who had previously expressed their approval.

There is no reply to this letter on file, and so far as the dominion is concerned the matter rests at this stage.

Within a few months after the minister's last letter to Mr. MacMillan, the provinces took action without reference to the dominion. At a meeting held at Saskatoon on September 21, 1944, it was decided by Hon. N. E. Tanner, Alberta minister of lands and mines, Hon. J. H. Phelps, Saskatchewan minister of natural resources, and Hon. J. S. McDiarmid, Manitoba minister of mines and natural resources, to establish a water board representative of the three prairie provinces under an agreement along the lines of that prepared by this department in 1937.

At the time of this meeting it was the understanding of those present that the board should be advisory only and should have no jurisdiction in the matter of allocating water rights with respect to interprovincial watersheds as between the three provinces concerned.

Some time elapsed before the formal agreement was completed, this being dated December 7, 1945. The present representatives on the board are, for Alberta, Mr. Ben Russell, director of water resources; for Saskatchewan, Mr. G. N. Munro, chief engineer, water rights branch; and for Manitoba, Mr. D. M. Stephens, deputy minister of mines and natural resources.

Arrangements have been made for an organization meeting of the board to be held at Saskatoon on April 1 and 2. Questions relating to procedure as well as with regard to specific problems to which the board might devote immediate attention will probably be decided upon at that time.

It is understood that when the decision was made to set up the board the dominion was not asked to participate on account of objection by the representative of Alberta, but those from the other two provinces felt that, while it would be desirable to have the dominion interest in water resources represented, there would be a considerable advantage in having the work begun on a provincial basis.

That is the position so far as the conservation of water in Saskatchewan is concerned. An advisory board has been formed representing the three provinces, with no representation of the dominion upon it, and for that reason, as I said before, that is where the dominion goes out of the picture as at this stage.

The motion that is before the house aks for the setting up of an interprovincial board. I suggest that we as a dominion cannot set up through this house a board which is going to take over the jurisidiction of either of the three provinces and that any board that is set up must be with the consent and approval of the three provinces. For that reason I suggest that that part of the hon. member's motion has already been met by the three provinces, which have made their choice of an advisory board.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister not overlooking the fact that, the Saskatchewan river being a navigable river, none of the three provinces has any jurisdiction over its water except for power purposes and that the board they set up has not functioned? My information is that it is not going to function and that they would be very glad to have the dominion cooperate in the manner suggested in the motion with equal representation of the prairie provinces and the dominion on the board.

Mr. GLEN: I am not overlooking the fact that the dominion government is deeply concerned in all that pertains to this matter because it is an economic matter affecting the provinces, which are equally interested and are anxious to share in the conservation of the water in those three provinces. I do not think that the hon. member would suggest that we should set up a commission now just because the Saskatchewan river may be a navigable river; that because of that fact we should take upon ourselves the setting up of a commission which would advise the three provinces without their having some say in the setting up of that commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: Each province would name the same number of representatives to the board and have equal representation with the dominion. You cannot do anything else.

Mr. GLEN: A board has been set up by three provinces and the dominion is not represented on it at the present moment. Therefore the proposal in the motion of the hon. member for the appointment of a commission would, if it were carried out, be overriding the wishes of the provinces, which have already set up their own commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister does not seem to realize that the board which has been set up acts only in an advisory capacity to the provinces themselves. It has no jurisdiction over a navigable river.

Mr. GLEN: I have already said that. I have also stated that when the agreement was being prepared by the dominion with the provinces the commission was to be of an advisory character, without any executive power.

The hon. member then addressed himself to the question of the protection of the forests on the east slope of the Rocky mountains. Here again I must give a little of the history of the forestry of the eastern slope.

The Rocky mountains forest reserve was established in 1911, at which time the dominion government through the dominion forest service of the Department of the Interior inaugurated a development policy of administration and protection, which continued until the transfer of the resources late in 1930. Complete control of all the natural resources within the boundaries of the forest reserve was vested in the forest service. These included fire protection, timber disposal, grazing uses, rental of surface rights, and mining claims, permits to hunters and trappers for the erection of cabins and many other miscellaneous uses.

While administration of hunting and fishing was a function of the province, a measure of control was exercised by the dominion forest officers through the requirement for travel permits; in fact, during periods of high fire hazards large sections of this area were closed to hunting and travel.

The total area of the east slope reserves as of 1930 was 13,786 square miles, but certain proposed additional areas were under consideration. When the province of Alberta took over these areas were added and the total area of provincial forest reserves on the east slope now stands at 14,266 square miles.

That land was divided into five units under the dominion. When the province took it over they made it into three and then began their jurisdiction to protect these forests. Unfortunately, the experience of the province was that the losses were much greater than they had been under the dominion government, the reason being that they had not the money necessary to provide that forest protection at that time.

Communications were exchanged between the province and the dominion with regard to the taking over of the east slope of the Rockies by the dominion, and in the first instance a letter was written on December 10, 1937, by the then provincial minister, Mr. N. E. Tanner, of which I have here a copy, dealing with the whole matter:

When in Ottawa recently my colleague—the Hon. Solon Low, provincial treasurer—had intended to discuss with you the matter of our forest reserves situate on the east slope of the Rocky mountains, but owing to your absence, also that of Doctor Camsell, he mentioned the subject to the department and I am writing at some length so that you may more fully understand our attitude.

As you are aware these reserves are considerably important when consideration is being given to the rehabilitation of the drought areas, as all our large rivers, with the exception of the Peace, have their source in the forest reserves.

While these waters are of importance to Alberta, they flow through our neighbouring province of Saskatchewan into Manitoba, and we feel that Alberta is entitled to some consideration in maintaining the organization established during the administration of the resources by the Department of the Interior. Such assistance might conceivably be along the lines of the Clarke-McNary legislation in the United States of America, with which no doubt your department is very well acquainted.

I understand that in the year 1924 the President of the United States of America gave his approval to "an act to provide for forest lands, for the reforestation of denuded areas, for the extension of national forests, and for other purposes in order to promote the continuous production of timber on lands chiefly suitable therefor," and in so doing the President and congress established on a statutory basis a fundamental forest policy for the United States . . .

You will readily appreciate that if the province were to discontinue this service we might anticipate a serious depletion of the forest cover within a few years, and the passing of this protection would have a considerable effect on the distribution of water throughout the following years.

So long as the east slope of the Rocky mountains is well timbered the periodic run-off will be well controlled by nature, but with the loss of the timber we could expect periods of high water in the early spring and the water courses practically, if not, dry, in the summer and fall seasons.

The importance of the east slope watershed has been recognized in publications that have been issued by various governmental departments, as the agricultural development depends for its success, to a large extent, on a dependable water supply for domestic use, power and especially, for irrigation projects.

Your department will have given these matters their earnest consideration in dealing with the rehabilitation programme for the drought areas, and the information as to stream measurements is a matter of record in your department; this work having been continued as a federal service under an arrangement with the province.

All of these facts must have been recognized by Canada when considering the transfer of the natural resources to the three western provinces as the draft agreement of January, 1926, reserved to Canada the crown lands included in the Rocky mountain forest reserve, so that these lands might continue to be administered by the government of Canada for the purposes of Canada.

It is understood that the preliminary drafts of the agreement finally made in December, 1929, had continued this reservation, but for some unknown reason, this section was withdrawn from the agreement as completed.

Were the government of Canada to feel that it could not consider making a grant to Alberta along the lines of the Clarke-McNary legislation, would it be possible to consider having these areas again vested in Canada for administration?

That letter was written on December 10, 1937. There was further correspondence with the then minister with regard to forest protection, and a letter written on February 16, 1938, reads:

Dear Mr. Crerar:

Consideration has been given to your letter of the 29th ultimo, on the subject of our discussion relative to the forest reserves situate on the east slope of the Rocky mountains, and may I again emphasize that Alberta has, since the transfer of the resources, expended a large sum in maintaining a staff on these reserves.

We freely admit, however, that an adequate protective service has not been furnished at any time since the province took control, although more money has been expended each year than essential for the welfare of Alberta.

This expenditure, we can no longer justify under existing financial conditions, and it is our proposal to immediately curtail this service as in justice to our people we cannot continue an expenditure in the interests of our neighbouring province.

On the other hand, I think that I should draw to your attention once more the fact that greater protection is necessary in this area in order to maintain a more equitable flow of water through the streams having their origin there.

It seems to me that ay such expenditure made by the federal government in this respect would be much less than the saving which would be possible in the drought area as a result of this protection.

Our great concern is, although we realize the importance and necessity of protection in the interests of the timber, adjoining parks, and especially the watershed, we find it necessary to reduce our staff and protection. With this in mind I felt that it would be only right for me to advise your government before any such curtailing of service was made effective.

The question of minerals underlying these lands should not cloud the issue as their administration has no bearing on the protective features. In fact, this was fully acknowledged in the draft agreements that were the subject of negotiation before the resources were actually transferred to Alberta for administration.

Later on, the discussion was renewed with regard to the taking over of the projects, and the then minister, Mr. Crerar, wrote a letter to Mr. Tanner under date of August 18, 1943, as follows:

We are considering projects that might be included in a scheme of post-war development. For many reasons, which it is unnecessary to recapitulate in this letter because you are thoroughly familiar with them, I believe it is of importance that steps should be taken to more adequately protect the east slopes of the Rocky mountains in Alberta. These are in the main included in provincial forest reserves. This is a project that would provide much useful employment.

We had some correspondence on this subject in 1938 and it was mentioned by the Honourable Mr. Maynard at the forestry conference with provincial ministers last May. I would refer you to my letter of January 29, 1938. The only difference of opinion that developed in our correspondence was concerning the under-rights. I can assure you that there is an appreciation of the position of the province in this respect. Provided that an agreement can be reached whereby the development of mining and oil rights is not allowed to jeopardize the effective administration of the area for the purposes for which the dominion might take over responsibility, I would be prepared to recommend the acceptance of your view as to the retention of under-rights by the province. I would like to have confirmation from you of the fact that your government is still prepared to turn over the surface rights and the resources thereon in order that the watershed protection functions of the area may be conserved to the general advantage of Canada. If an agreement can be reached by our respective governments, plans for the protection of the area could be got under way at once and put into effect immediately the war ends.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What were those rights—"under-rights" or "surface rights"?

Mr. GLEN: Under-rights. He is speaking there of minerals, ore particularly.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Under-rights?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What are they?

Mr. GLEN: As opposed to surface rights.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Minerals.

Mr. GLEN: I continue:

It is therefore desirable that we decide upon the details of the arrangement in the meantime.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) T. A. Crerar.

That was written on August 18, 1943. Then on September 29, 1943, Mr. Tanner replied as follows:

I regret that so much time has elapsed in answering your letter of the 18th ultimo.

I have spent some time in discussing the subject of your letter with the officers of the department, in an endeavour to get a clear picture of all that is involved, so that I might present it to the government for consideration. I have also asked our subcommittee on natural resources, which is a part of the post-war reconstruction committee, to give me their views on this matter. I hope to be able to advise you further in the near future.

I might say that I am very desirous of being able to work out some satisfactory arrangement whereby the east slope of the Rocky mountains in this province can be given the attention which it deserves, with the cost of administration equitably borne by those concerned.

It will be remembered that in the first letter I read they were prepared to turn back the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains to the government, but now they are willing to enter into some arrangement. On December 11, 1943, a letter was written by the then minister, Mr. Crerar, to Mr. Tanner, which reads as follows:

Re protection of forests on east slopes of the Rocky mountains

Following the discussion with Premier Manning, yourself and your deputy minister, Mr. Harvie, in my office, I undertook to write you again on this subject. Evidently the provincial government would prefer to continue the administration of the area, but considers that because of the benefits which undoubtetdly accrue to Saskatchewan and Manitoba from the maintenance of adequate forest cover on the east slopes the dominion should provide the funds for forest protection.

I endeavoured to set forth the difficulties of such a course from the dominion standpoint and repeated the offer which I made to you recently that I would recommend to the government taking over the administration of the east slopes of the Rockies, subject to the province retaining control of the under-rights.

As we were concluding our discussion the idea of constituting a commission or board representative of both dominion and provincial governments to manage the east slopes in the best interests of all concerned was suggested. Our view is that if the dominion is to put up all the money for the protection of these slopes then the dominion should have control of the area and be free to conduct the administration in such a manner as to ensure the results desired. My proposal meets the conditions on which your government was willing to transfer the lands in 1938 and I hope that you will not consider that I am unreasonable in urging settlement of the matter on this basis if I can secure the concurrence of our government and the approval of parliament.

The dominion now has the responsibility for the protection of the forests in the large park areas lying immediately to the west. It would seem reasonable to expect, therefore, that the two areas could be more efficiently and economically administered by one department rather than having two different administrations with the resulting duplication and overlapping of service. As I mentioned to you the dominion does not expect to make a profit on administering the forest resources. If the time should ever arrive when the amount received in revenues should exceed the dominion's total expenditures, then we would be willing to turn over the surplus to the province.

We did not discuss the length of time the area should be under special control. While I feel it should be for a long period of years, if it would be helpful to your government in reaching a decision, I would be prepared to recommend that at the end of twenty-five years the situation might be reviewed in the light of the circumstances then existing. That is, if an agreement were reached between the two governments along the lines of our proposal some years ago, it would not mean that the area for all time to come would be removed permanently from provincial administration. I do feel, however, that any arrangement that is made should continue for at least twenty-five years in order to secure satisfactory and permanent results from the expenditures that will have to be made.

I shall be glad to hear further from you on this subject at your early convenience.

Again on October 26, 1944, Mr. Crerar wrote Mr. Tanner as follows:

Following our conference last winter, I wrote you under date of the 11th December, 1943, respecting the possibility of entering into arrangements with your province for the better protection of the watershed forests of the east slopes of the Rocky mountains.

As you know, this is a matter of more than local importance, affecting as it does agricultural and power problems in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, as well as of Alberta. In some quarters the view is held that the national interest demands the assumption of a measure of permanent responsibility by the dominion, and that this is a question that should be actively dealt with as an important element in the reconstruction planning. I should be very pleased indeed to have the present views of your government on the proposals I have placed before you.

In reply, this letter of December 20, 1944, was received from Mr. Tanner:

Dear Mr. Crerar:

Re: protection of forests on the east slope of the Rocky mountains

Following our discussion in Ottawa on the 6th instant. I agreed to write you setting out as clearly as possible what I thought our programme should be regarding the above question. In doing this I shall set it out under separate points:

1. The department of lands and mines and the Alberta government recognize the need of assisting forest fire prevention on all forested areas in the province, built to the most modern and efficient standard.

2. As the east slope lies within the province of Alberta no other province is so intimately involved with the regulatory functions of forests in respect to water conservation. The stability of irrigation farming, of the beet sugar and canning industry, and of ranching, as well as water supplies for rural and urban settlement, is founded upon the constancy of stream flow and water level, largely dependent upon the condition of the watershed forest. The future of the forest industries is also dependent upon the continuance of forest growth.

3. Alberta does not favour divided jurisdiction in the handling of any of the natural resources. The province opposes the administration of any portion of her forest domain by a forest service conducting its operations from the federal seat of government. Any such form of control is in our view dilatory in method and not always efficient.

4. While opposed to the transfer of any portion of Alberta's forest area to dominion management, we feel that inasmuch as such watersheds affect the welfare of important areas beyond the provincial boundaries, it is the dominion government's responsibility to assist financially in the protection and management of the east slope watersheds.

5. Providing the dominion government is prepared to give this financial assistance, Alberta is willing to give full effect to a forest protection and forest management plan, which would be in the interests of all parts of the dominion affected. The province is prepared to engage any technical experienced competent engineer which a comprehensive plan of protection and management might require.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has already spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. GLEN: Thank you. I continue with the letter:

6. In order to satisfy the dominion government that any financial assistance given would be used on a programme of control and management which would be in the best interests of Alberta and the other provinces affected, we would favour the setting up of an advisory board on which the federal government would have a representative. This board would recommend a programme which might extend over a period of from five to twenty-five years, such programme to be approved by both governments, and a division of the costs agreed upon. The Alberta government would then accept full responsibility for putting into effect the programme as recommended by the advisory board, and approved by the dominion, with the understanding that each year as the work is done according to the programme the dominion government would pay its share of the costs as agreed upon.

7. The viewpoint of the Alberta government is that the forest resources of the province call for a long-term policy assuring of full maintenance under all conditions, and in keeping with the best known engineering standards, and we are convinced that all advantages by any plan which may be proposed, can be secured by all administration being retained by the provincial government.

8. We believe that as a result of such an elaborate programme greater revenue might be obtained from this area, and, therefore, during the term of this agreement the Alberta government would be prepared to make available to the dominion government its proportionate share of such increased revenue.

I shall appreciate hearing from you in the very near future as to how far you are prepared to go in a programme of this kind.

That is the situation as far as the east slope of the Rocky mountains is concerned. The province of Alberta desires, and has so indicated, to have complete control of the administration. It asks financial assistance from the dominion government, to be expended by the province and accounted for through the board. Nothing further was done at that time, but as far as the dominion is concerned we have now followed it up in the dominion government proposals to the dominion-provincial conference. On page 24, paragraph 4. under the heading, "Activities for which the dominion is fully responsible or is prepared to consider assuming full responsibility by suitable arrangements with the provincial governments wherever necessary," I find this:

4. Development and conservation of resources which are interprovincial in nature or have important interprovincial or regional effects:

(i) protection of regional watersheds; e.g., east slope of Rocky mountains;
(ii) integrated development of interprovincial river valley systems;
(iii) protection of migratory wild life;
(iv) agriculture; e.g., control of plant diseases.

That is the position of the dominion government at the moment. The matter has been the subject of the correspondence which I have read. The provinces have decided to form their own advisory board, which is now functioning. The dominion has not been asked to become a member of that board. As far as the forested area on the east slope of the Rocky mountains is concerned the province takes the position that it will not yield its jurisdiction over that area; but in view of the fact that the conservation of the forests is of value to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba in connection with the conservation of water, the province feels that the dominion should share the financial burden. The dominion has gone further now and placed its proposals before the dominion-provincial conference. There it is stated that this will be the subject of arrangement and agreement with the provinces concerned. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the dominion can do no more at this moment. They are fully seized with the utter desirability of some scheme being planned and carried into effect whereby the forests on the east slopes of the Rockies may be protected and water may be conserved to the advantage of Manitoba and Saskatchewan; and they are exercised that these things should be done at the earliest possible moment.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) for having brought this matter before the house. I suggest that the substance of the motion he has moved has already been implemented, as far as the provinces are concerned, by the appointment of the advisory board. I suggest to him also that in the circumstances it would be presuming on the part of the dominion government to impose a body on each of the three provinces without even being asked or without their approval. In the meantime an offer has been made by the dominion, which will be considered at the conference which is to take place on April 25, when some definite plan must be entered into for the conservation of the water and the forests. I can assure the hon. member that when in his motion he speaks of "immediate consideration", these matters are being given daily consideration. Something will have to be done, because at the present time the situation is unsatisfactory from all points of view. At an early date a plan must be evolved under which the forests on the east slope of the Rockies will be protected and water will be conserved so that the other provinces may get the benefit. Therefore I suggest to the hon. member that, having given the house an opportunity to express its viewpoint with regard to irrigation and other matters which will have to be considered, he has done a very great service, but in the light of what I have said I suggest that the hon. gentleman should withdraw the motion.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate. I regret that I was unable to hear the whole speech of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), but I take it that he was speaking on technical grounds against the motion now before the house and suggesting some other plan by which these measures might be made effective. Since I represent a portion of Saskatchewan which is very much interested in this irrigation project, I think I should have something to say

In the first place, I feel it is tremendously important that at this time some responsibility should be assumed by the federal government in connection with a large-scale irrigation project such as that outlined by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). To-day, simply because of the failure of past governments to formulate plans and develop these irrigation projects, we are scraping our bins right at a time when the whole world is hungry, when we have millions of people starving. As I said last session, I am firmly of opinion that here in Canada we should establish the principle of the ever-normal granary. During the latter part of the war we were spending something like $400,000,000 a month for war purposes; and I submit that if we could do that for war, we can do it for peace. Some hon. members to my right have spoken in favour of this resolution. I do not know how they are going to bring it into harmony with large-scale production after we get back to peace-time economy. I can only say that this programme would be in complete conformity with the position taken by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; that is, planned production for use.

I should like to direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that this great Palliser triangle which is under consideration here in connection with irrigation is considered to be the bread-basket of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If I may ask a question, what did my hon. friend mean by harmonizing our suggestions with large-scale production? I did not quite get that.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): In the past when we have had plenty, when our granaries have been bursting with wheat when our corrals have been filled with live stock, under the private enterprise system we have always had depressed prices and poverty among our farm people. What we want is a planned economy under which we shall produce and still have fair prices for the farm people. We are concerned with all the peoples of the world, all the hungry throughout the world. As the leader of this group said last session, nations march when they are hungry. So that to-day, when we are trying to formulate plans respecting the united nations organization, it is our duty to produce as much as we can. The greatest natural hazard we have in connection with agricultural production is that of drought. In the southern part of the province from which I come I have seen conditions, for several years, under which our people, due to the vagaries of the economic system, prices going up and down, and because of drought conditions have been forced to go to other parts of the dominion or the province. Therefore I say this is a project which, for only technical reasons, should not be thrown back into the lap of the province, but should be accepted as a responsibility of the federal government.

The irrigation project would come down from Regina to Moose Jaw, and right down through Estevan, in my constituency. We already have a project under P.F.R.A. through which from Estevan to Dead lake we can irrigate around 3,000 acres of land. Then, from Estevan to the international boundary there is another 3,000 acres which can be irrigated.

We are endeavouring to enter upon a scheme in that area whereby we can open that land for settlement by veterans, as a result of which they can go back to irrigated land and enjoy some stability in farming. Surely this is a worthwhile undertaking. Any larger scheme running down from the Saskatchewan river, through Moose Jaw and Regina, supplying those cities with water, and servicing a large acreage of land, would add tremendously to the security of those people.

A survey respecting industrial development within the province was made and handed to the present provincial government. In the survey it is stated that it was not feasible to enter into large-scale uses of chemurgy within the province, because so often in the history of the province we have had small crops. However, if we had a scheme such as this, under which in each year we could be assured of a certain crop, the project would be feasible. When one remembers that in 1937 and 1938 we had to go as far east as Quebec and as far west as British Columbia to get fodder, when we had to ship in seed and feed, and put our farming people in that section of the province under a debt-load for seed grain which was not settled until this year, one realizes the necessity for such a scheme. In those times the people suffered greatly. They had to sell their live stock, their foundation herds, and at ruinous prices.

I believe all hon. members ought to insist that this matter be put to a vote, and that the house go on record as being in favour of it. This would give a lead to the dominion-provincial conference, and the country would know where we stand.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I desire first to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) upon placing the resolution on the order paper so that the house might discuss at length the whole question of irrigation. I believe, however, that as we face a vote it is necessary to be very careful to read the resolution, and to understand what it says. It calls for the setting up of a board, or for the passing of legislation under which the dominion government would set up a board.

Practically all hon. members who have discussed the resolution have not discussed that problem at all. Rather they have addressed themselves to the question as to the advisability of establishing an irrigation scheme. I take it there is no hon. member in the house who has any objection whatsoever to the development of an irrigation scheme.

When the minister replied, in his usual analytical fashion he directed the attention of the house to the request contained in the resolution, namely that of setting up a board. He pointed out, further, that parliament has no authority to set up such a board. He was not discussing the question as to whether the government or he were in favour of developing an irrigation scheme. Neither was he opposed in any way to the general idea of protecting our forest areas on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains.

Consequently the minister is entirely in accord with the arguments which have been advanced by all hon. members who have discussed the resolution, all of which tended to establish the idea that we should develop an irrigation scheme throughout the three prairie provinces, and thereby protect the forests. I rather got the impression that the last speaker had not grasped the distinction between the two matters involved in the resolution. I would ask that we concentrate out attention again on the real meaning of the resolution.

I agree with the minister; I think his analysis of the situation is beyond reproach. He has brought us right up to the position we now occupy in Canada, and has shown exactly—

Mr. MacNICOL: I am afraid the hon. member, like the minister, is wholly astray on the resolution. It asks for consideration, and the minister appears to be afraid of consideration. So does the hon. member. But I am going to see that there is a vote on it, anyway.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can only reassert definitely what I have already said—and the hon. member for Davenport will set me right, if I am wrong—that the idea behind the resolution is the advisability of setting up a committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: "Consideration".

Mr. COLDWELL: "Consideration" of the advisability.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is just a diplomatic way of saying the same thing.

Mr. MacNICOL: Oh, no, it is not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us read it. I hope we shall not go astray in this matter and become confused. It states:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of introducing legislation during this session to set up a permanent interprovincial board or commission—

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the hon. member afraid of consideration of that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not saying whether I am afraid or not. I am just trying to get it clear, so that we shall all know what we are talking and voting about. And it continues:

> —on which the three prairie provinces and the dominion would have equal representation under the chairmanship of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or some other qualified person, to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river.

I suggest once again, in all seriousness, and with all sincerity, to the hon. member for Davenport, that the whole gist of the resolution is that we should set up a committee, or commission. That is an altogether different matter from embarking upon an irrigation scheme or embarking upon a scheme for protecting our forest areas on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. Let me repeat once more that practically every hon. member who has discussed this resolution has approached it as though it meant the introduction of an irrigation scheme.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Showed the need for a commission.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Showed the need for bringing in an irrigation scheme. There is no member of the C.C.F. or of any other party in this house who cares a button whether or not you have a commission so long as you get irrigation. It is irrigation you want, is it not? If you can get the forests protected you do not care by what technique it is accomplished, whether there is a commission or whether there is not, or whether the dominion has anything to do with it at all.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Which side are you on?

Mr. BLACKMORE: First I want to be sure just exactly what we are talking about. That must be known before anybody can tell what side he is on. As far as irrigation is concerned, I favour one hundred per cent the ideals of the hon. member for Davenport. Certainly there should be established throughout the three prairie provinces an elaborate and extensive irrigation system by which we could use all the water which falls on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains for the improvement of conditions in the three prairie provinces. I do not think there is an hon. member in this house who does not believe that. I certainly believe it.

Furthermore, I agree entirely with the approach of the hon. member for Davenport in the matter of protecting our Rocky mountain slopes. They have been neglected far too long. Not only must we protect the forests that are now there, we must embark upon an extensive programme of reforesting those slopes. I live right close to those slopes where I can see them every day when I am home. I have been in the mountains and I have seen how fires have devastated the forests. I know how serious the matter is, and no one in Canada is more enthusiastic than I about protecting the forests. But when it comes to voting that we must set up a commission to do this, that is an entirely different matter.

This resolution calls for the setting up of a commission. Let us see if we all agree on this matter. It calls for having the dominion government obtruding itself to a certain extent into affairs which particularly and specially belong to the provinces. I am not sure that any hon. member would vote for that principle. The minister was very wise in the stand he took on this matter. Surely, if the British North America Act has any meaning at all, the provinces must have control over their resources and their property and civil rights. It is proposed to have the dominion government take action which would in effect mean the abrogating of provincial rights to a certain extent.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Did the P.F.R.A. intrude itself?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You do not want it to operate in Alberta?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hope we shall not have a lot of foolishness going on. If the hon. member for Calgary West will make sure he sees it squarely, there will be no difficulty. In connection with the P.F.R.A. I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that that is merely a scheme under which money is spent by the dominion government for the development of certain water facilities anywhere in the provinces. It has nothing to do with the taking away of any provincial jurisdiction over their waters or forests. This resolution proposes the setting up of a commission by this parliament—

Mr. CAMPBELL: What for?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The important language in it is that it proposes to set up a commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: It only asks consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To deal with a matter which is of purely provincial concern.

Mr. CAMPBELL: To conduct an investigation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In my opinion the provinces have taken exactly the right stand. They have taken the initiative and have met together. They recognized that this is a matter of provincial concern; they met to consider the problem and they have established their own board.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Which will need funds from the dominion government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is right. I think the minister indicated clearly that the next step would be that that provincial board would ask the dominion government to sit in.

I think I have made my position with respect to the resolution quite clear, and I shall turn now for a few minutes to discuss the aspects of the resolution which all hon. members up to the present time have been discussing, namely, the desirability of developing a great irrigation system and the desirability of protecting our forest areas at the head waters of our rivers.

It is well that the members of the house should know something of the efforts that Alberta has put forth up to the present time in connection with the development of irrigation. There are one or two hon. members who have indicated that they are ready to accuse Alberta of not cooperating. I trust they will not get any such ideas as that in their minds because there is no more cooperative province in the dominion than Alberta. The Hon. T. A. Crerar rose in his place two or three times and testified to that effect even while these negotiations were going on. But the people in charge of Alberta have to be watching the interests of the people of Alberta for the next hundred years.

I am not sure that I understood exactly what the minister read and I know he will put me right if I have not interpreted it correctly. Was it not the proposal of the dominion at one time that the dominion would advance money to take care of the forests if the province of Alberta would give the dominion the under-rights. What did that mean? It meant that the dominion was prepared to advance money to help protect the forests if the province of Alberta would permit the dominion to have control over the coal under the forests, over the iron under the forests and over the gold under the forests—over the under-rights. If that is not the meaning of under-rights, then what is it?

Mr. GLEN: The province is to get the under-rights.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was that involved?

Mr. GLEN: That was the suggestion which was made, that the province would get the under-rights.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would not be so objectionable. I do not wish to cause any unhappiness at all, but one of the difficulties the provinces have faced, and especially Alberta, is a tendency on the part of certain dominion officials to try to get more control over provincial affairs than they ought to have under the British North America Act. The province is prepared to recognize the dominion in its field and has always been so prepared, but it is also prepared to protect the people of Alberta in their field.

May I turn from that aspect of the question because I do not wish to spend time on it. I should like to point out just what Alberta has done already with respect to irrigation. There are four major projects which have been built with provincial guarantees. These projects are the Lethbridge Northern irrigation district, undertaken in 1919, with a total irrigable acreage of 93,000 acres; the United Irrigation district, undertaken in 1919, with a total irrigable acreage of 34,166 acres; the New West irrigation district, undertaken in July, 1922, with an irrigable acreage of 4,563 acres; the Little Bow irrigation district, undertaken in March, 1922, with a total irrigable acreage of 3,093 acres. These projects are of considerable size, particularly the Lethbridge Northern and the United irrigation districts, and the amount of money involved is large. This indicates quite clearly that the province of Alberta has been prepared to do its share in connection with the development of this great irrigation scheme and has been so for a great many years.

The province of Alberta has eight other irrigation projects, some of them of considerable size. These were all undertaken by private enterprise. They are the Canadian Pacific railway western section, undertaken in 1903, with 218,980 acres; the Canadian Pacific railway eastern section undertaken in 1903, with 250,000 acres; the Canada Land and Irrigation company, undertaken in 1908, with 130,000 acres; the A. R. and I. company, undertaken in 1899, with 100,000 acres; the Raymond irrigation district, undertaken in 1925, with 15,130 acres; the Magrath irrigation district, [illegible] acres; the Mountain View irrigation district undertaken in 1923, with 3,500; the Taber irrigation district, undertaken in 1917, with 21,499 acres. All together these irrigation districts total 880,906 acres. These are projects which have been established in Alberta and most of which are in operation right now.

There are in Alberta approximately 2,300,000 acres that could yet be brought under irrigation. They could be brought under irrigation in two ways, first of all by possible extensions where ditches have been built but have not been operated. We have two projects of that sort, the Eastern irrigation district, with 100,000 acres, and the Canada Land and Irrigation company, with 150,000 acres, or a total of 250,000 acres. What I am referring to now are extensions of schemes that are now in operation.

We have, in addition, projects which have been surveyed but which have not been constructed. One is the Lethbridge Southeastern, with 415,000 acres; the South Macleod, with 50,000 acres; Champion, with 50,000 acres; Retlaw-Lomond, with 115,000 acres; small projects, 25,000 acres; North Saskatchewan (William Pearce) project, 1,400,000 acres, or a total of 2,055,000 acres.

I think all members will realize, therefore, that Alberta is in irrigation right up to the ears. So that we must be deeply interested in this matter. We know what irrigation projects cost and we know their value.

There is another aspect of this question which I think is of interest to the house. From page 64 of "The case for Alberta", I quote:

> The total amount which the province has expended upon these projects and for which it remains liable under its guarantees, including future interest, is $16,921,728.39, made up as follows: total net outlay Lethbridge Northern, $6,410,821.98; total outlay other three districts, $473,259.34; remaining liability under guarantee, $4,911,772.07; future interest, $5,125,875.

Mr. CAMPBELL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the hon. member is not speaking to the resolution, which calls for:

> . . . a permanent interprovincial board or commission . . . to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains.

It does not say anything about Alberta irrigation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I grant that the hon. member's point is well taken, but I would point out to him that, under his argument, every speech which has been delivered here this afternoon except the speech of the minister has been out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: If some other members who have taken part in this discussion were out of order, that is no reason for the hon. member himself being out of order. I would ask him to speak on the motion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask for your ruling on this point. I am quite prepared to abide by your ruling, but in this discussion a very wide latitude has been allowed, which in my judgment was the right thing to do. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) spent the whole of his time in discussing the William Pearce project.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member not to discuss the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All I am asking, Mr. Speaker, is for your ruling on the point I raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to speak on the motion which is before the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will proceed with what I was going to say.

I should like to outline the general situation with respect to my own constituency as it bears on the subject-matter of this resolution as it was interpreted by the hon. member for Davenport. There are in southern Alberta wide areas of land which are rich and easy to work, and relatively near to railways and schools. This land has nearly all been settled and brought under cultivation. The rainfall in this area is usually too scanty, and crop failures are therefore common. The climate is well adapted to growing sugar beets, canning crops, peas, beans, corn, tomatoes and all kinds of vegetables. It is also well adapted to the production of alfalfa and other hay crops and all kinds of grain. It is one of the greatest potential food-producing areas in this dominion. All that it requires is more water.

There are in my constituency four major irrigation projects. They are the Lethbridge-Colddale district, the Raymond irrigation district, the Magrath irrigation district and the Taber irrigation district, comprising altogether 120,000 acres. These projects are irrigated from the St. Mary's river through a canal built early in the century, from 1899 to 1901. Most years there is too little water in the canals of these four projects. The result is that in July, August and September, just when the water is most needed, there is a falling off and frequently there is an acute shortage of water, especially if the snowfall in the mountains has not been adequate during the previous winter, or if there has been hot weather melting the snow rapidly in the early weeks of the year. We have known at least forty per cent too little water in the ditches right at a time when growing was most important.

In the St. Mary's river there is at the present time not a reservoir in which water can be stored and from which the water in the ditches can be supplemented. There is considerable water in Alberta if only we could store it and have it available. There is enough water in four rivers in my constituency to supply all the area in that constituency and some of the area in other constituencies, particularly Medicine Hat. There are four rivers, namely, Waterton, Belly, St. Mary's and Milk, all in southwestern Alberta. From these rivers there is available for use in irrigation 795,700 acre feet of water. This quantity, allowing for losses from evaporation and seepage, would supply the needs of 465,000 acres of land. There is a particular matter of urgency in connection with this area. The St. Mary's and Milk rivers are both so nearly international streams that the United States has a claim to a share of the water. Back in 1901 the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company began to build a canal from which the Magrath, Raymond and Lethbridge areas are now watered. Then a reclamation act was passed by the congress of the United States in 1902. The St. Mary's and Milk rivers project in Montana was authorized in 1903, and there were protests from citizens on both sides of the line, those on one side fearing that the people on the other side would get more than their share.

In consequence, a boundary waters treaty was made on January 11, 1909, in which, under article VI, there was set up an international joint commission to deal with the boundary waters. This provided for an apportionment of waters between the two countries under the direction of the commission. In the final act of the international joint commission on October 4, 1921, definite rules were laid down for dividing the water between Canada and the United States. In accordance with the final act, Canada, between 1922 and 1940, would receive annually from the St. Mary's and Milk rivers 403,200 acre-feet of water, and the United States, 324,100 acre-feet.

During the years from 1922 to 1940 and since, Canada has wasted and is now wasting 55 per cent of her share of the St. Mary's and 95 per cent of her share of the Milk river. This is extremely serious for two reasons. First, there is loss of production and of human values, and, second, there is danger of our losing our right to this water. It is recognized that a country must make beneficial use of water if it is to retain its right thereto. Canada for twenty-five years has neglected to make such beneficial use of her share of this water.

Realization of this fact will make it clear to hon. members why the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is very wisely planning to begin active work on the construction of the St. Mary's river project this year. It is in order to protect our right to the water, and I wish to commend him very highly and to express to him once more the gratitude of my constituents for his promptness in going forward with this work immediately upon the cessation of the war.

Meanwhile, what has the United States been doing with her share? The United States authorized her St. Mary's and Milk river project in 1903 and began work in 1906, completing it in 1920. She has built the Sherbourne reservoir, capable of storing 66,000 acre-feet near the head of the St. Mary's, and a diversion canal from the St. Mary's to the Milk river to carry into the Milk the United States share of the St. Mary's. Then, near the Milk river she has constructed the Fresno reservoir, capable of storing 126,000 acre-feet and the Nelson river reservoir, capable of storing 66,800 acre-feet.

It is estimated that the United States is now equipped to handle her share and ours as well, and all her share of the water is being beneficially used. She has great need for much more than she has available, and she is finding irrigation profitable, as has been pointed out several times in the debate to-day. Thus again hon. members can see why the Minister of Agriculture has taken particular care to go forward with the construction of this project as expeditiously as possible.

The dam which we need to construct in Canada in order to show our good faith is what is known as the St. Mary's river dam. This dam is situated at Spring Coulee in my constituency. Its capacity will be 270,000 acre-feet. Into it can be diverted water from the Waterton river and the Belly river. Once this dam is constructed, once this reservoir is being used, there will be no occasion for anyone from the United States to establish the idea that Canada is not making beneficial use of her water. Thus the minister is proceeding with construction of the St. Mary's river dam. From the St. Mary's river dam, water can be carried to supply all the present projects to which I have referred and to the seven other reservoirs in the district, and all these together will store enough water to supply the needs of all the present irrigation projects, and 345,000 acres of land which have not yet been brought under water.

Consequently this dam is of extremely great importance. The minister has told us to-day that $750,000 is to be spent on this dam this year. The total cost of the dam will be in the neighbourhood of $4,000,000. The reason why $750,000 is to be spent this year rather than the whole amount is that the dam cannot be built any faster. That is indicated by the apportionment of that sum of $750,000, which is about all that can be spent this year. In the second year the reservoir and outlet canals can be built at a cost of $2,250,000. Hon. members might therefore expect next year that the amount of money which will be set aside for the construction of the St. Mary's river dam will be $2,250,000. In the third year the reservoir, canal enlargement and distribution system would be built according to plan. This cost will be something over $2,250,000, estimated at pre-war prices.

There are four reasons, then, why we should go forward with this particular project as rapidly as we possibly can. The first one is the food situation; the second one is the possible war needs, for apparently we are not yet through with wars; the third one is the rehabilitation of our boys, and finally, once more, the protection of our share of the water from the St Mary's and Milk rivers.

May I refer for just a moment to the general resolution? At the outset of my remarks I pointed out that the resolution does not really call for the construction of the great irrigation system, although unquestionably it is the construction of the great irrigation system which is near to the heart of the hon. member for Davenport. I honour him greatly because of his deep interest and activity with respect to the popularization of the idea of constructing this great irrigation scheme. Since he spoke this afternoon, there has come into my hands the map of the whole area to which he referred. I wish to congratulate him again on that map. Many things are shown in detail. To my mind it is a splendid conception. I heartily support the idea. As a resident of Alberta, as a member for Alberta, let me say to the house that we in Alberta have no desire to have more of the water than is our share. We desire to see the other provinces have the advantage of water. We believe there is pleny of water in these rivers flowing down from the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains to supply the needs of all three provinces. The hon. member for Davenport expressed that idea this afternoon. From what studies I have been able to make I feel that I am justified in agreeing with him that there is plenty of water.

The next idea that was near to his heart, and which he made quite clear to the house, was that of protecting the forests on the slopes of the mountains. This must be done. Once more I am heartily in accord with that idea. I believe, of course, that dominion money must go into the protection of those forests, for the simple reason that one province simply cannot take care of the great problem which is involved in looking after those areas. All anyone needs to do is to look at a map, look at the Rocky mountains as they skirt the western boundary of Alberta, estimate the tremendous length of those mountains, estimate the amount of money which would have to be spent in order to have suitable precautions made ready to act in emergencies, such as fire hazards. Anyone can recognize that no one province in this dominion would be in a position to discharge the financial responsibilities involved. There simply must be assistance from the dominion government. This does not mean that Alberta should surrender any of her rights under the British North America Act, any of her resources or any of her property and civil rights. It does mean that assistance must come from the other provinces to protect the resource which is of vital interest to all the people of Canada.

I now find myself in a difficult position. I have to repeat once more that I favour completely the establishment of an elaborate, far-reaching thorough-going irrigation system throughout the three prairie provinces, and I favour the protection of the forests on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. But I cannot say that I favour the idea of the dominion government passing a law to set up a commission to do what this resolution calls for. There is no objection to having a committee study the situation. I think there is no danger in the wording. In that respect may I read it again. This commission is to be set up to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river. So far as I can see, there can be no objection to that if this committee has no power or authority to rule with respect to the use of the water. However, I believe the minister's point was well taken when he indicated quite clearly that it is not the proper function of the dominion government to take the initiative in this matter, especially since the provinces themselves, through their representatives, have met and proceeded to do the work which is envisaged by this resolution.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I desire to say a few words on this resolution. First of all, may I commend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) for bringing the resolution before the house. He is one of those members who have, in the words of the man on the street, what is called a roving commission. He has taken it upon himself to interest himself in parts of Canada other than his own particular riding. Perhaps he may have a little more time and may be a little better fixed financially than many other hon. members to do this, and then he is not easily intimidated with respect to going into other members' ridings and investigating what is going on there.

On various occasions the hon. member has introduced most commendable resolutions. In commending him to-night I wish at the same time to say something on the principle of the resolution. It may seem strange that one from British Columbia should rise at this late stage of the debate and deal with a resolution which refers particularly to the watershed of the Saskatchewan river. It is no more strange than the hon. member for Davenport introducing it.

As I say, I intend to deal with the resolution itself. In that regard I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who in his opening remarks drew the attention of the house to the fact that this resolution might infringe upon provincial rights.

I know there are many members in the house who do not view the infringement of provincial rights by the dominion as seriously as I do. Ever since 1939 when the dominion took over all the powers of the country many municipal and provincial governments have been set aside. As a matter of fact, in many instances provincial governments have been nothing more than glorified municipal councils, at least for the past six years. People have become so accustomed to the dominion government handling their affairs that their eyes turn to Ottawa. If their chickens do not lay, it must be the fault of the dominion government. If there is trouble at home, it must be the fault of the dominion government. On every occasion the provincial governments will be found looking to Ottawa for assistance and help. I view that tendency with alarm. I view as one who lives some three thousand miles from Ottawa viewing with alarm the centralization of power in Ottawa. I would advise members of parliament to give a little more thought to asking the dominion government to do everything within their province or within their municipality. Bit by bit power is being concentrated in the city of Ottawa, and I say the time is not yet ripe, in the interests of the welfare of the people, that all power should be centralized here.

I listened with a great deal of attention while the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) read the voluminous correspondence which has passed between the dominion government and certain provincial premiers, in which the discussion centred around the eastern watershed and the taking off of trees from the mountain-tops. The removal of the trees from both heights of land and from the mountains as well has done irreparable damage to farm land not only close to the Rocky mountains but in the other western provinces as well. In the province from which I come there was a time when the forests in the Fraser valley held the water right through the growing season. In those years the farmers had not the difficulties they have experienced since. The rain that fell in the winter and spring was held in the soil for months, generally speaking, and percolated very slowly to the creeks and rivers. Once the timber was cut off, however, the rain which fell in the winter and spring ran right off, of course causing floods during the spring season. Something else was caused in the summer time, however; a dryness resulted which has affected the growing of crops for many long years.

I remember an incident which occurred in 1932 or 1933, when under the administration of that day men were put to work cutting trees off the mountains in a district called Lillooet. The only purpose in having those men cut the trees from the mountain-tops and mountain-side was to keep the snow from hanging, although those men might have been given other and more useful work, because Lillooet is a gold centre and men were and still are making anywhere from $2 to $16 a day panning gold. But taking off that timber did irreparable damage to the district of Lillooet, and the same thing occurred in the Fraser district.

I should like to have seen a resolution of this kind broadened, not to ask the dominion government to take over irrigation projects but merely to ask it to make a survey and advise the provinces as to what should be done in regard to irrigation. Something has been said about planned economy; I believe I heard one speaker mention that this evening. From my knowledge of the prairies I believe I am correct in saying that, at the most, irrigation would affect but a fraction of the prairie land. Out of some sixty or sixty-five million acres of land, of which some twenty or thirty millions are in the prairie belt, I doubt if more than two or three million acres at the most could be brought under irrigation. It is all very well to talk about producing more food, about planned economy, and so on, and to place before the people a picture in which the whole prairie district will be helped out by some great water scheme. But for the benefit of the farmers on the prairies and some hon. members who advocate this scheme, after some practical experience I am going to predict that when that type of farming comes to the prairies many who are looking forward to it may not care to farm under it.

With irrigation you have to farm with a shovel. The irrigation ditches are all put down; but once you start irrigation you cannot just sit on your fanny and pray that the Lord will bring some rain, or send for a Hatfield to bring rain. You cannot do that any more. Once you get into irrigation you have really to work; and after a man has sat on his fanny for ten or fifteen years on the prairies, once he has to get hold of a shovel and work all day going out through the rows of trees or out among his crops he may not like it. Yet if he does not do that the water system will not be worth anything at all; I do not think any hon. member will dispute that. I know a district in the middle of British Columbia where a certain type of farmer has taken up the growing of apples and other crops under irrigation. Those farmers have gone into that district because they are not afraid of work, and because they know what they have to put up with. But I am thinking of those who have long sat looking to the clouds or to the dominion government or to a Hatfield to bring them what they need, and I am just wondering how they will like it after these irrigation schemes are put into effect. I am not too sure that they will take kindly to it. I know that many who come from the prairies to British Columbia find farming there just a little tougher than they found it in Saskatchewan, Alberta or Manitoba, although perhaps when we get into the new era that may be changed.

My main purpose in rising, Mr. Speaker, was to draw the attention of hon. members to the principles at stake in this proposal, and to advise hon. members to view with care putting into the hands of the dominion government powers which properly should belong to the provincial governments.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, with all respect to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) I should like to call your attention and that of the house to the fact that this resolution indicates no feasible conclusion. It suggests that a board or commission should be appointed to investigate and make studies, but then it does not provide what shall be done with the information they get. Are they to carry out that investigation and make those studies just for their own amusement or their own information? It does not provide that they shall report to the government or any department of the government. Why should this house want to create an institution like that, to do nothing that will be in the public interest? As far as the resolution goes, if they get any information they may keep it to themselves. I should think the hon. gentleman and other hon. members would agree that the Department of Mines and Resources has on its staff enough engineers and experts to make such an examination and report to that department. Then, if the minister chose he could report to the house and action could be taken. As I say, however, with all respect to the hon. member for Davenport I cannot see any advantage in putting through a resolution like this.

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): As I rose, Mr. Speaker, I was advised not to speak too long. I shall govern myself according to my own thoughts, however, no matter where the counsel comes from. I did not intend to speak at all, as a matter of fact, but I hesitate to let this resolution go to a vote without saying a word, after hearing the correspondence read by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen). I am somewhat in the same position as the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore); I must admit that I was quite prepared to give full support to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol).

This is a question that has agitated the minds of the people of the west for a great many years. I believe it is fifty-four years ago this month that as a boy, travelling on the slow train through the western plains, I wondered after hours and hours of travel, not seeing even a shack anywhere throughout this vast area, why it was all this wonderful land lay idle. To me, coming from the province of Quebec, where we had such hard work chopping the trees and clearing sufficient to build a shack in the lake St. John area when we first went there, this was strange. I wondered why we went for mile after mile after mile, and did not stop and pick up some of this fine prairie land which seemed to lie there in the sun waiting for someone to plough it up, and tear its bosom for crops.

One settler, hearing my comment and my amazement, asked me, "Do you see any trees across this plain?" I said that I did not. He said, "There are a few places, as you can see even in the ditches along the railway tracks, where the depth of this black soil reaches down two or three or four feet; the richest soil under the sun. Why is it that no trees grow?" Then he said, "If it rained here every year we would have a forest. The reason why settlers are not stopping here is that they do not get rainfall. It may rain for a year or two and then there will be three or four years of drought. The result is that the settlers go farther west and farther north." This lesson stayed in my mind.

Those of us in Alberta of the political persuasion to which I belong have had another lesson in connection with the Lethbridge Northern which was mentioned by the hon. member across the way. It was the Liberal party in Alberta, led at that time by a man who later became Minister of the Interior in this house, one who was highly esteemed and liked by everyone, the Hon. Charles Stewart. This happened under his leadership, and I well remember almost every word that was said in the debate. After a great deal of agitation throughout the southern part of the province the plan as submitted to the government under the Lethbridge-Northern scheme was accepted. The people who had organized thte Lethbridge-Northern irrigation district came to the house and strongly supported the project, almost demanding that it be accepted.

What was wanted then was a guarantee of the debentures of the Lethbridge-Northern district by the provincial government. As the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackburn) has said, this involved a large sum of money. Eventually the house became convinced that it ought to accede to the request so ably presented and so urgently supported. The result was that the Liberal government of that day did guarantee the debentures which enabled the formation of the Lethbridge-Northern district, and permitted it to begin operations.

We were well-paid for it politically! At the election following the guarantee of the debentures of Alberta for a sum which I now forget —but it was a considerable sum of money—the Liberal party did not win one seat in any of the seats involved in and around that district. I believe the one exception was the Bow valley. We lost Lethbridge, we lost Macleod, we lost Empress, we lost Taber—we lost them all, except the Bow valley.

So that I say to the hon. member for Davenport that I hope the Conservative party does not receive the same treatment for his actions, if he succeeds in getting the attention he hopes to get and the support he hopes to get from the government of Canada and from the western provinces.

The situation was discussed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and also by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who always speaks in a most interesting fashion. I think he is one of the most pleasant speakers in the house. The sense of humour he injects into his speeches makes them most agreeable to listen to.

Those hon. members mentioned the possibility of the farmers taking over the eastern irrigation district. I was in the Alberta legislature when the bill was passed enabling the farmers to take over from the Canadian Pacific railway. When they say that the farmers are carrying on successfully, they forget one important matter. The main point is that the Canadian Pacific had to give the land away, because they were unable to carry it any longer. It was said this afternoon and this evening that nobody ever pays the Canadian Pacific and the government if that can be avoided. Perhaps that is true.

However, the main reason was that in ordinary times and under normal conditions the rates they had to charge for water and for the lease of the land were such that only a very few of the most efficient farmers could make any profit on their operations. When the Canadian Pacific, without the return of a single dollar, gave away millions of dollars worth of property; when they gave up dams and gave up ditches; when they gave the land and everything free, the farmers were able to take it over without spending a dollar or assuming any obligations whatsoever. They had no interest to meet, no amount to lay aside for amortization, or anything of that kind.

Of course it was easy to make a success of it, provided that they got crops—which they did. The farmers of those districts, I admit, have administered their business well. As described so eloquently by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Calgary West, the area involved is a bit of paradise on earth; certainly it is one of the finest places one could visit in western Canada. It is almost a show place, and when one travels through this irrigated district he sees that it produces fruits and vegetables and many other crops in great abundance.

Surely we are not going to ask the people of Canada to-day to assume the obligations that the Canadian Pacific railway tried to assume and tried to carry on for years. We are not going to ask the people of Canada to spend hundreds of millions of dollars, and then give the land away to somebody else. The taxpayers in Quebec, the maritime provinces and Ontario are entitled to have some say in the disposition of land and the cost of investigations. They should know something about the cost of reforestation, and how it is to be done.

Before we embark upon a proposition of this magnitude, most careful consideration must be given as to how we are to meet the expenditure of money. We must consider how the farmers we hope to place on the land will meet the indebtedness that will be created by the cost of the land, of the water, and of all the works required to build a vast project of that kind.

May I congratulate the hon. member for Davenport upon the able manner in which he has presented the resolution? I know the sincerity of his convictions as to what we ought to do for the people who have settled on this land which, through years of drought, has been found to be arid, and who are faced with sufferings and discouragement such as have been so ably described by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

I thank the hon. member for reminding me of that grand old chief who had such a vision in this matter. I do not think the hon. member mentioned it, but I think he had in mind a meeting held in Edmonton in 1910, which I attended. Across the street from where the grand old man of Liberalism was speaking was a banner on the balcony of a hotel reading, "Come back, Laurier, by the river route." He did not, because in 1911, although western Canada supported his policy, he was overwhelmingly defeated in eastern Canada, and men with his vision did not come into this house to carry on what he had envisaged and what has been so ably described by the hon. member for Davenport.

Before I came into the house to-night to hear what the minister had to say, whose remarks brought me to my feet, I was reading a letter which I had just received from a personal friend in Athabaska. He asked me why it was that I did not take advantage of the fact that the French language is one of the official languages of this country. He wanted to know why in the few times I have had the honour to address this august assembly I had never used that language. With the permission of the house, and in the hope that the hon. member for Davenport has in his years of travel learned sufficient French to be able to follow me. I shall finish my address in my mother tongue.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I admit that it is not without some hesitation that I rise to-night to discuss the highly important matter which the hon. member for Davenport has brought forward in his own inimitable style, and with his enlightened patriotism, his devotion to the cause of hapless people, among whom he includes especially the residents of the prairies.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that it had not been my intention to speak to-night; therefore I am doing my best with the conviction that I am fulfilling a duty, since I am the only liberal representative of the Alberta farmers, in voicing my opinion on a matter as important as this one; it is important not only for the western but also for the eastern provinces which with us will have to assume the financial responsibility in this connection, and also, because one must pay for anything purchased, not only in Alberta but in all other provinces, for I cannot see any possibility of living without having anything to pay.

In Alberta, we have the privilege to hear a gospel which teaches that there are certain means of spending money without any cost being involved. But up to the present, it has been absolutely impossible to convince the balance of the country of the value of this doctrine. It must not be forgotten, in the course of a debate on a project the cost of which is variously estimated at 100, 200, 300 and even $400 million, that this house is perfectly entitled to discuss such an important question for at least a whole day.

I am not one of those who waste their time in discussions on what the east could do for the west and vice versa. I know too well the good understanding that exists among our people to waste time in such idle talk. A lot is said that is jocularly but I know that in Montreal, Toronto and even in the maritime provinces, our conditions are perfectly well known. I realize the vast sums of money that were expended to open the western prairies, where I live, but I also know that they have created considerable wealth in return, to an amount which certainly balances the expenditures involved.

I well remember, Mr. Speaker, that in normal times—and I hope they will return—I well remember that the topic of the day in the month of August boiled down, for western farmers as well as for the rest of the country, to wondering about the crop out west. Would the prairie provinces have a bumper crop? The Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg newspapers and those of other cities as well sent reporters and experts to gauge the crop prospects out west. Factories in our industrial centres anxiously awaited reports on the wheat crop of western farmers. Would we reap one hundred, two hundred or three hundred million bushels of wheat? That was the topic of the day, Mr. Speaker, because western farmers, who operate on a large scale, supply with funds the factories as well as wholesale and retail dealers of the central and eastern provinces.

Sometimes I incline to think that the western farmer is to a certain extent a spendthrift. Then, let us stop discussing projects as extensive as the one which has been proposed by the hon. member for Davenport, who considers it rather as from a local issue, while I view it as having a national character. I was saying, in the course of the remarks I made in English, that about fifty-four years ago this month, I was travelling with my father and a neighbour who were chatting on the train that was moving slowly across the great western plains. Those plains looked extensive to us, outsiders, who were from the Lake St. John district, where, as you all know, the plains do not cover very great stretches—when I was a boy, I remember that our small pasture seemed very near the house. Needless to say how astonished I was when I saw those great plains which seemed to extend so far in the distance, that we could not think we would ever reach the end: It was then that I asked my companion: "How is it that these lands are not all under cultivation?" Why are those plains not already peopled all over? Why do the wheat fields not stretch as far as the eye can reach? That is what happens to-day in the irrigated areas or where the rainfall is plentiful. And my old companion answered right back: "Well, my friend, do you see any trees in these plains?" "As a matter of fact, I do not". "Well, that is because we have no rain. The soil is so fertile that if the Good Lord watered it occasionally with a bit of His beneficial rain, these plains would be covered with forests. The lack of timber in these vast areas is due to the lack of rain."

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Talk it out.

(Text):

Mr. DECHENE: I heard the hon. member, and with the permission of the house I shall revert to the other language, of which I happen to know a little, in order to answer his remark. He does not seem to understand the rule. Surely the hon. member knows that the rule which provides that private members' motions shall be discussed only on certain days was not put there just for fun. He knows it was placed there because of a need. He knows that in this parliament and in the legislatures of Canada the government is the body which governs. That rule was placed there so that the private members of this house, as in any other legislature in a British parliament, may bring before parliament the question that he wishes to bring to the attention of the people. A member from British Columbia, for instance, may bring before the house a matter in which he is interested, but a member from Nova Scotia who is not conversant with the matter requires time to study it. It takes time for public opinion to be seized of the matter and for the press to discuss it. We can conceive of a member of a certain group arriving at a certain conclusion before the matter comes before parliament but—

An hon. MEMBER: Why not let the house settle it?

Mr. DECHENE: I was replying to the question that had been asked by my hon. friend over there, a question that could have been asked only by a man who does not understand the rules. To say, "talk it out," shows an ignorance of the rules that one would not expect of a member who has been in the house all the years he has been here.

(Translation):

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall proceed in the language I was using when my hon. friend interrupted me.

I wish to insist anew on the deforestation of the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. To my mind, this is the most important part of the resolution now before the house. Indeed, as the eastern slope of the Rockies is stripped of its vegetation, and as the snowfields, which were so beneficial to us in past years, recede, water gets scarcer in the western prairies, the velocity of our rivers decreases, humidity gradually disappears everywhere. As a result, the dry regions of the western provinces increase in area, except, possibly, in Manitoba. This is a vital problem which will command our serious attention at some future time, but, of course, it cannot be considered with a province that will not cooperate. In my opinion, the hon. member for Davenport should have sought first of all, with his customary courtesy, an interview with the leaders of the Alberta government in order to ascertain whether the latter were prepared to cooperate with the dominion government in carrying out such a measure. But as the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) has shown by means of the correspondence exchange with the leaders of that province, they are not prepared to cooperate in carrying out the work essential to the project which was so ably introduced by the hon. member for Davenport.

As I stated a moment ago, rainfall is getting more and more scanty from year to year in the northern section of Alberta, of Saskatchewan right up to my own district in the vicinity of Cold lake. There lies the vital problem which prompts me to join with the hon. members who have spoken on this matter in asking the whole house to consider very seriously this matter of irrigation in that part of the western provinces. We must act now, but not in the manner suggested in the resolution. In fact, I do not think it wise to insist on such a vote being taken, when the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who represents his party in the house to-night, is apparently unable to make up his mind. This matter should be submitted in such a way that the house could unanimously support a resolution which should be endorsed by hon. members in every section of the house.

As I said a moment ago in English, the province of Alberta is carrying on a rather costly experiment in the way of irrigation—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I wonder if the hon. member is complying with the rules and if he really speaks to the question before the house.

Mr. DECHENE: Mr. Speaker, I thought I was discussing the two points mentioned in the resolution submitted by my hon. friend. I shall give the French version of it, if I may be permitted to do so, because the translation we have does not convey exactly the same meaning as the original. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for having called my attention to the rules of the house. If I broke those rules, I beg your forgiveness. The resolution is worded as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of introducing legislation during this session to set up a permanent interprovincial board or commission . . .

The province of Alberta is therefore included.

. . . on which the three prairie provinces and the dominion . . .

Again the province of Alberta is included.

. . . would have equal representation under the chairmanship of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or some other qualified person, to conduct investigations and make studies of the most feasible and economic means for the conservation and utilization of the eastern watershed of the Rocky mountains, particularly the watershed of the Saskatchewan river.

Mr. Speaker, I was just discussing that point. I was saying that some of this water flows in the plain, gradually reaches to the northlands and even further. This water, however, does not flow with the same abundance as in the southern areas of the prairies, but . . .

(Text):

Mr. McCUAIG: If I may ask the hon. member a question, why will he not let the people's representatives vote on this question?

Mr. DECHENE: I have no idea whatsoever how the people that I am supposed to live with would vote on this question. I am speaking as J. M. Dechene, M.P. for Athabaska. I have been in this house for some years, and my hon. friend, when he has been here longer, will know that I speak my own views in my own language in my own way and that I am not governed by anybody else.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I regret very much having been unable to complete my last sentence as it was the most important point to which I wished to refer to-night. However, it is eleven o'clock and as I do not wish to break the rules of the house, move the adjournment of the debate.

The SPEAKER: The hon. member moves the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. DECHENE: Yes, Mr. Speaker, as it is eleven o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Dechene the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 9, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce) be substituted for that of Mr. Bruce on the committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

CREDIT TO FRANCE UNDER EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to make a brief announcement in which I believe the house will be interested.

An agreement with the government of France was signed early this afternoon, under which Canada will provide to France a credit of $242,500,000 to enable France to make purchases in Canada. The amount and terms of this credit were agreed upon last September by M. Jean Monnet and myself, with the approval of our two governments, and they were made public later in the autumn.

The credit bears interest at three per cent and is repayable in thirty annual instalments, commencing at the end of 1947 and running until the end of 1976. The agreement was signed by the French ambassador on behalf of his government, and myself on behalf of the government of Canada.

This is much the largest of all our credits under the Export Credits Insurance Act. I am sure that members of the house, as well as the government, will welcome this agreement and the effective cooperation of Canadians in assisting in the reconstruction of this great allied nation with whom we have such close ties of friendship and historical association.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wonder if the minister could inform the house what the total is of all credits already extended to countries other than Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will make a statement giving that total when I introduce the resolution relating to the United Kingdom loan, which I hope will be on Thursday.

EXPORT ACT AMENDMENT

REPEAL OF SECTIONS 5 AND 6—EXPORT OF WILDFOWL

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the first reading of bill No. 14 (from the Senate) to amend the Export Act.

[Mr. Dechene.]

He said: The purpose of the bill is to eliminate certain overlapping with the Game Export Act and to assist the administration of provincial game regulations. Owing to changed conditions the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the Export Act have become undesirable. They prevent non-resident sportsmen from taking home with them woodcock, partridge or prairie fowl lawfully killed by them in Canada. This bill really is founded upon a resolution which was passed at the ninth conference of provincial and dominion wild life officials held at Ottawa on April 6 and 7, 1942, requesting that sections 5 and 6 of the Export Act be repealed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPLOSIVES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO MEET PRESENT-DAY REQUIREMENTS

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the first reading of bill No. 16 (from the Senate) respecting the manufacture, testing, sale, storage and importation of explosives.

He said: The Explosives Act, which is chapter 31 of the statutes of 1914, was passed by parliament on June 12, 1914, and has not been changed in any respect since 1920, the year in which it was proclaimed, save for the general revision of Canadian statutes of 1927. It is based on the British explosives act, 1875. The purpose of this bill is to bring the statute into line with present-day requirements and to remedy defects that have been revealed by practical experience in its administration.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON MONDAYS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday the 10th April next to the end of the session, government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence on Wednesdays over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motion for the production of papers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when I asked the Clerk to put this notice of motion on the order paper I had not realized that the house will be adjourning on Wednesday of next week, which is the 17th, over the Easter recess. I should like to point out to hon. members that on Thursday of this week we shall have been here for four weeks, and that up to the present there has been very little consideration of government measures. The Secretary of State has a bill respecting citizenship which has not yet been given second reading. As the Minister of Finance has indicated, he is ready to proceed on Thursday with the bill respecting the loan to the United Kingdom. Apart from these measures nothing in the way of government business has been accomplished thus far, unless my little bill on the external affairs department could be regarded as such.

If I had thought of the Easter adjournment coming next week I would have worded the motion to read that on and after Monday, April 15 next to the end of the session, government notices of motion, government orders and so on shall have precedence on Mondays over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motion for the production of papers. If the house would allow me to amend the motion in that way, I would appeal very strongly to hon. members to accept the amendment and allow the motion as so amended to carry. I do this without any desire to deprive hon. members of their opportunities but rather in an attempt to assist the entire house to get through its business. If we continue discussing the resolutions of private members during the next couple of weeks we shall have no government business under way until some time after the Easter recess, and then hon. members will begin to regret that they have taken so long in the discussion of private members' resolutions to the exclusion of government business. For that reason I would ask the house to allow me to amend the motion by striking out the words "Wednesday, the 10th" and substituting therefor the words "Monday, the 15th."

Mr. STIRLING: And later on the word "Monday" will have to be substituted for "Wednesday."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment is that the words "Wednesday the 10th" be struck out and the words "Monday the 15th" substituted therefor, and that in the third line the word "Wednesdays" be struck out and the word "Mondays" substituted therefor.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): The rules of the house provide that certain days of the week be allowed for the business of private members. All the private members have done has been to utilize the time thus placed at their disposal. If now the government wishes to take more of that time for its own business, I am sure we shall all look at the request with an open mind. However, I would offer two suggestions to the government. If Monday, a private members' day with afternoon and evening sittings, is taken for government business, as I expect it will be, I would respectfully suggest that Wednesday with only an afternoon sitting be continued as a private members' day rather longer in the session than otherwise would be done. My second suggestion is that the government might expedite its own business by allowing us to get to a vote on some of these private measures before eleven o'clock at night.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I think the request is reasonable, but I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) that if Monday is taken away we should continue for a while at least to have Wednesday for private members. I think the matter should be adjusted in that way.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I too believe the request is quite reasonable. After all, the house wants to finish its business some time before August.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may tell my hon. friend that his suggestion will meet with the approval of the government. I think after a little while the house itself will be only too ready to take Wednesday, so we may well leave the question of Wednesday to be taken up a little later on. I thank hon. members for their cooperation in this matter.

Mr. BRACKEN: What about my second proposal?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The second proposal refers to the capacity of the government to stop anyone from speaking when he gets a chance. I am afraid that is a power which cannot be exercised on any side of the house.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN FORCES

PERMANENT FORCE ESTABLISHMENTS—ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence, notice of which I have given. When can the men in the forces, particularly those in the interim forces, expect to receive an announcement regarding the permanent force establishments? The delay in the announcement is causing difficulties for those who are anxious about future employment.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): As my hon. friend knows, my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson) and I announced last October the approximate size of the three armed forces. In January, following a conference with district officers commanding, and senior officers at national defence headquarters at Ottawa I gave the press a statement in which I indicated that so far as the army is concerned the active force will comprise a field unit, composed of a brigade group, which will be representative of all arms, and the remainder of the force will consist of headquarters staff; personnel to assist in the training and administration of the reserve force, research and development, and the units required for the maintenance of the Alaska highway, and the like.

I had not contemplated making any further detailed announcement as to the establishments in the immediate future. As the house knows, committees have been sitting to consider the question of pay and allowances and pension provision for post-war services, and I expect to make an announcement concerning this within the course of the next few days.

SERVICEMAN HELD UNDER P.C. 6577

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Have any instructions been given that Mr. McCloy in Winnipeg is to be released from custody under which he is held under P.C. 6577, and has the order in council in question been set aside?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I shall have to take the hon. member's question as a notice, and make inquiries. As soon as I have ascertained the facts I shall give an answer.

TIMBER

CONDITIONS AFFECTING EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. Has the government considered lifting the embargo on timber exports to the United States, as hinted in a recent press dispatch?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, there is no embargo on timber exports to the United States. A certain proportion of the cut is exported by agreement between the timber authorities of the two countries. From removal of the control two results would follow: there would be an immediate increase in the price of lumber to the Canadian user by from $20 to $30 a thousand, or alternately there would be no lumber for Canadian users. The present control will be continued. There is no change contemplated.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINNIPEG NEWSPAPERS AND TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. What additional steps are being taken by the Department of Labour to settle the dispute between the Winnipeg newspapers and members of the typographical union?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of the question. I have already appointed a second commissioner in an effort to bring the parties together. I hope to settle the dispute.

REQUIREMENTS OF MANITOBA SUGAR BEET PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, of which I have given notice. Will the minister give assurance to the beet growers in the Red River valley that the necessary labour will be available for the increased production contemplated this year?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given notice of his question. The federal department of labour, along with provincial agricultural authorities, sugar beet growers and sugar companies, have been giving special attention to the matter referred to by the hon. member. I cannot give any absolute assurance, in view of the very tight labour situation in agriculture to-day, and the fact since V-J day that we have not had the power of direction. I think, however, the hon. member may rest assured that we shall overcome the difficulties this year, as we have done in the past, ever since I have been head of the department.

HOUSING

TORONTO—UTILIZATION OF GENERAL ENGINEERING PLANTS FOR SHELTER PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. Have any arrangements been made with the city of Toronto with regard to utilizing the buildings of the General Engineering company on Dawes road for shelter purposes? If not, if matters are simply being investigated, could the minister speed up those investigations so that these buildings can be used for shelter? The situation is desperate.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I have no information about the situation, but I shall make inquiries and try to give an answer.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Friday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin for the second reading of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, at different times during the debate my thoughts have gone back some nineteen years to a scene in a classroom at Osgoode Hall Law School when the class was studying private international law. In the lectures on the subject of the Canadian Naturalization Act I am sure one young man in that class would have been interested indeed if he could have foreseen that some nineteen years later he would be introducing in this House of Commons a citizenship bill. The student of nineteen years ago is the Secretary of State to-day. And had I been able to foresee the future I should have been surprised to know that the student who then sat two seats away from the man who is now Secretary of State would now be rising to support the principle of the bill introduced by the Secretary of State.

Some things have been said in the debate which I think will be deplored by those who love our country and feel that it can become great only to the extent to which it is united. From time to time during the course of the debate there has been evidence of a bitter spirit. There has been evidence of hair-splitting and narrow legalism. I hope in what I have to say to-day I may be able to contribute something toward better understanding.

There are strong reasons which make it perfectly obvious that we must have in this country to-day a citizenship act. We must have Canadian citizenship. To put it on one ground, if you like: there are important technical reasons why there must be a proper definition of Canadian citizenship. At the present time we have the Naturalization Act, the Canadian Nationals Act, and the Immigration Act. All of them touch some aspect of the problem of citizenship, some aspect of the status of Canadians living within this country. In some respects they are contradictory. In fact, our present legislation in this respect is something of a hodge-podge. It is high time that it was reexamined with a view to codification of the provisions which relate to citizenship. There are also important reasons, Mr. Speaker, in relation to the status of Canadian citizens in their private capacity. One need mention only one or two—the status of married women, and the status of children born outside Canada to Canadian parents, to point to subjects where there are great weaknesses in existing legislation. There is need for clarification and codification.

But there are greater and broader reasons than these why Canadian citizenship should be the subject of legislative enactment at this time. The first and principal one, in the face of all the facts, is the necessity for contributing something in legislative form that will be effectual in the creation of Canadian unity. I agree with what has been said by some who preceded me in the debate, that this bill alone will not create Canadian unity. But given sympathetic application and given sympathetic treatment now by the house I think the bill is capable of making some contribution toward national unity.

In the second place, this bill does hold out the hope that, given sympathetic and effective administration, it will have the effect of creating in the minds of Canadians a greater appreciation of the value of citizenship and of the rights which flow from it. We have lost much in this country because we have not put a sufficient price and value upon citizenship. We have taken our rights as citizens far too much for granted. We have only to look at the example of the United States to see what can be accomplished in creating in the minds of citizens, by proper rules and ceremonies and by education, an appreciation of the fundamental value of citizenship. Citizenship in the United States has been a great unifying factor; it can be made so in this country. I support the bill on general principles because I believe that if it is enacted and is given sympathetic administration it will contribute something to the desirable end of national unity.

Before I leave this subject may I say just this word about ceremony. I am glad that provision has been made in section 38 of the bill for appropriate ceremonies to attend the granting of certificates of citizenship in order that applicants may be duly impressed with the advantages of Canadian citizenship. This is all to the good. There is a growing need of it at the present time.

I should like to refer now to an article which appeared in the Toronto Evening Telegram of April 1, 1946, describing some proceedings in the naturalization court in that city. It reads in part:

> Queen's husband Mr. King bars German's citizenship
> Alfred Alpert, factory worker, was smart enough to get out of Germany in 1939 ahead of the nazis, but he's still a little muddled about world figures.
> "Mr. King is king of the British empire," he told Judge Denton in naturalization court when seventy-eight new Canadians took the oath of allegiance to the crown. "Where does the King live?" the judge asked: "The King is in Ottawa," replied Alpert, who arrived in England in June, 1939, was at Kitchener camp and Isle of Man camp and migrated to Canada in July, 1940.
>
> "I admit it's a bit confusing," said Judge Denton. "Where does the queen live, then?"
> "She lives in England."
> "What is her name?"—"Queen Elizabeth."
> "What is the king's name?" Alpert was stymied. Judge Denton gave him a hint: "The queen's husband," he explained, "what is his name?"
> "His name is Mackenzie King," Alpert replied.

There is a great need of giving to those who come to this country to make it their home an opportunity, which perhaps has not been fully provided for them in the land from which they come, to learn what citizenship means, to learn what the rights and the responsibilities of citizenship mean in a country like ours. I think as a nation we have hitherto failed deplorably in this respect. This is an age of adult education, but we in this country have not realized the great need of affording opportunities for adult education to those who come from other lands to make Canada their home. We have often treated as foreigners those new Canadians, who have come here with the full permission of the laws of this country to make it their home. To me that is a denial of the fundamental principle of Canadian citizenship. Once people are admitted to this country, once they become citizens, no lines should be drawn, racial or otherwise, which will have the effect of discriminating between different classes of citizens.

Due regard must be had in the future, far more than has been had in the past, to the duty of providing to those who come to this country to make it their home the opportunity to learn of all that is involved in Canadian citizenship, and there should be impressed upon all applicants for citizenship a due regard not only for the rights but also for the responsibilities of citizenship.

I think it is worthy of the attention of this house that we should consider now the true significance of Canadian citizenship. Canadian citizenship involves an assertion of our rights as equal individuals before the law, and before the electoral law, to determine as we will the destiny of this country. We owe much to those who have gone before us and who have provided for us the privileges of this Canadian citizenship. If there was more regard for the sacrifices of those who have gone before us, there would be a higher appreciation of the privileges of citizenship in Canada. Think of the contribution made to the developing concept of Canadian citizenship by Macdonald, Cartier, Laurier and Sir Robert Borden. Think of the contribution made to that expanding significance of Canadian citizenship when in the time of Sir Robert Borden this country, by the hand of a minister of Canada representing His Majesty the King, signed the treaty of peace in 1919. It was a great step in our national development.

We need to have more pride in Canada. We need a greater sense of achievement on the part of our country and our people—and when I say "our people" I mean all our people. We are not yet adequately conscious of being Canadians. This country is finding its soul, a soul born of sacrifice. I for one am an optimist for Canada. I can see nothing to circumscribe or limit the future of this country except the extent of our faith in it and our faith in ourselves under God's guidance.

It is not all clear sailing in this country to develop a sense of citizenship. Let us be quite frank. We have had a problem created by race and it is a difficult problem. It has led to a hyphenation of Canadianism which I say it is the duty of every citizen of this country to fight. We must put aside this idea of a hyphenated Canadianism which will not fit into a worthy conception of Canadian citizenship or Canadian unity. Those who exalt race above Canadian unity or Canadian citizenship do a great disservice to Canada.

We know perfectly well that so far as the great races of this country are concerned, racial purity is a biological myth. There has been a mingling of the races in Canada, and there will continue to be. A couple of years ago the premier of the province of Ontario, Hon. George Drew, addressing an audience composed largely of new Canadians, said that in the veins of his two children was mingled the blood of seven races. I daresay there are many of us in this chamber who can say that we have in our veins the blood of several races at least.

If in approaching this question of the relationship between race and nationality, unity and a common Canadian citizenship, we realize that unity does not demand uniformity, and that we are operating under a constitution which gives certain rights to our brothers whose maternal language is the French language; if we approach the problem with good-will and understanding and sympathy, there is no reason why there cannot be a true sense of Canadian unity.

There is a work of reconciliation to be done in this country. We saw the need of it in this house in the debates of last Thursday and Friday. It seems to me that that work of reconciliation must begin here in Ottawa. Whoever seeks to exploit racial differences for political advantage commits a crime against Canada, against Canadian unity and against our proper sense of Canadian citizenship.

If we know each other better there will be far less danger of suspicion and distrust. Canadians must know each other better. That is a duty that rests upon us all. In the light of the necessity of creating in Canada a deep sense of national unity there must be no thought of pitting aggressive minorities and aggresive majorities against one another. We have to put first the interests of Canada as the whole of Canada, as a nation.

As the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) said in his speech in the house last Thursday, historically those who first held the title "Canadiens" were persons born in this country of French descent. It is a title which we are all proud to possess. I ask hon. members to recognize that it is not a contribution to Canadian unity to have a member of this house say: I have a superior claim to this title. It is now the proud possession of all of us and we should all be big enough to admit that our rights to it are now complete and equal.

The two great races in this country owe debts to each other which they do not, it seems to me, adequately realize. Reference was made in some of the earlier speeches in this debate to the articles of capitulation which were signed after the fall of Quebec in 1759, and after the fall of Montreal in 1760, followed by the Quebec Act of 1774, the constitutional act of 1791, the Act of Union of 1840 and finally the British North America Act itself. It is a plain fact of history that had Canada not become British when it did, it would later have become American. Those whose mother tongue is English may equally well be reminded that but for the loyalty of the Canadiens, and had guarantees not been extended to those whose mother tongue was French, Canada would not have been retained for the British crown at the time of the American revolution but would have become American.

These two races owe a debt to each other which they can never adequately repay. Let us therefore in all common sense and justice recognize it, and let us be conscious of a sense of obligation to each other. I believe that will promote better understanding and a greater appreciation of each other.

We hear talk from time to time of language rights. This question of language was fully settled in the British North America Act, by section 133. It is our duty to refute, wherever and whenever we hear it, the talk of those who say that the national fabric of this country is weakened by there being two official languages. It is not so. Those who follow that line whittle and hack away at the foundation of confederation, because without section 133 confederation would never have been brought about, and without it confederation to-day could not continue.

I want to say a word with respect to one passage on bilingualism in the speech of the hon. member for Outremont—and I approach this as one who has the desire and hope to improve what little facility he possesses in the French language. I think no one will promote bilingualism in this country by scolding those who speak the English language for not having acquired any facility in French. It may be that the hon. member for Outremont did not intend to rail against those who have not acquired that facility. I think on sober reflection he will appreciate that that is not the way in which better understanding can be brought about between the two great races in this country. We must concentrate above all else on understanding each other, and with tolerance and good will any problems attendant on the question which the hon. member for Outremont raised are, I think, capable of solution.

Two sections of this bill, which are essential in the light of the principle of the measure have occupied the attention of some who have preceded me in the debate. I refer to section 26 and section 10. Without a careful examination of the provisions of these two sections the principle of the bill cannot be adequately debated. I wish to say a word with regard to section 26, particularly in view of the interpretation put upon it on Friday last by the hon. member for Outremont and the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard).

Section 26 provides that a Canadian citizen is a British subject. The parliament of Canada could not enact any contrary legislation unless Canada renounced her allegiance to His Majesty the King. Whether that section is in the bill or not we shall continue to be subjects of the king. Let no one be under any illusion in that respect.

When I heard those two hon. members on Friday last speak of section 26 as being ambiguous, I asked myself what could be plainer. The section consists of seven words:

A Canadian citizen is a British subject.

That is simply declaratory of the law. It will be the law, it must be the law, as long as we are subjects of the king. I detected in the remarks of those two hon. members the suggestion that to be a British subject means to be subject to the jurisdiction of the imperial parliament at Westminster. It is not so. Ever since the statute of Westminster in 1932, the imperial parliament has renounced all legislative power over Canada except so far as this parliament consents, so there can no longer be any justification for talk in this country of any of its citizens being subject to the laws enacted at Westminster. We are completely autonomous; nothing further is needed to achieve autonomy for Canada.

The hon. member for Outremont went on to say that so far as he is concerned His Majesty the King must divest himself of certain titles before Canadian citizens should be content to be his subjects. He said that we must change the provisions of this bill and must say, in effect, that to be a Canadian citizen is to be a Canadian subject of His Majesty the King of Canada. We had statements such as this from the hon. member, as he is reported at page 595 of Hansard:

. . . but my king and the British king are not legally the same; they are not the same entity. And this the statute of Westminster implicitly recognizes.

That statement is false to law, to fact, to sense. The hon. member for Outremont said that that was in accord with the statute of Westminster. He will not find in the statute of Westminster one word which says that the British king, the king of Great Britain and the king of Canada, are not the same legal entity. What is more, if he will examine the declaration which came from the imperial conference in 1926, which was the foundation upon which the statute of Westminster was built in 1932, he will find these words, referring to the component countries of the commonwealth:

They are autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their internal or domestic affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown—

Note that, Mr. Speaker—united by a common allegiance to the crown:

—and fully associated as members of the British commonwealth.

It is inherent in the association that now exists between the component members of the British commonwealth that the crown is one entity, one crown, one and indivisible. That common crown is the one entity which binds all parts of this commonwealth of equal partners. It is not only the greatest binding force amongst the members of the commonwealth: it is in fact the greatest binding force in Canada—our common allegiance to His Majesty the King. We should abandon a lot of silly ideas and silly talk about inferiority and subordination. There is no justification in fact or in law or in sense for such arguments. But some members go on fighting battles that were fought and won many, many years ago. They are not helping the cause of Canadian unity. There was no idea of inferiority on the part of Sir John A. Macdonald or on the part of Sir Wilfrid Laurier or on the part of Sir Robert Borden in their relations with the British Colonial Office and the Dominions Office—far from it. Our allegiance to His Majesty the King, which we share with all parts of this commonwealth and empire is the greatest binding force in Canada.

What are we invited to do by those who would reject section 26? Without the fact on which section 26 is built you would not have Canadian unity, you could not build a Canadian citizenship. But the hon. member for Outremont and the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, as well as some other hon. members, say: Oh, take that section out of the bill; we have to have that changed. Do you think for one minute that you can unite Canadian citizens on the basis of rejecting the idea of a common crown for the commonwealth? You will never do it—never.

Let us examine for a moment what is involved in the ideas put forward by these hon. members. They say: We want to reject the idea of being British subjects—as though there was something servile in the title. The term means only this, those who owe allegiance to the king, to the crown. That, and no other, is the significance of the term "British subject". Those who say: We are grown up, we do not want to be British subjects any longer, are, in effect, asking Canadians to forfeit a generous measure of their own birthright, one of the greatest privileges provided for free men in the world to-day.

If we reject the concept of being British subjects it will mean that we shall renounce privileges such as those I shall now mention. When our citizens go to the United Kingdom to take up residence they go on a footing of equality with all other citizens of the United Kingdom. They qualify for the franchise in the same length of time—I think it is six months—as any other resident of that country. It means that a Canadian going to Australia to take up residence there enjoys, because he is a British subject, all the rights of citizens of that country, and he qualifies for the franchise just as any other citizen of that country does in a period of six months. A British subject going from Canada to New Zealand steps into that land on a footing of equality with all citizens of New Zealand and qualifies for the franchise in one year. A British subject going from Canada to South Africa enjoys all the privileges of citizenship and qualifies for the franchise, in two years if he is a native-born British subject, and in five years if he is a foreign-born naturalized British subject.

We are told, however, that Ireland is the example we should follow. Are we going to accept the course taken by Eire in 1935 as an example for Canada? Reference was made to the Irish Nationality and Citizenship Act of 1935, and the Aliens Act passed by that country in the same year, by which it is provided that citizens of Eire will no longer be British subjects. But I think it is well that the house should know that the Aliens Exemption Order of 1935 provides for the exemption of Canadians and persons from other parts of the British commonwealth, from that principle, so that British subjects are now dealt with by Eire on a basis of reciprocity.

I have referred to some advantages which Canadians enjoy in going to other parts of the commonwealth. We must not overlook at the same time the advantage of our association with the commonwealth in terms of protection and in terms of the status which it gives us in the world. Could we ever hope to enjoy the position in the world and the respect in which the world holds us to-day if we stood alone, if we sought to proceed as some hon. members who spoke on Friday suggest we should do, and renounce our right and title as British subjects? These hon. members invite Canadians to the renunciation of great rights and privileges. If Canadian citizenship is to be bought at the price of a renunciation of the rights which we as British subjects enjoy in all parts of the world, we shall be paying too great a price for it. It is a price we do not need to pay, and this bill by section 26 provides that Canadians shall not be called upon to pay that price for Canadian citizenship.

I wish to say a word now about section 10 of the bill. I have said something already about the advantages which accrue to Canadians by reason of the fact that they are British subjects. What about a little reciprocity? What about the lot of British subjects from other parts of the commonwealth who come to Canada, as the land of their choice, to make this country their home? What does section 10 say about them? It says in effect that those who come from other parts of the commonwealth—British subjects, trained in citizenship, in no way inferior to ourselves in their appreciation of the rights and duties of citizenship—are to be treated, with one solitary and inconsequential exception, as though they were aliens. That is the effect of section 10 of this bill as it stands to-day; they are put on a basis of equality with aliens. What does it mean? Examine the provisions of section 10. What are the requirements of applicants for Canadian citizenship?

Mr. MARTIN: I rise to a point of order. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he will realize that the rules of the house are designed to permit statement or discussion only of the principle of the bill on second reading. The hon. member is now proceeding to a discussion of section 10. I have no doubt that what he says will be of great value, but there is no opportunity of discussion and explanation in reply, and consequently, because of the importance of the bill, wrong impressions may get out because of what one might call unilateral statements. It is contrary to the rules of the house for an hon. member on second reading to discuss a section of the bill. My only reason for rising is that I had to do so the other night in the case of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), and I feel I must, as one who is leading the house at this time, take the same attitude in regard to the hon. member. There will be ample opportunity to discuss the section when we reach it. There is no chance now of the hon. gentleman and myself engaging in explanations of it, and I think he should postpone to the committee stage the discussion of section by section.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling I would like to point out that a very important principle of this bill is contained in section 10, to which the hon. member has been referring, and if this is the time to discuss the principles of the bill, I suggest that he be not denied the right to do so. He can do it in any event by not referring specifically to the number of the section. And it does contain a principle of this bill.

Mr. BROOKS: The main principle.

Mr. BRACKEN: One of the main principles; and I respectfully suggest that he should not be denied the opportunity to discuss it here.

Mr. LESAGE: I wonder if the point of order does not go to the principle of the bill. If the hon. member wants to prove to the house that citizens coming from other parts of the commonwealth are more likely to acquire a Canadian mind than people coming from other parts of the world, I think the house is anxious to have this proven—proven against the historical background.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, may I point out to you, as I have had to do on two other occasions, that the minister himself, in making his speech on the second reading of this bill, dealt with section 10, and said there was not anything in it worth worrying about.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not mention the section.

Mr. GREEN: Well, in effect that is what he said, and every time he gets a little worried about remarks made about some part of the bill he gets up and raises this point of order. Every speech made thus far on the second reading has contained some reference to one or other of the sections. For example, the member for Outremont and the member for Chambly-Rouville spoke on section 26, and the minister allowed them to go ahead without raising any point.

Mr. MARTIN: I certainly did.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that he is wide of the mark now when he tries to stop the member for Eglinton.

Mr. SPEAKER: Last week I took occasion to draw the attention of hon. members to Beauchesne, third edition, page 228, paragraph 656, which states that on the motion for the second reading it is out of order to discuss clauses of the bill. On each occasion on which a member was called to order it was stated that he was discussing a clause that was of particular importance and which it was necessary to consider at the moment. Hon. members, I am sure, will understand that it is the duty of the Speaker to point out to any member who has the floor, when it is necessary to do so, that a particular standing order requires that this or that shall be done. The Speaker has no alternative; he must draw the attention of hon. members to the rules as they stand. On the second reading of a bill hon. members must confine themselves to the principle. I realize that an hon. member may find it necessary occasionally to refer to particular sections, and he may do so without discussing each clause of the bill. It is extremely difficult to keep the discussion in conformity with the rules of the house, and I have no doubt that hon. members on both sides appreciate the importance of this rule which requires that discussion at this stage be confined to the principle of the bill. I would ask the hon. member to be good enough to observe the rule.

Mr. FLEMING: I have no intention whatever of discussing the details of section 10, Mr. Speaker. I did discuss section 26 at some length and what I have to say with reference to section 10 has to do with its effect in relation to the principle of the bill. In this connection I should like to refer to what was said by the hon. member for Outremont, at page 596 of Hansard. He was referring to the fact that, as he says, one of the reasons for disunity in Canada is in part this, that British subjects coming to Canada have been able to acquire rights of citizenship here without being subjected to the same requirements as aliens. The hon. member said:

> I cannot help but think, Mr. Speaker, that the different treatment accorded to these as against the other immigrants has something to do with the lack of complete Canadian unity.

Obviously the hon. member can in this respect give whole-hearted support to the bill, because the bill does put the British subject, coming from other parts of the commonwealth, in the same position as an alien coming from any section of the globe—except in one respect; he is absolved from the mere detail of filing a declaration of intention. He must do everything else that the alien is required to do. He must prove his lawful entry; he must prove five years' residence in Canada; he must prove good character and an adequate knowledge of either English or French; he must prove that he has an adequate knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of citizenship, and his intention to take up permanent residence. In other words, he has to go through precisely the same procedure, in all respects, to supply the same proof and adhere to the same rules as an alien from any foreign land. That shocks me. Surely the purpose of requiring five years' residence is that we may train people in our conception of liberty and freedom so that they may take their place within the democracy of our conception. Do we need to put a British subject, with all his background, with all his present possession of everything that we have in the way of citizenship and knowledge of democratic processes, in the humiliating position of having to conform to the same procedure precisely and to observe the same rules as the alien? It is a humiliation which this bill seeks to heap upon British subjects from other parts of the commonwealth. I do not think that is a basis upon which we shall build the national unity which we so much desire. We must work for unity and understanding; it will not be possible for us to do so on that basis. People coming from other parts of the commonwealth, if they are qualified to be good citizens, must not be placed in that invidious position.

We have a great heritage, and we should value it as Canadians. We should value it far more than it has been valued in the past. We must have a sense of indebtedness to the past, to those who have gone before us, if we are to have an adequate appreciation of our privileges to-day and our opportunities in the future of this country. But there must be great vision in Canada, a vision of unity of all citizens from coast to coast, marching shoulder to shoulder and working for Canada. Without vision the people perish. There must be a great national vision which encompasses the high place of Canada in the world and among the self-governing nations of the British commonwealth.

In what I am about to say now, Mr. Speaker, in your mother tongue, I am not attempting to do anything smart or superficial. I am simply attempting to offer, in a spirit of good will, a gesture, a desire for understanding, an indication of my willingness as one member of the house—I am sure this is true of all members—to approach our common Canadian problems with sympathy and understanding. I hope you will bear with me. I may tell you that I have not been too successful in practising conversation in French with the comely young ladies who take such good care of us in the parliamentary dining-room; such is my facility in the language that when one morning recently I ordered porridge—upon which I may say I was raised—I was served scrambled eggs! Maybe what you are about to hear is a scrambled-eggs version of the French language. Nevertheless here it is.

(Translation):

The consideration of this bill affords to this house an opportunity to give Canadian citizenship the full importance it deserves and to dispel all doubts as to its meaning. This citizenship is our pride and it constitutes our privilege and our priceless heritage.

We all love our country. Certainly no one among us would exchange his title of Canadian for that of a citizen of any other country in the world.

Our Canadian citizenship links us together with bonds of unity and equality, from whatever province we come and whatever be the race or language of our fathers.

Too often, unfortunately, racial considerations and prejudices have been allowed to obscure the meaning of our Canadian citizenship.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FLEMING: As Canadians, we should constantly endeavour to emphasize those things that are common to all of us and that form our common heritage. It seems to me that we could strengthen our bonds of unity in Canada by avoiding the use of a hyphen when defining our citizenship. We should be proud and happy to call ourselves simply "Canadians".

On June 6, 1943, speaking in Kingston, my leader, Mr. John Bracken, made the following statement:

> Sir John Macdonald's first consideration was Canada—not French-speaking Canada, not English-speaking Canada, but Canada, a Canadian Canada. And we to-day must have no less high an ideal. Let us look upon all our citizens, of whatever racial extractions, as Canadians. Let us have less of hyphenated Canadianism. Our new citizens don't want it, and we don't. In the United States they do not speak of President Roosevelt as a Dutch-American, nor Mr. Willkie as a German-American, nor of Mayor LaGuardia as an Italian-American. They are Americans. Let us in Canada be Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to make a few personal observations. I am descended from Irish forbears. Am I, for that reason, an Irish-Canadian? I am also of Scottish stock. Does that make me a Scottish-Canadian? Some of my ancestors were Englishmen. Should I therefore be termed an English-Canadian? My lineage can also be traced back to French forbears. My grandfather told me, when I was a boy, that one of my ancestors had fought under the Marquis de Montcalm on the plains of Abraham. Does that make me a French-Canadian? Then, what am I? Am I a French-Canadian, a Scottish-Canadian, an English-Canadian, or an Irish-Canadian? Mr. Speaker, I wish to consider myself simply as a Canadian.

The various races I have just mentioned, as well as others, have made a splendid contribution to the building up of this country and to the enrichment of our national heritage. This heritage can surpass all others in richness owing to the diversity of our origins.

Our citizenship will be all the more precious if we are ready to unite and work for Canada in a spirit of cooperation, mutual respect and equality.

The party to which I belong has made the following statement:

We recall, with pride and gratitude, that our party rose to greatness through a fruitful partnership between two great races, English and French. We affirm our belief that the two cultures are part and parcel of our future development and that Canada's true greatness depends on sympathy and understanding between these two original races and all other races that have come to join in the building of our country.

Realizing the inherent greatness of Canada as a nation and recognizing the strength that can come only from unity and purpose, we believe that all the peoples of Canada should unite in fostering a common pride in Canadian achievement and institutions and a common loyalty to our ancestral traditions of equality, justice and toleration, and should seek, with due regard for constitutional rights, to achieve that profound sense of the importance of national interests which will ensure harmony and cooperation and that future for our country which was the aim of the Fathers of Confederation.

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure the sense of the house is that the hon. gentleman should be allowed to continue.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am very sorry to have interrupted the hon. gentleman, but if he has unanimous consent he may continue.

(Translation):

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker I shall have concluded within a minute.

Let us then endeavour with more energy than ever to strengthen our dear Canada by linking ourselves with bonds of unity and equality. Let us be proud of our title "Canadian citizen".

(Text):

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) on the splendid speech he made. I am sure we particularly enjoyed the latter part of it. I wish also to join with other hon. members in congratulating the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin), first on having sponsored this bill and second on piloting it through the house, as I am sure he will. I feel certain the house will approve the bill in principle. We may differ as to some of the details, and when the time comes for third reading I shall certainly make myself heard. When the hon. gentleman introduced the bill in the house I believe he concluded his remarks by saying that when this bill finally passes everyone in Canada who is covered by it will be able to say, "I am a Canadian." May I say to him that for his imagination, his application and his thoroughness there are many of us in Canada who will say of him that he is a great Canadian.

The bill now before the house has been received by the great majority of Canadians with a large measure of indifference. They will now be Canadians and British subjects rather than British subjects and Canadians; so what? That has been the response of the majority of the people who will be affected by this bill, and every man, woman and child in Canada will be affected by it. It is very much like the recurrent debates on the national flag. Maybe we shall have one; maybe we shall not have one. Perhaps it should have the union jack in one corner, perhaps the fleur-de-lis on the fly; perhaps stripes, or perhaps the maple leaf. I understand that already we have had 1,800 submissions of designs. I should have thought we would have 18,000. Again I say that the majority of the people in Canada who are affected by the problem, and whose flag this will be, are consumed with apathy over the whole question. Maybe we shall have the old red ensign; maybe we shall have a crest with the maple leaf. So what? I was impressed by the fact that even newspapers which are attempting to whip up a little enthusiasm for one design or another design, or for no design at all, merely the union jack, had to throw in a pretty girl, with shapely legs, her skirts hiked well up above her knees, in order that the picture might be good enough to interest people in the flag.

With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, I would mention one group of citizens in this country to whom the question of citizenship and the question of a national flag are of the deepest concern, who are fascinated by this bill, and whose hearts, from sheer joy, miss a beat at its implications. They are those who are not charter members of this Canadian organization, like my French-speaking friends; they are not those of Anglo-Saxon stock, like so many others of my friends; they are not those whose birthright gave them every freedom and privilege this country of ours can offer. No, sir; when I mention some of those to whom these questions of citizenship and national flag are so important, I mean those who had to save and struggle and endure hardship to achieve the status which is so casually accepted by our brethren. I mean the new Canadians—and in saying that, I mean 20·2 per cent of the population of Canada. I mean also that one-fifth of our population which can hold its head as high as any other when anyone raises the question of loyalty to Canada.

I am one of them. For forty-one years of my forty-six I have lived in this country, have enjoyed liberties and opportunities it has given me, I have gladly allowed myself to become assimilated into its community. What little service it has allowed me to give, I have proudly given. Yet I remain a new Canadian. I am not a native-born; I am a naturalized citizen. Behind me remains, and occasionally I hear, the reminder of those cold years when, from the wrong side of the tracks, this new Canadian could only look across enviously at the warmly-lighted windows of those who enjoyed Canadian birthright and who so casually accepted the high privileges which were theirs from the cradle on.

That, if I may say so, has been the shocking thing so far as most of us are concerned. We have come, in the main, from lands of oppression, hunger and fear; we, or our fathers, have struggled mightily to assemble the little bit which was needed for that which we sought—the opportunity to be accepted on our abilities, not on the basis of the class or group to which birth has assigned us; freedom of education and opportunity for ourselves and our children; a land and a democracy which would engage our hearts and loyalty as never could those downtrodden acres we were leaving.

We have not come, in the main, from some dark European morass where learning and culture never flowered. It was not ignorance that led us to reject our homes and our friends and the countries of our birth—and out of all lands to which we might have gone, to choose Canada. We, or our fathers, were actuated by those same impulses which, one or two or three centuries earlier, had led the forebears of hon. members, whether they speak English or French, to make this same venturesome, sometimes desperate, move from an old world to a new, to escape from drudgery without hope of security, hunger born of social injustice, religious faith without the freedom to practise it, democratic idealism ruthlessly suppressed by the despot.

And we did not imagine that we were exchanging this for streets of gold and untold wealth when we asked admission to Canada. We knew only that here was a land where a man could call his soul his own, and with hard work could see that his sons and daughters had a better start in life than he, and, with a bit of extra luck, could approach old age in dignity and security. So we made our choice, and gambled our lives and those of our families—and by and large we won. Not without pain were the deep-grown roots of generations wrenched from the familiar soil; but mercifully soon, we found, new roots were taking hold in new, far more nourishing clay than ever we had known. We settled fairly easily, at least the younger of us did, into the new scene as gradually the old one faded. We became, in our own thinking, Canadians in all but citizenship, and we were eager for the day when that final proof of right and liberty would be added. That day is near at hand.

Canada was giving us a new life—what had we to give Canada? We brought to her our brawn and our skill; new Canadians helped till the unbroken soil and build the factories and dig the ditches. They sought to contribute to the new land the best of the national cultures they brought from the old. Was that enough? No; for there remained loyalty. Those of you who know the new Canadian will know that he has been inclined to attach to his Canadianism, to his loyalty to his adoptive country, that same fanaticism which the proselyte shows toward his adoptive faith. To him the title of citizen is something to be proudly worn, a recognition of his own love for this new country of his, an earnest of his determination to serve it—to serve it and to die for it if need be. There is no one of us who has returned from this latest war who does not carry with him the remembrance of the young men with non-Anglo-Saxon, non-Gallic names who lie beneath the temporary markers in the shallow, roadside graves of a half-dozen fronts.

That has been the concrete response of the new Canadian to that inward urge toward an expression of gratitude to his country. That has been the response of most—but I would never suggest it has been the response of all. There have been those whose loyalty has wavered, who have imagined, in their confusion and in their woolly thinking, that there is a higher loyalty than that to Canada; who have not rated their acquired citizenship on so exalted a level as most of us have placed it. Recently we have been shocked to our very roots when we have had to face up to unpleasant realities which upset our comfortable and complacent thoughts and habits. There is no need to be alarmed. There is no point in hysteria, and there is no reason for losing our perspective. We have been tough with our enemies from without. We only need apply the rule of law in order to be tough with our enemies from within. That is what the law is for. But may I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a degree of blame must be shouldered by ourselves as well as by others.

How dearly does the Canadian born citizen value his birthright? How far have we gone in creating in the mind of the world a knowledge that Canadian citizenship is a distinct and valued asset? How far, in brief, have we gone toward becoming a nation, toward offering to these new Canadians a symbol to which they can attach the loyalty and gratitude which wells up within them? There have been those of us who have been inclined to scoff at the forthright American expressions of loyalty, at their reverence of the flag, at the idolatry towards their constitution, the salute to Old Glory, and the hand-on-heart recitation of the oath of allegiance. But on the grim testing ground of this latest war did not this schooling in loyalty pay off in the solidarity by which Smith and O'Mallory and McCrea and Cohen and Russo and Schmidt and Svensen mingled as Americans, mind you, without distinction as to grandparents or parents or as to their own native nationality? We Canadians, too, had that same deep democracy overseas, but we have not approached it at home.

We have no flag of our own to salute. We have no citizenship of Canada to proclaim boldly when our nationality is asked. Too often we have heard the assurance given to Americans, "No, you must not mistake us for the British," and the caution delivered to the British, "You must not confuse us with Americans." We have not shouted proudly from the housetops the proclamation that we are Canadians, a nation as distinctive as any that ever came down the pike of history, an up and coming nation, with the unique ability to get along with our neighbours and to pick a fight with none. A proud nation which when its own freedom and that of its friends became imperilled threw into the fight every man and woman it had available and still had enough left over to become the third greatest producing country in the world.

We have not realized our own greatness. We travel in the strange, conflicting shadow cast by our mother and by our neighbour, and somehow we still refuse to come out into the warm sun of the world's acclaim. Sometimes we actually seem ashamed of being Canadians. So little have we thought indeed of the rights and privileges of our citizenship that we have disfranchised some of those whom we have accepted into our community. You may ask, "Disfranchised them—why?" Because out of the welter of national origins that goes to make the country we dream of there have been some who sprang from countries which currently were our enemies. We did not do it once; we did it twice. Do we treat citizenship so lightly that those who were born to it are apathetic toward it, and that some of those who have acquired it can be stripped of it without inquiry into their loyalties?

[Mr. Croll.]

Let me say a further word about loyalties. It is well that we look to the structure of our own nest before we inquire too deeply to see who has fouled it. Loyalty is a coin with two sides. On the obverse is the attachment of the citizen to the state; on the reverse are the service and inspiration which the state gives to the citizen. I have no use for traitors or for those who accept the protection and benefits of the state and then sell it down the river. I entertain no belief that loyalty can be divided, so much to the state and so much to another organism. To me, as to other members of this house, treachery in all its forms is despicable, and the oath of allegiance is not double talk.

But have we gone sufficiently far in creating or perhaps formalizing that Canadian nation which will have a citizenship and a flag as its symbol? I do not suggest bolting away from the empire—far from it; but I do suggest the creation of an entity in which the Canadian by birth will find pride and the Canadian by choice will find inspiration. I suggest the recognition of a nation newly come of age but already sufficiently mature to accept proudly its high place in the world and to use its newly won prestige in the universal cause of peace. A nation to be proud of, a nation which will hold the loyalty of all whom it accepts within its citizenship.

I suggest also that we call our people Canadians and forget that destructive hyphen we are so wont to use. Surely after all these years we are no longer English or Irish or French or German or Hebrew or Ukrainian Canadians? Surely the people of these national backgrounds need no longer huddle protectively among others of the same descent, keeping alive their immigrant ways and customs only because they have not been accepted into the larger community which apparently is not yet ready to avow its Canadianism.

Surely the time has come for us all to eradicate that sense of domestic isolation? Surely the time has come for us to eradicate the hyphen? Above all, from the date this bill is proclaimed there should be no longer new Canadians or old Canadians—we all belong. I think the minister should undertake an intense educational programme to deal with languages, history and government so that Canadian citizenship may be appreciated, so that it may be known exactly what it implies; that citizenship means ninety per cent of interests that we have in common comes ahead of the ten per cent of the things that divide us. It should be known that citizenship is not only a challenge, that it is an achievement; that not only is it a responsibility, it is a privilege. It should be known that no man can be a citizen of a country without first being a citizen of a community, that no man can be a citizen of the world without first being a citizen of a country. How can we hope to understand the problems of other people and take an intelligent attitude toward them unless we first develop techniques and the willingness to understand one another here in Canada?

It is time we awakened to the greatness of our country and called a holiday on hatreds, both racial and religious, which are attacks on the hopes of a free people, and attach a real and important value to the very fact of Canadian citizenship as created by this bill. Surely the time has come for us to stop our damning of the many for the acts of the infinitesimal few? I say to the house that if we, as other countries, have at times produced Catilines, we have in turn produced many Ciceros.

This Canadian soil is hostile to ersatz Canadians and recognizes no changing styles in loyalty. We must dedicate ourselves anew to creating in this country a Canadian unity which will meet hostile challenges from within without having to abandon basic freedoms in order to meet that challenge. The time has come for us to dispense with the soft, apologetic Canadianism which has been so familiar to us. The time has come for us to build up a conditioned citizenship that can do a long march, sleep on hard ground, go on short rations and still be ready to go into action with a deep, genuine faith and loyalty.

This twentieth parliament I feel will not only give life to a Canadian citizen but present him with a flag and set aside a day to celebrate the occasion. I hope he has much to celebrate.

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much time in discussing this bill, but as one born in the British isles I wish to state my reactions to the bill, especially those sections which will affect British subjects in the days to come if this bill passes.

I should like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and through you, the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) I came to this country in 1913 when many immigrants were coming to Canada from the British isles. I was preceded by three of my brothers and other members of my family, and within a few months of coming to Canada I and my brothers and a great many thousands of other young Englishmen who had come out to Canada found ourselves in the Canadian army. We were proud to serve in the Canadian army, and if the Secretary of State will take the trouble to look up the figures of the early enlistments in the great war of 1914-18 he will find that the great majority of those who served in the first and second Canadian divisions were men born in the British isles who had immigrated to this country shortly before the war. When I listen to members of this house belittle men such as myself who have come out to this country and have paid the price for being a citizen of Canada I wonder what the score is.

One must remember that when we left this country in 1914 and early in 1915 we were all Canadian soldiers. We wore the Canada badge on our shoulders as did the soldiers of the past war, and I consider that those men together with men of all races and creeds who served by their side in the famous battles of the war of 1914-18 helped to make Canada the great country that it is to-day.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has dealt with those sections of the bill which will be applicable to British subjects who come to Canada from other parts of the empire. I think it is a shocking thing that the Secretary of State should put British subjects from other parts of the empire who come to Canada to the trouble and humiliation to which they will be subject under this bill. The Secretary of State proposes that British-born subjects coming to Canada from other parts of the empire shall go through the naturalization courts, and not only that, but they shall be compelled to take an oath of allegiance to His Majesty the King. May I point out to the Secretary of State that a British-born subject owes his allegiance to His Majesty the King and it is an indignity to compel him to reaffirm his allegiance to the king as this bill provides. I object to that very much. I have no objection to the Secretary of State compelling subjects of the British empire to take an oath as a citizen of Canada, but they are already subjects of His Majesty the King and I see no reason to make them reaffirm their allegiance. I would ask the Secretary of State if this matter was discussed with other parts of the British empire?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. COCKERAM: Because it seems to me that the Secretary of State is making fundamental changes in the status of British subjects the world over. British subjects coming to Canada will have definite restrictions placed upon them by this bill, whereas Canadian subjects going to other parts of the British empire will have privileges which those coming to this country will not have. For instance, a Canadian subject can go to England and after a year's residence there he is to all intents and purposes looked upon as a citizen of the British isles. The same thing is true of other parts of the British empire. I would ask the minister what he intends to do to clear up this situation. Is he going to leave it in the position that British subjects coming to Canada are treated in one way, whereas Canadian citizens going to other parts of the empire will get preferential treatment over British subjects coming to Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: Does my hon. friend want me to answer the question now?

Mr. COCKERAM: I would prefer to continue at the moment.

An hon. MEMBER: Putting up a straw man.

Mr. COCKERAM: I have no objection to having the minister answer now.

Mr. MARTIN: This bill in its present form has not only commended itself greatly but so great an impression has it made upon those charged with this matter in the United Kingdom that they propose to use it as a model for future legislation in that country.

Mr. COCKERAM: Then may I suggest that if it is to be used as a model we should make it a model one hundred per cent perfect.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that certain sections of this bill are the thin end of the wedge in loosening the ties of empire of which most of us are so proud. In that regard the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret), speaking on Friday last, made the following statement as reported on page 591 of Hansard:

> In any event I do not wish my vote to be interpreted as a reaffirmation of the principles enunciated in article 26, because I believe that this theory is antiquated, and if, I might say so, I am myself progressively conservative.

He was referring to the section which says that a "Canadian citizen is a British subject". I wonder if that little warning thrown out by the hon. member for Outremont does not mean that at some time in the future the Secretary of State and his following will see that that section is eradicated for all time.

Mr. MARTIN: It was the present Secretary of State who put it in. I think my hon. friend wishes to be fair.

Mr. COCKERAM: But there is an opening to take it out. Further on in his speech the hon. member for Outremont said at page 595 of Hansard:

> The descendants of these Canadians of 1760 —they total some 3,500,000 to-day—are scattered all over Canada. They have remained truly Canadians and, to this day, they still are and feel Canadians. They could have returned to France had they so desired, but they preferred staying here, because they had no other country, no other home than that of America. These Canadians in 1946 figure that they, or at least their ancestors, have made a positive act of Canadianism, and they fail to see how and when the British subjects of English descent residing in Canada have done the same.

What a ridiculous statement that those of British descent residing in Canada have made no positive act of Canadianism! I would point out to the hon. member that no group in this country have been greater Canadians than those who, in the three wars which have taken place since the turn of the century, have been willing to leave this country to fight its battles and to give their blood, and if necessary their lives, for the cause of Canada. It is a well known fact that these forces have been comprised in the main of Canadians other than French-Canadians. When we are talking about being Canadians, we should compare those who are willing to fight the battles of their country with those who have displayed reluctance to do so.

I wish to speak for a few moments about the naturalization courts. The minister, as a lawyer in the city of Windsor, has had some experience of these courts. I ask him, if he were a British subject coming from some other part of the empire, would he like to stand in line and await his turn, possibly for months on end, when he knows that the whole time he is a British subject and that becoming a Canadian is a matter of formality only.

Mr. MARTIN: Is that the way it is to be done?

Mr. COCKERAM: I do not know. I think so. I am going to make a suggestion. If the purpose of this bill is nationalization and not naturalization of people who are already British subjects, and the minister intends to force this section through, I suggest to him that he make it possible in the bill now before this house for British subjects, after one year's residence in Canada, to apply to the clerk of the naturalization court and thereby take the oath of allegiance to Canada, an allegiance already possessed with the exception of the formality of declaration. This will, I believe, clarify the point that a citizen can be a Canadian and a British subject at one and the same time.

I believe that this can be made a great bill. The strength of Canada is in the unity of its people, and I believe that we should be frank with one another, that we should get together and have an act which can be accepted by a majority of the people.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) posed the question, who is asking for this bill? That question ran like a refrain through all his speech. He said that he had tried to find out in Toronto who was asking for the bill and had been unsuccessful. He stated that it was a belief of his that the bill had been asked for by only a few people, almost all from one province. Had the hon. gentleman gone beyond the confines of Toronto and of Ontario he would have found that the great majority of the people in this country want this bill. The error contained in that belief of his is matched only by the additional error when he said that most of the people who came from Europe are opposed to this bill. Again I say, had he known Canada he would have known how wrong that statement was.

The hon. member for Broadview proved too little, but I think the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) tried to prove too much. That gentleman has drawn a certain amount of fire to-day from hon. members on my right. I do not join with them. I certainly do not agree that he scolded the house. He spoke objectively and fairly and he presented to us his ideas. With some of them I disagree. He said that there are many more whose tongue is French who can speak English than there are those whose principal tongue is English and who also speak French. The ratio, he pointed out, is about ten to one. Perhaps there is a reason for that, and that reason certainly does not include any slur upon one of the official languages of Canada. But in the western stretches of this country there are many of us who have little opportunity of learning French, practically none to talk with in French, little chance to read or write in French, and the people will not, unfortunately, go to the trouble of learning a language if they find no opportunity at all of using it. Furthermore, may I say this; as far as we in the C.C.F. are concerned I think the majority of us, if not all of us, when we were asked that question in the census, "Can you read, write or speak French?", answered in the negative. Perhaps we were unduly modest. Certainly most of the members of this party in the house, while we may not understand and appreciate every word which is spoken in speeches in French, do grasp the gist of the argument; certainly most of us can read French papers with some comprehension. Perhaps we have not the temerity of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), and I congratulate him on it, in rising in his place in this house and giving a speech in French, but I think before this session is over some of us may have done the same.

The hon. member for Outremont went on to emphasize the efforts made by the French-speaking population to understand its English-speaking compatriots and the lack of cooperation given in the other direction. I am sorry he said that. Had he been acquainted with western Canada he would have realized that there we have a great realization of the problems and aspirations of the people of Quebec. I think we have a greater knowledge of them than perhaps the people of Quebec have of our hopes and fears on the prairies. I express this hope too: I should like to see members of parliament from the eastern parts of Canada travel through to western Canada, and they will find there a Canadianism second to none in this country. Because we come from the west does not mean that we do not have devotion or loyalty or a desire to serve our country; and the impression which was given in the speech of the hon. member for Outremont was precisely that.

Then he went on to say, is not a complete attachment to the soil true Canadianism? I do not think so. I think it is part of Canadianism, certainly, but we cannot divorce Canada and Canadianism from its people. To me true Canadianism must have a profound regard for the conditions under which Canadians live. True Canadianism cannot exist where there is malnutrition. It is not seen in sickly children. It can no more live in slums than can democracy. True Canadianism is not realized where many of our people are poverty stricken and where the vast majority have no economic security. True Canadianism will find its highest expression when we have eradicated these evils from our country. Then, indeed, we shall not need to talk of lack of patriotism, for never does patriotism burn brighter than in a country whose principal concern is the alleviation of human suffering, the constant improvement in the conditions of the people and the maintenance of equal civil and political rights for all.

It has been argued during this debate that we are a nation; that we are not a nation. I myself think that as yet we are not a nation. It is true that we have the right to appoint our own diplomatic representatives abroad. It is true that as Canada we can sign treaties, as Canada we can join international organizations such as UNO, as Canada we can declare war or maintain neutrality as we see fit. But we are not a nation so long as we are dependent upon an external power for the right to amend our own constitution; we are not a nation so long as we are dependent upon external courts to have the last say as to what our civil law shall be. I hope to see this government rectify these omissions before the twentieth parliament of Canada is finished. I hope to see, too, a Canadian flag, but I do not want to see a Canadian flag which is reminiscent of those things which have divided us in the past; I want to see a uniquely Canadian flag.

There are certain things in this bill which I approve. Naturally, as a member of the C.C.F. I approve the principle of it. As a Canadian I approve the principle. I am especially glad to see that the minister is going to take power at last to instruct our immigrants in the matter of democratic responsibilities and privileges. I only wish that he would go farther and take the power to instruct Canadians in these same privileges and responsibilities; for he has the tools at his hand. Within his department there is a citizenship branch; it is small just now but one which, I hope, will grow. Within the government, belonging to the people of Canada, we have the national film board. I should like to see the citizenship branch cooperate with the national film board and use it through audio-visual education, with leaflets and pamphlets and speakers going all through the country telling Canadians just what Canadianism really is. We have the means; we have the trade unions; we have the farmers' organizations, the cooperatives, the cultural societies in this country, and our people are waiting for that sort of message.

While I approve that I cannot approve another section which makes explicit, discrimination in citizenship. Already the government has decided that there are to be two classes of citizens, those who apparently are genuine citizens and those who, at the same time, for reasons which are not always good, can lose their citizenship. I object to that. I feel that I am as good a Canadian as the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin). I may differ from him politically; I undoubtedly do—

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps you are a better citizen than I am.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): That, too, is possible, Mr. Speaker. The fact remains that there is discrimination explicit in the bill, where the rights of people who have come to this country as immigrants, as I have, are taken away. Already we are setting up the two categories of citizens.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) objected to hyphenated Canadians. I regret to see he used the term "new Canadian". I am not a new Canadian; I am a Canadian without any hyphen about it, and that is how I should like to see all Canadians treated.

Last session I had the following resolution placed on the order paper:

> That, in the opinion of this house, there should be incorporated in the constitution a bill of rights protecting minority rights, civil and religious liberties, freedom of speech and freedom of assembly; establishing equal treatment before the law for all citizens, irrespective of race, nationality or religious or political beliefs; and providing the necessary democratic powers to eliminate racial discrimination in all its forms.

I withdrew that resolution for a good reason. I had seen other resolutions talked out in the house and no vote arrived at. This motion, to my mind at least, was much too important to meet such a fate. It is regrettable that in a democratic state a resolution such as that should have to be introduced, but necessity compelled me to do so because there is no equality in this country for all groups and for all minorities. Our Canadianism means either that we are building Canada in terms of equality or that we are going to slide back into those terrible ways which we have seen demonstrated in Europe in the last fifteen years.

There has been discrimination in Canada against minority groups based on ignorance, bigotry and stupidity, and it still exists in this house. In the Winnipeg Free Press of March 31, 1945, the following editorial appeared:

> Somehow or other ways must be found which will bring individual firms and employers to a realization of the fact that to maintain discriminatory rules of employment is wrong.

In theory, at least, everybody will say "amen" to that. One of the most discriminatory practices I know of in Canadian industry and commerce is where an applicant for a job has to state what his nationality is and what his religion is before he can get work. If we are Canadians we should have the right to work in Canada on the basis of ability and merit and on no other basis. What do I find in the business office of the Free Press? An application form for employment which asks these precise questions: "What is your nationality? What is your religion?"

I might have more belief in the sincerity of that newspaper if it lived up to what it preached. The same thing applies to the government of Canada. I hold in my hand an application form of Wartime Housing Limited for soldiers who fought overseas to give us a chance to live. Any soldier who has fought for Canada and who wants one of these wartime houses has to state what his nationality is and what his religion is. How does the government justify that sort of action with its protestations of the past?

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. gentleman send that form to me? I should like to see it.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I certainly will; I shall send it now.

These men battled for Canada not on the basis of racial origin or their religion. They fought as Canadians and it is as Canadians that we should recognize them. That is one of the things they fought for.

When we brought this matter up before the city council in Winnipeg the Winnipeg Tribune in an editorial on July 19, 1945, said this:

> How can we reasonably expect wholehearted assimilation into the national life of Canada on the part of peoples of many origins if the official attitude continues to be one which gives the appearance of being bent on segregation? Canada needs Canadians, not hyphens. Insistence on hyphenation seems to be firmly entrenched in the official mind.

Yet here again we find this newspaper, which took umbrage at these words, including in its own applications for employment the same request: "What is your nationality? What is your religious denomination?" If these newspapers are sincere, then I suggest that they strike these words from the application forms. They are used either for discriminatory purposes or they are of no use to them at all. But discrimination goes farther and strikes much deeper than these examples I have given of business practices. I have drawn to the attention of the house before the plight of certain minorities in this country. I have spoken of the Jewish people, and none has been more cruelly persecuted by the Christian world in the last two thousand years. They are still suffering all over the world. It still appears to me that anti-Semitism is on the increase. Anti-Semitism, racialism of any type is one of the most deadly enemies of any democratic community. It not only hurts those against whom it is directed but warps and twists the minds of those who practise it; yet we find it again in the government service, in the department of immigration; we find it in the allegedly cultured places in this country, in universities such as McGill and Toronto. I am glad to say that racial discrimination has ceased in the university of Manitoba, but we must never rest until we have wiped it out from these other universities and given to the Jewish people the same rights and the same privileges that every other Canadian citizen has.

Then we have another minority group, those who are of German origin. On September 19, 1939, the Prime Minister said in this house:

> I ask, above all, for a broad toleration. I was glad to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) make that plea, not only on behalf of citizens here in our own country who belong to the two great races, but as well on behalf of those of German descent, who also are citizens of our country.

Yet during the war this government, at the head of which is the man who made that statement, discriminated wretchedly against those of German origin. Those who came to this country from Germany after 1922 were compelled to report to the mounted police, some every month. Like criminals they were compelled to have their finger-prints taken by the mounted police. I know one man, a German by birth, a Canadian by adoption, who had two boys. One of them received a medal for gallantry overseas as an officer in the Royal Canadian Air Force. His second boy died fighting for Canada; yet every month that man had to report to the mounted police. How does the government justify that conduct in view of its expressions of virtue? I know of other cases. I can think of one young lad who fought for three years for Canada, whose people have been in this country for four generations, but because his name was German he was denied the right to work. Yet last session this house accepted the united nations charter, and to what did we pledge ourselves? We said:

> We are determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and the equal rights of men and women.

How does the house intend to put those words into operation? That is one thing we should be considering seriously now. Then we have those of Ukrainian and Polish descent who were brought to Canada by the thousands by the railroads and unceremoniously dumped on the most barren and rocky ground in the west. The hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) said the majority of the people of Quebec feel that they are the true settlers of this country. I would suggest to him that he go to western Canada, where he will find people who also believe they are the true settlers of this country. We do not say we are better than other Canadians; we merely say that we are as good. These people have made a garden out of what was practically a desert. As a memorial to their labour and toil one can see on every farm great piles of stones which were taken out of the ground by heart-breaking, back-breaking labour.

There is still one other group; and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read part of an advertisement which appeared in a Winnipeg newspaper:

> This institution wishes to announce that beginning January 28, 1946, it will offer an eighteen months' course for practical nursing approved by the Department of Public Health and Welfare. Applicants must be eighteen years of age, have successfully completed grade 8 and have good health and good moral character.

This girl, who was born in Edmonton, applied for the job. This was her answer:

> Dear Miss . . .
> Following our telephone conversation of Saturday, I feel that I should let you know how sorry I am at not having been able to have your application accepted by our medical staff. They feel that accepting an applicant of your nationality would be a new thing in the history of our practical nursing school, and for this reason would like to have your acceptance postponed.

Mark those words: "They feel that accepting an applicant of your nationality." What nationality was that girl? She was Canadian, but her skin was dark; and because her skin was darker than ours she was refused one of the fundamental rights of a citizen of this country. That is not the only case; I could go on citing example after example, but there is one more about which I must tell the house. This is the story of a young man who came to Canada from the West Indies. He went to university and obtained a degree in science. He became a licensed pharmacist. He went to Dublin and there took two years of pre-medical training and three years of medical training; then, because his money ran out, he returned to Canada. He was coloured. He had this degree as a pharmacist, this degree as a scientist; but because he was coloured he was condemned in perpetuity, apparently, to do nothing but work as a porter on the railway. I have brought other similar examples to the attention of this house. How do we justify that sort of thing in the name of Canadianism? How do we justify it in the words of the united nations charter? In article 13 we say:

> We promise to assist in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

Are those words which we accepted last year to have any sincerity at all? If they do mean anything to us, then we cannot permit these conditions to exist in Canada.

There are many reasons for the racial discrimination we see in our midst. One of them obviously is lack of education. Another is psychological. I have not time to deal with those matters, but I should like to suggest to the house that there is also an economic basis. In western Canada children of all ethnic groups and all religious faiths go to the same schools. Children are not born with prejudices; when they are at school they get on as well as any children do. Perhaps they fight and bicker and squabble, but by and large they are united by an esprit de corps to the school and by a bond of common comradeship. But when they leave the school and go out in the world what happens? They find there are not sufficient jobs, and there are too many seekers after work; so that instead of being friends and comrades they become enemies, fighting each other for the right to work. That is even more apparent among the parents, where you find that a man who at one time, in a period of full employment, was perhaps your neighbour, following a depression becomes a man who is possibly going to take the bread from your mouth and take away your job. Instead of being a neighbour he becomes an enemy; instead of his being a friend we begin to expand on the ethnic differences and the religious differences which separate us. One of the safest and surest methods of getting rid of racial discrimination in Canada would be for the government to carry out its pledge of full employment.

There is still one other minority, the Japanese, which was brought to the attention of this house the other evening by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). The hon. member for Kamloops, with regard to the deportation orders, spoke of:

> . . . that pressure which is being applied to it (the government) by, I submit with all respect, uninformed and unenlightened groups in the country.

The hon. member said that he submitted this with respect. I say that he submitted it with intolerable arrogance and insolence. Who are these uninformed and unenlightened groups in this country? I have here resolutions from the Church of England in Canada. Is that an uninformed and unenlightened group? I have resolutions here from the United Church of Canada. Is that an unenlightened and uninformed group? I have resolutions from practically every church in this country. Are we to believe that these are uninformed and unenlightened groups? The hon. member speaks with an ignorance which is unprecedented when he speaks on this subject. He says:

> Let us analyse what is involved in being a British subject. I submit that it means nothing more or less than being a citizen of the British empire.

If that is the case how are the Hindus who live in British Columbia treated? Are they treated as citizens of the British empire, or as people who are inferior because their skins are coloured? How can anybody in this house reconcile such conduct with these high protestations of Canadianism we have heard for so long? Either put those words into practice or let us admit that they are false and a complete mockery. Then the hon. member for Vancouver South found himself ably supported by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). What a combination! Arsenic and old lace! The hon. member for Vancouver South said:

> The real genius of the governments of the British nations has been that questions are dealt with realistically, not by theorizing at which my friends of the C.C.F. are so good.

If the hon. gentleman is a realist I am proud to be a theorist. In my lifetime the realists have landed us in two world wars and two world depressions. If that be realism the hon. gentleman can have it. My theorizing is this, that any citizen of this country, whether he be Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant, believer or unbeliever, black, white or yellow, has exactly the same rights as any other citizen.

Then we had the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the dying hours of the last session coming here and tabling three orders in council which had as their intent the deportation of Canadians of Japanese descent. I have nothing but contempt for any party which calls itself a Liberal party which can do a thing like that. When I hear the Prime Minister state that such a policy will be carried out, and then clothe it in words such as "doing justly" and "acting with mercy," my stomach revolts. If this be Liberalism, then it is no wonder that all over the world Liberalism is failing and declining, because Liberalism has never had the courage to live up to its finest ideals. If that be Canadianism, then I do not know the meaning of the word.

In committee stage I intend to move an amendment which perhaps to some extent will define the rights and privileges of Canadian citizens. Perhaps I shall be told that this is just a moral gesture. I will not dissent. Perhaps I shall be told that one cannot legislate a people into morality. There I disagree, for a hundred years ago in the United Kingdom slavery was rife and accepted. Then legislation was invoked against it; and what was then a legal wrong is to-day a moral wrong.

A hundred years ago in the United Kingdom it was accepted that women and children should work down in the bowels of the earth in the coal mines for twelve or fourteen hours a day. Legislation was introduced against it. What was then a legal wrong has now become a moral wrong. I still think we can legislate people, at least to some extent, into a state of morality.

It is the responsibility of parliament to create these conditions which will make our citizens grateful for our traditions, proud of that even-handed justice and equality of treatment which is the right of all, regardless of creed or race. It is the responsibility of parliament to grant our citizens some measure of happiness in the enjoyment of the highest standard of living which Canada can provide; to give them that security from want which this country can afford if its resources are used for the benefit of all. Then we shall have Canadians. Then we shall have Canadians not in any sense of the lamentable nationalisms which still beset us and divide us, but rather Canadians who, in deepest tribute, can say, "This is our country; this is our Canada to which have come the people of all the nations to seek peace and freedom, to live in dignity and with justice; our Canada whose glory is certified for all time by the blood of its youth who died to give us an opportunity to make our country great."

Great? It was Disraeli who said that the greatness of a nation lies not in the mightiness of its armies and fleets, or in the repletion of treasuries, or in the factories and forges of industry which blaze on every plain; the greatness of a nation lies in the character of its people, and here we have a splendid and incomparable heritage. Then let us see to it that we do not neglect it or abuse it. Let us build a Canada which will be the pride of all its citizens and the envy, the friendly envy, of the peoples of the world.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, the majority of those who have spoken in this debate have been men born in this country. Forty years ago, in the spring of 1906, I left England to take up residence in Canada. Had the phrase been coined at that time I should have then been called a non-Canadian British subject. It is a phrase used in this measure. Perhaps it is a somewhat cumbersome one, and the minister might wish to follow a procedure frequently followed in the army, and refer to that group of people as N.C.B.S.

When I left the old country I was the product of the ordinary English public school. By present standards I do not suppose my education was considered high. I was well grounded in history. I had a keen interest in games; perhaps to my love of sports can be attributed the root of a desire I have to compromise. Sometimes I think that in your position, Mr. Speaker, you must regard sportsmen as those of a high order because, after all, you are a sort of glorified referee whose responsibility is to interpret to the house the rules of parliamentary fair play.

I believe that my religious education was a sort of sentimental attachment to the school chapel. I arrived here in Canada, and went at once to the western province of Alberta. There I arrived in a strange world. In that country were groups of people of many nationalities. I remember well in my neighbourhood a group of Icelandic people, and other groups of Welsh, American, English, Swedish, Norwegian, and down-east Canadians.

I lived in Alberta for some considerable time before I realized that there was anything else but a down-east Canadian. It was not mentioned in disrespect, but those Canadians in Alberta forty years ago were regarded as immigrants, in exactly the same way as I was regarded as an immigrant. They were settlers. It was a strange world into which I was inducted—and inducted not as a Canadian but as a westerner.

I wanted to be one of the gang, and therefore went out and bought myself a pair of chaps and a wide-brimmed hat. I became a westerner, and remained such until I went overseas during the first great war. It was on the slopes of Vimy ridge I first became a Canadian. I do not say I should not like to have become a Canadian before that date, but it had scarcely occurred to me that there was such an organization.

As I say, I wore the garb of the people of western Canada, and because of that, with the additional fact that I wore a Stetson hat, I was considered one of them. Had there been a more dignified method of welcoming me into the family of Canada I should have been delighted to follow it, by going before either a mounted police officer, a justice of the peace, or even a bishop. I should have welcomed whatever method might have been laid down.

But until now, so far as I know, no such methods have been laid down. As I have said, it was on the slopes of Vimy ridge, where I had the great honour of serving with a regiment recruited from the province of Quebec, that I first became a Canadian. I have been out west most of the time since the close of that war. No longer does one hear in western Canada the expression, "A down-east Canadian." One hears the expression, "Canadian." World war II has cemented that spirit of unity which, as far as I was concerned, was first sown when we fought on the slopes of Vimy ridge.

I believe that throughout this dominion there is a wide desire for Canadian citizenship to be defined and clarified. To me Canadian citizenship is not incompatible with being a British subject. After all, Canada is a nation in the British commonwealth of nations and as such I can be a Canadian citizen and still feel that I am a member of the British commonwealth of nations.

As I understand the present bill, a non-Canadian British subject may reside in Canada and remain a British subject if he so desires, or he may express a desire to become a Canadian citizen and by carrying out certain formalities laid down in the bill he can become a Canadian citizen. Provision is made also for the Canadian citizen who is travelling among other nations of the British commonwealth of nations still to retain his British citizenship. Therefore, if a non-Canadian British subject comes here and desires to become a Canadian citizen, to my mind he undergoes an act of renationalization rather than naturalization. I think there is a difference. He still remains a British subject; he gives up his nationality of Englishman, Scotsman or Australian and becomes a Canadian by nationality. That would have met with my early desires as a boy, which I expressed a few minutes ago, to be permitted to become one of the gang.

The average non-Canadian British subject coming here who is born in one of the other nations of the British commonwealth has been steeped in the history of the commonwealth. He is familiar with the system of government and the customs of our institutions, customs and institutions which in the main are uniform in every nation of the British commonwealth of nations. He will have learned about magna charta, he will know of habeas corpus and the bill of rights, and he will know something of the statute of Westminster. He is of the breed and, being of the breed, he knows the breed; he is prepared to take the worth of the breed for granted. Those things which are closest to the hearts of many are seldom found readily in their mouths.

I referred to the willingness to compromise. There is much in this bill that I can accept, but there is one point which I do find it difficult to take readily. I refer to the necessity of a non-Canadian British subject having to serve the same period of apprenticeship when he comes to Canada that must be served by a man who has not been brought up in the traditions, who is not familiar with the customs and the system of government of the British commonwealth.

Mr. MARTIN: As the hon. gentleman knows, that is not a new provision; that is twenty-seven years old.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, no.

Mr. PEARKES: I am referring to the provision that a non-Canadian British subject must remain in Canada for five years. That is the point I am complaining about.

Mr. MARTIN: The point I am making is that that is not a new provision. That has been in existence since 1919 in this country and in all dominions.

Mr. GREEN: For one purpose only, the Immigration Act.

Mr. PEARKES: Whether it is new or not, I still take exception to that clause. I regard this period of apprenticeship as a university course. A young man entering university may have to take the full course, but if he has certain academic qualifications which he has obtained elsewhere the period of the course may be reduced. He has to take the same examination and he has to go through the same procedure of receiving his diploma. I would look upon a non-Canadian British subject as a student entering this university of Canada who, because of the education he has received elsewhere in Canadian principles, will have his time of study in Canada reduced.

Perhaps there has been a certain amount of heat interjected into this debate and it might be well that there had not been so much. I feel that no group in this house or in this country has a monopoly on loyalty to Canada. I love Canada as intensely as any native-born Canadian. I may not express this in exactly the same way, I may not give vocal expression to my thoughts perhaps as readily as some others, but I still love this country.

I rode the range and I have drunk deep of the beauties of the prairies, of the sunsets, of the foliage of the fields. I have climbed the Rockies and I have been impressed with the grandeur of those mountains. I have wandered over the foothills and I have dreamed my proud daydreams. The proud daydreams I have dreamed have been, "What may I do to further the interests of this my country?" Therefore I do ask the minister to reconsider this five-year qualification clause.

I wish to speak of one other matter, the twenty-year provision in connection with those who have come to our country and who during that period have been unable to learn one or other of our languages. If they cannot speak English or French and have lived here for twenty years and are able to meet other requirements, such as knowledge of our customs and so forth, they are to be granted the right of citizenship. I consider that provision just in so far as elderly people who are here now are concerned. We know that with the system of colonization used in western Canada groups of immigrants have been tempted to live together in certain colonies where they have not had the same opportunities of free intercourse as the people coming to this country now do have. Therefore I would say: Allow men or women who are over fifty years of age and who have lived here for twenty years, whether they have been able to learn English or French or not, to have the privileges of citizenship provided that they meet the other requirements.

But I am not sure that I can go so far as to say that the young man or the young woman who has lived here for twenty years and who in the last twenty years has not taken advantage of the opportunities which now exist for all people to learn our languages should be granted citizenship until he or she has learned one of those languages. I suggest that an age-limit might be considered at which they might be permitted to become citizens of Canada by taking advantage of that clause.

As for the future I would make it quite definite and clear that anybody coming into this country who wants to become a citizen will be expected to learn one or other or both of our languages and I would not allow that twenty-year clause to apply in the future.

Reference has been made by the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) to Japanese residents of this country. I represent a constituency in which the Japanese lived in their thousands before the outbreak of this war. When war came with Japan those residents were removed as a protective measure because there was a danger of espionage or of hostile action being taken. The people of my constituency have realized the difference that there is now that the Japanese have gone, and whether the Japanese are made citizens of Canada or not the people of Vancouver island and the people of the gulf islands do not want to see the Japanese moved back into those areas. I have had letters from all kinds of organizations, I have had letters from individuals, from farmers, from fishermen, from employers of labour, from churches and organizations all containing this plea: Do not let the Japanese come back to this territory after the war. They believe that the present government has given an undertaking that the Japanese will not come back. They do not want them to come back. They do not want the Japanese to live there for various reasons, the main reason being that they are not assimilable. They have been engaged, I know, in all kinds of pusuits, particularly in fishing, and it has been suggested that if the Japanese do not come back we shall not be able to maintain the fishing industry. But that has been proved to be incorrect because the white man has taken over the fishing industry, and moreover it has provided an opportunity for employment for our own native-born Canadian Indians, to step in and show their craft. They have been able to take over the industry of commercial fishing which the Japanese were exploiting before the war.

The people of Vancouver island do not want to see the Japanese come back. They expect the government to live up to the promises that that government made.

There are many high-principled people on Vancouver island and in other parts of British Columbia who wonder what shall be done with the Japanese. It goes somewhat against their grain to think that those Japanese, if they are Canadian citizens, must live in one part of Canada and not in another part or, if they are Canadian citizens, that they must be deported and sent back to Japan. But I do not believe that there is one-tenth of one per cent of the population of Vancouver island who want to see the Japanese come back. When the Japanese left they left in an arrogant manner. I should like to read an extract from a letter I received only to-day describing the manner in which the young Japanese males left just after Pearl Harbor:

> They were in uproarious spirits, taking possession of the lounges—

That was in the Canadian Pacific boats.

> —flirting heavily with some girls who were with them, gambling until stopped by the ship's officers, and behaving generally in a most unseemly manner. They embarked at every island port. The Japs here were Japs first and Japs to the last.

I do not know what the government's plans are to deal with this situation. I sometimes feel almost more sorry for the government than for the Japanese. It will not be an easy decision for the government to make. As a British Columbian I should feel quite happy if the Japanese were never coming back to the coast of British Columbia. As a Canadian—and I have been talking about Canadian citizenship—I cannot recommend to any group of Canadians that they should accept large numbers of these Japanese. As a British Columbian I must ask what steps are being taken by the government to prevent the Japanese from coming back to my country if they are moved to other places.

As I have already said, I would find it very hard as a Canadian to accept the principle that Canadian citizens must live somewhere and not be allowed to live elsewhere. It is a difficult and perplexing problem.

I could give advice to the Japanese clearly and definitely. To them I would say: Accept every opportunity to go back as quickly as you can to Japan whether you were born there or not. Go back because in the long run you and your children will be happier back in Japan than you will be here in Canada distributed across this country or living in British Columbia, as the case may be. You will have to live in small minorities where there will be no chance of you or your children or your grandchildren assimilating with the rest of the population. What is going to happen? Small groups intermarrying, and the children and the children's children will deteriorate.

I think from the high Christian point of view now is the opportunity to repatriate the Japanese back to their homeland where perhaps they would be able to introduce to Japan, which has suffered so much, some of the western and Christian ideas that they have learned and in this way raise the standard of the other Japanese. They can do a great missionary work there. If they have not assimilated the ideals of western civilization while they have been here, they never will, and we should send them back.

So that, while I find it difficult to help the government out of its present predicament I must hold the government to its promises, and I feel like offering the suggestion to every Japanese that they should go back to their land and that if they will do that the government will take care of their rehabilitation back in Japan or in some other island.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house met at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I first express commendation of the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) for the bill which he introduced into the house and which is now before us to establish the status of Canadian citizen. The bill, I think all hon. members will agree, gives every indication of being the result of very careful work, and I am sure the commendation the minister has received from all parts of the house indicates that it is a splendid piece of work. I am sure he must have been pleased to see it reported in the press to-day that the government of Australia is so much impressed with the principle of this bill that it is inclined to consider introducing a similar measure in the commonwealth of Australia. So again I say that the Secretary of State deserves great commendation for the splendid bill he has laid before us.

In the debate which has taken place so far there was some suggestion on the part of some hon. members that the United States had dealt with their problems of establishing citizenship and fostering devotion to their country in a manner which Canada might well emulate. As I listened to various speakers giving expression to that view I thought to myself, can these be representatives of a people who decided at the very outset of the second great war that it was a war in which they should immediately take part in order to protect their freedom and the freedom of the world, and who did it unhesitatingly and with the support of all parts of the country? I happened to be in this house when that decision was taken, and as I recall, only two members showed the slightest inclination not to agree with that decision. In that war we, the Canadian people, took into our armed forces over 1,100,000 persons, the vast majority of whom enlisted on a voluntary basis. I venture to say there is no other country in the world, the United States included, which could put into its armed forces almost one-tenth of its people on a voluntary basis. I ask myself, can this be a parliament of the Canadian people in which its representatives find fault with the Canadian people and point to the country to the south of us as more deserving of our admiration? Much as I admire that country to the south, the fact remains that they were just as much in danger as we were on that fateful third of September, 1939, but it took over a year for their people to come to a united decision that they should take part in that war. Had it not been for the decision which was taken by the Canadian people just before our declaration of war on September 10, 1939, and remembering that France collapsed in June, 1940, and Britain stood alone except for the other members of the commonwealth and her empire; had Canada not been at her side, with the help she was able to give in giving an uplift to her morale, with the men she sent into the air force, the troops she had in the British isles to help defend the shores of Britain, I fear we would have lost the war. I shall not refer to-night to our achievements after entering the war. In view of these exploits of a people which has played such a crucial part at a time of crisis, a people numbering around twelve million who by their free will act saved, perhaps, the very liberties of mankind, it ill behooves any hon. member to compare our achievement unfavourably with that of the people of any other country, even the great republic to the south.

There has been some suggestion that Americans have so solved their problems that the people of the United States are more proud of being members of that great country than Canadians are of being Canadians. People who talk like that must have associated with different kinds of Canadians from those with whom I have associated. I happen to have served for a time in the army in the first great war, and again in the second great war. I saw something of the reactions of my fellow Canadians toward their country; also I saw and heard in my travels something of the reactions of peoples of other countries toward their respective countries; and I came to the conclusion that much of the feeling that we were somehow inferior in the way we dealt with our great problems was not justified by the facts of the situation. I am satisfied that deep down within the soul of every Canadian there is just as much love of country as there is on the part of any American. The Canadian may not be quite so open in his expression of that feeling; but from what I have seen and from what the men of Canada have achieved on the field of battle, in the air and on the sea, will anyone in this house say that the Canadian has not shown just as much devotion to his country as has any man who belongs to any other nation? After all, "by their fruits ye shall know them"; and I submit it ill behooves any member of this parliament, right at the end of a war in which our people have given such proofs of their bravery and their devotion to their country, their ability to organize themselves and strike blow after blow for freedom, to cast aspersions upon the loyalty of the Canadian people to their own country.

I have heard it said that there is a work of reconciliation to be done. A work of reconciliation has been done by the great leaders of the Canadian people ever since confederation. It seems to me there is some disposition in this house to assume that the two great races, which voluntarily went together to create this great country and have lived together in great friendship in spite of the strains which have at times developed since confederation, suddenly need to be reconciled to each other. If they had not been ready to give and take, confederation would never have been brought about. If they had not been ready to live and work with one another in fraternity and friendship, we would not have been able to take the great part we took in the first great war.

I well remember the attitude as we appeared to be approaching still another great war. I well remember the thoughts of some people, people who did not believe that this country was built upon a firm foundation. They felt that the war would put such stresses and strains upon us that the country would be torn asunder. In the face of one of the greatest trials that any nation ever had to meet, trials which we went through in the last war, when we took into the armed services over 1,100,000 people, the vast majority of them on a voluntary basis, and when some people despaired of the country standing together united, what was the result? Time after time the apostles of disaster prophesied that the country would be split asunder, and every time the crisis was met under the leadership of the great Prime Minister of the country. Canada came through the war as a united country and survived many difficulties in regard to what had to be done, without impairing its essential unity. Therefore, when any hon. member rises in his place and suggests that suddenly the great work of reconciliation has to be commenced, I say that it was commenced by Sir John A. Macdonald, carried on well by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his successors, so that to-day I am satisfied that Canada is a more united nation and more at peace within itself, that there is more fraternity, more devotion to our common country, Canada, than has ever before been the case in its entire history.

I mentioned the work of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have also in mind the work of Sir Robert Borden, the man who insisted that Canada should as a nation sign the treaty of Versailles. I have in mind the work of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who was the first Canadian minister of the crown to sign a treaty on behalf of Canada. I have in mind the separate declaration of war by Canada on the decision of the Canadian parliament, which was taken in this very chamber in the early days of September, 1939. Hon. members will recall that Great Britain went to war on September 3. Our declaration of war, signed by His Majesty the King, came into effect on September 10. By these and other acts the world recognizes Canada as a nation. The world has admired the prowess of Canada on the field of battle, her achievements in the field of industry and invention, and her great contribution to the winning of the late war in other fields. The world recognized that Canada was a nation. It was certainly time that the fact that Canada was a great nation of the world was recognized by the law of this country. I was pleased to see that the bill recognizing and legalizing Canadian nationality was received with approval by all parties in the house.

I find the suggestion that Canadians do not regard themselves as Canadians a most strange one. If hon. members go to any person who was proud to wear the badge of Canada on his shoulder in either the first or the second great war and tell him that he did not think Canada was a nation and that he was not fighting for the freedom and liberty of Canada, they would get their answer. When one considers that 1,100,000 people entered the Canadian army in the late war and were privileged to wear the badge of Canada I think one will find that the feeling of loyalty and devotion to Canada, the feeling that there is a Canadian nationality, that there is such a thing as a Canadian is more widespread and deep-seated than many of us realize.

Section 3 of the bill—and I mention it with the hope that I shall not be called to order, and in order that hon. members will know what I am talking about—says that it shall be a sufficient answer to any question which brings up the nationality of a Canadian to say that he is a Canadian citizen. This simply puts into words what I venture to say has been the thought of nine out of ten Canadian people for the last twenty-five years.

If there has been one thing more than another that has been mentioned to me by Canadians of all racial origins it has been their resentment at the idea that, although they were Canadians who intended to live in Canada, have their families here and had no intention of going elsewhere, they had to put themselves down as of English, Scotch, Irish, French or some other origin. If there was nothing in this bill but the establishment of the will of the sovereign people of Canada that there is a Canadian nationality, the minister who introduced this bill would have done a splendid piece of work.

Something has been said about the provision that a person may become a Canadian citizen if he has satisfied the other requirements which are set out in section 10 of the bill, such as being of good character, lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence therein, has an adequate knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship, with adequate knowledge of the English or French language not an absolute requisite. I hope that the house will not in any way require that provision to be curtailed.

From time to time since I have been privileged to be a member of this house I have drawn to its attention a situation which confronts many of our western pioneers who came and settled in western Canada, thirty, forty and fifty years ago, and who for one reason or another, some of them because they happened to come from a country which was under the domination of Austria-Hungary, which at the time in question was an enemy country, could not become British citizens when they were getting their homesteads. Therefore they were given a certificate in what is called "form K", which many of them thought did make them British subjects. Later on in life, when some of them wished to apply for old age pension, after going out, breaking up the land, clearing it of bush and stone and hewing out homes for themselves on the western plains and in the wooded areas, they found that they were not British subjects. Then they would come in and apply to be qualified as British subjects, and certain questions were asked of them. One question was: "Do you intend to apply for old age pension?" If one of these men who helped to pioneer this country admitted that he would like to get what the people of this country have provided for people in their old age, in many cases the judge would decline the citizenship even if the man could speak English or French. I hope the minister will see to it that that sort of thing does not continue in the future. Surely no judge should be permitted to deny to a man who has pioneered in this country, who has lived in it for twenty years and who is otherwise qualified to be a British subject, that which this parliament intended every worthy citizen of this country to have, by refusing for no legal reason to grant that man British citizenship. From time to time I have brought cases like that forward, and to-night I wish to thank the minister most sincerely for making it possible for some of my constituents who helped build western Canada and who sent their boys to fight and in some cases to die for Canada, now to become British subjects even though they cannot speak English as well as some hon. members.

A suggestion has been made that there would be no harm in permitting that section to apply to those already settled in Canada, but that it should not apply to future settlers. To-day people who are among the most freedom-loving in the world are looking for homes in Canada, or at any rate somewhere other than Europe. Because they let it be known that they favoured freedom in their own country, many are afraid to return to their homelands, and they wish to come to Canada. I think, for example, of some of the Ukrainian people, some of the Polish people, who when Poland was overrun went into the Polish army in exile or are now refugees in Germany. I get letters from them and from their relatives saying they do not wish to be returned to the Soviet Union but would like to be permitted to enter Canada. Could we wish to have better citizens than men who were so devoted to freedom and liberty that they were prepared to remain in exile for five years, fighting against tyranny, and who are now ready to throw in their lot with the building up of a great peace-time Canada as they were ready to risk their lives in order to establish freedom during the war? I hope the time will soon come when we may be able to admit to our country some of those worthy citizens who can make a great contribution to the building up of this country, even as their relatives have made a great contribution here in Canada in the past fifty years. I well remember when many of these people from central Europe were brought out and settled on our prairies. There were those who said they would never become good citizens. They feared what would be the result; but now that the country has seen what good citizens these people are and how ready they have been to support Canada in peace and defend her in war, those misgivings with regard to allowing some of them into this country should no longer prevail. Some of these worthy people may be fifty years old or more when they come in the future. If they come here and make good citizens, as their relatives did fifty years ago, then they in turn should be able to look forward to becoming Briitsh subjects and Canadian citizens, even if they have difficulty in mastering the English or the French language. Therefore I urge the minister and the house not to take that section out of this act.

It has been suggested that if a man is a Canadian citizen it should not be provided in the bill that he is also a British subject. On that point I submit that whether or not it is put in the bill, if a man is given the status of a Canadian citizen and takes the oath of allegiance to the king of the British empire and commonwealth set out in the schedule, by that very fact he has a status as a subject of His Majesty, a status common to the citizen of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and certainly Northern Ireland. He has a common status with the people of all those countries. Whether or not it is put in the bill I think the courts would rule that he was a subject of the king. Consequently I believe that section is just a recognition of the legal position. But through you, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to hon. members that while I want to be a Canadian citizen I am also happy to belong to the British family.

I happened to attend the monetary conference at Bretton Woods, where there were distinguished representatives from India, New Zealand, South Africa, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and from other parts of the British empire and commonwealth. While each of these groups recognized that they were as free to speak their minds as any other groups (the most spirited attack upon British policy came from the Indian delegation), there was a common feeling that we belonged to one family. I thought to myself what a splendid thing the British commonwealth and empire was, that within it you could have people of all religions and all races, from all parts of the globe, with the feeling that they belonged to one family, people who would work together as brothers in one family. As far as I am concerned I think of such men as Field Marshal Smuts, General Botha, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe and others who were happy to belong to the family of British subjects, realizing that within that family they were just as free as the people of any other nation on the face of the globe, while at the same time they were part of a family that would help to promote the peace of the world, and I am happy and proud to join the company of such men as those I have mentioned, and other outstanding leaders of various commonwealth countries.

I think the tendency of the world at the present time must not be toward an ever-narrowing devotion to one nation. There must be loyalty to your own nation, yes; but there must be an ever-widening loyalty. If one looks to the past, first there was loyalty to the tribe, and the tribes fought each other. Then there was loyalty to larger and larger groups. So that to-day, as I see it, while being loyal to Canada, it seems to me we should do what we can to strengthen the good will and accord which prevail in the family of British nations.

But there is another aspect of the question which points to a part which Canada can play. We have brought into our midst the oppressed of other lands. One-fifth of our people have come to us from countries whose people are of other than British or French origin. As those people from other lands have lived in our midst we have come to realize that there is very little difference between one human being and another. We have overcore some of the racial prejudices we may have had before we came to know the people of other racial origins. While in the past Canada has served as a sort of connecting link between the United Kingdom and the United States, and to a certain extent by virtue of the fact that one of the great races which people this country is the French race we had a special appeal to the great French people, so now that we have taken into our midst the peoples of almost all countries in Europe, at least we in western Canada feel that if we can get along with them in perfect harmony and accord, we through them have learned that men are brothers and can live as brothers. Perhaps Canada, through that very fact can learn to play a part in the councils of the world in bringing all the nations of the world into greater harmony and accord.

Surely the nation of Canada playing a part in drawing together the various members of the British family, and the various members which make up the human family, to a point where war shall be no more and fraternity and brotherhood shall prevail—surely this is a greater vision than one which says, I will centre all my life and all my consideration in my own country, and have no care whatsoever in the working together of the different members of the human race.

Members find no difficulty in being loyal at the same time to their families, to their cities, to their provinces and to their country. Many people find no inconsistency at the same time in feeling a loyalty to Canada and to the British family of nations. Others to-day are ready to go farther and say that we must set up a world government where we shall have loyalty to the human family, where we shall recognize the fatherhood of God and the essential brotherhood of man.

There has been some suggestion that in some way British subjects should not have to comply in the same way as others with the requirements in regard to obtaining Canadian citizenship, the idea being that when they wish to become Canadian citizens they should not have, among other things, to take the oath of allegiance. I will admit that at first I thought that when a British subject came to this country we should give to him some extra consideration over a person who is not a British subject, when both applied to be Canadian citizens. But the more I thought about the question the more I realized that the disadvantages far outweighed the advantages.

Speaker after speaker has mentioned that if we are to have real unity we must treat every Canadian on exactly the same basis, no matter where his ancestors came from. If we are to say to an Englishman, a Scotsman or an Irishman who comes to Canada, we will treat you as a preferred person; we are not going to require you to go through the same steps as the Americans, the Russians, or any other—

An hon. MEMBER: Why should he?

Mr. TUCKER: The reason why we should treat them the same is that if we treat one better than another he will carry that in his mind, and the other man will carry it in his mind after he becomes a Canadian citizen.

Mr. COCKERAM: Absolute nonsense.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend says it is absolute nonsense. I would recall to his mind the words of various members on his own side of the house who have said over and over again that if we are to have wholehearted unity in Canada, we must treat all applicants for citizenship the same. If you say to a Scotsman, we will say—

Mr. KNOWLES: Careful, now.

An hon. MEMBER: Why a Scotsman?

Mr. TUCKER: If we were to say to a Scotsman that it was less needful that, to become a Canadian citizen, he go through the same steps as would be required from a man coming from the United States, the Scotsman would be inclined to say, well, it must be that I am a better Canadian to start with; I must have been better when I landed in this country than the other man was.

Mr. JACKMAN: One of them is a British subject.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, the Scotsman is a British subject; no one takes that status away from him; and if he does not wish to become a Canadian citizen, he does not have to.

If we want to have everybody coming to this country and applying for Canadian citizenship feel that they are all on the same basis, then the only way to do it is to say to the Frenchman, the Englishman, the Scotsman, or the American, you must all take the same steps, and you will have to take the oath or affirmation.

It is an oath or affirmation I think everyone should have to take before receiving the right to play his part in choosing our government. I do not believe anyone should come here from another country and have a vote in choosing a government without first taking the stand that he will uphold Canada and stand behind her. Surely there is nothing disgraceful about going before a judicial officer to take the kind of oath prescribed in this bill. This is the oath or affirmation.

An hon. MEMBER: A lot of people in your riding would not take that oath.

Mr. TUCKER: This is the oath or affirmation:

> I swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George VI, his heirs and successors, according to law; and that I will faithfully observe the laws and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

Is it disgraceful for a man from England to appear alongside a man from the United States, and take that oath or affirmation before a judicial officer? After all, I submit to the government that before any man has a right to vote or to hold office in this country he should be required to take that oath or affirmation of allegiance to our king and our country.

Indeed, it is pointed out to me that members of the privy council have to undergo that "disgrace" before they can assume the duties of their high office—and it is a disgrace which I am sure some hon. members opposite would not mind assuming. Perhaps, in view of the way they are acting, that would not apply to some on the other side.

In her short time as a nation, Canada has had a glorious history, one which has been based upon tolerance between man and man, no matter what his race or religious origin. There has been a feeling of fraternity developed with these peoples from other countries who have come and settled on our lands, and have shown their willingness to be good, faithful, loyal Canadian citizens. We have demonstrated by our past achievements, by our ability to weld into one Canadian people the diverse elements of which this great nation is composed, that if we carry on with the programme before us this session, that of laying a broader and firmer foundation for this Canadian nation, Canada will go forward to a future greater than she has yet known.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) upon the contribution he has made to the debate. I followed his remarks closely and while I do not agree with all he said—we have the right to disagree, of course—I may say that I am in wholehearted agreement with many of the things he did say.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) spoke with such eloquence and fervour on his motion for the second reading of this bill that a stranger listening might have been justified in coming to the conclusion that when it was passed we would "change the sorry scheme of things entire" and have a new heaven and a new earth in this country. Unfortunately that result will not follow.

We are all Canadians and we have called ourselves Canadians for many years. When this bill becomes law it will not make us better Canadians or more conscious of our Canadian citizenship. We shall take no greater pride in our country after this bill is passed than we did before. We shall be no more loyal to our constitution and we shall be no less critical of or more satisfied with conditions that prevail in this country. We shall be no more united as a nation.

I make these remarks with two reservations. First, I believe that proper ceremonies on the granting of naturalization will be of benefit and, second, I think the provision in the bill that a declaration of Canadian citizenship will be an adequate statement of national status is a step in the right direction. But may I point out to hon. members that if a person applies to-day for a Canadian passport he can have inscribed on it the fact that he is a Canadian national. When the next census is taken I have no doubt that a person will be able to say he is a Canadian citizen, but inquiry will be made as to his national origin. There are good reasons why we should keep a record of national origin.

In dealing with questions of citizenship, nationality, naturalization and the status of aliens we are dealing with technical subjects. They are matters about which I do not profess to have the answers, and they are matters about which I think the members of the house should have a great deal more information. Therefore I am in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) who suggested that this bill should be sent to a committee. There could be called before that committee experts from the Department of External Affairs, from the Department of the Secretary of State, from the immigration department and from the Department of Justice who could explain the difficulties they face in connection with the present legislation. There could also be called before that committee men who have made a particular study of this matter and who could express their views, who could criticize the bill and who could furnish information that hon. members do not possess at the present time. I strongly urge that the bill be sent to a committee for further study.

We have on the statute books of this country, and have had for many years, a definition of Canadian citizenship. This is to be found in section 2 (b) of the Immigration Act, which is chapter 93 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. With the permission of hon. members I wish to place this definition on the record because that has not been done during this debate. I should like permission to do that without reading it in order to save time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must have the unanimous consent of the house.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. HAZEN: The definition of Canadian citizenship contained in the Immigration Act reads:

"Canadian citizen" means

(i) a person born in Canada who has not become an alien;

(ii) a British subject who has Canadian domicile; or

(iii) a person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile;

Provided that for the purpose of this Act a woman who has not been landed in Canada shall not be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship by virtue of her husband being a Canadian citizen; neither shall a child who has not been landed in Canada be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship through its father or mother being a Canadian citizen;

That definition has much to commend it, although it is not as inclusive as it might be. Its effect is limited by the fact that it is applicable only for the purposes of the Immigration Act.

We have also had on our statute books for many years a definition of "British subject". This is to be found in the Naturalization Act which is chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. If I may be permitted, I would ask permission to place it on the record. Section 2 (a) reads:

(d) "British subject" means a person who is a natural-born British subject, or a person to whom a certificate of naturalization has been granted; or a person who has become a subject of His Majesty by reason of any annexation of territory.

Similar definitions of a "British subject," or definitions in practically similar words are to be found in the naturalization acts of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Great Britain.

We have also had on the statute books of this country for many years a definition of "Canadian national". This is to be found in the Canadian Nationals Act, which is chapter 21 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. With your permission, sir, and for the information of the house I should like to place this on the record. It reads:

2. The following persons are Canadian nationals, viz:—

(a) any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act;

(b) the wife of any such citizen;

(c) any person born out of Canada, whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth, or with regard to persons born before the third day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, any person whose father at the time of such birth, possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian national as defined in this act.

Before I go any farther I wish to say that I am in agreement with the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) when he said—I am not quoting his words exactly—that this bill gives us no more than we had already as far as the definition of a Canadian citizen is concerned; that a Canadian citizen and a Canadian national means the same thing, that, if there is any difference, Canadian national means more; that the change made by this bill is more superficial than real.

The difficulty about these definitions is that they were unconnected and in consequence they led in some instances to conditions that were not altogether satisfactory. But I would point out that we shall always have some confusion and some difficulty so far as the term "Canadian citizen" is concerned owing to the fact that other countries have different definitions of "citizen" or "national". We shall at all times have in connection with those terms a conflict of law which will lead to difficulties. I agree with the Secretary of State when he said, in speaking on this bill:

> Despite what one often hears to the contrary, there has been a Canadian nationality, but the difficulty has been that the existing definitions were so specialized and so unrelated that they led to a condition of great confusion and misunderstanding.

It is well, I think, that this misunderstanding should be removed and that any difficulties which have been occasioned by the legislation that at present exists be overcome and cleared up if possible. So far as this bill clarifies the definition of a Canadian citizen I support it, but I do not agree with the definition of "Canadian domicile" that is contained in it because it has the effect of requiring a British subject to reside in this country five years before he can apply to become a Canadian citizen. I do not think it is necessary, in order to get a clear definition of Canadian citizenship, for the government to proceed in this way.

What this bill proposes to do, as I read it, is this. For better, for worse—time alone will tell—it proposes to turn our present Naturalization Act upside down. Under our present act a person who is naturalized becomes a British subject. Then the other statutes I have mentioned define him in many instances to be a Canadian national or a Canadian citizen. Under this bill the procedure is reversed. We give a man a certificate of Canadian citizenship and say that in consequence he is a Brtish subject.

It would be much better I think, to introduce a bill defining Canadian citizenship and then make the necessary amendments to our present Naturalization Act. I do not say that dogmatically. I should like to have an opportunity to have the matter further considered and looked into, and it is for that reason I suggest that it be referred to a committee of this house so that it can be given further study.

This bill will materially change our Naturalization Act. Not only does it change the Naturalization Act; but, as I read it, it enacts as well a nationalization act. Under this bill foreigners will be naturalized and British subjects will be nationalized. Both an alien and a British subject, with some exceptions, will be required to live in this country for five out of the six years prior to the time they apply and they must comply with the other provisions of section 10. If they do so, the alien or foreigner will not be granted a certificate of naturalization, as he is under the present act. What he will be granted is "a certificate of citizenship". It seems to me that perhaps the government is more or less playing with words in changing these terms.

The British subject who applies will receive a similar certificate. But the certificate the foreigner receives will naturalize him. It will make him a British subject and a Canadian citizen. The certificate a man from Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand or South Africa receives cannot make him a British subject for he is a British subject, but it makes him a Canadian citizen. This procedure, it seems to me, leaves very much to be desired. It is, in my humble opinion, objectionable.

Why, I ask, should a British subject, a citizen of Great Britain, Ireland, Australia, New Zealand or South Africa who comes to Canada for the purpose of making this country his home be obliged to reside here for five years and then go through exactly the same procedure as the foreigner who applies for naturalization in order that he may be nationalized or declared to be a Canadian citizen. I should like to repeat the question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

> I ask the minister to explain why at this time when we in all parts of the empire are desirous in the interest of our own security to bind still closer the various parts of the empire together, should a British subject coming into Canada and properly entering this country under our immigration laws be required to go through the same formalities as persons coming from other parts of the world.

I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of hon. members to the fact that any British subject who has ordinarily resided in Canada for at least twelve months and in the electoral district where he seeks to vote for at least two months immediately preceding the issue of a writ for election can vote in a dominion election. I think all of us have read that section with a good deal of interest.

Why is that privilege accorded to a British subject who has been in Canada for only a year? There is a reason for it and that reason is, I believe, that British subjects are familiar with democratic institutions and with British laws and British principles of fair play and justice and they speak our language. That is the reason why a British subject is permitted to vote after he has been twelve months in this country. That is a good reason, I think, why he should, when he applies for Canadian citizenship, be treated differently from a person coming from a country where a different system of government and different laws prevail and who is not familiar with our constitution and cannot speak our language. Surely there is nothing unreasonable in permitting a man who is familiar with our way of carrying on and who is a British subject to be treated differently from a foreigner who is unacquainted with our ways and who possibly cannot speak our language.

I should like to call as a witness in support of this view Doctor John E. Read, K.C., who until recently was legal adviser to the Department of External Affairs. He gave evidence in 1943 before a committee of this house which had to do with the defence of Canada regulations. The committee was also considering questions of naturalization and immigration at that time. He was asked if he would draw any distinction between a person who was a British subject coming to Canada and a foreigner with regard to the time it would require to obtain Canadian citizenship, and he replied:

> I think we ought to draw a distinction. I think a foreigner who comes here should have to reside here five years, no matter what happens, before becoming a Canadian citizen, but I should think a person coming here from another part of the British empire should be able to get it in a shorter time.

Mr. MARTIN: He helped to draft this bill.

Mr. HAZEN: I am giving the house his views. It does not follow from his having helped to draft this bill that he has changed them. This was in 1943.

> That would depend on whether it was possible to work out some arrangement that would be satisfactory to meet the immigration requirements as well as the other requirements.

I should like now to direct the attention of hon. members to the fact—I think it has already been stated—that a certificate of naturalization granted in Canada prior to January 1, 1945, was of a limited nature; it had no effect outside Canada. For many years the question of naturalization had engaged the attention of the statesmen of the empire and had been studied at practically every imperial conference, for the situation had been regarded as far from satisfactory. At the imperial conference of 1907 it was agreed that a naturalization act should be passed creating uniformity within the empire. That decision, it seems to me, was a wise one. It exhibited a breadth of vision and a statesmen-like approach which were most commendable. In that year and at the conference in 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier strongly urged the adoption of the principle that there should be uniformity in the effect of naturalization wherever granted, and that a man who was a British subject anywhere should be recognized as a British subject everywhere. Let me quote from the statement he made on June 13, 1911, at the imperial conference. It is found on page 251 of the proceedings as reported to both houses of the British parliament. This is in part what he said:

> This is in my estimation one of the important questions that the conference has to deal with. The power of naturalization is one of the incidental powers of sovereignty and one of the most important attributes of sovereignty. The British government, in granting the constitutions of the several dominions, has parted with the power of sovereignty and delegated it to the dominions. It has given the power to all the dominions of granting letters of naturalization to aliens. That was one of the necessary incidents, I think, of the power of self-government which was given to the dominions, and the one power which it was very important for them to have, because being young nations and all inviting immigration, it followed as a measure of practical moment that they should have the power to grant letters of naturalization. They have all availed themselves of that power, and each one has its own law of naturalization, and those laws are all different . . . I do not think there are two laws in all the dominions which are here represented which are the same—they all vary.
> The practical difficulty which arises at once is, as to what is to be the effect of this power of naturalization. The power which is given to Canada, to New Zealand, and to all the self-governing dominions, is one which is limited each to its own territory. It does not extend beyond the limits of the territory covered by that legislation.

Then, after giving instances of the difficulties that occurred under the legislation which then existed, Sir Wilfrid continued:

> In these days of travel and locomotion it is conceivable that this condition of things—this divided allegiance—may produce serious complications. Therefore I think the first consequence to be deduced from this condition of things, this divided power of legislation between the mother country and the dominions beyond the seas, must be remedied in some way, and I think this principle may be laid down as an object to be ultimately reached—a British subject anywhere, a British subject everywhere.

In consequence of these consultations at imperial conferences, Great Britain in 1914, Canada in 1914, Australia in 1920, New Zealand in 1923 and South Africa in 1926 passed naturalization acts identical with respect to their important provisions. These acts provided that a certificate granted in one of the dominions or in the United Kingdom would be recognized as conferring on the holder the status of a British subject throughout the world. The point I wish to make is that these acts were passed after an agreement had been reached between the dominions concerned.

The bill that is now before us makes a material change in the present act. It is not a change merely in procedure but a change in substance, for under our present laws a British subject became a Canadian citizen after five years' residence in Canada, but this bill requires a British subject from Great Britain or any of the other dominions coming into this country after five years' residence to make a formal application and go before a court, just as a foreigner is obliged to do. Under our present laws a woman marrying a British subject becomes a British subject, but under the proposed legislation that is not the case. Here again we have a material change.

On June 15, 1943, Doctor E. H. Coleman, K.C., under-secretary of state, appeared before the committee I have referred to, and with reference to the provisions of the naturalization acts passed by the different dominions and Great Britain, he was asked:

By the way, in each of these British dominions were the important provisions reenacted?

He replied:

Yes. They are identical. That is the whole basis of the thing, in order that there might be uniformity and that the certificate granted in one of the dominions or in the United Kingdom might be recognized as conferring on the holder the status of a British subject throughout the world. There was an informal, if not a statutory, understanding between the governments of the United Kingdom and the dominions that no fundamental changes would be made without consultation. I think the subject had been on the agenda at more than one imperial conference held in the interval. There have been some modifications made by common agreement, and there have been some proposed which have not been made because a common agreement could not be reached. But the point I am trying to make, Mr. Chairman, is that we are bound—perhaps not legally, but morally at least—not to make any fundamental changes in the act without consultation with the other dominions, which includes the United Kingdom.

In 1929 a preparatory conference of the members of the commonwealth was held in London for the purpose of considering, among other questions, that of naturalization. The Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe headed the Canadian delegation that attended that conference. It made certain recommendations that are to be found in sections 73 to 78 inclusive of its report. I propose to read two of these recommendations which are found at page 128 of the evidence given by Doctor Read before the committee to which I have referred.

Mr. MARTIN: Doctor Coleman or Doctor Read?

Mr. HAZEN: Doctor Read.

Section 76 reads as follows:

A common status directly recognized throughout the British commonwealth in recent years has been given a statutory basis through the operation of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.

77. Under the new position, if any change is made in the requirements established by the existing legislation, reciprocal action will be necessary to attain this same recognition the importance of which is manifest in view of the desirability of facilitating freedom of intercourse and the mutual granting of privileges among the different parts of the commonwealth.

This report was approved in this house on a resolution introduced by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. It came before the imperial conference in 1930 and was approved by that conference. The conclusions that were reached by the conference are to be found in its proceedings. I believe these proceedings were also approved by this house. The conclusions read as follows:

(1) That the conference affirms paragraphs 73 to 78 inclusive of the report of the conference on the operation of dominion legislation.

(2) That, if any changes are desired in the existing requirements for the common status, provision should be made for the maintenance of the common status, and the changes should only be introduced (in accordance with present practice) after consultation and agreement among the several members of the commonwealth.

(3) That it is for each member of the commonwealth to define for itself its own nationals, but that, so far as possible, those nationals should be persons possessing the common status, though it is recognized that local conditions or other special circumstances may from time to time necessitate divergences from this general principle.

(4) That the possession of the common status in virtue of the law for the time being in force in any part of the commonwealth should carry with it the recognition of that status by the law of every other part of the commonwealth.

There is one other extract from the report that I should like to read. It is to be found on page 124 of the evidence to which I have referred, and reads as follows:

(2) Although it would seem that no question could arise as between members of the British commonwealth in the case of those referred to in subparagraph (1) (a) above, it is recognized that in the case of a migrant, referred to in subparagraph (1) (b) above, the member from which he might wish to declare an interest in the conditions under which the member to which he went might claim to be entitled to regard him as a member of its community. It is also desirable to avoid laws or rules as to acquisition or loss of such membership which might lead to overlapping. As time has not allowed consideration to be given to the different criteria which a member might desire to impose, it is recommended that any member contemplating passing a law on the membership of its community, should submit its proposals to the other members of the commonwealth, so as to enable them to offer observations thereon, if they feel so inclined.

I have quoted these paragraphs for one purpose. When the Secretary of State introduced this bill, and when he spoke on second reading, he did not tell us whether the proposals contained therein had been submitted to the other members of the commonwealth before it was introduced here.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I am going to ask the minister whether it was submitted to them, when it was submitted to them, and what their answers were. When he replies he should give us a full explanation of what took place.

Mr. MARTIN: I can do so now if the hon. member desires it. The answer is yes, but I shall give greater detail later on.

Mr. HAZEN: This practically concludes all that I have to say. Once or twice in the speeches that have been made—there have been remarks to the effect that this bill might break the bonds or weaken the bonds between the different parts of the empire. I do not hold any such view. The British empire and commonwealth is more closely united to-day than it has ever been before in its history.

In reading the speech made by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe in May, 1930, when he moved that the recommendations of the preparatory conference to which I have referred be accepted by this house, I was interested in a certain portion of it. I have not time to quote portions of that speech, but I should like to read a quotation he gave from a speech made in the House of Lords by Lord Balfour, which reads as follows:

The British commonwealth is held together far more effectually by broad loyalties and common feelings of interest and devotion to the great world ideals of peace and freedom than by anything else. A common interest in loyalty, in freedom, in ideals, that is the bond. If that is not enough, nothing else is enough.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In rising to take part in the debate on the new citizenship bill my first remarks are to congratulate the government and also the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) on introducing such an important bill at this time. I believe that the bill meets the general views of all people in this country. I suppose the only differences will be in regard to the interpretation of many of the sections. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I was a little disappointed when the minister changed his view this year and did not suggest that the bill be sent to a committee. I believe the importance of the bill warranted having it sent to a committee where every section could be thoroughly discussed and more information obtained than can be the case in the house itself.

My first criticism of the bill is that it is wrongly named. I think it should have been called the "Canadian nationality act" instead of the "Canadian Citizenship Act". I believe the word "nationality" would convey more, not only to the people of Canada but to the people of all countries especially if a person from Canada going abroad could say, "I am a Canadian national". In the United States they use both terms in their naturalization act; they refer to both nationality, naturalization and citizenship. In that country one can be a citizen and not be naturalized, and vice versa.

I wish now to deal with some of the sections, although I realize I must only comment on them because on the motion for second reading only the principle of the bill may be debated. I would find it extremely difficult to debate the bill or the principle of it if precluded, however, from dealing with some of the sections.

Before I begin to mention the sections may I say that I have listened to many speakers during this debate, and I have come to the conclusion that some of them have not studied the bill very carefully. Some of the sections which I believe to be among the most important have not yet been touched upon so far during the debate. I am going to mention one right now. Under section 4 a child becomes a natural-born Canadian citizen if its parent, either father or mother, was born on a Canadian ship. That follows the British act, and I do not think a great deal of objection can be offered to that section. But what do we find in section 5? A child born outside Canada, perhaps in the middle of China or on some island in the Pacific or elsewhere is a natural-born citizen under this measure if its father or mother was born on the Canadian ship. I contend that is carrying our natural citizenship much too far. Especially is that so, in the light of the criticism which has been offered, and I suggest rightly, to the sections of the bill which will compel a British subject coming from Great Britain or the other dominions to take out naturalization papers after a residence of some five years. So that I think when we come to the various sections of the bill we shall have something more to say with regard to this particular matter.

We have heard some expressions with regard to the word "British", and I have met some people in this country who even actually hate that word. There are some persons in certain provinces who would like to cut all ties of any kind with Great Britain. I have wondered many times if those people have given any thought to the part Great Britain has played in the development of this country of ours. Have they ever considered that perhaps we never would have had confederation but for the fact that following the Plains of Abraham, Great Britain took control of this country. In all kindliness I ask my hon. friends from the province of Quebec to consider what kind of treatment might have been meted out to them had some power other than Great Britain taken possession from France at that time. I go farther than that. I say that had France retained control of what was then Canada the treatment given the people of the province of Quebec would not have been as fair or as generous as the treatment given them under British rule. The rights of minorities have been maintained to the letter. Again when one looks over the history of France and reads about the persecution of the church in that country; and when one considers the very fair treatment that has been given by the British, one wonders just the reason for this desire in the minds of some citizens of Canada to cut ourselves entirely free from everything pertaining to Great Britain, even to the extent of hating the very name.

To my mind in this bill far too many powers are given to the minister. I believe in a matter so important as the conferring of citizenship this parliament should say in every particular what is to be done, and it not be left to the minister. That is how it is done in the United States; all the regulations are passed by the legislative body and contained in the United States act. In connection with the conferring of citizenship I would be loathe to give the minister the power either to confer naturalization or the power to ask for a rehearing after naturalization has been granted. Section 14 is somewhat singular. After the court approves, under that section, naturalization, the minister may ask for a rehearing. The bill does not direct the court as to what shall be said or argued by the person brought before the court for the second time, other than that he must prove the right to have Canadian citizenship conferred upon him. I am of opinion that once the court, having heard all the facts of the case, decides that naturalization should be granted, that should be the end of it. If the minister is of opinion that a rehearing should be held, then the man should be given some intimation as to what objection has been raised by the minister to the granting of citizenship. Further, I wonder how many hon. members have noticed the provision that if on the second hearing the court decides to revoke citizenship, the person concerned will have to wait a further two years before his case may be heard again. When we reach the committee stage, that is something about which we should, I suggest, ask a number of questions.

I come now to sections 16, 17 and 18, all important sections, dealing with the loss of Canadian citizenship. I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) who, in his argument, could not see why a person from Great Britain should not be called upon to take out papers and to take the oath. He spoke of handing out treatment with fairness and equality. Well, if we are to treat all with fairness and equality, then why not do so? So far as I can find in the bill, loss of citizenship can happen only to one who is naturalized, and not to one born in this country.

I know it is only a natural feeling on the part of those born in Canada that they have a natural or prior right over those from other lands. But as I look at members of my own family and as I look at others born here I just wonder if we are viewing things in the bill in the right perspective. After all, remember that those who were born in this country had no say whatsoever as to where they were to be born. On the other hand, when I, like others who came to this land, chose it as one of the best countries to which I could go—and I have found it was the best country. If we are to treat all Canadians with fairness we should also consider those born in this country who might commit certain acts against the state.

No one, I believe, is going to accuse the United States of being inhuman or un-Christian because of her naturalization laws. Yet I find that in the United States there are many conditions under which a citizen of that country may lose his citizenship. That applies both to those born within the United States and to those obtaining naturalization papers. For instance, deserting military or naval services of the United States in time of war is punished by loss of citizenship, whether a person be born in America or not. Then, again one loses citizenship if he commits an act of treason, or attempts by force to overthrow the state, or bears arms against the United States, provided, of course, that he is convicted thereof by a court martial or some other court of competent jurisdiction.

Time will not permit my reading all those sections dealing with loss of nationality, so that I shall touch upon only one more. Many Americans who have come to this country have lost citizenship in the United States by voting in a municipal, provincial, or federal election. I had a case in my own community last year where a woman who had been thirty-five years in Canada, but whose parents were born in the United States— and she, too, had been born there—wanted to attend her daughter's wedding in that country. But when she came to the border the United States immigration officer said to her, "Just hold on a minute; have you ever voted in a municipal election?" She replied, honestly, that she had. "Well," he said, "you cannot enter this country; you are no longer a citizen of the United States". And that woman living in my own district was debarred from entering what one would term her own native land.

Does anyone call the United States un-Christian or cruel, or does anyone accuse it of doing something wrong? Yet if we proposed anything like that here there would be cries of, "Oh, that is un-Christian; that is cruel; that is wrong." But the United States has been carrying on in that way for many years.

I am suggesting to the minister and to hon. members that we should give careful consideration to this matter of loss of nationality, because even those born in this country may commit some act which, in some of our minds at least, believe should place them in a position where they should not be allowed to retain their Canadian citizenship.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and some other hon. members have mentioned minority groups, and have spoken particularly about Japanese. It is not my intention this evening to deal at length with that subject, because I feel certain that another occasion will arise when the entire matter may be dealt with. Let me say at once however that I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South when he points out that by the passing of this measure we thereby confer citizenship upon the Japanese—every one of them. I am going to leave this thought with hon. members: There were 1,600 Japanese who left this country prior to the outbreak of war.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Was it not 16,000?

Mr. REID: Well, I am not quite sure of the number. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni says it was 16,000, and that may be so. However, I thought that 1,600 had gone back to Japan just prior to 1939 to perform their military duty and to fight on the side of Japan, against us.

All these young men were born in British Columbia; they were educated there, and had reached the stage in life where they were able to use their own discretion if they so desired. But, having been registered in Japan, and looking upon Japan as their country they went back to comply with the regulations for military service in that country. I hope when we get into committee the minister will answer this question: If we pass this measure in its present form what will be the status of those 1,600—or 16,000, as the case may be? What will be the status of that great number of Japanese who left voluntarily to fight on the side of Japan, the country to which they owe first allegiance, against this country of ours. Under the act they are designated natural-born Canadians. Are we to open the doors to them again? I was not at all surprised that the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) were greatly perturbed about what is to happen. One of the things worrying those of us from British Columbia particularly is the dispersal of these people.

However, before discussing that point further may I say this. First, however, I have asked two important questions of hon. members in the House of Commons. Those particular questions have been quoted in the Japanese paper, but, as yet, they remain unanswered. My question to hon. members of the House of Commons, and to the people of Canada, is this: Can a man owe allegiance to two countries at one and the same time; can he be a citizen of two countries?

I remember the special committee on elections and franchise which sat in 1934. While I was not a member of that committee, one which sat long before the war, I appeared before it. That was a time when this question was not as acute as it is to-day. True, there were only a few of us trying to point the way in those days. There were four Japanese who came before that committee, and I well remember asking two of them this question: In case of war or trouble with Japan, to which country will you owe allegiance? Without hesitation both of them said Japan—and that was long before the war.

Through their newspaper I have asked Japanese, and I have asked many gatherings why is it that, so far, not one Japanese has renounced his citizenship or allegiance to Japan. Why is it that none of them has said, "I was born here; I am a Canadian; this is the country to which I owe allegiance." I have wondered at that great silence. Why? What is holding them back? If a committee is to be set up to investigate the Japanese who signed papers indicating a willingness to go back to Japan but are now asking that they be revoked, I urge the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to ask them that very question. I have spoken on this matter many times and I am not going at this time to deal with it at any great length. However, I am a little worried about the position of this class of people under this bill.

There is another question which I forgot to mention: Can these people be really assimilated into the life of the Canadian people? My answer is, "no, they cannot." I look to the United States and I ask myself if the question of the blacks is any nearer settlement to-day than it was fifty or seventy-five years ago. I have travelled in the United States and spoken to men in authority and to others, and I have come to the conclusion that the question of the blacks in that country is more acute to-day than ever it was. Then I look at the Japs. I am not considering this problem only in the light of to-day; I am looking at it in the light of the time when I shall be gone. I wonder if it is right to encourage a group that is not assimilable, a group whose first allegiance is not to Canada but to Japan. And so I protest.

Strangely enough, there is a provision in the bill that one holding a dual citizenship may renounce his Canadian citizenship if he so desires and hold on to his original or foreign citizenship. But there is nothing in the act to compel anyone to make a decision in favour of retaining Canadian citizenship. I am maintaining, and I will maintain as long as this bill is before the house, that no one in Canada should be allowed to hold Canadian citizenship if he or she at the same time owes allegiance to and is a citizen of another country.

The minister stated in his remarks, and it is provided in the bill, that ceremonies will be held at the time citizenship is granted. Ceremonies are all right in their way, but I should like to have seen us do what they do in the United States. I think I am on firm ground when I refer to that country because there are something like thirty-six different races who make up the peoples of the United States. If we consider the races who have come to Canada I think we shall find that we also have thirty-six different races who make up the Canadian population. Before a person can become a United States citizen he must attend a school, which is free, and be able to answer certain questions, before being granted naturalization. These questions are not of a harsh nature; they are educational in character. I should like to read the section of the United States act dealing with this matter. It reads:

> 356. 3. Educational examination of petitioners for naturalization. The examination of each petitioner for naturalization shall include an educational examination. The purpose of the educational examination shall be to determine whether the petitioner has a fair knowledge of the fundamental principles of the constitution and is qualified to assume the duties and responsibilities of a citizen of the United States. To this end the petitioner may be questioned as to (1) the principal historical facts concerning the development of the United States as a republic; (2) the organization and principal functions of the government of the United States, and of the states and local units of government, and (3) the relation of the individual in the United States to government—national, state and local, the rights and privileges growing from that relationship, and the duties and responsibilities which result from it. Every care shall be exercised to avoid abstruse, technical, irrelevant and extreme questions. The language level of the questions shall be suited to the particular petitioner having regard to his educational background and the extent of his knowledge of the English language.

I believe that the effort which an alien must put forth before becoming a United States citizen makes him more conversant with that country and with the affairs of government. Someone, perhaps in a joking way, has said that many aliens know more about the United States after passing this educational test than many children who were born in the United States knew upon leaving school. Be that as it may, I believe that if something like that were done before we grant Canadian citizenship it would be far better than waiting until the citizenship is about to be granted and then making a ceremony of it by having someone put on robes and having a kind of show. Make the applicants do a little work and undertake a little study and that will make them even better citizens. At least it will make them more conversant with the affairs of the country.

As I say, we should take note of what the United States has done. Not only am I in favour of setting up schools for this purpose;

I would advocate that all the regulations and all powers granted under this act be passed upon by the people's representatives in this parliament. Many of the matters mentioned in the bill should not be left to the minister or to some of his officials.

I believe I have covered most of the salient points I had in mind. I think the immigration department should be linked up with this bill. As is well known the records of those entering either Canada or the United States are kept by the immigration department of that country.

I am rather doubtful about section 29 which confers property rights upon those who become naturalized citizens. It is my opinion that we are infringing upon provincial rights because property rights are entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces. If by this bill we confer property rights on anyone who becomes a Canadian citizen, then I think we are doing something we should be most careful about.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this debate conclude without once more appealing to the government, in support of what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has said, and asking them to make a statement with regard to their present position in connection with the disposition of the Japanese. We have had the policy explained to us, but unfortunately little or no progress appears to have been made as time has gone along.

For twenty-five years in this house members from British Columbia have been endeavouring to explain the situation with regard to the Japanese in that province and to warn the people of Canada that the day would come when the question would become a red-hot and dangerous one. It needed the treacherous action of the Japanese at Pearl Harbor and the ensuing war to bring the situation really home to the Canadian people. I am very much afraid that the opinion of the Canadian people is slipping back to the belief that this is a provincial question and not a dominion one.

At the time that the Japanese were sweeping through the Pacific and moving in a northerly and northeasterly direction in the islands below Alaska there was great anxiety in British Columbia. So great was the anxiety at that time that it spread throughout the rest of Canada, and it seemed to us that Canada at last was getting hold of this problem as one which would have to be recognized as a dominion problem.

In August, 1944, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) proclaimed the government's policy in the matter of the Japanese. In November last the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) summarized that policy and reiterated it and reported at that time as to the numbers and the position which the question then occupied. Unfortunately things have happened since then. With regard to parts of the government's policy representations were made which resulted in an appeal to the supreme court. The supreme court largely upheld the orders in council, which were a portion of the government's policy. But in one way they did not, and there apparently the matter stands. We do not know whether the government is proposing to carry the matter to the privy council or whether the government is facilitating the other party in carrying it to the privy council, or whether in the meantime, if that appeal be long delayed or perhaps never taken, the government's policy will still remain at a standstill. This bill is now before the house, and there is a very close connection between what this bill contains and the Japanese question. I therefore ask the government to make a statement clarifying their position at the present time before this bill passes out of our hands.

The first portion of the policy to which I have referred states that it must no longer be looked upon as a provincial question and that the Japanese must not again be allowed to concentrate in British Columbia. But we have had no information about how that is to be brought about. We have no knowledge as to whether the hint dropped by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) last session that special legislation might be brought in will be acted upon or not. But it is quite clear at the present time that there is no power in the hands of the government to prevent the Japanese from again concentrating in British Columbia, although the government has had plenty of warning that if that should take place the difficulties and the dangers will be great.

The position of the government in that regard is modified also by the answer which the Prime Minister gave to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) last December. When this matter was being discussed the hon. member asked whether the Prime Minister would undertake to make this statement, that the Japanese would not be allowed to return to the coast. The Prime Minister said that he was unable to make such a statement. That caused doubt in the minds of us from British Columbia as to whether the government was really sincere in its statement that never again must these people be allowed to concentrate in British Columbia.

The government's policy also contains the setting up of a commission to measure the loyalty of the Japanese. It has been pointed out in this house more than once that you cannot expect thoughtful people who have considered this problem to believe that it is possible for a commission to measure the loyalty of these Japanese. Can anybody conceive of any way in which the loyalty of a Japanese could be measured so that the commission might be able to say: This man's loyalty is twelve inches long; he is all right. That man's loyalty is only nine inches long; he is all wrong. It is impossible to believe, the Japanese being what they are, and from our knowledge of their habits and behaviour, that their loyalty can be measured by a commission.

Whilst the Japanese were sweeping through the Pacific victoriously before Pearl Harbor and at the time of Pearl Harbor there were scores and scores of instances where they told their employers that soon they would be on top and we would be below. Maids told their mistresses; employees told their employers; high school and collegiate students boasted of the fact that the day would soon be here when they would be on top and we would be below. Those people were very largely Canadian-born, those who are held up to us as so saintly that we must not tamper with the position in which they find themselves. It is impossible for me to believe that a commission can measure with any certainty where the loyalty of the Japanese stands. Now that their emperor has been deposed, if they are asked questions it is not at all unlikely that they may declare loyalty to this country. They come of a race which for centuries has worshipped the emperor whom they described as their god and which believed in the domination of the Japanese race in the countries surrounding the Pacific. Is it to be expected that merely because the children of these parents were born in this country that they have given up all belief in the sanctity of their emperor? It is far more probable that had that invasion come, had those Japanese paratroopers landed in Canada, had Japanese operations along the southern shore of Alaska and down the Pacific coast been successful, the incoming Japanese troops would have benefited greatly by the existence of twenty-three or twenty-four thousand Japanese in this country.

Another plan which the government has in its policy is the distribution of the Japanese through the other provinces. It has not been successful. Not so very many of them have been so distributed. The government has not found the provinces cooperative in endeavouring to carry out that policy, and one province has already asked that the Japanese be removed in accordance with the clause in the contract entered into between the British Columbia security commission and that province. Sixty per cent of these Japanese are still in British Columbia. They are in camps; they are in the settlements in the mining towns in the south; and if we look at the numbers of those who have already been removed and compare them with the numbers of those who will have to be received by the various provinces, if the distribution is in accordance with the population of the provinces we find something like this. Let us say that there are twenty-three or twenty-four thousand Japanese in Canada. If all the ten thousand that the minister mentioned who have asked to be allowed to return to Japan or to be removed from Canada should go, that will reduce the figure we are examining to fourteen thousand. If we distribute that fourteen thousand to the other provinces this is the picture:

Prince Edward Island would have to be asked to receive 140. They have none now.

Nova Scotia would be expected to take 700. They have none now.

New Brunswick would be asked to take 560, and there are none there now.

Quebec would be asked to take just over 4,000, and by the last figures I had, at the last session, there are 394 now in Quebec. Is it considered likely that the province of Quebec will be ready to take 4,000 in order to carry out the government's policy of distribution?

Ontario will be asked to take 4,600. There are 2,500 there now.

Manitoba will be asked to take 840. There are just over 1,000 there now.

Saskatchewan will be asked to take 1,120, and there are only 146 there now.

Alberta will be asked to take 980. They have almost 3,500 there now, and the premier has asked that they be removed.

It should be remembered that, outside the protected area which was proclaimed for about 100 miles up the Pacific coast in British Columbia we had Japanese resident for a considerable number of years. Those Japanese are still there, and when the removal from the protected area threatened, the Japanese started moving in to that area that I represent and to the area represented by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). So that in that section we have certainly enough for the quota for British Columbia: we cannot be expected to take any more, particularly bearing in mind the statement of the Prime Minister that they must not be allowed to concentrate again in British Columbia.

Therefore I find myself in this position. The government's policy of distribution has certainly not succeeded. I see no likelihood that it will succeed in the future if it has not done so in the past. The policy which sets up a commission to measure their loyalty is not, to my mind, a satisfactory one. I am driven, therefore, to the only expedient which I think is left, namely, that we should boldly undertake the removal of the Japanese from Canada.

"Ah", it is said, "to do so would be flouting British justice." Mr. Speaker, of the many problems which confront us in private life and the decisions which have to be made in this house in international questions, how many of those problems can be decided by the application of one simple formula? We have to weigh the pros and cons. In matters which come up for decision here it is no easy thing for a government in Canada to balance all the arguments and decide which is the right course to take. Think of those boundary decisions which followed the great war. Think of the boundary of Sudetenland, and Poland, and the Polish corridor, to mention but a few. Why, justice could have been argued on both sides on each of those questions. You could not say that justice ruled the answer. The decision had to be weighed in the light of many circumstances, and the application of no simple formula settled one of these boundary cases.

Likewise in this matter there are other factors which have to be considered than merely the application of "British justice." One of the duties that each member of this house has to perform is to have a vision of what Canada will be like when our descendants are occupying our places. We are here to represent those who sent us to this House of Commons. We are here to consider these matters from the point of view of Canada at large. I am not sure but that the most important duty falling upon us is to endeavour to see the picture that may be painted in Canada when our grandchildren and their descendants are here, and I cannot bring myself to believe that we shall be wise if we fail to remove these people from Canada now when the opportunity of settlement at the peace table is before us.

I do not consider that it is proper to expect our descendants to work, in that great task of building Canada, in collaboration, in cooperation, with the equal help of people whom I consider unassimilable, people whose loyalty is unquestionably in doubt. They are unassimilable in the sense that, even though mixed marriages did take place, it would be unwise, for the resultant children that would be born would start that hateful trouble of the Eurasian question as we see it in many other lands. It is all very well to say that half-breed children ought to be accepted by society and placed on an equality with either of the two races; it is easy to say that. But the answer is that they are not, and all their lifetime they are pathetic people who are looked down upon by the rest of the population and are not received on an equality with them. It will be lamentable if we give countenance to the setting up in this country of a half-breed race composed of Canadians and Japanese.

I do not accept for a moment the doctrine that we have not the right to remove these people from here. We cannot trust them. They have shown that they are unreliable. We cannot answer for it that if they say they are loyal to Canada they really are. For a generation past their births have been registered with the Japanese consul general. How can a child whose birth was registered with the representative of another country have the same form of loyalty to our country and our king as we have? They are not on a par with us; and it would be a very grave mistake, in my opinion, if we allowed this matter to be settled by leaving some of them in this country, when the Prime Minister tells us that they shall not concentrate in our province and yet there is no means at present to prevent them from doing so.

Before this bill passes out of our hands, I trust that the government will see fit to make a statement clarifying the position in which it finds itself at present with respect to the policy it has enunciated, and explain particularly whether it is its intention to proceed to the privy council for a decision on the matters which were submitted to the supreme court.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): In rising to speak in support of the principle of this bill, I might say it is my belief that one of the greatest and longest standing needs of the Canadian people is unity; not only that, but a sense of equality among our people. It was a realization of this need that caused the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation national convention to adopt as part of its programme the establishment of the legal status of Canadian citizenship for the people of Canada by way of birth and residence qualifications. It was in realization of that need and the resolution from our convention that caused me last July 23 to write to the Clerk of the house and inform him that it was my intention to place the following resolution upon the order paper:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is in the best interests of Canada to establish a distinctive Canadian citizenship, which shall be available to all persons of certain residence or birth qualifications within the dominion.

Mr. MARTIN: Great minds think alike.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes; I hope they are thinking at the same time. My hon. friend had a long time to think about this and his party has been in power for many years.

When the house opened there was an undertaking in the speech from the throne that it was the intention of the government to bring in such a bill. When the bill was introduced, out of deference to it and under the rules of the house I withdrew my resolution. Unfortunately the bill died after it received first reading and the last session closed without anything further being done.

I again placed my resolution on the order paper prior to the opening of this session, and we welcome this bill. I hope it does not suffer the same fate, either in this house or in the other place, as did the last one.

Canadians must feel that they are all members of one family. We must have that feeling in order fully to develop our possibilities as a Canadian nation. On meeting Canadians from all parts of Canada one is struck forcibly by two or three things. The first is the lack of a real understanding and appreciation of the problems, of the contributions, of the difficulties and even of the way of life of our fellow Canadians within our own country. There is a provincialism which is stifling Canadians and which prevents and overshadows a national outlook. As a nation Canada lacks the spirit of greatness and the passion for knowledge which is one of the attributes of a progressive nation.

One fact which proves this, and which causes Canadians to think deeply is that so many of the cream of Canada's educated youth, the graduates from our universities, the brains and ability of our young people, the greatest asset we have, have migrated in their thousands, yes, in their hundreds of thousands to the great nation to the south of us. The fact is that we have lost a nation in the making to the United States where the statue of liberty is a symbol of the great unity of that country, of its freedom. Had those Canadians who left our shores been imbued with a true realization of their duty as Canadians they would have remained in this country and helped to remedy its defects which prevented them from having within this land those opportunities which they found elsewhere. The truth is that Canadians do not know Canada.

I do not wish anyone to think I am not aware of, or wish to belittle, the achievements and contributions that Canada has made. What I am trying to emphasize is the fact that we are only about five per cent of what we could be, five per cent of what we should be. It is my opinion that we shall not achieve that greatness until we have a consciousness of our unity. We are prone to emphasize our differences and to overlook our common heritage. We lack a realization of our own greatness, our own strength and our own possibilities for the future. There cannot be a future unless we are a united people.

In the part of Canada which I have the honour to represent and where I was born, are people who came to Canada with hope, pride and faith that this was the greatest country in the world in which to live. These people carved out their homes from the park areas and the prairies, like their brothers from the wooded lands of Canada from coast to coast. They built their schools, their churches and their little communities. Their children worked and played with their fellow Canadian children in their youth and mixed their blood with the blood of their fellow Canadians in the wars of this land. They thought they were becoming Canadians. When they took out their naturalization papers it was a surprising thing to them to find that they were not called Canadians.

Naturally they feel that there is discrimination between them and those who were here before them; particularly when officials appointed by the federal government to take the census come and ask them this question: "What nationality are you?" Proudly they reply: "I am a Canadian." They are told, "No; you cannot put down on the census paper that you are a Canadian. What is your racial origin?" Many of these people came to this country as adults. They spent the latter part of their years in this country, sometimes twenty and thirty years. They have been busy making a living; in pioneer Canada it is not an easy job. Many of these people did not learn the English or the French language. On reaching the age of seventy many of them find themselves unable to make a living. They have applied for the rights of Canadians to the pittance of an old age pension such as we give in Canada, only to find that they are not qualified. These are people who have done everything to make Canada a nation. They have given their all to Canada, contributed their sons and their life work; yet they are denied even that right. The fact that this bill ends that injustice commends it to the support of every hon. member.

I believe this bill should have been embodied in the terms of confederation almost eighty years ago. Certainly it should have been in the Statute of Westminster which was intended to give Canada the status of nationhood. What reasons the governments of the past had for not establishing citizenship I do not know. Such a citizenship is the very foundation of nationhood. Without it no nation can be progressive. We pay lip-service to something which does not exist. Without it Canada will never achieve real progress. If Canada is to rise in the scale of nations, we must brothers be. The consciousness of unity is the first essential in the building of a nation. That unity cannot be built merely by a bill. There must be something deeper than that. In the hearts and minds of all Canadian citizens there must be a realization, an acceptance of the principle of equality of people irrespective of their colour, race or creed. Without it, jealousies divide us and progress is impossible. Irrespective of colour, race or creed, human beings within the Dominion of Canada must be conscious of an equality with each and every other Canadian.

It is interesting to note that one provincial government recognizes that equality. I have a news item here from the Toronto Globe and Mail, which, at any rate, can scarcely be accused of C.C.F. sympathies. To its credit it says this:

> Appointment by the Saskatchewan government of a Canadian-born Japanese as legal adviser to its economic planning commission again focuses attention on the dominion government's plan for wholesale deportation of Japanese from this country. This particular individual has been given a position of great responsibility. The colour of his skin may be different from that of most Canadians, but the fact remains that he is a Canadian and is entitled to opportunities of citizenship in keeping with his abilities, so long as there is no abuse of this right . . .
> There are persons of Japanese origin who can be expected to make a definite contribution to the country. They should be allowed to stay here and make the best of the opportunity of citizenship. There are others who are not to be trusted. There is no place for them in Canada and the government has at its disposal all the machinery required to send them elsewhere. But it will be a sad day indeed when a Canadian government expels people from the country on the sole grounds that it has the legal power to do so.

To illustrate further what I mean about equality among people, I am sure the person concerned will not mind if I tell of a little incident which happened in this fair city of Ottawa. Recently a lady entered a street-car on her way home. It was a windy day, and the lady was wearing on her head what I believe is termed a babushka. She took her seat in the street-car and overheard another lady remark to her companion, "There is another foreigner." The lady with the babushka was none other than the only lady member of this house. This illustrates the sort of thing Canada must overcome. Within this nation everyone must be conscious of the fact that all people are equal. The people of Canada must subscribe to that principle. The basis upon which unity must be built and which must become a part of Canadian citizenship is a recognition of the fact that citizenship must carry with it these basic freedoms: freedom of speech; freedom of peaceful assembly; freedom to worship as one chooses; freedom of the press; the right to a speedy public trial; the right to hold property. Canadian citizens must also appreciate their obligations and duties. They must inform themselves thoroughly of those duties which are related to citizenship. The Canadian must learn his responsibility in connection with voting; he must learn that this is a part of the democratic process. There must be instilled in each and every citizen of this country a passion for education and enlightenment.

I am going to suggest to the government that it prepare a simple, easily read pamphlet outlining the rights of every citizen before the law and some simple, basic principles of legal rights within this country so that a citizen may know what his rights are irrespective of the price of the lawyer whom he may or may not be able to hire.

In closing, I wish to say that only upon this unity can Canada hope to reach its full status. Self-governing and free, we can then work out our destiny. It must be a destiny of peace, happiness and enlightened freedom. We shall then be able to make our contribution to brotherhood among men, to a heritage of freedom which is a right common not only to people in Canada but to people everywhere in the world. We realize and appreciate that to-day we are part of one world. We cannot hope to make our contribution to the welfare of that world until we have achieved brotherhood within our own nation. This bill can form the basis of a new conception of Canada; it can place Canada among the nations moving toward a common brotherhood of mankind throughout the whole world.

Mr. W. A. McMASTER (High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is largely because of what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) that I felt

I must say a few words and apologize for being one of British descent. I felt I also should apologize to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) for being of Scottish descent. I do not know why the hon. member took a Scotsman and placed him beside an American before the court of naturalization. I could understand why he would choose a Scotsman, but I do not know why he should mention an American as well. I can only say that if the hon. member believed the Scotsman could be made to think any less of himself by having to appear before a court, he is very much mistaken. A Scotsman in his own quiet way will still think he is one of the best people in the world.

I did not take in very good part the lecture given us to-day by the hon. member for Spadina, who spoke of something being very wrong here in Canada. That did not seem to be entirely in accord with the eloquent way in which he told of many people having come here from his own and other countries, and having found this a land of opportunity. Surely he must recall that at the time they came here there was no citizenship act in force. But I cannot believe the fact that no such act was in force made Canada any worse to live in, or the fact that this act will come into force will make it any better. My ancestors came from Scotland when Canada was quite different from what it is to-day. My grandfather remembered when the battle of Waterloo was fought. He came to Canada, to Glengarry. I venture to say that Glengarry was not a very easy place to live in then; opportunity was a long way off. When he worked on the Rideau canal, which passes near these parliament buildings, I venture to assert that he earned his money the hard way, because in those days they had no mechanical tools with which to work. Then he left the eastern part of Ontario to go to the south-western part of this province, and settled in a virgin forest. For many years he lived in a part of the country where he had to carry on his back for seventeen miles the flour used by his family. They were really the people who made this country the land of opportunity to which people now come, and where those now entering enjoy the benefits provided by our forefathers. Then they proceed to lecture us as to what we should do about the laws of this country.

Neither did I take very kindly the statement made by the hon. member for Spadina that our boys overseas died without any citizenship and without any flag to salute. It is a wonder he did not go on and say they had no Canada day to observe. I feel sure the 10,000 airmen and the 17,000 infantrymen and others who died overseas believed they had a flag to salute, and believed they were citizens of a great country. I can say to you now, Mr. Speaker, that I believe the flag they believe they did salute, and would want to salute, was the union jack, or probably the red ensign.

I can remember reading that the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) said that when he as an engineer came to parliament he forgot about his engineering. Perhaps as a lawyer it is very easy for me to forget all about law. However, I believe that in an approach to any bill there are certain rules of interpretation which must be observed, and that those rules should be applied to the present bill.

What defect was it intended to cure? There must have been some reason for introducing the bill. In the debate there have been many eloquent speeches, perhaps the most eloquent of which was given by the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) who introduced the bill.

After all, no good and sufficient reason has been given. It is true they have mentioned that there was no particular act defining citizenship. But the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) has pointed out that there are three acts of parliament in which citizenship and nationality are mentioned. They are the Immigration Act, the Naturalization Act and the Canadian Nationals Act. This latter act was mentioned only incidentally by some hon. members, and by the Secretary of State.

I wondered what was said about Canadian citizenship when this act was brought into force in 1921, a generation ago. With that in mind, I took the time to look into the debates of that session, to find what was said. I find that the bill was introduced by the Right Hon. Charles Doherty, who at that time was Minister of Justice in a Conservative administration. The hint was offered by some hon. members, and possibly by the Secretary of State himself, that the real reason for introducing that bill was that it was required so that a Canadian should be a national, as distinct from a British national, in order to obtain greater responsibility before the league of nations.

In introducing the bill, the then Minister of Justice stated this, at page 645 of Hansard of that year.

> But the purpose of the bill is to define a particular class of British subjects who, in addition to having all the rights and all the obligations of British subjects, have particular rights because of the fact that they are Canadians. I think we have always understood that without a specific statutory definition there has for a long time been such a person as a Canadian, and some outstanding indications which justify a man in claiming to be a Canadian.

In other words, at that time the then Minister of Justice did not believe that it was necessary that they be made citizens by statute but believed that in fact they were Canadians. Then he went on to explain the use of the word "national" instead of the word "citizen", the reason being that in the French version of the league of nations documents the word "ressortissant" more nearly approximated in English the meaning of the word "national" than any other word.

In the course of the debate, in which there was a considerable amount of discussion, and during which Mr. Doherty seemed to answer some questions forty or fifty times, he was asked by Mr. Fielding:

Is there such a thing now as a Canadian national? Is it right to say, "the following persons are Canadian nationals," or do we not by this bill make them so? It is a very fine distinction; I merely call the hon. gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. Doherty: I think that both things are true. There does exist to-day such a thing as a Canadian national; if there does not, then all those who are proud of the fact that they are Canadians have been attaching to themselves a designation that means nothing. It is equally true that this act speaking the day it is passed, declares the fact to exist that certain persons are Canadian nationals. The moment this bill is passed—whether by virtue of this law or by virtue of any anterior thing is immaterial—these people are Canadians.

So that again Mr. Doherty states that he believes that they were Canadians, and that there was such a thing as Canadian citizenship prior to that act.

Later on, Mr. Marcil referred to the fact that when he went to France on one occasion he wanted to register as a Canadian, but it was suggested to him that he should register as a British subject. When that point was raised in the debate Mr. Doherty said:

I certainly think he would be entitled to . . .

That is, he would be entitled to register as a Canadian subject.

. . . indeed, I thought he was, in the past. On any occasion when I have been travelling and have been asked what my nationality was, I have said, "Canadian"—and it went right down. At the league of nations we from Canada were never known as anything else—and we were not anything else—than the Canadian representatives, and we sat at the table in the position officially designated "Canadian delegation."

Then, again, later on, Mr. D. D. McKenzie, who at that time was an outstanding Liberal, took part in the debate. As I recall, he was a doughty fighter. He, as a Liberal, criticized the bill introduced by the Conservative administration in these words:

I do not think the good loyal people of Ontario will like the idea that we have forsaken Canadian citizenship with all that term meant, and that we are now nationalists if we take our definition as a nationalist from what Mr. Bourassa and those behind him were preaching . . .

Then he proceeded to discuss a matter of domestic strife in the party which I shall not bother reading. There again he thought there was a Canadian citizenship, before that time

A great deal has been said about the taking of the census. I went to some trouble to find out why a census is taken and, so far as I can discover, it is because the British North America Act says there must be a census every ten years. Those ten-year periods were in 1871 1881 and so on. I find nothing in the British North America Act which says that any particular questions shall be asked. They wanted to find out only how many people there were in the country; at least that was the chief reason.

Yet, in 1941 I find that on the form which was handed the census takers there are two columns, one immediately following the other, the first of which calls for nationality or citizenship, and the country to which the person owes allegiance. I have not a copy of the instructions given the census takers, although I tried to get them. I was late in asking for them. However, if the government in office at that time—a Liberal government—said to those census takers that a natural-born Canadian was to be classified as anything other than a Canadian, it gave those census takers wrong advice.

The next column deals with racial origin. This would refer to Scotsmen, Irishmen, Englishmen, or Frenchmen, as the case may be. I believe the instruction there was that it should be traced through the father, rather than in any other way, a procedure which, of course, is not always fair.

I have mentioned one reason for introducing any legislation, namely, that there must be a defect. Since the introduction of this bill I have believed firmly that it is not necessary in order to establish Canadian citizenship. What is the reason for it? One of the other rules in interpreting a statute which the minister will know better than I do—

Mr. MARTIN: No, not at all.

Mr. McMASTER: —is to ask: "What is the true object and intent of this amendment?" In this case, what is the object and intent of the bill? Perhaps in this instance I can help the minister. I do not believe there is any other reason in the world for introducing the bill than that of having a codification, and to compel those who come from the British isles to appear to declare themselves nationals in the same way as do the peoples from any other country.

It is no disgrace to anyone coming from a country not speaking the English or the French languages to be asked to appear before a court, because they must give proof that they understand one of those languages. It is a fair thing to ask that that be done. One of the previous speakers referred to elderly people who would be naturalized although they do not speak the language. I know of a fine lady in Toronto who had not learned the language and who was naturalized. It was only right that she should be, because she is a good citizen. But, generally speaking, it is not unfair to ask anyone to learn either English or French before he becomes a citizen. This does not mean that he will necessarily be a good citizen. As I have said time and again, and as has been said in other countries, when naturalization is at stake the smart immigrant will learn the language quickly, whereas the good immigrant may perhaps find it difficult to do so. But this reason does not apply to British subjects.

I should like to deal for a moment with the question of intolerance. I do not think I ever heard any of the members of a certain political party praise anyone except those whom they call members of minority groups. I am bound to say that I have heard people of British stock say the same thing. I do not believe there is any justification for such statements. They have a strange idea of intolerance. Lately we heard of a case in Toronto where the owner of a rink refused admission to a certain boy. His friends rallied around; the case was brought to court, and the owner of the rink was compelled to allow that boy to go in. It has been said that this is a case of intolerance when, in, fact, it is just an example of tolerance. They will not stand for that sort of thing in Toronto. I cannot understand why anyone should think that we in Canada are intolerant. Reference has been made to this twenty per cent of our population, but we are not intolerant toward them in Toronto and we do not hear of this intolerance towards them. It is strange to hear this sort of thing from other parts of the country.

Then we have heard of the wearing of a babushka. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) was referred to by bystanders as a foreigner because she wore a babushka. No doubt it was rather unusual, but the mere wearing of it would not make her a foreigner.

I am opposed to this bill on principle. I believe it is proposed for one purpose only, a purpose with which I certainly am not in agreement.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, there are only fifteen minutes left before I adjourn the debate. I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) is ready to give way to me because I am probably more conversant with what I am going to speak about than he is. I am not going to take up much time, but being a good Canadian I am interested in this bill. Being a good Liberal I am glad to know that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) agrees with me. In this instance I think the hon. member is right. If he listened to me more often he would be right more often.

Mr. GREEN: I would be in trouble.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The particular section in this citizenship bill with which I am concerned is section 10. I am not a lawyer, and I have listened to lawyers in the house talk about Canada day and every other kind of day. As I understand this section, a man who resides in Canada for twenty years automatically becomes a Canadian citizen—

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, no.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: —whether or not he can speak the language. Not being a lawyer, I do not know about that, but I am opposed to it. As I see it, this will discredit our minister, for whom I have the greatest regard and for whom I believe every veteran in Canada has the greatest regard. As my minister has said, "Not a Jap from the Rockies to the sea." I stand by that and I presume he stands by that. However, I am in position to go still farther.

The province of British Columbia is the gateway to the great Pacific, the greatest market that this country ever had. There are 400,000,000 people in China alone who offer a great potential market for Canadian products. I wish to ask the members of this house what they would think of the province that was the gateway to that great market if it had no minister in the cabinet. I am here to tell the house that no member of the Liberal party from British Columbia will ever sit as a member of the government if he permits the Japs to come back to the coast. That is covering a lot of territory, but the minister gave me that opening. I am talking for the rest of the members. If any other private member cared to go into the government and permitted the Japs to come back he would never be elected as a Liberal from British Columbia. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South will agree with me when I say that no Conservative member would be elected from our province who allowed that. I am making no comment about the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

A citizen of this country must have all the rights of law and all the privileges of a Canadian citizen. I am glad the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is making careful notes of what I say because, added to what he has learned in Moscow, it will be an addition to his knowledge.

Mr. COLDWELL: He will read it in Hansard in the morning.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I always have the greatest respect for and admiration and appreciation of what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) says. I have never had the privilege of visiting Moscow. I remember when the premier of the great province of Saskatchewan told off this house and said that a man such as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard had no knowledge of what they were doing at Dieppe because he had been there on a twenty-four hour visit on one occasion.

We are told by this C.C.F. that these Japs should have all the rights which they will have under this bill. I am not a lawyer, but according to the press this is what the hon. member for Vancouver East said, and I quote from the Regina Leader-Post of April 19, 1945. He may have been misquoted because my hon. friend, the leader of the C.C.F., is always being misquoted. The article is headed, "Would disperse Canadian Japs". It reads:

> Angus MacInnis, C.C.F. member of parliament for Vancouver East, said in an interview Wednesday night that Prime Minister Mackenzie King should follow up his proposal of August 4 last, that orientals be dispersed across Canada.

I am not going to read the whole article.

Mr. MacINNIS: What did you come across that you did not like to read?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will read it all; do not worry.

Mr. MacINNIS: I want it all read.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It goes on:

> "All restrictions against loyal Japanese should be removed," he said—

I want the hon. member for Vancouver East to bear this in mind.

> —"except that they should not be allowed to return to British Columbia after the war."
>
> Loyal Japanese should be permitted to settle anywhere in Canada without disadvantages or prejudices, he added. After the war, British Columbia should be prepared to take her share.
>
> "The Japanese problem before the war," he said, "was essentially a British Columbia problem, but now it is a dominion problem and should be handled as one."

Mr. MacINNIS: What is wrong with that?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The point I wish to make is this. If the hon. member for Vancouver East is sincere in his idea, and I give him credit for that, particularly as regards the C.C.F., I ask him, how can you give all the rights of citizenship to a man when you tell him what province or what municipality he shall live in? You cannot tell him where he shall live if he has all the rights of Canadian citizenship. But that is what the hon. member for Vancouver East advocated.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, it is not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You will have your chance to-morrow.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am going to take it too.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I hope you do because I will finish up after you are through.

Mr. MacINNIS: No; you are shooting your bolt to-night.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The people I represent in British Columbia support me in my stand. The hon. member for Vancouver East, I presume, represents the C.C.F. party which says that the Japanese must have every right as Canadian citizens, and there is a section of this bill which says that after twenty years' residence in Canada you may be given all those rights whether you can speak the language or not. But you cannot possibly give a man all the rights of Canadian citizenship and then tell him which province of which municipality he shall live in. To carry that to its ultimate conclusion, can you imagine anybody, Mr. Speaker, wanting to reside in Vancouver East when he could reside in the Fraser Valley? I want the hon. member for Vancouver East when he rises to speak on this question to tell me and the fishermen and the berry growers of British Columbia how the Japanese can have all the rights of Canadian citizenship if you are going to tell them which province and which riding and which municipality they shall reside in.

On motion of Mr. Merritt the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

LABOUR CONDITIONS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask what the motion is?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I announced last evening that we would ask for permission to go into supply, to take an item in the Department of Reconstruction and one in the Department of Labour, and I am now asking for permission to call these items in committee of supply.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter I wish to raise. I should like to preface my remarks by saying that I think this practice of moving the house into committee of supply at three or four minutes to eleven o'clock, which does not give the members of the house an opportunity to raise any matter which they wish to raise, should be discontinued. But we have been doing this now for a considerable time. So far as we are concerned we are determined to take advantage of the motion, and we expect that the house in the future will be moved into committee of supply at a more convenient time. One of the departments mentioned by the minister was labour, but there is no guarantee that the estimates of the Department of Labour, if moved into supply to-night, will come before the house for consideration before Easter, and there are some matters dealing with labour problems in this country which should be considered by the house before we adjourn for the Easter recess. I propose, therefore, to raise some of them now.

Within the last week or so two delegations have met the cabinet and discussed with them the problems of labour, the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. Both of these organizations have pointed out to the government that conditions in the realm of labour in this country are far from satisfactory, and indeed far from the conditions that were expected when this government was elected to power in June of last year.

May I point out to the members of the house, and to the government in particular, that the principal slogan which was used by the party in power during the general election of last June was: Jobs for all. To-day we find that there are—I was going to say, several hundred thousand; I would be within the mark in saying that, but I will put it in this way—a very large number of men and women who have contributed to the winning of the war in the field of industry and labour who are at the moment unemployed; and not only those who have contributed to the winning of the war in industry and other forms of labour, but thousands of veterans also who have returned from overseas who are at the present moment unemployed and living on their gratuities.

The briefs which were placed before the cabinet by the two labour organizations I have mentioned were comprehensive, and I was surprised at the reception they received when they were placed before the cabinet. I noted the reports in the daily newspapers of the reception which the brief of the Canadian Congress of Labour received from the Prime Minister and the cabinet. I have the brief before me, and I am at a complete loss to understand why it aroused the kind of criticism that was made on the occasion of its presentation; for, after all, is it not a fact, for example, that we have no real plans as a nation for the orderly transition from war to peace, apart from the disposal of industries which were established by the government and which should have been retained for the making of needed civilian goods and the giving of employment to large numbers of people in Canada at this time?

The hour is too late, Mr. Speaker, for me this evening to say what I intended to say and intend to say on this matter. There are several other important considerations which I wish to place before the house in connection with what is going on in the country in the realm of labour and the attempts that are being made by certain persons in Canada to carry on propaganda against labour receiving its rights in this country at the present time. But I see it is eleven o'clock, and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 10, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

First report of special committee on revision of standing orders.—Mr. Speaker.

Third report of special committee on war expenditures and economies.—Mr. Isnor.

CANADIAN ARMY

STATEMENT RESPECTING ALLEGED DESERTER—REPEAL OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) raised a question concerning a deserter from the United States army, one McCloy, who was arrested in Winnipeg for return to the United States. At that time the hon. member asked if steps would be taken to see that such return was not made.

May I inform the house that the order in council under which these arrangements were entered into with the United States was repealed yesterday. Perhaps by way of explanation I might say that this order represented a consolidation of arrangements which had been in effect for some time following discussions between representatives of the United States and Canada, going back as far as 1940. We asked first that there might be an arrangement whereby our deserters would be returned to this country, and the United States later made a similar request to us. The fact is that such arrangements were carried out, although it was perhaps a bit uncertain as to just what the legal authority for them might be. All this culminated in the passing of the order in council, one which is now largely unnecessary. It was never intended that the order in council should cover such a case as the McCloy case, and the case in question has served to emphasize that fact. Therefore the order in council was repealed yesterday.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MOUNTED POLICE—PENSIONS—BENEFITS TO WIDOWS

Mr. PROBE:

1. What is the schedule of benefits to widows of commissioned officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and what is the basis on which contributions are made to the benefit fund?

2. What differences exist in respect to non-commissioned officers and constables on the one hand and commissioned officers on the other in (a) the basis of contribution in the widows' benefit fund; (b) the amount of benefits payable?

3. What is the amount of retirement pension for members of the R.C.M.P. for each rank of the services?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

There is no schedule of benefits but under sections 52 and 54 of the R.C.M. Police Act the widow is eligible for a pension equal to one-half the pension to which her late husband would have been entitled, or was in receipt of immediately before his death. Commissioned officers of the force are required under Section 49 of the act to contribute five per centum per annum of their pay.

2 (a). Non-commissioned officers and constables receive for themselves a free pension, but any of these members of the force who joined after October, 1934 must contribute five per cent per annum of their pay to the widows pension fund established by part IV of the R.C.M. Police Act. Other such members already in the force at that time had the right to elect whether they would contribute or not. In the case of officers they are required to contribute five per centum per annum of their pay under part II of the act, as already related in answer No. 1, above.

(b) The amount of benefits for officers' widows is already indicated in answer No. 1. The amount of benefits for non-commissioned officers and constables depends upon how much each has contributed and for how long, and how much of an annuity such total amount is capable of purchasing. The actuaries of the department of insurance are requested to supply these details in each individual case.

3. Part II of the R.C.M. Police Act governs in the case of commissioned officers and part III in the case of non-commissioned officers and constables, according to length of service. An officer receives for each year of service an annual pension of one fiftieth of his total pay and allowances at the time of retirement, but not exceeding 70 per cent thereof, and a non-commisioned officer receives an annual pension not exceeding two-thirds of his total pay and allowances for the last year of his service. The amount in each case is governed by rank and length of service. It is calculated as follows:

(a) If he has completed ten but less than twenty-one years' service, one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowances during the last year of his service for every year of service;

(b) If he has completed twenty-one but less than twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances during the last year of his service, with an addition of two-fiftieths of such pay and allowances for every completed year of service above twenty years;

(c) If he has completed twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances during the last year of his service with an addition of one-fiftieth of such pay and allowances for every completed year of service above twenty-five years; provided, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of such annual pay and allowances.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY—OFFICERS

Mr. COCKERAM:

1. How many officers, holding the following ranks, are now on the strength of the Royal Canadian Navy, at home and abroad (a) admiral; (b) vice-admiral; (c) rear-admiral; (d) commodore; (e) captain.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL SECURITY

On the order for notices of motions:

That, in the opinion of this house Standing Order 63 be amended by adding after subsection (1): (m) on public health, welfare and social security, to consist of thirty-five members, ten of whom shall constitute a quorum.

Mr. SPEAKER: This notice of motion is out of order, on the ground that the standing orders of the house were referred to a committee on March 26, 1946. The hon. member will see at page 44 of Votes and Proceedings the following notation:

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King it was resolved,—That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Adamson, Gladstone, Glen, Golding, Hansell, McGarry, Jean, MacInnis, Pouliot, Smith (Calgary West) and Stirling be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the standing orders of the house with a view to simplify, accelerate and expedite its business, and to report to the house during the present session.

If the hon. member wishes to be heard before the committee, I am sure the members of the committee will be pleased to receive and consider his suggestions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF FULL-TIME MINISTER

On the order for notices of motions:

Whereas the minister in charge of the Department of External Affairs has been up to the present date the prime minister of the day;

And whereas the said department has developed and grown in size and importance to the point where the appointment of a full-time minister is essential in the public interest;

And whereas Canada's responsibilities abroad require ever more frequently the attendance of the appropriate cabinet minister at international gatherings outside Canada;

Therefore, be it resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should consider immediately the advisability of appointing a minister of the crown whose duties shall be solely concerned with external affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, this resolution has been standing in my name since the opening of the session. The purposes and objectives I had in mind when it was placed on the order paper have to a large extent been carried out by the legislation introduced some weeks ago by the Prime Minister. That legislation, which was passed by the house, provided for a separate and full-time minister of external affairs. Such minister would be appointed under the statute as amended. In view of the fact that the government has accepted the principle of the resolution I would now ask for permission to withdraw it.

Motion dropped.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AGE AND INCOME REQUIREMENTS—PROPOSED INCREASE IN AMOUNTS PAYABLE

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East) moved:

That in the opinion of this house, consideration should be given to amending the Old Age Pension Act by lowering the pensionable age to sixty years, by increasing the amount of the pension so as to enable the recipients to live in health and self-respect, and by deleting the income requirements for eligibility.

He said: Mr. Speaker, about six months ago I had the opportunity of moving a resolution almost identical with the one I now move. I do not apologize for taking up the time of the house in a discussion of this subject, because I am convinced that better provision for our old people is one of the most important questions confronting Canada to-day.

For many years the plight of old people in this country has been a sad one, and in my opinion it is daily growing worse. Those of us who read the immortal Scottish poet, Burns, will remember his poem "Man Was Made to Mourn," one verse of which says:

Look not alone on youthful prime,
Or manhood's active might;
Man then is useful to his kind,
Supported in his right:
But see him on the edge of life,
With cares and sorrows worn;
Then Age and Want—oh! ill-match'd pair—
Shew man was made to mourn.

Almost two hundred years have passed since Burns wrote those words; yet the condition of people faced with old age and want, the same ill-matched pair—is not very much better now than it was then.

The resolution before us asks for three changes in our old age pension legislation. First, I am asking for a reduction in the eligible age for receiving a pension. Second, I am asking for an increase in the amount of the pension. Third, I am asking for the abolition of the means test in connection with receiving a pension. I am sure that anyone who has given any thought at all to our old age pension legislation will agree there is no need to elaborate upon those three changes.

Whether the eligible age is sixty or sixty-five years, I think we are all agreed that seventy years is too advanced an age at which to begin the payment of old age pensions. I am asking in this resolution that the eligible age be reduced from seventy to sixty years. I think I can bring evidence before the house to prove that the age of sixty is a proper eligible age. First, I would ask members of the house to consider the age at which old age pensions are granted in other parts of the world, and I would refer them first, to the legislation in the nations of the British commonwealth, countries that perhaps are more like our own than any other part of the world.

Under recent legislation passed in Great Britain the eligible age has been made sixty years for women and sixty-five years for men. In New Zealand the eligible age is sixty years for both men and women. In Australia the eligible age is the same, sixty years for both men and women. I believe the eligible age in most of the states of the United States is sixty-five years, with some states having it as low as sixty years.

There is another reason for reducing the eligible age. Because of the way in which modern machinery operates, many people are not able to carry on with their ordinary labours much beyond the age of sixty. This is particularly true of those whose work is manual. Persons engaged in sedentary occupations are often able to perform useful service after the age of sixty-five, or even after the age of seventy-five, but few who do manual work can hold their jobs after they have reached sixty years of age. This is particularly true of those who have intermittent work.

Often when a man has been employed for a period of years he is kept on by his employer, although he may not be as efficient as a younger man would be. Personal and humane considerations enter into the matter. This is particularly true where there is a retiring pension system. These pensions are usually paid at sixty-five years of age, and often an employee is kept on in order that he may reach the eligible age for a retiring pension. That is what happens with the good employer, but there are other employers who are not so thoughtful or humane and who are ready to find an excuse to discharge an individual who has reached such an age that his usefulness is impaired.

Age is a factor in engaging men and women for the government civil service. Employees in the civil service are supposed to retire at the age of sixty-five years. Very few, except service men or women, are brought into the service after they have reached the age of thirty-five and this applies also in private employment. Unless a person has some particular ability or skill which will make him more useful than he would be at an earlier age, very few employers care to hire any one beyond the age of thirty-five. I do not think I need labour the point.

Less need be said about the necessity of increasing the amount of the pension. Taking into consideration all payments that are made in connection with old age pensions, in most provinces there is a nominal payment of $30 a month, but in no province does the old age pension from all sources average $30 a month. I have here an answer which was made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) to questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as reported on page 579 of Hansard of October 1, 1945. The hon. member asked for the average pension paid to old age pensioners in each of the provinces, and also for the number of the old age pensioners in each province, both as at June 30, 1945. I should like to quote these figures so that hon. members will realize how many persons are receiving these inadequate payments. The number of persons receiving old age pensions as at June 30, 1945, is as follows:

Alberta	11,594
British Columbia	15,505
Manitoba	12,427
New Brunswick	12,335
Nova Scotia	14,135
Ontario	58,323
Prince Edward Island	1,881
Quebec	49,645
Saskatchewan	12,971
Northwest Territories	11

Add the figures I have given and you will have the number of old age pensioners as of June 30, 1945. These are the average monthly amounts received by pensioners in the various provinces: Alberta, $24.13; British Columbia, $24.38; Manitoba, $24.47; New Brunswick, $22.18; Nova Scotia, $22.54; Ontario, $24.45; Prince Edward Island, $18.66; Quebec, $23.94; Saskatchewan, $24.63; Northwest Territories, $24.09.

Additional sums are paid in some of the provinces, and adding these to the figures given by the minister in his answer gives this result: Alberta, $29.13; British Columbia, $29.38; Quebec, $29.38; Manitoba, $25.72; New Brunswick, $22.18; Nova Scotia, $27.54. In the case of Nova Scotia the pension is limited to $365 per year, and the additional payment is whatever amount up to $5 per month will bring the annual pension to $365. The figure for Ontario is $27.45; Prince Edward Island, $18.65; Quebec, $23.94; Saskatchewan $27.63.

No one can tell me that an individual to-day can live on less than $20 a month, as it is in some cases, or on less than $30 a month as it is in other cases. Members of this house are, especially considering the action we took respecting ourselves at the last session, in duty bound at this session to see that the old people of this country receive something more than $360 a year on which to live.

The third change which my motion proposes is that the Old Age Pension Act should be amended so as to abolish the means test. Old age pensions to-day are paid only if the applicant is really destitute. I cannot do better than put on the record a few paragraphs from the proposals made by the dominion government to the dominion provincial conference. I quote:

> The means-test is generally recognized as undesirable after a certain age. It has been noted that about 40 per cent of all persons of 70 years of age and over make application, satisfy the means-test requirements and receive pensions.

I call particular attention to the next paragraph:

> There is little doubt that a very considerable number in addition are not able entirely to support themselves, but are dependent upon their family, and refrain from applying for pensions because of the embarrassment occasioned by the means-test.
>
> The minimum age of 70, though convenient as a dividing line with respect to the payment of any kind of universal old age pension, is nevertheless too high in a number of cases of actual need.

That is an understatement. It goes on:

> A strong case can be made for reducing the age limit to 65 in order to provide assistance, at least for those in the age group of 65-69, who are actually in need.

I do not think I need add anything to that to show the need for the abolition of the means-test in order that persons, even if they are not absolutely destitute, may apply for the old age pension without feeling that they are asking for charity.

I have before me the annual report of the Department of Old Age Pensions in the province of British Columbia for the year 1944-45. It gives the value of the real property and personal property owned by applicants for the old age pension. The following table gives the percentages of applicants for the old age pension holding real and personal property to the values shown:

(a) Holding real property of value—	Per cent
Under $251	57·41
$251 to $500	8·66
$501 to $1,000	13·68
$1,001 to $2,000	14·20
$2,001 to $5,000	5·80
$5,001 and up	0·25

This table shows that only one-quarter of one per cent of the applicants had real property of a value of $5,001 and up. When you come to personal property the situation is even worse, as the following table shows:

(b) Holding personal property of value—	Per cent
Under $251	71·77
$251 to $500	13·74
$501 to $1,000	8·22
$1,001 to $3,000	5·63
$3,001 and up	0·64

Surely in view of these figures we could get something better for the people who are investigating these applications to do than looking into the personal affairs of old people who have given the best of their lives to their country. I should like to quote a short paragraph from this report:

> From the middle of 1939 until the end of 1940 the rate of increase in the number of pensioners is seen to continue evenly. This represented the early period of the war. The latter period of the war, beginning with the year 1941 and continuing into the early part of 1944, shows a rate of increase in the number of pensioners less than in any former period. However, early in 1944 it is noticed that a sharp rise began in this rate of increase, became steeper towards the end of that year, and continued into 1945.

With the worsening of economic conditions throughout the country, since the end of the war the number of persons making application for old age pensions is continually increasing.

In the province of British Columbia we have what is called the Parents' Maintenance Act. It provides that persons who make application for old age pensions and have children who might be able to support them or contribute to their support, must bring court action against them for that support before their applications will be accepted. A question on the point was asked in the British Columbia legislature in the 1943 session as follows:

> What is the actual or estimated saving to the pensions board for the year ended December 31, 1942, due to the assumed ability of children to contribute to the maintenance of parents in receipt of the old age pension?

The answer was $3,560. As the number of old age pensioners in that year was 14,615, the amount collected was equal to 24 cents per pensioner for the year. Yet we keep in the administration of old age pensions in British Columbia people whose business it is to find how much children can contribute to their parents' maintenance. I should not be a bit surprised if the cost of administering that provision were found to be much more than the $3,560 accruing to the board. I would, therefore, ask this house to see to it that the means test is abolished. What is required in this connection is a social security programme to cover all the hazards of modern life—by which I mean any contingency which prevents an individual from earning an income; it does not matter what it may be. The individual should be covered, and he can only be covered by a social security programme administered by the state. I am aware of the difficulties in this connection in Canada, because of our constitution. But recognizing these difficulties, I believe we should try to find a way around them.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

So far as I know there is only one country in the world which has developed a complete social security programme. I should like to put on the record the various benefits which are given under that programme, so that hon. members can study them for themselves. I refer to New Zealand, but in order that hon. members may not, as they generally do when New Zealand is mentioned, blow a gasket or something, I will read briefly from the social security bulletin of the United States, volume 8, under date August, 1945. This bulletin gives among other things a summary of social security programmes throughout the world. In regard to New Zealand it says this:

> New Zealand.—A high degree of income security for the entire population of New Zealand has been achieved through the Social Security Act of 1938, which welded a number of older scattered programmes into a unified whole. The New Zealand social security system represents a considerable departure from the pattern followed or proposed elsewhere, particularly with respect to cash benefits. The medical care benefits of the programme—including relatively complete medical, hospital, and laboratory services—are available to the entire population. The cash benefits are paid upon the occurrence of specified risks—old age, invalidity, widowhood or orphanhood, sickness, and unemployment—to individuals whose income is less than a specified amount.

That is not my statement; it is the statement of those who edited this social security bulletin. I would like to give the house the different headings, and, if I have the time, the amounts, yearly or weekly as the case may be, in Canadian money which are paid in benefits under the New Zealand programme:

Age Benefit	yearly rate
All persons 60 years old	$374 40
Married couple (both eligible)	748 80
Additional for wife not eligible in own right	187 20

Widows' Benefit	yearly rate
Widow who has had children	$374 40
Widow who has never had children	280 80

NOTE: Deserted wives and wives of mental hospital patients receive widows' benefit.

Invalid Benefit	yearly rate
Married male invalid	$374 40
Additional benefit for wife	374 40
Unmarried invalid under 20 years of age	280 80
All other permanent invalids	374 40

Sickness Benefit	weekly rate
Married couple	$14 40
Single person	7 20
Person under 20 years of age without dependents	3 60

	weekly rate
Unemployment Benefit
Married couple	$14 40
Single person over 20 years of age	7 20
Single person under 20 years of age	3 60
	yearly maximum
Orphans' Benefit
Orphan under 16 years of age	$147 60
	yearly rate
Miners' Diseases Benefit
Miner and wife	$748 80
Single miner	374 40
	yearly rate
Family Benefit
For each child under 16 years of age irrespective of parents' income	$93 60
NOTE: All children receive the above even when parents are in receipt of any of the aforementioned benefits.
	yearly maximum
Emergency Benefits
To cover all persons not otherwise eligible	$374 40

The last provision is made in any emergency in which none of the others apply. Let me point out that these benefits are all on a contributory basis, but all the benefits come out of the same fund and persons are entitled to them without the taint of charity.

I think I have said enough to show that the time has come, indeed it came long ago, when we should improve the conditions for our old people. Let us remember that it is not a question of money, but one of organizing the man-power, the resources and the capital equipment of the country to produce the things the people need.

I would conclude with a sentence or two from the American philosopher, Lewis Mumford. He says:

> The final test of an economic system is not the tons of iron, the tanks of oil or the miles of textiles it produces. The final test lies in its ultimate products, the sort of men and women it nurtures, and the order, the beauty and the sanity of their communities.

We cannot have order and beauty and sanity while a great many of our people are living on what the dominion government in its proposals to the provinces describes as a minimum subsistence.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): There can be little doubt that this question of old age pensions is one of the most important that can come before the Canadian parliament at this time. It is also one in which the members of the House of Commons should show great interest, since it involves directly the welfare of our senior citizens. In the last few years there has developed in the country an appreciation of the value of humanity. I believe that the Canadian people as a whole are now placing far more value on humanity and far less on material things than they did ten years ago.

To-day I propose to place before the house certain cold, hard, unpleasant facts about the Canadian old age pension. All hon. members probably realize these facts, but in any event it will do no harm to mention them again in order to refresh memories. I am quite certain that the Canadian people, realizing these facts, are very much concerned that something should be done to remedy the situation.

The first fact is that the old age pension paid in Canada is not high enough for anyone to live on. I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) to make that admission when he speaks, or if he feels that the pension is high enough in any province I would ask him to say so. The highest amount paid is paid in British Columbia and Alberta, and in those two provinces it is only approximately $30. That, Mr. Speaker, no matter how we try to get away from it and to make excuses, is not sufficient to enable any human being to live in Canada in health and self-respect, to use the words of the motion that is under discussion this afternoon.

The second fact is that there are thousands of Canadians under the age of seventy who are in need of old age pension but cannot get it because seventy is the earliest age at which a Canadian can qualify. It cannot be disputed that that age is higher than the age required in almost any other country where old age pension is paid. I have here the report on "Social Security for Canada," prepared by Doctor L. C. Marsh for the dominion government in 1943, and at page 73 I find this statement:

> Review of the forty or more systems of old age assistance—contributory and non-contributory—effective in the world to-day clearly shows that the generally accepted view as to the proper age when consideration should be given to retirement from work and provision of security is sixty-five for men and sixty for women.

There is a great deal to be said for having the age for the wife lower than for the husband. There are many husbands who can qualify because they have reached the age of seventy but whose wife is some years younger, and where she cannot qualify it means that the old couple must live on the pension payable to one person.

The third fact is that the applicant for old age pension in Canada must go through a valley of humiliation before he or she can qualify. I might say something further about those words, but this is strictly a non-partisan speech. That, at any rate, is the position of a proud and dignified Canadian who goes to make application for the pension. Many of them have come to my office in Vancouver and almost invariably they are hurt by the questions they must answer. They have the feeling that they are under suspicion, that the governments suspect them of trying to get something for nothing. There is a stigma attaching to the information that is required, and this I think is very unfair and unwise.

For example, they must answer questions about the gifts they have received from their children or from any other source during the twelve months preceding application, and what salary their sons or daughters are earning. These questions make it difficult for a parent to complete the application without feeling humiliated. We have been led away from the original idea of the Old Age Pensions Act. I remember reading the debates that took place in this house and in the provincial house of British Columbia when the Old Age Pensions Act was passed. At that time there was great talk about these pensions being a reward for pioneers. They were to be a payment for something that our older people had richly earned during their earlier years. There was no question at all of the pension being considered a hand-out. But it was not very long after the act had been passed until the administration was being carried on in such a way that the applicant felt that he was classed as somebody trying to get a hand-out. An old age pension should be treated throughout as a measure of security for our senior citizens.

The fourth fact I should like to place before the house to-day is that in Canada a large percentage of applicants cannot qualify for a pension because of the stringency of our regulations. I hold in my hand the green book which was issued in August, 1945, and which contains the proposals of the government of Canada to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. At page 37 we find this statement with regard to the deficiencies of the present old age pension scheme in Canada. It reads as follows:

> It has been noted that about forty per cent of all persons of seventy years of age and over make application, satisfy the means-test requirements and receive pensions. There is little doubt that a very considerable number in addition are not able entirely to support themselves, but are dependent upon their family, and refrain from applying for pensions because of the embarrassment occasioned by the means-test.

The percentage of those who qualify in Canada is far lower than in Great Britain and, I think, far lower than in any other nation of the commonwealth.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. CLAXTON: Great Britain has a contributory system which entitles the people as covered of right—

Mr. GREEN: If the minister will read his own proposals of last year and also the report of Doctor Marsh he will see that there was no doubt in the minds of the people who drew these documents that the position in Canada was not right, that it was not as fair as in other parts of the commonwealth.

In addition to those who cannot qualify, there are many thousands who, because of the present regulations, can qualify only for a partial pension. For example, there is a provision which says that a percentage of the value of a person's real property can be counted as income, although actually there is no income; take the case of a man who has a piece of land or a building which is assessed at $3,500; whether or not he gets any income from that property, the old age pension regulations call for his being charged with an income of five per cent of the assessed value of the property. That is a most unfair regulation.

The fifth unpleasant fact about the Canadian old age pension is that thrift is penalized. Take a man who has put away a little money. He may have an income of $20 a month from the savings of a lifetime. Under the regulations as they stand to-day an applicant for old age pension is allowed an income of only $125 a year, which is about $10 a month. If he has an income greater than $125 a year his old age pension is cut down accordingly. That, I suggest—and I am sure no hon. member in this house can contradict me—penalizes thrift and is unfair to the Canadian who has been saving throughout his lifetime.

The sixth unpleasant fact about Canadian old age pensions—there may be many more but I picked out the six which I considred the most important—is that dominion governments as distinct from some of the provincial governments, have not faced the old age pension problem. There has been delay after delay. I have been a member of this house for over ten years and during all that time very little progress has been made in modernizing the Old Age Pensions Act. It is almost impossible to have any change made in the act or in the regulations. In this house there has been a tendency for the Minister of Finance, and through him the government, to take the stand that old age pensions are a provincial responsibility. I can quote from different speeches made by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to that effect, but I shall not take the time of the house to do so. That has been the outlook, that this question of old age pensions concerns the provinces and that the dominion government should not be bothered about it. It is true that now a change is coming about in that outlook, but there has been too little desire on the part of all dominion governments to settle this old age pension problem. The dominion government should take the lead in having the question settled.

Now, in 1946, of all times, prompt action is imperative. Of course the time element is always important to these old people because of the fact that they are old. They have few years left to live, and a delay of a year or two years at this time means great unhappiness to many of these elderly Canadian people.

Now in 1946 we are in the time of reconversion; we are turning over from wartime to peacetime. We are laying new foundation for Canada, building for peace. There are hundreds of thousands of young Canadians coming back to go to work. The number of unemployed is increasing steadily across the country. Now is the time when something should be done about old age pensions, about our senior citizens.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I come to my suggestions. I realize that the dominion government has made certain proposals to the provincial governments in connection with old age pensions. I also believe that fact has been used as an excuse for delay. I suggest that at this session, not in the session of 1947 or 1948 or some subsequent session, the government bring in legislation providing for a national old age pension for those of seventy years of age or over without any means test whatever.

Mr. CLAXTON: No matter what the provinces say?

Mr. GREEN: That was the proposal submitted to the provinces. I should like the government to show, by actually bringing in legislation, that it was not simply dangling that proposal as a carrot before the noses of the provincial governments. Let them bring it in, to show that they really meant business.

The second suggestion is that an amendment be brought in covering the years from sixty-five to seventy. When the original Old Age Pensions Act was introduced the dominion government did not wait for the provinces to pass similar legislation. The dominion took the lead; then as the years went by province after province brought in the same act, thereby enabling the citizens of those particular provinces to get old age pensions. Let the dominion government of to-day do the same thing. Let it bring in an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act whereby any province wishing to provide pensions for its citizens between the ages of sixty-five and seventy years may be able to do so by the passing of complementary legislation.

Then there can be no excuse for not revising the old age pension regulations, without further delay. The residence qualifications need to be widened. Those regulations dealing with income should be revised. Application forms should be changed. Allowance should be made for higher earnings of applicants. An applicant should be able to earn and to receive as pension up to a total of $660, the amount which remains untaxed under the Income War Tax Act. In offering that figure, I refer only to the single man or woman. Applicants should be permitted to make higher earnings.

I have this final suggestion. Why does the governmnt not get busy at once on a retirement insurance plan under which Canadians could contribute during their working years and, then, as of right, and without any means test, become entitled to an adequate pension? If that were done, I believe the pension could be paid even at the age of sixty years, as recommended in this resolution. But some such scheme should be brought into being in Canada. We shall never have these old age pension problems settled, nor shall we settle other security problems of other types for the people of Canada until we have some broad retirement insurance plan.

In 1944, when discussing old age pensions, the Minister of Finance said, as reported at page 3535 of Hansard of that year:

> The object would be eventually to work into a contributory scheme which would have very wide coverage. Of course it would not be contributory as far as present old age pensioners are concerned, because it is too late.

I am not suggesting that the present old age pensioners should be compelled to wait until there is a contributory scheme of this type, but there must be a retirement insurance plan for Canada. The government would have been much wiser if it had placed before the provinces some such plan. Had that been done, we would have got at the root of this problem, and of other security problems. But instead, so far as I am aware, no such retirement insurance plan has as yet been submitted to the provinces. I hope the government will get busy, working out the details of some such plan. I feel confident that if the government were to do so it would have the support of hon. members of all parties in the house.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is most consoling to hear the words of the hon. member who has just preceded me, because it shows that Liberal processes of thinking can get across the floor and into the minds of our hon. friends opposite.

Mr. GREEN: The trouble is they have long since left Liberal thought.

Mr. PICARD: What was the attitude of my hon. friend's party when that measure was initiated by the Liberal party? But that is the Conservative trend or frame of mind; they are always in favour of a project, but it is never the appropriate moment to introduce it. We saw the same thing in connection with family allowances.

Mr. GREEN: You did not.

Mr. PICARD: I admit my hon. friend was one of the bright exceptions when that measure was introduced.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let us not make a political football of the old people.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Hon. members must not interrupt the hon. member who has the floor. He can be asked questions only with his consent.

Mr. PICARD: It is good, at times, to have a little brush-up, and remind ourselves where we stood a few years ago. I do not mind the interruptions; it is fun.

But when my hon. friend talks about delays he should not accuse us of having delayed, when the fact is that we were the first to bring this measure before the House of Commons, and when all the social security measures now on our statute books were put there by Liberal governments, and initiated by Liberal members.

Mr. GREEN: No, no.

Mr. PICARD: There is not one that has not been.

Mr. CLAXTON: Every single one.

Mr. PICARD: They all have been. Each time, when a new one was brought in we have been faced with the same opposition. In connection with family allowances, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) were for it, and voiced their opinions. But there was a lot of hesitancy on the other side of the house; and there was even opposition—not so much to the principle, but because it was not the right moment. It is never the right moment for the Conservatives to bring about a reform.

Since my hon. friend wanted to keep his remarks above politics, I shall carry on in the same vein. The point I wished to make was that the delay was not on our side, but on theirs, in introducing such measures.

Social security is not a cure-all for man's troubles, nor is it intended to prevent man from working for his living. It would not be right to bring into being any social system which would have as its outcome any diminution, if I may so describe it, of individual effort, or any crushing of initiative. On the other hand, it is impossible to do away with risks and responsibilities, and it would not be right to have a society based on paternalism. What must be created is equality of opportunity for all. Heredity, talent, initiative and work will soon make sure that equality of attainment will not be achieved. For that reason social security measures must be enacted, some in the shape of contributory plans, others in the shape of assistance for the less fortunate, without any contributions from the people who are to benefit.

As I said a minute ago, up to now Canada has been given one of the best systems of social security to be found on the statute books of any modern nation. We are not behind. Indeed, we are ahead in many of the fields we have entered. There are some, though, who because of their relative success in life, have failed to see the good fortune that helped them to higher achievements, and who looked down upon those who had not reached the same level.

They selfishly overvalue their virtues or their work, and blindly or ignorantly hold that equal work and equal industry will inevitably bring about similar results. That is far from the truth, and that is why we need social security measures. Assistance of the kind to which I refer is one of the urgent needs of modern society to bring about more equality of opportunity and more security against the hazards of life. Social security, which aims at preventing and controlling the hazards of life, meets an end which is not only vital to the individual but is essential for his morale and economic well-being.

During the session of last year I had dinner on a train with a business man, who had achieved considerable success. He said that he had not had any advantages, that he had started from nothing, He would not agree with any suggestion that another man working just as hard with the same talents could not reach the same level as he had. The fact is that chance and other considerations account for these inequalities. Social security is a necessity which is now recognized by everybody and there is no room for hesitancy in regarding it as essential. I am glad my hon. friends opposite have reached the same conclusion.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) stated that conditions for the working man throughout the world were about the same to-day as they were in the time of Burns, which would probably be a hundred and fifty years ago. I think he has overlooked a few of the things that have happened since then. Hours of work have changed considerably. Hours of work in industry generally have gradually been lowered until they are now from forty-five to forty-eight per week, and there are proposals to reduce them still further. The conditions in this regard are very different from what they were at the time referred to by my hon. friend.

Health conditions have changed a great deal. As a result of the advances made in science and economic development, probably the poorest man to-day lives better than the wealthy man of fifty years ago. The life of man has been extended considerably by the achievements of medical science. While all these things may not depend upon governments, I do not think my hon. friend would ask us to go back to the days of fifty years ago.

Consider the advances which have been made in housing generally throughout the world, and in Canada in particular. I admit that there is room for improvement, but much has been done over the years. Consider the conditions of the people who lived in the slums of England a hundred years ago. Some of those people—and I bow to them—came to Canada and helped to build up this country. To-day they are living under conditions much better than those which prevailed in England. Wages have gone up. Let us be just; let us not try to compare the conditions of to-day with those of a hundred years ago. What about child labour?

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. PICARD: Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: I think the hon. gentleman's point—

Mr. PICARD: Is this a question?

Mr. IRVINE: I think the point made by my hon. friend (Mr. MacInnis) was that in the time of Burns, they were mourning because of hunger and old age, and they are still mourning. If there has been so much improvement, how does my hon. friend explain the fact that there is still mourning for bread?

Mr. REID: Not to anything like the same extent.

Mr. PICARD: My hon. friend, and the hon. member who spoke before me, should realize that conditions have changed. I think everyone wants to be fair. No matter what government may have been in power, is it not a fact that conditions have improved considerably throughout the world, and particularly in Canada? I admit that there is room for still more improvement, and in a moment I will say that I am in favour of better pensions. But I do not think it is fair to compare conditions of to-day with what they were a hundred and fifty years ago, even if some of our people have not reached the level which we should like to see achieved for the population in general. The standard of living throughout Canada is much higher to-day than it was in England and than it is at the present time in many other countries.

Among the different measures that could be included in social security—and which, if I may remind the house, were brought about by Liberal governments—are the workmen's compensation acts and measures to provide for the arbitration of labour disputes. The matter of health insurance is under consideration by the minister. It has been studied by committees, and as soon as the proposals are accepted by the provinces it will be placed upon the statute book. It is another innovation for which a Liberal government was responsible.

May I remind my hon. friends that when unemployment insurance was first brought before the house it was stated that the time was not opportune, economically or otherwise, to bring forward the measure. But we have unemployment insurance. It costs the government a considerable amount; it costs industry a considerable amount, but it has resulted in a tremendous improvement in conditions. Family allowances are now being paid, and they cost the treasury quite a large amount of money. Then there are old age pensions, as I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. GREEN: I know the hon. member does not wish to be unjust. He will remember that this party advocated unemployment insurance, and actually the first unemployment insurance bill was brought in by Mr. Bennett.

Mr. PICARD: If the hon. member will look up Hansard he will see that the objection was not to the principle, but to the time at which the measure was brought in.

Mr. GRAYDON: It was brought in by the Bennett government.

Mr. PICARD: At a very opportune time—just before the election of 1935.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to my hon. friend—

Mr. PICARD: Does my hon. friend mean the election bill?

Mr. GRAYDON: Unemployment insurance was brought in by the Bennett government.

Mr. CLAXTON: It was thrown out by the courts.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister will have his chance. It was brought in by the Bennett government, thrown out by the present government and sent to the supreme court and privy council for decision. It was thrown out by the courts. Then it was brought in by this government in 1941. I happened to be a member of the committee which brought the bill in, and I know there was entire unanimity with respect to it. There were no reservations at all.

Mr. PICARD: I am glad to know that some Conservative elements approve of what we proposed at the right time.

Workmen's compensation has been in operation throughout the world for about fifty years. Most of the workmen's compensation legislation which is now on the statute books was enacted between 1911 and 1930. France started in 1898, and Spain in 1900, on a moderate scale. Workmen's compensation implies a modification of common law rules relating to liability for damage for the purpose of securing, with the minimum of litigation, limited compensation for all injuries incurred in the course of employment.

I am reviewing briefly these different measures because most of them touch directly or indirectly the question of old age pensions. Workmen's compensation is or should be related to old age pensions. Health insurance is another measure which has to do with it. The proposals made to the provinces have been read and are known by all members of the house, so I need not go back to them. Sickness is the most constant and frequent risk for the low income population and for wage earners in general. It is a risk which may entail the loss of health and earning capacity, the loss of livelihood, the loss of ability to pay for medical assistance.

What is needed is to place at the disposal of the people the facilities of modern medicine for the preservation of the health and detection of disease. As stated in the proposals to the provinces, under our present system, for those who cannot afford to pay, the cost of ill health falls at the very moment when earning capacity is cut off. Those unable to pay are left to the charity of benefactors. It is evident that a scheme of health insurance such as is proposed by the dominion to the provinces is necessary, and it is to be hoped that an agreement in this regard will be reached. Any such scheme should include an extension of assistance to the blind, assistance to needy mothers, and maternity grants. Unemployment insurance, shall I say, to correct what I said a moment ago, has been adopted unanimously by the house.

The outstanding feature of any social security act has been considered to be the old age pension. Social security for aged people can be arrived at by two systems, one supplementing the other, if we wish to have a real social security system. One is the retirement or long-service pension scheme on a contributory basis, as adopted in some countries and as we have it in Canada for certain trades and professions. We might classify old-age insurance plans as follows: schemes applying to salaried employees in general; schemes applying simply to occupational groups, such as bank clerks, civil servants, public utility workers, railway employees, and so on; schemes applying to workers in one entire branch of economic activity, such as all industrial workers, or all commercial workers; and schemes applying to wage-earners or employed persons generally.

The outstanding feature of the occupational scheme is the retirement or long-service pension at a given age, and with that are usually coupled invalidity provisions for retirement on practically the same conditions if the worker becomes an invalid and incapacitated from earning. The different definitions of invalidity or incapacity to earn a living can be considered later, as they are very elastic and differ from one country to another and from one scheme to another.

Many of these retirement schemes, depending on the type of occupation involved, provide a pension as early as fifty, but usually at around sixty-five, and in some cases at sixty years of age after from twenty-five to thirty years of service. That is the average of most of the schemes now in operation. The employee becomes entitled to a pension ranging from two-thirds of his average salary for the previous five years, and pensions for survivors are often provided in such schemes at the rate of fifty per cent of the pension which the deceased employee was receiving or would have received.

Most of these schemes are financed by contributions from the employers and employees, but not by the state.

Insurance schemes for wage earners in general or in an organized trade present a much more complicated problem. Large contributions for the purpose of old age insurance schemes cannot very easily be levied on manual workers who are not permanently employed. Enough is already taken from their weekly pay by workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, and—probably later on—by the health insurance programme; and so for most wage earners a contributory scheme will not be practicable. The main object is to withdraw as little as possible from the wage earner's income for current consumption needs, because it is of the utmost importance to society generally that he should maintain a decent minimum standard of living and sufficient purchasing power to ensure large markets for our production, if we do not want our whole economy to be endangered and if we want to keep employment at as high a rate as possible.

We are left therefore with the necessity of providing pensions for old age on a non-contributory basis. The present old age pension scheme is well known, therefore I do not need to enter into details. But as we have to compare what is being done with the proposals contained in this resolution, it may be said that up until now the maximum amount of pension to which the dominion has contributed is $25 a month. Some of the provinces granted supplemental amounts. The monthly pension varies from $18.63 in one province to $29.41 in another, including provincial supplementary grants. This resolution, although it does not specifically mention any sum, it calls for an increased pension, and if I understood the mover aright he would like to see the pension increased to $50 a month. On the other hand the dominion government has made proposals to the provinces with respect to the old age pension, and it might be well to consider these before we go any further.

The proposals made to the provinces rather suggest that they cannot very well be applied, as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) suggested, by separate federal enactment without infringing upon the rights of the provinces. This is an important consideration in some places throughout the country, and of course we must act with due consideration for the wishes of the provinces. We know how ticklish it is at times to get agreement from the provinces on schemes which we would normally regard as perfectly acceptable and to which neither side of the house at first seems to see objection; yet we find that one province or another objects. So I think that before we go into any new pension scheme for the aged we should have the answer of the provinces to the proposals which have been made by the dominion government.

I am all in favour of a higher rate of pension, and a lower pensionable age, but we must take into consideration the capacity of the country to pay and we must consider the burden it will impose upon the taxpayers. There are many people—some of them sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker—who clamour for lower taxation, lower income tax, and lower corporation tax. If we want to reach that objective, and at the same time plan for higher government expenditures, it will be difficult for the Minister of Finance to make ends meet.

The proposal of an old age pension of $50 per month at age 60 would, I am given to understand, involve an annual expenditure of $851,000,000. That was the figure given by the minister last year, and I am told that further calculations have not changed it. On the other hand the expectancy of income tax revenue this year is $680,000,000. In addition to the $851,000,000 for old age pensions there will be the cost of the present social security programme of the government, which I entirely support. While I should like to see the old age pension increased to $50 a month and the age reduced to 60, I wonder if, in view of the figures I have mentioned, it would be at all possible to do it, and whether we could not say that the programme proposed by the dominion government to the provinces is a good one. Already, taking the figure given by the minister when he spoke to the house the other night on disability pensions, we have reached an expediture of over one billion dollars yearly, which does not include more than $39,500,000 from the federal treasury for old age pensions. If to that we add another $851,000,000 to finance the scheme proposed by my hon. friend, we would have an annual expenditure of $1,851,000,000. With income taxes as they are, I wonder how we would be able to get along with the system we had during the war, financing half our expenditures by taxes and half by loans. I think we would be top-heavy, or lop-sided, or whatever you call it, in our finances if we went all along with the proposals which have been made to-day.

Social security in all its phases is in a constant process of evolution. No system of government for the world has been found to be permanent, and no system of social security benefits has been evolved all at one time. I think the government has not done badly in years past with the programme it has put on the statute books. I think also that the present proposal should be considered an improvement and that it will be acceptable.

One point in the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) which I heartily approve is his criticism of the means test. It is an awkward system and should be entirely discarded. The present proposals mention that the test should be disposed of for those who are seventy years of age or over. I would favour going farther than that and making the change applicable to all who come under the benefits of the act from the age of sixty-five years. The means test and the withdrawal from the estate of the deceased man under the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member are not, to my mind, the best of policies. They may be regarded as necessary by those who are better versed in such questions than I am, but I do not think they work satisfactorily, and I personally would favour their abolition. Let the payment outright of $30 a month to everybody of the age of seventy and over be the obligation of the federal government; and, as to the age groups from sixty-five to sixty-nine, let the federal government contribute 50 per cent of the cost of $30 a month. I believe that would be a considerable improvement on the present system and that it would be highly appreciated by the people of Canada.

While I am on this subject of old age pensions and still have some time left, I should like to apologize to the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton). The other night he took me to task because at the end of my remarks on the disability proposals I said, and I thought I was perfectly right in saying, that I would carry on the debate next Tuesday. I wish to apologize because I realized last evening that I would have been out of order had I tried to proceed with that debate; but the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand), who proposed this resolution, was under the same impression as I was. Probably at a later time he will find a way to say a few words on his resolution. Since it is intimately connected with the question of old age, I think I might say one word in this regard, that when amendments to old age pensions are considered it might be appropriate to consider some form of benefits for invalids or other people who are absolutely incapable of earning their livelihood. These people, of course, as do all workers, fall into different categories. There are those who during part of their life have been able to work but who have been incapacitated: some of them fall under schemes of pensions which give them definite benefits; others come under the provisions of workmen's compensation acts, if their disability was occasioned during the course of their work. But such protection is provided for only a certain number.

I believe that the majority of wage-earners, for example those employed in agriculture, in domestic service, as casual workers, as daily manual workers, are usually excluded from all sorts of benefits or compensation laws dealing with disability. In these cases something should be done. If I understand well, in England there is protection in such cases up to the age when those concerned come under the provisions of the old age pensions law. I see here in a book by Beaman, although I cannot vouch for the fact, that the British law covers the field of need, because all wage-earners in the United Kingdom are insured for disability benefits up to the age of seventy, although I doubt whether that includes all occasional and daily workers. What of the unskilled labourers, the farmers, the fishermen, and, above all others, people who have permanent disability from childhood, people who have never worked, not people who are trying to evade the law of work but those who, on account of their physical build or their ill health, have never been able to work? All of us know in our constituencies many such cases which are not provided for under existing laws. It would be well, therefore, for the minister to consider a readjustment of the old age pensions law or some appropriate way of dealing with them. The other night, when he so ably presented his opinion on the matter, the minister mentioned disability as coming after certain other things. He said that unemployment insurance would come first, under the Doctor Marsh report and the recent speech of President Truman: he put second, health insurance; third, disability and old age pensions; fourth, children's allowances; fifth, sickness cash benefits. I think the minister in his speech included the people we are mainly talking about in the fifth class, namely sickness cash benefits. With all due respect for his higher knowledge, I think they should come in the third category, that of disability and old age pensions, and that they should be treated, as I have said, in one act or under one scheme.

Mr. GRAYDON: The principle is now recognized in the case of blind people, and it should, I think, be extended.

Mr. PICARD: Yes, it is done now for the blind. Here the minister had in mind those who probably become invalids through sickness, and he put them into the fifth category. As I was going to say for the benefit of those who were not here the other night, I think it might be well to consider what the minister has done up to now for the building of social security plans for Canada. He has given of the best of his ability to evolving an entirely new system, one which is comprehensive, well organized and well balanced, and I think he deserves credit for it and the gratitude of the country for it. I know that he is anxious and desirous above anybody else in the house to bring about as speedily as can be done a comprehensive system of the kind which has been outlined. As I said a moment ago, this cannot be done all at one time; these matters are in process of constant development.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Other countries have done it, have they not?

Mr. PICARD: Does the hon. member mean New Zealand? That is one country which has been given often by him as an example. But I do not think any one country has brought about at one time, in one year, a plan of social security. Does the hon. member, by any chance, mean Russia? I forgot about that entirely. Whatever any nation may do by means of revolution, I do not know of any country which, by process of evolution, can effect an immediate change in the present system. At any rate, so far as democratic countries are concerned, working along evolutionary lines, I do not think we in Canada are doing too badly. The situation is improving gradually.

I feel keenly about the question of disability, and what I suggest might well be done concurrently with a revision of the old age pensions law. Some people have raised the objection that it is quite difficult to define disability or infirmity, but there are three descriptions which are given as taken from the United States laws at the moment, and which I think I can readily bring to the attention of the house. Here I am referring to a publication entitled "Social Security Bulletin," for March, 1941, and in particular from an article by the chairman of the social security board of the United States, Mr. A. J. Altmeyer. I quote:

> Under the retirement law for the civil service employees of the government, for example, an employee meets the test of disability if, by reason of disease or injury, he is totally disabled for useful and efficient service in the position occupied by him. The Railroad Retirement Act requires that a railroad worker be "totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire" before he is granted a disability benefit.

There is quite a distinction there.

> Under United States life insurance, purchasable by persons who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during the war, total permanent disability is any "impairment of mind or body which continuously renders it impossible for the disabled person to follow any substantially gainful occupation, and which is founded upon conditions which render it reasonably certain that the total disability will continue throughout the life of the disabled person."

That, I submit, is an apt definition, because impairment of mind or body, which renders it impossible for a person to follow any gainful occupation, is more specific than simply the stipulation that in order to be considered an invalid a man should be subject to certain restrictions. The definition, I think, is broad enough. Of course there must be an avoidance of any duplication of benefits, but any objection in that respect can easily be met.

It is evident that we must consider a broader source of relief for the numerous persons in Canada who to-day have to depend upon relatives or upon charity, so that, as regards those who have parents to support, family resources which heretofore have been used for the assistance of such persons may be set free to meet the important needs of those who have to contribute such support. It would mean fair treatment and the removal of a source of anxiety.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to a point of order. I am no stickler for the rules, Mr. Speaker, but time is short, and I am suggesting that my hon. friend is not discussing old age pensions.

Mr. PICARD: I have about concluded, Mr. Speaker, although I submit that what I am saying is directly connected with the question before the house. We owe it to the country to do something for these people. We all admit that the workers are entitled to rest after a life of labour, but we should not have to leave to the children alone the obligation to support their parents. Their burden should be lightened in order that they may see to the education of their own children. At the same time, we must see to it that the aged are not deprived of purchasing power, which is important if we are to maintain stable economic conditions.

The hon. member who introduced the resolution has done the house a real service. We must improve our old age pension system and provide for those who find it necessary to take advantage of it, and we must have a pension scheme that will cover all those who are not already taken care of. But let us do it in a way consistent with the interests of the Canadian economy. I submit that by passing legislation which will put into effect the proposals made by the federal government to the provinces we may best attain our goal for the present.

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that you hear from this remote corner of the house, but occasionally, when I see the storm clouds gathering and mounting in the sky, I feel impelled to say a few words. In my solitude down here I have been giving particular study to various members of the house, one of whom is the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I have learned to respect the hon. member for Vancouver East and I realize that he is a great humanitarian. He is always looking out for the unfortunate individual and I have acquired an admiration for that hon. gentleman. To-day I must differ with him in certain respects, and I differ not so much in principle as in point of time and expediency. I know you will want me to explain that. Do not suppose that I am trying to use up the time of the house unnecessarily. Far from it; I do not often speak.

When I speak of time and expediency, I mean this. We all know that the dominion-provincial conference is due to resume on the 25th of this month. Proposals have been set forth by the dominion government and with those proposals we are all acquainted. I would not want to see the premiers of the different provinces embarrassed in any way, nor would I want to see the federal government in any more complicated position than it may be in at the present time when it comes to ironing out the differences that may exist.

I regard the dominion-provincial conference as one of the most important conferences we have ever had in Canada. We must recognize that there are certain powers which the provinces must have, and I for one have great faith in the premier of my province, the Hon. Angus L. Macdonald. Down there we all know that he will not accept any proposal from the dominion government unless he believes that it is for the good of his province, and I trust that all other hon. members have the same faith in their provincial premiers. I am sure that if they have as much faith in their premiers as I have in mine they will not do anything that will embarrass those gentlemen when they come here to discuss matters.

I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East that in time we should reduce the age from seventy, but I do not know when. That is something which will have to be discussed, and it should be discussed by the premiers as well as by the federal government. I agree with the hon. member, in principle, so far as that is concerned.

One thing I loathe and have always loathed is the means test. I do not like a means test or anything else that is likely to make any man appear undignified in his old age. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) expressed his views, with some slight differences, on the same matter on October 3, 1945, as reported at page 729 of Hansard:

> When the proposals were put before the provinces they received what I think anyone who was present would regard as a sympathetic reception. Certainly the provinces gave every assurance that the proposals would receive serious consideration, and we in this house can only take it to be the case that they are receiving serious consideration to-day.

I am sure that they are receiving consideration, because those premiers are all serious-minded men. I believe they are making an honest effort to come together with the dominion and to work out some sort of grand scheme which will have far-reaching effects, not only for us but for all our children and our children's children.

In what I am about to say I do not wish to be misunderstood. Sitting in this corner, I hear a lot of debate going on backwards and forwards. I find it interesting. I am particularly interested in the views I hear expressed regarding western Canada, because I do not know too much about that part of the country, but I am learning fast. From one side of the house we hear statements that we must lower the taxes. Then we hear that we must raise the allowances, raise payments and so on. The province of Nova Scotia, from which I come, is something like the highlands of Scotland where money is hard to come by and we value it highly there. I think the time is coming when we have to call a halt. We must make a reconnaissance and not move forward one yard until we have made a thorough survey of the entire situation. We must make that reconnaissance as quickly as we can. Then, when we have a solid foundation laid and plenty of support behind us, we should move ahead in the right direction. Our social legislation must be founded on rock bottom. If it is not, and we increase the old age pension now and lower the age limit, in time, if we do not balance our budget and occasionally have a surplus, we shall reach the stage when our children and our children's children want the old age pension and there will not be anything to pay them. We shall all agree in principle, but there will be no principal to pay them. That is a matter we must take into serious consideration.

I was so much interested in the debate last fall that I wanted to take part in it again to-day. May I quote again from page 729 of Hansard of October 3, 1945, so that people who read this debate will be able to refer readily to the previous debate. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said:

> . . . for old age pensions to be paid to all citizens on attaining the age of sixty years, at $50 a month without a means test. The estimate which the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has given me would indicate that in the year 1948, $50 a month to every person of sixty years of age and over would cost the federal government $850 million for that year alone. When I tell the house that the total amount raised by personal income tax for the year 1944-1945 is estimated to be $667 million hon. members will see something of the magnitude of the proposal put forward by the hon. member.
> In other words, the cost of this proposal would be more than the total personal income tax paid by the Canadian people during the last year. That has a definite bearing on our relations with the provinces.

I maintain that that has a definite bearing—

An hon. MEMBER: So what?

Mr. BAKER: An hon. member said, "So what." I cannot say, "So what" when it comes to large sums of money like that. People all over this country and the men and women in the armed services bought victory bonds. If we reach the stage where our dollar drops to the extent that it might, if we go ahead too rapidly—I mention victory bonds because that is something with which outside concerns have nothing to do; that is something we all own; the country belongs to us—the bonds will depreciate and it will hurt the people who need the money most. I agree in principle with much that the hon. member for Vancouver East has said. I know the hon. member for Vancouver East is a champion. What Angus was not a champion? There is Angus MacInnis; he is a champion for humanitarian causes and I grant him that. There is Angus Walters who was the skipper of the undefeated north Atlantic fishing schooner Bluenose. There is Angus L. Macdonald, who is Premier of Nova Scotia. He is another champion from my province. I want to give my champion a chance to come here to see what he can do, and work things out for my province. I shall give him my support and I am sure that many other hon. members will do the same.

I have not a great deal more to say on this subject because I am not trying to take up a lot of time. However, I believe the motion is premature at this time. I hope that some day in the future, and the sooner the better, we shall be able to have these things so arranged in Canada that the old and aged people will be able to pass through the twilight of their lives with dignity, comfort and security.

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): Since this debate started I have noticed that approximately one hundred Liberals have walked out, joined, I must say, by a great number on this side of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: What about your own group?

Mr. ASHBY: I said that they were joined by a number on this side of the house. Therefore I must come to one of two conclusions: either they are not interested in old age pensions, or they realize we have done nothing but talk. I think that is the correct answer; they realize that we are doing nothing but talk. That is true.

I have listened to the impressive figures, financial and otherwise, that have been given here this afternoon. The only figures that I am interested in are the figures of our old folk, and they have just about lost them. I visited an old folks' home, and I can assure the house that the old people I saw there had no figures left. The skin that was hanging over their bones looked to me just like a coat on an old senator. I wanted to aid some of these old people, but they did not want me to help them even to walk. The woman in charge of this particular place said: "Pat has come to see you." Immediately there was a scramble to get up to have a look at me. I saw one poor soul trying to come down the stairs. He had on a shabby dressing gown which looked like a thing that had been thrown out in the garbage months before, but he did not want any help. He was an independent fellow. His knees were about the size of the old gray mare's that I used to have, swollen up with arthritis, knocking together with a clatter that could be heard like the bones on the prairie in a windstorm.

I am not deaf and dumb, as apparently the Minister of Finance and this government are. I do have fairly good eyesight, and I can see the plight of these people. My hearing is not too bad. I can hear their groans. They have been in need for years. What are we going to do about it? Stand up and talk all day? What I want to see is a bill brought into the house so that we can vote on it. Who is holding it up? We brought in a bill in the latter part of the last session giving each hon. member a couple of thousand dollars tax free, and it went through like a house afire. Had it not been for the fact that the bill was held up by one or two members who wanted to get their names in the papers, it would have gone through in half the time. That is all there is to it: Bring on the bill; who is holding it up?

An hon. MEMBER: You are.

Mr. ASHBY: No, I am not holding it up. I will support a bill if you will give me an opportunity to vote on it.

When I listened to this talk about millions and millions—well, what about it? Did we talk about that when war was declared? No; we went ahead and produced abundantly, and gave it all away to the enemy. Well, surely to God we can provide our old folk with a few crackers and some thin soup.

I am not interested in methods; I am interested in results. However I must bring to the attention of the house this fact, that there are four methods of dealing with our old folk. There is the present method we are now using, that of starving them to death. I do not agree with this method. I suppose my disagreement is due to some weakness on my part, but it just makes my heart bleed to see these old folk slowly dying. When I have an old mare who has fulfilled her usefulness I sell her to the fox farms. I do not just tie her up somewhere and let her starve to death. And so I disagree completely with the present method.

Another fellow did have a better method, I believe; that was the gas chamber in Germany. That was Adolf's method. I think it would be far better to put our old-age folk in a gas chamber, because it does not take long to gas them to death, and we would not be bothered with them any more. If that were done we would not hear their cries, but of course I would object to that method, on more than one ground.

Then there is another method known as the guillotine. I would object to that too, because it is a terribly messy job. Besides, in these days one has to have a licence for everything. You have a licence for this and a licence for that and a licence for the other thing.

Folks are not keeping as many dogs as they used to have, so that we have not enough canine scavengers to clean up the mess. So I think the best answer is to let them live. Yes, I do. Just let them live as they want to live. So far as I can see when I walk through the city streets, there is plenty of food for sale in the stores. The storekeeper is always right behind the counter, ready to sell it. I can see no reason why these old folks should not be able to buy all the food they want.

I have asked them what they want, and they tell me they do not want very much. A great many of them have said to me, "You younger men"—and they look upon me as a younger man—"want a car, fine clothes, luxuries; you want far more than we do. But when one gets along in years, to sixty-five or seventy years of age, one does not want very much. We do not want to go gallivanting around the country as you do, in automobiles. No, we do not even care about going to the moving pictures. All we want is a street-car ticket once in awhile, so that we can go to the cemetery and have a look around at our last resting place."

I heard some hon. members talking about some contributory method by which in their younger days people would be able to contribute part of their savings to a fund for their old age. Well, have they not already contributed? I wonder how many thousands upon thousands of dollars they have contributed. I'll warrant some of them have paid in as much as $25,000 or $30,000 in taxes during their lifetime. And what about those taxes? Where did the money go? Did someone burn it up? It must be around somewhere. Where is all this money that was said to have been spent during the war? There were billions and billions of it; I should like to see where it is. They talk about money being scarce; what became of it? Did it go up in flames like the wood-pile across the river? What became of it?

When hon. members begin talking about a contributory system I feel like telling them to go and chase themselves. I could have brought down to the floor of this house dozens of resolutions I have received. My suggestion was $60 a month at fifty years; but no; our old folks are so generous that they do not want that. Certainly they are not greedy when they say, "No, we can get along on $50 a month at sixty years." I said to them, "Well, if you feel that $50 a month at sixty years is sufficient, it is perfectly all right with me."

If a bill were brought in here to-morrow which would enable our old folk to receive $50 a month at sixty years, without a means test, it would receive my support and the support of this house. It is none of our business what their means might be; that is their private concern. It is not my business to pry and spy into the affairs of my people. Just imagine me, a member of parliament, going along the street, stopping folk and asking them how much they have in their pockets, or to let me look at their bank books. Just imagine my going up to a lady, grabbing her bag from her arm, opening it, and looking inside of it. Of course I would not do that in these days, because women wear their finger nails so long. But I have not the right to pry and spy into the affairs of the people I represent. What reason have we collectively to employ civil servants and demand that they must know all about the private affairs of our people? Certainly that is not democracy; it is pure unadulterated nazism. It is the sign of dictatorship.

When we refer to $50 at the age of sixty, we must remember there are many whose wives have not yet reached sixty years, or sixty-five—whatever the age at which the pension is to be made payable—who are incapable of earning anything. The people, not members of parliament, have the right to decide at what age these pensions shall be payable. And if the people decide that the age of sixty is the one they want, then the wife of every old age pensioner should also receive a pension. I see no reason why she should not. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred she is incapable of earning anything, or of going out to work.

I must say that old ladies are sometimes tougher than men. Indeed I have seen some old ladies whose vitality puzzled me; I wondered how in the world they kept alive. Surely they must be made of better material than any other animals with which I have associated.

I do not think there is any use in talking any more. We have talked and talked about it. Dozens of resolutions have reached me —indeed, they have been coming in for years. And why not? I know it is useless for a private member to introduce a bill involving an expenditure of public money, but I am wondering why the government does not bring in such a bill. It would not take long to do it. Meantime these old folk are groaning in their old age and suffering poverty and want in this great country of abundance.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to finish in five minutes time. I do so in the first place because the hon. member who introduced the resolution was just as lucid and logical in his presentation as he usually is. He covered the ground admirably. Anything he may have missed was brought forward by the hon. member who followed him in the debate, and other points were brought out by my hon. friend across the way. So, much as I should like to talk on the subject, I shall refrain from doing so, and shall make only a brief plea to the house.

In the first place, I wish to emphasize that this is not a party question. My hon. friend opposite, perhaps facetiously, introduced a party spirit into the debate. He wanted us to think with the Liberals and to give them credit for having done certain things. I have no objection to giving the government credit for having done some things. I do not know of any government in the history of Canada, federal or provincial, that has not done some things worth while. I am looking forward to this government doing some more things that are worth while. I am not forgetting about that, but I should like to point out to my hon. friend that the thinking about this subject has been done already; it is the acting that we are interested in now.

In spite of the apparent futility of discussing private members' resolutions in this house I still have some faith that some good may come out of such discussion and out of this one in particular. I do not know of any other way by which private members can bring before this house what their people are thinking. I do not know of any means by which the government can more readily get to know what the people of the country are thinking about than to hear frank expressions on the floor of the house during private members' discussions about national matters of importance.

I suggest that we do not try to talk out this resolution, that we bring it to a vote as speedily as possible so as to get it through before six o'clock. I would also suggest that the whips be called off and that this matter be treated as being what it is, a private member's resolution which binds the government to no definite action but which has as its object telling the government what the private members think the country wants. It is then the government's business and duty to formulate a policy in accordance thereof to the best of their ability. If they cannot go all the way with us, we shall be prepared to consider whatever policy they may advance.

On the last occasion when this matter was before the house the minister suggested that we could not have reduced taxation and increased pensions at the same time. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker) suggests that it is time we called a halt, and he hit his desk to emphasize the importance of that halt. I think it is time the we said, "Quick march." We have been halting all the time. I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby), in one thing, although I did think he was going to gas the old people to death before he got through. I agree that it is not a matter of adding up figures and presenting huge sums. The first consideration of any government or of any economic system should be to provide the living needs of a living people. If this government cannot reduce taxes and at the same time provide for old age pensions, then it is not the right kind of government for this dominion and it will simply have to go.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman proposes an amendment to the present old age pensions legislation to reduce the eligible age to sixty years, to increase the amount of the pension in order to enable the recipients to live in health and self-respect, and to delete the income requirements. By the latter I suppose he means the means test. I propose to take only the same amount of time as the preceding speaker. I think the rules should be changed so that members would be allowed only ten minutes instead of forty minutes when speaking on private members' motions.

Prior to 1927, when the old age pensions legislation was first passed, these aged people were the responsibility of the municipalities. Cities had to take care of their aged and infirm in public institutions or by private and public charity. A city like the one I represent had to pay millions of dollars to establish and maintain these institutions. Many of these people were left to drift or care for themselves.

Our system in Canada has been a disgrace, and I shall refer to only two sections. When the legislation was first passed in 1927 the government reimbursed those provinces that participated in the scheme on the basis of fifty per cent. In 1931 this proportion was raised to seventy-five per cent, the increased contribution to start on November 1 of that year. Then by an order in council passed under authority of the War Measures Act the maximum amount of income allowed was increased from $240 to $300 a year. This legislation has been in operation in all the provinces and the northwest territories under the conditions set out.

The city of Toronto, in which there are so many industrial people, established a local board. However, that local board had no power; it simply passed on the applications to the provincial government. The number of Toronto residents who received pensions last year was 11,044, and the amount paid was $3,651,000. In 1944 the blind were brought under this legislation, and there were 252 blind persons in Toronto who received $83,000.

Long before 1927 the city of Toronto had established pension schemes in the police and fire departments, and the school board and other public departments under which pensions were paid at the age of sixty-five years. This scheme covered departments like the police department, the fire department, the school-teacher and others. The employees contributed from five to seven per cent. Further, $12 a week was paid by the city hall to all employees in various departments until recently.

The minister should reconsider a readjustment of the whole system. Last year an increase in pension was opposed for financial reasons, but I ask the minister to consider what happened in the old country ten years ago. They passed what is known as the determination of needs act. Under that legislation a poor person did not have to be a pauper in order to draw a pension. In 1940 the pensionable age for women was dropped from sixty-five to sixty years and some 3,000,000 women workers were able to secure these benefits. That country also inaugurated a supplementary pension scheme for the aged and widows in need.

Our system is nothing but a pauper system with its means test. It is well named. It is the meanest test that was ever applied in any civilized country. Then the government puts it up to the municipalities and the provinces to enforce this pauper rule. What was done in Great Britain in 1944 under the Churchill government? Legislation was passed to abolish the means test, and the same thing should be done in this country right now.

The determination of needs act, 1943, brought within the scope of the supplementary pensions scheme, widow pensioners under the age of sixty with children to support. As a result of regulations made in 1944, improvements were made in the method of calculating supplementary pensions, and the rates for women were made equal to those for men.

That is what should be done in Canada. We should abolish the means test and have a needs test. The physical fitness branch which has been established under the federal government should also be abolished immediately because it is useless. All the work it is doing is already being done by school boards throughout Canada and by local sporting organizations throughout the country. The money spent on this branch is absolutely wasted.

I wish to give one example of how the means test operates, and this is the meanest case I know of. It concerns the widow of what one might call the dean of the press in Canada. He died a few years ago and left a widow. I do not want to mention any names. She applied for the old age pension. She was 76 years of age, having been born in 1868, and was in poor health. She had resided in Canada since 1884, was a citizen of Toronto for twenty-five years, and was entitled to the old age pension. I quote from her letter to me:

> It came as an unpleasant surprise to be told by an investigator—
> They are all over our city.
> —that old age had nothing whatever to do with the payment "it does not matter whether you are are seventy or ninety, the pension is only for those persons who are in want."

I have only one son and he married in September, 1944. He and his wife were obliged to continue living with me in this upper duplex, 310 Wright avenue, where my husband and son and myself had lived for over five years.

It was a tentative arrangement as my son's wife naturally wanted an apartment all to herself. The acute housing situation has forced us to remain on here. The overhead expenses are too heavy for my son to carry so an arrangement was made that I would stay on and contribute towards household expenses and pay all my own personal needs without any assistance from my son, which I was able to do while I had the pension.

I do not want to be made feel that I am a pauper and have no rights as a free citizen.

That is what our old age pension scheme is—nothing but a pauper system—and it would be better to wipe it out altogether and place the onus on the municipalities and the provinces and private charity to administer, with federal aid, directly rather than this means system we have.

I know another old citizen in Toronto who owned a little bit of a house, and he got a measly pension of $28 a month and then died a few years later. The members of his family at that time were attending the university and they were asked to reimburse the government $265 which this pensioner had received over a period of a few years. The whole system should be changed. To-day we are spending one billion and a quarter dollars, and all on material needs and we have not a dollar to take these poor old people out of the poorhouse. It is a disgraceful system. The city of Toronto during the depression had to spend almost half a million dollars monthly on relief, all loaded on real estate, for the relief of those who were suffering in the depression between the two wars, and then on relief.

I ask the government and the minister in charge of old age pensions to consider the British statute and to abolish the means test and bring in a needs test, so that all people who need it will receive immediate assistance, without any deductions. It seems to me that the present system is operated on the principle of "to him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." There should be a reorganization of the whole old age pensions department, and a new agreement should be arrived at with the provinces at the dominion provincial conference next month. The amount of the pension should be increased, and there should be a needs test and not a means test applied to these aged people, and direct federal aid to many old age people's homes across Canada on a per diem basis.

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this resolution, although I am in sympathy with its principle, I do not consider it advisable that the house should adopt it at this time I realize that what I have to say will not add materially to the debate, but we have already heard a great many repetitions this afternoon and I should like to say a few words.

I consider that it would not be advisable to adopt this resolution at this time because certain proposals have been made with respect to the old age pension by the dominion government to the provinces, and we should not do anything now which might hinder the work of the conference.

My hon. friends opposite have been consistent in their demands for a more liberal old age pension, but they have not been consistent in the particulars of their demands. Since I came into this house less than one year ago I have heard a great many opinions expressed on this question of old age pensions. Some hon. members have asked that the old age pension be increased to $50 a month; others have suggested $60, payable at varying ages from 60 years upwards, and if my memory serves me aright, one hon. gentleman suggested a pension of $100 a month payable at the age of 40. If I am not mistaken, very different suggestions came from hon. gentlemen directly opposite to me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They were all sensible suggestions.

Mr MICHAUD: We all feel that our suggestions are sensible, the most sensible, so that I am not at all surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite consider that their suggestions are logical and consistent.

As to the C.C.F. group, their views have changed on this much debated question, because I recall that in the provincial election in New Brunswick in 1944—and that is not very long ago—their party advocated an old age pension of $50 a month payable at the age of 60, and I can say with assurance that that was the main plank of their platform in New Brunswick. But their appeal to the people of my province did not get very far because they did not succeed in electing a single member, which would seem to indicate that the people of New Brunswick are not in favour of that plan. In the last federal election that party retreated to some extent because they simply advocated an old age pension at 60 years of age without stipulating any amount. This is practically what they are asking for under the present resolution.

I do not question the sincerity of those supporting the resolution, but I suggest that it is much easier to advocate advanced social security measures while in opposition. On this point I cannot avoid referring to what happened in my province in 1930. In that year there was a provincial election. A Conservative government was seeking renewal of its mandate. During the last session, before going to the people they had enacted legislation providing for old age pensions and mothers' allowances, and an elaborate machinery had been set up to that effect and considerable information had been gathered apparently with a view of implementing that legislation. Even the opposition forces honestly believed that the government of the day was in earnest, that it meant business. Just to what extent this legislation affected the voting on that occasion is not easy to ascertain. The fact remains that the government of the day was returned, although with a decreased majority. For some reason better known to the members of that government the people of New Brunswick never got the benefit of this legislation, which was never proclaimed by the then government. It was not until the return of the Liberal government to power in 1935 that old age pensions came into operation in New Brunswick.

I mention these facts to point out that it is much easier to promise social security measures while sitting in opposition than it is to put them into operation after attaining power. For that reason I am wondering whether our good friends who sponsored this generous resolution could actually implement it if they were in power.

Mr. MacINNIS: Why not?

Mr. BURTON: You are afraid to give us the chance.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is up to the people to give you the chance, I should say.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is the hon. member aware of the legislation which has been passed by the Saskatchewan government in regard to health, medical and hospital services?

Mr. MICHAUD: We have heard different things from Saskatchewan.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I ask the hon. member if he is aware of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order .

Mr. MICHAUD: Well, during the last provincial election I read C.C.F. propaganda circulated in Nova Scotia giving details as to this wonderful programme of social reform. I am also aware of the fact that a former minister of the previous Saskatchewan government has issued a statement denying practically all that was said in that C.C.F. statement; and, not being in Saskatchewan, I am not in a position to tell who is wrong and who is right.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But is the hon. member aware of the facts?

Br. BURTON: He does not need to read only the Liberal papers.

Mr. MacINNIS: Better look up the statutes.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am prepared to give the government of Saskatchewan a chance, but let us see what we can do or should do in this house on this important question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well said.

Mr. MICHAUD: I come to another aspect of the problem, which is, what is the attitude of the old people to the present scale of pensions? In my profession and, shall I say, on account of my political activities for the past ten years, I have been in touch with a number of old people seeking to obtain a pension, or an increased pension, and I must say that I have always found them most reasonable. I have yet to meet a single pensioner who is dissatisfied with the amount which the law provides for him at the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Better be careful with that statement.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am careful with that statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are getting far too much if that is the case.

Mr. MICHAUD: A statement was made this afternoon by an hon. member as to the "humiliation" of filling up these forms. I have helped a number of people to fill up application forms for the old age pension and I have never noticed the feeling expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). Some difficulties have been mentioned by old people with respect to getting the pension. In certain instances they have complained about delays, and they have complained about certain other things; but I reiterate the statement I made a moment ago. Two years ago an additional $5 was granted. I think one hon. member said in the course of his remarks this afternoon that the Liberal government had not done anything for these people since the act came into operation. He must have forgotten for the time being that an increase of $5 a month was brought about two years ago. I can say that the people of my province, of my town and the vicinity were pleased when this came along, and if the present proposals go through and there is a further increase of $5 I am sure they will be pleased.

Mr. MacINNIS: But they are satisfied now. How can they be more pleased than that?

Mr. MICHAUD: I stated that I have yet to have one old pensioner come to me and say that he is dissatisfied with the amount he gets when he is receiving the full amount. Some have come making representations that they were not in receipt of the full amount and have asked me to intercede for them in order that they may get the full pension, but in most instances the full amount of the pension was granted, and they were highly pleased.

Mr. IRVINE: I wish the hon. member would write about all mine.

Mr. MICHAUD: As has been stated this afternoon, the old age pension was never meant to be a cure-all; it is in the nature of assistance, to meet the bare subsistence requirements of life. In my province, and I suppose in other provinces, there are institutions which take old people for the amount of their pension and look after them, and as far as I have been able to ascertain they have been well looked after. An old gentleman well known to me, who is a widower, went into one of these institutions. He managed so well that after five or six months he married an old lady living in the same institution, and they seem to be very happy.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is he raising a family?

Mr. MICHAUD: I dare say that if he does not it is not because the amount of the pension is insufficient.

On the point of reduction of the age requirement from seventy to sixty years, I consider that a desirable suggestion. A number of people, particularly those between the ages of sixty-five and seventy, people unable to engage in a gainful occupation, have come to me asking for the old age pension. This is also provided for in the proposals made by the federal government to the provinces; and we should not pass any resolution which might jeopardize the success of those proposals. As far as I can recall, people looking for the social security measure are people between sixty-five and seventy years of age who are suffering from some sort of disability, and for that reason I consider that legislation along the lines of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) would serve a very useful purpose.

With the third point of the resolution as to the means test I am heartily in agreement. It will certainly improve the situation. There are a number of old people who make transfers of property when they reach the age of, say sixty-five, with a view to being in a position to draw the full amount of the pension. This is undesirable and with the disappearance of the means tset there would be no reason for doing that. Moreover, the means test to a certain extent destroys the initiative for thrift and it should be done away with. There are many people even over the age of seventy years who keep on working. I know some. One in particular made application for his old age pension. He had his papers prepared and everything was set, but he would not take it. He kept on working. I daresay most of those between sixty and seventy years of age, if they are in good health, would rather keep on working.

An hon. MEMBER: If they can get jobs.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, if they can get suitable jobs.

An hon. MEMBER: Not much money in it.

Mr. MICHAUD: The usual good wages.

If the resolution is put to the vote I shall vote against it because I do not think it is advisable to pass upon it while the proposals are before the dominion-provincial conference, being somewhat in the position of a case before the courts, designated as sub judice.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There are still several hon. members who would like to speak on the motion, and I am obliged to them for letting me have the ten minutes remaining before the house rises at six o'clock to submit some facts that have a definite bearing not only on this resolution but on questions of social security in general.

As I believe hon. members will appreciate, the officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare have had under consideration types of social security legislation in every part of the world, and have been studying these matters ever since the department came into existence. Before that, social security legislation was studied by other branches of the government and in consequence the proposals made by the federal government to the dominion-provincial conference were worked out. They are proposals which we believe can be carried out by the Canadian people and which will work to their advantage. We also believe that the burden can be carried by the Canadian economy.

When we come to consider a single item of social security legislation we should take it in relation to the total picture to see what can be done and what it would cost. If the house would permit me I would put on Hansard costs of old age pensions of different types and different amounts at different ages. With the unanimous consent of the house I would like to put on Hansard estimates of costs of old age pensions, estimated for the years 1948, 1951, 1961 and 1971 on various plans. The plan proposed by the federal government to the provinces would provide for the payment of $30 a month without a means test to everyone at the age of seventy, and that it is estimated would cost $200,000,000 in 1948.

Mr. MacNICOL: To every person?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, over seventy. In addition, we propose to contribute on a fifty-fifty basis to the payment of old age pensions with means test to everyone from sixty-five to sixty-nine years of age, and the cost would be certainly not less than $34,000,000, and probably $40,000,000.

Mr. GREEN: For a $30 pension?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. The table is as follows:

ESTIMATES OF COSTS OF OLD AGE PENSIONS
1948, 1951, 1961, 1971

Amount per Month	Basis	Sex	Age	Percentage on means test	Total Cost in $ Millions

(a) Where means test operates, the amount per month used n calculations is the maximum, not the average pension, except in Basis A where March, 1945, averages are used in the calculation of cost.
(b) As noted on page 40 of the Dominion's Proposals, the figure of $34 million may reach $40 million.
SOURCE: Calculations based upon population data supplied by Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

There is no country in the world, of all those that have old age pension legislation, where there is a non-contributory system that is not on a means test. Either you have a contributory system of insurance and no means test, the people receiving the pension as of right, or else you have a non-contributory system on a means test. That is the invariable rule. In other words, there is no system in the world along the lines of that suggested, as I understand his proposal, by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

Further, there is no system of old age pensions in the world which provides for a pension of anything like $50 a month. The rates at the present time are these—

Mr. MacNICOL: Put that on Hansard too.

Mr. CLAXTON: This table is not in a form in which I can put it on Hansard. In Canada, under the means test, the rate proposed is $30 a month maximum; in the United Kingdom, they are putting into effect a plan which is going to come gradually into operation, by which twenty-six shillings a week or $5.77, or $300 a year will be paid as of right to those who contribute. This will be supplemented by a means test plan which has not, I believe, yet been announced by the present labour government. In Australia there is a means test plan only, under which there is a payment of 32 shillings and sixpence a week, or $5.77, or a total of $300 a year. In New Zealand the new plan for payment without a means test, which is just beginning—in 1945—and which is a modification of their previous plan—

Mr. MacINNIS: It is 1941.

Mr. CLAXTON: The 1945 plan is a modification of the one they have had there for a great number of years and it comes into effect by degrees. The annual benefit is today 22 pounds, 10 shillings or $79.88, working up to a maximum of two pounds a week, which is $8.88, or $369.20 a year, which will be achieved in 1978. That is supplemented by a means test plan payable to men and women at the age of sixty of two pounds a week, with a maximum of $369.20. They will have a combination of both plans until 1978, when they will have worked out, they hope, on a basis without the means test. People pay for this in New Zealand out of the security tax of 7½ per cent of the income payable by the employer and the employee—7½ per cent by each.

Mrs. STRUM: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have only a minute before six o'clock and I am afraid I cannot answer any questions at the moment. In the United States, they have a contributory plan, without a means test, under which payments and benefits are related to average wages and it covers three-fifths of the gainfully employed civilians. They also have a means test plan under which the average payment per month is $29.46.

The total picture presented by these plans is that the Canadian proposal put before the provinces is a fair and workable one in line with what is in effect in other countries. It has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that we might have proceeded before discussing it with the provinces. I ask him seriously if that is the policy of his party.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say that.

Mr. CLAXTON: I understood the hon. member to say that we should proceed at this session to put on the statute books legislation to provide for old age pensions along the lines he suggested. There is no more certain way of retarding progress than to proceed by any means other than constitutional process and by consultation with the provinces, as we propose to do when we meet on April 25 to continue our discussions.

One further word. We can have old age pensions of this size, but we can meet the cost only out of taxes or out of borrowings or out of printed money.

Mr. MacINNIS: Or out of production.

Mr. CLAXTON: There are only three ways, and if the people of Canada want to pay taxes on the scale required, or to contribute to loans or to see their money go to pot through inflation, then I think they should arrive at that decision after they really size up the facts.

The budget estimate of the total revenue to be obtained by the federal government from income tax in 1945-1946 is $680 million.

An hon. MEMBER: On individuals.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. Hon. members can see something of the magnitude of the proposal to pay an old age pension of $50 at age sixty without a means test, which we estimate would cost $851 millions or more than the total sum raised by personal income tax. When this matter comes up again at this session I should like to continue these remarks and develop the general ideas behind the federal government's proposals, the reasons why we have chosen this figure of $30 payable at age seventy, and also the reasons for the particular type of contributory plan that we have in mind. I believe that when that is done hon. members, as well as the country, will appreciate that the steps we propose are the most constructive, the most reasonable and the effective way in which to do what we all have at heart, namely to secure more to benefit those people who need it.

There is another table I should like to place on Hansard. This is a table showing the proportion of gainfully employed and non-gainfully employed in 1941 as fixed at the census of that year. From that it will be seen that in the age group from sixty to sixty-four, only fifteen per cent of the males in the population were not gainfully employed. From sixty-five to sixty nine, 31 per cent, and seventy and over, 69 per cent. In other words, if you extended the non-means test plan down to the age of sixty you would be paying money to a large group of people who were gainfully employed. The table is a follows:

Age Group	Gainfully Occupied	Others	Total
		(Males)
60-64	186,033 (85%)	32,524 (15%)	218,557 (100%)
65-69	112,627 (69%)	49,890 (31%)	162,517 (100%)
70 and over	71,716 (31%)	156,676 (69%)	228,392 (100%)
Total	370,376 (61%)	239,090 (39%)	609,466 (100%)
		(Females)
60-64	19,215 (10%)	169,379 (90%)	188,594 (100%)
65-69	12,268 (8%)	132,939 (92%)	145,207 (100%)
70 and over	8,477 (4%)	223,222 (96%)	231,699 (100%)
Total	39,960 (7%)	525,540 (93%)	565,500 (100%)

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister a later year than 1941?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, it is based on the census of 1941 and there are no later figures.

On motion of Mr. Claxton the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 11, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

PENITENTIARIES

CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF ACT EFFECTIVE BY PROCLAMATION—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I inform the house that by proclamation issued on April 5 and published in an extra of the official gazette of that date certain portions of the Penitentiary Act which were to come into force by proclamation, have been brought into force. These are subsection 6 of section 4; section 4A and part of subsection 2 of section 13, which relate to commissioners. Immediately thereafter order in council P.C. 1313 was passed appointing Major-General Ralph B. Gibson, of the city of Toronto, former vice chief of staff of the Canadian army, a commissioner under the act. I now table a copy of the order in council.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has Major-General Gibson had any special training or experience in penology?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No particular training in penology, but considerable experience in administration and the handling of men. After careful consideration we came to the conclusion that he had the qualifications which would fit him for this particular commission.

CRIMINAL CODE

FATAL ACCIDENTS AND INJURIES FROM HIGHWAY TRAFFIC AND LEVEL CROSSINGS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 27 to amend the criminal code (motor cars).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The object of the bill is to call the attention of the people of Canada to the number of fatal accidents which are occurring in increasing numbers in this country. A return to an order of the house of April 3 shows that there were 149,000 accidents, and nearly 10,000 people were killed during the period covered by the return. This rate of motor car accidents on the highways is becoming a public scandal. The sections of the bill are modern and constructive in character and I hope the Minister of Justice

(Mr. St. Laurent) will consider them when he is bringing in amendments to the criminal code. I shall not read the sections, but will refer only to the marginal notes.

The first section deals with the requirement that the driver of a car shall stop after an accident. Some children were killed in the riding of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) down near the beach by a cowardly hit-and-run driver. These hit-and-run drivers are a menace all over the country. The bill provides for imprisonment for a term not less than six months without the option of a fine.

Section 2 deals with driving while under the influence of alcohol or a narcotic. The object of this section is to add the words "under the influence of alcohol" to the section as it now stands. The next section deals also with hit-and-run drivers and provides for an increase in the penalties now imposed.

Section 5 brings the hit-and-run driver under subsection 7, and provides that an order may be made prohibiting the convicted person from driving a motor vehicle for any period not exceeding three years. The next clause deals with the causing of a death in a culpably negligent manner. This incorporates the law now in force in New York state. The amendment penalizes the driver where death results, if the driver is breaking by-laws—against speeding for instance—and where he may be thirty per cent the cause of the accident.

The next section deals with the trial of a female person. It seems only fair that in the trial of any female person by a jury a certain proportion of the jurors should be female persons. They voted 52 per cent in the elections as against a male total vote of only 48 per cent.

The marginal note for the next section reads:

Charge of manslaughter arising out of operation of motor vehicle, criminal or culpable negligence proved.

The purpose of the amendment is to define the powers of the jury in cases of manslaughter arising out of the operation of motor vehicles.

The final section defines the powers and functions of the judge and the jury by the judge. There have been instances in which cases have been taken away from the jury. Questions of law should be matters for the judge to decide, and questions of fact should be decided by the jury. The jury should decide on the evidence whether a person is guilty or not guilty.

I hope the Minister of Justice will consider these amendments to the criminal code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR ASSETS—MOTOR VEHICLES

Mr. WEBB:

1. How many (a) jeeps; (b) station wagons; (c) automobiles; (d) trucks, are held for sale by the War Assets Corporation?
2. Are priorities required to purchase these vehicles?
3. If so, to whom are they issued?
4. If not, what is the proper procedure to buy one?
5. What are the names of individuals or municipalities in the county of Leeds who have purchased vehicles or materials of any kind from War Assets Corporation?
6. Is there a local office of War Assets Corporation in Leeds county?
7. If so, where is it located?

Mr. McILRAITH: Question No. 25, standing in the name of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Charlton), asks for very similar information. I would draw the attention of the house to the fact that on Monday, April 1, a question was asked by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) and passed as an order for return. That question asked for detailed information about automobiles, trucks and so on, in the possession of War Assets Corporation and held for disposal. The order for return already passed seems to cover the information asked for by paragraph No. 1 of this question and by the later question in the name of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Charlton). I would ask that paragraph 1 of this question be dropped, that the remainder of the question be allowed to stand, and that question No. 25 be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

(On the question of Mr. Charlton, immediately following:)

Mr. STIRLING: May I draw attention to the fact that Your Honour called "answered" to the rest of the question of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Webb). I think the rest of that question should stand. This is the matter referred to by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction on the question of the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Mr. CHARLTON:

1. How many (1) passenger motor cars; (2) station wagons; (3) sedan delivery trucks, owned by the Department of National Defence (a) army; (b) navy; (c) air force; (i) have been declared surplus; (ii) are held for disposal by War Assets Corporation; (iii) have been disposed of by War Assets Corporation?
2. To whom were such vehicles sold and at what price?
3. Were any sold to government departments?
4. If so, to what departments and how many to each?

Mr. McILRAITH: Dropped.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is certain information asked for in this question that was not answered, nor did it come within the ambit of the order for return referred to by the parliamentary assistant. The portion that is not covered by the order for return is that which has to do with the number of the various types of vehicles owned by the Department of National Defence, army, navy and air force, that have been declared surplus.

Mr. McILRAITH: I might elaborate on my previous remarks. When the hon. member has had an opportunity of looking at the order for return, which I expect will be filed in a day or two, together with the evidence given before the war expenditures committee, to be found at pages 45 and 68 of the proceedings, if he still feels that there is further information which has not been provided, the matter can then be brought forward again.

Question stands.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—MR. FINDLATER

Mr. JOHNSTON:

1. Has a Mr. Findlater been appointed to a position under the Department of Veterans Affairs? If so, when and to what position?
2. Who recommended this appointment?
3. What salary does he receive?
4. What moneys did he receive for expenses since his appointment?
5. What qualifications does he possess for this position?
6. Has he made any personal inspections of the veterans" houses constructed or under construction in the city of Calgary?
7. If so, how many and on what dates?
8. Did he make any recommendations to the Department of Veterans Affairs regarding these houses?
9. If so, what were such recommendations?
10. Were these recomendations put into force? If so, when?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Mr. A. Findlater, regional supervisor at Calgary was appointed to a position of field supervisor, 26th November, 1925.

2. District superintendent of soldier settlement, Calgary.

3. $2880 plus war duties supplement of $240 per annum.

4. Information not readily available as period of employment excedes 20 years. Actual expenses paid under travelling regulations.

5. Mr. Findlater was a successful soldier settler at time of appointment, and had 14½ years' farming experience in Alberta. His satisfactory service as field supervisor, and later as chief field supervisor, led to his appointment as regional supervisor, at Calgary, under the Veterans' Land Act.

6 and 7. It is not the responsibility of the regional supervisor to carry out building inspections. For this work two qualified building inspectors are employed and are on the job continuously. One of these inspectors had 18 years experience as carpenter and carpenter foreman, and the other 25 years experience in the same line of work of which he was in business for himself for 20 years. The building inspectors report to the district construction supervisor, Edmonton.

8, 9 and 10. The condition of flooring and millwork was reported to the district construction supervisor, who, with the contractor, made a careful inspection of all houses under construction. The scarcity of lumber, particularly for wood finishes, was so great that it was necessary to decide if the work should stop, or be proceeded with, using the best materials available. In view of the housing emergency facing veterans the latter course was followed. Contractor has had instructions since last January to replace any faulty material as satisfactory material becomes available.

DEPENDENTS OF SERVICE PERSONNEL ABOVE WARRANT OFFICER CLASS 1

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. Has the dependents' board of trustees provided supplementary grants or special assistance to any dependents of armed services persons holding a rank above that of warrant officer class 1?

2. If so, to whom?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

STEEL PLATE AND BAR STEEL

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Is steel plate or bar steel being exported from Canada to the United Kingdom?

2. Has there been a recent curtailment of steel plate to shipbuilders located in Nova Scotia?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No.

2. Yes. This, however, is not confined to the province of Nova Scotia. Because Canadian shipyards have accepted orders for shipbuilding in excess of capacity of Canadian mills and the recent steel strike in the United States has made it impossible to import sufficient additional quantities from that country, it has been necessary to allocate on an equitable basis the available Canadian supply which has resulted in curtailed shipments to some yards.

ESTON, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. JAENICKE:

What has been the revenue of the post office in Eston, Saskatchewan in each of the years, 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945?

Mr. MacKINNON:

Year	Revenue
1938	$4,087 42
1939	4,511 66
1940	5,113 25
1941	5,555 09
1942	6,148 83
1943	6,558 23
1944	7,816 16
1945	8,166 30

ESTABLISHMENT OF EMBASSY AT THE VATICAN

Mr. LaCROIX:

Has the government received any requests for the establishment of an embassy at the Vatican?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Representations as to the desirability of establishing such a diplomatic mission have been made from time to time by individuals but not officially.

DOMINION BORROWINGS

Mr. QUELCH:

1. What was the total amount of money borrowed by the dominion government in each of the years from 1939 to 1945 inclusive from (a) the chartered banks; (b) the Bank of Canada; (c) the public?

2. How much of the money borrowed from the public represented savings and how much bank credit?

3. How much money was repaid by the dominion government in each of the years from 1935 to 1945 inclusive in classes (a) (b) and (c)?

4. What was the gross national debt as at March 31, 1946?

5. How much of this debt is owed to (a) individuals; (b) corporations (other than banks); (c) the chartered banks; (d) Bank of Canada?

6. How much of this debt is payable in (a) Canadian funds; (b) funds of other nations, giving names and amounts thereof?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Details of Dominion of Canada loan flotations for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1939 to March 31, 1945, inclusive, will be found on pages LIV to LVII of the introduction to the public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945.

2. The wording of this question is not clear. If the question means how much was borrowed from the chartered banks to finance the purchase of Victory loan bonds, the answer is that approximately all of such loans made in the period 1939-45 have been liquidated.

3. Details of Dominion of Canada domestic bond redemptions for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1939 to March 31, 1945, inclusive, will be found on pages LVIII and LIX of the introduction to the public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945. No information is available as to the distribution of holdings of maturing issues.

4. The figures for total liabilities of Canada as at March 31, 1946, are not yet available. At March 31, 1945, total liabilities were $15,712,181,527.26.

5. (a) No information.

(b) No information.

(c) No information. The monthly return of liabilities and assets of the chartered banks of Canada shows dominion direct and guaranteed securities held by each bank. The amount of such securities held on March 31, 1945, was $2,916,559,650.

5. (d) No information. The monthly return of liabilities and assets of the Bank of Canada shows dominion and provincial direct and guaranteed securities held by the Bank of Canada. The amount of such securities held on March 31, 1945, was $1,535,247,139.65.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

6. Of the total liabilities of Canada, $13,983,763,574.91 is in the form of unmatured funded debt. On March 31, 1945, the unmatured funded debt was payable as follows:

In Canadian dollars ..	$13,638,698,042 05
In pounds sterling	12,065,532 86
In United States dollars	333,000,000 00

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "SATURDAY NIGHT"

On the orders of the day.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, on March 30 last a Toronto Weekly, Saturday Night, complained about the member for Temiscouata having called some professors seditious. The editors of that paper, who belong to the petrified brain-trust of desiccated bachelors and spinsters that form the Civil Liberties League of Toronto, have complained that I was guilty of contempt of court for recalling certain events of ten or twelve years ago in what I then said in the house. Ten or twelve years ago is quite a distance in the past, and I have had to check my notes. I find that King Gordon was on the F.B.I. list of J. Edgar Hoover when Mr. Bennett was prime minister, and here the paper says—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. gentleman to be as brief as possible in raising his question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, it is a question of privilege. That sheet has said in the first place that I was guilty of contempt of court, which is an offence, for having made the statement in the House of Commons; and it said further that I would be afraid to repeat it outside of the house where I had not the protection enjoyed by a member of parliament when speaking in the house. I shall speak outside of the house on April 13 in eastern Ontario. I shall be ready to repeat then what I have said, if they are not satisfied, and I will prove it too.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF PRICE INCREASE TO DAIRY BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): I would ask either the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Finance whether the wartime prices and trade board is giving consideration to an extension to dairy butter of the four cents per pound increase in the price ceiling on creamery butter, and if so when we may expect a decision.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, consideration is being given to such an extension. I do not know when a decision will be arrived at, but I expect soon.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF CONTRIBUTORY SAVINGS PORTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, arising out of numerous inquiries that I am receiving from persons at present unemployed who still have a substantial portion of their 1945 income tax to meet at the end of April. Will the government consider applying the savings portion of their tax to liquidate what is owing at the end of April on the 1945 income tax?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. The matter has been given the serious consideration of the government. It is not the policy of the government to allow application of the savings portion of the income tax to liquidate the balance of the 1945 payments. This is done on the ground that it would be discriminating in favour of one class of people.

Mr. GILLIS: The unemployed without an income can surely not be expected to meet their payments at the end of April. That would not be discrimination; I think it would be in the best interests of the government.

REPEATER CRIMINALS

RESOLUTION OF THE CHIEF CONSTABLES' ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. At the fortieth annual conference of the Chief Constables' Association of Canada, it was resolved:

> That, in the opinion of the conference, there is a definite need for a policy to be formulated by the government of Canada in respect to the serious problem of the repeater criminal, whose activities are so largely responsible for crime in the dominion.

I understand that this resolution was presented to the Minister of Justice by a delegation of this association on November 7, 1945. Will the Minister of Justice kindly indicate to the house if the government is giving consideration to this resolution and, if so, what steps are being taken in the matter?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): My understanding of the resolution was that it contained no suggestion; it wanted a result to be achieved. The matter is one which it is my intention to ask the new commissioner of penitentiaries to investigate and report upon.

CANADIAN NAVY

FURTHER STATEMENT RESPECTING LIEUTENANT FRANK B. LEE

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the Minister of National Defence if the answer he gave to me yesterday, Hansard, page 730, while it may have been technically correct, is actually in accordance with the facts, and if any intimation was given Mr. Lee that his racial origin would prevent his application from receiving consideration?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to elaborate on the answer I gave yesterday; perhaps it was too brief. I can best do so by reading a copy of a letter which I addressed to Mr. Lee:

Ottawa, April 10, 1946.

Frank B. Lee, Esq.,
c/o Queen's University,
Kingston, Ontario

Dear Mr. Lee:

Your letter dated March 27, addressed to the Prime Minister, has been sent to me for reply.

The regulations concerning entry into the Royal Canadian Navy permit the entry of any British subject provided he fulfils the requirements prescribed from time to time as to age, education, physical fitness, character and technical knowledge for entry into the branch or component selected. All such applications must be made to Naval Service Headquarters at Ottawa and passed on here. In connection with the examination of applications, a selection board has been created, of which Captain J. M. Grant is the president.

I have made inquiries concerning the matters dealt with in your letter of March 27 and am informed that on that date the selection board interviewed candidates from Queen's University at H.M.C.S. Cataraqui. I understand that you had made no previous application for an interview by the board and did not appear for such an interview until the board was preparing to leave H.M.C.S. Cataraqui to catch a Toronto train and that you then approached Captain Grant as the latter was actually leaving the establishment to enter a motor car and asked him if there was any possibility of your application for entry into the electrical branch being considered.

It appeared to Captain Grant that you were somewhat older than the average candidate, and he reports that he advised you that it was doubtful whether your application would be considered and that in any case there was then no time for an interview. You then asked if your racial origin would be a cause for rejection and Captain Grant informs me he replied that it might be but that, in any event, final approval or rejection of a candidate is made by Naval Service Headquarters.

It is perhaps unnecessary for me to say that in voicing the view that your racial origin might be a cause for rejection Captain Grant was merely expressing his own personal opinion and in no way reflecting the policy of the Department. He was quite correct in stating that applications must be made to Naval Service Headquarters and that the final approval or rejection of any candidate must be made here.

If you desire to make application to the Naval Secretary, Naval Service Headquarters, Ottawa, for entry into the Royal Canadian Navy, I wish personally to assure you that your application will receive every consideration.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) D. C. Abbott.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

TRAIN TRAVEL

INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF FURTHER RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport what restrictions on train travel and sleeping car service have recently been lifted on Canadian railroads, and when further improvements will be made in this respect?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I have not yet been able to obtain a report from the transport controller on this matter, and I have to draw upon my memory. So far as I remember there are but three orders left under the jurisdiction of the transport controller, and none of them has to do with restrictions on train travel and sleeping car service. Some time ago I announced that restrictions on reduced rates for week-end travel for parties of ten or more, and covering dominion and provincial public holidays, would be lifted, and that has been done, effective as of March 15.

WAR CRIMES

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE IN TRIALS AT HONG KONG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): I have a question to address to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he tell the house whether a Canadian representative has been appointed for the trials of Japanese war criminals at Hong Kong which are now proceeding, and can he say when that representative will be dispatched?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend did not give me notice of his question. I will take this as notice, and have it replied to to-morrow.

GASOLINE

INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF WAR TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I have a question to ask the Minister of Finance. For the purpose of encouraging increased production of much-needed food supplies, has the government taken action to remove the three cent war tax on gasoline, and the recently-imposed two cent tax on motor fuels?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is in the negative, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. FAIR: Then my subsequent question is, why is this action not taken?

Mr. ILSLEY: That question is out of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE ON RESOLUTION PRECEDING MONEY BILL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As announced last night, the first order for to-day is the consideration of the resolution respecting the loan to the United Kingdom. Before the item is called I feel that I should like to say a few words to hon. members about the procedure in debate on a resolution preceding a money bill. My reason for doing so is that the house having departed from its rules on some occasions during the last few years, the debates have been much longer than they otherwise would have been, and the public business has been delayed as a result. What I wish to say is that the rule is that a resolution must precede a money bill, but the resolution is intended merely as a notice to the house that a money bill is about to be introduced. It is not intended that the notice should be debatable; rather, the correct practice is that the resolution should be allowed to pass, the house go into committee and that, in committee, a statement be made on essential features of the bill which is later to be introduced, this to be followed if so desired by some brief discussion. It is not intended that a lengthy discussion should take place at that stage. The discussion on the bill should come after the bill itself is introduced.

I have spoken of this in previous sessions; if I recall aright, in 1943, when I think the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) who was then leading the opposition, agreed with me, at least in part, that it was desirable that discussion at the resolution stage should not be prolonged unduly: In 1944 I again drew the attention of the house to the position of a resolution preceding the introduction of a money bill. I again pointed out what I have said a moment or two ago. In that year, if I am not mistaken, the leader of the C.C.F. party expressed agreement with that view. Last year I was absent from the country at the time the resolution on the appropriation bill was before the house and I did not, therefore, speak of this particular aspect at the time, but I did notice that, by not following the rules, a very long debate took place in committee on the resolution. In fact, this is what also occurred on the war appropriations bills in the other years I have referred to, with the result that, after weeks of discussion in committee on the resolution, the bill was introduced, and then the bill itself—I have forgotten whether this was the case last year or not, but I know it was the case in some years—went through with practically no discussion at all, but with some comment in the press thereafter that it seemed unwise for the house to be voting millions of dollars with little or no discussion on the second reading of the bill.

One of two things is certain to follow if we do not observe the rule; either the discussion which takes place on the resolution, and which may run along for days, may be repeated at great length in the debate on the bill, or, as I have just indicated, there will be a lengthy discussion on the resolution and then the house will take the view that, as the matter has already been discussed at length the bill itself should be allowed to go through with little or no discussion and, as a consequence thereof with some misunderstanding thereafter on the part of the public.

This morning, in order that I might give the house an official word, I took up this matter with the Clerk. I have from him a statement which I shall read as authoritative in the matter. It is as follows:

> The motion for referring money resolutions to the committee of the whole is similar to the first reading of a bill which is not debatable under our standing order 71. The object of the resolution recommended by the crown is to give the house a first opportunity to decide if there is a prima facie case for introduction of a bill. The details of the projected measure are not then disclosed and the resolution is necessarily short although care is always taken that the terms used are sufficiently wide to cover the whole of the bill which will be subsequently introduced.
> This house confirmed on June 1, 1936, the Speaker's decision to the effect that the fundamental terms of the resolution submitted to the house with the governor general's recommendation cannot be amended. In the United Kingdom parliament, where the standing order governing the case is the same as ours, no motion is made for the Speaker to leave the Chair when the order is called. May says, page 506:
> > "If a resolution appears on the notice paper to be considered in committee of the whole house under this standing order, and a minister of the crown signifies the royal recommendation, the Speaker leaves the Chair forthwith and the house resloves itself into committee."

As hon. members know, the Clerk has been a long time in the house and has followed its proceedings closely. Moreover he is an authority on the rules. He adds this paragraph:

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden led political parties in this house either on the treasury benches or in opposition they always took a firm stand against the discussion of a money resolution when the Speaker was in the chair. Their contention was that the motion was formal, and was only made because there was no other way for the house to go into committee of the whole.

As hon. members are aware, a committee of the house is considering the rules, and considering them with a view to making the proceedings somewhat less lengthy than they have been at times. I should think the best way to further the object we had in appointing that committee is to abide by such rules as we have already, and make such further amendments to them as may be necessary.

I am only explaining the situation to the house: I am sure what I have suggested is the correct practice, and that, if followed, it will preserve all that the house may wish to preserve of the rights of members and will help materially to expedite its business.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: there are two things to consider. There is the motion that you put for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole, and there is the discussion of the resolution in the committee. If we do not discuss the motion when the chair puts it to the house, there is nothing in our rules which prevents a member from discussing the matter when the chairman of the committee of the whole is in the chair. These are two entirely different matters. The leader of the house knows that very well. But I just bring to the attention of hon. members the necessary distinction between both discussions—the debate before Mr. Speaker, before the full house; and the discussion when the chairman or the deputy speaker is in the chair in committee of the whole.

LOAN TO UNITED KINGDOM

APPROVAL OF FINANCIAL AGREEMENT SIGNED MARCH 6, 1946

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to come into force in whole or in part on proclamation for the purpose of approving the financial agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom signed on March 6, 1946, and of granting authority, (a) to advance to the government of the United Kingdom before December 31, 1951, amounts not exceeding in the aggregate one thousand two hundred and fifty million dollars ($1,250,000,000); (b) to continue until January 1, 1951, the interest-free provision of the loan to the government of the United Kingdom under The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942; (c) to cancel the amount owing by the government of the United Kingdom to the government of Canada with respect to the British Commonwealth air training plan being the sum of four hundred and twenty-five million dollars ($425,000,000); (d) to borrow for the purpose of paragraph (a) under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, sums not exceeding one thousand two hundred and fifty million dollars ($1,250,000,000); and (e) to carry out the other provisions of the said agreement.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Despite the speech which we have just heard from the Prime Minister, I am quite sure that at least the Minister of Finance, who is charged with piloting this resolution through the house, will undoubtedly be expected to make out the prima facie case of which the Prime Minister spoke. I suggest that this is the time for him to do so, in case there are others who desire to speak before Mr. Speaker leaves the chair.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps the house will allow me to make a brief reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Peel. The prima facie case appears in the notice itself. I am simply interpreting the rules. If I have given the wrong interpretation, I am prepared to stand corrected; but what I say to my hon. friend is this. If the Minister of Finance now makes his statement at length, while the Speaker is in the chair, in all probability he will be followed by several others before the house goes into committee and before we get down to the resolution stage of the discussion. When the bill itself is before the house, hon. members will be in a position to debate it on second reading and to discuss its details in committee of the whole. We may follow one of two courses. We may proceed in the manner suggested by my hon. friend, and have a debate on the resolution while the Speaker is in the chair, and then a lengthy discussion in committee on the resolution; then when we come to the bill the house will have debated the whole question and the bill will probably pass in a very short time. Or when we come to the second reading of the bill, if there is a desire on the part of some in the house to block the measure, there will probably be endless repetition of what has taken place on the resolution while the Speaker was in the chair.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the Prime Minister really interpreting a rule, or is he telling us what was the custom prior to the war? So far as his statement goes, I think it is quite sound that we should avoid two or three discussions on the same matter. But I should like to know whether we have a rule, or whether what the Prime Minister is suggesting is that we follow a custom which was in vogue before the war. I can find no rule, I may say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's observations suggest precisely the reason I had for conferring with the Clerk of the House, who is an authority on the rules, and asking for a written opinion from him before speaking again on this in the house. I have read the Clerk's opinion to the house. I could not put my hand on a particular rule, but there is a rule in the sense that it is a practice which the house has followed, and which authorities on procedure set forth. The other method of proceeding has been a departure from the correct practice.

Mr. POULIOT: If there is no rule, there cannot be an authority. He could not be an authority on nil.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I presume it will be appropriate for me to make a full explanation of this resolution, even though we are in committee.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before the minister proceeds, may I ask him a question? I do not know whether we fully understand what the Prime Minister had in view in his statement a few moments ago. The Minister of Finance is now proposing to make a full statement on the measure. That, I agree, is quite proper and necessary, but I trust that if the minister is allowed to make a full statement there will be no desire on the part of the government that others shall be denied an opportunity to make full statements also.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In committee there is opportunity for full discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand it, there can be the fullest discussion in committee; indeed the committee is the proper place for a discussion of details of a measure such as this. In order to introduce the discussion and the details it will be necessary for me to say something about the agreement itself and the principles underlying it, together with the reasons for it.

The financial agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom, signed on March 6th, was made public immediately after its signature and was made available to the members of the house in printed form at the beginning of the session. In moving this resolution, I wish to explain as briefly as I can the essential purpose of the agreement as a whole and its various provisions.

This agreement is the keystone in the financial measures and arrangements made by this country for international trade and reconstruction.

The need for a credit of this magnitude and on these terms springs not only from the effects of the war upon Britain, but also from the vital importance to Canada of the re-establishment, expansion and continued development of foreign trade. As compared with others, Canadians enjoy a high standard of living. We look forward to a higher standard. We are making our plans to achieve that higher standard, but our country is so specialized in its resources and its development that it can provide high standards of living only by trade and exchange. Cut off from trade or faced with a severe loss of markets abroad, we could not maintain even our present standards, despite whatever success we might have in securing full employment. Given access to expanding foreign markets and to imports of things we require, we can make our own employment effective in yielding us living standards far beyond any that the average Canadian enjoyed before the war. Exporting the products of our farms, forests, mines and factories, utilizing cheap hydro power, Canadians can earn a living second only to that enjoyed by our neighbours in the United States. Denied the opportunity of exporting and importing on a large scale, however, we would become increasingly conscious that we are a small, northern country, lacking many of the resources and advantages which are necessary if a country is to live well within itself.

In normal times our employment, as well as our living standards, depends upon trade. When our export markets are depressed, Canadians are thrown out of work. Without a revival in exports, work can be found for them only on less productive jobs than those in the export trades. Our farmers and our other primary producers are vitally dependent upon foreign markets. The prices they receive and the amount which they can sell must, over the long run, be determined mainly by the markets outside of Canada for our wheat, our bacon, our cheese, our apples, our fish, our lumber and our metals. In the short run we can give some protection to our farmers and our fishermen by floor prices and other such artificial devices; over the long run, however, nothing can protect their real interests against a loss of markets abroad.

Our financial strength, as well as our economic prosperity, now requires high levels of national income, and therefore of foreign trade, to maintain the level of Government revenues that are required if the Government is going to meet all the commitments which have been undertaken, both as a result of the war and as a result of the changing views of the Canadian public on the responsibilities that any government should assume in conditions of to-day. If we are to be successful in our public finance, we cannot afford to be hesitant and half-hearted in promoting the foreign trade which is the basis of our prosperity.

Our interest is not simply in finding some place to put our surpluses; we must receive payment for our exports that can be used in discharging our own debts and in purchasing the imports which we require, and which we want for our higher standard of living. To accomplish this purpose we must be able to use the proceeds of our exports to the United Kingdom and the continent of Europe in paying our own bills and debts in the United States and in making purchases wherever we can best obtain the goods we need. We have a special interest in being able to use the currency that we receive for our exports, to obtain other currencies that we need for the payments we must make.

Already the government, with the support of parliament, has undertaken many measures to restore, expand and develop Canada's trade. The principal one to which I shall refer at present is our programme of export credits, which is serving to finance a large part of our current exports. In the last session of parliament, on December 3, I made a detailed statement on our policies and operations in this field, and I shall not repeat here the substance of what I said at that time. As the leader of the opposition and others have asked me to review our foreign lending operations at this time, however, I wish to give the house a brief summary of the position up to the present.

Under part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act, as amended at the last session of parliament, our total authority for making direct loans to other governments is $750 million and our authority for giving guarantees is $200 million—and by that I mean I think it is two or three million dollars, or something like that—and no guarantees have been given since my review in December. Against our $750 million authority for direct loans we have now entered into agreements to lend $502,500,000. including the agreement with the government of France which was signed this week, and we have undertaken to lend additional amounts of $142,000,000 to those with whom we have already made agreements. This makes our total commitment $644,500,000 at present. Of this an amount of $67,412,051 had actually been advanced up to March 31.

The amounts and terms of the individual loans can most conveniently be given in a short table, which, with the permission of the house, I will place on Hansard at this point:

Credits Under Part II of The Export Credits Insurance Act

Country	Amount of Credit	Time of Repayment	Interest Rate	Amount Used by March 31/46
Belgium	$ 25,000,000[1]	1947-1976	3%	$25,000,000
China	60,000,000	1948-1977	3%	nil
Czechoslovakia	19,000,000	1950-1954	2½%	3,191,551
France	242,500,000	1947-1976	3%	nil
Netherlands	125,000,000	1950-1976	3·05%	25,150,000
Netherlands East Indies	15,000,000[2]	1950-1954	2¼%	1,800,000
Norway	13,000,000[3]	1951-1959	2¾%	9,495,000
U.S.S.R.	3,000,000	1950	2%	2,775,500
Total	$502,500,000			$67,412,051

Add: Additional amounts committed (see footnotes) $142,000,000

Total commitments: $644,500,000

[1] An additional amount of $75,000,000 has been tentatively agreed with Belgium on the same terms.

[2] An additional amount of $50,000,000 has been promised to the Netherlands East Indies on the same terms.

[3] An additional amount of $17,000,000 has been promised to Norway on the same terms.

I should add that some advances have been made to France under section 3, which I shall point out later. Those advances will be transferred to the agreements, so to speak, in the near future.

I shall have a little more to say later about the U.S.S.R. This amount is not the whole amount that the U.S.S.R. owes Canada. Advances have been made to the extent of perhaps another $9 million, under other authorities. However, I shall deal with that later.

Mr. BRACKEN: When was this credit extended to Russia?

Mr. ILSLEY: During the latter part of 1945. In respect of some of the items it was agreed that it should be extended long before that. But there are so many transactions—some dealing with wheat, some with industrial equipment, and some with mutual aid supplies which were not delivered before the end of the war—that it is almost impossible to give a summary explanation in a few words.

So the total of the amount of credits covered by the agreements is $502,500,000; the amount of cash used up to March 31, 1946, is $67,412,051. Additional amounts committed for, which I have mentioned, amount to $142 million, making a total commitment of $644,500,000.

Then, as I started to say, for the sake of completeness, I should also mention that temporary advances have been made on behalf of allied governments under section 3 of the War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Acts and previous War Appropriation Acts. During the past year these have served as temporary loans to certain of the governments to whom we are providing credits under The Export Credits Insurance Act. A table of these advances as of February 28 was given in answer to a question and appears on page 417 of Hansard. It has not been possible to provide a complete table as yet for the same items as of March 31, as a number of the accounting transactions are not yet completed. I should mention, however, that the list for the end of March includes amounts of approximately $80 million on behalf of France, which will be repaid shortly from the export credit which has just been provided to that country, approximately $30 million on behalf of the United Kingdom, representing costs incurred subsequent to February 28 and therefore not covered by the claims agreement, approximately $14 million for the Netherlands, $9 million for the U.S.S.R., $8 million for Australia, and $5 million for Belgium. These figures do not include the items that have been settled by the claims agreement with the United Kingdom, nor do they include certain expenditures made out of appropriated funds which it is expected to recover in whole or in part from other countries, such as military relief, for example, and costs of production of some supplies originally ordered for Mutual Aid and which are now being sold.

A detailed report on operations under part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act will be presented to the house later this month, and the house will have an opportunity to discuss them, as it is planned to bring into the house a bill amending certain provisions of that act, although not altering the amount that may be loaned under it.

Turning now to the special case of Britain, we should note first that her need for credits is huge in comparison with the other countries with which we have dealt. Moreover, there are special factors in the case of the United Kingdom, which I shall discuss in a moment, that necessitate and justify different terms from those we have offered as a matter of policy in other cases. The government is, therefore, not proposing to deal with the credit to the United Kingdom under the Export Credits Insurance Act, but instead is seeking the specific approval of parliament for this financial agreement that has been concluded with the British government.

During the five years from 1946 to 1950, the United Kingdom will be going through a period of transition and reconstruction, both in its domestic and in its international economic affairs. In this period it will be endeavouring to revive and establish its export trade, which was so seriously curtailed during the war when all Britain's manpower was mobilized for war service, war production and only the most essential civilian purposes. It will take time for British exports to get back to their pre-war volume, although the progress made over the past few months is encouraging. It is necessary for Britain to do much more than to regain the pre-war levels, however, if she is to pay her way internationally. She has had to sacrifice many of the overseas investments she had made, and will no longer be able to count on as much income from this source as before to help her pay for imports. This must be replaced by increased exports. Moreover, the losses incurred in shipping during the war have reduced, at least temporarily, the income from her merchant marine, while the general dislocation of trade and finance caused by the war has interfered with the British overseas earnings in respect of insurance and financing services, which also helped to pay for imports.

I am now going to speak about deficits, and I do not want confusion between domestic deficits, budget deficits and deficits in international accounts.

Britain is confronted with a very serious deficit in her international accounts which she is trying to keep down by the utmost economy in her purchases and expenditures abroad, and by the utmost efforts in promoting her exports. This deficit, however, must be financed by borrowing in one form or another. The British authorities have estimated that the deficit for the current year 1946 will be no less than £750 million, which is equivalent to $3,300 million Canadian. This deficit will decline during 1947 and 1948, and it is expected that for these two years together it will amount to about £500 million, or $2,220 million Canadian. What the figures will be in 1949 and 1950 is, of course, very difficult to predict at this time, but unless completely unforeseen developments occur, the deficit in 1949 should be small and a balance should be achieved by 1950. This is what the British refer to as getting back to equilibrium.

Thus for the period as a whole it seems likely that Britain will need to borrow abroad a total amount which will exceed the equivalent of about 5½ billion Canadian dollars. The United States loan will provide her with the equivalent of 4,120,000,000 Canadian dollars for future purchases, and this loan which we are proposing to make would bring the total up to $5,375,000,000. The remainder the United Kingdom will need to find elsewhere, together with such amounts as are required to discharge existing indebtedness, which, of course, is not included in the estimate of her deficit on current account.

The figures I have given apply to Britain's total position and not her position vis-à-vis Canada alone. We expect that the excess of what Britain pays to Canada for supplies and services during 1946 over what she receives from us currently for supplies and services, will amount to approximately $600 million. Next year, that is in 1947, the amount of this deficit with Canada will be reduced both because of lower expenditures of Britain here and because British exports to Canada will be at higher levels. The total may be expected to amount to about $400 or $500 million. From that figure, the deficit may decline gradually in subsequent years to some more or less permanent normal figure, which it is difficult to forecast at this time. Of course before the war there was always a heavy British deficit vis-à-vis Canada. The exports of Canada to Great Britain were very much greater than the exports of Great Britain to Canada. The essential point, however, is that in meeting her own requirements in Canada, Britain will probably need to use within the next three years this $1,250 million which we are proposing to lend her. In the meantime she may need to use some of it in providing Canadian dollars to other countries in the sterling area in exchange for their receipts in sterling which they wish to spend in Canada, and which we, of course, are most anxious that they should be free to spend here. Consequently, I would expect this credit that we are proposing to make available to Britain will be fully drawn upon by the end of 1948, and thereafter she will be financing her deficit in Canada from other sources, for example, by selling us gold or other foreign exchange that we require.

These figures which I have cited will make it clear that in respect of the amounts involved the case of the United Kingdom is unique. There are other and even more important reasons for regarding the British situation as a special one requiring terms and conditions in a financial agreement that are quite different to those in our other loans. This view is not ours alone. It has been expressed quite clearly and emphatically by the United States government, and perhaps I might be permitted to quote the report of the national advisory council on international, monetary and financial problems, comprising the United States secretary of the treasury, secretary of state, secretary of commerce, the chairman of the board of governors of the federal reserve system, and the chairman of the board of directors of the export-import bank of Washington. In their statement of February 21 is included the following paragraph:

> 3. The proposed loan to Britain requiring congressional authorization is a special case, but one which is an integral part of the foreign economic programme of this government. No other country has the same crucial position in world trade as England. Because of the wide use of the pound sterling in world trade, the large proportion of the world's trade which is carried on by the countries of the British empire, and the extreme dependence of England upon imports, the financial and commercial practices of Britain are of utmost significance in determining what kind of world economy we shall have. The early realization of the full objectives of the Bretton Woods programme, including the elimination of exchange restrictions and other barriers to world trade and investment, requires an immediate solution to Britain's' financial problem. The international monetary fund agreement permits the continued imposition of certain of these restrictions for as much as five years; in the financial agreement of December 6, 1945, the British agree to their removal within one year from the effective date of that agreement. It is the view of the council that the British case is unique and will not be a precedent for a loan to any other country.

These reasons for regarding the United Kingdom position as a special one requiring special treatment are much more important in relation to Canada even than they are to the United States. They are more important for two reasons: first, because we are so much more vitally interested in the future of international trade as a whole than the United States, and, secondly, because such a large proportion of our trade takes place with the United Kingdom and other countries in the sterling area and we are most concerned to continue this trade and to continue to be able to receive payment for our exports to Britain and other sterling area countries in a form that we can use for expenditures elsewhere.

Britain has for many, many years occupied a key position in international trade and in its development. For more than a century it has been the greatest importing nation in the world. Despite the enormous growth of the importance of the United States in international trade and finance after the first world war, Britain remained much the largest importer. In 1938, for example, British imports comprised approximately 19 per cent of the total imports of the world, whereas American imports amounted to only slightly over eight per cent of the total. Nor do these figures alone make clear the great importance of Britain's markets. The nature of her imports was such that she constituted the chief market for countries such as Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Argentina and Denmark, as well as many smaller countries, all of which were greatly dependent upon exports for their prosperity and their general welfare.

Because of this large and central place which Britain occupies in world trade, British policies in regard to trade are of critical importance to exporting countries and particularly to Canada. In addition, British policies will influence and largely determine the policies of many other countries, including particularly the countries now in the sterling area and probably the countries of western Europe. If Britain follows one type of policy it will enable and encourage these other countries to follow it as well. Therefore, British trade policy in the next few years, when the whole pattern of postwar trade is to be determined, will be of the very greatest importance.

There are, broadly speaking, two alternative types of policy open to Britain at the present time. The first and much the more desirable policy from our point of view is the type reflected in the Bretton Woods agreements and the proposals for expansion of world trade and employment put forward by the United States government. This type of trade and exchange policy involves a minimum of restrictions on trade, tariff reductions, the elimination of discriminatory import quotas and exchange practices, and the freedom of each country to use any currency that it has obtained through trade with another country in carrying on trade with any third country. This type of policy would make possible not only a high level of trade but freedom in the direction of trade. The alternative type of policy, on the other hand, which is open to the United Kingdom is one of bilateral arrangements in which Britain would purchase goods on condition that the selling country would take British goods in exchange, one involving discrimination in both importing and exporting and substantial restrictions on the use of currency received by exporting countries. Under this type of policy if Britain were forced to follow it, she would endeavour to make the most of the bargaining power which her huge import markets give her in order to improve the terms on which she trades and to force her exports into the markets of other countries.

The choice which Britain makes between these two alternative policies is vitally important to Canada as well as to the United States and to other countries which are largely dependent upon exports. There are many in the United Kingdom, some of them in very influential positions, who contend that Britain cannot afford the risks of liberal policies under present circumstances. They propose that she should exploit the strong bargaining position that will be hers after the present shortages disappear and buyers' markets return. Some persons in Britain even seem to see virtues in the political and economical arrangements likely to result from the restricted trading blocs which would emerge from a policy of bi-lateral bargaining and discrimination. On the other hand, there are many who realize, as we realize here, the advantages to Britain of liberal policies that will encourage the maximum development of trade. Britain can follow these policies which we favour if the British government and the British people can have confidence that they will possess sufficient financial resources to engage in trade on these liberal lines, which would involve more imports and a larger temporary increase in Britain's indebtedness than would the other policies, pending a revival in British export trade.

Britain cannot afford to choose the liberal trade policy unless she gets loans from the United States and Canada on liberal terms. If she follows these policies, which we wish to see her adopt, she will have to discard within the next year many of the defensive and discriminatory import and exchange measures which she adopted during the war to protect her financial position under the enormous strains which the war thrust upon it. She will have to go into debt to the United States and to Canada, and perhaps to others, on a large scale. Britain can only afford to undertake these debts with any confidence of being able to repay them if the terms recognize the realities of her international financial position and make allowance for the relatively narrow margin she will have available over the long run to make repayment and pay interest. This necessity for liberal terms arises on the one side from the huge amounts which it is necessary for Britain to borrow, and on the other from the effects which the war has had upon her international financial position.

We must realize that Britain is no longer a wealthy country in international terms. She has sacrificed her international financial strength in meeting the costs of the war. Before the war Britain had substantial overseas assets that yielded her, on balance, an income of approximately a billion dollars a year.

After Dunkirk, Britain, as part of her all-out mobilization, threw all of her financial resources at home and overseas into the struggle, and used her ability to borrow abroad both in North America and in the sterling area. From that time until the end of hostilities, she incurred heavy costs outside her own borders in buying supplies and in financing the conduct of warfare in many parts of the world. The United States and Canada relieved her quite rightly of a considerable part of these costs in North America by lend-lease and mutual aid. These, however, were truly part of our North American war effort rather than aid to Britain, who continued to carry more than her full share of the financial costs of the war. As a consequence of these huge overseas expenditures, Britain was forced to liquidate her overseas investments to a value equivalent to approximately five billion Canadian dollars. About twenty per cent of these liquidated investments were Canadian securities. This liquidation of assets, however, was only the beginning. Britain proceeded to borrow heavily abroad in order to finance the costs of the war outside Britain and her total external debts increased by the equivalent of 13 billion Canadian dollars. In addition, she used up practically all her foreign exchange reserves before lend-lease commenced, and has only been able to rebuild them to little more than about half of what they were prior to Munich. As a consequence of all these changes, the British are now worse off to the extent of about 20 billion Canadian dollars than they were when the war commenced. Now the war and the effects of the war upon her exports and her overseas expenditure have left Britain in the situation where she must borrow a further five or six billion dollars during the transition period. As a result of the war, therefore, she will end up with her international position worsened by the equivalent of over twenty-five billion Canadian dollars, as compared with her position in 1939.

In addition to these losses in her external position, Britain of course suffered great losses at home—losses in property, in manpower and in wealth. We are all familiar with the spectacular damage caused by bombs and rockets; we are not so familiar with the insidious losses that arose because Britain was unable to repair and maintain her equipment, her houses and all the property that goes to make possible modern civilization. In addition, of course, the British cut down their standards of living and their consumption substantially below pre-war figures on average, while we on this continent were able to raise ours. I mention these losses within Britain only in order that we shall not seem to concentrate solely on the financial side. Other allies have suffered enormous losses in their own countries. None, however, has borne the international costs that Britain has borne; none is faced with the same tremendous problem of readjustment in the balance of their international payments. Alone among the allies, Britain has suffered as a result of the war a great deterioration in her external financial position and now, in addition, she must borrow huge new sums in order to embark in peacetime upon the trade policies which are so important to us.

The government has examined the present and prospective financial situation of Britain at length. We have come to the conclusion that Britain can undertake the trade and financial policies that she would like to undertake, and that we would like to see her undertake, if we and the United States are prepared to enter into financial agreements such as those already signed with her. We have come to the conclusion, after the most serious study and discussion of the matter, that terms more onerous than those provided in this agreement would not enable Britain to follow the policies which are in the long-run interests of both countries, and indeed of all countries. We have also come to the conclusion that the British government will be able to meet the terms of this agreement over the next fifty-five years. The British authorities themselves considered this aspect of the matter most thoroughly and they have taken the most careful and responsible attitude possible in regard to the obligations which they have incurred under this agreement and the Anglo-American agreement. They have been determined from the outset, and indeed they made this determination clear to us as early as 1944, that they would not incur debts which they could not honestly believe they would be able to discharge.

I should like now to outline the main provisions of the agreement and to make some comments upon them that may help the house to understand their meaning and purpose.

In the first place, I should like to explain that this financial agreement and the other agreement on the settlement of war claims are separate and distinct. The agreement on the settlement of war claims is essentially a measure to settle with precision and finality a large number of outstanding claims between the two governments, without making any concession of consequence on either side. The amounts of some of the claims which are settled by this claims agreement are open to argument, and it would have been possible to spend years in debating whether this claim or that should be one or two or three million dollars, more or less, all things considered. Both sides have come to the conclusion that the payment by the United Kingdom to Canada of $150 million would be a fair and reasonable settlement of the net balance of the claims by Canada on the United Kingdom over the claims by the United Kingdom on Canada. There should, during the consideration of the estimates, be an opportunity for discussing the details of the claims covered by this agreement, if members wish to do so. The transactions to implement the agreement are being carried out under the War Expenditures and Demobilization Appropriation Acts of the 1945-46 fiscal year. Britain has already paid us in gold the $150 million she undertook to pay in this settlement.

The first item of interest in the financial agreement itself is, of course, the amount of the credit and the way in which it may be drawn upon. The British representatives asked for this amount, and demonstrated to our satisfaction that they would in fact require this much and more to finance the purchases which they intended to make in Canada during the six-year period in which the credit may be drawn upon. In fact, as I have already indicated, the British deficit of Canadian dollars will likely be such that the total amount of this credit will be drawn before the end of 1948. The British representatives made it clear to us that they expected that Britain would need to finance additional purchases in Canada from other cash resources.

The terms of the loan relating to interest and repayment are, of course, the same as those in the agreement between Britain and the United States. During the years 1946-50 no interest is payable on the amount of the loan which will have been used. The reason for this is that this is the period during which Britain will be experiencing difficulty in her balance of payments as a result of the immediate after-effects of the war. This is the period during which she needs to use the credit, and she cannot afford to pay interest in this period without making additional credits necessary. Interest commences at the beginning of the year 1951 and for that year is payable on the whole amount outstanding at the end of the year. From that time on, interest is payable each year on the amount of the credit outstanding during that year. Principal repayments are made at the end of each year from 1951 to 2000 A.D.

We would naturally have preferred a higher rate of interest but after careful consideration of the probable British balance of payments, we reached the conclusion that two per cent was all that Britain would be in a position to pay. Indeed, she will not be able to afford even this rate of interest unless her exports expand and are maintained at a high level. It is for this reason that waiver of interest payments is provided for under certain circumstances in our agreement as in the agreement with the United States. This is needed to allow for the uncertainties and risks which the United Kingdom must face in reestablishing her export trade. Interest may be waived only if the United Kingdom's exports over the preceding five years are insufficient to pay for the pre-war volume of her imports, taking into account other current account transactions as well. In effect, therefore, we say to the United Kingdom: If your exports are sufficient to enable you to pay for a pre-war volume of imports without running further into debt, then we will demand interest from you; if, however, they are not up to this level and if, therefore, you must go into debt or liquidate your capital in order to import on the pre-war scale, or else must restrict your imports to avoid the strain upon your resources, then we are prepared to waive the interest payments.

I should point out that the waiver will only be granted if the United Kingdom states that it is necessary in view of the present and prospective conditions of international exchange and the level of her gold and foreign exchange reserves, and if the international monetary fund certifies that the condition in respect of United Kingdom exports is fulfilled. We have also the safeguarding provision that the waiver will only be granted by Canada if it is also being granted by other countries having similar agreements, which, of course, include the United States and any further countries which may enter into agreements of this kind with the United Kingdom. This waiver clause should go a considerable distance in enabling us to avoid any possible damaging effects of the burden of large scale indebtedness upon future trade in the event of adverse economic circumstances.

The next important provision of the agreement is article 5 regarding exchange and import arrangements. It will be noted that this is reciprocal in form, and that each of the two governments agrees to accord to the other treatment not less favourable than that provided for in any instrument of agreement with the government of any other country, signed prior to the date of this agreement. Under this clause Canada binds herself to give the United Kingdom most-favoured-nation treatment in regard to the use of import quotas, which are referred to in some of our trade agreements. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, in this clause undertakes to give Canada similar treatment to that granted the United States in the Anglo-American financial agreement. This is of quite substantial importance. Hon. members will recall that there are 4 important sections of the Anglo-American agreement relating to these questions. Under certain of them the United Kingdom agrees to make sterling paid by the United Kingdom in current account transactions, or sterling released from accumlated balances, freely convertible and available for current transactions in any currency area without discrimination. On the other hand, certain of the undertakings given in the Anglo-American agreement apply specifically to the treatment of United States transactions or trade, and it is the benefit of these provisions in particular that we obtain under Article 5 of our agreement. In particular, we obtain the benefits of paragraph (i) of section 8, in which the United Kingdom undertakes not to apply exchange control in such a manner as to restrict payments or transfers in respect of current transactions between the two countries, or the use of sterling balances to the credit of residents of the United States arising out of current transactions. We also obtain the important benefits of section 9, in which the government of the United Kingdom agrees to administer any import restrictions on a basis which does not discriminate against imports from the other country in respect of any product. This assurance of non-discrimination in import control is to take effect as soon as practicable, and not later than the end of 1946. We shall obtain the benefit of this non-discrimination as a result of Article 5 of our agreement.

Article 6 of the agreement provides in effect that the arrangements already existing in respect of the loan which we made to the United Kingdom in 1942 will continue as they are at present until the beginning of 1951, and that before that date we shall discuss the question of payment of interest on, and the terms of repayment of, any balance of the loan then outstanding. Members will probably recall that this loan was made under the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942. In substance, the actual loan was made to Britain to finance war expenditures during 1941, as we were providing Britain with dollars in 1941 in return for sterling which we accumulated and this accumulated sterling was paid off with the $700 million loan granted in 1942. The loan was, of course, a war loan, made to finance war expenditures. The act which authorized it provided that no interest shall be payable under such obligation in respect of any period prior to the termination of the war. Consequently the loan has not borne interest up to date. In view of the enormous burden of international debt which war has thrust upon Britain and the difficulty she faces in reestablishing her export trade and paying for all her current requirements, we have come to the conclusion that Britain has not the capacity to pay interest on this loan during the period from now until the end of 1950, any more than on the main loan, and that she should not be asked to do so. There has been another important arrangement concerning this loan which is being continued under the new agreement. At the time we made this loan in 1942, the United Kingdom government undertook to ensure that the proceeds of sales to persons not resident in the United Kingdom of Canadian securities payable in Canadian currency, and interests therein, held by residents of the United Kingdom, and the proceeds of the redemption or repayment of Canadian securities or interests therein held by residents of the United Kingdom were paid to the government of Canada as part repayment of this loan. This arrangement is now being extended and will continue until the end of 1950, along with the interest-free provision. Under this arrangement the loan is being paid off or reduced by the sale or redemption of Canadian securities held in Britain. This process will result in the gradual and orderly repatriation of Canadian securities owned in the United Kingdom, and in the gradual reduction of the amount of the loan outstanding. The total repayments up to date have amounted to $161,435,596.43. Additional repayments are pending as a result of the substantial sales and redemptions of securities in the latter part of 1945, and when they are made the loan will be reduced to something in the neighbourhood of $500 millions.

Article 7 of the agreement provides for the cancellation of the amount owing by the government of the United Kingdom to Canada under the British commonwealth air training plans of 1939 and 1942. These agreements were the basic ones under which this great Canadian project, one of the most creditable aspects of our war record, was developed and financed. In broad terms, the agreements provided for the sharing of the total costs of these plans among Canada, Britain, Australia and New Zealand in proportions considered fair at the time in view of the number of pupils from the several countries to be trained under the plans, and also in view of other relevant circumstances at the time. Under both the first and second plan, the United Kingdom share was intended to be financed mainly through contributions in kind, that is, contributions of aircraft, spares, supplies and equipment. As the plans developed and as the various circumstances affecting the ability of the United Kingdom to make contributions in kind changed, for example, when the great intensification of the air war in 1940 made it difficult for the United Kingdom to send planes to Canada for training purposes, the share of the United Kingdom in the total costs came considerably to exceed the amount which she could furnish as contributions in kind. As a consequence, when the settlement of the accounts for the first plan was finally worked out, it was found that the United Kingdom's share of the cost exceeded what she had contributed and paid by $200 million. Similarly, when the details for the second plan, ending at March 31, 1945, were worked out, it was found that the United Kingdom had paid or contributed an amount that fell short of her share of the costs by $225 million. These two sums together add up to the $425 million referred to in this financial agreement. The detailed methods by which the shares of costs were determined, and the various items credited to the United Kingdom are exceedingly complicated, and if the house wishes to know more about them when considering the bill, I am sure that the Minister of National Defence for Air, with some advance notice, would be able to give an explanation of them.

In agreeing to cancel this amount owing by Britain in respect of air training, the government has been motivated by a number of strong reasons. In the first place, this service provided to Britain is one that might well have been covered by mutual aid, and perhaps would have been covered by mutual aid had not the air training agreements been entered into before mutual aid began and the accounts worked out only after mutual aid had terminated. We did provide air training services to Australia and New Zealand as mutual aid, and we furnished supplies to Britain as mutual aid that could be used for air training in Britain. Secondly, the United States government furnished air training services to Britain and to other countries as lend-lease and furnished Britain with equipment and supplies on a large scale to be used in air training, including equipment and supplies used in the British Commonwealth air training plan in Canada. Thirdly, we came to the conclusion after much consideration that repayment of this $425 million was beyond the United Kingdom's capacity to pay within any reasonable period. From what I have already said, it will be evident that the amount which the British can undertake to pay is severely limited within the next five years and, indeed, over the remainder of this century. We have taken full account of their ability to pay in setting the terms for interest and repayment on the new loan and for the 1942 loan. It seems to us futile to ask the British government to pay this $425 million some time in the next century when they have completed the payments on the loan which we are now making to them. I do not believe that either the British or the Canadian people at that time would consider it a proper transaction. I think it is far better for us to face the facts clearly and cancel this particular war debt. It should be remembered that the British have no production assets as a result of incurring this debt—nothing that will add to their ability to pay it.

I need say only a few words about the remaining articles of the agreement. Article 8 regarding consultation indicates that the two governments will work together in putting the agreement into effect, and that if major changes occur in the international situation which materially alter the prospective benefits and obligations flowing from the agreement, they will consider together what changes in its provisions they should agree to make, subject to such legislative approval as may be necessary. By consultation we shall be able to work out such things as the manner and time at which the United Kingdom will draw upon this credit and the machinery for implementing its other provisions.

I should now refer to the exchange of notes between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and myself in regard to our understanding about the entering into force and implementation of the various provisions of the agreement. This was made necessary because the agreement has been drawn up in the expectation that the financial agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States, signed at Washington on December 6 last, will be approved by the American congress and will enter into force some time during the current year. As soon as that agreement does enter into force, we shall be prepared to implement the whole of our agreement once parliament has approved it. If, however, congress does not approve the Anglo-American agreement, we shall consider that, in the terms of article 8 of our agreement, a major change has occurred in the international financial situation which would materially alter the prospective benefits and obligations flowing from our agreement, and that consequently it would be necessary forthwith to consider what changes in the provisions of our agreement the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom should agree to make, subject to such legislative approval as may be necessary, which, of course, in our case would be approval by parliament in the event of any amendment to the agreement itself. If congress does not approve the Anglo-American agreement, we shall not benefit from the trade and exchange provisions of that agreement, either directly or through the application of article 5 of our agreement. It will, therefore, be necessary to consider some substitute for article 5 of our agreement in those circumstances. Consequently we feel that those portions of our agreement which it is not necessary to implement immediately in order to enable the United Kingdom to proceed now with its purchases in Canada should be deferred until we see the results of congressional action. For that reason, therefore, we have reached the understanding with the United Kingdom that articles 5, 6 and 7 of the agreement will not be implemented until it is known whether the United States congress has approved the Anglo-American agreement.

In conclusion Mr. Chairman I wish to say just this. The United Kingdom has always been Canada's largest and most reliable market. Upon the continuation of this market the employment and welfare of millions of Canadians depend. It must cease to be a satisfactory market for Canadian products unless the British pound is in the future both convertible and stable. The restoration of the convertibility of sterling and the maintenance of a reasonable stability of sterling depend upon the successful completion of the proposed loan agreements with the United States and Canada. If these go through, Great Britain can take her full part in the post-war period and throughout the years of the future as a great trading nation, a nation whose currency can be used by any country to buy the products of any other country; a nation whose currency will retain a stable value from year to year. Viewed in this light, this agreement is of the highest importance and value to Canada. It is not in any sense an act of charity, it is an investment in the future of Canadian trade. Together with the Anglo-American agreement and the Bretton Woods agreements, it will enable us to proceed confidently to the consideration of the commercial policy that Canada and other countries should follow after the war, and to the establishment of the international trade organization which has been proposed by the United States. As hon. members already know, it is planned to have an international conference on trade and employment some time within the next twelve months. Preceding that will be a smaller conference, sponsored by the economic and social council of UNO, for the purpose of drawing up specific proposals for the consideration of the larger conference and, more particularly, for the negotiation of specific proposals for the reduction of tariffs. These measures, relating to international trade and the barriers to such trade, are of the utmost importance to Canada. We can proceed to a proper consideration of them and to the action that will be based upon such consideration only if the financial resources that will make trade possible are provided by agreements such as that which has been placed before the committee for approval.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I shall not attempt this afternoon to make any detailed observations on the very complete statement which we have received from the Minister of Finance, but I should like to make some general remarks on this resolution, which seems to me to be one of the most important that we have ever considered in this house or that we shall have to consider for some time. In the first place it seems to me that the time at which we are considering this resolution is rather apt, perhaps even critical, because it so happens, as you know, Mr. Chairman, that this matter has now reached the stage of impending decision in the United States. I suppose it is no exaggeration to say that what we do in this house at the present time may have an influence far beyond ourselves. What we are being asked to do, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, is to take part in what may be described as a piece of global economic strategy. We heard a great deal about global strategy during the war, and I take it we must have global strategy to-day, in times of peace, when we face questions just as difficult as we faced in the war, if not more so, and in an atmosphere more difficult because we have not now that inspiration, urgency and common feeling which come from sharing a common danger which we can feel day by day in terms of human life. I believe we are facing just as great a common danger to-day, but it is not so easy to see it.

I wish to discuss this matter solely from the point of view of the economic interest of Canada. That is not because I have not any other feeling about the matter. I might speak from other points of view, but the reason I wish to speak from that point of view is that I want to put it on a basis where no Canadian fellow citizen can say to me, "you have introduced an extraneous element here." I want to put it on a basis where I can say to any Canadian citizen, "I am arguing this from the point of view of your interest and my interest, our Canadian interest, our economic interest." I have some hope that if we can all make each other believe that we are really arguing it on that basis and that there is nothing else in it, we can reach that measure of unanimity which I regard as very important.

The next observation I wish to make is that I believe every one in this house—I really said this already—realizes the enormous, the vital importance of this. If this succeeds —if we have faith we can make it succeed—we have a chance to go forward to some kind of economic cooperation comparable with what we had during the war. If we ourselves, the United States and the United Kingdom reach some kind of coordination and cooperation the rest of the world will, I am sure, be glad to follow. If we fail, then there is literally no hope for anything except the old chaos which we all got to know so well in the thirties.

I come to the bill, the first section of which says that the government of Canada will extend to the government of the United Kingdom a credit of $1,250,000,000. What do we mean by that? What does that mean in terms of the life of the ordinary Canadian citizen? We have become so accustomed to these fabulous and astronomical amounts that we are getting to feel they are just figures in books, and some people tell us that they are just figures in books. I should like to describe what it means to me in as simple words as I can. What it means is that the citizens of Canada are to be asked either to pay taxes or to lend money to that amount, to make that amount available to the people of Great Britain and of other places, as the Minister of Finance pointed out, to buy goods in this country. Why do we do that? Do we do that just to make ourselves good fellows, because we are generous-hearted? No. Why do we do it? All hon. members know why we do it. I ventured to say last autumn when the exports credits were up that we could not afford not to afford them. I say the same thing about this amount. Why do I say that? What do I mean when I say it? All hon. members need to do is to look back over the last fifteen years. They do not need to go another step backward to see what foreign trade means in the life of this country. We remember the figures of 1929. Our exports amounted to something like $1,400 million. Then it went down in 1933 to little more than one-third of that amount. I believe it was $534 million. We all know what that meant. Then by uncertain, rather anxious and slow degrees it mounted up in 1939 until it was something over $900 million, just under a billion, if I remember rightly. We all know what happened since that time. It mounted up and up until it got to about $5 billion. We know how that happened. We know that we borrowed, that we taxed ourselves as we never believed we could. The Minister of Finance almost made us like it. We taxed ourselves to the extent of about two and a half billion dollars, and on top of that we borrowed almost another two and a half billion dollars. In various other ways the minister managed to raise about another $500 million. Altogether we took out of our pockets about $5,500 million. The result was we were all rich. We all had money in our pockets. There is great danger lest we feel somehow or another that these good times with these fabulous amounts can just go on. The truth of the matter is that we are like a man who had an income of $2,500 and then borrowed $2,500 and spent the whole $5,000 in one year and said, "This is grand", and did not bother very much about what is to come afterwards.

The Minister of Finance smiles. He knows better than that, and we are going to know better when we look at it. The longer the spree, the sorer our heads will be when we wake up. I do not think many of us believe there is some magic which enables us to go on borrowing and borrowing and never have to pay the piper. Incidentally I am glad that we got a very fine lead this week from the Chancellor of the British Exchequer, who, I suppose, is a socialist.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, and it was a socialist budget.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I like to be able to praise a socialist when I can. I want to point out that no one is more orthodox in the arranging of a budget than Doctor Dalton. He made it clear that a balanced budget is essential. He is a model for us here. I hope the Minister of Finance is following very closely what he is doing.

I come back to exports, because I think we should regard this matter in that light and not let ourselves get confused with this, that or the other thing. We should regard this simply and clearly as a matter which affects us through our export trade. The Minister of Finance has already made that clear and I wish to underline it. It affects us in our export trade. That brings us to Britain. When we look at the continent of Europe which was our great market, and when we consider the extent to which that market is shattered—we realize that from the loans to European countries we heard of this afternoon—I suppose there never was a time when the British market was more important than it is now.

I do not like to think of what would happen, first of all to Europe, and then to us, if Britain is not able to restore her economy. Therefore it seems to me that when we are talking about assisting her to restore her economy we are talking about something which is very close to ourselves. I should like to read a few words from a speech of Lord Keynes which was delivered in the British House of Commons. He was speaking about his trip to the United States and the negotiations that were carried on last autumn. He referred to the attitude which they had to take in the United States. He was answering some people in Britain who felt, I suppose naturally, that since they had been in the war for two and a quarter years before the United States there might have been a somewhat different attitude taken toward all the amounts which were spent, and spent in the United States, during those two and a quarter years. But Keynes told them to forget all about that, and he had one or two important remarks to make on it. I should like to read one or two of them. It is, I think, put in rather clever wording. This is what he said:

> We soon discovered that it was not our past performance or our present weakness, but our future prospects of recovery and our intention to face the world boldly that we had to demonstrate.

He went on to say:

> In every circle in which I moved during my stay in Washington, it was when I was able to enlarge on the strength of our future competitive position, if only we were allowed a breather, that I won most sympathy.

Why do I read this to the house? I do so for two reasons: first of all, to try to underline the argument that I am making. If I succeed in nothing else I hope I shall succeed in showing that I am arguing this from the point of view of the interest of Canada. My second reason for reading it is to draw to the attention of the house what Mr. Keynes said, who, I suppose, on his record of the last twenty-five years can clearly be regarded not only as the greatest economist, but the most successful prophet that we have had in economic matters. In case I forget later, I should like to remind the house of that astounding book he wrote in 1919 called "The Economic Consequences of the Peace," in which he repeated everything that has happened since; at any rate, everything that has happened with respect to the indemnities of the first war. He said they could not be paid. Keynes pointed out the whole thing. Here is the man who was in Washington. Here is the man who told the British that in dealing with the United States they had to satisfy the people of that country that they would be able to recover; that this global strategy of economics would succeed, that if they were given this breathing space they could get on their feet and be able to fit again into a freer world economy, and that this would be to the advantage of the United States and ourselves.

Let us remember when we are talking about this that the negotiations in the United States—and Keynes pointed this out in the British House of Commons—were always carried out with congress in mind. There was congress; and congress was considered to be representative chiefly of the people of the middle west. In other words, they wanted to get down to hard-boiled people who considered nothing about sentiment, but who were looking to their own advantage.

To me the matter is very simple. I shall give a simple illustration drawn from business. I do not know if I have used it before in the house; but if you have escaped it, there are a lot of other people who have not. It is this: We all know that in business, the wise businessman very often finds it necessary to give credit. The wholesaler may give credit to the retailer, and he may not pay for a year or two years, or even three or more. Why does the wholesaler give credit to the retailer? Does he do it because he likes the retailer? Indeed not; he may dislike him. He does it because he thinks this man is a sound businessman, and he hopes to set up a good customer. That is why we should make this loan to Great Britain.

I wish now to say a word—and no more than a word, because the Minister of Finance has covered it, and I do not wish to labour it—about another phase of the matter. It is well for us to remember two things that happened during the war. It is well for us to remember why these people need help. It is not because they are a lot of poor weaklings who have mismanaged their own affairs. It is not because of that at all. It is because they have fought a war for six years. It is because they had to take their savings for generations—perhaps centuries—and use them, as we know, to buy astronomical amounts of supplies in the United States.

The result is that that great source of income is just about cut in two. But that is not the worst. The worst is that after the United States came into the war, and when things seemed to be going better, when prospects were better, in the last years of the war Great Britain had to make this great distortion in her economy, namely, that she had practically to give up her foreign trade. She had to make the things that she could make at home, for use at home; and the United States and other countries took over the foreign trade. This was necessary to save shipping, and to prevent so far as possible the unnecessary use of shipping in submarine infested waters. The fact of the matter is that these unfortunate people, while fighting for their lives, saw their trade drop to about thirty per cent of what it was in 1939—and it was nothing to boast about even in 1939. That is the reason why we are faced with this situation.

There are two alternatives, and, I think, only two. The first is that of multilateral trade, to which the Minister of Finance has referred, and which we hope will become real under this International Conference of Trade and Employment which is to meet during the current year.

What is it hoped that may do? It is hoped that may get us away from the multitudinous restrictions we have, and about which we all know so much. We would all like to get away from them if we can. I do not think there is any doubt about that. It is a policy to free sterling currency, which at the present time is not free. They have had to stipulate in England that people who sell there have to leave their money in England, so that sterling could be used and marshalled and the small amount of United States exchange could be kept in a pool, which was managed by Great Britain.

The whole aim of loans by the United States and ourselves is to set that free and, as the Minister of Finance said, so that money can be used freely throughout the world, so that we can get back to the method left behind, so that we can do business again without being hampered with all these numerous checks and balances.

What is the alternative? The alternative is a very simple one. I shall read again the words of Keynes, and I would ask hon. members to note carefully what he says. The alternative, of course, is to go on with the sterling bloc. The alternative is for Great Britain to seek more credits from the countries in the sterling block to whom she already owes a lot, particularly those in the sterling bloc who have not the goods that we in Canada and the United States have, and who have not the materials which are needed by the United Kingdom in order to get its business under way.

This is what Keynes said in the debate in the House of Lords:

> The alternative is to build up a separate economic bloc which excludes Canada and consists of countries to which we already owe more than we can pay, on the basis of their agreeing to lend us money they have not got, and buy only from us and one another goods we are unable to supply.

May I read it again, because it is true. Perhaps it sounds like a clever epigram; but let me read it again:

> The alternative is to build up a separate economic bloc which excludes Canada and consists of countries to which we already owe more than we can pay—

That is, each country in the sterling bloc.

> —on the basis of their agreeing to lend us money that they have not got—

They have already extended credit beyond their means.

> —and buy only from us and one another goods we are unable to supply.

Because the people who can supply them are the United States and Canada.

I want now to come back to one observation he makes here which, to my mind, is vital, when he says, "This economic bloc which excludes Canada." I believe there is an argument for Australia or New Zealand or South Africa, or France or Belgium. I think there is an argument in the case of these countries that they might flourish under a sterling bloc. But I cannot see how there is an argument that we can flourish in it, because we cannot get into it. The reason for that is that nature has put us in North America. We are inescapably north American—as a distinguished leader of my party said about ten years ago. We are inescapably, geographically north American.

If we are not in the sterling bloc, then will hon. members and will the people of this country please reflect upon what that means? It means that if we are unfortunate enough to have the economic world divided into two blocs, one presided over by the United States and the other presided over by the United Kingdom, we are not in either one. We are in some unpleasant no-man's-land, some middle ground I do not know anything about. Therefore I feel, and I believe every man who will think it over will feel, that what we should hope for in all our hearts is that this trade agreement may succeed, and that therefore we should now take the means of giving it a chance of success.

As the Minister of Finance has said, one of the aims is that we should give the British a breathing spell; give them a chance to get on their feet; give them a chance to pay us this loan, and in doing so be able to increase and increase and increase their foreign trade, so that we shall be able to sell them more and more goods.

We shall have to take goods, too; do not forget. Nevertheless what we hope is that their trade may greatly increase, both ways.

As I said a minute ago, I believe every sensible man, if he could visualize these two alternatives, would not hesitate a moment as to which he would take. Again, if we can have multilateral trade, which means going back to the simple and sensible world—certainly it was sensible when compared with the mess we have been in since—of the nineties, or opening years of the present century. I do not mean that they were perfect; I do not mean that our social services were what they should be. I am thinking about the international situation and the likelihood that any sensible man would wish to go back to that reasonable degree of freedom.

Nobody believes we can get rid of restrictions and discriminations to-day or to-morrow. But if we could get back to those conditions, when there was a reasonable degree of freedom, trade moved, goods moved freely, and people benefited from each other's capacity to specialize, as the minister pointed out. That is what we should have again.

What reason have we to think that that may succeed? First, I would say—this may be a rather negative reason—that there are a lot of people still in places of responsibility who know the terrible results of not doing it. They remember what happened in the 1930's. I was reading a book this morning which pointed out the awful effects of economic nationalism running mad. It pointed out that in 1929 Germany, Italy and France imposed tariffs on wheat amounting to as much as $1.83 a bushel. The result was that in the succeeding five years 600,000,000 bushels less wheat were imported into those countries than in the previous five. The competent writer of this book reckoned that that cut down the purchasing power in this country by some $200 million per annum.

We remember these fantastic things and any sensible man wants to do everything possible to get away from them.

In the second place we have moved into a world where, although there are perhaps a lot of grandiloquent and more or less irresponsible things said about full employment, not only public conscience but political necessity demand that the state shall never stand by again and see unemployment in a big way without using all the resources of the state to prevent it. We have this great hope, particularly when we look at the United States—if you have prosperity in the United States, then the thing will go. If you have prosperity in the United States you will have big imports into the United States; if you have big imports into the United States, that is half the battle because that will get the wheel turning everywhere.

You have only to look back to see what happened to British exports in 1929, 1930 and 1931 when the United States went flat. British exports went down by fifty per cent. There you have it.

May I come back to Keynes; I do not want to be tiresome by quoting him but, after all, Keynes is considered, as I said a few minutes ago, to be a very great expert. He has been the best prophet on these matters that we have had and he has the great advantage of having lived last year for several months in the United States. He says:

> All the most responsible people in the United States and particularly in the state department and the treasury, have entirely departed from the high tariff, export subsidy, conception of things, and will do their utmost with, they believe, the support of public opinion in the opposite direction. That is why this international trade convention presents us with such a tremendous opportunity. For the first time in modern history the United States is going to exert its full powerful influence in the direction of reduction of tariffs, not only of itself, but by all others.

I should like to give one little illustration culled from yesterday's press which shows the difficulty we are running into, because of the mixed-up world we have now where the individual who is trying to do business finds himself cribbed, cabined and confined at every turn. I read in the New York Times an unfavourable reference to a stepchild of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), the Canadian Commercial Corporation. The New York Times takes a rather dark view of that, the minister will be glad to know. This article states that the operations of this corporation will be unfair in connection with ordinary trade movements, and it quotes one individual as follows:

> The important thing, one exporter declared, "is not what the Canadian corporation is set up to do, but that it is set up at all."

I am not going to labour this, and incidentally I should point out that the report is quite fair because it gives the minister's explanation when it says:

> According to the Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce, the commercial corporation is intended to take over the various functions of making purchases in that country for foreign governments and UNRRA; to assist private enterprise in obtaining essential supplies from former enemy territories, and to provide machinery to purchase sugar, tea, oils and fats, which are under international allocation or foreign government control.

I am not complaining about that; I am only mentioning it to show what a fantastic world we live in. This morning I talked to an exporter who had been groaning under these restrictions. He said, "We exporters are not a lot of dumbells; we are ready to do business, but when we want to we have to go to this board and we get wound round and round with red tape." Perhaps that is not a criticism of the board, because what else can it do? We all know that when you get a board and put a man at the head of it with a lot of people underneath him, the rest of them cannot assume any responsibility. Do not let us fool ourselves about what happens when you get a board like this. What you do is to set up a little kingdom—perhaps it will become a government secret and be forgotten by the cabinet. I understand that this board is presided over by an able and energetic man who got his training under the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe).

Mr. BREITHAUPT: Probably a good Tory.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): All the better if he is, except that if he is a good Tory he will be a man of energy who will want to do a good job, and doing a good job will mean doing a big job. Whoever this gentleman is, and I do not know his politics, no doubt he will be faithful to his minister. If that is so he will have a great desire to exercise power; he will have a great desire to push other people around. My feeling is that that board will go on and on acquiring more and more power, unless some strong person, unless the Minister of Trade and Commerce keeps his hand on it and prevents it from doing so. I am not joking; that is what happens when you put a man on a board who wants to do a job. When you have a man who thinks he can very easily make himself believe that he knows more about it than anyone else, especially when other people have to come and do double handsprings before him. He may begin to believe that all these business men know nothing at all and he will want to stay there as long as possible. That is the sort of thing we should be trying to get away from. That is the sort of thing we shall begin to get away from if this agreement, which permits a reasonable freedom of action, is carried.

I want to repeat myself just briefly and I promise not to say it all over again. There will be difficulties; there will be objections raised. Incidentally, I am only discussing the principle and I may be raising objections to certain details. The alternative which Keynes outlined is, to me, unthinkable. It is an alternative which leaves Canada, as I say, to be ground between the upper and nether millstones. I hope with all my heart that in this debate we shall be able to consider this matter from the point of view of the true economic interests of Canada. I believe that if it is rightly considered in that way there is only one answer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make any extended remarks this afternoon in connection with the statement that has been placed before us by the minister, except to say that I believe that the putting into effect of these agreements will be beneficial, not only to Canada but to the entire world. Therefore we are prepared to support this agreement, reserving to ourselves the right to make inquiry into details to understand it better. We should, not only in this house but throughout the country, consider agreements of this sort in a more realistic way.

It seems to me that all of us at times are under what I might call a money illusion. We think in terms of money and we think in terms of financial agreements and financial returns from those agreements. As a matter of fact, what we are actually doing is to send, in this case to the United Kingdom, certain goods which she requires and which she cannot herself produce. If we are to do the same thing for the other nations whose loans have been mentioned this afternoon, and these loans are to be repaid from 1946 to 1976 or from 1949 to 1979, as the case may be, we shall if we are wise, if we have the ability to do so in spite of the contradictions of our present economic system, import into our country not pounds and shillings and pence or francs or any other foreign currency, but quantities of goods which will enable us to raise our own standards of living. That is what agreements of this sort should mean. In this time of necessity we need to help rebuild the economy of the world and to assist our best customer to place herself once more in the position of being able to take from this country goods which she will ultimately repay in goods which we shall receive from her or from some other country obligated to make payments to her, and we should so arrange our affairs that we shall be able to take these goods and use them for improving our own standards of living.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who has just made a very fine speech about the matter, said a few moments ago that during the war we taxed ourselves and borrowed from ourselves as we never taxed and borrowed before. But is it really true that we accomplished the miracles we accomplished during the war just by taxing and borrowing from ourselves as we never did before? That is not true. We accomplished those miracles by producing as we never produced before. Taxing and borrowing money? Money meant nothing at all during the war. It was the production of goods for the winning of the war that counted; because we produced as we never produced before we were able to accomplish the wonders we achieved during the war, and so long as we are able to maintain those high levels of production we can continue to perform miracles in supplying the nations with the goods which they need in order to recover their economy and at the same time help to raise our own standards of living in this country by improving the housing situation and supplying the various other things we ourselves need at the present time.

One of the difficulties is this. Never at any time have the producers of our country had the means to use the goods which they produced or the goods that are returned to us in exchange for the goods which we produce and export, and consequently the time comes when we find ourselves in the position of having to safeguard our economy, as it is called, and we endeavour to build a wall around ourselves. I was delighted to hear the hon. member from Muskoka-Ontario speak in the way he did this afternoon about opening up the channels of trade. That is indeed refreshing coming from the party with which he is associated. But may I add that even to-day when I pick up articles or read speeches by friends of my hon. friend I see that they insist on the necessity of retaining the imperial preferences and the Ottawa agreements. Yet, if ever agreements were made that were restrictive of international commerce it was the Ottawa agreements.

An hon. MEMBER: They made reductions.

Mr. COLDWELL: There we have an interruption from the same party discounting the words used this afternoon by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. If we are to have a free flow of trade, we can never have it by building a wall around Canada or around the association of nations known as the British commonwealth, and one of the reasons why I am prepared to support these loan agreements is that they will tend to open up world trade.

I am not unmindful of the fact that these agreements, so far as Canada is concerned, can be successful only in so far as our great neighbour to the south follows intelligent international economic policies. Here I believe is the great danger, because the United States remains to-day an island of capitalism in a world that tends ever more to socialization or socialism, or whatever you like to call it. Those contradictions in the capitalist system in the United States will compel her in the long run to try to protect her own economy and her own standards, as she calls them, by keeping out goods from the rest of the world, with the result that we shall have deepening unemployment.

I did not want to introduce any discussion of the United Kingdom budget but my hon. friend asked if Mr. Dalton was a socialist. I have known Hugh Dalton for a long time and I would say he is a pretty thorough-going socialist in his thinking and in his views. Let me point out to my hon. friend that I shall be quite content if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) here in his first full year's budget after the war follows Mr. Dalton's example. Mr. Dalton has relieved entirely British income tax payers in the lower brackets to the number of two and a half million people, and if the Minister of Finance here will relieve our income tax payers in the lower brackets and restore the pre-war income tax exemptions in this country, that will be an instalment of income tax relief which we shall be very glad to welcome in this house.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member be content if I took the English exemptions and took the excess profits tax off?

Mr. COLDWELL: No. My right hon. friend asks me if I am prepared to accept the English income tax exemptions and I answer no, because our economies and social services are so different and always have been.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. We are making loans to Britain at the present time. Do not forget that we are a rich country and that the British people are compelled to dig down deeper than we are. Nevertheless they have restored the pre-war level, at least of income tax exemptions, and yet we, a rich country, have not restored the pre-war levels. I say that if the Minister of Finance will do that in his budget we shall have a word of commendation for him. Let me point out, too, that the British have retained the super-taxes on high incomes; let us retain them too. They have increased their succession duties; let us increase them too. Then see how my hon. friends to my right will greet such a budget. It is true that the British budget provides that the excess profits tax will be removed at the end of the year, but it retains the war profits tax of five per cent. Let my hon. friends approve the taxation of profits too, and then we shall be more on common ground. It is no good to cite Britain as an example unless one states exactly what is happening there, and it is time we understood just exactly what they are doing to implement their policies.

In almost the same breath the hon. member made the statement that we dare not go back to the conditions of 1930. It is true that we dare not go back, but I believe that we are headed for those conditions under the policies now being put into effect in North America. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario says that if there is any tendency to go back to the conditions of 1930 we must use all the powers of the state to see that that does not happen. "Use all the powers of the state"? But we find my hon. friends demanding at the same time that controls shall be removed, that the powers of the state shall be curtailed. That would prevent us from doing the very thing he wants, using the power of the state to prevent a recurrence of the conditions of 1930. I find it very difficult to understand the logic of some of my hon. friends.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not blame that on the logic.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is no logic in it. It sounds well, but when you pick up the speech and read it the day after, it will appear like a good many things that you have said the night before appear the day after.

So, Mr. Chairman, all I want to do is to say that when the proper occasion arrives we shall have more to say about this, but meantime I believe that the agreement entered into is, in the main, a good agreement and we are prepared to give it our support.

Mr. BLACKMORE: First of all may I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on the excellent presentation which he has made. Since I have been here I do not think he has ever said anything in the house which I could so heartily support as the speech which he has just delivered. One of the main reasons why I can support so enthusiastically what he has said is that he is finally, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) points out, on a goods and services basis.

If I recall correctly, the minister did point out that it would be impossible for the British people to get their pound up to value and keep it stable unless they had this loan; and this loan is a loan of goods. It is the goods and services which a people can produce that make for the stability of their money. Once the whole world begins to see that, it will begin to look at this situation which so grieves the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), not as a completely bewildering and incomprehensible puzzle, but as a labyrinth from which there is a way out to be found.

I do not propose to discuss this matter at length because, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar points out, there will be plenty of opoprtunities to have much more to say as we go forward. But I should like to point out three matters which, in my judgment, ought to be borne in mind in dealing with this loan. I will discuss it briefly from three points of view: first of all, from the point of view of defence; second, from the point of view of good business; and third, from the point of view of common decency and national self-respect.

We are in a world of grim realities. In our own lives we have seen two wars. Who can say that we shall not yet in our own lives see a third war? Britain has saved us twice in the memory of those in this chamber. Who is to say that we shall not need to have Britain save us a third time?

Canada is a member—if one may use an athletic expression—of the British commonwealth and empire team. Thus far this team has won every series. The United States has thus far played in our team as a star, and Great Britain has also been a star player in the team. Great Britain has been seriously injured in the last series, and we must get her back into good condition; we must make her fighting fit again. Fighting strength in these days depends more and more upon productive capacity, economic strength and financial strength. If, then, we are to restore Great Britain to a condition of fighting fitness we must restore her economically and financially.

Just a few words regarding the general situation which Britain faces. What do the British people do to make their living? There are in the neighbourhood of forty-seven millions of them in a small island which has not the resources to support them. What do they have to do? Well, there are several lines of activities in which they engage to make their living. First of all, they produce what they can from their own resources and they manufacture what they can from their own resources. Next, they export as much goods as they can manage to manufacture and sell to pay for imports. Next, they depend on income from foreign investments. Next, they depend on income from carrying services which they have rendered with their merchant ships. Finally, they depend on the interest on financial loans and on insurance which the British have a good deal to do with.

What has happened to Britain? The Minister of Finance gave, I thought, a very fine and comprehensive picture of what has happened to Britain. He could have gone into great quantities of detail, which perhaps it was unnecessary to go into because hon. members, generally speaking, are well informed. But it would be a good thing to recall at this time that a tremendous amount of Britain's industrial capacity was destroyed during the last war. Many of the plants were actually bombed. A great number of British industries were changed over from a peace-time basis to a war-time basis; and the British were given as their part in the team the very task of changing their industries over from a peace-time basis to a war-time basis and were dependent upon the United States for their peace-time production. This is why the British were hurt so seriously when lease-lend was cancelled immediately at the close of the war.

Another important matter is this, that for about six years the youth of Great Britain have been trained in producing war material and consequently lack the skills and the facilities necessary to produce peace-time goods. Meanwhile a good many of the techniques in connection with peace-time production have been changed, so that even some who were skilled do not find themselves exactly qualified to produce at the present time. That is the first thing.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Then, with respect to British foreign investments, they have lost a tremendous amount of those foreign investments because they had to liquidate them to get raw materials with which to fight the war. Consequently, as the Minister of Finance points out, they can no longer depend on them to anything like the same degree as a source of income.

Then, at least one-third of the carrying ships of Great Britain have been destroyed in the war. They have been sunk or otherwise lost; they are not there; consequently the British are not able to use them as a means of deriving income.

This is only a part of all that has gone on. One could go into much greater detail. But the result of the whole study would be to show that the British capacity to produce goods is seriously impaired; and if we are to restore the British to the position in which they will be able to fight again in case they have the need to fight—and they may have to, in a very short time—we shall have to make every possible effort to see that they have the goods necessary to enable them to restore themselves to a high degree of productive capacity and financial strength.

What can Canada do about this whole matter? Some of us are beginning to suffer a little because of a shortage of goods, but I do not think many of us here in Canada have suffered much so far. There are some things we have to get along without. But the trouble in Great Britain is that the people have to get along without nearly all the things we enjoy. It is astonishing how seriously their diet is impaired. It must be borne in mind that these people have been enduring these conditions for five years. If we do not advance the goods to them they are going to have greater austerity than they had even during the war. How can one expect people who are impaired physically by malnutrition or undernutrition to be capable of a high measure of production. All that I am saying at the present time has quite obviously to do with defence. If Britain is to be strong and ready to fight again in case of need we must help to make her capable, and the only way to do that is to supply her with the goods which she cannot produce and which she can obtain only by trading exports for them.

I am going to sum up by making this statement. It is expedient that Canada should aid Britain to be strong. It is expedient that we should grant this loan, and greater loans still, if the British find that they need them. It is expedient that we should grant the loan so that Britain may be capable of being our ally in case of another war, that she may be a good market for Canada in times of peace, and that she may contribute to the general prosperity of mankind.

I am sure that every hon. member is well aware that many of the goods Britain produces are of extreme importance to the other nations of the world, and that there is a high demand in the world for those goods. The world cannot have as high a standard of living as is possible unless Britain is able to produce such goods. If, by reason of the want of a loan such as this, Britain cannot produce those goods, the result will be an impairment of the general standard of living, of well-being and of prosperity throughout the world. The Minister of Finance pointed out that Britain was our A-1 customer. She is indeed our A-1 customer; and she was the A-1 customer of thirty-one nations before the war. How many people know that? She imported more than any other nation of the goods produced by thirty-one countries. To what a tremendous extent, then, the general prosperity of the world depends upon the prosperity of Britain, and upon her capacity to import goods and to pay for them, must be obvious to all.

Finally, I think we all agree that Canada is able to lend the money. We may be afraid of the debt—I am afraid of the debt—but there are things we all dread more than debt; otherwise this house would not have sat calmly by and encouraged the government to incur fifteen billions of debt while the country was at war. Yes, Mr. Chairman, there are things we fear more than we fear debt, and there are things in the future that we need to fear more than we fear the debt that will be incurred. If we have to raise many billions as debt to pay for goods, as long as we are struggling with the present financial system, let us raise the money and supply the goods to Britain.

There is another aspect of the question that will have a strong appeal to every member of the house; that is the moral aspect. It is morally right that Canada should make this loan to Great Britain. In the first place, the war expenditures of Great Britain were proportionately greater than those of any other allied country. Everyone knows how we naturally react to the spectacle of any one member of the team bearing a heavier burden than the rest. It is beneath our national self-respect to allow Britain to continue to bear a greater burden financially than we are bearing.

Taxation in Britain was on a scale never before reached in any country in the world, I am told. Can we sit idly by and witness such a state of affairs and do nothing about it and still feel that we can respect ourselves nationally?

Britain bore more than her share of the international financial burden of the war. She provided more goods on mutual aid to Russia, the United States and other nations of the world. She bore a greater international burden than any other one of the allied countries. Can we contemplate that without a twinge of conscience?

Britain faces a more difficult international trade position to-day than any other nation, as the minister has well pointed out. We naturally wish to help those whose ability has been impaired. Notice how readily, in any community, people contribute to the rebuilding of a home that has been destroyed by fire, especially when the sufferer is poor. Surely the same principle works internationally, especially when the country affected is a very close friend—and certainly Britain has never done anything which should deprive her of a title to the friendship of the Canadian people. For the reasons I have outlined, Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that the Social Credit group will enthusiastically support this loan to Britain.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, at the risk of being alone I wish to register my opposition to the principle embodied in the resolution. I do not propose to go into a detailed discussion of the principle of the bill which will be based on this resolution, but I desire to take this opportunity of expressing my strong opposition to that principle. I wish also to express sentiments that I have voiced in this house on previous occasions with reference to proposals of this kind.

History will have to take note of the fact that when it comes to the consideration of proposals relating to what is called the British empire there is no difference between one side of the house and the other. All the members of this House of Commons, with very few exceptions, always agree when a proposal is made to help to sustain the prestige, the grandeur and the prosperity of the United Kingdom.

We have heard during the last few days very beautiful words and strong expressions of opinion about Canadian citizenship. Well, if you bring these principles, these ideas, together with the sentiments that have been expressed this afternoon, under serious consideration, I think you will find a strong and a definite conflict of ideas and of principles.

Without any intention of offending the views or the sentiments of anyone in this house, I persist in calling this proposal another gift which is being made by the small fellow to the big fellow. The sum involved is, $1,250,000,000. What is that in the exchequer of the United Kingdom? A drop of water in the bucket, if not in the sea; and we get all excited about it, as if the whole world were going to crumble if we did not grant this new gift to a country which is ten times, fifty times richer than we are.

One has only to look at the map of the world to see the interests that the United Kingdom holds all over the globe wherever there is something of any value in the soil. This gift that we are proposing to make is out of proportion to our capacity for paying. The last speaker said that Britain was taxed to a higher degree than any other country, and he added, "I am told". If he will look at the figures he will discover that, in proportion, Canada is the most heavily taxed country of all those that participated in the war, and we had less interest than any other participating country. It is beyond our means, beyond our capacity, to make a gift of this kind at this particular time when we need so many things to help our country to recover from the false economy of the war to a reasonable and fair and durable economy for the time of peace.

We were told by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) who made an able speech—he is always impressive when he gets on his feet and argues on any question—that if we did not agree to this proposal we might find ourselves between a financial organization at the head of which would be the United Kingdom, and the United States organization, and that Canada would be placed in a position to suffer very much if we did not agree to help the United Kingdom to revive her trade and to revive at the same time the whole trade of the world. I should like to hear any hon. member of this house state seriously that all that Canada did during the last war is to be lost if we do not agree to this last loan or gift that we are asked to make to the United Kingdom.

We were told by Britishers themselves that up to the present time Canada has done splendid work. Some of them have said, somewhat lightly, but with a large amount of truth: "We should not ask Canada to go any farther than what she has up to the present time, because the effort that Canada has made is beyond all expectation of any reasonable citizen, even of the United Kingdom." I do not propose for the moment to discuss certain arguments that have been advanced here. I reserve for a later day the right to go into more detail and make more comprehensive comparisons between our position and the position in which the United Kingdom finds itself at the present time. At the moment I do not want to delay the proceedings of the committee. If the resolution passes I ask that it be passed on division, because I do not agree with the principle embodied in it. I am convinced that there is no necessity, and no necessity has been shown, for Canada to enter into such an agreement on terms which are more favourable to the United Kingdom and more difficult for Canada than the terms of the United States loan. We still have in our ears the voices of citizens of the United Kingdom advocating that the proposed United States loan should be refused. In the circumstances I wish to make my position clear and definite. In the past I have been opposed to the renewal of such gifts. At first they were properly described as gifts. Later on, they were called by another name—mutual aid. Now it is called a loan to be reimbursed in fifty years from now. Really it all amounts to the same thing.

The agreement contains a clause waiving all interest if at a certain period in the economic life of the United Kingdom they feel that they are not in a position to pay the interest. Well, I am opposed to that.

I think it is time that Canada took a definite step and spoke for herself instead of speaking for the British empire as we are doing all the time. Where is the Canadian spirit in this house? There is none.

A few days ago some hon. members spoke about hyphenated names. Heavens, if the bill which the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) introduced to create a Canadian citizenship should pass, we shall be in the very same position of having a hyphenated name—Canadian citizen-British subject!

We are part of the British empire, and I claim, without any desire of offending the views of anyone, that we are not a sovereign country. We may be by strict interpretation of certain laws; but in practice we are to a large extent what we were before, colonials. We have somewhat increased the liberties that we have enjoyed in the past; certain things are not imposed on us any more by the front door, but suggestions are made to us through the back door and we obey them. Those things happened during the last war and there are indications that they are still continuing throughout; the order is coming from outside in all things relating to our economy, finances and commerce.

I am not afraid of the future of my country, even if my country is left alone. Even if my country is left between the sterling bloc and the United States I have enough confidence in Canada to feel that Canada is capable of coming through her difficulties and achieving a prominent place among the important nations of the world, even though she is not assisted by the one side or the other. Let us be ourselves; let us think for ourselves, and let us think of our future, the future of Canada. It is with these views, not complete I admit, and not the result of any preparation, that I express my opposition to the principle embodied in the resolution. I would agree to the passing of the resolution, but with the conventional term of "on division".

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to see the resolution go through before six o'clock and the bill introduced. I compliment the government on this particular resolution. Notwithstanding what the preceding speaker has said, it follows out the principle laid down thirty years ago by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding when they offered aid to the mother country in the form of preferential trade, without asking anything in return. The resolution which precedes the bill will assist the mother country which suffered so terribly in the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to see the resolution pass. The principle of the loan is exchange of goods and services for goods and services. It is not like the United States loan, exchange of goods and services for debt or gold. I should like to see the government go farther and offer further aid later on, and with what Australia and New Zealand have done to assist the mother country at this particular time, the United States loan could be done without. I should like to see the government thus go farther if necessary. It is good business, first, last and all the time, as everybody will admit, because Britain was always our sure and best customer. The resolution has shown what Canada has done. It will give aid to the mother country as aid from Canada is being given France to recover herself.

In conclusion, I may say that under paragraph (d) I am glad Canada is cancelling the debt for the air scheme. I believe that is due the mother country. Our army, navy and air force were unprepared. Britain, save for the aid of the dominions, for two years prevented an invasion of our shores, which would have cost us much more than $400 million.

I hope the government when they borrow this sum of $1,250 million will do something to lessen the cost of these loans. As we know, we have paid heavily for some loans. We can borrow by private loans and negotiations, or we can call for tenders. The latter method has been proved most successful in Washington. We saw an example the other day where a company from Cleveland secured refunding at some cost of the debt of the whole city of Montreal.

I believe the people of Canada, Australia and New Zealand will rejoice to see that the dominions are as an economic unit, coming to the help of the mother country in her hour of trouble.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: I have great admiration for the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres, but I am sorry that he has taken the stand which he has with regard to this particular resolution. As I see it, such a position will be regarded by others as though there was a division between us at a time when unity is necessary. We should hang together as we did during the war, and did so well, or we shall hang separately and the British empire will be no more.

I supported the cause of France and the defence loan. The Minister of Finance made very fine statements regarding both loans and the resolution is an illustration of equality of treatment. The minister should be commended for the stand he has taken. We must not forget that when the war first started we were without an army, navy or air force. Our safety depended mainly upon Britain's supremacy of the sea. That saved the St. Lawrence river and the maritimes, Quebec and Ontario and the eastern provinces from the awful invasion we might have had. Axis submarines did later get up as far as Gaspe and near Rivière du Loup.

I always rejoice in the fact that we should always learn something from the lessons of history regarding this particular resolution. As I say, I have supported both loans, the one to Britain and the one to France. It is good business to aid Britain, our best customer. As has been said by a great historian, W. McNeil Dixon:

> Civilizations arise, and continue to exist—and all history is the witness to the truth—when conditions are hard only when they are continually threatened, only when they are determined to maintain and defend their rule.

As I see it, in many places war is still going on and we have yet to win the peace. As I would say in answer to the hon. gentleman who preceded me, history has taught us something about the stand he has taken. As this historian says:

They (the nations) decline and fall when the external pressure is removed, or rather the inner spirit decays. The surrender may disguise itself in many forms, of which humanitarian sentiment is one. "If a country," wrote F. S. Oliver, "will not stand up for its rights, it must surely lose them. The spirit of giving in is the most fatal disease to which nations are subject, and it is apt to attack them, like a cancer, when they have arrived at the meridian."

We rejoice in the many freedoms we have had in this country from time immemorial. We have had all the freedoms set out in the Atlantic charter. I wish to compliment the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres upon being such a splendid citizen of this country. I do not think anyone in the house admires him more than I do, I believe he will regret not supporting this loan. There is one lesson which he should learn and which he apparently has forgotten. As I said, I supported the French loan because I think we can help to rebuild that great country. The minister has done his duty in that connection. I support the loan to Britain because I think it is good business and will mean a great deal of business. As this great historian at Glasgow university, Mr. W. McNeil Dixon, in the Gifford Lectures, "The Human Situation," said:

You may, indeed, conclude that you will have neither part nor lot in the rivalry, you may wash your hands of responsibility for the madness and folly of mankind, you may renounce the contests, and refuse the challenges of ambitious competitors for your place and power, you may elect to leave its future to the bullies of the world.

Is that what we are going to do? We are not out of the woods yet. Are we going to leave our future to the bullies of the world? I continue:

But it should be obvious that if the heart be set on nothing the earth contains or offers, nothing in the manner of the earth will be done there.

I cannot forget how the enemy came past St. Pierre and Miquelon, how they were found in the many inlets in our great gulf. We had a closed session of the house regarding that matter. After the fall of Dunkirk and after Dieppe the United States thought Britain was done for and they asked that Britain should not surrender her fleet to Germany. I have always had a great deal of respect for hon. gentlemen from Quebec. I know nearly all of them. Many of them come to our city and they find that there is no bigotry there. There is no racial or religious jealousy, because our people are hard-working and they find they must hustle too much to make a living without bothering themselves about smaller matters. We should try to carry into peace the same unity as we had in war and not forget that we might have been invaded, only for Britain's aid and the aid of the dominions. The United States thought Great Britain was done and that Canada was done.

I believe the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres and others will regret the stand they have taken on this particular matter. The United States took the same stand at the time of Dunkirk; they thought Great Britain and her dominions were done. Let me quote one more paragraph in conclusion to show our hon. friends they are wrong and will regret their stand because history always repeats itself.

When England's day comes to an end the principles which have contributed to its coming, Christian, pacifist, or whatever they may be styled, will not thereby be strengthened. On the contrary, such is the irony which pervades things human, they will have brought about their own eclipse, their own dissolution, and the triumph of the opposing principles. The decline and fall of England, which will rejoice her enemies, will not be England's decline and fall only, but of all for which she stood, and not till then shall we know the extent of our miseries. I, at least, am not of the opinion that humanity, justice, freedom, no, nor Christianity, will be gainers in that fall.

I hope that we shall have little further discussion of this loan, although I respect and appreciate the opinions of the younger members who come from the great province of Quebec. We have always had absolute unity in this country and the people of my city will never forget the land of France, where, in the last war, over 6,000 of my fellow citizens lie buried until resurrection day. They went to the aid of France with the 1,000,000 men who went from the British dominions, 130,000 of whom fell in the war, and they went there as citizens of dominions enjoying their own sovereignty, their own autonomy, their own independent status.

We have in the Minister of Finance a gentleman who has always been very kind and courteous to all the members in the house. He has borne a lot of the burden of the day and I rejoiced to see him honoured by His Majesty on the 1st of January last. I believe that history will record that he played a noble part in trying to save the mother country by this resolution at the most acute hour in history.

I should like, in conclusion, to quote one paragraph from Mr. Churchill on empire unity:

Let no man underrate the abiding power of the British empire and commonwealth. Because you see forty-six millions on our island harassed about their food supply, or because we have difficulty restarting our industries and export trade after six years of passionate war effort, do not suppose that we shall not come through these dark years of privation as we have come through the glorious years of agony, or that half a century from now you will not see seventy or eighty millions of Britons spread about the world and united in defence of our traditions, our way of life and of the world causes you and we espouse.

Britain and her dominions entered the war looking for nothing. They thought of nothing but the freedom of the human race, French and English. We have always, all races, got on splendidly together in this country. When this loan from Canada to Great Britain was announced in the British House of Commons the news was received with applause and it was also applauded in New Zealand and Australia. We are now on the eve of the coming of our new governor general. I believe we have in him a man who will unify all classes of people in this country. He comes straight from the battlefields where he fought side by side with our soldiers he led in the glorious cause of freedom.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that I cannot agree with my hon. friend the member for Broadview any more than he himself did agree with the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres. This loan raises no question with respect to the new governor general. What we have before us is a resolution concerning a so-called loan of $1,250,000,000 to Great Britain. I am speaking in this debate because as a member I have a right to speak and no one can deprive me of that right unless the rules of the house are changed. I will protest very strongly against any change in the rules because I enjoy my rights and I want my colleagues in this house to enjoy their rights.

I do not see why we should pass this measure without scrutinizing it, and the members who would follow that course will be blamed when they return to their constituents. Opinions are free. One may be for the measure; another may be against it, and another may be open-minded, as I am myself, waiting to decide how I should vote upon it. But my right to speak now on this measure is as unquestionable as is the right of any other hon. member, and I say again that I do not see why we should rush to put this measure through at full speed.

A lot of surprising things have been said. To-day I saw among my clippings one from a Montreal daily of February 18, 1937, and I shall read only one headline to show what bunk is talked by statesmen. I quote:

U.K. will not ask dominions to help pay defence cost, Chamberlain tells house.

Everyone cheered when he said that, just as people cheer when just as foolish utterances come from statesmen here or anywhere else. Was he a good prophet, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario called Lord Keynes?

Mr. COLDWELL: What paper was my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. POULIOT: I will send it over to my hon. friend.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to know the name of the paper.

Mr. POULIOT: The Montreal Gazette. The type is big enough for my hon. friend to read it across the aisle.

Mr. COLDWELL: Almost.

Mr. POULIOT: Chamberlain was not serious. He was talking bunk to the house, and he was cheered—hurrah, hurrah, very fine! They have a curious way of understanding things in England. I will quote something else which was said by another former prime minister of Great Britain, Lord Baldwin, in a book that I will pass over to any hon. member who wants to read it. It is important that we understand their state of mind. The quotation I am about to give is from a speech delivered by the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin at Empire day and Coronation banquet of the Combined Empire Societies, London, on May 24, 1937. It is from one of the dozen last speeches that he made before retiring as prime minister. He said:

If you will only do as I have done, study the history of the growth of the constitution from the time of the civil war until the Hanoverians came to the throne, you will see what a country can do without the aid of logic, but with the aid of common sense.

That I cannot understand—without logic but with common sense. For me, common sense is logic, but for him it had a different meaning. He went on:

Therefore my next point is: Do not let us put any part of our constitution in a strait-waistcoat, because strangulation is the ultimate fate. And I would say one more thing: Don't let us be too keen on definition.

I do not think the measure now before the house will put this country in a strait-waistcoat. I think it will put this country in a strait-jacket.

The only difference between the right hon. Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is that the latter is more intimate with Mr. Hugh Dalton. That is the only difference between them. They all think similarly. The hon. member for Lethbridge, the former leader of the Social Credit group, is, if I correctly understood what he said, even more enthusiastic about these measures.

Mr. MacINNIS: You have no doubt of that.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. I do not wish to offend my hon. friends who are just in front of me, but I do not believe in the present government of Britain, and I believe also that all they said about the nationalization of the Old Lady of Threadneedle street is just for the gallery.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do you believe in the present government of Canada?

Mr. POULIOT: I say this for the reason that the former governor has been chosen as governor by the present government. His name is rather funny; it is Lord Catto. Never mind; Catto was good enough for Churchill and he is good enough for Attlee. The same old system continues.

The main reason why I am opposed to the finance schemes of the government is that the experts who advise them are those whom I denounced twelve, thirteen or fourteen years ago when they were appointed by Viscount Bennett, then Prime Minister. They were chosen by a Conservative prime minister and chosen by him alone. I do not know whether he consulted the leader of the Liberal party about the matter; I asked the question and Mr. Bennett said No, and that was the reason for me that it was Yes. But the fact is that those great experts were appointed under a Conservative government, and sometimes I was alone in denouncing them. I was often rebuked, even by my leader, because I denounced them. At that time there was a Conservative government in charge of the business of the country, and therefore things went wrong much sooner than they do when the party in power is the Liberal party.

Mr. MacINNIS: But still they go wrong.

Mr. POULIOT: It does not mean that they are any better. However, I will not mention them by name. My hon. friends agree with me.

An hon. MEMBER: Just at this moment.

Mr. POULIOT: But for ten years I was alone in denouncing them by name and asking the government to fire them. I had no support, and I regret deeply that the leader of the C.C.F. group never supported me in removing these obstacles from the way. He was quite ready to describe the evil situation which was created by that intelligentzia, which is similar to the one that brought revolution to Russia, but he stopped there. I notice that the hon. member for Regina City seems to be very alert; I hope he will give a tip to his leader at times to support me.

Let it be understood well, Mr. Chairman, that I am ready to support any measure to help the British people so long as that help serves that purpose. I have said so already. But I do not believe that we are now in a position to make a gift of such magnitude to a country which is called the mother country by those who describe themselves as true Canadians. I hope you will understand well what is my point.

A statement was made by one of the ministers yesterday or the day before, and last week, to the effect that it was impossible to help those who were suffering from any infirmity because it would cost too much. When the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) moved a resolution with regard to health, and the hon. member for Vancouver East moved one regarding old age pensions, they were told that we have not the means to provide this assistance. But now we have the means not only to finance the United Kingdom but to finance the sterling area. This is incredible. We cannot do it. We have not the backbone to do that; we have not at the present time the population to do it, and we have not the means to do it. When anyone wants to help those in need in this country, our own people, the answer given is, no, we cannot do it; we have not the means to do it. But when it comes to the financing of the sterling area money comes so easily. It reminds me of all the reforms we were advocating before the war; it was impossible to get a satisfactory answer. But as soon as the war came all the sluices were wide open; the money flowed. It was easy to find money for the war, but it is impossible to find money for Canadians. If it is urged that family allowances are for the benefit of our own folk, the answer given is that if this measure does not pass there will be no more family allowances, and the people who have saved money, sometimes were forced to save money, to buy victory bonds, will not get anything when they go to the bank to change their coupons. That is not the way, I believe, in which discussion should be carried on upon a matter of such magnitude. I suffered humiliation because I accused Bennett of having lent $60 million to the Canadian Pacific Railway company without consulting the members of his cabinet, and the then Speaker called me to order, without having the right to do so, in spite of the rules of the house, which I knew much better than he did. However

I made a concession for the sake of the party. At the time I denounced Bennett because he lent $60 million to the C.P.R., without consulting his cabinet. What about making a gift of a billion and a quarter to Great Britain without consulting the supporters of the government in this house? This I cannot understand, nor can I agree with it, because I am a Liberal and I believe we must stick together. We must be consulted before any matter of such importance is decided upon.

Mr. HOMUTH: I thought you had a caucus once in a while.

Mr. POULIOT: When I talk of Liberalism my hon. friend cannot understand anything.

What surprises me also is that in this time of distress, when we are told it is impossible to get any money for the poor, for those who suffer any infirmity, the Bank of Canada gets bigger and bigger. They have now bought two buildings for $1,170,000. They are growing up. Some day I will take the house into my confidence and tell my colleagues the story of the Bank of Canada, how it came on the programme of the Liberal party and how it was stolen from the Liberal party by Mr. Bennett; and if the Bank of Canada was ever amongst the fourteen points of the Liberal party I will tell you why. It was one more point to win Oxford and other by-elections. That is all. That is why the Bank of Canada has been put in the beggar's bag, with a few other things—just to offer something concrete to the electorate at the time.

An hon. MEMBER: Your party would not do anything like that, would they?

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend should not be scandalized; they do worse than that. But my hon. friends over there do not enjoy the freedom we enjoy on this side of the house in the Liberal party. If I were a C.C.F. member and spoke as I am speaking now as a Liberal I would probably be censured by the hon. member himself.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, then, the hon. gentleman is a Liberal. Now, Mr. Chairman, here we are being greatly generous. This is $1,250,000,000, and it is well arranged. There was an understanding between the United Kingdom envoys and the government and they fixed up their war claims. What it is we do not know. I did not expect the Minister of Finance to make a plea for the adoption of the resolution this afternoon; I expected him to give a complete exposé of the situation and to inform the members of the house of the situation. But after we had listened to him we knew no more than after having read the agreement. I expected more details about the matter and I will tell him the kind of details I want.

In the first place, in this country we have what is called a temperate climate. We have not a tropical climate. But Great Britain has possessions in the West Indies; it has Trinidad, Jamaica, the Bahama islands. Why should we not put in our claim for these in return, as a guarantee for what we have been doing financially for them? It is not only a question of a a billion and a quarter; it is a question of all that we have done for England since the beginning of the war. I remember the first time the first billion dollars was voted. What was the reaction in England? What appeared in the morning press was that it was taken very calmly in England, and I as a member of parliament had to remind Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden, after they had come here and forgotten to thank us for our help, our monetary help, in the very chamber that had voted these gifts. I reminded them of all this. At a meeting in the city of New York or Washington—one of them—where the Prime Minister of Canada was present, Mr. Churchill said that the help that Canada had given to the united nations, and especially to the United Kingdom, was massive. Afterwards, I said here in this house that evidently Mr. Churchill never failed to read the speeches made by Jean-François Pouliot in the House of Commons. Why should we not have Bermuda? Why should we not have Jamaica, with its rum, its sugar, its molasses? Why should we not have the bananas of Trinidad? We should have something.

An hon. MEMBER: We have no bananas.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but something should be done. The matter is too sacrosanct to be discussed as a business proposition when Englishmen come here with their brief cases in which they put everything they can get in this country. They make several trips and have larger bags and cases, and all the stores in town are empty after a delegation has been here. Well, they do not talk of business; they talk of sentiment. But sentiment, sentimentality, does not exist in the mind or heart of an Englishman when he does business with someone, and if he saw anyone acting sentimentally—and Canada is the only country in the world to-day that does so—he would say, "That fellow is crazy".

I will not say that of anyone in this country, but I think it of this measure. I think it is silly and crazy. It is not only a question of having something territorial as a guarantee of what is being done and what has been done by Canada for Great Britain.

There are other things too. There are securities, bonds and stocks now in England, controlled by foreigners. I will give a brief resume to show what they are; and every time it is the same thing. We are told that with this amount we shall redeem securities. A small amount, a small slice, a very small slice comes back to this country, and the rest stays in England—I will tell the committee why—or is sent to the United States via Toronto. Here we have nothing or very little. Mark you, sir, over a billion and a half in securities, bonds and stocks is over there. The cartels should be owned in Canada by Canadians. Cartels make colonies out of dominions, as has been stated repeatedly.

There is still a large quantity of C.N.R. stock, securities; over 60 per cent of Canadian Pacific in London, Paris and Amsterdam, and they control, mark you, sir, Consolidated Smelters and Western Lands also to a large extent. There is Hudson's Bay, Lever Brothers, Lazard Frères, who are interested in so many concerns, Canadian collieries—my hon. friends from the west know what that is—the match combine of Bryant and May of London and Sweden, H. F. Ritchie and Company who control Eno's and lots of medicines, Red Rose Tea, International Nickel, Courtauld's Rayon Companies and C.I.L., besides others. There are municipal securities and bonds of Montreal and Moose Jaw and other places. When the directors of an organization like Canadian Industries Limited are Canadian they are just stooges to international finance. My hon. friends who listen to me now would fall from their seats if they knew who is the president of Courtauld's in Montreal. They will find it in the book in the library.

British taxes are less owing to the allowance for the corporation tax and special allowances for what the company has paid. When the company pays 40 per cent it is deducted from the 60 per cent charged to the shareholder taxpayer. Here the charge is 60 per cent, without any reduction. I do not see why all that wealth which should belong to the Canadian people has not been brought back here, just as all the stocks, securities and bonds of the Indian railways have been called back to India, not by Hindus but by Englishmen engaged in business there, and just as all the South African securities have been brought back from England to South Africa by Smuts, mark you, who is a dandy imperialist.

Britain has been planning how to carry on if the loan were refused, and Britain insists that France pay all claims in gold. I kept something in reserve. It is an excerpt from the Financial Post quoting an interview with Keynes. Canada has been giving help to thirteen countries, owing to the advice of these experts in whom it is impossible to have any trust. It is impossible for the farmers, for those engaged in lumbering or any other occupation to have any trucks, and what do I see? I see that Finland, a country with which Canada has been at war without sending a single soldier there, now receives Ford trucks built in Canada, though from the experience of all hon. members it is impossible to secure any trucks in our own country. How is it that they are sent as far as Finland, an enemy country, while we have not even yet made peace with Finland? We send our trucks there; yet when farmers in any part of this country want trucks they have to beg them on their knees, and sometimes it is a very long time before they get a satisfactory answer. It is absurd. Why should we serve these countries outside Canada while our people are in need of these things? What I say now I could repeat anywhere in this country. I could repeat it in tory Toronto or anywhere else, and I am sure it would find an echo in the minds of all those who are patriotic enough to look at the matter reasonably.

I know some will say I am not a loyal Canadian because I want my people to be served before any stranger or foreigner. I think it is a shame that we should not look after our own people, who made such sacrifices during the war, in order to give benefits to enemies of Canada, to send help to thirteen other countries. We are supporting the sterling area. Is there anything crazier than that? It is a handicap to our trade. It is most difficult to trade with countries outside the sterling area as long as we are in it. What was the first idea of that organization? It was the German zollverein, at the time of Napoleon. It was a union between the grand duchy of Baden and Prussia, and at first it was a commercial union. There was no sense of business in all the war financing, and it is time to say so. I remember what Mr. Aberhart said about that kind of financing before he died. He said it was wrong, and he was right in saying it was wrong.

I speak with great sincerity, and the committee honours me by listening; but how is it that it is impossible to reduce taxation as it has been reduced in the United States, where last fall twelve million people were relieved from taxation by President Truman by the stroke of a pen, and in Great Britain, where taxation now has also been reduced? I wonder if the help we are giving to Great Britain now, which will increase the burden of taxation on the shoulders of our Canadian fellow citizens, will not help to relieve the people of the United Kingdom of their own burden of taxation. I do not know if hon. members have read an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of April 10, but if they have not I should like to read it for them:

> The budget forecast for 1946-47 presented by the Right Hon. Hugh Dalton, chancellor of the exchequer, called for a decisive cut of approximately $7·5 billions, or thirty-one per cent in total outlay . . .
> The only alternative would have been continuance of deficit financing and burdensome borrowing. But a firm retreat from such policy is marked by a drop of 68 per cent in the 1946-47 deficit compared with the past year.

Then it goes on to compare the United Kingdom and Canada.

> Both countries levied the tax on a one hundred per cent basis during the war, but Britain led the way in dropping it to 60 per cent—at which level it now stand in Canada—and has now acted first to wipe it out entirely.

It will be said that Canada will meet with disaster, that it will be the end of the world if we change that agreement. No, sir. Trade must be free and it is a barter. I remember what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he notified us of the appointment of our first and only consul general in the city of New York. He told us he would work in cooperation with the representatives of the United Kingdom. That is wrong, because Canada must be financially independent; Canada must be economically independent; and we are not to be under the tutelage of the United Kingdom any more than under the tutelage of the United States in regard to trade. We must be masters of our trade; and if there is any difficulty between a Canadian and an Englishman the consul and the government shall stand behind the Canadian and fight the Englishman on the trade proposition.

I find it most unfortunate to have to say this. We are told here that there are to be new contracts for Canadian foodstuffs. Mr. MacLeod of the British United Press went to England during the war and came back with this news, which is clear and obvious to all. He said after the war is over, the question of trade will not be one of gratitude; it will be one of business; and if England can find cheaper goods in other parts of the world than in Canada, she will buy them there. That is normal; I do not disagree with it. What I find childish and silly is the suggestion that Englishmen, with their sense of business, will put aside centuries of tradition to adopt the views of the Canadian government and say, "After you, my dear Alphonse; after you, my dear Gaston." One who takes that view cannot have read a line of the history of England. I have the greatest admiration for Englishmen. They come here and they are the masters of the land; Canadians must be put aside when the Englishman says, "How do you do? Ho, ho; fine country, Canada." Every hon. member laughs, but every hon. member knows that is true. They come here as conquerors. Each Englishman who comes here to make a bargain with the Canadian government is like Julius Caesar when he went to Britain for the first time. He is a conqueror. He reminds me of the child who was writing figures on the blackboard. "Il pose zéro et retient tout". That is the way it is done. It is a principle of business; it is the principle the Canadian government should have.

Is it reasonable to think there has been last fall a lowering of taxation in the United States to exempt twelve million people at the stroke of President Truman's pen, a reduction of taxation to that extent, and which is going on in England now; yet it is impossible to get a guarantee in this country that bachelors, single people, will receive some relief, that their burden will not be alleviated to $1,000, and for married couples without children to at least $2,000?

The other day when a question was asked about a reduction in expenditures a minister answered: "There is no question of reducing taxation; the question is one of reducing expenditures." We hear hon. members in the Progressive Conservative party talk about reduced expenditures. I say to them this: Support us in asking at least something in return for those agreements signed not long ago.

How much was I abused during the war; how many times have I been called traitor when I asked only for a recognition of what had been done by this country! If I put my hand in my pocket I find there a sentence uttered by the Minister of Finance either last fall or last spring. I cannot conceive of his saying this, and yet he did say that Canada was not a creditor nation; that our people owed more to other countries than other countries owed to Canada. After that, how can he say that this measure is not a pure gift. The mutual aid bill, and all those measures were gifts. They were sentimental gifts, and that was said in the house. If to-day we have some difficulty with the other united nations and if we have some difficulty with our own folk, because enemy countries are favoured at the expense of our own, it is due precisely to the fact, that not only is this country under the yoke of UNO, but it is also under the yoke of UNRRA, and we are not masters of our own destiny. When we fight for the recognition of freedom, not of single individuals, but the freedom of the country at large, we fight for the cause of each one. We fight for the cause of liberty. We fight against that octopus which is trying to control our national resources, the octopus of international finance which I have denounced repeatedly by name in this house, but without support. However, I hope that next time I do so I shall have the support of someone—at least that of my C.C.F. friend who was so nice to me just a minute ago.

I thank the committee for having listened, and I hope that my colleagues, whom I respect, will never think that one is biased because, although not anti-British, he is pro-Canadian.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, this afternoon, the Right Honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked members to refrain from an extensive discussion of the resolution since we will have an opportunity of outlining our objections when the bill is submitted for second reading. I will therefore postpone my remarks expressing my disapproval.

However, as the resolution embodies a principle against which I struggled all through the war, and which I feel all the more justified in opposing now that the war is over, I deem it proper to register my disapproval without delay.

Looking closely at the resolution, we find that the Right Honourable Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is introducing a measure seeking, among other things, "to cancel the amount owing by the government of the United Kingdom to the government of Canada with respect to the British commonwealth air training plan, being the sum of four hundred and twenty-five million dollars". This afternoon, discussion has taken place mainly on the loan and nothing has been said about this out-and-out gift, this direct contribution of $425 millions to a country which at the very moment it requested this gift, or should I say received it, was lending money to another country, with interest.

In the second place, we are also asked to settle for $150 million another debt the details of which we do not know and which we have reason to believe a much greater than that sum. That is another direct gift.

In the third place, we are asked to lend without interest for five years the amount of one thousand two hundred and fifty million dollars on the understanding that at the end of those five years we shall decide whether to claim interest. In other words, more money gone with the wind.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

What will these loan gifts and presents achieve? They will simply make it possible for Great Britain to advance money to other nations thus developing her commercial relations and maintaining her supremacy over world trade. To my mind we who are citizens of Canada have no right to levy taxes on our fellow countrymen in order that Great Britain may lend money to other nations.

This afternoon, the Right Hon. Minister of Finance gave the impression that the donor rather than the recipient of a gift ought to be grateful. What a strange reasoning! . . . We have now come to misrepresenting the meaning of words; gratitude is no longer expected of the recipient of a gift but of his benefactor. The borrower who is advanced an interest-free loan, that is, a worthless investment which is nothing but a gift in disguise, is no longer required to be thankful since the shoe is now on the other foot and it behooves the benefactor to show gratitude. I am not ready to accept this argument, and I wanted to register my disapproval without delay, postponing until the second reading of the bill a more detailed discussion of my objections.

(Text):

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Rimouski): Mr. Chairman, I think a voice from the province of Quebec should be heard to-night in defence of the resolution before us. This resolution does not represent an entirely new policy of the Liberal party. In my view it is the continuation of a policy which was adopted during the war under dire exigencies.

I consider I have a right to discuss this matter because judgment has been passed upon it by the electorate of my constituency. "Billions to England" was the cry of every Nationalist, every member of the Bloc Populaire and every independent member during the last election. In my own constituency the most forceful denunciator was the former member of parliament and he made many speeches. Previously he had separated from his party; after denouncing it in this house in the most violent terms, he crossed the floor of the chamber. During the campaign I defended the government to the best of my humble ability. The good people of the constituency of Rimouski had every opportunity to form an opinion. On polling day they gave their verdict and here I am to speak for them.

It seems to me that Canada's relations with the United Kingdom, even the purely commercial relations, are the greatest occasion for misunderstanding and misinterpretation. Our relations with other countries on approximately the same basis are not even questioned. Under the Export Credit Insurance Act loans have been authorized and made to other countries but never a word has been said. This afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) tabled full details of all these loans. At the beginning of the session a question was asked and the answer appears in Hansard at page 358. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) asked for the details of loans and gifts made by Canada to other nations, and the following information was given:

U.S.S.R.	$13,000,000
Norway	13,000,000
Netherlands Indies	15,000,000
Czechoslovakia	19,000,000
Belgium	25,000,000
China	60,000,000
Netherlands	125,000,000
France	242,000,000
Total	$512,000,000

These loans were considered by every nationalist as good business.

(Translation):

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BELZILE: Certainly.

Mr. RAYMOND: Did those loans which you have just mentioned bear interest or were they interest-free?

Mr. BELZILE: According to the report of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) the interest rate ranges between 2½ and 3 per cent.

Mr. LALONDE (Labelle): He was not in the house this afternoon.

(Text):

Mr. BELZILE: If these loans were considered as purely business matters, I humbly submit that the present loan should be considered in the same way although it does involve a large amount of money. As was said by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), it should be appraised and judged solely in the light of the general interest of Canada and of its people. It should be judged from a purely selfish and egotistical point of view. In extending a loan a businessman or a man on the street has two things to consider. First, he must consider his own personal situation and. second, he must consider the solvency of the borrower. That is a good rule and it should be applied to the present case.

What is the financial situation of Canada? The statistics that I am about to give were obtained from the Canada Year Book for 1945. National income forms the fundamental basis of revenue. When national income is considered in relation to national revenue or taxes it faithfully portrays the economic position of a country. From 1933, the darkest year of the depression, Canada's national income has risen from $2,795 million to an estimated amount of some $9,000 million for 1945. National revenue increased from some $500 million to a total of $2,765 million. There is no doubt that our national wealth is much greater in 1946 than it ever was. In using the other method of calculating national wealth, that of working back to capital values ough income tax returns, we find that the same assertion can be made.

Of course we must consider our national debt of some $15,000 million, most of which was incurred during the war and which therefore, is not represented by corresponding assets. However, this is counterbalanced to some extent by the fact that this loan is mainly held in Canada and is payable in Canadian funds. It is said that during the war Canada repatriated Canadian securities from the United Kingdom to a value of about $1,000 million and has accumulated sterling balances, later converted into a loan, of which there is still owing to Canada some $500 million which is guaranteed by liens on Canadian securities held in the United Kingdom. Therefore our financial situation as far as the United Kingdom is concerned has been converted to our advantage to the extent of $1,500 million. I think everyone who spoke before me concurred in the opinion that our financial situation is actually quite sound.

We have assumed great responsibilities to our own people. There is the interest on our debt, the reestablishment of our veterans, the payment of family allowances and so on. We must face great problems, such as reconversion, housing, great programmes of public works and railway expansion such as has been requested from the other side. After listening to many speeches in this house, I have formed the opinion that many of us are trying to raid the treasury in order to satisfy the demands of our own constituencies that this or that should be provided.

To meet these responsibilities, to solve these problems and to satisfy our constituents we shall need an annual revenue of some $2,000 million, and we shall have to get this from taxes. Taxes are derived from national income and the rate of taxation is in direct proportion to the national income. With a national income of $10,000 million, we must impose taxation at the rate of 20 per cent in order to raise $2,000 million. With an income of only $6,000 million the rate goes up 33⅓ per cent. National income is the yardstick of the comparative severity of taxation. It is a principle of economics that income results only from production. In that I agree with hon. members on the other side. Therefore, to have a high national income we must maintain a large production.

At the close of 1944, Canadian agriculture and industry, despite the shortage of labour, succeeded in meeting war-time requirements —and war was an insatiable consumer. But now reconstruction is taking place and we are faced with this situation, that Canada has become the third largest producing nation of the world. On a per capita basis the Canadian figures exceed those of all the leading world powers. This is a situation that we cannot evade. It is the whole crux of the question. It is an admitted fact that we cannot possibly consume all the goods we produce. We shall have surpluses of agricultural, forest and mineral products. What are we to do with them? Let them glut our domestic market? That was tried in the 1930's and found impractical, to say the least. Or shall we try to trade them? We have been doing that; we are doing that, and we shall keep on doing that.

The importance of our foreign trade has steadily increased since 1939. In 1944, Canada's total trade reached a record value of $5,242,000,000—a more than three-fold increase of the 1939 total of $1,687,000,000. Of course, this was mostly war-time trade. An approximate calculation indicates that seventy-five per cent of it belonged to that category; nevertheless, the remaining twenty-five per cent of peace-time trade was important and played a vital role in sustaining the activities of this country.

Because Canada is one of the least self-sufficient countries, her very existence depends upon making the most of her own specialized resources, and her prosperity also depends on trading them as advantageously as she can for her own requirements. Canada cannot dispense with international trade. Actually we have been trading all over the world; according to the Department of Trade and Commerce, the geographical distribution of Canadian exports has shown some marked changes under war conditions; but the United States and the United Kingdom have retained their position as Canada's best customers. To the United States we have sold much less than we have bought from her. For the last six years our trade with the United States shows an adverse balance of $1,187,852,000. On the other hand, trade within the British empire in the last six years shows a surplus of $4,203,773,000. As in the past we have compensated our deficit of United States dollars with English pounds. Our trade in those two markets, the United States and the United Kingdom, represent about seventy-five per cent of our exports. In consequence of these facts and statistics, I conclude that external trade is a matter of necessity for Canada, and that the United Kingdom is our best customer. The situation is not the effect of the war but a direct result of an old policy of the Liberal party.

This brings me to the second point of view of the lender: the present and future solvency of the borrower.

Up until the war the United Kingdom was the controlling factor in international commerce. The pound sterling was the monetary standard. It is an indisputable fact that the United Kingdom was the most solvent merchant in the world. Has this position deteriorated during the war? Of course it has. As a matter of fact, the United Kingdom from a creditor nation has become a debtor nation. It is estimated that it owes to the world twenty billion dollars. That is an enormous amount, but we have to take into consideration the national income accruing to private persons and to business for the basis of its reimbursement, and the revenue of the government that repays it. That was the rule applied in the case of Canada.

Statistics for the United Kingdom show the net national income of the people and the revenue of the government to be as follows:

	National Income	Government Revenue
1938	£4,604,000,000	£ 883,000,000
1939	4,968,000,000	975,000,000
1940	5,945,000,000	1,258,000,000
1941	6,885,000,000	1,836,000,000
1942	7,604,000,000	2,344,000,000
1943	8,172,000,000	2,876,000,000
1944		3,238,000,000
1945	estimated—	3,265,000,000

The English people are still doing business and paying taxes. Mr. Hugh Dalton, when he presented his budget in the British house yesterday, proved that even with the reduction he was proposing in the income tax the British rates are higher than ours on personal incomes.

We have to consider now what has been the effect of the war on British industry. There has been a six-year interruption of normal processes of trade. Overseas markets have been compelled to supply their own needs and foreign investments have been liquidated. Those are hard facts. But external trade is a matter of necessity for the United Kingdom. With a population of 47,000,000 people it cannot feed itself or supply its industries with essential materials without a large import and export trade. During the war great technological advances have been made, and Germany Italy and Japan have disappeared as competitors for many, many years. Therefore it can safely be concluded that British industry will fast recover and that her exports will find a ready market within the next few years. That is my humble opinion in answer to the second question as to the future solvency of the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom is solvent but it has not the ready cash.

The end of the war and the termination of lend-lease have created great economic problems of reconversion. The main one is to find funds to finance an import balance during the immediate period when foreign receipts will be inadequate to sustain imports at a rate necessary for a fast reconversion. The only nation that has any money to lend is the United States and they have agreed to lend the United Kingdom $4,400 million, out of which $650 million will be in full settlement of lend-lease, surplus war property and other financial claims arising out of the conduct of the war.

Under the terms of the financial agreement, the United States negotiators agree to extend a $3,750 million line of credit to the United Kingdom, to be drawn upon until the 31st of December, 1951. The loan is to be repaid in fifty annual instalments beginning in December 1951 with interest at two per cent per annum; taking account of five interest-free years the rate is actually 1·62 per cent. This Anglo-American agreement was signed on the 6th of December, 1945, subject to ulterior ratification by both governments.

When it was presented to the parliament at Westminster, various voices pronounced it "cruelly hard", mentioned that "it left us with our agricultural programme" and concluded that "we have been forced into a disastrous bargain."

Sir John Anderson, Chancellor of the Exchequer, said: "The agreement was the result of very intricate discussions and of some very hard bargaining". He added, "I think we have had to accept a very hard bargain." Hon. Oliver Lyttelton said: "In many respects the bargain is a thoroughly bad one—the terms are onerous." Mr. Cyril Osborne said it was "an agreement under duress." The Right Hon. Ernest Bevin, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, said he knew that the task of facing this loan left a good many people with a sense of discomfort, but he did not know anybody who ever came away from a money-lender's office and felt comfortable.

The English parliamentarians seem pretty well unanimous that it was not an "outright gift", and they should know.

Canada's cooperation was essential to assure the ratification of the loan by the congress of the United States. Therefore, on the 6th of March last, an Anglo-Canadian agreement was signed at Ottawa. It is on the same terms and conditions as the United States agreement. It complements it and depends on it for its execution.

I think it ought to be ratified. If Canada refuses that credit to its best customer, it is sure to suffer an immediate decrease in its national income and to face terrible unemployment with all its consequences. This opinion has often been voiced in this house, but I am bound to repeat it because it is the absolute truth. It would be a great responsibility for me to refuse my adherence to this measure and risk, as a consequence, to see the farmers and lumbermen of my constituency without a market for their products. It is a good thing to try to obtain new markets, but it would take years to change the course of our external trade.

In conclusion, I wish to add that in my personal opinion this loan is a direct proof of our own sovereignty. It is not the payment of tribute by a vassal to his lord, but it is a business transaction of mutual interest between two friendly nations.

Mr. L. R. BEAUDOIN (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to speak on this measure following the hon. member for Rimouski. In the first place, I wish to congratulate the hon. member upon his wonderful address. I think he has presented his conception of the measure in a comprehensive and realistic manner. I was not going to participate in this debate but, like the hon. member for Rimouski, I feel that some voices from Quebec should be heard in favour of this measure.

This question merits thorough consideration and careful study. It has been explained clearly this afternoon by the Minister of Finance. We have heard about this measure for quite a while: now it is presented to the house in the form of a resolution. Later on, a bill will be introduced and we shall have a further opportunity to discuss the present measure.

I was very much surprised at the speech which was made at the end of the afternoon by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres. He stated at the beginning of his remarks that he was not very well prepared to speak on the matter but that he just wanted to state his opinion of the measure. When he said that, I recalled the advice which he had given to the people of Quebec about the seriousness of certain matters into which one should not go without careful study. I delved into some excerpts from the press, and I picked out this item, which appeared in the Montreal Star on April 10, 1942, when the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres was addressing the people of Quebec on the matter of the plebiscite of 1942. He said:

I submit that several aspects of the question have not been presented to you, and, what is still more serious, you have not been shown the grave consequences which might result from your decision. It may very well be, in fact, that the vote to which you have pledged yourselves may bring results exactly contrary to those you desire.

I would be the last one to speak of this measure in emotional terms. It was a real comfort this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario state that he was considering this measure exclusively on the basis of the interests and the best interests of Canada itself. That is the tone that the Minister of Finance has set on this question, and that is the way that it is understood throughout Canada, that this loan is a good business proposition. But had there been anyone to suggest that the subject of this loan should be presented in emotional terms, I would again have recourse to thoughts expressed by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres as I found them in La Presse of Saturday, April 25, 1942, when he said, and I translate:

Independence would not protect us; on the contrary it would aggravate our obligations and the results of a possible defeat. Look at Belgium! Look at Holland! We are far from there, one might say. Yes, because the English fleet guards the ocean. But without it, what would the defence of our coasts be worth?

These statements of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres should be remembered today. Were we considering this measure otherwise than as a business proposition; were we considering it as a gift, I would be entitled to consent to this measure, under the terms expressed by the hon. member himself, as a gift, and I would consent to it not with interest at two per cent but without any interest at all.

I agree with the hon. member for Rimouski that this measure is only one loan of a group of loans which have already been made in order to restore and maintain our export trade. In the debate on the speech from the throne at the beginning of the session the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg made it clear, and it has been made clearer since, that other loans have been made, about which hon. members who are opposing this measure have never uttered a word. I would repeat, although the hon. member for Rimouski has made it quite clear, what was pointed out by the member for Queens-Lunenburg. namely, that:

Loan agreements have been entered into with England, Belgium, China, Czechoslovakia, the Netherlands, the Netherlands East Indies, Norway and Russia. Furthermore, negotiations are well advanced toward making a very large amount of money available to France.

As part of that policy instituted by the government, in the best interests of Canada, we have this measure for a loan to the United Kingdom. We must understand that the economy of Canada and that of other countries interpenetrate. We cannot live alone. We must understand, in order to support this measure, that global strategy which the minister discussed so ably this afternoon.

The Liberal party is presenting this measure. It is supported by the Conservative party, by the C.C.F. and by the Social Credit party. A great deal of study was given to the question by the government before introducing the measure, and I do not see why certain individuals should rise and speak against the proposal after so many have given it careful consideration and so many people in all sections of the country, realizing what good business it is for Canada, have through their representatives, agreed to the resolution.

Again I will recall the words of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres when he declared in La Presse on Wednesday, January 12, 1938:

(Translation):

A man who stands alone in politics or in any organization is worth nothing at all. What can be expected of an individual who is always changing about and who has such a nasty character he can get along with no one? Personally, I do not trust anyone who is neither with the government nor with the opposition, and is regarded as a one-man party.

(Text):

I know that hon. members are anxious to have this debate concluded and I have no desire to take up any more of the time of the house. Let me say, in conclusion, that I have confidence in the government of the country, and knowing that in every move it makes it does consider the best interests of Canada, I wish on behalf of my constituents to declare that I am very happy to support this measure since I believe that its object is to safeguard the interests of the country.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 28, respecting the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom signed on the sixth day of March, 1946.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. CARDIN: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin for the second reading of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like first of all to say a few words on the Japanese question. I do not wish to dwell very long on that particular aspect of the subject, but I will place myself squarely behind the British Columbia members who have preceded me in this debate. The people of British Columbia are very much concerned over the delay in the application of the policy announced by the government. It seems to me that the government must recognize that delay will bring them further and further into difficulties, and they must very soon come to a decision and carry through their policy.

The government will be more and more under the influence of pressure groups in this connection. I would point out to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), when he receives these pressure groups, that the contest, if there is one, is between the people of British Columbia represented by their members in parliament, who have a responsibility not only to themselves but also to those whom they represent, and those deputations that have a responsibility only to themselves. The people of British Columbia have borne this Japanese problem for many years and for them it might be likened to a red-hot shot. During the war, after years of effort, they succeeded in dumping it on the lap of this government. There is only one thing that the people of British Columbia will not accept, and that is to have this red-hot shot dumped back into their hands to carry it again alone.

So that whatever policy the government eventually decides to adopt—and I hope that it will adopt a policy quickly—that policy cannot be one of forcing back upon us a load which we have carried too long and know too well. That is all I wish to say about the Japanese.

I now turn to the bill itself. First, I should like to refer to the point raised by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) and the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen). I was very much surprised that in introducing the bill the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) did not make any statement as to the discussions he had had with Great Britain and the other members of the commonwealth. I should have thought that in connection with a bill of such importance nothing could be more desirable than that there should be such a discussion; and if the Secretary of State were to take the view I do, surely he would have made that announcement when he introduced the bill. Then, arising out of his remarks in reply to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram), I wish to say that certainly for many years no one on this side of the house has doubted Canada's absolute sovereignty. Certainly there will be no one in the official opposition who will regret that we are taking the lead in the development of empire affairs. But if we are to take such a lead it is of vital importance to a very large number of people in this country that the lead we take and the example we set to the other nations of the commonwealth shall be not only for the good of Canada but also to the advantage of that association which so many of us believe is good for Canada. Therefore, if this bill is to be used as a model for legislation in other countries of the commonwealth it is vital that we do not put any impediment in the way of the free movement of peoples in the empire family.

Mr. MARTIN: Does this bill do that?

Mr. MERRITT: In the five years residence rule it certainly does.

Mr. MARTIN: That has been the law for twenty-seven years.

Mr. FLEMING: Oh, no.

Mr. MERRITT: I shall leave that point and come to another angle of this matter. I am a natural-born Canadian whose forbears were also born in this country. I am entirely Canadian, and I am one of a very large number who are entirely Canadian, yet who say with pride, "I am a British subject." Therefore, I think I may speak for a moment on behalf of that very large class. The Canadian-born British subject is the one class of Canadian that has taken an awful beating in this debate. We have heard much about the glories of all other classes of Canadians, while the Canadian-born who is proud to be a British subject has been accused of various weaknesses in his Canadianism. Well, I think it is very good that matters of this kind should be brought up, because the opinion of others is very good for one's soul. Until this debate I had never realized that my Canadianism was not complete. I do not doubt that it is, even after what has been said, but certainly it will do me good to know there are those who hold such a view.

I welcomed the bill heartily, and I welcome it particularly for the reasons so ably advanced by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll).

I consider that this bill is of tremendous importance, as the hon. member said, to the class of Canadians on whose behalf he spoke; and I can well understand the view he takes when he says many people who have come into this country have not experienced the same sense of nationhood they knew in their native countries in crowded Europe. But I wish to say to the hon. member for Spadina, who, I am sorry, is not in his seat now, that he must not doubt the attachment of native-born Canadians to their birthright. We travel in no shadow of the mother country or of the United States. We are British subjects because and only because we are Canadians; we are not British subjects in spite of being Canadians. The hon. member spoke of "soft, apologetic Canadianism." I must say I have not experienced any such feeling, nor have I ever encountered it in this country. Very often I have met the reverse of soft, apologetic Canadianism, but never that type.

In addition to welcoming the bill, I welcome this debate, during which many frank things have been said. That is a good thing. I have sat silently in this house for some months now and have been amazed and distressed at references to colonialism and slurs on the status of British subjects. I have not been silent because I agreed with those remarks, but rather because I did not understand and therefore did not know how I could answer them. In this debate, however, I think I have heard the reasons which motivated references to colonialism and derogatory remarks about British subjects; and if I do understand them now I might say a word in reply. I gathered from the speeches of the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) and the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) that both hon. gentlemen were of the opinion, although in very different degree, that the status of a British subject meant there was some allegiance to Great Britain or Great Britain's laws as well as allegiance to Canada. If that is so I think I can answer it. I would say that such a view is a complete misconception of law and of fact; and since it is only a misconception that stands between us, nothing really holds us apart. I say perfectly frankly that if dual nationality or allegiance to another country existed owing to my being a British subject; if it meant that Canada was not a sovereign state, I would join with my hon. friends not in destroying the status of a British subject but rather in rectifying it, so that if there were derogations from Canada's sovereignty those derogations would be removed. I wish to say this—and I do not say it for myself, but for all Canadians proud of the status of British subjects—that that status is not to us one of habit or law, or one to be supported simply because we were born to it; it is a status we honour because we believe in it.

We believe in the status of British subject, and as Canadians wish to remain British subjects, because to us the British Empire or the British Commonwealth of Nations, whichever you like to call it, has been for many years in the past, and will be for many years in the future, the greatest bulwark of freedom that exists in this world. We desire to remain British subjects. We are proud of being British subjects now, because to be and to continue to be such is to us the surest way to be and to continue to be free men.

If there was any such misconception that I thought I gathered in the speeches of the hon. members to whom I have referred, it seems to me that the misconception might be based simply upon our use of words. I would point out to the house that where we can refer to citizens of Canada as Canadians or citizens of Brazil as Brazilians, we cannot refer to citizens of the United States of America by any adjectival addition to that country's name. Therefore we call them Americans, although they have no greater right so to be called than have we or the Brazilians. After all, we live in America and we, too, are Americans. But we allow to the United States, for convenience, the national appelation of American.

The same might be said about Great Britain. That country is not Britain; it is the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and one cannot add to that description the suffix "an" and use it conveniently in conversation.

Therefore, particularly in the United States, there has grown up a habit, which I noticed in the debate this afternoon, of referring to the citizens of Great Britain or of the United Kingdom as "the British". Surely that gives rise to a misconception of the term "British". Surely we are imparting to the citizens of Great Britain a status they do not exclusively possess, and that they do not claim exclusively for themselves.

They are not the only British. A British subject is not a citizen of Great Britain, as one hon. member has suggested. I suggest to anyone who doubts that statement that he ask an Englishman what his nationality is. He will say that it is English. And if one were to confuse a Welshman with an Englishman I think there would be a great row from the Welshman.

To drive that point home I would call the attention of the house to the perfect conception of nationality which exists in Scotland where, not only would the Scot be annoyed if he were called an Englishman—I would not dare do it—but also Scotland, although part of the United Kingdom, still has its own law, and still jealously retains many of the attributes of a separate country. So that I do not for a moment think it can be said, with any justification, that a British subject is something which pertains exclusively to Great Britain.

I wish to enlarge upon my conception of the status of British subject. As I said, I am a Canadian and I come from a family which through all Canada's history, long before confederation, has lived in Canada. I have no connection whatsoever with Great Britain. Yet I am a British subject. As a British subject, however, I am not the subject of any nation but Canada. And let me say here, with all sincerity, that no nation holds a greater place in my heart than my own country of Canada.

A British subject, therefore, is not a citizen of the United Kingdom. He is a citizen, rathe, of the British commonwealth of nations. A British subject has one king and one country—not two countries. But he has fraternal affiliations with many countries; he is close to being a world citizen. He is a member of the greatest collection of freely associated nations the world has ever seen. He is an internationalist in a world which is still nationalist, but is groping toward internationalism. He is a member of the first successful united nations organization. I say to the house that the British subject is the prime hope for the future of a free world.

The term is the exclusive possession of no one country, but rather it is the joint possession of many. Although I do not wish to labour this, I might offer another illustration of status, which I think makes it very clear. The hon. member for Outremont and I are both British subjects from Canada. Likewise, an Australian is a British subject from Australia. Mr. Churchill is a British subject from England and Field Marshal Smuts is a British subject from South Africa. Neither Mr. Churchill nor Field Marshal Smuts has any greater claim to the title "British subject" than has any hon. member in the house. Country of origin gives no precedence whatever to that appellation.

Let us for a moment turn to the bill. If the status of British subject is as I have described it, then it is something very much to be prized. It represents freedom; it represents sovereignty, and at the same time it represents the ability to join with other countries in something more than a mere arrangement of convenience for the time being.

When a British subject comes from England to Canada he may, under this bill, if he wishes, remain a British subject from England or, by going through the procedure provided in the bill, he may become a British subject from Canada. If he follows the latter course he assumes allegiance to the law of Canada and at the same time renounces his allegiance to the domestic law of England. Therefore I say he does not become naturalized in the usual sense of the term, but rather he becomes re-nationalized. If that is his status, if the process that he has gone through is different, why should he be lumped together in this bill and be forced to go through exactly the same procedure as must be gone through by an alien? The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) pointed out the other day, I think most cogently, that the period of apprenticeship should not necessarily be the same for the one who has already partaken of a part of our joint heritage and who needs only to familiarize himself with our domestic law in order to be able to fit very well into our national life. That he should be lumped together with the alien is, to my mind, an ungracious act by a government which has not paid sufficient attention to that non-vocal but very large number of people in this country for whom I think I can claim to speak. I say it is an ungracious act because it is an unnecessary act and also because, as far as I know, it is a unilateral act.

At the opening of my remarks I referred to the necessity of consultation with the other nations of the commonwealth before introducing this bill. If we are setting an example to those other nations we must be clear in our minds as to what we are doing if we lump these people together in the cause of sovereignty. I say to the Secretary of State that sovereignty is not something over which to chuck your weight about. I say rather that sovereignty is pure, steady power which needs vivid expression only when it is actually attacked.

I do not think there is anyone in this country or in this house who doubts Canada's absolute sovereignty to-day. We hear about appeals to the privy council and the right to amend our own constitution. But do not let us think that the existence of those limitations on our sovereignty, if they can be called such, are there because of any act committed outside the boundaries of this country. We all know, and if it were not so I would be very angry, that the moment we in this parliament decide to change those things, and decide upon the way we are going to change them, it will be done on the instant with no one objecting and no one able to object to the exercise of our undoubted sovereign power. I hope that out of this debate will come an end to all this talk of colonialism and of the slurs on a status of which a large number of Canadians are very proud indeed.

Having said so much about my pride in being a British subject, I wish to go on and say a few words about why I am proud of that status. The Secretary of State referred to the advantages of having a Canadian passport. I would have the same delight as he would in having my own passport, but I should like to point out to the house that there still are, and will be for many years to come, many places in this world where that passport will have to be executed and where the holder will have to be protected by a British consul or by the might of the British fleet. I use the term "British" as I always try to use it, in its widest and only proper sense. It might be a New Zealand consul, or it might be the South African fleet, but I think we shall find they are all British and all one when trouble occurs.

I should like to refer to the statement which is often made, and which has been made by myself, as to the fact that Great Britain, or as we often say wrongly, England, stood in the breach alone before Hitler. A vast part of the forces which stood in the breach alone before Hitler was forces of the United Kingdom. That was so because they were by far the most powerful country in the family of British nations. But at the same time there were Canadian forces in England; there were New Zealand forces in England and there were Australian forces in the middle east. It is right to say, and I think we can take pride in saying it without taking away from Great Britain any credit which is due to her, that it was the British Commonwealth of Nations which stood in the breach alone against Hitler. That makes me proud of being a British subject.

Let me talk a little more personally about trouble and how the British family reacts in trouble. I got into trouble and I was a prisoner in Germany. While there, I was able to confirm the views I had always held about the value of my status as a British subject. I remember my arrival at the British officers' camp in Germany. I was in a semi-starved condition; I had no clothes other than those in which I stood; I had no toothbrush and I was very dirty. Although perhaps I should not have been, I must admit that I was very low in spirit. I was accompanied by fellow-Canadians who spoke the French tongue, among whom I had several very good friends. We did not have to wait for five years for admission into the British family. We did not have to wait five minutes. We were given food, clothes and all the facilities at the command of that camp before we got into it. These things were thrown over the barbed-wire fence to us when we were confined in a separate compound. We were showered with food and clothing and conveniences. But, most of all, we were showered with the kindness which can be shown only by members of one great family.

In one of the camps in which I was there were men who were nationals of other nations. There was not the same feeling between those allies as there was between members of the nations in the British commonwealth. We gave them as much as we kept to ourselves. We were their friends, and we liked to meet them and talk with them and learn their points of view. But always there was that barrier, that they were friends and not brothers, and when you are in difficulty, Mr. Speaker, it is nice to be among brothers.

In that camp, which as I say was a British camp, we were South Africans, Australians, New Zealanders, English, Scottish, Irish, Welsh, Rhodesians, Palestinians, Indians, and Canadians not only of British and French extraction but naturalized Canadians bearing European names. We lived together and were chained together, and we took precedence and command according to our ranks, not in our own armies, not in the Canadian army or the Australian army, but according to the date of appointment of our ranks in the army of the whole British commonwealth. We meshed in completely, but despite that meshing in, our nationalities remained distinct. We remained distinctly Canadian; the Australians remained distinctly Australians, and I, for all my pride at being a British subject, was not at all backward in keeping the Canadian viewpoint advanced against the viewpoint of other commonwealth nations. But although sometimes we did divide internally, when it came to a matter affecting the enemy we had a common front and we were one in trouble. That is the great advantage of this status.

I wish to end on this note, with one further illustration. Late in the war, when the nazi government, in its desperation for trained men in its air force, took from our camp into the hands of the gestapo in Prague certain Czechoslovakians who were serving in the R.A.F.—and incidentally spoke much better

German than they did English—and threatened them with death if they did not volunteer to serve in the German air force, those Czechoslovakian pilots said, "No, we are British subjects; we wear the British uniform and you cannot ask us to do that, and you cannot harm us if we refuse." And, Mr. Speaker, each one of those Czechoslovakian pilots was returned unharmed into our camp from the hands of the gestapo. That, to me, seemed cogent evidence of the value of the status of which I speak.

So I say, let us understand our situation. Let us not delude ourselves with doubts about a sovereignty that we have and that we cherish. There are those amongst us, and I say it with all respect to them, who fail to understand that the full expression of Canadian sovereignty does not require any diminution of the status of a British subject, nor does pride in being a British subject lessen our essential Canadianism. On the contrary, the status of both increases with an increase in Canadian sovereignty. The whole essence of the meaning of the term "British subject" is freedom itself, and you cannot have freedom without absolute sovereignty.

If we look at history, we find that the ground on which the tree of Canadian sovereignty was grown was tilled first by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Cartier. That ground was hard and stony ground because in those days there was a real sense in Great Britain that Canada was a colony. Sir John A. Macdonald had to fight and struggle; and fight and struggle he did, until he caused the then colonial office to realize that Canada did not intend to remain in any status other than that of a sovereign state.

After Sir John A. Macdonald's work, and he did the hardest part of the work, Sir Wilfrid Laurier came and tended the tree, and it grew. His also was a hard task, comparable with that of Sir John A. Macdonald. He carried on in the same tradition that had been Canada's tradition since the days of confederation, and under his care the tree grew strong and tall.

Then. in the last war, by the efforts of Canadian soldiers on the battlefields of Europe the fruit of that tree was ripened and was first plucked perhaps by Sir Robert Borden at the peace conference. That process has gone on until now there is very little, if any, fruit still left to be plucked; but if there is, then we must do it if we are to be true British subjects.

The sovereignty we all prize, Canadians all, was not won by any single man or by any single party. It was won by the feeling of all Canadians of every race that we must be a sovereign state. It was pioneered and led, not by one man alone, but by several men, and in particular by two great men of the French race and two great men of the English race.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MERRITT: I have practically finished, Mr. Speaker. I only wish to say, in conclusion, that I hope out of this bill we can establish a status that will settle all doubts and differences between us as to the way in which we all hold our sovereignty. Then we can go on, in national unity, to the great future which lies ahead for Canada. Canada, in the British Commonwealth of Nations may be not one of the minor partners, but one who in due time will assume the lead in the commonwealth of nations which will play the greatest part in making a reality out of the united nations organization.

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree by any means with many statements which have been made so far in this debate, and for that reason I shall ask the indulgence of the house for a few moments.

We are now dealing with bill No. 7, an act respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens, which is now referred to as the Canadian Citizenship Act. This bill had its first reading some three weeks ago, on March 31. It is divided into seven parts and forty-seven sections, and the principles of the bill are directly related to about seven different items. It deals with natural-born Canadian citizens, Canadian citizens other than natural-born, loss of Canadian citizenship, status of citizens and recognition of British subjects, status of aliens, and the method of procedure and evidence, as well as a schedule defining the oath of allegiance.

This bill is undesirable for the reason that it takes away from British subjects a privilege which they have had and which they enjoy to-day.

Mr. MARTIN: What privilege does it take away?

Mr. KIDD: I will tell the minister, if he will follow me. If this bill passes as recommended by the Secretary of State, it will mean that British subjects throughout the empire will probably go to Australia or New Zealand in preference to Canada. This bill has been the sounding-board and is the instrument to make known to this house and to Canada that there is in this house an anti-British following who are not desirous of giving preference to British subjects.

I welcome the opportunity to say something on this bill. The statement has been made, with reference to Japanese now domiciled in Canada, that the predicament and the embarrassing position in which the government now finds itself may be relieved by the passing of this bill. I wonder whether the bringing forward of this measure at the present time has any bearing on the Japanese question.

Mr. MARTIN: Not a bit.

Mr. KIDD: All right. Some supporters of the government could not avoid blushing to hear the various anti-British expressions which have already been used in this debate. After the next few months, when the troops have returned home from overseas and are settled in civilian life, Canadian immigration policy will likely be relaxed to admit many British people who are desirous of coming to this country. Under the provisions of the proposed bill these men cannot become citizens of the country until they have resided here for five years, and they will, therefore, be unable to vote in dominion or provincial elections held during that period.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member knows that is not right.

Mr. KIDD: The minister knows the five-year clause.

Mr. MARTIN: It has nothing to do with the elections act at all.

Mr. KIDD: It has. Let the minister follow me. I should like to draw to his attention the immigration set-up as it existed in the ten years following 1930. There entered into Canada about 150,000 annually, or, in that decade, a total of one and a half million immigrants. One hundred thousand annually were aliens and the other fifty thousand annually were from Great Britain and the empire, or put it in this way, for every three immigrants entering Canada one was British and two were of foreign extraction. In the same period we lost 100,000 citizens annually to the United States. This means that the best citizens Canada produced, boys and girls of Canadian families, educated in our collegiate institutes, our technical schools and our universities, went across the border to find positions for themselves and their families. For every British immigrant entering Canada two Canadian citizens went to the United States. This is a state of affairs which we should not allow to occur again. Just as our immigration policy in that period was anti-British, so is this proposed bill, and I tell the Secretary of State that we have already had two indications of a government attempting to pilot through the house this most contentious bill. A citizenship bill was introduced by a previous secretary of state, Hon. C. H. Cahan, in 1931, but it was withdrawn, and—

Mr. MARTIN: It was not the same bill at all.

Mr. KIDD: I know it was not the same bill, but it had to do with citizenship. The urgency to-day is no greater than it was at that time. Two other contentious bills, one dealing with the flag and the other seeking to abolish Dominion day, have already been brought forward this session. I would refer particularly to the procedure in dealing with the Canada day bill, which was sponsored by a private member and was piloted successfully through the house in one afternoon and evening. The present bill is also contentious, and I tell the Secretary of State that he might have been well advised to have left this to the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote) who did such a good job in support of the government.

Though it has been recalled recently, I would briefly refer to the part played by Great Britain in world war I and world war II. In world war I Russia was an ally, but dropped out before the war was finished. In world war II she did not enter until after the war had continued for months. In world war I France was on the side of Britain; in world war II she capitulated to Germany nine months after the war commenced. The United States did not enter either world war I or world war II until some time after those wars commenced. In the last war Great Britain and the empire stood alone against Germany for over a year. This must not be forgotten. This is not a time for the House of Commons to enact legislation taking from British subjects entering Canada the rights they have enjoyed for generations. British subjects throughout the world should not be placed for immigration purposes in the same category as aliens who fought against the empire.

May I recall to the house something which Canada should not overlook, the part played by her troops on at least two occasions. Canada declared war in August, 1914, and September, 1939. Canada owes much to those men who in 1914 and 1939 formed the first and second divisions. The majority of these men were of British stock. If I may make a personal reference, I remember well, as do some other members of this house, the first inspection by Their Majesties of the first Canadian division on a Saturday afternoon in November, 1914, on Salisbury plain. With Their Majesties the King and Queen were Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener. I wish to mention particularly the Princess Pats. The majority of these men were South African veterans who freely volunteered to serve Canada and the empire. They were marked by the ribbons they wore. The key men in nearly every section, company and brigade were veterans. A few weeks later, in April, 1915, the same troops, at Ypres, when the Germans launched their famous first gas attack, made a name for Canada, and from that very moment Canada's prestige in the empire has steadily grown.

What happened in 1914 repeated itself in 1939. The men of the first and second divisions were veteran volunteers, the majority being of British stock.

Let us also not forget that it was the British navy in the fall of 1914 and in 1939 that delivered Canada's first division safely to England. Reference was made to that a few minutes ago in the loan debate, and I shall not refer to it at length. But I would say this. Deputations from Canada have visited the empire year in and year out since confederation. Even since the last session representatives of Canada were in England. The part which our Canadian soldiers overseas played in world war I and world war II has done more to cement Canada to the empire than all the deputations and conferences held before or since.

Let me give one illustration. We had in Kingston a unit of the empire air training scheme, No. 14, which was the first and largest fleet air training school in Canada. There were 100 classes of about fifty each, which meant 5,000 men training there for the R.A.F. fleet air arms. These boys served in the most hazardous branch of the service. What happened during these four years? Many of them, not dozens but scores of them married Canadian girls. Many went overseas and many of them wish to return to Canada. Why should those boys be placed in the same category as aliens who have to wait for five years before being granted the franchise? No finer citizens will enter Canada than the 30,000 or 40,000 war brides who wish to find new homes here at the present time. We must not overlook the thousands of Canadian brides who married British soldiers and soldiers of our allies and who would like to return to Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: Every one of those, under the bill, will become a citizen.

Mr. KIDD: It will take five years.

Mr. MARTIN: No, not at all.

Mr. KIDD: I say that this bill should not take away, from our British subjects coming to Canada, the privilege they now enjoy. The Secretary of State, in his explanation of the bill, seemed to go out of his way when he said:

> One thing we hope to do, following the passage of this measure, is to provide a more effective and impressive ceremony for admission into the Canadian family.

I say to the Secretary of State that in view of the fact that nearly one million aliens entered Canada in the ten-year period of the thirties, the question flashes through one's mind: Why was not this ceremony carried out in the past when taking the oath of allegiance as British subjects as is now proposed?

An hon. MEMBER: The Bennett government was in power.

Mr. KIDD: For five years. Since the last session of parliament Canada was represented by members of the government in London. Heading the deputation were the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin). What happened there? Apparently the Secretary of State was not too favourably impressed by Canada's relationship and responsibility to the mother country. We have him returning from the old country, and the first major piece of legislation, contentious as it is, is tabled and sponsored in his name. He evidently set out to discard British preference in regard to British immigration.

Tuesday last developed into a Japanese and British Columbia day. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) did not hesitate to state where he differed with the government on this bill. The fact that bill No. 7 has been sponsored by the government makes it difficult, if not impossible, for government supporters to take any other position than a party view of it. This afternoon I went into the library and looked up the Globe and Mail, because I happened to be in London in 1937 during the conference there. We have heard a good many things said in connection with this bill and something flashed through my mind regarding what had taken place at that conference. I am sorry I have not the clipping because I did not know that I would be referring to the matter at this moment. However, take the Globe and Mail for the month of May, 1937, and you will find that at that conference the statesmen were dealing with the question of citizenship, which occupied a great deal of their time. On that occasion the premier of South Africa shot a question at the meeting which took them all by surprise. He wanted to know what the definition of "British subject" was and no one could answer him. A committee was appointed and a former Minister of Justice was made chairman, while the British attorney general, whose name has slipped my memory, spoke for twenty-five minutes on the subject of British citizenship. After the discussion was over, they did not seem to be much farther ahead. What took place in 1937 at that conference only convinces us that this citizenship bill is a contentious one and something that should not be rushed through the house hurriedly but should be studied from all angles.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I should like to contribute a few words to the discussion of this bill. I am absolutely in support of the principle of it. As a child I had my education partly in the old country, in Scotland, and here also in this country. I think a lot of the race I come from in Scotland, but I also think a great deal of the country in which I was born, Canada. I also realize that this country comprises many men and nationalities and that here we still have to write down, when we are asked to furnish information on going to the United States on a visit, that we are British subjects. We are still known by our racial origin, and it is about time that this country grew up and that we became just Canadians.

In the United States, no matter whether a man be an Italian or a Czechoslovakian, he is always an American and there is no deviation from that. We here in Canada should have the same spirit and be known as Canadians.

The tradition of the old country has in some respects held back the development of this country in so far as working-class conditions are concerned. I am now referring to the merchant marine. In the building of freighters, which we constructed during the war, 10,000-tonners, we followed the good old British traditions of putting the galley amidships and the mess hall at the front of the boat, and you had to lug the food across the open deck. Imagine what it would be like in the middle of winter on the north Atlantic! An American would have enough sense to put the galley and the mess hall in one part, but we have to follow the tradition of the British navy and the time of Lord Nelson.

That may be a small thing, but it means a great deal to the men working on the ship. I suggest that we here should establish our own traditions on the North American continent. I am not so much concerned about a national viewpoint. I am thinking of the spirit of the people of the whole North American continent. It is something distinctive and we should follow along our own lines.

There has also been too great a tendency on the part of those who have been British-born or who have come of British stock to rub it into the other fellow. I shall never forget the time I was working on a threshing outfit in southern Alberta. There I saw Dutchmen, Belgians, Czechoslovakians and Poles. One Englishmen had preceded me on the job and he claimed that he was the only white man there. That is the sort of thing that must stop if we expect to have a united nation.

In the speeches that have been made on this bill, especially by members from British Columbia, hon. gentlemen seem to have suffered from violent attacks of yellow fever. I come from Skeena, a federal riding, a fishing district which produces as much fish as any riding in that province, and in spite of the Jap issue they elected me. Let me explain the reason they did so. They found out a long time ago what was the secret of it. Like the other members from British Columbia I am absolutely opposed to the Japs going back to the coast, but for a reason. In the last election, if it had not been for the Jap issue the poor Conservatives and Liberals would not have known what to talk about; they would have been absolutely bankrupt. The fishermen on that coast suffered during the depression; fish went down to around two cents a pound, and the full hatred of the fishermen was turned to the Japs, their fellow workers. But when the crisis begins to become apparent in this system, as it will with mathematical certainty, I hope there will be no Japs on the coast on whom to blame it. This time the people will know the cause of the trouble.

I went back to British Columbia during the last provincial campaign. The last lone Liberal there, Mr. Pattullo, was in desperate circumstances. He came out with this line of propaganda, that if the C.C.F. got in they would allow the big companies to bring the Japanese back into the canneries. It was my duty to tell the people that if the C.C.F. got in there would be no big fish packing companies. But he lost, and again the Japanese were the main issue in that area.

What I want to see brought out clearly is that there is no difference among the workers in this country, whether we be black or yellow or red. We all suffer under the same system, and soon we are going to realize that. Sir James Orr says that in a couple of years we shall have complete collapse of commodity prices unless such prices are fixed internationally. If that collapse becomes apparent on the coast within the next two years the fishermen will realize once and for all who are the real Japs. A year before the election I attempted to go on the radio with a speech in which I wanted to say that after the war with Japan was over and won our first act would be to put Hirohito back on the throne. The C.B.C. censor, who said that he was not a censor but that he just checked things, censored that speech and said that such a statement was seditious. I was in the army, and he was not; but they did put Hirohito back on the throne, and these governments here did trade with Hirohito even after we had declared war on Germany. Therefore in the final analysis, putting Hirohito back on the throne showed more of a community of interest with the ruling class of Japan than with their own workers here.

This citizenship bill is a step in the right direction. I hope it will mark the beginning of a united Canada.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I did not really expect to be called on to speak to-night, Mr. Speaker; I thought there was a long list ahead of me, but I do not want to miss the opportunity of saying a word or two on this particular measure. It is not very often that one in this corner of the house is able to agree so wholeheartedly with the present government, but I wish to congratulate the government and the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) on this bill. It is peculiar to note that at infrequent intervals during the life of this government they have shown flashes of brilliance, but their inspiration has come from only one source. Many years ago there sat in this house, with a smaller group and under a somewhat different name but with just about the same philosophy, a gentleman from Winnipeg named Mr. Woodsworth. He was keen to have the old age pension brought into effect, and as a result of his constant pressure the Liberal government of that time finally gave us old age pensions. They were not very good ones, but still it indicated that the government were susceptible to such propositions after a great deal of pressure, and, of course, if they thought it would do them good politically. Then, after another long period, following constant pressure by progressive people on this side of this house and throughout the country—I did not say Progressive Conservatives but progressive people—the same government finally brought in the family allowances measure. That was another good step; the allowances were not good enough, but they were far better than nothing at all.

I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is to be commended for the selection of his Secretary of State (Mr. Martin). I do not make that statement in order to obtain any applause either for myself or for the minister, but simply to point out that apparently the hon. gentleman is open to inspiration, and is able to convince the government that something good should be adopted. He has now brought in this citizenship bill. I wish to read from a little pamphlet; and then I will give the name of it.

> The C.C.F. again pledges itself to . . . the adoption of a distinctive national flag and national anthem and the necessary legal provision for Canadian citizenship.

This little book is called the "C.C.F. Manifesto", and was drawn up at the C.C.F. national convention held in Montreal a year ago last November and early December. So that the government can be congratulated on being able to accept suggestions of this kind, and on being able to select from the platform of another party the things they consider good. We hope that some day they may take more from our platform; in fact we believe it would be an extremely good thing if they would read this little book all the way through and adopt everything it suggests.

To Canadian-born citizens like myself I believe this measure is very welcome. I welcome it not only for reasons of national pride, because a person should not have too much national pride just because he was born here. I cannot be proud of being born here because I had nothing to do with it, but can feel very lucky to have been born in a country like Canada and to have grown up among the kind of people we have here, those who were born here and those who have come here from other lands. I believe those who like myself were born here will welcome this for another reason. As I grew up I made up my mind that never, under any circumstances, no matter what the law says—and I am a law-abiding citizen—would I ever give any nationality to any government official on any question but that of Canadian; and I never have. I do not know whether I can be arrested for breaking that law, but I make the statement that I have never given any other nationality than Canadian, and if this bill should not pass I will still stick to that. No one will ever get me to say anything else without putting me in a torture chamber. I could not do anything else; I have to be a Canadian or I am nothing at all, and I refuse to accept that alternative.

Possibly the people who can be proudest of this bill are those who have come here from other shores. They at least can say they exercised their intelligence and chose the country in which they wanted to live. Their coming here has been a compliment to Canada, a compliment to those who were born here and a compliment to their own intelligence in wanting to live here. They have made a great contribution to this country, and I am sure they must feel gratified, after having chosen to come to these shores, that now they will be able to call themselves what they wanted to be.

So far as the Japanese question is concerned, let me say that I am not closely associated with it at the present time. However, I should like to tell hon. members from British Columbia, from whichever side of the house they come, that I remember the question quite well around thirty-five years ago when I was a very young man. I was working in British Columbia then for wages, and I remember that when the Japanese came in there at that time they were welcomed by the employers.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap labour.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, they were cheap labour. They were hired for cheap wages when they were swinging the rigging on the old donkey-engines for the big timber companies. The rest of us, if we were not able to work on the springboard, or at the higher type of work, had to compete with them in the lower work. But the employers welcomed them then.

Since then, they have shown themselves in many respects capable of competing with our own people in different lines of business. Probably because of this they are not so well liked. However, I am not going to discuss the question from the British Columbia point of view; rather I shall leave that to the intelligence of the house, when a vote in the matter is called.

But I do wish to say this, that, with my limited knowledge of Canadians of Japanese origin, I could not now possibly support some of the statements we have heard from British Columbia about the poor citizens their Canadians of Japanese origin are likely to make. We have a few families of these people in the constituency in which I live. Some of them are in business; some are market gardeners; some are on farms, and some are at labouring work. Every one of those citizens is well liked in his community. They are good men.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): We can give you lots of 'hem.

[Mr. Bentley.]

Mr. BENTLEY: Our premier in Saskatchewan has, I believe indicated that we are willing to take some.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): We have an unlimited supply.

Mr. BENTLEY: No, you have not an unlimited supply, but you have quite a number of them. Possibly they will like to come to Saskatchewan; possibly they will not. But let me say this to the house, that there is one elderly Canadian gentleman of Japanese origin who sits with me in the Canadian legion, a veteran of the last war, of the Princess Patricia Canadian Light Infantry. That same Canadian Japanese citizen is liked by all the Canadian legionnaires around there. He is received and accepted in all circles, the same as any other individual out there. But he is a practical farmer, a good farmer. He has a wife and family, and one of his boys was killed in the Canadian forces in this war. Does anyone here think for one moment that I am ever going to cast a vote which will throw a reflection upon that kind of individual? It certainly would not be fair to do so. That is the way I feel about these people.

This bill carries with it a great many privileges and responsibilities. One of those privileges is the right to vote, and the responsibility is the obligation to vote and to try to understand what one is voting on. Those are two things which go with citizenship, and should not be forgotten.

The fact that the bill, as described by the Secretary of State, is to provide for some kind of ceremony and initial training for these people to teach them the responsibilities connected with their privileges is all to the good. I believe the newcomers will welcome it, and be the better for it.

They have another privilege, the right to do useful work. That is an important privilege in the citizenship of any country—the right to work at useful work. They have no right to be thrown on the bread-line every so often when the system under which we operate refuses to work. If they are to be citizens they have the right to work. Then they have the obligation to accept useful work. Their jobs should be there, and they have the right to take them, and also the obligation.

They have the right to education and training to make them more useful in some useful job and to make them useful and valuable citizens in the community. They have the right to training to the extent of their ability to learn that to which their training is directed. They have the obligation which goes with that, that of educating themselves to the best of their ability, according to the facilities made available to them for that purpose. That is a privilege and a responsibility, right there.

They have the right to security and comfort to the fullest extent of Canada's ability to produce the goods and services needed for security and comfort, regardless of their ability to work. That is right in line with the resolution placed before the house by an hon. member opposite.

With that obligation goes the obligation of all citizens, whether they were born here, or whether they came here later, or are newcomers recently arrived, of contributing to the comfort and security of the less fortunate among our citizens.

If this citizenship bill will impress upon the people the fact that these privileges are accompanied by obligations, then I think we have one of the measures to which the people of Canada have been looking forward for a long time. Let me again remind the house that this was part of the programme of the party to which I belong, of hon. members sitting in this corner of the house. Because of that, and for other reasons I have mentioned, I believe there will be no difficulty in our supporting the measure.

On motion of Mr. MacNicol the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 12, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESSES IN SENATE CHAMBER THIS DAY TO BE PRINTED IN HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have a brief motion to make which speaks for itself. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has kindly consented to second it. It reads:

That the speech of His Excellency the Right Honourable Viscount Alexander of Tunis, G.C.B., Governor General of Canada, together with the address of welcome read by the Prime Minister in the Senate chamber this morning, be printed as an appendix to the official report of debates of the House of Commons, and form part of the permanent record of this parliament.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to second the motion of the Prime Minister. In doing so I might say that I observed in the proceedings this morning that there was no word of greeting to His Excellency in the French language. In view of the fact that under the British North America Act we have two official languages in this house, I should like to suggest that these proceedings be printed in both languages.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend and to the house that on these matters precedent is followed. All arrangements are made by a committee, of which the chairman usually is the Under-Secretary of State. I have asked Mr. Coleman with respect to the proceedings and he has given me a memorandum in which he says that he had carefully looked into the matter before the arrangements were made and that the records in the department indicate that previous governors general have said a few words in French only on occasions when the installation took place at Quebec. On those occasions addresses of welcome were presented on behalf of the city and the province, which were in French, and normally the Governor General replied to these by speaking briefly in that language. In the case of Lord Tweedsmuir this occurred. In the case of the Earl of Athlone, who was sworn in in the senate chamber, and the Earl of Bessborough, who was sworn in at Halifax, their addresses in reply were entirely in English. From the above it would appear that the proceedings of this morning were in accordance with precedent.

Of course I am only too prepared to take the responsibility for all the proceedings, and, in particular for the address of welcome having been presented only in English this morning, but I can assure my hon. friend that there was no discourtesy intended either to His Excellency the Governor General or to our friends from the province of Quebec or any other part of Canada.

Mr. BRACKEN: There was no suggestion of any discourtesy on the part of anyone to anyone; there was only a suggestion that these proceedings be printed in both languages.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They will as a matter of course. Hansard is printed in both languages.

Mr. POULIOT: Don't take it too high. Give a calling down to Coleman.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ADVANCE FOR PURCHASE OF 200,000 SHARES OF T.C.A. CAPITAL STOCK

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table, in accordance with chapter 31 of the statutes of 1945 copy of order in council P.C. 1280, of April 5, 1946, authorizing a further advance to Canadian National Railways to enable the company to subscribe for an additional 200,000 shares ($20,000,000) of the capital stock of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

UNITED NATIONS

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION—CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in view of the widespread public discussion at the present time with regard to UNRRA, I thought that the house might be interested in having a brief report regarding the Canadian contribution to UNRRA.

Canada's total contribution to UNRRA up to March 31, 1946, was $154,000,000. Of this amount, ten per cent has been reserved as UNRRA free funds expendable in any part of the world. The balance reserved for expenditure in Canada is, therefore, $138,600,000. As of March 31 of this year, $119,000,000 has been committed by various government departments and agencies leaving approximately $19,000,000 uncommitted, of which it is estimated that ten per cent should be removed for freight storage and handling charges. The exact figure of the balance available for future purchases on March 31 was $17,350,532.87.

Hon. members will be interested to know in greater detail how this $119,000,000 has been committed. A sum of $27,500,000 has been set aside for the purchase of wheat and grain; $16,000,000 for meat and more than $2,500,000 for seeds and milk. The grain has been purchased by the wheat and grain division of this department, and the seeds, meat and milk by the Department of Agriculture. The Department of Munitions and Supply has contracted for $2,300,000 worth of electrical equipment. The Canadian Export Board have made commitments on behalf of UNRRA for $56,500,000 worth of goods under the following headings:

Farm machinery	$ 3·4
Clothing, textiles, footwear	6·8
Miscellaneous supplies	7·1
Medical supplies	3·1
Trucks	20·5
Miscellaneous food	1·9
Soap	4·1
Fish	9·6
Total	$56·5

In addition, freight charges will amount to about $13,500,000, of which slightly more than half will be for inland freight. The total Canadian contribution to UNRRA has been paid as of March 31, and has been largely expended or committed as outlined above so that only slightly more than $17,000,000 remains available for future purposes.

In addition to Canada's own contribution to UNRRA, we have found it possible to make available for UNRRA purchases, above and beyond the amounts already mentioned, goods to the value of nearly $67,500,000. This amount includes $27,000,000 worth of wheat; approximately $16,000,000 worth of trucks; more than $2,000,000 worth of canned fish; nearly $2,000,000 worth of shoes; more than $1,500,000 worth of metals; about $14,000,000 worth of meat and smaller amounts of other items including some clothing, some surplus textiles, asbestos, ambulances and an allowance of $1,500,000 for ocean freight. Thus it will be seen that nearly $200,000,000 worth of goods have been made available in Canada for UNRRA up to the end of the last fiscal year.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, arising out of the statement just made by the minister, may I ask two questions? Can the minister advise us whether the other countries contributing to UNRRA have paid their allotments in full, and will he say under what authority this last $67,000,000 was advanced?

Mr. MacKINNON: Answering the latter question first, there was no special authority necessary. The supplies were available in Canada and were purchased by the Canadian Export board for UNRRA.

Mr. BRACKEN: These are purchases, not gifts?

Mr. MacKINNON: They were purchases in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Purchased by UNRRA, or by the countries to which they were being sent?

Mr. MacKINNON: Purchased for UNRRA in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: But paid for out of the money we contributed?

Mr. MacKINNON: Paid for out of UNRRA funds. These purchases in Canada were not necessarily limited to the amount of money contributed by Canada. Answering my hon. friend's other question, I have no idea whether or not all the countries have paid their total commitments to UNRRA. I saw in the press recently that two or three countries had met their commitments, but I have no detailed information on the matter.

Mr. BRACKEN: Our representative to UNRRA ought to have the information. I suggest that the minister should get it and let us have it.

With respect to the provision of $154,000,000 by Canada for UNRRA, and this other $67,000,000, I gather that the minister did not mean to leave the impression that we had ourselves contributed over $200,000,000, but that we had provided $154,000,000, and that out of other UNRRA funds $67,000,000 of extra goods had been purchased in Canada.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am sure the leader of the opposition when he looks over my statement in Hansard will see that that is what I said.

Mr. POULIOT: I should not like to be an intruder, but may I ask the minister if he would be kind enough to give the house a statement later showing the number of automobiles and trucks which have been given to each country as Canada's share?

Mr. MacKINNON: I will take that into consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister will perhaps recall that at the meeting of the general assembly in London the whole question of contributions by various countries to UNRRA came up, and a special resolution was passed in one of the committees on which my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) sat. I listened to the debate on that occasion. A number of countries had not made their full contribution, and the purpose of the resolution which was brought forward by Mr. Bloom, representing the United States of America, was to stimulate and encourage various countries to bring their payments up to date. The Secretary of State has a wide knowledge of this matter, and I think he will agree that the parliament of Canada ought to be given a full explanation of the position of other nations so that we can see whether their obligations under the original agreement have been carried out.

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS

REVOCATION OF ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 4671

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): I wish to announce that order in council P.C. 4671 of the 7th June, 1943, was revoked to-day. This order provided that the only statutory holidays which "should be observed by employers and employees" during the war were to be New Year's day, Good Friday, Dominion day, Labour day, Thanksgiving day and Christmas day. The same order similarly restricted the number of statutory holidays to be observed by the public service of Canada and those which were during the period indicated to be legal holidays or non-juridical days within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act.

As a result of the action now taken, the definition of "holiday" in the Interpretation Act is again in full effect. The holidays to be observed by the public service are again those enumerated in section 45 of the Civil Service Act, and again are those to be observed as legal holidays or non-juridical days. The result will be that, among others, Easter Monday and Victoria day will be observed as statutory holidays this year.

With regard to Remembrance day, the Minister of Veterans Affairs in particular has been in consultation with the national veterans organizations of the country. It seems desirable that before a definite decision with regard to that day be made, full consultation with veterans organizations should be proceeded with. Some of these organizations are holding annual meetings—one, early in May—and as soon as the veterans have had an opportunity of conferring further with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, in particular, a definite policy with regard to that day and, I may say, a definite decision with regard to holidays generally other than those covered by the present announcement, will be made.

Mr. POULIOT: What about Boxing day?

Mr. HAZEN: Is an employee entitled to a holiday with pay on these statutory holidays?

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may answer that, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of arrangement between the employer and the employee, and that has always been so, notwithstanding the order in council which my hon. friend the Secretary of State has just mentioned. Where the holidays are enumerated in an agreement between the employer and the employee, that practice has been followed.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RATES OF INTEREST

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Soldier Settlement Act to provide that a soldier settler within the provisions of the Act who served in world war II who has not abandoned his land and whose agreement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned, and a soldier settler who did not serve in world war II who has not abandoned his land and whose agreement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned, shall be charged in the case of the soldier settler of world war II a rate of interest of three and one-half per centum per annum in respect of his agreement made under the act after the standard date in the year 1942 or the date of his enlistment whichever is the earlier and in the case of a soldier who did not serve in world war II a rate of interest of three and one-half per centum per annum after the standard date in the year 1944.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. BROOKS: In connection with this resolution, when the matter was brought to the attention of the house yesterday the minister asked that it be allowed to stand. My impression at that time was that he was asking that it stand in order that there might be further consideration in the veterans committee. The matter was to be further considered by the veterans committee, and there were other representations to be made, as I understood, by a delegation from the soldier settlers. I would ask the minister if this should not stand until these representations have been made.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was quite aware of the point raised by my hon. friend. The intention would be that whatever recommendation came from the veterans committee would be considered and then, if approved, introduced by way of amendment at the proper time.

Motion agreed to.
